On page 16, after devoting several pages to the whole question of inspection, the report contains these words:

The government inspector, who inspected the ship annually, and his superior, were of opinion that if two hydrants on a particular deck were not sufficiently close to a particular point to enable two separate hoses to be brought to bear on such a locality, the regulation would be satisfied if it would be possible to bring a hose from the deck above or the deck beneath. In practice this had never been done at any fire drill and, in my opinion, such an operation should not have been relied on . . .

Then on page 17—and all this part deals with the question of regulations, inspections, and compliance with the law—I see these words:

As to regulation 6, which deals with the provision for making available two powerful jets of water in the coal bunker spaces, boiler rooms and engine rooms, there was only one hydrant capable of supplying a single hose in the engine room and boiler rooms. The inspector said in evidence that in that situation he could not say that regulation had been complied with, although the certificate which he issued to the owners states that the statute had been complied with.

In other words, according to the evidence of the inspector he could not actually substantiate an important certificate which stated that a statute, upon which human safety depended, had been complied with.

Again, after reviewing the subject further, and going into further details of safety measures which were not carried out, I come to these words on page 18:

The inspection consisted of lifting up each extinguisher for the purpose of seeing whether or not it had been charged and in turning two or three upside down to ascertain if they would operate. It was impossible for the inspector therefore to say, from such an inspection, that the requirements of the regulation as to the provision of the necessary number of extinguishers "in each enclosed space occupied by passengers or crew" on each deck, had been satisfied. Such an inspection does not attain the real purpose of the regulation, namely, that a sufficient number of fire extinguishers ready for instant use shall be in position on each deck.

Then, in a discussion of the subject of pumps, I come to these words in the report:

The Noronic, at the time of the fire, had complied with this regulation as to the number of pumps, but all three considered by the inspector as complying with the regulation were in fact "fitted in the same space," contrary to the express provision of the regulation.

By virtue of the fact that they were fitted in the same space, they did not comply with the regulation. I am going to refer to the next page in a moment, but I want to point out that this review of the regulations and the failure to enforce them appears in the report before the general discussion of the failure of the management and officials to carry out their responsibilities. I believe that it must be the opinion of most if not all of the members of the house that those inspections and those standards which are imposed under the laws passed by parliament must be the starting point of those measures of safety which we expect to be enforced in ships, vehicles or anything else carrying human beings. The attitude of the commissioner as to the effect of this failure by the inspector and others to insist upon compliance with the regulations is clearly indicated in these words found at page 20 of the report, and this is in regard to smoke helmets and safety lamps:

I venture to think that the laxity in the particulars mentioned above in requiring compliance with the regulations could only induce or encourage a similar laxity on the part of the owners and officers of the ship with respect to the vital matter of preparedness for fire.

Those words come at the end of the review of the various regulations and the failure to insist upon compliance with them. It indicates that the commissioner was clearly of the opinion that the failure to insist upon compliance with those regulations by the inspector and other officials had not only made possible a disaster of this kind but had actually induced or encouraged a similar laxity on the part of the owners and officers of the ship.

Let us see what happened to those concerned where there had been laxity. We had read into the records of the house the decision by the court that the captain of the ship lost his right to command that ship as a result of his laxity, and there can be no doubt about the measure of responsibility upon the shipowners and management, through the evidence of laxity there. But surely when the commissioner appointed by the minister to carry out the provisions of an act of this parliament, and to report to this parliament, says that the laxity of the government official actually induced or encouraged the laxity that was reported to the house, then I think we should have known that fact at the same time. But in any event, now that we know of it, we should insist that the laxity of the government official shall be dealt with with the same severity that was regarded as necessary for the prevention of similar accidents in other cases in the future.

We have a civil service of which we have every reason to be proud; but the standards of that civil service will not be maintained or elevated by any suggestion that civil servants are not subject to the same standards and the same tests of responsibility as are those whom they must instruct in the requirements under any act passed by this parliament. If under the laws passed by the parliament of Canada certain penalties are imposed upon others for laxity, then it will be in keeping with our attitude toward the standards of our civil service to make sure that a similar attitude is adopted where laxity of this kind induced other laxity which produced tragedy such as that which occurred in this case. There was no mention of that matter in the report; but on December 3, some time after we were given the information, a Canadian Press dispatch was reported in the press. It gave no names of any people who had been dealt with but it stated:

> A transport department steamship inspection official has been reprimanded by transport minister Chevrier as a result of the Noronic fire, it was learned today.
> The official came before Mr. Chevrier who rebuked him for "laxity" in signing the certificate which allowed the vessel to ply lake waters.

I do not think that the laxity which the commissioner, Mr. Justice Kellock, said was a laxity that induced and encouraged the other laxity which resulted in tragedy is dealt with sufficiently by a rebuke.

Mr. Chevrier: May I inform my hon. friend immediately that, contrary to what is stated in the report read by my hon. friend, no inspector came before me nor was any inspector rebuked by me in connection with laxity.

Mr. Drew: From that do I take it that no action has been taken?

Mr. Chevrier: No.

Mr. Drew: Then I think that is exceedingly serious.

Mr. Chevrier: You may not take that from it. But when a report is read by an hon. gentleman in this chamber, and the report is not even anywhere near the truth, then surely the person who is alleged to have made it can say whether he made it or not. I repeat that on no occasion did there come before me an inspector of the steamship inspection branch of the department who was rebuked. I will deal with what was done when I reply; but that is the position with regard to the press release read by my hon. friend.

Mr. Drew: I think it would perhaps facilitate a discussion of this matter, Mr. Chairman, if the minister would say whether he has taken steps to deal with the laxity reported in this case.

Mr. Chevrier: I will deal with that in a moment, if I may.

Mr. Drew: If that is so, then I will defer my further remarks until I have heard what actually happened; because there is a report there by the commissioner which should have been placed before the house but which was not placed before the house in the summary that was read. We have the report, it is true; and on reading that report we find what the facts are. On the basis of the recommendations of the commissioner, I think it is quite clear that action in regard to the failure of the government official or officials to deal with this matter was clearly indicated, and I for one should like to hear what action was taken.

Mr. Chevrier: I think the committee will agree that a tragedy such as that which happened at the Canada Steamship Lines dock in the city of Toronto is one which is so serious that not the slightest attempt should be made by any hon. gentleman in the committee or elsewhere to make capital of it in any sense of the word. In saying that, I am not suggesting that that is what my hon. friend had in mind; in fact, I feel that such is not the case. But I wish to make the statement that the tragedy was of such a nature that we should approach both the report and the recommendations in the light of the evidence that came before the commissioner.

I think my hon. friend stated that, in the statement read to the house by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, while much was made of the laxity of the owners and the captain, nothing was said about the laxity of the steamship inspection. Am I correct in that?

Mr. Drew: What I said was that the laxity was duly reported in regard to the steamship owners and the captain but that, so far as I am aware, it is not in regard to the officials who dealt with them.

Mr. Chevrier: The report which I have before me, and which were the notes read by the Minister of Trade and Commerce—

Mr. Green: What date was that?

Mr. Chevrier: The exact date to which my hon. friend referred. The report contained a very express reference to steamship inspection. On the fourth page of the statement made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce I find these words:

> The commissioner expresses the opinion that the laxity of the inspection in requiring compliance with the regulations could only induce or encourage a similar laxity on the part of the owners and officers of the ship with respect to the vital matter of preparedness for fire.

My hon. friend says that there was no reference—or at least that is the purport that I took from his remarks—in the statement made by my colleague to the laxity of the officer in the division of steamship inspection.

Mr. Drew: There is no summary of the details in the report in that respect. There may be reasons for that. But I do want to point out that what I read was a reference to the complacency which had descended—and which I said had obviously also occurred to the commissioner—upon the department, and that that should have been brought in in a balanced report which would clearly indicate the relationship—

Mr. Chevrier: There is clear reference to that in the statement made by the minister. In any event, the report was tabled in the house. The report is a lengthy one and evidently it would not be possible to make a statement covering all of the facts and all of the circumstances that were contained in it.

My hon. friend has dealt with some of the statements contained in the report and has read from some of the evidence in the report; but he omitted some that have a very material bearing. For instance, I refer to that part dealing with fire-resisting bulkheads, and the exemption which, under the regulations, the chairman of the steamship inspection board has the discretion to grant in a particular case. The report goes on to say that the regulation providing for fire-resisting bulkheads was made in 1939, and steamship inspection decided that it would not be practical to make the regulation retroactive to ships which were then in existence. That is a practice which exists not only in Canada but in the United States. I am informed it is the practice that exists all over the world. When new regulations are made dealing with technical changes of this importance, having to do with steamship inspection, rarely if ever are they made retroactive. Therefore, what the chairman of steamship inspection was doing on that particular occasion he was doing in conformity with what I am informed had been done in most countries of the world and in the United States.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, I do not want to interrupt, but what it says on page 10 is:

> As far as the Noronic is concerned, it was not impracticable, on the evidence, to install fire-resisting bulkheads in accordance with the regulations. It must therefore be assumed that the chairman considered that, from the standpoint of expense, it would be unreasonable to require compliance.

That is a very different reason.

Mr. Chevrier: Not at all. The point which I am making is that this regulation applied to ships other than the Noronic.

Mr. Drew: Oh, yes.

Mr. Chevrier: And ships in the same position as the Noronic in so far as putting that regulation into force was concerned. Notwithstanding that, they were exempted from the operation of that regulation, and they were exempted for the reason that I gave a moment ago. I am not going to say wisely, because of the recommendation made by the commissioner. But nonetheless the Noronic cannot be pointed out as being an exception, because all other similar passenger ships were exempted from that regulation.

My hon. friend went on to read from pages of the report concerning fire extinguishers and fire extinguishing equipment. May I draw to the attention of my hon. friend what the commissioner said at the end of the first paragraph on page 17. He said:

> In any event, it does not appear that the failure to extinguish the fire at a stage when that would have been possible, was due to any deficiency in the number of location of hydrants.

Dealing with the same subject the commissioner said at the end of the page:

> Again, it should be said, however, that non-compliance with this regulation did not prejudice the situation at the time of the fire.

He deals with the steamship inspector, the very inspector, the only inspector from the steamship division, who gave evidence as to the actual inspection of that ship. He condemns that inspector because of the fact that instead of going about the ship and examining the hydrants, the fire extinguishing equipment, the helmets, et cetera, the inspector collected them all on the deck, examined them there and gave a certificate just as if they had been examined on the spot.

In giving the report which he did I believe that the steamship inspector was not stating the facts as they were, and in that respect he was guilty of laxity. Let me tell my hon. friend that the commissioner deals with him and him alone because there was no other person who gave evidence on the actual examination, save and except another officer from steamship inspection who gave evidence on the regulations and who is not singled out in this particular report.

Dealing with the pumps and with the evidence of that inspector to whom I referred a moment ago the commissioner states at the bottom of page 19:

> It cannot be said, however, on the evidence before me, that the location of the pumps in breach of the regulation was the cause of this failure.

There is only one place in his report, and that is on page 20, where the commissioner refers to the laxity in the particulars above referred to as read by my hon. friend. The recommendations are there. They are too numerous to read at this time. They are there and can be read, but I do not want to take up the time of the committee unduly. They contain no recommendation in so far as the inspection division of the Department of Transport is concerned. They contain a number of other recommendations; and here I can tell the committee that at no time did I ask Inspector Craig to come before me, nor did I reprimand him. What I did was to call before me the deputy chairman of the steamship inspection branch. I discussed with him the regulations and the recommendations. I indicated to him certain parts of the report, particularly that part on page 20, which had to do with laxity, and which was directed at one man and one man alone. I cannot for one moment concede that a conclusion based upon the evidence of one individual could be directed at other individuals who were not examined and who did not give evidence before the court of inquiry. So that the position I am taking and the point I am making now is that condemnation of the commissioner, in so far as laxity is concerned, is directed at one man, that individual who gave evidence on that occasion and who inspected the Noronic.

My information is that the inspector is a man of some years. I discussed with the deputy chairman of the steamship inspection board the question of his position. In view of the fact that the man is about to retire, and has reached the retiring age—in fact I believe he has gone beyond the retiring age—it was decided that no action would be taken by way of dismissal. But the contents of the report have not yet been fully considered in so far as the recommendations are concerned, because I have not yet come to the conclusion whether or not it will be necessary to bring in legislation, or whether or not this report can be implemented in another way.

In any event I can assure the house that no one realizes the seriousness of the position any more than my officials and I do. I have no hesitation in announcing that the recommendations of the commissioner will be put into effect just as quickly as that is possible, in order that tragedies of this sort or fires of this kind be not repeated in our country.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, no one will wish to see anyone suffer unnecessarily; but the finding is inescapable by the commissioner, on evidence which he regarded as adequate—and he is a most experienced judge—that the laxity in the various particulars which he mentioned, and to which I referred by quotations indicating the nature of the findings, could only induce or encourage similar laxity on the part of the owners and officers of the ship.

The fact that the minister has just explained that what occurred in connection with the Noronic was not an exception, but that similar situations existed in other ships as well, merely emphasizes that the necessity for inspection is one of the features emerging from this report, and that it is essential that in future there be certainty from the administrative point of view that the provisions for inspection and supervision shall be strictly adhered to.

While it is true that in one case there was a discretionary provision, there were other cases where certificates were given which really stated something which in one instance the witness knew nothing about or was not sure about, and in the other case the witness made a statement contrary to actual fact.

Those matters do require the most vigorous attention. Even without new statutory provisions, this report certainly emphasizes the necessity for the utmost vigour in dealing with this particular matter.

I wish to make it clear—and I believe the record of my remarks will bear this out—that I said I did not suggest that there was any misinterpretation of the actual finding, but that I would emphasize the complacency that had descended upon the management and those charged with the direction of the ship, and the fact also that it should have been brought home to us that such complacency had apparently existed at a point where it induced the possibility of a situation of this kind.

I have nothing further to add to these remarks, beyond saying that I welcome the assurance that the report will be acted upon. I do feel also that in cases of this kind, where human life is possibly in jeopardy if the regulations are not complied with, the most severe standards should be required from those whose actions will determine the actions of those whose activities are inspected.

Mr. Green: While this disaster occurred on the great lakes, it has been one of great concern to people on the west coast, because we travel extensively by ship. I am greatly concerned about the minister's statement to the effect that when these new regulations to ensure safety become operative they are not to be made applicable to ships already built. If that rule is strictly followed it means that only those ships built after the time the regulations come into effect will be subject to these safety measures.

It is obvious from the Noronic disaster that if that ship had been forced to comply with the new regulations there would have been no tragedy. Had the regulations been made to apply to the ships already plying the great lakes it is not likely the tragedy would have occurred. I hope the department will not take the stand that safety regulations enacted in the future need not apply to ships already in operation. Certainly these safety measures should be made to apply to all ships. I should like to have some further word from the minister on that point.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce, when he made his statement, indicated that there would be some sort of investigation into the question of whether there should be amendments to the Canada Shipping Act and other legislation, and whether changes should be made in the regulations. Will the Minister of Transport tell us what steps are being taken to investigate those two points? Is there some body within his department reviewing the statutes and regulations, or is there to be some body outside the Department of Transport? Will representations be heard from the various bodies across the country which are interested in the safety of ships at sea? If there is some group, departmental or otherwise, investigating the act and the regulations, provision should be made for representations from across the country.

Mr. Chevrier: Dealing first with that part of my hon. friend's remarks which dealt with ships on the Pacific coast, my reply would be that our steamship inspection service following this report has been given instructions to make a complete investigation of all ships on the west coast, for safety purposes, and to make sure that the steamship inspection regulations are enforced. That is being done at the moment. Part of it has been done this week and the rest of it will be done early next week. My hon. friend has said that if the regulations with regard to fire-resistant bulkheads had been put into force there would have been no fire.

Mr. Green: I did not deal with any specific regulation. It seemed to me that if the regulations as they existed had been enforced with respect to the Noronic, even though she had been built before some of the regulations came into effect, it is quite probable there would have been no disaster. I am hitting at the failure to make the regulations apply to a ship built before they were brought in.

Mr. Chevrier: That is a difficult thing to say; that is conjecture.

Mr. Green: I realize that.

Mr. Chevrier: One cannot say whether there would or would not have been a disaster, particularly when one is dealing with an act of God. One never knows when an act of God is going to occur, or under what circumstances or conditions. I venture to say, although this is also conjecture, that if this tragedy had taken place at sea the position would have been infinitely better. However, I do not want to get into a long discussion.

My hon. friend asked whether these regulations or the legislation would be made retroactive. The regulation with regard to fire-resistant bulkheads on passenger ships has been in existence since 1939, but all passenger ships in the class of the Noronic were exempted at the discretion of the steamship inspection service. The commissioner recommends that fire-resistant bulkheads be installed in ships so that—

Mr. Green: Even in the older ships.

Mr. Chevrier: Even in the older ships. If we carry out that recommendation it would meet the point raised by my hon. friend. With reference to changes in the Canada Shipping Act, there is a departmental committee which deals with changes to be made from time to time in the act. That committee will deal with these recommendations and any other changes that are likely to be made. It will consult from time to time with public bodies as to the necessity of making changes.

Mr. Green: Will an opportunity be given to make recommendations to that committee?

Mr. Chevrier: I would not say that. I remember the difficulty we got into with the C.S.U. when we amended the regulations before, but I will say that that committee will consult those who are interested, the shipowners and others.

Mr. Gibson (Comox-Alberni): In changing the regulations the government should be careful that it is not starting on a witch-hunt. There are certain inherent risks in connection with travel by sea, air or rail. If changes are to be made in the regulation so that the older ships must instal fire-resistant bulkheads, I am sure that would be desirable but these things should be economical as well. Unless the fare-paying passengers are prepared to pay substantially higher rates, they will either go without steamship services or be ready to permit a degree of latitude to some operators.

Mr. Chevrier: I am glad the hon. member brought up that point. It has always been a fact in the Department of Transport that more requests are received for relaxing the regulations than for tightening them up; in fact I would say the ratio is almost 95 per cent to five in favour of relaxing the regulations. Because of this tragedy I do not think there is any other conclusion we can come to but that these will have to be enforced. However, this would apply only to passenger ships and in so far as they are concerned I do not think it will be too much of a hardship.

Mr. Green: It is only natural that there would be more representations for relaxing the regulations because they would come from those who are operating the ships. The passenger whose life is endangered because the regulations are not enforced is not in position to make representations to the minister. The people who have to travel on these ships have no way of knowing what the regulations are. The first thing they know there is a fire, a wreck occurs or there is carelessness of some kind which costs them their lives. After all, these regulations were not designed to help the operators; they were designed to save lives. I do hope that the minister and his department will see that proper regulations are prepared and that there is a careful official inspection of these ships.

Mr. Noseworthy: The minister has referred to certain items in the report to indicate that the laxity of inspection in connection with the Noronic did not contribute to the disaster. There are a number of places in the report where that statement is made. I should like to direct attention to a paragraph on page 20 which deals with the question of laxity of inspection and non-compliance with the regulations.

I doubt if the minister or anyone else can estimate the extent to which the laxity of inspection which is quite evident from this report actually did contribute to the disaster that befell this ship. I have read the report carefully and have discussed it with a number of seamen sailing the great lakes. I agree with them when they say that, as far as the inspection reported here is concerned, the inspector referred to might just as well have been hired and paid by the shipowners. There is every indication here that the only persons being considered in that inspection were the shipowners. The inspection of pumps and fire hose and extinguishers, the enforcement of the regulations with regard to fire-resistant bulkheads and fire patrols, all seemed to be made in the interest of the shipowners.

I am sure many people in this country would feel much happier if they knew that these regulations and the whole matter of inspection were going to be tightened up.

Mr. Higgins: A short time ago I asked the minister a question with regard to the regulations governing the number of people to be carried from Port aux Basques to Sydney and from Sydney to Port aux Basques. If new regulations have been enacted I shall have no more to say about this.

Mr. Chevrier: I am informed that there is no difference in the regulations governing traffic one way or the other.

Mr. Higgins: If you will bear with me for a couple of minutes, may I say in that case the situation cannot have changed. I made a trip up here on the 8th of September, and I do not mind going back tomorrow or the next day, but certainly if I have to come back again, as I likely will in the early months of the coming year, I am a little bit anxious about it. The situation is that there is a definite load limit on the boats for passengers from North Sydney to Port aux Basques, but the men on the ships tell me that there is no limit from Port aux Basques to North Sydney. I have seen people lying on the floor of the saloon and in the passageways. I have seen them seasick, and it is a most unpleasant sight. Not only is it unpleasant; the situation is definitely unsafe, and the officers of the ships are worried.

There is not sufficient lifeboat accommodation, and I am quite certain there would be a real tragedy if by any chance anything happened. I am not prepared to say who would be responsible. I merely draw the matter to your attention again. I think it is a most serious situation. I am not altogether speaking without some knowledge of it. As I informed the house before, I happen to be associated with the union that mans these ships, and the men and the masters are most worried about it. I feel that precautions should be taken as quickly as possible. I am sure the minister knows the matter to which I am referring.

Mr. Chevrier: I am glad my hon. friend has brought the situation to my attention. It is a matter of importance, and I will see that Canadian National Railways, who operate the service, are advised of it immediately.

Mr. Higgins: There is one other matter. It is rather difficult to try to talk about freight rates in Newfoundland when you are using ships and railways.

Mr. Chevrier: May I remind the hon. member there are two items dealing specifically with freight rates.

Mr. Higgins: We can do that afterwards.

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, if he will allow this item to pass.

Mr. Higgins: I have two further questions which I am sure will not be controversial. I believe the minister will be able to answer them very readily under this item. What is the position as to the Clarenville boats? May we have a statement as to the question of future ownership? Does the C.N.R. propose to take them over? Primarily I am concerned in the one instance with the fact that the men who man these boats have been told they are not entitled to be regarded as pensionable. In other words, the boats are looked upon as being the property of the provincial government. They are operated by the C.N.R., and the men on the boats have been told they will not be pensioned because they are not entitled to be regarded as members of the C.N.R. organization.

Mr. Chevrier: I can tell the hon. gentleman that the Clarenville boats, as already stated, are the property of the Newfoundland government. The dominion government has no intention of purchasing them. The Canadian National Railways operate one or two, or perhaps three, on a management fee basis for the government of Newfoundland, and so far as I know they do not intend to buy them.

Item agreed to.

462. Nautical service administration, $490,670.

Mr. Green: Item 462 deals with the nautical service, and under that branch of the department training is given to merchant seamen. The branch also arranges for the distribution of war medals and memorial crosses to dependent relatives of merchant seamen who have lost their lives. Earlier in the session we had a discussion, in which both the Minister of Transport and the Minister of Veterans Affairs were involved, concerning the present provision for vocational training for merchant seamen. As the order in council reads at the present time, the only men who were able to qualify were those who were under thirty years of age, and applications had to be made by the end of June of this year.

It has been pointed out that there were a great many men who were unable to qualify. As a matter of fact, I asked a question earlier in the session and received the reply that out of 770 applications which had been made only 321, less than half, had been able to qualify for training. I have no intention of going over the merits of the request for changed regulations. Both ministers know the picture.

When we were discussing the matter before I understood that active consideration was then being given to introducing an amendment to the order in council in order that more of these men might qualify. I think some of us urged that the age limit should be withdrawn. Each case has to be dealt with separately; in any event, there is wide discretion as to whether or not training should be given. We also urged that the deadline for applications should be lifted. I believe the Department of Veterans Affairs is so organized and equipped that it could carry on more extended vocational training. I should like to ask the Minister of Transport whether any change is to be made in the order in council.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, there are two points involved. First there is a group of merchant seamen who were cut off because they did not make their applications within the specified time. Consideration has been given to that point. There is also the other point that too many merchant seamen, because of the strict interpretation of the order, were being deprived of vocational training.

Mr. Green: There was also the question of age.

Mr. Chevrier: That includes age. I may tell my hon. friend, and the hon. member for Vancouver East who is interested in the question and who raised it one night together with the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra, that the Minister of Veterans Affairs and I have consulted and have agreed on the necessity of some action being taken, but the matter has not yet been brought to the attention of our colleagues. I am hopeful that it will, but that is all I can say at the moment.

Mr. Green: I am very glad to get that word from the minister. I should like to point out that the report of the Canadian maritime commission recommends a further drastic reduction in the Canadian merchant marine, which means there will be jobs at sea for fewer men, and consequently all the more need for vocational training.

Mr. Chevrier: The matter is being carefully considered.

Mr. Higgins: I want to ask the minister again whether there is any possibility whatsoever of Newfoundland merchant seamen who served in war zones being brought within the class of people who received the 10 per cent bonus. The only reason given for not doing so is that they were not in the manning pool at the time. Newfoundland war veterans have received the same benefits as other Canadian war veterans. In fact the new province received all the benefits given any of the older provinces of Canada, except in this one instance. These men served in the same waters, endured the same hardships and certainly paid with their lives in the same way, but merely because they were not in the manning pool they did not receive the same benefits. Is there any chance of ameliorating that ruling, if there is a ruling?

Mr. Chevrier: The two bonuses my hon. friend refers to were applicable to a group of seamen who joined the merchant navy under certain circumstances during the war. Unless those bonuses, the effective date of which has expired, were made retroactive they could not be applied to Newfoundland seamen. Any future order of course would take them in; but while I could give the matter consideration I would have little hope that those orders could be made retroactive.

Mr. Higgins: Would the minister give the matter serious consideration, because the situation arose only because they were not in the manning pool?

Mr. Chevrier: I will.

Item agreed to.

469. Administration of pilotage, including authority for temporary recoverable advances; contributions, and the operation and maintenance, as required, of necessary pilot vessels in certain pilotage districts, $270,965.

Mr. McLure: I have just one question. Does the marine office at Ottawa have jurisdiction over pilotage or over the pilots at the port of Charlottetown? There have always been disputes there between the pilots and the ships they pilot.

Mr. Chevrier: No, the Ottawa office has no jurisdiction over that group of pilots. They are under their own pilotage association.

Item agreed to.

470. Life saving service including rewards for saving life (revote $129,240), $404,710.

Mr. Higgins: Some time ago the minister gave a brief statement on the possible co-ordination of the life saving services. I wonder if he is in a position to say anything further in that connection.

Mr. Chevrier: I covered the matter very fully on one occasion, and I do not think I can add anything at this time.

Item agreed to.

471. To provide subsidies for wrecking plants—Quebec and British Columbia, $65,000.

Mr. Green: Will the minister state to which companies these payments are made, and in what amounts?

Mr. Chevrier: There are two companies, one in Quebec and one in British Columbia. The Quebec company receives $40,000 and the British Columbia company $25,000.

Mr. Green: What are the names of the companies?

Mr. Chevrier: The Pacific Salvage and Wrecking Company and the Quebec Salvage and Wrecking Company Limited.

Item agreed to.

[Mr Chevrier.]

473. Miscellaneous services relating to navigation and shipping, including grants as detailed in the estimates; and provision to settle claims by the board of trade, London, England, for expenses incurred, in respect of Canadian distressed seamen of British ships registered out of Canada, $106,207.

Mr. Higgins: Does item 718 in the supplementary estimates correspond with this item; and if it does, what does it entail?

Mr. Chevrier: The Newfoundland estimate is in addition to this.

Item agreed to.

478. To provide towards the construction of a service vessel for the eastern Arctic patrol (estimated cost $2,400,000)—capital (revote $825,000), $2,100,000.

Mr. Green: Will the minister explain this vote?

Mr. Chevrier: This is for the construction of the eastern Arctic patrol vessel, the contract for which was given to Davie Shipbuilding at Lauzon, Quebec. The ship has been launched, and it is expected that it will be ready for operation early next month.

Mr. Green: Does that ship patrol into Hudson bay or is it for the north Atlantic?

Mr. Chevrier: Both the east coast and into the Hudson bay area.

Item agreed to.

480. To provide towards the construction of a lightship for the port of Saint John, N.B. (estimated cost $741,850)—capital (revote $520,000), $681,000.

Mr. McLure: When is it expected that this lightship for the port of Saint John will be completed, and who were the contractors?

Mr. Chevrier: It has been launched and will be in operation by May, 1950. The contractors are Vickers in Montreal.

Item agreed to.

Railway Service—

483. Repairs and expenses in connection with the operation and maintenance of official railway cars under the jurisdiction of the department, $64,000.

Mr. Knowles: Can the minister tell us what is the policy and practice with respect to these official railway cars? What does this $64,000 cover? Who pays for hauling the cars, if anyone; and such other information as the minister probably has on his desk just waiting to give us.

Mr. Chevrier: This item concerns five cars, two of which are used by His Excellency the Governor General, one by the Prime Minister, one by the Minister of Transport, and the other for all other ministers. The total of $64,000 is made up of salaries, $15,000; repairs and upkeep of the equipment, $40,000; materials and supplies, $4,000, and sundries, $4,300. This is the usual item that appears in the estimates of the Department of Transport; and as far as hauling charges are concerned, there are none.

Item agreed to.

484. Hudson Bay railway—construction and improvements—capital (revote $80,000), $168,000.

Mr. Bater: I should like to take just a moment to say that I think it is in the national interest that the greatest possible use should continue to be made of the port of Churchill and the Hudson Bay railway. On a previous occasion I have mentioned the cattle that might be shipped through that port, and now I should like to read a letter in that connection. The reason I mention this is that, as I said previously, we would like to see some provision made at The Pas by way of stockyards and feeding facilities so that cattle coming from Great Britain could be held there in quarantine. Recently I received this letter from the North Battleford board of trade.

Dear Mr. Bater:

We are in receipt of and thank you for your letter of November 25, with which you enclosed a copy of a letter you had addressed to Mr. P. J. Ibbotson, with regard to the establishment of a quarantine station for imported cattle, preferably at The Pas.

We believe Mr. Ibbotson has already left for Great Britain. It is our understanding that his intention is to import two carloads of registered Shorthorn cattle as the initial shipment, and that if this turns out to his satisfaction in all probability he will continue to import cattle.

It would, of course, greatly help the business if facilities were provided so that he could ship via Churchill.

I might add that if cattle could be brought from Scotland to Saskatchewan by this route it would shorten their trip by some 1,200 miles.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the item carry?

Some hon. Members: Six o'clock.

The Deputy Chairman: We might finish the items relating to railway service, if the committee is agreeable.

Mr. Wright: I have a few words to say on this Hudson Bay railway item, but it is now six o'clock.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Coldwell: Just before we go on with item 484, may I ask the minister a question which may be a little bit off the Hudson Bay railway. Last year I noticed that Premier Duplessis had announced that a railway would be constructed immediately—I think according to the newspaper report it was August 14, 1948—from a place called Havre St. Pierre opposite Anticosti island north to Allard lake. No application has come here for any rights or charter. I was wondering just what this railway was, what it is being built for and by whom.

Mr. Chevrier: That railway is being built for the purpose of a company known as the Kennecott Copper Company. Deposits of copper have been found in that area. The railway is twenty-seven miles long. The contract has been let to Fraser-Brace and it is purely a provincial railway.

Mr. Coldwell: Is construction taking place?

Mr Chevrier: I think it is almost complete.

Mr. Helme: In the house from time to time, in discussing the Hudson Bay railway, figures of 25 million to 40 million bushels have been mentioned as being tributary to that railway. I think all we have to do is to have a good look at the map of the west, and we will be inclined to think that all of the wheat in the province of Saskatchewan is tributary to the Hudson Bay railroad. I wonder if what is meant when the figure of 25 million bushels is mentioned is that that would be a goal at which to strive with regard to handling grain through the Hudson bay.

The season is short up there, we admit; but a couple of years ago I had occasion to talk to Mr. Peter Dalgleish, who is managing director of Dalgleish shipping lines, and he was of the opinion that the season might be lengthened quite a little bit with the help of an icebreaker in clearing ice from the mouth of the Churchill river and away from the elevators at the start of the season and also when the ice was beginning to form at the closing of the season. I should like the minister to give some attention to that suggestion. This afternoon we heard that an icebreaker was being built for use on the Atlantic coast and also for Hudson bay. I would think that in what might be considered the slack time for that icebreaker on the Atlantic and on the Hudson bay itself, it might well be used in helping to clear the ice from the port of Churchill.

Mr. Chevrier: All I can say is that the amount of wheat which was transported over the Hudson Bay railway this year amounted to 5,730,000 bushels. The railway is being used to fairly good capacity. There are some people who think that 25 million bushels should be carried by the railway. I do not know whether or not that can be done. I am not in a position to say. But we are hopeful that more than the amount carried this year will be carried in the future.

As to extending the season of navigation, the position is that the season is about twelve to thirteen weeks in length and the question of providing an icebreaker in that area is one that has been given consideration from time to time; but I doubt whether it would be practical to use an icebreaker in the area. The department has been helpful through its national harbours board and through the Canadian National Railways, in assisting the Hudson Bay railway and particularly by reducing the insurance rates by about 25 per cent.

Mr. Helme: I think the facilities there can be extended to handle much more than 5 million or six million bushels. I was glad to hear the minister say that he has the same hopes as I have.

Mr. Knight: The progress of the Hudson Bay railway has been slow, at least in the eyes of those of us from the west who have been anxious to promote its use. The minister has heard my opinions on the subject on many previous occasions and I do not propose to make a speech now about the whole matter; but I should like to put before the committee and before him one or two ideas I have with regard to it.

I think that probably a good deal of the trouble is apathy on the part of many people and perhaps hostility on the part of a few. I do not make that latter statement rashly. I have been actively interested in this matter for five years and passively interested previous to that for a number of years. I know something about the problem. I have been up at the port. I have talked to the manager, to many people along the line, and to residents of Churchill itself. I do not like to say this, but I must do so. There is a persistent feeling—whether it be right or wrong—among the people in those areas which the railway might well serve, that there is somehow antagonism here in the east. I know I shall be accused of talking about the big interests and that sort of thing. I want to be reasonable in the matter, but it is true that most of our business operations, both financial and otherwise, are concentrated here in the east. Even in the matter of longshoremen who handle the grain for a few weeks when that port is open, these men are imported in some cases from the port of Montreal. Perhaps that is natural enough, because where you want to engage trained men, you must go to the place where the men are trained. I shall say no more about the matter, but that is a persistent feeling in the west; and it is well that the government should know it.

I think one of the greatest disadvantages the port has to contend with is the fact that the marine insurance rate is too high. The insurance people are the last ones you would expect to do anything much about this matter because they can insure the cargoes for the present rate. It is not big business and naturally you would not expect them to get excited about lowering that rate. But there is no doubt in my mind, after making an exhaustive study of the matter, that that rate could be lowered. There are really three seasons in Churchill; I will not go into particulars, but one of the seasons is the season which exists in the minds of those insurance people. To my mind that season is much too short. I talked to a captain up there the last time I was at Churchill and he told me that in beautiful weather, in a calm sea with the sun shining, they lay for two days outside the borderline, wherever that is, whatever strait it is, at the mouth of the bay, and he said: We might just as well have been sailing in there, but we could not do so because we knew that if we did we would not be covered by insurance. He told me also that frequently there was a week or ten days after the insurance rate was removed that the port could have been used. I suggest, as I have suggested before in this chamber, that there should not be a fixed season in that particular case; I suggest that in this day and age, with our modern methods of predicting the weather, surely there could be a variation by which these dates could be settled, that the length of this season should not be inflexible as it is at the present time.

Another difficulty of course is storage of wheat in position, and when I say "in position" I mean in such position that such wheat could be profitably shipped out of that port. I know the situation was difficult during the war and since the war because there has been a tremendous demand for wheat. There has been a shortage of wheat and there has often been a necessity to get wheat out within certain time limits in order to meet certain contracts or to receive a certain price. But I suggest that perhaps, unfortunately, from what we have been hearing of late, that day seems to be past. I hope that if it is an ill wind, it will at least blow good to the port of Churchill and that from now on that position may be improved. At various times I have raised the matter of storage. It is a hard question about which to get information, but I am interested in it. We as a nation, or the wheat board if you like, must store wheat some place, and it does store wheat some place at almost all times of the year. It seems to me that there should be some way of storing it at Churchill. Of course the Churchill elevator holds only 2,500,000 bushels. I am often amused by papers I see in the east. "Oh dear me", they say, " we could not store two and a half million bushels. Just think of keeping two and a half million bushels of wheat idle up there all that time." Think of what a small proportion the two and a half million bushels is to the immense wheat crop of this country. After all, it is only a drop in the bucket.

Then we have a great storage elevator built by the government and standing there in Saskatoon with a capacity of five and a half million bushels, none of which is ever used. I should not say "none". There are a few bushels of wheat in it; it may be a thousand or two but what is that compared to the five and a half million capacity? The only thing that I know that elevator has been good for in the last few years is that it has been used to store a few thousand bushels of rapeseed. It was held in that position so that it could be pressed for oil at the local wheat pool oil plant. I have suggested to the minister that flax might well have been stored there instead of being stored in the terminal elevators down here in the east, because there was a time when that small oil mill had to shut down because there was no flax there to be processed. At the same time there was lots of flax lying idle in the east upon which storage was being paid in these eastern elevators.

The storage of wheat is one of the difficulties of the situation, and I have suggested at least some remedy. Another tremendous difficulty—and I am not a grain man; I fail to understand this—is this diversion charge. The diversion charge is one of the most ridiculous things of which I have ever heard. The minister can correct me but I think it is 2½ cents a bushel that we are charged in dealing with that wheat. What is a diversion charge? I am none too clear on it myself, but as far as I have discovered it appears to be a fee which is paid to certain grain companies for not handling wheat. In other words, if they had not the privilege of handling and storing that particular wheat then there is an assessment of 2½ cents a bushel put against the wheat which is not so handled. That seems to me to be a ridiculous situation.

There are a great many people in my part of the country—and I think it includes all of the farmers in northern Saskatchewan—who are tremendously interested in this road and in the port. They look on it as their own road. Let me say here that you see various wild statements in the press that this white elephant thing was built at national expense. It was no such thing. It was built at the expense of the western provinces. They look upon it as their own road. They are interested in it and they would like a little co-operation in making it a success. Great Britain has benefited from this route perhaps more than anybody else of recent years. As a nation Great Britain has benefited to the extent that she has been able to get wheat shipped out from Hudson bay. I think that helps our position in the British competitive market; and, if reports about our trade are true, assistance in that particular competitive market could be to our advantage some of these days.

This deficit, which is costing the taxpayers of this country money, is a thing in which business people in all parts of the country should be interested, one in which the taxpayers should be interested. The estimate calls for $50 million to square the deficit. This deficit, which must be met by the taxpayers, has been caused simply by one thing, namely, a lack of volume. I have a statement from the management of the port. I have statements from people in the grain trade. They estimate that a volume of fifteen million bushels would take care of the deficit. It would not make any profit, but it would mean that the taxpayers of the country would not have anything to pay in respect of this route.

I have pleaded that just once we ought to be able to get that much grain over this road and through this port in order to decide what is the value of this route. I have urged that business be sought for this road. I am afraid that I have always had the suspicion, held by many people in our part of the country, that business is not so sought. I have appealed to the minister that the railway might drum up some business. The Minister of Transport has told me that it is neither his business nor the railway's; that it is a matter for business institutions, and so forth. Still the minister has assured us that he was benevolent to the Churchill route, and I believe perhaps he still is. Yet we have not had the results that some of us would have desired, and which I think we might have expected. I will say this, that if there had been any interest in this country, if the Canadian National Railways had done the same amount of work in drumming up business as, for instance, the Dalgleish Shipping Company, which has shipped out most of the wheat from that port and shipped in most of the goods, if there had been some agencies in this country that had been working for the promotion of that port and road to the same extent that Mr. Dalgleish's company has, this thing would have been on a solid footing long before now.

I am aware of the influence that the wheat board has in this particular matter; I am aware of the influence that the Minister of Trade and Commerce could have in this particular matter; and I am aware of the influence that the Minister of Transport could have. He will probably say that I am attributing to him powers which he has not. However, that is my own opinion on the matter.

As I said when I began, I do not want to go into the whole matter in detail, but our people out there want to see that road a success. They are interested in it. They believe that it could be made a success if there were the proper co-operation between all the people who should be concerned in it.

Mr. Wright: I should like to say a few words on this particular matter. This is rather amusing for me, after having been here for eleven sessions and hearing every year this discussion on the Hudson Bay railway and the promises of the minister and the government that they are going to see what can be done about it. It may be new to some of the other members from northern Saskatchewan who are here for the first time, but it certainly is not a new story in this house. In 1946 there was a resolution before the house on which the house voted by an overwhelming majority, asking the government to make greater use of this port.

After hearing this debate, after visiting the port, after living in that part of the province, it seems to me that this government is responsible. Through the harbours board they control the port of Churchill. Through the Hudson Bay railway and the Canadian National Railways they control the railways going to that port, and through the wheat board they control the main product which can be shipped through that port. Therefore they should have some influence on the insurance rates into that port. Therefore the responsibility lies here with this government as to whether that port is to be developed or not. If they see fit it can be developed. If they exhibit the same apathy that they have in the past then the port will remain in the same state as it has been during the last number of years.

With the facilities there the port could handle at least twenty or twenty-five million bushels of grain even during the present season, if it were placed in a position where it could be moved into the port at the proper time. The Hudson Bay railway will only be a paying proposition when this government, through their various government agencies, make up their minds that they are going to develop the port. Through the Canadian National Railways there is the possibility of building feeder lines to Hudson Bay. A new mining area has opened up in the Loon lake district, north of Flin Flon, where there is a large body of ore which, when developed, could be moved out through Hudson bay. There are several branch lines in northern Saskatchewan. I refer particularly to the one which ends at Arborfield and another which ends at Carrot river which can be connected up with the Hudson Bay railway at Le Pas in Manitoba, and make that railway a paying proposition. In my opinion it is entirely up to this government to decide whether that is done or not, or whether it is going to continue to pay deficits on that road as has been the custom in the past few years.

Mr. Blackmore: May I add a voice from Alberta in support of the Hudson Bay railway. I believe the success of that railway is pretty well covered by the old saying that where there's a will there's a way. I hope that before too long the government will acquire a very definite will, and will find a way to make this a success. In western Canada there is a desire that this railway should succeed, and I believe it can be made a success. I ask that it be made so.

Item agreed to.

486. Prince Edward Island car ferry and terminals, construction and improvement of terminal facilities, capital (revote $1,372,000), $1,400,000.

Mr. McLure: This item deals with the chief means of transportation between Prince Edward Island and the mainland. There appears to be a decrease in the amount of the vote. I do not believe the terminals are completed yet, but I am glad to see the work has been progressing satisfactorily. I have not troubled the minister very much about "reefer" cars this session, but I may say that in view of the reports I have been receiving I hope he will continue to keep the supply of reefer cars right through the shipping season.

When the terminals are completed I suggest the next thing the minister will have to consider is the matter of an auxiliary wharf or an auxiliary boat to help the present boat, the Abegweit, take care of the freight and the transportation of cars. In view of the interest the minister has taken in our transportation problem, I am sure that, if this is properly presented to him, before another year we will have an auxiliary boat to take care of the extra traffic on the Borden ferry service.

If he has time I should like him to speak briefly tonight with reference to the completion of the terminals and the work the ferry has been doing. While I have not the report for November, I find that in October the ferry carried 2,780 carloads of freight to and from Prince Edward Island. It is of great advantage to the Canadian National Railways to have the long haul on most of the freight to and from Prince Edward Island. Would the minister state what the government intends to do in the future in connection with the terminals at Borden and Tormentine?

Mr. Chevrier: I am happy to tell the hon. member that, in so far as this vote is concerned, the contract has been completed to the extent of almost 95 per cent, and it is expected it will be fully completed some time in the spring. There are about five small items remaining to be done. I can assure the hon. member that the department and the Canadian National Railways are fully conversant with this transportation problem, and that is one of the reasons which led to the construction of the Abegweit. I can tell the hon. member that the transportation problems of Prince Edward Island will be carefully looked into.

Item agreed to.

487. Strait of Canso, transportation improvements and facilities, capital (revote), $500,000.

Mr. Chevrier: I promised the hon. member for Cape Breton South to make a statement on this item, and I shall proceed to give him the brief statement I have before me. As to the present position of the contract at the Strait of Canso, let me point out that on March 12, 1949, the government gave a contract to Foundation Maritime Limited for eight diamond drill borings across the strait of Canso, and on and around the proposed bridge site. This contract was completed in September of this year. The engineer in charge of the Canso bridge, Dr. P. L. Pratley, has reported that in place of the anticipated almost bare rock he found an overburden which was considerably heavy and almost 8 feet in the centre of the channel, and since the completion of the contract by Foundation Maritime Limited the engineer in charge is preparing plans and specifications for the calling of tenders for the construction of piers and the bridge itself.

It must be realized that for a project of this nature there are very many technical problems which must be solved before calling for tenders. For example, the province of Nova Scotia, which is keenly interested, must be consulted in so far as the ownership of the riverbed is concerned. And then there must be co-ordination of the work, new topographic maps must be completed, triangulation has to be completed, piers and abutments must be looked into. But the co-ordination of the work is in the hands of the engineer in charge with the Canadian National Railways and the Department of Highways of the province of Nova Scotia for the approaches to the bridge.

The last report I have from Dr. Pratley indicates that the preparatory work for all this which I have mentioned is progressing satisfactorily, and that he still hopes to be in a position to call for tenders some time in March of next year.

Mr. Gillis: This item makes an appropriation of $500,000 to improve transportation facilities at the strait of Canso. The minister's statement indicates that the department has the intention of going ahead with the project. However, this bridge was going to cost $13 million, and there is no estimate so far as I can see either here or in those of the Department of Public Works to carry on that work. Would the minister clear up that point?

Mr. Chevrier: The vote now in the estimates is to cover these surveys. The amount for the construction of the bridge will be in the main estimates of next year.

Mr. Gillis: That is rather disappointing.

Mr. Chevrier: Let me point out that even if there were $5 million in the estimates it could not possibly be spent between now and the end of this fiscal year.

Mr. Gillis: I am not going to get into any argument with the minister about it, because I imagine he is doing the best he can. However, the only assurance we have thus far is that they have completed the borings and anticipate no difficulty. I think we had that assurance at least a year ago. I thought that angle of the work was completed. It was my understanding that the $100,000 contract let to Foundation Maritime Limited was for the purpose of completing the test piers, that the test piers were in, and that that particular line of work was finished. The preliminary work outlined by the minister will cost more than the amount in this vote. It is disappointing to the maritime provinces, where there is and has been since the end of the war a serious unemployment problem. The last figures we have show that there are approximately 23,000 unemployed registered and many of them are in that area. There has been keen interest in Nova Scotia in this bridge during the last couple of years and everyone was of the opinion that the preliminary work had been done. They were hoping that early this spring this project would be started and would help to relieve the present unemployment.

It is not encouraging to learn that this work is merely in the exploration stage and that next year another appropriation will have to be passed. We are not going forward with this thing in the way I anticipated after hearing the statements that were made in this house and during the last election campaign. I am not satisfied. I think that this is merely a palliative to take the edge off a bad let-down. The province of Nova Scotia will be financially interested in this project and it appears to me now that a lot of the ballyhoo we heard—I hope I am wrong about this—

Mr. Chevrier: You certainly are.

Mr. Gillis: —in the last six or eight years in regard to this bridge is just that. I am disappointed that something more definite cannot be given to us and that there are not more realistic plans for the going forward with this project so that it may be commenced next spring.

Mr. Chevrier: I am sorry my hon. friend is not satisfied, but let me tell him that the report on the Canso bridge was tabled in the house in March. That contained a specific recommendation that a special contract for borings should be let. If my hon. friend looks at page 39 of that report, of which he has a copy, he will find that recommendation set out and that is what is to be done under this item.

My hon. friend says that this is a palliative, that we have no intention of going on. Let me tell him that when the government makes a statement, as a rule it carries out its undertaking. There was a statement made in this house following the establishment of the board of engineers which was concurred in by the government of Nova Scotia to the effect that Dr. Pratley had been selected as the engineer and it was intended to proceed as quickly as we could.

It was discovered that until test borings had been made it would be impossible to get a bid from any contractor. Let it not be forgotten that this report takes issue with the recommendations of some of the previous engineers with reference to the depth of water and the difficulties surrounding the bridging of the strait of Canso. I can assure my hon. friend that there is not the slightest intention of backing away from this project and I do not think anyone knows it better than himself.

Mr. Gillis: Far be it from me to offend the minister because I believe that he believes everything he says. As far as reports are concerned, may I say that I have read a good one that was made in 1906. That report was tabled by the government, paid for by the government and apparently accepted by the government. I have followed this matter quite closely. As far as test borings are concerned, may I say to the minister that there were borings long before that report was brought in. A total of $100,000 has been spent to find out how deep the water is, and now we are boring some more. I thought the test bores had all been made but apparently they are still being made. I am going to keep on boring here until this bridge is completed.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): All the people are of one mind about this matter, they want this bridge built. I can understand the hon. member for Cape Breton South feeling sceptical along with a good many people in Nova Scotia. Personally I am going to accept the statement made by the minister that the government are going ahead with the construction of this long waited for and greatly needed bridge.

I was a little uneasy at what the minister said with regard to the results of the borings and I gather that the engineer in charge confirms his previous finding that the construction of this bridge is practical and he is prepared to go ahead with the construction. Am I to understand that contracts will be called for this season and construction proceeded with?

Mr. Chevrier: That is right.

Mr. McLure: This bridge over the strait of Canso is said to be for the benefit of the maritime provinces. We in Prince Edward Island are almost as much interested in it as the hon. member for Cape Breton South. With our own ferry service and this bridge we hope to be able to share in the $1 million per week paid out in wages in Cape Breton by supplying foodstuffs from the best producing province in Canada, Prince Edward Island. I am ready to accept the pledge of the minister given in this house about a year ago that the Canso strait would be crossed in the interests of the maritime provinces. I can quite understand why borings will have to be made before this work can be proceeded with but I am sure that the Minister of Transport will see that this bridge is built in the interests, not only of Cape Breton and Nova Scotia but of the maritimes generally.

Item agreed to.

Maritime Freight Rates Act—

488. To hereby authorize and provide for the payment from time to time during the fiscal year 1949-50 to the Canadian National Railway Company of the difference (estimated by the Canadian National Railway Company and certified by the auditors of the said company to the Minister of Transport as and when required by the said minister) occurring on account of the application of the Maritime Freight Rates Act, between the tariff tolls and the normal tolls (upon the same basis as set out in section 9 of the said act with respect to companies therein referred to) on all traffic moved during the calendar year 1949 under the tariffs approved on the eastern lines (as referred to in section 2 of the said act) of the Canadian National Railways $5,503,000.

Mr. Hatfield: We are thankful for the Maritime Freight Rates Act, but like the hon. member for Cumberland I should like to point out that the people of the maritimes are worrying over their markets in the United States. People who live along the Canadian National Railways in the maritime provinces must pay a higher freight rate for shipments to the United States than people living on the Canadian Pacific line in New Brunswick. For example, in making shipments of potatoes from Centreville to Paterson, New Jersey, the rate is 21 cents per 100 pounds more than the rate from a point on the Canadian Pacific four miles away. It costs 21 cents per 100 pounds or $100 a carload more on the C.N.R. than on the C.P.R. at a point on the C.N.R. four miles from the station on the C.P.R. I want to point out that the rate in the province of New Brunswick is 10 cents a hundred lower than the rate from Charlottetown, Prince Edward Island. In practically all cases, unless the shipment is routed to the western United States, the rate via the C.N.R. from Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia, and the north shore of New Brunswick is 10 to 20 cents higher than from points on the C.P.R. in New Brunswick. I should like the minister to tell me what route a car billed from Charlottetown, Prince Edward Island, to Boston would take on the Canadian National Railways. Where would it cross the border?

Mr. Chevrier: It would go via Saint John. I do not know where it would cross the border.

Mr. Hatfield: If it went via Saint John it would cross the border at Vanceboro. It would be turned over to the C.P.R. at North Devon. That car would take a 10 cent higher freight rate than a car originating anywhere on the C.P.R. in New Brunswick. In other words, we can ship a car of potatoes from Prince Edward Island to Woodstock, New Brunswick, on the C.N.R. and re-ship it on the C.P.R. to New Jersey or other points in the southern United States for less money than we can ship it directly from Prince Edward Island to these points in the United States. Paterson, New Jersey, is one example. We can save 10 cents a hundred by billing the car first to Woodstock, N.B., which is 500 miles from Charlottetown and then rebilling it on the C.P.R. to Paterson, New Jersey. We can save 10 cents a hundred, but that situation should not exist. We have to depend on the United States market to dispose of our potatoes, turnips, lumber and fish. I have raised this question for a number of years in the railway committee, but nothing has been done about it.

Anyone living in the United States who buys goods in the maritime provinces will ask that they should not be billed over the Canadian National Railways. It might be all right if potatoes, for example, are carried over the C.P.R. before they reach the border, but unless that is the case when we come to the border they are then shipped on to their destination in bond. When the receiver on the other end receives the carload of goods he has to get a customs broker and is put to the trouble of taking the car out of customs. On the other hand, if shipment is made via the C.P.R. from New Brunswick, and the car enters the United States at Vanceboro, or any other point, the railway has a customs brokerage firm set up there and the duty is paid. The duty is then added to the freight, and when the receiver in the United States gets his carload of goods he pays the freight and duty at the same time. He does not have to go to the trouble of getting a customs broker and paying him to get the car out of bond. I should like the minister to look into that matter because people living in the vicinity of the Canadian National Railways in New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island and Nova Scotia, and now in Newfoundland as well, are discriminated against.

Mr. Chevrier: As my hon. friend knows, individual rates are matters for the board. In view of his representations, I shall be glad to bring them to the attention of the board of transport commissioners.

Mr. Higgins: I should like to discuss the matter of freight rates and their application to Newfoundland. Before I do so, may I say that I do not want to delay the committee, and if it is not in order I shall not go further. The province has presented a brief to the royal commission on transportation, and if I cannot discuss the matter I shall not go any further. I should like to have an understanding before I proceed.

Mr. Chevrier: May I bring to the hon. member's attention the fact that once a matter is before the board it is considered sub judice and should not be discussed in the house on the estimates. Of course he can discuss the subsidy, but he cannot discuss the matters which he has already brought to my attention on several occasions. I have spoken about them in the house once or twice, and I would be delighted to speak tonight, but I hope he will not insist.

Mr. Higgins: I shall not take up the time because the minister is fully conversant with the matter, and I am sure he will look after the poor province of Newfoundland in that regard.

Item agreed to.

918. Canadian Government Railways—enlargement of dock and terminal facilities at North Sydney, N.S. (estimated cost $2,000,000)—capital, $250,000.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): These items are going through fairly rapidly, and I think most hon. members want to facilitate their passing. I should like to know what expenditures are being made at North Sydney, and whether this appropriation will complete the required facilities. We understand and are in agreement with the improvement of these facilities in order to serve the traffic going to Newfoundland. There should be some statement from the minister.

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): I have asked the minister for a statement as to this question, and I do not know why hon. members should cry "carried".

Mr. Chevrier: I am sorry. While I heard the first part of the hon. member's remarks, I did not hear the last part, which was the question.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): I asked whether this appropriation was sufficient to complete the necessary facilities in order to serve the increased traffic to and from Newfoundland.

Mr. Chevrier: No, not nearly enough. The estimated expenditure for the docks and railway facilities will be in the neighbourhood of $2 million, and this vote provides for $250,000.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): And the total expenditure is $2 million?

Mr. Chevrier: That is right.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): When does the minister expect the work to be completed if the total expenditure is to be $2 million?

Mr. Chevrier: The contract has not yet been let. Plans and specifications are about ready, but I hardly think it will be completed before next winter.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): What is the purpose of the $250,000 that is now being voted? What use is it to be put to?

Mr. Chevrier: It is in order to provide for the expenditure in connection with preliminary plans and specifications.

Mr. Higgins: Is there going to be any improvement in the docking facilities at Port aux Basques?

Mr. Chevrier: There is nothing provided in this estimate.

Mr. Higgins: Is it intended?

Mr. Chevrier: Not at this juncture.

[Mr. Higgins.]

Mr. Fulton: I think I can only raise this as a point of order, Mr. Chairman. As I understand it you have called item 918, and I should like to know whether item 911 has yet been called, because I understood the supplementary estimates were to be left until we had carried the main estimates.

The Deputy Chairman: I do not know of any such arrangement. Perhaps it happened while I was not in the chair. I have arranged the estimates in such order that once we take up the main estimate on a certain subject the supplementaries and further supplementaries dealing with the same item can be discussed at the same time. That procedure, which was followed previously, appeared to be satisfactory, and I intended to continue to follow it. Item 918 relates to the same subject matter; that is, Canadian government railways. The main estimate concerning the Canadian government railways had to do with repairs to Ogden Point piers in British Columbia, while item 918 dealt with the enlargement of terminal facilities at North Sydney. That was why I read the subject matter of this further supplementary item under the same heading. Item 911 has not been called, I may say for the information of the hon. member for Kamloops.

Item agreed to.

Air Service—

549. Air transport board—salaries and office expenses, $188,745.

Mr. Fulton: Before we come to this item I should like to make a comment or to ask a question on the statutory item following vote No. 494. Is it permissible to do that now, or should that be done on one of the administrative items? The question is, this being a statutory item as indicated, under what authority was the annuity increased by $1,200 a year? I do not recall any legislation coming before the house to authorize that increase.

Mr. Chevrier: It has not been increased. The amount was announced prior to last session, upon the retirement of Colonel Cross and the appointment of Mr. Justice Archibald.

Mr. Fulton: Was this provision incorporated in that statute?

Mr. Chevrier: Last year it covered the unexpired term and amounted to $3,600, while this year it is for the full term.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I am in favour of that item; he is a relative of mine.

Mr. Bater: I have received advice from the North Battleford board of trade that they have made representations to the department in connection with the composition of the directorates of Trans-Canada Air Lines and Canadian National Railways. They have asked, and have requested me to support their suggestion, that better representation be given western Canada on both those directorates. I also noticed that at the annual convention of the Manitoba associated chambers of commerce a resolution was adopted requesting better representation for western Canada on both those directorates; and I should like to draw that to the attention of the minister.

Mr. Fulton: This is the board before which, as I understand it, the hearing on the show-cause order in connection with Colonial Air Lines will be heard. I am just wondering what may be the repercussions of that order. As I understand it, Trans-Canada Air Lines has a franchise for a service from Montreal to New York, via international agreement; that has been authorized recently. Colonial has a franchise for the same service under an earlier international agreement. If I am correct in my reading of the press reports—and I admit that is all I am going on—the statement has been made that since Colonial questions the constitutionality of the award of that franchise to Trans-Canada, we are taking the position that we question the legality of their earlier franchise. Where is this going to end? I confess that I am somewhat confused, and incidentally very much disturbed, by the international bickering which appears to be going on. I would certainly appreciate, as I am sure the country would appreciate, a statement by the minister which might clear up the matter for us.

Mr. Chevrier: I made a complete statement in the house on the orders of the day earlier and went into the matter as fully as I could; but perhaps I can recapitulate briefly. The air agreement which was signed between the two countries in June, 1949, provided among many other things that T.C.A. would operate the route between Montreal and New York. They made their application to the civil aeronautics board in the usual course, and Colonial Air Lines by a number of legal methods, attempted to block the application. The position is such that it would take some time to go into the legal entanglements involved in that application.

Be that as it may, T.C.A. have not yet obtained their right from C.A.B. to operate to New York. On the other hand C.A.B. gave us the right to have Canadian Pacific Air Lines operate between Vancouver, Honolulu and Australia, and another application is now before the civil aeronautics board by T.C.A. to operate into the Caribbean via Florida with traffic rights at St. Petersburg and Tampa, which as yet has not been disposed of. Because of the delays in the granting of the licence to T.C.A. and because of what appeared to the air transport board to be lack of good faith on the part of Colonial the board under the Aeronautics Act issued this show-cause order, which simply means that Colonial Air Lines will be asked to come before the board and show cause why its licence to operate between New York and Montreal should not be suspended. I do not think I can say more than that at this time.

Mr. Fulton: I do not quite follow the reasoning behind this case. It may be extremely irritating to have Colonial Air Lines opposing the constitutionality of the award of the franchise to T.C.A.; but surely the fact that they have a franchise already to operate from New York to Montreal cannot be disputed. I am inclined to question the wisdom—and I should like to hear the minister's reaction to this—of entering into disputes at the international level concerning a matter which it seems to me should be dealt with at the commercial level. In other words if there is a dispute between two companies, Colonial and T.C.A., why must governments get mixed up in it?

Mr. Chevrier: Governments are not involved in it.

Mr. Fulton: Then why are we getting notes from the United States government?

Mr. Chevrier: Governments had not been mixed up in it except to this point, when the note referred to yesterday by the Secretary of State for External Affairs was received. The application is simply a routine one made by the air line to C.A.B. in the United States and to the air transport board in Canada; there is nothing more than that in it.

Mr. Higgins: Following the minister's statement, as I understood his remarks the other day no matter what may be the outcome of Colonial's application, nothing will interfere with the use of Gander by United States or international air lines?

Mr. Chevrier: I am unable to substitute my judgment for that of the board. The air transport board is the body that grants the licences. Already they have granted licences to two United States companies at Gander, Pan-American and Trans-World Air Lines. One application is still pending; and the rights granted those two United States companies at Gander are permanent. The other right will be disposed of.

Mr. Higgins: Has the minister reason to believe that other trans-Canada carriers will not be granted the same rights?

Mr. Chevrier: I have none.

Mr. Fulton: Who inspired—and I shall use that word for want of a better—the show-cause order issued to Colonial Air Lines?

Mr. Chevrier: The air transport board.

Mr. Fulton: Is that not a branch of government, an emanation of the minister's department?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, it is, in the same way as the board of transport commissioners is a branch of the department, or the national harbours board.

Mr. Fulton: It seems to me, with respect, that government is getting mixed up with this. I will put it this way. Why could not T.C.A. have issued the show-cause order?

Mr. Chevrier: T.C.A. is the chosen instrument of the government to operate under the international air agreement, just as Colonial Air Lines is the chosen instrument of the United States government to operate from New York to Ottawa. It could not interfere. There must be a regulating body that decides whether an air line shall operate from one point to another or shall cease to operate. That regulating and controlling body is the air transport board.

Mr. Fulton: Is the position not this? Whether we resent it or not, Colonial Air Lines made an application and Colonial is—and I think I am correct in this statement—a commercial air line, is it not?

Mr. Chevrier: Colonial did not make application. Colonial already had its licence.

Mr. Fulton: It opposed the constitutionality of the award of a franchise to T.C.A. from Montreal to New York.

Mr. Chevrier: Yes.

Mr. Fulton: But it did that as a commercial entity. Unless the T.C.A. take action to request that Colonial's licence be cancelled, it seems to me that the air transport board, which it is stated is an emanation of the government, has turned around to a commercial corporation and, as it were, by way of reprisal, said: You show cause why we should not cancel your licence. That is why I say I regret that government—and it appears that we have taken this step—should get mixed up in what is a commercial matter as between air lines.

Mr. Chevrier: The reverse position could equally have been the case. Suppose that Colonial Air Lines had made the application and had previously been designated by the American government as being the line to operate between Toronto and New York. T.C.A. could then have come before the air transport board and opposed the application. It probably would not have done so, but it could have done so in the same manner as Colonial is opposing and has opposed the application by T.C.A. before the C.A.B.

Mr. Fulton: That is perfectly true. I do not think that alters the situation as I have placed it before the committee, namely that the action to show cause why Colonial Air Lines licence should not be cancelled has been taken in the first instance by an emanation of our government. Is that not a statement of the fact?

Mr. Chevrier: No, that is not the fact. The fact is simply this. The two countries signed a bilateral air agreement and one of the designated instruments of one country, namely Colonial, challenges the right of T.C.A. to operate on a certain route; and it challenges that right, as the hon. member has said, on the ground of constitutionality; and while challenging the constitutionality of the bilateral air agreement, it maintains that it has the right on the other hand to operate from New York into Canada.

Mr. Fulton: Under an earlier agreement.

An hon. Member: Under the same agreement.

Mr. Chevrier: As my hon. friend says, under the same agreement, confirmed in the earlier agreement. What I mean is that it had these rights under the earlier agreement and now the same rights were confirmed in the agreement of June, 1949, plus other rights. The whole point is that it seeks to challenge the constitutionality of the agreement in the United States and still in Canada it wants the right to say, on the other hand, that the agreement is constitutional and that it should have the right to operate in here. All the air transport board say is: We now ask you to show cause why your rights should not be suspended.

Mr. Fulton: Is there no way in which that action taken by the air transport board could have been taken by T.C.A.?

Mr. Chevrier: No.

Mr. Fulton: In order to keep the thing off the international level and keep it as between air lines?

Mr. Chevrier: No, for the reason that T.C.A. is not a regulating or governing power. There is only one body that has them under the Aeronautics Act, and it is the air transport board. It is the only board that can cancel or grant a licence or ask an applicant or a licensee to show cause why its licence should not be suspended.

Mr. Fulton: Would it not have been possible for T.C.A. to apply to the air transport board? Would it not have been possible for that action to have originated with T.C.A.?

Mr. Chevrier: No.

Mr. Fulton: It seems to me to be desirable that it could.

Mr. Chevrier: Only in regard to its rights across Canada or a trans-border right wherein it would have to apply to both boards; that is, if it had running rights in both countries, therefore it must get a licence from both countries.

Mr. Fulton: In conclusion, as far as I am concerned, I put this thought before the minister as a result of the discussion we have had. In my view it would be desirable to create a situation in which it would be possible for the initial action to be taken by our T.C.A. or our commercial air lines under such a set of circumstances, if only for the object of avoiding the appearance—and it seems to me it has that appearance, based on facts—of government having to take the initial action which means inevitably what we have now, an exchange of international notes, a thing which has not happened under circumstances of this sort, at any rate, for years as between ourselves and the United States. I think it is most regrettable. I feel that, if it is at all possible, some mechanism should be worked out whereby our commercial air lines, T.C.A. or other air lines as the case may be, could take initial action to avoid such a set of circumstances in the future.

Mr. Green: If the Colonial Air Lines withdrew their application in the United States, would this show-cause summons be dropped?

Mr. Chevrier: I could not answer that question. That would be up to the board. I could anticipate what the result would be, but I would not presume to say what the board's decision would be.

Mr. Green: I think there is one question about the jurisdiction of the air transport board which should be clarified. It has always been my understanding that the board exercises its discretion in granting a licence, permit, or whatever the certificate is called, and apparently that has been done in this case. Colonial Air Lines have been given a licence. I can quite understand why the board should at a later date issue a show-cause summons to show why that licence should not be cancelled if there were some doubt about the ability to fly, or if the line were not operating safely, or if there were something being done that was wrong with the actual conduct of the operation; but I should like the minister to state whether the air transport board can go further than that and cancel the licence for some reason which has nothing whatever to do with the efficiency of the operation. If the board can do that with one line, then it could do the same with a Canadian line; having issued a licence to a Canadian line, and that licence still not having expired, and the route being flown in an efficient way, satisfactory to the public, the board could issue a show-cause summons and have that licence cancelled for some extraneous reason. Has the board that power? That is the point which worries me. Because it does not like something that a flying company is doing, quite apart from the route that is being flown, has the board the drastic power to cancel the company's licence?

Mr. Chevrier: In the first place, the licence was granted under the old agreement. In the second place, having the power to grant a licence, they must of necessity have the power to suspend or cancel that licence. And as I said the reason why the show-cause order is being given is perfectly valid, namely, that a licensee claims on the one hand that the air agreement under which it is the chosen instrument is invalid, on one side of the line, and on the other side claims the right to continue to operate because the air agreement is valid. Surely that in itself is a good reason why the board should exercise the power which it has under the act.

Mr. Green: Then the board could not take action of this kind in the case of a licence issued for a domestic flight, that is, a flight within Canada.

Mr. Chevrier: I think the board has the power to grant licences for domestic flights in Canada, and also to cancel them.

Mr. Green: If it issues a licence in Canada for flying in Canada and the Canadian company is giving satisfactory service, could the board issue a show-cause summons and cancel that licence for some reason quite apart from the fact that the route is not being flown in a safe way?

Mr. Chevrier: I would not like to answer that question generally but I would say that if an air line were operating in accordance with the regulations, civil aviation, radio and weather, the board would not attempt to interfere with it.

Item agreed to.

Airways and airports—

498. Construction and improvements, including radio facilities; and to authorize commitments against future years in the amount of $100,000 (revote $2,303,650)—Capital, $13,097,300.

Mr. Green: Can the minister tell us where this money is to be spent?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, I have quite a lengthy list. I shall pick out some from various districts. As the committee knows, there are several air districts across Canada. I shall take the larger amounts. In the district of Moncton almost a million dollars is to be spent to reinforce and extend runway, $725,000 at Sydney, Nova Scotia; $750,000 is to be spent for the construction of a hard-surfaced runway at Fredericton; $750,000 is to be spent at Saint John for the construction of northeast-southwest runway including lighting. In the district of Montreal, Dorval, $300,000 is to be spent for a terminal building. In the district of Toronto there are two large items, one of $970,000 to complete the construction of one runway and another of $740,000 to complete the construction of another runway. In the Winnipeg district there are substantial expenditures for the construction of parking areas and taxi strips at the Stevenson airport. In the Edmonton district $870,000 is being provided for the construction of east-west runway at Calgary. Then there is a substantial number of smaller items, one for the isolated places in the Northwest Territories. In the Vancouver district there is quite a large number of items that are provided for. Again this is broken down in districts for radio aviation. The total amount is as set out in the vote.

Mr. Green: That is not all being spent on government-owned fields?

Mr. Chevrier: No.

Mr. Higgins: In the Newfoundland supplementary estimates there is an item of $449,000 under the same heading.

Mr. Chevrier: Over and above this.

Mr. Higgins: Where is it to be spent?

Mr. Chevrier: At Gander.

Item agreed to.

499. Civil aviation services, $3,842,568.

Mr. Higgins: Under this item there is an amount of $3,770,000 for Newfoundland. Where is it to be spent?

Mr. Chevrier: My hon. friend is referring to the supplementary estimates.

Mr. Higgins: Yes.

Mr. Chevrier: I speak from memory now. The expenditure for the Gander airport will run upwards of $3 million. I think it is somewhere in the neighbourhood of from $3,500,000 to $4 million.

Mr. Higgins: The amount I refer to is $3,770,000.

Mr. Chevrier: I would say most of that is for Gander.

Mr. Higgins: Is that for runways?

Mr. Chevrier: Buildings, runways, and I think there is an apron. After we took over Gander we discovered that there was a great deal of work to be done. Most of it was in connection with repairs, various maintenance and the like.

Mr. Higgins: That will be in the next season?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): What is the total expenditure for this service in the current year?

Mr. Chevrier: Under item 499?

Mr. Black (Cumberland): No, for all the air services.

Mr. Chevrier: It is $36 million.

Item agreed to.

500. Radio aviation services, $4,097,050.

Mr. Higgins: There is a little item of $415,000 for Newfoundland. Is that to be spent at Gander?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes.

Item agreed to.

502. Grants to organizations for the development of civil aviation, in the amounts detailed in the estimates, $310,000.

Mr. Fulton: I do not want the detail of this item. Perhaps it will be sufficient if the minister could tell me where I can find it. What are the qualifications or standards laid down before a flying club or a flying school can obtain one of these grants? In the detail on page 291 it says that $250,000 is available to flying schools and flying clubs and student pilots. Is that available under the statement of policy that has been previously announced?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, it is available under an order in council which I tabled. If my hon. friend has not got it I shall be glad to send it to him.

Item agreed to.

503. Contributions, subject to the approval of the governor in council, to assist municipalities to improve existing airports, the sites of which have been provided by such municipalities (revote, $164,000), $264,000.

Mr. Herridge: Under this item contributions re given to assist municipalities in improving xisting airports. In my constituency there s a most important airport. I think the inister is aware of the circumstances. It is laced on the most favourable site for the anding of planes. It is used at this time by he Canadian Pacific Air Lines for landing assenger planes. I understand that the inister's department has rejected assistance o the development of this airport because it oes not come up to certain specifications. It s jointly owned by four municipalities.

Mr. Chevrier: What is the name of it?

Mr. Herridge: Castlegar. In view of the fact hat this is a terminal airport for the district nd will continue to be, and offers the best pportunities for development as an airport, vill the minister's department consider ssisting those municipalities that own the irport?

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, there is a arefully defined program in the department n connection with assistance to municipal irports. The technical officers of the depart- nent feel that this airport is good enough or the services now available. The officers lo not think that it is the kind of airport that hould be operated on a 24-hour basis because he cost of it would be prohibitive. Having one into it carefully they feel that is as far s they can go. If it pleases my hon. friend shall be glad to ask my officers to look at it gain.

Mr. Herridge: I wish you would.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): On what basis loes the department assist municipalities in he construction or maintenance of airports?

Mr. Chevrier: It assists them in three ways: First by grants to the municipalities; second, by a subsidy to an airport; and third, it comes o the assistance of airports in isolated areas.

Dealing with the first group, as a rule the nunicipality must provide the site. What the lepartment does is to make a grant of $25,000 o the municipality. The municipality asks or the contract, places the contract, and we vill pay towards that cost to the municipality sum not to exceed $25,000.

Mr. Green: I notice that in the particulars n page 291 there are eleven payments; ten f them are for airports in the province of Quebec, each in the amount of $25,000; and ne in Ontario for $4,000, and none in any f the other provinces. Why is that?

Mr. Chevrier: Because the list I mentioned moment ago gives assistance to trans-con- inental airports—for T.C.A. and C.P.A. in he northwest. I think now of Winnipeg, Calgary, Edmonton and Saskatoon. Those were airports taken over during the war. The government spent large sums of money, and then turned them over to the municipalities. Some of the municipalities felt they should not accept them; and in connection with some of them, as indicated by the vote which appears later on, we have to carry them on and administer them ourselves.

In Quebec, apart from Dorval, there are not many of these transcontinental airports. But in the more isolated parts of Quebec, such as the north shore and the south shore, for which provision is made in these estimates, there is great need for small airports, and the government decided to come to the assistance of these municipalities in that way.

I think however if one were to make a tabulation one would see that, from the point of view of population, Quebec perhaps —and not "perhaps", but assuredly—receives far less by way of assistance for airports than does the rest of Canada.

Mr. Green: I am not complaining about what Quebec is getting. It does seem strange however that only Quebec and Ontario are getting any benefit from this vote. The minister just referred to an airport at Castlegar. That is a main airport on the route from Vancouver to Calgary. Planes are dropping in there every day on their regular routes. While the minister says it cannot be operated at night, I think that is not the actual position. Furthermore it is an emergency landing for Trans-Canada Air Lines. I do not understand why it cannot qualify for some help when these municipal airports do.

Mr. Chevrier: It does qualify, but not for the kind of help it wants. It wants operation day and night. These little airports to which my hon. friend refers cannot operate at night. There are no instrument services and no control works permitting them to land aircraft at night. All there is is an airstrip. When one considers the tremendous size of the estimates for airport construction, and the cost of building an airstrip, it must be realized that $25,000 does not go very far. Most of these are dirt strips.

Mr. Applewhaite: Mr. Chairman, I should like to speak briefly in connection with this item, and direct my attention more to what the item does not cover than to what it covers. This item deals with contributions subject to the approval of the governor in council, to assist municipalities to improve existing airports, the sites of which have been provided by such municipalities. The situation I should like to bring to the attention of the minister and the committee is that of those communities which are not municipalities. In northern British Columbia, and presumably in other parts of Canada, there are a large number of small communities which are not municipalities, but which, of their own volition and with their own work, have provided the existing airports.

Perhaps it would not be proper to call these airports, but they could be described as airstrips on which aircraft can and do land. These are not airports asking for assistance by way of range finders and other types of modern equipment. What I have in mind are those communities where the citizens have literally got out with their picks and shovels, perhaps with horses or trucks, and built the airports now in use.

Perhaps in view of the wording of the item it would be difficult to assist them. I would draw the attention of the minister to what has been done in a few of those cases in my district. The most important of these is the Atlin airport, where the north-south runway of the proposed two-way airport has been cleared from end to end by the people there. It was done in 1940, and has been partially maintained by bulldozers since that time.

During the months of June and July of this year there was an average of three planes per day at that point. This airstrip was built entirely through local effort, local money and local labour.

At Telegraph Creek, which perhaps is not so large, we find a similar situation where the airstrip was built by local, voluntary labour. At Dease Lake we find a somewhat similar airstrip. The main expense of the field at this point was borne by Mr. G. L. T. Dalzeil and Robert A. Farrell. Mr. Dalzeil is the present owner of the land on which the field is located, and put up most of the cash. He is the only one who uses the field at the present time, because he is the only person with a small enough plane.

At Tulsequah the situation is slightly different. The airstrip at Tulsequah was built by the Polaris-Taku Mining Company, who now own it. The strip is used by the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company and other planes that may be going through in that direction. Permission is given to everyone who wishes to use the strip, and no charge is made for its use.

In all these cases I should like to point out that there are involved a class of people who are not usually dependent upon governments, and who do not make a practice of running to governments to have everything done for them. They have done everything it is humanly possible for them to do, and have done it of their own volition. I suggest they are now entitled to some assistance from this department.

Someone may suggest: Why not incorporate and become municipalities? These communities are too small. You cannot incorporate a working municipality out of a community of 220 or 250 people. But, without exception, they are communities which have no rail connection, no passenger steamship connection and, so far as three out of four of them are concerned, no highway connection. To all intents and purposes therefore they are entirely dependent upon air transport.

I would ask the minister whether he could make this vote applicable to communities of that sort. I would be perfectly willing to see the limit brought down to $4,000 or $5,000 as a maximum for airports of this size. Would he consider applications from that type of community?

Mr. Chevrier: This vote does not provide for the contingency to which the hon. member has referred. The policies outlined a moment ago cover grants to municipalities only. But, as I have already indicated to my hon. friend, I am asking my officers to see if there is not some way of amending this vote so as to give assistance in such cases as he has mentioned.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Would this vote cover maintenance expenditures necessary to keep the airport at Amherst in a serviceable condition? This airport was acquired by the municipality, and a special appropriation was made. During the war the government made substantial expenditures in the improvement of the airport, and after the war it reverted to the municipality. I believe the government still has title to it. Would this appropriation provide funds to maintain that airport? It is used by flying clubs, and some of the people in those clubs have complained to me about its condition.

Mr. Chevrier: There is no provision in this vote for maintenance or operation expenditures. But if there is an airport at Amherst, and the municipality wishes to make application, we will be glad to see if we can assist them.

Mr. Gibson (Comox-Alberni): Can assistance be granted under this vote to municipalities for the maintenance of sea plane bases?

Mr. Chevrier: No.

Mr. Gibson (Comox-Alberni): Have you been asked to grant such assistance?

Mr. Chevrier: I cannot say, but we could not grant assistance for sea plane bases under this vote which is purely for land plane bases.

Mr. Gibson (Comox-Alberni): There is no ther appropriation available?

Mr. Chevrier: No.

Mr. Higgins: What is the position with egard to the United States bases at Argentia nd Stephenville? Are landing fees charged r is there a subsidy by the Canadian governnent?

Mr. Chevrier: That would come under xternal affairs.

Item agreed to.

505. To authorize contribution of an amount not xceeding $30,420 to the state of Michigan, U.S.A., epartment of aeronautics, towards the cost of peration and maintenance of certain airways facilies at Grand Marais, Michigan, for use of Canadian ircraft, $30,420.

Mr. Hatfield: Will the minister explain this ote?

Mr. Chevrier: This is to assist in the operaion and maintenance of the airport at Grand Marais, Michigan, which is used as a substiute airport by T.C.A. planes when taking he lower route from Toronto to Winnipeg.

Item agreed to.

506. Contribution to the international civil aviaion organization as Canada's portion of the finanial assistance to the government of Iceland in espect of the provision, operation and maintenance f certain air navigation services, $48,000.

Mr. Knowles: This seems to be a new item nd perhaps the minister could explain it in nore detail. What is the total amount spent n these services and what other countries ontribute? Who is benefited?

Mr. Chevrier: This service is of benefit to ll planes that use the north transatlantic oute operated by countries who are members f I.C.A.O. and who subscribe to this service. The total amount is 3,609,800 kroner and Canada's share is 310,661 kroner, which is approximately $48,000.

Item agreed to.

Northwest communication system —

507. Additions and betterments, including transport equipment—capital—formerly under demobilization and reconversion estimates, $500,000.

Mr. Fulton: Where are these improvements and betterments to be made?

Mr. Chevrier: This appropriation is to carry out the terms of the Ilsley-Morgenthau agreement of 1944 whereby this government purchased from the United States government the northwest Pacific lines which were turned over to the Canadian National Telegraphs for operation. This is a capital vote which can be broken down partly for the acquisition of equipment and partly for the construction of certain buildings such as additional married quarters. This is the northwest communications line extending northwesterly from Edmonton in the direction of Fairbanks and Alaska, and these improvements will be made at places such as Little Smoky, Destruction Bay, Yellowknife, Canyon Creek, Swift River, Watson Lake, Fort Nelson and Summit Lake.

Mr. Fulton: These are communication lines?

Mr. Chevrier: Telegraph lines and radio.

Mr. Knowles: I notice that this is under civil aviation. Has this to do principally with private telegraph services or private telecommunications services for the Canadian Pacific Air Lines which flies that route?

Mr. Chevrier: It provides telegraph service and telecommunications service for the assistance of all planes operating in that area and for the assistance of the people living there.

Mr. Knowles: Do Canadian Pacific Air Lines pay anything for this service?

Mr. Chevrier: They pay the usual rate for the use of the line.

Mr. Knowles: So far as the capital expenditures are concerned, we are paying the whole shot.

Mr. Chevrier: Yes.

Item agreed to.

508. To provide for the difference between the expenditures for operation and maintenance and revenue accruing from operations during the year ending March 31, 1950—formerly under demobilization and reconversion estimates, $343,016.

Mr. Knowles: What are the anticipated expenditures for the present fiscal year and what are the anticipated revenues?

Mr. Chevrier: The anticipated revenue is $883,000 and the anticipated expenditure is $1,226,966, showing a deficit of $343,000.

Mr. Knowles: From whom is the revenue received?

Mr. Chevrier: The revenue is received in the following manner:

Lease of line to the United States government	$318,000
Lease of line to Department of Transport	226,000
Lease of lines to airlines operators	44,000
Lease of line to R.C.A.F. and army	98,000
Commercial traffic and other leases	195,000

Mr. Knowles: We seem to have quite a mixture of telegraphs, telecommunications, civil aviation, defence and international relations. On what basis is the C.P.A. now operating the service that crosses the international border into Alaska? Is there some order in council that gives them that right or are they flying that service for T.C.A.?

I have in mind the general government policy that routes crossing the international border are to be covered by the government agency.

Mr. Chevrier: If my hon. friend is referring to the domestic service of C.P.A., that is operated under a licence granted by the air transport board. If he is referring to the international service from Vancouver to Kiska to the Orient, that is operated under agreement by which the government has selected them as the chosen instrument.

Mr. Knowles: I was referring to the C.P.A. line that goes north from Edmonton and eventually crosses into Alaska to Fairbanks and Nome.

Mr. Chevrier: That route is operated under a subcontract from T.C.A.

Item agreed to.

724. Meteorological services—further amount required, $77,000.

Mr. Higgins: Where is that money being spent?

Mr. Chevrier: This item for $77,000 is for the operation and maintenance of meteorological facilities being taken over from Newfoundland. While a part of it appertains to Gander, some of it is for Botwood, Torbay and Goose.

Item agreed to.

725. Construction and improvements—further amount required, $61,000.

Mr. Higgins: What about this item?

Mr. Chevrier: This is for improvements to existing accommodation for weather services at Gander. All of it is for expenditure at Gander.

Item agreed to.

Radio division—

511. Administration of the Radio Act and regulations, $1,075,425.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): What is the reason for the big advance in expenditure in this item?

Mr. Chevrier: The main part of the increase is due to increases in salaries; $102,000 is attributable to that, and the other great increase, $185,000, is provided for the North American regional broadcasting conference which has been in session in Montreal for the last eight or ten weeks. It is a group of members of the North American hemisphere which met at Havana in 1942 and concluded an agreement for a period of five years. That agreement expired in 1947, and they operated on a modus vivendi until 1949 when they met in Montreal to attempt to agree on a further convention.

[Mr. Knowles.]

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): All right.

Mr. Chevrier: In 1949 Canada is the host government.

Item agreed to.

512. Radio direction finding stations, radio beacons and radio telegraph stations, operation and maintenance, $1,778,283.

Mr. Green: Recently the minister's department established a radar station on the bridge over the first narrows at Vancouver. The idea was that from this station directions would go out to ships in the event of fog, or if any other difficulties were experienced in getting into the harbour. Just two or three weeks ago a ship crashed on the shore of Stanley park a few hundred yards from the bridge despite the fact that the radar operator on the bridge gave out repeated warnings that the ship was running into the shore. There is some doubt whether or not the apparatus on the ship was working, and also whether it had a radio operator. The suggestion is made that the department has no power to compel ships to follow the directions given. In other words, if they choose to ignore the directions or are not able to hear them, the company operating the ship is not subject to any penalty. Incidentally, the minister announced he was having an investigation made into the wreck. The ship was totally wrecked, but fortunately there was no loss of life. Can the minister tell us what the position is as to radar warning stations of that type?

Mr. Chevrier: With regard to the hon. member's reference to the wreck of the Chelohsin, as I indicated earlier a preliminary inquiry was ordered, but the report has not been forthcoming, and I am unable to give the house or my hon. friend the details surrounding the wreck. With reference to the radar station which operates on the bridge, all the radar station can do is to give a warning of danger that lies ahead. It has no power to give instructions which must be followed by the ship.

Mr. Green: Is there any penalty if the ship does not follow instructions given by a station of this type?

Mr. Chevrier: No, there is not.

Mr. Green: There might very well be a collision. The instructions might be directing one ship to keep clear of another, and if they were not followed the result might be a serious collision. It seems to me there should be some power to enforce obedience to those directions.

Mr. Chevrier: I am informed all these radar stations do is to advise the ship of its location and any imminent danger that may lie ahead. There is no power to give orders.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): This ship hit a whole continent, didn't it?

Item agreed to.

726. Radio direction finding stations, radio beacons and radio telegraph stations, operation and maintenance—further amount required, $119,500.

Mr. Higgins: I see the amount of $119,500 is made up, among other things, of an item of $65,000 for a Marconi operated radio station. Is that a fee, or what connection does it have with the bill we passed recently?

Mr. Chevrier: That is an agreement Marconi have with the department to operate a number of stations on the island.

Item agreed to.

513. Suppression of radio interferences, $357,978.

Mr. Herridge: In the southern interior valleys of British Columbia there are thousands of people with radio sets who are unable to listen to Canadian stations at night. The only radio reception they get is from United States stations. I think the minister's officials are well informed as to the situation because they have investigated it, but is any consideration being given to remedying it?

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): How lucky they are.

Mr. Chevrier: The difficulty that arises in the case mentioned by my hon. friend is that the main obstacle is the mountains, and they could be circumvented by additional power. If the stations wish to ask for additional power I suppose their applications would be considered by the C.B.C., and eventually by the Department of Transport, but the matter has been and still is being given consideration. I realize that it is a difficult position, but it is one which is caused because of geography more than anything else.

Item agreed to.

514. Issue of radio receiving licences—(transport department only), $666,254.

Mr. Knowles: Can the minister tell us what the present status is of the discussions that have been taking place about the amount of the radio licence fee? Is it still $2.50, or is it going up or down?

