EDUCATION

SUGGESTED PUBLICITY OF GOVERNMENT-SPONSORED PROGRAMS AND GRANTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that many government programs and grants are developed and awarded each year to help varying educational projects, and in view of the limited publicity given to the existence of such programs and awards and that therefore, many individuals, educational groups and institutions as well as school boards, are not even aware of the existence of such programs and grants and therefore cannot benefit from them, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Okanagan-Kootenay (Mr. Johnston):

That each government department responsible for such programs and grants be required to send written notice of them to every school board and post-secondary institution in Canada giving full details of the programs and grants requirements and application procedures.

Mr. Speaker: The provisions of Standing Order 43 require the unanimous consent of the House for the presentation of such a motion. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ENERGY

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF AGREEMENT AND SAFEGUARDS FOR SALE OF NUCLEAR REACTOR TO ARGENTINA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a motion, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. It has been reported that Atomic Energy of Canada has completed the sale of a CANDU reactor after renegotiations with the Argentine government which has produced a total loss of between $20 million and $40 million. It is essential that the people of Canada be reassured that adequate safeguards against the production of nuclear weapon material be accepted by the Argentine goverment. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas):

That this House direct the government to table all records of the agreement and particularly records of safeguards negotiated to prevent the use of the materials produced by the CANDU reactor for the development of nuclear bombs.

Mr. Speaker: The presentation of such a motion pursuant to the Standing Order can only be made with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

PROPOSAL TO MAINTAIN DAYLIGHT SAVING TIME TO CONSERVE ENERGY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43, I seek the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion on a matter of utmost importance for the future of Canada.

Considering that Canada will very likely be faced soon with a serious shortage of oil and natural gas, that it uses a considerable amount of oil, a non-renewable source of energy, and that it is not as rich in black gold as it thought it was in 1973, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier):

That the House strongly urge the federal government to hold as soon as possible a federal-provincial conference of energy, mines and resources ministers to agree on a formula which would make it mandatory for all Canadian provinces to maintain daylight saving time throughout the year, a formula which our southern neighbours have found to be highly profitable.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The House has heard the hon. member's motion. Pursuant to Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent; the motion therefore cannot be put.

PENSIONS

PROPOSED COMMITTEE STUDY OF AGGREGATE PENSION COMMITMENTS OF ALL LEVELS OF GOVERNMENT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Considering that it has been estimated there may be already $400 billion of unfunded liabilities in Canada arising from governmental commitments under pension plans and bearing in mind the fact that the Canada Pension Plan will cross a threshold on or before 1982 at which time benefit payments will exceed tax income, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander):

That there be an immediate reference to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs to determine what in fact is the aggregate pensions commitment outstanding at all levels of government, to what extent these commitments are funded and to what extent they will become a burden on future taxpayers.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can only be presented with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: No!

LABOUR CONDITIONS

REQUEST FOR EXPLANATION OF MINISTER'S STATEMENT GOVERNMENT IS MAKING ACCOMMODATION WITH LABOUR—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, I too rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity pursuant to Standing Order 43. My proposed motion arises from a statement by the Minister of Labour on Saturday that the government was forging a new, accommodating arrangement with labour. In view of the fact that labour has consistently refused to return its representatives to the Canada Labour Relations Council and the Economic Council or to accept the minister's multipartite national forum, and, further, in view of the fact that Mr. Joe Morris, President of the CLC, has now publicly repudiated the minister's statement and reiterated labour's claim that they were, and I quote, "sold down the river" by the Liberal government, I ask leave to move, seconded by the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Ritchie):

That this House direct the Minister of Labour to appear before the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration to explain fully the basis for his statement and explain to the committee why it has been so swiftly contradicted by the President of the CLC.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be presented to the House only with unanimous consent. Is there such consent?

Some hon. Members: No!

[Mr. Speaker.]

AIR TRANSPORT

GOVERNMENT POSITION ON COURT DECISION ON ACQUISITION OF PACIFIC WESTERN AIRLINES BY ALBERTA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to move a motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. My motion relates to the ruling by the Supreme Court of Canada in favour of the right of the government of Alberta to purchase Pacific Western Airlines. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Edmonton Centre (Mr. Paproski):

That a spokesman for the government state on motions today whether the government accepts the decision of the Supreme Court or whether it intends to bring in the contingency plan of the Minister of Transport to introduce retroactive legislation, and whether the government proposes to rescind the order in council preventing the move of the head office of Pacific Western Airlines to Alberta.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion can be made only with the unanimous consent of the House.

Some hon. Members: No!

ATOMIC ENERGY CONTROL BOARD

ALLOCATION OF FUNDS TO ENABLE BOARD TO DEAL WITH RADIATION IN ELLIOT LAKE HOMES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I seek to move a motion under the terms of Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that the start of clean-up operations affecting about 200 homes in Elliot Lake which show unacceptable levels of radiation has been delayed as a result of the government's refusal to allocate the necessary funds to the Atomic Energy Control Board, claiming the board has no responsibility for natural occurrences of radiation, and bearing in mind the negligence of AECB in failing to check the site before these homes were constructed, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Blackburn):

That the government recognize its responsibility to fund the remedial action necessary to protect the health of Elliot Lake residents.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can only be moved with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there such consent?

Some hon. Members: No!

ENERGY

PROPOSED PUBLIC INQUIRY INTO USE OF ATOMIC ENERGY—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Leader of the Opposition.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should at the beginning express my appreciation to the party on the other side for all the help they have given me.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: My question is addressed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources who yesterday tried to evade his government's responsibility for a national inquiry into nuclear power. I should like to draw the minister's attention to one of the statutes of this parliament which governs his own activities, the Atomic Energy Control Act, which states quite clearly that "it is in the national interest to make provision for the control and supervision of the development application and use of atomic energy". In light of that clear mandate in a statute of this parliament, will the minister now tell this House whether the government of Canada intends to slough off this critical national responsibility to the province of Ontario, or whether the government will honour its responsibilities to the thousands of Canadians who are vitally concerned about this power source and at the same time honour its commitment to its own party in national assembly?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I could take this opportunity of congratulating the hon. member on his first anniversary.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gillespie: We look forward to future years when he will be on that side and we will be on this side of the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Paproski: Don't you believe it.

Mr. Hees: You are all mixed up, Alastair.

Mr. Gillespie: I am not sure, Mr. Speaker, whether the opposition are serious about the question or whether they are so overcome with goodwill on this occasion that they do not want an answer.

Let me make it quite clear that I consider the question of nuclear energy, the benefits and the risks, an exceedingly important one. That is why I was particularly pleased when the Porter royal commission interpreted its terms of reference in a very much wider way than they were first given to the commission, so wide in fact that they engaged in a public dialogue and debate respecting the benefits and risks of nuclear energy; and that is now in motion. I think it is also important that hon. members understand that Ontario, far more than any other province in this country, is committed to generating, and indeed is generating, its electricity from nuclear power today. Probably one-fifth of the lights in this room derive their electricity from nuclear generated power.

The question that is surely before us is: What is the best way to go about examining the potential, the benefits and the risks, and to deal with the apprehensions of the Canadian people or those who may have them? I believe that one of the most important ways is to support the report of the royal commission of the Ontario government. I also believe there are a number of other things that we can do. I believe that the Atomic Energy Control Board needs to be beefed up. I believe that its terms of reference—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, I was hoping that in that long list the minister might finally come to a public inquiry, either held by a standing committee of this parliament or by some other agency, which would ensure that the national responsibility which is set out in law would be honoured and exercised by a national agency, instead of ducking behind the work of a province. May I ask the minister quite specifically and simply: will he establish a national public inquiry into this question; or, alternatively, will he make a reference to a standing or special committee of this House to look into the question?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I was very clear in my answers yesterday: if the hon. gentleman can show how such an inquiry would not duplicate an already good inquiry being undertaken by the province of Ontario, I would be prepared to consider that.

• (1420)

Mr. Clark: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. We now have a willingness to consider. We will provide the demonstration and we will then ask the minister not simply to consider it but act on it. The point I want to make now—

Mr. Gillespie: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: —I have read the minister's answer and have listened to his answer as to whether or not—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Take it easy!

ACCEPTANCE OF PROVINCIAL STUDIES AS BASIS FOR FEDERAL ACTION

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources is embarking upon a very serious precedent as to whether he is prepared to accept the work of a royal commission established in a province as being an adequate substitute for the national government or national institutions carrying out a responsibility that is set out in law as applying to the national government. I should like to ask the minister whether it is going to be the continuing practice of this government in the energy field or otherwise to accept work carried out under provincial jurisdication as a substitute and an excuse for not acting within its own responsibility.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, that seems to me like an absurd question.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: For an absurd minister.

Mr. Gillespie: Surely, a moment's reflection would have convinced the hon. member that in this country we are too often involved in duplicating the work of the provinces.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gillespie: Surely, the time has come to support our arrangements so that the federal government can do certain things and we in the federal government can use the useful work done by the provinces.

Mr. Clark: A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Since we now have an expression of the view of the government that they want to use the work of a provincial agency, may we have an undertaking from the minister that the government is prepared to consider the reports of the Porter inquiry and act upon its recommendations, consider them with the same seriousness and act upon their recommendations in the same way, as they would a royal commission or any other agency established under their own jurisdiction.

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I think I have made that clear all along. We are looking forward to the work of the Porter commission.

Mr. Fraser: Will you follow its recommendations?

Mr. Gillespie: Of course, we would want to use the information provided.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

SALE OF NUCLEAR REACTOR TO ARGENTINA—AMOUNT OF LOSS ON RENEGOTIATED CONTRACT

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. It arises from reports that Ross Campbell, chairman of AECL, has finally signed a renegotiated contract with Argentina and that the anticipated loss is now between $23 million and $40 million. In view of the fact that AECL officials have given themselves a margin of error of a mere 100 per cent in counting up their losses, will the minister tell the House how he is so sure that these losses will not exceed $40 million, $50 million or $60 million? What is the upper figure?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the hon. lady has already indicated what the upper figure is. That, if I understand it, is $40 million.

An hon. Member: Plus 100 per cent.

[Mr. Clark.]

Mr. Gillespie: I do not know what further information the hon. member wants. All I can tell her is that I think Mr. Campbell was able to negotiate a good deal for Canada.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: I would hate to see a bad deal.

Mr. Gillespie: Any time the opposition can show me how they can save $75 million I would like to hear it.

Mr. Fairweather: April Fool's Day is not here yet.

Miss MacDonald: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. All I can say is that the $40 million loss which the minister is looking upon as a benefit he is liable to turn over to the provinces in due course along with the other matter.

POSSIBILITY OF WITHDRAWING FROM SALE OF NUCLEAR REACTORS

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): In view of the fact that over the years the Canadian people have been told by this government that we are in fact doing the third world a service by letting them have our reactors, will the minister tell the House whether the sordid and inept business practices of AECL have rubbed so much of the gloss off those pious sentiments as to induce the government to leave the nuclear reactor export business for good?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): No, Mr. Speaker, but I acknowledge that there were mistakes made. There is no question that mistakes were made. But I think we should recognize that while mistakes were made on the first one, we learned something.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Gillespie: Let me put it in these terms. I think we learned enough that we are going to more than compensate for the loss of the first by the profits on the second.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

RECOGNITION BY EUROPEAN COMMUNITY OF UNITED STATES 200-MILE COASTAL ZONE—EFFECT ON CANADIAN CLAIM TO GEORGES BANK

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Acting Prime Minister. On February 16 it is reported that the United States and the European Economic Community signed an agreement which recognizes the new U.S. 200-mile coastal zone. That recognition, as I understand it, was unconditional. Can the minister advise what effect this will have on Canada's long-term claim to the Georges Bank?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, discussions are probably going on today in Washington between the U.S. and Canada on the question of Georges Bank, which is an outstanding issue between Canada and the U.S. As the hon. member knows, there is an overlapping claim with respect to Georges Bank, and that is a matter that is now under discussion between Canada and the U.S. Certainly, no action taken by the EEC with the U.S. or any other country in any way diminishes Canada's claim to the lines which it has put forward in its negotiations.

Mr. Leggatt: Perhaps the minister can then explain to the House why it is that Canada, which made its unilateral declaration in January, was unable to obtain a similar agreement from the EEC as the United States has been able to do, therefore placing our claim in an inferior position to that of the U.S.? We do not have recognition by EEC of the claim to Georges Bank. Can the minister explain why Canada failed to obtain such an agreement while the U.S. was successful?

Mr. MacEachen: As the hon. member may recall, before we undertook the unilateral declaration of the 200-mile limit, we had worked out with a number of European countries, apart from the U.S., bilateral agreements in which there was an explicit recognition of the regime that would exist within the Canadian 200-mile limit. But without challenging the accuracy of the hon. member's statement, I question very much whether an agreement of that kind would have any effect on the resolution of the disagreement which exists between Canada and the U.S. with respect to Georges Bank. That is a matter for discussion between the two countries and settlement, which is the route we are taking at the present time.

Mr. Leggatt: In view of the fact that the EEC has recognized U.S. territorial claims without officially recognizing ours, after the March 1 declaration of the United States when their territorial claims will become law, is it Canada's intention to apprehend vessels entering the Georges Bank disputed area which do not hold Canadian licenses but which hold American licenses?

Mr. MacEachen: One of the items that is presently under discussion with the United States is what the joint attitude will be toward third parties on Georges Bank. It is unlikely that the jurisdiction will not be settled because we are very close to March 1 and both Canada and the United States have declared their lines.

ELECTION EXPENSES

REASON FOR DELAY OF LIBERAL PARTY TO REPORT CONTRIBUTIONS

Mr. C. A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the President of the Privy Council.

On February 18 I directed a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration about the report on political contributions to the Liberal party for the financial year 1975. The Minister for Manpower and Immigration referred me to the Minister of National Revenue and now she tells me that it is not within her jurisdiction. This is why I am asking today the President of the Privy Council why we cannot obtain before June 30, 1977 the report of the Liberal party on contributions in 1975 when all parties were supposed to table their report before the end of the financial year?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member will allow me, I shall answer his question. My French must have been distorted because I do not remember having said that my responsibilities are not my responsibilities. I am therefore pleased to advise the House that the Liberal Party of Canada, as requested last week, made a report to the Department of National Revenue, as prescribed by section 230.1(2), on contributions received during 1975. With regard to the contributions to all political parties in 1976, the parties, by ministerial decree, have until March 31, 1977 to report to my department. My report is then filed with the chief electoral officer, Mr. Hamel. That report, which of course is only a summary, will be made available. I shall see to it personally: as soon as possible after all pertinent information has been received, it will be made available.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, on a supplementary.

I thank the minister for her reply. I should also like to ask her whether the Liberal party had to ask the department for an extension?

Miss Bégin: My department advised me that the act had been complied with. Still, I shall enquire into the matter. I have not heard of any extension. We are referring here, I expect, to the report on contributions for the year 1975. No one requested an extension for that year: there is no question about that.

FINANCE

STUDY OF PENSION PLANS—REQUEST FOR DETAILS—FUNDING OF CANADA PENSION PLAN

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. As the minister has indicated that the government has undertaken a study of retirement incomes which is wide enough to cover the private pension industry, will the minister now tell the House exactly who is conducting the study, what are the terms of reference, when will they report and to whom?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, officials in my department and officials in the Department of National Health and Welfare are engaged in the study. It is in the broadest sense to consider the questions of retirement income, particularly those related to the jurisdiction of the government of Canada, and we hope to have the results of that study within a matter of months.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, as it has been represented that the Canada Pension Plan will pass a threshold on or before 1982 at which time benefit payments will exceed tax revenue, would the minister indicate what steps he intends to take to ensure that the Canada Pension Plan will be properly funded and not become a burden upon future taxpayers?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): This is a matter which has received some consideration by the government. In terms of our priorities in examining the pension system, however, it seems clear from representations made in this House that our first priority should be to examine the tax measures which affect the private pension system before proceeding to deal with the Canada Pension Plan.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, as there is a great hodge-podge of governmental pension plans at all levels of government, some funded and some not, would the minister indicate if he would be willing to go further and not just have the study he has referred to but also have a reference to the appropriate standing committee of this House to determine what are the aggregate commitments at this time for future pensions and to what extent these commitments are without funding? As such they may become a burden on future taxpayers.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I would be glad to consider the suggestion. I am sure the House leaders might have something to say about the use of the time of the House in that way, but I personally would have no difficulty with the suggestion.

INDUSTRY

TEXTILE AND CLOTHING IMPORT QUOTAS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

Is he in a position to inform the House about the present situation of the government's decision announced toward the end of November concerning import quotas of cloth, clothing and threads, to protect the Canadian textile industry?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, as a matter of fact import quotas for 1975 were put into effect on November 29 last. We have provided some special allowances in the most difficult cases. The Textile and Clothing Board is reviewing such cases. At the present time, most of them have been reviewed by the board, and I believe the policy as announced to protect the textile and clothing industry in Canada is operating very well right now.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a supplementary question.

[Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale).]

Is the minister aware of the disastrous effect of this decision upon those who earn their living in small enterprises specialized in woollens, for example, retailing clothes that the Canadian textile industry has never manufactured?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I said earlier that the policy provided for flexibility and that as regards some exclusivities, the Textile and Clothing Board has the power to recommend additional quotas, when the textiles are not manufactured in Canada as, for example some Irish woollens and so on. Each shop facing such problems could make representations to the Textile and Clothing Board, and I am informed that generally some arrangements were made.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

STATEMENT OF MINISTER ON GOVERNMENT'S ACCOMMODATION OF LABOUR—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Acting Prime Minister. In view of the unusual comments of the Minister of Labour about the relationship between the NDP and the CLC and about the so-called new accommodation with the Liberal party, which comments have already drawn a blunt rebuttal from Mr. Morris, President of the CLC, and Mr. Pilkey, President of the Ontario Federation of Labour, who said, and I quote: "There is no way labour can find any accommodation within the Liberal party"—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Fraser: —can the Acting Prime Minister advise whether the statement of the minister was made with the approval of the Prime Minister and his cabinet colleagues?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, before answering the question directly, I wonder if I could draw to the attention of the House the historic speech which the Prime Minister made today in Washington.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: I should like to congratulate him upon the great service he did for our country in his presentation today.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Paproski: Why doesn't he do the same in this House?

Mr. MacEachen: In reply to the question of the hon. member, I am aware of no effort by the Liberal party to seek an accommodation with the Canadian Labour Congress. I am sure what the Minister of Labour had in mind was the continuing effort of the government to engage in consultation, not only with the labour movement in Canada but also with the business community, in order to address some of the serious economic problems facing the country.

● (1440)

Mr. Fraser: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. May I draw the attention of the Acting Prime Minister to what may turn out to be an historic speech by the Minister of Labour about this government's relationships with labour. Can the Acting Prime Minister tell the House whether labour has agreed to return its representatives to the now defunct Canada Labour Relations Council and the Economic Council of Canada, and agreed to the Minister of Labour's policy of establishing a multi-partite national forum? If the answer is no, how, then, could the minister say what I suggested he said on Saturday, namely, that he was building a new accommodation between the Liberal party and the CLC?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I am not in a position to confirm that the Canadian Labour Congress has resumed its membership on the consultative organizations to which the hon. member has referred. It would be the wish of the government for the Labour Congress to take a favourable decision and resume the possibility of making a contribution to these national bodies.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

Mr. Jean-R. Roy (Timmins): Mr. Speaker, can the Secretary of State responsible for Heritage Canada and the national museums inquire if the blue flowers the official opposition are wearing today are a symbol of eternal hope or a wreath of mourning for their decision of one year ago?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Ask that question one year from now.

ENERGY

SALE OF NUCLEAR REACTOR TO ARGENTINA—POSSIBILITY OF INDUCEMENT TO SIGN RENEGOTIATED CONTRACT—REQUEST FOR TABLING CONTRACT

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, my question is supplementary to those asked earlier of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources concerning the contract renegotiated between AECL and the National Atomic Energy Power Commission of Argentina. What extra inducement or extra consideration was granted to the Argentina agency in the renegotiated contract, to induce them to sign a renegotiated contract? For example, is Canada extending a further line of credit to them in respect of the building of a reactor and, if so, how much?

An hon. Member: Another $40 million.

Mr. Paproski: Interest free.

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I believe there was some additional financing. I am not sure how much but will be pleased to find out for the hon. member. That would cover the escalated costs of the total contract.

Mr. Paproski: And what about the agent's fee? Is that an extra?

Mr. Lawrence: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I wonder if the minister could allay the fears of the many people in the country and in this House, about the renegotiated contract and the minister's obvious ignorance about some of the main parts of that contract, by tabling it, so that everybody can see it?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I will be pleased to consider that before the public accounts committee. As you know, that matter has been discussed at considerable length before the public accounts committee. I disagree with what the hon. member says about considerable apprehension on the part of the public about the renegotiated contract. I am surprised the hon. member's party did not want us to renegotiate it. Considering the kinds of losses we were facing, surely that was the right thing to do.

IMMIGRATION.

PROPOSED INCREASE IN NUMBER OF INVESTIGATORS IN VIEW OF INCREASE IN ILLEGAL ENTRIES

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, my question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration concerns the ever-increasing problem of the illegal entry of aliens to Canada. Will the minister indicate if additional man-years will be assigned to units such as the Toronto immigration investigative unit, and will similar units be established in other urban areas?

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I do not foresee that at present. We hope that some of the measures to be proposed in the new bill will have the desired effect.

MEASURES TO IMPROVE CAPABILITIES OF INVESTIGATIVE OFFICERS

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Since officers of the Toronto immigration investigative unit have notified departmental officials that, in order to cope with the numbers of aliens on Toronto streets, including those whose street operations are frequently in violation of the Criminal Code, they need radio equipped cars, walkie-talkies, self-defence training as well as an outline of their rights and responsibilities, will the minister say when steps will be taken to allow the Toronto immigration investigative unit to do the job it must do? When will they receive the equipment and training for which they have asked?

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, precisely because of what the hon. member has raised, we sent investigating officers down, to find out what the situation is so far as our front line officers are concerned. They have a difficult job to do and I intend to do everything I can to help them, within the confines of the funds allotted to me.

GRAIN

LARGE AMOUNT OF TOUGH WHEAT IN PRINCE RUPERT TERMINAL—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO ALLEVIATE PROBLEM

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I shall direct my questions both to the Minister of Agriculture and to the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board, to let them know they are not being neglected. Is the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board aware that most of the working capacity of the Prince Rupert terminal has been filled with tough wheat; that lack of drying capacity there has meant that one ship has remained idle for three weeks waiting to be loaded; that another ship now loading will be there for a total of two weeks; that a third ship was diverted to Vancouver, and that already five ships in Vancouver are waiting to load. I ask the minister, who co-ordinated the shipping of that amount of tough grain to Prince Rupert, when there was not sufficient time to get it dried for loading on ships? What action is being taken to get dry wheat in there to mix, and is he doing anything to increase those drying facilities?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, as I am sure the hon. member knows, the shipment of grain is co-ordinated by the Canadian Wheat Board. This particular grain was moved at a certain time in order to avoid or relieve serious congestion, particularly in the Peace River area. Whether the Canadian Wheat Board was aware of the volume of tough grain which was involved I do not know. I will have to check. I know they have taken action to bring dry grain from other areas, so that a mixing process can assist the dryers. Those dryers are not capable of handling this volume of grain easily or quickly. The situation in relation to Vancouver was complicated by the movement to Vancouver earlier of grain which was of a lower protein content than the Wheat Board had reason to expect. They have had to balance that movement with large volumes, particularly from southern Saskatchewan, where wheat of higher protein content is dependably available.

PRINCE RUPERT TERMINAL—MEASURES TO INCREASE DRYING CAPACITY—REQUEST FOR NAME OF LESSEE

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct my supplementary question to the Minister of Agriculture? May I ask the minister, who is in charge of the Canadian Grain Commission which operates the terminal at Prince Rupert, two questions? One, is any action being taken to increase the drying capacities of that terminal at Prince Rupert? Second, and even more important, has the minister yet decided what tender he is going to accept for the leasing of that terminal? Will he assure the House that it will not go to the Cargill Grain Company?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, first, may I correct the report carried on CBC radio yesterday morning that two million bushels of damp grain are in that elevator? The figure is 1.2 million, less than they stated. Therefore, the dryer is running to capacity. They are blending that grain with grain which is dryer. There was not, over all, that waiting which was alleged, and demurrage costs were not as great as reported. When a ship goes to Prince Rupert it knows full well that it will take longer to load from that old elevator than from other elevators; on the other hand, that ship is several hundred miles closer to the port of destination. Also, let me add that I am to meet the Canadian Grain Commission in Winnipeg tomorrow.

FISHERIES

HADDOCK QUOTA FOR FISHERMEN FROM SOUTH WESTERN NOVA AREA—REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE NO REDUCTION

Miss Coline Campbell (South Western Nova): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment. Is the minister aware that the larger boats which have been excluded from the gulf have come down to the Brown's and Germa Banks and increased the effort on the allotted haddock quota for this area? If so, can the minister give assurance to the fishermen of South Western Nova that their boat quotas will not be reduced in the month of June or the rest of the year, in light of this increased effort by the outsider boats on the haddock quota?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, the fishing plan for 1977 tries to assure a fair share for all concerned, and tries to ensure that there will be no undue dislocation of traditional fishing patterns. Before considering the exact details of the hon. member's question I would have to look into this matter, and report to her.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

PROPOSED INVESTIGATION OF DEATH OF ARCHBISHOP OF UGANDA—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, may I direct my question to the Acting Prime Minister? Is it the intention of the government to support the call of the distinguished Anglican Primate of Canada, Archbishop Scott, for an international investigation of the murder of Uganda's Anglican archbishop and two government ministers, and can the Acting Prime Minister tell the House if the Canadian government has yet expressed to the United Nations Human Rights Commission or the Commonwealth Association the grave concern of the Canadian people about the escalating violation of human rights by President Idi Amin in Uganda?

● (1450)

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Acting Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker. The government of Canada does support the call of the Anglican Primate for an independent inquiry into these tragic deaths. The government of Canada has already made known to the representative of Uganda in Canada that in our view, an independent inquiry is justified in the present circumstances. Therefore, we have no hesitation in supporting strongly and sincerely this particular request.