Mr. Chevrier: The licence fee is still $2.50.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I want to make one remark about this item. This is—what is a parliamentary word—the most insidious bit of camouflage in financing I have ever known in my life. The Canadian Broadcasting Corporation permits your poor unfortunate department to do all the work for them and then turns over the whole fee to the C.B.C. in spite of the work that you and your officials have done. Why in this House of Commons we do not face this thing and give the C.B.C. the money they want without this ostrich business of financing is absolutely more than I can understand.

Mr. Hatfield: This costs more to collect than it is worth.

Mr. Shaw: In the details on page 295 I see provision for temporary assistance in the amount of $163,608. Does that cover in the main those persons who go around knocking on the doors of Canadian householders in an effort to ascertain whether or not they have radio licences?

Mr. Chevrier: No, it does not.

Mr. Shaw: Then where may one find a record of the amounts paid to those men who do go around to the houses?

Mr. Chevrier: Some time ago I tabled a return in the house indicating that certain sums of money had been collected in each of the last three years, but perhaps for the information of the committee I might give the amount collected in 1948-49, which was $4,670,000. The commissions paid in the same year were $341,000, which was a very small portion of the total collections.

Mr. Shaw: The point I have in mind is this. I understand the $2.50 fee is turned over to the C.B.C., and that the cost of collecting that fee is not deducted from it. Is that not true?

Mr. Chevrier: I understand that the full amount is turned over to the C.B.C.

Mr. Shaw: Then my previous question naturally follows. Where in the records do we find the amount paid these door to door canvassers or solicitors or investigators, whatever you call them?

Mr. Chevrier: I am told that the commissions I mentioned a moment ago are covered by item 514.

Item agreed to.

Telegraph and Telephone Service—

515. Administration, operation and maintenance, $1,263,060.

Mr. Knowles: Does this item relate to the telephone service provided by the federal government in northern British Columbia?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes.

Mr. Knowles: Last summer I was up in that part of the country trying to keep the hon. member for Skeena from getting here.

Mr. Cruickshank: You were not very successful.

Mr. Knowles: No, I was not. At that time I had occasion to pay a visit to Hazelton, British Columbia, and the employees of the telegraph office there invited me to look over their premises. It did seem to me there was considerable room for improvement. I wonder if that situation has been drawn to the attention of the minister, and whether consideration is being given to improving the building and the facilities with which these employees work at that point.

Mr. Chevrier: I do not know about the premises my hon. friend refers to, but I was up in the Northwest Territories last year—

Mr. Knowles: This was in British Columbia, at Hazelton.

Mr. Chevrier: I was at the station at Whitehorse, or a few miles outside that town, which is on the same line. Frankly, in that isolated country I was surprised to see the efficiency of the operation of this station. It was pretty well operated; the operator was a young man who knew his business, and he had the most modern equipment. It may be that the station visited by my hon. friend was not in the same condition, but it is on the same line. However, I shall be glad to ask the officers who are here to look into the matter.

Mr. Knowles: I just mentioned the matter to bring it to the minister's attention. The point I am talking about is probably a thousand miles south of where the minister was.

Mr. Chevrier: It is on the same line.

Mr. Knowles: The conditions at Whitehorse as described by the minister certainly were not those I saw at Hazelton.

Mr. Applewhaite: I wish to bring up a matter which comes directly under the heading of telegraph and telephone administration. I want to refer this matter to the minister with the request that he take such action as I am going to suggest, at least as a temporary palliative.

I point out to the minister and the committee that between Prince Rupert and Prince George, British Columbia, there is a telegraph line operated by the dominion government telegraph service. Going over that line today is the complete radio service of the trans-Canada network, including both sponsored and sustaining programs. At the present time, however, radio station CFBR, which is operated under some lease arrangement, is not permitted to rebroadcast revenue-pro ducing or sponsored programs. The informa tion I have, which I know to be accurate, i that the C.B.C. cannot permit those program to be broadcast because they have bee unable to come to an agreement with th dominion government telegraphs with respec to a rental fee for the use of the line, thoug I would impress upon the minister tha today those programs are going over tha line to the radio station. The programs whic are non-revenue-producing are being broad cast, while those which are revenue-pro ducing or sponsored have to be switched o at the Prince Rupert station.

Therefore no question of the greater o lesser use of the dominion government tele graph line is involved. To have these pro grams rebroadcast would involve no cash out lay as far as the taxpayers of Canada ar concerned. Not one cent would be involved I am informed, and I believe the informatio to be correct, that the amount suggested a a fair rental by the dominion governmen telegraphs is $30,000 a year, which they ar asking the Canadian Broadcasting Corpora tion to pay but which the C.B.C. has decide it is not in a position to pay.

Mr. Chevrier: If I may correct my hon friend, the amount asked is $18,000.

Mr. Applewhaite: I am glad indeed to hea that, because the information I was give not very long ago was to the effect that i was $30,000; and that was the figure quote before the board of transport commissioners I am glad it has been reduced to $18,000 because I might hope that figure would pro vide a basis for negotiation.

In the meantime the suggestion I want t make to the minister is this. Both the C.B.C and the dominion government telegraphs though they may be separate bodies, ar forms of governmental agencies or crow corporations. That being so, would it not b possible to give permission to have thes programs broadcast while negotiations ar going on? Why should the residents of tha district, who are paying their radio licenc fees, have to go without the programs they want to hear while these negotiations are i progress? It might be said that to do thi would weaken the position of the dominio government telegraphs in their negotiation with the C.B.C. I strongly suggest that thi should not be the case; otherwise it woul indicate that one government departmen apparently is trying to make money out o the other.

I know the departmental excuses o reasons; I know the difficulties in connectio with the solution of interdepartmental problems of this kind; I also know the answers to the questions that have been raised. I find it very difficult indeed to believe that this has been going on with the minister's knowledge; and I find it impossible to believe that it will continue with the minister's knowledge and approval. I suggest that it is an unfortunate situation when on Monday morning the member for that district receives telegrams from the city of Prince Rupert on the Pacific coast asking who won and what was the score in the Saturday night hockey game in Toronto, which of course is a polite way of telling me they cannot get the Imperial Oil hockey broadcast, which is one of the programs they really want. I could talk for forty minutes without repeating myself on this subject, but I am not going to do so. In view of the fact that governmental expenditure is not involved, I am just going to urge the minister to give these people the programs they want for Christmas.

Mr. Chevrier: I think the hon. member has raised a point that is quite a sore one in the area from which he comes, and I am not at all surprised that he should be quite angry and disturbed about the situation. But there is more to the position than that which he has placed on the record, and I do not want to enter into a discussion of the various points involved at this time. It does seem unfortunate—and I agree with him in this respect—that two government bodies could not agree on what should be done. I have already taken up the suggestion which he has made. In fact, I brought it to the attention of the two branches concerned, and I must say that it did not seem to appeal to them. But I am fully conversant with the problem, and I can assure my hon. friend that I will give it my personal attention.

Mr. Benidickson: The same condition prevails, of two government bodies scrapping about who is going to assume the bookkeeping in these matters, in the district of Rainy River. There the two culprits are the C. B. C. and the Canadian National Railways. I think you will find there is something similar there.

Mr. Fulton: In the south central part of British Columbia from which I come, large areas are covered by the government telephone and telegraph services. The people who are given that service are genuinely disturbed lest they should be subject to an increase in rates, not as a direct result of the application now before the board of transport commissioners by the commercial telephone companies, but on the basis that in previous correspondence and discussions with regard to the matter it has been stated that the government telephone rates are based upon the rates charged by the commercial telephone companies. Perhaps this may be taken care of by the fact that these are mostly long distance rates, but can the minister give us any indication or assurance that it is not intended to increase government telephone service merely on the basis of the application before the board?

Mr. Chevrier: I cannot say that it is not the intention to increase government telephone rates. I can say that there is no intention at the moment to deal with that subject by way of increase in rates. But I am informed that, if an increase is granted to the company that is now making application before the board with regard to long distance tolls, it may have an effect, because the tolls are applicable across Canada.

Mr. Fulton: I am afraid I do not quite understand the minister. Does he mean that the rates for the government service would go up automatically, or merely that on those lines or those systems where there is partly private and partly government service rates will go up?

Mr. Chevrier: Rates will not go up, as far as I understand it, save and except on long distance tolls, if they are increased, for the company which has now made this application. Then because of the interline arrangements it would be impossible to operate without a concurrent increase on long distance tolls. This discussion appears to me to be entirely outside the orbit of this vote, because no authority has been granted by the board for an increase in rates.

Mr. Fulton: It seems to me the government immediately becomes an interested party in the application before the board. I most strongly urge that the government be represented before the board by counsel. In addition, may I ask this question. If the increase were to take place, I should like to be quite clear on this point. Does it then follow necessarily—and is that the minister's statement—that, say, between Ashcroft and Williams Lake where the service is exclusively over the government telephone line where there is no private line involved, there would be a similar increase in that government service?

Mr. Chevrier: Not necessarily.

Mr. Sinclair: I should like to ask a question which is apropos of this item. The government telegraph service serves most of the northern part of my riding, giving good pioneering service in the outlying areas; but in the southern part of my riding the village of Squamish, which has already featured in this session's debates as the terminus of the P.G.E. railway, to which this government is going to pay a subsidy for further construction, is still served by the pioneer service of the government telegraph service; whereas two adjacent towns, Britannia Mines and Woodfibre, enjoy urban service provided by the British Columbia Telephone Company. This is an excellent service and for some time the people of Squamish and the P.G.E. railway officials have asked that the government telegraph service at Squamish be sold to the British Columbia Telephone Company so that they could enjoy the same service. I should like to ask the minister what progress has been made in this transfer.

Mr. Chevrier: I am not aware of that particular application, but I shall be glad to look into it.

Mr. Sinclair: It has been outstanding for two years now, I think.

Mr. Chevrier: I am sorry, but this is the first time I have heard of it.

Mr. Sinclair: I wonder if one of the minister's officials has heard of it.

Mr. Higgins: In the supplementary estimates, item 729, on the same subject, provides an amount of $350,000 for the difference between the revenue and expenditure for telegraph and telephone service. What is the reason for that? Are you cutting rates?

Mr. Chevrier: That is a vote which is consequent upon this one to deal with Newfoundland only, and the expenses are $1,014,340 and the revenue $664,340. The vote is therefore $350,000.

Mr. Higgins: The rates will not be any cheaper?

Mr. Chevrier: The same.

Item agreed to.

Telegraph and telephone service—
516. Construction and improvements, $524,192.

Mr. Higgins: Am I right in my belief that this $524,000 is for the whole dominion? It would appear from item 730 on page 9 of the supplementary estimates that the province of Newfoundland is to get $300,000. That seems a rather large proportion. I am glad if it is a Christmas box in that way, but is it really that?

Mr. Chevrier: The $300,000 is in addition to the amount voted in the main estimates.

Mr. Higgins: The whole country is getting only $524,000, and Newfoundland is getting $300,000. Thank you for the Christmas box.

[Mr. Sinclair.]

Mr. Chevrier: I do not want to hurt the feelings of my hon. friend but perhaps because of the bad state of repair in which the services were, we found that it would take a considerably larger sum of money to look after them than similar facilities in the rest of Canada.

Item agreed to.

Telegraph and telephone service—
925. Construction and improvements (revote, $169,000)—further amount required, $183,500.

Mr. Fulton: Purely for information may I ask why, in the supplementary estimates, there is included a revote of $169,000? I do not understand why that figure should be placed in there if it was not in the main estimates. Was it something that was discovered subsequently that had not been spent?

Mr. Chevrier: This amount of money is for the acquisition, construction of buildings, works and structures, including land, in the amount of $183,500; for assistance to small rural telephone companies, and for the maintenance of essential services. The revote is made up of a number of things. For instance, for the acquisition of a local telephone system at Canal, British Columbia, which was also provided for, there is $8,000—that is a revote. For the metallizing of the existing circuit and rebuilding the pole line as required between Port Alberni and Bamfield there is a revote of $18,600.

Mr. Fulton: Does that include the improvement of the circuits between Lytton and Lillooet, in the vicinity of Lillooet?

Mr. Chevrier: No, it does not. May I answer the question raised by my hon. friend from Coast-Capilano. A memorandum has just been sent to me to the effect that an order in council has been passed selling the Squamish Telegraph and Telephone system to the British Columbia Telephone Company, which is effective as of January, 1950.

Mr. Sinclair: I am glad to have that confirmation now.

Item agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: Item 729 in the supplementary estimates deals with the telegraph and telephone services in Newfoundland to which the hon. member for St. John's East referred a moment ago.

Item agreed to.

Demobilization and reconversion—Director of merchant seamen—now included in ordinary estimates—
517. Acquisition of properties in Canada for United States authorities, $24,000.

Mr. Hatfield: Explain this, please.

Mr. Chevrier: This is for the payment of taxes on properties at Prince Rupert acquired from the United States government.

Item agreed to.

Railway and steamship service—
518. Steep Rock Mines—construction, $59,500.

Mr. Knowles: Will the minister say what this is for? Will he tell us what is the total amount that has now been spent at Steep Rock mines?

Mr. Chevrier: This amount is for assistance in the development of the iron ore deposit at Steep Rock.

Mr. Knowles: What specifically is it for?

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Digging.

Mr. Chevrier: It is for new construction.

Mr. Knowles: Of what?

Mr. Chevrier: It is made up as follows: additional trackage at Port Arthur, estimated cost $86,000, less the expenditure of $72,000, a revote of $13,650; additional trackage at Atikokan, $2,500; strengthening iron dock pockets, Port Arthur, $19,250; purchase of land, $2,000, and a number of additional items of equipment to the amount of $22,100, making a total of $59,500. My hon. friend asked the amount that had been expended thus far. It is $3,145,000.

Mr. Knowles: All of that has to do with railway equipment and service at Steep Rock, Steep Rock to Atikokan and down to Port Arthur?

Mr. Chevrier: That is right.

Mr. Knowles: None of it has to do with any of the equipment in or at the mine itself?

Mr. Chevrier: No.

Item agreed to.

519. Steep Rock Mines—subsidy, $240,000.

Mr. Knowles: What are we subsidizing by this item of $240,000? What is the total amount that we have spent in this sort of subsidy since we started doing it?

Mr. Chevrier: This item provides for the payment of a subsidy of twenty cents a ton to the Canadian National Railways on the ore that moves out of the mine across the dock at Port Arthur. The subsidy for this year is $240,000. The grand total of subsidies thus far since it began in 1944 is $692,000. Two and a half million tons of ore have been taken out of the mine since the inception of the subsidy.

Mr. Green: Has the minister any idea of the reserves of ore?

Mr. Knowles: If I may do as my hon. friend from Calgary West suggested, refer to this as a bit ostrichlike, is it correct to say that we are subsidizing the Canadian National Railways? Are we not really subsidizing Steep Rock Mines Limited?

Mr. Chevrier: No, the twenty cents goes exclusively to the Canadian National Railways.

Mr. Knowles: I still think there is an ostrich in the thing somewhere.

Mr. Green: Has the minister any figures showing the estimated reserves of iron ore at Steep Rock?

Mr. Chevrier: The company reports of 1947 stated that the ore reserves amounted to 71,675,000 tons. That is the last I have.

Mr. Knowles: Getting back to this twenty cents per ton, why should not the Steep Rock people pay that additional twenty cents per ton to the Canadian National Railways so that this money would not have to come out of the public treasury as a subsidy?

Mr. Chevrier: This was done during the war years. This ore was in great demand, and at that time the government came to the conclusion that it would turn over the movement of the ore to the Canadian National Railways and pay it the subsidy, in accordance with the amount of ore that comes out.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, we understood that policy in wartime, but the war ended in 1945. This is for the fiscal year 1949-50. How much longer are we, in effect, going to subsidize Steep Rock mines by permitting them to pay twenty cents less per ton than it costs the Canadian National Railways to haul the ore?

Mr. Chevrier: The Steep Rock mine pays $1.12 and the government pays twenty cents.

Mr. Knowles: This is private enterprise. The mines should pay the whole thing.

Mr. Wright: Is there any agreement between Steep Rock mines and the government that this ore will be carried at a specific rate?

Mr. Chevrier: There is no agreement between Steep Rock and the government. There is an agreement between the Canadian National Railways and the government for five million tons.

Mr. Knowles: When this was first adopted it was by order in council under the War Measures Act.

Mr. Chevrier: My information is that it was.

Mr. Knowles: How did we make the transposition from order in council to an item in the estimates?

Mr. Chevrier: It was always covered by an item in the estimates. The Minister of Munitions and Supply, who had the conduct of this, following passage of the order in council, covered it by an item in his estimates.

Mr. Knowles: When the item was put in the estimates in the war years the moral authority for it at any rate was contained in an order in council passed under the War Measures Act. Where is the moral authority for it now?

Mr. Chevrier: Well, there is a contract made between the Canadian National Railways and the government.

Item agreed to.

Airways and airports—

520. Operation and maintenance of municipal and other airports, $530,800.

Mr. Cruickshank: This is not my night for filibustering, so I shall be brief. My question is only for the sake of information. What does this vote mean? I see at page 297 two items for temporary assistance, and material supplied.

Mr. Chevrier: This item provides for the operation all year round of nine public licensed airports leased by municipalities to the Department of Transport. These are at Calgary, Winnipeg, Charlottetown, Lethbridge, Lakehead, Regina, Windsor, Saskatoon and London.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): Has any provision been made for servicing the airfield at Quesnel, British Columbia?

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): The answer is no.

Mr. Chevrier: There is no item in this estimate covering that.

Item agreed to.

Airways and airports—

521. Care, operation and maintenance of Royal Canadian Air Force airfields transferred to the Department of Transport, $525,072.

Mr. Cruickshank: I should like to speak briefly, because some of the junior members from British Columbia have already spoken too much. The Abbotsford airport is situated in the constituency of Fraser Valley and is used on an average of 20 days in the year owing to the fact that Vancouver airport is fogbound and all Trans-Canada Air Lines aircraft land there. One day last year the minister himself arrived in Vancouver after the fog lifted—much to our disgust, because we had hoped he would have to land at Abbotsford.

Is the Department of Transport paying any rental to the R.C.A.F. or in any way contributing to the field at Abbotsford for use when the Vancouver airport is fogbound?

[Mr. Knowles.]

Mr. Chevrier: This is exclusively an R.C.A.F. airport, and we pay no rental of any kind to the R.C.A.F.

Mr. Cruickshank: Then this item is not clear, because it refers to the care, operation and maintenance of the Royal Canadian Air Force airfields. When the minister's department is using that airfield, should it not pay a share of the cost?

Mr. Chevrier: Abbotsford is one airport which has not been transferred to the department. This vote covers only R.C.A.F. airports which have been declared surplus and turned over to us for operation.

Mr. Cruickshank: Then you make no provision for a fog-free field in British Columbia?

Mr. Chevrier: I say we make no provision for payment at Abbotsford.

Mr. Cruickshank: And you make no provision for that purpose?

Mr. Chevrier: No, we do not.

Mr. Coldwell: What is the position with regard to the use of airfields? For instance, through the mountains there are airfields with station agents placed there by T.C.A., but apparently it is used almost exclusively by C.P.A. What contribution does C.P.A. make to T.C.A. or the Department of Transport for the use of these fields and the services rendered by these station agents? I have in mind places such as Penticton where T.C.A. maintains a stationmaster, or whatever he is called.

Mr. Chevrier: T.C.A. and C.P.A. do not operate airports. It is the civil aviation division of the Department of Transport that does that. The one at Penticton is one of our airports, and is known as an intermediate airport. All the facilities required, such as weather reports, radio and beams are provided and paid for by the Department of Transport.

Mr. Coldwell: Are there payments made by C.P.A.?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, they pay landing fees, rentals for hangars, storage—if they have any equipment to place in there.

Mr. Coldwell: What do they pay for the beam service?

Mr. Chevrier: There is no payment for the beam service. That is one of the provisions made by the civil aviation branch for the whole of the country; and there is no charge for it.

Mr. Coldwell: And C.P.A. gets that service free of charge from the department?

Mr. Chevrier: And all other airlines do, too.

Mr. Coldwell: They all get it free of charge?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes.

Item agreed to.

Canadian maritime commission—
523. Administration, $182,480.

Mr. Green: During the discussion on the bill to provide for assistance in the construction of Canadian vessels I asked the minister to bring up-to-date figures showing the number of Canadian ocean-going vessels of 1,000 tons gross and over.

Mr. Chevrier: I shall have that information in a moment.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the item carry?

Mr. Green: No.

Mr. Chevrier: I shall have it for the hon. member, if he will allow the item to pass.

Item agreed to.

Mail subsidies and steamship subventions; western local services—

524. Vancouver and northern ports of British Columbia and Queen Charlotte islands, service between, $345,000; Victoria and westcoast Vancouver island, service between, $60,000.

Mr. Cruickshank: Where subsidies are paid is there any provision under the contract that only British subjects may be employed?

Mr. Chevrier: I do not think there is.

Mr. Cruickshank: I suggest it might be advisable that a provision be placed in the contract so as to protect our merchant seamen from cheap labour being employed by any company subsidized by the taxpayers of Canada.

Mr. Green: This amount of $345,000 is increased from $69,000 last year. Why has there been this increase, and to what company or companies is this subsidy payable?

Mr. Chevrier: This item provides for subsidies on the Prince Rupert-Queen Charlotte islands service, and the Vancouver and northern ports of British Columbia, operated by Union Steamships, for $345,000.

Mr. Green: The whole thing is payable to Union Steamships, is it?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes. The increase is due chiefly to the increase in the cost of materials and operations by way of wages and salaries.

Mr. Green: Are they providing any service which they did not provide last year for the $69,000?

Mr. Chevrier: No, they are not.

Mr. Green: Surely this increase cannot all be accounted for by increased wages and operating expenses. This is a greatly increased subsidy, five times last year's vote.

Mr. Chevrier: I am informed that the increase is due to the cancellation of the stabilization fund. This company was able to get a substantial sum of money from the fund and when that was cancelled they made application for the amount they had received to the steamship subvention branch, and after the auditors had gone into it they approved of this amount.

Mr. Green: Were other subsidies increased to the same extent?

Mr. Chevrier: Those that were in receipt of amounts from the fund; some of them were.

Mr. Cruickshank: Are all companies treated the same? I understand that certain veterans or combinations of veterans formed companies to compete in these services; are they given a share of these subsidies?

Mr. Chevrier: Subsidies are paid only where there is no competition.

Mr. Cruickshank: I cannot understand this large increase in the one year going to one company which apparently has no competition and where there admittedly has been no increase in wages.

Mr. Chevrier: I explained to the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra that a large portion of the vote was due to the fact that no payment was made to this company out of the stabilization fund and they made application to the maritime commission for the amount they had received from the fund and were granted an amount over and above that which was warranted by the expenditures they were able to establish.

Mr. Green: What happens to a company in competition with this company? The minister has said that there is no competition on this particular run to the northern ports of British Columbia, but this company operates out of Vancouver and when it gets a subsidy that helps the company even though it is paid for the boat operating in the north. There is another company competing with them on the coastal run, although perhaps not as far north as the Queen Charlotte islands. Would that company also get a subsidy?

Mr. Chevrier: Subsidies are granted to the one company only, not to two. I have just had it brought to my attention that according to last year's estimates this company got $388,000; they received $69,000 in the main estimates and $319,000 in the supplementary estimates. They are to receive $345,000 under these estimates, so there is a decrease.

Mr. Cruickshank: My information is that there is another company operating between Westview and Vancouver. Am I to understand that they would not be entitled to a subsidy, that it would automatically go to this one company?

Mr. Chevrier: The Union Steamship Company receives no subsidy with respect to the route my hon. friend refers to.

Mr. Green: Could I get an answer to my question?

[Mr. Chevrier.]

Mr. Chevrier: It is pretty lengthy and perhaps my hon. friend would be satisfied if I sent it over to him.

Mr. Green: I should like it on the record.

Mr. Chevrier: May I have unanimous consent to put it on Hansard without reading it?

Mr. Knowles: What is it about?

Mr. Chevrier: It is a list of Canadian registered ocean-going dry cargo vessels laid up, and to date there are 26.

Mr. Green: That was only part of the question. I asked the number and tonnage of Canadian ocean-going vessels of 1,000 gross tons and over. The figure is given on page 18 of the report of the Canadian maritime commission for the year 1949 up to March 31, but I asked that that figure be brought down to October.

Mr. Chevrier: As of October 31 there were 118 deep-sea dry cargo vessels built in Canada for war purposes which are now under Canadian registry. Over and above that, as my hon. friend knows, there are 58 vessels which were put under United Kingdom registration and which are due for delivery in Canada in 1950. At the present time there are 26 such war-built vessels laid up for want of cargoes. There are 92 such ships now actually operating under Canadian registry employing about 3,772 men.

As of March 31, 1949, the tonnage of Canadian ocean-going vessels of 1,000 tons gross and over (excluding vessels operated on the great lakes and in the coastal trade) was 981,255 tons. The number of such vessels was 145. As of October 31, 1949, there were 143 vessels of a gross tonnage of 967,310.

Have I unanimous consent to place the statement on Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): What steps are being taken to renew the ferry service between Parrsboro, Kingsport and Wolfville on Minas Basin? This ferry service was in operation for 50 years but was discontinued during the war. The boat was especially built for the service and was called the Kipawo, the name being made up of the first two letters of the three ports served. The boat was taken over by the navy, used in Newfoundland, sold without loss and the proceeds placed in the consolidated revenue fund of Nova Scotia. Continuous representations have been made to the department and the government to renew this service by boards of trade, town councils, individuals and others. That is the only service in all Canada that was discontinued.

I am sure this was not done for economic reasons, because considerable increases are shown in subsidies paid in connection with other services in Quebec, such as the one between Quebec, Natashquan and Harrington where there is an increase from $127,500 to $448,000. Then there is an increase from $60,000 to $88,000 in connection with the service between Pictou, Nova Scotia, Souris, P.E.I., and the Magdalen islands. In addition there is the large increase of $276,000 in connection with the British Columbia services which we have been discussing.

My views and the views of the different communities that were served are on record and the minister knows what they are. I hope some steps are being taken by the department to renew this service because it saves about 150 miles in travelling between these points. There has been a most unjustifiable denial of a service which has been carried on for 50 years and which was a matter of pride to the people on both sides of the Minas Basin.

Mr. Chevrier: I think my hon. friend will agree with me when I say that before any consideration can be given to granting a subsidy someone must make an application. After all, the maritime commission do not go around the country seeking applicants for subsidies. In this particular case there has not been an application, and until there is the commission cannot deal with it. If my hon. friend knows of any contractor or group of individuals who want to make application, I can assure him that the maritime commission will give it their best consideration.

Up until now there has been no evidence of anyone intending to apply for the service.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): So far as I know, there has been no evidence of the government being prepared and willing to renew the subsidy. So far as I know there is also no evidence or record of the government going about the country and attempting to do justice to this community. Under the pretext and stress of war they went about the country and took from them the service that they had been enjoying for fifty years. I think it is only just that they should go about the country and see what they can do to renew the service they took away from this community.

Mr. McLure: I notice that for the Prince Edward Island-Newfoundland service the vote is the same as last year. There may be something in the supplementaries that I have missed, but the trade will be much greater now since Newfoundland has become the tenth province. I was hoping that a change would be made in this item so that better service could be provided directly to Newfoundland. While I am on my feet, there is another service I should like to mention, the Wood Island-Cariboo ferry, and in this instance also the vote is the same as it was last year. This Northumberland ferry has been giving one of the finest services of any ferry we have. I hope that the Minister of Transport will prevail upon the Minister of Public Works to do the proper dredging that he promised to do last year.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I did?

Mr. McLure: The ferry people will be able to buy a larger boat if it is properly dredged as the minister promised. We will take that up with him when we come to his estimates. I am also grateful for another vote in these estimates, even though it is not so large. I refer to the one for the service to Souris and the Magdalen islands. We only want one more ferry to complete the transportation system on the island. I thought surely there would have been an estimate for it. I refer to a service between West Point and Buctouche. It was the one ferry that had the most advertising during the recent election campaign. I thought the hon. member for Prince would have seen to it that there was a good vote in the estimates for the building of a new ferry.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): That will be for the next election.

Item agreed to.

Mail subsidies and steamship subventions—eastern local services—

926. Halifax, Sherbrooke, Spry bay and Torbay, N.S., service between—further amount required, $2,800.

Sydney and Whycocomagh, Cape Breton island, N.S., calling at way ports, service between—further amount required, $7,500.

Mr. Green: Is the minister in a position yet to make any announcement concerning the negotiations between Canada and the United Kingdom for Canadian ships to carry some portion of the sterling freights?

Mr. Chevrier: If my hon. friend will only allow me to get through with these estimates, there will be an announcement by the Prime Minister tomorrow.

Item agreed to.

National harbours board—

555. Advances to national harbours board, subject to the provisions of section 29 of the National Harbours Board Act, to meet expenditures applicable to the calendar year 1949 on any or all of the following accounts: (a) retirement of maturing debentures—Saint John, $85,000; (b) reconstruction and capital expenditures—Halifax, $2,644,000; Saint John, $1,850,000; Quebec, $1,150,000; Three Rivers, $166,000; Port Colborne, $84,000; Churchill, $279,500; generally unforeseen and miscellaneous, $200,000; less amount to be expended from replacement fund, $428,500, $5,945,000.

Mr. Green: I believe some representations have been made to the minister—

Mr. Chevrier: The Prime Minister may not make the statement.

[Mr. McLure.]

Mr. Green: You cannot bluff me that way. The Prime Minister should have made the statement before now. I believe representations have been made to the minister as to the lack of recreational facilities in certain Canadian ports for British and foreign seamen using those ports. The suggestion is made that the national harbours board could give some assistance with these facilities. It appears that in many of the leading foreign ports, which our own Canadian sailors are visiting from time to time, there are much better facilities than in some of the Canadian harbours. Has the minister given any consideration to the suggestion?

Mr. Chevrier: I have received no representations at all, and I am not aware of any. The chairman of the national harbours board tells me he is not aware of any.

Mr. Green: I have here a copy of a letter sent to the minister on March 28, 1949, by a Mr. George L. Patterson.

Mr. Chevrier: That is not the same thing.

Mr. Green: That is what is in the letter.

Mr. Chevrier: I read Mr. Patterson's letter very carefully and replied to him. In fact I told him it was a matter which should receive the attention equally of the Minister of National Health and Welfare. If my memory serves me right, in his letter to me there was no suggestion that the national harbours board should assist in the provision of recreational facilities.

Mr. Green: I will let the minister have this copy of the letter. The suggestion is made that the national harbours board would be the best body to step into the picture.

Mr. Chevrier: I shall be glad to look at it.

Mr. Hatfield: I should like to ask the minister about the vote for Saint John harbour, $1,850,000. What is that for?

Mr. Chevrier: Most of the money is for expenditure on the contract for the construction of the Macleod and Pettingill wharf.

Item agreed to.

Deficits—Transport—

556. Amount required to provide for the payment during the fiscal year 1949-50 to the Canadian National Railway Company (hereinafter called the national company) upon applications approved by the Minister of Transport made from time to time by the national company to the Minister of Finance and to be applied by the national company in payment of the deficit (certified by the auditors of the national company) in the operation of the Prince Edward Island car ferry and terminals arising in the calendar year 1949, $1,159,000.

Mr. McLure: I regret the minister did not correct this item and put it under the proper heading. He has it under deficits.

Mr. Chevrier: I am also sorry I did not.

Item agreed to.

National harbours board—

935. Advances to national harbours board, subject to the provisions of section 29 of National Harbours Board Act, to meet expenditures applicable to the calendar year 1949 on the following account: retirement of maturing bonds—Montreal—further amount required, $1,995,000.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Is any provision being made to take over the operation of the harbour at St. John's, Newfoundland?

Mr. Chevrier: Does the hon. member mean in so far as the national harbours board is concerned?

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Yes.

Mr. Chevrier: Consideration has been and is still being given to whether or not it should be taken over as a port under the national harbours board administration or under the Department of Transport. While there are indications as to what will happen, no decision has yet been taken.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Could the minister not take members into his confidence? We have been giving him a good many millions of dollars. I do not think he should keep any secrets from us.

Mr. Chevrier: I have no intention of doing so, but until a decision has been reached I do not think I should announce it to the house.

Item agreed to.

Marine service—

716. Marine service steamers, including icebreakers—maintenance, operation and repairs—further amount required, $115,000.

The Deputy Chairman: I shall now call the supplementary items which have not been dealt with so far. I refer particularly to item 716 and following. They will be found on page 8 of the supplementary estimates. These items relate to marine service, air service, civil aviation division, and so on.

Mr. Green: These are Newfoundland items?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes.

The Deputy Chairman: The explanations have been given previously, but these supplementaries and further supplementaries were not called at the time.

Mr. Chevrier: Yes.

911. Departmental administration—further amount required, $20,000.

Mr. Knowles: Can the minister tell us what is the status, or make any comment on the situation which now obtains in view of the remarks made by certain justices of the supreme court with respect to the actions of the board of transport commissioners concerning freight rates? Where do we go from here?

Mr. Chevrier: My hon. friend is very kind to invite me into a discussion of a case now pending before the Supreme Court of Canada. I think I would be extremely ill-advised to make any comment on that matter. I read the report which appeared in this morning's press, but I have no intention of discussing, either directly or indirectly, any case which is before the Supreme Court of Canada. It is sub judice and should not be discussed, certainly not by the minister and, I say respectfully, not by the house.

Mr. Knowles: Surely the minister has as much freedom as the press.

Item agreed to.

Special—

919. To provide for the expenses of the royal commission on national transportation, $300,000.

Mr. Green: Will the minister explain how this item is made up?

Mr. Chevrier: These expenses are for the royal commission on transportation, which is sitting at the moment. It is made up as follows: temporary assistance, $12,000; professional services, $241,000; travelling expenses, $12,000; telegraph, telephones and postage, $2,000, and various other small items.

Mr. Green: I do not want to take more than a minute, but I suggest this is an example of the costliness of royal commissions. I have no doubt this commission is doing good work; I know it is composed of splendid men. They rolled into Vancouver in a special train of six cars, I think, for twenty-three or twenty-four individuals. Expenses of this kind are pretty high, and I wonder what check is kept on the expenditures of these various royal commissions.

Mr. Chevrier: I can assure the hon. gentleman that no part of the money covered by this item went to provide that train.

Mr. Green: What vote does that come under?

Mr. Chevrier: No vote. The cars were provided by the Canadian National and the Canadian Pacific at their own expense.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): May I ask who were the solicitors who received this $241,000 for professional services?

Mr. Chevrier: There are no solicitors.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): This is for professional services.

Mr. Chevrier: I should not have said there are no solicitors. I should have said there are both solicitors and technical men, economists and the like. The chairman gets $10 per day plus living allowance. One of the commissioners gets $50 per day plus living allowance, and another commissioner gets the same. One counsel gets $200 a day and another gets $150 a day.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Would the minister give the names of these counsel?

Mr. Chevrier: Right Hon. J. L. Ilsley was paid at that rate for a time, and later was succeeded by Mr. Frank H. Covert of Halifax. The assistant counsel was Mr. Pierre Desmarais, who is in receipt of $150 per day. The secretary is in receipt of $40 per day, and the assistant secretary $25 per day.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Who took the place of Mr. Ilsley?

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Covert of Halifax.

Item agreed to.

920. Grant to the province of Manitoba towards the erection of a school building at Churchill, Manitoba, $30,000.

Mr. Knowles: I want to take a moment to say I am very glad to see this item in the estimates. I well recall, as does the minister, the persistent efforts of the former member for Churchill, Mr. Ronald Moore, in support of this proposal. Many times he invited the minister to bring in an item of this kind. He is not here now to see it, but I am sure the present member for Churchill and all the rest of us are glad—

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Knowles: One would think those hon. members would like to listen when a bouquet is handed out once in a while. I am sure all who are interested in northern Manitoba and in education will be happy to learn that provision will now be made for a school for the children at the port of Churchill.

Item agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall I report progress, or shall we go on and take up national health and welfare?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Let me make a suggestion, which I hope will meet with unanimous approval. I know the minister has a very interesting further statement to make on two wonder drugs, and I wonder if we could not continue just long enough to permit him to do so.

Mr. Knowles: I would agree to that, providing we are not asked to go on and discuss items after that.

[Mr. Chevrier.]

The Deputy Chairman: Then it is understood the minister will make his statement tonight.

Mr. Coldwell: How long is it going to take the minister to make the statement?

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Twelve minutes.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL HEALTH AND WELFARE

252. Departmental administration, $794,605.

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I had intended to make a statement on the next item, but in view of the suggestion of the hon. member for Calgary West it might be advisable to make it at this time.

The committee will recall the statement I made the other evening with respect to cortisone and ACTH, and the circumstances surrounding them, which I felt could be made public at that time. In view of certain conferences which have since taken place here in Ottawa and elsewhere, it is now possible to supplement that statement.

On November 28 I announced that limited supplies of cortisone manufactured in the United States would be made available after January 1 by Merck and Company Limited, Montreal, for research to be undertaken in Canada. Today I can reveal that, as a result of negotiations that have been going on for some time, Connaught Medical Research Laboratories at the university of Toronto are going to undertake immediately to get production of ACTH under way in Canada for investigation and clinical research by Canadian scientists.

The federal government, the Canadian packing industry and the university of Toronto are all co-operating in the project of producing ACTH in Canada. Supplies of ACTH made available in this country will be allocated exclusively for research by a special committee of eminent Canadian medical men named by the president of the national research council. This committee, besides advising on the allocation of ACTH, will approve financial support for research on both ACTH and cortisone to ensure that all available facilities in Canada are fully utilized to speed the research program. The cost, estimated at about three-quarters of a million dollars in the first instance, will be provided for by the federal government through the national health grants and the national research council.

ACTH, like cortisone, seems to hold promise for the treatment of a number of diseases, but since on the basis of present knowledge only exceedingly small quantities of these drugs can be produced, they will be used exclusively for research to determine their full effects, to discover new or improved methods of production, and to study the possibility of developing related products having similar effects. Only by limiting these drugs strictly for research purposes now can we hope for progress in finding out how to produce enough for whatever treatment purposes are proved to be of lasting value.

The medical scientists with whom there has been collaboration have urged that persons suffering from arthritis or other disease for which ACTH and cortisone are possible remedies should not neglect the treatment they may presently be taking. As I mentioned in the house a few days ago, with Dr. Cameron, deputy minister of National Health and Welfare, I had an opportunity in New York recently of discussing these drugs with Drs. Hench and Kendall of the Mayo clinic, who are best known among the many scientists who have been associated with their development and use. Both emphasized to us that no responsible prediction could be given as to when adequate quantities of cortisone will be available for treatment purposes. Canadian medical scientists have urged me to state that the same is true for ACTH.

ACTH—known to scientists as the adrenocorticotrophic hormone—is a substance obtained from the tiny pituitary gland located in the centre of the brain of animals. It gives promise of highly important discoveries which may lead to advances in the treatment of a number of diseases. It is, for example, believed to stimulate the body to produce its own cortisone, which has already been found by Drs. Kendall and Hench of the Mayo clinic to produce "encouraging results" in the treatment of certain types of arthritis.

Up to the present, ACTH is being extracted from the pituitary glands of hogs. This gland is about the size of a pea and only a fraction of it contains the hormone. It is estimated that 1,700 hogs produce a pound of glands, and that 400,000 hogs are needed to yield a pound of ACTH.

At present, the entire production of ACTH in the United States is 60 pounds per year, enough for the continuous treatment of only a thousand patients. ACTH can also be obtained from the glands of cattle and sheep, but the yield is not nearly as large as from hogs.

What I am going to say now is said in part with the view of placing on the record the contribution made in this highly important field by our own Canadian scientists—medical men and chemists, particularly steroid chemists.

Since the interest and help of the Canadian packing industry is assured, the maximum amount of glands will be collected. This entails special arrangements being made, as the glands must be quickly removed from the slaughtered animal, frozen and kept frozen until processed. Dr. R. D. Defries, the director of the Connaught Medical Research Laboratories, is my authority for saying that during the past few months Armour Laboratories in Chicago have been able to forward limited supplies of ACTH to a few centres in Canada for investigation. Although chemists in Canadian laboratories have been interested in this material for some time there has as yet been no production here of this drug in more than the most minute experimental quantities.

To ensure a continuing supply of ACTH in this country without drawing heavily upon the necessarily restricted supply available for research in the United States, it is planned to use as large a quantity as possible of pituitary glands from Canadian sources. Small quantities will be used at first to develop a method of production in the Connaught Laboratories and the balance will be forwarded to Armour Laboratories in Chicago, who have developed successful processing techniques and will make a supply of ACTH available for use in this country. I am further empowered to state that as soon as production is well established, in keeping with the general policy of this widely known research organization, the product will be made available at the minimum cost.

To assist in financing this undertaking, with the co-operation of the Ontario department of health, a federal grant has been approved from the funds available for public health research under the national health program. An equal amount is being granted by the medical division of the national research council. These grants will be used for developing the process of production.

In the initial stage of making ACTH and cortisone available for research in Canada, an expenditure of as much as three quarters of a million dollars will probably be required during the first year. It is not possible yet to predict the probable cost in succeeding years. The material purchased by these funds will be very limited and sufficient, as I have already emphasized, for research purposes only.

In order to have a supply of ACTH for assay purposes, the food and drug laboratories of the Department of National Health and Welfare have made arrangements with Canada Packers of Hull for enough hog pituitary glands for the preparation in Ottawa of very limited quantities of ACTH.

The product of this federal laboratory will be tested for potency and stability against preparations of known strength prepared in Chicago and Toronto. It will then be assigned a potency value and retained as a reference standard for the testing of preparations from all manufacturers. This work is being directed by Dr. L. I. Pugsley, chief of the laboratory services in the food and drug division, who in 1933 worked with Dr. J. B. Collip, then professor of biochemistry at McGill university, on some of the first studies made of ACTH. This Ottawa project is the immediate responsibility of W. D. Snair, who has had considerable experience in the preparation and assay of ACTH, having taken his M.Sc. degree in this branch of endocrinology at the university of Toronto.

The development of ACTH and cortisone is an outstanding example of international co-operation in medical research, and of the value of the free interchange of scientific information. It is a notable fact that although the first regular production of both ACTH and cortisone has taken place in the United States, Canadian scientists have been kept fully advised and are co-operating in this undertaking. For several months we have received progress reports from the officers of our department, and also from Canadian scientists who have attended meetings of the committee of the National Academy of Science in Washington that was established to correlate information in this field. We have also established liaison with those who perhaps can be described as mainly responsible for the development of these new drugs.

Early in the 1920's American research scientists demonstrated that the functioning of the adrenal cortex is under the influence of the anterior pituitary, a tiny gland controlling growth and sexual development as well as influencing the functioning of the adrenal and thyroid glands. In 1933 Dr. J. B. Collip, one of our outstanding research men, then at McGill and now dean of medicine at the university of Western Ontario, demonstrated that what had been believed to be a single, simple hormone from the anterior pituitary gland could be broken up into fractions to perform several functions. One of these fractions is ACTH.

In this work Dr. Collip was assisted by Dr. Evelyn Anderson, now in the United States public health service, and Dr. D. L. Thomson, now dean of graduate studies and research at McGill university. The first report of these studies was published in the English medical journal, the Lancet, in August 1933. Dr. Hans Selye, also working at McGill at this time, who is now head of the institute of experimental medicine and surgery at the university of Montreal, devised a practical method of removing the minute pituitary glands in animals used for experimental purposes.

Three years later, Dr Selye first announced his theory—which is of great interest—about the body's defensive mechanisms against injury and disease and the way in which they involve the pituitary-adrenal linkage.

It was not until several years later that—at about the same time—Dr. C. H. Li and Dr. H. M. Evans of the university of California and Drs. Sayers, White and Long of Yale university, obtained purified ACTH from the anterior pituitary glands of sheep and swine. Dr. Long also worked at McGill university for some years.

In 1947, J. B. Fishman of Yale university developed a method of preparing ACTH which gave yields considerably higher than those obtained by previous workers, and last year Dr. Li's work opened up the possibility of synthesizing ACTH. Also in 1948, Dr. J. S. L. Browne, professor of medicine at McGill university, and his associates carried out studies on the metabolic effects of ACTH on the human system.

As yet it is beyond the powers of scientists to produce these drugs in quantity. Efforts are being made to find better sources or less complicated and time-consuming production methods. Meanwhile, we are ensuring that funds will be available in Canada to further all useful lines of investigation both into the production and the use of these drugs. To do this we must resolutely conserve them exclusively for research purposes as this is the surest guarantee of shortening the time that must elapse—and it might be a very long time—before they can be made available for all that they can benefit.

I have made this statement in collaboration, of course, with the officers of my department, but also in collaboration with some of the men whose names I have mentioned and who have deemed it necessary to state some of the things I have said. I have done so because of the great importance attached to cortisone and ACTH by leading authorities in Canada, and indeed all over the world. The considerable resources of Canadian scientific research are now being mobilized to ensure a worth-while Canadian contribution in a matter so important to humanity.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we should like very much to take up the remaining departments. To indicate at least the procedure for some time we shall take up justice at eleven o'clock and continue for perhaps an hour. Then we shall revert to health and welfare, and then mines and resources, veterans affairs—I understand there are four or five items remaining—the remaining items of agriculture, and then trade and commerce. If we have time we shall proceed with the others.

Mr. Casselman: Trade and commerce the last?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): That is the last.

Mr. Fleming: In that order?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): As much as possible. We shall start off with justice and then health and welfare.

It being 11.20 p.m., the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

BRITISH NORTH AMERICA ACT—PROCEDURE IN AMENDMENTS

FURTHER CORRESPONDENCE WITH PREMIERS OF PROVINCES

(Copy of letter sent to premiers of all the provinces with the exception of the premier of Saskatchewan)

OFFICE OF THE PRIME MINISTER
CANADA

Ottawa, December 7, 1949.

My dear Premier:

In a recent letter the premier of Saskatchewan has inquired whether it is proposed to have an agenda under which to deal with the question of constitutional amendment at the conference opening on January 10.

In my original letter of September 14 the purpose of the conference was described as being to devise a generally satisfactory method of making amendments in Canada to the provisions of the constitution which concern both federal and provincial authorities. It was on that basis that the proposal for the conference was made and agreed to. In my last letter of November 7, I referred to the conference more briefly as being simply "to consider a method of amending the constitution of Canada." It had been the feeling of my colleagues and myself that the subject for discussion at the forthcoming conference scarcely admitted of any formal subdivision or reduction to an agenda of procedure in advance. We had felt that each delegation would be making its own preparations for discussion of the problem of procedure in constitutional amendment, and that the question of the best way of discussing it might be settled after we had assembled on January 10. I should appreciate it if you would let me know whether you feel that this is a satisfactory basis on which to leave the arrangements.

Perhaps I might take this opportunity to refer to another matter which has been considered by my colleagues and myself recently. There are many questions of concern to both the provincial and the federal governments in connection with which some discussion would be desirable. Several questions have been proposed for discussion at various times and there may be others which it would be helpful to consider jointly.

If it would meet with the approval of the governments of the provinces, I would propose that a general conference should be held early in the autumn of 1950, possibly in September or October, to discuss general questions of common concern to the provincial and federal governments. The conference would, among other things, carry out the undertaking which has been given to several of the provincial governments which entered into tax agreements with the federal government to hold a general conference at least a year prior to the expiration of the agreements on March 31, 1952. If the suggestion for a conference meets with your approval, and that of the other provincial premiers, views might be exchanged in the next few months as to the matters that should be placed on the agenda, and preparations could then be undertaken. It would, I think, be desirable to have an interval of several months in which to make preparations if fruitful discussion is to result.

Yours sincerely,

Louis S. St. Laurent

OFFICE OF THE PRIME MINISTER
CANADA

Ottawa, December 7, 1949

Hon. T. C. Douglas, M.L.A.,
Premier of Saskatchewan,
Regina, Saskatchewan.

My dear Premier:

I have received your letter of November 29 enquiring as to an agenda for the conference which is to open on January 10 to consider the procedure of amending the constitution of Canada.

In my original letter of September 14 the purpose of the conference was described as being to devise a generally satisfactory method of making amendments in Canada to the provisions of the constitution which concern both federal and provincial authorities. It was on that basis that the proposal for the conference was made and agreed to. In my last letter of November 7 I referred to the conference more briefly as being simply "to consider a method of amending the constitution of Canada". It had been the feeling of my colleagues and myself that the subject for discussion at the forthcoming conference scarcely admitted of any formal subdivision or reduction to an agenda of procedure in advance. We had felt that each delegation would be making its own preparations for discussion of the problem of procedure in constitutional amendment, and that the question of the best way of discussing it might be settled after we had assembled on January 10. In view of your enquiry I am, however, writing to all the provincial premiers to ask whether they think it would be satisfactory to leave arrangements on the basis I have indicated or whether an effort should be made to draw up an agenda.

Perhaps I might take this opportunity to refer to another matter which has been considered by my colleagues and myself recently. There are many questions of concern to both the provincial and the federal governments in connection with which some discussion would be desirable. Several questions have been proposed for discussion at various times and there may be others which it would be helpful to consider jointly. If it would meet with the approval of the governments of the provinces, I would propose that a general conference should be held early in the autumn of 1950, possibly in September or October, to discuss general questions of common concern to the provincial and the federal governments. The conference would, among other things, carry out the undertaking to which I referred in my letter of August 18 to hold a general conference at least a year prior to the expiration of the tax agreements on March 31, 1952. If the suggestion for a conference meets with your approval, and that of the other provincial premiers, views might be exchanged in the next few months as to the matters that should be placed on the agenda, and preparations could then be undertaken. It would, I think, be desirable to have an interval of several months in which to make preparations if fruitful discussion is to result.

Yours sincerely,

ORDERS IN COUNCIL

TABLING OF SUMMARY—NOVEMBER 1, 1949, TO NOVEMBER 30, 1949

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I wish to lay on the table a summary of orders in council passed during the period November 1 to November 30, 1949.

The previous summary was tabled on November 30. As agreed, this summary does not include the minutes of treasury board.

MERCHANT MARINE

CANADIAN DEEP-SEA SHIPPING INDUSTRY—STATEMENT OF GOVERNMENT POLICY

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a declaration of government policy with respect to the Canadian merchant marine.

During recent months the government has been giving very serious and careful consideration to the state of the Canadian deep-sea shipping industry. The main facts of the situation are fully set forth in the report of the Canadian maritime commission; since that report was prepared an increasing number of Canadian flag ships have been laid up. The government proposes to deal with the matter promptly.

The problem stated in simple terms is this. Canadian flag vessels are no longer able to pay their own way. This situation is not new. Not since the beginning of this century has the business of owning and operating deep-sea vessels really prospered in Canada. In fact from 1900 to 1919 there was very little Canadian participation in deep-sea shipping. However, the building of ships in Canada during the first world war led the government of that day into a post-war venture of a government-owned merchant fleet. That fleet proved to be uncompetitive in the world market, and when the Canadian government merchant marine was finally liquidated in 1936, the total loss to the government, exclusive of interest on capital and other advances, amounted to over $82 million.

During the second world war it again became necessary for Canada to build ships to carry essential supplies. In 1946 the Canadian merchant fleet was the fourth largest in the world. The Canadian government at that time, instead of continuing to operate a government-owned fleet in a period of high freights, decided to dispose of its vessels.

In 1946 there was a strong demand for ships both in Canada and abroad. Companies in Canada were most anxious to purchase ships, and under these circumstances it appeared only right and proper to give to our own people the first opportunity to buy. Thus the bulk of the war-built fleet was sold to Canadian operators at reasonable prices and on favourable terms, but they purchased these vessels at their own risk. On the 16th day of June, 1947, my colleague, the Minister of Trade and Commerce, then Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Howe), in addressing this house said:

> Hon. members are well aware that a merchant navy is basically an industry which, like other industries, has to pay its way if it is to survive.

During the years 1946 and 1947 ocean freight rates remained at high levels and Canadian owners were able to operate their vessels profitably and successfully. About the middle of 1948, however, Canadian ships began to experience greater difficulty in obtaining dollar cargoes and freight rates began to decline from their high wartime levels. In March of this year a steady decline set in which has continued and at present rates and at Canadian costs Canadian vessels cannot be operated without substantial losses.

As I have said, the Canadian government has sold all its ships, the majority of which have been purchased by Canadian owners. At the present time we have 118 dry-cargo vessels operating under Canadian flag, and an additional 58, which likewise have been sold, are due to be returned from United Kingdom flag to Canadian registry next year, making a total of 176 ships which we must take into consideration. I am advised that, in order to enable those ships to operate competitively in the world market, over $25 million in annual subsidies would be required.

The maintenance of a Canadian flag merchant fleet can be justified only on the basis of one or both of two assumptions: (1) that the fleet is a net economic asset to the community, or (2) that the fleet is important for purposes of national security.

In considering the studies which are available to us on the subject, we have concluded that we are not justified from an economic viewpoint in maintaining a Canadian flag fleet by artificial means. It is not the intention of the government to maintain an industry at the expense of the taxpayer, and of other export industries, by the unhealthy method of subsidies, unless these countervailing considerations are very strong indeed.

There are many objections to shipping subsidies. They do not tend to promote a healthy and efficient industry. They constitute a steady and usually increasing drain upon public funds. In a world in which some types of ships are already in oversupply they represent a waste of the taxpayer's money.

I do not propose to go into all the difficulties involved in shipping subsidies, since the government's basic objection to a policy of subsidization rests on wider grounds. The world is still suffering from the effect of two great wars. Dislocation resulting from such wars has disrupted world trade to an extent that nations are taking extraordinary steps for the preservation of their economies. Our view has consistently been that it is not possible to seek a solution to our trade and currency difficulties on a purely national basis. Canada has goods to sell, but our European customers lack dollars to buy them. They cannot acquire such dollars unless we do our share of buying from them. In other words we must seek to encourage imports from countries to whom we desire to sell our goods and in this sense shipping services of other countries represent an import. We must not adopt measures which would hinder the revival of world trade and defer the achievement of balance between dollar and non-dollar trading areas. If we were to adopt a policy of subsidization of national shipping, it would be a protectionist measure disabling other countries from trading with us.

The problem of preserving some part of the fleet for national security purposes deserves further consideration. In a world at peace with itself, this would not be necessary. Each nation would perform those functions which it could carry out most efficiently and economically, and if Canada were unable to conduct deep-sea shipping operations as well as other countries, such operations would be abandoned. Safeguards would have to be set up to prevent countries engaged in shipping from discriminating against countries which had no shipping. However, we must regard the world as it is and make a realistic approach to the problem.

Safeguards to prevent discrimination have been set up under the machinery of the United Nations, and the constitution of the intergovernmental maritime consultative organization is designed to prevent unfair shipping practices. But although Canada has ratified the IMCO convention, it has not yet received the agreement of sufficient nations to bring it into operation. Furthermore, unhappily, we cannot say that war is not a possibility. I am strongly of the opinion, however, that arrangements should be made between the peace-loving nations of the world to pool their shipping resources in the event of war. If proper assurances were received in this respect, it might not be necessary for those nations who cannot operate ships economically to continue to maintain merchant fleets to meet an emergency.

The maintenance of adequate ocean-going shipping, shipbuilding capacity and ship repair facilities is fundamental to the defence organization of the North Atlantic treaty. It is, like defence proper, a collective responsibility which the partners must share in relation to capacity, aptitude, and relative efficiency. An increasing degree of specialization along the lines in which each country can make the greatest contribution to the common defence and welfare is the natural complement of the principle of integration in defence planning which we, together with our partners in the North Atlantic treaty, have accepted and have begun to apply. The implications of this approach are plain.

The experience of two wars has made it plain that allies have to pool their shipping resources. This lesson has not been lost on the countries which are now associated, for purposes of common defence, in the North Atlantic treaty. It is our hope, to further which we shall use our best endeavours, that arrangements can be completed in peacetime which would ensure the prompt, fair and efficient use and allocation of all available shipping in any emergency. Conversations to this end are already under way. In particular, discussions on this subject have taken place between officials of the government of the United Kingdom and Canada. Those discussions have not yet been completed, but I believe that if Canadian ships are transferred to United Kingdom registry, arrangements can be made to treat such ships as part of the Canadian contribution to any allied shipping pool in the event of war. Similar conditions would govern any transfer of registry for operating purposes to the flags of other countries upon whose close co-operation in mutual defence we can confidently rely. By proceeding along these lines and within the framework of security which we are building up, it should no longer be necessary for each individual country to risk the waste of its national effort in duplicating facilities and services which can be more efficiently carried out in peacetime by their partner countries, and which will be available to serve the needs of all should a war come.

The government has therefore decided that, for the next year—and I stress "for the next year"—while an allied defence shipping pool is being created, it is advisable to maintain some proportion of the present fleet under Canadian flag. For that purpose the government has decided to recommend the provision of a sum of $3 million as an aid to the Canadian ocean shipping industry for one year only. It is estimated that over 500,000 deadweight tons of dry-cargo shipping will remain under the Canadian flag, but it may be that not all vessels comprising that tonnage will receive assistance. The number of ships to be assisted, and the amount of assistance required by each, will be left to the Canadian maritime commission, who will administer the fund under the provisions of the act, if parliament sees fit to pass it.

It is recognized that the reduction contemplated in the fleet will compel a number of seamen to find shore employment. In order to assist them in this transfer, the government has decided to extend the vocational training scheme to admit eligible men applying on or before the 30th day of September, 1950, and commencing their approved training before the 31st day of January, 1951. The ministers of transport and veterans affairs will have discretion with regard to the restricting provisions respecting age and the granting of allowances as at present set out in the merchant seamen vocational training order. Hon. members know that the terms of that order restricted training to men under thirty years of age.

Mr. Green: Is that being lifted?

Mr. St. Laurent: That is to remain the rule; but there will be discretionary provisions enabling the Minister of Veterans Affairs and the Minister of Transport in exceptional cases to extend the privilege to men who have passed the age of thirty.

The vessels of the Park fleet, which, I have said, were sold by the government to Canadian companies, were purchased under the terms of an agreement containing the following clause:

> It is one of the essential conditions of the present agreement that except with the prior written approval of the seller—
> —the vessels sold will be operated under Canadian registry by the purchaser as well after as before the full balance of the final or adjusted purchase price and interest has been paid; and the purchaser agrees for itself, its successors and assigns, not to make any application for transfer of any of the vessels out of Canadian registry without the prior written approval of the seller.

If it had not been for this clause, Canadian companies could have transferred their ships to foreign flag at any time. That covenant has now been in force for about four years, and it is now felt, in view of what I have said, that it is fair to give relief in respect of this restriction, as it has been demonstrated that Canadian vessels with their present high costs cannot be operated. Applications from shipowners may now be made to the Minister of Transport, through the commission, to transfer flag, and transfers will be permitted under such conditions as he may impose. This is in conformity with what I said previously about the concern to have an arrangement for a shipping pool that would give us the confidence that ships would be available in the event of an emergency.

Such transfer of flag, of itself, does not of course affect the ownership of the vessels, which will remain in Canadian hands. In permitting transfers the government will see to it that there will be tonnage available to meet Canadian needs in the event of war, and it is hoped that by means of such transfers Canadian-owned vessels will be able to secure cargoes which have not been available to them by reason of currency restrictions.

Let me emphasize again that the relief which is now being granted to the shipping industry is temporary and for one year only. It is given to assist shipowners to meet the emergency created by the decline in the freight market, and in the hope that they will be able to reduce their costs in order to operate competitively.

May I take this opportunity to pay a tribute, which I think all hon. members would wish to pay, to the efficient and intelligent work which has been done by the maritime commission, under the chairmanship of Mr. Clyne, in coping with a most difficult and somewhat discouraging problem under the conditions which prevailed when they had to give all their time and energy in an attempt to find a solution to that problem.

Mr. Green: I should like to ask the Prime Minister one or two questions. I understand from his statement that legislation will be required, and I should like to know whether it will be introduced at this session, or not until the next. Then the Prime Minister said that an attempt would be made to retain a tonnage of approximately 500,000 tons, but I am not sure whether he said deadweight tons or gross tons. The recommendation of the maritime commission was that there should be 750,000 deadweight tons, which I think is about 562,500 gross tons.

The Prime Minister said nothing about the $26 million now held in escrow, being the proceeds of sales that have already taken place. Under present provisions that money cannot be paid out. Would the Prime Minister explain what will be done with that money?

Finally, has the government given consideration to the fact that in some cases ships have been transferred to the Panamanian flag? Panama is not a member of the North Atlantic alliance, and I am wondering what would happen if ships are transferred to the flag of that country.

Mr. St. Laurent: I shall deal with the last question first. There have been no ships transferred to the Panamanian flag, and it is not the intention to authorize transfers to that flag. The intention is to authorize transfers under conditions that would leave us with the assurance that ships would become available in the event of an emergency.

Mr. Green: Only to North Atlantic treaty nations?

Mr. St. Laurent: I would not like to tie it down any more firmly than to say that when an application is made, the merits will be considered. The intention is to reach some kind of agreement within a year that would provide for the pooling of the ships that would be required in the event of an emergency by the members of the North Atlantic security pact.

With reference to the first question asked by the hon. member, it is 500,000 deadweight tons of dry cargo shipping, and I am told that that would be about forty ships. With regard to the amount now in escrow, under conditions which require it to be expended for the production in Canadian yards of Canadian ships, at the moment no change is contemplated in those restrictions.

The hon. member asked if it was intended to introduce the legislation at this or the next session. There is no intention of introducing it at this session. There is still the hope among a great many of us that this session may be pretty close to prorogation, and it was felt that, in view of the general interest in the matter, it would be desirable to announce government policy at this time, and the intention of the government to introduce legislation as early as possible in the next session to implement that policy.

[Mr. Green.]

Mr. Coldwell: Mr. Speaker, this is a most important statement, and a number of questions have arisen in the minds of hon. members, as indicated by those asked by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green). I am at a loss to understand why this statement was not made yesterday before the estimates of the Department of Transport were finally completed, so that we could have obtained some information to carry back to the country. It is regrettable that we did not get this statement before those estimates were finally adopted.

Mr. St. Laurent: I shall have to deal with the hon. member's remarks in two parts. The statement was not made before because it was not ready. We have been giving it careful consideration and have been expediting its preparation, but I was able to get it only this morning. Even when I did get it this morning, there was one change that it was found necessary to make.

With regard to the estimates of the Department of Transport, it was convenient to have them called yesterday, although it might have been preferable to deal with some other estimates and call the transport items today. I repeat that the reason this statement was not made before was that we were expediting its preparation, and I was able to get it in its final shape only a few minutes before I came into the chamber.

Mr. Knowles: The minister said that we would not get the statement unless we put his estimates through last night.

Mr. Gillis: There is just one question I should like to ask the Prime Minister, and I think it is important. Can he inform the house whether there is such a thing as a ship of Canadian registry? I understand that all Canadian ships are of British registry, regardless of the flag they fly. That is, there is no such thing as a Canadian registered ship leaving a Canadian port.

Mr. St. Laurent: Oh, there is. These ships are of Canadian registry.

Mr. Gillis: I checked that recently with a captain who clears in and out of Canadian ports with a Canadian ship. He told me that he lost a bet with the immigration officials in New York who told him that his ship was not of Canadian registry, that it was of British registry. They showed him his ticket indicating that his ship was of British registry.

In connection with transfer to other flags I am not worried about the Panamanian end of it. If the privilege of transferring to other flags is granted to shipping companies, i there not a danger that they will replace Canadian labour with cheaper labour, even when they transfer to the British flag?

Mr. St. Laurent: Transfers are made only with the authorization of the Minister of Transport. If owners could not achieve lower operating costs by transfer, it is probable they would have to lay up their ships. At the present time ships under Canadian registry, and with Canadian costs, cannot operate without substantial deficits. It is for this reason that the government will recommend that for the limited number which will make up the 500,000 deadweight tons dry cargo, a subsidy be provided not exceeding $3 million for the year.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): The question I was going to ask has been partly answered. As I understand the policy announced by the Prime Minister, it will enable quite a proportion of the total number of Canadian ships to be transferred so that they may immediately operate under sterling costs.

Mr. St. Laurent: Yes; that is what is intended.

Mr. Green: Apparently the policy means that Canada is to retain approximately forty of her present ships. It is not the plan to have forty new ships?

Mr. St. Laurent: No.

Mr. Green: The policy is forty old ships.

Mr. St. Laurent: The policy is to provide a subsidy not exceeding $3 million under which it is hoped that the owners of approximately forty of these ships will undertake to keep them in operation under Canadian registry and the Canadian flag for the year during which they will get a portion of the subsidy.

HOUSING

RENT CONTROL—FURTHER CORRESPONDENCE WITH PREMIERS OF PROVINCES

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I desire to table further correspondence with the premiers of Saskatchewan, Quebec, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick concerning rent control.

As hon. members will see from the further correspondence with the government of Saskatchewan, the government of that province has definitely undertaken to assume responsibility for rent control as from April 1, 1950, and, pending the enactment of the appropriate provincial legislation, has requested that orders 813 and 814 of the wartime prices and trade board, which come into effect on December 15 and authorize further increases in the rental ceilings, and other relaxations, be suspended in Saskatchewan.

Hon. members will also note that in accordance with the policy announced in this house, the government has taken the necessary action to comply with these requests. Therefore the situation is that the wartime leasehold regulations will remain in effect in Saskatchewan as they now are, unaltered by orders 813 and 814 of the wartime prices and trade board, which will not be operative in that province. On April 1, 1950, all federal rent controls will cease to have effect in Saskatchewan.

Mr. Coldwell: I should like to ask the minister whether the announcement made yesterday by the premier of Alberta has the same effect.

Mr. Abbott: As yet I have received no communication from the premier of Alberta as to the details of the plan which I gather it is intended will be adopted in that province. It would appear that some form of rent control legislation is to be introduced, to be effective from the first of April, 1950, and that we shall be asked to withdraw federal regulations from Alberta as of that date. As yet, however, I have received no official notification.

Mr. Coldwell: The same as in Saskatchewan.

Mr. Abbott: Yes. I omitted to suggest that, as was done previously, the correspondence concerning rent control might be printed as an appendix to Hansard.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house that the correspondence be printed as an appendix to Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

(For text of correspondence see appendix, pages 3065-66.)

NATIONAL FILM BOARD

STATEMENT AS TO PRODUCTION COSTS OF CERTAIN FILMS

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (for the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): Mr. Speaker, at the request of my colleague the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Winters), I have been asked to give certain information in answer to a question which was asked by the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) on December 7. The question was as to the cost of production of certain films. The minister was unable to give the figures at the time, but he undertook to provide them later.

The films with their production cost are as follows: "River of Canada", $7,267.07; "Four Seasons", $7,223.37.

There was also one which the hon. member referred to as "La Cité de Notre Dame", and which it is believed is the film board production "Montreal Tercentenary". The cost of that film was $9,948.98.

CANADIAN RED CROSS SOCIETY

AMENDMENT OF ACT TO PROVIDE FOR EXPANSION IN CANADA

Mr. A. A. Macnaughton (Mount Royal) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 222, to amend the Canadian Red Cross Society Act.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Macnaughton: Mr. Speaker, this is a non-contentious bill. Its first purpose is to assist the Canadian Red Cross Society to expand its services in Canada, particularly with regard to the establishment of outpost hospitals and blood transfusion services across the country. The second purpose is to increase the membership of the central governing body so that representatives from the new province of Newfoundland may be included thereon. The third, and by no means the least important aspect of the bill, is that an amendment is required to the act to sanction the use of "La Societe Canadienne de la Croix Rouge" as the name of the Canadian Red Cross Society in the French language.

I hope, with the good will and unanimous consent of the members of the house, that it may be possible to have second reading of the bill today.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. Speaker: When shall the bill be read a second time?

Some hon. Members: Now.

Mr. Knowles: Later this day—at eight o'clock.

Mr. Speaker: Later this day.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

121. Departmental administration, $256,281.

Mr. Garson: Mr. Chairman, at the outset of this sitting of the committee I should like to raise a question of privilege.

Before the resignation of the commissioner under the Combines Investigation Act becomes effective, he is endeavouring to complete two reports which he now has in the course of preparation. In this connection he has asked me, with regard to the first of the two reports, whether I would approve of getting out 100 odd copies of it, not printed but in mimeographed form. He said this was the only way in which we could get the report published within the statutory period of fifteen days. He said if we did not publish it in mimeographed form we would not be able to get it published within fifteen days after its delivery to the minister. I asked him, if it was necessary to mimeograph on the present occasion, how it had been possible in the past to comply with the requirement that reports be published within fifteen days. Mr. McGregor then informed me for the first time that the combines investigation commission, and the ministers responsible for it in previous years, had had a great deal of trouble in complying with the section, and as a matter of fact had always found that if a printed report was to be published it was mechanically impossible to comply with it. He said that even when the report went from him in first-class order to a minister who knew all about its preparation, and who had been kept fully informed by him of its various stages, it had not been possible to accomplish publication of the printed report within the statutory period of fifteen days. This has happened not through any lack of attention or effort on his part, or through any indisposition of the minister to publish, but simply because the fifteen days provided in the act is too short.

In view of all the criticism that has been heaped upon me, some of it going to the extreme length of hinting that, like Charles I, I should be beheaded for this grave offence, I would ask members of the press gallery to give due publicity to the point I am now raising. That I should have raised it before in my argument I do not for a moment deny, but this is just another example of the position in which I have found myself from beginning to end in this matter. That is, having no direct knowledge of the matter which has been under discussion, I have been continually under the necessity of securing all the information I have required in these debates from other people, mainly civil servants; and having heard no suggestion at any time that the act should be amended to extend this period of fifteen days to a more realistic period, naturally I assumed that it had been found to be satisfactory. That is one reason why there was no provision in the bill brought down this session to extend that period. That is also why, in addressing ourselves to the matter of the publication of this report which has not yet been delivered to me, the commissioner and I have to put our heads together to devise unusual ways and means of managing to comply with the statutory requirement of publishing within fifteen days.

In my own case I was not the minister who was familiar with this matter. I came in as a new minister, totally unfamiliar with either the flour report or any of the matters out of which it had arisen, and found on my desk an accumulation of some six weeks' arrears of work, with the session to prepare for, and with a flour report in respect of which the period for publication was known to be completely inadequate but as to which the statutory period of fifteen days began to run some five days before I even got here.

I think I can say with reasonable modesty that I came to this city with a good name, which it had taken me twenty-two years of hard, diligent work in the public service to build up. There are those in this house who would take it from me because I did not comply within ten days with a provision which, as the records show, on several occasions it has been quite impossible to comply with in the fifteen day period.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Nor within ten months.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): I do not think anyone in this house was at any time attacking the good name of the Minister of Justice. Those of us who know him particularly well, including myself, a political opponent from Manitoba, have always paid tribute to his fairness and other very admirable qualities. If there is criticism directed to him it is not because he is Stuart Garson but because he is the Minister of Justice, and one who broke the law of this country.

I must say that I find his statement today singularly unconvincing. There has been criticism of the minister and the government, and I think that criticism is well merited, because justice in this country must be even-handed and impartial. Justice must apply to those in positions of power and prominence as well as to those in more humble walks of life; and the minister has broken the law. I do not say he has defied it; I say he has broken it. If fifteen days is not long enough, then we shall have to amend the act; but the law states that the period is fifteen days. I think most hon. members would go further and agree that the fifteen days should run from that date toward the end of February when the last amendment was made.

What are the chronological facts of the situation? The report was presented last December. I think it should be said in fairness to the minister, though he has not said it himself, that when that report was presented he was lying in bed in Manitoba, a very sick man. Therefore he could not have been expected to know what was in the report. Nevertheless there must have been an acting minister at that time. A few days later, I believe, Mr. McGregor sent in a request for authorization to print the report. That authorization was not granted until some time in April. I believe the report was printed before the last parliament was dissolved; yet members of that parliament never saw it.

I point out that the minister has broken the law. There is a punishment in Canada for those who break the law. I must admit that I am not fully conversant with the law, not being a lawyer, but still I can read certain aspects of it. I maintain that the minister did not comply with the law; and here I speak of the Minister of Justice. In that case section 164 of the Criminal Code must apply, and that section reads:

> Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to one year's imprisonment who, without lawful excuse, disobeys any act of the parliament of Canada or of any legislature in Canada by wilfully doing any act which it forbids, or omitting to do any act which it requires to be done, unless some penalty or other mode of punishment is expressly provided by law.

I hope the minister will realize that, to use the familiar cliché of the Minister of Labour, I am speaking in a kindly way, you understand. I do not want to see the Minister of Justice go to jail for Christmas; but if he does have to go to jail I suggest that he invoke section 574 of the Criminal Code and take some of his colleagues with him. That section deals with accessories after the fact, and reads:

> Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to seven years' imprisonment—

This is more severe than the other section.

> —who, in any case where no express provision is made by this act for the punishment of an accessory, is accessory after the fact to any indictable offence for which the punishment is, on a first conviction, imprisonment for life—

Perhaps that is the wrong section. In any case I suggest that the minister's colleagues are liable to be sent down for about seven years for being accessories with him. I wonder if the minister has heard from the attorney general of Ontario, the province in which the offence was committed, as to his position under the law?

Mr. Drew: There might have been a general disposition to feel that this matter had been adequately dealt with in the earlier discussions had it not been for the extraordinary statement made today by the Minister of Justice. He now seeks to suggest that the criticism which has been directed in this chamber to the procedure followed was improper. He speaks of his reputation, and suggests that people would take it from him. The implication is that those who have clearly stated what were the requirements of the law had some motive other than to place before this house the necessity of obeying fundamental and well-established principles of our parliamentary system and the responsibility of government to parliament. The minister comes in at this late hour, unrepentant, and even taking away any limited measure of regret that he expressed previously. Now he says that Mr. McGregor indicates that it will be necessary to have another report, which Mr. McGregor is completing, mimeographed if there is to be compliance with the law requiring publication within fifteen days; that that requirement is something with which it has not been practicable to comply all along. Did the commissioner say to the Minister of Justice that it takes ten and a half months to do it? Did he say to the Minister of Justice: You should amend the time within which publication takes place and be sure to allow ten months, because that is the time required? Unless that was said, then all this is meaningless. It does not make clear the elaborate and detailed explanation given by the Minister of Justice for the ten months' delay in complying with this requirement.

The fact is that on the basis of what the minister says this morning there could have been compliance with the act. The only requirement is that there be publication. There is not a word about printing. It is simply a matter of providing the material upon which the report can be published. This being so, the suggestion of the necessity for mimeographing imposes no limitation; it demonstrates the extent to which the minister feels it is necessary to go to explain what he did, rather than apologize for what he did. The suggestion conveyed, not in words but by implication, is that there was no substantial ground for the criticism which has been directed to the conduct of the minister and the members of the government who joined in this extraordinary procedure.

In the closing hours of this session, let the Minister of Justice not come to us and say that the delay in this case was the result of any procedural or mimeographing difficulty, when he spent such a long time explaining exactly why he had not published the report. In a nutshell, the story is that he examined the report and discussed it with the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and the Minister of Trade and Commerce was not willing to let it be published. As a result of the objection raised by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, publication did not take place. That is the explanation, and not that fifteen days was not enough time. Then there were discussions with the officials, and the Minister of Justice explained that on different occasions he brought other senior officials and Mr. McGregor together, so that they could reconcile their points of view, if possible, in regard to this important matter. All that had nothing to do with any difficulty in complying with the requirement that publication shall take place within fifteen days.

If there had not been any great reason for concern before this morning, Mr. Chairman, about the measure of responsibility displayed by the government in regard to obligations of this kind, there is now, having regard to the explanation given this morning by the Minister of Justice. After reviewing in considerable detail each of the stages of the discussion of this report, after telling us of the discussion which took place with the Minister of Trade of Commerce and the different officials, and giving all the reasons why the report had not been published for more than ten months, the minister now comes before us and seeks to leave the impression that the difficulty in publishing this second report, except by the procedure of mimeographing—which is a well-accepted procedure in business and in government—is the explanation, in spite of the lengthy statement already made.

Mr. Garson: I am sure my hon. friend does not want to misquote or misrepresent what I said, but I am afraid that, quite unintentionally, he is doing that at the moment. Perhaps I should state my point in order to make it clear. The breach of the act which is alleged is a breach of section 27, subsection 5, of the Combines Investigation Act. It states that any report of the commissioner, or of a special commissioner, other than an interim report or a report of a preliminary inquiry shall, within fifteen days after its receipt by the minister, be made public.

Mr. Knowles: Not published—just made public.

Mr. Garson: Be made public. If my hon. friends on the opposite side wish to be technical, I can be technical too. I do not raise this point as a point of substance, but the act states it is to be made public, and does not state by whom.

The point I wish to emphasize is this. As to any allegation that the Minister of Justice has broken the law and is open to all the penalties that have been mentioned by the member for Winnipeg North, it relates to non-publication within fifteen days. As to the period of time the leader of the opposition is talking about, as I explained in my longer address upon this subject, that is not a matter of law but a matter of propriety in respect of which, from the standpoint of the opposition, we may be open to criticism. Then there is the argument that once the section had been broken we should have published the report as soon as possible thereafter. The reasons which we gave for not publishing within that longer period of time, for not acting in a proper manner from a political rather than a legal standpoint, I presume are not concurred in by the members of the opposition. But so far as the breach of the act itself is concerned, I am sure even a layman would agree that the offence, if any, is complete when the fifteen-day period is up. It is complete, and it is at an end.

The matter of the publication of a report which is quite different from the report which was received is another matter, and I take it my hon. friend was not dealing with that.

Mr. Drew: This matter becomes worse every time the minister makes further remarks about it. I am quite sure the minister has not forgotten that I said, and others have said, that if the minister had explained that he was in Winnipeg, ill, and unable to be here immediately after his appointment, and that after his arrival there was an accumulation of work which made it impossible to comply with the provisions for publication,—I use the word "publication", because that is what it means, to make public—no one in the house would have done otherwise than to say that was a reasonable explanation which we could accept. No one would say that the failure to publish for a few days, or even a few weeks, should be regarded as a serious breach of the law, or a serious breach of the responsibility of the Minister of Justice and the members of the government who concurred in the procedure. But the minister himself has made it clear and beyond all question that his inability to deal with this matter quickly in the month of January had nothing in the world to do with the fact that this report was not made public until a short time ago, for more than ten months after it should have been made public. He has made it perfectly clear why publication did not take place. He has made it clear that publication did not take place because the Minister of Trade and Commerce first of all objected, did not agree with the findings of fact, and because after all these consultations there was general disagreement on the part of the government with the facts as they were found.

The Minister of Justice, making his explanations worse on every occasion, has now said that the act does not say by whom publication is to be made. The minister has explained that he received a copy of the report of the commissioner with an explanation as to the date on which publication should take place last January. He has made it plain on his own statement that it was on his initiative that the publication did not take place so far as the commission is concerned.

The act may not say specifically by whom the publication is to be arranged, but it most certainly leaves no doubt that the Minister of Justice has no authority to prevent publication, and that is what took place here. The commissioner appointed under the act was anxious to have publication, and said so, and it was the act of the Minister of Justice—for whom many hon. members have expressed real sympathy, in view of their feeling that he was placed under compelling pressure by another member of the cabinet, and that being a newcomer to office he was not able to resist that pressure at the time—it was the act of the Minister of Justice that prevented it. But that feeling of sympathy for the position of the minister is certainly removed when he says here first of all that the act does not say by whom publication shall be arranged, and suggests—and more than suggests in his remarks today—that the criticism that has been directed to the procedure is merely an attempt to damage his reputation, established over long years.

Even in his last remarks of a moment ago the minister said that this may be wrong from the standpoint of the opposition. May I impress upon every hon. member the effect of his words, that this of course may be wrong from the standpoint of the members of the opposition. By that he suggests, and more than suggests, that the standpoint is not wrong from the point of view of those who support the government. It is the only interpretation that can be put on these words. If that is the interpretation, then it makes the matter increasingly serious. Let no one in this chamber suggest that we are attaching too much seriousness to this procedure. On Thursday of last week a debate took place in the House of Lords in Great Britain, the first stage of the debate having been in the House of Commons, in regard to the conduct of Lord Pakenham, Minister of Civil Aviation in the United Kingdom. The circumstances there were in no way comparable with what has taken place here from the point of view of the seriousness of the course that was followed; nevertheless there is at least this similarity that can be noticed. A year ago last October there was a crash of a Dutch KLM passenger machine at Prestwick airport. As a result of that crash all the crew and passengers died. Under the statutory provisions covering such circumstances the Minister of Civil Aviation, Lord Pakenham, appointed a prominent barrister, Mr.

McDonald, to conduct an inquiry into the circumstances. After the taking of extensive evidence, a report was made. Lord Pakenham kept the report for a period of five months. When the report was recently released he disagreed with the findings of fact contained in the report and refused to accept them. Anyone who questions the seriousness of a matter of that kind from the point of view of our parliamentary and administrative procedure should read the record of what took place in the House of Lords a week ago yesterday.

Lord Pakenham made his explanation in the House of Lords. He expressed regret that he had followed the course he did, but reiterated his non-agreement with the commission's findings of fact. In the discussion that followed it was pointed out that he had not heard the evidence; that he had not had the opportunity of exploring the details, and yet without that evidence and without those details he was taking it on himself to challenge the findings of fact made by a highly competent inquirer with the evidence actually before him. We find such great world figures in both constitutional and procedural law as Lord Reading and Lord Simon taking part in the debate.

In the opening discussion of Lord Pakenham's remarks, Lord Swinton dealt with what had occurred, and without covering it in detail I should like to read these words from the London Times of December 2, which gives an extensive report of the proceedings:

> It was inconceivable that the minister should reject the findings of fact of a highly qualified tribunal unless he could satisfy parliament beyond all doubt that there was no proper evidence to support those findings. It was almost inconceivable that with a highly qualified lawyer sitting with an assessor such a situation would arise. Certainly no such situation arose here.
> In the present case Lord Pakenham had, under the advice or direction of high authority, not retracted his previous statement but had retracted the method in which it was made. Most of their lordships would be greatly surprised at the form which Lord Pakenham's statement took today. If a minister could, in practice, cavalierly override the findings of fact of a highly competent quasi-judicial tribunal in such a way as to render the whole procedure, in Mr. McDonald's words, "nugatory, if not indecent," no lawyer of repute would in future be willing to undertake the task.

There is a remarkable similarity in the situation here to what is referred to in these remarks.

In case there be any doubt as to what the attitude of these men was in regard to what had happened, Lord Swinton said that he did not think that after what Lord Pakenham had done and said, confidence in the administration of that department could be maintained so long as Lord Pakenham continued as minister of that department.

Let no one suggest that when a minister, in regard to an extremely important matter, fails to carry out his obligation to parliament and to the public, there is anything in the nature of personal attack, or anything in the nature of an attempt to destroy a man, when the established practice is pointed out and the suggestion made that the proper course is for that minister no longer to be the head of that department. That, after all, was the view of great constitutional and procedural experts in England last week in connection with a minor breach of the responsibility of a minister to parliament and the public, as compared with the breach we have before us here.

As I said earlier, most hon. members had much sympathy for the position of the Minister of Justice on the basis of his earlier statements; and most hon. members I feel sure regretted greatly that the Minister of Justice should have found himself in a position in which his conduct was open to such severe criticism as it was in this case. When it was indicated that established practice and custom suggested that he should no longer continue as minister in that department, having regard to the explanation he had given, it was with the feeling that he had given an explanation which did indicate why he had failed to carry out his obligation. But that feeling cannot be quite the same after the minister's statement this morning, which he seeks to convey the impression that the failure to carry out the obligation was the result merely of practical difficulties, and that a criticism of this course was an attempt to destroy his reputation.

The Minister of Justice will recall that in the earlier discussion it was pointed out that the amendment he introduced to the Combines Investigation Act, which amendment has now been passed, gives to him a greater measure of responsibility for prosecution by making it possible under the act for the minister, in his capacity as attorney general, to institute proceedings under the Combines Investigation Act or the Criminal Code. It was pointed out that in view of the admitted breach of law by the Minister of Justice, with the consent and agreement of the government, he was placed in an invidious position in regard to the prosecution of other people under the same law or other laws of parliament. Already this morning section 164 of the Criminal Code has been read to the house; I think it would be well to read it again:

> Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to one year's imprisonment who, without lawful excuse, disobeys any act of the parliament of Canada or of any legislature in Canada by wilfully doing any act which it forbids, or omitting to do any act which it requires to be done, unless some penalty or other mode of punishment is expressly provided by law.

I can find no provision which exempts any minister of the crown from the provisions of that act. Even assuming that many people may not regard this as serious, let them remember that others are compelled to obey these laws.

Section 573 of the Criminal Code provides:

Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to seven years' imprisonment who, in any case not hereinbefore provided for, conspires with any person to commit any indictable offence.

Well, there may be those who feel that it is inappropriate even to suggest that these sections should be read in connection with action of this kind on the part of a member of the government. But there certainly was an omission, and a deliberate omission, to do something called for by the act; and we are left in the position that from the government's point of view the only person who can advise the house whether this applies to the Minister of Justice is the Minister of Justice himself. Has the Minister of Justice considered whether in his capacity as attorney general he should launch a prosecution under either of these sections? The very asking of that question indicates the extraordinary position in which the minister has placed himself.

No matter what measure of seriousness or otherwise may be attached to this act, there was a plan; there was a holding back of the report by definite agreement and for a definite purpose. The Minister of Trade and Commerce did not agree with the findings of the report, and, so far as the explanations given earlier are concerned, it seems that the government collectively did not agree with those findings. So they took it upon themselves to become the tribunal, without having the opportunity to hear evidence; they took it upon themselves to make a decision in regard to a quasi-judicial finding which under the act could become the basis of subsequent procedure, and under circumstances similar to those in which Lord Pakenham made the decision which is under vigorous criticism in Great Britain today.

I am not suggesting that we should necessarily follow any governmental procedure other than that established here. But the practice in the matter of the responsibility of the government to parliament has evolved from traditions brought here from Westminster, and their attitude toward matters of this kind is at least helpful to us in determining what others, under the same procedure, believe to be the duties of a government and the duties of ministers of the crown responsible for the fulfilment of obligations under any statutory provision.

One of the greatest authorities on constitutional law, Dicey, says this in the ninth edition of "The Law of the Constitution," at page 193:

With us every official, from the Prime Minister down to a constable or collector of taxes, is under the same responsibility for every act done without legal justification as any other citizen.

I do not think the position could be more clearly stated. The law was broken not because of pressure of time; the law was broken by a decision of the government concurred in by the Minister of Justice. No matter what the appropriate action would be on the part of any other member of the government, the fact is that the Minister of Justice is the minister charged with the legal affairs of this administration. In his capacity as attorney general he is responsible for the prosecution of individuals and corporations under the law as passed by parliament.

I can only conclude by expressing my regret that what was already bad was made infinitely worse by the spurious explanation given this morning by the Minister of Justice for what took place. The Minister of Justice, having taken the responsibility for breaking the law, and breaking it deliberately for over ten months, is not in a position to launch prosecutions under laws passed by this parliament without a feeling of injustice on the part of those who are prosecuted by him as Minister of Justice or as attorney general.

As has been said here before and on other occasions in this parliament, it is not open to hon. members to forget what minister it is who will be carrying out these responsibilities. I repeat that we are not dealing with this matter upon a personal basis in relation to any individual; we are dealing with the responsibility of parliament, and the fact that the government is responsible to parliament, and that if it fails in that responsibility it must take appropriate action to restore its position, otherwise the constitutional responsibility of the government to parliament will be impaired by the precedent so established.