CANADIAN EFFORTS AT UNITED NATIONS TO PROTECT HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton-Strathcona): Expressing the dismay of members on this side that the motion of the hon. member for St. John's East on this particular point yesterday was denied, may I ask the Acting Prime Minister a supplementary question? In view of the escalating violations of human rights in many parts of the world—Russia, Czechoslovakia, Chile, Indonesia, to name just a few countries as well as Uganda—can the Acting Prime Minister tell the House what instructions have been given the Canadian representative to the United Nations Human Rights Commission to help the United Nations increase its worldwide efforts to protect human rights?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, so that there will be no misunderstanding on this point, I should refer to the incident which occurred yesterday. We did not refuse to accept the hon. member's motion on substantive grounds but on procedural grounds—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacEachen: —because the action called for in the motion had already been taken by the government of Canada. Therefore, there would be no reason to oppose it on substantive grounds. With regard to the United Nations Commission on Human Rights, I am pleased to advise the hon. member that the government has already acted. Prior to his question, we instructed our representative to the United Nations Commission on Human Rights, Mr. Beaulne, to take an active hand in bringing this particular incident in Uganda to the attention of the United Nations.

SUGGESTION THAT MOTION CALLING FOR INVESTIGATION OF DEATH OF ARCHBISHOP OF UGANDA BE PUT AGAIN

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I thank the minister for that explanation of the unusual action in the House yesterday. Following on that reply, will the minister agree at three o'clock by unanimous consent to having that motion put, and this is a very important question, in order that the House of Commons may have an opportunity to support the government in its expression of its concern, and indeed its indignation, at what is happening in Uganda.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am not prepared to accept any further Standing Order 43 motions, whatever the subject, until the procedural question is clarified because just the other day we all agreed to an extremely good motion put forward by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. Suddenly a debate took place which interrupted the normal proceedings of the House. Until that situation is clarified, I do not intend to agree even to this particular motion which we support 100 per cent.

INQUIRY WHETHER PRESIDENT AMIN WILL ATTEND MEETING OF COMMONWEALTH LEADERS

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, can the Acting Prime Minister say whether this despotic, erratic and cruel leader of a commonwealth country will be part of the commonwealth leaders meeting in June?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am not the person responsible for sending out the invitations.

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, on the basis that we on this side of the House will agree not to debate the motion referred to by my colleague, the member for St. John's East, will the government House leader have the motion moved at three o'clock on the order for motions?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Hon. members will realize that these questions generally lie in the class of representation and when they carry an additional condition, they become hypothetical representations.

COMMUNICATIONS

REFUSAL OF QUEBEC MINISTER TO ATTEND CONFERENCE—POSSIBILITY LEGISLATION INTRODUCED PRIOR TO CONFERENCE

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Communications. In view of the refusal of the minister of communications of Quebec to attend the Minister of Communications meeting later this month or early next month, and in view of the fact that this minister is one of the hosts or co-chairmen of the conference, has any decision been made for that conference to proceed?

[Translation]

Hon. Jeanne Sauvé (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, as a matter of fact I communicated immediately with my provincial counterpart in Alberta. Of course I would have been pleased to see the Quebec minister take part in this meeting of communications ministers. I think he would have found there an excellent opportunity to discuss how the provinces can cooperate to set up the national communications and broadcasting policy which is his major area of concern and to start the discussion on the tools and means needed to enable the provinces to meet their objectives. Unfortunately it will not be possible. However, we decided to hold the meeting anyway.

[English]

Mr. Nowlan: Will the minister advise whether prior to that conference she intends to lay before this House the next stage in the telecommunications legislation or does she intend to discuss that with her respective and responsible provincial ministers? If it is not in the legislative stage, does she intend to take to that conference new proposals and new initiatives in the whole field of telecommunications, in particular involving some of the jurisdictional problems?

[Translation]

Mrs. Sauvé: Mr. Speaker, I hope that the legislation on communications will be tabled in the House so that I can lay it before the ministers who will be present at the meeting. It should be noted for the benefit of the House that this meeting is not a federal-provincial conference but a meeting of communications ministers set up as a forum in which views on a future communications policy will be exchanged.

FINANCE

FUNDS FOR URBAN TRANSIT SYSTEMS—REQUEST FOR RECONSIDERATION OF FUNDING OF SOUTH WEST TRANSIT STUDY FOR WINNIPEG

Mr. Dean Whiteway (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Finance. It has to do with the Toronto rebellion. In view of the uprising in his own caucus after his decision last week to renege on a campaign promise to supply funds for urban transit systems, is the minister now prepared to reconsider that decision and include it in the upcoming budget? It is a policy which Canadians considered to be serious rather than a hollow campaign promise.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): As I pointed out last week, Mr. Speaker, we have given an undertaking, indicated most recently by my colleague, the President of the Treasury Board, with regard to restraint on federal expenditures and we intend to hold to that.

Mr. Whiteway: My supplementary question has to do with a study commissioned by and paid for in large part by the minister's department with the province of Manitoba and the city of Winnipeg a year ago. The minister will recognize it. It is called "South West Transit Study". In his announcement last week, the minister effectively killed that project, a project on which he asked for a tri-level study. Is the minister at least prepared to consider that one transit study and fund it rather than cut it off at the knees?

[Mrs. Sauvé.]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That is clearly in the class of a representation. Presenting reports from standing and special committees.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, I wish to raise a point of order at this time. It is with regard to the statement made by the government House leader in response to questions from members on this side relating to the motion moved yesterday by the hon. member for St. John's East under Standing Order 43. In order that the government House leader can demonstrate the bona fides of the government in the interest of having a statement made by the House of Commons without any debate whatsoever, will the minister at this juncture move that we revert to motions under Standing Order 43 in order that the hon. member for St. John's East may now move the motion? This would give my hon. friend from St. John's East an opportunity to put forward a motion which would demonstrate that the House of Commons supports the position of the government with respect to this matter.

• (1500)

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member raises this matter by way of a point of order. He realizes, I am sure, that it is one not totally within the authority of the President of the Privy Council, regardless of his extensive power and authority. The calling of motions pursuant to Standing Order 43 takes place prior to the question period, and any change in that arrangement should be made only with the unanimous consent of the House.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: I simply want to ask, then, the permission of the House to revert to motions under Standing Order 43.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

AIB DISAPPROVAL OF WAGE INCREASES

Question No. 905—Mr. Howie:

1. As of October 1, 1976, how many wage increases for workers in the Maritime Provinces were disapproved by the Anti-Inflation Board?

2. How many firms in the Maritimes were found to exceed profit guidelines?

Mr. Bob Kaplan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): 1. In the Anti-Inflation Board establishment the Halifax Regional Office is responsible for the Maritime provinces and the province of Newfoundland, and statistics are collected for these Atlantic provinces. From October 14, 1975 to October 1, 1976 collective agreements from this region totalled 1,186. In the preliminary assessment 605 cases were over the guidelines. By September 30, 1976 complete assessment of 302 cases was completed and submitted to the board. Of this number 149 agreements were rolled back. The balance were dealt with by the board subsequent to October 1, 1976.

2. Up to October 1, 1976 two firms had excess revenues.

GRANT TO L'INSTITUT DE PROMOTION DES INTÉRÊTS DU CONSOMMATEUR AND DUTIES AND FUNCTION OF INFORMATION DIVISION OF DEPARTMENT

Question No. 1,245—Mr. Jones:

1. Did the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs grant this year to L'Institut de promotion des intérêts du consommateur for consumer information and education, the amount of $50,000 and a total of $145,400 since 1973 and, if so, what are the precise duties of this group that it should receive such a grant?

2. What are the duties and function of the Information Division of the Department?

Hon. A. C. Abbott (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): 1. Yes, a grant of $50,000 was awarded to L'Institut de promotion des intérêts du consommateur for the following purposes: (a) Magazine publishing, testing, $25,000; Magazine distribution, $10,000; (b) Consumer assistance and representation, $15,000; Total: $50,000. In previous years, grants have been for similar purposes—product testing, research and publication of the magazine. Since 1973/74, grants to IPIC have totalled $145,400.

2. The Information and Public Relations Branch of the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs develops and carries out a communications programme to assist the department in the achievement of its objectives. The branch produces and issues a full range of information materials, involving both print and electronic media, designed to generate awareness and understanding of departmental legislation, the rights it protects and the responsibilities it imposes. Most of the communications programme is tailored to the needs of businessmen and consumers with the over-all objective of enhancing the fairness and effectiveness of the marketplace for the social and economic betterment of all Canadians.

Order Paper Questions

AIB—STUDY OF FOOD PRICES

Question No. 1,373—Mr. Neil:

What was the total cost of the study carried out by the Anti-Inflation Board to determine the differences in food prices between Canada and the US?

Mr. Bob Kaplan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): I am advised by the Anti-Inflation Board that the cost of the study was $3,234.

RDIA—AVERAGE COST PER JOB

Question No. 1,402—Mr. MacDonald (Egmont):

For the years 1973 to 1975, by province, what was the average cost per job created under the Regional Development Incentives Act?

Mr. Ed Lumley (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): The reply for the Department of Regional Economic Expansion is as follows: The following table provides information from 1969, the inception of the programme, to 31 December 1975, for those net accepted offers on which final payment had been made by that date. Records are not maintained in a way that permits the answer to be restricted to the period 1 January 1973 to 31 December 1975. The average cost per job created, in accordance with the foregoing, by province, is: Newfoundland, $2,929; Prince Edward Island, $4,481; Nova Scotia, $6,905; New Brunswick, $6,928; Quebec, $2,218; Ontario, $3,075; Manitoba, $6,414; Saskatchewan, $2,592; Alberta, $4,107; British Columbia $6,692.

NEWFOUNDLAND—LOANS UNDER SMALL BUSINESSES LOANS ACT

Question No. 1,562—Mr. Marshall:

By constituency, between January 1 and September 30, 1976, what is the breakdown of the loans made in Newfoundland under the Small Businesses Loans Act?

Mr. Bob Kaplan (Paliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): The requested data is not maintained by electoral district but only by province, by lender, by type of business and by purpose, for the following reasons: (i) Loans are made by banks to customers who may not live in the same constituency as the bank and whose businesses may be in yet another constituency. (ii) Constituency boundaries change from time to time; thus comparative statistics cannot be maintained on a consistent basis.

RCMP—POSSIBILITY OF ESTABLISHMENT OF REGIONAL DETACHMENT

Question No. 1,639—Mr. Epp:

Does the RCMP intend to establish a regional detachment to serve the south-eastern region of Manitoba and, if so (a) in what location (b) what area will the detachment serve (c) how many officers will be stationed at the detachment?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): No.

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY AUTHORITY—TENDERS FOR CONSTRUCTION CONTRACTS

Question No. 706—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Did the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority approve a document on February 14, 1975 entitled: "Management Guidelines No. 18. Subject: Construction Contracts" and, if so, on page three does it state that tenders up to $50,000 are permitted to be made by the Chief of Purchases and Stores on the basis of invited tenders rather than tenders by public advertisement and does it further state that under certain conditions this situation can also be used on work estimated to cost up to $100,000.

2. (a) What are the names and addresses of all firms presently on the list held by the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority for purposes of inviting tenders (b) who compiled the list (c) what are the names and designations of any persons furnishing, or in any way recommending names for inclusion on the list (d) were any Members of Parliament or members of any Liberal Party Executive consulted or otherwise involved in any way whatsoever with compiling the list and, if so, what are their names and addresses?

3. What is a complete list of all such tenders called on this basis since January 1, 1972 including, in each case, the successful bidder's name and address, the amount of their tender, the name and address of all others invited to tender and the nature of work done?

*DR. NOEL HALL—MEDIATION OF DISPUTE BETWEEN TREASURY BOARD AND CANADIAN UNION OF POSTAL WORKERS

Question No. 1,486—Mr. Dinsdale:

1. Was Dr. Noel Hall, professor of industrial relations at the University of British Columbia, appointed in October, 1976 to mediate the dispute between the Treasury Board and the Canadian Union of Postal Workers (CUPW) on technological changes in the Post Office Department and, if so (a) were proceedings of the meetings between Dr. Hall, CUPW officials and government officials recorded (b) were any papers presented at the meetings by Dr. Hall, CUPW officials and/or government officials?

2. Are copies of the proceedings and of any papers presented at the meetings available and, if not, for what reason?

[English]

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): For the Public Service Staff Relations Board. 1. Dr. Noel Hall was appointed by the Chairman of the Public Service Staff Relations Board as a mediator on October 25, 1976 for the purpose of conferring with officials of the Treasury Board, the Post Office Department and the Canadian Union of Postal Workers and endeavouring to assist the parties in reaching a settlement of their dispute over the introduction and implementation of technological changes in the Post Office. (a) and (b) All mediation proceedings are conducted in private and the information and proposals provided to the mediator by the parties are furnished on a confidential basis to be utilized by him in the exercise of his discretion. Accordingly, there are no records of the proceedings before Dr. Hall nor is there any record of any papers presented to him by the parties.

2. For the above reasons there are no copies available of any record of proceedings or any papers presented to him.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Clark: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I should like to request the unanimous consent of the House to return to motions under Standing Order 43 for the purpose of seeking unanimous support for the motion moved yesterday by my hon. friend from St. John's East.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. If I were to permit the seeking of unanimous consent pursuant to Standing Order 43 at times other than those provided in the Standing Orders, it would take away the meaning of the routine proceedings by which we govern ourselves, which provide that applications pursuant to Standing Order 43 are made prior to the question period.

Since the Standing Order calls for an application for the unanimous consent of the House, we must either decide whether that can be done at any time an hon. member has the floor or whether, according to our practice, it is to be confined to the period prior to the beginning of the question period. We have rather rigidly followed the pattern that it is confined to the period prior to questions, and if I were to permit any hon. member who has the floor by any means to make an application at any time pursuant to Standing Order 43 we might just as well abandon the provision whereby such motions are confined to the minutes prior to the question period each day. Without any directive to that effect from the committee on procedure, I am not disposed to do so.

Mr. Clark: I am not at all wishful of disputing your authority on this question, Mr. Speaker, but it is equally the case that the House of Commons is the final arbiter of its own proceedings. While I can understand and sympathize with Your Honour's concern not to establish a precedent which might interfere with the smooth functioning of the House, I believe it is recognized on both sides that there are at stake here two highly important principles, one of them referred to in the substance of the motion moved by my hon. friend yesterday, and the other having to do with the right of parliament, as distinct from simply the government, to express its opinion on this matter. What I am seeking is an opportunity to ask the unanimous consent of the whole House of Commons to vary the rule, it being understood that such a variation would not establish a precedent but would be regarded as an extraordinary response to an extraordinary situation.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. In order to respect our procedures and allow an opportunity for the voicing of sentiments expressed on several occasions by members to my left, I must point out that tomorrow is another day, another opportunity for taking advantage of the provisions of Standing Order 43. It continues as a daily matter. There was nothing to prevent such an application from having been made today despite the fact that it was turned down yesterday, and there is nothing to restrict any member from putting forward the same application pursuant to Standing Order 43 tomorrow without having to circumvent our procedures or to set any dangerous precedent.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL FISCAL ARRANGEMENTS AND ESTABLISHED PROGRAMS FINANCING ACT, 1977

MEASURE FOR MAKING CERTAIN FISCAL PAYMENTS AND OF ESTABLISHED PROGRAMS FINANCING CONTRIBUTIONS TO PROVINCES, ETC.

The House resumed, from Monday, February 21, consideration of the motion of Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale) that Bill C-37, to provide for the making of certain fiscal payments and of established programs financing contributions to provinces, to provide for payments in respect of certain provincial taxes and fees, and to make consequential and related amendments, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, when I spoke last night I said we were opposed to this bill because the provinces were forced into this agreement and because the measures now proposed would have a particularly bad effect on the disadvantaged provinces, including the province of Quebec about which so much has been said. I have since had an opportunity to look at what some of the provincial premiers have said about these arrangements, as well as at the record of the discussions held between the first ministers.

I hope the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Murta) will note the following, particularly in view of his eloquent plea for understanding and support of Quebec. According to Premier Lévesque as he was leaving the first ministers' meeting several weeks ago, Quebec will lose $100 million in the first year as a result of the new agreement, by comparison with what the province would have received had the old agreement continued without change. The bulk of this loss will be the result of the change in the revenue guarantee provision. It has now been brought to my attention that Premier Lévesque's estimate of the loss was probably on the low side. Since the meeting of the first ministers there have been some developments and announcements by the federal government which make it obvious that the government will further reduce the money that the provinces would have received under the old agreement.

When we look at how the established program financing is going to be affected by the new agreement we are being asked to support, we find this, Mr. Speaker. The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) some time ago offered the provinces $20 per capita to finance nursing homes and other intensive care facilities, replacing an earlier offer which he made in 1975 to share the cost of such facilities 50-50. Anyone who has followed the course of the financing of hospital care in this country realizes that it was a colossal blunder on the part of the federal government to restrict its 50-50 cost-sharing program to intensive care hospitals. The provinces are, after all, responsible for the actual delivery of hospital services and for caring for sick people, not the federal government. The federal government had been prepared to pay 50 per cent of the cost of keeping patients in intensive care hospitals, hospitals that are very expensive to run and which cost up to $200 a day. On the other hand, the federal government has not been prepared to pay for the much lower cost of keeping a person in a nursing home or rehabilitative hospital, facilities that cost very much less but which, from the point of view of the provinces, cost the provinces more than their 50 per cent share of intensive hospital care financing.

Bill C-37 contains provisions which affect the $20 per capita offer that the Minister of National Health and Welfare made some time ago, restricting it even further. When this was brought to the attention of the federal government, the federal government agreed to hold its offer open until there was provincial consensus, setting a time limit of February 15 for the provinces to agree among themselves. I am told that last Friday the Minister of National Health and Welfare sent a telegram to the provinces indicating that the federal government would proceed with the $20 per capita figure I have already mentioned, on the ground that five provinces, representing 84 per cent of the population, had already agreed to his proposal. These provinces, with the exception of the province of Quebec, are the rich provinces, the provinces of British Columbia, Alberta, Ontario and Nova Scotia. This means, Mr. Speaker, that those provinces which tried to diversify their hospital care services, such as Manitoba and Saskatchewan—in accordance with the desire and recommendation of Ottawa—so that these facilities would be less costly both for them and for the federal government, are now going to be penalized, while those provinces which have not begun this process, the wealthier provinces in this country—British Columbia and Ontario—will benefit.

This proposal to switch from the open-ended, equal sharing formula to an annual grant which is based on population and gross national product is going to mean bonuses for those provinces with lower quality services, such as Ontario, and penalties for provinces which have recently improved their services, such as Manitoba. Unfortunately for pensioners, people who are handicapped, and others in need of assistance, this change will probably inhibit any further improvement in services. After all, if Ottawa is not going to share the cost, why should the provinces which are really strapped for money proceed with such improvements? As I said last night, existing services will undoubtedly, over a period of several years, be reduced in quality.

The minister's plan was outlined in a proposal which was sent in mid-January to the provincial health ministers. Since then he has made a few minor revisions, but nothing very fundamental. The original deadline was extended, as I have indicated, but now the options have been closed off. The decision of the federal government means that the Ontario government will get an extra $50 million in the coming fiscal year; British Columbia will get $23 million, despite the fact they have relatively low levels of adult care services; Alberta will gain $90 million because it will no longer be penalized for having facilities of too high a quality to qualify for cost-sharing. Meanwhile, poorer provinces such as Prince Edward Island stand to lose $2 million in the next year; Saskatchewan will lose up to $2 million; and Manitoba will gain about $800,000 the first year but will lose money in subsequent years. The last three provinces which I mentioned have probably had the best adult care services in the country.

Because none of the proposed grants will be earmarked for adult care services, the provinces will be under no obligation to improve or even to maintain such services. Furthermore, the recent removal of automatic cost-sharing will discourage the provinces from improving their services because suddenly they will be facing double the cost. All of this is because the federal government would give each province $20 or $21 per person for theoretical expenditures for adult care services, regardless whether the province spends $1 or $1,000. The $21 would increase or decrease each year in accordance with a three-year average of the gross national product.

This may be fine for the bureaucrats who develop budgetary details because it will give them a better idea of what their costs are likely to be. But it takes no account at all of the actual record of the provinces in the past. It takes no account of the needs of the people. It is a proposal based simply on a formula that makes it comfortable for the federal government and its finance department. This is just one example of how the government's proposals will affect the provinces adversely.

I want to deal for a moment with the whole question of equalization. The federal government forced the provinces to agree to an equalization program based on what the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) has described as the "representative tax system" approach. The provinces were given two formulas from which to choose. Each formula contained variations in the treatment of the different forms of provincial taxes, and each of them was pretty adverse to the interests of the provinces and their people. For one thing, Mr. Speaker, the formula that would probably be adopted, formula B, equalizes all revenues from oil, gas, metallic and non-metallic minerals to the extent of 50 per cent but places an additional limit in that equalization payments in respect of all resource revenues may not exceed one-third of total equalization payments.

When the federal government put a limit on the equalization of oil and gas revenues it was to be a temporary measure to allow the federal government to adjust to the rapid increase in provincial government revenues from this source. However, given the increase in the importance of non-renewable resource revenues to the provinces—in 1969-1970, resource revenues accounted for 13 per cent to 16 per cent of total equalization and by 1973-1974 this had jumped to 23 per cent to 25 per cent—the federal government decided that a permanent limit was needed.

All the provinces with revenue from non-renewable resources are pleased with the first cap on the formula as it will help reduce some equalization losses. However, the second change poses some dangers. If resource revenues continue to grow in importance—they are now around 29 per cent of equalization payments—the 33.3 per cent ceiling could be reached very quickly and the provinces could start losing potential equalization payments.

It is obvious that the provinces resent this unilateral decision on the part of the federal government. They look upon it, quite correctly, as an invasion in a field of taxation which from the time of confederation has been almost exclusively a provincial preserve. They feel, and I think quite rightly, that their need for financing and their ability to tax is very much less than the federal government's, and that the federal government had no right to put that restriction on it. I think the more we look at the principles contained in the bill, the more we realize the federal government is continuing the policies which have been with us since the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) took office. The federal government feels that because of its constitutional power, and particularly because of its power to tax, it has the complete right to decide unilaterally what shall be the preserve and rights of the federal government and what shall be the rights of provincial governments. We do not believe that in a federal system any federal government, regardless of the party in power, has that right. We do not believe it has that right legally. We do not believe it can be good for federalism and for an efficient and fair division between the federal government and the provinces for the federal government to arrogate for itself those rights.

We believe federalism can only work if the provinces and the federal government are joined in a real partnership in which the rights and the responsibilities of all levels of government are dealt with on a fair and equitable basis. We see no sign that this government has changed that aggressive, unilateral power which it has arrogated unto itself. We believe the course it has been following, and continues to follow, is detrimental to real federalism. We believe it will lead the provinces to rebel and will encourage those people in the province of Quebec who really want a separate state to continue at a greater rate to advocate that policy. We believe it is detrimental to the good and to the welfare of the people of Canada. It is for that reason we believe that members of parliament, regardless of party, ought to vote against the bill.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I must say how delighted I am, particularly with the salutations of my good friend the hon. member for Edmonton Centre (Mr. Paproski). I am pleased to be able to enter the debate, which I will do very briefly, because it gives me an opportunity to explain to the House some of the recent developments in the relationships between the provinces and the federal government on the matter of education. I do not feel it would be useful for me to elaborate on the details of the provisions of the established programs financing legislation which has been explained by the government. That information is readily available. I should like to say at the outset, however, that in my view the new act contains a number of improvements over the old Fiscal Arrangements Act both from the point of view of this government and the provincial governments.

First, the provinces will be able to predict revenues from the federal government much more accurately. Second, provincial governments will have considerably more freedom with regard to how they choose to spend the federal contribution to post-secondary education. They will no longer be tied to a dollar for dollar cost-sharing arrangement, but will be free to establish their own priorities in educational spending without affecting the size of the federal contribution. Third, there will be no more need for the complex and often irritating system of auditing eligible operating expenditures at post-secondary institutions. This should increase the speed of settling accounts between the two levels of government. There are other advantages. I am happy that the new arrangements will have the result of distributing the federal contribution more equitably among provinces than was the case under the old Fiscal Arrangements Act.

I think the move toward an equalized per capita cash entitlement based upon provincial population is good and it should assist those provinces which formerly, on per capita terms, received significantly less than the national average. I should point out that because of the transfer of increased tax room to provinces those provinces with a high tax yield, particularly from personal income tax, will reap the benefit of relatively higher value in tax points.

I should like particularly to tell the House of the change which has taken place over the last few months in the relationship between the provinces and the federal government in matters of education. I am sure many members recall that when the subject of bringing forward the established programs financing arrangements was broached by the Prime Minister

(Mr. Trudeau) last June, he had occasion to remark that there was a necessity for some continuing forum for the discussion of provincial and federal concerns in this matter. In the statement the Prime Minister made on the subject which was tabled in this House in the middle of last June, paragraph 22 dealt with the necessity of combining and co-ordinating federal and provincial efforts. He said:

Combining and co-ordinating federal and provincial efforts require appropriate arrangements for intergovernmental consultation at the ministerial level, so that governments may together consider and develop policies of national significance in the fields of health and post-secondary education.

He went on to say : "In the health field we already have an established forum at ministerial level and that for post-secondary education there have been occasional contacts but we need a more permanent forum." Shortly after I became Secretary of State in September last year, I was charged with responsibility for undertaking discussion with the provinces to see how we could give concrete form to the expressions of the Prime Minister which I just cited. Toward the end of September I met, in Halifax, the council of ministers of education to discuss how we could elaborate on procedures of consultation which would be satisfactory to both levels of government. I think it is fair to say that I found some apprehension on the part of provincial ministers of education about the intentions of the federal government.

Mr. Paproski: Did they let you know?

Mr. Roberts: They not only let me in but they welcomed me and provided me with a very good lobster dinner.

Miss MacDonald: You really did not need it.

Mr. Roberts: That last comment is so unkind that it is unworthy even of the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald). She really hits below the belt. Not only that, but she has managed to derail my train of thought.

● (1530)

I was in the process of saying to you and to members of the House, Mr. Speaker, that I found some apprehension on the part of ministers of education as to exactly what was meant by the word "forum" or what was in the federal government's mind when it spoke about the establishment of a mechanism to discuss common areas of interest relating to education. To a great degree I think that those were problems of semantics, not problems of substance. I found, also, that there was concern that the federal government might have in mind the creation of an institution which would supplant, overcome or replace the council of ministers of education which had been established by the provinces and which had done such good work. I am not attributing this to any particular minister of education, but I almost sensed there were some who feared that the federal government might be desirous of making the Department of Secretary of State into a super-department of education and culture. I believe I was able to allay the fears of the ministers of education in this regard. Certainly, it is not true that it is our intention to impinge upon their area of jurisdiction in relation to education which clearly, under the BNA Act, is a matter of jurisdiction for the provinces. We respect the jurisdiction which they have, and have no desire to interfere with it.

It was exactly because of this concern that we had to establish some continuing procedure for discussion with the provinces which reflected the kinds of views that were expressed yesterday by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands. I would like to refer to her comments as recorded at page 3242 of Hansard of February 21, 1977. I do so not in any spirit of confrontation or antagonism. I should like to reveal that we have, in effect, implemented the kind of approach which I believe she suggested we should take. In her comments, she remarked that she felt we had missed an opportunity to act in a positive and constructive way; that is, to discuss certain questions relating to education with the provinces. She picked out, in particular, the possibility of an interprovincial agreement to ensure unimpeded mobility between provinces for students seeking post-secondary education.

The hon. member lamented that we had let slip an excellent opportunity to undertake discussions on this problem. Later she indicated that she felt bargaining would be far more productive if the provinces and the federal government brought to the negotiations a realization that their common purpose is to reach acceptable settlements and not to find out who will knuckle under to whom. She went on to say:

It is all too easy to see our problem in terms of conflict between the federal government and the provincial governments. All the attention is focused on the arenas of federal-provincial conflicts—

I would like to tell the hon. member that, far from letting the opportunity slip by, what we have done is to establish a continuing method of discussing such problems—and the one she indicated is one which is of great concern to us, namely, a method of discussing with the provinces that question and many others as well. Since September the provinces have come forward in a most co-operative spirit, agreeing with us that such a method for discussion should be established. It is in that spirit of negotiation and realization of our common purposes, to which the hon. member referred in her remarks, that we have undertaken this effort to establish a method of carrying on the dialogue.

At the end of the Halifax meeting in September to which I referred, the council of ministers of education issued a communique. I should like to cite the last paragraph of it which clearly indicates the kind of understanding we have reached with the provinces. It reads:

The council has also been seriously considering its relations with the federal government. Because the concerns of the CMEC cover all aspects of education, the council sees the need to exchange views with the federal government from time to time, depending on the subject, for the purpose of discussing the interface between education policies as determined by the provinces, and various federal programs. It is agreed that the council is the mechanism for such discussions and it will provide further opportunities for them to take place in the future.

Subsequent to that September meeting I met with the executive committee of the council early in November and there was agreement about various matters which might be placed on the agenda for a subsequent meeting between the federal government and the provincial governments. That meeting took place in January, in Quebec City, and two matters of common interest were discussed. The first was the possible renegotiation of the agreements we have with the provinces, commonly called the formula payments, for the support of the official second language and minority language instruction throughout the country, and the second was the question of student assistance. The important question which the hon. member raised is equally one which could be discussed and I will explore the possibility of placing it relatively soon on the agenda for discussion.

So you see, Mr. Speaker, that we have implemented in a satisfactory way, I believe, the kind of intention that was expressed in the Prime Minister's comments last June. I would prefer not to call it a "mechanism" or a "forum". I do not want to get into a semantic confusion which might be misinterpreted. Let me say that we have simply established a continuing arrangement for the discussion of the interface of the policies of the federal government and the provincial governments which touch upon the area of education. It is a method for communication and for discussion of questions of common interest and common concern. Certainly, it does not represent any desire on our part to interfere with or to supplant the council of ministers of education, nor is it in any way an attempt to displace provincial responsibility in relation to education. It is, in essence, a common sense arrangement to discuss matters that are of mutual concern.

It is because of those developments which have taken place in the few months since September, which I believe were very satisfactory developments, that I believe the provincial ministers of education feel we are on the right track. I must confess to the House that I am extremely satisfied with the constructive, positive and welcoming attitude which the ministers of education have adopted in both establishing this procedure for discussion and in the substantive matters we have discussed so far. They have been extremely co-operative, and I welcome that and try to be as co-operative with them as I can. It is because of these developments, of which not all hon. members may be aware, that I thought I should indicate to the House what the situation is now. I should like to point out to hon. members that it was because of this procedural development that we placed in the bill clause 24(3) which refers to the responsibility of the Secretary of State. It reads:

—to consult with the governments of the provinces with regard to the relationship between the programs and activities of the government of Canada and of the government of the provinces that relate to post-secondary education.

I believe that subclause in the legislation embodies or crystallizes the practical and common sense arrangement which we have worked out with the provincial governments.

Mr. Stan Schellenberger (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, wearing a blue flower in my lapel, and with memories of a grand convention held just one year ago, I should like to add my congratulations to the hon. member for Rocky Mountain (Mr. Clark) for a most successful first year.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Paproski: Even Simma thinks he is great.

• (1540)

Mr. Schellenberger: I invite hon. members to reread in Hansard what I thought was an excellent speech given by my colleague the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Murta) yesterday. I thought his speech was very well delivered.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Schellenberger: I wish to make just a few comments in this debate on federal-provincial fiscal arrangements. I would like to leave the details of these arrangements to my colleagues to discuss. My concern is about the way the agreement was arrived at. In December of 1976 the 11 first ministers met in Ottawa to iron-out the details of this new federal-provincial cost-sharing scheme. Eleven individuals had the responsibility to determine a new economic relationship which will affect all Canadians.

The use of federal-provincial conferences has increased tremendously in the past few years, yet few of us have taken the time to examine the implications of this type of decision-making. Federal-provincial conferences deny elected officials from provincial legislative assemblies and from the parliament of Canada the opportunity to represent the views of their constituents. Instead of being based on the collective will as represented by members of legislative assemblies and members of parliament, the decisions arrived at in a first ministers' conference are based on the will of only 11 individuals. While I have few doubts about the competency of these first ministers, I resent the fact that these men are speaking for all of Canada when they do this without a resolution of either the elected assemblies of the provinces or a resolution of the House of Commons. The people of Canada have elected federal and provincial members in the belief that these men and women will not only represent their views but, also, that this representation will have some impact on policy formation. However, when the policy formation takes place at a federal-provincial conference it is clear that we, as elected representatives, have no way of making known the views of our constituents.

The first ministers' conference is a very vivid example of the present trend toward technocratic decision-making in Canada. Unable to comprehend the technicalities of each issue, the premiers and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) come to these conferences armed with a battery of advice and expertise provided to them by public servants. The power of these bureaucrats has reached awesome proportions, and as a result of this increased power the phenomenon of top-down legislation has emerged. Policy originates in the cloistered offices of government departments in Ottawa and only slowly and sporadically seeps down to the general populace. The bureaucrat makes plans without assessing the interests of the citizens to be affected by those plans. After implementation of a certain policy he compounds his first mistake by failing to arrange for adequate and instantaneous feedback on how the policy is working. Insulated from the real wishes of the citizenry which he claims to serve, the bureaucrat assumes the right to set social goals by himself or he accepts them blindly from some higher authority. As a result, individual citizens are becoming increasingly alienated from the political process.

As the elected officials of this country, we have the opportunity and, indeed, the responsibility to combat this alienation. In our capacity as members of parliament, MLAs or municipal councillors, we must make an active and determined effort to become familiar with the wishes and wants of our constituents. Canadians are in an excellent position to offer constructive input. The educational level of our citizenry is higher than it has ever been. It is time that we tapped the knowledge, experience and common sense of ordinary Canadians. Only by doing so will we have the tools necessary to help us in our search for good government policy.

In politics, as in industry, health and welfare and in education, goals have been set without the participation of those affected by them. Such goals will be increasingly hard to meet as citizens become more and more removed from the actual process of establishing them. What we need in this country is a dramatic reassessment of where we, as Canadians, are going. This reassessment must not be made only by politicians, sociologists or the elite, but by the people themselves. All of us must ask ourselves what kind of country we want to have ten, 20 or 30 years from now. Let us talk to the people of our provinces and to the people of Quebec. I believe we should attempt to reactivate the town hall meetings of an earlier era and rekindle the spirit of citizen participation which contributed so greatly to the strength of Canada. Only when people from all walks of life—students, parents, professionals, workers, intellectuals and executives—get together to discuss the options for the future can we be assured that we will have the guidance and the ideas we need.

From time to time all of us feel left out—those in the west, those in Quebec, those in the maritimes, and even, I am sure, those from the great province of Ontario. However, this feeling of alienation does not have to be an inevitable aspect of modern society. We can, and must, construct a system of feedback and of input to all government levels from all people. In light of the Parti Quebecois position on separatism, it is not just advisable that we open the lines of communication; I believe it is imperative.

Among industrialized nations, the United States has led the way in efforts to reinvolve the citizenry in the political process. Recently, the state of Washington conducted a very successful experiment in citizen participation. In its previous attempts to arrive at long-range plans for the state, expert reports had been relied upon and had regularly proved fruitless. Under the slogan "You are the experts", a massive information campaign was launched in the state. A questionnaire was circulated asking citizens what kind of country they wanted to live in in the year 2000. The views of individuals and groups within the state were assembled, and on the basis of these attitudes a citizens' committee selected 11 alternative policies for the future of the state of Washington. A broad publicity campaign was again launched in the press and on television asking citizens for comments on the 11 policy options. After receiving this additional public input the governor of the state of Washington selected the priorities to be followed by government officials in the years to come.

While the idea of such extensive citizen involvement in the policy formation process is extremely innovative, there is no reason why the Washington model could not be adapted to Canada. Whether on a munipical, provincial or national level, consultation with the citizenry would allow for a more democratic decision-making process and a more coherent plan for the future. As a preliminary step we, as members of parliament, might start to canvas our own constituents for their opinions as to what kind of Canada they would like to see by the end of this century. This would force both ourselves and the people we represent to look at the possibilities and the constraints involved in planning for the future.

I ask hon. members to take some time to consider these ideas. The problems facing Canada—whether they be those regarding the economy, the environment, unity, or the quality of life—cannot be resolved solely by the technocrat tools of government bureaucrats. Their input is important, but it must be supplemented by the wisdom of Canadian citizens.

• (1550)

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, Bill C-37, an act regarding federal-provincial fiscal arrangements, comes before parliament at a time when Canadian confederation faces its most serious challenge in our history. All parties in this House agree on the need to maintain our federal system. I think we all believe that the separation of Quebec from the rest of Canada would have serious consequences for that province and for the rest of Canada. The main question which members of this House and the Canadian people must consider is: how can we persuade the people of Quebec that it is to our mutual interest to retain confederation? I submit it will not be done by making inflammatory statements or taking inflexible positions. It will not be done by making the issue a personal contest between the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Trudeau) and the Premier of the province of Quebec.

Miss MacDonald: Hear, hear!

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): It would be unfortunate if the debate on federalism were to degenerate to that level. In the final analysis, the decision to hold Canada together will rest with the people of Quebec. It is our job to convince the people of that province that it is in their best interest to remain in confederation and to assure them that they can safeguard their language, culture and traditions within a federal system.

The federal government has not done too well in this regard. In 1968, when the Prime Minister led his party's general election campaign of that year, he poured scorn on the suggestion of the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield), then the leader of the Conservative party, and on my suggestion, then as leader of the New Democratic Party, that we should consider the concept of "des deux nations," that we should consider a particular status for Quebec despite the fact that Quebec has had that particular status since 1867. The Prime Minister told the people of Canada that his inflexible position would ensure a one-Canada policy. In 1968 the Parti Quebecois had the support of about 8 per cent of the people in the province of Quebec. Now, in 1977, they are the government of the province of Quebec. Surely that ought to teach the government and the rest of us something, that the approach to this problem must be one of flexibility, good will and understanding. I think that the Prime Minister in recent weeks has begun to relent; he is now somewhat less adamant than he has been for the last nine years.

I am not so naive as to think that concessions offered to Quebec will change the minds of confirmed separatists. I think those who are convinced that Quebec should become a sovereign power probably hold that position so firmly that no amount of concessions will make any difference. It would be wrong to make concessions which could weaken the national government of this country to the point where it had not the necessary powers to govern the country and to enable this country to operate as a nation. I am equally convinced that a majority, probably a substantial majority, of the people of Quebec want to remain in confederation if they can be convinced that within the federal system their province, along with the other provinces of Canada, will be treated fairly and justly. It is the responsibility of the House of Commons to demonstrate that under our federal system all regions of Canada are treated equally and fairly. Unfortunately, the government has chosen this particular time to introduce a measure which is both unfair and discriminatory.

The provinces are being compelled, with a gun at their heads, to accept a revision of fiscal arrangements, a revision which has enabled the federal government, under the guise of a restraint policy, to transfer many of its financial burdens to provincial governments, provincial governments which have a narrower financial capacity than the federal government for coping with these burdens. Hon. members have heard talk, for example, of the revenue guarantee program and the changes the federal government has instituted unilaterally. Those changes will mean a reduction of over $400 million in the revenues our provinces will receive.

Also let us consider cost-sharing programs. Under those programs provinces formerly were entitled to claim from the government of Canada 50 per cent of the money they spent on hospital insurance, medicare, post-secondary education and welfare expenditures incurred under the Canada Assistance Plan. The Secretary of State (Mr. Roberts) said this afternoon that the provinces will be pleased with this change, with this alteration in the 50-50 division of expenditures, because it will relieve them of the necessity to spend dollar for dollar what the federal government spends. Surely that statement was the height of absurdity, for it was the federal government which was required to spend dollar for dollar what the provinces spent. Now the provinces will have certain responsibilities in these important areas without any assurance that the federal government will match their expenditures dollar for dollar. Instead, the provinces are to be given tax points for personal income tax, corporation taxes and cash grants.

A government spokesman argued that this change to tax points and cash grants will provide the flexibility which the old 50-50 cost-sharing programs did not provide. That argument will not hold up under examination. It is true that under the 50-50 cost-sharing program there was a certain lack of flexibility because the federal government said it would only meet certain costs on a 50-50 basis. Consequently, the provinces were compelled more and more to build acute treatment hospitals instead of more nursing homes, instead of providing home nursing services and instead of providing meals on wheels. That flexibility could have been provided within the 50-50 cost-sharing program by saying to the provinces, "We will meet 50 per cent of what you spend on hospital insurance, medicare, post-secondary education and welfare assistance, no matter whether you divert it to one part of the program or to another aspect of it."

One of the most unfair features of the tax points system is that it treats the provinces differently. One tax point can mean $10 per person in one province, and $4 per person in another. Surely that is manifestly unfair. The inevitable result will be that some provinces will get more revenue from these tax points allocated to them than other provinces. Consequently, some provinces will be able to establish a higher standard of service in cost-sharing fields than other provinces. We will have destroyed what has been a matter of pride in this country, namely, that we have national standards for hospital care, medicare, post-secondary education and welfare. When we begin to have different standards for these important services for the people of Canada, we embark upon a road which will lead eventually to the balkanization of this country. The government is moving in a dangerous direction when it undertakes such a step. Inevitably, depending upon tax points for financing a substantial part of this program will result in disparities between the provinces.

Yesterday I listened to the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald). As reported at page 3241 of Hansard she made the statement that the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent) was less than honest when talking about this disparity of treatment between the provinces because of the transitional tax equalization provisions. I have tremendous respect for the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands. However, I ask her to look at the total picture—not at any estimate which I have made, but at the figures which have been filed by the Department of Finance. I invite the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) to make these documents available to the members of this House and certainly to make them available when the bill is being discussed in committee.

On the basis of the tax differences on the total receipts which the provinces will get from the fiscal year 1977-78 to the fiscal year 1986-87, a ten-year period, what do we find? We find that in the ten years covered the province of Ontario will have a cumulative increase of $1,300 million. The province of British Columbia, which gets nothing for the first six years, will get a cumulative increase of $200 million. The remaining eight provinces of Canada will get no increase at all for the first nine years. In the last year the amounts of money will be negligible: Newfoundland, $1 million; Prince Edward Island, $200,000; Nova Scotia, $1.9 million; New Brunswick, $1.3 million; Quebec, $10.4 million; Manitoba, $1.7 million; Saskatchewan, $1.7 million; Alberta, $1.6 million.

Outside of Ontario and British Columbia, the other provinces in the first nine years, according to the government's own figures, get no increase. I submit that this is equalization in reverse. The two provinces with the highest per capita income will get more money, and Ontario will get more money every year. The poorer provinces will get nothing by way of an increase in the first nine years. I submit there is something seriously wrong with this system of tax points. It can only lead to continual aggravation of the disparities which now exist between the wealthy and the poorer regions of Canada.

This scuttling of the 50-50 cost-sharing arrangement, replacing it with tax points and cash grants, leaves all the risks to the provinces. Under the 50-50 sharing program they knew that if they spent $1 million the federal government would match it with $1 million. Now they are entirely dependent upon what the tax points allocated to them will bring in. Therefore, any decline in the gross national product will affect them adversely.

Every member knows that the amount of sickness in the country, the number of people who have to be taken care of through welfare, and the number of old people who have to be given custodial care, does not go down because the gross national product has gone down. If any government is in a position to take the risk of a drop in the gross national product, it is the federal government. It has some responsibility in that situation. However, the provinces will have to bear the burden of increased costs at a time of economic recession, the very time when the revenues they receive to meet adverse economic conditions will be declining.

Under the proposals in this legislation there will be very little for new programs: the amount available is negligible. The provinces will receive one-half of a tax point equalized to the national average, plus an equivalent amount in cash. This is estimated to give the provinces between $200 million and $400 million over the next five years, despite the fact that the Minister of National Health and Welfare in 1973 offered the provinces $600 million over the following five years.

My hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has already explained what this change in financial arrangements will mean in the field of adult care. Whereas under the Canada Assistance Plan costs have been shared 50-50, the provinces are now going to get eight tax points, and for the purpose of providing adult care, $20 a head. What will be the result of that? Look at the discrepancies. British Columbia, an additional $23 million; Ontario, an additional $50 million; Alberta, an additional $19 million. Prince Edward Island will lose $2 million; Saskatchewan will gain $2 million; Manitoba will gain $800,000. But next year the amount will decline. Is it any wonder that the Saskatchewan minister of finance, according to a report in the Globe and Mail this morning, said:

> The federal decision to change the method of cost-sharing is a cruel blow to the aged and handicapped in Saskatchewan. Where we had hoped to provide a significantly enriched level of service, we now will find it extremely difficult to do so, given the loss of federal cost-sharing dollars.

He went on to say:

> The $20 per capita will barely cover our losses under the Canada Assistance Plan in the first year. In future years we will actually receive less money. And with less federal money we are expected to increase the range of low-cost health services in the provinces.

I do not think any hon. member who looks carefully at this situation could fail to agree that in times of economic adversity the responsibility of the provinces increases. This legislation makes it almost certain that provincial revenues will decline at the precise time when economic adversity makes itself most felt. I want to suggest to the government that the least it could do when this obnoxious legislation goes to the committee would be to average the tax points for the cost-sharing programs to the highest province, in order to remove the disparities which are inherent in this bill. Levelling the tax points to the highest province would remove some of the disparities. Moreover, it would not leave the provinces to take all the risks, and it might provide some funds for developing new programs.

I might point out that this is the position taken by the provinces themselves. I have in my hand a copy of a speech which was delivered at the conference of finance ministers on December 6 and 7, 1976. It was made by the hon. Merv Leitch, the provincial treasurer of Alberta, on behalf of all the provinces. I underline that fact. This was one of the few occasions at a federal-provincial conference when one spokesman was able to present the views of all the provincial representatives. I will read just one paragraph of what he had to say on behalf of all the provinces.

> It is essential to our proposal that these tax points be equalized to the level of the highest yielding province. The proposed equalized tax point transfer is viewed as having a very special purpose. It would permit all provinces to benefit equally from the increasing yield of the tax points. At the same time, it would provide all provinces with the potential to achieve the same standard of per capita program expenditure. As the Prime Minister stated last June: "There should be greater equality in per capita terms among the provinces with regard to the amount of federal funds they receive under the programs." This is a federal principle that all provinces endorse. We are not prepared, however, to accept any disparity. It would be illogical to equalize to the national average if the number of points to be transferred were calculated with reference to the province with the highest per capita yield. More importantly, it would be inequitable because it would lead to wide divergences in the per capita value of the total federal contribution.

He went on to say:

> We emphasize that we are not seeking equalization to the top for general equalization.

In other words, the provinces were not asking for general equalization financing. They were urging that in this cost-sharing program the tax points allotted to the provinces should be equalized to the highest province in order that there might be no disparities and in order that the per capita benefits to the provinces would, on the whole, be the same right across Canada. I submit that failure to act in this way will result in a patchwork of standards across Canada. It will create second-class citizens in some regions. I find myself obliged to ask the government whether this is the best they can offer the Canadian people. In particular, I ask whether this is the best they can offer the people of Quebec whom we are seeking to persuade to stay in Canada because we support each other and co-operate to provide fair and equal standards across the country.

One of the questions which every member of parliament ought to ask, and one which I hope the people of Canada will ask themselves, is this: why do we wish to retain a federal system? We are not likely to keep Canada together by rhetoric and sentiment. There must be a raison d'être for staying in the Canadian family. Like all members, I have emotional ties with this country. All of us have warm recollections of various regions of Canada, its environment, its scenery, its people. All of us are challenged by the possibility of building in Canada a society which is different, a country whose tolerance and diversity make it outstanding. But I base my belief in the need to retain a federal system in this country on three things. First, I believe that only a united Canada can give us true national independence. I am an independent. I believe in independence, not Quebec independence but Canadian independence. And we have not got it. No country is independent when two-thirds of its economy is owned outside its borders. No country in the world today finds more of its resources held by foreign corporations than has Canada. We shall not achieve independence by breaking this country into fragments. There is a much better hope that Canada can be independent by staying together than by breaking up. One of the first areas to be absorbed would be the province of Quebec where they would lose what has been theirs ever since 1760—the right to their language, their culture and their legal system.

I believe that economic progress is more likely if we have a national government with the constitutional powers necessary to promote economic growth and full employment. You cannot appeal to people in Quebec in connection with the benefits of federalism as long as there is 13 per cent unemployment in that province; they are not going to believe you. The Premier of Quebec says he wants to establish a customs union and common market. I want to point out we already have that in Canada. In the northern half of this continent we have a great free trade area in which goods, people and capital move freely back and forth. When the Premier of Quebec says he wants to have a customs union that is something similar to the European Economic Community, I think he should be reminded that the European Economic Community is moving eventually toward political union, not away from it, and that to take any part of Canada out of confederation is to move against the stream of history. It should be remembered that there is little value in pulling out of Canada if it means we are going to have something which is not as good as we have at the present time.

I believe the people of Quebec as well as the people in the rest of Canada will understand that if we have a national government which applies itself to the economic growth of this country, to solving the problems of unemployment and the disparity between the different regions of Canada, then we are giving Quebec an inducement to stay in confederation.

Finally, I believe in a federal system, because by co-operating together we can attain national standards of health, welfare and education which guarantee all Canadians the basic rights of human well-being no matter in what region they may reside.

My quarrel with the legislation now before us is that it fails to provide equality of opportunity at a time when we need to be demonstrating the worth of Canadian federalism. This legislation is a retrogressive measure which undoes the work which was done by people like the right hon. W. L. Mackenzie King, the right hon. Louis St. Laurent, the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), and the right hon. Lester B. Pearson.

Mr. Parent: And Trudeau.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): My hon. friend says, "And Trudeau". I will come to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) in a moment, if he wants me to. I had the privilege of sitting in federal-provincial conferences with Mr. King, Mr. St. Laurent and the right hon. member for Prince Albert, and I sat across the House when Mr. Pearson was prime minister of this country. One of the things that characterizes these four ex-prime ministers of Canada is that they were convinced that if we were going to hold this country together we had to maintain certain national standards so that all Canadians, no matter whether they live, on the Pacific coast, the Atlantic coast, the north or the south, no matter what their language, creed or racial origin, will get fair and equal treatment and that there will be no second-class or third-class citizens in this country. My hon. friend across the way wants me to add the Prime Minister to my quartet. He is heading a government which right now is moving to destroy these national standards.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): This is a government which is moving backwards to create disparity between provinces, which can only result in resentment and hostility; and if it is carried far enough it could lead to the dismemberment of this country.

Mr. Parent: What you are saying is not worthy of you. You should know better than that.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Just read Bill C-37.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. The hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas) has the floor.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member seems to be getting very excited. I can only assume he has not read the bill; or if he has, he does not understand it. The fact is that this bill will destroy the very thing which since 1945 successive federal governments have been seeking to establish, namely, national standards for the people of Canada by which the federal government, through equalization payments and sharing the cost of programs on a 50-50 basis, could assure that a little province like Prince Edward Island would be able to give its people services that are comparable to the wealthiest province of Canada, the province of Ontario. I have shown, by using the federal government's own figures, that rather then equalizing revenue, the bill before us gives the preponderance of that revenue to the wealthy provinces at the expense of the poorer provinces.

Let me conclude, Mr. Speaker, by saying that if this country should break up—and God forbid that should happen—it will be because we have failed those who have gone before us. This country was founded by men and women who had a dream that it was possible to bring together diverse groups of people with different cultural backgrounds, who spoke different languages but who could live together in a spirit of tolerance and good will. They believed it was possible that the strong would help the weak, that the wealthy provinces would help succour the poorer provinces and that we would build a standard of Canadian living which would be our pride. If we fail to do that, then we are not worthy of those in whose footsteps we follow. My plea to the Canadian House of Commons is that we should make up our minds that we will not allow either apathy or bigotry to destroy the Canadian dream.