As was said in the House of Lords last week in a much less serious case, no matter what our regard may be for the minister as an individual, no matter what our personal attitude may be as to the ultimate consequence of what has been done, the failure of the minister to observe the law as passed by the parliament of Canada disentitles him to continue in this office, no matter what other office he may get; and confidence in the administration of this act and other acts cannot be restored while he is the Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada.

That is the situation with which we are confronted. The explanation given this morning only adds to the concern that everyone has as to what else may have been done by those who still hold this point of view in regard to the responsibility of government to parliament. What has been done cannot be changed, but it is our duty to maintain public confidence in our system of government. It is the duty of parliament to assert its authority and to demand that the government respect its responsibility to parliament as a whole. Therefore the course that has been indicated is the course that should be followed in the interests of the preservation of our system of responsible government and the restoration of confidence in the minds of the public that, to use the words of Dicey, every official, from the Prime Minister down to the constable or collector of taxes, shall be under the same responsibility as any other citizen for every act done without legal justification.

Mr. St. Laurent: Mr. Chairman, I shall not take more than two or three minutes to answer the long speech of the leader of the opposition, delivered in the solemn tones he has used, with his reference to great principles and so forth. With all that no one disagrees; but with the facts as they exist I think no one can disagree, not even the leader of opposition and the other members of the opposition.

The leader of the opposition closed his remarks by saying that what has been done cannot be changed. That is the kernel of this whole debate. What has been done cannot be changed, and what has been done was done inadvertently by pressure of time. The law requires that a certain thing be done within fifteen days. The report was not published within fifteen days because neither the minister nor any member of the government had been apprised of it. After the fifteen days had elapsed, what had not been done could not be changed.

The law does not say that if there is inability to comply with the requirements during that period, it shall be done as soon as possible afterwards. The law says that it shall be done within fifteen days and it was not done within fifteen days. That is the situation in fact. The leader of the opposition says that there was no lawful justification or excuse or anything else; but there was the factual justification and excuse in that the commissioner under the Combines Investigation Act says that it is now, in a different case, an impossibility to make publication in the way that has always been regarded as proper compliance with the statute. That is what had taken place before anyone's attention was called to the matter at all.

As the Minister of Justice said this morning, afterwards there was no possibility of complying with the express terms of the law, but there was the matter of propriety to be considered. Hon. members may form their own opinions whether the reasons given to justify the propriety of the delay after the fifteen days had gone by were or were not good reasons. That is something which has nothing to do with compliance with the statute. The statute had not been complied with, and could no longer be complied with. There remained the question of propriety as to what was the right thing to do afterwards.

Explanations have been given for the delay that occurred in choosing and fixing a time when publicity would be given to this report. The report contained suggestions that a line of conduct should be adopted which the government felt it was not proper to adopt under the circumstances, because we knew what had been the reasons for the conduct of those who are named as having been guilty of practices prohibited by the Combines Investigation Act.

That is the whole situation. The failure to make a report public is not a continuing offence as the leader of the opposition suggests. You cannot continue the offence. If a thing has to be done within a certain time, it has to be done within that time or it is not done within that time. After the time has expired there is no further possibility of going back behind its expiry and performing the act required. What has been done cannot be changed; and it was not done, as the leader of the opposition suggested, by deliberate omission or by a plan for holding back the report. The question of publication did not arise at all before the fifteen days had expired.

The leader of the opposition said the law was broken not by pressure of time but by deliberate decision. That is entirely contrary to the fact. It was broken by pressure of time, and there was no deliberate decision not to publish within fifteen days, because the question had not arisen. Afterwards the law was not operative, because it could not be complied with, and it was a question, as the Minister of Justice has said, of what it was proper to do after compliance with the statute had become impossible. The minister has explained why what he did then was considered by him and by his colleagues to be proper under the circumstances.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, I am at a loss to know which is the more amazing, the statement made this morning by the Minister of Justice or the statement just made by the Prime Minister. It seems to me that the longer this is carried on the worse it gets. I am surprised that the Minister of Justice reopened the question this morning at all. I shall try to deal briefly with some of the very simple facts about this case in relation to what has been said this morning. The Minister of Justice made a great play on the use of the words "publication" and "publish". Section 27 (5) of the act says nothing about publishing. It simply requires the report to be made public.

A few days ago I referred to the fact that the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act requires the Minister of Finance to lay on the table of the house on October 31, if parliament is then in session, the public accounts and the report of the Auditor General. On October 31 of this year the Minister of Finance had not secured the printed copy of the public accounts and the report of the Auditor General. Did he use that as an excuse for not complying with that section of the law? No; he tabled a typewritten copy. He obeyed the law and made it public. Many items in the Auditor General's report were in turn made public to the country by the press, which had access to it when it was laid on the table of the house. There were plenty of ways in which the Minister of Justice could have complied with the law by making the McGregor report public when he received it. All he had to do was to call in the press, lay one copy before them, and say, "Here it is." The press would have done the rest.

The Minister of Justice made a great deal out of the mechanical delay occasioned by the difficulty of having the report printed. I remind him, as the leader of the opposition has already reminded him, that in his earlier defence he said nothing at all about mechanical delay. In the earlier defence he, the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Prime Minister all said that deliberate decisions were taken to delay publication of the report. If there is any argument about that I have the references, and—

Mr. Garson: If my hon. friend will permit me to interject—I know he wishes to be fair: these decisions were all made after the statutory period had elapsed.

Mr. Knowles: I will come to that.

Mr. Garson: That is very important.

Mr. Knowles: Oh, yes; I have it in mind and I will come to it. I am not a lawyer, but I have learned a bit about law this week.

The point I wish to make is that in the previous defence that was made for the action of the government it was said by the three ministers I have named that deliberate decisions were taken to delay and to continue to delay. Granted for the moment that the decision was made after the fifteen days had elapsed, never before was it said to us that it was because they could not get the report printed. I will come to the point raised by the minister in a moment, but I submit the delay was not due to mechanical difficulties; rather it was deliberate.

The minister also sought this morning to rely on the absence of certain words in the section, an argument which I confess was startling to me. He said that section 27 (5) of the act says that the report shall be published within fifteen days after it is submitted to the minister, but the section does not say by whom. The section makes it perfectly clear it is the minister to whom the report is transmitted. The section also makes it clear that, if under certain circumstances the commissioner were to tell the minister that he did not feel it should be published, the minister still has the authority to override that recommendation and make the report public. In other words, the plain ordinary meaning of the language, which reasonable and ordinary people would take from it, is quite clear, namely, that it is the minister who must make the report public.

The minister threw out a question. Let me throw one to him. Who, does he think, is supposed to publish the report according to the section? Does he think it was Mr. McGregor? What would have happened if Mr. McGregor, when the report was not published by the minister within fifteen days, had taken it upon himself to publish it? That would have been the end of Mr. McGregor. The minister would have said: That is my responsibility.

Mr. Garson: My hon. friend is really not being very fair in his comments upon what I said. What I said was that if my hon. friends of the opposition wished to be as technical as they are in all the arguments they advance, here was a matter upon which they could be technical. My hon. friend is being technical about it now. I did not suggest for a moment that it was a substantial argument to which I was subscribing; I was suggesting that it was something to which my hon. friends might apply their technical minds.

Mr. Knowles: The minister says it was not an argument on which he was relying, but he certainly threw it out, and the inference was that he had something there.

Mr. Garson: For you to be technical about.

Mr. Knowles: It is very interesting that whenever we try to get down to the simple language of what the law clearly says—

An hon. Member: Very simple.

Mr. Knowles: That is right; it is very simple. Tell that to the minister. When we try to do that we are accused of being technical. The law clearly says the report shall be made public within fifteen days. That has been the whole argument all the way through, and sections 164 and 573 of the Criminal Code, which have been read this morning are equally simple, clear and direct.

When the Prime Minister got into this a little while ago he developed the argument made by the Minister of Justice that the deliberate decisions made by the cabinet were made after the fifteen days had expired. There is no argument that deliberate decisions were not made. The Minister of Justice, the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Prime Minister have all given evidence of that fact.

May I draw the attention of the Minister of Justice to the fact that when I asked him on what authority the government relied when it made its decision to violate the law, he said it relied upon the fact that any democratic government is answerable to the people of the country for its acts. All right. If the government continued to make the decision to keep the report secret after the fifteen days had elapsed on the authority that it had because of its responsibility to the people, how does the government explain that it kept it secret until after the 27th of June? How does the government explain that it proposed to submit this matter to the people, not when it was an issue but in 1953 or 1954, whenever the next election takes place? It seems to me that is one of the most iniquitous features of this whole matter. We had a session of parliament last spring; we were here from January until the end of April. For all I know the report may have been printed during that period of time, as some of my friends say it was. We were here, but it was kept secret from us. Then the government went to the country. The Prime Minister has said that the Liberals had all the trump cards, but this card was kept secret from the people as a whole.

I cannot understand the law which the Prime Minister enunciated here this morning when he said there was nothing in the act which sets out what the government must do if they have broken the fifteen-days provision. In other words the inference is that if they have broken it by one day it does not matter if they continue to break it by ten months or ten years. Surely the plain meaning of the law cannot be stretched in that way. This morning the Prime Minister objected to the solemn tones of the leader of the opposition and to his references to great principles. I do not think it becomes the Prime Minister to use that kind of language. What we are trying to do is to defend some things that are simple, basic, sacred, and fundamental to our democracy—that is, the maintenance of the law, and the rule of law, which all must obey.

It was also said this morning by the leader of the opposition and taken up by the Prime Minister that what is done is done and cannot be changed. That was what the leader of the opposition said; and the Prime Minister replied: Well, that's it; it has been done and cannot be changed, so what are you talking about? As I understand the whole rule of law, when people have done things that cannot be changed we may admit they cannot be changed, but there is such a thing as punishment; there is judgment which is meted out to people because they have broken the law. It is not pleasant for us to suggest that, as the other Stuart lost his head, this one should do so as well; or to suggest that he should spend a year in jail; or that the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Prime Minister, who conspired with him in this matter, should spend seven years in jail, as set out in the Criminal Code. It is not pleasant for us to suggest that the minister should resign. But when the Minister of Justice and the Prime Minister continually come before us and insist that they had the right to break the law, which is what they have done again this morning, we have no alternative but to take that position.

I regret that the Minister of Justice put this matter on a personal basis. He knows, as some of us on this side have said, that we do not treat it in that way. We are thinking of him in terms of the office he holds. But he has chosen to do it that way, and throughout the piece has not made one iota of apology or given one indication of being prepared to throw himself on the mercy of the house. No; they reopen the matter even after it has been closed. I may say I had my file in this connection here on my desk, and even I was not sure that I could summon enough nerve to bring up the matter again when we reached the item dealing with the Combines Investigation Act, in view of the general opinion that this session should end. But the minister has done it for us, and done it in what spirit? He has done it in the determination to show that though he has clearly broken the law, he simply says: That is nothing; it is just an obsession with the members of the opposition.

Well, Mr. Chairman, the issue is really crystal clear. Even yet I believe the Minister of Justice and the government should change their whole attitude and express to the house and the country some real measure of apology. If they do not, we have no alternative but to continue to refer to what happened to that other Stuart; to continue to refer to instances in British parliamentary practice of ministers who have resigned because of acts like this, and to continue to refer to sections 164 and 573 of the Criminal Code, which provide one year's imprisonment in the one case and seven years' imprisonment in the other for those who do this sort of thing. The country expects some one of these courses to be followed.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I shall not detain the committee long, Mr. Chairman, but it seems to me that what has happened this morning is easily the most extraordinary thing that has happened during the course of this whole discussion. As the last hon. member to speak has said, it is probable that if the minister had not taken the most unusual course he adopted this morning of introducing this subject on a point of privilege, this matter might have rested where it was, at any rate for a time. But what has the minister done? First of all he has made what I might call, though I do not want to use the word in an offensive way, a sentimental appeal, which I am sure affected all of us, just as the last speaker said. But what did he do after that? Certainly there was no sign of a guilty conscience, but if there had been any sign of repentance it seems to me there still would have been a disposition on the part of those on this side of the house who have been critical to go as far as they could with the minister.

But what did we get then? We got a hair-splitting, logic-chopping defence. I am not going into the details, but it was the kind of defence a lawyer would bring up in a criminal case if he had no defence on the merits. He would get down to some technical, narrow and, as I said, hair-splitting issue; and if ever there was hair-splitting it was in the two suggestions made by the minister. The first was that once you got to the sixteenth day it did not matter any longer. Here I turn to the Prime Minister's words, that once you passed the fifteen-day period the law was not operative. Apparently he took that idea from the Minister of Justice, though the Prime Minister is perfectly competent to reach his own conclusions. That was an extraordinary thing for the Minister of Justice to say to us—in effect, that once you got to the sixteenth day it really did not matter what happened after that. Then, as I say, we had nothing but what I would call a narrow, police-court, technical defence, there being no defence on the merits.

Then we come to the extraordinary speech by the Prime Minister, which to me is far worse than what was said by the Minister of Justice. In fact to me it is by far the worst thing that has occurred in this debate, partly because it came from the Prime Minister and partly because it came from a great lawyer. He began by saying that this had been done "inadvertently". As I understand it, that means without quite knowing what you were doing, when you were off guard, or when you were not looking. That was not the case here. One afternoon the Minister of Justice spent at least two and a half hours explaining to us in great detail how it was anything but inadvertent. He gave us a great many reasons, as a matter of fact, why it was justified, explaining to us how it had been carefully considered. After all that we have the Prime Minister come along saying it was "inadvertent" and pooh-poohing the seriousness of it, as was mentioned by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Then we had perhaps the most extraordinary remark of all by the Prime Minister —that after the fifteen days the law was not operative. In other words, as I said a moment ago, once you got to the sixteenth day it did not matter what you did in the intervening months—incidentally during the time parliament was sitting, and during the time of an election campaign. According to the Prime Minister, during all that period they were perfectly free to do what they liked, because on the sixteenth day they had broken the law and therefore nothing worse could happen. It has been suggested to me that this is exactly as though a man who was carrying a pistol in his hand said, "Well, I am breaking the law anyway; therefore it doesn't matter much what I do with this pistol."

I have just one thing to add. When I spoke before on this matter I said we were still in the position of having had no apology and no promise for the future. It seems to me this morning that was doubly and triply underlined and doubled and triply worsened by the fact that the Minister of Justice came here and raised the question again, giving this entirely new reason, this entirely new line of argument, more or less as an afterthought. Worst of all we have the Prime Minister coming in, again with no apologies and no promise for the future, pooh-poohing the whole thing and saying this is just a funny idea we on this side have dreamed up. I cannot help but believe that the minister, with his legal experience, must have listened to those sections of the code with some interest. I only knew of them myself yesterday. Certainly they seem to tell a very simple story.

Again I say, as I said before, that I hope and believe the government has not heard the end of this yet from the people of the country. I believe what has happened this morning will make the people of the country wonder what sort of custodians of the law they have in the Minister of Justice, and in the Prime Minister who aids and abets the Minister of Justice in the most extraordinary line of conduct he has followed this morning.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I do not wish to interrupt this interesting debate, but yesterday I undertook to say that we would try to pass item 122, remission service. My colleague the Solicitor General, who administers this item, has an engagement and is forced to leave Ottawa this afternoon. With unanimous consent I should like to have item 122 called and try to have it disposed of before one o'clock, if that is possible.

Mr. Drew: What will the procedure be with regard to the discussion that is now taking place?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I gave an undertaking that we would consider the Department of Justice estimates this morning for some time, and then would revert to the Department of National Health and Welfare at three o'clock.

Mr. Drew: I am not prepared to make any concessions. We came here this morning to discuss the estimates of the Minister of Justice, and, as a matter of privilege, he chose to make a further explanation of the unexplainable. He has raised the question, and has been supported in that by the Prime Minister. This is a most serious situation, and deserves continued debate. A remark was made which implied that, because something had happened, nothing could be done. I want to leave no suggestion that I think nothing should be done. I thought I had made a clear suggestion as to the first step, and that is that under our constitutional procedure the minister should resign, in order to restore confidence in his department. Unless the interruption is only for the purpose of passing an item, and then returning to this debate, I regret very much that I cannot consent to any other procedure.

[Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood).]

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I did not think the leader of the opposition would take that position. Last night I announced, and I mentioned it twice, that we would take up for some time this morning the estimates of the Department of Justice for the purpose of passing item 122, remission service, in order to accommodate my colleague, the Solicitor General. Then I announced we would take up national health and welfare. I do not want to lecture the leader of the opposition, but under the rules, the business of the house is decided by the government. At three o'clock this afternoon we will take up national health and welfare.

Mr. Fleming: I rise to continue this discussion, sir. What a spectacle we have witnessed in this House of Commons this morning! This is the most astounding chapter in what has been undoubtedly one of the darkest incidents, if not the darkest, in Canadian parliamentary history.

The Minister of Justice must have been lying awake at night thinking about this subject, because this morning he came here having thought up one bright new idea. He put forward the trivial excuse that he could not do otherwise than break the law, after spending hours in this house in recent weeks trying to justify what he did. Now he has dreamed up this latest excuse, and he says: Oh, I could not have done otherwise than break the law, because I could not get the report printed in time.

The minister began with what may fairly be termed a maudlin appeal to sympathy. It is completely irrelevant. Then he grasped at straws. He said: We could not have the report published, because we could not print it. That is not an answer that would appeal to the intelligence of a public school child. The statute says it is his duty to make it public, and a delay in printing is no excuse for a failure to comply with that provision. What we have witnessed here, sir, in this last and most trivial of all his excuses, this grasping at straws on the part of the Minister of Justice, has been an incredibly inept and desperate attempt to palliate, in a belated and blundering brainstorm, a deliberate, calculated and callous breach of the law.

Whether his breach of the law was due to inexperience in obeying the law, or to weakness and impotence in the face of the behests of a blustering dictator in the cabinet, or a reprehensible attempt to cozen the votes of unsuspecting Canadians at the polls on June 27, the fact remains that the Minister of Justice, who should be the chief law enforcement officer of Canada, has become Canada's No. 1 lawbreaker.

The Prime Minister, sir, in the amazing statement which fell from his lips this morning, tore to shreds that fundamental principle of our democratic and parliamentary institutions, that all men, regardless of rank and quality, are equal before and under the law. No man, whether or not he is a minister of the crown, has any right to override the law. It binds him just as much as it binds the humblest citizen in any walk of life. The Prime Minister, along with the Minister of Justice, has torn that fundamental rule to shreds. Those who sit with him on the treasury benches, participating as they did with the Minister of Justice in this deliberate breach of the law, are equally guilty.

Then, sir, what is the responsibility of every member in this house? I ask hon. members opposite, who will return to their constituencies shortly: are they going to go home and say that they have been parties to upholding this government in its wilful, flagrant breach of the law?

An hon. Member: Yes.

Mr. Fleming: It is a tremendous responsibility for any Canadian to bear, most of all a Canadian who has been elected to parliament, and who has taken his oath to uphold the laws of this country.

Item stands.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at three o'clock.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL HEALTH AND WELFARE

252. Departmental administration, $794,605.

Mr. Blair: When the house rose last night the minister had made a statement on the new products which were introduced in this country. I am glad the minister made that statement, because among other things he pointed out that while these products had been discovered, yet they were not available to the public at the present time. It remains for another discovery to be made. In ways other than the way the minister cited this product will have to be produced in a synthetic form. I appreciate the fact that in his speech the minister pointed out that these products are not available to the public. We would not like to delude the public into thinking that these things are available and could be used in the form of treatment.

The statement made by the minister deserves a great deal of consideration, because this is one of the most important discoveries made for years. In fact it may revolutionize the whole system of treatment in medicine. In making this statement I should like to pay tribute to Dr. Collip and to Dr. Browne of McGill university and Dr. Selye, those Canadians who have done so much research and have played their part in making this product available to the public.

We should view with pride the fact that Canadians have been in the forefront in scientific research and investigation, and especially in the investigation of this product that will bring so much relief to suffering humanity. Therefore I wish to pay tribute to a man like Dr. Collip, for instance, who has done so much work in endocrinology, and to the other doctors who were associated with him, especially those Canadians who have made this product possible, and to the other workers. It is a sample of co-operation between research workers both in Canada and in the United States.

As the minister pointed out, we should be very careful to indicate to the public that while these products have reached the first stage in research, before they can become available to the public further work must be done, and that work is making them available to the public in a synthetic form.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Chairman, I have nothing to add to the words which the hon. member for Lanark has so well spoken concerning the statement made last night by the minister, except to say that every Canadian must view with a thrill of pride the noble part played by Canadians in the research work which has led to discovery and development of these two new drugs, cortisone and ACTH.

Sir, my remarks on this first item are going to be intentionally brief. We are dealing here with the estimates of a department which this year call for an expenditure of $397 million, in round figures, representing an increase of more than $21 million over the estimates voted for the same department last year. On the health side the total estimates amount to something over $47 million, an increase of more than $5 million over last year's estimates. On the welfare side the estimates amount to $350 million in round figures, an increase of over $16 million, compared with the total of $334 million appropriated on the welfare side of the department last year. In case there are any who look upon these proposed expenditures on health as large, I should like to say briefly, sir, that there is abundance of irrefutable evidence that ill health is one of the greatest causes of national economic loss. Dr. J. G. Cunningham, Ontario provincial director of industrial hygiene, recently estimated that Canadian industry loses $100 million a year by sick absenteeism. He also pointed out that in Ontario alone a cut of one-third in time loss through sickness and accidents would save industry in that province alone $35 million a year, and that Canadian doctors are accordingly campaigning for wider industrial medical services. He added:

Besides the dollar saving, they know industry will come to be the biggest field in preventive health work.

Can we assume, sir, complacently that the nation's health is sound? Those who so assume must have been rather rudely jarred by a statement made by Mr. J. H. Ross of Calgary, acting chairman of the National Council of Physical Fitness, in Ottawa on September 22, when he is reported to have said that there is a likelihood that Canadians are not as physically fit now as they were on V-E day. That is a striking statement from a man who is the acting chairman of the National Council of Physical Fitness. Therefore I say, sir, in the face of indisputable evidence as to the very serious loss that ill-health creates each year, no one will begrudge sound expenditures on the national health. All will wish, however, to see the utmost benefit from the taxpayer's dollar so spent.

But, sir, I do not think this committee can be satisfied with the progress that is being made in the field of health under the present administration. Had these estimates come up at an earlier stage of the session, I should have welcomed the opportunity to develop this theme more fully. But on this matter of delay in proceeding with a program of national health insurance I must perforce be brief. I recall, sir, what the Liberal party itself said in its promising mood, that mood in which it can be quite clear in its statements. When in such a mood it wrote into its platform at its convention in this city in 1948 these words:

The program—

That is to say, its national program of social security—

—will include—

And note the words that follow—

—health insurance covering medical, dental, surgical and hospital health services on a contributory basis.

I say, sir, these words are clear. There could not be anything clearer than that statement. In its promising moods that party is clear; but what about its moods of performance? Well, sir, there is anything but clarity in what we find by way of performance. On a number of occasions this house has tried to smoke out the present minister and the government on the subject of performing its promises to give this nation a national contributory system of health insurance, which will provide those benefits that were promised in the passage that I have just quoted from the national Liberal platform. We do not find a clear statement coming from the minister on the subject; we do not find performance, but lacking that on the ministerial level we do find something more encouraging on the official level.

I have before me a press dispatch of September 14, reporting a statement made by Dr. F. W. Jackson, director of insurance studies in this department, in his address to the Ontario Medical Association, District No. 5, at Streetsville that night. The press dispatch attributes to Dr. Jackson this statement:

A complete health service, including hospital and medical care insurance operated and organized by the provinces for the Canadian people, was predicted by Dr. F. W. Jackson.

Dr. Jackson said the evident demand for health insurance by the public and the acceptance of this fact by the major political parties would bring such a scheme into being.

"Our objective must be to see that everything medical science has to offer for promotion of health, prevention of diseases and cures of illnesses will be available to every citizen of Canada, no matter where he lives or what his economic status may be," said Dr. Jackson.

Now, sir, it is perfectly clear from statements which have emanated from responsible medical sources that the medical profession of this country is studying health insurance. At the same time that profession has set its face, as I hope we all have, against anything savouring of state medicine. For instance, one reads this report on the convention of the Canadian Medical Association at its meeting in Saskatoon on June 18:

The 13,000 doctors in Canada today are probably more concerned about health insurance than they are with any other facet of their profession.

Health insurance—how it is and how it might be operated in Canada and the forms it takes in other parts of the British commonwealth—overshadowed any other feature of the five-day Canadian Medical Association convention, which wound up here yesterday. Technological advances, usually the centre of interest, took second place . . .

The General Council held lengthy closed conferences on the subject and issued a report giving the association's official stand. It said the C.M.A. proposed to adopt "all means within its power to further the development and extension of prepaid medical care plans in Canada." But a national compulsory program of health insurance was described by Dr. Magner in an address as abhorrent to the medical profession.

On this same subject Dr. W. E. Gallie, former dean of medicine at the university of Toronto—

Mr. Martin: Would it not be better to discuss this subject under item 267?

Mr. Fleming: As there has already been a discussion of the subject of a national health insurance plan in which at least two other hon. members have taken part, I think it would perhaps contribute to saving time if I were to make my remarks now. I do not propose to discuss it at great length.

Dr. Gallie, in a statement at convocation of the university of Toronto on June 18, said:

> State medicine must be resisted by every means within our power . . . If medicine had been socialized thirty years ago, as it is now in Great Britain and New Zealand, Fred Banting and Charles Best never would have entered the medical profession. And diabetics would still be dying . . . State medicine would change our glorious profession into a political-ridden, form-writing department of the civil service.

I do not think I need develop this subject further, except to quote one more statement. This is the statement of Dr. A. D. Kelly, of Toronto, before the annual Canadian Public Health Association convention at Halifax on June 28:

> We believe that the highest standards of medical practice are promoted by permitting patients freely to choose their medical advisers and the present opinion is that remuneration of doctors by fee-for-services also contributes to this end.

Sir, the Minister of National Health and Welfare has been asked repeatedly for a clear statement as to what the government are going to do, and do now, to fulfil their promise that they would introduce a national contributory health insurance plan. We do not want any more of those generalities, those evasions, which we have been given in the past. We want a clear statement, and we want an assurance of action.

I wish to make good my promise to be brief in these remarks on the first item. May I offer one or two suggestions to the minister as to how we might proceed more expeditiously, and, I suggest, more efficiently, in the discussion of the estimates. We have had considerable discussion on several occasions recently concerning reports and the giving of information. I think it is a deplorable fact that we must spend time in the committee of supply on these estimates trying to draw out information that ought to be available to hon. members long before they reach this stage of debate or this final stage of the session. If we are to do our duty in respect of these estimates it will be necessary to ask for certain information, but I want to place the responsibility for our having to ask for that information at this stage and in this committee squarely upon the shoulders of the minister, because the report of his department for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1949, has not been made available to hon. members. The last report from that department is the one for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1948, twenty months ago. The last fiscal year ended eight months ago. How much time is required to get out and to circulate these annual reports?

Section 11 of the Department of National Health and Welfare Act, chapter 22 of the statutes for 1944-45, states:

> The minister shall submit annually a report to parliament in such form as may be prescribed by the governor in council.

That is to be done annually. Apparently the minister's idea is that he will submit the report to the next session of parliament, at which time it will be stale. I put the responsibility squarely upon the minister for failing to make available to members of parliament the report of his department for the fiscal year which closed eight months ago. We do not want any more excuses about the difficulty of having the printing done. Surely eight months is ample time to print all the reports of government departments. If it becomes impossible for the government, working at its lethargic pace, to have these reports printed, then certainly their minimum duty is to provide reports in another form which would not take as much time. There is a great deal of information an annual report contains which should be available to all members. Because of the default of the government in carrying out a plain duty, that report is not available.

The other suggestion, looking to the saving of time at this stage of the session and in this committee of supply, has reference to reports of expenditures over the year. For the last six sessions I have raised this question with the present minister, pointing out to him that before the estimates of his department pass we wish to know item by item, and in the aggregate, the expenditure of the department in the last year. We are given in the volume of estimates the appropriations for the year. This is a young department, and one can understand its difficulty in coming close in its estimates. We hope the department has now developed to the point where the estimates will be much closer and more accurate than they have been in times past.

To save time, I am asking the minister if he will give this committee of supply, before we leave the first item, the actual expenditures in the last fiscal year, item by item, so that it will not be necessary for us to rise on every item and ask the minister what the expenditures on that item have been in the last fiscal year.

Mr. Coldwell: Mr. Chairman, like the hon. member who has just taken his seat, I intend to be brief. I, too, join with other hon. members in saying how pleased I was last evening to hear the minister's statement that some important discoveries had been made for the relief of arthritis, one of the great scourges in our country. I am hoping that that discovery will fan out to other incurable diseases of a similar nature which have caused untold misery and suffering among so many of our people for long periods of time.

This is a very important department. Like the hon. member for Eglinton, I too hope that during the lifetime of this parliament we may have a comprehensive plan of health benefits placed before the house for its consideration. Unlike the hon. member, I do not believe that we should fight shy of consideration of a completely socialized medical and health plan. I noticed his reference to Great Britain and New Zealand. Well, we shall know more of the working out of those plans in the course of the next few years. Although I did not bring it with me, I remember reading a statement made to a meeting of the medical profession in my own province by a well-known British doctor that was far from critical of all details of the plan in effect in Great Britain. I have followed closely the reaction of medical men and of the people generally in Great Britain. One point we should consider is that no matter what government may be in power in Great Britain after the next election, the popularity of the health plan inaugurated by the Labour government will be continued. The opposition party is pledged to expand rather than contract it. I have placed before the house on previous occasions evidence to show that doctors who were opposed to it when it was established are now speaking favourably of the plan.

I do not want to read any of these opinions at this stage of the session, because I do not think they would be of material interest in connection with the problem we are now discussing. What I really rose to say was this. We may talk about health plans all we wish; we may talk about advances in medical science; we may talk about the benefits conferred by a national health plan of medical aid and hospitalization, but after all, we must build up the health of the people right from the ground. In other words, we have to start by seeing that the children of this country are healthy and well fed. I have very high regard for the minister's interest in these particular matters. Interested as his department is in nutrition, I think the minister should place every pressure upon his colleagues in the cabinet and upon the various departments of government concerned so that there will be work for those who need work, help for those who cannot work; so that families will not be faced with undernourishment, which creates the greatest and most permanent difficulty in the field of health.

[Mr. Coldwell.]

I have in my hand a clipping which I took from the Ottawa Citizen of the night before last. It is dated from Halifax, Nova Scotia, and reads:

> Increasing numbers of undernourished children attending Halifax schools is causing city health and welfare officials serious concern, a civic official said yesterday.
> Doctor R. G. Rice, director of child health for city schools, told the public health and welfare committee the situation was a result of poor economic conditions in many Halifax homes. The high price of milk had caused it to disappear from many tables in the city.
> Breakfast was the poorest meal of the day for many children, he added. "A surprising number of children come to school with no breakfast at all; others have only tea and toast."

Yesterday we were discussing the international children's relief fund. I warmly supported our contribution to that fund, but I said that while I believed in relieving distress among people beyond our borders, I thought that charity should begin at home and that we should see that something was done for the undernourished children of this country. The statistics show that because of the high cost of living, which has been made greater by increased rents, thousands of children are undernourished.

I do hope that a national health plan will not be delayed on the excuse that we have not sufficient hospitals, that we have not sufficient hospital beds, that we have not sufficient doctors or sufficient nurses. If we wait for all these we shall not put into effect the kind of national health plan that we need. I do not think we should wait until we have hospital accommodation and facilities. Indeed I think public opinion will support the building of hospitals and medical institutions and other facilities as they become more aware of the fact that they are needed. Once we begin to root out the people who need treatment in these institutions, public opinion will become aware of the necessity of providing greater appropriations for the hospital and medical facilities that we need.

I ask the minister not to delay this. Let us go forward. Let this parliament and this government fulfil the promise made in the Liberal manifesto which the hon. member for Eglinton read, so that we may have a national health plan. I should like to see that national health plan a part of a general social security plan. I am not sold on the piecemeal idea of saying: Let us have national health insurance on a contributory basis, or: Let us have old age pensions on a contributory basis. What we need is a comprehensive social security plan on a contributory basis providing for unemployment relief, family allowances, old age pensions, health and the other social security measures that we need.

The world is moving fast in that direction. I am not afraid to advocate what is sometimes called the welfare state. I know that that term has been used as a term of ridicule by the opponents of measures of this kind, but if we go back into the history of free peoples for the last fifty or one hundred years we find that as people became more secure in their jobs, with old age pensions at the end, with better health and all the rest of it, the efficiency of the individual and of industry has increased, apart altogether from the improvement in the field of health and the greater happiness of mankind. This is the main thing for governments to consider.

I know it is sometimes said that these social security measures would give the people a great deal of leisure, that they would not have to think so much of the future and it would therefore undermine initiative, and all the rest of it. Looking back over history I see that those within the British commonwealth, many men and women, who contributed to our culture, many of the great poets, the great writers, the great painters, the great thinkers and the great political leaders, were not faced with economic insecurity. Very largely they were people who were economically secure, both in their productive years and at the end of their lives. Consequently I think that this is one problem this parliament must face; it is one obligation that must be assumed, to see to it that we have a national security plan, and as part of that plan I would give priority at the present time to an all-inclusive national health plan.

Mr. Gillis: Mr. Chairman, I feel that in the field of health the federal government is doing all that can be done within the terms of the constitution. While health grants are made by the federal government to the provinces, many of the provinces have not the funds with which to take advantage of them, because they are contingent upon the provinces being in position to put up dollar for dollar with the federal government. I am glad the government has seen fit to take steps to amend our constitution because I have been of the opinion for a long time that those in authority provincially, and who have had the responsibility for social security measures without having the funds to provide them, were very shortsighted in wanting to maintain their jurisdiction to take care of the poor, the maimed and the afflicted, without being in a position to do very much about it. In the time that the health program mapped out by the federal government has been in operation, it has done very little to take care of the people actually affected.

So far most of the grants have been utilized in the expansion of hospital bed space. So far as my own province is concerned, and I think it is true of the whole of Canada, there is not much use building hospitals, training nurses and providing specialists if the people who are afflicted are unable to pay for these services. There is not much use improving, as they did, the Halifax general hospital and at the same time fixing the rates at $6 to $12 a day thereby making it impossible for ninety per cent of the people of that province to get into the hospital. That is something that will have to be corrected. I am reliably informed that some of the provinces have suggested to the minister that the federal government is placing them on the spot by offering certain amounts of money to be matched by the provinces for the purpose of expanding this program. That is positive proof we are not going to make the progress in national health we desire to make until such time as constitutional arrangements are made which will enable the federal government to put into operation the measures for which appropriations are made.

Last night I listened with a great deal of attention to the statement of the minister as to the development of new drugs, and I also read very carefully his statement in the press. I believe that the minister, as a layman in the field of medicine, feels that great progress is going to be made, particularly in the treatment of arthritis. In the section of the country from which I come, anyone who has worked for any length of time in heavy industry, particularly in the mines, is afflicted with some form of arthritis, rheumatism or allied diseases. Changing temperatures, heavy work and injuries from time to time bring that about. I know that the mining section of the north is affected in the same way.

I am sceptical whether the development of new drugs under the present plan will bring much relief to those who suffer from that affliction. In the great majority of cases those who suffer are unable to pay for specialized treatment. Drugs of that description are going to be expensive, and if they are going to be handed over to the drug manufacturers of North America, one of the biggest combines on the continent, after their development by the expenditure of public funds for research, very little of these drugs is going to trickle through to those who cannot afford them. The same thing applies to streptomycin and penicillin. They are expensive drugs, and in the great majority of cases those who need them most, and cannot pay for them, do not receive them. While we are taking the initial steps in the development of the two new drugs mentioned by the minister, with all their potentialities in the field of medicine, I hope the government will also see that the formulas for these drugs are kept as the property of the Canadian government until such time as a price can be arranged to fit the incomes of people who may be in need of that particular form of treatment. There is no use developing them unless they are going to be made available to the people who suffer. I know that with all the talk you hear about developments in the field of medicine—

Mr. Hosking: May I ask a question?

Mr. Gillis: Yes.

Mr. Hosking: Do you say the same thing about insulin?

Mr. Gillis: Certainly I say the same thing about insulin.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): You should not.

Mr. Gillis: What I say is that if the government is going to provide public funds for research, once the formula is perfected, once tests are made and the drug is marketable, the government should see to it that its price is kept within the reach of the average person who may be in need of it. That applies to insulin or any other drug on the market where public funds were used to develop it. When I was interrupted I was about to say that I have taken an active interest all my life in the field of medicine. In the section of the country from which I come we developed our own scheme of co-operative medicine forty years ago. We hired our doctors on a panel system. We signed contracts with them and fixed the price for their services, including drugs, operations and everything else connected therewith. I helped to develop that system. We built our own hospitals and staffed them. The hospital boards consisted of members of the medical profession, mine workers and steel workers. We had the eight-hour day for our nurses a long time before it was ever thought of in similar institutions. I will say without fear of contradiction that medical services today in that particular part of the country were never at such a low level as they are at the present time.

Instead of building up and taking advantage of the advances that have been made, a deterioration has set in. Right at the present time the system of contracts and the arrangements we had, which I thought were very fine, are going by the board. Wrangling is going on in the community at the present time as to the fees for the medical profession and the price of drugs. In my opinion it has all come about because there has not been any supervision of the cost of drugs in this country. The du Pont company in the United States fixes the price of drugs for the whole continent. That is why I say that drugs now being developed under government supervision should be carefully handled as to price and everything else so that people who suffer may have the advantage of them without the drug manufacturers fixing the price and using these drugs for commercial purposes rather than for suffering humanity.

Another suggestion I made ten years ago, and which I followed up from time to time, had to do with research in the field of silicosis. The mining districts of the north country are particularly bad. There was some talk about it in the house a few years ago but it has died out. Five years ago there was a lot of research being done. When I raised the question I was told the compensation boards were carrying on research, the Rockefeller institute was carrying on research, and everybody else was carrying on research. But nothing has come out of it. There are men in the north country particularly, and to some extent in the coal mining districts, forty or forty-five years of age, who are relegated to the scrap heap because they are suffering from that particular disability. There is nothing worse, and nothing is being done about it. The minister has in his department a small branch concerned with industrial hygiene.

Mr. Martin: They are working on that all the time.

Mr. Gillis: We do not hear a word about it.

Mr. Martin: We have not succeeded in getting all that we want.

Mr. Gillis: That does not do people very much good when they are suffering from that disability and have no means of livelihood. It is a compensable disease under the workmen's compensation acts of the different provinces. But just try to prove you have silicosis! It is rather difficult to make it stick for compensation purposes. I know the minister has not much control over that, but intensive research should be carried on as to that particular angle.

Mr. Martin: It is being done.

Mr. Gillis: Then don't hide it. Tell the people it is being done, publicize it, and give some hope to those who may be suffering from this disease.

My main reason for rising at this time was to focus attention on the fact that while I am sure the minister means well, when he gets up and tells us relief may be in sight for thousands of people in this country who suffer from arthritis I cannot help but think that when that drug is perfected a very small percentage of the people afflicted with arthritis will get the benefit of it if Mr. du Pont and company get hold of it and are permitted to fix their own price. That is all I have to say now, though I have many questions to ask as we go through the estimates.

Mr. Fleming: Has the minister nothing to say about the subject under discussion?

Mr. Martin: I thought the most convenient way might be to deal with it on the next item.

Mr. Fleming: If the minister is not going to deal with that now, is he going to give us the expenditures by items; or must we go through the senseless rigmarole of asking for this information under each item?

Mr. Martin: What was the question?

Mr. Fleming: For the third time the question is, will the minister give the expenditures by items for the last fiscal year?

Mr. Martin: I will give them as we come to the items; that is the best way.

Mr. Fleming: Then we will just have to waste time asking for that information on each individual item.

There is one other matter on this first item; that is, these expenditures for educational and informational publicity, to give them their euphonious title. The estimates for this purpose which the minister is asking parliament to approve amount to $445,600 for this fiscal year, whereas the amount for last year was $413,640. Will the minister give the total expenditures under these items? Has he the total of the expenditures on educational and informational publicity scattered through the various branches?

Mr. Martin: It was $344,000.

Mr. Fleming: Then you are $100,000 up on that this year.

Mr. McLure: I want to ask just one question, and I think this is the proper place to ask it. On other occasions I have brought to the attention of the minister one class of people in my own constituency, and also throughout Canada; I refer to the incapacitated.

Mr. Martin: Could we deal with that when we come to the welfare item?

Mr. McLure: Very well.

Item agreed to.

National health branch—health services—

253. National health branch—administration, $126,015.

Mr. Fleming: The minister has not given the expenditures under the previous item and this item.

Mr. Martin: The expenditures were $657,660.23; unliquidated commitments, $19,-799.19; total commitments, $677,459.42.

Mr. Fleming: That figure is for item 252, I presume. I should like the same information for item 253.

Mr. Martin: The expenditure was $498,-692.98; unliquidated, $4,462.94; total commitments, $503,155.92.

Mr. Fleming: That cannot be right. That sounds like the expenditures under item 254, but I asked for the figures for item 253.

Mr. Martin: I am sorry, you are right. For item 253 the figures are as follows: Expenditures, $106,788.10; unliquidated, $30,577.20; total commitments, $137,365.30.

Mr. Fleming: Perhaps the minister could indicate why, eight months after the close of the fiscal year, he should still find it necessary to set up amounts for unliquidated commitments.

Mr. Martin: That was at the end of the year.

Mr. Fleming: But is the information not up to date on these items now?

Mr. Martin: As up to date as I can get it.

Item agreed to.

255. Proprietary or patent medicines, $26,585.

Mr. Fleming: Expenditures?

Mr. Martin: Expenditures, $23,606.26; unliquidated, $32.70; total commitments, $23,638.96.

Item agreed to.

256. Opium and narcotic drugs, $139,860.

Mr. Fleming: Expenditures? I have to ask this on every item because the minister would not give this information at one time.

Mr. Martin: This is the only department with which this is ever done, but I am prepared to accommodate my hon. friend. I will do anything he asks, because I like him. Expenditure, $130,560.55; unliquidated commitments, $156.94; total commitments, $130,717.49.

Item agreed to.

257. Quarantine and leprosy, $272,797.

Mr. Blair: Could we have this broken down?

Mr. Martin: Expenditures, $255,205.20; mitments, $156.94; total commitments, $258,431.46.

Mr. Blair: I wanted to know if the minister could break down the expenditures as between quarantine and leprosy. I want to know how many lepers there are and the cost of their maintenance.

Mr. Martin: There are nine at the moment, seven at Tracadie—

Mr. Blair: How much do they cost?

Mr. Martin: $11,000 at Tracadie, and between $4,000 and $5,000 at Bentinck island.

Mr. Fleming: I think a good many hon. members will wonder why it should be necessary to maintain these two establishments, one on the east coast and the other on the west coast, and why it should be necessary to maintain the establishment on the west coast simply to provide for two lepers, one of whom I understand is an out-patient who is thought to be practically cured. The hon. member for Nanaimo recently asked some questions concerning expenditures on the leprosy hospital at Bentinck island, British Columbia, and the return to his questions indicates that substantial expenditures are being made there, in effect for the benefit of one in-patient and one out-patient, while at the same time a similar station is maintained on the east coast for seven lepers. Here is the information contained in this return, sessional paper No. 164. The first question was:

> How many patients are cared for at the leper station, Bentinck island, British Columbia?

The answer was two. The next question was:

> How many attendants and other persons are employed at Bentinck island, and what are their salaries?

The reply was two; one at a salary of $2,280 and the other at a salary of $2,240. The next question was:

> What was the cost of maintaining Bentinck island, including heating, lighting, etc., during the past year?

The answer given by the Department of National Health and Welfare to that question was $5,607.78, and it was pointed out that this did not include heating costs, which were met by the Department of Public Works.

Mr. Martin: That is right.

Mr. Fleming: The Department of Public Works replied that the heating costs were $2,300 for the year. Questions 4 and 5, which were answered by the Department of Public Works, were these:

> 4. What improvements have been made in the accommodation, lighting plant and landing stage during the last two years?
> 5. What was the cost of these improvements?

I shall not weary the house with the full details contained in the reply, but I believe the house would be interested in some comparative figures. In the fiscal year 1947-48, the amounts expended were $3,750.12 and $675; in the fiscal year 1948-49, the expenditures amounted to $559.71. Then, sir, in the fiscal year 1949-50—bear in mind, sir, that there are just two patients there, and there is a similar institution on the east coast in which these unfortunate persons could be accommodated—these are the expenditures:

Fiscal year 1949-50

General repairs and painting of nurses' residence	$2,075
Modernizing caretaker's residence	4,435
New electrical fixtures for nurses' and caretaker's residences	100
General repairs and painting exterior of patients' cottages and outbuildings	2,046
Removing the old wood and coal heating plants in the nurses' and caretaker's residences, and installing oil burners including an oil burner in the kitchen stove at a cost of	2,645
Purchase of new kitchen range for nurses' residence	150
Providing and erecting link wire fencing complete with gates, etc., at blind patients' cottages	420

There is a total of over $11,000 for improvements during the present fiscal year, at a station which is providing for the needs of two unfortunate lepers. My friend will say that all these expenditures were made by the Department of Public Works, but I think he will agree that the Department of Public Works would not make those expenditures unless it was the policy of the Department of National Health and Welfare to maintain that station.

Mr. Martin: That is right.

Mr. Fleming: We are all moved with sympathy for the lot of these unfortunate lepers, and we are not going to be penny-pinching in our provision for them. But why is it necessary to make improvements on a station on the west coast for the benefit of two lepers, when there is ample accommodation for them on the east coast?

Mr. Martin: I can only say that my hon. friend has stated the case correctly. Those expenditures were made. If he will recall, two years ago I was criticized, and correctly so, for the condition of the station in British Columbia. I have no other defence to offer. I did not create the disease of leprosy. It is an unfortunate condition, and we are doing all we can to isolate it, and isolate the people who have it. We are trying to make them as comfortable as possible. That is the only defence one can offer, and that is the only defence I have to offer.

Mr. Fleming: Has the minister given thought to moving them to the east coast?

Mr. Martin: Yes, consideration has been given to that, but my technical officers advised against it.

Mr. Fleming: Why?

Mr. Martin: Because of the character of the disease; I would sooner have a separate place maintained for the care of these two people than be responsible for risking the spread of the disease.

Mr. Fleming: Is the objection to moving these two lepers from the west coast to the east coast because of the danger of the spread of the disease if they come in contact with other people?

Mr. Martin: I took the same position my friend takes, but the technical advisers in my department, and the department of health, have strongly advised against it.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): There is great danger of an epidemic of leprosy being started in the cities on the Pacific coast. On the other side of the Pacific ocean, the cities are alive with leprosy. It is all very well for someone in Ontario, protected by good hospitals, to object to this state of affairs, but it is a different matter if you are from the west coast. There could be an outbreak of leprosy. You might as well condemn the fire department because you do not have a fire one month. I hope the minister will maintain that station, and make it efficient, because he does not know when there will be an epidemic of that terrible disease, which modern medicine is steadily stamping out.

Mr. Blair: It would be interesting to know how many patients have been at that station, on an average, over the last ten years. I understand that a good deal of work is being done on leprosy in the United States, but those people are allowed to mix freely with others. I can understand the danger of contagion if those lepers have to travel, but I do not hold the view of the minister that there would be danger of an epidemic. This disease is rapidly being brought under control, and I think the time has come when we could concentrate these people in one institution. It would save some expense.

Mr. Martin: I thought I had the figures showing the average number of patients over the years. There were about four people involved, on the average.

Item agreed to.

258. Laboratory of hygiene, $340,014.

Mr. Fleming: Will the minister give us the expenditures under this item?

Mr. Martin: The expenditures amount to $272,348.34; the unliquidated commitments, $4,662.52; and the total commitments, $277,-010.86.

Item agreed to.

259. Immigration medical inspection, $842,773.

Mr. Fleming: Will the minister state the expenditures?

Mr. Martin: The expenditures amounted to $779,279.07; unliquidated commitments, $912.04; and the total commitments, $780,-279.07.

Mr. Wright: This item covers the services of doctors who are in Europe inspecting immigrants before those people come to this country?

Mr. Martin: Yes.

Mr. Wright: How much has been spent on these doctors in Europe, and what is the number of doctors involved?

Mr. Martin: There are about 23 doctors, and their average pay is between $5,400 and $6,000.

Mr. Wright: That just gives me the salaries; what are the expenditures?

Mr. Martin: I do not have the amount broken down that way.

Mr. Fleming: In connection with this item, the answer given by the minister as to last year's expenditure indicates that, with the supplementary estimates contained in votes Nos. 692 and 834, there will be an additional expenditure this year of something in the neighbourhood of $160,000 for this service. It appears that the flow of immigrants to this country is somewhat reduced this year as compared with last year, but it may be that, by reason of the considerable number of displaced persons entering, the proportionate expenditure on medical expenses has increased.

Mr. Martin: The biggest item in this expenditure was the equipping of Rockhead hospital.

Mr. Fleming: Is the balance of the expenditure approximately the same as last year, that is for the routine inspection of immigrants?

Mr. Martin: Yes, roughly.

Item agreed to.

260. Child and maternal health, $96,005.

Mr. Knowles: Will the minister give a brief description of the work that is done in connection with child and maternal health?

Mr. Martin: Yes. As my hon. friend is aware, the well-known book "The Canadian Mother and Child" is perhaps one of the most popular, not merely of its kind, but the most popular book in Canada. It now has a circulation of well over a million copies. While one would not want to attribute to that book the reduction in the infant mortality rate, the reduction in the maternal mortality rate, as well as the greater interest taken in post and pre-natal care, nevertheless it is admitted by all health authorities that the book has had a considerable influence.

Another book is now in the process of being printed to cover the next age group of children. The division seeks to co-ordinate plans and co-operate with the provincial departments of health, both those that have separate child and maternal divisions, and those that have not but have officers who concern themselves with that aspect of the problem, in the hope not only of furthering the work of education among parents, children, school teachers and the like, but of formulating actual plans in some of the provinces. Actually Dr. Couture, who is the head of this division, has spent a good part of the past year in the actual organization of one of these divisions in one of the provincial departments. I think this is work that will commend itself to the committee. The general description that I have given indicates its character.

Some of the films that have recently been receiving a good bit of attention both here and in the United States, such as "The Feeling of Rejection" and "The Feeling of Hostility," were prepared in co-operation with Dr. Stodgill, who is the director of the mental health division of the department. Other films having to do with subjects such as nutrition receive the collaborative effort of the child and maternal division. From these general observations I think my hon. friend will appreciate the character of the work, while still admitting that there is a great deal yet to be done. The expenditures are $59,283.30; unliquidated commitments $5,589.45, total $64,870.75.

Mr. Knowles: Can the minister indicate the ages covered by the publication "The Canadian Mother and Child"? Also, can he indicate the ages to be covered by the new publication to which he referred?

Mr. Martin: The first book "The Canadian Mother and Child" deals with infants; the second publication now being printed covers the ages one to six.

Item agreed to.

261. Public health engineering, $158,640.

Mr. Gillis: Can the minister tell us how the sick mariners' fund is administered?

Mr. Martin: That is the next item. I shall give the expenditures for this item. Expenditures, $127,429.66; unliquidated commitments, $1,791.96; total commitments, $129,221.62.

Item agreed to.

[Mr. Martin.]

262. Treatment of sick mariners, $524,610.

Mr. Gillis: How is this fund administered? Is it contributed to by the shipping companies?

Mr. Martin: Yes.

Mr. Gillis: And also by the provincial governments?

Mr. Martin: Not by the provincial governments. Sick mariners' dues are collected at the rate of two cents per ton on a vessel's registered tonnage. The duty is collectable not more than three times in each year. Duties are collected on the same tonnage rate as at the beginning of confederation when the act began to operate. From 1867 to 1942 the duties collected and the expenditure were approximately equal. However, since 1942 the deficit has been steadily increasing. And that is due chiefly to the increasing number seeking medical attention.

Mr. Gillis: Is it compulsory for all shipping companies to contribute to the fund?

Mr. Martin: Yes.

Mr. Fleming: On this point the Auditor General has some comments to make that I think should receive attention. I interject that this is a report of the Auditor General for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1949. We have not the report of the department for that year. At page 6 the Auditor General says this about the treatment of sick mariners:

> 23. Expenditures in connection with sick mariners were approximately $475,000, while levies assessed on shipping produced $225,000. The disparity illustrates the consequence when legislation sets a fixed rather than a flexible scale of levy to recover the cost of a service. Since confederation, it has been public policy to provide for the care of sick mariners and to assess shipping for the cost. Collections have been credited to revenue and expenditures charged to an annual appropriation.

Then he quotes section 305 of the Canada Shipping Act, to which the minister referred, and proceeds:

> Up to five years ago, total levies collected had been adequate to offset costs, but since then costs have exceeded income by about $800,000. This has been mainly due to (a) higher cost of services, and (b) more crew members receiving treatment. Twenty years ago 6 per cent of ships' crews received treatment during a year; the rate is now 20 per cent.
> 24. The extent to which treatment is provided at public expense for crews of vessels of 33 tons and under, most of which are fishing boats, is an illustration of the inadequacy of the levy rate. These boats pay dues of $2 a year; departmental statistics indicate that expenditures average about $36 a boat. With respect to larger vessels, mostly those engaged in transocean shipping, expenditures also exceed revenues, the ratio being about three to two. Audit query elicited information to the effect that the question is under review by departmental officers.

Mr. Martin: What the Auditor General says is quite true. The reason is of course that our fishermen cannot afford to pay, and one is faced with the obligation of deciding whether or not, because they cannot pay, they should be denied the best of medical attention. That is the problem: Expenditures, $474,291.60; unliquidated commitments, $353.95; total commitments, $474,645.55.

Item agreed to.

263. Industrial health, $125,180.

Mr. Fleming: Expenditures?

Mr. Martin: Expenditures, $89,940.03; unliquidated commitments, $10,768.35; total commitments $100,708.38.

Item agreed to.

264. Civil service health, $202,709.

Mr. Fleming: Expenditures?

Mr. Fleming: Expenditures?

Mr. Martin: Expenditures, $35,362.06; unliquidated commitments, $6.25; total, $35,368.31.

Mr. Fleming: I have a question on this item which would not have been necessary if we had the department's report for last year. Can the minister give us an indication as to the trend in the number of cases of venereal disease reported? The last existing report of the department indicated on page 154—that is the report for the year ended March 31, 1948—that a high point was reached in the number of such cases reported in the year 1946. There was a substantial reduction in 1947. Has that downward trend continued in the subsequent years?

Mr. Martin: Yes. The picture is better now than ever. Of course one must attribute much of this decline to the recent greatly increased use of penicillin, but the secondary reason is, of course, the grants-in-aid for control work, particularly the former. The report for the third quarter of 1949 shows, in comparison with the previous quarter, a reduction of 332 reported cases of total syphilis.

Mr. Fleming: That is just one disease.

Mr. Martin: Compared with the same quarter one year ago there is a net decrease of 378 cases of all types of venereal disease, or 5·7 per cent made up principally of 323 cases of syphilis and 50 cases of gonorrhoea.

Mr. Fleming: Has the minister figures for the total number of V.D. cases reported in the year 1948?

Mr. Martin: Yes. In 1946 the total V.D. reported was 41,556; in 1947 it was 33,476 and in 1948 the figure is 27,491.

267. Health insurance studies, $56,451.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, I think we will not try to rush over this too quickly. I should hope the minister might make an extended statement telling us what progress is being made in the study of health insurance, and when we may expect that study to be implemented by legislation.

Mr. Martin: I was hoping that we might pass this item, and deal with that matter at the end.

Mr. Knowles: I would remind the minister that when we were discussing the general item I wanted to discuss this matter with him at that time, but he suggested that we wait until we reached item 267. We have now reached that item, and I suggest it should be discussed now.

Mr. Graydon: I guess the minister has to make a speech.

Some hon. Members: Later.

Mr. Knowles: There seems to be a lot of prorogationitis around here. When we were on the general item, although some of us spoke about it, the minister did not discuss this matter of health insurance. We were asked to wait until we reached item 267, and I suggest the statement should now be made.

Mr. Martin: I suppose it could be made as well now as any other time—and I must say the committee has been most co-operative. I have already stated this session the policy of the government regarding this matter. I am prepared to do it again, but in doing that I am merely covering grounds which have already been covered.

I would remind the committee of the general proposals made by the government to the provinces in 1945. The national health program announced by the prime minister a year and a half ago effectively implemented three out of four of the proposals then laid before the provinces. Those proposals, in respect of a national health program, may be divided into three categories.

The first was that we were prepared to give money to the provinces—then nine, and now ten of them—to enable these provinces to make a survey of their health facilities, and to plan what they consider necessary for future development in their particular jurisdictions. We have had two meetings with all the survey committees of the provinces in Ottawa. We are having a third meeting on January 12, and I am hoping that at that meeting we shall have a fairly comprehensive progress report from most of the provinces.

I can say now that I know, from advance information which has come to hand, that that information will not be complete in all provinces. I have no jurisdiction, nor would I have any disposition to try to exert any pressure on the provinces to hasten their work. The job they have undertaken at our expense has been a colossal one.

We hope to have on January 12 or thereabouts, as I say, comprehensive, if not in some instances final, reports from provinces on the surveys they have been conducting.

In addition to that, when we come to the national health grants—and I was not being supercilious when I suggested that we should discuss the matter there, because I think perhaps that would be the best place to do it—I can show the very great amount of preparatory work that is being done under the national health plan, and its tremendous achievements to date.

Let us take the one field of hospital construction. When the plan was announced we said that our objective was to see built in this country 40,000 hospital beds in the next five years. It was stated in the house that that was an impossible assignment, that it could not be done. I am in the happy position today of being able to say that, partly as a result of this plan, and the attitude and co-operation of the provinces since the plan was announced, there are under construction or are completed 18,500 additional hospital beds in Canada. That is no mean achievement, and there is no country in the world that has exceeded this record under this or any similar plan.

When we come to these grants we shall be able to show how we have assisted the provinces in setting up further health units and mental health clinics. The hon. member for Cape Breton South has talked about his province, as he properly should, although not with that complete accuracy we always expect him to display. I may tell him that in his province a number of public health units have been created under this plan, and mental health clinics, hospital beds, equipment for mental institutions and assistance for professional training—that same whole series of achievements has gone on throughout the country.

For instance let us consider the county of Carleton. Up until the time of this plan it had no health unit. There are a number of health units in the province. The health unit is the basis of the attempt to try to give good, daily health services of a preventive nature in the communities. The health unit in the county of Carleton has been established as a result of contributions made under the federal health plan to the province on behalf of the county.

One could go on, as we perhaps will have to when we reach that item, to give the details in each province and the tremendous achievements which have been the result. When I say to the committee that we have dealt with nearly 1,600 health projects, one will get some idea of the achievements, which can truly be described as more than satisfactory.

In the national health program, which represents an extra outlay of more than $17 million a year, we have gone further than the proposals of 1945-46 to the extent of hospital construction grants, to the extent of cancer control grants, to the extent of an increase in professional training grants and research grants. When one is discussing this subject one must not forget the important departure made in May of 1948 from the type of proposals originally stated by the government in 1945.

When the former prime minister on May 14, 1948, announced to the house a national health program he said that it represented also the first stages in the development of a comprehensive health insurance plan for all Canada. The hospitals being built and health services being created and extended with federal aid would have the added advantage —and I am now quoting the former prime minister——"of being fundamental prerequisites of a nation-wide system of health insurance."

The federal government stands ready, when satisfactory understandings are reached for co-operation with the provinces, to give financial support to provincial health insurance programs. With regard to this plan as a prerequisite to health insurance, I shall quote what the prime minister said a year ago:

It is up to the people and the government in each province to take the initiative in working out health insurance plans in line with their local conditions and their traditions.

I do not think anyone can quarrel with that statement. As one surveys the whole field in this country, and recognizing that under the constitution health is primarily the responsibility of the provinces, if one is going to achieve a satisfactory measure of hospital and medical care and health insurance on what will be a responsible basis—not a basis that will destroy the integrity and autonomy of the medical profession which I think is most important—one has to take into account the character and development of Canada.

That is the policy of the government. That is the policy being pursued daily. That is the policy being discussed biannually with the provinces when they sit down with the dominion to discuss health and kindred matters. It is a problem we have in our minds and which will be resolved when we reach that state when in line with their wishes and in line with present preparations we are able to make our plans effective.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, I think the minister's speech might have better been made on item 276, but perhaps that should not detract from the praise he sought to give to what has been done in the way of constructing hospital accommodation and the providing of grants to provinces for various medical matters. But may I say to him: What use is it to have 18,500 new hospital beds if Canadians who are ill cannot afford to get into them?

The fundamental problem in dealing with health and hospital and medical care is wrapped up in this question of health insurance. I would hope that the minister will tell us what the $38,000 voted last year was used for, and for what purpose it is proposed to use the $56,000 we are being asked to vote this year. I know that every time this question is discussed there are those who say there is no use discussing health insurance until we have all the hospitals and facilities and personnel that we need. As a matter of fact, when we were on the first item I had something to say about what I felt were the three requisites of a proper health program. For one point I stressed the need of having the equipment and personnel that are necessary. Then my second point was the need of health insurance, and my third point had to do with sickness benefits. I did not at that time indicate the sequence in which I thought those should come, but I want to say now that I feel that health insurance should receive attention first.

Some people in this chamber like to talk about the law of supply and demand. It seems to me that if we had health insurance and if people could afford the hospital and medical care they required, an effective demand would be created which should stimulate the government to provide the hospitals and services that are needed. Actually that is the way it has worked to a limited extent through the various Blue Cross plans which are in effect across this country. The more people there are with some means to pay for hospital care, the more hospital beds have been provided. I feel that that is the point in the whole health program to which the government should be giving more strict attention than seems to be the case.

I want to join with the hon. member for Eglinton in asking how the vote was expended last year. The minister knows that for two or three years the portion of the amount voted that has been expended has been so small as to make it look as though not much was being done.

Mr. Martin: There is more now than ever before.

Mr. Knowles: Perhaps the minister will tell me the amount right now.

Mr. Martin: Perhaps it might be more convenient if I gave that information just before the item passes. If I gave it to the hon. member now he might speak longer.

Mr. Knowles: But if the minister waits until I am through I may speak again. The minister boasted about the proposals that had been made in the green books of 1945. I am a little surprised at his mentioning those green book proposals. It is for us to point out to the government how slow they are in implementing those proposals. The minister referred to the grants that are being paid under the announcement made by the former prime minister in May, 1948, but may I remind him that for the first time in the estimates now before us those grants have got over the $30 million figure, whereas the proposals made in the green books of 1945 called for federal health expenditures of $150 million per year. The government is now making a grant of only 20 cents on the dollar of what it promised.

I am disturbed by what the minister said just now about throwing this business of health insurance back to the provinces. I wonder how long this thing is going to go on? In this country we live from one dominion-provincial conference to another. Whether it blows up or whether it succeeds, the best we can hope for is another dominion-provincial meeting.

Mr. Martin: I think my hon. friend will admit that I am no less interested in this subject than he is, but I have the responsibility of trying to push it forward while he has the responsibility of pushing me forward. If he were in my place would he do anything that would make it impossible to get agreement with those who under the constitution have the prime responsibility for this very matter?

Mr. Knowles: I certainly would not stand up here at a time when we are trying to move in the direction of federal responsibility for social security and say that I think it should be done by the provinces. What is the use of the government asking for the power to amend the British North America Act? What is the use of talking about a national over-all scheme of social security if the minister is going to say to the provinces: "We think that so far as health insurance is concerned you should handle it because your responsibility includes the field of health."

Mr. Martin: Don't make it difficult for me because we are going to have to sit down to discuss this one of these days.

Mr. Knowles: I may have to do exactly what the minister said it was my job to do. I may have to push him along a little bit.

Mr. Martin: Don't shove me off the precipice.

Mr. Knowles: The minister has lost a little weight—working so hard, no doubt—so he should not be so hard to push. This business of going back to the green books of 1945 and doing nothing about it, this business of talking about meetings with the provinces and putting health insurance back on the provinces, simply is not good enough. All political parties and all people realize that what we need is a national over-all security program. As my leader said a few moments ago, one of the best places to get started with that program is in the field of health insurance. I hope that we are not going to have the same ineffective answers that we have had during the past number of years.

I should like the minister to tell me how much was spent during the past year out of the $43,897 that was voted? Will he also give some description of the kind of work that was done and what have been the results of that work? Will the minister tell us what recommendations have been made and whether he is going to do anything about those recommendations?

Mr. Martin: The expenditures last year were $20,500.55, almost $16,000 more than the year before.

Mr. Knowles: Oh, oh.

Mr. Martin: My hon. friend laughs, but that represents personnel. He knows that that is important. It is all very well to make lofty speeches about these matters, but a point is reached some time when you have to carry through your planning and studies and that requires competent people. We have as director of our public health insurance studies perhaps the most eminent man in the field of public health in Canada, Dr. Jackson. Everyone admits that. Everyone knows Dr. Jackson's views. With him is associated Dr. Langlois, a graduate of one of the medical schools in the province of Quebec, who enjoys a very high reputation in that province. We also now have Dr. Wride who held a very important post in the department of health of the province of Saskatchewan up until about six months ago. My hon. friend will know how eminent a man Dr. Wride is. He has had a great interest in this particular field for years. I need only mention these three individuals to indicate the character of the studies that we are making in the department. The research division is playing an important part in this work. Frequent visits are made to the ten provincial departments of health and conferences are held with provincial health people. Studies, reports, estimates of costs, and so on, are continually under way for the purpose of bringing up to date material prepared earlier so that we shall be in a position to deal with this matter in the most efficient manner when that time arrives.

Mr. Knowles: What the minister has said makes some of us feel that it was worth while for us to take the time on former occasions to try to push him in this matter. If I have his figures more or less correctly, I gather that out of the $43,000 we voted last year some $20,000 odd was spent. He said that was about $16,000 more than the year before. The minister will remember in former years, when the department was spending only three or four thousand dollars out of $20,000 or $30,000 voted, we got after him pretty hard. I am glad to know he has brought it up to $20,000. I am also glad to know that he now wants $56,000 for the new year. Nevertheless it seems pertinent, inasmuch as the department spent only $20,000 out of $43,000 last year, to ask the question what it is they are anticipating for this year that requires nearly three times as much as they actually spent last year. I am not objecting to his wanting it. I am glad he wants it. But I want it spent because I want to get something done, and I think the minister should tell us what the $56,000 is for.

Mr. Martin: My hon. friend may know something of the difficulty I had in securing Dr. Jackson. He had been deputy minister of health for Manitoba for a long time, and it was not easy to urge a man who had been in the public service of that province to leave, particularly at his age and with the interests he had. He came to us only a short time ago, as did Dr. Wride and Dr. Langlois. These gentlemen and others in the department are doing very valuable work, but for the sake of time I will not mention them all. They have already started a program of surveys of their own for certain very good reasons, as well as for close collaborative effort with all of the departments. Dr. Jackson, Dr. Langlois, Dr. Layton and Dr.

Stodgill have been on the go continually outside the department in conferences in the capitals of the various provinces and in setting up adequate systems by which statistics and cost figures can be obtained, all of which are necessary in the development of any scheme that one may have in mind, and which one will deal with at the proper time.

Mr. Knowles: I assume these doctors have complete freedom in their research?

Mr. Martin: They have the most complete freedom.

Mr. Knowles: And that the minister will give serious consideration to the recommendations they make?

Mr. Martin: The minister certainly will.

Mr. Shaw: Realizing as I do the desire on the part of most, if not all, members to see the business of this session concluded at an early hour, I shall make an effort to limit my remarks to as few words as possible. In the light of circumstances to which I shall refer it would be rather difficult for me to justify my presence here if I did not bring before the minister, the house and the government at this time a problem which to me is a tragic and sordid picture, in fact appalling.

I refer to a band of approximately 320 Indians who are found in the district west, northwest and southwest of Rocky Mountain House in the province of Alberta. It includes approximately 120 Sunchild Cree Indians and approximately twenty Chippewa Indians, all of whom are treaty Indians, and a further band of approximately 200 Indians of the Chippewa tribe who have not accepted treaty. In what I am going to say this afternoon I want to make it perfectly clear that my principal purpose in speaking is to bring a problem before the minister rather than to level charges at the minister or at the government because of things which have not been done.

Speaking only recently in the United States the Minister of National Health and Welfare made one or two very significant observations which are closely related to this problem.

Mr. Martin: The minister always tries to make significant observations.

Mr. Graydon: That is what Vishinsky does.

Mr. Fleming: The minister does not always succeed.

Mr. Shaw: In one case the minister said:

> We are determined to keep abreast of the advances of medical science and to be impatient and intolerant of anything that debars our people from the best of health care.

The Indians are "our people". I want to emphasize that. Secondly the minister said:

> In our democracies any neglect of the citizen's right to health opportunity dishonours the concept on which our countries were founded—that we should organize society for the good of all.

These Indians would be included in the word "all". Thirdly the minister said that in surveys which had been made recently his department found some health statistics that gave little cause for pride. Unfortunately I am going to have to say later, when referring to certain statistics, that there is little cause for pride in the information which I will bring forward.

Finally, and this is most significant in the light of what I am going to say later, the minister made an interesting statement when speaking to the American Public Health Association on October 25. I am quoting from the Journal for October 26, and since part of these words are in quotation marks I presume they are designed to represent exactly what he said. This was the statement:

> Canada . . . is determined not to permit "lack of money to lead to neglect of health."

That neglect of health is not tied up to any specific group of people; I would rather look upon it as being all-embracing. In referring to this group of Indians I want to stress again that we have approximately 120 treaty Indians and some 200 non-treaty Indians. I realize that the 200 could go quite some distance toward having their problems solved were they prepared to accept the treaty, but there are a couple of very significant reasons why they have failed to do so, and I am going to have to mention those reasons a little later because they are tied in with this question of health.

It would alarm hon. members, I am sure, if I were to tell them that one-half the Indian children in that area never reach the age of sixteen. In the second place, it is asserted by reliable authorities that one-half the Indian babies born there are buried almost before they see the light of day. When the mobile clinic was in Rocky Mountain House a few months ago some of those Indians presented themselves for X-ray. Of those who presented themselves, thirty per cent had tuberculosis, either active or inactive. The doctors, who are very close to this problem, estimate that fifty per cent of all the Indians in that area have tuberculosis, either active or inactive. I have before me something that will be rather interesting, eight or ten admission reports relating to cases of Indians taken to the Charles Camsell Indian hospital in Edmonton. Each report is signed, and the ages of the Indians range from five years to thirty-four years.

I am not going into great detail but here, for example, is the card of a youngster five years old. The diagnosis is: far advanced; has apparently been ill for one year and failing steadily; worse in the last few months. Prognosis: hopeless. Here is the card of a boy sixteen years of age: far advanced; apparently ill for months but going downhill rapidly in the last two or three months. Prognosis: practically hopeless. Here is the card of an eleven year old child, which states that as nearly as they can determine this condition commenced in 1946, yet the child entered hospital only this year. I could go through all these admission reports and present a most appalling picture.

I might add to what I have said already that the doctors advise me that of all the Indians in that area who presented themselves for military service during the war, not one was passed as physically fit. There are no statistics I can get hold of that could be considered as reasonably reliable with respect to venereal disease, but here again the doctors who are on the spot advise me that the number affected is liable to run over fifty per cent, basing this estimate upon those who have come to them for other reasons.

[Mr. Shaw.]

Is it any wonder that I call this a tragic situation? Let us not forget that these people are human beings. Let us not forget that they love life, too. Let us not forget that they feel pain, as we do. Above all let us never forget that these Indian mothers and fathers love their children, too. Apart from that, however, they are an absolute menace to the white population among whom they circulate freely.

I have already said that some further assistance could be given 200 of these Indians if they would accept the treaty; but I doubt if any great advantage would accrue to them when I consider the conditions that exist among the 120 who are already treaty Indians. Even among those Indians the situation is appalling. These conditions, we know, result from a number of things including improper and inadequate housing which leads to pneumonia and other diseases. They have no definite employment; and there is no plan or properly executed enterprise with respect to these treaty Indians, though we have officials who are presumed to be looking after their interests. They have practically no educational opportunities; but above all else no satisfactory steps have been taken to conduct a comprehensive health survey in that area which to me is absolutely essential.

Mr. Martin: I wonder if I might say a word after which my hon. friend may not find it necessary to go a great deal further. He will recall bringing this matter to my attention earlier. As a result a survey was undertaken and a nurse is to be appointed. We had hoped to get her out there quickly, but she has to leave another post to follow up on that survey. I want to thank my hon. friend for bringing the matter to my attention. I can say also that arrangements have been made with the doctors there which I believe are satisfactory. Following my hon. friend's suggestions I think he will find that we are taking corrective action.

Mr. Shaw: No one is more delighted than I to hear that. I will not quibble over the fact that this action is long overdue. It has come; that is wonderful, and it certainly permits me to slice about seventy-five per cent off what I was going to say. But I tell the minister that in a few days I shall be going back to Alberta. A few days after that and for the succeeding days, weeks and months, I shall be in close touch with this problem. I shall go among these Indians and talk to the doctors and the nurse.

Mr. Martin: I hope you will keep me advised. If not, I shall go out there myself.

Mr. Shaw: That is fine; and from time to time I shall be back to let the minister know what further steps I believe should be taken. No one is more delighted than I that I am able to close my folder leaving unsaid seventy-five per cent of what I was going to say. Before resuming my seat, however, I want to get this quite clear. As the minister knows, we have been having a difficult time with respect to medical services.

Mr. Martin: Very difficult.

Mr. Shaw: I know Drs. Greenway and Laing, and they are one hundred per cent. They want to do a job, and they can do it; but they also want fair compensation for services rendered.

In conclusion, I should like to pay tribute to a man who is well known to the officials of the Indian affairs department here. I refer to Mr. Henry Stelfox of Rocky Mountain House, who for more than forty years has given not only his time but his counsel and means in trying to bring into the lives of these people a bit more comfort than would otherwise have been the case.

Mr. Harkness: During the past two or three years, there has been a considerable improvement in the medical services, hospital facilities and so forth, provided for our Indians. I am extremely pleased that this progress has taken place. I should like to commend Dr. Moore for the excellent work he has done in that regard. I believe he deserves the thanks, not only of the Indians, but of all the people who are interested in the welfare of the Indians.

An instance was brought up, however, by the member for Red Deer, which illustrates there are still many places for improvement in the medical services provided our Indians and Eskimos. I trust that the government will press forward, just as rapidly as possible, to eliminate situations such as the one described to us. In doing so, I would ask that they set aside what might be called the slow processes of bureaucracy and red tape, which hold up the proper treatment of Indians when there is not an Indian medical officer available. The ordinary doctor will not treat an Indian because the doctor has had difficulty in getting paid.

As the minister knows, there was a considerable number of Indians at Banff and Canmore, who were engaged in clearing the brush from the Spray river power development. For a time at least the doctors in Canmore and Banff refused to treat these Indians, because they were not able to get satisfactory pay for the services they performed. It seems to me that the difficulties which are experienced along that line deny the Indians treatment, because of certain red tape regulations. Things of that nature should be wiped out. Surely, it is possible to get some sort of arrangement into operation, under which instances such as the one mentioned will not take place.

I should like to ask the minister what new hospital construction is covered by the item, which I see at the back of the book, amounting to approximately $2,300,000. What proportion of that money is for infirmaries, small hospitals, on individual reserves? Will the minister say what hospital facilities there are now on the Hobbema reserve, and what the medical situation is on the Saddle Lake reserve?

Mr. Martin: About 50 per cent of that amount represents smaller hospitals or nursing station units. As my hon. friend knows, I was out to the Hobbema reserve, and he was kind enough to extend some hospitality to me, as did his colleague from Calgary West. The hospital that was under construction there was burned. We have advertised for tenders for a new building and I am hoping that situation will be corrected.

Mr. Harkness: Will the minister say how soon it will be corrected? It was for that reason I brought the matter to his attention.

Mr. Martin: Tenders are being advertised almost at once, and we will proceed as quickly as we can. Presumably it will be spring before construction can be commenced.

The main hospitals under construction are the big hospital at Sioux Lookout, which we hope to open some time in the new year; the one at Moose Factory which fills a long-felt need in one of the most congested areas of our Indian population, and in which, unfortunately, the t.b. rate is quite high. This will form part of a series of hospitals for attacking t.b., which I think deserves some of the commendation which hon. members have seen fit to give to the departmental personnel.

Unfortunately the Coqualeetza hospital was burned, but we are still occupying part of it. We have a fine hospital at Nanaimo. The Charles Camsell hospital at Edmonton is a 350-bed hospital, and is one of the best t.b. hospitals in the country. Supplemented by the one at The Pas, and one at Brandon, as well as by others that are about to be opened, and nursing stations which have been opened all over the country, I believe the hospital situation will be taken care of. I will not say this represents a new departure, but at least it represents a new attitude on the part of the government towards this highly important matter.

The departmental budget might not be a full indication, but it is some indication of the improvement, or of the new attitude, and the steps being taken. This year the budget amounts to approximately $11 million. When one considers that in 1945-46 it was around $2·5 million, one can get some appreciation of the importance of the work that is being done. I should like to say to the house and to the country that, while we are spending a lot of money, it is bringing results. I have indicated that the increase in the budget is almost ninefold, from $1,400,000 in 1940, to $11 million in 1949. The results of this increased expenditure are seen in the following figures: First of all, I should say that the Indian population represents one per cent of the population of Canada and, at the same time, represents 10 per cent of the tubercular population. Now, that is the challenging situation which we are seeking to meet.

During the period I have mentioned, the number of patients under treatment for tuberculosis has increased nine times, from 200 to 1,800, and the death rate has fallen over 600 per 100,000 of population to about 300 per 100,000 of population. The hospitalization program we have under way, and the increased medical personnel to go along with that program, together with what is being done by the voluntary workers for the Indian population with regard to t.b., makes our progress in this regard certain.

Mr. Harkness: I am glad to see that this problem of t.b. among the Indians is receiving so much attention. On the question of X-ray tests for t.b. among the Indians, will the minister state the proportion of our total Indian population that has received this test?

Mr. Martin: About 62 per cent. With the X-ray facilities we are installing, we hope to be able to accelerate that. In the hon. member's province, Alberta, it is 90 per cent.

Mr. Harkness: Will the minister state whether anything has been done along that line amongst the Indians, not only in my province, but in the far north in the Northwest Territories, and right across Canada?

Mr. Martin: To the extent that medical personnel can be recruited—and I must say it is not easy—and to the extent that we can get nursing personnel, we are making great progress in that particular in some areas. Take the James bay area, the area that I mentioned, and which is thickly populated. Almost every Indian, except a fraction of one per cent, has received X-ray examination. That has revealed a story, of course, that is not a very happy one; but it is far better to know it now than to know it too late.

Mr. Hatfield: What is the difference between a treaty Indian and a non-treaty Indian in regard to medical service?

Mr. Martin: The legal position of course is that the treaty Indian is given treatment. I must say that it is not always possible to draw the line.

[Mr. Martin.]

Mr. Harkness: Among a very large number of people, including the officials of the minister's own department, there is a widespread belief—I believe it is a correct one—that a great deal of the tuberculosis and other diseases to which Indians are particularly subject, and many of the earlier deaths of infants, are due to dietary deficiencies. If these dietary deficiencies could be corrected a great deal of the health problem would be solved. What is being done by the medical services for the Indians from the dietary point of view? Are they supplying any of the vitamins to overcome the deficiencies? Are they supplying extra food with a view to improving health conditions, apart from just keeping these people alive?

Mr. Martin: My hon. friend of course has touched one of the basic points. The answer to his questions is yes. Through our nutrition people we are making surveys. We have the advantage of surveys which are made by other groups. We use our medical personnel, nurses and doctors, and our own departmental literature through the schools and so on where they have access to Indians. They do not always have access to them but we use whatever agencies we can to bring home to the Indian the importance of good nutrition. Family allowances of course have been a great help in this particular. I can only say to my hon. friend that the very vital and basic point that he has emphasized is one that has been very much on our minds in the pursuit and the discharge of these duties.

Mr. Harkness: I make one further suggestion to the minister as to how he can overcome these dietary deficiencies to quite a considerable extent. He should persuade the Indian affairs department to increase the amount of what is called welfare allowances to Indians who are destitute and Indians who are partially destitute and unable to make a decent living or provide themselves with proper food. If the allowance which has been $7.80 a month per person were increased to twice that amount it would improve affairs considerably. If it were increased to anything like the dominion's portion of the old age pension payment the more extreme of these dietary deficiencies would be overcome. I am quite sure the minister could do more by urging on the government that this measure be taken than in any other way.

Mr. Martin: I shall note my hon. friend's remarks carefully.

Health grants—

General health grants—

276. To provide for the following grants to the provinces, under terms and conditions approved by the governor in council—health survey grant to assist the provinces in surveying present health services and facilities, including hospitals, and in studying ways and means of improving and extending the same; to be distributed on the basis of a flat amount of $5,000 to each province and the balance according to population but the total payment available to any province in no case to be less than $15,000, $150,000.

General public health grant to assist the provinces in strengthening general public health services; to be distributed on the basis of 40 cents per capita of population, to provinces which maintain at least their standard and extent of service in this field as at March 31, 1948, $5,143,600.

Tuberculosis control grant to assist the provinces in an accelerated and intensified effort toward the eradication of tuberculosis and to extend progressively the provision of free treatment; to be distributed on the basis of a flat amount of $25,000 to each province and the balance to be divided 50 per cent on the basis of population and 50 per cent on the basis of the average number of deaths from tuberculosis in each province over the previous five years, $3,000,000.

Cancer control grant to assist the provinces in programs for the control of cancer; to be distributed according to population, with any such programs for cancer control to be approved and the cost thereof to be divided equally between the dominion and the province concerned, $3,500,000.

Mr. Harris (Danforth): There is a sentence or two I should like to put on the record but they may more properly come under the second section of this particular item. I do want to say this, sir, because it is the only opportunity that some of us have, who may be interested in hospital work, to say something on behalf of the government which is doing so much in this day and generation toward this work. I would be the last man in this house to start paying compliments to ministers and their deputies but they are doing a good job. I will go that far. We admire the way in which they attend to business. We admire the way in which they respond to every request of hon. members, and they respond as fast as they can. I will go that far.

I hold in my hand a special delivery letter dated December 8, showing the accord and the co-operation which the minister is receiving in his department from the inspector of hospitals for the province of Ontario. I just wish to say to him "thank you" for the kindness that he has shown some of us charged with a responsibility in that regard over the last two decades. The city of Toronto, which contains nearly one-tenth of the population of Canada, is doing very well in hospital work. I have no authority to speak for the hospital for sick children or for other children's hospitals, but I have authority to speak for one small 400-bed unit which is trying its best to do a real job for the citizens in the community. On their behalf I want to thank the minister, his deputies and particularly Mr. Hughes and Mr. Jackson who have under review the finalizing of a grant of $2,500,000 which is being spent in my particular community. I am sorry, sir, if I have delayed the committee, but I wanted to put that on the record at this time.

Mr. Fournier (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): Would it be possible to have the total amount of money that has been granted to the provinces since the government initiated the policy of grants?

Mr. Fleming: May I make a suggestion to save time?

Mr. Martin: I can put a table on Hansard.

Mr. Fournier (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): Put the statistics on Hansard.

Mr. Martin: My hon. friend will understand that these national grants give only a partial picture. I do wish that we could have more time to go into this matter. This matter takes second place to no item that comes before this House of Commons. I wish I had time to describe fully the great things that are being done. I am not taking credit for the government. I am merely stating that this plan has provoked a whole series of achievements in so many lines throughout every province of this country that I am sure this House of Commons is proud of having had something to do with establishing it. The table is a general table. It does not tell all the story. Of course no figures will tell the story; but to the extent that tables can tell the story these tables will. I can think of what is being done in the little province of Prince Edward Island. If I told that story I could give a picture that would encourage every hon. member; but it is not possible to do that in figures. I could tell what is being done in the province from which the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont comes. I am sure he would be very happy to know the series of health achievements in that province alone, not only with regard to hospital construction alone, but with regard to equipment for mental hospitals, with regard to the work being done on crippling conditions in children, the work being done in cancer research and cancer treatment, the work being done in the strengthening of public health units, and so on.

I want to thank the hon. member for Danforth, who has just spoken, for his words of commendation of the department. May I in turn say to him that that was due only to the institution itself, and is in part a tribute to the great work that he himself has performed throughout the years in connection with that particular hospital. So I will put the two tables on Hansard, with the unanimous consent of the house, in answer to the question of the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont. They are as follows:

* Total includes $100,000 for Public Health Research not included in Provincial figures. In addition, Provincial figures and total amount have been increased by appropriate portions of $3,069 voted in Supplementary Estimates as a carry-over from 1947–48, for V.D. Control.

 Figures in this column embody $3,069 referred to above.

NOTE:—

With respect to the table set out above, the figures given under the headings "Expended" represent only payment by the Department of National Health and Welfare to the Provinces of claims submitted by them covering accounts (properly audited) which have been paid by the Provinces and for which they are entitled to be reimbursed. "Expended" does not in any way represent the amounts actually spent by the Provinces on projects for which approval has been given by the Department of National Health and Welfare under the National Health Program. The Provinces have until the end of the fiscal year to submit their claims; in the meantime the Department has no knowledge of what expenditures have been made by the Provinces, in respect of approved projects, other than those represented by claims already submitted.

In the case of the Hospital Construction Grant, claims by the Provinces in respect of approved projects are submitted in four instalments, namely, upon completion of 25%, 50%, 75% and 100% of construction. It is understood that the period of construction of nearly all projects will extend over one or more fiscal years.

In the case of the Health Survey Grant, the basis of payment is an advance by the Department of National Health and Welfare to the Provinces, at the time projects are approved 15% and payment of the balance upon receipt from the Provinces of claims covering accounts (properly audited) which have been paid by the Provinces. While the Health Survey Grant is not recurring it is anticipated, in the light of statements received from the Provinces, that the total amount thereof will eventually be required by and paid to the Provinces.

NOTE: Totals include appropriate figures for Public Health Research not included in provincial figures as follows:
(a) Includes $205,148 as grant available. (b) Includes $198,547 as amount approved.
(c) Includes $60,920 as amount expended.

Mr. Fleming: Will the minister indicate what those tables include?

Mr. Martin: The second includes all amounts approved and expended from April 1 to December 1, 1949, and the first, in connection with national health grants, all amounts approved and expended during the fiscal year 1948-49.

Mr. Fleming: Are those amounts broken down by provinces?

Mr. Martin: Yes.

Mr. Gillis: I am not satisfied with having them placed on Hansard.

Mr. Martin: Would the hon. member ask specific questions?

Mr. Gillis: And I am not pressed for time, either, on this particular subject. I agree that perhaps the minister likes to see things done, and he makes statements to the effect that we would be amazed if we knew what was being done.

Mr. Martin: And that is right.

Mr. Gillis: Well, I want to know what is being done. I do not want to read it in Hansard tomorrow. I want to know the extent of the money granted by parliament, and to what extent it is being used in my own province. This particular grant merely states that $15,000 is the maximum amount that can be voted to any province for the purpose of surveying the whole field of health. You cannot do much with $15,000. So far as I am concerned—

Mr. Martin: That is just a survey.

Mr. Gillis: I want the minister to tell me what has been done in Nova Scotia in connection with the grant under discussion at the present time.

Mr. Martin: What grant? There is a series of grants. The hon. member must appreciate, as I am sure he will—

Mr. Gillis: Not under this item.

Mr. Martin: What particular grant is the hon. member asking about?

Mr. Gillis: Just a moment, now; I want to know about this maximum grant of $15,000 for the purpose of a health survey. I want to know this: Has the province of Nova Scotia used it? Have they submitted their plans to the minister? Are those plans complete—and what are they, in the field of health survey?

Mr. Martin: The province of Nova Scotia is making a survey. Their report is not finished. I am hoping it may be completed when we meet on January 10. We have approved $33,000 for that province.

Mr. Gillis: That grant has been available for the last two years at least.

Mr. Martin: The last what?

Mr. Gillis: The last couple of years.

Mr. Martin: Yes, it has—to all the provinces. But the hon. member must appreciate that a survey cannot be made overnight.

Mr. Gillis: I know that.

Mr. Martin: Keeping in mind the great advances Saskatchewan has made in certain particulars, it too is in the same position as most of the other provinces. My hon. friend must not fail to appreciate that this survey is not just a matter of sitting down at a desk and making a priori conclusions. It is a matter of getting out in the field and making a survey. And that is being done by this province.

Mr. Gillis: The minister says the grant has been available for more than two years. It has. The survey made by the province of Nova Scotia in the field indicated by the vote has not been completed. They have been over three years on it. So far as the minister is concerned, he cannot tell me what that province is going to do, or what their plans are. Living as I do in that province, and coming from it, so far as I know nothing has been done.

Mr. Martin: Oh, that is not true.

Mr. Gillis: Oh, yes, you have had a new wing added to the Victoria General hospital in Halifax—which people cannot get into. Some people who want specialized treatment are still in the position they were in twenty-five years ago. And if they are doing any cancer research work, certainly they have not set up any diagnostic organization. I know of no place where one could go to have that work done—unless you have money and travel some distance.

I am interested in getting something done. As I said a moment ago, I think the federal government are doing what they can, within the confines of the constitution. But there is a great amount of laxity in the provinces. It should not take three years to make a survey in connection with this grant. They have a good medical set-up, and facts and figures and statistics, and all the requirements. And if they have not gone on with something, then there is something wrong.

Mr. Martin: The hon. member has been good enough to say that the federal department is doing all it can. However, I could not permit his statement to go unchallenged, in fairness, as to what the provinces are doing.

Mr. Gillis: What are they doing?

Mr. Martin: I will not say we are completely satisfied, but they are doing a great deal of splendid work in Nova Scotia, as in the other provinces.

Now, if the hon. member will ask specific questions I shall try to answer. For instance, I can tell him now the number of hospital beds constructed in Nova Scotia since this grant came into effect.

Mr. Gillis: I should like to know that.

Mr. Martin: The figure is 1,067.

Mr. Gillis: Where are they located?

Mr. Martin: The list is as follows:

List of Hospitals Approved to October 31, 1949

I am not a bluenose, and perhaps my pronunciation of some of these names has not been as it should have been. It will be noted by the hon. member that the hospital at Sydney, included in this list, is one of 153 beds.

Item agreed to.

277. Welfare branch administration, $36,155.

Mr. Green: At the spring session an amendment to the Old Age Pensions Act was passed increasing the basic pension from $30 to $40 a month, of which the dominion contributes three-quarters. In the amending bill no provision was made for raising the total income that could be received by a pensioner. In other words, the total income, including the pension, and what little a pensioner might be able to earn, or had coming in by way of revenue, was not increased at all. In the case of the single pensioner the ceiling remains at $600, and in that of the married pensioner, where his wife is also receiving a pension, the total they can receive by way of income remains at $1,080.

The effect has been, of course, to take out of the act one of the basic features which, from the start, has been that a certain income would be allowed over and above the pension. From the time the Old Age Pensions Act first became law there was a provision—and it has always been considered a fundamental part of the law—that the pensioner could get income from some other sources, up to a certain amount. That feature is now gone because of the failure to raise the ceiling at the last session.

Mr. Martin: This might better be brought up under the old age pensions item.

Mr. Green: I have just about finished. The situation is summed up in the headings of different editorials which were published on the subject in the Vancouver newspapers. For example, one was headed "Unfinished business" and another, "A matter for correction". The articles went on to point out that this situation should be remedied without further delay. I mentioned this in my speech in the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne and I regret exceedingly that no move has been made during this session to raise that ceiling. Can the minister tell us why nothing has been done and what possibility there is of the government raising this ceiling so that these pensioners will be able to get the same amount above their old age pensions they could get before the amendments were passed?

Mr. Martin: I will deal with that when we come to the item.

Mr. Green: Could the minister not answer it now?

Mr. Martin: It might start a whole discussion if I did it now. I will deal with it at the right time, if the hon. member does not mind.

Mr. Fleming: What were the expenditures?

Mr. Martin: The expenditures amounted to $27,665.16; unliquidated, $700.70; total commitments, $28,365.86.

Mr. Fleming: There are several items covering educational and national publicity scattered through the estimates and the minister gave the total as $334,000. How much of that was paid to persons outside the government?

Mr. Martin: There would be very little. There might be some for writing scripts and things like that, and perhaps some printing. The photography work is done in the department as well as most of the writing, and films are done by the film board.

Mr. Fleming: We may take it that none of this went to outside advertising agencies?

Mr. Martin: Oh, no.

Mr. McLure: For a number of years we have brought up the question of incapacitated people. I brought it up myself in 1945, 1946 and right down to the present time and I should like to know what is being done to help these people. I was pleased to read in the press what the Prime Minister had to say about it, and I quote as follows:

> The government of which I am the leader will do everything within its power to provide adequate welfare and security to the less fortunate.

He was dealing with the incapacitated people. The Prime Minister is then quoted as having said:

> At times we are accused of paternalism on account of our social legislation.

Far be it from me to make a charge of paternalism against the government in connection with their treatment of the incapacitated. I would say that the present government, as well as the last, has shown a most flagrant disregard for the incapacitated people in our province. What program is there for this class of people this coming year?

Mr. Martin: The difficulty of dealing with a specific question on the general item is that one never finishes the subject. This question would be better asked on the specific item. My hon. friend knows that health grants and special grants are made, and there is provision for assisting with disabling conditions in children. Then there are grants for the care of tubercular people and general health grants. In a number of provinces projects have been put under way to deal with invalidity situations. Complementing all this is the work carried on by the Department of Veterans Affairs and our own work on behalf of the blind by way of pensions and particular programs to improve their eyesight. Then there is the general assistance we give to various blind organizations, notably the Canadian National Institute for the Blind.

The general problem which my hon. friend poses is not only the concern of the federal government; it will be discussed at a conference being called by the Minister of Labour, to which are being invited federal and provincial officials and representatives of voluntary agencies. It is hoped that out of this conference there will emerge a clearer picture of the problem as well as concrete and practical suggestions as to a useful course of action to be followed in the future by governments at all levels. Beyond that there is no more that I can say at the moment.

Family allowances—

278. Administration, $1,808,198.

Mr. Fleming: The Auditor General has drawn attention to certain matters which I think call for a statement from the minister. On pages three and four of his report the Auditor General refers to a situation which has arisen through the method used to verify the age of children. He lists 144,662 cases as at March 31 where payments have been made pending verification of the age. In paragraph nine on page four he points out that overpayments subject to recovery at the end of the year, which I presume means March 31, amounted to $429,394. He points out further:

> Overpayments occur, as a rule, because (a) proof of birth is not established, or (b) children are not being maintained by the applicant.

I think the committee is familiar with the statement made by the deputy minister of welfare indicating that steps were being taken to recover some of these amounts, but in paragraph 10 the Auditor General proceeds to make some concrete recommendations in reference to safeguards when he says:

> From birth to the age of 16, family allowance payments total $1,128. The extent of overpayments and the time lag between date of payment and receipt of data from the bureau of statistics make desirable the introduction of safeguards; for example, requiring (a) evidence of birth to accompany application, and (b) a parent to furnish annual declarations that the child is alive, is being maintained by the parent and, if of school age, is attending school.

I think those comments are worthy of the most serious consideration, and I ask the minister what steps he is proposing to take in the light of those recommendations?

Mr. Martin: My hon. friend has called attention to a statement made when I was away and which otherwise would have been made under my name. That statement was made by the deputy minister on the welfare side on my instructions because I realized that while the press reports no doubt were intended to be helpful, actually they did not give a true picture of the situation. In order to put things in a proper perspective may I say that in the last two years only $163 of overpayments have resulted through a lack of immediate birth verification. When you consider that in the last two years between $500 million and $600 million has been paid out by way of family allowances, and that there have been overpayments in the amount of only $163 for want of immediate birth verification, I think my hon. friend will find that the situation is one for which the administration of family allowances should be commended. I may say that the $163 was recovered. I think that statement ought to be underlined.

There were, on March 31 last, overpayments, in the amount stated by my hon. friend, of $429,394, out of gross disbursements made to date exceeding $1,100 million. Overpayments not yet recovered represent less than one-twentieth of one per cent of total family allowance payments.

Since the statement of the Auditor General came out, I have had an opportunity of examining the overpayment situation in those countries where family allowances prevail, and while I do not propose to give all the details today—it would take too long—my hon. friend will find that we not only compare very favourably but that our record is a record indeed in this respect.

The question really boils down to this. We have to make up our minds what we wish to accomplish with regard to birth tion as to birth verification, when family ance payment to be made as quickly as possible after birth? That was the intention of the house when the act was passed, and I think properly so.

In the case of the province of Quebec we were unable to get the same kind of collaboration as to birth verification, when family allowances came into being, as we got in the other provinces, and that fact accounts for the seemingly large proportion of overpayments in that province compared with other provinces. It was not because honesty is less prevalent there than elsewhere, but rather because it was not possible to obtain the same measure of early verification that we were able to get as a result of the co-operation given by other provincial governments.

As a matter of fact, a very small amount of the total overpayments are due to want of birth verifications. It is due to many other factors such as overpayments resulting from situations arising in respect of non-attendance at school, non-maintenance, the death of a child, non-residence, duplicate accounts, immigration regulations, children working for wages, and so on.

Therefore it is wrong to assume that the mere fact that birth verification does not immediately attend the registration for family allowance is the main circumstance which provokes this overpayment situation. We are anxious to give the payments to parents as quickly as possible at a time when they need them. If we had to wait until such time as the birth certificate came in, the family allowance payment would be delayed beyond measure, and our experience has shown that the trust which we place in the ordinary Canadian parent is more than justified. I do not think I need to say any more than that. We have to make up our minds whether we wish to provide family allowance payments as early as possible or wait until they are backed by a birth certificate. If the latter takes place, parents may not get the family allowances for several months, possibly longer. We feel the time to give the family allowance is as early as possible. Current verifications are now taking place as quickly as possible, and as I have indicated there have been overpayments in regard to new applications in the last two years only to the extent of $163 for want of immediate birth verification.

Mr. Fleming: To complete the information for members of the house as to administration, will the minister give the figures—I presume he has them in his report—on the cost through the Department of Finance and the Department of Public Works? There is such a statement on page 94 of his report for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1948.

Mr. Martin: National health and welfare costs of administration in 1948-49 were $1,697,858.58, for finance $2,082,951.73, and for public works $165,312.09, making a percentage of 1·45, a truly remarkable record of administration for which the directors of the family allowance administration are entitled to our undying thanks. When you realize that 3·5 per cent represents the cost of administration of family allowances in Great Britain compared with our 1·45, I think I may say it is a truly remarkable achievement.

Mr. Fleming: With the consent of the committee, will the minister put on record the same sort of statistical table he put on Hansard on June 11, 1948? I think he has it there.

Mr. Martin: Yes.

The Deputy Chairman: Has the minister unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Martin: The tables are as follows:

Mr. Shaw: It is assumed where Indian families qualify for family allowances that the cheques are given out through the Indian agents. Is that correct?

Mr. Martin: I did not hear the question.

Mr. Shaw: Where Indian families are eligible for family allowances, are the cheques given out through the Indian agents to those families?

Mr. Martin: In about 78 per cent of the cases they are sent directly to the families.

Mr. Shaw: I wish to bring to the minister's attention one strong recommendation—it is one of a number—which I have received. The recommendation is that, so far as the situation at Rocky Mountain House is concerned, more care be taken with regard to the proper receipt by the legal recipients of the family allowance cheques. I wonder if the minister would bear that in mind.

Mr. Martin: I shall be very glad to.

Item agreed to.

279. Administration, $65,610.

Mr. Maltais: I should like to ask the minister whether administration of old age pensions, so far as applications for pensions and other facts are concerned, is left exclusively in the hands of each of the provinces?

Mr. Knowles: But within the provisions of the federal act.

(Translation):

Mr. Martin: That is definitely a provincial responsibility.

Mr. Maltais: Do some provinces pay old age pensions without benefiting from the 75 per cent contribution of the federal government?

Mr. Martin: The answer is no.

[Mr. Martin.]

(Text):

Mr. Maltais: I have in my hands a letter from one of the ministers of the province of Quebec in which he states:

(Translation):

To sum up, in the province of Quebec, old age pensions and pensions to the blind were paid for the first time under the Union Nationale government, in accordance with a provincial act and a provincial order in council, and the increase in the maximum pension from $30 to $40 was provided for by the Union Nationale government, under a provincial act.

Such indisputable facts will enable pensioners to draw their own conclusions.

(Text):

Following that I should like to know whether this statement is correct. Is it right to say that it would not have been possible to enforce the law in any province unless the province had the assistance of the federal government?

Mr. Martin: My hon. friend knows perfectly well, and he may want to pass this information on to interested parties elsewhere who desire it, that the Old Age Pensions Act was first passed by the federal government. The federal government has been responsible for the increases in the basic pension on three different occasions, for the increase in the outside income allowable, and of course the federal government pays 75 per cent of the basic pension.

Mr. Green: Will the minister answer my question now?

Mr. Knowles: My question is very simple. When is the means test going to be done away with?

An hon. Member: Tonight.

Mr. Knowles: Good. We would like you in the cabinet.

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Knowles: I did not ask that jocularly. It is a serious question, and is something that a good many members advocated in the last election campaign. It is the feature of the Old Age Pensions Act which people feel most offended by at the present time, and I think a statement by the minister is in order.

Mr. Martin: As to the question asked by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra, 75 per cent of old age pensioners have received the full benefit of the increase in the old age pension provided for by the house last year.

Mr. Fleming: Will the minister give the figures?

Mr. Martin: My hon. friend will appreciate that what we were aiming at was to try to put the full amount of the increase into the hands of the pensioners to further purchasing power. Those whose income took them up beyond a certain level did not benefit, but they were only about 10 per cent of the total figure. Fifteen per cent of the total received part of the increase. As to the question of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, I simply want to say that the federal government's views with regard to the means test were stated in 1945 in the proposals made to the provinces. My hon. friend may smile, but that does not add anything to it.

Mr. Knowles: I do smile, because the minister goes back to those proposals time and again but does nothing about them.

Mr. Martin: Let me finish my statement, and perhaps my hon. friend will agree that I have dealt with the matter pretty responsibly. In 1945 the government did make a certain proposition to the provinces, which was conditioned upon certain other actions by the provinces involving tax agreements and the like. That proposal inevitably was part of a whole pattern, a whole series of proposals.

Our means test in this country is as liberal as any other means test found in any part of the world. That is the first thing. No country has eliminated the means test. They have it in the United States; they have it in Australia; they have it in the United Kingdom; and they have it in New Zealand. Those are the facts. There are difficulties. I am not saying our situation is perfect; but until such time as we have a contributory system of old age pensions I say it is irresponsible to talk about the elimination of the means test.

To talk about liberalizing the means test is another matter. No one has a greater interest in this matter than I have, but I believe one must put the whole subject before the country. We are spending now on federal account $100 million on old age pensions. The old age population of Canada represents a growing percentage of the total population. There are 625,000 people of the age of seventy in Canada today. Of that number 275,000 are in receipt of old age pensions. There are 4,200,000 children receiving the family allowance. Total family allowance payments are less than $300 million. If we were to leave the basic pension at the present level of $40 a month and eliminate the means test completely, without lowering the age, the cost would be $300 million. I ask the house to bear that figure in mind. To leave the old age pension at the basic rate of $40 per month and lower the age for women only to 65 would cost $391 million. To leave the pension at $40 a month and lower the age to 65 for men and women would cost $491 million. To put the pension at $50, lower the age and take away the means test would cost $614 million.

Those are the facts. I ask hon. members to consider them. No one can take away from my appreciation of the importance of our social welfare plans in the kind of economy we have in the western world; but having in mind the facts I have just stated, bearing in mind that we hope there will be extensions of other phases of social security at the right time and in the light of conditions that prevail, hon. members should ask themselves whether they think, in the absence of a contributory system of one sort or another—there being several kinds of contributory systems—it is possible to completely eliminate the means test. I say it has not been done anywhere. I say that the abolition of the means test must be associated with the adoption of the principle of contribution in some form, a matter which is receiving our fullest attention.

Mr. Drew: I intend to deal with only one aspect of this matter, Mr. Chairman, because I do not desire to make any extensive remarks in regard to what should be done. That is so for the simple reason that anything suggested cannot be done at this particular point, no matter how much we might wish it. At the moment we are dealing with items calling for expenditures based upon legislation already adopted. No matter how convincing any argument might be at this time it cannot change the basis upon which these items are put forward. It is within the power of the house, if the arguments presented should be so convincing, to strike out any item. It is not within the power of the house as a whole to increase an item, except on motion of the government. Therefore I wish to make it clear that my failure to enlarge upon what I think should be done arises only because personally I do not feel that a discussion can produce any practical results at the present moment, and that the appropriate time for such a discussion will be next session, when we have the broad program of legislation under consideration.

In making that statement I am not presuming to be critical of anyone who has expressed an opinion in regard to a subject which is of great concern and great importance to the people of Canada. The only reason I am rising to speak at the moment is that I do want to place on record the simple circumstances which relate to why as yet there has not been any effective provision for action by the dominion and provincial governments to deal with this subject on the basis of a broad, joint contributory plan. I am not quite sure why the minister introduced the fact that proposals had been put forward by the dominion government in 1945 embracing certain provisions of this kind; but since this does become a record I wish to make it quite clear that there is only one reason why consideration has not yet been given to a broad, contributory plan approved by both the dominion and the provinces. That is because the dominion government has firmly refused to reconvene the dominion-provincial conference since the last conference adjourned on motion of the dominion government on May 3, 1946. This may be constant repetition in the minds of some people, but obviously only by constant repetition can the truth be kept clearly before the people. Because of the fact that this has been raised by the minister I can only express my regret—

Mr. Warren: That is not quite the truth.

Mr. Drew: It is the exact truth; and I intend to keep that truth on record in this house. I want to express my regret that the dominion-provincial conference at which general problems of this kind can be discussed, as announced recently, will not take place until next fall. This means that on the very proposition put forward by the minister there can be no consideration until the session of 1951, on the basis of joint action by the different governments. I would point out that the conference that will be called is only being called because it is necessary, owing to the termination of the financial agreements that were signed, and which were not, incidentally, the financial arrangements before the conference of 1945-46.

That is all I propose to say, but I wish to make it quite clear, and the record cannot be challenged, that these joint plans can only result from the combined action of the dominion-provincial governments, in view of both the constitutional position and the administrative problems involved. It is a matter of regret that the conference has not been convened to deal with that up to now, and the next conference will not be called until the autumn of the coming year. I can only express the hope that when this conference does meet, the dominion government will indicate a willingness to meet the provinces upon a basis of co-operation, which was not displayed in the previous conference, and which they have not displayed in the intervening period.

Mr. Knowles: The minister quoted some figures that are well-known to those of us who have followed this matter closely during the years. The point seemed to be that it was irresponsible for anyone to request such a thing as the removal of the means test—

Mr. Martin: No, I did not suggest that. Look at the context of what I said.

Mr. Knowles: I believe the minister used those very words. He went on to anticipate some of the other things I was going to talk about, such as the lowering of the age limit—

Mr. Martin: The hon. member told me if he was allowed to make a speech on the general item, he would not make a speech on this one.

Mr. Knowles: This is not a speech; I am just asking some questions. The minister implied that it was irresponsible to request the removal of the means test—

Mr. Martin: If you inferred that, I withdraw the implication, because it was never intended.

Mr. Knowles: —because of the amount of money it would cost. May I tell the minister that he ought to direct remarks like that to the members on his side of the house. Practically every one of those members made it a plank in his election campaign that he would work for the removal of this means test.

Some hon. Members: Oh, no.

Mr. Knowles: If the members wish to deny it, they can. I went across a good part of this country during the election campaign, and I saw the advertising the Liberals were putting out. It did not jibe with what the minister said here. It said, "I stand for the removal of the means test pending—not after, but pending—the adoption of a contributory plan."

Mr. Warren: Who said that?

Mr. Knowles: I read it over the name of the member for Vancouver Centre the other night, but I saw it in many parts of the country.

Mr. Warren: Don't put words in my mouth.

Mr. Knowles: I would not expect the member for Renfrew North to know what this is all about, but the people of this country were led to believe that the Liberals stood, at long last, for the abolition of the means test.

An hon. Member: Might I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Knowles: When I am finished. I submit that the minister is off on the wrong foot when he says it is irresponsible—

Mr. Martin: I said that I withdrew the implication. Why do you keep on repeating when I have already said that?

Mr. Knowles: I am telling the minister, and I am telling the Liberal members of this house, that it is one of the things the people of Canada thought this government would implement, as soon as possible after the election.

I should like to say further with regard to this whole question of a contributory plan, Mr. Chairman, that it seems to me that what we are getting now is the use of that phrase "contributory plan" as an excuse for doing nothing. Some day we shall have to insist on a statement of policy by the government, as to what they mean by a contributory plan. Do they mean by it merely a plan for a few more items, or do they mean an over-all plan? At the moment, the government is simply saying, we cannot take away the means test until we get a contributory plan, and we cannot do that until we get an amendment to the B. N. A. Act, and we cannot get an amendment to the B. N. A. Act until we have several more conferences.

Mr. Martin: I did not say that.

Mr. Knowles: In other words we do not get the problem solved until we have two or three more elections. I can tell the government that that is not good enough. The minister boasted today that the means test which is now in effect is the easiest means test there is, compared with the other countries. I should like to tell the government that the means test, so far as the other income it allows is concerned, is worse now than it was when the Old Age Pensions Act was brought into force in 1927. At that time, a single pensioner was permitted $125 of other income, while today a single pensioner is only permitted $120 of other income.

Mr. Martin: I do not want to prolong this debate, but my friend knows that I have said that is not the situation. Only ten per cent of the old age pension receiving population are affected by that, so when my friend says it is worse than ever before, he is not dealing with the situation accurately.

Mr. Knowles: What I said was perfectly correct. I said that when the Old Age Pensions Act was brought into force, it allowed a single pensioner $125 of other income; is that not right?

Mr. Martin: That is right.

Mr. Knowles: Today it allows $120 a year to a single pensioner; is that not worse? In 1927, when the act was brought into force it allowed $250 of other income for a married couple, while today it allows only $120 between them or, in other words, $60 each. That is a great deal worse. I submit there is nothing I must withdraw at all, and my statement is quite correct. That means test allows old age pensioners today a smaller amount of other income than was the case when the act was first brought in.

What the minister is trying to say, to deflect the discussion, it that, despite what the means test is, it affects only a small percentage. I should like to have the figures to prove the percentage he quoted. We had some unsatisfactory discussion about that point last session. Certainly, from the correspondence I receive the most offensive thing to our old people today, is the amount by which the pension is cut down, because of the application of this means test.

Some hon. Members: Six o'clock.

The Deputy Chairman: In my opinion, we will expedite the business of the house if hon. members are allowed to make their speeches without interruptions.

Mr. Knowles: I want to remind the minister, as I did last April, that this same situation developed back in 1943. In that year, Mr. Ilsley raised the pension from $20 to $25 a month by order in council. When he did it, he did not raise the total amount of income that the pensioners could have, and the result was that the amount of other income the pensioner could have was reduced from $125 a year down to $65 a year. We kicked about it then, and we got the same sort of answers we are getting from the Minister of National Health and Welfare now. By continuing to complain about it—and even Liberals went out across the country and found that it was most offensive, and they joined in the complaining—in six or eight months' time Mr. Ilsley corrected that, and put the ceiling back where it was.

I believe I have made it clear that I think the means test should go, and I believe the member for Vancouver-Quadra agrees with me. If that cannot be done immediately, I believe the member for Vancouver-Quadra and the rest of us who have spoken about it agree that the least the government should do is to put the ceiling back where it was before the amendments of last April.

Mr. Green: I have not yet received an answer to the question I asked. The minister has said that there are 75 per cent of the old age pensioners getting the full benefit of the $10 a month increase which was put through last April. I think he also said that 10 per cent got no benefit at all.

Mr. Martin: That is right.

Mr. Green: That means that approximately 25,000 old age pensioners in Canada got absolutely no benefit from the increase of last April.

Mr. Martin: Because they had outside income.

Mr. Green: Because the ceiling was not raised.

Mr. Martin: Yes, that is right.

Mr. Green: That also means that about 37,000 other old age pensioners got only a portion of the $10 increase because the ceiling was not raised. Is not that correct?

Mr. Martin: They had $50 a month to live on.

Mr. Green: That may be; but the result is that 62,000 or 63,000 old age pensioners did not get this increase of $10 a month.

Mr. Martin: Ten per cent only did not get it.

Mr. Green: Let us get down to figures; 62,000 approximately did not get the increase.

Some hon. Members: Six o'clock.

Mr. Martin: I wonder if we could go on. I should like to finish.

Mr. Green: Sixty-two thousand did not get the full increase of $10 a month. We are now to understand from the minister that government policy is to keep that ceiling where it is at the present time. I can only say that it is a great tragedy for at least 62,000 senior citizens of Canada. It is entirely out of line with what this house had in mind when the amendment was passed last April. I do urge upon the government that at the next session they lift the ceiling so that allowable income will be put back to where it has been ever since the Old Age Pensions Act was introduced.

Mr. Fleming: Will the minister give us figures instead of percentages of those who benefited?

Mr. Gillis: It is six o'clock. If we are going to sit overtime tonight—

[Mr. Knowles.]

Some hon. Members: Let us finish this item.

Mr. Martin: I gave the figures in a return to the hon. member for Lake Centre.

Mr. Fleming: Will the minister put them on the record now? If they are in a return they are not on the record.

Mr. Martin: It has already been given in the return.

Mr. Knowles: Six o'clock.

Mr. Gillis: I am going to call it six o'clock.

Mr. Martin: Would the hon. member mind going on for a few minutes. I would like very much to finish, if we can.

Mr. Knowles: There are still some important items.

Mr. Martin: I know my hon. friend will try it for a few minutes.

Mr. Gillis: I am in this position. We sit in the house for two months early in the session and listen to a lot of abstract discussions that mean nothing except giving hon. gentlemen a chance to make a speech. The meat for which this parliament is called is here. We are dealing with money that runs this country and goes back into the lives of our people. At every session the same thing happens. We are sandwiched between Christmas and the estimates. I am prepared to sit here and discuss these things properly, and I do not care so long as I get home by Christmas eve. I just don't like this business. I could not say what I want to say in the next twenty minutes or half an hour. I do not want to keep hon. members here listening to me. I do not like this procedure. The government is going to get stuck one of these times with this kind of thing unless we come to an understanding to deal with the estimates earlier. In my opinion under the welfare department we are discussing matters that vitally affect the people of the country.

Mr. Martin: I agree.

Mr. Gillis: It should not be rushed and hon. members should have a thorough understanding of it.

Mr. Knowles: Six o'clock.

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Gillis: I am through with it. I cannot say what I want to say.

Item agreed to.

279. Administration, $65,610.

Mr. Fleming: Expenditures?

Mr. Martin: Expenditures $63,550.78; unliquidated commitments, $1; total commitments $63,551.78.

Item agreed to.

280. Administration, $60,887.

Mr. Fleming: Expenditures?

Mr. Martin: I have not got these. Could I give them later?

Item agreed to.

281. Assistance to provinces, $85,689.

Mr. Fleming: Expenditures?

Mr. Martin: Expenditures $100,353; unliquidated commitments none; total commitments $100,353.

Item agreed to.

282. Assistance to schools of social work, $50,000.

Mr. Knowles: Six o'clock, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Fleming: If hon. members are willing to carry on, I think we can finish up very quickly.

Mr. Knowles: No. It has already been suggested that we sit for an extra hour tonight.

The Deputy Chairman: Unless we have unanimous consent it is difficult to carry on. As has already been pointed out, in December benevolence is in season. If hon. members do not object perhaps we can carry on for a few minutes. May I point out that once we reach the heading "Miscellaneous grants" there is nothing contentious that I can see. If unanimous consent is given perhaps we can call item 282 and carry on for a few more minutes.

Mr. Knowles: Would you set a time?

The Deputy Chairman: I shall see six o'clock in about twenty-five minutes' time.

Mr. Fleming: In keeping with the feeling of the committee, I shall be very brief. I know there are others who are of the same mind as I am in regard to this item of assistance to schools of social work. For that reason I am going to be brief.

A brief was submitted to the minister by the national committee of Canadian schools of social work on this item. I consider the contentions in the brief in support of increased grants for schools for social workers are unanswerable. I do hope that the minister will make the most strenuous efforts to increase those grants. They are needed by Canadian schools of social work to cover part of their administration expenses, and to provide student bursaries. The personnel situation in social work in Canada is still very critical, and unless these schools receive federal assistance there is going to be a continuation of the crisis in the matter of personnel engaged in social work. The fact that the D.V.A. assistance is in process of being reduced as the number of student veterans who are attending the schools of social work graduate contributes to the critical situation that exists.

In line with the program that the national committee of these schools submitted to the minister it had been expected that grants in the neighbourhood of $130,000 would be available this year and $178,000 next year. For my part I commend this to the minister and urge him to give it active support.

Mr. Knight: I am afraid I cannot take the responsibility of delaying the committee. The chairman himself and the minister will have to do that. In my opinion this is one of the most important items that we have discussed and I propose to discuss it. Personally I should like to back up the remarks made by the hon. member from Cape Breton South. I consider this haste with the estimates scandalous and unrealistic. In my opinion, if these estimates are to be discussed as they should be discussed we should sit here until Wednesday night at the very least.

Having said that I shall say that I am deputed by a number of my colleagues to shorten this debate by saying on their behalf what I am about to say. Perhaps that will substitute one speech for four. I have been spoken to in that regard by the hon. member for Winnipeg North, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, the hon. member for Kootenay West and the hon. member for Yale, each of whom had expressed his intention to say a word or two.

I was glad to hear the minister say that he took second place to no one in a desire to promote social welfare. Here is his opportunity. Personally I think this grant should be increased. I myself have had some connection with welfare work. I realize, and the committee must realize, that there is a great dearth of social workers in this country. I remember a number of years ago, when the present Prime Minister was minister of justice, I asked how many trained psychiatrists there were in connection with the penitentiaries, and he said there was one such person, and that he was attached to Kingston penitentiary.

Mr. Martin: I wonder if the hon. member would object if I said this—possibly to help him to abbreviate or to shorten what he is about to say—

Mr. Knight: I am doing very well without help.

Mr. Martin: I regard the work the hon. member is urging as highly important, and I can only say I regret it greatly if this measure were not continued in another year.

Mr. Knight: I can see one advantage in having these estimates brought forward under pressure. The minister is prepared to commit himself earlier than he would otherwise. I want the estimate not only continued, but increased. I said I had been connected with family welfare work in Saskatoon, and one of the disadvantages with which we found ourselves faced was a lack of trained personnel for social work. It was almost impossible to obtain properly trained and qualified workers.

Some people think that good intentions are all that are necessary for the social worker. I know however that, in addition to a natural aptitude for his work, he must have training of a high degree. I am referring to training in psychology or psychiatry, and human relations. The demand for social workers is increasing, and I propose to give one or two reasons why. In the first place mental instability is decidedly on the increase. We find that the average age of occupants of prisons is becoming lower. We find that the number of divorce cases in almost all the provinces, and throughout the country, is becoming higher.

Then there is the matter of the government's social program to be considered. There are increased public services rendered by governments in connection with which trained social workers are necessary. Personnel will have to be supplied. There are a number of schools of social welfare, which are entitled to this grant as the hon. member for Eglinton has pointed out. These are connected with universities—I shall not read the list because I think that is hardly necessary.

The grant in 1946-47 was $100,000, while in the two following years it was $50,000. I was disappointed when this year's grant was only $50,000 because, as I said in my opening sentence, I think it should have been increased.

These grants have substantially increased enrolments in these social schools. Without that assistance I doubt if the enrolments would have increased, and many of the students would not have been able to take the course. The grant for 1949-50 of only $50,000, in spite of the representations which have been made to the Department of National Health and Welfare, is disappointing. I might have said that the fact the D.V.A. training scheme is now completed has some bearing on this question, because a great many people who were prepared to go into social service work under that scheme find it is no longer available to them.

The estimates this year would seem to indicate that any increase of this $50,000 in the future is uncertain. I would urge upon the minister the necessity for increasing this amount. I do not know what the schools have applied for. I have not read their brief with care.

Mr. Fleming: It is $178,000 for the next year.

Mr. Knight: May I say, as my last word in this connection, that bursaries are necessary. The average student going into this work would be better qualified if he had a B.A. degree, or an academic degree of some sort with which to begin his studies in social work. The temptation for those with degrees is to go right to work and earn a living at once. I have known of several cases of people with considerable aptitude who said, "I cannot afford it; I will have to go to work at once at the thing for which I have been trained." Had there been some inducement in the form of a bursary or a scholarship these people, with their leaning towards social work, might have been induced to take further studies. I think we would get a much better type of person by that method. Under present circumstances they are reluctant to spend more time in schools or universities. As a final word let me express the hope that the minister will see fit in future to increase this amount.

Mr. Croll: Mr. Chairman, may I associate myself with what has been said by the hon. member who has just spoken, and the hon. member for Eglinton. I had intended making some extensive remarks, but those hon. members have pretty well covered the ground, and there is nothing much further to say. I would add only this statement, that I think the grant is not large enough. As was pointed out by the hon. member for Saskatoon, it has been cut from $100,000 to $50,000, and is inadequate.

The amount is not assured. It is given for only one year, rather than for a period of years, which would give some opportunity to do planning. Some of the effect is lost. My suggestion is that the minister ought to give some assurance that these grants would be continued for a period of three or five years so that the responsible schools may be built to a point where the people in the communities involved may take advantage of them.

Mr. Proudfoot: I, too, wish to commend the minister and the government for their assistance to schools in connection with social work. I should hope that he and the government might see fit in future to increase this grant substantially.

Mr. Knowles: Will the minister not answer?

Mr. Martin: I have already spoken. I cannot add to what I have said.

Mr. Knowles: All the minister said was that he would regret it if it was not there next year. Surely he can put it in more positive terms.

Mr. Martin: What more can any minister say? I do not run this government; I am only a member of it.

Mr. Fleming: The most important member.

Mr. Martin: I feel that this is an important matter, and I cannot take any other attitude. The hon. member knows that.

285. Health League of Canada, $10,000.

Mr. Hansell: I have said nothing in the discussion of the health estimates.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): Neither have I.

Mr. Hansell: I had a forty-minute speech to deliver on this item, but if the minister will give an answer yes or no to my question, I shall cut it down to forty seconds. I am sure hon. members appreciate the work being done by the Health League of Canada. Part of that work is the publication of a fine magazine called Health. I have a grievance—and this is the point at which I would have made my forty-minute speech. I find in this magazine some advertising for cigarettes. One of these ads is most appealing, showing the picture of a rather glamorous-looking young lady with a cigarette in her hand. It is very appealing, indeed.

The part which struck me most, however, was that in the ad there appear in small type these words:

Awarded the certificate of the institute of hygiene for quality and purity.

I know I might be very unpopular in making a speech of this kind, and by vast numbers of people I may be considered a crank. May I say that history has proved that anything worth while is always done by a crank. That advertisement would give the impression that it is a pure and highly desirable habit to become a cigarette smoker. I want the minister to give a simple answer of yes or no. I think the minister has played quite a part in holding up his own estimates by saying too much. If I were a minister of the crown and wanted to pilot through my estimates I would try to look as dumb as I could.

Mr. Martin: I am doing my best.

Mr. Hansell: I guarantee that I would get my estimates through faster than those of any other department. Does the minister support that kind of advertising in a magazine which is supposed to be published in the interests of the health of Canadian citizens—yes or no?

Mr. Martin: The government has nothing to do with the magazine. It is published by a voluntary organization. If I had anything to do with it I would give that matter careful consideration.

Mr. Hansell: I know the government has nothing to do with the magazine but $10,000 is being given to this organization which publishes this magazine. My forty-minute speech will be made some other time.

Mental health grant to assist the provinces in the prevention of mental illness and in extending progressively the provision of free treatment; to be distributed on the basis of a flat amount of $25,000 to each province and the balance according to population—further amount required, $122,171.

Venereal disease control grant to assist the provinces in extending and intensifying their present efforts toward the control of venereal disease; to be distributed on the basis of a flat amount of $4,000 to each province and the balance according to population—further amount required, $15,944.

Crippled children grant to assist the provinces in an intensive program for the prevention and correction of crippling conditions in children, rehabilitation and training; to be distributed on the basis of a flat amount of $4,000 to each province and the balance according to population—further amount required, $15,944.

Professional training grant to assist the provinces in the training of personnel for public health and hospital staffs; to be distributed on the basis of a flat amount of $4,000 to each province and the balance according to population—further amount required, $15,944.

Public health research grant to assist the provinces in stimulating and developing public health research—further amount required, $5,148.

Cancer control grant to assist the provinces in programs for the control of cancer; to be distributed according to population, with any such programs for cancer control to be approved and the cost thereof to be divided equally between the dominion and the province concerned—further amount required, $90,093.

Mr. Gillis: There are a number of things I should like to know about this item but I am particularly interested in the grants to provinces to help crippled children; how is that applied?

Mr. Martin: A province will put on a project. For instance, Saskatchewan recently put on a project to provide for the examination by dentists of some 45,000 children of high school age, which was approved.

Mr. Gillis: What is done with the grant to Nova Scotia? During the last five months I have tried to get something done for some incapacitated children but I could get nowhere. I was told to go to the Rotary Club or get in touch with the Red Cross and so on.

Mr. Martin: A total of $26,945 was available for that purpose in Nova Scotia.

Mr. Gillis: Have any projects been recommended there?

Mr. Martin: Yes. One of the last projects concerned X-ray equipment for the children's hospital in Halifax. There is another project for the provision of braces for children. Those are the only two I have before me now.

Mr. Gillis: When a grant is made to a province is it made to all children who may be in the category, or must children who need assistance pay for it?

Mr. Martin: That would be a matter of policy for the particular province.

Mr. Gillis: The minister is doing all right in his department because he is making funds available. But once the funds get into the hands of the provinces do they apply to the people the department has in mind or are they told that if they are not in position to pay, the services are not available or it would be on a charity basis? Are these people to be told to go to the Rotary Club or the Red Cross for assistance? People do not want to be placed in the position of having to ask for charity. I hope at the next dominion-provincial conference the government takes a strong stand in an effort to bring our people out of the field of charity as far as grants by the federal government are concerned. If this cannot be done with the consent of the provinces we should bear in mind that we can now change our constitution.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again this day.

Progress reported.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, to meet the wishes of most members of the house, with unanimous consent I should like to move that we give priority to the bill entitled an act to amend the Canadian Red Cross Society Act.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Cruickshank: Mr. Speaker, I presume the normal procedure will follow immediately afterwards.

CANADIAN RED CROSS SOCIETY

AMENDMENT OF ACT TO PROVIDE FOR EXPANSION IN CANADA

Mr. A. A. Macnaughton (Mount Royal) moved the second reading of Bill No. 222, to amend the Canadian Red Cross Society Act.

Mr. Coldwell: Is the hon. member in charge of the bill going to explain it?

Mr. Macnaughton: Mr. Speaker, I should first like to take the opportunity to thank members of the house for their great co-operation and assistance in allowing the house to proceed with the second reading of this bill. I take it to be a tribute to the work of the Canadian Red Cross Society. This morning I tried to outline briefly the general purposes of the measure, and with your permission I shall go over the same ground again. The purpose of the bill is to allow for the expansion of the Red Cross Society in Canada. Section 1, for example, is an amendment to remove the limitation on the value of real estate which can be held by the society. This is necessitated by the rise in the value of real estate, and also because the society wishes to expand its services, particularly with regard to the establishment of outpost hospitals and blood transfusion services across Canada. Section 2 deals with the governing body.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): What are the figures on the increase in real estate holdings?

Mr. Macnaughton: Under the Canadian Red Cross Society Act the limitation is $100,000. I believe the actual value is approximately $150,000 now. Therefore we can easily see one of the reasons for the amendment. The second major point is that, with the addition of the new province of Newfoundland, the society desires to enlarge its governing body from forty to sixty members. That also entails the enlarging of the executive committee from approximately a minimum of seven to eighteen, or perhaps a few more. Last but by no means least is the desire of the society to sanction the use of the following words, "La Societe Canadienne de la Croix Rouge", as the name of the Canadian Red Cross Society in the French language. If hon. members will co-operate in passing the bill, I am sure that the extension of the services of the Red Cross Society will be helped very materially.

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): Mr. Speaker, the members of the official opposition are very glad to support the bill, and to commend the hon. member for Mount Royal (Mr. Macnaughton) for bringing it before the house. I suppose there is no organization in Canada which has done finer work through the years than the Canadian Red Cross Society. I think it has the support and admiration of Canadians from coast to coast. We are only too glad to do what we can to help the society. It is worthy of comment that one of the main reasons given by the society for asking for these amendments is so that it may go further in its wonderful work of establishing outpost hospitals and extending blood transfusion services across Canada. This society seems to have had the faculty of keeping in touch with developments from year to year, and of always being ready to serve where the need is greatest. We are very glad to be able to support the bill tonight.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, it is not often that one has an opportunity of saying a word concerning an organization of this description. While the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) said he was glad to rise on behalf of the official opposition to commend the hon. member for introducing the bill, and also to express appreciation of the society, I am sure that all of us, wherever we sit in the house, share the sentiments that he expressed. I know of no society in the world which throughout the years has done more for suffering people than the Red Cross. Too many people have looked upon the Red Cross Society as a purely wartime institution, but those who have lived nearer the outposts of the country, and in the newer provinces of Canada, have an appreciation of what the Red Cross has done between wars.

I know that during the depression years the Red Cross Society performed splendid work on the prairies in the province of Saskatchewan in aiding many people who were suffering from adverse conditions. Outpost hospitals in our northern regions were an example of what might be done in a bigger way as the days went by. This afternoon we listened to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) outlining some of the problems of his department and expressing the hopes that he and all of us have in relation to the extension of public health services on a much wider scale in Canada. When we think of what we hope to do concerning public health, of necessity we think of organizations that have laid a foundation for the kind of thing we want to do on a much larger scale than can be done by a private organization such as the Red Cross Society. During the last war the Red Cross Society inaugurated a splendid blood bank service which it has carried forward into peacetime. It organized the taking of blood in order to facilitate its use in transfusions.

One has an opportunity on an occasion of this sort to say something by way of appreciation of what this great society has done. I think the house will be pleased to learn that the governing body is to be enlarged because of the society's activities in our new province of Newfoundland. Therefore I want to say, and not only on behalf of my own party because I know my views will be shared by all members of the house, that we appreciate what the Red Cross Society has done throughout the years in war and in peace, and we hope that the measure which has been introduced by the hon. member for Mount Royal (Mr. Macnaughton) will enable the society to go forward and perform still finer work from one end of Canada to the other, including the new province of Newfoundland. We support the bill.

Mr. G. A. Cruickshank (Fraser Valley): I should like to say a brief word on this measure. I believe the hon. member for Mount Royal (Mr. Macnaughton) will be the first to acknowledge that many years before I ever arrived here certain rules of procedure were laid down by someone far more learned than I am. The hon. member for Mount Royal came to me this afternoon and was the first to admit the existence of such rules. I said I would gladly stand aside for such a measure although I had the privilege of speaking at eight o'clock tonight. I think the hon. member is probably a little bit more experienced than some of the members who interrupt from time to time. As it happened, during the first great war I was grateful for the service I was given by the Red Cross. I know what they did for me and those who served with me. But particularly do I know and appreciate, on behalf of the people of my riding, what the Red Cross did during our time of trouble last year, when we had flood conditions in the Fraser valley. To me it is not a question of being asked to contribute to the Red Cross. To me it is a privilege to contribute in any form, whether by donating blood or giving money. What the Red Cross has done, not for the Fraser valley, not for the province of British Columbia, not for Canada, but what it has done for the whole world entitles it in my opinion to the support of every hon. member of this House of Commons. I can assure the hon. member for Mount Royal (Mr. Macnaughton) that I am entirely behind any effort he makes in behalf of this magnificent organization.

Mr. A. L. Smith (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, I rise to take part in this discussion because, in spite of what some people may think, I have an interest in the subject that has been raised. Like other hon. members I am anxious to compliment and commend the hon. member for Mount Royal (Mr. Macnaughton) on bringing forward this bill. Some people may criticize the Red Cross because of the way its money is raised; but the simple fact is that when people are in trouble, when danger threatens or disaster strikes in any part of Canada or the United States, this organization stands ready to alleviate the sufferings of the people concerned. So anything we can do to help the Red Cross must appeal to every member of this house.

I have had some experiences in this connection, one of which might interest the house. The Red Cross is based upon the Geneva convention. During the early days of the last great war the president of the Canadian Red Cross happened to be a friend of mine who lived in Regina, and who is now a member of the court of appeal of that province. We graduated in law together; and if the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) were here I might suggest to him that I would like to join my friend of law student days on the august bench of my province. But that gentleman learned something, which I want to tell you about. When he assumed office as president of the Red Cross and came to Ottawa there was not a single copy of the Geneva convention in this city. In a worthy effort the government had the splendid idea that, as part of the war effort, it should take care of the financial responsibilities of the Red Cross. I am not criticizing the government of that time for this, because we all assumed we knew what the Geneva convention said. That action, of course, would have been entirely opposed to the whole principle on which the Red Cross was founded. That organization only operates in other countries in time of war because of the fact that it is not supported by the governments of any of the contending parties. That is the whole basis of the Geneva convention. So this splendid chap had to keep on searching until at last—and I am looking at the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll)—he found a copy of the Geneva convention in the public library in Toronto. From that copy many other copies were made, so now I take it that if anyone should seek a copy of the Geneva convention it will be readily available.

I merely mention that incident, Mr. Speaker, because we all have certain things preached to us for years and we assume that they are like the laws of the Medes and Persians and cannot be altered. The fact is, of course, that the Red Cross in Canada and every other country in the world is based absolutely upon the Geneva convention.

It would be a waste of your time and mine, Mr. Speaker—and frankly I have more time than you have—to try to deal at length with the continuous achievements of this organization. Perhaps the knowledge most of us have is largely confined to the communities in which we live. Following the remarks of the previous speaker I remember how shocked we all were two sessions ago when we learned of the conditions then existing in the province of British Columbia and particularly in the Fraser valley, from whence my friend comes. If ever I was really proud of the parliament of Canada it was when this parliament to a man supported the expenditure of public money to meet that emergency. But the Red Cross were there first. They looked after the job; all we did was provide some money, most of it after the event, to back up the excellent work done there by various organizations.

I was not alive during the Crimean war, and the name of the nurse who founded the Red Cross escapes me for the moment—

Some hon. Members: Florence Nightingale.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Incidentally my younger brother is married to another Florence Nightingale. Even to have this matter discussed in this house must recall to everyone who has read any history the heroic deeds of that noble woman. That was the beginning, not particularly of the Red Cross in our country, but of the idea of the Red Cross as between countries. The Red Cross of the world owes its origin to her efforts on that occasion, when she looked after not only British soldiers but the soldiers of our enemies. Today in this House of Commons, we can do a trifle more towards this worthy cause.

I understand this bill contains three sections. I have not a copy of the bill, but I think I can speak fairly accurately from memory. May I say that the sponsor of the bill called on me today, and gave me an opportunity of reading the bill. There are only so many copies of it in English, and so many copies in French. I told him I knew what it meant, and I am for it; go out along the highways and byways and see some of these other chaps, so you can bring them into the picture. I have been handed a copy of the bill, and I am going to preserve this among my mementos. I have four grandchildren, all boys. My grandchildren will say, "Did old super-granddaddy get this particular copy in the House of Commons?" The answer will be, "Yes, he did, and you just follow old granddaddy; you will be broke, but you will have an awful lot of fun."

This bill contains three sections. I hear a number of those wealthy Conservatives around me laughing. I notice that I buy my own lunch, as a matter of fact, rather regularly, so we can let that go. Gentlemen, do not be cynical about what I am going to say, because your pipe line bills would not have got to first base, anyway. I should like to say that the unanimous consent given to the member for Mount Royal shows that the principle of hard things, money things, is not the most important in our lives. It means that human understanding and sympathy are still the main factors that control the thinking of the members of this House of Commons. For that I compliment them, including myself.

Some people laugh at sentiment. They say, "That is sentiment." Listen, Mr. Speaker, and gentlemen of this House of Commons: Unfortunately, on one side the controlling factors in human conduct are still greed and selfishness, but on the other side the controlling factor is sentiment. I am happy that it is so. I do not want to be one of those people who live by pure reason. Psychologists tell me that at about 32 years of age those fellows go to their mental institutions, and they never leave. Those fellows are the gold medallists in our universities. The answer is that they have single-track minds. They are confined to one idea, so they have a good development on one side of their cerebellum, while the other side pushes in, and out goes sanity; that is the whole story of insanity in this country.

Old as I am, I still remember that the pleasant things that have happened to me throughout life have been those of sentiment. Perhaps I am quite unable to reason; I do not know. When I meet a fellow who is too reasonable, I know from the outset that he is utterly wrong. I can assume that, and experience has proven that I have nearly always been right in my judgment of that sort of person.

I shall not take any longer—

Mr. Fulton: Just another five minutes.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): My great difficulty is that all my forensic life—for the benefit of some of you chaps who do not practise law, that means a blow-hard fellow who talks a great deal—in the courts, I have been subject to a control almost equal to that exercised by you, sir. In so far as I am concerned, I am more controlled by what you think than by what you say. You and I have never had a bit of difficulty since this House of Commons opened a short time ago.

Telepathy is a great thing. I am not a telepathist, but I think you are because, you know, we have been talking about these rays, and that sort of thing. All I need to do is look in that direction, I do not even have to look at the Speaker. Something emanates from him that tells me I am wrong. As a matter of fact, I think it is starting about now, so I shall not go very much further.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): You know, Mr. Speaker, I mean every word I am saying about you.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I did not know that word "order" was automatic. Apparently I started something I did not intend to do. I think the inclusion of Newfoundland—I do not know how to pronounce it. We have seven members from that province, so we get seven pronunciations; none of them really knows how to pronounce it. It means that this is probably the last word we shall hear about it. We are going to give that province a lot more bonuses, but we went into this with our eyes open. I think it will be well worth everything which we put into it. I do say that it is perhaps the last sentimental link which unites this tenth new province with us, and makes it part of this country. I say, Mr. Speaker, what could be more fitting than our joining with them in this grand sentiment of the Red Cross, and through the Red Cross to help the unfortunate wherever they may live, and irrespective of what may have happened to them.

Seriously, I believe that it is a link between us. For years and years we have read of the sentiment that binds us to the British commonwealth, or that new word, the commonwealth, if you like. Let no one, unless he be stupid—that is too harsh a word, let us say "dumb" because it is better understood by most people—unless he be dumb, dare contend otherwise than that sentiment is something which is stronger than bonds or steel chains in binding peoples together.

May I close, and it is only half past eight—

Mr. Rinfret: Another five minutes.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Let us make it another three minutes, and then we shall both be happy. These people have been quite generous to me, Mr. Speaker, in these interjections. You do not know how I appreciate them. I really love the original thinking that is behind the interjections which I get. My difficulty is with my hearing. I have not yet got one of those hearing aids, but when I get it I am going to share it with the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) so that we shall both hear a little better and perhaps we shall both be greatly benefited as we go along. He is a man of prejudices and does not like them. I would wear them on both ears to hear anything that you say, sir, and particularly the intelligent and brilliant remarks that come from the opposite side of the house. And if I were in a tough spot I would need only turn to these gentlemen, these hon. gentlemen, on my right. May I say, sir, that I use the word "honourable" in its very best sense because I know of no one who is able to pronounce the word "carried" just the way they do.

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I am glad to have the desk-thumping so ably led by my very great friend and great scientist; but he told me he was going to do that, and therefore it is just an arrangement between him and myself. He nods his head in approval. What I said was completely untrue so he and I stand on the same basis. I know that, because anyone in this house who speaks untruths is doing something which is quite beyond parliamentary language. I said a moment ago that I spoke an untruth. I immediately withdraw the statement with respect to myself and hope that I shall not be penalized by having myself named and expelled again from this august assembly.

I am closing with this one remark. We have Newfoundland coming in. They want to own more property. The blood banks in the province and in the city in which I live, which are operated by this Red Cross Society, are in my judgment the greatest single contribution to human effort for the saving of life and the relieving of pain that science has yet developed, if it were for nothing else. Remember, in all these various communities they need properties in which these blood banks can be carried on. It cannot be done without it. It is an enlargement of the activities of the Red Cross which we knew nothing about just a few years ago. Therefore the bill introduced by the hon. member for Mount Royal, that 200-foot hill they have in Montreal, is a splendid thing, a splendid contribution to decency and efficiency in the relief of pain and suffering.

May I close, as I began, by complimenting the hon. member, who is a new member, for taking the interest which he has in this matter, and permitting us, unanimously I hope, to agree with every line that he has put into the bill. It is but the expression of human kindness, of human decency from all of us, and I hesitate to think of the attitude of mind of anyone who might oppose this noncontroversial and splendid objective which he seeks to promote.

Mr. J. H. Dickey (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that we all agree with the words of appreciation which have been used in the house tonight with respect to the work of the Red Cross Society. I certainly am not going to take up the time of the house to repeat what has already been said several times, but I do want to say that it is my belief that this bill will be extremely effective.

As you know, sir, one of the purposes of the bill is to improve the transfusion service of the Red Cross Society. I am sure that at least three hon. members who have preceded me in this debate will recognize the very appearance of this bill on the order paper as a life-giving transfusion to their ailing filibusters.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): What you need is an operation, not a transfusion.

Mr. Cruickshank: That is all right, I will give him plenty.

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): I only wish that time permitted me to say all the things which I should like to have the opportunity to say in praise and commendation of the work of the Red Cross; but in view of the swift passage of time and the proximity of nine o'clock I regret that I shall not have the opportunity which I should like to pay my tribute to the organization whose principal act it is sought to amend here tonight.

The hon. member who has just spoken seemed to confuse the issue. I rather felt that, instead of the word "transfusion", had he used the word "translation" he would have been closer to the principle involved in the bill before us; because, as I understand it, we are faced with the necessity of finding in the French language words adequate to express what we say in the English language with regard to this great organization whose bill is before us this evening.

With practically everything that the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith) has said I find myself in complete agreement. Indeed, I am lost in admiration, Mr. Speaker, of the brilliance, the erudition and the well balanced mentality of the graduates of the Methodist college, so different, if I may say so, from the graduates of other institutions of learning whom occasionally we hear condemned in this house.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I hope the hon. member will permit me to say that I am the only continuing Methodist in Canada.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to permit the hon. member to say that; but I think he will permit me to say that, from whatever institutions of learning one may be fortunate or unfortunate enough to have graduated, when we in this House of Commons are brought face to face with a bill in support of the Red Cross Society those petty differences which we may have had in the past, and not only those, but the major differences which may have divided us, disappear, and we are united in the tribute which we wish to pay to that particular organization.

No words, Mr. Speaker, are adequate to express the admiration which we have for the work of the Red Cross Society. I recall the floods in British Columbia last year; I recall the work which the society did during the war years. I recall not only the major disasters of war, famine, flood and pestilence, but also the minor disasters where perhaps just one family was involved, perhaps a fire had levelled a humble dwelling to the ground and one family's lifework and life's saving had been wiped out overnight.

In a nation of 13 million people, all too often unfortunately the suffering of one single family is lost sight of, even by those great and beneficent agencies set up under our Department of National Health and Welfare, and under our provincial welfare departments. Even to those departments, working on a grand scale, the suffering of one individual or one family may be overlooked—not deliberately, but accidentally. But this never happens to the Red Cross. I have yet to hear of a single case where the sufferings of an individual or a family have been overlooked by this organization.

Canadian Red Cross Society

The Red Cross is but the expression of that great and welling charity, and the desire to do good and to bring relief to our fellow human beings, which exists in the hearts and souls of all people. However, while we all may have that desire, we do not always know in what way it can be manifested, or in what way we can best apply those sentiments which exist in the breasts of all of us. The Red Cross organization exists as a means through which we can translate into practical action the best and finest sentiments in our hearts.

For that reason it is my pleasure to support the principle of this bill and to congratulate the hon. member on the other side of the house who has the distinction and honour of having moved second reading. I take special pleasure in supporting the bill, because in my own community I have gained considerable knowledge of the work of the Red Cross Society.

Mr. D. A. Riley (Saint John-Albert): Mr. Speaker, it is indeed a pleasure and privilege to say even a few words in support of the bill introduced by the hon. member for Mount Royal (Mr. Macnaughton). I have had a great deal of experience with the Red Cross Society, particularly as it operates in the constituency of Saint John-Albert, and more particularly in the city of Saint John. Any legislation which will enable this society to broaden the sphere of its activities is one well worthy of the interest of this house.

During the war Canadian Red Cross Society units in Saint John did a tremendous work. Even after the cessation of hostilities it has not slackened its efforts in any way. In every case of suffering, Red Cross workers are first on the scene.

I should like to recall an incident which occurred a couple of years ago in the county of Saint John when we were unfortunate enough to have a rather serious forest fire. One morning at eleven o'clock, urged by the Red Cross workers, hundreds of housewives, office workers and professional people dropped their tasks and rallied to the support of the men who were working day and night to keep the fire away from their homes.

I speak of this only as an instance typical of the splendid work carried on by this great humane organization, which rallies under the banner of the red cross to relieve suffering wherever it is to be found.

I am sure hon. members are most anxious to give second reading to this bill, and I commend it to their best consideration.

Mr. P. E. Wright (Melfort): Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to talk this bill out, so in what I wish to say I shall be brief. I feel however that as a representative of one of the northern constituencies of western Canada, where a great part of the work of the Red Cross is carried on, I would be remiss in my duty if I failed to say something concerning that work.

I know that in my own constituency when the boys came back from the first world war, and settled in little settlements forty miles or so from the nearest town or hospital, the Red Cross were the first to go out and establish outpost hospitals to serve those boys, just as they had served them during the war.

Since that time they have continued to do that work, and to follow the settlements back into the northern parts of the western provinces. May I say a special word in appreciation of the services of the nurses who have gone out to those outpost hospitals and in many cases served three, four, five or ten years in them, far removed from the cities, and lacking many of the amenities of life. Yet they have given a service to the community where there was no doctor, and very often great hardship—travelling at night by dog-team or perhaps by sleigh, and acting so as to serve the community in which these outpost hospitals were situated. These nurses deserve a special word of tribute from members of the House of Commons, and it gives me pleasure to tender it. May I commend the hon. member for Mount Royal upon having brought this bill before the house. I am sure it will receive unanimous support.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish briefly to express my support of the bill and in a few words my appreciation of the work the Canadian Red Cross has done throughout the years. Like the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) my first direct contact with this organization was in the first world war. There I had the opportunity to appreciate the great work it did among the troops overseas.

I must confess that I always consider I owe the Red Cross a debt of gratitude, because it was in a Red Cross hospital that I first met my wife.

Mr. Cruickshank: Hear, hear; that was the best break you ever had.

Mr. Herridge: Realizing the work the Red Cross Society had done among the troops overseas, upon my return from overseas I had my first opportunity to see it in action on the civilian front. I remember well the immediate response of this society to the Halifax disaster. In British Columbia I had the opportunity to serve on the committee which organized the campaign for the Red Cross in the southeastern section of that province. Since that time through the years we have seen it working in the outpost hospitals mentioned by the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright). May I add that in my own constituency there is a small Red Cross hospital serving an isolated district, and doing very effective work.

May I pay tribute to the people who serve those hospitals and who at times carry on their work under difficult conditions. In the second world war the Canadian Red Cross repeated its great work, and since the close of that war has continued to carry on in the civilian field, particularly in connection with shipments of food, drugs, medical supplies and other commodities overseas which, I understand, in one year exceeded a value of a million dollars. This is a great organization with over 900,000 senior and 800,000 junior members, and with a budget of $5 million for 1949. These figures alone indicate the great support the Canadian Red Cross Society receives from the Canadian people, and the appreciation of the work it has done, is doing, intends to do and will continue to do.

I am pleased to see the sponsor of this bill receive congratulations from hon. members, and to see the house express such unanimous support of the bill and the work of the Canadian Red Cross Society.

Mr. D. S. Harkness (Calgary East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to take just a few minutes to express my wholehearted approval of this bill and of the work of the Canadian Red Cross. I should like to compliment the hon. member for Mount Royal (Mr. Macnaughton) for introducing this bill. I congratulate the government and hon. members of the house upon giving unanimous consent to permitting it to be considered at this time. I assure the house that I shall not prevent its passage by speaking too long.

One can only speak of an organization as he comes in contact with it in his own community. One of my chief contacts with the Red Cross in Calgary has been through its blood bank. The work they have done in that regard in Calgary is sufficient to enlist the support of anyone who has the general welfare of his community at heart. I have come in contact with the work of this organization through an extremely good friend of mine, Mr. Hugh Farthing, who has headed the organization in Alberta for the last two years. The work done by this organization and the time that numerous citizens of Calgary and Alberta have devoted to furthering its interests are added reasons why this bill should go through.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Dion in the chair.

Sections 1 to 3 inclusive agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

PRIVATE BILLS

ALBERTA NATURAL GAS COMPANY

The house resumed from Friday, December 2, consideration of the motion of Mr. Maybank for the second reading of Bill No. 66, respecting Alberta Natural Gas Company, and the motion of Mr. Fulford: "That this question be now put".

Mr. G. A. Cruickshank (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, I had not expected to be called upon to speak tonight but my good friend, the hon. member for Mount Royal (Mr. Macnaughton), came to me this afternoon and asked if I would defer in his favour. I referred him to Your Honour. I think hon. members will agree that no matter before this house has been more worthy of consideration than the one we have just been discussing.

I have not much time to speak tonight. All I shall probably have time to say this evening is that, since I have had the honour and privilege of being a member of parliament, in my opinion there have been two bills which have been all-important to my riding, to my province and to Canada as a whole. The one was the bill that provided for reinforcements for the troops overseas and the other is this present bill.

I sincerely believe that. I appreciate the sincerity of those who disagree with me, but I think they should credit me with the sincerity of my beliefs in the matter.

On motion of Mr. Cruickshank the debate was adjourned.

Mr. Speaker: The hour for private and public bills having expired, the house will resume the business which was interrupted at six o'clock.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Beaubien in the chair.

MINES AND RESOURCES

172. Departmental administration, $365,500.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): Mr. Chairman, last February I brought to the attention of the house a situation where certain collaborators of the nazis had been allowed to enter Canada. The hon. member for Kamloops says "alleged collaborators." I have proof positive that they were collaborators of the nazis. Owing to the dissolution of the last parliament I could not continue the case which I was building up against one of them, Jacques de Bernonville. Several men were involved and perhaps I might refresh the memory of hon. members by giving in brief the dossiers I have and which are based upon official information given to me in certain returns brought down to the house.

Jean Louis Huc, who lived in the region of Saint Gaudens in France, was looked upon as the local recruiting agent for the dreaded militia of Vichy. He tried to use his authority to compel his subordinates to follow the directives of Vichy and was himself a member of the militia to whom he delivered weapons. He was sentenced by a magistrate at Toulouse to five years' imprisonment and national degradation for life. Sentence was passed in September 1945.

Julien Labedan was a uniformed and armed member of the militia who took part in operations against the maquis of Haute Savoie and unhesitatingly followed the orders of Darlan. He was sentenced to death at Toulouse during January, 1945, for treason.

Georges Montel, a doctor and surgeon, was appointed first assistant to the mayor of Annecy by the Vichy government and was an impassioned speaker for the cause of that government. He is reputed to have urged that war be declared against Britain and the United States. In 1946 he was sentenced to hard labour for life by the court of Haute Savoie.

Andre Boussat, another doctor, was found guilty of dealings with the nazis and sentenced by the court at Agen in July, 1945, to penal servitude for life. He was a moving spirit as well as an ardent propagandist for the militia.

Michel Seigneur, still another doctor, was a strong Vichyite and a member of the militia. He attended the school for militia leaders where his file stated that he was an "excellent element from every standpoint; among the first of his year; perfectly in his place." In March, 1945, he was sentenced to death at Poitiers. These men are now here in Canada.

There is still another and very much worse case. I refer to de Bernonville who worked with the Germans in north Africa and became military commandant of the Lyons area. As I said before, amongst his duties there was the identification of British and other allied officers who had been dropped into France by parachute and were subsequently caught. He was accused of having caused the death of many Frenchmen. In February of this year I partially placed upon the record the sworn testimony of Maurice Nedey who had been tortured by de Bernonville, but my time expired before I could complete the statement. I may say now that Nedey was sent to Buchenwald camp and most fortunately escaped from there. A member of the house in the previous session, the member for Charlevoix-Saguenay, who I believe was counsel for de Bernonville, took exception to the things I said and he answered me on February 24, 1949. I am not going to take the time of the house to answer him, but I can assure hon. members many of the statements he made were quite inaccurate. I can only point to his allegation that according to the French ambassador ninety per cent of the maquis were communists. He stated the French ambassador said that, which is certainly not the case. He mistranslated a telegram, and he was responsible for other misstatements which can be proven. In approaching all these charges he implied that I was necessarily a sympathizer with communists, or communism. I repeat now what I said very bluntly before, that the man who thus accuses me, or any other members of my group in the house, is either a liar or a knave, and in all probability both. He accused me of harbouring sentiments against French people because I opposed the entry of these collaborators into Canada. That also is not true because when the government of Canada placed French citizens on exactly the same basis as any other individuals coming to this country, we were amongst the first to welcome this move. Even more stupidly I have been accused of anti-Catholicism because I opposed the entry of these men to Canada. I think my record in the house and outside of it will prove that I have no intolerance of any group because of race or religious belief. Such a concept is anathema to me. I do not know the religion of these men. All I know is their political records, and it is solely on the political basis that I oppose them.

I should point out, however, that when de Bernonville was sentenced to death it was not, as the member for Charlevoix-Saguenay said, when there was an alleged reign of terror in Toulouse in 1944. He was sentenced to death in October, 1947, when the premier of France was Mr. Paul Ramadier, and the minister of justice was Mr. Andre Marie who, if he were in this House of Commons, would feel perfectly at home in the ranks of the Conservative party.

I am told that once again a board has been set up to consider the de Bernonville case. I do not know whether or not that is so, but I should like to produce certain other evidence I said I had. I am not going to read it all, but if the minister does not have copies I shall be very happy to supply him with these statements. There is one given by Julien Lessaque which reads:

I, the undersigned, Lessaque, Julien, commandant at Givry (Saone et Loire) attest that my brother, Lessaque, Jean, twenty years of age, from Rosey, Saone et Loire, belonging to the Cruchand Maquis took part in the battle with his group on June 12, 1944, with the occupants of Givry. He was wounded and captured by the militia stationed at Cortiamble, a suburb of Givry, under the command of de Bernonville. He was questioned and tortured and while in prison at Chalon, he managed to send me word. This paper was sent to the commandant of Chalon and Saone and was never returned to me. On July 18, 1944, I learned that my brother had been shot by the Germans. I am sure that my brother had only as his object to fight the aggressor and to liberate the country. It is therefore de Bernonville who is entirely responsible for his arrest, tortures, and his death. I truly hand over this present attestation in order that it may be put on the file of this unworthy Frenchman.

It is signed at Givry on November 23, 1948. I shall only read one other. There are others if the minister wishes them. This one is written by one Madame Bonnet whom de Bernonville made a widow. It reads:

I, the undersigned, Vv. Bonnet, Maurice, declare under oath having been arrested on May 31, 1944, by a group of militia men who were at Chalon-sur-Saone under the order of commandant de Bernonville. After having been closely questioned at the hotel Moderne, I was taken to the prison of Chalon-sur-Saone. I admit that they were not looking for me but for my husband as being a member of the resistance and who had just escaped them. I was to be released on June 24, as my husband was arrested again on June 9 during a battle at Givry, Saone and Loire, together with militia men and a group of F.F.I. of whom he was the leader.

Very severely wounded by seven shots during this battle and taken prisoner, he went through terrible tortures, namely, hanged by the feet regardless of his severe wounds, then turned over to the Germans who left him forty days in the Chalon prison without any care and shot him on July 18 with one of his men (Lessaque) who was arrested with him. I add that de Bernonville was perfectly aware of the tortures inflicted by his men on the French he ordered to arrest.

That is signed by Madame Bonnet at Chalon-sur-Saone on November 21, 1948. As I say, there are many other instances which I could give to the house. But now I want to point out that one, Jean Bonnel, a resident of Montreal, said that de Bernonville was one of the heroes of France and instead of sending him to his death we should kiss his feet. He added these words:

I will do everything to keep de Bernonville from being delivered to the present government of France, a government of cretins, assassins and bandits.

One who is now a member of the house and also mayor of Montreal, Camillien Houde, stated that the deportation of de Bernonville would be "an iniquity". He went on to say:

This crying injustice—we can call it this infamy —cannot pass in silence.

We have other amazing declarations such as that of the judge of the court who, according to newspaper reports, said that he would ask the authorities at Ottawa to grant de Bernonville asylum in Canada along with his family. I think I might add to these testimonies that of Pierre Laval who was shot as a traitor in France. I will translate this very roughly. It is signed by Pierre Laval at Vichy and dated the 6th of July, 1944. It is to the effect that de Bernonville was becoming energetic in the militia. He proved on numerous occasions his ability to maintain order in Haute Savoie and distinguished himself in the way he defeated the maquis in certain engagements, details of which I have already given to the house.

I do not think there is any argument at all for the presence of de Bernonville in Canada. I am informed that the government intends to press for his deportation, and I hope they will be successful in their endeavour. There is more to it than merely the matter of de Bernonville. There is also the matter of statements which were made last year by ministers of the crown when this whole most obnoxious business was first exposed. The then minister of mines and resources declared in public that these men had been screened, and that they were accepted as being proper applicants for entry into this country. He was seconded in his statements by the then acting prime minister, who is now the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Both of these gentlemen said these men had been screened. I challenge the accuracy of that statement because it was not true. If it was true then the screening was most incompetent. What was even worse and more unbelievable was the suggestion that these men had been screened by officials of the department, and that therefore these officials were responsible for their entry into Canada by consenting to their coming here. That was entirely untrue because the officials of the department had recommended that these men be deported, and the government overruled their recommendations and accepted them into Canada. The then acting prime minister went even further. He spoke of hasty trials. When any hon. gentleman is acting as prime minister of a country he has to be rather judicious in the remarks he makes about the courts of a friendly nation. The Minister of Trade and Commerce has all the finesse of a bull in a china shop when it comes to diplomacy, and he made an extraordinary mistake when he said that these trials had been hasty. Very shortly afterwards he was called upon by the ambassador of France who, after consultation with the minister, issued a statement. The following is the statement issued by the French ambassador:

> The ambassador pointed out that the persons in question, who have been condemned in absentia, were tried by French courts according to correct legal procedures and found guilty of major crimes. He further stressed that their concern for their honour should prompt these Frenchmen to go and appear before the courts of their country, where every opportunity of defending themselves would be given to them.

The acting prime minister, the Right Hon. C. D. Howe, issued the following statement:

> I have seen the communiqué of his excellency the ambassador of France. I am able to confirm that at no time since the end of hostilities has the French government presented any request for extradition to the Canadian government, nor would I wish to question the ambassador's assurance that the trials in absentia were conducted according to correct legal procedure.

Of course that puts a rather different complexion on it because, as has been pointed out, justice, as it was meted out in France, has been lenient. There were 160,000 cases of collaboration reported, not many when one considers the four years of occupation. Some 820,000 French citizens were deported by the nazis. Some 222,000 were killed during deportation, and 30,686 were shot in France by the invaders. So far as French justice is concerned, of the 160,000 cases there were only 5,500 death sentences, and only 791 carried out. I do not think there can be any aspersions cast on French justice in that regard.

The Prime Minister also said, as one might expect in the light of cabinet loyalty, that he agreed with the regularizing of the entry of these nazi collaborators, and he said:

> I am satisfied with that. In my judgment that should be final.

"Final" only in the judgment of the Prime Minister, Mr. Chairman. There are certain questions which I wish to ask the Minister of Mines and Resources. The first one is whether he can tell me the composition of the tribunal which has been appointed to consider the case of de Bernonville. Following upon that, I should like to know if the minister has any information about the trail of Michel Seigneur at Limoges in France.

Mr. Croll: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): I wonder if I might have my questions answered first.

Mr. David A. Croll: Mr. Chairman, I should like to commend the government for the job it has done in the field of immigration since the end of the war. In 1946 we were the first overseas nation to establish a mass immigration program from the displaced persons camps. We were pioneers in that field. We were the first from the new world to extend our hand to those unfortunates who were then rotting in the camps. We organized teams consisting of immigration, labour, medical and security officers who travelled from camp to camp recruiting, examining and processing. We procured transportation for displaced persons when it was very difficult to obtain. Two years later we were followed by the United States. To date we have welcomed 90,000 immigrants to Canada, and the United States with her vast population and resources has only taken in 120,000. In the light of these figures I think we can be very proud, and we can give credit where credit is due.

I want to say a word about the man who carried the administrative burden, the director, Mr. A. L. Jolliffe, who will have retired before we return for another session. He has been a great public servant who has spent thirty-seven years in the department during which time he has carried a very heavy load. It has not been an easy department because it deals with human beings. Many times it was an adjunct of some other department, and the immigration policy was not too clear. He has been an excellent administrator with a very penetrating mind, and has helped to carry out this country's achievements and objectives as to immigration. Many of his problems have been human problems, and he has brought consideration and understanding to them. He dealt with them in a fine warm-hearted manner as an honest man would. I think all members of the house will wish him well indeed.

I am happy to call the attention of the house to another matter, the attitude of the government with respect to those who have ventured across the Atlantic on their own. I think this house knows that in August of last year a movement was commenced across the Atlantic from Sweden to Halifax, first by a motor vessel called the Astrid, carrying 29 Estonians, which was followed by nine other small vessels bringing a total of 987 persons, of whom only twelve have been refused admission to Canada. Recently another attempt was made by the S.S. Victory, which is now in Cork, Ireland, carrying 372 passengers, who are being inspected and cleared there. These refugees were people running away from oppression. They came to our shores seeking freedom and opportunity, and we generously admitted them. They were modern Vikings who demonstrated their desire for freedom in a way most of us are incapable of. The cost of this movement was considerable; we had to feed, transport and maintain them, and the government spent almost $150,000. In admitting them the government has placed humanity above regulations, and I think it should be praised for so doing. Canada has need for such bold and enterprising people, and the department has done the country a great service.

The news that a Department of Citizenship and Immigration is being set up is most welcome. I think it is a proper recognition of the relationship that exists between citizenship and immigration, and of the long-term importance of immigration to this country. It is also, I hope, an indication of a larger and more vigorous immigration policy in future. I am heartened by the words of the right hon. Prime Minister on Friday, December 2, at page 2596 of Hansard, when he said:

> There is a probability that there will be an increasing number of persons admitted as immigrants into this country to share with us the advantages and responsibilities of developing the resources of Canada.

At another point on the same page, he said:

> It is my view that our experience in that respect has demonstrated that, while it was principally on humanitarian grounds that these people were admitted to our country, they will ultimately prove that the bread we cast upon the waters is returning to us.

So, after a generation of inaction with an immigration policy which was tantamount to a non-immigration policy; after a generation in which the once important department of immigration dwindled almost to extinction; after a generation in which almost as many people left Canada as came to Canada; it has been heartening to see a new tide of immigrants coming to our shores. Those of us, and our number is increasing, who believe that large-scale immigration is the lifeblood of a young, vigorous nation, are gratified that the government has admitted more people to Canada in the last four years than it did in the whole preceding 14 years.

The latest figures indicate that Canadians are now staying at home. The border has lost its lure. We might ask what has suddenly happened in Canada? I wish to give this house five potent reasons that have fired the imagination of young and old in this country; they are the main reasons why Canadians are staying at home today. I remind this house, first, of Chalk River, with its scientific research; Polymer, with its great engineering advances; the western oil fields, with their liquid gold; Labrador, Ungava and Quebec, with their iron ore; and the Northwest Territories, which is an empire all its own. Truly, the twentieth century belongs to Canada. Those are frontiers that have, as yet, been unscratched. The natural resources are almost limitless.

The need for people is still with us. This great war has swelled the post-war wave of immigrants, but there is still plenty of room for more. Those who came to us have become part of the Canadian mosaic. They have enriched our economy and our culture, contrary to all predictions. As I have already stated, they have remained here. Is it any wonder that we should want more of them? When we look about, we find that the sources of immigration are drying up. With the exception of the countries on the western fringe of Europe, Russia has closed the continental door in our face. No one goes in, and no one comes out.

In Britain, the traditional source of much of our immigration, we find her economy so depleted she has taken in great numbers of them, too. Faced with that situation, we must revise our standards considerably if we want to retain our present healthy level of immigration. If the flow is dwindling, we must open the sluice wider. We have recently heard the news that immigration this year is falling far short of our figures for last year. The figure for 1949 is one-fifth less than for 1948; I think that is a serious situation, because that is one import upon which we cannot afford to cut down. People have always been our most valuable import. Unfortunately, many countries have had to establish a form of export control on people, and that is one reason for our falling immigration figures.

There are several solutions to this problem. The first is to extend the degree of relationship which renders immigrants admissible to this country. This is badly needed. At present, the regulations authorize the entry of certain categories of relatives, extending as far as unmarried nephews and nieces under the age of 21 years. Yet, the fact is that in four years we have drained that valuable field and also of mothers, fathers, brothers, sisters, nephews and nieces; they have nearly all been spoken for. There are still many who want to come to Canada, and who would make good and useful citizens, but who fall outside the present categories of relationship. I do not believe there is one member in this house who has not had at least one heart-breaking case brought to his attention, and has been told that nothing can be done.

I ask this house, by what stretch of the imagination is a nephew 25 years old less desirable as an immigrant than his younger brother of eighteen? He is still excluded, however. Why should we admit a niece, but not a cousin? Why may a single man come in, yet we exclude married couples. I believe these categories are unrealistic. They should be abolished. If they cannot be abolished immediately, they ought to be abolished progressively. We could abolish them by gradually expanding the right, first to married nephews and nieces over 21 years of age; then to cousins, and then to any degree of relationship.

I think the test of admissibility to this country must be twofold. First, is the immigrant a useful citizen; and second, is there someone in Canada who will accept responsibility for him, who will guarantee accommodation and maintenance until he becomes self-supporting. Then, providing they are in good health, physically and ideologically, they should be encouraged to come to Canada to build new lives here. A second solution is to attract settlers from countries which, in the past, have sent us many fine Canadians. We want settlers from the British isles; of course we do.

An hon. Member: Scotchmen.

Mr. Croll: There are none better. Then, of course, we can look at Scandinavia, Holland and France. I was thinking particularly of Italy, a land which, to my personal knowledge, has supplied us with some of our best citizens. Today Italy is a great reservoir of manpower, yet the Department of Labour Year Book indicates we have only brought in 250 Italians since the end of the war. They were immigrant workers, such as terrazzo workers, and stonemasons. Italy is a country that has always been overcrowded, lacking resources. Her economy is reduced to a point where she must export people, if she wishes to achieve any kind of stability. This is a great opportunity for us, and we cannot afford to miss it.

Italian settlers have come to Canada since the turn of the century. They are sober, hard-working people who have made a worth-while contribution to this country. The Italian settler fits in any place. He is a farmer, artisan, merchant and worker. When he comes to Canada, he comes here to stay. Canada has never been his half-way house. He is a permanent acquisition, and a very good one indeed. Today there are thousands of skilled and unskilled prospective settlers in Italy, who seek nothing better than an opportunity of coming to Canada. We, in turn, need them as much as they need us. Our absorptive capacity in this country has not even been scratched.

I should like to see this government mount a full scale immigration scheme, designed to draw us the best type of settlers from Italy and other free European countries. Our immigration service in Europe is now functioning, and functioning very well. I think they can handle a much larger flow than is at present passing through their office. We have helped a great deal to reduce the displaced persons population in Europe. Now I think we should turn to that portion of Europe's people who are not displaced persons and give them an opportunity to qualify for entry into Canada. We can do that best by expanding the classes of people who are admissible and by vigorously going after the very best type of immigrant.

I think it is highly significant that in our history periods of national prosperity and high immigration have usually coincided. I am not trying to propound the theory that prosperity causes immigration or vice versa, but I do believe that immigration and prosperity stimulate each other. A glance at the last four years would affirm it, and a look at our past history would reaffirm it. Our post-war immigrants have brought to this country brains and skills. They have founded scores of industries and have given employment to thousands. If we are to continue to grow in this country, if our national income is to continue to increase, if our prosperity is to last, we must have more people; we must have more customers and we must have more consumers and we must have a larger internal market. I plead again with the government and with the department to continue to stimulate immigration in this country. It is my firm belief that we must have more Canadians. In order to have more Canadians we must have more immigrants.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): The minister has not answered my questions yet.

Hon. Colin Gibson (Minister of Mines and Resources): The question the hon. member asked was first of all about the composition of the board that will consider the de Bernonville case. The board is arranged for. It consists of members of the department. It is not customary to give their names, as we do not want to have their names announced until the hearing actually takes place. Counsel has been appointed and the board hearing will be started as soon as the counsel is ready to proceed with the case.

My hon. friend also asked whether we had particulars of the trial of Michel Seigneur. I would say that details of that kind do not come to my department; they go to the Department of Justice where any screening is arranged for, but we do not ourselves have the particulars of those files.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): Can the minister tell me where we can get the information contained in the sessional paper I have here, 61-H. I presume this did not come entirely from his department but from other departments as well.

[Mr. Croll.]

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): That was before I was in the department. I understand that was an order for return, and papers for that are supplied by all departments.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): The reason I ask is that I have information that Seigneur was accused and condemned for having been an inspector general of the Waffen S.S. I should like to remind the minister of this. In the last parliament seventy-nine days elapsed before this order for return, 61-H, came down. Seventy-nine days elapsed and I got it the day before the house dissolved. The government has beaten that record now. Since the notice of my question and the order for return was passed on de Bernonville over eighty days have elapsed and I do not have the information I should like to have. Nevertheless I was given certain information, certain transcriptions of evidence of the courts in France about these individuals. I have the transcript of the court of appeal about Seigneur. What I should like to know from the minister is whether the record of the trial at Limoges is in the possession of the department.

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): I do not know anything about it. The question has not been raised with me since I have been in the department. I have not looked into it. I do not know anything about the papers. If the government has any they are not in my department.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): This is a serious matter. Here are men whom I accuse of being nazi collaborators. The minister knew I was going to bring up this matter. I would have thought that he would have made himself fully conversant with it, and would correct me if I am wrong or agree with me if I am right. I cannot find out this information about Seigneur at the moment. Therefore I pass on the information which I have here. I say that this man, whose entry into Canada has perhaps by now been legalized, was sentenced to death for being an inspector general of the Waffen S.S. I am talking about Seigneur now. All these men came into Canada on false passports, on forged passports. I should like to know what sort of security existed to allow them to come here when obviously they could have had no background but names which were assumed. Were they smuggled in?

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): Mr. Chairman, the cases that have been referred to were considered some time ago, before I was in the department. I understand that they were carefully screened at that time and the decision was made that they would be permitted to remain in this country. Since then I have not heard from the hon. member that he had any further evidence that he wished to have considered, and certainly since I have been in the department I have not even looked at their files because the matter had not come up.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): I am not quoting the evidence now. I want to know how these men with false passports were screened. How could they be screened? The minister must know because evidence has been read into the record that his department officials and security officials recommended against their staying in Canada. He knows that. If any decision was made it was purely a political one, I assume at cabinet level. The minister ought to know something about that. While I am not accusing him the government must assume the responsibility. How were these men cleared by security if they had false passports?

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): Mr. Chairman, the fact that a person had a false passport does not conclusively prove that he is not a desirable person to enter this country. For example, people have escaped from other countries and come here and landed without any passport at all. They have had to be examined and screened to find out what their background was. If they were approved, they were allowed to stay. If they were not approved they were of course deported.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): By whom?

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): Department officials and security officials recommended that they be sent back. They came into this country on false passports. We have been told that they were screened. How could they be screened? Yet I am told they were screened. They came in here with false passports, under false names. They could have no background at all. What sort of security is there? I know that there is security, and I have no objection to it. I think it is competent, but now I am told that these men were screened. I say they could not have been. Will the minister please be a little more specific and tell me how people with false passports and with false names could be screened. I want to know how that is done.

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): Mr. Chairman, the screening is done through the Department of Justice. We send to the Department of Justice any cases on which we require information. They have methods of securing reports on the individuals. If they are not satisfied and they do not give a clearance the individual is deported. If they are able to satisfy themselves and give a security clearance, then we are at liberty to admit them into this country.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): These men were screened by officials of the Department of Justice and they recommended against their entry into this country. A section of the immigration law says—I have not the exact quotation here—that they should not be allowed into Canada because they are not of good character. What was the reason for the decision to permit them to stay here? Were there extenuating circumstances? The government knows that they had been accused and convicted in France of certain crimes against our allies. What circumstances prompted the government to permit these men to stay here, knowing that they had come on false passports, knowing that they had deported seven Jewish people for exactly the same reason? What was the distinction between the seven Jews and these collaborators?

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): I understand the reason the Prime Minister gave when this matter was up in the house before was that all the circumstances had been considered, and thoroughly considered. That is, they had decided that some of the men who had been able to satisfy the authorities would be permitted to remain in this country, and those who had not would be deported.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): It is only right that we should know the circumstances, so that the names of these men can be cleared if they are not guilty. I have certain facts here which are damning. These are extracts from the trials appearing in sessional paper 61-H. The minister says there are extenuating circumstances, that there is something about the character of these men which I do not know, and which permits them to stay here. What were those circumstances, which were so important that they could override the provisions of the Immigration Act itself?

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): I cannot give the hon. member the information we have on confidential files. I can only say that the government at the time went over the material and decided that it would be justified in admitting certain ones and not admitting the others.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): All I am saying is that the minister has information which may redound to the credit of these nazi collaborators. In fairness to them, even allowing for any confidential files, he should make it public. I have put on record the case against them. The minister says he has confidential information in their favour. I ask, in fairness to them: Why not present that evidence?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): I would like to have an answer.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Just a word on this: I do not know the de Bernonvilles—

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): I know what this silence means.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): Oh, oh.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I notice great laughter over here to my immediate right over my mispronunciation of the French name. I am quite sure the honourable member—and I emphasize the word "honourable"—would not respect me much if occasionally I were to laugh at his English, something which I never have done in this House of Commons.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): My hon. friend is mistaken. I did not laugh. He is absolutely out of order.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Then I accept what you say, and I was quite wrong—as I will accept the word of any other hon. member, particularly the minister. But I wish the minister to tell me this—

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): I would never do that.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Doctor, I have done everything I can. I wish to ask this: The hon. member for Winnipeg North tells this House of Commons that certain people were convicted of crimes in France against the allies and came to this country fraudulently —and that is the only word one can use. It was thoroughly fraudulent. Now someone in the government service, as he has said, against the advice of departmental officials has decided that these people convicted even of murder, if I heard him correctly, and I think I did—

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): de Bernonville; the others are not accused of that.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): In any event, they were in opposition to the allied cause.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): That is right.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): We are now told by the minister that certain investigations have been made, and that after those investigations these persons have been admitted to Canada. So far as I am concerned, the minister's explanation is nothing at all. If the situation is that people can be admitted to this country against our laws, and the minister speaking for the government can then say, "We made an investigation and they are entitled to be here; but we will not tell you what that investigation was"—well, that is exactly the minister's position, and I say there is something not only rotten but thoroughly rotten in the state of Denmark, and even in the state of Canada.