Mr. Bob Kaplan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I want to begin by assuring all members that I am not standing up to disagree with the noble sentiments expressed by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas). All members, all federalists in the House and in the country, must surely support the goals he has put before us. What I am standing up to say is that this is not a bill which will destroy Canadian federalism. What would destroy Canadian federalism would be to take the kind of position that that hon. member advocated. It is true that we have achieved high national standards in the field of health, the field to which he referred particularly and to which I will return in a moment. But what is the trouble with the socialists in this House is that they have no confidence in the provincial governments to maintain these programs which constitionally are under their responsibility.

Socialists want to centralize all power. They want Ottawa to determine what should be the level of post-secondary education. They want the federal government to determine what the level of help should be. They want the federal government to determine the way hospitals should be run.

● (1630)

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Nonsense.

[The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner).]

Mr. Kaplan: More centralism is not the salvation of federalism in Canada. The salvation of federalism in Canada is to enable the provinces to do things within their constitutional jurisdictions. And that is what this legislation is about.

It is not a question of money. I am going to come to the question of money in a moment, because the socialists even have that backwards, though thankfully the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald) did not. The hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands read a chart to try to show—wrongly, I will argue, and as I will demonstrate—the perverse impact of equalization payments.

There is a certain irony in listening to opposition parties as they talk about the government's legislative program. Yesterday I listened to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). I will summarize what he had to say and then read some of his remarks. If this legislation goes through, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I realize the hon. member is confused, but he is referring to the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow).

Mr. Kaplan: Thank you. If this legislation goes through, he argues, the quality of post-secondary education will go down; student tuition fees will go up; post-secondary education institutions across the country will be threatened, and many will have to close; it will be more difficult for young Canadians to get a good education. Looking at the aspect of health, he says the health of Canadians will be adversely affected by this legislation; their health will begin to deteriorate; high user charges will have to be introduced, he argues; and says it is not far down the road before the quality of medical care will go down. Let me quote a few sentences from what he said yesterday. As reported at page 3271 of Hansard, he said:

> The provinces will have to reduce the level of service they have been providing. Fewer young people will be able to attend our universities and community colleges. There will be less of a guarantee of payment for hospital care. People will not receive the same kind of service from their doctors. Either all that will happen or the provinces will have to increase their fees. University fees will have to be increased substantially. It will be necessary to implement a deterrent fee for those entering hospital. It will be normal for people to have to pay a charge to see their doctor.

Doom and gloom, Mr. Speaker. That reminds me of what the Conservative party was saying ten years ago when medicare was introduced. I do not have the appropriate Hansard before me, but I can get it if necessary. They said that if we entered this program the quality of medicare would go down. What has happened? The quality of medicare has gone up. They said doctors would leave the country in great numbers if the program—the changes to which are now of such concern to the socialists—were introduced.

On the contrary, in the last few years there has been a net immigration of doctors under this legislation, not emigration. They argued ten years ago that medical schools and universities would close down and thay young people would stop wanting to be doctors. The opposite has happened. In the last ten years not only have medical schools been as full as ever, but more have had to be built. They said the cost of health care would go way up. What do we find in fact? We find that we put less of our gross national product into health care than the United States, where they do not even have universal coverage. Our system is less expensive than the free enterprise system that the Conservatives tried to retain.

There was the same kind of gloom and doom from the Conservatives ten years ago when the programs were introduced. Now that the government is bringing forward changes consistent with federalism we are hearing gloom and doom from the socialist party about things that will not happen. The level of post-secondary education will not go down, and the quality of medical care will not go down. I doubt if user charges will be introduced, although that will be a matter of jurisdiction for the provinces. That is the constitutional responsibility of the provinces, and it is largely up to them under our federalism to control the quality and level of post-secondary education and medical care that they receive.

I can hear the New Democratic Party getting ready to come back with figures about cost. The change from cost-sharing to tax points proposed in the legislation, they say, takes it out of the power of the poorer provinces to maintain the level of medical services. That is another irony, Mr. Speaker, because exactly the opposite is going to happen. Tax points are far more dynamic and bouyant than costs. It has been shown in the past, and will continue to be true, that the value of tax points will increase faster than the cost of medicare programs and post-secondary education programs. Tax points are something the provinces want; they grow faster than costs.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): If you believe that, give them a revenue guarantee.

Mr. Kaplan: I will come to the revenue guarantee. What about poorer provinces? Their tax points are worth less there than the tax points of other provinces, they say. But this legislation does not just give the provinces tax points; it gives them tax points equalized to the national average. The hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands read some figures. I do not know where he got them from, but he said they were transitional payments to provincial governments. That is not equalization; and the fact that British Columbia and Alberta were getting the highest transitional payments demonstrates that under the cost-shared programs the greatest beneficiaries have been the richest provinces. In the transitional period they get the biggest benefit because they get the biggest benefit from cost-shared programs, both the ones before us today and all other cost-shared programs. Fifty per cent has to be produced by a province, rich or poor, to get a matching 50 per cent from the federal government. It has been easier for Ontario, British Columbia and Alberta to buy federal help.

The tax points will be turned over to the provinces whether or not they spend the money on these programs. We hope they will spend the money on these programs, but it will be up to provincial voters ultimately to determine the level of services which the provinces provide. It is in them that the constitution has reposed that responsibility.

Wanting to support federalism that truly works, we are putting tax resources back behind the provinces, which is the level of government that has responsibility over these programs. Tax points are equalized. That is important. We have to look at the correct chart and not at the one the hon. member read on transitional payments. If we look at the chart on equalization payments, we find that when a poor province receives a tax point, if it received less than the national average the federal government—out of the taxes of the rest of the country—will make that amount up to the national average. So tax points for the poorer provinces are equal to the national average. Far from moving away from financial responsibilities for these programs, the federal government retains responsibility for keeping payments equalized to make sure they are as valuable to any particular province as they are on the national average.

Some hon. members may ask why the provinces are not cheering with joy if this legislation is as good a deal as I have described. They are not cheering because they got together—the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands paid tribute to them for this—and agreed on the position to present to the federal government.

It was very easy for them to agree on the highest common denominator of the demands of provincial governments. That was not an agreement, Mr. Speaker; it was a shopping-basket that contained the maximum demands of every province. I do not know if it can be called an agreement. The provinces that were concerned about tax points got tax points; the provinces that are poorer and looked to tax points said, "Let's have them equalized up to the highest level, the level of the province that is best off." It is an agreement for the provinces to get together and say, "Let us demand both", and then the demands of those provinces that prefer the cost-sharing programs, the ones that are able to write cheques for 50-cent dollars and expect the federal government to make up the rest of it, are in that shopping-basket as well.

I attended those meetings. I attended the finance ministers' conference, then the first ministers' conference, and then the finance ministers' conference that followed—and I am not surprised that the provinces went away sounding angry. They wanted the revenue guarantee to be continued which, when it was introduced, was clearly identified as a three-year transitional program. Then it was extended to be a five-year program. The five years are over and the responsibility of the federal taxpayer to transfer funds to the provinces has ended. I am not surprised that the provinces want the program to be continued, but the fact is that the federal government never agreed to continue it. It was put forward definitively as a five-year program. I am not surprised that the provinces are angry, but also I am not surprised that the federal government stuck to its guns and insisted that the guarantee program end after five years.

There is legitimate federal concern about the transfer of tax points. I think that those of us who want to see a vigorous federalism recognize that we need to have a federal government that is capable of moving in and supporting various national programs. When some of the poorer provinces express concern about the number of tax points, what they mean is that as more and more tax points are transferred away, the federal government loses the economic base which it needs to provide assurance of some level of national standards.

I do not know how far Ottawa can go on turning over tax points and still retain the power of equalizing, because equalization is funded out of the remaining tax points that the federal government continues to collect. At some point—and I would argue that we are fast approaching it—the federal government should take the position that this is as far as it will go. We cannot guarantee revenues indefinitely. We cannot equalize to the highest average and still give ourselves the economic base to ensure that this country has national standards in areas where these become endangered. It concerns me that the federal government may lose the economic clout that it needs to do its job.

I am not worried that the poorer provinces will no longer be able to continue to meet their responsibilities under these programs. That argument is a red herring. I am not worried that some of the provinces went home sounding angry, or that all the provinces went home with something to grumble about. They did not get 100 per cent of what they wanted. But if they had received it, they would have emptied the federal resources to such an extent that Canada would have been seriously weakened; we would have lost the power of manoeuvrability that the federal government, at the centre of so large and diverse a country, requires.

We do not expect the provinces to come cheering about this fiscal arrangements act, but what is disappointing is to find the opposition parties dragging out red herrings and attacking them, instead of wondering—in what I would submit is a more critical issue—where the federal government goes from here. Is our federal tax base adequate to discharge our responsibilities in a diverse country which is threatened, as we all know, by all kinds of internal and external problems?

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased that I can participate today in a debate on this bill on federal-provincial fiscal arrangements. Members of the House are in a difficult position as we debate this bill, in that we are facing a plan which has already been agreed to by 11 persons, namely, the first ministers of every province, and the federal Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). So we are facing a fait accompli. We are really asked to give rubber-stamp approval to something that has been hammered out behind closed doors.

I think I understand that much of the negotiation that takes place between the federal and provincial governments must take place behind closed doors. Obviously, every one of the persons involved comes to the bargaining table with a plan of what they would like to see incorporated in any agreement. Also, I am sure, in their more realistic moments—after they have looked at the losses—they say, "This is what I must have in order to go back to my provincial electors and say to them that I have bargained in good faith, and this is the best I could get".

I understand that. But what I feel is basically wrong with the approach of the government is that at no time prior to the negotiations were we given, in the House, an opportunity to discuss the broad outlines of what we are debating. All we can do now is say "Yes" or "No". We are in the same position in which the provinces found themselves when they were told, "Here is the deal—take it or leave it. But we have decided that this is what the deal will be". I know, as I look at members of the House who have attended these negotiations personally, that the federal government proposed a program and sugar-coated its proposals in such a way that the provinces had no alternative but to opt in. However, once having opted in, as the years went by the rules were changed—again by the power of the federal government. The government wonders why there are strains in federalism. I think it is self-evident. A strain is bound to occur in the system if changes are brought into the rules of the game halfway through the game which was played in good faith.

There is no question that the provinces will have to bear an increased burden. Not only will there be an increased burden on the provinces but there will be an increased burden on the municipalities. We all know that the municipalities have not seen an appreciable increase in the base on which they can collect taxes. It has been primarily the municipal land tax on which they have relied. Also, throughout Canada they have gone to their provincial governments and said, "If we are to provide the basic services of transportation, education, and the basic infrastructure to run municipal organizations, we will need more tax points from the provincial governments". But the provinces do not have the ability to bring more money to municipal affairs. In fact, the Manitoba government desperately tried to project to Manitobans the financial straits in which the provincial government finds itself. In Manitoba 40.5 per cent of the federal tax is for the provincial government and another 2 per cent goes to the municipal governments, for a total of 42.5 per cent. The provincial rate is 42.5 per cent of the federal rate. Already an attempt is being made to project the fact that the provinces will not have the ability to give municipalities the resources which are needed for services.

In this discussion I want to give the House my views on how I see the federal state operating. I want to do this not in a partisan manner but to present to the House the feelings of a person who has lived in western Canada all his life and who is, first of all, a Canadian. I am sure all members of this House are in that position, but if we are to understand the federalist system and if we are convinced that unity must be preserved we must also be bold enough to present to the House the position our constituents back home are taking. Having said that, how do we see our responsibility, as federal officials, to bring to the attention of our constituents the reasons Canada should remain a country and, why unity is so desperately important and the federal union must survive?

The very fact that Canada is a federalist state already should be an indication to all of us that we have a unique situation in this country. The fathers of Confederation did not choose a unitary state. When only four provinces were joined, a federalist state was created. It was recognized then that the various parts did not have the same background or the same language, and while their first aspiration was a united country, they also knew that that country would not survive if the decisions of a central body were to be forced on the collective parts. The very fact that we have a federalist state demands from all of us that tolerance has to be shown and, especially in a federalist state, that need for tolerance is extremely important.

In 1968 the Prime Minister came to power. He was elected by the majority of Canadians. I think all of us would admit that he was the repository of a tremendous amount of good will throughout the country. In fact, even those of us who did not support his party in 1968 had to admit that many people in our areas supported the Prime Minister and what he stood for.

Mr. Brisco: How times have changed!

Mr. Epp: Indeed, how times have changed! But I think we would all admit that that was the case in 1968. The Prime Minister said very clearly at the time that he was going to bring Quebec into the mainstream of Canadian life. The majority of Canadians accepted those words at face value, hence the election of the Prime Minister. That question has dominated Canadian affairs for the entire tenure of the Prime Minister. What have been the results? In a long and wide-ranging article which appeared in the Economist dated February 12, 1977, the writer went into great detail not only with regard to Canada's federalist future but also with regard to an analysis of the various parts of Canada. The writer said this about the Prime Minister's record:

> Canada is not a unitary country and never has been; it is Mr. Trudeau's tragedy that he has failed to make it one. Perhaps he has exhausted his role as a leader of all Canada by concentrating too exclusively on federal solutions for Canada's problems, when the provinces have been demanding more room in government for themselves.

Further in the article the writer said:

> From the Pacific until one reaches Ontario, Ottawa and Mr. Trudeau are anathema—focal points for a paranoic hatred of so much that the federal government has done to redistribute their wealth to the poorer provinces east of the Ottawa valley and to force them, as they say in their morbid shorthand, to learn French when they did not want to. To this observer, federal Canada seemed vulnerable—

An hon. Member: Who wrote that?

Mr. Epp: At the beginning of my remarks I said I was going to try to show the House the point of view of western Canada on how to bring about a united country. The carping of hon. members opposite will not help in any way. However, I want to continue what I have to say. What about the view which has been expressed so frequently in the last few days? In the press there has been an overabundance of speculation that in the west there is no recognition of the aspirations of Quebec. I was deeply moved by the comments of the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Murta) yesterday. He spoke as a western Canadian and put forward his view, and the view of his constituents with respect to Quebec staying in confederation, very clearly. As western Canadians, we want Quebec in confederation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Epp: As western Canadians, we also want to be part of confederation. That is Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Epp: With great respect to hon. members opposite, I say that more attention will have to be paid to what the west is saying—although not by way of blackmail. It is saying it has some legitimate grievances and legitimate aspirations. We in the west believe that we can contribute to the Canadian confederation.

Mr. Speaker, if I may call it five o'clock, I will continue at eight o'clock.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 40, it is my duty to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Carleton-Charlotte (Mr. McCain)—Fisheries—Extensive herring kill in Bay of Fundy—Request for determination of cause and assistance to fishermen; the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall)—Transport— Request of Atlantic provinces for funds to improve TransCanada Highway—Government position; the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock (Mr. Friesen)—External Affairs—Cuba—Suggested reconsideration of relationship in view of support of Rhodesian guerrillas.

[Translation]

It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, public bills, private bills and notices of motions.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' PUBLIC BILLS

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Motion No. 12, in the name of the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Rynard).

Some hon. Members: Stand.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The motion stands at the request of the government.

Statistics Act

STATISTICS ACT

AMENDMENT TO PERMIT PERSONS WHO OBJECT TO ANSWERING QUESTIONS TO DO SO WITHOUT PENALTY, ETC.

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands) moved that Bill C-213, to amend the Statistics Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

She said: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of Bill C-213 is to remove from the Statistics Act the penalty provisions contained in section 29 which are directed against those individuals who refuse to answer Statistics Canada questions. The two exceptions—and I emphasize these—would be questions contained in any census of population, or agriculture. As the law presently stands, persons who refuse, or neglect to answer virtually any questions posed by Statistics Canada, are subject to criminal conviction and a maximum fine and/or a penalty of $500 and three months' imprisonment, respectively.

Before I proceed further, Mr. Speaker, I should like to announce that it is my intention to propose an amendment to Bill C-213 at committee stage. It has been brought to my attention that the effect of Bill C-213 as it presently stands would be to exempt corporations as well as individuals from the necessity of complying with requests for information from Statistics Canada—information other than, of course, that which is solicited for the purposes of a population or agricultural census. It was not my intention when drafting Bill C-213 to have its relieving provisions apply to corporations. This unintended consequence would occur as a result of the definition of the word "person" in the Interpretation Act. According to that act, the word "person" includes a corporation. I will, therefore, be seeking at committee stage an amendment to Bill C-213 which would limit the application of its relieving provisions to individuals.

I have been advised by a spokesman from Statistics Canada that penalty provisions of the kind contained in section 29 have been a part of the legislation under which Statistics Canada and its predecessor, the Dominion Bureau of Statistics, have operated since the latter's creation in 1918. Penalties of this severity may have been appropriate in the early years of the operation of this agency when only minimal census details were requested. However, the times—and Statistics Canada—have changed. Statistics Canada is now a much more sophisticated data-collecting instrument. It is no longer concerned with merely the minimal details of the population of Canada—for example, the age, sex and number of its citizens—but is concerned with a host of other matters as well.

There is not merely a population census every five and ten years, but a whole series of complex surveys which are conducted on an almost continuous basis and which relate to areas such as the level of unemployment and the consumer habits of Canadians so far as food and housing are concerned. The recipients of these questionnaires are chosen at random by computer and are often required to complete detailed surveys, some of which exceed 16 pages in length and require considerable time to complete. People have written to me complaining that it has taken them two or three hours to complete lengthy questionnaires. In the case of the so-called labour force survey, the recipient must submit to not just one questionnaire but to a series of monthly questionnaires for a period of six months.

The questions contained within these surveys often demand of the citizen very detailed information on matters which may be of privacy to him, or her. One recent survey, for example, requested information from the householder as to the amount of alcohol and tobacco consumed. Another requested information as to the degree to which child care facilities were utilized by the respondent. The former of these two surveys, the food expenditure survey of 1974, also contained questions relating to the ages, salaries, professions, mortgages, stocks and bonds, land interests and, finally, food expenditures of the respondent and his family. This last item contained questions dealing with the amounts of money spent on meals eaten out, dry cleaning, laundry, reading material, personal care articles, the estimated cost of home-grown vegetables used, and gifts received. Space was even included for the names of the stores where the items were bought, as well as their location. The housing survey of the same year was equally detailed and contained, for example, a series of questions relating to the nature of the bathroom facilities contained within the respondent's home.

As one can see from these examples, these surveys can be extremely detailed and often contain requests for information of a personal nature which the recipient of the questionnaire, for reasons of personal privacy, may wish not to reveal. The problem is particularly acute in the case of rural and small town areas where the surveyor may be an acquaintance of the respondent. The surveyor, although he is sworn to secrecy and is subject to heavy penalties if it can be proved that he violated this confidentiality, is required, depending upon the nature of the survey, to either direct the questions verbally to the householder, in which case he also records the responses of the householder, or scan the questionnaire after it has been completed by the householder.

These practices can, naturally enough, cause a great deal of consternation among respondents. If a respondent is reluctant to answer the survey as a result of these procedures, the surveyor is—in the case of some but not all of the surveys—instructed to advise the householder that he can send the completed form directly to Statistics Canada rather than having it pass through the hands of the surveyor. I am aware of this practice. This option is not, however, sanctioned by law. It is merely a matter of policy which could, where it exists at all, be withdrawn at any time by Statistics Canada. Nor, as I am informed, is the surveyor in these cases instructed to advise the respondent of the option at their first encounter, but only after some hesitation has been expressed by the respondent.

According to Statistics Canada, the purpose of the penalty provisions within the act is to ensure that the validity of statistical information which is collected is not distorted by the refusal of some recipients to respond. But Statistics Canada also admits that the majority of Canadians contacted are more than willing to co-operate with the requests for information without the provisions of section 29 even having to be mentioned. This raises the question why the penalty provisions are required at all. If the refusal rate is indeed so low, why is it necessary for the threat of prosecution to be used in order to coerce the small minority of Canadians who refuse, on grounds of principle, to reveal information which is in many cases of a highly personal nature? Why could not Statistics Canada simply substitute the reluctant householders with others who show no reluctance? And if the refusal rate is indeed so low, Mr. Speaker, how real is the danger of statistical distortion in the first place?

Another point I should like to raise is the extent to which section 29 is actually used as a threat. According to Statistics Canada the interviewers are not allowed to threaten the respondent with legal action. However, if they are asked they will indicate, and I am quoting directly a Statistics Canada official, "the Statistics Act provides a legal authority to collect the data." There are two difficulties with this statement. The first is that what Statistics Canada tells its surveyors may not be what they in fact do.

In a national survey, an undertaking of some magnitude, it is almost inevitable that a few of the surveyors chosen, no matter how selectively they are screened, will go about the performance of their duties in a manner which is heavy-handed and which would not be condoned by their superiors. The correspondence I have received from constituents and other concerned Canadians would certainly bear this out.

The second point is that the distinction between the threat of prosecution and merely having pointed out the legal authority by which Statistics Canada collects information is a very fine and subtle one. Most Canadians are law-abiding citizens who genuinely desire to fulfil their obligations under the law. Knowledge that they are breaking the law and are subject to prosecution is liable to be, for the ordinary citizen, as compelling a reason to comply with requests for information as an actual threat of prosecution itself. In fact, for many Canadians knowledge that they are breaking the law is a terrifying experience. The final point I would like to raise is that Statistics Canada indicates that prosecution of individuals pursuant to section 29 occurs very rarely and only after a great deal of deliberation by the agency. The last prosecutions arose out of the 1971 census and were ten in number.

Statistics Canada states that as a matter of policy prosecutions are laid only in regard to those refusals that relate to a census of population. If this is indeed the case and prosecutions are, as a matter of policy, brought only in regard to refusals which arise out of a population census, why ought not the law to be brought into line with the policy? Why ought we to retain in our laws extensive powers which officials say they do not use but which continue to exist nonetheless and could presumably be used, or abused, by them at some time in the future?

We must, in my view, be constantly on guard against provisions of this kind. We ought never to be content with the assurances of public officials that laws, though undesirable and unnecessary, will be administered by them in a prudent fashion. If laws contain provisions which are unused and superfluous, those provisions ought to be removed from the law once and for all.

I have no quarrel with the aims of the surveys undertaken by Statistics Canada. Indeed, I would hope and encourage Canadians to co-operate to the fullest extent with Statistics Canada in its collection of data. The surveys it undertakes provide a wealth of very valuable information which is useful in determining the social and economic policies that will be desirable for Canadians in the future. This information is of use not only to governments but also to a multitude of private individuals and institutions. However, at the same time we must have a corresponding respect for the freedom of the individual. It is necessary in this area, as in others, to strike a balance between the legitimate needs of society and the rights of the individuals that comprise it. Unfortunately, this balance has in recent years swung rather drastically in favour of the bureaucracy. The federal bureaucracy has, as we are all painfully aware, grown at an enormous pace and now involves itself in virtually every aspect of our daily lives.

We have before this House a bill, the human rights bill, which attempts to provide a certain degree of protection against the infringement of civil liberties. One of the most prized of civil liberties, and the one that is the subject of this bill, is the right to one's privacy, the right not to be compelled to reveal personal information against one's wishes. It is for this reason, Mr. Speaker, that I have introduced Bill C-123 to this House. I believe that private individuals ought to be able to withhold from Statistics Canada information about their personal lives which is not required for a population or agricultural census. To require otherwise is to pay lip-service to the concept of civil liberties. In the final analysis, Mr. Speaker, it boils down to a contest between statistics and individuals; and in my view statistics must never be permitted to become more important than individuals.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hugh Poulin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to join in this debate on the bill presented by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald). I have served with her for some years on the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs and I know how sincerely she is a proponent of civil liberties. I agree with her in many of her efforts in that regard, and commend her for them. I was pleased to see the hon. member indicate early in her speech that she would bring an amendment to this bill when it reaches committee. The effect of the bill, therefore, would not be to exempt corporations from the reporting requirement that they are now subjected to in the Stastistics Canada Act. If this bill reaches committee, we would certainly agree with that kind of proposal.

Canada's statistical system has for many years been based on two important corner-stones. On one hand there exists a solemn guarantee that the information provided by respondents will be treated with absolute confidentiality and will never be released to anyone outside Statistics Canada in a form which could identify the respondent without the prior written authorization of the respondent. Statistics Canada employees are sworn to secrecy and severe legal penalties are prescribed for any breach of confidentiality. During the years in which Statistics Canada has served the Canadian people there has never been any substantiated case of a Statistics Canada employee having intentionally violated this principle. The second corner-stone of the statistical system is that in return for this solemn guarantee that information about them will be treated in strictest confidence, individual Canadians and Canadian business entities have a statutory obligation to respond to legitimate statistical inquiries carried out by Canada's central statistical agency.

If I may divert for a moment, may I say how important it is to Canada and to the factual economic base of information that is necessary that we have the greatest trust and faith in Statistics Canada. Recently, during the time of the estimates of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, there was an inquiry into some matters of Statistics Canada. After those two meetings, where full opportunity was given to members on both sides of the House to question whether there had, in fact, been any leak in confidential information, no such evidence appeared at any time.

Subsequent to that, in my capacity as parliamentary secretary to the minister responsible I had further occasion to go into the allegations and surrounding circumstances in great detail. As a result of what I was able to find out, I am confident that Canada is well and truly served by an agency of which we can all be very proud. The confidentiality of information, the high standard of professional excellency insisted upon by the chief statistician, Dr. Kirkham, and, indeed, the high standard of professional excellence of all the people in that organization can lead Canadians to have pride and certainty in the accuracy of the organization not only in relation to the results but also in relation to the very up-to-date and scientific methods and procedures used by the agency in the conduct of its business.

Canadians should realize that notwithstanding certain innuendos levelled against the organization from time to time, none of them has ever been proved. On the contrary, these allegations have only demonstrated that Statistics Canada has been conducting itself according to the highest standards, and we can all be proud of it as Canadians. The overwhelming majority of Canadians, far from resenting the compulsory nature of Statistics Canada surveys, readily co-operate by providing basic data for the production of important national statistics. This is undoubtedly due to the importance Canadians attach to good statistics as a basic element in public and private decision-making and for informed discussion of the public issues that concern them.