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): Following up what the hon. member has said, let me tell him that in the last few months we have had refugee ships coming to this country from Sweden. They have carried refugees with not a document on them. May I ask him if he would insist that, because they have no documents on them, we should require that they be returned to the country from which they came?

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Oh, no.

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): You said that.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I agree with you entirely. I read all about those people. They came in ships supposed to hold fifteen people, but sixty-five or eighty-five were loaded into them. But the people the hon. member for Winnipeg North is talking about did not come that way. These people came and threw themselves on our mercy—the people you are talking about who came in the ships. But the other people came with forgeries to back their admission. That is a different situation altogether. I said "forgeries" and I mean it —forged passports.

You may be right—and I hope you are right, because I like you; I like everything about you—but on the other hand do not permit yourself, Mr. Minister, to get into a position of concealing facts which began with fraud. I do not know anything about those people. But I do know that when a man enters this country on a forged passport, even though he may have come in a suite on the Queen Mary, he has no right to be here. He may be able to do that, even though he may have an excellent name—and I have forgotten this particular name. He may have a splendid name, or may be even a count. In those circumstances I think the hon. member for Winnipeg North is entitled to know what the facts are which permit you, Mr. Minister—and I say this with the greatest respect in the world—to set aside the law and to admit this person or other persons.

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): In the first place it was not I who set aside the law, as the hon. member has said. There was no law set aside by anyone.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): An order in council.

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): I was not here at the time, but—

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Forgive me; I was not speaking of you as an individual. I know you are far above the cabinet level, and that you would never break the law.

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): When it is suggested that because someone had a passport that is not in order, he must be a criminal, that does not follow. After the war, as is well known, European countries were pretty well upset and, in order to escape from the countries in which they were living, some people obtained any kind of document procurable. That circumstance did not condemn a man when he arrived in this country.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Agreed.

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): We then investigated their background. The result of the investigations was submitted to government authority, who decided that certain individuals should be allowed to remain in Canada, and others should be sent out. Naturally, the source of the information cannot be made public, and I cannot give the details of it.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I do not want the source; I want to know what they found.

Mr. Gardiner: They found they were all right.

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West:) They found they were not collaborators who should be sent back.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): May I take it that a person who comes to this country, having been accused and convicted of a criminal offence in another country, a friendly country, is perfectly in order in coming here to stay? Is that not in violation of the immigration law? Does that law not say, in part, that these individuals must be of good character; and does not the minister know that these men were convicted of criminal offences in France?

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): No, I do not admit that they were convicted of crime. There were trials held in absentia. They had not a chance to defend themselves; and, although judgments may have been rendered against them, that does not prove they were guilty of crime or of the charges which had been laid against them.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): I point out that they had every chance to defend themselves—even asked to go back to France to defend themselves.

Mr. Gardiner: And you know what would happen to them if they went back, whether they were guilty or not.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): What would happen? May I put it the minister meant that these men would be liquidated if they went back to France?

Mr. Gardiner: One gets a bit tired sitting here listening to members who talk the way the hon. member is talking, and the way the hon. member for Calgary West was talking a few moments ago, suggesting that members of the government are not acting in accordance with the law. Anyone who has come from the old land, as my hon. friend has, knows that for ages the greatest refuge for political prisoners has been Great Britain. Great Britain never has sent anyone back to the country from which he came because of a political crime that might be charged against him and that might result in a sure sentence of death.

About the end of the war these men left Europe and came to this country. Every man who came to this country under those circumstances was properly screened. I have no hesitation in saying that as one of the members of the government I was responsible along with every other member of the government for the orders in council that were passed. Those orders in council took into consideration the fact that there had been a proper screening of these people in so far as we were able to screen them. We decided finally that some should remain here and that some should go back to where they had come from. I hope that all the decisions were made on exactly the same basis as British practice has made its decisions over the years, namely, that you do not send a man back to sure death at the end of a war because of political differences that may have existed in the country from which he came. If we made any mistakes, I hope we made them on the side of mercy.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): I can assure the Minister of Agriculture that I am completely tired of his irrelevancies; when he attempts to answer a question he skates around it in every possible way.

Mr. Gardiner: It is the only answer that could be made to the question and the only one which would agree with long-time practice in Britain or any other free democracy.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): The Minister of Agriculture has suggested that if these men go back to a friendly, democratic country which was and is an ally of ours and which will be an ally of ours again, they will be liquidated. The French ambassador to this country has made it known quite amply and clearly that if these men go back to France they will get a fair and free trial. I have placed on the record tonight the number of death sentences which were carried out in France and which were less than one per cent of those convicted. I claim that these men had no right to come to this country, that they entered illegally and have been kept here illegally.

Mr. Green: I should like to ask a question with regard to the money collected from those people who came back on the exchange ship Gripsholm from the Orient during the war. I believe that comes under his department.

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): Would my hon. friend bring that up under the immigration item later on when the official will be here?

Mr. Green: The money was collected by the immigration branch?

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): Yes.

Item agreed to.

Special projects—

173. Director of special projects—administration, $29,235.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): What is this vote for?

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): This branch looks after any special projects that require extra services which are not provided by other branches of the department. Under this vote would come the eastern Rocky mountain forest conservation board and the international boundary commission.

Item agreed to.

803. To provide for investigations into the possibility of water storage on Mayo lake, Yukon Territory, and of hydro-electric developments on Mayo river, Yukon Territory, to serve the Mayo, Keno Hill, and Galena Hill districts, $50,000.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): I think we should have some particulars on this item.

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): Investigations are being made as to the power possibilities in the Mayo area.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Is that in connection with mining operations?

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): There is a large silver lead mine up in the Mayo area.

Item agreed to.

Mines, forests and scientific services branch—

177. Mineral resources investigations, $1,598,850.

Mr. Hodgson: I think the committee should be given some information in connection with this item.

[Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North).]

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): This vote provides for office, laboratory and field investigations relating to metallic minerals, industrial minerals, fuels and mineral economics.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Is the department solely responsible for the mining operations in the Yellowknife district where there has been such development in the last three or four years?

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): Yellowknife is in the Northwest Territories which come under the dominion government. The department looks after that particular work.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Is there a special appropriation for that?

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): It comes under the general appropriation.

Item agreed to.

Bureau of mines—

805. Maintenance of plant of Abasand Oils Limited, $85,000.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): These oil sands have been discussed in the house year after year and I think we should have an up-to-date report from the minister as to what the developments have been in the last year.

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): Abasand Oils Limited was wound up and during the period before it was finally wound up the company had maintained equipment and property on the location at a cost of $85,000. When the government took over the property it was felt that the company should be compensated for the maintenance costs incurred during that period.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Have the tar sands operations been abandoned? On many occasions we have been told that these sands constitute one of the world's great oil reservoirs and it would be disappointing to know that these tremendous natural resources are being abandoned.

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): I would not say that the resources are being abandoned by any means, but the development has been suspended for the present. There has been such a tremendous development of cheaper oils that it is not considered advisable to go ahead with this development at the present time.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): What has been the total expenditure in the last ten years, say, or the total to date in connection with the development of exploitation by Abasand?

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): It will be in the neighbourhood of a million and a half dollars.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): I would point out that the United States government is hard-surfacing that part of the Alaska highway that lies within the borders of Alaska, and the time might very well come when that portion within our own borders will be hard surfaced. In that case material from Abasand might be profitably used.

Mr. Harkness: When the dominion government ceased to support any experimentation in connection with the McMurray oil sands, in which this Abasand company was engaged, I believe the Alberta government continued to work on that project. As a matter of fact I understand that last year they spent between a half and three-quarters of a million dollars on it. I should like to ask the minister if the dominion government turned over to the province of Alberta any of the plant that was built there, or any of the data it obtained as a result of the four or five years of work carried on with dominion government funds.

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): The work carried on by the Alberta government I understand is being done further north. They purchased their own equipment, and the Abasand plant was sold.

Mr. Harkness: Was there any turnover to the Alberta government of information obtained as a result of the experiments carried on by the dominion government?

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): Of course our officials are in collaboration with the officials of the Alberta government on that work; but there was no turning over of equipment to them.

Mr. Harkness: In this case I did not ask about the equipment; I asked about turning over data and information.

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): Oh, there is the closest co-operation between the mines branches of the province and the dominion on all information that is obtained.

Mr. Harkness: The statement that there was the closest collaboration still does not answer the question. I asked definitely, was the information obtained as a result of these experiments at Abasand turned over to the Alberta government?

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): My officials tell me they know everything we have done up there and that we know what they are doing at the present time, because they do keep each other informed as to the progress of any work being carried on.

Mr. Harkness: I think the minister knows something about experimental work. One of the most important features of scientific experiments and that kind of thing is the data that is obtained as those experiments are carried on from day to day. My definite question is, was the data obtained during the operation of this plant turned over to the Alberta government?

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): I understand the province got all the information we had as a result of the work carried on up there.

Mr. Harkness: In other words all the records were turned over to them?

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): I do not say the records were turned over, but I say all the information we obtained was made available to them.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Was this company which was exploiting or exploring the possibilities of these oil sands acting as the agent of the department? Is that the reason it was reimbursed for its expenditures?

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): Yes, it was financed by the government.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Did it go there initially, in the first instance, as an agent of the government?

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): I understand not in the first instance, but the government did get behind it and helped finance it.

Item agreed to.

181. Forest research and investigations, $762,990.

Mr. Hodgson: Items 181 and 182 are closely related, and I believe the minister should give some explanation.

The Deputy Chairman: These items relate to forest research investigations and forest products research; and supplementary item No. 683 relates to forest research investigation as well.

Mr. Hodgson: These two items total well over a million dollars, and I think we should have some information about them.

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): This vote is for the advancement of forest conservation in Canada generally. It embodies essential research to obtain and disseminate basic data in silviculture, including growth, yield and cutting methods; fire protection and forest inventories, designed to produce the optimum use and development of our forest resources on the basis of continuous production.

Mr. Hodgson: Where is that work being carried on?

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): All over Canada.

Mr. Hodgson: There are not just one or two particular stations?

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): We have five forest experimental stations, and in addition we have forest products laboratories.

Mr. Low: Would the minister tell the committee what if any investigations have been carried on with respect to the use of a thinner saw blade in forestry work? The reason I ask that question is this. I am told that under the methods that have been pursued up to this time from 25 per cent to 45 per cent of the potential lumber in this country is being wasted in the form of sawdust, because of the very wide and heavy steel blades that have been used. In the course of the work of this branch could the minister tell us what investigations have been carried on in respect to the use of that very thin blade—I believe they call it Scotch steel—that has been used successfully in the north country, particularly?

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): In the coming year we are setting up in this branch a model sawmill to test and develop sawmill equipment, including blades and so on. During the past year we have had one of our officials over in Scandinavia looking at the equipment and methods in use over there, so he may be of assistance in that research work.

Mr. Hodgson: Could the minister tell us where these plants are set up?

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): The forest products laboratories are at Vancouver, Ottawa and Montreal. The forest experimental stations are in Alberta, Manitoba, Ontario, Quebec and New Brunswick.

Item agreed to.

183. Grant to Canadian Forestry Association, $4,000.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): I should like to point out the valuable work being done by this association from coast to coast in Canada. I would also mention the work being done by Mr. James A. Vance of Woodstock, Ontario, who has given a great deal of time and much of his fortune to this particular phase of the conservation and improvement of our forests. We receive their publications in British Columbia from time to time, and the work they are doing is worthy of every consideration by this house and the various provinces.

Item agreed to.

Eastern Rockies forest conservation board—

184. To provide for the salaries and expenses of dominion members of the board and their alternates and sundry expenses in connection with the maintenance and operation of the Ottawa office of the board, $23,000.

Mr. Harkness: This particular project in connection with the conservation of the eastern slope of the Rockies I believe is one of the most valuable undertakings the government has initiated, and I should like the minister to tell us in a general way briefly what has been accomplished so far with respect to restoring the forest cover on the eastern slope of the Rockies, thereby conserving moisture and the flow of the streams which lead down to all the prairie provinces.

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): As hon. members know, this board which looks after the eastern slope of the Rocky mountains was set up by act of parliament. It consists of two representatives of the dominion government and one of the province of Alberta. The board receives funds each year from the dominion government, in addition to certain capital advances running over a period of six years. It is taking steps to conserve the slopes of the Rockies by providing roads and fire stations in that area, so the forests may be protected; it has power to make recommendations, and is responsible for the work that is being carried out.

Mr. Harkness: I know all that; I knew it when I asked the question. I asked what has been done, in other words what are the results? What roads have been built? What fire stations have been established? Just what has been accomplished in the year and a half or so this board has been in operation?

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): It is difficult to give all the details, but I can give a summary of some of them. For example, the contract work was confined to the main north and south road through the conservation board area, which with the exception of some thirty-one and a half miles has now been graded from Coleman, Alberta, to the southern boundary of the dominion forest experimental station in the Kananaskis river valley. The road is being built with a traffic surface twenty feet wide, the width of side ditches being additional. In high fills the road is being built twenty-two feet wide, to provide for sloughing and erosion. The New West Construction Company of Edmonton have completed 44·2 miles on their contract north from Coleman, at an average cost of $10,082 per mile. This figure only includes bridge work and bridge materials installed to the 14th November, and covers some thirty per cent of the bridge piers and abutments with no bridge superstructure being completed.

On the Kananaskis section, southerly over the Pocaterra summit the Assiniboia Engineering Company, contractors, have partly completed the grading of 31·5 miles at an average cost per mile of $12,812, which includes the cost of all concrete bridge abutments and the material therein. No superstructure costs are included.

It is the view of the board on analysing these costs that at least $3,000 per mile has been saved on these grading operations by the award of contracts on a unit price basis for various items of work, rather than on a cost plus fixed fee basis.

Mr. Harkness: Do I understand from what the minister has said that all this board has accomplished so far is the construction of a certain amount of highway near Canmore, and the construction of a few bridges to the north, less superstructure?

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): No, I would not say that was the only work by any means. I would be very glad to let the hon. member have a list of what has been done in connection with fire stations and other bits of work that have been undertaken or that are in progress. I have not all the details before me, but I should be glad to let him have the list if he so desires.

Item agreed to.

186. Forest insects control board, $13,225.

Mr. Hodgson: In the details for this item it is indicated that this covers travelling expenses and temporary assistance. This would seem to represent expenses in connection with only one man. What is this item for?

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): It really covers the salary of an executive secretary and administrative expenses of the forest insects control board, including the salary of a stenographer and travelling expenses of members of the executive staff, as well as a per diem allowance to each member of the board except those who are employees of the dominion government.

Mr. Hodgson: Does the minister mean to say this is all that is being done in connection with forest insects control?

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): This is really an advisory body; the experimental work is done by the Department of Agriculture, in the entomological branch.

Mr. Graydon: They handle the termites there.

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): Yes. These expenses are met by our department.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): May I just refer to the voluntary work being done by a great number of men who are interested in this phase of forest protection. I should like to mention the name of Mr. A. W. A. Phair of Lillooet, British Columbia, an entomologist who has given generously of his services and has not charged the government one cent for the work he has done.

Item agreed to.

Surveys and mapping bureau—

194. To provide for the payment of fees of the board of examiners for dominion land surveyors, of the secretary and of the sub-examiners and for travelling expenses, stationery, printing, rent, etc. (the fees of B. W. Waugh, J. E. R. Ross and J. L. Rannie, members of the board, and A. W. W. Cole, secretary, are to be paid out of this sum), $2,100.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): What are the total expenditures in connection with all these surveys, including geological surveys, mapping, topographical, and so on? We are passing items here one of which amounts to nearly $3,500,000, another to $1,200,000 and another to $1,130,000. These appear to me to be very expensive undertakings.

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): These are expensive undertakings. We have been doing a great deal of survey work trying to catch up with the work we were unable to do during the war. These include all types of surveying, geodetic, topographical, hydrographic, geological, and so on in various parts of Canada. During the past year we have had more parties out than for a good many years, in an endeavour to get ahead with the mapping of this country.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): When this surveying is done is it put on record and done forever, so it need not be pursued further?

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): It does not have to be done over again once it has been done in a certain area, unless it is a different type of survey. We are doing a great deal of air photography and mapping in the Northwest Territories over land that up to the present has never been properly mapped.

Mr. Gillis: I understand the minister's department has had a party in Nova Scotia for the past year or so making a technical survey of the coal resources of that province. I suppose that would come under this vote. I wonder if the minister is in a position to give us any information as to what progress is being made, and about how long it will take to complete that work. I am interested in this because it is rather important for our province, where coal is the basic industry and the old mines are running out. I am just wondering to what extent the department may have discovered new resources?

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): We have had two parties working in Nova Scotia, and we intend to have four parties down there in the coming year working in co-operation with the Nova Scotia department of mines, in making a detailed stratographical map of coal deposits in the Sydney area; a one-mile geological map of the coal area in Springhill—there are two parties doing that. There is a continuous systematic geological map of Wolfville; a one-mile geological map of industrial minerals. I have not got a report of the results that have been obtained, but I shall be glad to ascertain what we have, and let my friend know.

Mr. Gillis: Is the work continuing?

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): Yes.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): What was the total expense for all these surveys?

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): I shall add that up.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): May I point out the valuable work done on the Alaska highway by these surveys. They established the location of lakes, and other points along the route, making it possible for the surveying of that country for settlement.

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): The member for Cumberland asked for the total amount spent for surveys. During the last year, it amounted to $7,525,000.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): How many students taking scientific courses at the different colleges are allowed in each of these survey parties during the summer?

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): It is difficult to tell because the parties vary in size, but the students apply through the civil service commission. Notices are being sent to the various universities now, as a matter of fact, so the students can apply for appointment to the various surveys for the coming summer.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Could the minister state the number of students that will be given an opportunity for employment during this coming season?

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): I understand it is in the neighbourhood of 1,000.

Item agreed to.

197. To provide for studies and surveys of the Columbia river watershed in Canada, $350,000.

Mr. Herridge: This item is to provide for surveys on the Columbia river watershed in Canada. Can the minister inform me how much has been spent to date on these surveys, and the reason for the $50,000 increase this year? When is it expected these surveys will be completed?

[Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West).]

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): The increase is attributable to two main causes: (a) the urgency for a decision with respect to flood control measures on the Kootenay and Columbia rivers following the disastrous floods of 1948, and (b) the increase of approximately 100 per cent in the unit costs of drilling operations. The investigations of the Columbia river basin, comprising 39,000 square miles, are designed to provide basic Canadian information necessary to plan future development of the water resources on an international basis for purposes of navigation, flood control, power development, irrigation, reclamation, fisheries, and conservation of wildlife and other purposes. Up to the present time we have spent about $1 million.

Mr. Herridge: Has the minister any idea as to when it is expected the surveys will be completed?

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): I understand a great deal of work has been done, but it will take about another couple of years to complete the work.

809. Geographical bureau—further amount required, $16,500.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): In connection with these supplementary expenditures, are they due to poor estimating or to extravagance?

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): As a matter of fact, our construction work proceeded rather well this year. We found that we got ahead in many cases, and instead of having the equipment drawn out during the winter and going to the expense of returning it, we have asked for a supplementary grant and have gone ahead with the work. I believe we will save money by doing that. In so far as the geographical bureau is concerned, the additional funds are for salary adjustments and new positions. Extra funds for field parties are required to reimburse vote 100.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): Has the museum taken any steps with regard to further work in the Hope area—

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): That comes under the next item.

Item agreed to.

203. National Museum of Canada, $177,500.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): In that connection, I hope the minister may be able to have the appropriations increased so that further observations can be made in the Peace river pass and elsewhere, for material which will be of value in the industrial and mineral development of this country.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Has the minister any policy to announce to the committee with respect to the national museum of Canada?

All members recognize the importance of this museum. From time to time some information has been forthcoming concerning the necessity for expanding this building to allow for the display of exhibits which are stored there. I should like to hear what policy the minister has.

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): There is one policy we have adopted. During the war a lot of the museum space was occupied by offices. We found that it was quite difficult to display a great many of the specimens that had been brought in. We have now been able to move out some of the departments, and we hope to have more space available to display the many specimens that have been secured, but which, previously, we have had to hold in the crates.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): In the Peace river pass there are the footmarks of dinosaurs in the sandstone. I believe it would be proper for them to be recorded in casts, which could be displayed in the museum here. They would tell of the very early history of our country.

Mr. Knowles: Will the minister explain the rather large increase in the amount requested under the heading "Printing, stationery, and office equipment" for the National Museum. The item we now have before us amounts to $20,700, and there is a supplementary item for $22,000, making a total of $42,700. The amount voted last year was $12,000.

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): Yes, the increase in the printing bill is to provide for the printing of about 7,500 copies of a bulletin in two volumes on totem poles, prepared by Dr. Marius Barbeau. I understand it is one of the best publications on this subject ever put out.

Mr. Knowles: That is not costing $30,000?

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): He is a former member of the staff of the national museum. Funds were not included in the main estimates, as it was not expected that the manuscript would be completed in time for publication this year. The manuscript is now ready, and publication is desired as soon as possible. It is proposed to set a price of $5 per copy, that is, $2.50 for each volume, and it is expected that the cost of the publication will be more than recovered in a short time, as a heavy demand has been foreseen.

Mr. Knowles: How much of this is for the publication?

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): $23,000.

Mr. Knowles: What is the status of the national museum building; is it holding up or otherwise?

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): I understand it is holding up all right. It will require some repairs. That of course is handled through the Department of Public Works, but we have had no difficulties down there up to the present time.

Item agreed to.

Lands and development services branch—
209. Roads, $197,000.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): I should like some information on this item of roads. Where are these roads, in Prince Edward Island or in the arctic?

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): On the subject of roads, very valuable work is being done in extending roads north toward the source of the atomic bomb, to Hay river and so forth from Grimshaw, Alberta. It is very necessary work which will ultimately bring the development of that country into a Pacific outlet by way of Vancouver and the Pacific Great Eastern Railway.

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): In regard to the question, the vote is to provide funds for the construction of streets and roads in the Yellowknife administrative district, extension of small roads within the settlements and leading to airports in the Mackenzie district, also their maintenance and that of the Northwest Territories section of the Grimshaw-Great Slave lake road; repairs and upkeep of road equipment.

Mr. Low: What work is being done on the Grimshaw-Slave lake highway? What are the plans?

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): To maintain them from the Alberta border northward?

Mr. Low: No; I understand that there needs to be a certain amount of repair work done particularly on the northern part of that road where it was originally built over very sandy territory. I am just wondering whether any rebuilding is contemplated by this vote.

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): We have been discussing it with Alberta. The road south from the Alberta boundary was very bad; it was on muskeg and was very difficult to maintain; from the Alberta boundary up to Great Slave lake it has held up very well. It was well built, and is holding up quite well.

210. Buildings (revote $51,100), $681,128.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): This item has to do with buildings. The minister has just told us that his department has no responsibility for buildings, that it is the responsibility of the Department of Public Works. Here is an item of $681,128.

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): This is to meet essential needs for housing and office accommodation brought about by increased mining activities and administrative responsibilities. The building program was commenced in 1945 in the Mackenzie district, the construction being carried out by the Department of Public Works. A considerable amount of the materials required was salvaged from buildings left by the United States army at Waterways, Alberta, and Fort Smith, Northwest Territories. The program has now been extended to include public day schools and accommodation for the teaching staffs in keeping with the minimum educational requirements.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): This sum of $681,000 is money provided by the minister's department but expended by the Department of Public Works.

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): Yes, that is correct.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): The Department of Mines and Resources pays the Department of Public Works out of moneys voted by this parliament through the minister's department. The Department of Public Works expends the money but is not responsible to this parliament for these expenditures.

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): Not for this item, no.

Item agreed to.

211. Water and sewages, $367,383.

Mr. Fulton: Will the minister explain this item of water and sewages?

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): That is in the Yellowknife district. We have put a pumping plant and a sewage disposal plant in that area. The dominion government does that because they have no municipal works in there at the present time.

Mr. Fulton: For whom was it put in and by whom and in what particular place?

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): In the Yellowknife townsite. There is quite a settlement at Yellowknife. They now have a school and a hospital. Since it is not an organized territory the dominion government has to do that.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): May I point out at this time that an eleventh province in Canada is about to be brought forward. The department has been working in the Northwest Territories handling these new settlements, new mining towns, and these new developments and doing a very good job in preparing the way for the day when in the Northwest Territories another province will have been carved out in that area.

Item agreed to.

Yukon division—

214. Administration, $166,500.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, there is one question I have been wanting to ask on this item for several years now and have not got around to it.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): You are not usually that slow.

Mr. Harkness: What is the matter?

Mr. Knowles: These items sometimes come along when we are in a bit of a squeeze. I take it this is an item having to do with administration of the Yukon territory so far as it comes under this government. I hope, Mr. Chairman, that hon. members will not think that I am trying to drag something in here. I think it is related to old age pensions paid in the Yukon, and the same would apply to the Northwest Territories. Who pays the 25 per cent of it corresponding to the 25 per cent paid by the ten provinces in Canada?

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): That comes under health and welfare. We do not pay it.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, this is serious. I am not trying to drag old age pensions—

Mr. Harkness: If you wanted an answer you should have started three years ago when you first thought of it.

Mr. Knowles: Under the Old Age Pensions Act the federal government pays 75 per cent of the pension and the provincial government pays 25 per cent. It is done in this way. The provincial government pays the pension in full and the federal government reimburses the province to the extent of 75 per cent. My hon. friend is telling me that there is no provincial government up in the Yukon or in the Northwest Territories. In some instances these people get the full pension. I can produce figures to show that. Who pays it? Is it a case where at least some Canadians are drawing old age pensions 100 per cent from the federal government?

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): If the hon. member does not mind I would ask him to let the question stand and I shall get an official down here who has definite knowledge of how it is handled. I am not familiar with how the payment is made.

Mr. Knowles: Let the item stand.

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): Would the hon. member mind if we carried the item? I shall get the information before we adjourn tonight.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall item 214 carry?

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): Would the hon. member mind if we permitted it to carry, on my undertaking that I will get the information for him before we adjourn tonight?

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Does the minister's department make expenditures for roads? We have passed one item of $197,000, and here is another one for $1,460,000. Who actually constructs these roads, or assumes the responsibility for seeing that the country gets fair value for the money expended?

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): The main roads are paid for by the government and the small crossroads paid for by the Yukon council.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Who lets the contracts?

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): For the main roads the department here lets them.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Not the Department of Public Works?

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): No, this department.

Item agreed to.

Yukon division—

815. Roads, further amount required, $650,000.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Here is another item. We started out with about $200,000 in the main estimates; then we jumped to $1,460,000, and now we have this supplementary expenditure of $650,000. When did the department learn that it required this additional $650,000?

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): That was an additional expense for a road we had undertaken in the first place. It is for carrying on additional work during the year. We found the contractor was getting along well with the work for which he had contracted. This is on the Mayo-Minto road in the Yukon. Therefore we arranged for him to continue with the work so that we could get more done and have the work completed at an earlier date.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Who was the contractor?

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): Mannix Construction Company.

Mr. Gardiner: A good resident of Calgary.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): You're telling me.

Item agreed to.

Yukon division—

217. Coal development, $90,000.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Coming from Nova Scotia I should like to know where this $90,000 was expended.

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): This expenditure is made in the Yukon.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): Mr. George Black, former member for the Yukon, was a native of New Brunswick. I am sure if he were here he would be glad to know this government is developing the very fine coal deposits in that area, so as to make coal available to settlers in the Yukon Territory which Mr. Black served so well for many years.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): That stops me! Where is the coal, and what is the development? You have a little bit of a mine up there, part of this Keeno Hill outfit. But cordwood is still $25 a cord around that country.

Item agreed to.

National park services—

219. National parks and historic sites services, $10,062,324.

Mr. Fulton: There is an increase under this item of $2,164,596 in the main estimates, and we are voting a further $1,255,000 in the further supplementary estimates. What is this for? I would hope it is for the construction of adequate roads in our national parks in order that we may have a system connecting the trans-Canada highway.

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): With a great influx of tourist traffic we have been making a great effort to improve our national parks, and this increase in the estimates is due principally to a construction program for the improvement of roads, bridges, camping grounds and administrative buildings. Further development is proposed for a new national park in New Brunswick.

Mr. Fulton: Has any decision been made as to whether through trucking will be allowed in the national parks which may be on the route of the trans-Canada highway?

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): No decision has been made because we do not know where the trans-Canada highway will go. We do not encourage through trucking on the roads in the parks.

Mr. Fulton: Surely a decision could be made as a matter of principle. The trans-Canada highway is practically bound to go through one of the national parks, if not more. It has been decided to assist in the development and building of the trans-Canada highway. Surely as a matter of principle it should have been decided whether or not through trucking is to be permitted in the parks—whether it be Yellowstone park, Jasper, Banff or the one on the southern route between Alberta and British Columbia. One of them will be involved. Have we not yet any decision as to whether through trucking will be allowed, and whether adequate roads will be provided?

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): I do not think that question has been taken up with the national parks service.

Mr. Fulton: Why?

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): I have no doubt some decision will be reached, but I have not heard of the matter having been brought up.

Mr. Green: I would suggest that the minister make inquiry about it, because I know the government of British Columbia is much concerned about this question as it affects the trans-Canada highway. They have not yet been able to get any assurance from the dominion government that there will be adequate facilities for trucking through the national parks. This is an important question in British Columbia, and I am surprised the minister has not had any word of this difficulty. As a matter of fact it has already restricted trade between British Columbia and Alberta to a large extent, and I think without reason.

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): The negotiations have been carried on with the Department of Reconstruction and Supply. Certainly we have had nothing passed on to us—at least, so far as I know—as to any negotiations in regard to trucking through the parks.

Mr. Hatfield: How much of the money was spent in New Brunswick on a national park? Has that national park been completed? Was the work done by contract? If so, who was the contractor? What was the cost in the national park?

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): We are working on Fundy national park at the present time, but it is not by any means completed. A certain amount of roadbuilding must be done.

Mr. Hatfield: How much has been spent thus far?

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): About $500,000.

[Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West).]

Mr. Hatfield: How much did the golf course cost?

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): That is, $500,000 in the previous year and another $700,000 this year. The golf course cost about $100,000.

Mr. Hatfield: Was the work done by contract?

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): Largely.

Mr. Hatfield: Who was the contractor?

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): The Caldwell Construction Company was one of the main contractors.

Mr. McCusker: Is that the M. J. Caldwell Construction Company?

Mr. Coldwell: I can assure you it was not.

Mr. McLure: I should like to bring to the attention of the minister a highway in a national park leading from Cavendish down to Dalvay. There is also the building of a bridge across Rustico harbour to Robinsons island. Early in the summer the engineers were working on that and I should like to know if this work will be continued.

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): I understand that work is being continued.

Mr. Fulton: There is an increase of $3,500,000 over what was voted last year in the main and supplementary estimates. I think it is important to the people of British Columbia and Alberta to know whether or not through trucking will be permitted over the trans-Canada highway route. The minister has said that a large part of this money will be devoted toward the building of adequate roads in our national parks and I think we might almost be justified in asking that this item stand until we get a full explanation. However, I am not going to do that. All I am going to ask the minister is to have a decision made in the immediate future and announce it to the house and the country so that we shall know the situation in regard to the trans-Canada highway which is bound to go through one or other of the national parks.

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): I think it is quite reasonable to say that if the trans-Canada highway is to go through the parks the people are entitled to know that. I only said that the matter had not been brought to my attention. I shall look into it.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Are any steps being taken to develop the national park in Nova Scotia?

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): Discussions are going on in that regard and one of our officials has been down with the provincial authorities looking over the area. No decision has yet been reached as I do not think the report has come in.

Mr. Hatfield: What amount was paid to the Caldwell Construction Company in connection with work in the national park in New Brunswick?

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): I have not that information here but I shall obtain it for my hon. friend.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): There is a substantial increase in this item and I should like to know how much of that increase will be spent on the Banff national park and how much on the Jasper national park? I should like to know also how many visitors entered each of those parks in the last period of time for which you have a record?

There is another simple matter I should like to refer to and I think I need only mention it in order to have it corrected. For example, if a coal dealer in Banff takes his truck to Canmore, fourteen miles away, for a load of coal, he must pay fifty cents when he brings that load back to Banff. If the minister wants more details about this I can give them, but I think this is something in administration which has just been overlooked but which should be corrected immediately. I cannot see any justification for charging a coal dealer, or any other dealer, this fee every time he goes to get a load. The revenue would be nothing, but it is rather tough on the fellow who is selling coal. I am not asking the minister to say tonight that it will be stopped, but I wish he would look into it. I have no doubt that it is something that has been inherited in the administration.

The minister's predecessor was a great personal friend of mine and I do not know just how to refer to him. He has gone to another place and I hope no one will regard that as meaning that he has gone to the bourne from whence no traveller returns—he has gone to the Senate. During the last two or three years Jasper park has received twice as much as Banff and, as far as visitors are concerned, ten visit Banff for every one that visits Jasper. The explanation for this greater expenditure has been that roads are being built, but I do not think that has anything to do with it. Now we have a new minister and I do not know whether he has been out to look at these parks.

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): I was there last summer.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): If I get an answer to the questions I have asked it will shorten greatly what I have to say about the national parks. However, there is one more thing I should like to take up and this has to do with the land in Banff national park which is available for lease. I should like to know how much land the government is prepared to lease under the usual ninety-nine year leases to persons who are ready to sign such leases. The simple fact is that the withholding of the right to lease lands controlled by the government has caused prices to rise to almost astronomical figures. I know the government has made an arrangement with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company whereby they have taken over a considerable piece of land which is well suited to residential purposes. That was done at least two years ago, and yet nothing has been done to relieve the housing shortage. I notice the assistant to the minister is taking careful notes of what I say. I should also like very much to know why the civic centre which was planned for Banff is now being built in Jasper. That is a matter of history within the last three years.

An hon. Member: Eleven o'clock.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Don't stop me. I may not be able to continue tomorrow. If the minister will answer these questions then I will help him in every way I can to get his estimates through.

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): First of all the number of visitors at Jasper and Banff during the past year—that is up to October 31—was Banff, 405,436, and Jasper, 81,831.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): That is about five to one.

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): The expenditures for this year are Banff, $1,529,000, and Jasper, $2,740,000. I may say that while the expenditure at Jasper is higher of course Banff had a great lead by having an earlier start, and a considerably greater sum of money has previously been spent on Banff.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): And why not?

Mr. Fulton: Eleven o'clock.

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): As to the question of the traffic of coal into the parks, this is the first time I have heard of it, and I shall be glad to look into it. With regard to the question of land surveys for residents at Banff, I understand surveys are being made to provide further residential facilities.

Mr. Fulton: Eleven o'clock.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Will you forgive me? I did not hear the last thing you said about surveys.

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): I said that surveys are being made at Banff to find suitable ground for residential purposes.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): After three years they should find one lot anyway, should they not?

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the item carry?

Mr. Harkness: No, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Fulton: Eleven o'clock.

Mr. Coldwell: It is past eleven o'clock. We sat until half-past six, and I do not think we are going to get anywhere tonight by sitting until half-past eleven or midnight.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Will my hon. friend not consent to our finishing even this department? There are about ten more items.

Mr. Fulton: You have got both Indian affairs and immigration. I doubt if you will finish.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Let us try anyway.

Mr. Harkness: If this little procedural wrangle is over, I notice that $7 million odd of the main item of $10 million is for the acquisition or construction of buildings, works and structures, and practically all of the further supplementary item of $1,250,000 odd is for the same purpose. Where are all these buildings and structures being constructed?

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): It is chiefly roads. It is all under one item, but the chief expenditure is on road work.

Mr. Harkness: I should like to know what parks these roads are being constructed in.

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): The biggest expenditures are in Banff and Jasper, and the road connecting the two.

Mr. Harkness: The total of these two items comes to about eight and a half million dollars. It seems to me we should have a little more information than just the minister's statement that it is mostly for roads. Having been in Banff national park several times during the past summer, I do not know where all this expenditure for roads is being made except for the improving and building of a partly new road between Banff and Radium Hot Springs.

Mr. Coldwell: Before the item is carried, the hon. member for Calgary West raised a point about tolls through national parks. Some time ago I got in touch with the former minister concerning tolls through Prince Albert park, and I was given to understand that some reconsideration would be given to these matters. Have these park tolls been reconsidered? The situation at Prince Albert park is somewhat the same as in the case mentioned by the hon. member for Calgary West, only there is not a town in the park. People have to pass through the park to reach the highway beyond.

[Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West).]

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): I have not had that question brought before me, and I certainly have not given it consideration.

Mr. Coldwell: I had some correspondence with the former minister, and I was wondering whether reconsideration had been given to it.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): No, with the former minister everything went to Edmonton.

Mr. Coldwell: This is last year.

Mr. Harkness: Has the minister found where the $8 million worth of roads are being constructed?

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): We can give you every dollar as to where it is expended if you wish to go through the entire list. Would you like to have it by parks?

Mr. Harkness: I should like to know where the main expenditure is.

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): The main expenditures are in Jasper park, Kootenay park and Banff park. There is $1,454,000 at Banff, $2,420,000 at Jasper, $1,621,000 at Kootenay, and then there are various smaller amounts. I will just give round figures. There is $724,000 at New Brunswick park, $527,000 at Prince Edward Island park.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): How much at the Nova Scotia national park?

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): Cape Breton highlands park, $590,000.

Mr. Knowles: Would the minister explain why, as indicated on page 185, there has been an increase in the salary of the controller of the national parks services in the amount of $375, and a decrease in the salary of the assistant controller by $315? It looks like a case of taking from those who have not and giving it to those who have.

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): The assistant controller retired, and he was not there for the whole year.

Mr. Fulford: I should like to commend the minister and the department for the work that has been done in the last year on the St. Lawrence river national parks. These parks extend from Morrisburg on the east to Kingston on the west. I know of no facilities supplied by any department of the government that give more pleasure to people both on the United States side and the Canadian side. I would ask the minister to see that the work is continued, and also that further islands are taken over. I think the hon. member for Grenville-Dundas will agree with me that one site that should be taken over is Windmill point just below Prescott. That is one community in the district which is not adequately served by these national parks.

I would also recommend to the minister that serious consideration be given to taking over certain islands in the Rideau lake chain for the same purpose, and that further consideration be given to taking over Hill island, over which a stretch of highway runs connecting the Canadian side of the Thousand Islands bridge with the United States side. This matter has been brought up before, and I do not think anything has been done. How much has been spent on the St. Lawrence islands national park?

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): $57,695 this year.

220. Grant to the Jack Miner migratory bird foundation, $5,000.

Mr. Graydon: I do not rise primarily to commend this vote to the Jack Miner migratory bird foundation, but when I am on my feet I should like to pay a tribute to the work of a great Canadian, whose enterprise has been carried on during his lifetime and since his death in a very effective and very satisfactory manner in the interests of Canada generally.

I am rising at this time to say a word with respect to another county undertaking in my own part of the country, which we regard as of great importance also. I am not going to detail that work tonight; I only want to mention it, but on another occasion, next session, I should like to lay before hon. members full information as to the work being done by the Peel county game and fish protective association. This is the only undertaking of its kind in the province of Ontario and for that reason stands out as an important development in connection with wildlife conservation. The association was formed about two years ago and has been an immense success. It is largely concerned with the raising of pheasants, of which more than eight thousand were released this year. One of the important features of the work of the association is that we have not asked this or any other government for a grant of any kind. I thought it ought to be mentioned because of that fact, since I am afraid we must be an island in a sea of similar requests that have been sent to the minister.

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): I was very glad to help them get a hut from Mount Hope.

Mr. Graydon: I thank the minister for that, though I must tell him the association paid for it. It was nevertheless a great help to us to get the war assets building the minister and others were so instrumental in helping us obtain. I only want to mention the matter at this stage preliminary to another address I hope to make to this house with respect to what I believe is a very important work being done in connection with wildlife conservation.

221. Grant to aid in the development of the international peace garden in Manitoba, $15,000.

Mr. Knowles: I just want to say that this item is very welcome.

Dominion wildlife service—

222. Wildlife resources conservation and development, including administration of the Migratory Birds Convention Act, $259,520.

Mr. Blair: I understand the migratory birds act officials have jurisdiction over the setting of the season for ducks in the fall. This year it was set back from September 15 to October 15. I happen to be a duck shooter myself. I was out the first morning, and that was the first time I ever failed to get ducks. Sportsmen in our part of the country got absolutely none throughout the season, which was the worst we have ever had. I want to draw this to the attention of the minister in the hope that next year we might at least split the difference and have the season open October 1. By October 15 all the local ducks have departed for the south and the northern ducks have not yet come in. We feel that we are simply raising ducks and somebody to the south is shooting them.

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): These dates are set as the result of a conference held with all the provinces, and the provinces were unanimous on the dates set this year.

Mr. Blair: Then the provinces were absolutely astray as far as eastern Ontario was concerned.

Mr. Warren: In spite of all the scowls coming my way I am going to say a word on this item, even though it is late. There is an increase in this item of $38,020. I believe it is most important that we do everything possible to conserve wildlife, as well as to conserve the top soil, our forest resources, and such things as those. Down in Renfrew county we have an opportunity to do something in the way of conserving wildlife. We have a farmer named Harry Berry, who lives some ten miles west of Carleton Place on highway 17. Some twenty-five years ago seventeen wild geese landed on his farm and stayed for about six weeks. He did not disturb them but protected them, and they have been returning in greatly increased numbers each year since that time. Last spring some eight thousand wild geese landed on his farm.

It is now getting too much for one farmer to feed these increasing numbers of geese. Eight thousand wild geese can pull a lot of young clover out of the fine soil on Harry Berry's farm, and now he is asking for some assistance. When so many millions of dollars can be spent in our parks to attract tourists, why not spend at least something to help this man feed these geese? They have not only been eating his clover; he has been feeding them grain out of his granary all these years, and I believe he deserves some kind of help. I am asking the minister now to give consideration to some assistance for this man, and also to consider setting aside this territory along Muskrat lake as a bird sanctuary.

I have taken up this matter with the minister personally, and I think he knows the situation there. Muskrat lake is perhaps ten miles long and does not average more than a mile in width; it is really an extension of the Muskrat river. Ninety-eight per cent of the farmers owning land along Muskrat lake have signed a petition asking the minister to have this property set aside as a bird sanctuary, and that petition is supported by at least five reeves of the district. We feel that this is important, and we would like the matter settled before the geese come back next spring, when there will be probably ten thousand. So I am placing the matter before the minister tonight in the hope that he will not overlook it in the interval.

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): It has not been the policy of the federal government to establish bird sanctuaries under the Migratory Birds Convention Act without prior consent from the provincial government concerned. The matter of this proposed sanctuary was taken up promptly with the provincial department of lands and forests, but that department wished to further study the situation. At the moment an investigation is being carried out by the dominion wildlife officer for Ontario and an officer of the Ontario department of lands and forests.

224. Cranberry Portage road—to provide for the 1949-50 dominion contribution to the cost of section B, Cranberry Portage to Cuprus mines, of the proposed road between The Pas and Flin Flon in Manitoba in accordance with the terms of an agreement between the dominion and the province of Manitoba dated September 30, 1948, $305,000.

Mr. Knowles: Will the minister give us some details of the agreement between the federal government and the province of Manitoba in regard to this road from The Pas to Flin Flon? What was to be the total cost, and how much was paid?

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): The purpose of this vote is to provide for the dominion contribution to the cost of section B Cranberry Portage to Cuprus mines, of the proposed road between The Pas and Flin Flon in Manitoba, in accordance with the terms of the agreement between the dominion and the province of Manitoba dated September 30, 1948.

The increase in the dominion contribution is in accordance with the terms of the agreement, wherein it was proposed to expend $100,000 in 1948-49; $305,000 in 1949-50; and the balance in 1950-51.

The agreement provided for the work on the road to be started not later than April 1, 1948, and completed on or before September 30, 1950. The road is to be an all-weather standard gravel surface with sufficient width for two-way traffic. Work commenced early in 1948 and at the end of the calendar year, approximately 17 miles of clearing, 10 miles of grading, and 10 miles of gravelling were completed. The Pas-Flin Flon highway will be approximately 95 miles in length, of which 27 miles between Cuprus mines and Cranberry Portage are in a potential mineral belt. The total dominion contribution will be $437,000.

Mr. Knowles: Is it on a dollar for dollar basis?

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): I understand it is supposed to be about fifty-fifty, but the maximum cost to the dominion has been set.

Item agreed to.

Indian Affairs branch—

225. Branch administration, $138,790.

Mr. Charlton: I should like to ask the minister when the new Indian Act will be brought forward?

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): I would say the next session of parliament.

Mr. Harkness: I had a few remarks I wanted to make in that connection.

Mr. Lennard: Make them tomorrow morning.

Mr. Harkness: I would rather make them right now. The minister will remember that there was a joint committee of this house which sat for three years revising this Indian Act. After the completion of the draft revision, it was sent to the Department of Justice so that the officers of that department could look it over. During the spring session of this parliament, several members asked when the revised Indian Act would be introduced. Invariably, the answer has been that it was still in the hands of the Department of Justice officers. That excuse got so thin that I think the minister himself was ashamed to put it forward.

In answer to the member for Brant-Wentworth, the minister has suggested that the act will be introduced next year. Have the Department of Justice officials completed their lengthy consideration of this act? It has been in their hands since June, 1948. Will the act, as revised by the committee and with all the changes made by the Department of Justice, be the act introduced, or will the joint committee on Indian affairs be reconstituted for further work in this connection?

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): As a matter of fact, the Prime Minister spoke on this subject the other day. He pointed out that the Indian Act would not be introduced in this session, but would be left over until the next session. The report of the Indian affairs committee was a good report. My department worked to incorporate certain proposals for amendments to the act, and they were all sent down to the Department of Justice. When the act arrived at the Department of Justice, it was found it was a long time since it was overhauled, and that department felt there were other amendments which should be put in, quite apart from those recommended by the committee. Under those circumstances, the bill has not come back from justice yet. I understand it will not be ready until the next session.

Mr. Harkness: Really, that is complete nonsense. This committee sat for three years considering the matter, and had the benefit of advice from solicitors from the Department of Justice as to what should be in the act, and what should not be in the act; what would work, and what would not work. This story that the Department of Justice found out the act had not been revised for many years is ridiculous, because the reason for setting up the committee in 1946 was that the act had not been revised since the nineties. Everybody knew that. The minister now says that the Department of Justice found out it had not been revised for many years, and yet the chief reason the committee was set up was to revise the act.

As I say, we spent three years in revising the act, and in addition a royal commission was appointed which spent considerable time travelling through the eastern portion of this country. After all this work was done, and after all this advice had been received from the Department of Justice officials, the minister now gets up and says that the Department of Justice found out the act had not been revised for a long time, and has, therefore, been holding it for this length of time.

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): I just want to correct my hon. friend in one respect. There was no representative from the Department of Justice on that committee. I understand there were solicitors from the Department of Mines and Resources, but not from the Department of Justice.

Mr. Harkness: Naturally, the Department of Justice did not have representation on the committee, because the committee was composed of members of the House of Commons and the Senate. The Department of Justice did send representatives over to advise the committee, including Mr. Varcoe. The point I am getting at is that the government has been absolutely negligent in the matter of looking after this promised revision of the Indian Act. I do not think they can put forward excuses any longer for not taking action on the matter.

There are one or two other specific matters to which I should like to refer. The first is concerned with the fishing rights of Indians in the province of Alberta. The Indians were granted fishing rights in the various lakes in that province by treaty. The fish constituted one of their main items of food. Last year an order in council was passed by this government, apparently as a result of representations made by the government of Alberta, which prevented the Indians from doing any fishing in those lakes, except on Wednesdays or Thursdays, I think; it was one day a week. I suppose it was Thursday the idea being that the Indians could then have fish for Friday.

Often there were storms on Thursdays, or the fish were running on the opposite sides of the lake to that on which the Indian was fishing, or something of that nature happened, which meant the Indian had no fish. I should like to ask the minister what steps have been taken by his department to get this order in council rescinded, or to make some agreement with the Alberta government which will allow these Indians their treaty rights. I have made representations to the department about this matter.

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): When the natural resources were turned over to the province in 1930, under the agreement it left the Indians with ordinary rights for fishing and trapping in the province. There has been no change in that situation.

Mr. Harkness: That is absolutely wrong. Nothing affected these fishing rights until last year, when an order in council was passed by this government limiting the right of the Indians to fish in these lakes to one day a week.

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): I understand that the Indians are subject to the laws of the province. I do not know of the order in council to which my hon. friend is referring that took away any rights that they had up to last year.

Mr. Harkness: If the minister does not know he had better consult the officials in the Indian affairs branch and find out.

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): They do not know either.

Mr. Harkness: They know about it. I have had correspondence with them on the matter. The order in council was passed in the last year. It is very recent and was passed as a result of representations from the Alberta government, again I think because of representations made to them by the fish and wildlife association of Alberta. The actual effect of this order in council is that the Indians bordering on these lakes have been deprived of their treaty rights which were guaranteed to them by the treaties which were signed when this territory was taken over from them. In addition to that, they have been deprived of their means of livelihood. The result of their being prevented from fishing is that the taxpayer of Canada has to provide them with welfare funds, food and so forth.

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): The special fishery regulation to which my hon. friend is referring is, I understand, one that was passed by the province of Alberta. As I said before, when the natural resources were taken over by the provinces it left the provinces with the right to regulate the use of the natural resources of the provinces. That I think must be the regulation to which my hon. friend is referring.

Mr. Harkness: I think the minister will find that an order in council was passed by his own government, which is the one to which I am referring. I have had correspondence—

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): An order in council was passed approving the fishery regulation of the province of Alberta.

Mr. Harkness: Yes.

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): I find that was passed, but that is only approving of the regulation that had been passed by the province of Alberta.

[Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West).]

Mr. Harkness: That is one of the things that I complained about. The minister is supposed to be the guardian of the Indians and is supposed to look after their rights. Instead of safeguarding their fishing rights in these lakes, as a matter of fact, the government passes an order in council giving away the rights. That is the very thing I am complaining about.

Mr. Coldwell: I want to support the hon. member in his request that a new Indian Act be brought down. Members of the parliamentary committee worked three years on the proposed act. As he has already said, they were turned into a royal commission and toured a part of this country. The proposed act they brought down was probably one of the most progressive pieces of legislation offered to this house on behalf of a group of people in this country. Because the Indian Act is obsolete the record of our own country regarding Indian affairs has been far from satisfactory and far from a credit to Canada. When the proposed act was recommended by the committee in the report to this house we all hoped that it would be something of a charter for the Indians in order that they might be encouraged to find a place in the life of Canada. I think the committee did an excellent job and produced an equally excellent report. We had the makings of a very good Indian Act.

Like the hon. member, I do not see why it takes a year and a half to refer this matter to the Department of Justice for other suggestions and amendments. Because the act has not been revised for a good many years, surely the Department of Justice should have been interested in the act at the same time as the committee was sitting and discussing Indian affairs. I think it is a shame that after three years of work, and the approval of the proposed act which had the makings of something good for the Indians and for Canada herself, nothing had been done with it.

The criticisms made by the hon. member are fully justified. I was not a member of the committee, but I followed it very closely. Several members of our party were on the committee. I saw the work they did; I saw the work that was done by members of other parties, including hon. members on the government side of the house in the last parliament. They worked effectively; they worked well; they worked conscientiously to do something for the Indians of this country. The least that could be done would be to bring legislation before the house early in the next session and not allow anyone anywhere to interfere with or circumvent the wishes of the committee which made such an excellent report to the house.

Mr. Harkness: I have one more question in connection with welfare payments paid to aged Indians. Indians are the only people in this country who are not eligible for old age pensions. The welfare payments made to aged and other indigent Indians are now at the rate of $7.80 per month. The Indian association of Alberta has made representations to the Indian affairs branch to raise this amount to at least $15 a month. This afternoon in discussing medical matters as far as the Indians were concerned, the Minister of National Health and Welfare agreed that one of the reasons why tuberculosis and other diseases are so much more evident among the Indians than in the rest of the population is dietary deficiencies. I suggested to him that perhaps one of the best things he could do in order to improve the health of the Indians would be to recommend to the government that they increase the scale of these welfare payments so as to provide at least something reasonable in the way of money or payments in kind with which Indians could feed themselves decently. I urge the minister, who is directly responsible for this, that these welfare payments be increased. I think everyone will agree that the present scale is ridiculously low.

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): I think I should point out that in addition to the $8 that they get for welfare they also get subsistence in the form of fuel, clothes, food and medical attention in addition to the cash payments that they receive. Therefore it is not just the money alone.

Mr. Hatfield: Treaty or non-treaty Indians?

Mr. Harkness: The minister says that they get these things in addition. If he will look into it he will find that the amount of food they get in addition to the welfare payments is very small. It amounts to a certain quantity of meat, in many instances meat that could not otherwise be sold, cast-off meat, and flour and a few other items along that line. It does not amount to very much. I have forgotten the money value of it. I think it is a very small amount.

Mr. Shaw: Mr. Chairman, this afternoon I had occasion to refer to conditions of health among the Indians in the Rocky Mountain House district of Alberta. I was greatly pleased witih the response that came from the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Tonight for just one brief moment I should like to point out that in order to solve the problem which I brought up this afternoon it will be extremely necessary for officials of the Indian affairs branch to give serious and thoughtful consideration to the responsibilities that rest upon them in connection with this problem. We have approximately 200 Chippewa Indians who have not come under the treaty. A tremendous amount of ground work was done in that district by old-timers in the district. I mentioned one this afternoon, Mr. Henry Stelfox. The Indians were practically at the point where they were prepared to accept treaty, and then the Indian affairs department sent a man in to negotiate with them. I believe that my ten-year-old boy would have been just as competent to deal with these Indians—I will not mention any names—as this gentleman. He was not even civil with the Indians, with the result that this advance party which had come down to discuss treaty turned and went back in disgust. It is not beyond the realm of possibility to get these Chippewa Indians into treaty. But some care must be exercised in the type of man who goes in there to negotiate with them.

I would stress one or two points in connection with this. Whether it happens to be the agent or someone else located at Rocky Mountain House, this person must be essentially of a very humane character. He must be one who has the interests of those Indians at heart. He must know something of the history of those Indians. He must know something about the nature of the country in which they live.

I have not met the agent or the officials at the agency at Rocky Mountain House. I am not going to register any complaint about them, but I am going to stress upon the minister that he be certain above all else that he has the right man in there, if he ever expects to get those 200 Chippewa Indians into the treaty. I suggest the attention of his officers should be focused upon that situation to determine whether or not the right man is in charge at that agency.

With respect to the Crees who are on the reservation at that point, let me say that on that reservation there is a large quantity of timber—sufficient, if properly dealt with, to provide a great deal of security for those Indians over a long period of time. On the basis of the information I have received I am fearful that situation is not being dealt with properly. For example, these Indians should be allowed to go in there and establish their own small mill. It does not cost much money. Let it be all Indian labour, and let them take out their own timber under supervision.

Today the policy seems to be to let the white man go in there and establish his own mills, with the result that the poor Indian gets nothing but the wages paid to him—and sometimes those wages are not very high.

In my opinion that timber belongs to those Indians, and they should be helped to bring it out.

I do not wish to take more time, but I do believe this economic angle is very important from the standpoint of the health problem I set before the minister this afternoon. That condition is simply appalling in this district.

Mr. Hatfield: Will the minister consider increasing the old age pension from the $8 at which it now stands. An Indian cannot live on $8 a month. I have a letter here from an Indian on a reservation in my constituency. This man says he is eighty years of age.

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): I would say that this matter is receiving consideration at the present time.

Mr. Coldwell: What is the incidence of tuberculosis among the Indians?

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): That comes under the Department of National Health and Welfare.

Mr. Coldwell: I know.

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): We do not touch it.

Mr. Coldwell: But surely the Indians branch, which is supposed to look after the welfare of the Indians, should know something about their health. Does the minister know anything about the health of the people in his custody?

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): The Minister of National Health and Welfare gave a very full report on the subject today.

Mr. Coldwell: I do not think he did.

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): He gave the percentage that had been covered by the X-ray surveys.

Mr. Coldwell: That is all he did.

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): I believe he said 62 per cent had been covered.

Mr. Coldwell: What were the results?

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): He is the one who would have to give that. I have not that information.

Mr. Coldwell: If the Indian affairs branch is charged with custody of the Indians, and we appropriate money for the welfare of those Indians, why is it that that branch of government does not know anything about the health of the Indians in its custody? Perhaps this is one reason why the Indian population is in such an unsatisfactory condition today, and why our Indians have not been raised to the level of the white population, as the natives of some other countries have been raised to the level of the white population there.

Because of the division of power, if we may so describe it, among the various branches of government it would seem that this condition has arisen. The same applies to education. What are the educational levels among the Indians? How is that education looked after? What kind of schools have they? To what extent are they educated? I have been to some of these Indian schools, and I will say that in the junior grades I found that the level was about the same as that of white children. I know something about this, because at that time I was supervising schools and knew something about educational levels.

But a little later on there seemed to be no provision for higher grades in the schools, no provision for higher education among them. We know perfectly well that, given the opportunity, the Indian has the same mentality as other people, and can be raised to the level of the whites.

That is one of the reasons I want to see this Indian Act brought down. That is one of the reasons I want to see a complete revision of the provisions for education, health and everything else in the Indian affairs branch. This thing is a public scandal in Canada, and it is a scandal that the government has not brought down the act for revision, so that we may do something about it.

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): May I say that we are just as anxious to have the act brought down as other members of the house. With regard to the health of Indians, I am informed that the health has been improving. Certainly the birth rate is the highest of any group in this country. They are increasing rapidly.

Mr. Coldwell: But what is the infant mortality rate?

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): Expenditures on Indian education in the last fiscal year amounted to $5,403,012.24. At this time there are in operation 309 day schools, 72 Indian residential schools and 5 combined schools. The number of Indian pupils stands at 12,511 in the day schools, 9,368 in the residential schools and 104 in the combined schools, in addition 1,302 attended provincial and private schools, making a total of Indians enrolled in educational classes of 23,285, an increase of 2,015 over the preceding year

Mr. Coldwell: Those figures are meaningless. I know there are Indians enrolled in schools. But what kind of education do they get in those schools, and how is the money being spent in connection with that education?

Is it going toward the education of the Indians? To what extent is this money being spent properly for educational purposes?

And the same questions could be asked in connection with health. To what extent is the money for the health of Indians being spent for the health of Indians? What is the overhead in connection with education on Indian reserves? I will say again that I have found from personal observation that the Indian children in the lower grades measure up pretty well with the white children; but afterwards they seem to evaporate, and we have nothing to show for these vast sums of money we are spending on education. I say the number of Indian children in schools means nothing. What kind of education are they getting? That is the point.

The Deputy Chairman: I would point out that we are now discussing item 225.

Mr. Hatfield: I would draw the attention of the minister to the water service at the Indian reservation at Tobique Point in my constituency. They were promised a water service two years ago when the committee was down there investigating. This water runs into puncheons or large casks which are set out on the different streets of the Indian reservation and the Indians go and dip their pails in to get their water instead of having it available from a faucet. An Indian from a t.b. home will go there and dip in his pail along with an Indian from a healthy home. We were promised that this unhealthy situation would be corrected by the putting in of a water system.

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): If the water system is not already completed it will be completed quite shortly.

Item agreed to.

Welfare—

228. Welfare of Indians, $3,002,528.

Mr. Coldwell: What is the total amount provided in the main, the supplementary and the further supplementary estimates for Indian welfare?

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): The total is $3,103,000.

Item agreed to.

Education—

230. Indian education, and to authorize commitments against future years in the amount of $200,000, $4,157,433.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): There are 3,000 Indians in my riding and naturally I am interested in their welfare. I should like to refer to the splendid work being done by the department under the superintendency of Major Donald Morrison MacKay, who is a son of Cariboo and is active in the department. I want to refer especially to the setting up of day schools throughout the Cariboo district which makes it possible for the young Indian people to have the same educational opportunities as those available to the whites. I am looking forward to the bringing down of the new Indian Act and I hope that the time will come when these people will have the same status in the nation as the white people.

Mr. Knowles: Will the minister explain what is meant by, "and to authorize commitments against future years in the amount of $200,000"? Is that included in the amount of $4,157,433?

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): That is not included in the total.

Mr. Knowles: We are authorizing the department to make commitments of $200,000 in future years?

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): Over and above what will be spent next year.

Mr. Knowles: Will those expenditures appear in future estimates?

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): In the estimates of next year, yes.

Mr. Hatfield: What is the difference between a treaty and a non-treaty Indian?

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): Treaties have been entered into with Indians in Ontario and the western provinces under which annuities are paid.

Mr. Hatfield: What about the Indians in eastern Canada? Treaties were entered into with them long before they were entered into with the Indians in western Canada.

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): The treaties I have referred to are as follows:

Treaty No. 1. Southern Manitoba centering Portage la Prairie and Winnipeg districts.

Treaty No. 2. Central Manitoba, south-eastern Saskatchewan and south-western Manitoba.

Treaty No. 3. Extreme south-west of Ontario lying west of the great lakes and small portion of south-eastern Manitoba.

Treaty No. 4. Mainly southern Saskatchewan.

Treaty No. 5. Northern Manitoba and part of extreme western Ontario, north of treaty No. 3.

Treaty No. 6. Central Alberta and Saskatchewan.

Treaty No. 7. Southern Alberta.

Treaty No. 8. Northern Alberta, the Northwest Territories, south of Great Slave lake and north-eastern British Columbia.

Treaty No. 9. That part of Ontario drained into the Hudson bay.

Treaty No. 10. Northern Saskatchewan.

Treaty No. 11. The Northwest Territories north of Great Slave lake.

There are no such treaties with Indians in the maritimes.

Mr. Hatfield: Treaties were made with Indians in Ontario, Quebec and the maritimes but the department told me three or four years ago that they had been lost.

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): I am sure there are no such treaties in the maritimes and Quebec.

Mr. Hatfield: There were because I have copies of them.

Item stands.

The Deputy Chairman: There are two items that were carried but kept in abeyance. I understand the minister has the information now. A question was asked by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre about item 214.

Mr. Knowles: It will keep until tomorrow morning.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): That was passed.

The Deputy Chairman: I believe they were carried, but I kept them here in case they were needed for further discussion.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Unless I am mistaken there are three departments that have not been discussed at all, the Prime Minister's office, public works and finance. There are two departments that were discussed for some time but items were not passed. They are the departments of trade and commerce and justice. We have balances in agriculture, veterans affairs and a few items in mines and resources. Tomorrow morning at eleven o'clock we shall proceed with the remainder of the items in agriculture. Then we will take up trade and commerce, public works and the Prime Minister's office. APPENDIX

RENT CONTROL—FURTHER CORRESPONDENCE WITH PREMIERS OF PROVINCES

THE GOVERNMENT OF THE PROVINCE OF NEW BRUNSWICK

THE PREMIER

Fredericton, November 25, 1949

Hon. D. C. Abbott, K.C.,
Minister of Finance,
Ottawa, Canada.

Dear Mr. Abbott:

I received in due course your letter of the ninth instant, which has reference to rental controls, but have delayed replying thereto until I had an opportunity to discuss these questions in cabinet.

They have been under consideration during our current meeting and are still receiving study. Under these circumstances, I am not in a position to indicate our attitude thereon but will be in further communication with you shortly.

Yours sincerely,

John B. McNair

THE PREMIER
Nova Scotia

Halifax, December 1, 1949

My dear Minister,

Let me thank you for your letter of November 9 on the subject of rental control.

I note that the constitutional aspect of the question is being referred to the Supreme Court of Canada, and I shall await with interest the decision of that court. Undoubtedly it is well to have this matter settled.

At the moment the province's views on rent control remain the same as expressed in my letter to you under date of February 21, 1949.

Yours sincerely,

Angus L. Macdonald

Hon. D. C. Abbott, P.C., K.C., M.P.,
Minister of Finance,
Ottawa, Canada.

MINISTER OF FINANCE

Ottawa, December 7, 1949

Hon. Angus L. Macdonald, P.C., K.C.,
Premier of Nova Scotia,
Halifax, Nova Scotia.

My dear Premier:

Thank you very much for your letter of December 1 in reply to mine of November 9, on the subject of rental control.

I note that the views of the province of Nova Scotia remain the same as expressed in your letter of February 21, 1949.

Yours very truly,

D. C. Abbott

PREMIER'S OFFICE
SASKATCHEWAN

Regina, December 6, 1949

Hon. Douglas C. Abbott,
Minister of Finance,
Ottawa, Ontario.

Dear Mr. Abbott:

Re rent control

I wish to thank you for your letter of December 2.

My letter to you of November 16 set out the position of the Saskatchewan government, namely:

(1) That the order permitting rent increases on December 15 should be made inoperative in this province.

(2) That Saskatchewan was prepared to enter the rent control field.

(3) That we desired an assurance that you had jurisdiction to place Saskatchewan in the field while it was still occupied by the dominion. We requested a supreme court reference to determine your jurisdiction in this respect.

Your last letter, we take it, is a definite refusal to refer the question to the supreme court. We regret this, and cannot agree with you that such a reference is "undesirable" or that it "might confuse the main issue". With respect, we doubt if the learned members of the supreme court would be confused by submitting a second question arising out of the same subject matter as the first.

We also find it difficult to agree that "all that can be asked is a hypothetical question" because there is no provincial legislation to be referred. The question we desire answered is not one of provincial but of dominion jurisdiction.

You have been informing the provinces for a year that if they or any of them expressed a willingness to take over rent control you would put them in the field, tomorrow, I believe was the expression used. It is to obtain a ruling placing beyond doubt your power to carry out your undertaking and put a single province in the field that we requested a reference to the supreme court.

Your argument that a reference to determine the legal position of landlords and tenants of Saskatchewan might delay a decision on the main issue comes strangely from yourself, as you are already on record as holding the opinion that the question can be answered only in one way as there is no reasonable doubt of the legal position. Surely if you are correct in your view the supreme court justices will be able to reach that decision as quickly as your law officers did.

Your refusal, however, to have the point passed on must be accepted as law; we cannot change it.

In the opinion of our government the recent order permitting heavy increases in rents, straight across the board, without consideration of the merits of individual cases is so inequitable and iniquitous that we must submit to your terms to have it annulled in Saskatchewan no matter how arbitrary we think those terms are.

Saskatchewan will therefore consent to the two orders being passed; one making the recent rent increases inoperative in Saskatchewan and the other making all federal rental regulations inoperative in Saskatchewan from and after April 1, 1950.

This consent is given because of the assurance of your law officers that the second order will be so drawn as to enable Saskatchewan to pass valid legislation respecting rent control.

The consent is conditional, however, on your assurance that if your law officers are at a later date proven wrong and it is held by the courts that we cannot enter the field you will take the necessary steps to put Saskatchewan back under federal controls. Inadequate as we think your regulations are we cannot permit a situation to arise where Saskatchewan will have no rental controls at all.

We agree that an amendment to the Continuation of Transitional Measures Act is advisable but do not think the amendment proposed in your letter is the appropriate one. We desire an amendment that will, inasmuch as dominion legislation can do it, put beyond question the power of the governor in council by executive action to confer legislative jurisdiction respecting rent control on one province or on any number less than all. We do not wish to confuse the main issue, however, and think the form of the amendment can be worked out later. We believe it should follow the general lines of the suggestions made in the house the other night by your colleague, Mr. Garson.

At a later date we intend to request you to renew your offer to pay the cost of provincial rent control. This would appear to be only fair and reasonable, if, for instance, Saskatchewan alone undertakes the work and relieves you of an item of expense you are incurring in the other provinces where rent control is left with the dominion.

It will therefore be in order for you to proceed with the two orders, on giving us the assurance that in the event of the courts finding that Saskatchewan control legislation is beyond our jurisdiction you will put Saskatchewan back under federal controls if any are in force at that time.

Yours sincerely,

T. C. Douglas

MINISTER OF FINANCE

Ottawa, December 8, 1949

Hon. T. C. Douglas,
Premier of Saskatchewan,
Regina, Saskatchewan.

My dear Premier:

Thank you for your letter of December 6, which I have discussed today with my colleagues in the government.

Pursuant to your request and in accordance with the announced policy of the government, the wartime prices and trade board is today issuing an order which makes orders 813 and 814 of the board inoperative in Saskatchewan and revokes the wartime leasehold regulations in their entirety as they apply to Saskatchewan as from April 1, 1950.

If it is conclusively determined by the courts that legislation enacted by the legislature of Saskatchewan, with respect to landlord and tenant relationships, is invalid because and only because regulations of the federal government remain in effect elsewhere in Canada, the federal government will take the necessary steps to put Saskatchewan back under then existing rental controls.

We shall be prepared to consider a request that the federal government pay the cost of administering provincial rent control in Saskatchewan for a period not exceeding one year. You will understand, of course, that any agreement would be subject to approval by parliament.

Yours very truly,

D. C. Abbott

OFFICE OF THE PREMIER

"Far from offering to the province the full exercise of its rights in this field, the federal government continues to render the full exercise thereof practically impossible.

"We respectfully suggest to the federal government that it should modify its attitude and make it consistent with the rights of the provinces and with the rights of the people concerned. By removing, as you could easily do, the further and grave difficulties which you have added to the difficulties inherent in the problem, you would help solve the question rather than make it more complicated and more difficult. As to the present government of the province of Quebec, it is always ready to assume its responsibilities, but it desires that the federal government assume its own without any further delay."

Yours sincerely,

M. L. Duplessis

MINISTER OF FINANCE
Canada

Ottawa, December 8, 1949

Hon. Maurice L. Duplessis,
Premier of Quebec,
Quebec.

My dear Premier:

I acknowledge and thank you for your letter of December 7 on the subject of rent control.

Kindest personal regards.

Yours sincerely,

D. C. Abbott

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Saturday, December 10, 1949

The house met at eleven o'clock.

UNEMPLOYMENT

INQUIRY AS TO PUBLIC WORKS PROGRAM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a question of the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply? Has the government an adequate shelf of public works ready, which may be used to relieve increasing unemployment in certain parts of Canada this winter? If so, will the minister give the house a statement regarding preparations made for the undertaking of a necessary works program?

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): I thank the hon. member for having given notice of his question. As I informed the house on Wednesday, and more specifically as recorded in Hansard at pages 2843 and 2846 in reply to questions asked by the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell), and in the report of the Department of Reconstruction and Supply for the year ended March 31, 1949, the government has a program of public investment which is being and will be used from time to time as conditions may warrant.

The answer to the hon. member's second question will be found largely in the reference cited in reply to the second question asked by the hon. member for Greenwood. Contracts are being placed in accordance with usual government practice.

POSTAL SERVICE

SALE OF NEW STAMP ISSUES TO COLLECTORS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. Chester S. McLure (Queens): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Postmaster General or the Minister of Finance. Is there a regulation of the Post Office Department prohibiting the sale of the new issues of stamps to stamp collectors, or does the foreign exchange control board prohibit the sale?

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): The answer to the second part of the question is that the foreign exchange control board take no action in the matter. I shall bring the first part of the hon. member's question to the attention of the Postmaster General.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Dion in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

Special—

31. Major irrigation and water conservation projects in the prairie provinces, $7,500,000.

Mr. Boucher: Mr. Chairman, in view of what has been said on this very important subject concerning the large project on the South Saskatchewan river, I believe I should make a few observations at this time. Irrespective of what has been said by some hon. members opposite, I am sure the Minister of Agriculture is doing all that can be done to have this great project under way as soon as possible. In saying this I know I express the feelings of the people in Rosthern constituency. During the last election campaign I told the people in that constituency about the amount of money that had been placed in the estimates for this year, and the fact they have re-elected me with an increased majority proves that they are satisfied with what is being done

This is a very important project, one that will mean much not only to Saskatchewan but to all of Canada. I am sure the minister is anxious to have this important undertaking proceeded with without delay. It surprises me to find some hon. members from my own province criticizing the minister —and I think it will be agreed that when I say "criticizing" I am putting it mildly. I believe it is the duty of each one of them to back the minister to the hilt in his efforts in connection with this project. It is such a big thing and so important that I feel it should be above party politics. I appeal to all members to support the minister in his efforts to assist Canadian farmers.

Item agreed to.

32. Prairie Farm Assistance Act administration, $500,000.

Mr. Charlton: Do the provinces make a contribution toward the payments made under this act?

Mr. Gardiner: The provincial governments as such contribute nothing toward the payments made under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. The taxpayers of Canada pay what is required over and above the one per cent charge on grain delivered to the elevators.

Mr. Coldwell: The levy on the farmer is the core of the fund, is it not?

Mr. Gardiner: No, the core of the fund is taken out of the treasury.

Mr. Coldwell: What are the figures on that?

Mr. Gardiner: About $2 is taken out of the treasury for every $1 paid in by the farmers. Those are the percentages over a period of years; but some years it is three to one and there have been years when it was four to one.

Mr. Hatfield: Why should not the provinces in which these payments are made contribute to this fund?

Mr. Gardiner: We feel that in handling it as we do the federal government is paying at least its share. If anything beyond what we are doing has to be done, then the provinces ought to pay.

Item agreed to.

33. To provide for assistance to encourage the improvement of cheese and cheese factories, $1,700,000.

Mr. Charlton: Can the minister give us the amount of cheese now in storage and the amount that was shipped this year to Great Britain under the contract?

Mr. Gardiner: The amount shipped to Great Britain was 50 million pounds and the amount in store is about 17 million pounds. We do not consider that to be in the nature of a surplus, as surpluses have been discussed from time to time. It will be remembered that in 1948 it was asked whether we intended to requisition cheese, and the answer I gave was that we hoped that we would not be required to do so, that we would get the necessary deliveries of cheese without requisitioning. But we did not. There was little if any cheese delivered to us before July 21, 1948. We requisitioned cheese from that date onward, and any cheese we did obtain for the British contract was obtained through requisitions. But that did not nearly fill the British contract. I doubt very much if we would have been able to fill the British contract even though we had requisitioned right from the beginning, because at that time surplus milk was going into cans rather than into cheese.

In the spring of 1949 we were asked for permission to ship cured cheese to the United States to be sold at a higher price, but we took the position that cured cheese could be sold quite readily on this market, thus releasing more of the fresh cheese for the British market. The result was that that cured cheese was sold on this market with the result indicated. Our contract called for 50 million pounds. The British refused to take any more, and as a result there are some 17 million pounds on our hands at present. We do not consider that a surplus, as we hope to have another contract at the beginning of the year under which we can go on delivering.

Mr. Charlton: What are the production figures to date as compared with last year?

Mr. Gardiner: I have not the figures, but they are considerably higher.

Mr. Cardiff: Just how is this money used to assist cheese and cheese factories?

Mr. Gardiner: The assistance given to cheese producers is of two kinds. First, we pay fifty per cent of the cost of putting in storage facilities for the ageing of cheese. As most hon. members know, cheese must be kept for ninety days before being put on the market, and special storage must be provided in order to keep it properly. In an effort to encourage plants to put in the best type of storage and thus produce a better product, we have agreed to pay fifty per cent of the cost. Then we have a program of premiums of one cent on 93 score cheese and two cents on 94 score cheese.

Mr. Cardiff: That goes to the producer?

Mr. Gardiner: That goes to the producer, and also the other in an indirect way.

Mr. Coldwell: Did the British take all they agreed to take?

Mr. Gardiner: Yes.

Mr. Charlton: Is the dominion government taking part in the province of Ontario scheme for the building of storage for cheese? I think $1 million is being spent this year in that way.

Mr. Gardiner: If it is the type of storage provided for under this item, our assistance would be given. If it is the type of storage provided for under the Cold Storage Act, organizations of a certain type would be able to get assistance. I am not so sure that we give assistance directly to the provincial governments, but we do give it to co-operatives, individuals or companies that are establishing cold storage facilities.

Item agreed to.

34. To provide assistance for the replacement of maple production equipment, $500,000.

Mr. Hatfield: Where is this money being spent, and what is the explanation for the increase?

Mr. Gardiner: Around 1936 or 1937 the United States threatened to prevent the entry of our maple products into that country because some form of lead poisoning had been discovered. Investigations showed that this was the result of the sap being allowed to sit in buckets which had a lead coating to prevent rust. As a result all maple products going from Canada to the United States were for some time limited in use to the manufacture of tobacco for cigarettes.

In order to overcome this difficulty, and also the possibility of lead poisoning in maple products on the Canadian market, the government agreed to a three-way plan to remove all the old equipment from the maple products industry of Quebec where most of this difficulty had been experienced. We agreed to pay one-third of the cost, the provincial government agreed to pay one-third and the producer was to accept one-third. Over the years there has been a shifting from that type of equipment to some other type, and this has not been completed.

Mr. Hatfield: That has been going on for how many years?

Mr. Gardiner: There were some expenditures in 1940-41, and these dropped in 1941-42 because of the war and our inability to obtain equipment. The expenditures were as follows:

1940-41	$106,000
1941-42	12,000
1945-46	87,000
1946-47	194,000
1947-48	203,000
1948-49	360,000
	$964,000

That is our third of the cost. The others have put in an equal amount, and this vote is to cover our share for this year.

Mr. Lennard: When is this going to end? I understood a few years ago, when this item was first introduced, that over a period of years the situation would clear up. If it keeps on for many more years we shall be replacing replacements.

Mr. Gardiner: We do not replace replacements. One old type of equipment—perhaps I should say it was a new type—is taken out, and of course there is no further replacement of the equipment. The equipment that is being put there does not have a lead covering. Aluminum is going in in its place, and lead solder is not used. This will not be mistaken for the other. In answer to the other part of the question, it was thought when we started that we would finish this in about three years. If you will take a look at the figures I have given, you will find the amount of $300,000 for three years might have been sufficient under the circumstances. We could not get the equipment at all during the war, and therefore we could not go on with it. Now we are taking up the slack and trying to finish it. The amount will be about the same, except that it is increased by the increase in the cost of the material.

Mr. Cardiff: Is production going up or down?

Mr. Gardiner: Production is on the increase.

Mr. Charlton: What is the total amount of money that has been spent over the past number of years?

Mr. Gardiner: I just read the figures. The amount spent by us up to date is $964,474.64.

Mr. Charlton: That means that pratically $3 million has been spent in sap buckets alone.

Mr. Gardiner: Not buckets alone; it is vats, boilers and everything of that kind. They had the same kind of covering.

Mr. Charlton: Has any of that money been spent in eastern Ontario?

Mr. Gardiner: So far as I know they do not have the same problem. The difficulty was in an area of Quebec.

Mr. Charlton: Surely they are not using one type of sap buckets in Quebec and another type in Ontario. Surely this situation is not going to go on and on.

Mr. Gardiner: There has been no application from Ontario. They are eligible if they want to apply for it. So far as I know, it is not a problem there. My memory of the sap buckets in Ontario is that they are pretty badly rusted.

Item agreed to.

35. To provide for administrative expenses, Agricultural Prices Support Act, 1944, $60,000.

Mr. Quelch: Section 9 of the Agricultural Prices Support Act expires on March 31 of next year. Has the governor in council the power to continue the act in force without the passing of the resolution that is on the order paper?

Mr. Gardiner: Without the passage of the resolution on the order paper it remains as it was, which means that the government makes the decision from time to time as to what the date is.

Mr. Quelch: Then all the resolution actually does is to set a cut-off date; in other words, the act expires at the end of the life of the present parliament.

Mr. Gardiner: The resolution does not do anything, because the minister in charge of the business of the house announced the other day that we were not putting the resolution through, so there will be no bill based upon it.

Mr. Hatfield: How much money has been spent under this act in the last year, and for what commodities?

Mr. Gardiner: I wonder if my friend will wait until we reach item 42, which provides the funds. This item is just administration.

Item agreed to.

36. To reclaim and to prevent the flooding of valuable agricultural lands in the valley of the Lillooet river, near Pemberton, B.C., $312,000.

Mr. Fulton: Will the minister make a brief statement about the progress of the work to date and what it is intended to do next year?

Mr. Gardiner: Our expectation is we will be finished with it before the end of this financial year. There is always the possibility there will be some hang-over on it, but it will not be very much.

Mr. Fulton: By March 31 next?

Mr. Gardiner: Yes. As a matter of fact, I think it is practically completed now.

Mr. Fulton: The lake has been lowered, but I understand there is still considerable ditching and diking to do in the upper areas. With winter now on, my impression is it will not be completed this year.

Mr. Gardiner: I understand that is in the project which is partly financed by the provinces, partly by ourselves, and partly by the individuals concerned. I am speaking from memory on that. My hon. friend probably knows the local circumstances better than I.

When we started on this project we undertook to do certain work at the expense of the federal treasury. When we had, as we thought, pretty well completed it, the province agreed to assist in the plan from there on to the extent of about one-third, generally speaking. The persons who are on the land are also bearing some of the expenditures. I believe most of that work is ditching and the other work to which reference has been made. In any case I will check it and make sure what the position is.

Item agreed to.

38. Land protection and reclamation; clearing and settlement of new lands under such terms and conditions as may be approved by the governor in council, $200,000.

Mr. Charlton: Will the minister explain where the new lands are being brought into production?

Mr. Gardiner: If one reads the vote carefully, it will be seen it is not entirely confined to new lands. The first part is land protection and reclamation. Then there is a semicolon, and from there on it is another item dealing with new land. It may be used for either purpose. It was the intention that we would be prepared to support—I think the first vote was $200,000—applications from any province where the province was prepared to pay a certain amount, and probably the individuals concerned would be charged with a certain amount. During the first two years we had no applications from anybody which conformed to the terms of the vote. This matter was discussed every year and suggestions were made that we ought to make expenditures. Last year I said if we had no applications from anyone I would not put the item in again. The result of that suggestion was that we received an application from Manitoba, and we are spending some money this year in co-operation with the government of that province. They actually take charge of the doing of the work, and we are paying dollar for dollar towards work in the Dauphin area. The Manitoba government is carrying on the operation. That is the only work that has really taken place under this provision up to the moment.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Before the item carries, I should like to ask the minister what the total expenditure has been for protection of farm lands in the Fraser valley because of damage caused by floods. From a return brought down I find that expenditures have been made by the departments of transport, public works, trade and commerce, and agriculture. The amount estimated as being required runs to more than $11 million. Will the minister make a statement as to how much money has been expended by all departments, and what further estimate is necessary to complete the work?

Mr. Gardiner: All I can say with regard to it is that none of the work is done under the Department of Agriculture. I presume it was done by the Department of Public Works, and some of the others. None of it was done under the Department of Agriculture, and I have no information.

Item agreed to.

40. Maritime Marshland Rehabilitation Act, and necessary surveys in connection therewith, $400,000.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): I should like a report from the minister as to marshland reclamation. The marsh owners are grateful to the department for what they have undertaken, but there is considerable criticism about the delay. A large amount of surveying has been done. A new superintendent, connected with prairie farm rehabilitation, has been assigned to that work. I think his name is J. S. Parker. While he was a stranger to the marshowners, and there were some misgivings as to his experience and ability to deal with this very special work, I think he has been well received and that his plans will work out reasonably well; at least that is the hope of the marsh owners. I should like a statement from the minister as to how much money has been expended on the protection works up to the present, and I should like also a statement as to the report and representations sent in by Mr. Parker.

Mr. Gardiner: The gross expenditure on the dikelands in the province of Nova Scotia covering the period from April 1, 1948, to March 31, 1949, totalled $101,616.73. Administration costs were $3,026.33, making a total of $104,643.06. Total actual expenditures in New Brunswick were $49,823.93 and administration costs $2,132.20, making a total of $51,956.13. If the hon. member desires these details on record I imagine the committee will agree.

The Chairman: Is that the pleasure of the committee?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Gardiner: The details are as follows:

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Could the minister tell the committee what recommendations have been made by Mr. Parker for 1950 and succeeding years?

Mr. Gardiner: The total expenditure recommended by Mr. Parker for the coming year is around a million dollars. That recommendation has not yet been considered or passed upon. Would the hon. member desire the locations?

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Yes.

Mr. Gardiner: Then I would ask permission to place these on Hansard also.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Gardiner: The list to date is as follows, and others will be submitted when the engineering reports are completed:

Nova Scotia

Falmouth marsh
Truro dikeland park marsh
Victoria Diamond Jubilee marsh
Grand Pre marsh
Saulnierville marsh
Dentiballis marsh
Queen Anne marsh
Dugau marsh

New Brunswick

Westcock marsh
Dixon Island marsh
Lower Coverdale marsh
Allison marsh
Middle Coverdale marsh
Belliveau village marsh
Beaumont marsh
Pre d'en Haut marsh

Prince Edward Island

Johnson River marsh

Mr. Black (Cumberland): While the marsh-owners and general public are very appreciative of what has been done, they are somewhat critical of the delay. Some of these aboiteaux and outlets that not long ago were perhaps four feet wide and two or three feet deep in some places are now fifty feet wide and twenty-five feet deep, and the cost of repairing those breaks and protecting the land is a hundred times more than it would have been if the work could have been done when the recommendations were first made; and it is getting worse all the time. That is just in one area a few miles from the town of Amherst, where thousands of acres have been flooded.

Photographs have been forwarded to me showing storage barns with the tide about halfway up between the sills and the eaves, with the entire area flooded. That shows how urgent it is that this work be proceeded with. In that area we have the most valuable marshland in the maritime provinces, and the farmers are getting discouraged. Recently they had a meeting; they are prepared to co-operate with the department, but they want action now so that this damage will be repaired and the marshlands protected and made available to them for agricultural purposes.

[Mr. Black (Cumberland).]

I would ask the minister if any decision has been arrived at with respect to the experimental station taking over certain areas of this unreclaimed land and building it up for grazing land and the production of hay. It is quite generally felt that this should be done as an example or model for the whole countryside.

Mr. Gardiner: As the hon. member knows, ten acres at the farm are being utilized for that purpose now. We have not contemplated taking any more land; we figured the work could be done on the ten acres, and are operating in that way.

As to the other matter, I am pleased to learn that our engineer has proved acceptable to the people and that they believe he is doing a good job. The hon. member will recall that when I was down in Nova Scotia last year there was considerable discussion as to the possibility of putting in aboiteaux as the old-timers had done perhaps a hundred years ago. They took me out to see one of these aboiteaux which I believe was put in under the direction of one of the old-timers who knew how it had been done in earlier years. He was too old himself to work on it, but he directed the operation. They followed that old method until they reached a height which they thought was above a water level that would do any damage; and when they reached that height they began to use modern equipment and methods and bulldozed the earth in.

When I was there, however, it was evident that this work was going to go out. That was an experience we had to pay for, and it was thought we should proceed more slowly until we obtained more knowledge as to how best to proceed, particularly if we are to use this modern equipment to put in these structures. In addition I understand the tide this year was the highest in the past seventy-five years, and that has been responsible for some of the damage. I quite agree, however, that if we are to avoid further damage of that kind in high tide years we must get along with the work as rapidly as possible.