Although the overwhelming majority of Canadians readily co-operate with Statistics Canada, there are nevertheless significant numbers of individuals who are not prepared to co-operate voluntarily. In some cases this reluctance is based on the legitimate concern over the right to individual privacy. Statistics Canada is most sympathetic with this position and recognizes that its legislative authority is not a licence to bombard the people of Canada with frivolous, irrelevant or offensive inquiries. But in this day and age there are certain kinds of basic information which government, be it federal, provincial or municipal, simply must develop as a basis for policy and program responses to the many complex problems of our society. In order to address these problems—sometimes just to identify them—there is no substitute for good information. It is no easy task, in a democratic society, to balance these two conflicting principles of the right of the individual to privacy and the need to obtain certain essential information.

If I might digress for a moment, I find a serious inconsistency in the position of the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands. On one hand she is proposing an amendment to the Statistics Act which could have a serious impact on response rates to Statistics Canada surveys and which could, in turn, jeopardize the reliability of important economic and social indicators. At the same time, her political colleagues are frequent critics of the reliability of these same indicators and champions of improved statistical reliability.

There is one important point I would like to stress. This government is not opposed in principle to the concept of making the response to certain official statistical surveys voluntary. Indeed, at the present time officials of Statistics Canada are studying the scientific and technical implications on the quality of data that the introduction of voluntary responses would have. It is possible that in the future some Statistics Canada surveys could be conducted on a voluntary basis. However, to introduce voluntary response to virtually all surveys, as this bill proposes, without first having carefully analysed the resulting impact on the quality of the statistics, would be an irresponsible leap into the dark with possibly devastating consequences for the statistical system.

Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, in the area of business surveys, where there are obvious costs associated with compiling the necessary responses to Statistics Canada surveys, it could not be assumed that businessmen would be willing to continue incurring such costs when it is not legally binding on them to do so. It is true that those businessmen who are themselves users of statistical data and recognize their value would probably continue to respond to surveys. But there are many businessmen, particularly those who own or manage small businesses and who make less direct use of statistical data in their daily affairs, who would simply not participate in surveys if they were voluntary.

This government recognizes the necessity of reducing the paperwork burden on businesses, and especially on small businesses. However, the solution is not to simply eliminate survey-taking or to shift overindiscriminately to voluntary response. Information relating to small business is critical to the compilation of statistical series on such subjects as output, employment, prices and trade. Similarly, insofar as these series constitute components of the national income and expenditure accounts, small business data contribute to the production of our aggregate economic indicators.

With the creation of the new Ministry of State for Small Businesses, this government has given a clear indication that it is concerned about the paperwork burden which falls on the small businessman. Statistics Canada, for its part, is actively pursuing ways and means of reducing its share of this burden. The use of administrative records such as income tax returns as a substitute for statistical surveys is a concrete example of such a reduction. This year alone, Statistics Canada will be able to exempt between 70,000 and 75,000 respondent businesses, mostly small businesses, from various surveys.

Another means of reducing the response burden is by using sample surveys instead of the traditional complete consensus. However, when sample surveys are used the importance of obtaining a response from every member in the sample is all the more critical since in such a situation each respondent represents several hundred others. Again I must emphasize that to introduce the concept of voluntary response to such surveys without first analysing the potential impact very carefully, and subsequently making necessary adjustments to compensate for any changes in response rates, would be irresponsible.

In summary, Mr. Speaker, the possibility of introducing voluntary responses to some Statistics Canada surveys is under examination by officials of the department who are carefully assessing the impact such a change would have on the reliability of Canada's official statistics. In addition it must be stressed that Statistics Canada is very sincerely concerned with the response burden imposed by its survey-taking activity and is actively pursuing several specific programs designed to reduce this burden. Finally, we should not forget that although Canadians have a statutory obligation to provide responses to official surveys conducted under the authority of the Statistics Act, they are, by this very act, provided with an iron-clad guarantee that the confidential information they provide will be carefully protected and will never be released in an identifiable format without prior express written permission from the respondent in question.

As a result, Mr. Speaker, I would hope that other hon. members will join with me in defeating this bill, one which, though superficially innocent, could be potentially detrimental to our national statistical system.

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, when I first read the bill introduced by the hon. lady from Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald) and then listened to her words of wisdom, I wondered whether there would be any further speakers because I assumed the path of sanity and responsibility on the part of the government would simply be to accept the measure and refer it to the committee along with the amendment my hon. friend indicated would be proper at that stage. Instead, we have been treated to one of the greatest pieces of nonsense I have heard during private members' hour for some time.

I think much too highly of the hon. member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. Poulin) to believe that he himself was the author of the speech he presented to us. When he launched into his paean of praise for Statistics Canada it was obvious that it must have originated with that organization itself, because no one else, not even his own department, would indulge in the kind of nonsense which has taken up the time of this House for the last ten minutes. When the hon. member went on talking about the accuracy of results, scientific techniques and the up dating of Statistics Canada, I wonder that even the author of that purple prose in Statistics Canada could have said it with a straight face, realizing over the past few months and years the numerous instances of the many obvious weaknesses that exist with respect to the gathering of statistics in this country.

I come from a province which has been plagued for years with this fact. I am sorry I did not bring the material along and send it over to the parliamentary secretary, but I would remind him that they had to go to the point of including at the bottom of the page of statistics that related to Prince Edward Island the note that their own figures were indeed so insufficient that they were not prepared to stand by them.

I had a couple of classic examples of this in the last few months, and I think the one that really struck me as the most ludicrous was the situation in which we were asking Statistics Canada for information as to the number of housing starts in Prince Edward Island. They arrived at some mysterious figure by some kind of ethereal survey which they conduct on a regional basis in which they compute the number of housing starts, and I knew from the figures they reported that they were so wildly at variance with reality that no person in their right mind would accept them even for a moment.

What I did, Mr. Speaker, was what any person on Prince Edward Island would normally do. I telephoned the Prince Edward Island Housing Authority which records each and every month the absolute number of housing starts on Prince Edward Island, because you cannot build a house on P.E.I. today unless you first of all receive permission or a licence from the provincial government. In other words, at this very moment any individual can telephone the authority and get the absolute number of housing starts. This is something which has apparently not yet seeped through to Statistics Canada, which is still indulging in its own kind of crystal ball gazing with respect to housing. That is only one recent example, Mr. Speaker.

We have talked over the past few weeks of the unemployment problem. It is unfortunate that the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) did not hear this wonderful eulogy about Statistitics Canada or he might have wanted to speak ahead of me. I have received numerous letters indicating that there is no way that they are basing their present program of job creation and the tuning of the amount of money to be spent in various constituencies on the facts provided by Statistics Canada because they are so wildly inaccurate. I assume that the Minister of Manpower and Immigration talks to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Chrétien) and that they do not keep these kinds of juicy bits of information from each other. I know that the parliamentary secretary, in computing his own LIP program, would not for a moment rely on Statistics Canada information with respect to unemployment in his constituency. If he did, he would not be sitting in his seat very comfortably for very long. The list is long, Mr. Speaker.

I must make a confession here. I may not be able to get off Parliament Hill this evening, because I can think of at least two instances where apparently I broke the law.

I treat this particular move by the hon. member for Kingston and The Islands as a very modest move indeed. What it does is to try to bring modern law to some point of sanity. For the parliamentary secretary to treat this as being superficially innocent is for him to engage in some new form of misdirection which is surely beneath both his capability and his responsibility.

When I first established my constituency office in my constituency of Egmont, I recall that for some reason known only to the forces at Statistics Canada we were suddenly on their mailing list to provide monthly employment surveys about, "our industry". This mystified my constituency secretary, who was a direct employee of the constituency office, because we were not operating any major commercial enterprise. Yet faithfully, month after month, Statistics Canada would send this form letter to the Egmont office, company, or what have you, asking us to give them the following information: "How many employees have you on your payroll? What were the transactions during the past month?"

My secretery, being a very responsible sort of person, asked me what she was going to do about this. So I said; "Do with it what you do with all the rest of the junk mail that comes in—throw it in the wastepaper basket". I can see I was encouraging my secretary to break the law, but I thought it would be much better to break the law in this instance than to return forms which would be absolutely useless to whomever was the anonymous official at Statistics Canada who was circulating this kind of monthly questionnaire which had no relevance to my constituency office in the constituency of Egmont.

Because of the kind of society we have today, Mr. Speaker, it is obvious that we need a throrough overhaul of much of the methodology that is used in gathering statistics. A classic example of this occurred during the last major census in 1971. Hon. members will recall that the census was to take place during the month of June. During that month all of the census gatherers were sent out across the country. Now, Mr. Speaker, it so happens that during that month of June I and my family moved from Ottawa to Prince Edward Island, as we normally do. Before we left we had a visit from a person from Statistics Canada who asked us dutifully to fill out the form she supplied, which we subsequently did. Then a few days later when we arrived in P.E.I. we were visited by the local statistics gatherer for census Canada in P.E.I. and were again asked to complete the form. When I protested and said I had already completed one in Ottawa and thought it would be a little redundant if we became statistical reportees for the province of Prince Edward Island, she told us in no uncertain terms that it was an absolute requirement, that we were residents of Prince Edward Island and that we should file a full return for the five of us living on P.E.I. This we again dutifully did.

If that kind of rigidity, and the kind of rigidity expressed today by the parliamentary secretary, are what we are up against, Mr. Speaker, then the hon. member for Kingston and The Islands has merely touched the tip of the iceberg. We have a much more serious problem than any of us realize. I have some belief that this may well be the case.

A few years ago, Mr. Speaker, I was somewhat disturbed, when attempting to grapple with a good, sound statistical base for the Atlantic provinces in order to deal with our ongoing problems of economic and social disparity, to realize that so much of the information that we required was not available to us because so far we had not updated our social and economic fact gathering sufficiently to give us a much clearer picture of the chronic and structural problems facing the Atlantic region.

It is one thing for individual members to be faced with a series of forms which do not add anything worth-while to the over-all statistical base of the country. But it is another thing not to be conscious of the fact that without good statistical information, as the parliamentary secretary suggested, we would not be able to do our job effectively as parliamentarians and legislators.

It seems to me that if the only response is that we provide criminal penalties for those who do not respond to questionnaires presented to individuals, then the department, or this particular agency of government, is in a very serious state indeed. I believe that we are faced with a situation in which it is not a question of whether or not the department has means of harassing people. I fail to be convinced by the argument that the parliamentary secretary brought forward when he said that there would be a very serious impact on response rates. I have to ask the parliamentary secretary in all seriousness, what kind of documentation, what kind of support, does he give for that? It seems to me that the response rates are going to be determined in almost all cases by the willingness of the individual to provide information which he knows is in the best interests not only of himself but of his community, province, and country.

Surely if the only argument that Statistics Canada has with respect to the information that is going to be gathered, is that if you do not provide the information you are going to be breaking the law, and you will be subject to the laying of criminal charges, then Statistics Canada will become poverty stricken in its approach to people and in the services that it provides to Canadians. Therefore I would hope, Mr. Speaker, that what has been said by the parliamentary secretary this afternoon are the ill-considered remarks of some PR flack in StatsCan and not the thoughful response of the hon. member or, I would hope, of a minister who believes it is in the best interests of this country to have a Statistics Canada branch which is functioning responsibly, sensibly, and also with proper respect for the human and civil rights that have been properly represented here this afternoon by the hon. member for Kingston and the islands.

● (1740)

Mr. Gilbert Parent (St. Catharines): Mr. Speaker, I was almost intimidated by the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald) and nearly shied away from speaking, but seeing that he said he thought no one was going to speak after the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald), and then himself proceeded to do so, I decided that I would too.

On studying Bill C-213, one could get the impression, Mr. Speaker, that a concerted effort is being made to harm, annoy, harass and even threaten the Canadian public, that a plan is even now being implemented or that steps have been taken for Statistics Canada to do so. Nothing could be further from the truth.

In all its activities, whether they are directed towards industry, employers or Canadian individuals, Statistics Canada is endeavouring, above all, to get the voluntary co-operation of the respondent, and not to threaten him with penalties as stipulated in the Statistics Act.

[English]

I think hon. members would agree that the record of Statistics Canada over the years for producing high quality, timely, and relevant statistics speaks well for the level of co-operation the agency has been able to obtain. There is a motto at Statistics Canada: "The respondent is our most important resource". Better than anything else I think this summarizes the approach the agency takes to the Canadian public.

The requirements related to compulsory response outlined within the Statistics Act have been in effect for some 60 years since the early history of legislation pertaining to the production of statistical information. Those who object to compulsory response may be overlooking, as has already been discussed by my colleague, the complementary provisions of the Statistics Act which outline the privileged relationship between the agency and the respondent and provide an absolute guarantee of the confidentiality of individual information. In support of such guarantees, employees of Statistics Canada are required to take an oath of secrecy and they too are subject to severe penalties for breaching the trust reposed in them. The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands mentioned that this was not the answer, and the hon. member for Egmont said we should not be penalized in any way for trying to gather information.

In 1976, if I recall correctly, surveys were sent out in my riding of St. Catharines by Statistics Canada. I know a few people who were involved in that exercise and I asked them what the response was when they went to the homes with the survey forms and asked people to fill them in and return them. The initial response was about 40 per cent.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Did they prosecute the rest?

Mr. Parent: They did not prosecute but they had to go back and ask people to fill them in, and the majority did. There was no prosecution that I know of but I guess in this, like everything else, we are quite cavalier about laws that are made when we attach penalties to them, yet in any country if we relied on the average citizen he would co-operate. What I am saying is that when we bring in laws that have penalties to back them up, it is not the worst thing in the world so long as the information requested is truly necessary.

I agree with hon. members that information should be available to us, and the questions should be reasonable and geared to help people carry out their duties and not simply for the sake of gathering statistics. I think we should be able to gather the information necessary for running this country.

The hon. member for Egmont had a question about housing starts in Prince Edward Island and he went to Statistics Canada. Why did he not go to the provincial housing authority in the first place if he knew they had the information? I agree that we should be upgrading our system of gathering information, but to say that because Statistics Canada is going about it the wrong way it should be scrapped, is something with which I cannot agree.

Statistics are vital to many areas of planning and decision-making within the business community and government. An important example of how statistics directly affect individual Canadians is the case of labour contracts, pensions, and family allowances which are based upon escalation clauses keyed to the consumer price index. Clearly the production of these and other statistics which affect the well-being of all Canadians necessitates the gathering of information and this, in turn, requires inputs by citizens. I am confident that those who furnish this information do so willingly, recognizing the net benefit to them in the long run.

As I have said, the compulsory response provisions of the Statistics Act have been carefully counter-balanced by confidentiality provisions to prevent the disclosure by Statistics Canada of information which could be related to an identifiable respondent. These confidentiality provisions have always been scrupulously respected by Statistics Canada. Not only are these very rigorous security measures but, more important, the great majority of employees take their responsibilities very seriously. My colleague pointed out earlier that in all the years Statistics Canada has been in operation no one has ever been proven to have knowingly given out information which would in any way hurt a respondent.

In case it should seem that Canada is out of step with the rest of the world, let me say that in other countries such as the United Kingdom, France, West Germany, and Sweden, all of which have highly respected statistical systems, their statistical legislation also finds it necessary to embody similar provisions related to compulsory response, coupled with the necessary procedures for prosecution and fines, but truly only as a last resort.

It should be pointed out again that a refusal in a sample survey is not merely the refusal of an individual to furnish information solely about himself. The individual who refuses to answer a sample survey is denying information about hundreds or, in some cases, thousands of people from the particular group which he represents. Statistics Canada does not institute legal procedures at the initial point of refusal. The agency's policy has been one of co-operation and assistance, with a final resort to persuasion in order to obtain a high level of response. Though prosecution is rare, it has to be available to the agency as an ultimate sanction in order to maintain the high response rate necessary to the production of meaningful statistics. An example will serve to illustrate this point.

Several years ago a survey was conducted with a universe of some 68,000 corporate respondents. After an initial response of 61 per cent, a letter was sent requesting the remaining 26,000 non-respondents to complete the survey questionnaire. This resulted in a further response of 70 per cent, leaving a balance of some 8,000 non-respondents. A second letter indicating the legal requirements to respond produced a further response from 58 per cent of those non-respondents. Again, subsequent correspondence produced a further 71 per cent response from those 3,000 remaining non-respondents. Of the less than 1 per cent balance of non-respondents, a certain number had gone out of business. However, after a review, 20 were considered for prosecution, and the Department of Justice was consulted. The Department of Justice announced that prosecution proceedings would be commenced. Then all but three corporations responded, and these three were prosecuted and fined for non-compliance with the Statistics Act. Therefore we are looking at three corporations, out of a possible 68,000, which were prosecuted. We hope that it was not the stick that brought the others to a final response, but if the stick were not there I do not think the response would have been a complete one.

At one point Statistics Canada discontinued prosecution proceedings for a large annual survey with a view to relying upon respondent co-operation, as the hon. member for Egmont said. After several years it was found that response rates had begun to deteriorate sharply, with the result that prosecution procedures were reinstated. Even though the final stage of prosecution has not been necessary to obtain a high response rate, it is evident that a system of law which does not provide for sanctions would weaken Statistics Canada's historical success in producing meaningful statistical information.

As my colleague has mentioned, there are cases where it may be feasible to introduce voluntary response as a method of conducting some surveys, and officials are carefully studying this question. However, I think the evidence I have just outlined confirms the position stated by my colleague that there could be a serious negative impact on the quality of statistics produced by Statistics Canada if the provisions in the Statistics Act to compel response were suddenly eliminated.

I might add that the real losers, if such a deterioration took place, would be the Canadian public. It is not inconceivable that incentive grants, certain transfer payments, pension and family allowance indexing, collective bargaining, and a host of other activities and programs would be adversely affected by a deterioration in the quality of the statistical indicators produced by Statistics Canada. These activities affect the lives of literally millions of Canadians, and I am therefore hard pressed to understand the cavalier way in which the bill under consideration appears to deal with this issue. There is no mention, either in the bill or its accompanying explanatory note, of the possible impact of the bill on response rates and data quality, and I therefore assume that the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands is simply unaware of the possible ramifications of her proposal. It is for these reasons therefore, Mr. Speaker, that I would urge, as has my colleague before me, that members of this House reject this ill-conceived bill.

Mr. D. M. Collenette (York East): Mr. Speaker, my two colleagues, the hon. member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. Poulin) and the hon. member for St. Catharines (Mr. Parent), have spoken at some length concerning the possible impact on the quality of statistics which might result from the implementation of Bill C-213. Hon. members may have the impression that Canadian practices with regard to the gathering of official statistics are somewhat behind the times and that we continue to hang on to archaic and unnecessary procedures that other, more enlightened countries have found it possible to discard.

The officials who operate Canada's national statistical system are always anxious to learn from their colleagues in other countries about new developments which will make it possible to maintain or improve the quality of their outputs, while at the same time reducing the burden on respondents. In this connection it may be useful for me to go over a review which Statistics Canada conducted in 1975 of the statistical legislation of other countries. The review concentrated on five countries, the United Kingdom, France, Sweden, the Federal Republic of Germany, and the United States. All of these countries have well developed, highly sophisticated, national statistical programs, and all have one or more pieces of legislation which regulate the collection, compilation, analysis and publication of statistical data by their respective statistical agencies. It is clear from this review that all of them rely, for the continuing viability of their operations, on some form and extent of mandatory reporting, although like ourselves they do not use this as a stick with which to beat respondents.

In the United Kingdom, for example, the legislation which governs the operations of the business statistics office contains a provision for undertaking legal action against non-respondents to official surveys of business establishments, with a maximum fine of $125 for a first offence and up to $500 for a second offence.

In France the legislation governing their Institut National de la Statistique et des Etudes Economiques also contains provisions for a penalty of up to $500 for a first offence for businesses which refuse to respond to official surveys. If a firm is convicted of a second offence within a three-year period, the fine is increased to a minimum of $1,000 and a maximum fine of up to $5,000. In addition, special penalties can be assessed against large firms, that is, those with more than 100 workers. Upon conviction for a second offence within three years, they are liable to fines of from $10 to $50 per employee up to a total maximum fine of $10,000.

In Sweden also persistent non-respondents to official surveys of the National Bureau of Statistics are liable to prosecution at the request of the national bureau under king-in-council decree. If convicted, non-respondents are liable to a fine of up to 500 kroner, or approximately $125.

The West German situation is also similar. In that country there is legislation which provides for a maximum fine of up to $2,500 for non-response to official government statistical surveys.

The situation in the United States is slightly more complicated due to the fact that there exists in that country several departments or agencies which collect official statistics. However, the two most important are the U.S. Bureau of the Census and the Bureau of Labor Statistics. The legislation covering the operation of the U.S. Bureau of the Census provides for penalties for non-response to annual surveys as well as to certain monthly and quarterly surveys. Conviction under these provisions can result in fines of up to $500. The situation in the case of the Bureau of Labor Statistics is somewhat different. Many of its surveys are conducted on a voluntary basis. However, in such areas as surveys of occupational safety and health statistics programs, response is compulsory and there are provisions for fines of up to $500 for non-compliance.

Although I would like to continue my remarks on this worth-while bill, in view of the hour, Mr. Speaker, may I call it six o'clock?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being six o'clock, and the hour appointed for private members' business having expired, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL FISCAL ARRANGEMENTS AND ESTABLISHED PROGRAMS FINANCING ACT, 1977

MEASURE FOR MAKING CERTAIN FISCAL PAYMENTS AND OF ESTABLISHED PROGRAMS FINANCING CONTRIBUTIONS TO PROVINCES, ETC.

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale) that Bill C-37, to provide for the making of certain fiscal payments and of established programs financing contributions to provinces, to provide for payments in respect of certain provincial taxes and fees, and to make consequential and related amendments, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, just prior to my calling it five o'clock I indicated it was my view that it is important at this juncture in our history to look at the various regions of Canada and interpret how they see Confederation working. As a member from western Canada I see it as my task to present to the government how I see Confederation working in my part of the country, and hopefully we can get together on some problem solving which I feel would enhance Confederation in the future.

I also stated it is my view that over the last ten years Quebec has dominated Canadian public affairs to too high a degree, that in view of the fact that this has happened other areas of Canada, and specifically western Canada, have not received the attention in public debate and in policy making I feel they should have, and that this has added additional strains to Confederation.

I also stated that those of us who come from western Canada are not separatists, but looking at the various articles which are currently appearing in the daily media one would almost think that is what we have become. I have in my hand an article which appeared in the Saturday, February 19, Toronto Star. It also appeared today in the Ottawa Journal. It is written by Richard Gwyn, and it is entitled "The West Could Slide Out Of Confederation." While there are some observations of that writer which are accurate, I suggest that that is overstating the case rather dramatically.

Having said that we western Canadians are federalists, I believe that it is important to note that we entered Confederation of our own free will after the terms of Confederation had already been drawn up and were operative. They were operative in 1867, and all the western provinces joined Confederation after that date in a voluntary manner. However, throughout the past 110 years of Canadian history we have stressed one Canada, that we are part of that Canada, and that we want to remain in Canada.

While a few voices in western Canada today might be loudly demanding separatism, I suggest to hon. members on both sides of the House that they are few in number and that the noise they create far exceeds their popular support.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Epp: Having stated that, I would be incorrect in saying that there is nothing seriously wrong with Confederation as western Canadians see it. There is a strong feeling of alienation felt by people who support all parties. There is a strong feeling that we are so far removed from the centres of decision-making power that we really count for very little.

Perhaps over the years we have developed an inferiority complex, but no matter what the cause the fact remains that this feeling of alienation is there. We are concerned that the problems of unemployment, investment, growth, and expansion are not getting the serious consideration which is needed because we keep concentrating on questions of Confederation. One would think that after 110 years of our history we would have grown mature enough to recognize that this union is here to stay and that we can develop it.

Although there is alienation in the west, we are still Canadians. We may criticize, say something is wrong with Confederation; we may not like the centralized decision-making power of the government, of any government, but that does not make us bigots. We have a deep love of our land and very much want to see our particular area of the world developing.

I believe the Economist puts it too strongly in its article when they talk of hatred in the west. Let me quote Mr. Gwyn's article.

Hatred is too glib, a shade too strong a word. Indifference, impatience, frustration, contempt, are better descriptions of the west's mood.

I believe he is right.

Not only do we feel alienated; we are frustrated. We believe nobody is listening to us, that the government thinks that we are few in numbers and consequently not worth listening to. Mr. Speaker, we are fed up with brokerage politics. We have seen one area of Canada pitted against another. If one may use a Biblical reference, I guess we are like the early apostles, like voices crying in the wilderness. No one wants to listen.

The west also recognizes that it lacks input into central decision-making, as is reflected in federal-provincial relations. I say that because the premiers of western Canada have raised this very same complaint, but little has been done to rectify it. We are not interested in tokenism. We want to be involved. Is this government genuinely interested in western views, or does it look on us only as people who live somewhere in the west and who keep repeating a long litany of complaints?

What has happened since the days of July, 1973? When the Liberals formed a minority government the Trudeau administration was deeply concerned about the erosion of its support in western Canada. What did it do? It called the Western Economic Opportunities Conference in July, 1973. Oh, it was a great media performance. A lot of work was put into that conference. Position papers were submitted, and we western Canadians were in high hopes of seeing solutions to some of our problems emerge from that conference, of seeing the west become more greatly involved in central decision-making. Unfortunately little changed. In 1974 the government was returned to power with a majority, and all the promises made at the Western Economic Opportunities Conference went by the board.

[Mr. Epp.]

Interestingly enough, the views expressed by the western premiers at the recently concluded federal-provincial conference were virtually the same as those expressed in Calgary in July, 1973.

The list of concerns is long, and I shall mention a few. The hon. member for Churchill (Mr. Smith) has repeatedly made representations for the upgrading and further use of the port of Churchill. The farmers of Saskatchewan, farmers of northwestern Manitoba, and members of the Hudson's Bay Route Association have asked that the port of Churchill be utilized to its fullest potential. But the government has not acted; we have seen little action in that regard. Western Canadians have longed complained about tariffs, those applying to farm products and those applying to manufactured goods. Hopefully the present round of negotiations in Geneva will correct some long-standing grievances.

I will not go into the question of freight rates for it has been repeated ad nauseam; nevertheless, that problem still exists.

If I were parochial I would discuss at great length Air Canada's move from Winnipeg. Some people think that the move of certain Air Canada facilities from Winnipeg to Montreal eight years ago has been forgotten, that the move was never questioned. In the 1974 election campaign the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) dropped into our area and, as a result, we got a hangar. You should see that hangar now, on the west side of the airport. Yes, it is being built.

Mr. Hamilton (Swift Current-Maple Creek): What a hangar, Jake.

Mr. Epp: Yes, it is quite a hangar. Ironically, that hangar is not on MOT land. I understand the department must negotiate with the Department of National Defence in order to have access to the hangar.

Mr. Hamilton (Swift Current-Maple Creek): If they want to do repairs, it takes them 45 minutes to get from the air base to the hangar.

Mr. Epp: I have mentioned some of our grievances, but we see little evidence of the government's willingness to tackle them.

Let me raise another matter of importance to our nation. We want to develop our resource industry, certainly; but also, we want to develop a mature and economically viable secondary industry. In this connection let me put on record the conclusions set out in the presentation of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce to the conference of July, 1973. It said:

(a) Large quantities of Canadian natural resources are exported in relatively unprocessed forms, and recent trends, notably with respect to minerals, indicate the proportion exported in crude form is increasing.

We want the opposite to happen. Unfortunately we are exporting crude resources and, by so doing, exporting jobs from Canada, including western Canada.

I have fought two election campaigns. I spent much time talking to people in rural communities who wanted to make their communities viable. We witnessed the trend toward larger sized farms, for it was thought that only large farms could be viable economic units. My point is that we must process more of our agricultural and natural resources, and it must happen in western Canada. It is not happening now.

I continue quoting from the conclusions of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce:

(b) A wide range of resource commodities provide potential opportunities for adding value, through processing prior to export.

It is not happening. I continue quoting:

(c) If these opportunities for adding value could be realized, there would be significant direct benefits to the economy in terms of increased incomes and employment, and the resulting processed materials could provide a basis for forward integration into fully-manufactured products.

A department of the federal government recognizes the need for action, but what has happened?

While the government's actions have strained the bonds of Confederation, western Canadians have come to realize that they possess economic clout. We have always been concerned about our population being somewhat sparser than that of central Canada; nevertheless we have developed a new economic clout which has been embodied in the form of agricultural and natural resources. In other words, the world today needs commodities. There is a developing need for our commodities, not only outside Canada's borders but inside. In fact Gwyn argues it is almost a sense of revenge that westerners have, that finally they have some levers with which they can move the central government. It is my view that while we want to see those natural resources developed, it is incumbent that all Canadians share in those resources.

There is one other point I want to make. Many of us in Canada, especially in western Canada, are of a background other than either of Canada's two official languages. In the past ten years, for very good reasons, many of these people who sometimes are referred to as ethnic Canadians—I prefer to have no hyphenated Canadians—have been made to feel that they are not as important in Canadian life as they might have hoped they would be.

Multiculturalism has been used by this government as a whipping boy. There was a minister between 1972 and 1974. After once again receiving a majority, that portfolio was removed and it has now been placed under Labour. That community, whether it is based in Toronto or in the west, is not fooled by machinations of that type.

What these people had been hoping for, and I hope it takes place in our future, is that they will be judged, not by their background, not by the accent with which they speak one or both of Canada's official languages, but by their contribution. That is what is important.

I know the Postmaster General (Mr. Blais) is trying to get a word in, but the fact is, and I say it to him directly, that just because he might disagree with me, that does not remove the alienation. It is there. It is time that Canadians looked at their total resources to see how they can best be used for the development of this country.

In conclusion, I want again to emphasize that we are federalists. We are proud to be Canadians. However, we are no longer willing to give in to economic blackmail. We are interested in sharing in the task of nation building. We are not asking for special status, but we demand equal status.

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be able to enter the debate on this important, indeed historic, bill that has been tabled by my colleague, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald). In keeping with my own departmental concerns, I would like to direct my comments today to the new and innovative financial arrangements between the federal and provincial governments in the areas of hospital insurance, medical insurance, and the extended health care services.

The introduction of the established programs financing arrangements will culminate years of discussions between the federal and provincial governments about an appropriate financial arrangement to replace the current cost-sharing arrangements for medical care and for hospital insurance. For them and for us this new financial arrangement represents another important step in the maturation of our national health care system.

Probably the single most significant development in the health field in Canada over the last two decades has been the implementation of our universal health insurance scheme. The federal government's primary concern in this area was to ensure the development of uniform health insurance programs throughout the country. As a result, we offered to share the costs of these programs on the condition that provincial plans met the broad criteria of administration by public authorities, universality, comprehensiveness, and portability from one province to another.

As a consequence of the shared-cost programs legislated for hospital insurance in 1957 and for medical insurance in 1966, Canadians have been provided with high quality and universal health care insurance. Indeed these universal health insurance programs have become so deeply ingrained in the Canadian fabric that any retrograde step in the form of halting or even reducing these programs is absolutely unthinkable.

It is this strong commitment by Canadians and by all the provincial governments that encourages us to propose a major change in the financial and administrative arrangements between the federal and the provincial governments. Because the very existence of these programs is no longer questioned, the administrative presence of the federal government can be reduced and the operation of the system can become even more effectively controlled by the provincial administrations.

The established programs financing arrangement is a major step toward increasing provincial flexibility in the administration of health care programs. Under the new arrangements the federal government will continue to pay a substantial proportion of the costs of medical care and hospital insurance. But, by providing a financial contribution that is not tied to the provincial program expenditures, several very important program and administrative objectives will be achieved.

First, provinces will be able to achieve greater efficiency in the use of their health care resources. No longer will provincial health priorities be influenced toward health care delivery forms that are covered by shared-cost programs. Whether or not a provincial dollar is spent on home care, acute care or physician's services will no longer influence the size of the federal contribution. Thus provinces will have the flexibility required to develop the most appropriate, but also cost-efficient, health care delivery system.

We have heard arguments, Mr. Speaker, from provincial ministers and from some hon. members opposite, that our terms are not flexible enough. These arguments usually come from the same people who want much higher levels of guarantees of revenues under the terms of our proposed agreements. Now of course, complete program flexibility together with very high levels of guarantees is an impossible request for any responsible federal government to meet. The result could be program anarchy together with very high costs—the worst of both worlds. Similarly we cannot keep a careful rein on expenditures while providing very high flexibility for to do so would be to encourage different provinces to pick and choose different pieces of a complete array of services. Once again the result would be no real guarantee for all Canadians of a reasonably uniform standard of services. We have, therefore, opted for a reasonable level of guarantees together with fully adequate, but by no means infinite flexibility in program design.

Second, the established programs financing arrangements will facilitate a streamlining of the federal-provincial administrative structures thereby eliminating administrative steps which are no longer essential. Examples would include federal auditing of provincial plans or protracted discussions about the shareability of specific provincial expenditures.

Third, and I view this as being of considerable importance, it will facilitate a gradual redirection of energies at the federal level toward other aspects of health care such as health standards, research, and manpower planning, as well as toward social services and the primary prevention of health problems.

Within these general comments concerning the flexibility of the new agreements and the greater administrative discretionary powers of the provinces, I would like to give some explanation of the basic requirements of the hospital insurance and Medicare plans. Even if federal-provincial administrative mechanisms will no longer be as complex and if the federal contribution will no longer be based on the cost of provincial programs, the financial share of the federal government will continue to be related to the implementation in provincial medicare programs of the following objectives: the globality of the guarantee concerning services, universal application to the whole population, transferability of benefits among provinces and service availability not restricted by excessive user fees, and finally, non-profit administration by a public agency.

These basic objectives are well established in the present system and all provincial governments understand them well. Keeping them will therefore not really impede the flexibility of the provincial programs and the new financial arrangements. To facilitate the introduction of the new financial arrangements in the case of hospital insurance and medicare, it is necessary to amend certain aspects of the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act and the Medical Care Act. These amendments are contained in Bill C-37 now before us.

The changes required come within three categories. First, the financing formulas established under the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act and the Medical Care Act will no longer apply after March 31, 1977. Then, we shall have to make minor changes to the type of information required from the provinces. Until now, the provisions concerning this point in the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act and the Medical Care Act were based on the existence of cost-sharing formulas.

In the future, we will need more general information so that the federal government can supervise the application of the basic requirements of these programs, produce the statistics required at the international level, exchange comparable information between the provinces and proceed to the planning and assessment of the national system of health with the cooperation of the provinces. Finally, those changes will be introduced to facilitate amendments to the provincial programs. For example, the federal Minister of Health will not be required to agree officially with amendments concerning the registration of hospitals and authorized costs. However, we will always need the information that the provinces can give us on such matters. As concerns particularly the basic requirements of the health programs, the legislation concerning hospital insurance and medical care will remain unchanged. Next year we hope to have the cooperation of the provinces to establish a single legislation on health insurance which will cover both the hospital insurance and the medical care programs, and which will provide an integrated legislative structure determining the federal government's role as regards health care.

[English]

I would like as well to comment on the initiative being taken by the federal government to provide an additional contribution to the provinces to assist them in the provision of supplementary health care schemes. The per capita transfer for the extended health care services will assist provinces in the development and provision of new health care services that are appropriate given the health problems of their particular clientele and which are cost-efficient as compared with more traditional methods of delivering health care. As my colleague, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald), told hon. members when he spoke concerning this legislation, we have informed the provincial governments of our intention to proceed with these measures in this House as rapidly as possible.

Over the past years many provinces have taken initiatives in areas such as home care and ambulatory care but these services have had to be financed to a large extent by provinces. Indeed, one of the major problems with the existing cost-sharing arrangements is that federal financing has been provided for the more costly forms of health care to the detriment of some innovative, and cost-efficient, delivery techniques. Under the new financial arrangements, which move away from detailed cost-sharing formulae, the federal government will be contributing in a manner that provides provinces with more flexibility to work toward the most appropriate and cost-efficient set of health care programs.

Up to now the federal government has provided the provinces with considerable financial assistance for adult residential care under the Canada Assistance Plan cost-sharing arrangement. Another part of the proposal currently before the House is to bring adult residential care into a per capita, block-funding, arrangement. By this expedient all levels of adult residential care will be financed through a similar financial arrangement. This will ensure that distortions in provincial programming of institutional care due to the financial arrangements will be minimized. Again, the provinces will have the flexibility to provide their residents with the most appropriate level of care without being impaired by financial and administrative formulae. This bringing together of all types of adult residential care under a common financial arrangement is a good example of the steps that are being taken by this government to harmonize the relationship between various health and social services programs.

These new arrangements for hospital insurance, medical care and post-secondary education will provide provinces with greater financial assistance, through the transfer of tax room and the cash payment, than would be transferred with the present shared-cost arrangements. The entitlements under established programs financing are estimated, for 1977-78 alone, to exceed by about $750 million the entitlements that would be generated by the present shared-cost programs. I should note that the estimates for the shared-cost programs are based on the provincial estimates of their program costs.

In addition, the arrangement for the extended health care services also provides the provinces with some additional financial assistance. For 1977-78 more than $100 million in additional financing will be provided by the $20 per capita transfer than would be provided for these services through the Canada Assistance Plan.

The implementation of these new financial arrangements for the health care programs will result in a substantial federal financial contribution in a manner that provides provinces with the flexibility in program decisions necessary to achieve greater efficiency in the use of their health care resources. This will be accompanied by a streamlining in the administrative structures within my own department.

Hon. members may perhaps recall that last November I announced that I would be moving to integrate the health and the welfare sides of my department under a single deputy minister. This move was prompted by the twin desires to achieve greater administrative efficiency within my department and to provide more efficient and effective health and social services to Canadians. Since it is virtually impossible to draw a meaningful line between social and health services, it is my conviction that we must move toward much closer co-ordination of the two general areas. Several provinces have already moved in this direction and Bill C-37 will help them to move further, as will the provision of a single locus of administrative responsibility within my department.

As I mentioned earlier, the federal government will now be in a position to further redirect its energies towards social services and primary prevention in the area of health. So I would like to conclude by indicating a few initiatives now under way or soon to be undertaken. The basic objectives of the government policy in the area of health and social welfare can be summed up in the two following propositions: first, we intend to provide the highest possible degree of physical and mental well-being and development for all members of our society, within available resources and, second, we intend to ensure as great distributive equity and justice as possible among individuals and groups considering the means available to reach that individual development and well-being. Those objectives prompted the federal government to show leadership in the area of health insurance in the 1950s and 1960s.

The health insurance system that came about as a result of those initiatives has no doubt greatly contributed to the achievement of the basic objectives of our health policy. Those very objectives are now prompting the federal government to lead the way in the area of social services and primary prevention, particularly with respect to physical and social environment and lifestyle. Those new challenges have been accepted by the federal government and concrete action is under way. The nature of these initial steps necessarily had to be limited. However, I am convinced that the success of those first initiatives is obvious if one thinks, for example, of our efforts to make the wearing of seat belts compulsory and reduce speed limits, as well as the following initiatives: our campaign entitled Dialogue on Drinking, for example; the development of an over-all program affecting the living habits of each and everyone and entitled Operation Lifestyle; more and more stringent and efficient food and drug regulations; and finally development as a high ranking priority of higher safety and health standards in the work environment.

I would also stress, Mr. Speaker, that I shall introduce shortly a piece of legislation for the funding of other social service programs provided by the provinces. Such a bill will strengthen the provinces' financial capacity to give Canadians social services, in order that they enjoy greater flexibility and receive a more generous federal contribution for special initiatives. It must therefore be considered an essential supplement to the bill now before us.

In the health care area, our main concern over the years has been for the financial aspects of shared-cost programs. Simultaneously however, we have participated with the provinces in various projects such as the development of health standards, manpower studies, program assessments, program data analyses and the development of special expertise such as the extension of various techniques to health care.

The federal government will continue its efforts in those areas and we want to maintain close co-operation with the provinces and other health groups so as to implement and maintain priority projects along those lines. To conclude, Mr. Speaker, the new financial arrangements with respect to health insurance and the new health programs will provide the provinces with the increased flexibility and financial help needed to improve their health care systems. Those arrangements, in addition to the new initiatives by the Canadian government in the social services areas and primary health prevention, and to the continued participation and leadership by the government in other health areas, will assure Canadians of constant progress in the achievement of the basic goals of our health and welfare policy.

[English]

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I wish I could rise to congratulate the government on the legislation that is now before the House but I am afraid that is impossible, not that I would vote against it, because too many of the provinces of Canada would suffer damage if the House were to defeat these iniquitous conclusions which are now before us. What I would point out in my remarks tonight is just what happened on the way to these conclusions.

If we look at what happened within the last year or two of negotiations on fiscal arrangements, I believe we will see to a very great degree why the people of Canada and the provincial governments today feel there should be some different constitutional arrangements in Canada. They feel that way because of the rough way they have been treated in these negotiations by hon. gentlemen opposite.

I should like to entitle my remarks tonight "A Funny Thing Happened on the Way to the Forum", and to tell the House some of the funny things that happened on the way to the conclusions which are before the House tonight. This is the forum that the funny things happened on the way to; I do not know of any funny things that happened in the forum, but some funny things happened on the way to get here.

Why do the provinces feel aggrieved, and why are the people of Canada feeling aggrieved? Why is it that practically every article one reads these days refers to the fact that there is a need for more decentralization within Canadian constitutional arrangements? Why is there this demand now, which has become particularly prevalent within the last six months or a year? This demand has arisen, in my opinion, as a result of the roughshod way that hon. gentlemen opposite have run over all the provinces on the way to reaching the conclusions that are now before this House in the form of this legislation.

The provinces of Canada, or at least seven of them, badly need the financial assistance that is offered in this legislation. If I use as an example the province I am most familiar with, the province of Newfoundland, there is no question that the province of Newfoundland needs the tax equalization and contributions to shared cost programs which are contained in this bill, and I would have to vote for the bill for that reason. Newfoundland is to receive a tremendous amount of revenue, and since it is so important to the general scene in Newfoundland I cannot very well vote against the bill.

I have some figures here, Mr. Speaker. For example, in 1975-76 of the total revenue of the province of Newfoundland the government of Canada contributed 52.4 per cent by way of tax equalization and shared cost programs on both current and capital accounts. For 1976-77 the amount estimated is 51.7 per cent, or some $461 million of revenue which the government of Canada will contribute to the province of Newfoundland. This does not mean to say that because the government of Newfoundland receives a large share of its revenue from the government of Canada that we are just going to lie down and take whatever is handed to us without expressing any independent views on what happened to reach this conclusion and what should have happened.

Provinces like Newfoundland badly need financial help and hon. gentlemen opposite, knowing that, feel that they can throw their weight around without fear or trepidation for that reason. I want to show this House some of the ways they have done that, Mr. Speaker. It is my view that the process by which this result was reached was not a example of co-operative federalism. We used to hear a lot about that from hon. gentlemen opposite, particularly when the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) first took office. We were going to have co-operative federalism. What we have in this bill is not co-operative federalism but the result of strong arm federalism. It is the result of forced put federalism; it is the result of bully boy federalism, not co-operative federalism. It is arm twisting federalism that we see in the legislation that is now before the House.

We also used to hear a lot about participatory democracy. This bill is not an example of participatory democracy but of closed conference autocracy. This is what is before us tonight. The great participatory democrat of 1968 has become the closed conference autocrat of 1977—make no mistake about that. If the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald), with his brass knuckles, is not sufficient to quell the ten provinces, then out comes the Prime Minister himself, the expert with the stilleto, the expert in fiscal Kung-Fu, to put the final kibosh on the provinces.

There are five things wrong with the arrangement now before the House. It is forcing the provinces to take all the risks in regard to the increasing cost of hospital and medical care as well as in post-secondary education, but particularly in regard to the first two, hospital insurance and medicare. The federal government is putting the onus of meeting increased costs on the provinces, many of which did not initiate these programs. These programs were initiated by the great white god in Ottawa who initiated hospital insurance and medicare and made it impossible for the provinces not to go into those programs. Now the federal government no longer wishes to share the increasing costs in those fields and is putting the risk on the provinces. There are five or six provinces that are in no financial position to take that burden. They did not initiate these programs, but now the risks are on them. Those provinces did not impose inflation.

If we want to know why hospital costs have gone up in the last ten years we should look at this government which overspent us into inflation. It said we were not going to have inflation. It said inflation was imported—it came from Afghanistan, from Pakistan—it came from everywhere but Ottawa. This is the government that has all the financial powers, the fiscal powers, the Bank of Canada, and which controls the currency and the printing presses. But it cannot control inflation, Mr. Speaker.

The provinces were faced with inflation which was not controlled by this government and which was running at 10 per cent or 12 per cent. Hospital costs rose and other costs rose, and the federal government blamed the provinces for the increasing cost of hospitals and so on and said they had to take the risk of it.

What happens if the federal government unleashes another burst of inflation across Canada and these provinces are left with the increasing cost of hospital care and medicare? All this will be put on the provinces that can least afford it. That is one of the weaknesses of this legislation. The federal government would not make a commitment to review the situation in some regular fashion by 1980; it insisted that the changes come by 1977. It is not committed to any review of what happens to these programs by 1980. The Minister of Finance laid down the fiscal tablets like Moses and the provinces either accept them or are buried in the bullrushes. No one should get the idea that the proposals embodied in this legislation were accepted by the provinces. The provinces have not accepted these arrangements willingly—only after a long period of bullyragging and brute pressure by the Minister of Finance and his colleagues. We do not hear any loud hosannas coming from any province as a result of this arrangement, so it has not been accepted willingly.

The fourth weakness is that this is going to leave the weaker provinces squeezed, in a position of financial distress, with inferior services that will remain inferior until some other government is elected that will be more careful about the realities of Canada.

The fifth weakness of these arrangements is the damage that has been done to federal-provincial relations. That cannot be underestimated. When all the statesmen in Ottawa and elsewhere in Canada are considering the difficulties with Quebec and all the rest of it, they might well consider the damage done to the whole structure of Canada in the last several years in reaching these arrangements. It is my view that the constitutional crisis in Canada is very likely to be solved much more easily when there is a change of government—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: —and if the practitioners of strong arm federalism are put out to grass where they belong.

This is a complicated piece of legislation, and these are complicated arrangements. The ordinary person in Canada cannot be expected to understand them. Even we in this House, wise as we are, have difficulty understanding them, so the ordinary person in Canada will not know what this is all about. But over a period of time they can get a general impression. We are dealing with a complicated issue.

What are the provinces complaining about? Some of the changes were made by the federal government without consultation—without "by your leave". They were told to do it just because the federal government has the fiscal muscle and no one can stand against them. There are at least a dozen instances of this in the last few years. A revenue guarantee was given by this government in 1972 that, as a result of a new income tax act and all the changes in personal income tax and corporate taxes, the provinces would not lose any revenue. The federal government promised to guarantee them against loss of revenue and entered into an agreement for five years in order to get that pledge. The federal government developed its own formula, however, for calculating what the revenue losses would be.

The federal government with its all fiscal experts—hundreds and thousands—ten thousands of them, I suppose—rank upon rank of them, came up with a formula to assess the loss of any province by virtue of the changes in income tax and corporate tax. But these losses far exceeded what the federal mandarins expected. It cost a lot more money than they expected. It cost a lot more money than they anticipated. Without so much as asking the provinces if they agreed, in 1975 the Minister of Finance announced that he was going to change the revenue guarantee—that the formula being used to calculate what the provinces got was going to be changed retroactively for 1974-75. His own formula, the federal formula, was going to be changed without their consent, and in 1977 the whole guarantee program would be terminated and there would be no compensation for that either. It was just an announcement, not even a proposal. The hon. gentleman just made the pronouncement that this was going to happen.

Naturally the ten provincial governments were irritated to be told that something settled several years earlier was to be changed retroactively, in addition to causing losses of hundreds of millions of dollars. This is one example of what went on in reaching this agreement.

As a result of that decision the province of Newfoundland is to lose at least $8 million per year under the revenue guarantee. There was to be no compensation, although the previous minister of finance—a more warmhearted gentleman who could not stand the company opposite because they were too hardhearted, and who is now practising law in Toronto in preparation for his next move—gave an assurance that there would be something to replace the revenue guarantee after five years. That was changed unilaterally by the federal government, the people who set up the formula—heavy handed and heavy fisted—hamhanded and hamfisted—uncaring.

They entered into an agreement with the ten provinces a few years earlier. And what else did they do, Mr. Speaker? They decided to put ceilings on some of these programs because of rising costs—costs caused by the inflation they had induced or failed to prevent. But they were not going to bear the brunt of that and placed it on the provinces who could ill afford to bear the brunt.

One of the changes they made was in the health insurance and medicare field. In the June, 1975, budget they decided to put a per capita growth rate ceiling on their contributions to medicare. It was not agreed upon by the provinces but just decided by the federal government. The medicare program that hon. gentlemen opposite started in 1967 and made it impossible for the provinces to stay out of was now costing too much—more than they anticipated because of their lack of care and failure to halt inflation, so they put on arbitrary per capita growth rates of 14.5 per cent for 1976-77, 12 per cent for 1977-78, and 10 per cent for 1978-79 and subsequent years. There was no consultation. The provinces were told the federal government will only share increasing costs if they do not exceed those percentages. That naturally has a tendency to induce bad feelings between the provinces and the federal government.

The miracle is that we still have a country, with the way the provinces are being treated. This is supposed to be a federal state. We are supposed to have one government at the centre and ten provincial governments supreme in their own sphere, but because of the fiscal power, because the federal government controls the tax system directly and indirectly, and because it controls the monetary system, it has the whip hand. This is no longer a federal system but a Liberal unitary system.

A unilateral change was made in medicare. The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) wanted to change the arrangements in health insurance because health insurance costs were rising too quickly to suit him. He does not deal with hospitals; he does not enter into collective negotiations and collective bargaining with CUPE and other unions that represent hospitals. He is not dealing with situations where hospital workers have been underpaid since the beginning of history, but in the last four or five years have willingly organized collectively and were exercising some muscle. They were determined to see their wages increased so they could get a living wage. The minister did not have to deal with that. He certainly had no sympathy for them because he decided he had to put on controls, and what was going to be spent on hospitals would be limited.

[Mr. Crosbie.]

He came forward with proposals that the federal government would set a limit. He said the government would give the workers the same percentage increase as the increase in the gross national product each year. If their costs increased more than the percentage of the gross national product, they would still only get that percentage. That was the great brainstorm which he presented to the provinces, but the provinces would not accept it.

The proposal was made in 1972 and was rejected in September of 1974. Then the minister gave notice that in five years' time the government would terminate the whole hospital health insurance program. That is the government's idea of co-operative federalism. The new co-operative federalism is "If you do not do what I say, we will terminate the program and you will not get one cent for your hospitals."

I am surprised backbenchers opposite support such a hard hearted, arbitrary, dictatorial set of cabinet ministers.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. The hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) has the floor.

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, let us look at another part of the established program financing which was established so that the ordinary people do not realize they are having their throats cut in health insurance, medicare, and education. They call it established program financing, EPF.

Let us take a look at post-secondary education. What did hon. gentlemen opposite do about this? They had instituted a system of supporting post-secondary education a number of years earlier. I will not go into the details of how they did it, whether it was per capita or 50 per cent of the costs in post-secondary education from trade schools to universities. But they became annoyed when these costs continued to rise. They were annoyed that the cost of operating trade schools, technical schools, and universities was rising. Having looked in the mirror and recognized the cause as being themselves, at least in part, due to the inflation which they permitted, or due to the fact that this was inevitable, they decided that the burden they were sharing for post-secondary education should no longer be shared on a 50-50 basis. They decided to put a 15 per cent ceiling on aggregate federal payments in any one year, a ceiling on the increase in federal payments. That was the decision they imposed several years ago.