As to the latter part of the question, our policy has been to take responsibility for putting in the main dike that keeps out the sea, and to that extent we have maintained certain areas as to which perhaps a definite decision has not been made with respect to how those living behind the dikes are going to handle the land, or how it will be handled by the provincial government. We figure our main job is to keep out the sea, however, and we hope to get along with that work as rapidly as possible.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): If I may offer one other suggestion it would be that the department, through Mr. Parker, take steps to devise and build special machinery to excavate these small ditches the farmers used to dig by hand. It is impracticable now to get labourers to do this work; it must be done by machinery. I feel that quite large sums could be made available as an incentive to practical men, who have been accustomed to working this marshland, to devise machinery that might be useful in this work. These small ditches cannot be dug by hand at today's costs; they have to be dug by machines. So far as I know, no such equipment has been developed which is acceptable. I believe most of the owners of marshland feel that machines of this kind can be developed.

Mr. Gardiner: I understand that New Brunswick has a machine which is fairly satisfactory. At the experimental farm we are working on machines which we hope will prove to be satisfactory. This development may reach a satisfactory conclusion with the support of the provincial people. I know the hon. member is acquainted with the fact that we have already purchased some machines for the larger works, such as putting in dikes. Those machines might be available.

Item agreed to.

41. For assistance in construction of potato warehouses under regulations to be approved by the governor in council, $100,000.

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the minister what portion of this $100,000 has been spent in the last few years on the construction of warehouses, and whether any applications for assistance have been received from the provinces.

Mr. Gardiner: I believe I am correct in saying that up to the moment no money has actually been spent. There was an arrangement with the province of Prince Edward Island under which we were to spend dollar for dollar with the province. The arrangement was that when that money was spent, the warehouse was to be available to the producers in the area. The province has been suggesting that its portion of the money be collected and repaid. We have not accepted that suggestion up to the moment. We have taken the position that our donation, and the provincial donation, ought to be dealt with in the same way, whichever way that is.

When the dominion put through the legislation in the first instance, there was no intention of collecting the money and returning it to the treasury. We have not asked this house for the right to collect it, and, as a result, no payments have been made in Prince Edward Island. No agreement has been reached. There are applications for assistance from New Brunswick, Ontario and Saskatchewan, in connection with the building of warehouses for the storage of potatoes. These applications are being considered.

Mr. Hatfield: Some warehouses have been built under the arrangement.

Mr. Gardiner: Some warehouses have been built, but we have not paid out any money to Prince Edward Island. We may have paid some in New Brunswick.

Mr. Hatfield: All the warehouses have been built in Prince Edward Island.

Mr. Gardiner: They have been built, but presumably they were built under directions of the provincial government. Up to the moment, we have considered that the provincial government has not carried out what we thought was the arrangement. We have not paid any money, therefore, but the warehouses are built.

Mr. Hatfield: From whom have the applications from New Brunswick come?

Mr. Gardiner: I understand the communications from New Brunswick are still in the form of requests for information about the plan. No actual application has been received as yet.

Item agreed to.

42. Agricultural Products Act—to provide for losses incurred in respect of the purchase, sale and export of agricultural products under the Agricultural Products Act, including authority for the Minister of Finance, at the request of the Minister of Agriculture, from time to time, to pay amounts in the aggregate not exceeding $40 million out of any unappropriated money in the consolidated revenue fund as recoverable advances, $100,000.

Mr. Coldwell: I believe this is the appropriate item under which to ask the question I have in mind, since it deals with the export of agricultural products. It makes provision for the amount the Minister of Agriculture may call upon the Minister of Finance to supply. I believe the house should have some knowledge of the startling charge made by the Minister of Agriculture, in his reference to the export of our farm produce and other products to the United Kingdom. I have not the report from the Globe and Mail, to which the minister objected but I have the report which appeared in the Citizen and which he accepted. The headline stretched across the paper—"Startling charge by Gardiner about U.K.". It goes on to say that he addressed a board of trade dinner at Brantford, and I quote:

—he recalled that prior to the second world war, Canada was Britain's chief source of wheat and apples, and also supplied considerable quantities of pork, cheese, beef and other foods. During the war Canada became Britain's chief supplier of pork, eggs and cheese, and also shipped large amounts of beef and milk.

This is the important paragraph:

"During the last two years," he said, "a very decided official effort has been made to drive every one of these products excepting wheat off the British market. And now that the four-year wheat contract is drawing to a close an effort is being made to drive off a considerable part of our wheat as well."

It seems to me that this is a serious charge. It is alleged there is an official move in Great Britain to drive Canadian products off the British market.

My understanding, from what the Prime Minister said yesterday in his discussion of the $3 million bonus for shipping losses, was that the restriction of trade between the two countries was due to the dollar shortage, and that it was our problem as much as a problem of the United Kingdom. In other words, they will have to supply us with goods in order that we may sell our farm produce overseas. I should like to remind the minister that on July 1 of this year a budgetary provision came into effect which greatly restricted the export to Canada of such things as piece goods. A few days ago I was introduced to a gentleman by one of the supporters of my hon. friend, and he told me he was the export director of a large shoe company in Great Britain. He told me that if I wanted to buy a pair of British shoes, and lived in Windsor, I could buy them cheaper in Detroit because the Canadian tariff was four times as high as the United States tariff on his product—shoes.

A short time ago I asked the minister whether the British took as much cheese as they had contracted to take, and the answer was yes. We have now lost the British market in other respects. It is true the British are looking more to the sterling areas for goods, because they have the sterling with which to buy those goods. That is not the whole story, however. Over the last two or three years I have followed this trade matter rather carefully.

Take, for example, the position as to bacon. The minister has often said that we supplied Britain with vast quantities of bacon during and since the war. He has said that Canada has fulfilled the understanding we had with Great Britain with regard to the supplying of bacon. I have some figures before me concerning this aspect of the matter. In 1946 Britain expected to receive 450 million pounds of bacon from Canada, and we sent 286 million pounds. In 1947 the British expected 350 million pounds, and we sent 232 million pounds. In 1948 the British expected 195 million pounds, but we failed to deliver anything like that amount. I believe the contract this year is for 160 million pounds, and according to a return that was tabled in the house, we sent only 14 million pounds in the first three months of the year.

I looked up the trade statistics of the Department of Trade and Commerce issued by the bureau of statistics yesterday. On page 3 of their report, dealing with trade up to the end of September, I found that we had exported to Great Britain about 28 million pounds of bacon. It seems to me that unless the minister can tell the house what the official action of which he complains is, a statement of this kind is something to which objection should be taken by all members of this House of Commons. It certainly does not make for good relationships. The minister will recollect that in 1948 we agreed to send 195 million pounds of bacon. We also agreed to send a quantity of beef. The American market was good for beef; we had available more bacon than we expected in the earlier part of that year, and the British agreed at our request to take 29 million additional pounds of bacon in lieu of beef, making 224 million pounds altogether. What did we ship that year? We shipped 176 million pounds. The minister complains that there is in Britain an official attitude to drive our products off the market. I presume that the British, who want to maintain their meat ration, are looking for a constant supply. We have been unable to maintain that constant supply or live up to the understandings—I use the word "understandings" because I am not sure whether they were agreements or not; but they were understandings. These figures I have used have been gathered carefully, and I know they are correct—I think the minister's own figures will verify them—as to the understandings and the amount that was sent.

We are losing the United Kingdom market, and we are losing it for two reasons.

An hon. Member: We have lost it.

Mr. Coldwell: All right; that is the hon. member's opinion. I will not go that far. I think we are losing it for two reasons. One is our failure to fulfil understandings of such importance to the British people. The second, of course, is the maintenance of a relatively high tariff. When the Geneva agreements were made two years ago some of us in the house urged the government to use one of the escape clauses in the agreement so that we would not have to put into effect immediately the non-discrimination clauses in the treaty. As hon. members will recall, we had a year's grace; and if the exchange situation was bad, we could ask for a further extension of time. But the government put the whole treaty or agreement into effect immediately; and may I say that while that agreement has been on the order paper it has never been ratified by the House of Commons.

The committee should have a knowledge of the facts on which the minister based this statement. If there is an official attitude to drive Canadian products off the British market, he should take the committee into his confidence. This is a serious matter. It is particularly serious because of the manner in which Canada went to the assistance of the overseas countries during the war, and because of the manner in which we changed our economy in many respects during the war to meet the overseas needs. I think the people of Canada should know on what the minister's statement is based.

If, on the other hand—and this appears to me to be so from all that I can read—this stems purely, or mainly, from a dollar shortage, then I think that Canada should endeavour to co-operate with the sterling and other areas and should endeavour, through international organization, to set up a plan whereby we might bring about the convertibility of our various currencies, or even go to the extent of finding an international currency that would enable us to trade with one another. After all, the world is short of food—it is always short of food—and Canada is a great potential provider of food. If we lose the only markets we have, and there is no possibility of finding sufficient new markets, what will be the condition in this country within a few years?

I greatly regretted that Canada did not support the proposal made recently at the United Nations for dealing with surplus foods. I notice that the president of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, Mr. H. Hannam, was of much the same opinion. He said recently:

> Farmers want some assurance of stability in markets projected ahead a few years to enable them to plan their production with confidence. With this view, we found the farmers of all countries in complete agreement.

He went on further to say:

> Our Canadian federation put a proposal for moving embarrassing surpluses into consumption before the international federation of agricultural producers at Guelph and it was unanimously endorsed. It proposed the setting up of an international agency and fund to take surpluses, arrange for their sale to needy people at special prices, and have the loss shared between the fund and the supplying country.

That may not apply to our trade relationships with Great Britain, but it does apply to dealing with potential surpluses of foodstuffs in this country in the next two years.

I was disturbed when I saw the minister's statement headlined in the Citizen the other evening; because, after all, trading relationships to some extent stem from good relationships in other ways. You can trade with people with whom you are not on friendly terms, but you can trade better if you are on friendly terms. I think this statement of the minister was most unfortunate, and I believe it was without any basis in fact with respect to the statement that there is an official resistance to Canadian products on the British market, except in so far as that resistance stems from the shortage of dollars with which to pay for Canadian goods.

Mr. Gardiner: In the first place, Mr. Chairman, there was no reason why anyone should have been surprised at the statement, because it has been repeated on the floor of the House of Commons; and I think those who pride themselves upon sitting in the house more days than other members do ought to be more familiar than anyone else with what is said in the house.

Mr. Coldwell: It has never been said in the house.

Mr. Gardiner: In addition, it was said before the chamber of commerce in London a year ago, and had publicity in every newspaper in Britain and in every newspaper in this country. I have a file—and it is so long that if I brought it into the committee and attempted to read it, we certainly would not get through tonight—of clippings from newspapers saying exactly the same thing, repeating what I said a year ago, not just within this last few days. The only thing I objected to at any time was a report which appeared in the Globe and Mail, in the copy which apparently most hon. members did not have, headed "United Kingdom wheat market threatened". In the article that followed, nothing is said with regard to the other foods which I discussed at Brantford, but everything I said with regard to other products was made to apply to wheat. It is that article that I objected to. I understand that the news staff of the Globe and Mail themselves found out it was wrong and got another report on the speech, before they published their second edition,—

Mr. Coldwell: I had not seen that.

Mr. Gardiner: —and they published it correctly. The first is the only report I made any reference to whatsoever. The gentleman who arranged for me to meet the Canadian Press is in the chamber, and he can correct me if I am wrong. We were meeting in a room in Brantford, and the Canadian Press phoned and asked if they could see me. I was communicated with through another. I said,

"Certainly," and their representative came right up to the room. I had written in my own hand the report which was given to him; if it had been fully published, it would have been a correct report of what I endeavoured to state. However, no Canadian Press reporter wrote it. Everything that is quoted in the Canadian Press report is quoted from a report which I handed to them. There was no reason why there should have been a wrong report in any paper, but I have yet to find a paper which published it all. The hon. member who is here, and who was there on that occasion, will agree with me that I took the report out of my pocket—it was in my own handwriting—handed it to him and said: "That in effect is what I will be saying." I said: "It is not my whole speech. It is a very short summary. I have a copy of it here in my own handwriting. In view of the discussion there has been about it, and the fact that it is short, perhaps I had better read it into the record. This is what I was trying to say, and what I think I did say—and I think I said it so that those who were there at least understood what I was talking about:

Mr. Chairman, I am pleased to discuss rural relations in Brantford. The city of Brantford is perhaps better known on the farms of Canada than any other city. The reason is that there is scarcely a farm in Canada that has not a farm implement or machine on it made in Brantford—

And I said, when I was speaking—"having the name of Brantford upon it."

No city has done more to supply up-to-the-minute farm equipment to the farmers than Brantford.

I went on to say that I thought Brantford a proper place to discuss rural relations with industrial cities.

It is estimated that well over $200 million is being invested by farmers in farm implements and machinery this year. Much of this is being purchased in the United States, and some people are advocating buying from the United Kingdom.

Prior to the second world war Canada was the chief supplier to the United Kingdom of apples and wheat and an important supplier of pork, cheese, beef and other commodities. During the war Canada became the chief supplier of pork, eggs and cheese, and a very considerable supplier of beef, milk, beans and other foods.

Until the fall of 1947 we had every reason to believe that our efforts to supply the British at low cost to them had been appreciated. We believe the British people still appreciate both our service and our foods.

During the past two years a very decided official effort has been made to drive every one of these products, excepting wheat, off the British market.

That statement appeared in some of the papers, and in some it did not.

Now that the four-year contract is drawing to a close, an effort is being made to drive off a considerable part of our wheat as well.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

In the report I have here it says "a major part". They had no reason for changing the word "considerable" to "major".

The farmers of Canada have been able to stand up against this deliberate onslaught—

I repeat the words "deliberate onslaught".

—only through the increased purchasing power provided in centres such as Brantford, a city producing farm implements.

I am a free trader and advocate the freest possible exchange of farm products for the necessities required on the farm. But when one is convinced that the other party to the trade has made up his mind he is not going to buy anything from us that he can avoid buying, free exchange is impossible.

If Canada's agriculture is to be threatened further in the "cold war" over exchange, even free trade farmers will have to advise all farmers to buy where they can sell. The only place where he can sell freely for the time being seems to be Canada.

That is the statement as it was handed to them.

Mr. Coldwell: May I ask the minister upon what evidence he bases that?

Mr. Gardiner: I shall give it. I have given it a dozen times, but I shall repeat it. I do not know why my hon. friend does not have it in his mind.

I have here a statement which appeared in the press of December 7, under the heading, "Coldwell claims session proving promises false". It says:

"There are others," he added. "For instance, a couple of weeks ago our Minister of Agriculture, Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner, opposed the United Nations proposal for feeding the world's hungry with food surpluses . . ."

That is the kind of statement, of course, which one might expect politically, but it ought to be based upon the facts. The facts as they have been given to this house over and over again, and over and over again to the country, and as every paper in Canada that I have been reading has published them, are that up until 1947 every representative of the British government who came here was bent upon securing all the food they could from Canada, and entered into contracts with us, which were fully understood by them, and fully understood by us, and fully reported to the house on every occasion.

I stated as early as 1939, and every session after that, that until the time the war started, the British did not believe we could produce in Canada enough foods of the types they required. Certainly they did not believe that we could produce bacon for the British people in any greater quantity than about 160 million pounds. We maintained that we could produce more than that, as the Conservatives before us had maintained that we could.

Mr. Bennett secured under the Ottawa agreements of 1932—written into those agreements—a figure of 280 million pounds of bacon. There was no way in which Canada could contract to deliver it, because under our federal system of government we have no authority to compel delivery to us.

So there was no opportunity for the government to make use of what other countries are able to make use of, namely, making a direct contract with the British government, and then compelling delivery to carry it out. We were not able to do that. But when the war came along we were able to do it. We compelled delivery under the War Measures Act.

Before the Canadian government entered into contract with the British government we stated over and over again at food conferences that we were going to prove conclusively to the British people that we could produce any possible amount they could take from us. I recall we produced over 700 million pounds in one year, when we had been told before that they were not going to expect more than 160 million, the quota insisted upon in 1936 under the Ottawa agreement. But when we battled under the preceding government and battled under this government we induced them to put the figure up to 280 million. By the time the war started we had almost reached 280 million pounds. After the war did start, by signing contracts with the British for 50 million pounds a year more than our officials estimated the farmers could produce, and more than the British expected to get from us, in every year we exceeded the contract. We exceeded it by more than 50 million pounds, until we got up to over 700 million pounds shipped over there within one twelve-months period.

When we got to that point the British government sent a man to this country, Mr. Scott Watson. He appeared before the farm associations, sometimes behind closed doors. I was present at the first meeting in Regina, when he made a speech behind closed doors. In that speech he told us clearly that when the war was over we were not going to be able to sell this amount of bacon in Great Britain. I think the words he used were, in effect, that when the war was over it would be necessary to trade bicycles for bacon in Denmark.

Mr. Coldwell: What official status did he have?

Mr. Gardiner: Representative of the ministry of agriculture in the government of Great Britain, and he still is an important official in connection with that same department.

Mr. Coldwell: Isn't he also a professor at Oxford?

Mr. Gardiner: He might be, but he was here as a representative of the ministry of agriculture. He had offices in Washington, and made speeches when I was present in Chicago and Regina.

Mr. Coldwell: But was he speaking as an official of the government?

Mr. Gardiner: Yes, he was speaking for the government and giving us information for the government.

Mr. Coldwell: Or as a professor?

Mr. Gardiner: He was speaking for the government; and I discussed his remarks too with farmers at Regina following his speech. But his statement was made officially to farmers right across this country. That was discussed for days at the meeting of the wheat pool delegates in Regina, and behind closed doors. I spoke myself immediately following Scott Watson, and I indicated to him just what I said at Brantford and elsewhere, namely, that if the British were to follow that policy they would experience difficulties in the long run.

The next step which concerned us was one which was widely and lengthily discussed in this house: whether we should get out of the production of meat and into the production of grain in order to save people from starvation. I am sure that there is no hon. member who was in the house at that time who does not recall that there was no opposition to the policy of getting right out of everything else and into wheat in order to save people from starvation—except from the government. We took the position that that was not a good policy to be followed here, in view of some things that were happening and were bound to happen in different parts of the world.

The result of that was that certain things happened at the FAO conference which I shall refer to in a moment; but first I should like to complete the record. When Lord Woolton was minister of food in Great Britain, when Sir Ben Smith was minister of food in Great Britain, when Mr. Hugh Dalton was chancellor of the exchequer in Great Britain—all those men met us in the spirit that the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar has said we ought to be met with in Great Britain. Their effort was to take all the food that we had in surplus. As a matter of fact while Sir Ben Smith was minister of food we were told in London that they would take all the beef we could produce in Canada and pay the United States price for it. We told them that we hesitated to believe that that policy could be followed sufficiently long to be a solution for any of our problems in the marketing of beef. We said we thought that certain price levels should be set, and certain price levels were set upon beef which did not necessitate any increase in the cost of living in this country. It was on that basis that we contracted to sell beef to Great Britain during that year.

Up until two years ago it is correct to say that all those who were in a position to direct policy in Great Britain were in favour of trying in every way possible to take the farm products of this country that we had been supplying during the war, and to finance them. I think most of them thought that they could find a way of financing these purchases. However, in the fall of 1947 that policy was changed. I am not going to attempt to say who changed it; hon. members can come to just as reliable a conclusion on that as I can, because they know what changes were made at that time. One of the outstanding changes was that we were told that there was great difficulty in finding dollars with which to pay for our food.

Mr. Coldwell: Was not that true?

Mr. Gardiner: It may have been true, but it did not give a basis for the statement that has been made that we have not been squeezed out of the British market. The delegation that came here in the fall of 1947 stated, in so many words, that they did not want any food products except wheat at any price, and that they wanted wheat at the price they were paying under the contract. We naturally said, and it has been reported to this house although not in as definite terms as I am stating it now—I think it is time it should be stated definitely—that if there was going to be no contract, there was going to be none. That meant that all our foods would have to be sold at the world market price. From that time on an effort was made to take more of our foods; but no matter how much discussion we had about it, it finally came down to the fact that they were prepared to take only cheese, bacon and eggs and in the quantities which we were certain we could send forward in spite of anything that might happen elsewhere.

We sat down as a result of that understanding and tried to figure the quantities but not as we had done earlier in the war. We could not go out to the farmers, as we had gone then, and tell them how much to produce to the limit for a market which existed. We figured it down to the last pound which we thought we had to get rid of in order to make it possible for our farmers to go on marketing at all in this country, even at reasonable price levels. I think everyone will realize that if you put back on this market 86 million dozen eggs; if you threw back on this market even the quantity of bacon we did send to Great Britain, or if you threw back on this market any of those other farm products, you would have lower prices, which might be beneficial to some people but would not be beneficial to the farming population.

We decided that the furthest we could go was to get rid of what we might feel was going to be a surplus. We agreed with the British—it was not put into writing—that we would cut that down as low as we could throughout the whole twelve months. In other words, we would sell all the products we could somewhere else, on the Canadian market or the United States market or somewhere else, provided that we could get at least as good a price for them as we had written into the contracts. We would go ahead and sell them, and if we sold them all we would not deliver anything to Great Britain. That is as they wanted it. I have no hesitation in saying that, no matter what anyone anywhere else may say. That is as they wanted it. They wanted those quantities reduced in the year 1948 down to nothing at all. There was no way of going out to the farmers of this country and telling them to produce more for the British market or more for the United States market; we had to be careful about what we said.

When we got along to the next year the British came and said: "We will take wheat and cheese, but we do not want anything else." There is no doubt about what they said. This matter has been reported both overseas and here and discussed quite fully. They said that they could not finance these purchases. Probably I am going a little too far in saying that they said they did not want them. Of course the British would like to have more food of certain types. They said they could not finance it, and for economic reasons they did not want it. They said that they did not want any. There is no doubt about how much it was; it was none at all.

We then said to them: "We can sell our cheese in the United States for more than what is proposed; why should you want to take only cheese." I am not going to suggest that that was the reason; nevertheless we were told that they could find dollars with which to buy cheese without depending upon ECA, but they could not find dollars with which to buy anything else without depending upon ECA. They could not buy other food products in addition to all the other things they were buying from Canada. They told us that if their desires were met, we would cut out eggs and bacon.

We kept up negotiations until they agreed finally to take 160 million pounds of bacon, which was exactly the figure they wished to take before the war. Under great pressure they finally agreed to make a contract for some 46 million dozen eggs, none of it in fresh shelled egg form. The price of shelled eggs in Poland, Denmark or any other country compared with ours does not mean anything. They did not agree to take any of our fresh shelled eggs at any price, and we have had to market them as best we could in the United States and Canada. I might say that up to now we have done a fairly good job of getting them marketed.

These are the facts. They do not want them. We are negotiating with them now and they do not want them. They do not want our eggs, and they do not want our bacon. They do not want any of them.

Mr. Coldwell: Is it because they do not want them, or because they have not the dollars to pay for them?

Mr. Gardiner: You can put it whichever way you like. They have much more to do with settling that question than we have.

Mr. Coldwell: There is a difference.

Mr. Gardiner: I have said in this report the British people still like our food and still want to take it, but I am pointing out to you that officially Great Britain does not want it.

Mr. Coldwell: Cannot pay for it.

Mr. Gardiner: The statement I have made is absolutely true. You can pick whichever official group you like to blame for it. I am not going to do the picking. That is the official position stated by no matter what official of the British government comes to this country, and no matter what official or minister of our government goes to Great Britain.

I presume it is an understanding of the facts that is wanted. I shall not attempt to say at the moment whether or not we are going to secure any contracts for 1950. All I am going to say is that discussions are still going on, and that is the environment in which they are being carried on. We are being told they just do not want it, and some say that we must go out and find some way of making it possible for them to have it. There are not very many ways in which you can do that. I think it is a kindly feeling on the part of Canadians when they say we should finance the sending of the food anyway when Great Britain needs it. But I should like to indicate what some people, who spend most of their time in Great Britain, think about what has been done and what might be done.

I have here a copy of an article written in Canada's Weekly a year ago, just after I made the speech I referred to at the beginning of my remarks. One of the paragraphs in that article is headed: "Canada was there when needed." This is an article printed in London, England; it is not something printed here. The article reads:

> Britain suffered tremendously in every way in the late war. None realized that better than Canada, which pioneered methods of assisting Britain to the utmost, financially as well as with her armed forces. In 1942 she made Britain a gift of $1 billion.

How many members of this House of Commons have forgotten that? This country gave Great Britain a billion dollars and said: Go and buy your food or anything else where you like. We did not even say that they had to buy it in Canada. We said: Here is a billion dollars, with no strings attached to it at all; go and buy anything you want, anywhere you want to buy it. This paper reminds the British people of that. It goes on to say:

> In 1942 she made Britain a gift of $1 billion and a year later a further $1 billion was earmarked for mutual aid.

All that mutual aid meant, as different from a gift, was that Great Britain was to buy the products in Canada. That was the only difference.

> In 1943, to provide Britain with vitally needed dollars, she repatriated $205 million of British equity of fixed capital of war plants in Canada. Before the United States advanced its loan—

The important word there is "before".

> —of three and three-quarter billions in 1945, Canada had already given Britain a post-war credit of one and one-quarter billion dollars. All this from a nation of only twelve million.

The trend of the article is to call attention to the fact, not in this country but over in Great Britain, that it is a pretty difficult task for twelve million people to undertake to feed, half feed or twenty-five per cent feed, fifty million people in Great Britain. If that is what is being suggested, then I am quite prepared to say if it is going to be done it cannot be done by the farmers alone.

Mr. Coldwell: I am not suggesting we should make a gift to Great Britain. I am looking at it from the point of view of trading with Great Britain in order that she may get the necessary dollars to spend for our produce.

Mr. Gardiner: Of course my hon. friend's view on this may be different from mine, but I am of the opinion that unless the public have all the facts we are not going to help trading very much. I do not care what the British people think about it. We are not dealing with the British people. We are not trading through the old methods we followed prior to the war. If we are going to trade with Great Britain at all, we must trade through agreements made by the government. As long as we must trade through agreements made by the government, then the people of this country should know what the British officials think about it when they come here. What they come here and tell us is: We do not want your food. You can interpret the word "want" in any way you like. You can decide whether it means that they are not able to pay for it, or something else, but they say: We do not desire to have it from Canada.

That is what I said at Brantford. It is in accordance with the facts, and it has been said all through the last two years every time I have spoken in the house and out of it. It has been published in every newspaper in Canada at least a dozen times, and it has been published in papers which are now writing editorials wanting to know why I did not say it before—which means they do not think their own papers valuable enough to read them themselves. That can be proven beyond any possibility of doubt. If we were not so near the end of the session I would take the time to read them.

Coming down to the present position, we know what the Canadian people can eat if they have the money to buy. We have pretty well found that out during the last couple of years. If the Canadian people had not had the money with which to buy the food produced on our farms in the great quantities that they have, we would have had one of the most difficult periods in agriculture during the last two years that we have ever had, owing to the fact that we could not market our food products where we have always marketed them when we had surpluses, and where we think somebody ought to provide that we have a perfect right to market them yet. That is the position as clearly and briefly as I can state it.

Why have we been able to market our food products at home? One of the reasons is that we have taxed the people who are making big profits, either in trade, industry or elsewhere, to such an extent that we have been able to pay for high old age pensions, family allowances and other social services which have made it possible for the people to have high purchasing power. The other is the fact that the Department of Trade and Commerce has been searching every corner of the world for markets for our industrial and natural products, everything that we have to sell, and have secured considerable markets for them. They have not stopped there. They have tried to find markets for the surpluses of food we may have after our sales have been made to the Canadian public.

So, directly as a result of the policies introduced by the government in its various departments, our people have a higher purchasing power. My suggestion at Brantford was that we try to keep it that way, and that one way of doing it would be for the farmers, who have to sell practically all their food products in this country, to buy their farm implements where they are selling their products. I think that is what they should do, and that was my advice to them.

That is about all that was said there. I believe it met with a fairly good reception where it was said; and judging by my mail since that time I am quite satisfied that it has had a pretty satisfactory reception nearly everywhere. Therefore I am quite pleased to give the house the report that has been asked for by my hon. friend.

Now he wants to know what happened at Washington.

Mr. Coldwell: With regard to the British contracts, can the minister produce any letters or memoranda which would bear out the statements he has made? I have made some inquiries concerning these matters, and the information one gathers from the British papers and from British sources would suggest, to put it quite bluntly, that the minister's statements are not based upon the facts and are inaccurate.

Mr. Gardiner: I should be sorry if in order to prove it I had to read from the London Times and a number of other British newspapers, because they all said it and all admitted it. They all added that there was some difficulty in finding a solution, but they admitted that that is what is being done.

Mr. Drew: In what issue of the London Times did the editorial appear to which the minister refers?

Mr. Gardiner: I am afraid I shall have to read it. There were two editorials, as a matter of fact.

Mr. Drew: I think the last one is the issue the minister wants.

Mr. Gardiner: Yes. I have sent for it, and will read the editorial when I get it. In the meantime perhaps I can go on with the other question asked, as to the FAO.

The suggestion was that we did not support the proposal made at Washington for the marketing of surplus foods. I suppose an interpretation could be placed upon the position we took at Washington which would bear out that contention, if you consider the whole proposal; but the position we took at Washington was that we were in favour of the principle of the proposal but were not in favour of the method by which it was to be financed.

I may add that we took this position after hearing what the Americans and British had to say about it, and both those countries took that same position very strongly. We did not say we were in agreement with them. We said we might appear to be in agreement, because of the position we were going to take; but realizing that such a proposal—in which we saw some weaknesses—could not be financed unless it received the support of the British and Americans, we said we thought a committee ought to be set up which would put into effect the principles of the proposal. In other words the suggestion was that someone should gather all the information with regard to conditions throughout the world; that this information should be compiled and kept available in a certain place, which would be the FAO, and that the committee should advise the various nations as to what could be done in order to avoid difficulties in connection with surpluses. In principle that was the proposal; and the only important addition contained in the original proposal was that a $5 billion fund be set up with which to carry it out.

It was suggested that many of the nations concerned might experience difficulty in supporting the plan financially. It was suggested, too, that many of them might have difficulty in carrying out any undertakings they might give. Therefore it was thought that a committee of this kind, which would gather all the information and pass it on to the governments concerned, could get more co-operation in that way than would be obtained by a compulsory board of any kind which would take delivery and market these surpluses in competition with other trade organizations.

That, in general, was the position taken; but we from Canada had in mind another matter which we thought would concern Canadian farmers in the long run more than any decision that might be reached at this time on the other question. It had to do with what I said a few moments ago; that is, that at the end of the war we, together with the Americans and everyone else, seemed to think that our particular task for the time being was to produce wheat in order to save people from starvation. The Americans held that view even more strongly than we did, and from time to time sent word that they wanted us to stop using wheat for this, or to stop using barley for something else, in order that all our production could be used for human food.

In 1938, at a time when we were taking considerably less than 50 cents a bushel for our wheat on the farms of western Canada, a price at which we could not produce it, the Americans had 81 million acres of land in wheat. During the year just before the war, and in the early part of the war, however, they took 26 million acres of that land out of wheat production, reducing their acreage to 55 million. They said that under the multilateral contract which was being discussed then they considered that a reasonable acreage for their farmers to have in wheat; and they went on to say that they considered the acreage to which we had reduced ourselves during the war to be a reasonable acreage for our farmers to have. At the time that was said I believe we had something like 22 million acres of land in wheat. In our contracts of that time we went on to provide that other nations, in order to avoid these surpluses, had to reduce their acreage if they were to come in under those contracts.

At the end of the war all agreements of that kind were taken out of the contracts, and they are not now in the contracts at all. There is no acreage control in the contracts.

When I went down to the United States I was of the opinion that probably the Americans still wanted to go on producing that great acreage of wheat. If they did, it was going to cause us trouble. Some representatives of the other nations proposed that the Americans should continue producing that extra quantity of wheat, but the United States representative disagreed with them. He said the United States did not think it should continue to do so, not only in the interests of their present agricultural position, but in the interests of the long-term food position in the world. In other words it was said by the United States: If we keep several million acres in grain, eventually the soil will be blowing around and will not be producing anything. The United States representatives were of the opinion the soil should be turned back into grass and the production of livestock and other products.

Immediately I rose and agreed with them. That is what I was doing when I got the report which indicated that I might have been doing something else. I agreed with the United States people, and pointed out the reason for doing so, namely, that Canada has practically no surplus of wheat at the moment. I said that as a matter of fact we had not surpluses, to the extent we had before the war, in any agricultural products. The reporter called them "top-heavy surpluses"; he said that I said we did not have any top-heavy surpluses. This was a fair interpretation of what I had been saying.

As a result of this discussion—at least I presume partly as a result of it, and partly as a result of their own judgment—when the United States representatives made their proposal to the conference it included a reduction in the acreage that was to be put into grain. I had a discussion with some of our press representatives at Washington as to whether "grain" meant wheat. One of them went to interview the leader of the United States delegation, Mr. Andrews. A report of that interview appears in the Regina Leader-Post, and I am going to read a paragraph or two of it, just to indicate why we think that we were on the right line:

Mr. Andrews said that the acreage devoted to wheat in the United States had risen by approximately 26 million from the low point of 55 million before the war. This increase was roughly equal to the acreage sown by Canada on its entire wheat crop. Mr. Andrews was fully aware of the anxiety this enlarged United States crop must cause to Canadian farmers seeking an outlet for their own produce.

Strictly on U.S. grounds of policy, however, Mr. Andrews was convinced that a new policy had to be applied. Much of this wheat was being grown on land never intended for this purpose. It had been brought into cultivation under the stress of the war and post-war needs. If it were not returned to grass, then "the land would blow away."

Already the U.S. government had made a start on this program by ordering a reduction of fourteen per cent in last year's wheat acreage of 81 million. Mr. Andrews expressed the private opinion that total reductions in the next three years might amount to something like 25 million acres.

That is exactly what we had in mind when we went there. We wanted to bring that situation about, and the Americans are stating that it is their intention anyway, no matter what we think about it. To continue:

Mr. Andrews said the government had two great sanctions in existing legislation to enforce this policy. These were acreage allotments and market quotas for individual farmers. Any farmer could store wheat on his farm, but if he tried to market wheat above his quota he might be fined very severely, in some cases up to fifty per cent of the value of his wheat. Restricting these allotments and quotas was one way to cut down on wheat acreage.

Then this reporter goes on to say that, so far as the farmers of western Canada are concerned, that was the most important accomplishment of the FAO conference. I believe it was more important to have that wheat acreage reduction, and the land used for other purposes, than that our farmers should be forced out of wheat in order to maintain a surplus which might be of assistance to people somewhere else, but would put our farmers in a worse condition economically than the people we are trying to help.

That is the only report that I care to make at the moment in connection with the matter, in view of the fact the official report of the position taken by the Canadian government is not yet in my hands.

Mr. Coldwell: I have heard a long list of editorials that have appeared in different papers, but I am asking about memoranda or correspondence. Editorial opinion is the opinion of one man who is writing for a newspaper. We know what editorial opinion is.

Mr. Gardiner: If you are not interested in editorial opinion, all I can say is that every official from the city of Ottawa, and every official who came from Britain, knows that every word I have uttered is correct, and that includes every member of the government who is sitting in this house. That is a correct statement of what took place. I do not believe it needs any backing from anyone else, except those who were present, and they were the only people who heard it.

Mr. Hatfield: The minister's statement is all the greater indication as to why the Minister of Trade and Commerce should make a long-term agreement with the United States. We might as well forget about the United Kingdom. I am surprised that the Minister of Trade and Commerce went down to New York and told the people they should buy from Europe. He should have been telling the people of the United States that they should buy from Canada. He should have been making a long-term agreement with the United States. We might as well make up our minds that the 175 million people on the North American continent will have to live within themselves.

Mr. Howe: Just to set the record straight, I may say that I was in the United States to tell them that if they did not buy more from Canada, then Canada would not be able to buy as much from them.

Mr. Hatfield: The minister told them they should buy from Europe, and Donald Gordon, an employee of this government, told them they should buy from Europe.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, the speech that has just been made by the Minister of Agriculture is one of the most significant utterances that has been made in this house for many years. He has used phrases that are bound to have an important effect on the relationship between the government of Canada and the government of the United Kingdom. As members of this house we must assume that this speech is a carefully prepared statement of the position of this government and its attitude towards the dealings they have had, and expect to have, with the government of the United Kingdom in regard to agricultural products.

So far as we are concerned, the export of agricultural products to the United Kingdom is by far our most important export. The statement the minister has just made, therefore, is one that may have a far-reaching effect in considering the future of that export market. This market was described by the members and by the Minister of Trade and Commerce just a few days ago as being vital to the future of this country. On December 1 the Minister of Trade and Commerce used these words at page 2551 of Hansard:

> Canada's prosperity is dependent to a large extent on the state of world trade and more particularly on our trade with the United Kingdom and the United States, our two largest suppliers as well as our two largest customers.

What we have just heard is a statement that there is a deliberate onslaught by the government of the United Kingdom on our trade in farm products with that country. Surely it is not possible to imagine a statement of more significance, a more serious statement, if that does interpret the situation correctly.

One of the reasons why this statement must be of great concern to every hon. member is the impression that is left by what we have now heard as compared with the impression that was left on the minds of the members of the house and other Canadians who read the reports of the statements made here, right up to December 1. Hon. members who were in the house on that day will recall that when the Minister of Trade and Commerce was being asked certain questions in regard to the sale of food products in Britain, and particularly in regard to some of the very food products that the Minister of Agriculture has now mentioned, he left the impression that there was no reason for concern about the future sales of those products. In his speech on December 1, 1949, as reported at page 2571 of Hansard, after giving a number of figures which showed our large export of food products to the United Kingdom in the present year and in recent years, he used these words:

> Judging from these figures I have quoted one would hardly reason that we are losing our trade with Britain. Let us take the individual commodities. What about wheat? I think we are in grave danger of being oversold on wheat from this crop.

Those words, Mr. Chairman, do not give anything like the same impression as the words that we have just heard from the Minister of Agriculture, who is primarily charged with the responsibility for supervising production of these particular commodities. The Minister of Trade and Commerce did not confine his optimistic remarks to wheat. He spoke of oats, barley, flax, bacon and other food products. Nor should I limit my reference to the recent statement on December 1 of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. On May 12 of this year I find that the Regina Leader-Post carried an extended report of a speech of the Minister of Agriculture in Simpson, Saskatchewan, under the heading: "Market is safe, Gardiner says". Then, criticizing those who had suggested that there was reason for concern about our markets in the United Kingdom, he used these words, according to the Regina Leader-Post:

> We could sell much more of most farm products if we had them in surplus supply.

I could give numerous quotations which show that right up to December 1, both outside and inside the house, ministers of the crown have sought to create the impression that, in spite of disturbing incidents and difficulties that were being encountered, our market in the United Kingdom is safe, to use the words that were attributed to the Minister of Agriculture last May. If in this important speech of his this morning the Minister of Agriculture had told the members of this committee that, to his great surprise, he had just learned that there was a resistance to the purchase of Canadian commodities in the United Kingdom, and that, to his amazement, the government of the United Kingdom is conducting a deliberate onslaught on the sale of these Canadian commodities in the United Kingdom, then certainly we would have reason to be astonished and alarmed by such a statement; but at least it would be an explanation of the difference between the statement we have just heard and the statements that have been made outside and inside this chamber until recent days.

To me one of the most revealing features of the speech of the Minister of Agriculture is the fact that he tells us of a meeting behind closed doors in Regina in 1947, and he tells us that in 1947—

Mr. Gardiner: May I just say that the meeting was reported in the press; what I said was reported in the press the next day.

Mr. Drew: Nevertheless it was reported in the press at that time without such an interpretation as is now put upon it by the Minister of Agriculture.

Mr. Gardiner: No. I put the same interpretation on it then myself.

Mr. Drew: Oh, no. If the Minister of Agriculture put such an interpretation on it at that time, it is extremely difficult to understand why he was saying last May that our markets in the United Kingdom were safe, or why the Minister of Trade and Commerce was saying in this chamber on December 1 that we had every reason for confidence in the United Kingdom market.

Mr. Cardiff: That was before the election.

Mr. Drew: The statement in May of course was before the election. But what the Minister of Agriculture now says—and he cannot be critical of the reference to what he himself has told us this morning—is that in Regina in 1947 an official of the British government informed this meeting that in his opinion the United Kingdom would not be buying our foodstuffs in any event, and that, to repeat the illustration which he used, the United Kingdom would be trading bicycles for Danish bacon. If that is so, and if the minister has been aware that there was a deliberate onslaught on our sale of food products to the United Kingdom, then what I find extremely difficult to understand is how it was possible for him to continue to assure the Canadian farmers of the advantages they were gaining by contracts under which they were receiving less than the world price because of the assured long-term markets at those prices at a time when, he suggested, world prices might be less than they then were. The key to the alleged value of those agreements was the assurance that the contracts would be the basis of continued prices at that level, and that, while Canadian farmers might not at that time be receiving the world prices, they would later receive more than the world prices.

Nor was it possible to listen to the remarks made by the Minister of Agriculture this morning without remembering where he made the speech that he made a few days ago. It was not made to an agricultural group.

Mr. Gardiner: Fifty-fifty.

Mr. Drew: It was made in the city of Brantford, which is a very important industrial city.

Mr. Gardiner: At a board of trade meeting.

Mr. Drew: I am aware there would doubtless be many farmers there. I am not suggesting for one moment that this speech was not fully reported both in the press of Canada and in the press of the United Kingdom.

Mr. Gardiner: Just to keep the record straight, may I say it was rural night for the board of trade. They had invited the farmers to come in and listen to the speaker, and I had been invited to speak.

Mr. Drew: It was in Brantford, an important industrial centre, from which there comes a great deal of agricultural equipment. The farmers in the Brantford area are responsive to the concern that might be felt by their immediate local market about the future of industrial production in that area.

The minister has said that his speech was given a fairly good reception in Brantford, and that it has received favourable comment from elsewhere since then. Certainly it would receive a favourable response from one point of view, and a perfectly natural point of view. He was asserting the proposition that, as Canadians, our first concern must be for Canada, and, quite properly, that our trade relationships with the United Kingdom or with any other country must be based upon our own legitimate self-interest.

The suggestion that Canadian purchases of industrial products from Britain should be related to Britain's willingness to buy agricultural products from us would undoubtedly receive support. I am not questioning the fact that it should receive support. But what we have been told today is that the reason for concern about the United Kingdom market is not something that arises now, but something that has been present since 1947 at least. That, to me, is one of the very real reasons for concern in connection with what we have heard here this morning.

It is difficult, if not impossible, to escape the impression that the Minister of Agriculture is now seeking to hide behind the government of the United Kingdom for the purpose of explaining the optimistic statements which have been made for the last two years, and which do not gibe with what he has told us now about the attitude of the government of the United Kingdom as disclosed at Regina, and as disclosed, according to his statement, at every subsequent meeting they have had.

The minister now tells us that our difficulties are not so much related to the dollar problem as they are to this deliberate onslaught upon our sale of products in the United Kingdom. I would remind hon. members that when I use the expression "deliberate onslaught" I am using the words employed here today by the Minister of Agriculture. He left no doubt that in his mind this is not so much a problem of dollars as it is a question of deliberate policy on the part of the government of the United Kingdom. He has emphasized that belief by saying that, after all, the solution of the dollar problem is much more the problem of the United Kingdom than it is for us.

By those very words the minister supported the clear statement he had made that this is a question of government policy. No matter what any one of us here may think of the political point of view of the present government in the United Kingdom, it is the present government of the United Kingdom; it is the government of that country chosen by the people of that country. Therefore we must regard a statement of this kind as having the utmost importance. Because the Minister of Agriculture did explain why he made that statement in Brantford—and in this I am referring to a report contained in the Ottawa Journal of December 6, which states:

> He was talking about it just now because negotiations for new food contracts with the United Kingdom are approaching conclusion. All existing food contracts, except that for cheese, expire the end of this month.

If that press report is a correct interpretation of what he said, either in his formal remarks or otherwise, then the Minister of Agriculture explained that he was making a speech at that time in which he was sharply critical of the government of the United Kingdom because negotiations for new food contracts with the United Kingdom were approaching a conclusion.

I can only interpret those words as meaning that the Minister of Agriculture was making this speech as part of the broad negotiations that were taking place, and that the purpose of the speech was to have its influence upon those negotiations. If that is so, and if his speech here this morning is for the same purpose, then it does unquestionably place before the government and people of the United Kingdom the proposition that, in the opinion of the government of Canada, the government of the United Kingdom has decided not to buy, no matter how much the people of that country like or approve the taste, standards or general quality of the food products they get from Canada.

This is something they should know. I agree with that proposition. By all means let us discuss these matters out in the open. By all means let us have all the essential facts before it is too late. If the situation is the one placed before us this morning, then it will be a good thing if, before the conclusion of these present contracts, the people of the United Kingdom have an opportunity to express their opinion as to what they think the government of that country should do.

I would also hope that in the interests of having a full knowledge of the facts, the appropriate official or officials of the government of the United Kingdom will say whether or not in their opinion the statement given to us this morning does correctly represent the situation. Unless we have that statement of course we cannot know what hope there may be of working out arrangements for the future.

I am not going to go into the details of the many figures that were presented to us this morning by the Minister of Agriculture in his long speech. I say long speech, but I admit that this important statement by the minister certainly required to be made, and adequate time had to be taken to give the essential details. In that speech the minister has left the responsibility for the present situation on the doorstep of the government of the United Kingdom. He has left the impression that the dollar problem is not the crux of the problem that we have to solve; that the government of the United Kingdom, as a matter of continuing policy, is making an onslaught on our sales of food products in that country.

This being so, I suggest that, apart from the other considerations that have been put forward, there should be in the mind of every one of us the realization that this is either a problem attached to currency difficulties or it is not. I would remind hon. members of the fact that on several occasions recently it has been pointed out that currency problems are at the root of some of our difficulties. One recalls that in the excellent report of the maritime commission tabled in the house not long ago, it was stated that the recommendations they made would not help to solve the problems connected with shipping or the shipping industry unless there was a solution of the currency problem. We have heard that said inside and outside of this house in relation to other questions of trade.

The word "convertibility" has been used in this discussion. I suggest that the real crux of this problem is convertibility, and this is a problem that can be tackled by the Canadian government, because it is not exclusively a problem of the government of the United Kingdom. Unless our trade in foodstuffs and other products is to be seriously threatened, one of the things most urgently required is that the government of the United Kingdom and the government of Canada get together to see if it is not possible to find some basis of actual convertibility which will loosen this log-jam and avoid the possibility of an extremely serious trade situation in the not distant future.

I suggest that everything that has been said here this morning emphasizes the need of tackling that problem. I suggest that everything that has been said here this morning emphasizes the importance of checking carefully what has been said in the past, and insisting upon the most complete and accurate information as to what is the present situation.

I can only repeat that what we have been told this morning is inconsistent with the statement made to this house in regard to these very products as recently as December 1. In the discussion that may take place now, between now and the next session and again at that time, we will insist upon full information. I would hope that the other party to the contracts, the government of the United Kingdom, will assist us in placing fully before the public, and in that way before us, their explanation of the present problem. Only in this way can a solution be found.

What has been said here this morning is significant and most serious. I feel sure that all hon. members want to retain these markets, and it is to be hoped that in seeking a favourable outcome of the negotiations which are taking place in regard to the renewal of these contracts a barrier of misunderstanding will not be created between the government of Canada and the government of the United Kingdom.

Mr. Coldwell: One o'clock.

Mr. Gardiner: I understood that we were to go right along.

Mr. Coldwell: I was not aware that we were going to go right through. I would point out that we still have to consider the estimates of trade and commerce, public works, finance, justice, the Prime Minister's office and legislation, all in full. We have still some items in agriculture, veterans affairs, and mines and resources. I take it it is up to the committee to consider whether it is possible to do that amount of work properly between now and midnight tonight. If it is, then I have no objection to sitting right through, but if it is not, I think we should adjourn for lunch. I am doubtful myself as to the possibility of completing all those departments before midnight.

Mr. Drew: So that our position may be known to the committee I want to make it quite clear that we did agree to sitting through until six o'clock tonight. I certainly will not withdraw in any way from that agreement. I think it was hoped by all members that it would be possible to complete business by this afternoon, but I must say that at the present time there does not seem to be the slightest possibility of that being done. I do not think there is the slightest possibility of the business now before us being completed today, even though we sit through until midnight without interruption.

The opposition can assume no responsibility for the amount of time that is involved. There are still three important departments to be dealt with. The Minister of Agriculture spoke for an hour and ten minutes this morning, and needed that time for the important statement he made. However, it is perfectly obvious, in view of the importance of the statement which was made here for the first time this morning, the significance of which hon. members cannot be expected to disregard, they should not be limited in any way in their discussion of it.

I have mentioned this in order to point out that I do not suggest that any undertaking be withdrawn, but the undertaking was on the premise that we would complete the business. If there is general agreement that that cannot be done by six o'clock, it would seem the most sensible procedure to recognize that fact and adjourn. Then we would be able to resume on Monday without being unduly exhausted by the effort made today to accomplish the impossible.

Mr. Coldwell: I have no objection to sitting right through if it is believed that we can finish the business.

Mr. St. Laurent: I was informed that an arrangement had been made to sit through until six o'clock because it was expected it would be possible to give due consideration today to the business that still had to be completed. I know it was on that assumption that the undertaking was made. There can be no desire on the part of the government to curtail the time required to enable hon. members to give such consideration to the business still to be completed as they feel the public interest requires. Of course there was a statement made by the Minister of Agriculture, but I do not think there are any other long statements to be made from this side of the house.

But there is not only one side of the house, however, and if hon. members on the other side feel that it is not possible to finish without slighting the consideration that the business of parliament requires, there might not be very much point in omitting the luncheon recess. The agreement to omit the luncheon recess was predicated upon the desire, which we all know is general, to complete the business as soon as it can be completed in a manner that will satisfy each member's feeling of responsibility as to the seriousness of what has to be done. If hon. members on the other side are convinced that they cannot properly discharge their responsibility if an attempt is made to complete the business today, it might be as well to take recess at this time and come back at three o'clock.

Mr. Drew: I want to assure the Prime Minister that I am as anxious as anyone else to facilitate the business of the house in the natural course of events. But the statement that has just been made by the Minister of Agriculture opens up a new basis of discussion of the agriculture estimates as well as those of the Department of Trade and Commerce. In addition to the very important Department of Trade and Commerce there are also the Department of Public Works and the Department of Finance. We have not even dealt with the first item in the Department of Justice; and there are also the items under legislation. Therefore I do not believe there is any chance whatever of completing the work today.

So far as the time of sitting is concerned, I must admit it would probably meet the general wishes of members, if we are not to complete our work today, to sit through the lunch hour and adjourn at six o'clock rather than sit late tonight. It will then be possible for a number of members to get home for the week end.

In making these observations I am not suggesting that we rise now, or at any particular time; but my thought is that we cannot finish tonight even if we sit right through the lunch hour; therefore we might consider closing the discussion at six o'clock.

Mr. Shaw: We are neither able nor willing to forecast the result of a continuous sitting, but we are prepared to co-operate in an endeavour to complete the business by midnight.

Mr. Coldwell: We will co-operate, but looking at the list of departments it would seem impossible. I am willing to sit through the lunch hour and see what happens, but I cannot see that we can deal with the business properly today.

The Deputy Chairman: Is it agreed that we sit through the lunch hour?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Gardiner: I want to reply to part of what was said by the leader of the opposition. Whether my statement was long or short, it was not a statement in which I was attempting to say what the reasons were for the position that was taken by the British. I was asked a definite question. I was asked to prove to the satisfaction of the leader of the C.C.F. group, and I presume others who think likewise, that there had been some official opposition to the marketing of these products in Great Britain. When he asked me if that was not owing to the dollar question, I said probably in part, but that after all that was a British responsibility as much as, or more than, it was ours. I was not discussing that question at the time.

As to the remarks that were made by the leader of the official opposition, I only wish to say that I take nothing back concerning that question from what I said a year ago. All that is on record, and I do not think it is necessary to repeat it.

On the other question of what was said before and after the election, my remarks both before and since the election were exactly the same as they were when I was in London a year ago. The newspaper reports naturally did not repeat everything I said, and every speech I delivered, over and over again. They took certain parts out of them and printed them.

So far as the speech at Simpson and speeches anywhere else are concerned, I stated that at the end of this season there would not be any of the surpluses of farm products which our opponents were prophesying we would have. I said our wheat would be all gone. I said we would not be able to fill our bacon contract, we would not be able to fill our egg contract, and all our food would have disappeared, with the possible exception of cheese, as to which we had already realized that the British would not take any further quantities. We have never expected any difficulty in connection with cheese. Therefore there is no difference between what the Minister of Trade and Commerce has been saying and what I have been saying.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce said about the beginning of the year that we had no troublesome surpluses. I said in Washington that we have no top-heavy surpluses. There is no difference between those statements; they mean exactly the same thing. I was reported to have said in Washington that there are no top-heavy surpluses. I did not use the word "top-heavy", but it states, as well as any one word could, what I did say.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): In view of what the minister has just said, why did he find it necessary to refer to the British as making an onslaught? If someone has made an onslaught on our trade, it suggests that everything in the garden is not so lovely.

Mr. Gardiner: I do not know of any other word to describe it, and I am not withdrawing it. When we met with them in the fall of 1947 they said they did not want our food products except wheat. The second time they visited us, in 1948, they included cheese, but they did not include cheese in 1947. They said: We prefer not to have these products. As a matter of fact, at certain stages they said they would not take these products, and at certain stages we said other things which induced them to take the products. I do not think it is necessary to repeat all that here

Mr. Coldwell: Then why were understandings reached in a given year? We will take 1947. There were 195 million pounds of bacon—

Mr. Gardiner: That was before.

Mr. Coldwell: —plus 29 million pounds of bacon later on, making 224 million pounds which they agreed to take, but we delivered only 176 million. Going back to 1946, the contract was for 450 million pounds, and we delivered far short of that amount. Coming to the present year, they said they would take 160 million pounds of bacon, and up to the end of September we have delivered approximately 58 million pounds. It simply does not make sense.

Mr. Gardiner: I have not applied anything I said to any time prior to the fall of 1947. I made that very clear. I indicated that under all members of the British government—

Mr. Coldwell: What about this year?

Mr. Gardiner: Let me answer what the hon. member has already asked. Until the fall of 1947 we had complete understanding with the members of the government in Great Britain. It does not matter whether it was the Churchill government or the present government. We have always made it clear that this is not a matter of party differences, either in Britain or here or anywhere else. So far as I am concerned it is simply a matter of fact.

Until we got to the fall of 1947 we had complete understandings to the effect that we would market our surpluses of bacon, cheese, eggs and other products in Great Britain. I am dealing only at the moment, however, with bacon, cheese and eggs; those other products were included prior to that time. Well, we set out to do that. At the same time we were increasing the purchasing power of our own people, and I have said over and over again that our people now are buying as much as fifty per cent more meat for their own consumption than they bought before the war. I have taken credit to the government, as has been stated, for evolving policies which brought about that result. Whether we are entitled to all the credit I have taken may be a question; nevertheless I say we have assisted in creating conditions which have resulted in Canadians consuming more and more of those products. That was what I was emphasizing at Simpson and at every other meeting I attended, namely, that we have created better conditions by family allowances, old age pensions and all the other social services, and by other methods which I went into at the time.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

Having done that; with Canadians themselves—including the farmers—buying so much more food in Canada, the amounts we sent to Britain under the contracts were reduced from year to year up to 1947. Until that time we could go to the farmers and tell them to produce more and more; but since that time, as I said, we have not been telling the farmers to produce more and more. The reasons I gave were the very reasons I have given this house today, namely, that we had already been told by the British that they did not want these products. I have always said on those occasions that their reason for not wanting them was a dollar reason. It was not because they did not want our food; it was because they were not able to finance the payment for it.

Mr. Coldwell: That can hardly be described as a deliberate onslaught.

Mr. Gardiner: I think it is a deliberate onslaught when officials come to you year after year, as they did in 1947 and again in 1948, and as they are doing now, and say: "We do not want your food at all." What are you going to call it, if it is not a deliberate onslaught? At the same time they say: "We are still going to buy that food, but in some other area." Sometimes they even come to this continent and buy the food in another area, paying for it in dollars. I do not know of any other term to describe it than a deliberate attempt to stop buying in this area. I presume it is because they cannot find the dollars with which to pay for it; but the attempt is deliberate.

Mr. Coldwell: That is different language.

Mr. Gardiner: I do not know any other word for it. The fact is that our farmers must realize, as we are going into another crop year, that this is the attitude with regard to the shipment of food to Great Britain at the present time.

On the other question, whether or not we have surpluses, I have been saying that we have none, and I am prepared to say now that we have none. The only commodity in which there appears to be a surplus is cheese, and I have explained that, so I need not go into it further. So far as the Minister of Trade and Commerce and myself are concerned, we are in entire agreement that we have not surpluses. On the other hand we have not been selling our products to Britain even in the quantities in which we sold them before the war; and they would prefer that we did not sell them any.

Mr. Quelch: I regret very much that there seems to be danger of friction developing between this country and Great Britain in connection with our trade. I must say there has been a real change in attitude on the part of the Minister of Agriculture as between today and a year ago. I believe he outlined the situation clearly in a speech he made before the Canadian chamber of commerce in London in December, 1948. His attitude was very different, of course, during the election campaign. I will agree that the stand he has taken today is the same as the one he took before the Canadian chamber of commerce, but it is not the same as the one he took while the election campaign was on.

Mr. Gardiner: You did not hear any of my speeches. My position was just the same.

Mr. Quelch: I read a number of them, and I heard a great deal about them. When I would discuss government policy at meetings, people would get up and quote statements by the minister on the trade position, in which he said there was no danger of the food contracts with Britain falling off. These statements were thrown at me time and again during the campaign, and my only reply was to quote what the minister had said in addressing the Canadian chamber of commerce in London.

Both the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of Trade and Commerce have pointed out time and again that the situation that is developing is largely due to the fact that the United Kingdom lacks dollars with which to buy our produce. It is not a question, of course, of Britain not wanting to buy our goods. The people there want our goods, but they have not the dollars. They have to buy their goods now where they can get them without spending dollars; so that the word "want" is ambiguous in that sense.

I agree with the minister that the official attitude of the British government today is that they must cut down their imports from Canada in order to conserve dollars. On the other hand I am satisfied that if they had the dollars they would be anxious to buy goods from us.

Another point is that the action the British government is taking today has been recommended by the international monetary fund and the administration of Marshall aid. They have been told time and again they must do everything in their power to cut down imports from the dollar area. You may find that in the annual report of the international monetary fund for 1948. So they are only doing what they have been advised to do by the body we helped set up, in an attempt to bring about a closer balance of trade. I think it only natural that they should take that action, because Marshall aid ends in 1952. The only reason why various nations have been able to buy the quantity of goods they have taken from us is that they have been given dollars with which to buy them.

Mr. Gardiner: May I say to my hon. friend at this point, if he does not mind, that I think he will agree, as I believe most hon. members will agree, that no one has backed the British since 1939 more than I have as Minister of Agriculture in this country. No one has said more kind things about them or has more fully appreciated the British position than I have. But when it comes to the facts as they are related to our own farmers, then I think those facts have to be stated. My kindly feelings towards the British cannot be allowed to run so far that the farmer does not know his position. I think he must know that.

I think it will be generally agreed that all through the period under discussion, from 1947 to the present time, the people of Canada have pretty well known the British position. At no time during the election campaign did I say we were sure of being able to get contracts with Britain. I did indicate what had happened in the past. I said the British had come to every meeting and said they did not want our food, but that in spite of the fact that they said they did not want it we were able to get contracts for quantities which have worked out to our satisfaction, and I was hopeful that in future we would be able to do the same thing. We are now in the midst of making contracts for the third time under those conditions, and we are still hopeful that we shall be able to obtain contracts covering some of the foods, though not all of them, or even all for which we had contracts last year. We hope to get those contracts for next year; and my hope, which I presume is the hope of the hon. member who was speaking a moment ago, is that by that time Britain may have the dollars with which to buy more of our products. I do not know how they are going to get there, but I do think the British want our food, in the sense the term has been used by the hon. member. They are going to insist on having it, no matter what government they have, as soon as they have the means to pay for our food. It is mainly for that reason that I want to keep the products in the British market under these agreements, until the British can get back into that position.

Mr. Quelch: I do not take any exception to the speeches the minister has been making. I believe he has been quite clear, although some people have the impression from his speeches that he is hostile to the British over this market situation. If one takes all the minister's speeches, both the ones delivered in Great Britain and in this country, I think one gets the correct impression. I have always felt that the Minister of Agriculture felt rather kindly towards Britain, and would do anything he could to extend our trade with that country.

The minister has pointed out that the situation that has developed is due to a lack of dollars. I take direct issue with the minister when he tries to put the blame for that situation on Britain. Just a few moments ago the minister said that the shortage of dollars was Britain's responsibility. I should like him to show me any way in which the shortage of dollars is Britain's responsibility.

Mr. Gardiner: That is hardly correct. What I said meant the possibility of its being corrected is more likely to be through Britain's efforts than through anything we can do.

Mr. Quelch: Right after the war, in order to get aid from the United States, Britain signed the Bretton Woods agreement, and also agreed to make sterling convertible, knowing full well she could not carry out that agreement. After a few weeks of attempting to do it, Britain was forced off convertibility. We now have the unpleasant situation under which she cannot get the dollars she needs for her business.

When members suggest that a possible solution to this difficulty would be the establishment of convertible currency, or the establishment of an international currency, it seems to me they are putting the cart before the horse. You might have convertibility of currencies, but until you establish a balance of trade you will not get very far. The establishment of an international currency would not mean that all nations would be able to buy. The only way a nation could get that currency would be by selling its goods to another nation, and taking payment in international currency. So long as you have the unfavourable balance of trade in the sterling area which you have today, there will be a shortage of dollars with which to buy goods. An international currency would not be any solution to the difficulty, because you would still have an unbalance of trade between the sterling area and the dollar area.

The only solution for the problem is for the sterling area to adopt the attitude that the Minister of Trade and Commerce seems to have adopted towards the United States. He has said that, so far as Canada and the United States are concerned, either they will have to buy more from us or we shall have to buy less from them, because we still have an unfavourable balance of trade. That is exactly the situation in which the British find themselves. It does not make any difference whether you are trying to bring about convertibility of currency or the establishment of an international currency; until there is co-operation you cannot solve the problem.

The Minister of Agriculture has pointed out that the reason we have fallen down on some of our former contracts with Britain is that we are consuming more in Canada. I do not believe anyone could criticize the government for that. I believe the best market for our products is the home market. If the reason for the reduction in imports is the consumption of more in this country, I would not criticize the government except to the extent that our production might have been expanded in order to take care of the increased demand. There is one danger though, and it is this: if we try to consume the greater part of our agricultural production at home, we may, as a result, lose our markets abroad. Then I suppose in future the prices at which goods were sold in Canada would be determined by the prices for the small amount exported abroad. That has usually been the attitude of governments in the past. If the price of the commodity exported abroad sets the price for the commodity we consume at home, then to the extent that we lose markets the difficulty will increase.

For this reason I am hoping the government will establish the Agricultural Prices Support Act on a sound basis. I know I am out of order in discussing that, but a resolution will be coming up next year to terminate that act. I looked upon it as permanent legislation. The minister has said there is no reason why it could not continue indefinitely. Now it seems an end is to be put to the life of that act. I believe that will be a definite breach of faith with the farmers of this country. As a result of certain sacrifices they have made in the past, they were guaranteed stabilization in the future, and not just for four years. I regret the appearance of that resolution on the order paper, and I hope that by the time it is brought down it will be in different shape.

Mr. Gardiner: May I make one comment about the last remark of the member for Acadia? He believes the British are not altogether to blame, and I should like to call his attention to the fact that, so far as I am aware—I may be wrong in this—it is only food products that are being declared surplus in the United States, as related to the provision of Marshall funds. This creates a difficulty in connection with food products that is not felt in connection with some other products. I do not blame the British for that; I do not blame anyone in particular. It is a fact, however. On behalf of our American friends we have to say that although they did have 26 million acres more in wheat last year than they felt they ought to have, they did not declare wheat surplus in the sense in which it could have been declared surplus under the Marshall plan. Provision was made to help finance the sale of our wheat in Britain, and that is one of our important products. It has created some difficulties for us in connection with other products, and makes contracts of the type we have been making rather difficult.

Mr. Charlton: All I can say is that the statement made by the minister this morning, along with the speech made in Brantford, to which I had the pleasure of listening, constitute the most important statement made by any member of this government in many years. I can assure the minister that I have a copy of the Brantford Expositor which carried his speech in detail. The only difference is that the Brantford Expositor has the headline, "British barrier to Canada's foods."

I have warned the minister and the members of this house on many occasions during the last two or three years as to what might take place. On one occasion in 1946 the minister took me to task for even suggesting that the British would not fulfil any of their agreements, whether they were by word of mouth or by signed contract. This morning the minister tells us that the United Kingdom in 1946 was trying to buy all our surplus farm products. Then he comes along and says that the situation now is actually reversed; that the United Kingdom is trying to drive all our farm products off their market. The statement made by the minister then, and by many other members of the government, that Britain had no dollars with which to buy our food, apparently has not been true.

Surely neither the minister nor anyone else in the House of Commons or in this country would expect that Britain would take only our surpluses of food products. Unless we can assure a stable market to Great Britain or any other country to whom we expect to sell our products, certainly we cannot expect to have that market. That is the thing that I have said was the trouble during the past two or three years. I have repeated it in this chamber on several occasions. I so stated when the estimates of the Minister of Trade and Commerce were being discussed the other night, and I repeat it now. It is not only a case of the dollar shortage; it is not a case of their wanting to see our products off the British market; it is the effect of this government's lack of foresight in not maintaining production and not fulfilling the contracts which we had with Great Britain, and allowing production to go down to such a level that we could not supply the food products that Great Britain wanted. She was therefore forced to go elsewhere to buy the food that she required to feed her people.

It would be interesting if the Minister of Trade and Commerce the other night had put on the record the figures I asked for, or if the Minister of Agriculture would now put on the record figures with respect to the value of food products we have sent to Great Britain since the beginning of the war, the amount of the contract, and the amount we sent each year from 1942 or 1943 up to the present year. Those figures would be most interesting. I think all hon. members would agree that never since 1944—or it might have been 1944-45—have we filled a British contract, with the exception, probably, of that for eggs, and for cheese this year. The quantity of cheese this year, however, is the lowest quantity we have ever sent to Great Britain in the last fifty years.

The attitude now taken by the Minister of Agriculture is apparently very different from that taken in 1946, when both he and the then minister of trade and commerce assured us, and assured the farmers all across Canada, that if we supplied food to Great Britain at prices far less than world prices during those years, we could be assured of a future market at a reasonable level in the United Kingdom. That was the statement made on several occasions in this chamber by the minister.

Mr. Gardiner: I still believe that, but it may not be next year—in the future.

Mr. Charlton: If it is not next year, it is not very satisfactory, is it? If we are going to cut out the odd year, what good is it?—because the very year we do not get these markets is the very year we are going to have a surplus in this country. Whether the Minister of Agriculture or the Minister of Trade and Commerce believes it or not, there is a food surplus in this country today; whether they call it a surplus over domestic requirements, an unsold surplus, or whatever they wish to term it, there is still a surplus. We were all happy, as I have said, to supply Great Britain at that time; the farmers of this country never asked for all the traffic would bear with regard to the price of food; they were doing it partly on a patriotic basis and partly on a basis of maintaining those markets with Great Britain in future years. The thing the farmers across this country are fearful of now is that, having sold these things for less than the world price, they are to be expected to take the low prices in the post-war era; and that is what they have been worrying about for the last number of years. This government always assured us, through the federation of agriculture and through the House of Commons, that they were going to stabilize farm prices; and one means they were going to use to do that was through the Agricultural Products Act and the Agricultural Prices Support Act.

I see that on the order paper there are two resolutions having to do with prices support acts. I grant you they are not to be taken up this session, but it is obvious that the government has in mind taking out section 9, the operative section, of the Agricultural Prices Support Act. Now that this whole market situation has fallen down over his ears, the Minister of Agriculture is looking for a scapegoat.

Mr. Gardiner: Oh, no.

Mr. Charlton: Mr. Chairman, it is fairly obvious that he is looking for somebody to blame for the situation.

Mr. Gardiner: I am not blaming anybody.

Mr. Charlton: The minister is not blaming anybody?

Mr. Gardiner: No.

Mr. Charlton: Yet he says—

Mr. Gardiner: Why should I blame anybody? Two days ago I hunted all over to find a few bottles of milk or a few cans of milk and a few pounds of something else to sell to a group of people who were here to buy these things, and I could not find them. Why should I be blaming anybody for the condition? We have no surpluses of these food products. The food is all gone. I have no complaint to make about that. That is what we grow it for. We grow it in order that somebody may consume it.

Mr. Charlton: I think it is fairly obvious from this newspaper report—the minister himself read it over this morning—and from the newspaper reports which have appeared in many papers since that Brantford speech, that he is blaming the government of Great Britain now for not wanting our food.

Mr. Gardiner: I do not withdraw that, either. The government of Great Britain does not want our food; but in spite of the fact that the government of Great Britain does not want our food, we have sold it all. I do not think it is going to be a good condition for the future. I think we must have the British markets in which to sell our foods some years ahead; I do not know just when, but some years from now.

[Mr. Charlton.]

Mr. Charlton: What is the government doing to get those markets?

Mr. Gardiner: Trying to keep our contract with them.

Mr. Charlton: The minister says there are no food surpluses. I wonder if the apple growers across this country will believe that. I wonder if the milk producers across this country will believe that.

Mr. Gardiner: I think even the apple growers will believe that.

Mr. Charlton: That there are no surpluses of apples? I am sorry, but I am afraid the minister is being extremely optimistic. Here is a statement in the Ottawa Journal of November 9, for instance, which is headed: "Processed milk and butter surpluses proving problem". Has that been sold?

Mr. Gardiner: When was that?

Mr. Charlton: November 9.

Mr. Gardiner: That may be. But they are not here this week. They are gone.

Mr. Charlton: Is the minister trying to tell me that 56,600,000 pounds of powdered milk and condensed milk were sold since November 9?

Mr. Gardiner: Yes. I am trying to tell the hon. member that within the last week I have been trying to find powdered milk, canned milk and milk of any kind to sell to anybody, and could not find it. If there was 56 million pounds here then, it is not here now, begging for a market.

Mr. Charlton: I wonder if the hon. member for Leeds will believe that. He talked about the supplies stored in church basements.

Mr. Gardiner: Yes, I think he will. He had a newspaper here the other day. He was going to quote it. I do not think he is here now, but he will have it here and quote it to you after a while.

Mr. Charlton: The minister still says there are no surpluses in Canada. He has all the figures. He has all the departmental officials in front of him. I have talked to some of these officials within the last week, and they tell me a different story. I do not know whom we can believe, if we cannot take the figures in the Trade and Commerce booklet, and if we cannot take the figures which are given to the press, obviously from the department.

Mr. Gardiner: I have here a list of products which was handed to me the other day by people who wished to buy them. It includes skim milk powder to the extent of 920 tons,

I believe it is; whole milk powder, 600 tons; yellow cheese, 1,200 tons; fillets of fish, 1,440 tons; canned fish, 900,000 tons; egg powder, 480,000 tons; canned vegetables, 7,200 tons. Then it deals with grits, barley and maize, frozen wheat and buckwheat, and canned milk. I went right down that list with the branches that are presumed to have them, and was told that we have none of those surpluses left whatsoever under our control. The only way they could buy these products is to go out and buy them in competition with other countries at prices they are prepared to pay for it.

Mr. Charlton: What prices were offered for those materials?

Mr. Gardiner: I have them here, but it is a lengthy list.

Mr. Charlton: They are low, I imagine, as compared with previous prices.

Mr. Gardiner: The price is lower than they were prepared to offer for some.

Mr. Charlton: The price we were asking is lower than they were prepared to pay.

Mr. Gardiner: The price, as I understand, at which they could be bought is nine or ten or eleven cents on the first one, thirty-four on the second one, and so on.

Mr. Charlton: What products are they?

Mr. Gardiner: Skim milk and whole milk powder.

Mr. Charlton: It is characteristic, because the minister told us this morning that England offered us more for our beef than this government wanted to charge them for it, just to maintain price control and to maintain the low cost of living. So that we could expect the government to sell our products for less than they could get for them.

Mr. Gardiner: But we had price control then, and we have not now.

Mr. Charlton: Well, this is still the most discouraging statement made in this House of Commons for many years. I am sure the farmers of Canada will take it as a very strange Christmas present to come from the government.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Charlton: Everyone on that side of the house seems to treat it as a joke.

Mr. Warren: It is not a joke.

Mr. Charlton: Certainly it is not a joke. It is a different story now from the one that was told prior to the election. The minister says he told the same story. One newspaper after another quoted what the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Minister of Agriculture said. The London Free Press of October 21, 1949, carries a headline, "Trade protection key Canadian policy—Howe" and states:

> Need of Adjustments
> "Ours is a healthy, prosperous, well-balanced and in fact a booming economy," he added. While there were indications that 1950 would be a favourable year in exports, there would need to be some adjustments.
> These adjustments may see the exports figures not as "impressive" as those attained in 1949.

"Not as impressive". Of course we are not going to sell as much. He says they are not as impressive as they were in 1949. The report goes on:

> High domestic demand, nevertheless, would cushion the effect of any adjustments. The domestic demand already has been able to fill the gap created by export markets restrictions.

Then follows the heading "domestic markets strong," and the minister goes on to tell how the domestic market is strong. That is true of many things. But is the domestic market enough to take all those surpluses which we will have?

I have here a telegram from the hog producers of my own riding, and they say they are discouraged about the situation at present.

Mr. Gardiner: They say they want a contract with Britain.

Mr. Charlton: Yes.

Mr. Gardiner: I got the telegram, too.

Mr. Charlton: They want a contract for more than one year, and they want to know what the contract price is.

Mr. Gardiner: And the British will not sign one for more than one year.

Mr. Charlton: That is something which this government has never given.

Mr. Gardiner: The British will not sign a contract for more than one year, and if they have their way they will not sign one at all; but I think they are going to sign one.

Mr. Charlton: It seems strange that they will sign contracts with other nations, even behind the iron curtain, for terms of two or three years—yes, fifteen years. They sign those contracts; I do not know why they will not sign similar contracts with us. Apparently the department is not prepared to sign those contracts for more than one year.

Mr. Gardiner: No; we have been trying to sign them for four or five years, but they have refused to sign them, either during the war or since, for more than two years on anything but wheat. We heard a lot of criticism from hon. members on the other side of the house for signing one on wheat for four years.

Mr. Charlton: Possibly they have refused, when contracts have been for anywhere from 200 million to 300 million bushels and they were sent only half of it. You cannot expect to sign a contract for four or five years under that condition.

Mr. Gardiner: Probably not, but the hon. member's statement is not correct.

Mr. Charlton: What is wrong with it?

Mr. Gardiner: My hon. friend stated the position correctly himself at the beginning of his remarks, when he was sticking to the record. Our production went up until 1944. We did fill the contract, and more than filled it every year. Of course the reason why we did not fill it after that is that the British came here in 1944 and said they would not sign a contract for a higher amount. They would only take 450 million pounds after that, where they had been taking 700 million. When they wanted to write it into a contract we refused to write it into a one-year contract, and finally agreed to write 900 million pounds into a two-year contract. That is the way it turned out. That is the way it went down, and we allowed it to go down deliberately because the market was not there.

Mr. Charlton: There is a big difference between 450 million pounds a year and 56 million or 55 million, as we have it this year. But of course the minister will find some excuse for lowering of production; naturally he will not blame the government. I still say it was lack of foresight on the part of the government. Taking the ceiling price off feed grains was one thing. In 1947 the price of little pigs went down to nothing, absolutely nothing. They were killed and thrown on manure piles in some parts of Canada.

Mr. Gardiner: Farmers do not do that.

Mr. Charlton: Some of the people here who claim to know so much about farmers have been away from farming so long they have lost track of it.

Mr. Gardiner: I go back three or four times a year.

Mr. Charlton: Apparently the hon. member does not go out behind the barn; you stay in the house.

Mr. Gardiner: The only little pigs that were ever thrown out behind the barn of any farm I was ever on—and I have been on them from one end of Canada to the other—were those that died a natural death, in spite of all the farmer could do. He did not kill them.

Mr. Charlton: I told a story in the fall of 1947 about a chap who was trying to sell pigs and who put a sign on his trailer which he left outside stating that anybody who would take them was welcome to them. When he came back there were twice as many pigs in the trailer as when he went in.

Mr. Gardiner: But that never happened.

Mr. Charlton: Do you say it never happened?

Mr. Gardiner: No; it is a good story, but it did not happen.

Mr. Charlton: The Rural Co-operator of Toronto, Ontario, states in a headline on October 11, "Gardiner says market not lost if nothing to sell." That was the kind of statement that was made prior to the election. The last statement made at Brantford and which was directed to the farmers was that the farmers across Canada would do just as well to sow what they wanted of the products they could make the most money with and then everything would be all right. That was quite an optimistic statement coming on the heels of the statement the minister made previously with regard to the British export market.

Everyone knows that we must depend upon our export markets. As I have said on previous occasions, we cannot look to the United States to provide markets for our agricultural products. The United States is a competitor and the year we might have a surplus of products, the United States would have a surplus of the same products and would not permit ours to be shipped there.

While the minister did not name the product, I have no doubt he was referring to cheese that is being shipped by the United States to Great Britain, and to the fact that this government had not permitted cheese to be sent from this country to the United States. Would we expect them to take it when they were exporting to the United Kingdom?

Mr. Gardiner: Let me read to the hon. member the report he is looking for and then he can find the answers he wants. Here is what is said in the Brantford paper:

> The minister said: We can produce more cheese now and enter into a larger contract with the United Kingdom next year.

Then the report continues:

> In conclusion he advised farmers: "Use your farm the way you have used it in the past. Produce as much as you feel you want to produce, and I am sure that we will maintain good relations between the farming community and the industrial community."

Mr. Charlton: That statement could have been made 25 or 30 years ago. Another statement made at Brantford by the minister was that the United States was going to reduce its wheat acreage by some 26 million acres. Are we going to continue to expect the United States to carry the agriculture of this country? It has been ECA dollars that have paid for the wheat and many other of our products that have been sent to Great Britain in the last couple of years and now the minister states that the United States are going to reduce their wheat acreage.

Mr. Gardiner: The hon. member should tell the committee what he said at the Brantford meeting.

Mr. Charlton: Sometimes one says the things one is expected to say on such an occasion, but I do not always believe them. In thanking a speaker who had come that distance it would only be common decency and courtesy for me not to disagree with the statements he made on that occasion. I do not think that, with the minister coming into my home riding, I would be expected to do that. I showed that much courtesy to the minister, but I am sure I am not called upon to show the same courtesy here in the House of Commons that was shown to him in Brantford.

Mr. Gardiner: You showed much more courtesy than there was any occasion for. Does the hon. member want to repeat what he said?

Mr. Charlton: I do not need to repeat it.

Mr. Knowles: Don't repeat it, just repent it.

Mr. Charlton: The United States is to reduce its wheat acreage by 26 million acres, but what has this government or the minister done to see that the same reduction is carried out by our western agriculture where the land is threatened with wind erosion? We should be doing the same thing. We should be reducing our acreage and getting the land back into pasturage. Is the minister willing to permit the United States to reduce its acreage by 26 million acres and then say that everything is all right here, that we can go on and produce all the wheat we want? Apparently that is the attitude taken by the Minister of Agriculture and this government.

The statement made this morning must have been quite a shock to some Liberal members who were given other statements to make previous to the election to the effect that everything was rosy in the British markets, that everything was going to be all right in the future. It must have been quite a shock to those hon. members to have heard the statement made by the minister this morning which absolutely reversed the position taken previous to the election.

Referring to the FAO meeting in Washington, the Globe and Mail of November 25, 1949, says that the Minister of Agriculture "doubts value of FAO clearing house". The London Free Press of November 24 headlined an article by the minister to the effect that there should be a return to sound agricultural practices followed in both Canada and the United states.

The farmers across this country are wondering what is going to happen in the next few months. When there is doubt in their minds there certainly is not going to be increased production; there is more likely to be a decrease in production. Apparently the only thought of this government is for today, let tomorrow look after itself.

Mr. Hatfield: The minister was going to answer some questions I asked.

Mr. Gardiner: I misled the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton by saying that the question he asked would come under this particular item. The amounts spent to assist the marketing of different farm products are as follows:

1946	Potatoes	$ 170,748.48
1947	Apples	3,119,274.22
1948	Potatoes	1,642,122.49
1948	Apples	1,409,000.00
1948	Beans	195,000.00
1948	Honey	325,000.00
1949	Skimmed milk	1,063,000.00
1949	Butter	26,775,000.00
1949	Cheese	5,200,000.00
1949	Apples	1,500,000.00

In the case of butter I would not say that that amount was paid to assist in marketing. That money was used in order to accumulate the butter, but the butter is now being sold and the money will be returned. The item for cheese is in the same class. The arrangement with regard to apples was on a fifty-fifty basis; this government paid half the price and the British paid half the price.

Mr. Hatfield: Has the minister received any requests from the department of agriculture in New Brunswick or from anyone else in that province to support the price of potatoes? This season we have had the largest potato crop ever produced, and on December 1 there was the largest amount in storage ever known. The market has gone down to the point where it is less than the cost of production. I should like to ask the minister if he intends to put a support price on potatoes.

Mr. Gardiner: We have had a request from both the government of New Brunswick and the government of Prince Edward Island to put on a support price. Up to the present time it has not been done.

Mr. Hatfield: Does the minister intend to take some action?

Mr. Gardiner: I have an arrangement to discuss it with the minister from the province of New Brunswick next week when the agriculturists are here, but I do not know what the outcome of the discussion will be.

Mr. Hatfield: I understand the minister will be in Ottawa on Monday. Will he take up this matter with him?

Mr. Gardiner: Yes, I think I have an appointment to meet him some time on Monday. I was not able to set a time because we have the conference on Monday.

Mr. Hatfield: Is the United States embargo against wheat shipments from Canada still in effect?

Mr. Gardiner: Yes, the embargo is the same as was put on early in the war.

Mr. Fulford: On September 30 I spoke before the committee, and my remarks were of a very gloomy nature concerning the future of the evaporated milk industry. I was referring entirely to a local situation, and at that time my figures were absolutely correct. Since then a very different picture has presented itself to the industry. I am only speaking now of evaporated milk. The situation that had developed has resolved itself, and I can say confidently that today the industry is in a substantially better position. In fact exports of evaporated milk have gone ahead in an extraordinary manner.

Mr. Graydon: That was because of the by-election.

Mr. Fulford: The by-election had nothing to do with milk. The markets that have been found are chiefly in Europe. I want to commend both the Department of Trade and Commerce and the Department of Agriculture for their unfailing efforts to develop the markets of Canada, harbingers of gloom on the other side and reports to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. Graydon: You should have a talk with them before you make another speech.

Mr. Cardiff: I should like to ask the Minister of Agriculture one question. As the result of the remarkable statement he made this morning, is he now in a position to admit that he accepted too low a price for the products he sold in the British market during the war?

[Mr. Gardiner.]

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Chairman, in the first place I do not admit that the statement was remarkable. In the second place I do not admit that, so far as any of the products we have been discussing are concerned, we accepted a low price from the British for them. An examination of the markets now will indicate that we are asking a higher price than most other people are getting in the British market.

Mr. Cardiff: I do not think that answers the question. During the war years you sold our agricultural products to Great Britain for less than you could have sold them on any other market with the understanding that we were to continue to have the British market after the war. I should like you to admit that one thing.

Mr. Gardiner: I will not admit any such statement.

Mr. Cardiff: No, you will not admit it, but you should.

Mr. Gardiner: I should not admit it. There were only a few months during which Canadian farmers could have sold their food products at higher prices than they were sold. At the end of the war the United States took off all controls, and there was a period of time, which might have extended over twelve months but after all was only a few months compared with what we are talking about, when you could have sold Canadian products at very much more in the United States market than you could have sold them here, if they had let them in. I am not too sure that they would have let them in if we had tried to sell them on the United States market. We have been selling our products, with the exception of wheat under the four-year contract, at just as good a price in the British market as could have been found in any other market for that quantity of products.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Chairman, I want to say a word or two, though now that I no longer represent an agricultural riding I do not feel as expert on agricultural matters as I used to. I wish to make one or two comments. First of all I think the Minister of Agriculture did himself a great injustice when he said his speech was not remarkable. I think it was quite remarkable in one or two ways.

There are two things I want to say about it. I am sure that anyone undertaking to criticize the Minister of Agriculture would never criticize him for being stupid, for not knowing the meaning of words, or not having a due sense of publicity. When the minister used the words "deliberate onslaught" more than once, when he said many times that Great Britain "does not want our products"—I will tell him the other things he said too—

Mr. Gardiner: The officials.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): When he said they "would prefer that we did not sell to them", although it is quite true that at times he explained it was because they did not have the money, nevertheless the whole tenor of the minister's remarks created the impression that the British people were being unco-operative and a bit perverse.

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I will not permit anyone else to have the floor.

Mr. Gardiner: My hon. friend is not going to put words in my mouth. I was not talking about the British people.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I will not allow the minister to interrupt.

Mr. Gardiner: It is all on Hansard.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Chairman, who has the floor?

The Chairman: The hon. member for Greenwood has the floor.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I will go on. The minister is such an experienced parliamentarian that he can shout us all down, and he gets away with things that we amateurs cannot very well do.

Mr. Gardiner: After that statement, I am sure you will permit me to say that I did not refer to the British people. I made it very clear I was not talking about the British people. I said "officially".

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I will accept that correction. We will say the officials or the government. Nevertheless what I say is that the impression remains and will be carried into the press—indeed I should very much like to see the press release to see how it was put out—that somehow or other the British people are not being co-operative, the British government is not being co-operative. The government represents the British people. I do not take very much stock in that distinction although I accept it.

Mr. Gardiner: I know you will allow me to correct you—

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): No more interruptions, Mr. Chairman; I have the floor.

Mr. Gardiner: There is no press release.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I have the floor. In my opinion it is being done to becloud the issue. It is good footwork. I have always admired the minister's footwork, but never so much as I did this morning. He is able to say—and I think with truth—that he has been a friend of Great Britain. I think that is true. I think he can point to many things which have greatly helped Great Britain for which he has been responsible, but nevertheless now there is a different situation. We have a change. We have to get off on a new track, and the minister's speech is very clever on that point. I think he has deliberately tried to create what to me, at any rate, is an entirely false impression of the situation in Great Britain, and of their attitude. The second thing I want to say is—

Mr. Gardiner: I cannot be responsible for your impressions.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I am giving my opinion for what it is worth. It is just the opinion of a private member for what it is worth. The second thing is that a short time ago we had a picture of the minister, this great free trader, going into what he would have called years ago the home of high protectionism. It is almost like the bible picture of the lion and the lamb lying down together. We had the minister creating a lovely picture of how we were going to get along by pulling up each other's bootstraps. In other words, the west was going to grow prosperous by selling to the east, and the east was going to grow prosperous by selling to the west. The minister very modestly suggested that that was due to what the government had done. He forgot to refer to the Marshall plan. He forgot to point out we were still making advances to enable the British to pay.