The result of that in one province, Newfoundland, with which I am familiar, and that is why I hark back to it—I prefer to talk about something I know about—but this is true even more in other provinces, was that in 1975-76 Newfoundland received $1.3 million less from the federal government for post-secondary education than it would have received had the 15 per cent ceiling not been imposed unilaterally. All this was done unilaterally, not by way of negotiation or agreement. It was done by the hon. gentlemen opposite, the hon. King Kongs flexing their fiscal muscles and saying, "This is it", with not so much as "by your leave". It is any wonder that Canada is being disrupted and divided and that certain provinces feel they should quit? It is because of that kind of treatment.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: I am dead serious, Mr. Speaker. I have witnessed this for five years, and I am as serious as can be that in large part the reason for the dissatisfaction in federal-provincial relations is the arbitrary and arrogant attitude and actions of the hon. gentlemen opposite. I should not be warning them and telling them this. They might change in the next few months.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Don't you believe it.

Mr. Crosbie: Imminent elections cause the Liberals to do wonders. Anything is likely in the next few months. Even the Minister of Finance might become most conciliatory and might throw out a few million dollar to the provinces in the next few months. Perhaps I should not be mentioning these things at all.

Let us speak about something that is still more dastardly. Hon. gentlemen opposite should listen to this because it is another example in federal-provincial relations of the co-operative federalism as practised by the hon. gentlemen opposite, the hon. King Kongs. In December of 1975 the federal finance mandarins made an estimate of what they would have to pay for post-secondary education in the next fiscal year. The federal government entered into programs with the provinces for a few years and came up with an estimate. In the financial year 1976-77 they were going to spend $538 million, they would transfer that to the provinces under post-secondary education. They told the provinces this and the provinces accepted the federal figures. But lo and behold, in May of 1976 the federal financial wizards, the experts, hundreds of them, discovered that it would not be $538 million in 1976-77 under that program but rather $649 million. They made a mistake, they underestimated the cost.

It might have been the fault of the Liberals because of the Liberal induced inflation. They were going to have to spend $111 million more than they had expected. I am sure you will think that they took that on the chin, because of course they had to meet their commitments. They made a mistake in their estimates, but since the program had been established for years you might think they would accept that. Not on your life! They did not accept it. They told the provinces the country was under fiscal restraint. I say they should have been under penal restraint to do what they did, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Right in the solar plexus.

Mr. Crosbie: They said to the provinces, "We underestimated by $111 million. We know we should pay you that money, but we are under fiscal restraint and we cannot pay it to you until next year. You will not get what you are entitled to this year because we do not want to be embarrassed by going back to the House of Commons and having to admit there is another $111 million in supplementary estimates". So those shylocks, no-lucks, went to the ten provinces and told them they had to wait until next year for the $111 million. How is that for co-operative federalism? How is that for the great Liberal principle of participatory democracy? Bushwhackers! There will be no democracy in this country until we get those scoundrels out.

Mr. Crosbie: I just want to make one reference to Newfoundland in this connection to show the enormity of the crime. Because the government is going back on its commitments in 1976-1977, Newfoundland receives $2 million less for post-secondary education than it should. Presumably it will get the $2 million next year. It has been postponed.

I mentioned in another debate in this House several weeks ago—and the Minister of Finance took it very lightly, and he should not have—the fact that the federal government in another fantastic example of co-operative federalism—that is, you co-operate or you get nothing at all—unilaterally indexed the personal income tax in 1974. I believe it was the former minister of finance, Mr. Turner, who brought down that budget which unilaterally indexed the personal income tax. The government collects the provincial income tax for nine provinces, and they have to accept uniform conditions. The federal government is doing this because that is best for Canada. It causes less confusion, it is more efficient, it saves money, and it obviates 11 governments each having to collect its own.

The hon. gentleman entered into an agreement with nine provinces to collect their income tax, but unilaterally, without consultation, without notice, and without as much as "by your leave" or a please or a thank you, indexed the personal income tax, which caused all nine provinces to lose millions of dollars over the last three years. The federal government did not even agree to compensate them for this loss. As a result of that unilateral indexing—and I could care less if the federal government indexes its own income tax; that is its own income tax; let it do what it likes with its own—instead of just indexing its own, it indexed the income tax for nine provinces. Perhaps it had to do it for technical reasons, but if it had to do it for technical reasons it should have made up the revenue lost to the provinces. However, the government opposite did not do that. It just imposed indexing itself and caused the loss of hundreds of millions of dollars to those provinces.

In the case of Newfoundland the loss this financial year is $30 million. That is $18 million in income tax, and the rest in the negative effect that had on tax equalization. The Minister of Finance took $30 million out of the coffers of the province of Newfoundland in this fiscal year by that one change made without the consent of the province and without its consultation. He refused to reimburse the province for that, and every time it is brought up he just smiles to himself as though it were the work of a genius. The hon. gentleman is going to discover that that is not something which is taken lightly. It is another reason federal-provincial relations are in the state they are. I am sorry. The figure for Newfoundland for 1976-77 in direct revenue loss is $14.9 million, and the estimate of negative tax equalization brings it up to $30 million. Of course, in the other larger provinces the figure is much higher.

All these funny things happened "On the Way to the Forum", but these were not very funny for the provinces which participated. That is why there is a strain in federal-provincial relations. That is why there is exacerbation, if that is the word to use. That is why feelings are not good. That is why people are suggesting we need to take a look at the BNA Act and the distribution of powers.

A lot of the pressure for that kind of constitutional review will disappear when the hon. member for Rocky Mountain (Mr. Clark) forms his government this year, next year, or whenever the next election is called.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: It's Bow River.

Mr. Crosbie: He will be the member for somewhere; never mind about that. You are just lucky he doesn't run in your district.

Mr. MacFarlane: I hope it will be outside the 200-mile limit.

Mr. Crosbie: What is needed is not so much a constitutional change in Canada as a change in personnel in the government. We need someone who will be co-operative, someone who will negotiate, someone who will consult, someone who does not think he has all the answers, and someone who does not have the Liberal habit of thinking that he and only he has the answers, and that he is God's gift to Canada. When we get a change in the seats opposite this constitutional crisis will be vastly diminished.

In this House several weeks ago the Minister of Finance said that there was $1.25 billion more in the pockets of people because of indexing. I do not know how much of that applies just to federal tax and how much to provincial tax. However, I say that the hon. gentleman has a duty to put back in people's pockets what the government of Canada can afford, not what the provinces of Canada cannot afford.

I come from a province which cannot afford to rub two nickels together at the present time. It cannot borrow any more than it is borrowing. It cannot impose any more taxes. It already has the highest tax rates in Canada. It has the highest tax in the five main tax fields—sales tax, personal income tax, corporation tax, liquor tax and gasoline tax. They are the highest in Canada. The people in Newfoundland have the lowest per capita income. They have less ability to pay these high taxes. The government of Newfoundland cannot turn down what the government of Canada offers in the final analysis, but we do not have to take it quietly. If we think we are being treated unfairly we can protest, and we are protesting, and we are going to protest the dismal estimates which were tabled in this House a few days ago.

The estimates tabled in this House are an abomination. Of the $45 billion in estimates which were tabled in this House last week there was practically nothing for Newfoundland to fight the unemployment problem there. In the estimates of the Department of Public Works an amount of $300 million is for single purpose and general purpose buildings across Canada, but look at what is to be spent in Newfoundland: $276,000 in Fortune and Burin-Burgeo, and $700,000 for planning a tax data centre in St. John's. That is $1 million out of $300 million, one three-hundredth out of the department of patronage, the Department of Public Works.

An hon. Member: Disgraceful!

Mr. Crosbie: Only one three-hundredth is to be spent in Newfoundland, the province with the highest unemployment and with a construction industry which is having the greatest difficulty. What is the department spending in Ottawa-Hull, in this rich part of Canada? It is spending $63 million out of the $300 million from Public Works. That amount is to be spent in this fat-cat area of Ottawa-Hull for more government buildings.

Mrs. Holt: Do your arithmetic, and you will know that that is not right.

Mr. Epp: You mean it's more?

Mr. Crosbie: I am not including Campeau. Campeau is in there under lease-backs. I am including direct government expenditures by the Department of Public Works to build buildings. What is the unemployment rate in Ottawa-Hull? It is very small. What is the unemployment in Newfoundland? It is at least 20 per cent to 25 per cent.

I went through the estimates looking at the items of $250,000 and more which were going to be spent. This was supposed to be shown in the estimates. I could not find $30 million spent in Newfoundland on those kinds of items. I am not talking about DREE now; I am talking about direct expenditures like transport, public works and fisheries. Only $750,000 is to be spent for small crafts and harbours in the whole of Newfoundland and Labrador, in all their 160,000 square miles. Over $2 million is to be spent in Nova Scotia, over $2 million in New Brunswick, and over $4.5 million in Quebec. Is that co-operative federalism? Like—I have to keep my language parliamentary. This is a diversion.

The people who brought these estimates down in this House should be ashamed of themselves. They are going to leave the people of Newfoundland to wallow in their unemployment problem. We have the guts to stand on our own two feet and not give in to them with regard to the off-shore minerals off Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick. We do not fall over and play dead. I will be speaking about that tomorrow, so I will not waste my time on it tonight. The pipsqueaks are putting the squeeze on Newfoundland because we will not fall over and play dead; not on your life, Mr. Speaker. There is one of them now. I am going to move that that hon. gentleman's salary be reduced to two cents, and that is twice what I think he is worth.

If I may get back to federal-provincial relations—I am not in good form tonight, having risen at six o'clock this morning to catch a flight for Ottawa—I shall return to my main theme. I shall deal with my other theme tomorrow afternoon, hopefully. For the present I want to tell the House of other examples of bullying tactics, of dragooning, of Upper Canadian bullyboy behaviour.

Mr. Abbott: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: The hon. member for Mississauga (Mr. Abbott) had better watch out. If he ever comes down to Newfoundland he will find out what consumers can be like.

Mr. McKenzie: He'll be consumed.

Mr. Crosbie: The federal government agreed with the provinces on a program called revenue stabilization, that is, the federal government guaranteed that a province's total net revenue would not be less than its net revenue in the immediately preceding two years if the rates and structures of its taxes were to remain unchanged during those two years. That was the revenue guarantee.

That guarantee was most helpful for the financially less well endowed provinces, because they could go to the bond markets more easily. When you went down to the States and mentioned a revenue guarantee, it sounded good. People down there knew that the federal government's revenue guarantee meant that a province's revenues would not slip back, that is to say, if they did slip back from the level of the previous year, the federal government would make up the difference. The federal government never had to pay one cent under that principle. It never cost it one cent, one sou, one copper. It cost the government nothing to agree on that principle with the provinces; but it helped provinces like Newfoundland when they became involved in the financial markets. The guarantee provided fiscal stability.

What did the federal government do with our revenue stabilization program? While the negotiations were going on to establish the principles embodied in this bill, the federal government came to the provinces and said, "We want to do away with revenue stabilization. We no longer want to implement that policy." In other words, it was another twist of the arm. The Minister of Finance had the poor old provinces by the arm, and he gave it another twist, as much as to say that if they did not behave, if they did not accept what he was offering, they were going to be hurt even more. The federal government said that revenue stabilization was to go by the board, although the program was not costing it one cent.

Some members of cabinet might realize the dirty struggle which was going on, and I hope they are listening.

Mr. Paproski: Listen, Gillespie, and you may learn something.

Mr. Crosbie: I hope they are either listening or that they will read Hansard. What the government did was another example of its attitude to federal-provincial relations. Given all this, some of you may wonder why the ten provinces were able to get together and make a joint proposal last December 7. They did it because they wanted to save themselves. For the first time in federal-provincial relations, the ten provinces agreed together, on all of these—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his allotted time has expired. He may continue if there is unanimous consent.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): The Chair recognizes the hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Rondeau).

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Does the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) have unanimous consent to continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): The hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) may continue. Order, please. I see the hon. member for Timmins (Mr. Roy) rising on a point of order.

Mr. Roy (Timmins): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I said no.

Mr. Paproski: Mr. Speaker, I rise on the same point of order. The hon. member cannot rise on that point of order after Your Honour has recognized the hon. member for St. John's West. (Mr. Crosbie).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): That is a valid point of order. I had recognized the hon. member for St. John's West.

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, I will only take a minute or two.

Mr. Stollery: Mr. Speaker, I also rise on a point of order. I also said no, and I am sure I said no before Your Honour recognized the hon. member for St. John's West.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. It is possible that I did not hear. I shall ask again. Is there unanimous consent for the hon. member to continue?

Some hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): I could not hear the sense of the House; therefore I shall ask again. Is there unanimous consent for the hon. member for St. John's West to continue his speech?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): There is not unanimity. The Chair recognizes the hon. member for Shefford.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, it is unfortunately funny to note that the wranglings in the House are similar to those now experienced in the Canadian confederation. This Bill C-37 dealing more especially with the federal-provincial relations is an extremely important measure and as timely in 1977 as it was in 1976.

The coming into power of the Parti Québécois in Quebec on November 15 last was necessary to give an entirely new significance to Canada's federal-provincial relations. In my opinion, this political development in Quebec should be approached by the federal government in a realistic and serene mood, not with a tendency to say to Quebec: We will prove to you Quebecers that federalists are right. Such an attitude would only worsen the federal-provincial relations, because it should not be forgotten that all provinces feel that they are assailed when one of them is threatened by ultimatums, reprisals, official or unofficial sanctions.

The real problems which have led Quebec to its present condition—and this goes for the Canadian confederation—were not solved or settled at the right moment and now that we are before a fait accompli, long-term or effective solutions which would be beneficial to the provinces and to Canadian unity are rejected. A mature individual does not depend on ultimatums to take decisions.

Problems left in abeyance far too long without any solution created a state of fact within the Canadian confederation and when one wants to settle them, the good faith requisite for a frank dialogue often does not exist any longer unfortunately. A great many people have nothing to lose in fact. Why? Because they have lost everything and that is the reasoning one hears, wrongly or rightly, around Quebec everyday: Through what miracle would it be possible for the Canadian provinces to operate better tomorrow than in the last 110 years?

The present confederation seems to have been an impediment to the provinces' emancipation, if one considers the existing mentality in the Canadian provinces in 1977, in Quebec as well as outside Quebec. This impediment has been caused by overly great centralization and by the central government monopolizing provincial powers, ordering the provinces instead of being of service to them. This is the real cause of the conditions as we know them today. The provinces are less and less the blind servants of the federal government, and that is good, for it will prevent, I hope, excessive centralization by the federal government, which would prevent the provinces from becoming weak members in the family which is our nation. Mr. Speaker, let us imagine a child who would have grown in the same clothes at 12 and at 20. It is easy to imagine that at 20, he would feel stifled by the clothes he wore at 12.

The provinces have gone a long way, but during the last 110 years the Canadian confederation has gone in the opposite direction, strangling the provinces, which are increasingly capable of taking their responsibilities and ever less willing to depend on a centralizing government which they created to serve and not to strangle or provoke them by removing from them—and this has been said by many members in this House—by taking away from the provinces rights that belonged to them and which it now administers in their place.

Mr. Speaker, why should a county council do on behalf of a municipality what this municipality is perfectly capable of doing itself? Why should a provincial government do on behalf of a county council what this county council can do better than any other public organization? Why should the federal government do on behalf of a province what the provincial authorities can do more easily than the federal government? Where does this desire to centralize everything come from, Mr. Speaker? For the closer the authority is to the people, the better the chance people have to be as they have always been. Decisions made far from the people are always detrimental to the people. The farther the authority is, the better the chance financial institutions have of exploiting the people through centralization. That is why the financial institutions do not like to see decision making processes too close to the people. The farther away the decision making, the better served the financial institutions.

Mr. Speaker, the first thing which should come under the exclusive control of every province is its own credit. Each Canadian province should be provided with the services of a branch of the Bank of Canada. This branch should be fully and entirely responsible for the credit in the province, and the decisions as to the use and control of the credit of the province should come under the exclusive control of each province.

Mr. Speaker, Hydro Ontario is responsible for the distribution of electric power throughout Ontario, just like B.C. Hydro in British Columbia and Hydro-Quebec in the province of Quebec. Similarly a branch of the Bank of Canada would be responsible for financial credit in each of the provinces. So the federal government could no longer jeopardize the financial credit of the provinces by endlessly borrowing on their financial credit and guaranteeing loans for its own financing with the wealth of a province.

Mr. Speaker, this brings me back to the British North America Act which gave responsibilities to the provinces while centralizing the financial resources in the hands of the federal government. What is at the root of the quarrelling we have known since the beginning of confederation, the fact that while the provinces have clearly defined obligations and duties, the financial levers are in the hands of the federal government? This is why the last 35 years or so have been witness to perennial disputes over federal-provincial conferences, over taxation powers, over financial powers which the provinces do not have but which are held by the federal government and which in turn mean further obligations for the provincial governments.

This is why, Mr. Speaker, as long as the federal government will not give the provinces the financial power enabling them to meet their provincial obligations, the Canadian confederation will unfortunately be in trouble and will continue to be threatened, not only by Quebec, but also by the other provinces. Why? Because the provinces were given responsibilities and the federal government was given the financial powers to meet those responsibilities.

Why this perpetual conflict in our federal-provincial relations, and why does the federal government refuse to tackle the financial problems to allow the provinces to achieve what they want and what they can do in their own sphere and within their own territory?

Mr. Speaker, this is why, like the former prime minister of Canada said, it is useless and pointless to talk about democracy in this Chamber as long as we have not placed financial powers in the hands of those who have provincial obligations towards the population. This is why, Mr. Speaker, we would like the government to realize before it is too late that it is up to the federal government to take action to save Canadian unity and Canadian confederation.

You cannot blame children who want to leave the family home when they have reached an adult age if they are given only promises and told: Come and argue constantly at federal-provincial conferences, and you will still go back with promises because the federal government has not wanted, at least until now, to give the provinces the financial powers that they had before, but that the federal government took over because of an international event in 1939, at the start of the Second World War.

Mr. Speaker, instead of wanting to control the provinces, the federal government must therefore become somewhat more flexible, more understanding, and stop issuing secret directives to the world of finance so as to strangle a government which may have socialistic tendencies, I admit it, but which has still been chosen by the majority of Quebec voters. Let us therefore give this government the opportunity to pass good legislation if it has any. Let us give this government the opportunity to become bankrupt if the only thing it can offer the population of Quebec is economic bankruptcy. Mr. Speaker, I hope that this government can take its responsibilities and that it can request not the separation of Quebec from the Canadian confederation, but the financial powers needed to enable Quebec to fill its own aspirations.

[English]

Mr. Bob Wenman (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, I am a Canadian. I believe in Canada. I believe in one strong united nation. I believe in a federation of regions united in mutual respect and common interest, in both the richness of regional diversity and the unity of a creative federalism that, in spite of many gusts, has burned so brightly on since 1867.

While it might well be that Canadians are drawn toward regionalism because they are disenchanted with a repressive central government, the striving for an expression of identity from a regional perspective deserves close examination as to its potential to give expression to a new type of regional federalism. This new balanced federalism need not be a decentralization or a weakening of either federal or provincial responsibilities. Canadians have nothing to fear from strong regions as long as there is strong national government as well.

What we clearly need to ensure is a rational redistribution of responsibilities between the federal and provincial governments, a rational redistribution that involves clarity and the elimination of overlapping jurisdiction and duplication. This would mean that both the provinces and the federal government must be willing to forgo some programs, recognizing that certain services are delivered better by other levels of government.

The country has been committed to universality in social programming, which suggested that we should treat all regions as though they were the same although we knew they were not. Why, for example, apply a massive employment program in a region which has no real unemployment problem, but rather a weakness in its transportation links? Why not develop programs in response to regional needs rather than on the basis of universality for the sake of universality? We are a diverse country and we need institutions which reflect and accommodate that diversity.

Canada is in fact a federation of diverse regions. Why not recognize this situation and build from it? Why not recognize regional aspirations, maximize them, and allow them to replace the small but powerful vested interest groups which express their demands only too effectively on an old, tired structure which capitulates because of the impotency of a castrated parliament, stripped of its authority, dignity, and ability to produce for, and in the interest of, the majority of Canadians?

The clash of opposing regional forces is the seed from which Canadian identity must and will grow. Directed positively, in a spirit of co-operative federalism, it could be the new dynamism to drive a renewed confederation. Let us recognize not just two regions of Canada but rather the many diverse regions of our country, acknowledging each for the validity of its own unique cultural, social, political and economic aspirations. Let us recognize that Canada is great because of its freedom from uniformity, because of its capacity to tolerate, accept, and appreciate the great freedom of choice inherent in that diversity. Let us not be limited by our diversity; let us be elevated by it. Let us feel that our potential, is broadened and enhanced by it instead of retreating in fear from the reality, from the expressed desire for this new type of regional balanced federalism.

The present government has waited too long before recognizing the regional aspirations of Canadians. The bill before us is but a token attempt at recognition of those aspirations. The government and its leader are attempting to play the role of the saviours of Confederation. Mr. Speaker, this Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and his government are not the saviours of Confederation, but rather the saboteurs of Confederation.

An hon. Member: Shame!

Mr. Wenman: Their arrogant confrontary tactics and abuse of power have led to a centralization of government never contemplated in the partner concept envisaged by the creators of the union of this nation.

Four thousand people responded to a questionnaire in my constituency and 80 per cent of them said that talk of separatism in several regions of Canada was really not a call for separatism as such but rather a larger concern that the government of Canada and its bureaucracy in Ottawa are too big, too much out of control, and no longer responsive to the wishes of the Canadian people. Eighty per cent felt that the real concern of Canadians is not separatism at all but rather a concern for better, smaller yet strong government. This strong western sentiment was exactly the sentiment which saw the government change in Quebec and will see a change in the national government of Canada.

I am confident in my Canadianism and I am confident in the Canadianism of my constituents. Ninety-five per cent of my constituents who responded to the questionnaire said, "Yes, I want my province or region to remain a part of Confederation in Canada." We have no doubt about our personal Canadianism in Fraser Valley West, but we feel that too much credibility has been given to non-representatives, separatists, vocal minorities.

Mr. Speaker, I want my province to remain in Canada because I am a Canadian. I believe in Canada. I believe in one, strong, united nation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, as one considers the mathematical formulas in Bill C-37 and also the fact that the legislation is presented to us as a fait accompli, it is no wonder that so many speakers in this debate have sought to take a broad approach to their feelings about Confederation. It is precisely that leadership from the Canadian parliament on the crisis of Confederation at this moment in our history that the Canadian people have a right to expect. I think the Canadian people want to hear from their members of parliament how we feel, what we are going to do to save our country if we hope to hold it intact at this particular moment.

I think it is unfortunate that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has not sought to come into the House of Commons to share, the kind of views he expressed in Washington today, to come into the House of Commons and take part in a full scale debate in this House on national unity and the future of our country—a national unity which we could define for the good of the Canadian people. It is not only the threat of the break-up of Confederation and the linguistic and cultural issues that we are facing, but also we will be considering in the debate on national unity the economic problems and regional disparities of our country, because that also is what needs to be discussed in a broad ranging debate on national unity. That is why the members of this House, as we look back in the debate of the past two days on this bill, have sought to take a wider approach. Members are tired of the great issues of our country being faced and settled in federal-provincial conferences, in TV addresses to the nation, and in speeches to the Congress of the United States. I believe it is here that we ought to be giving the leadership the Canadian people want.

We heard tonight the views of members from Newfoundland and British Columbia about the desire of people in those provinces to stay in Confederation and to respond flexibly to the threat that faces our country right now. I want to say a word about the people of Alberta. I think that not enough positive statements are being heard which truly reflect the feelings of Alberta. I must say to you, Mr. Speaker, that I deeply resent the kind of media coverage some eastern journalists have been giving Alberta when they interview people who say that we in Alberta don't care if Quebec does separate and that our future is not really on the line. I think that such views within Alberta express the feelings of only a very small fraction of the people in Alberta. The people of Alberta I come into contact with want very much to recognize that the problems posed by the November 15 election in Quebec are problems that have to be solved by all Canadians together.

I resent that great Liberal, Bryce Mackasey, going into Alberta and saying that Albertans won't pay the price, that Albertans wont pay the price for staying in Confederation, and then being interviewed on the media as if this was a great discovery which had been made and one worth relaying to the rest of the people of Canada. I think that Albertans are paying the price, and I recognize that we are going to have to go on paying a price for national unity.

I think it is absolutely unfair to depict Albertans as being narrow on this subject, even on the subject of bilingualism and biculturalism. I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, that people in Edmonton line up to get their children into French schools in the city of Edmonton and that there is a thriving French community in the city of Edmonton which enjoys French language television and French language radio and newspapers. Many things have been done in our province to reflect the diversity and the fullness of the Canadian character.

I think it is a calumny to say that Albertans won't pay the price for staying in Confederation when we are already paying the price in energy subsidies which we pass on to the rest of the country through our willingness to take less than world price on energy. Then these are the freight rates. The discrimination in freight rates has been documented in this House for many years.

Speaking about transportation, Mr. Speaker, we think about the decision handed down today by the Supreme Court of Canada in the Pacific Western Airlines dispute which the federal government brought through a series of actions all the way into the Supreme Court. The Supreme Court ruled by a nine to nothing decision today to uphold the province of Alberta in its acquisition of PWA. I think the action of the Alberta government in acquiring PWA for reasons which Premier Lougheed made very clear, namely, that it was essential to development in northern Alberta and to the province's over-all, long-range planning and to diversify its economy, has now been vindicated by the Supreme Court of Canada and is an indication why a flexible federalism is absolutely essential. The provinces do have a right to expand and develop their own regions through a system of transportation along the line Premier Lougheed has indicated.

I think it would be a very serious mistake indeed for the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) to carry out the implied threat that he made prior to the handing down of the Supreme Court decision. He implied he would bring legislation into the House to roll back the decision of the Alberta government to acquire PWA. I warn the Minister of Transport, with all the energy at my command, that we will fight any such legislation down to the last post. We will uphold the right of provinces to develop their own regional strengths, including their own transportation systems.

I think more of us in this country are recognizing that regional input is absolutely essential if we are to have the kind of flexible and creative federalism that is necessary and which Bill C-37 allows us to consider in greater fullness. It is essential to be realistic about the extent of the threat that is facing Canada. However, it is more important not to despair or to accept separatism as inevitable. I want to reaffirm to the House tonight that the people of Alberta by no means are accepting the so-called inevitability of separatism. We are going to indicate in the months ahead, by a mobilization of outspoken federalism in our province, that those who are telling the rest of Canada that Alberta does not care are wrong. As I say, I do not think that separatism is at all inevitable. The idea, the emotion, and the power of a united Canada is shown to be stronger and better than René Levesque's constricting nationalism.