Mr. Gardiner: I did not forget those things at all.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): All I want to point out is that that is another of those befuddling statements which are intended to lull the Canadian people into a sense of entirely false security. But do not take my word for it. I want to quote a short extract from a newspaper which often supports the minister, and of which I imagine he often thinks well. It refers to a statement along the same lines made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce. The article is from the Winnipeg Free Press of November 16. It deals with a statement made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce concerning the importance of the home market. I think the Canadian people had better realize the implication of the statement which apparently is that somehow or other we are going to get on very well by the east selling to the west and the west selling to the east. That was the general impression left by a part of what the minister said. The minister is very adroit at slipping in words here and there which enable him to come back later and say, "That is not what I said at all." I want to put forward what an ordinary fellow like the hon. member for Greenwood takes out of what the minister says. This is the quotation from the Free Press commenting on the speech by the Minister of Trade and Commerce:

> It has to be realized, however, and doubtless Mr. Howe realizes it, that the abundant domestic market which is absorbing more and more of our Canadian production is abundant mainly because our export trade is high. When Canadian farmers, lumbermen, miners, fishermen and factory workers can sell their products outside Canada they have money in their pockets to buy Canadian goods.
> As proved again and again throughout Canadian history a serious drop in foreign exports instantly impoverishes a large part of the Canadian population, reduces its consumption of Canadian as well as foreign goods and thus slows down the whole national economy.

This morning, as I say, the minister has tried to divert our attention and make the British government the villains of the piece, or at any rate the un-co-operative people. I got it right that time, I hope; not the British people but the British government, which to all intents and purposes is the British people. I hope the public of Canada will not swallow that, will not fall for that piece of fast footwork. I hope also the public will realize, notwithstanding all the Pollyanna statements of the various ministers, that foreign trade is vital to us and that if we begin to lose our foreign trade our prosperity will not remain.

Demobilization and Reconversion—

43. Freight assistance on western feed grains, $4,750,000.

Mr. Charlton: There is an apparent reduction of $16 million in this item, but $12 million has been added in a supplementary item, which still leaves a reduction of some $4 million. As I understand it, order in council P.C. 3803, dated July 29 and effective August 1, changed this whole situation. Will the minister tell us exactly what this freight assistance was before that order in council was passed and what change was made by the order in council with respect to those in the east who buy this grain?

Mr. Gardiner: The amount provided in these estimates is to the end of the financial year; but if the policy is continued longer supplementary amounts will have to be provided as well. I understand the figure up to the present is about $17 million, which will have to be provided eventually if the policy is continued.

Answering the other question concerning the change of rates into Ontario, that has to do with the fact that there were increases in freight rates generally, and as a result changes had to be made in the amounts charged not only in Ontario but elsewhere. At the time that was being done it was realized that since the policy was put into effect certain discrepancies have developed in the amounts paid in Quebec and the provinces further east as compared with Ontario, owing to the fact that some of the grain coming into Ontario is shipped in by water, some partly by rail and some by rail, water and truck. The changes were made in order to adjust that position so that the farmers in the various areas would benefit more nearly to the same extent. That is the general reason, without going into the detailed changes that were made.

Mr. Charlton: Would the minister explain in more detail just what those changes were? As I understand it, no payment is to be made now for trucking, and the amount paid at the various ports along the lakes varies. Previous to this order in council the amount was the same at all ports, about $5.40 per ton. I believe the minister should give us the amounts paid these various companies at the different points, such as Owen Sound, Goderich and Port Colborne. As I say, the rate formerly was the same in all ports. Since the adoption of P.C. 3803 that system has been changed and a graduated scale has been adopted. In Georgian bay ports, Goderich, Sarnia and Walkerville the amount is $3; in Port Colborne it is $3.60; in Toronto it is $3.80; in Kingston it is $4 and in Prescott it is $4.15. Under the previous arrangement, when the same amount was paid in all ports, a man at Goderich would be getting very much more in proportion than a man at Prescott.

Mr. Gardiner: The position in Ontario is different from that in some of the other provinces in this way, that a very considerable part of the grain coming to Ontario for feed purposes is unloaded at Georgian bay ports. Another considerable portion is unloaded at Toronto; some is brought to Prescott, and so on. At one time we did allow special rates for trucking in Ontario which were not allowed in any of the other provinces. We also had certain provisions concerning the relationship between rail shipping and lake shipping which we considered gave Ontario an advantage over some of the other provinces. The first order in council was intended to more or less equalize the returns in Ontario as compared with the returns in other provinces, and the second order in council put into effect a 50 cent increase in the rates due to the fact that the railways had been given an increase in freight rates.

Mr. Charlton: The minister still has not answered my question. Is it not true that previous to this order in council each company, regardless of where it was located, received the same freight assistance of $5.40 or $5.50 per ton?

Mr. Gardiner: That was true, and under that method some got more than their costs. That situation has been corrected under the order in council as finally approved. I think they are pretty well all satisfied with the arrangement that has been made. Naturally there was some criticism from those who were going to get less than they had received before, but I think it is pretty well agreed that they were getting more than they were entitled to previously.

Mr. Charlton: Consideration has not been given to paying for trucking from these various points?

Mr. Gardiner: No.

Mr. Charlton: As long as the shipment is by rail the assistance is given?

Mr. Gardiner: On carload lots.

Mr. Charlton: By rail?

Mr. Gardiner: Yes.

Mr. Charlton: Up to the maximum of $5.50?

Mr. Gardiner: I think it is $6 now. It was $5.50 before the last order.

Mr. Charlton: And nothing is to be allowed a chap who may be thirty or forty miles from Goderich, for instance, and who wants to truck the grain to his mill? He is not allowed anything for that trucking, though obviously it would not pay him to put the grain on a railroad car and ship it that short distance?

Mr. Gardiner: Well, there are great difficulties in connection with the payment of freight moved by truck. Everyone moves grain by trucks. If a company decides to move its grain by truck instead of by rail, that is its own choice. I am afraid it would be an impossibility to administer payments of that kind to everyone who would be entitled to them if you started paying freight on trucks.

45. Dairy products board, $22,022.

Mr. Charlton: I understand the government now is releasing the more than 48 million pounds of butter held in storage by the dairy products board. Just what percentage of that butter has been disposed of, and how is it grading, coming out of storage? What percentage of the butter is grading No. 1?

Mr. Gardiner: It is grading out exceptionally well. To date there has been approximately 5 million pounds of it sent out. It is going out in carload lots to persons who desire to distribute it.

Mr. Charlton: The minister says it is going out in car lots. I understand some of it is being trucked from these warehouses; is that correct?

Mr. Gardiner: No. The packing house in the town in which we had the meeting the other night made an application to me to make representations to the officials that they be allowed to truck some of it, but to date no trucking has been allowed.

Mr. Charlton: It is only sold in car lots?

Mr. Gardiner: It is sold in car lots.

Demobilization and Reconversion—

667. Freight assistance on western feed grains—further amount required, $250,000.

Mr. Knowles: These supplementaries are the ones which are known as the Newfoundland supplementaries. Will the minister say whether this money was used as freight assistance to get feed grains into the province of Newfoundland?

Mr. Gardiner: Yes, we are obligated to give some consideration to the farmers who want to take feed grain into Newfoundland, just as we give assistance to the other maritime provinces.

755. To provide for payment of compensation to owners of animals affected with diseases coming under the operation of the Animal Contagious Diseases Act, which have died or have been slaughtered under circumstances unprovided for under the above act and regulations thereunder, in the amounts detailed in the estimates, $1,815.

Mr. Charlton: This item has to do with the Animal Contagious Diseases Act. Will the minister give the committee an idea what the cost will be as a result of the amendment to that act?

Mr. Gardiner: I am not yet in a position to state what it is going to cost. An estimate was made at the time the amendment was under consideration, but it has slipped my mind. The act does provide that the government will pay for all cattle that went to the tank from April 1, 1947, down to the present time. We shall continue to pay on that basis for all cattle that go to the tank. It is presumed payment will be made on the basis of the average price those cattle would have brought on the open market. I have no estimate of what the amount will be.

Mr. Charlton: At that time we were told that the payments under the retroactive part of the legislation would be based on the average for three-month periods.

Mr. Gardiner: Yes, I think the act gives the minister authority to arrange some regulations that will apply. I am not sure whether it will be three-month periods, but there will be some period over which we will average it. It will depend upon when the price changes came into effect. There were certain price changes following the war, and we will try to set it so that whatever the period is the average price will be about the same throughout that whole period.

Mr. Charlton: That average has not been worked out as yet?

Mr. Gardiner: No.

Mr. Charlton: Can the minister say when he reasonably expects that to be worked out, and when the payments will be made to the farmers?

Mr. Gardiner: It is estimated we will have the payments made by the end of this fiscal year, or within a short period running into April which is always allowed for the final cleaning up of payments charged to the fiscal year. We will have the records completed and the cheques out.

Mr. Charlton: By the end of this fiscal year?

Mr. Gardiner: Yes.

Mr. Charlton: There is no item in the estimates for that, so how can the money be available?

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF TRADE AND COMMERCE

413. Departmental administration, $468,107.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Is the minister going to make any general statement of any nature concerning the work of the department?

Mr. Howe: I made a comprehensive statement when this item was called on December 1.

Mr. Knowles: That statement, of course, was before the statement the Minister of Agriculture made this morning. I do not rise to pursue that, but I should like to ask another question. It relates to the employees of the board of grain commissioners, which I understand comes under the minister's department. Would he like to have the question now, or is there some other item upon which I should ask it?

Mr. Howe: It should be asked when we reach item 430, the administration of the Canada Grain Act.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

Mr. Knowles: All right, I shall wait until then.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, the department whose estimates have just been completed has some relationship to the discussion now before us, because of the similarity of the subject matter in so far as a number of the items are concerned. One of the points I should like to emphasize particularly is something that was said by the Minister of Agriculture in a speech he made last year in London. It was delivered to the chamber of commerce on December 17, 1948, and I am referring to it because of what seems to me to keep recurring in any discussion of trade, or of our business activities of any kind.

After reviewing the situation with which he thought Canada was confronted at the time, the Minister of Agriculture said this—I suggest that it has a great deal to do with the whole trade and commerce situation with which we are confronted.

> I am convinced that the world is not in any state of mind where it can expect to agree that the manipulation of any system or systems of currency is going to be allowed to interfere with the will of those who have empty stomachs, when it is preventing surpluses of food to get to them. It might be a good thing for everybody if they closed down United Nations' meetings long enough to permit of the United Kingdom and United States experts getting together and settling some basis upon which dollars and sterling can be converted, to allow nations like Canada to produce food to feed the starving millions, and distribute it.

In those words, I believe the Minister of Agriculture has pointed to the greatest need of this period, if we are not to find barriers in the way of trade which will cause difficulties, no matter how optimistic the predictions might be. I repeat the suggestion that was presented earlier in this session, that the government of Canada should not wait for action to be taken by the government of the United Kingdom and the United States but that it should itself take the initiative in seeking to find some way in which Canada can trade with the sterling area. If this problem is tackled, I believe that we may find the solution for the broader problem; because if we can find a way to trade effectively with Britain, then at the same time we shall have found a way to trade effectively with the rest of the sterling area; and if we find that solution, we shall have found a solution for the broader problem, which will be to the advantage of the United States as well as Canada.

There is a reason why Canada is in a better position to make proposals which might solve this problem than is the United States. Even with the full recognition of the great service that the government of the United States has done to all mankind by the financial resources which that government has made available to the nations of Europe and to other nations throughout the world during the period of recovery, there is still some measure of reluctance to disregard the possibility that the financial power of the United States may be exercised in a way that might reduce the complete freedom of action of some of the other nations. That suggestion can never be made with regard to Canada. Fortunately we are not large enough, from the financial point of view, to be in a position to threaten the economic position of any other country. Nevertheless, we are large enough, and financially strong enough, to enter into discussions which might form a pattern for other nations in the sterling area and ultimately for a solution of this broad problem.

I am not going to quote in detail the statement of the Minister of Trade and Commerce which gave an optimistic picture that seems to be so greatly in conflict with the picture given to us this morning by the Minister of Agriculture, as to the immediate prospects for the sale of our agricultural commodities. Nevertheless, the speech that he made here on December 1 can be summed up by saying that it was an optimistic speech, and all of us will hope that optimism may be the spirit in which all our problems will be tackled; but it was a speech in which the optimism that was expressed refused to admit the many suggestions that were made that there was a real reason for concern for the immediate trade picture.

It is not necessary for me either at this time to quote the statements made by the leading representatives of the Canadian chambers of commerce, of the exporters' association or of other organizations whose business it is to stimulate the trading activities of this country. Everyone has read them. Everyone knows that there is being expressed, by those whose personal business is export trade, a feeling of concern which is not in keeping with the statements made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce in his speech of December 1.

Then we also have a recent speech by the Minister of Finance in which the word "crisis" appeared in the heading above the speech; and there again we have the difference—

Mr. Abbott: Does my hon. friend think I am responsible for the headings?

Mr. Drew: No. But seeing that it is in the Toronto Daily Star, I believed the minister would approve it.

Mr. Abbott: I do not even write the headings in the Toronto Daily Star.

Mr. Drew: Perhaps not; but the Toronto Daily Star of course has such a measure of intimacy with the government that I thought possibly we might take the heading as an accurate interpretation of the speech.

Mr. Abbott: It is a great newspaper.

Mr. Drew: I felt sure that the minister would agree with that. We have the constant appearance of the word "crisis" and the word "threat", and now today we have the statement by the Minister of Agriculture that we are being squeezed out of the British market.

It is not necessary to debate what the interpretation of any of these statements or speeches really should be. If confirmation were needed of the real concern which has been felt for some time by Canadians about the future of our export trade, particularly in the line of agricultural products, that doubt was removed this morning by the speech of the Minister of Agriculture. The question before us is not whether there is danger to our export trade, but whether it is possible to find any way to meet the situation with which we are confronted today.

It may well be that the Minister of Trade and Commerce is not the one to deal with financial problems as such; but again may I point out the recurrence, in speech after speech of those in the government ranks and in statements prepared by government agencies, of expressions of the need for finding some solution to the present problem presented by the inconvertibility of sterling and dollars.

This is not a problem that we can sit back and wait to see solved. Our position is not the same as that of the United States. This is a special problem of our own. With the importance of overseas export markets—and I underline those words "overseas export markets"—it is essential to the future prosperity of this country that we should not wait for any other nation to find a solution of that problem which now confronts us and which presents these immediate dangers, as was clearly expressed by the Minister of Agriculture today. Shipping, shipbuilding, the export of our industrial products and of our agricultural products, all are related to a solution of this difficulty, as has already been stated in this chamber and as has appeared in reports of such government agencies as the maritime commission. Therefore, without seeking to go back and balance one interpretation against another of the things that have been said in the past, I urge with all the earnestness that I believe the present situation demands that in meeting problems of trade and commerce, particularly export trade, Canada take the initiative in trying to find a solution to the very difficulty which was so clearly stated by the Minister of Agriculture in London last December.

As he said at that time, I do not think the people of Canada or the people of the rest of the world are nearly so concerned about the details of exchange problems as they are about finding a way in which we can trade, and finding a way in which there can be convertibility of money, no matter what the unit of money may be. We do not want to see this world divided into three economic areas, one behind the iron curtain, one in the sterling area and one in the dollar area. I would hope that, without any regard to past statements or past points of view, Canada for the particular purpose of holding our trade and expanding it in the years ahead will take the initiative in seeking a solution of this very grave problem.

414. Commodities branch, including assistance in the development of markets and the procurement of supplies, and contributions as detailed in the estimates—a proportion formerly under demobilization and reconversion, $753,324.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Would the minister say a word on this item? I was not here when he gave his preliminary statement. If it was covered in that I shall drop my question.

Mr. Howe: This represents the cost of the commodities branch of the department, and includes all the specialists in such subjects as textiles, steel and lumber who operate in various parts of the world to advise the department on commodity matters.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): To what extent is it an increasing or decreasing operation?

Mr. Howe: This item represents an amalgamation of branches formerly under the Department of Munitions and Supply. Formerly, for instance, lumber, steel and several other items were administered by that department, later by the Department of Reconstruction and Supply, and then finally were absorbed into the Department of Trade and Commerce. I doubt if there will be any great reduction. I believe this is a most valuable service, and I should think it is being stabilized at about this year's level.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): It shows an increase of $413,676. The minister says it represents functions formerly performed in the Department of Munitions and Supply. What is the over-all net position in the way of costs?

Mr. Howe: The sum of $237,540 was included in last year's estimates of the Department of Reconstruction and Supply.

[Mr. Drew.]

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): So that, over all, it is roughly an increase of about $200,000.

Mr. Howe: An increased cost, over all, of about $50,000. There were two items in other departments last year. One was in the main estimates of the Department of Trade and Commerce, and then there were the demobilization and reconversion estimates of the same department. The amounts are $124,260 and $237,540.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Are those to be added together and then deducted from $413,676?

Mr. Howe: Those two added together with $51,000 which is the increase in the vote make the $413,000. If the hon. member will take $51,800 and add to it the $124,000 voted last year under the demobilization item of the Department of Trade and Commerce, and then add to that the $237,000 voted last year under the Department of Reconstruction and Supply, he will find that the whole thing adds up to $413,000.

Item agreed to.

416. Publicity and advertising in Canada and abroad, $267,210.

Mr. McLure: What type of advertising generally is carried on in the interests of Canada abroad?

Mr. Howe: Generally speaking, advertising abroad is in support of our international trade fair, as well as advertising special features in special countries which will be helpful to Canada's trade. Practically all the advertising is done outside Canada.

Item agreed to.

417. Economic research and development branch, including the conducting of investigations and reporting upon commercial relations and foreign tariffs, and the development of Canadian industry, and a contribution of $8,400 to the international customs tariffs bureau—a proportion formerly under demobilization and reconversion, $536,960.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Would the minister comment on this increase?

Mr. Howe: There was an item last year for industrial development, commercial relations and the foreign tariffs division which now has been amalgamated with this division. The hon. member will note a decrease of $130,000 in the former item, which amount has been transferred to this item. The vote in the Department of Reconstruction and Supply last year for the same purpose was $271,482.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Perhaps I might be permitted to ask a further question on item 413. I notice at page 257 that while previously the department had a confidential messenger, he has now turned into a packer and helper. Can the minister explain that?

Mr. Howe: I am sure I do not know. I have one messenger who has been with me since I entered the government in 1935—but I have no packers and helpers.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): You have not lost confidence in him?

Mr. Howe: No, he is still my messenger, and doing very well.

Mr. Fleming: I presume he has been screened.

Item agreed to.

418. Exhibitions generally, including a contribution of $1,000 to the international bureau of exhibitions, $328,832.

Mr. McLure: Is this for the travelling exhibition, the one which is designed here and is sent abroad?

Mr. Howe: Yes; such as the various exhibits we had in London at the time of the British industries fair. We also show at most of the industrial fairs throughout Europe and in other countries. We have exhibits at fairs in the United States as well.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I am not going to ask the minister to make a long statement at this stage, but could he give us a word or two as to his views on the success of these exhibitions. I do not suppose you can measure this in actual volume of order, but the minister must have some yardstick.

Mr. Howe: Our exhibit at the British industries fair this year was devoted wholly to showing the opportunities for British imports in Canada. We believe that the people of Canada should be represented at these international fairs and we try to prepare our exhibits in a way that will best serve the interests of Canada at that time. I find it difficult to assess the value of these undertakings. I have tried to get independent views as to the success of the international trade fair in Toronto and I must say that at the moment I am not sure whether the fair is sufficiently valuable to warrant its being continued. I decided that we would try the fair one more year and have another look at the situation. I confess that I am not an expert in judging the extent of benefits from fairs and exhibitions.

Item agreed to.

Dominion bureau of statistics—

427. Census of population, including a contribution of $3,146 to the inter-American statistical institute committee on the 1950 census of the Americas, $569,836.

Mr. McLure: Has there been a census since 1941?

Mr. Howe: The taking of a census is an important part of the work of the department and a staff is employed continuously. There was a census of the western provinces in 1946.

Mr. McLure: Will there be a census in 1951?

Mr. Howe: Yes, a dominion census.

Item agreed to.

429. To hereby authorize the Canadian wheat board to buy rapeseed and sunflower seed from producers at a price of six cents per pound for the best grade f.o.b. local shipping point and at appropriate prices for other grades during the period commencing on August 1, 1948 and ending on July 31, 1949 to sell rapeseed and sunflower seed so purchased or the oil extracted therefrom as directed by the Minister of Trade and Commerce; to enter into such contracts as the said minister may direct for the carrying out of any of these operations, $1.

Mr. Quelch: Could the minister make a statement with regard to the wheat pool and the outlook for another payment at an early period?

Mr. Howe: I can say definitely that another payment will be made, but it is too early to indicate the size of the payment. I do not think my hon. friend would expect me to do so at this time.

Item agreed to.

Special—

433. To reimburse the Canadian Commercial Corporation for expenses incurred in purchasing materials, supplies and equipment, etc., on behalf of the Department of National Defence under chapter 51, statutes of 1947, $900,000.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): The minister may remember that last year we discussed item No. 638 to reimburse the Canadian Commercial Corporation for amounts advanced by it as working capital under mortgage security to George T. Davie and Sons, Limited. I should like to have a breakdown of the present item in order to see if any further advances, either directly or indirectly, have been made to the Davie company or its associates.

Mr. Howe: This item has no reference to the Davie adjustment. I am happy to be able to tell my hon. friend that there was a recovery from the Davie item with the result that the loss to the government will be approximately $400,000 on the Chinese ship contracts. This item is to reimburse the Canadian Commercial Corporation for the cost of buying for the armed services. The earlier practice was to charge a percentage of the purchase price to cover the cost of buying but the Auditor General ruled that that was not appropriate procedure for handling sums appropriated by parliament, and suggested that the cost should be obtained by a vote from parliament. That suggestion is being followed.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Then the expenses of the Department of National Defence would be lessened accordingly?

Mr. Howe: No.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): If an amount is provided to buy things for the Department of National Defence, surely that would not show in that department's estimates as well?

Mr. Howe: This is to cover the cost of the service of buying which we thought should be charged to the Department of National Defence but which the Auditor General ruled to be a service that should be supplied by the Canadian Commercial Corporation at the expense of the Department of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): This is really a payment to the Canadian Commercial Corporation for services rendered?

Mr. Howe: That is right.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I understand that the minister says that no advance of any kind has been made to the Davie people in Quebec since the advances reported last year?

Mr. Howe: That is true, and on the contrary there has been a recovery of about half the amount then outstanding.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I want only the net figure. I want to know whether since April 1, 1949, any advance was made regardless of recoveries.

Mr. Howe: Cash was advanced under the vote. In other words, parliament voted some $800,000 which was advanced to the Davie company to permit that company to complete the Chinese ships.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): It had been advanced before parliament voted it?

Mr. Howe: I think not.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): That is what we were talking about last year.

Mr. Howe: The commitments may have been made but certainly the cash was not advanced. I believe Canadian Commercial Corporation had made some advances out of its contingent fund. The total amount advanced was the amount of the vote and of that about one-half has been recovered.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I had better explain a little further. When we were here last year the situation as disclosed—I think anyone who reads Hansard will confirm this—was that money had been spent without authority. Then they came here and the minister said, "If we pass it now, does not that conclude it?" It did conclude it; it covered up an entirely unwarranted expenditure which had been made. Regardless of what recoveries have been made I want to be sure whether further advances have been made subsequent to April 1, 1949. In other words, I want to see if you have been guilty of any more wrongdoing.

Mr. Howe: I can assure my hon. friend that generally speaking the department has been a model of rectitude since that discussion.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): It is not generally speaking that we are talking about; it is about a particular case and the minister has not answered my question. I want to know if any further advances were made, and I do not care how much you recovered.

Mr. Howe: No advances were made on that account that were not voted by parliament. I think that is what my hon. friend is getting at, is it not?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Let us try again. I think if the minister will look at Hansard he will see what we were talking about last April, I think it was April 7. At that time the minister came here and disclosed that he had spent some $800,000. There was a lot of talk about legal opinions which eventually were not produced. The minister finally said, and I am bound to say he was correct: Well, anyway, if we vote it now will that not settle it? That was the argument, and when you have a government majority that is prepared to support anything that the government does they can cure it to that extent. The minister has not answered me yet. I want to know whether any further advances were made subsequent to that. The deputy will tell you. Let us know.

Mr. Howe: The deputy tells me he does not know what had been spent at that time. If it was all spent none has been spent since. If only a part of the $800,000 was advanced up to that time, we did advance the balance of the $800,000.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): That is not an answer. I am not going to hold up the item, but if we let this pass I am going to ask the minister if before the house prorogues he will put on Hansard exactly what happened. On that understanding I will let the estimate go; otherwise I will not. I want an answer to this, and I have not got it.

Mr. Howe: This is Saturday afternoon, and we hope the house is going to prorogue Saturday evening. We will try to get the information requested by my hon. friend.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I will make the minister a sporting offer. If the house prorogues Saturday evening I will understand that he cannot put it on Hansard, but if the house does not prorogue tonight then the minister will undertake to put it on Hansard.

Mr. Howe: Agreed.

Item agreed to.

National research council—

441. Salaries and other expenses of the national research council, $8,908,969.

Mr. Green: Can the minister tell the committee what policy is in effect as to inventions which were taken over by the government? I believe there was set up during the war an inventions board which functioned under the research council, but apparently it has now gone out of existence. I wonder if we could be told what body deals with such inventions at the present time.

Mr. Howe: Inventions are handled by the national research council under a policy that has been established within the last twelve months. My hon. friend now asks me what the policy is. I am sending for the officer who can give me that accurately. At the moment I would hesitate to tell the hon. member what the policy is.

Mr. Hatfield: I should like to ask the minister whether officials of this department are allowed to take out patents for inventions they discover while working for the research council, then resign from the research council and go out and make millions of dollars out of the invention.

Mr. Howe: No, the policy definitely does not permit that. Generally speaking, anything that is invented during employment by the government, that is, by a man who is receiving a full-time salary from the government, is the property of the government. What I was going to ask my officer was whether there is any provision for participation by the man. I now am told there is a provision under the policy of national research council that if a patent is sold by the council, the man whose work made the patent possible for the government is entitled to a return of 5 per cent of the gross receipts from the sale.

Mr. Hatfield: The official I have in mind patented this article, resigned from the council, and then went out and made millions of dollars.

Mr. Howe: I suggest to my hon. friend that was not an official of the national research council. I think he was an official of mines and resources, was he not?

Mr. Hatfield: I do not know.

Mr. Howe: If we are thinking of the same man, I think he was.

Mr. Hatfield: He was a full-time employee of the national research council. Let us put it that way.

Mr. Howe: The policy I have just enunciated was put into effect on the first of January, 1949, and applies to inventions from that time on.

Mr. Hatfield: This is before that.

Mr. Green: Is no provision made now for inventions which were taken over during the war? The minister will recall that the men in the forces were asked for suggestions and inventions. I think there were suggestion boxes in the various camps. After the last war and also after the first war I believe Great Britain set up some sort of commission to investigate the claims of different individuals who had made inventions which had been turned over to the country during the war. I am not sure whether that is correct, but I believe some such arrangement was made, and that a somewhat similar arrangement was made by the United States. The purpose was to encourage these inventors. I think there is real merit in giving inventors some encouragement. For example, I understand that the inventor of the jet engine was paid £100,000 by the British government.

Mr. Howe: As a gratuity.

Mr. Green: Apparently the government was under no obligation to pay that, but his work was of such great value that he was paid £100,000. It would seem we have no governmental body in Canada which deals with inventions that were taken over. There was an inventions board during the war, but I believe the order in council creating it has been rescinded. Can the minister tell us whether there is any governmental body now in a position to deal with these inventions? It would seem to me that Canada is not giving the same encouragement to her inventors as Great Britain and the United States are.

Mr. Howe: The position during the war was that all inventions by men in the armed services or men employed on government payrolls, directly or indirectly, had no participation in the rewards from their inventions. The staffs were large; it was too difficult to sort out who was responsible for what. As I say, at the beginning of 1949 a new policy was instituted, which is the government policy for all departments. It applies to the national research council, the armed services and mines and resources. The policy is that all patents are taken out in the name of the crown, but if the patent is sold 5 per cent of the gross receipts from the sale go to the inventor.

Mr. Green: Does that apply to inventions made before the first of January of this year?

Mr. Howe: No.

Mr. Green: There is no provision whatever to cover them.

Mr. Howe: That is right.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I should like to ask the minister to give us as frank and detached an opinion about the work of the national research council as he did about the trade fair. Of course everyone is in sympathy with research. On the other hand, there are many agencies of research throughout the country, and a thing of this kind could run wild. An increase of $3 million is quite large. I realize that it is difficult to measure results by any yardstick, but perhaps the minister would make some comment by way of assessing the work being done.

Mr. Howe: I have no hesitation whatever in saying that the amount spent on research through the national research council is well spent, and is returned to the Canadian economy many times over. It does not take many successes to offset the total expenditure; and the national research council has experienced success in a considerable number of the projects it has undertaken. I believe the growth of industry in Canada has been greatly stimulated by the work of the council in the war years, particularly, as well as by the follow-up work in the post-war years. Canada spends less for research than most industrial countries. We are spending now about ten times as much per capita as we spent before the war, but still we are rather low in the list of industrial countries with respect to the amount per capita spent for research.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Proportionately?

Mr. Howe: Per capita.

Mr. Knowles: Has the minister the figures for the United States, the United Kingdom and the U.S.S.R., for example, by way of comparison?

Mr. Howe: I do not have them here but I have seen them. I believe the United Kingdom spends more than either the United States or Canada, while the United States spends much more than Canada per capita.

Item agreed to.

442. Expanded research on the utilization of farm crops (revote), $135,000.

[Mr. Howe.]

Mr. Herridge: This item is worded rather strangely: "Expanded research on the utilization of farm crops." Would the minister explain why the words "expanded research" should appear when there is a reduction of $225,000 in the amount? Would he also give the committee a brief summary of what this research is?

Mr. Howe: This is a capital vote. The item covers the cost of completing the laboratory at Saskatoon, which was constructed in that city by the national research council in conjunction with the university of Saskatchewan.

Mr. Quelch: What kind of work is being carried on? I should have thought that with the difficulty we are experiencing in connection with the marketing of our agricultural products there would have been greater need than ever for research into the utilization of farm products.

Mr. Howe: That is exactly what this item has to do with, research into the utilization of farm products. I wish my hon. friend would not always talk about the difficulty of marketing farm products.

Mr. Quelch: Page the Minister of Agriculture.

Mr. Howe: Even though it may be difficult, as long as we market the products there should be no complaint.

Item agreed to.

446. Maritime regional laboratory (revote $140,000), $478,000.

Mr. Hatfield: Would the minister explain this vote?

Mr. Howe: This is part of the cost of building a branch laboratory at Halifax, Nova Scotia, to work on the special problems of the maritime provinces. It is being built on the campus of Dalhousie university at Halifax.

Mr. Hatfield: What special problems?

Mr. Howe: The utilization of seaweed, for one, and I believe there are several others in prospect. Each region has its own local problems.

Mr. Hatfield: We do not get very much help in connection with potatoes. We get more help from the state of Maine than from the national research council. The university of Maine sends a man around to try and help us, but we get very little if any assistance from the national research council of Canada.

Item agreed to.

Atomic Energy Control Board—

448. Administration expenses of the atomic energy control board, $76,020.

Mr. Green: A dispatch appeared in the press yesterday concerning the talks between the United States, Canada and Great Britain on atomic energy. The last paragraph of that dispatch reads:

> If the Washington view prevails, Canada and Britain will continue to expedite shipment of fission materials to atom plants in the United States. Specific information on atomic techniques, however, will not be exchanged for the immediate future, even on peacetime uses of atomic energy, for security reasons.

That would make it seem that the Americans are sticking to their original plan with respect to the exchange of information on the peacetime uses of atomic energy. Is that the position at the moment?

Mr. Howe: The tripartite talks are continuing. They are highly secret. I cannot make any comment about them except to say that Canada is rather happy about the direction the discussion is taking at the moment.

Item agreed to.

450. Chalk River project—capital and operating expenses, $6,056,670.

Mr. McLure: Here we have a vote of more than $6 million and there is not one word as to how it is to be expended. Is this absolutely a secret society? You would think some little detail would be given, as to whether the money is thrown away or what is done with it. I should like to know how many people are employed up there and how many of them are returned soldiers.

Mr. Howe: At great expense the government sent a committee of parliamentarians to examine the whole situation at Chalk River. If my hon. friend will speak to his colleague the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra he will be able to get full details.

Mr. Casselman: He will not tell us anything.

Mr. Howe: I must say I hope the committee know more about the situation than I do, because they have been at Chalk River since I have.

Mr. Low: I suggest that hon. members read the report which was tabled in this house on Thursday of this week. If they do so I believe they will get the full content of anything that can be revealed by the committee that went up there.

Item agreed to.

Dominion bureau of statistics—

714. Census of population—further amount required, $30,300.

Mr. Knowles: Part of this item has to do with the decennial census of 1951. Would the minister tell us why this money must be spent in advance with respect to that census?

Mr. Howe: The expenditure has been made to improve the method of taking the census. Experts have been working on that matter, and a new method has been devised. In order to make sure the new method is workable, trial censuses are being taken in certain parts of Canada; in one of the Toronto wards, in one ward in Winnipeg, and elsewhere. I believe about $150,000 is being spent in testing the new method.

Item agreed to.

Dominion bureau of statistics—

901. Statistics—further amount required, $85,076.

Mr. Hatfield: I do not think the dominion bureau of statistics has a very good method of estimating the crops of this country. They do that by sending cards to Canadians all over Canada. This year they estimated the potato crop in New Brunswick at below the yield last year, when actually the yield was twice that of last year. The report from the Department of Agriculture in December reveals that we now have more potatoes in Canada than we had last year. The bureau of statistics estimated that we would have less than we had last year. I think there should be a better method of securing those figures.

Mr. Howe: I shall be glad to call the attention of the officers of the bureau of statistics to the remarks of my hon. friend. We find the same situation with regard to wheat. In some years there is a good advance estimate, but in other years the outcome is widely different from the advance estimate.

Item agreed to.

Canada Grain Act—

905. Operation and maintenance, including inspection, weighing, registration, etc.—further amount required, $18,668.

Mr. Knowles: I should like to ask my question with respect to the employees of the board of grain commissioners stationed at Winnipeg. The question is related to the five-day week, and particularly in the summertime. I realize that the question of a five-day week the year round for government employees is speedily becoming an issue, but for the moment I am speaking of it for the summertime.

The reason I asked the question is that last summer the civil servants thought the five-day week was to be generally applied.

The employees of the board of grain commissioners, and particularly those stationed in the railway yards in Winnipeg, were kept on a 5½ or six-day week. Compared with the railway employees with whom they were associated, and compared with other government employees, that seemed to be unfair. I wrote to the civil service commissioner, and he referred my letter to the deputy minister of trade and commerce. The deputy minister of trade and commerce wrote to me setting out that the federal government had laid it down as a desirable policy, but it was left to the heads of the different departments as to whether or not it was implemented for the employees of that department.

I am rising now to publicly express the hope that, whatever happens to the five-day week for the year round, next summer when the other government employees are on the five-day week it will be applied to the employees to whom I refer.

Mr. Howe: I shall be glad, Mr. Chairman, to call the attention of the board of grain commissioners to the remarks of my hon. friend. The difficulty is that railway movements have to be serviced. The situation is similar to that of the post office in Ottawa. No way has been devised as yet to put the post office employees on a five-day week, because it is a six-day service. I rather think that the same difficulty is found in regard to the employees in question. Some effort will be made to see whether or not an alternative can be worked out, or perhaps the granting of extra holiday time in lieu of that extra day per week.

Item agreed to.

906. To reimburse the Canadian Commercial Corporation for expenses incurred in purchasing materials, supplies and equipment, etc., on behalf of the Department of National Defence, under chapter 51 of the statutes of 1947—further amount required, $75,000.

Mr. Hatfield: Does this corporation handle surplus products only, or what kind of products?

Mr. Howe: This refers to the Canadian Commercial Corporation, which buys for the armed services.

Item agreed to.

909. Supersonic wind tunnel building and equipment and to authorize commitments against future years in the amount of $30,000, $275,000.

Mr. McLure: Where is this famous supersonic tunnel?

Mr. Howe: It is located in the city of Toronto, and is operated by the university of Toronto.

Item agreed to.

[Mr. Knowles.]

Atomic Enery Control Board—

910. Chalk River project—capital and operating expenses—further amount required, $375,000.

Mr. Green: This is another item relating to the atomic energy control board. The minister will have read the recommendation of the special committee on atomic energy.

> Your committee has been in existence for only six weeks and in that time has been unable to complete its examination into the field of atomic energy development. Furthermore, this field is a new one, is widening rapidly, and may well be of tremendous importance to Canada. For these reasons your committee recommends that a special committee be reconstituted next session.

I think all of the members of that committee will agree with me when I say our work has been most interesting. I do not think there has ever been a finer spirit in a committee. The minister has 14 keen supporters of the Canadian atomic energy project. Can he assure us that the committee will be set up again next year, so that this work will be continued? All the members of that committee were agreed that it would be a tragedy if the work were allowed to drop now.

Mr. Howe: I presume the next session will come early in the new year. I fully agree with my hon. friend that the work of the committee was splendid. I believe it had a good deal to do with raising the spirits of the staff at Chalk River. It occurs to me that a similar committee might be set up to look into all the work of the national research council, including atomic energy. I am not promising that, but such a proposal could be considered next year.

Item agreed to.

Mr. Knowles: Since when is the Minister of Trade and Commerce responsible for veterans affairs? The chairman has been calling veterans affairs items.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, I understand that those items you have just called were for the Department of Veterans Affairs. If that is correct, we cannot agree to passing them without having the minister here.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): If they were veterans affairs items, I think we should allow them to stand.

Mr. Hatfield: Are we on item 936?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): No, that has been passed.

The Chairman: If the hon. member wishes to ask a question on 936, I believe he should be permitted to do so because there was some confusion in the items called.

936. To provide for the purchase and storage of, and incidental expenses in connection with strategic reserves of materials, $1,293,375.

Mr. Hatfield: Will the minister explain the purpose of this item?

Mr. Howe: Canadian Commercial was instructed to purchase a certain supply of tin and antimony, which materials are obtainable only in the Far East. We have acquired stocks of those two materials, and this item is to reimburse the Canadian Commercial Corporation for that purchase.

Mr. Green: Was that only the one purchase, or is this to be a continuing policy?

Mr. Howe: We accept the advice of the armed services on that point. No purchases have been made since the original purchase of tin and antimony.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC WORKS

Architectural branch—

327. Branch administration, $373,105.

Mr. Herridge: I should like to make a few brief remarks on this item of administration. The officials in British Columbia have an exceedingly large area to cover in proportion to their number, and are obliged to do a great deal of travelling. I am now expressing the comments made by a good many people in my own constituency and throughout British Columbia when I say that the Department of Public Works is at the present time understaffed with engineers and senior officials.

I also wish to convey to the minister's officials the appreciation of many in my constituency, particularly those who have had to do with the supervision and building of wharves and docks. I would make particular mention of the most effective work that has been done by the captain of the dredge on the Arrow lakes in the last year or two. That is greatly appreciated by the people along the lakes, because it makes it possible for the steamer to run longer than it has run for some years; and the running of that steamer is important to many of those people. I should also like to express the appreciation of the people living in the Laredo district for the removal of jams in the Duncan river. While a small amount of money has been spent on that work, I have been informed by a good number of people that the work has been done most efficiently and to the great advantage of those residing in the district.

Item agreed to.

329. Maintenance and operation of dominion public buildings and grounds, other than at Ottawa, including rents, repairs, furniture, heating, etc., and to authorize commitments against future years in the amount of $500,000, $11,289,644.

Mr. McLure: Items 328 and 329 might be grouped together. About $20 million is being voted there. Is any of that money for new construction or is it for rent and repairs?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): No. These votes are for administration and maintenance; they are not for new works. They are for the maintenance and repairs on our architects' works in the different districts, Ottawa and outside Ottawa.

Item agreed to.

Construction, repairs and improvements of public buildings—Nova Scotia—

330. Dartmouth public building—addition and alterations (revote $15,000), $39,000.

Dominion—public building—(revote), $25,000.

Halifax—accommodation for customs (revote), $100,000.

Halifax—customs building — improvements and elevator (revote $21,000), $25,000.

Halifax—postal station at Armdale (revote), $43,000.

Halifax—office building, $150,000.

Kentville public building—addition and alterations, $15,000.

Kingston—public building (revote $23,000), $53,500.

Mr. Gillis: I want to ask the minister about this $25,000 for construction of a dominion public building. Is that the building we discussed last year and that was supposed to be utilized for a post office in the town of Dominion, Nova Scotia?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): That is correct. I am informed that we have purchased the site to date and that the plans and specifications are being prepared in the office here in Ottawa.

Mr. Hatfield: Is that for a post office only?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): In Dominion it is a post office, I understand.

Mr. Hatfield: It is not a public building? It is a post office, is it?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): It is a post office.

Mr. Hatfield: How does Dominion get a post office, with a revenue of $3,000?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Perhaps the case put up by the hon. member for Cape Breton South was a strong one, because it was approved by my officials.

Mr. Hatfield: I have a stronger case than that.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): If as good a case is made for Woodstock, probably they will get one.

Item agreed to.

New Brunswick—

331. Andover—customs and immigration buildings (revote $40,000), $100,000.

Fredericton—public building—site and preliminary work towards construction of building (revote $73,500), $150,000.
Moncton public building—addition and alterations (revote $50,000), $150,000.
North Head public building—addition and alterations (revote $25,000), $32,000.
Sackville public building—addition and alterations, $10,000.

Mr. Hatfield: When is the minister going to comply with the recommendation made on May 6 by the Post Office Department to his department to build a new post office building in the town of Woodstock?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Ever since the request was made by the hon. member, and approved by the Post Office Department, it has been taken into serious consideration.

Prince Edward Island—
332. Charlottetown — public building (revote $100,000), $150,000.
Summerside—public building (revote $50,000), $100,000.

Mr. McLure: I see a vote here for a new building in Charlottetown, Prince Edward Island, and the amount is $150,000. Is there anything in the supplementaries? It will be a poor looking dominion building, at $150,000. I thought there would be about $1,500,000 in the estimates.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): This building is estimated to cost $800,000, but we cannot spend more than the amount of $150,000 in this fiscal year.

Mr. McLure: The other $800,000 has not been voted yet?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I am giving my hon. friend the estimate we have in the department for that proposed building in Charlottetown. There is another $50,000 for that building in the supplementary estimates.

Mr. McLure: I know that. What properties have been secured for the site of this building? Have any prices been agreed on or have the properties just been taken without any price being agreed on? It has been difficult to get any information for those who are making inquiries, and I thought this might be a time when I could get it.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): The site selected for the proposed building is a city block bounded by Richmond, Queen, Sydney and Pownal streets. I understand that we have taken expropriation proceedings; not long ago, I believe, we made settlements with some of the owners of these properties, but we have not completed the negotiations as to the entire site.

Mr. McLure: When will the contract be let for that building?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I am told that next spring we will be ready to call for tenders.

Mr. McLure: Will public tenders be called for?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Yes, absolutely; and the lowest tender, if it is regular, will get the contract.

Mr. Knowles: The last item in this group is $150,000, a revote for a public building site. Is that the site for the new post office building in Winnipeg?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): That is right.

Mr Knowles: Has any money been appropriated yet for any other purpose in connection with that building?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): We have under expropriation some property in this site; there are sixteen properties comprised in it. Valuation was made for the department by Mr. H. R. Veals, real estate, November, 1947. Mr. Veals valued the properties at approximately $317,770. At the time these estimates were prepared it was anticipated that settlement for nine of the properties would be made through negotiations with the former owners. It was anticipated that settlement on the remaining seven would be made through the exchequer court. We will continue the expropriation proceedings.

Mr. Knowles: Have those proceedings been completed yet?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Not to date. I understand that the cases have come before the exchequer court but that judgment has not been rendered.

Mr. Knowles: Can the minister tell me what arrangements have been made in connection with plans for the building? The next question would be whether tenders have been prepared yet.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): On July 6, 1949, the firm of Green, Blankstein, Russell and Associates, architects and engineers at Winnipeg, were engaged to prepare the plans and specifications for this building.

Mr. Knowles: Those plans have not been returned to the department yet?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): They are not completed yet.

Mr Knowles: Can the minister give any indication as to when construction of that building might be commenced?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I am told that we will be ready to ask for tenders in June or July next.

Mr. Isnor: The minister will recall that I carried on considerable correspondence with him concerning two post offices. Will he advise the committee if he has decided yet to call for tenders in connection with the post offices buildings at Armdale and Bedford?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): As soon as plans and specifications are ready we will call for tenders.

Mr. Green: I should like to ask the minister about two buildings, one of which is known as the Alvin estates building and the other as the Begg building, both in Vancouver, and also about the proposed new post office building for Vancouver.

I would refer first to the Alvin estates building, where the office of the unemployment insurance commission is located. From whom was the building purchased and at what cost?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): The cost will be $862,155. Additional work had to be done to the extent of $200,950. The estimated cost will be $1,100,000. This will be a federal building, and we are going to purchase it.

Mr. Green: From whom was it bought?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): The Alvin estates. I do not know just who they are.

Mr. Green: Surely the minister knows from whom this property has been bought?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I do not know many people out there.

Mr. Green: Has not the minister any note of the name of the company from whom it was purchased?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I am told that the deal was between the department and Allan and Viner, builders, in Vancouver. That would be the firm.

Mr. Green: Is this sum of $1,100,000 being paid to Allan and Viner, contractors?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): My deputy tells me that is so.

Mr. Green: Is this the total amount to be involved, or is something more than this $1,100,000 to be paid?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I am told this is the whole amount for the purchase of the building. At one time we had no space for the unemployment insurance commission. We tried to secure the national defence building, but did not succeed. Then we entered into a contract with these people to put up a building at a stated rental per year, and we have the option of purchasing it after one year's occupancy. We have decided to purchase the building.

Mr. Green: Will the minister table the agreement between his department and this construction firm?

[Mr. Fournier (Hull).]

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Yes. That would be the order in council passed when we undertook to buy the building. There was a clause giving us the option of purchasing.

Mr. Green: Will the minister table in the house a copy of that agreement?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): If we do not prorogue, we shall; if we do prorogue I shall have a copy of the order in council sent to my hon. friend.

Mr. Green: I bring this point up because I think this is a very wasteful way of constructing a building. I understand the picture is this: Certain parties who are pretty friendly to the government got the property first. I believe the price paid originally for the property—that is, the land—was about $45,000. I am not clear whether they bought the land outright or just took it on option. Then this company, the Alvin Estates Limited, was formed; and Allan and Viner, who are the contractors, I believe are two of the men in the company.

Then they transferred the property to the company. Debentures were issued to the amount of $650,000. I think those debentures are held by the same individuals who had the company incorporated. At first they had a very good lease from the department containing the right of the department to purchase. Then the department exercised that right to purchase the building at a total cost, we are told, of $1,100,000.

It is hard to understand why the department did not simply buy the land and erect a building, calling for tenders in the ordinary way instead of going around the corner and dealing with friends, as would appear to have been done in this case. I am afraid the result is that this building has cost a great deal more than if it had been constructed in the ordinary way and if competitive bids had been called. Can the minister say why this roundabout policy has been followed?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): The explanation I have is that at one time the unemployment insurance branch lacked space in Vancouver. We sent out our Mr. Mills to make an inquiry into conditions and he could not find any space in Vancouver at that time. To have put up a first-class building, such as we would have put up in Vancouver, would have taken more time than the securing of this building. A note I have here states that no office buildings for rentals have been constructed in Vancouver since 1939, and that in view of the extremely rapid growth of the city there is no available office space in the locality In March of 1948 Alvin Estates Limited offered to construct a four-storey building and to rent it to the department on a ten-year lease at a rental of $96,000 a year. There was no available space in the city when this deal was made. We were pressed by the unemployment insurance people who required space for their administration. The offer also included the option to purchase by the department after one year's occupancy. We think it is cheaper to become the owners of the building than to continue to pay rent. During the war and for the last two or three years we have been hard-pressed for building space. In many cases time was of the essence. I am thinking of one case that was settled only two weeks ago at the request of some hon. members.

Mr. Green: Why does not the department purchase land through a real estate firm in the way that an ordinary company would instead of making these payments to friends of the government who have property?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): In normal times I agree that what the hon. member is saying would be the correct thing, that if we had time it would be better to acquire these buildings. The hon. gentleman has been here a long time and he knows that during the war I did not have any estimates for the construction of buildings. For a number of years after the war we were told that we should let materials and labour go for private housing which was in short supply.

Mr. Green: This deal was made last year. Is the department still carrying on in that way?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): In certain cases; in extraordinary cases. The unemployment insurance had to vacate the old Vancouver hotel and we tried to get space in the armouries from national defence but they would not release it. We had a man stationed there who was trying to make some sort of a deal so that unemployment insurance would not be out on the street. I agree that except in these extraordinary circumstances we should construct buildings.

Mr. Green: I do not think the department gets space any more quickly with a deal of this kind than by buying the land and building.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I have another case in Vancouver where we have been trying to get a site for three years.

Mr. Green: What it all adds up to is that some friend of the government gets a nice bit of money out of this deal. It is a most inefficient way of handling the matter.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I would not admit that. A man coming to Ottawa may find it most difficult to get an apartment and in order to get one he will do things that he would not do in normal times.

Mr. Mitchell: I have looked at that building and I would say it is the best laid out unemployment office in North America.

Mr. Green: It ought to be for the money.

Mr. Mitchell: I have not the kind of mind my hon. friend has indicated he has this afternoon; I still think most people are decent.

Mr. Green: I object to that. Simply because a member points out how money has been wasted—

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Oh, no.

Mr. Green: Simply because a member points out that a method of acquiring a building has not been businesslike the Minister of Labour gets up and says that the member who makes that suggestion is not doing it in a decent way. I am not going to bother to ask the minister to withdraw that because his statement is just ridiculous.

Mr. Mitchell: I did not say that. This is not a police court; this is the House of Commons.

Mr. Green: Then do not speak as though you were in a police court.

Mr. Mitchell: The hon. member always talks as though he were in a police court.

Mr. Green: I must object to that remark and ask that it be withdrawn.

Mr. Mitchell: I will withdraw it. All I want to say is—

Mr. Green: Be careful that you do not make another remark.

Mr. Mitchell: —that I think most people are decent, even my hon. friend.

Mr. Green: Coming now to the Begg building. Can the minister tell us who has been getting the money in that case and how much it is going to cost?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): This building was purchased from Mr. Begg, the owner. This is another case where we were pressed for space in Vancouver. The hon. member knows the situation out there better than I. Our man was looking over the city and these two buildings were submitted to my colleagues who wanted space and they agreed that they would be appropriate buildings for their purposes. I am told that this building cost $1.06 per cubic foot whereas the buildings we put up vary in cost from $1.25 to $1.30 per cubic foot.

Mr. Green: What is the cost of the Begg building?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): The building is being renovated and two storeys added and I am informed the total cost of the contract will be $1,050,000.

Mr. Green: The item on page 52 is for $620,000; there was a vote for $1,060,000 last year, of which $380,000 was not spent. According to my figuring that makes the cost $1,300,000.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I am told that the cost will be $1,050,000.

Mr. Green: There is also a supplementary item for $200,000.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): There is one item for $620,000; a revote of $380,000; one for $200,000.

Mr. Green: Is that the total cost?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): That is more than the total cost of the contract, which I am told will be $1,050,000.

Mr. Green: To whom is that money being paid?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): An amount of $375,000 is being paid to Mr. Begg, the owner of the building, and the balance is the contract for the renovating and construction.

Mr. Green: An amount of $375,000 is being paid to the owner. How much was paid to the contractors for remodelling?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): The amount paid to the contractors is $1,050,000, and to the owners of the building, $375,000.

Mr. Green: How much is that?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): $1,425,000; I am just adding the two figures.

Mr. Green: To what contractors was that money paid, the same people that built the Alvin estates building?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): That is what I am told. It is Allan and Viner.

Mr. Green: They are getting $1,050,000.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): They are getting $1,050,000 to put up a building or complete it, but it is not a gift. We have a contract with them, and they are getting the amount for delivering the goods.

Mr. Green: Were any tenders called for this remodelling?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): No, I am told not.

Mr. Green: There were no tenders?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): No. The reason would be the urgency for the building.

Mr. Green: Pardon?

[Mr. Green.]

Mr. Fournier (Hull): The urgency for the building. It was an alteration job. It was not a new job except for the two storeys that were added to it.

Mr. Green: May I point out to the minister that what was done here was to take an automobile show building or warehouse, which was not constructed in the first place for an office building at all—it had no facilities for a large staff—and then add two storeys to it.

Mr. McCann: There was an addition besides that.

Mr. Green: That was done without calling for any competitive bids. The same firm, Allan and Viner Construction Company Limited, apparently got the work. Did they get it on a cost plus basis?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): The fixed fee was $25,000.

Mr. Green: What is that?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): The fixed fee for the erection of these two storeys and making alterations was $25,000.

Mr. Green: Was there a contract?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): There must be a contract. We would not go into a deal like this without a contract.

Mr. Green: The minister and the departmental officials will know whether there was a contract.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I am told there is a contract.

Mr. Green: Will the minister table it?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I will send a copy to my hon. friend because if the session prorogues I do not see how I shall have time to table it.

Mr. Green: I am advised that a well-known office building in Vancouver, the Vancouver block, could have been purchased for under $1 million.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): My officers tell me that when our people were out there they could not find space to buy or rent within a distance of ten miles from Vancouver. Do not think we went into these deals because it was pleasant. The taxation division of the Department of National Revenue needed these offices if they were to collect the money owing there. Officials of the unemployment insurance division had to meet the public. The Department of Public Works had to provide the space to do that work. We were under pressure from all departments, and one of the most reliable men of the department, Mr. Mills, an architect, was specially sent to Vancouver to try to find space. I recall the discussions I had with my deputy, and it was because of Mr. Mills' reports that I agreed to these deals, which are not the normal way of proceeding so far as public works are concerned. I admit that.

Mr. Green: I hope that no more deals of this kind will be put through by the department, and that they will stop handing all these contracts to Allan and Viner.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I do not know these people at all. I have heard of the Alvin building. If I gave you Mr. Mills' reports on the whole matter, after reading them you will be convinced, I believe, there was no other way to provide space for the Department of National Revenue or the unemployment insurance branch.

Mr. Green: There is a vote for a Vancouver post office building of $350,000, of which $250,000 is a revote. In the supplementaries there is also a vote of $550,000. Can the minister tell us how much money is available now for this new post office, and when it is expected that work will be commenced on it? Two or three months ago press dispatches indicated that nothing would be done for several years. I have a clipping from the Vancouver Sun of August 18, the heading of which is:

Five year delay for new post office.

Can the minister answer those two questions, first as to how much is available, and second, when the work will begin?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): The first votes are for the acquisition of the site. The site is the city block bounded by Georgia, Homer, Dunsmuir and Hamilton streets. It was selected after consultation with the Post Office Department, the Vancouver city council, town planning commissions and various business interests. Practically the whole of the site is occupied by very old houses. It is comprised of forty-five individual parcels owned by nineteen separate owners. The total assessed value amounts to $213,800. Valuations of the property were prepared for the department by Mr. Howard Foster and Mr. Alan Ker. Mr. Howard Foster's valuation was $582,500 and Mr. Alan Ker's valuation was $540,650. An order in council dated November 3, 1948, granted authority to expropriate the properties, and I understand that expropriation proceedings are now before the court. As to the delay of five years in erecting that post office building in Vancouver, I may say that is not the intention of the government or the department. The moment we have the site we will have a firm of architects appointed to prepare plans and specifications.

Mr. Green: Can the minister tell us when it is expected that the building will be completed?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Oh, I should not like to make a guess because you would catch me when my estimates came up in some future year.

Mr. Sinclair: I should like to ask the minister a similar question about the North Vancouver post office for which there is a further item of $225,000. I should like to know when this splendid building he is now constructing will be completed, and whether further money will be required for the purpose.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): It is under construction. I do not know exactly when it will be completed, but we will see that estimates are brought before the house to enable us to finish it.

Mr. Jones: I should like to ask the minister a question regarding the Osoyoos customs building. Has the contract been let for that building? I understand also that additions are to be made to the post office in Penticton. Are any provisions made for that?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I understand there is an amount of $45,000 in the supplementary estimates for the Penticton building.

Mr. Jones: But what about Osoyoos?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): There is an amount of $100,000 for that building.

Mr. Jones: But has the contract been let?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): We are proceeding with the acquisition of the site, but the contract has not been let yet. I am not sure just where the matter stands at the moment.

Mr. Jones: The minister has no idea whether it will be proceeded with forthwith?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): As soon as the plans and specifications are ready we shall ask for tenders.

Item agreed to.

Maintenance and operation of roads and bridges—

363. Burlington channel bridge, $56,970.

Mr. Lennard: Would the minister tell me whether his department has approached the Ontario department of highways asking their co-operation in the development of some other method of crossing that channel?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I am told that to date no such negotiations have been entered into.

Mr. Lennard: I am very pleased to hear that, because during the last election campaign I was accused—

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Not by the Minister of Public Works.

Mr. Lennard: I was accused by one of the other candidates during the last election campaign of having blocked such negotiations. That, of course, was ridiculous, but I wanted to clear it up right here; and I am very glad to have that statement by the minister.

Mr. Warren: I want to say a word on this item. We want a bridge. I think the minister has heard about this bridge before. We want that bridge across the Ottawa river, about four miles east of Pembroke. This is a very modest request, but the matter is urgent; it has been urgent and necessary for the last fifty years, but still the bridge has not been built. I know the plans and blueprints are all ready, and I know the minister will tell me that he must wait until either Quebec or Ontario requests that the bridge be built. I am going to make a suggestion, and I hope the minister will listen. If the provinces hesitate or refuse to approach the federal government, will the minister not consider approaching the public works departments of either Ontario or Quebec, or both, asking them to meet here to consult with respect to this bridge?

The matter is urgent for many reasons. It is important in connection with the tourist traffic. It is important with respect to the health of our people, who for weeks in the spring and fall of the year cannot get to hospital without going four or five hundred miles out of their way, because of blocked roads. We want that bridge and we want it soon; we should have had it years ago. If the minister would just take the bit in his teeth and request the co-operation of Ontario and Quebec we probably would get the bridge. We would like it to be built at once; it is badly needed, and under any circumstances, give us a bridge.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): As the hon. member says, this matter has been mentioned before; but I have never heard of a project of this kind which met with the approval of everyone. It is a matter of time, to see whether the various authorities interested in this project can get together. I can say this, however; that if this government received a letter from the provinces of Ontario and Quebec saying they were ready to contribute to the cost of constructing this bridge, I have the assurance of my colleagues that such a request would be favourably considered. But, while everyone is thinking of this fine new bridge over the Ottawa river, we have not received such a request.

Mr. Sinclair: I want to say a word or two on this item. The hon. member for Kootenay West, speaking a few moments ago, mentioned that the engineering offices in British Columbia are very much understaffed. The district engineer himself is a very able man, but the list of projects included under this item is visible proof that the staff in that province is not adequate, because almost every second item is a revote. One item in my own riding, a small breakwater at Davis bay, has now appeared in the estimates for the third time. The amount involved is only $17,000; the men at any of the logging plants in the vicinity could throw it up in a week without plans, but because of the lack of staff to prepare plans we have had this as a revote for three years.

I suppose I should not complain, since almost one-third of the items in this list are in my riding, but there is a great difference between having an item in the estimates and actually getting the work done. My first request is that the minister take every possible step to see that the New Westminster office is brought up to full strength. Then in connection with the vote for Robert's Creek, for which $54,000 is provided in the main estimates and a further $100,000 in the supplementary estimates, this is one project that certainly should not become a revote. During the recent storms a month ago the work done by the department so far was completely washed away; so I would urge that this money be spent before March 31. It is even more important, I think, that the $100,000 for the assembly dock at Squamish, which was promised in connection with the extension of the P.G.E., be spent and the work begun.

So I urge the minister to see that the civil service commission brings his staff at New Westminster up to strength so that next year we will not have this long list of revotes instead of the finished public works.

Newfoundland—

705. Dominion public buildings—construction, purchase, repairs and improvements, $750,000.

Mr. Drew: On item 705, I wish to raise a question with the minister. The member for St. John's East has asked me to take this matter up for him. This item is related to the construction, repair and improvement of public buildings in Newfoundland. On November 21, in a reply contained in sessional paper No. 92A, the Department of Public Works listed the repairs and other public works projects which were under way in Newfoundland. The first question related to work projects dealing with harbours or rivers generally, undertaken in Newfoundland since April 1, 1949. In answering, the figures are given for the different constituencies, as to the works now under way. In St. John's West the total is $7,500; St. John's East, $9,000; Burin-Burgeo, $47,100; Bonavista-Twillingate, $55,100; Grand Falls-White Bay, $12,700; Humber-St. George's, $10,000; Trinity-Conception, $38,150. It will be noticed that the figures for the constituencies outside the two St. John's constituencies are for large sums, except in the case of Grand Falls-White Bay, and in that case also the sum is larger than that for the St. John's constituencies.

Then, with regard to the question of minor day-labour works undertaken since April 1, 1949, we find that what is being spent in the two St. John's constituencies is quite small when compared with the amounts spent in the other constituencies. I point this out, Mr. Chairman, and I should like to ask the minister if he has some explanation in regard to this. It will be noted that St. John's East and St. John's West are not limited to the urban areas of St. John's, but include a number of ports that are important. There are also requirements for public works in the city of St. John's itself, which is a large city. Will the minister explain the large sums spent in the constituencies which happened to have supported the government candidates, and the small payments in those constituencies which failed to do so?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I fail to follow the trend of reasoning—

Mr. Drew: It is just a peculiar coincidence.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I would not even say that. Newfoundland came into confederation on March 31. No staff of the public works department was available in Newfoundland, and we did not have much knowledge of the island. From the head office we sent one of our young engineers, who has a good reputation in the department, Mr. Millar, and several employees of the department, to make a report on the minor works that could be carried out this fall on the island. The list that was given in answer to the return is a list that was submitted to the department by the engineering staff in Newfoundland.

I had not noticed the details on it, but one day one of the members for St. John's spoke to me and said it was on a political basis. I said if it was it had been made by some civil servant because I had not been down there since Newfoundland joined confederation. I have noticed that the two St. John's ridings have received less than the others, according to this list. After my attention was called to it by the member for St. John's West, I made up my mind that in any other list that was brought to my attention, if the need was there, money would be provided for those projects.

Mr. Drew: I do not propose to pursue the matter beyond the fact that I do find the minister's innocence as to the details very touching. I feel quite sure that those living in the St. John's district, which of course includes the different ports as well as the city, will be greatly assured by the statement of the minister that, before any further undertakings are embarked upon, he will ascertain what their needs are.

I raise the question on behalf of one of the members for St. John's, in view of the somewhat interesting statement that was made by a rather prominent man in Newfoundland not long ago, that those who did not vote for the government in power might not find the results too satisfactory. I hope that this is strictly a coincidence.

Vanderhoof—accommodation for government telegraph service, $6,000.

Victoria astrophysical observatory — repairs, alterations and improvements — to complete, (revote), $10,000.

Mr. Knowles: Will the minister look down the list for item 866, until he comes to the last but one, Vanderhoof, accommodation for government telegraph services, $6,000. This is a town up in northern British Columbia, and the people there understood that there was to be an appropriation for a public building to house the various federal government services. I trust that this small item is not the one they thought was going to do that. Can the minister say what is to be expected?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): This amount of $6,000 is required for the purchase of a building, and the erection of an addition thereto, to provide more adequate accommodation for the government telegraph services. I think the former member spoke to me about this place. That is how this estimate came to be put in. It is made up as follows: purchase of the building, $3,500; additions, $2,200; contingencies, $300.

Mr. Knowles: My speaking about it arises out of a conversation with the former member for Cariboo and also out of the fact that I have been in the town. The expectation was not for just a small item like this, but that there was to be a proper federal public building in the town to house the various services. It is quite a sizeable place. The name may look a bit strange to the minister, but it is an important town in that part of northeastern British Columbia. There is no other item in the estimates?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Not for a new building.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): May I say that I have had discussions with the department about this matter, and that they are carrying out the wishes of the people there with respect to this public building.

870. National printing bureau—further amount required, $1,000,000.

Mr. Hansell: Although this item is for just $1 million, it strikes me forcibly when there is no explanation and no detail given. Will the minister say what the extra $1 million is for? It is a great deal of money to vote when we do not know any detail.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I always hesitate to speak of my own constituency. This is in order to give out, in the next few months, a contract for the construction of the new printing bureau in Hull. I could not give more details now because plans and specifications are being prepared. This would be the first amount towards this contract. To date we have acquired part of the site. We have had the excavations completed. They are proceeding now with the foundations and this would be for going further in the construction of this building.

Mr. Drew: Will tenders be called for?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): In every case in Hull.

Mr. Drew: When is it expected that this work will begin?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I cannot give an exact date. They are on that contract for the foundation. The moment the foundations are completed, we will ask for this contract.

Mr. Knowles: This is perhaps a minor point, but I am interested in the name applied to the bureau both in this item in the supplementaries and in the items we had a while ago in the main estimates. Is it proposed to change the name of the bureau to the national printing bureau? It is a perfectly good name, but is it not a change? At the present time it is known as the bureau of printing and—

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Does the hon. member suggest that we change the name?

Mr. Knowles: No; I am saying that it looks as though you have changed the name. It has not previously been called the national printing bureau.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): That is the name of it, to my knowledge.

Mr. Knowles: Was it not the bureau of public printing and stationery?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): No, it was the national printing bureau.

Mr. Knowles: Very well.

Dredging—

872. Maritime provinces—further amount required, $109,120.

Mr. McLure: Again I should like to call the attention of the Minister of Public Works to the fact that more dredging is required at Wood Island where the Cariboo-Wood Island ferry boats dock. Last season, on account of lack of dredging there at the proper time, one of the boats, the larger one, was not able to dock and had to be laid up for at least ten days during the best part of the tourist trade. I hope sufficient attention will be paid to dredging there this year, particularly at Wood Island, so that conditions will be satisfactory for the docking of boats.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I thank the hon. member for calling my attention to the item because I was under the impression that this dredging was completed. If not, I will see that it is completed.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF FINANCE

71. Departmental administration, $1,326,285.

Mr. Drew: I do not intend to make any extended remarks on this item or on the items before us generally because the affairs of the Department of Finance have been dealt with otherwise in other discussions, except for various details which are before us and which will be examined as we go through the estimates. Neither do I propose to raise some of the subjects that might be raised at this point in connection with the Department of Finance, because I recognize the fact that we are merely dealing with items that are before us and it is either a case of these items being dealt with or otherwise. I only say this because I would not want the omission to discuss any of these subjects that come under the Minister of Finance, such as rent control and matters of that kind, to suggest that I have not a good deal to say about them; I believe, however, that they cannot be effectively covered at this point.

Nevertheless, I should like to say this. I still hope that the Minister of Finance will give immediate and further consideration to the whole situation raised by the action taken with regard to rent control. Recognizing that some change in the situation is going to take place even if only to the extent of some of the provincial governments occupying part of this field, I once again urge him to reconsider what has been done and to recognize the desirability of avoiding the confusion, the dissatisfaction and the unhappiness that have been aroused on all sides by the step that has been taken. It seems clear that what has been done satisfies no one, and that the interests of everyone would be best served by a careful and immediate reconsideration of this problem.

One other thing I wish to mention—and in mentioning it now I hope it may be possible for the minister to give consideration to it. The amount involved may be relatively small, but the principle is important.

Perhaps the minister will have seen, as I did, reference in a newspaper in his own city to the luxury tax on miniature medals. It does seem to me inconsistent that these miniature medals awarded for service or valour, and which must be worn on certain occasions either in mess or elsewhere, by those who continue their service, or those who attend various meetings of their units, should be subject not only to the sales tax of eight per cent but also the luxury tax of ten per cent. I should think the minister might well dispose of that today, because I do not think the same objection would apply to many of the other items covered by the luxury tax. It seems strange to acclaim the service and recognize the valour of men and women who have served during the war only to find that they are subject to a luxury tax imposed by the country they have served so well.

Mr. Abbott: I must confess I have never given the subject consideration, but I shall be glad to do so when the budget is under consideration again. The tax is not a luxury tax as such, but rather a special excise tax which applies to a variety of articles including miniature medals. However, I do not think there is any real hardship. They are worn with a dress suit or a dinner jacket and if a man can afford to rent one of those, I think probably the extra five cents or so involved in connection with the miniature medal is not a very serious matter. However, it will be considered when the budget is under consideration again.

Mr. Drew: I do not wish to labour the point, but might I say I did point out that it was a matter of principle rather than of the actual amount involved.

Mr. Abbott: I saw the editorial in the Montreal Gazette.

Mr. Quelch: The Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of Trade and Commerce have stressed the fact that our international trade problems are of a monetary nature.

Is the minister in a position to assure the house that as a result of the conference in Washington and the action of Great Britain in devaluating the pound we have reason to feel that this problem will be smoothed out in the near future?

Mr. Abbott: As I have said in the house before, I have never given myself a high rating as a prophet. I do not intend to attempt to add to my reputation in that respect today. I think that as a result of the Washington discussions, among other things we are getting closer to an understanding of what the real problem is. But it is not a problem which can be solved unilaterally by any nation; and there is no use merely saying that convertibility of currency is desirable, because we all know it is.

I must say I believe all nations, debtor and creditor, must adopt policies which will achieve that desirable end. So far as we in Canada are concerned, it is our belief that we are attempting to follow a policy of that kind. I do not suppose my hon. friend either wants or expects me at this stage to attempt to enter into a discussion on monetary policy. That has been discussed on other occasions, and will of course be discussed again. I am simply saying generally that I think we are making some progress along that line.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): May I have an explanation for this substantial increase of $343,192?

Mr. Abbott: This increase is proposed to provide for authorized additional positions, salary revisions and annual increases, and to meet the demand for newly minted coin based on the current upward trend of shipments of coin to all agencies of the Bank of Canada for distribution to the chartered banks. Provision is also made for the outright purchase of the Remington-Rand punch card installation in the treasury board establishment section.

As my hon. friend knows, there were substantial salary revisions throughout the civil service last year. The total increase in salaries of staff amounts to $219,122. The express on coin and silver bullion shipments amounts to $50,000, and the acquisition of equipment, $71,545.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): What, generally, is the occasion for the increase in staff?

Mr. Abbott: The total increase in staff is 58 over the previous year.

Mr. McLure: There are 95 permanent civil servants affected by this item, with a vote of $342,035, and $649,541, or nearly twice as much for temporary assistance. I suggest some detail should be given about this.

Mr. Abbott: There are 349 temporaries in this vote, and 95 permanent.

Mr. Low: Mr. Chairman, there are many things a number of us would like to say on the estimates of the Minister of Finance. We think however that at this stage it would be unwise to try to launch a full-dress debate on the items. One thing I am going to ask is that the minister give us the undertaking that at the next session of parliament he will ask the house leader to bring forward his estimates at an earlier time, so that there may be a full-dress debate on financial policy. There has not been one for some time. I believe there are a number of members who would like to get down to the bottom of that policy, and have a full discussion. I am sure the hon. member for Greenwood would welcome it, and there would also be some others in the same position.

If the minister will give that undertaking and attempt to get these estimates before us earlier so that we may feel we could launch a discussion without delaying the house, we would not be disposed to force a debate at this time.

Mr. Abbott: I shall be happy to do that. As has been suggested in connection with some other departments, at the next session we could call the administration items in a number of departments at as early a date as possible with the understanding that general discussion could take place on those items in connection with matters relating to departments, and not necessarily attempt to cover all the estimates of a department at a particular time.

As the committee knows, one reason why these estimates are brought forward at a later date is that there are so many occasions, in the budget debate or otherwise, to discuss financial and economic matters in which the Department of Finance is concerned. There are always ample opportunities for hon. members to discuss the general financial questions. However I shall be happy, as has been suggested, to arrange to have the departmental estimates opened as early as the house will allow, and to have the first item called in order to permit a general discussion.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I welcome what has been said by the Minister of Finance. Not having been a member of the government at any time, it is a mystery which I have never been able to solve why these are left to the last moment when we cannot really give them the time we should give to them. I hope the minister's memory will be good when we come to the next session.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, after what has been said by the two hon. members who have just spoken, I hesitate to deal with a technical matter at this time, but at least the point I intend to raise will not take long to discuss. In fact it may make it possible for the Minister of Finance to clear up a point. I want to make it clear that I do not raise the question in any critical spirit, nor am I opposed to the expenditure of the money involved.

The Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister will remember that a few days ago, when we were discussing the bill to provide salaries for the new ministers I asked whether provision would be made for the usual car allowances that minister's enjoy. The Prime Minister told me that that point had presented itself to him but he had been advised that it would be covered in the estimates of 1931. I made the natural response that I would like to look into it for myself, and I have done that. I have here Appropriation Act No. 5, 1931, which is chapter 61 of the statutes of that year. Item 352 reads:

352. To provide for payment annually from the consolidated revenue fund of the sum of $2,000 to each minister of the crown charged with the administration of a department, the solicitor general, and the leader of the opposition, and the sum of $1,000 each to the Speaker of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Commons, in lieu of motor cars and their maintenance, including chauffeurs, the acceptance of such sums not to vacate their respective seats in parliament; and to authorize the governor in council to appoint any person now employed in the public service as a chauffeur of a passenger automobile at Ottawa, whose position is abolished, to a vacant position in the public service, provided such chauffeur has been continuously employed as such for at least two years and that the appointment will be made at no higher remuneration than he is now receiving, $42,000.

Actually it was not necessary to read the whole item, but I thought I should, lest after reading only the pertinent part someone should ask that I read it all. As I see it, the point is quite clear. In 1931 the House of Commons passed an Appropriation Act which provided for a sum of $42,000. It is clear from the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act, which was amended in that same year, that no sum can be paid out in excess of the amount appropriated by parliament. No matter how that item may be worded, I cannot see how an amount in excess of $42,000 can be paid.

I recognize that the word "annually" appears in the item, which might seem to give permission to pay that sum annually; but is it not also essential that the total amount paid shall not exceed $42,000? The fact is that most of that $42,000 was paid in that fiscal year. I looked up the public accounts and found that some $30,000 odd was paid. Section 32, subsection 1, of the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act, reads:

Balances of appropriations which remain unexpended at the end of a fiscal year shall lapse and be written off.

In other words it would seem to me that whatever was left of that $42,000 as the end of 1931-32 would lapse.

May I call attention to one or two other sections in the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act. Section 22, subsection 1, reads:

Subject to the provisions of subsection two of this section, no issue of public moneys out of the consolidated revenue fund shall be made except under the authority of parliament.

Section 23 reads:

All estimates of expenditures submitted to parliament shall be for the services coming in course of payment during the fiscal year.

Section 24 is a long section, but it ends with these words:

—not exceeding the amount of the sum so voted or granted.

I come back to the point I made. All I am arguing for is that this $2,000 should be properly provided for by a statute, because it seems to me that once the 1931-32 fiscal year ended, whatever part of that money had not been spent would lapse. I do not see how the government can go on making payments year after year on the strength of the $42,000 voted in 1931.

The item which I referred to is to be found in schedule A attached to chapter 61 of the statutes of 1931; and it is stated that the items in that schedule are based on the main estimates for that year. That act provides that the amounts expended under the terms of schedule A shall not exceed a certain rather large figure.

As the minister knows, there are frequent occasions on which it becomes necessary to get authorization from parliament to make commitments to be expended in future years. Last night we had a case in the Department of Mines and Resources about which I inquired. I confess that I knew the answer before I asked my question, but I wanted to get it on the record. The Minister of Mines and Resources made it quite clear that what the government was asking for was authority to commit the government to a future expenditure, but he answered me, I think correctly, that a vote would have to appear in the estimates for each year in which money was paid to carry out such a commitment. The same thing shows up in the estimates of the Department of National Defence, where a number of commitments are made for future years, and for which authorization is sought in the current fiscal year. It is always clearly understood that when the time comes to pay the amount committed, it will require a vote of parliament.

I have no thought that I am raising a problem which has not presented itself to others in times past. The Prime Minister indicated that it had presented itself to him this year. I have gone into this as carefully as I can, but I stand to be educated on the point by the Minister of Finance. Nevertheless, it does seem to me that he is going to have a hard job explaining that you can continue to pay out $40,000 a year on the strength of an item voted in 1931. Remember that on that occasion the vote was for a sum of money not to exceed $42,000.

Is this the correct way to do it? Should it not be done by statute? Is it proper to have these items marked "statutory" in the estimates when there is no statute covering them?

Mr. Abbott: As my hon. friend pursues these purely legal questions I always follow his legal arguments with a great deal of interest. Perhaps it is not necessary for me to say that the Minister of Finance has received a formal opinion from the deputy minister of justice that this is what is known as a continuing vote. From year to year the estimates are filled with items of this kind, including a number of pension items, which are voted once in an appropriation bill but which continue as a statutory charge. I used to lecture in the law faculty of McGill before I entered public life, but I have given up that occupation for the time being. If my hon. friend would like further elucidation I am sure the deputy minister of justice would be only too happy to discuss it with him. I can assure him that there is appropriate legal authority for the continuing payment of this item from year to year.

Superannuation and retirement benefits—

74. Superannuation and retirement acts, administration, $200,402.

Mr. Knowles: Once again I hesitate to raise questions at this stage of the session, but, as we all know, it is not our fault that these items are called now. I assure the Minister of Finance I shall be very brief.

I should like to ask the minister to go back and read all the things I have said before about superannuated civil servants; and I do want to make a plea, despite the number of times he has turned us down, for reconsideration of the plight of superannuated civil servants, particularly those in the lower brackets. A return was brought down in my name on October 13, 1949, which shows that there are 1,425 retired civil servants whose pensions are less than $40 a month, and that there are 2,463 widows of retired civil servants whose pensions are less than $40 a month. The return is sessional paper 100-A, of Thursday, October 13, 1949. I could give more figures, but those I have given will suffice to indicate that there are a large number of our faithful servants and employees of this government whose pensions are far too small. There is one piece of new evidence that I should like to bring forward on this occasion in support of the case. It is contained in a letter I have from the deputy minister of finance of the province of Newfoundland. I have pointed out on former occasions that the government of the United Kingdom has done something for retired civil servants in the lower brackets, as has the government of the province of Saskatchewan. I now call the attention of the Minister of Finance to the fact that the province of Newfoundland is doing a pretty fair job in the matter of providing cost of living bonuses for their retired civil servants. The figures contained in the letter dated October 31, 1949, which I received from the deputy minister of finance of the province of Newfoundland, indicate the following:

With effect from January 1, 1949, this scale—

This refers to the previous scale of bonuses.

—was repealed and the following introduced . . .

These are the bonuses that are given to retired civil servants in Newfoundland.

	Married Men per cent	Women and Single Men per cent
On pensions up to $600	70	55
On pensions $601 to $1,000	60	45
On pensions $1,001 to $1,500	40	30
On pensions $1,501 up	20	15

If the federal government was prepared to do as well as the province of Newfoundland, it would be of great benefit. Certainly, without trying to pigeonhole that province, it is fair to say that it is not the wealthiest province in Canada. In fact some of those who come from there refer to themselves sometimes as our poor relations. It must be difficult for them to finance things, and yet they are doing a fair job of bonusing their civil servants whose pensions are so low. If we applied even that scale of bonuses to our retired civil servants, in certain cases the results would be as follows: Married men on a pension of $20 a month—and there are 249 of them—would get a pension of $34 a month; $30 would become $51;

$40 would become $68; $50 would become $85; $60 would become $96; $70 would become $112; $80 would become $128; $90 would become $126, and $100 would become $140.

If we applied the Newfoundland scale, the corresponding figures in the case of women and single men would be $31.00; $46.50; $62.00; $77.50; $87.00; $101.50; $116.00; $117.00, and $130.00.

As I say, I am prepared on this occasion to cut my remarks short. I feel keenly about this matter, and I have never been satisfied with the answers the Minister of Finance has given. The only thing I can say about them is that he has been definite. Once he has concluded consideration of a matter and has given us a negative answer, he seems to think he has to stick with it. He sees no reason for reconsidering the matter, but as he and other hon. members of the house know, our superannuated civil servants across this land do not feel that they are getting a square deal, especially those in the lower brackets, and the figures show there are far too many of them.

Once again I make my plea to the minister that he reconsider the whole question. I am sure if it were not so late in the session—it may happen even now—there would be many members of the house who would rise to support me. In fact I hope two or three of them will do so, in order that the minister may know that I am not "a voice crying in the wilderness". I feel that the answers which were given in the last parliament were not good enough. To put it briefly, if a province having the financial difficulties of Newfoundland can do that well; if it can be done in Saskatchewan and the United Kingdom, surely this federal government can do it, and I urge action on this important matter without further delay.

Mr. Green: I should like to join in the plea made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. There is really very little that can be added to the statement he has made, but I should like to point out to the minister that when these civil servants were making their payments they believed that their retirement allowances would be sufficient for them to be able to carry on. Because of the increase in the cost of living, some of them, particularly those in the lower brackets, are now in a very difficult position. We have a large number of retired federal civil servants in British Columbia, and personally I know of a good many cases in which there is considerable suffering because of the inadequacy of the pension. It seems to me that Canada might very well take the lead in meeting this situation. Certain industries have made some provision in this regard and I suggest that the minister give further consideration to the plea that something be done for retired civil servants.

Mr. Low: I think what has already been said points to the necessity for a re-examination of the whole basis of the pension schemes. There is no questioning the fact that actuarially the whole basis of the contributory pension scheme is wrong from the point of view of the decreasing value of money. You cannot say today, nor can any actuary, what will be the value of a man's pension forty years from now. When we ask for a contribution of a certain percentage of a man's salary and say that in twenty or thirty years his pension will be so much, we are sticking our heads in the sand, because we all know that the inexorable trend is for money to diminish in value, since prices are constantly going up. It seems to me we shall have to call for a complete re-examination of the whole basis of our pension program if we are to give our civil servants a fair deal; and I ask that this be done.

Item agreed to.

Public debt charges—

76. Commission for payment of interest on public debt, services of fiscal agents, London, registrar's fees, etc., $386,400.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I should like to know just how this commission payment is progressing. I notice that it is slowly decreasing. I had thought that the repatriation of so many securities during the war would have tended to bring this down. Will the minister explain just how the figure is arrived at? Is it on a percentage basis?

Mr. Abbott: Yes. Owing to the low level of expenditures incurred in replenishing the reserve stock of bonds between 1947-48 and 1948-49, it was originally considered that provision for this purpose could be reduced by some $50,000 for the current year. The balance of the decrease reflected in this item resulted from an expected reduction in the value of coupons to be cashed during the current year, thus requiring less provision for the payment of commission to agents who handle such coupons.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Then I want to ask a question in regard to the item covering the cost of loan flotations.

Mr. Abbott: That is a statutory item, but I should be glad to give the details.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I wish the minister would explain it briefly.

Mr. Abbott: There was no change in this item, which has remained the same for some years. It is mainly used in connection with the Canada savings bond campaign, which, as my hon. friend will recall, was the only public issue of securities in Canada during the year.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Will the minister give me the statutory reference so I can look it up?

Mr. Abbott: It is the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act—section 7, I think.

Item agreed to.

General—

84. To provide for the expenses of the comptroller of the treasury's office, $10,459,000.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Just a word about the increase here, please.

Mr. Abbott: This is a very large vote, of course. The net increase of $209,000 over the estimate for 1948-49 is due to normal statutory increases, reclassifications and revisions of salary rates; increased costs of printing, stationery and postage, for the registration of income tax refund cheques. This is partly offset by a net decrease of 358 positions and the dropping of provision for unemployment insurance contributions, which are now provided in a specific vote for that purpose.

Item agreed to.

86. The Farm Improvement Loans Act, 1944, and the Veterans Business and Professional Loans Act, 1946—administration, $52,795.

Mr. Herridge: It seems to me this amount is quite high, in view of the amount of business done under this legislation. What percentage does this amount represent of the total business done under these two acts?

Mr. Abbott: This is the administration vote. The increase is due almost entirely to the increased volume of business being done by this branch, which has necessitated an increase of four in the number of positions provided for, and provision for legal and collection costs. There is a proportionate increase in certain other sundry and administrative expenses.

Mr. Herridge: Would the minister give the total amount lent under both acts for the current year?

Mr. Abbott: Total loans outstanding under the first act, as at September 30, 1949, amounted to $46,108,502. The amount lent under the second act is $3,813,483.

Item agreed to.

89. To provide, subject to the approval of the treasury board, for salaries, reclassifications, increases and other paylist items, $20,000,000.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I should like a word of explanation on this. Whom does it concern?

Mr. Abbott: This is an apparently large item. As my hon. friend will recall, during the course of the year substantial increases in salary were made throughout the civil service generally, as the result of an investigation carried on by the treasury board and the civil service commission. The ordinary departmental estimates for salaries were inadequate, of course, to cover those increases, and this item is put in to take care of salary adjustments and perhaps unforeseen increases in staff during the year. It is, of course, included in the estimates of the Minister of Finance, but next year the appropriate amounts will be included in the separate departmental estimates, covering the more or less major increases which were given this year.

Item agreed to.

91. To provide for the government's contribution, as an employer, to the unemployment insurance fund in respect of government employees paid through the central pay office, $950,000.

Mr. Fleming: Is this a new item?

Mr. Abbott: Yes; this is the item I referred to a moment ago in connection with the estimate covering the office of the comptroller of the treasury. Last year these amounts were included in the general estimates of each department. Now the total amount is set out as a separate item, under the Department of Finance.

Item agreed to.

Demobilization and reconversion—

93. Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation, $5,000,000.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I observe with satisfaction a decrease in this item; but I should like to know what commodities are still being stabilized, and why?

Mr. Abbott: This item was included last year, when the estimates were being prepared, as a clean-up vote. I am informed that according to present indications very little of this amount of $5 million will in fact be needed this year. The Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation has pretty well completed its operations, which now consist largely of recovering the overpayment of subsidies which were made through profit control arrangements and otherwise. All important domestic subsidies and bulk purchasing programs have been discontinued for some time past.

Item agreed to.

94. Advances to the Canadian wheat board for payments in respect of flour or food containing wheat for human consumption in Canada, $6,000,000.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I should like a word about this item, please.

Mr. Abbott: In accordance with the Canadian wheat board regulations which became effective August 2, 1948, the board sold wheat to fill domestic requirements at a price of $2 per bushel, plus carrying, forwarding and diversion charges. When the wheat thus sold was used for the manufacture of flour or food, other than alcohol, for human consumption in Canada, the purchasers were entitled to receive from the board a refund of 46½ cents a bushel. It was also provided that the board should be reimbursed from the moneys appropriated by parliament for the total amount of the refund paid, for interest on the refunds and for other incidental expenses in connection with their payments. During the previous fiscal year, that is the year 1948-49, the government advanced to the Canadian wheat board in this connection some $11 million, which was later found to be insufficient to cover all payments of the refunds claimed. It is now estimated that an amount not exceeding $2 million or $3 million will be required in this current year to complete the payment of refunds to millers and the processors of flour used for domestic human consumption in Canada during the period from August 1, 1948, to March 22, 1949.

Here again, of course, the estimate prepared some time ago appears to have been more than will be actually needed to complete these refund payments.

Item agreed to.

100. To provide, subject to the approval of the treasury board, for miscellaneous and unforeseen expenses and for the temporary provision of recoverable advances for working capital purposes and for the re-advancing of any such advances repaid, $1,000,000.

Mr. Fleming: Could we have some explanation of item 100?

Mr. Abbott: The purpose of this item, Mr. Chairman, is to provide, subject to the approval of the treasury board, for miscellaneous and unforeseen expenses, and for the temporary provision of recoverable advances and for working capital purposes, and for the re-advancing of any such advances required. Generally, this item provides funds from which important requirements which could not be foreseen sufficiently well in advance, or with sufficient accuracy to enable the estimates to be submitted, may be financed. It is an item which is put in year after year. Obviously, in preparing estimates of over $2 billion, it is difficult if not impossible to foresee every possible item. This is a sort of unforeseen contingency item which is included year after year.

Mr. Fleming: How much was drawn on the item last year?

[Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood).]

Mr. Abbott: I am told it was $178,000.

Item agreed to.

669. Government's contribution to the superannuation fund—further amount required, $300,000.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Why is it that in the main estimate this item has increased $330,000, and yet the situation was so unclear at that time—

Mr. Abbott: This is a Newfoundland item, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Oh, I suppose that does explain it.

Mr. Abbott: My hon. friend will recall the explanation I gave last year, that we put in separate items for Newfoundland.

Item agreed to.

671. To authorize payments hereafter required to be made under an agreement entered into between the government of Canada and the government of the province of Newfoundland pursuant to term 27 of the terms of union of Newfoundland with Canada, estimated amount required for fiscal year 1949-50, $4,845,000.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Those are the figures settled at the time of confederation?

Mr. Abbott: That is correct. These payments, if made, would be in accordance with the terms of union.

Item agreed to.

781. Servicing of public debt—commission for payment of interest on public debt, services of fiscal agents, London, registrar's fees, etc.—further amount required, $50,000.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): What is the reason for this increase?

Mr. Abbott: I am informed that the reserves for government bonds, printing and so on, have been depleted as a result of the demand for fresh issues. Perhaps I had better give a more formal explanation.

An unforeseen increase in bonds presented for transfer, both from registered to coupon and coupon to registered, has depleted the bond reserves of several victory loans necessitating a fresh printing by the bank note companies of engraved bonds to replenish the reserves. We always keep a reserve stock of these bonds on hand.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): What about these commission payments?

Mr. Abbott: There were no commission payments; this is a general item which is always included, and the $50,000 additional is for the purpose I have indicated.

Item agreed to.

938. To provide for administration of the program respecting grants to municipalities in lieu of taxes on crown property outlined in the House of Commons on November 14, 1949, including initial grants and other payments to be made in accordance with regulations of the governor in council, $300,000.

Mr. Fleming: Items 938 and 939 recall a statement by the Minister of Finance a couple of weeks ago concerning grants to municipalities, in lieu of taxes on property owned by the crown in the right of the dominion, or agencies of the crown in the right of the dominion. I do not propose to go into that very confusing statement at great length, but the minister has referred to it since as being a clear statement. There are not many people who have commented upon the statement, editorially or otherwise, who have found it clear. Practically every municipality in Canada has found it a most disappointing statement of policy.

In the light of statements that have been made from time to time by the government, it had been hoped that the government did appreciate that the time had come when it ought, in all fairness, to make to municipalities, in lieu of taxes, grants that would at least be a reasonable approach to the amount that federally-owned properties would have borne in taxes had they been owned by private individuals. The statement which the minister made seems to be based upon the assumption that only the municipalities having more than an average of federally owned property should qualify for any federal assistance whatever. With respect, I believe that is an entirely unfair decision. Here is a government that is amply provided with revenues and which, so far as its taxing powers are concerned, has unlimited sources of revenue. The municipalities with which we are concerned are all suffering seriously from limited sources of revenue and rising costs of services; and, I may say, Mr. Chairman, an extremely unfair burden of services has been cast upon them. There is hardly a municipality in this country, certainly among the larger municipalities, which in recent times has not been ground between the upper and nether millstones of limited sources of revenue and rising costs of services. Formerly, these were regarded as the municipality's responsibility, but today enlightened opinion regards many of them as the proper responsibility of the federal government.

In connection with the recent amendment to the housing act, the minister of reconstruction gave a clear undertaking that, for all the houses that would be owned by the federal authorities or constructed under the new legislation, payments would be made to the municipalities in lieu of taxes equal to the amount of taxes which those properties would have borne had they been in private hands. That was a fair enough example for the Minister of Finance to follow.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the amounts that are proposed by the government for the municipalities are entirely inadequate. Within the city from which I come we have over $13 million of federally-owned property. Under this disappointing scheme which the government has introduced, that city is not going to receive a cent. It is expected to continue providing services. The whole situation is lamentably unfair, Mr. Chairman. I say to the minister that before another session comes around I hope he will have the courage and determination to take the situation in hand and see that fair play and justice are extended to all municipalities which have federally-owned property within their borders.

Mr. Knowles: It is most unfortunate that this item, like so many others, should come up for discussion at the end of a session. I wish to register my protest—

Mr. Fournier (Hull): At this stage, Mr. Chairman, as it is five minutes to six, may I be permitted to move that the committee report progress, and report the resolutions so that we may have Mr. Speaker in the chair?

Mr. Drew: I think perhaps if the minister explained the purpose, it might avoid any unnecessary discussion.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): It is the intention before six o'clock to move the following motion:

That Mr. Speaker do not leave the chair at six p.m. this day, and that for the remainder of this day's sitting, government orders shall have precedence over all other business, notwithstanding any standing or special orders.

I understand we must do this before six o'clock, if the house agrees.

The Chairman: Shall I report the resolutions and ask leave to sit again?

Progress reported.

Mr. Speaker: When shall the committee have leave to sit again? Later this day.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): By leave of the house, Mr. Speaker, I wish to move:

That Mr. Speaker do not leave the chair at six p.m. this day, and that, for the remainder of this day's sitting, government orders shall have precedence over all other business, notwithstanding any standing or special orders.

Mr. Knowles: There is just one comment I should like to make. I understand the other place has been giving a bit of a rough ride to a bill that we dealt with so favourably last night, and that it may come back to us with an amendment. From the Clerk's nodding his head, I gather that to be the case. I would hope that this motion, if we pass it, would not prevent our dealing with Senate amendments to the Red Cross bill.

Mr. Abbott: You can do anything by unanimous consent.

Motion agreed to.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF FINANCE

Grants to municipalities in lieu of taxes on federal property—

938. To provide for administration of the program respecting grants to municipalities in lieu of taxes on crown property outlined in the House of Commons on November 14, 1949, including initial grants and other payments to be made in accordance with regulations of the governor in council, $300,000.

Mr. Knowles: I was about to express my protest against the formula that the minister has produced with respect to the matter of the federal government paying something to municipalities in lieu of taxes on crown properties. The day the minister announced his formula it seemed to me that, in those earlier stages of what he had to say, it sounded good. I thought he was laying the basis, theoretically, for a formula that would be acceptable. It looked to me as though we would get some sort of sliding scale that, despite its discrimination against some places, would at least be defensible. But when he came down not with a sliding scale but with one that cuts off abruptly, and provides no relief to a great many cities and municipalities of the country, I felt that it was most unfair and certainly did not solve the problem.

I can state my protest perhaps most readily by reading a few sentences from a letter which I received from the mayor of Winnipeg, Mr. Garnet Coulter, which I believe is in terms identical with those of letters received by each of the other members from the city of Winnipeg. The letter is dated December 6, 1949. I am not going to read all of it, but just a few selected sentences that drive home the point. I quote from Mayor Coulter's letter:

In October of this year I was one of a delegation from the executive committee—

[Mr. Fournier (Hull).]

That is the executive committee of the Canadian federation of mayors and municipalities.

—who waited on the Prime Minister when he told us that the government did have a plan under consideration which would be before the present session of the house, and we were all encouraged to believe that this issue was on its way to at least a partially fair solution.

The members of our city council were therefore very surprised and disappointed when the announcement of the details of the government proposal was made by Mr. Abbott. That proposal carries little or no benefit to any Canadian city, with the exception of two or three, of which group Winnipeg is not one. So the old situation still remains with our city gratuitously furnishing expensive services from which the government benefits.

I can assure you that a great deal of resentment has been created, not only here but in the other major cities of Canada, by the action of the government in purporting to deal with the situation and then having produced a formula which does not deal with it with any degree of adequacy.

Then I skip a few sentences in which the mayor tells me that the finance committee asked him to write to all four of the members for the city of Winnipeg, two of us being over here in this group and two on the government side, and then he goes on to say:

I was also requested to urge you, and the other members, to do anything possible to have the proposal revised so that at least some recognition of the moral right of the cities will be given.

My information is that since the proposal was announced by the government it has been scrutinized again by the executive committee and national advisory board of the Canadian Federation of Mayors and Municipalities, and that a protest is being forwarded to the cabinet, as well as a counter-suggestion, that the government should make payments in lieu of taxes to the extent that the government properties receive service benefits from the respective cities.

The letter has another paragraph and then it is signed: "Yours very truly, Garnet Coulter, mayor".

I have two or three questions to ask. First of all, I should like to ask the minister whether the protest and the counter-suggestion referred to in Mayor Coulter's letter have been received and whether consideration has been given to such correspondence. My other question is this, and I ask it in the light of the discussion a few minutes ago about ministerial car allowances. Is the wording of this item such that it is a continuing item that does not have to be voted again?

Mr. Abbott: No. In my public statement I announced that we put a single item in this year, and that a special statute would be introduced at the next session.

Mr. Knowles: That is fine.

Mr. Abbott: That is in my statement.

Mr. Knowles: So this is just for the current fiscal year. Will the minister tell me whether this protest and counter-suggestion have been received since his statement was made and whether consideration has been given to them, in the light of the assurance that the mayors felt they had had from previous interviews?

Mr. Abbott: I do not recall that particular protest. When the federation of mayors were here, in their brief they expressed some dissatisfaction with the formula as they understood it. Perhaps I might say at this point that there is not a great deal that I can add to the perhaps lengthy and complicated statement I made when I announced this policy, but here is the position. If federal property was distributed evenly throughout all the municipalities in Canada, obviously no taxes should be paid, since they are providing services, and the federal service would be distributed evenly throughout different municipalities. That is the basis upon which the exemption on taxation is contained in the British North America Act, and it is computed in every other way we have been able to find on a similar basis.

The justification for paying the tax to municipalities is that there is undue concentration of federal property and services in those municipalities. The basis of the proposed formula for the payment of general taxes is that, where there is an excess above what is established as a national average, then the taxes should be paid with respect to that excess, and that excess only.

It seems to me however that in the public comment respecting the outline of the proposed policy insufficient attention has been paid to the fact that in the case of crown corporations tax agreements will be made for the payment of fair sums in lieu of taxes, a procedure which has not been generally followed in the past. Secondly, all municipalities will receive payment for local improvement taxes, both current and arrears, if they have not been paid. That is something which has not been done in the past.

Thirdly, these transition payments will be made in any municipality where the federal government acquires property. It will pay the taxes for a period of three or five years, as the case may be, depending upon whether the municipality is one in receipt of the general grant or otherwise. Those are very substantial changes in the heretofore existing law.

I have only one further word to say, and that is that people should not jump to too hasty conclusions as to how this proposed formula will work out. It will require a very considerable amount of additional work and time to get at the fair value of the different federal government-owned properties in the different municipalities, and to determine which municipalities are entitled to specific grants, and the extent of those grants.

The vote now before the committee is a purely interim vote. The primary purpose is to carry up to the end of the year the grant which has been paid to the city of Ottawa for a great many years. The other item of $300,000 is to provide for the setting up of a special grant in the treasury, to which I referred in my statement, and for the future possibly another grant which it may be necessary to make between January 1 and March 31, the end of the fiscal year.

One point I omitted to mention in connection with the new policy is that payment will be made in all cases for specific services in connection with federal property—services such as water, and all that sort of thing.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): The minister has told us that we should not jump to hasty conclusions. I wish to associate myself with what was said by the hon. member for Eglinton and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre in regard to this very ingenious but unconvincing procedure the minister has suggested. I should like to point out also that this is a piece of class legislation, because what the minister is doing is to favour people who are above, as against those who are below the average.

Mr. Abbott: I think the last remark of the hon. member scarcely does credit to his very high intellectual attainments. Surely my hon. friend is not suggesting that every town in Canada which has a post office should be taxed on that post office. And I just refer to that as an example. Clearly a post office is providing a local service which the municipality needs and wants. Nearly every municipality has a post office, either rented or owned. That is an obvious case.

To say that we are benefiting those who are over the average and discriminating against those who are under is exactly the reverse of the principle which should be operative, and exactly the reverse of the actual fact.

Mr. Cruickshank: I have not taken up much time, and I should like to ask the minister a question as to how this act works out. In my riding there is a large army camp and a large airport, of which I am very proud. The preliminary talk was such that the municipalities thought they were getting something out of it. My understanding now is that municipalities such as Chilliwack will get nothing out of it. I would ask, as the Minister of Labour says, "in a kindly way", for an explanation that I can give to the people in my riding because, as I see it, the municipality of Chilliwack in which there is a large army camp, and the municipality of Abbotsford, in which there is a great airport, get absolutely nothing. I should like to have an explanation why.

Mr. Abbott: Cases of military establishments will have to be considered on their merits. In respect of a purely self-contained military establishment, where it provides its own municipal services such as roads, fire protection and the like—and there are some of them in Canada—it is understood that of course they are not being paid the grant in lieu of taxes, because they do not receive municipal services from the particular area in which they are located. There are some of those. Then there are others, such as Esquimalt and, I believe Halifax, where the military property, whether it is navy, army or air force, is within the town limits and is in receipt of general municipal services. Under those circumstances those facts will be taken into account in determining the formula as to whether the grant would be payable or not.

It is impossible to give a general answer with respect to military and harbour installations without looking at all the circumstances of a particular municipality in which they are located. I am familiar, in a general way, with my hon. friend's constituency, and with at least one of the large military installations there.

Mr. Cruickshank: Probably it is because of our climate—and we are noted for our fertility in the Fraser valley—but I would ask the minister, in all seriousness, if there is any hospitalization at Chilliwack for maternity cases. It is all very well for hon. members to scoff at that question, but we have to pay these bills, and we are anxious about it.

I understand that at the present time the Department of National Health and Welfare are paying for some things in the army camp.

What about hospitalization? I am asking this because I have not the information. I shall be asked about it when I go home, and I think it best to ask the minister at this time. What is the answer, so far as the airport and the army camp in my constituency are concerned? Will consideration be given as circumstances arise?

[Mr. Cruickshank.]

Mr. Abbott: I shall have to look into the matter and let my hon. friend know later. Perhaps I can get the information from the Department of National Defence.

Mr. Cameron: I have the honour to represent a Toronto constituency, that of High Park, and I have seen some of the comments that have been made about the minister's statement. I agree thoroughly with the principle enunciated and that we cannot deviate from the principle that has been established from time immemorial that the crown is exempt from taxation. But when we admit that as of grace we are going to make certain payments I am forced with some hesitation to come to the conclusion that I cannot agree with the formula that has been adopted. Once having admitted that principle, I submit that the essential public services that are rendered should be paid for by the federal government.

I notice that water was the only service mentioned, but other services to be considered are police and fire protection, sewage and others. I submit that the proper and business-like approach would be for the federal government to make these payments on the basis of the services received.

I cannot agree with the inclusion of school taxes because I think that is a provincial responsibility. We have here a resolution which would indicate that we might be asked to do something in that respect in a general way, and I think we should. I associate myself with that principle and I hope that in due course the government will give consideration to it.

939. To confirm and to authorize the doing by His Majesty during the period from July 1 to December 31, 1949, of acts and things that were required to be done by him in accordance with the agreement between His Majesty and the corporation of the city of Ottawa (entered into under the authority of chapter 27 of the Statutes of 1945) which expired on June 30, 1949, as if the agreement were in effect to December 31, 1949 and for that purpose to authorize payment of the sum of two hundred and fifty thousand dollars as if it were the amount payable for that period under clause one of the agreement; the payment to be made on or before December 31, 1949, upon delivery to His Majesty by that corporation of a release of all claims in respect of services rendered by the corporation to His Majesty to and including December 31, 1949, if the Minister of Public Works is satisfied that the said corporation has done all acts and things that it would have been required to do had the said agreement been in effect to December 31, 1949, $250,000.

Mr. Fleming: May we have an explanation of this item. After looking at the Ottawa Agreement Act, which is chapter 27 of the statutes of 1945. I should think that the proper thing to have done would be to amend the agreement. Section 1 of the agreement provides that the government will pay to the corporation the sum of $300,000 annually. I understand that for the six-months period from July 1 to December 31 of this year it is proposed to make this payment of $250,000 instead of prorating it on the basis of $150,000. This extra amount is being paid to compensate for certain services that have been rendered.

Mr. Abbott: On January 1, 1950, the city of Ottawa will come under the general formula and there will be no special statute relating to the city. As my friend has indicated, it was necessary to take care of the period from July 1 to December 31, and an item was included in the estimates which was prepared for the Department of Justice. It was decided to do this by means of an item in the estimates, since it is not proposed to continue the practice of having a special statute for the city of Ottawa. The city of Ottawa will be subject to the same general rule and will be covered by the general statute I intend to introduce next session.

Mr. Fleming: Have the officials of the department calculated how much the city of Ottawa will receive under the new policy? It has seemed to me that the amount received by the city of Ottawa up to the present has not been adequate compensation for the services that have been provided.

Mr. Abbott: I shall not discuss the adequacy of the previous grants. As I pointed out in my statement some time ago, the dominion government has in fact been paying for services which would normally be rendered by the municipality.

Mr. Fleming: Some.

Mr. Abbott: A great many, and I indicated what they were. As to the amount that will be paid to the city of Ottawa, an estimate has been made but I would not care to indicate what that will be until more accurate figures have been obtained. I feel it will certainly be not under the $500,000 per year, which this item for six months would indicate.

Mr. Cruickshank: Will other municipalities receive the same consideration as Ottawa?

Mr. Abbott: The basis upon which grants will be made to Ottawa will be the same as that on which grants will be made to other municipalities. They will be based upon the same formula.

Mr. Cruickshank: The formula is not quite clear to me because unfortunately I am not a Rhodes scholar. I am asking that Chilliwack be considered on the same basis as the city of Ottawa.

Mr. Abbott: I think my hon. friend can rest assured that the problem of the beautiful town of Chilliwack will be considered on exactly the same basis as the city of Ottawa.

DEPARTMENT OF VETERANS AFFAIRS

Demobilization and reconversion—

551. Post discharge rehabilitation benefits including out of work allowances, university and vocational training including the training of merchant seamen and salt water fishermen pensioners, awaiting returns allowances, temporarily incapacitated allowances and unemployment insurance contributions, $28,850,000.

Mr. Green: A number of questions were to be answered by the department when these estimates came up again for consideration; could we have those answers now?

Mr. Mutch: I have here answers to various questions which were asked when the estimates were previously before the committee. I should like to have the answers to these questions, which I am assured are complete, placed on the record in order to save the time of the committee.

The Chairman: Is it the pleasure of the committee?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Mutch: This is the statement which deals with the questions and answers thereto:

During the debates on the veterans affairs estimates—Hansard, page 640, column 2 and page 1049, column 1—the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra asked for the number of cases between the period 30th June, 1947, and 30th June, 1949, wherein the commission had refused entitlement on the basis that the condition was pre-enlistment and not aggravated. The total number of such decisions for the two-year period in question is 6,740.

In the course of his remarks the hon. member stated: "and, mind you, they had been discharged as disabled but were ruled out on application for pension on the ground that they had pre-enlistment conditions."

I wish to make it very clear to hon. members that the group in question were not discharged as disabled. The great majority were discharged in the ordinary course of demobilization, and subsequently the Canadian pension commission considered a claim for a condition which may or may not have been recorded on the proceedings of the discharge medical board.

At this stage I find it necessary to say a word regarding the procedure leading up to these decisions of pre-enlistment origin. On attestation a recruit was medically examined, that examination was a physical one and the examining medical officer asked a number of questions regarding the state of health and as to whether the recruit had ever suffered from certain conditions. This all forms part of the official record on attestation and actually, for example, thousands had defective vision to a greater or lesser degree, but not sufficient to cause rejection. The condition was pre-enlistment and obviously the commission, when considering a claim, would review the discharge board's records and, if there was no worsening during service, would rule "pre-enlistment, not aggravated." In other cases the member of the forces during his service reported sick and gave, on his own volition, a clear-cut statement of the pre-enlistment existence of the same condition for which he was suffering and being treated. It is the responsibility of the commission to determine whether the condition was, firstly, of pre-enlistment origin and, secondly, if there was any worsening during service; if not, they rule "pre-enlistment, not aggravated." Another group, and quite a considerable one, was found in those cases where, on examination during service, it was found they had constitutional or congenital conditions. These included adolescence and developmental anomalies, all of which were definitely of pre-enlistment origin, and the commission, on review, had to determined whether service played any part in aggravation.

Again it is only fair I should state that many pre-enlistment conditions were not disclosed as found on enlistment but very soon became apparent and led to discharge. To illustrate, I would repeat the figures on the record of the 1946 committee on veterans affairs: 3,830 served for 30 days or less, 17,388 served from 31 to 90 days, 28,982 served from 91 to 183 days (which is 6 months), 42,516 served from 184 to 364 days. A total of 92,716 men served less than one year because they were found to be unfit and unsuitable for service.

Then again I must point out that the decisions rendered by the commission were initial ones and gave the reasons. The act provides the veteran may renew his claim and may appear before an appeal board of the commission. Not only is this so, but my department has a branch called the veterans' bureau which, free of charge, assists applicants in the preparation and advancement of their claims to pension, and some of the national organizations of ex-servicemen render a similar service.

I make this statement and hope it will make the situation clear regarding this type of claim.

[Mr. Mutch.]

When on the subject, the hon. member for Saskatoon—Hansard, page 641, column 1—mentioned the case of a young man who was enlisted for service with the R.C.A.F. and suffers from a severe heart condition which the commission ruled to be of pre-enlistment origin and they have pensioned on an aggravation basis of two-fifths. On examination I find the facts of this case are:

The applicant had a relatively short period of service in the R.C.A.F., actually less than eight months in Canada. On enlistment he stated he had rheumatic fever in 1934 and later stated he had an earlier one in 1930. No cardiac abnormalities were discovered on enlistment but it was suggested he be watched. He was admitted to hospital less than 6 months after enlistment when the history and diagnosis of heart complications were made and led to his discharge.

It is my understanding that the time at which the heart disease resulting from the rheumatic fever first becomes manifest is a long drawn out process between the stage of original infection and the date of final incapacitation. A most eminent specialist says: "It is to the growing child we must go as rheumatic heart disease begins always in childhood." It certainly did in this case at the ages of eleven and fifteen.

We therefore have an airman who, very soon after enlistment, gave evidence of the serious effects of two childhood attacks of rheumatic fever. He had no complaints at the time of his discharge from service, no murmurs were detected and he worked as a C.P.R. brakeman until December, 1944, when he had a further recurrence of joint pains and definite murmurs were described. The commission has ruled pre-enlistment, aggravated to the extent of two-fifths of his entire disability. The latter is assessed at 100 per cent, and two-fifths of that is 40 per cent, being the award in payment. He also has the right to treatment with hospital allowances from my department at any time such is required.

Question by hon. member for Acadia—(Hansard, page 1051):

How many veterans, engaged in full-time farming under the Veterans' Land Act, have made their current payments? How many, if any, have paid up in full? How many are in arrears, and how many, if any, have signed quit claims?

Answer: Number who have made all payments due to 31st March, 1949, 18,293, or 94·7 per cent.

Number who are in arrears of payments due to 31st March, 1949, 1,025, or 5·3 per cent.

Number who have made prepayments, 4,710.

Amount of prepayments made, $1,253,732.03.

Number who have paid cost to director and taken title, 307.

Number who have paid contract debt and will get title in 10 years, 391.

Number who have signed quit claim deeds, 326.

The figures are for full-time farming only, but the standing is also as satisfactory for small holding establishments. Collection figures are given as at March 31 last, as current payments only became due on November 1.

Question by hon. member for Calgary East—(Hansard, page 1053):

How many soldier settlers did obtain their mineral rights?

Answer: 240 applications have been received from qualified soldier settlers where the mineral rights were acquired in the purchase of the land. Of these, 232 have been submitted to the governor in council for approval. On 26th October of this year, 147 have to date received a grant of the mines and minerals. The breakdown by provinces is as follows:

Province	Applications for mineral rights
Alberta	147
Saskatchewan	43
Manitoba	45
Ontario	4
Quebec	1

Province	Submitted to governor in council
Alberta	144
Saskatchewan	40
Manitoba	43
Ontario	4
Quebec	1

Province	Grants received by settlers to date
Alberta	106
Saskatchewan	19
Manitoba	20
Ontario	2
Quebec	—

Question by hon. member for Cariboo—(Hansard, pages 1053 and 1054):

I should like to ask the minister if the rights of soldier settlers at Moberly in the Peace river country in British Columbia are being protected with respect to the oil rights on the land which has been taken over from the Indian reserve.

Answer: The mines and minerals underlying 17,924 acres of the Fort St. John Indian reserve No. 172, township 85, ranges 18 and 19, W.6, were acquired with the land and, accordingly, are available for sale or lease by the director at the request of the veterans established or who may be established on the land.

Questions were asked by the hon. members for Royal, Vancouver East, and Melfort—(Hansard, page 1055), about the British family settlement schemes.

Answer: Total disbursements since inception on account of both schemes have been from—

Canadian government funds $9,992,909.31
United Kingdom funds 3,825,044.81

Generally speaking, the Canadian government paid for the land, while the United Kingdom paid for the stock and equipment.

Regarding the item of $25,000 in the estimates, in the early days of the schemes accounts were kept for each government and collections or other revenue emanating from land was credited to Canada, and that from stock and equipment to the United Kingdom. This proved so cumbersome that an agreement was reached between the two countries by which each collection was credited in the proportion of the total disbursements that each country had made for the two schemes combined.

A similar agreement was reached by which losses were to be shared in the same proportion. Therefore, when a property reverts and the proceeds from the subsequent resale are not sufficient to reimburse each country for the total expenditures it had made on account of that property, an adjustment in favour of either country has usually to be made.

As most of the earlier revenue collections were applicable to land, the effect of this sharing of loss agreement usually requires an adjustment in favour of the United Kingdom government.

In answer to the question as to how long these payments will continue, I may say that the department is now endeavouring to arrive at a figure that will be acceptable to the United Kingdom in full and final payment of their equity in the two British family settlement schemes. If such a settlement can be made, all collections and receipts from sales would go to consolidated revenue.

Question by hon. member for Acadia—(Hansard, page 1057):

Where a veteran is not able to complete an agreement by making a second or third payment, owing to crop failure, is it the policy of the department to extend the agreement for another year, or does the agreement automatically die and the amount of the indebtedness go back to the original amount?

Answer: If a veteran is unable to complete his agreement within the time limit, authority will be sought to enter into a new agreement to meet the circumstances.

Supply—Veterans Affairs

Question by hon. member for Acadia—(Hansard, page 1056):

Whether or not an agreement had been reached with Alberta to pay a grant where land is leased in special areas on a ten-year basis? Has anything developed since that time?

Answer: Veterans Land Act officials in Alberta recently concluded discussions with the minister of municipal affairs and the minister of lands in regard to the settlement of veterans under section 35 of the act in the special areas of Alberta. The province has agreed to grant a twenty year cultivation and grazing lease in lieu of the ten year lease which is normally granted in the special areas.

A supplementary agreement dealing specifically with the settlement of veterans in the special areas is in the course of preparation.

Question by hon. member for Calgary East—(Hansard, page 1056):

Can the minister tell us how many of our Indian veterans have taken advantage of the act? Can he give us a breakdown of the number who have used the act in order to get into full-time farming operations on the reserves, and the number who have used it really as a small holdings scheme?

Answer: As at August 31, 1949, a total of 1,014 loans were approved in favour of Indian veterans. The following is a breakdown by provinces of those cases where disbursements have been made. The difference of 81 is accounted for by grants approved but not disbursed:

	Full-time Farming	Small Holdings	Commercial Fishing	Total
Nfld.	..	..	..	..
P.E.I.	..	1	2	3
N.S.	1	22	..	23
N.B.	..	86	3	89
Quebec	3	29	..	32
Ontario	110	208	29	347
Manitoba	43	3	3	49
Sask.	211	2	..	213
Alberta	41	1	1	43
B.C.	70	19	45	134
	479	371	83	933

Question by hon. member for Acadia—(Hansard, page 2610):

Will veterans be entitled to the V.L.A. grant when they settle on crown lands in the special areas of Alberta?

Answer: Yes. A supplementary agreement dealing specifically with the settlement of veterans in the special areas is now being studied by those ministers of the government of Alberta whose departments are concerned with this matter.

[Mr. Mutch.]

Question by hon. member for Hastings-Peterborough—(Hansard, page 2617):

Will the minister tell us how many departments there are in Ontario and just how an application goes through? Will he explain what causes the long delay?

Answer: The province of Ontario, for administrative purposes, is divided into two districts, eastern Ontario and western Ontario, with the district offices for each being in Toronto and London respectively. Under the Toronto district office, there are five regional offices and two subregional offices. In eastern Ontario, there are four regional offices. This does not cover the Port Arthur-Fort William area which is under the jurisdiction of Winnipeg district office and which area is administered by one regional office.

An application goes through in the following manner: the veteran makes application to a regional office for certification that he is qualified to receive the benefits of the Veterans Land Act. After checking on the veteran's eligibility as to sufficient war service and receiving replies from the references given by the veteran at the time of his application, the veteran appears before a regional advisory committee for qualification. Subsequent to being qualified for assistance under the Veterans Land Act, the veteran submits an application for assistance with respect to the particular property on which he desires establishment. Upon receipt of this application, an appraisal is made of the property by the department. If the appraisal indicates the property is suitable, action is taken towards its purchase. As soon as the director has obtained title to the property, it is then resold to the veteran by agreement for sale.

During consideration in committee, I undertook to indicate the average time taken for an application to go through after acceptance. Accurate statistics on this point are not maintained by the department but a check made during the month of September last of a mill run of 100 cases showed the following to be the situation:—from the date an application was approved until title was registered in the director, the average number of days which elapsed in western Ontario was 65, in eastern Ontario 100, in Quebec 99, and in the maritime provinces 37. In the prairie provinces and B.C., the average number of days was only 27·6. Members of the legal profession in the house will appreciate that this wide spread probably may be largely attributed to the different land registration systems which obtain in the provinces. There are, of course, other factors involved. Often there are defects in the vendor's title which cannot be remedied without some formal application to a registrar of titles or to a probate court or the employment of a surveyor to determine the boundaries of the land to be conveyed. There is sometimes loss of time in searching for heirs or others who may have some interest in the land and who must sign the documents of release.

Question by hon. member for Hastings-Peterborough, Hansard, page 2618:

If a veteran releases his interest in a property to the director by way of quit claim deed and a loss of $300 is incurred in the resale of the property, would that loss in any way affect the amount of rehabilitation grant? Would that $300 be deducted from his rehabilitation grant or would he get his full rehabilitation grant as if he had never made application under V.L.A.?

Answer: Ordinarily if there is a loss incurred in establishing a veteran under the V.L.A., it does reduce the veteran's re-establishment credit.

Where a loss exceeds $50, the matter is examined by a district rehabilitation review board who may, after consideration of the circumstances involved, recommend that all or part of the loss be written off.

After consideration of the case at the district level, it may be further reviewed by a head office departmental committee who report to the minister.

Item agreed to.

552. Hospital accommodation and facilities, and to authorize commitments against future years in the amount of $7,387,835—$5,309,662.

Mr. Green: This is the hospitalization item. Earlier in the session the suggestion was made that hospitalization might be provided for the men of the merchant navy without the amendment of any statute because of the wide terms of the act which set up the Department of Veterans Affairs. That act gives the department power to help those who were associated in the war. It is not restricted in the same way as the Pension Act. Can the parliamentary assistant tell us whether consideration has been given to providing hospitalization for these unfortunate men? I would point out to him that, to all intents and purposes, it was practically impossible for a man in the merchant navy to qualify for a pension on the ground of disease. Even to qualify on the ground of injury he had to trace the injury to enemy action.

It is practically impossible for a man to qualify because of diseases such as malaria, tuberculosis, and so on. I know personally of quite a few sad cases where young lads have developed tuberculosis, obviously because of their service at sea with the Canadian merchant marine. Yet they cannot get any pension and they cannot get hospitalization. They are in civilian hospitals now under provincial social assistance. I think they get either $3 or $5 a month. It is a most unfair situation, and I should like to know whether the department is giving consideration to extending hospitalization benefits to the men of the merchant navy.

Mr. Mutch: So far as the Department of Veterans Affairs is concerned, I am informed that it is possible for merchant seamen to be admitted to D.V.A. hospitals upon the request of the Department of Transport whose wards they are generally considered to be.

Mr. Green: Will the Department of Transport not make the request that these men be provided with hospitalization? I am glad to hear that D.V.A. is prepared to give them hospitalization if requested to do so by the Department of Transport. Yesterday we had an announcement from the Prime Minister to the effect that the provisions for giving vocational training to merchant navy veterans were to be extended. Can we not get some assurance from the government that the Department of Transport will now take steps to request the Department of Veterans Affairs to give hospitalization to these men?

Mr. Mutch: I am sure the hon. member would not expect me to commit the Department of Transport. I can only speak of that which I know, and on a proper request our hospitals will give hospitalization under these conditions.

Mr. Gillis: That assurance is nothing new. That has been the hitch right along. That is why over the years we have tried in the house and in the veterans affairs committee to have the same privileges extended to the merchant marine as were provided for the armed services. Unfortunately under the regulations of the Department of Transport they are in the position that the merchant navy is a civilian organization. The Department of Transport will not request hospitalization for merchant service personnel unless injury arose out of, or was directly connected with enemy action. In other words, if you were hit by a torpedo and had a very obvious hole in you, then you could get hospitalization or pension. Otherwise you cannot. Unless the government is prepared to change the regulations that now bind the departments of transport and veterans affairs, no benefits will accrue to the merchant service, from the statement the parliamentary assistant has just made.

Mr. Green: Is the willingness of the Department of Veterans Affairs to provide hospitalization for the men of the merchant navy a new development, or has the Department of Veterans Affairs taken that position throughout?

Mr. Mutch: At the moment they are on exactly the same basis as any other department. In our hospitals we treat persons who are sent to us on the responsibility of another department. Previously, of course, those who had a pensionable disability were admitted as of right. Under the regulations of our department there is the same general willingness to treat anyone who is sent to us by another responsible department.

Mr. Green: Then the hon. member for Cape Breton South is correct when he says this does not mean anything, because the Department of Veterans Affairs has taken the same position throughout. We apparently are not getting any further ahead so far as providing hospitalization for these men is concerned.

Mr. Mutch: So far as I know, the Department of Veterans Affairs has not taken any position at all beyond the fact that it does not lie in our mouth to direct what another department shall do. If they arrive at our hospitals these facilities are there. We can scarcely go beyond that. An example of co-operation between our department and the Department of Transport was the announcement made by the Prime Minister yesterday. These questions are not dead. In our department nothing is ever finished. As the minister said when it was referred to earlier this session, it is a matter of consideration. There is no conclusion to it.

Item agreed to.

929. War veterans allowance board—administration—further amount required, $11,000.

Mr. Green: This item has to do with war veterans allowance. As the committee knows, the present position is that the maximum war veterans allowance which can be paid to a single man is $40.41 a month, and the maximum for a married man is $70.83 a month. In addition to that there was a vote in the sum of $500,000 which provided for further assistance. It was called a special assistance fund. On November 8 I had the answers to some questions concerning this fund, as follows:

1. How many veterans were in receipt of war veterans allowance as of October 31, 1949?
Answer: 25,918.

2. How many of such recipients have made application for assistance from the special assistance fund?
Answer: 3,174.

3. How many have been granted such assistance?
Answer: 2,444.

In other words fewer than one in ten of the veterans receiving the war veterans allowance have been given any assistance whatever from this special assistance fund.

Mr. Mutch: Nothing like one in ten have asked for it.

Mr. Green: The reason more have not asked for it is the restrictions. That fund can be used only in the case of a recipient of war veterans allowance who is drawing the full amount. If he is getting a partial allowance then under the regulations he has no right to ask for help from this special fund. Another reason that more veterans have not asked for it is that to get any help they have to go through a second means test, which they bitterly resent. As the committee knows, they have to pass a means test to qualify in the first place; then before they can qualify for further assistance they have to pass another means test. I have here the instructions sent out by the department to their officers for completing applications for this special assistance, and I am going to read paragraph 13:

Consultation with social service division may be indicated in completing this paragraph. Entitlement of all members of the family group should be explored, particularly those of dependents. For example, the wife may be seventy years or over and thus entitled to old age pension, which generally carries with it the right to medical and hospital care, and it might be in the veteran's interest to go on single rate and his wife on old age pension. Again, there may be an unmet health need for which a resource is available in the community.

That paragraph illustrates the tragedy about this whole special assistance fund; namely, that the veteran probably will be better off if he can get on the old age pension, or if he can get his wife on it. Surely that is not the way Canada wants to treat her veterans. I am sure the Canadian people would disagree violently with a policy of that kind. These recipients of the war veterans allowance were front line men. If they had not seen action they could not qualify, except for a small percentage with disability pensions who did not get to the front line areas. Practically all these veterans were Canada's fighting men of the first great war; and eventually, mind you, the men of the second world war will qualify in the same way. That is the actual position. In some cases today these men are better off not to take the war veterans allowance and they go on the old age pension. I have here an editorial from the Vancouver Sun of November 12 of this year entitled "Burnt out and burnt up." This was written the day after Armistice day. The newspaper office is within a short distance of the Vancouver war memorial, and these older veterans had been attending the parade, as they usually do. The editorial points out:

> They are today in a worse position than old age pensioners. Both are supported from public funds. Why in the name of all that is reasonable should those who made special sacrifices for their country be subsequently penalized? Surely the least that could be done is set the WVA rate at a figure equal to the OAP, even if the former may qualify before age seventy.

It goes on to point out:

> Needy veterans now get $40 a month war veterans allowance; their wives $30—a total of $70.

Actually the total for man and wife is $70.83.

> The veteran, if sick, can get treatment in a DVA hospital with $15 deducted from the pension for each month, but wives and dependents are compelled, from their meagre income, to pay into B.C.'s provincial hospital insurance fund.
> A man and wife together on OAP get $100 monthly in British Columbia and are entitled to provincial hospitalization while exempt from premiums. But a veteran's wife and children, under this ridiculous system, are penalized and can be haled into court and fined for non-payment of hospital premiums out of their pittance.

Then it further says:

> Some wives of older veterans are voluntarily abandoning their $30 WVA allowance to claim an old age pension. Obviously, however, only a few of them are old enough to do so.

I realize that this special assistance fund was brought in as a temporary measure, but I suggest to the government that the time has now come when the situation can only be met by increasing the war veterans allowance by statute. Just a few weeks ago the Canadian Legion made representations to the government. They also made representations to members of the house on December 5, in which they asked that the war veterans allowance be increased from $40 to $50 monthly for a single veteran and from $70 to $85 monthly for a married veteran. I do hope action of that kind will be taken at the next session. I am sure every veteran member of the House of Commons, regardless of party, would support that suggestion.

Then I should like to say a word about the group of men called the imperial veterans. Year in and year out we have been urging that they be made eligible for the war veterans allowance, but as yet they have not been granted that entitlement. The Legion deals with their position also and points out that since Newfoundland has come into confederation the imperials in that province have been made eligible for Canadian war veterans allowance, and quite properly so. We ask that this right be extended at the next session to the imperials living in the other provinces of Canada. Personally I would hope that all the men who served in the forces of the King and who have been here for a period of years would be made eligible. I believe we should also include those who served in the forces of France and Belgium, who were our allies in the first war. The Legion points out that a survey was made this year by the Department of Veterans Affairs to ascertain the number of imperials who would benefit and that there are only 2,311 known cases who would become eligible. In their brief they suggest that it could very well be assumed that the total would not be in excess of 3,000. So I hope that at the next session these men will be made eligible.

There is also the question of the treatment of the merchant navy veterans. I need not repeat tonight what I have said about them before, but their situation is very unfair.

It all adds up to this. We do not believe we will get any of these improvements unless a special committee is set up next session. Even then we may not get all the improvements, but certainly past experience has shown that there is unlikely to be any veterans legislation amounting to much unless there is a special committee of the house on veterans affairs. We have not had one this session. We have in the house a very large number of returned men of both the recent war and the first war. I would ask the parliamentary assistant if he can give us an assurance tonight that next session a special committee on veterans affairs will be set up.

Mr. Mutch: As to the special committee, to deal with the last point first, on different occasions this session the minister indicated that the question was under advisement. I do not understand the last speaker when he says we will not get veterans legislation until we have a committee. The history of this government, and of this parliament prior to this government, has been the exact opposite with one exception, on every occasion legislation has been introduced into the house which has been sent to a committee for consideration. The only exception of which I am aware was in 1946. Because of the magnitude of the task, special powers were given to the committee, and it was invited to make suggestions.

If the hon. member means the setting up of a committee which would meet and advise this department or the government in matters concerning veterans affairs, I for one do not expect it. Certainly, I should not support it. On the other hand, if he means that, when changes are being made in veterans legislation, the government will continue the practice it has been following since 1936, namely, referring the bill to a select committee of the House of Commons, I should hope that practice would be continued.

Mr. Green: No, I asked for a special committee at the next session to consider the problems of the veterans; I did not make it subject to the government introducing legislation. I have asked for a special committee to consider veterans affairs.

Mr. Mutch: I can only speak for myself, of course, but such a committee would be contrary to parliamentary procedure and I would not expect it. I cannot speak for my minister.

Mr. Green: What does the parliamentary assistant mean by saying it would be "contrary to parliamentary procedure"?

Mr. Mutch: No such committees are ever set up.

Mr. Green: Certainly, they are. We had a committee on atomic energy during this session.

Mr. Mutch: I cannot go further than to say this. If I understood my hon. friend correctly, then the minister has given the only answer that can be given, that the matter would be considered before the next session. So far as this session was concerned, he was not prepared to do it. I was simply asking my friend to define what he meant by "committee" and he has done that.

Mr. Gillis: I believe I can speak for the other two members of our group in connection with this matter that was raised by the member for Vancouver-Quadra. In order to save time, I merely say that I agree with him. Our opinions have already been put on the record during this session. I do not want to get into an argument at this time, but I do not agree with the parliamentary assistant that these committees are contrary to parliamentary procedure.

Mr. Mutch: Subject to that definition; I was not making a statement, I was asking a question.

Mr. Gillis: We have had three committees of this house who have done a good job with regard to veterans legislation. The parliamentary assistant knows quite well that the bills that went to these committees from this house did not come back looking like the bills that went in. The amounts were jacked up and deadlines were shifted. I think it is in the interests of this house and the veterans that such a committee be set up.

I am rising at this time for the purpose of bringing another matter to the attention of the parliamentary assistant. It is so late in the session that we can do nothing about it now, but the government can think about it during the recess. It has to do with veterans grants. There is one bad spot in the administration—I do not mean the personnel. Many veterans in this country did not draw their credits. They are leaving them on deposit against the time when they might want to establish a home. When a veteran passes away, and I have two particular cases brought to my attention which I took up with the departments of National Defence and Veterans Affairs, that money cannot be used to pay funeral expenses. These boys met a tragic death. In one case, the father had to transport the body practically across the country and there was a lot of expense attached to it. When he checked with the department as to whether the credits standing in the boy's name could be used for the purpose of assisting with the burial expenses, the answer was no.

I suggest the department should consider cases such as those, in which there are extenuating circumstances. The credits should accrue to the estate. I quite understand such a regulation early in the war, but under the circumstances I have described, in which the boy had credits standing in his name when he died, those credits should be paid to the estate. I would ask the parliamentary assistant to think about that and take it up with his officials.

Mr. Mutch: I note what the hon. gentleman has said, and in passing I might say that I think those credits can be paid to a wife or dependent mother of the deceased. Perhaps if we could let this item stand, Mr. Chairman, until we complete the other items, I could come back to it and possibly make a statement in connection with it which might clarify matters for all members.

Item stands.

932. Hospital accommodation and facilities—further amount required, $250,356.

Mr. Green: This is not directly concerned with this item, but perhaps the parliamentary assistant would tell us whether anything can be done for the Canadian nurses who went to South Africa, under an agreement with the South African government, and apparently were not paid the amount of money they had been promised. I believe representations have been made to the government about these cases. The matter was brought to the minister's attention when the estimates were last under consideration. Can the parliamentary assistant tell us whether that situation has been investigated, and whether anything can be done?

Mr. Mutch: As my hon. friend well knows, these nurses were enlisted and sent to South Africa where they served in a civilian capacity. According to the South African government, they were not considered as members of the armed forces.

On their return a special act was passed by parliament which gave to them most of the rehabilitation grants and benefits, not all of them. I know something of their present difficulty, and it is a dispute with respect to whether or not they have received those moneys they expected they would get at the time they made their contract with the South African government. So far as we are concerned, we have no knowledge of that. We gave them the benefits parliament has conferred, and it is clearly outside the scope of our concern.

Mr. Green: Could representations not be made by the Canadian government to the South African government?

Mr. Mutch: I could not answer for the government. Such representations would have to be made through the Department of National Defence, through whose offices those girls were recruited.

Item agreed to.

929. War veterans' allowance board—administration—further amount required, $11,000.

Mr. Mutch: I should like to read a short statement relative to the subject matter of item 929, and the discussion that took place on that item. I am reading it on behalf of the minister, who is unavoidably absent. I should like to make a statement in regard to this matter, upon which the government has now reached a decision. It is the intention of the government at the next session to seek amendments to the War Veterans Allowance Act, with the following purpose in view, that former members of any of His Majesty's forces other than Canadian forces or of any of the forces of His Majesty's allies participating with Canada in wars ending on or before November 11, 1918, who have been domiciled in Canada for twenty years, may be made eligible for the benefits of the War Veterans Allowance Act, provided they otherwise qualify under those provisions and regulations.

Mr. Green: That would be extremely helpful. I hope that it will be made retroactive, certainly to the time of this announcement. I think that would be only fair to these men, because the amendments to the act may not go through for a good many months yet. Surely, with this announcement, the parliamentary assistant can give us the assurance that a special committee will be set up at the next session of the house.

Mr. Mutch: The parliamentary assistant, just having given hon. members more than he had formerly anticipated he would be able to do, is not going to commit himself to anything. Having no responsibility, he is not prepared to do that.

Mr. Knowles: Will the parliamentary assistant answer one question about this if he can? Will this legislation include widows of imperial veterans and the other veterans referred to in the statement he made?

Mr. Mutch: The answer to that question is yes.

Mr. Knowles: Thank you.

LEGISLATION

164. General administration—estimates of the Clerk, $800,730.

Mr. Knowles: I suppose it would be appropriate on this first occasion, when his estimates are before us, to congratulate His Honour the Speaker on this phase of his work. It is, I would imagine, a rather onerous responsibility to have charge of the administration of this part of this building and of the large staff, but we know he will do a good job. My questions are in effect questions that I have asked before. I shall merely put them to His Honour hoping that he can either answer them favourably now or indicate to me that consideration will be given to these points in the near future.

First of all, as most hon. members are aware, the stenographers who work for us have felt for some time that an increase in pay was coming to them. They have made representations, and representations have been made on their behalf during this very session. I am sure we should all like to know whether favourable consideration is being given to these representations. I believe it is quite some time now since their last increase, and I am sure that the facts of the case warrant their request.

My second question would have to do with a long-range question that I have asked a number of times; it is whether consideration will be given to providing some sort of pension arrangements for stenographers and other employees of the House of Commons who are not included in pension plans. It seems to me that in this day and age it is unfair that some people should work the number of years that they do and not have the chance to participate in any pension plan at all. I realize one of the problems involved in all this is that we want, and I think rightly so, to keep the employees of the House of Commons as our employees rather than government employees. That means that there are certain points that must be watched.

My third question—and I think I have only one more after that—has to do with the interim period between the time this session prorogues and the time the next session begins. Usually there is a fair length of time between sessions and there seems to be nothing to do but let the sessional employees find such other work as they can, even though some of us may not think that is altogether fair; as a matter of fact, I think they should be put on an annual basis. In this instance the period between the end of this session and the beginning of the next is just long enough to get rather cold and hungry through not having any income, but it is not long enough to get other employment. I am wondering whether there is any possibility of some of the house employees getting temporary employment at least when the dominion-provincial conference is in session here in Ottawa; in fact I understand it is to meet here in this very building.

Then my last question relates to the experience that House of Commons sessional employees have had in the past a number of times of finding their employment cut off rather abruptly. I remember one year when the house prorogued about one o'clock at night, and some of the stenographers and others who had gone home at six o'clock that afternoon did not know that the session was over. When they arrived at the building the next morning they found that their names were not on the list and that they were through for that session. When members stay here a few days after the session ends in order to clean up their work, it is usually arranged that their stenographers, if necessary, are kept on.

I wondered if we could have a bit of a change in that policy and if some universal and more acceptable plan could be adopted so that these employees are not cut off too abruptly. I make that plea particularly at this time because it is not a very good Christmas present to have your pay suddenly cut off about two weeks before Christmas. Those are four questions which I should be glad to have answered by His Honour.

Mr. Speaker: With regard to the remarks made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre as to the administrative duties that fall to the lot of the Speaker, I should like to say that the administration of the building is directly under the Clerk of the House and the Sergeant-at-Arms. I might say that it has been a pleasure for me to work with these two officials this year; and I think all hon. members will agree that they have given good service to the house.

The Clerk of the House has informed me that a petition has been handed to him, signed by a great many members, requesting that the question of an increase in pay should receive the careful consideration of the officials of the house. I might say that the Clerk has already had a conference with me, and we felt that the amount involved, if an increase were given, would be such that it probably should not be decided upon by myself and the officials. I might say that if an increase were granted to the stenographers, it would probably also apply to the amanuenses in the house and to other employees holding positions similar to the stenographers. All I can say at this time is that I can assure hon. members that the matter is receiving our careful attention.

A number of members have pointed out to me that some stenographers have been here much longer than others and that the matter of seniority should be considered. Other members of the house have pointed out and have written to me referring to the fact that some stenographers are much more efficient than others, and have suggested that there might be a test as to efficiency, in order that such efficiency might be assessed.

I mention these points so that hon. members will know that the matter is receiving our careful consideration. Another question has to do with pensions. This matter is also receiving the attention of officials of the house. There are some complications. I understand it would have to be considered by the Department of Finance, and in any event is a matter which would have to be taken up with the commission on internal economy.

There is a difficulty which has been pointed out that the stenographers and other part-time employees are only part-time employees, and are not working the year round. If a pension plan were put into effect, under the provisions of the Civil Service Act a lot of employees who have been here a number of years would have to pay in a considerable sum of money in order to get any great advantage from the plan. However, if it were put into effect, employees who are coming on at this time would eventually benefit from it. I mention this to assure hon. members again that the matter is receiving our consideration.

The question of employment during the intervening period between sessions has also received consideration, particularly by the Clerk of the House. It is possible a number of stenographers may be required at the time of the dominion-provincial conference. The Clerk has already made inquiries regarding this, and if stenographers are required at that time he will do all in his power to see that those stenographers who are around Ottawa and have been employed in the house will be given an opportunity to obtain employment during that conference.

The fourth question raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre was with respect to the termination of employment of stenographers and, I might say, other sessional employees of the house when the house prorogues today. As he has pointed out on behalf of the sessional employees, their services have been abruptly terminated. The Clerk, myself and the Sergeant-at-Arms have considered this matter, and we have decided that in view of the fact that it is the Christmas season and that the interval between sessions will probably be brief, all sessional employees will be given seven days' pay as a bonus. Those in the restaurant being monthly employees will be paid to the end of the month. I think I have answered all the questions asked by the hon. member.

Mr. Richard (Ottawa East): Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to prolong this discussion. I think all hon. members agree that the stenographic staff are entitled to a raise at this time, and I am satisfied that Your Honour will look into this matter immediately and that at the next session there will be an improvement in that regard.

I had hoped that a greater number of the staff could be kept between sessions. My experience has been that we are rather understaffed in the interval between sessions, both in the stenographic pool and in the regular staff of clerks, constables and others.

Here again, of course, our judgment may not be as good as that of Your Honour, the Sergeant-at-Arms and the Clerk of the House who, after all, are doing a wonderful job. I only suggest that this matter be looked into so that a greater number of the sessional employees may be retained between sessions.

I have only one further remark to make. I would bring to the attention of the house the fact that these gentlemen who are on the staff, in this chamber, in the past few weeks, have been working longer hours than usual. They are entitled to our thanks and, if possible, they should be entitled to some remuneration. I am thinking of the page boys, those who head the page boys, and the other staff in this chamber. We have to be here and we are paid to be here. But they were never intended to be here for as long as they have been for the remuneration they are receiving at the present time.

Let me conclude my remarks by saying that I am sure all hon. members extend to them best wishes for a merry Christmas and a happy New Year.

DEPARTMENT OF MINES AND RESOURCES

Indian affairs branch—

231. Grants to residential schools, $2,470,017.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, at some point I should like to ask the parliamentary assistant if he would answer the question left over from last night as to who pays the 25 per cent erstwhile provincial share of old age pensions in the Yukon and Northwest Territories?

Mr. Maybank: If convenient, I should like to make a statement on that at the close of the estimates, if that would be satisfactory?

Mr. Knowles: Yes.

Mr. Low: Mr. Chairman, my colleague, the hon. member for Lethbridge wanted me, when this branch was before the committee, to say a word for him. In what I shall say I shall be brief. He had to leave for Edmonton last night to attend to other business, or he would have been here to speak for himself. He wanted me to say to the committee that he was prepared, had he been able to stay, to press for three things on behalf of the Indians.

He feels strongly that the old age pension as an unchallengeable right should be granted to all Indians in Canada. Secondly, he wished me to say that the grant should establish a claims commission before whom the various tribes of Indians might bring in any claims they might have arising out of the nonfulfilment of treaty undertakings by the government. He states there are a good many such claims based upon such things as perpetual fishing and hunting rights, which have now passed out of any possibility of fulfilment within the areas allotted to these Indians. He states the government should be meticulous in its fulfilment of contractual obligations to the Indians, or that in the alternative full compensation should be made to them for any losses they might sustain.

A further request of the hon. member is that a joint committee of the House of Commons and the Senate be set up to consider Indian affairs, such committee to sit continuously until Indian problems have been dealt with satisfactorily.

I believe that in what I have said I have discharged my duty on behalf of the hon. member.

Mr. Maybank: I can only say that I thank the hon. member for his suggestions. They are matters which will be considered in the interval between this session and the next.

Immigration branch—

234. Administration of the Immigration Act, $646,775.

Mr. Green: There are two questions I should like to ask the parliamentary assistant. One, which I began to ask last night, has to do with repatriates who were brought back on the Gripsholm. I do not know how many trips that ship made with Canadian repatriates from the Far East, but quite a number were brought back during the war. I understand the policy of the department has been to charge these people for their passage and I should like to speak in connection with one case.

I received a letter a week ago from a Canadian woman who was a nurse in Hong Kong during the attack on that city. Her husband, also a Canadian, served with the Hong Kong volunteers. Both were taken prisoner when the Japanese captured the city. The wife was transferred to Stanley camp and was brought back on the Gripsholm in November, 1943. The husband was sent to Osaka, Japan, and was not released until the end of the war. They lost everything they had and both came back in poor health due to malnutrition and beriberi.

The husband has recently been in Shaughnessy military hospital in Vancouver and has just resumed his occupation with the merchant marine. A claim has been made against these people for $883 for the wife's passage on the Gripsholm. These people have explained to the immigration branch that they have put in a claim to the Hong Kong government and they offered to pay the Canadian government whatever they received. The Hong Kong authorities say that they cannot pay anything and the imperial government has taken the same position. The wife points out in her letter:

> We cannot understand why this loss, our active service and our long harrowing experiences in the prison camps should not be considered sufficient service rendered to Canada and the empire, and why we are not allowed to settle down and rebuild our lives without this threat of prosecution from our own country. My husband and I are both native born Canadians and he is considered to be a Canadian veteran by the Department of National Defence and as such has been adjudged entitled to veterans benefits and treatments.

They received a letter dated December 1, 1949, from the Department of Justice, Ottawa, reading as follows:

> Dear Sir:
>
> I do not appear to have received a reply from you to my letter of October 26 concerning the claim of the Department of Mines and Resources. This is, therefore, to advise you that unless your remittance in full of this claim is received within two weeks of the date of this letter, I will have no alternative but to recommend that legal action be instituted.
>
> Yours truly,
>
> W.D.J.,
>
> Assistant Deputy Minister

[Mr. Maybank.]

Surely that policy is not right. Thes people who were in the hands of th Japanese suffered during the war as did n other Canadians. It was only the bad case that were allowed to come back on th Gripsholm. They lost practically everythin and yet the department is trying to colle for the cost of their passage. I sugge that those costs should be absorbed by th country and I think the Canadian peopl would wish to have it done that way. Th particular case is a very deserving one an I hope the claim will be dropped. Can th parliamentary assistant tell us just what the policy with regard to these claims?

Mr. Maybank: I cannot answer if the hon member means whether or not the clai will be dropped. That is something tha has to do with policy. The Canadian goverr ment provided subsistence for Canadians i enemy territory and also the cost of the repatriation to Canada when this could b effected. In accordance with the usua practice, these Canadians signed under takings to repay cost of subsistence an repatriation.

In the Far East the United States wa the protecting power until that countr entered the war. After December, 194 Switzerland became the protecting power.

Between August, 1942, and December, 194 the S.S. Gripsholm brought from the Far Ea two parties of Canadian repatriates, totallin 288 souls. The total cost of maintenance an repatriation of these Canadians was $227,51

I shall ask the minister to give specia attention to the particular case mentione by the hon. gentleman and I think that about as far as any person could go, sittin as we are in committee in the dying hou of the session.

Mr. Green: I shall be glad to give th parliamentary assistant the letter I hav referred to. I do hope that these people wi not be hounded any further.

Another question I have to ask has to d with the admission of Japanese to Canad Here are certain questions I asked and th answers I received in a return table yesterday:

1. Have any persons of the Japanese race comin within one of the following categories, (a) thos who were in Japan throughout the war; (b) thos who were sent to Japan on exchange during th war; (c) those who went to Japan after the wa under the repatriation scheme of the Canadia government, been given permission to return t Canada?

Answer: (a) yes; (b) no; (c) yes.

2. How many in each category have been give such permission?

Answer: (a) 165; (b) see 1 (b) above; (c) 36

The custom before the war was for Japanese to send their children to Japan. According to a report made by the R.C.M.P. shortly after Japan struck there were about 1,500 children in Japan whose parents were still living in Canada. Many of the male children served in the Japanese forces although they had been born in Canada. Now we are told that 165 of these people have been given permission to return to Canada. I do not know how many are men or how many are women or how many actually served in the Japanese forces. A determined drive is being made at the present time by the Japanese Canadian Association to bring back to Canada all Japanese now in Japan who were born in this country. I have an editorial from the New Canadian, which is the publication of that association, in which they say:

> There is an estimated 3,000 Canadian born Nisei at present in Japan. Just exactly how many of them are actually seeking to return is not known but the number is quite substantial.

Therefore the 165 may be only the forerunner of a very much larger movement. I suggest to the government that it will have to decide on a policy on this question. I think it is going very far to allow the re-entry into Canada of men who have served in the forces against us. Yet that would appear to be the present position. So far as the thirty-six who were repatriated, who went back after the war with the Canadian government paying the expenses, I do not know whether or not they are the children of parents who signed for repatriation. The government is faced with a plan to get as many as possible back. I suggest that there will have to be some policy adopted.

Mr. Maybank: With reference to the thirty-six, it may be said that they are people whose parents were sent back under circumstances which the committee, and particularly the hon. member, will recall. For example, would include a boy of eighteen. He did not wish to go back at the time but he had to go back. He was not yet a person in the eyes of the law, being still in his minority.

Mr. Green: I believe the age limit for those requesting repatriation was sixteen.

Mr. Maybank: Whatever the age was. At the first opportunity he sought to come back, being a Canadian-born person. That is the type of individual making up the thirty-six. As to the other question, I can assure the hon. member it will be carefully considered, and particularly the remarks he has made tonight.

Mr. Green: As yet no definite policy has been adopted by the government?

Mr. Maybank: It is a definite enough policy that those who are Canadian-born, and against whom there is no charge of disloyalty, would have the right to come back.

Mr. Green: Even though they served in the Japanese forces?

Mr. Maybank: They have all been carefully screened in that respect, and I would say it is certainly not within the knowledge of the department that any of them are in that class. The hon. member has indicated that some served in the war. It may be so, but that would be something tending to bar their admission. We have no definite knowledge of any such thing.

Mr. Green: The editorial attempts to justify the bringing back of those men who served in the forces on the ground that they were conscripted, and therefore had to serve. I hope the government will not adopt the policy of allowing the re-entry into Canada of men who fought against us in the war.

Item agreed to.

Mr. Knowles: Have we finished with the Department of Mines and Resources?

The Chairman: 826 was the last item.

Mr. Knowles: Will the parliamentary assistant give the answer that he promised to give?

Mr. Maybank: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre inquired on Friday evening, the 9th of December, 1949, about the financial arrangements for the payment of old age pensions in the Yukon territory. Old age pensions in the Yukon territory are administered under the provisions of the old age pensions ordinance of the Yukon territory, enacted by the Yukon territorial council, and assented to on the 8th of April, 1949. There is an agreement dated the 31st day of July, 1949, between the government of Canada, represented by the Minister of National Health and Welfare, and the government of the Yukon territory, represented by the commissioner of the Yukon territory, which provides for the payment of pensions by the territory under and subject to the provisions of the Old Age Pensions Act, being chapter 156 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1927, as amended. The provisions of the agreement dated the 31st July, 1949, became effective on the first of July, 1949. This replaces an earlier agreement dated the 9th of April, 1949, which became effective the first of April, 1949.

Under the terms of the agreement the territory, in the manner prescribed by the dominion act and regulations thereunder, will deal with an application for pension made by any person who is resident in the Yukon territory and, if satisfied that such person is properly and lawfully entitled to receive pension under the conditions specified in the dominion act and regulations, pay a maximum pension of $480 yearly, such maximum pension to be reduced under certain conditions specified in the agreement. This agreement between the government of Canada and the government of the Yukon territory was approved by order in council P.C. 3922, dated the 10th August, 1949. The old age pensions ordinance of the Yukon territory is administered by a board known as the old age pensions board. The board consists of three members, who are the territorial treasurer and two members appointed by the commissioner in council. Under the agreement the dominion government provides 75 per cent of the pension and the territorial government the balance.

Mr. Knowles: Does the parliamentary assistant know the source of the funds from which the territorial government pays that balance?

Mr. Maybank: They raise their own money from various sources, trapping licences, and that sort of thing.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

121. Departmental administration, $256,281.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, in the atmosphere of Christmas that is beginning to descend on the house I regret that it is necessary to return once again to a subject that is unfortunately out of harmony with the season we are approaching, and undoubtedly out of harmony with the general sentiments expressed here by most members on this occasion in regard to what they hope may be the atmosphere of the season ahead. Nevertheless, I do not think it is possible to allow the remarks the Prime Minister made yesterday to pass without comment. I would have dealt with them immediately if these items had not been interrupted just after the Prime Minister had spoken.

Dealing with the explanations which had been made by the Minister of Justice, the Prime Minister made certain statements that seem to leave an extraordinary impression as to the attitude of the government toward its responsibilities under the Combines Investigation Act, and, in fact, under other acts passed by this parliament. Referring to what had taken place and the remarks which had been made earlier, the Prime Minister said, as reported at page 2988 of Hansard:

> The failure to make a report public is not a continuing offence as the leader of the opposition suggests. You cannot continue the offence.

[Mr. Maybank.]

Then after further remarks he said this:

> . . . it was not done, as the leader of the opposition suggested, by deliberate omission or by a plan for holding back the report. The question of publication did not arise at all before the fifteen days had expired.

Just before he made those remarks the Prime Minister had said:

> . . . what has been done was done inadvertently by pressure of time.

First of all may I point out that what was done was not done inadvertently by pressure of time. In the detailed explanation given by the Minister of Justice as to what had occurred he explained that the commissioner under the combines act had referred the report to him, with a memorandum indicating the date by which it should be made public. The act is clear. No discretion of the minister was involved. It was the duty of the minister not only to see that the report was made public, but certainly to do nothing that would prevent its being made public.

It is certain, of course, that what has been done cannot be undone and cannot be changed. It never can. Our task as members of this house is to consider what should be done as a result of what has happened and what cannot be changed. It was not inadvertence. The question of publication was not one for discretion. The minister was informed, and this was not made public until more than ten months after it had been completed. It was not made public because the minister had decided it was not going to be made public, for reasons that had nothing to do with pressure of time or inadvertence.

The suggestion of the Prime Minister is that once a law has been broken it cannot be broken any more; and if by inadvertence the time has passed within which something should be done, then that is all that can happen. If this principle were applied to the income tax requirements, then if for any reason someone failed to file an income tax return he might just as well go ahead and not only continue to fail to file it but not make the payments required under the act.

What is involved here is not just the question of failure to make public. A number of other results would have flowed from making the report public as soon as that could be done, whether or not it was within the fifteen days. If the report had been made public at any time within three months of the date required by statute, the previous parliament still would have been sitting and the house could have dealt appropriately with the information that was made available. Second, if the report had been made public within five months of the date required by statute the public would have had an opportuni-of knowing the facts in this particular case before passing judgment at the polls. Third, if the report had been made public within ten months, then others might have launched prosecutions if they thought that was the proper course, based upon the evidence contained in the report.

This is no mere case of a technical breach of the statutory requirements, as was suggested by the Minister of Justice in his extraordinary statement yesterday. This was not a mere breach of the requirement to table a report, such as there was in the case of the report of the maritime commission. There was a breach of the statutory requirement in that case; but, important though it was that the members of this house should have known what the maritime commission said, within fifteen days of the opening of the session, which was required by statute, there can be no suggestion that in that instance the circumstances were similar. This was not just a case of a technicality, or of inadvertence.

The action of the government in this case did these things: First, it denied to the public information the public was entitled to have last January. Second, it denied to parliament information that the members of parliament should have had while sitting here as representatives of the people. Third, it denied to the voters information they had a right to have before being called upon, under the processes of democracy, to pass judgment upon what had taken place. Fourth, it denied the possibility of prosecution of the milling companies by any provincial attorney general or by any individual.

Those were the consequences which flowed from this act. It was not just a case of some delay in the information being made available. These were the direct results not of inadvertence but of the deliberate act of the government itself. It is important to go back to the time when the act in its present form was introduced. Because he was the man responsible for bringing in the act at that time, I should like to quote briefly from the words of the prime minister of Canada of that day, Mr. Mackenzie King, as they appear at page 2605 of Hansard for May 8, 1923:

> What is the power of the Criminal Code to prosecute some particular person or group of persons in comparison with the power of spreading broadcast throughout the land accurate and true information with regard to a situation which is inimical to the public interest, and which the people themselves are certain to be concerned in remedying? Take it as respects legislation. How is parliament to know what is the best course to take in the matter of legislation unless it gets true and accurate information?

Parliament was not permitted to know, at a time when parliament could have acted in relation to the subject matter of this report. By the deliberate and calculated act of the government, the time lapsed within which any prosecution could be launched by anyone.

At a later date, dealing with the question of publication of reports, Mr. Ilsley has this to say, as reported at page 3473 of Hansard of 1935.

> An intolerable condition exists when we permit the making of expensive and important inquiries into alleged combines and have the reports kept secret.

I think that sums up the situation. An intolerable situation exists when any report of an inquiry of this kind is held back and not made available to the members of parliament, who have a duty and a right to act with knowledge of what that report contains. I do not think a more flagrant violation of this or any other act passed by parliament could possibly be conceived. It still seems that the Minister of Justice, the members of the government, and many of the members of this house fail to recognize that this is no technicality. This is no mere procedural problem, nor is it just a case of inadvertence. They fail to recognize that a fundamental issue is involved here; that what has happened cannot be changed.

If that fundamental principle is to be respected, then something must be done. If we were asked what is the real guarantee of our liberty, I think that the most of us who have studied our constitutional history would answer: the equality of every Canadian under the law. If we were asked how that equality under the law can be assured, we would surely answer that the rule of law must be respected by every Canadian, from the Prime Minister down to the humblest citizen; that is the simple but unescapable issue before us. A law of this parliament has been broken, and deliberately broken, by the Minister of Justice. While it is true that the government has concurred in and must share the responsibility, as Minister of Justice he is charged with the enforcement of law. He stands in a special position in relation to the enforcement of this or any other law.

The Minister of Justice has broken this law, and that fact cannot be changed. For that reason, respect for the laws of this parliament and the enforcement of those laws can be restored only when the present Minister of Justice ceases to occupy that position.

Mr. Noseworthy: I wish to agree in principle with all that has been said by the leader of the official opposition. I have been interested in this subject, because for a great many years it was my duty and my privilege to hold up before young Canadians in this country the high standard of the British parliamentary system, British law and justice. It is because this incident which we are discussing now seems to me to undermine the whole structure of the British parliamentary system that I feel concerned about it.

I regret very much that the Minister of Justice has, by a series of circumstances over which he may or may not have had any control, become involved in this situation. It is not my wish that any hon. member of the Liberal party, or any other party, should find himself in such a position.

The leader of the official opposition has just pointed out that it is not simply a failure to comply with the regulations. What I cannot forgive the Minister of Justice for—or for that matter the Minister of Trade and Commerce, or the Prime Minister, because both have accepted responsibility for the course of action followed—is not their failure, because of the pressure of time, to make this report public, but the fact that those gentlemen sat through a whole session of parliament, which lasted for three months, knowing that they were withholding information. They failed to take parliament into their confidence. Following that, they went before the country in a general election, and withheld from the public, until they were safely back in office, the information which the public should have had. A series of by-elections were held, also, before the information was revealed. That is not fair, either to parliament or to the people of Canada.

In my humble opinion there is only one course that the Minister of Justice can take if he has any regard for the maintenance of our laws, if he has any respect for the responsibility of a cabinet or cabinet ministers to parliament, and that is for him to tender his resignation to the governor general. So far as that goes, I can see very little difference between the conduct of the Minister of Justice and that of the Minister of Trade and Commerce or the Prime Minister. Both have openly—

Mr. Cruickshank: Oh, oh.

Mr. Noseworthy: I may say to the Liberal backbenchers that this is no laughing matter. Even the Prime Minister and the Minister of Justice laugh, as though this were an everyday occurrence. I am giving my opinion as one who has some regard for the rights of parliament and respect for the laws of our country. I say this, Mr. Chairman, that if any other member of this House of Commons had followed the same course and deliberately flouted legislation passed by this parliament, the Minister of Justice could follow no other course. if he were to fulfil his duties, than to have that member unseated. I submit that is the only course that the Minister of Justice can follow.

Mr. Cruickshank: Mr. Chairman, a reference has been made to the backbenchers on this side of the house. I do not consider myself a backbencher, but I want to assure my junior friend, who has lately become a member of this house, that I have every confidence in the Prime Minister of Canada, the Minister of Justice, and the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I believe they are great Canadians, doing their best on behalf of all Canadian citizens.

Mr. Knowles: I just want to say a few words. As a matter of fact, I shall do it in words better than I myself might use, by giving just a few quotations from volume I of Macaulay's "History of England". I quote this from page 25:

> The principle that the King of England was bound to conduct the administration according to law, and that, if he did anything against law, his advisers and agents were answerable, was established at a very early period, as the severe judgments pronounced and executed on many royal favourites sufficiently prove.

Then on page 26:

> We have been taught by long experience that we cannot without danger suffer any breach of the constitution to pass unnoticed. It is therefore now universally held that a government which unnecessarily exceeds its powers ought to be visited with severe parliamentary censure, and that a government which, under the pressure of a great exigency, and with pure intentions, has exceeded its powers, ought without delay to apply to parliament for an act of indemnity.

We feel that this government exceeded its powers when it made the decision not to carry out the provisions of subsection 5 of section 27 of the Combines Investigation Act, and we feel that we have done precisely what is set out in that passage. We have endeavoured to visit on this government, in the only way that is open to us—and that is by speaking sternly and strongly on the floor of the house—severe parliamentary censure. We tried to do it in other ways but were prevented from doing so, hence we are doing it in this way.

I go on and draw a parallel to the last of the sentences I just read. Macaulay says that if a government, under the pressure of a great exigency and with pure intentions, has exceeded its powers, it ought without delay to apply to parliament for an act of indemnity. In this case there has been no evidence to prove that there was a great exigency; there has been no evidence that satisfies us that there were pure intentions; and I submit that Macaulay was right, that if there had been established a great exigency and pure intentions it was the British parliamentary practice, and it was the anadian thing, for the ministers concerned o apply to parliament, in spirit at least, for n act of indemnity. I submit that not only as the law of parliament broken, and broken eliberately, but that parliament has been ffronted and flouted by the attitude which regret the ministers concerned have taken n connection with this matter. Macaulay oes on, at page 27, to say:

Our forefathers might indeed safely tolerate a ing in a few excesses; for they had in reserve a neck which soon brought the fiercest and proudest ing to reason, the check of physical force.

Then Macaulay goes on to point out how it s the genius of our parliamentary set-up that ve have got away from the use of force to ne rule of law; but he says, in developing ne necessity for maintaining the rule of law, nd I quote now from page 28:

As we cannot, without the risk of evils from hich the imagination recoils, employ physical orce as a check on misgovernment, it is evidently ur wisdom to keep all the constitutional checks n misgovernment in the highest state of efficiency, watch with jealousy the first beginnings of ncroachment, and never to suffer irregularities, ven when harmless in themselves, to pass unchal-nged, lest they acquire the force of precedents.

I share the view expressed by the leader f the opposition that it is unpleasant, in the ying moments of a session, a couple of weeks efore Christmas, to raise this issue. As a natter of fact, it was reopened yesterday norning by the Minister of Justice. Even at nat, and though I had this book on my desk, was for a few moments thinking that I would not speak on it again tonight until he protests that were made on this side f the house were greeted with laughter from he other side. This is every bit as serious s the stern words I have quoted from ord Macaulay's "History of England". I ertainly hope that this sort of thing will ot happen again, and I trust that the Cana-ian people will not soon forget the way n which the law was broken, and the way n which those who have broken the law ave not only refused to apply to parliament or an act of indemnity, have not only efused to throw themselves on the mercy of he house, but still insist that they had the ight to do the unlawful thing they did.

Item agreed to.

132. To provide for the revision, classification and onsolidation of the public general statutes of anada, $75,000.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): May we have word as to just what the expectation is as o when the revision will be completed, or vhat progress is being made?

Mr. Garson: About a year and a half to wo years.

Item agreed to.

138. Operation and maintenance of penitentiaries, including administration, construction, purchase of land, supplies, equipment and livestock; maintenance, discharge and transfer of convicts; compensation to discharged convicts permanently disabled while in penitentiaries, $6,107,490.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I notice there is a decrease in this item. While I would be the last one in the world to object to a decrease, I should like to have from the minister a word on the operation of the penitentiaries and whether he feels that everything is being done that can be done to implement what I think is the more humane and enlightened administration that is being given by the new commissioner.

Mr. Garson: I might say to my hon. friend that the explanation for the reduction in the amount of the estimate is that we follow the practice of including in our current estimates items for what my hon. friend might regard as capital construction, and also for machinery. The reduction in those items accounts for the net reduction in the amount of the estimate. There is no actual reduction in the amount of money currently expended on the prisoners' welfare.

Mr. Gillis: Under the present penitentiary regulations, prisoners suffering from a communicable disease or one that requires active treatment are paroled out to an institution. On the other hand, there have come to my attention recently cases in which prisoners who were sentenced were suffering from a communicable disease, and in which the penitentiary authorities refused to admit them. Recently there were brought to my attention two cases, from Halifax, of veterans who got into difficulties, who were sentenced to two years' imprisonment and who required active treatment for t.b., but the penitentiary would not take them in. There was quite a bit of difficulty in having the matter resolved. I think the minister's department should consider amendment of the regulations to provide for the establishment of some central institution in Canada to which prisoners of that type may be sent. While this crime may not have been very serious, it was bad enough. What happens when a man is sentenced for murder, manslaughter or some other serious crime of that nature? In Canada if he is sentenced to a penitentiary, there is no place which will accept him. I know there must be a lot of cases across the country because in the last eight months I have run across three of them. Has this been brought to the minister's attention, and is the department considering any remedial action?

Mr. Garson: This matter has arisen in a minor way from time to time, but there has been no concerted effort upon the part of the provinces, who are the interested parties —because the expense of this treatment falls upon them—to request that we should do this. In point of fact, in view of the total convict population of our penitentiaries, the treatment of tuberculosis by us would be a much more expensive way of providing such treatment for those who are suffering from it than to let them take their treatment in provincial institutions.

As my hon. friend, I am sure, realizes, there has to be a certain volume of cases before they can be handled at a reasonable unit cost. Even taking the whole of our cases in the penitentiaries, it is not sufficient to enable us to make a provision whereby we could keep our unit cost at a reasonable level. For that reason we have not, up to the present time at any rate, considered that it was necessary that we should provide facilities such as my hon. friend has mentioned.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): What is being done for the John Howard societies? Are they being assisted in what the minister considers an adequate fashion?

Mr. Garson: I think perhaps the best way to answer the question is to give the exact amounts paid to the John Howard societies. They are as follows:

John Howard Society of British Columbia ..	$2,000
John Howard Society of Alberta	1,000
John Howard Society of Saskatchewan	500
Canadian Welfare Association, Winnipeg ...	2,000
John Howard Society of Ontario	5,000
La Societe d'Orientation et de Rehabilitation Sociale	3,000
La Societe de Readaptation Sociale, Quebec	500
John Howard Society of Quebec	1,500
Canadian Penal Association	2,000
John Howard Society of Vancouver Island	500
Salvation Army	2,000

BRITISH NORTH AMERICA ACT

AMENDMENTS TO THE CONSTITUTION—CONSULTATION WITH PROVINCIAL GOVERNMENTS —TABLING OF FURTHER CORRESPONDENCE

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): May I ask unanimous consent of the house to table the answer received from the premier of Ontario to the letter I tabled a couple of days ago in connection with the dominion-provincial conference? At the same time I inquired whether there was any other correspondence with the premiers that had not yet been tabled, and I find that there was the letter to which my letter to Premier Douglas was the answer, and two letters from Premier Duplessis which I should also like to table. The letters thus tabled so far will constitute all the correspondence that has been had with the premiers in that regard up to the present time.

Perhaps to follow what has been done on previous occasions hon. members would wish to have these letters printed as an appendix to Hansard of today.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house that the letters shall appear as an appendix to Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

(For text of further correspondence, see appendix, page 3169.)

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Knowles: May I ask the Prime Minister whether it is intended to do anything about the Senate amendments to the bill introduced by the hon. member for Mount Royal (Mr. Macnaughton) to amend the Canadian Red Cross Society Act? When we passed the motion to sit tonight I think it was agreed that there would be unanimous consent to deal with this bill this evening.

Mr. St. Laurent: I am told that the Senate amendments have not been printed, and hon. members have not had an opportunity of seeing them.

Mr. Knowles: Hon. members could find out quite easily what the amendments are, because all the Senate did was to strike out the first two sections. There is nothing left but the third section. I must be careful in what I say, but I want to protest against what was done over there.

Mr. Drew: Perhaps under the circumstances it might be well to let the bill stand for further consideration.

Mr. St. Laurent: I am informed that the reason for the amendments made by the Senate was that there was no one available to answer questions they put with respect to the extent of the immovable property now producing revenue for the society. I am told that the intention was to delete that clause, because they could not get the information required and there was no urgency about the other provisions of the bill.

Mr. Coldwell: That very effectively kills the bill for this session, and it will have to be re-introduced at the next session. It is most unfortunate.

Mr. Knowles: The other action taken by the Senate was to cut out the section that provided for such changes as were necessary to bring Newfoundland into the Canadian Red Cross. It seems to me that the action taken over there was rather high-handed.

Mr. Drew: I think it is obvious that the desires of the Red Cross would not be satisfied if we adopted the bill in its amended form.

Mr. St. Laurent: That is my understanding. It would probably better suit their convenience to have whatever amendments they wish made to their act included in the one bill, and not have the bill introduced by the member for Mount Royal, in its emasculated form, adopted at this time.

PROROGATION OF PARLIAMENT

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the house that I have received the following communication:

Ottawa, December 10, 1949.

Sir:

I have the honour to inform you that the Right Honourable Thibaudeau Rinfret, Chief Justice of Canada, acting as Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, will proceed to the Senate chamber at nine o'clock p.m. for the purpose of proroguing the present session of parliament.

I have the honour to be,

sir,

Your obedient servant,

J. F. Delaute,

Assistant Secretary to the Governor General.

SITTING SUSPENDED

Mr. Coldwell: If there is no more business to be done, and if we must wait until nine o'clock for the deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, should not we recess?

Mr. St. Laurent: I think we should be here a few minutes before nine o'clock, because we may receive a message from the other place informing us that the supply bill we have just sent over has been passed. I think we should receive the message before the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod summons us to the other place.

Mr. Speaker: With unanimous consent, the sitting of this house is suspended until 8.45 p.m.

At 8.20 p.m. the sitting was suspended until 8.45 p.m. this day.

PROROGATION OF PARLIAMENT

After which the Deputy Governor General was pleased to close the first session of the twenty-first parliament of the Dominion of Canada with the following speech:

Honourable Members of the Senate:

Members of the House of Commons:

Since the opening the present session of parliament you have approved measures required for the discharge of the constitutional responsibilities of our nationhood. As a result the Supreme Court of Canada will shortly become the final court of appeal for Canada.

In response to your address the parliament of the United Kingdom has amended the British North America Act to vest in the parliament of Canada the power to make amendments to the constitution of Canada in matters which are exclusively of federal concern.

Early in the new year a conference with representatives of the provincial governments will be held for the purpose of working out a satisfactory procedure for making within Canada such other amendments to the constitution as may from time to time be required.

Our country continues to take an active part in the proceedings of the United Nations. Despite that organization's present inability to solve the major political problem confronting mankind, the United Nations has succeeded in coping with menacing situations in many parts of the world. At the current session of the general assembly, Canada was elected to the economic and social council.

It is gratifying that the agencies under the North Atlantic treaty have been established and are undertaking the tasks which have been assigned to them.

My ministers are giving constant attention to the defence needs of Canada. The consideration of the measure to consolidate existing legislation respecting our defence forces has not been completed. This measure will be re-introduced at your next session.

The real foundation of the ability of the nations of the north Atlantic community to defend themselves lies in their continued economic strength and stability. Canada is co-operating with other nations, particularly the United Kingdom and the United States, in seeking solutions to the difficult economic problems which still confront the democratic world.

The revaluation of currencies in western Europe and the sterling area made it necessary to alter the exchange rate of the Canadian dollar.

You have approved important amendments to the National Housing Act designed to maintain the present high volume of housing construction.

Legislation has also been enacted to enable the federal government to enter into agreements with the provinces for sharing the cost of construction of a trans-Canada highway.

Provision has been made for three new departments to replace the Department of Reconstruction and Supply and the Department of Mines and Resources. These will be the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys, the Department of Resources and Development, and the Department of Citizenship and Immigration which will also be responsible for the administration of Indian affairs.

A special parliamentary committee examined into the operations of the atomic energy control board.

During the session measures have been enacted respecting forest conservation; the application of a national trade mark and the true description of commodities; the establishment of the Canadian Overseas Telecommunication Corporation; assistance in the production of coal in the Atlantic maritime region; encouragement of the construction of ships in Canada; the disposal of surplus crown assets. Amendments have been made to the Prairie Farm Assistance Act of 1939; the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act; the Industrial Development Bank Act; the Criminal Code; the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act; the Judges Act of 1946; the Animal Contagious Diseases Act; the Export and Import Permits Act; and the Veterans Land Act of 1942. The fish inspection legislation has been revised. The Combines Investigation Act has been strengthened and a complete revision has been made of the Bankruptcy Act.

The government has announced a new policy respecting grants to municipalities in which there is an exceptional concentration of federal property.

Members of the House of Commons:

I thank you for the provision you have made for all essential services for the current fiscal year. The budget resolutions, providing for substantial reductions in taxation, have been approved and the necessary legislation has been enacted.

Honourable Members of the Senate:
Members of the House of Commons:

As you return to your homes, I should like to extend to you and through you to those you represent my best wishes for the Christmas season and to express the hope that Divine Providence will continue to bless our people with prosperity and happiness in the New Year.

This concluded the first session of the twenty-first parliament.

Ottawa.

Mr. Prime Minister:

The members of the executive council of the province have learned from your letter of November 7, which was delivered to my office yesterday afternoon, that the opening session of the dominion-provincial conference which "will consider means to amend the constitution of Canada" will be held in Ottawa on the 10th of January, 1950, at 10.30 a.m.

I presume that the precise place where the sessions of the conference will take place will be determined in the near future.

Yours sincerely,

M. L. Duplessis

OFFICE OF THE PRIME MINISTER

Hon. Maurice Duplessis, M.L.A.,
Premier of Quebec,

My dear Premier:

I duly received your letter of the 9th instant inquiring as to the exact place where the sittings of the proposed constitutional conference would be held. The government will arrange to hold the opening meeting in the centre block of the parliament buildings, and all the premiers will be advised in advance of the precise room and other arrangements.

Yours sincerely,

Louis S. St. Laurent

PREMIER'S OFFICE

Regina, November 29, 1949

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent,
Prime Minister of Canada,
Ottawa, Ont.

My dear Prime Minister:

Thank you for your recent letter confirming the January 10 date for the dominion-provincial conference to consider a method of amending the constitution of Canada. It is felt here that different techniques may be required for different matters. If this be so, it would be difficult to consider the question of amendment in a general way. I would therefore be very much obliged if you could send me the proposed agenda. I am certain you will understand the difficulty with which we are faced in trying to do preparatory work before knowing what items are coming up for discussion and what the method of procedure will be. I note, too, that a preliminary meeting of constitutional experts, in advance of the main conference, is not to be held. This fact necessitates our having a proposed agenda as soon as possible.

Trusting you will be able to assist us by forwarding an agenda to us at your earliest convenience, I remain,

Yours sincerely,

T. C. Douglas

OFFICE OF THE PRIME MINISTER AND PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL
Ontario

Toronto, December 8, 1949

Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent, K.C.,
Prime Minister of Canada,
Ottawa, Canada.

My dear Mr. Prime Minister:

I have your letter of the 7th instant.

My feeling is that the reduction of the subject matter of the conference opening January 10 to an agenda of procedure is not necessary. I think better progress will be made if the question of procedure in the conference is left until the conference itself convenes. These matters can then be considered and settled. If in the meantime any of the other provinces have suggestions to make in this regard, I should be glad indeed if you would advise me. My feeling at the moment is that a formal agenda is not necessary.

Concerning your proposal that a general provincial conference should be held early in the autumn of 1950, possibly in September or October, I am in agreement. In this case the situation is quite different and there are many matters which the various provinces will probably be anxious to have discussed. In this case an agenda of subject matters should be prepared in advance, although I believe as much of the procedure as possible should be left to the conference itself. I shall be glad to discuss this matter with you at any time.

Yours very truly,

Leslie M. Frost