The alternative to the PQ argument must always be visible. It must be perceived by French-speaking Canadians that they can fulfil themselves culturally in Canada at least as well as they could in a separated Quebec. Certainly a great effort to make the bilingual nature of this country a working reality should not be abandoned. Real progress is being made in the public service and in the schools, and I have given the House an illustration in this regard so far as Edmonton is concerned. Real progress is being made and should be continued.

There are justifiable complaints in western Canada. Indeed, there is a similarity in the expressions of concern and alienation felt within the province of Quebec and those felt in other regions. We heard about Newfoundland tonight. I can tell the House that the people of Alberta also feel a sense of frustration which is caused by an inflexible type of federalism which is maintained by an overly centralist concept administered by the present government. I think we are looking forward to the day when we can have a greater decentralization of powers, and in order to approach this great question we must have the right attitude. In that way we recognize that a compromise is going to be necessary to hold our country together, in the same way that compromise was necessary in order to build and establish Confederation in the first place.

I look forward, then, to a national debate centring right here in the House which will be about the ways that a compromise can be achieved with honour and with practicality. I think that reason and toleration will help us to understand that what we are talking about is not so-called "giving in", to Quebec, but of implementing new relationships between Ottawa and the provinces that will lead to a deepened sense of national unity. It is in the interests of Alberta as much as Quebec to search for a new mode of Confederation, one that builds nationhood out of the strengths of all regions, rather than imposing a centralized system from the top.

I do not think that this debate is going to be easy by any means, which is why I think none of us should pretend that we have the final answers at the moment. Rather this is the time for speaking and for listening and for moving together, whether in Newfoundland, British Columbia, Alberta or Quebec. Together we must be tolerant of the views of one region or another at this moment when we are trying to find the way in which our country can be held together.

I want to mention that one thing I am going to do as, I hope, a small contribution in my capacity as a member of parliament, where I think I have some responsibility to exert some leadership in finding solutions to this problem, is to hold a Town Hall meeting in Edmonton on March 28 under the title "The Kind of Canada I Want". I am going to invite the people of Edmonton to come and speak from their hearts of their concern for the kind of Canada they want. I am going to invite the media from the province of Quebec to cover this event, and I hope they will convey to the people of Quebec in a direct manner the feeling of the people of Edmonton that they do care and that they are willing to pay the price for holding our country together.

It is not enough, Mr. Speaker, for members of parliament simply to stand and to say they want the country to stay together. I think we have an obligation to give some leadership and to show how we try to lead the way to these solutions, instead of just waiting for them to appear at some federal-provincial conference. If the Canadian parliament is going to re-assert its claim to leadership in this country in the form it was constituted, I think members of parliament ought to be able to advance some solutions to the crisis that faces us.

Speaking only for myself, I think we find a better concept of a more creative kind of federalism through a consideration of the report that was issued by the Joint Senate and House of Commons Committee on the Constitution, which reported to this House in June of 1972 and which did try to find a way between outright balkanization and a centralism that people in many provinces find excessive. I think if we can express a consensus on decentralization we would have a bold, new and exciting way to restore the vitality of Canada.

I see it is ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker; I will continue at a later time.

Adjournment Debate

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

FISHERIES—EXTENSIVE HERRING KILL IN BAY OF FUNDY—REQUEST FOR DETERMINATION OF CAUSE AND ASSISTANCE TO FISHERMEN

Mr. Fred McCain (Carleton-Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, on December 7 of last year I asked a question on behalf of some of the fishermen of Grand Manan who had experienced a very serious loss of income as a result of circumstances absolutely and completely beyond their control. These people have presented their case to the staff of the Ministry of the Environment. They have been patient, they have been polite, and they have not been demanding. They have merely presented the facts of the case as they saw them on their own behalf. They made all the expenditures that would have been necessary for a fruitful season, but they reaped no harvest whatsoever as they cast their nets upon the water.

I rise tonight to appeal on their behalf. I think that if we examine the report on expenditures by the Department of the Environment through its fisheries branch, we will find that the department has aided and assisted a great many people in the fishing industry in Canada. It seems only fair, then, that the same spirit, the same degree of recognition, should be shown to these people as has been shown judiciously and properly to others in Canada, including fellow fishermen. I think it is discrimination to leave these people out, particularly so in view of the very gentlemanly position which they have adopted and the very fine way in which they have presented their case.

I think it is necessary to take into consideration the basic economy of the island of Grand Manan. There is probably no community in Canada more dependent upon a single source of income than that island. Except for a very short tourist season which makes some contribution, the income of many on the island is based principally on fish. When any portion of this income is denied fishermen of that area, by virtue of an act of God or man, the economy of the area suffers.

Fishing is not a guaranteed income; by its nature it is cyclical. This is particularly pertinent to this group of fishermen this year because it was one of the perhaps two out of five years they could have anticipated a very generous and adequate income. The weir fisherman is one who must accept that perhaps not more than two out of five years are going to be really prosperous. With good luck in the other years of that five he would recover his investment, and in the fifth year would make virtually nothing.

It is not only unfortunate that a weir may be found to be absolutely fruitless for an entire fishing season, but in this particular season fish were in an abundance rarely seen anywhere, and the anticipated income was the one they needed in the five-year period to give them a decent average.

These people have not made an exorbitant demand upon the public treasury of Canada but merely asked that they be assisted as weir fishermen have been in the past. Their presentation indicated what their income might have been, and they asked that the minister recognize that and give them assistance on a fair basis. Some of their claims have been regarded as very high but I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, in view of the presence of fish at that particular time, they have not exaggerated what their income might have been had not circumstances interfered.

The fishermen of these parts have been hampered by regulations, licensing, and stock control. The income of the area has suffered seriously, and the processing industry has found it difficult to survive. This is an island which I think should have special consideration in every respect in regard to fishing. The licensing structure has hampered them severely. When you have no other source of income, and when it is restricted by the imposition of quotas and licenses, then the flexibility of earning power has been licensed out of existence. A few extra days of effort in another field might have added to their income, but they are denied that. They are abused by the licensing structure. It is not as if these people were on the mainland of New Brunswick or Nova Scotia where they might have an opportunity to earn money from other sources; their basic and only income is from fishing.

I submit that when a group of people such as this is denied the opportunity to reap the harvest through circumstances not of their making, the minister should take that into consideration and treat them as other fishermen in Canada. They should have some compensation.

Mr. Jim Fleming (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member is well aware, a thorough investigation of the herring kill of last summer has been carried out by the research scientists at the St. Andrews Biological Station in New Brunswick. All evidence indicates that the herring kill was due to natural causes as opposed to an explosion. The results of this investigation, including a report from the Department of National Defence, were brought to the hon. member's attention as well as that of the fishermen involved at a meeting held on Grand Manan a few weeks ago. The claims for the loss of income by the fishermen are understandable, but in the light of these results it has not been possible to compensate those affected by the kill.

However, the minister as well as his officials realize fully that there are a number of problems faced by the weir fishermen which need to be addressed, such as the instability of catches by the weirs. In this connection a second meeting was called by the Department of Fisheries and the Environment to discuss these problems with the weir fishermen. These meetings were well-attended, useful, and have established the potential to implement some long-term changes in the weir fishery, principally the development of a catch-insurance scheme and a more direct involvement of the weir fishermen in the management of the fishery.

TRANSPORT—REQUEST OF ATLANTIC PROVINCES FOR FUNDS TO IMPROVE TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, the purpose of my short comments tonight is to elaborate on my question of December 2 last to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) with regard to the submission by the transport ministers from the Atlantic region on the desperate need for a highway strengthening program in the Atlantic region. However, as selfish as it may seem, I am particularly concerned about the deterioration of what can only be referred to as a fourth class Trans-Canada Highway in my part of the province in western Newfoundland, particularly between Port aux Basques, through St. George's, Stephenville, Corner Brook and on to Deer Lake. These are five communities which comprise the comparative urban areas of western Newfoundland. This too is part of Canada.

This section of the Trans-Canada Highway and connecting links form the basis of an interconnecting highway system which is vital in the building of an economic base for western Newfoundland. While I realize that it must fit in with an over-all transportation plan for the province, the extreme pressure placed upon the use of the present system has indeed reached alarming proportions. The pressure on the increasing use is brought about by the fact that the available system of rail for the transportation of goods and services has deteriorated to a point where the basic industries have had to turn to rubber transport in order to compete in far off markets, and I refer mainly to our basic pulp and paper industry and the linerboard industry in Corner Brook and Stephenville. This has resulted in the increased traffic of tractor-trailors to the point where it is becoming absolutely dangerous for vehicular traffic other than the massive tractor-trailors which have been travelling the roads in ever increasing numbers in the past years. I can only stress that unless something is done on an emergency basis, we will all regret what is likely to happen.

The frustration which I have to endure at the evident procrastination of the government is that it appears that in spite of the countless studies on transportation which have been undertaken, there will now be further delays as a result of the impending appointment of a royal commission to study once again transportation problems in my province, when as recently as 1974 a voluminous study was produced on the trans-Newfoundland corridor transportation. I do not recall how many volumes there were, but volume C on the Trans-Canada Highway gives a complete picture of the conditions, the requirements, the cost, and the expected benefits. It goes into every detail which time will not permit me to go into tonight. I wonder why the government has to await another study before taking any action.

It adds to my frustration to know that there is a fundamental lesson we should all have learnt from history, that the basis of any economy in developing an area to take advantage of its resources is a proper transportation system. However, to add further to my frustration I read today a news release by the minister announcing a $30 million agreement for construction and improvement of highways in the northern part of the province of Alberta. I say God bless Alberta, it deserves it, but I ask, how long do we in Newfoundland have to wait for the infrastructure support necessary to give us a transportation base which is so vital to our future economy?

Just yesterday the minister indicated in reply to a question of mine that as a result of meetings with the Atlantic transportation ministers an agreement was reached to divert funds from other programs and to direct those funds toward the highway strengthening program for the Atlantic region. I sincerely hope that this will come about, and while it is a foregone conclusion that the royal commission study will come into effect, I hope the minister will, as he indicated to me previously, demand that the transcorridor study be referred to and become an important part of the relative factors to be considered by the commission to avoid further delays.

Even though the transportation studies will go through another process of delay, it is most important that on an emergency basis implementation of highway improvements take place in Newfoundland, regardless of the over-all acceptance of a policy for the province which will fit in with Canada's over-all new transportation policy, which I hope will be to the benefit of all Canadians.

I hope that the very capable parliamentary secretary to the minister will be able to give me answers which I can relate to the people of Newfoundland, and I hope he will assure them that this necessary transportation system will be made available by the government he represents.

Mr. Marcel Roy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the hon. member for raising this important matter. I appreciate this opportunity to speak on this subject this evening for two reasons: because of its subject matter, and because the hon. member has raised this matter on a historic day for all Canadians. The President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) mentioned today during question period the visit of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) to the President of the United States.

On March 10, 1976, the Atlantic ministers responsible for highways met with the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) in Ottawa. They presented to him with their joint submission for a ten-year highway program of assistance for the provinces to strengthen and improve primary highways in the Atlantic region, including the Trans-Canada Highway. The proposal involved the strengthening and upgrading of more than 2,000 miles of highways in the four provinces.

In the months following the presentation of the submission Transport Canada has carried out an economic analysis of the projects which the Atlantic provinces considered to be of particularly high priority. As the hon. member might appreciate, this has been a time-consuming task, due to the number of projects involved and the need to collect data on which an accurate analysis could be based.

As the hon. member is aware, the Minister of Transport is pleased to join with the government of Newfoundland in the appointment of a commission which will examine a range of transportation problems in his native province.

The question of federal assistance for primary highways in the Atlantic provinces was specifically discussed, among other things, when the minister met with the maritime premiers and the Newfoundland minister of transportation a few weeks ago, on February 7, and as the minister noted in the House on February 21 there was agreement in principle with the general idea that certain moneys which otherwise would have been spent in the Atlantic region in relation to certain programs—and it was agreed that those moneys were not particularly serving their original purposes of promoting development—would be diverted toward such matters as a highway strengthening program.

As the minister also pointed out, that agreement in principle will be worked out in detail in the next few weeks in terms of concrete actions and programs. In this regard it is hoped that an announcement will be made in the relatively near future.

In closing I would remind the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall) that the question he raises tonight respecting highway upgrading is very much associated with the nature of rail services to be offered and also with the kind of marine services which will be available in the future.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS—CUBA—SUGGESTED RECONSIDERATION OF RELATIONSHIP IN VIEW OF SUPPORT OF RHODESIAN GUERRILLAS

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, on February 9 I rose to ask the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) the following question, as reported on page 2873 of Hansard:

. . . In view of the massacre of missionaries in Rhodesia by guerrillas, and in view of the admission by Cuban officials that their Montreal offices are used for training guerrillas and the fact that these guerrillas are destined for Rhodesia and carry on continuing murder and harassment of missionaries, will the Prime Minister reconsider Canada's relationship to Cuba as well as its generous financial and material aid to that country?

I could not help being shocked by the callous and unfeeling effrontery of the Prime Minister's reply. He said:

No, Mr. Speaker. I believe that the question is based on a non sequitur. He might just as well ask if we are going to reinforce our delegation to the Vatican and help from that side.

That question did not come out of the blue. It stems from the obvious contradiction inherent in the government's foreign policy.

On February 2, 1976, the hon. member for South Shore (Mr. Crouse) directed the following question to the then secretary of state for external affairs, as reported on page 10520 of Hansard:

As the Cubans landed two unscheduled flights in Canada where they were refuelled, while en route with Cuban troops for the fighting in Angola, will the minister inform the House what steps he has taken to inform Premier Castro of Canadian displeasure over this action and whether any steps have been taken to prevent the recurrence of this procedure, in order to prevent Canada from being directly embroiled in this conflict?

The then secretary of state for external affairs answered as follows:

. . . we have made it plain to the Cuban authorities that we would reserve the right to inspect in future such unscheduled flights. We have also made it clear that we would not tolerate—

I emphasize the words "would not tolerate".

—any such use of Canadian facilities for military purposes if, indeed, that was the case.

That same day the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro) asked the following question, as reported on page 10518 of Hansard:

I wonder if the minister could assure us that Canada has taken steps to refuse further refuelling stops for Cuban aircraft at Gander at least until Cuba repatriates its troops from Angola. After all, Guyana and Barbados refused permission for stops; why not Canada?

The next day, on February 3, 1976, the former leader of the opposition, the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield), pointed out to the Prime Minister that in view of the Angola crisis it would be quite normal for the Prime Minister to postpone his pending visit to Cuba. He said, as reported on page 10569 of Hansard:

Accepting that Canada and the Prime Minister's government disapprove of foreign adventurism of the sort that Cuba is pursuing in Angola, why did the Prime Minister not take this opportunity to make this point very effectively to Cuba and to the world by simply postponing his visit to Cuba at this time?

He went on to say, as reported at page 10570 of Hansard:

Despite what the Secretary of State for External Affairs said as a result of the visit of the Prime Minister, the general perception abroad is that it was great for Fidel Castro. What did it do for Canada?

The hon. member for Victoria (Mr. McKinnon) then asked the following question:

Can the minister inform us if there have been any flights recently by Warsaw Pact countries which used Goose Bay airport as a staging or refuelling point between Cuba and points in east Europe or Africa?

The then secretary of state for external affairs replied in part:

. . . I believe that there have been two scheduled flights in the last months to Cuba stopping down at Goose Bay.

The right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) then asked the Prime Minister questions about conversations with Fidel Castro. He asked, as reported on page 10572 of Hansard:

What did he say with regard to Angola? . . . What did he say? Instead of evading the subject just tell the House, even though the language be brutal.

The Prime Minister answered in part:

In so far as Premier Castro's views, he made them known to me. I have the feeling that he has a good knowledge of Africa and a good feeling for the realities there.

That took place one year ago. Since then we have had a startling revelation by an American, David Bufkin, who was recruited by the Cubans in Mexico and trained in Montreal, and then turned a double agent in Rhodesia. That revelation amounts to a barefaced admission on the part of the Cubans that they were using their facilities in Canada to train guerrillas in Montreal. It was being done on Canadian soil. This is done in order to further the cause of the revolution in Cuba. My question to the Prime Minister again is what are we doing with regard to our relationship to Cuba in light of our continuing foreign aid, preferential tariffs in our trade relations with Cuba, and the 3 per cent loans? It is about time we called a spade a spade. If the Cuban people need foreign aid from us, by all means let us give it to them. However, in light of what the Cubans have been doing under the leadership of Fidel Castro, if their economy is good enough that they can export the most heinous and callous commodity imaginable, that of revolution and refined guerilla warfare, it is time to re-evaluate our position with regard to Cuba.

It is time that the Canadian people and the world know exactly what our foreign policy is with regard to these countries that want to export revolution. I therefore ask the parliamentary secretary to clarify once and for all the position of the Canadian government in relation to a country that insists on exporting revolution and ravishes the sanctity of Canadian soil is so doing, and not just give in return a token expulsion of Cuban diplomats.

Mr. Fernand E. Leblanc (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I want to congratulate the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock (Mr. Friesen) for raising such an important question as the presence of Cuban mercenaries in Rhodesia.

However, it seems that the department was not sure about the question the hon. member was going to raise tonight because I have been given an answer which applies to the massacre of missionaries in Rhodesia following interventions by people who went to work and wage war in that country.

It is unfortunate that I should not be able to give him the answer he is entitled to expect but since there was confusion in the two questions which had been raised on February 9 about the massacre of missionaries in Rhodesia and the presence of Cubans, and even though the same question had been raised by other members of his party, unfortunately I do not have the answer and I think the matter might have to be taken up another night on the late show so that departmental officials will then prepare the satisfactory answer which the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock is certainly entitled to expect.

Once again, I am sorry and I humbly admit that there was confusion in the department. They must have thought that the question the hon. member was going to raise tonight had to do with the massacre of missionaries. But he raised the other question about the presence of Cuban people in Rhodesia. I am very sorry—

REQUEST FOR INQUIRY INTO DEATH OF THE ARCHBISHOP OF UGANDA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the President of the Privy Council, speaking on behalf of the government, indicated that a motion under Standing Order 43, which I had moved on Monday regarding the tragic Uganda situation, was not acceptable because of the fear that it might precipitate a debate. I am now prepared to assure the government House leader that the Official Opposition is prepared to pass this motion today without debate. We take this position in view of the continuing and growing dimension of the tragedy in Uganda. I would therefore, with the leave of the House, move the following motion under the terms of Standing Order 43, seconded by the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald):

That this House condemn the government of Uganda for denying due process of law to its citizens and calls upon President Amin to permit an impartial inquiry by the Commonwealth or the United Nations into the circumstances surrounding the deaths of the Archbishop of Uganda and two Ugandan cabinet ministers.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion pursuant to Standing Order 43 can be made only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: No!

PROPOSED RECONSIDERATION OF DECISION NOT TO SUPPLY FUNDS FOR URBAN TRANSIT SYSTEMS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I rise in accordance with Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity to move a motion which I believe, given recent news reports, will receive support from both sides of the House and which can be accepted without debate. In view of the announced intention of both the Canadian National and Canadian Pacific Railways to increase fares and drastically reduce commuter train services in the Montreal area, leaving 20,000 commuters without service, and in view of similar circumstances in other urban areas, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House urge the government to reconsider its decision not to implement its 1974 election promise to provide $290 million for urban transit systems in Canada.

Mr. Speaker: The motion can be presented only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: No!

PENITENTIARIES

REQUEST FOR JUDICIAL INQUIRY AT MILLHAVEN, QUEBEC AND NEW WESTMINSTER—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jacques Lavoie (Hochelaga): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to ask for the unanimous consent of the House to discuss a motion on an important matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

Following the visit to the penitentiaries and considering that there is a lot of violence and that the subcommittee has no judicial power and can only make recommendations, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Reynolds):

That the House give its unanimous consent to urge the Solicitor General to establish a judicial inquiry under the chairmanship of Mr. Justice Dutil or any other prominent person, considering that such an inquiry could eliminate both physical and mental violence in penitentiaries, and particularly in the C.D.C. in Quebec and in the institutions of Millhaven, Ontario, and New Westminster, British Columbia.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Under the provisions of Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent; therefore the motion cannot be put.

URBAN AFFAIRS

REQUEST THAT GOVERNMENT FULFIL PROMISE TO SUPPLY FUNDS FOR URBAN TRANSIT SYSTEMS

Mr. Bill Kempling (Halton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under Standing Order 43. In light of the withdrawal of federal funds for Go-service to Milton, Oakville and Burlington, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander):

● (1410)

That this House instruct the government to fulfil its 1974 election promise and supply $290 million in federal funds to assist urban transit as promised.

Mr. Speaker: The presentation of such a motion pursuant to the Standing Order can only be made with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

SUGGESTED COMMITTEE STUDY OF ADEQUACY OF REGULATIONS FOR OIL AND GAS DRILLING IN THE NORTH—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I wish to move a motion under the provisions of the same Standing Order. Given that the Department of the Environment has gone on the record as having grave doubts about the adequacy of Dome Petroleum oil spill clean-up plans, and that the well blow-out at K-91 in the Beaufort Sea may be still blowing out and that if oil had been involved we would have a major ecological disaster in the area, and that the blow-out and the failure to contain it could have been avoided through stricter control on the drilling, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas):

That this House refer the question of the adequacy of the drilling provisions and their enforcement, and the risks to the environment in light of an inadequate oil clean-up technology, to the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development before any decision is made on the renewal of any drilling authority in the Beaufort Sea.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 43 such a motion can be presented for debate only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

SUGGESTED ACTION AGAINST VESSELS VIOLATING 200-MILE LIMIT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43, I seek the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

It would seem that 55 foreign fishing vessels recently violated the 200-mile fishing limit and thus did not respect the agreement which has just been concluded on January 1, 1977. Therefore, seconded by the hon. member for Rimouski (Mr. Allard), I move:

That a House committee be called at once to consider action to be taken against the owners of fishing vessels who are alleged to have contravened this agreement.

Mr. Speaker: The provisions of Standing Order 43 require the unanimous consent of the House for the presentation of such a motion. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent; the motion therefore cannot be put.

PROPOSED COMMUTER RAIL SERVICE BETWEEN MIRABEL AND MONTREAL—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. J. H. Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. In light of the government's announced intention to discontinue its assistance for commuter services, does the minister still intend to go ahead with his commuter rail service between Mirabel airport and the city of Montreal?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am certainly glad to see the hon. member for Crowfoot back in the House. I want him to know that I have missed him, even though I will have to say that the two parts of his question present some difficulty for me in view of the fact that one part is, so far as I know, wrong and the other is somewhat speculative. The fact of the matter is that as far as commuter services are concerned we do have a standing program, which was announced a year ago, for assistance in connection with commuter operations.

Mr. Horner: In 1974.

Mr. Lang: No, the actual commitment of $100 million over a period of four or five years was announced a year ago. We have had some discussions with the provinces in that connection and regarding other programs in the broad field of urban transportation, with a view to determining whether we could find the most effective ways of assuring that those moneys were available for the items most needed. These discussions are leading to some further action and decision by the government which is still to be taken.

As for the other part of the question there is, of course, no specific plan for a rail link to Mirabel, and this is the part of the question which falls into the category that I described.

APPLICATION OF QUEBECAIR TO FLY PASSENGERS FOR EUROPEAN AIRLINES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. J. H. Horner (Crowfoot): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I am bent on trying to assist the government to save money, and I did notice in the papers a report that Mirabel last year lost in operating costs $50 million. Has the government any desire to grant Quebecair the privilege of flying European passengers for European airlines from Toronto to Mirabel for which Quebec has asked permission and for which the European airlines are prepared to pay Quebecair?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): At all times we are looking at the question of which air services will best provide convenience to passengers as well as the way in which maximum advantage can be drawn from the facility at Mirabel, with convenience to passengers very much in mind. I should say to the hon. member that there was an exchange in the House which was a little more precise than his reference to the $50 million loss. When the figure of $47 million is attributed to the Mirabel loss, which includes $43 million loss in the interest on the debt, he will appreciate that this is carrying a full picture which was not common in the past and which is probably better said than not said, but it is a bookkeeping entry rather than an operating loss.

VIA CANADA PASSENGER SERVICE—ALLOTMENT OF FUNDS FOR PURCHASE OF EQUIPMENT

Mr. J. H. Horner (Crowfoot): I might say that one could study the answers for some time in order to determine just what was said.

I should like to ask the minister, in light of the announced intention of Via Canada passenger service, whether the government has given them any money for the purchase of rail cars and a rail system to put Via Canada into effect in the Quebec-Windsor corridor?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Appropriations will be made as required. We have called for and are now receiving and reviewing the tenders for from three to ten new train sets for that particular service. As soon as the tenders are evaluated, these will be ordered and produced. Of course, payments will be requested from parliament as the time frame and the order require.

PROPOSED ELIMINATION OF COMMUTER SERVICE IN MONTREAL AREA—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Transport. Given the announcement of Canadian National and Canadian Pacific to the effect that they will immediately commence a phase-out of their commuter train operations within the area of metropolitan Montreal, thereby depriving approximately 100,000 people in the greater Montreal area of any means of commuting, may I ask the minister what programs or plans he has, given the fact that federalism is on trial in the province of Quebec at present, to discharge the commitments made by this government in 1974 to the people of Montreal?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): As I said earlier in my answer to the hon. member for Crowfoot, we have in place a commuter program for which up to $100 million is available to assist in the purchase of equipment and the like in connection with commuter services. It is a specific form of assistance for these types of commuter services. Of course, while federalism is very important, it is also true that certain things are the responsibilities of the provinces within that federalism. It has been our view that commuter services, and indeed urban transit services, are primarily the responsibility of the cities and provinces in which they are found, and while we have made various forms of assistance available to them, the responsibility rests primarily with the province and the city. That has been recognized in the case of Montreal by the creation of a committee under the previous government to study the total situation, and we hope it will produce results which will allow CN and CP services to continue.

Mr. McGrath: I have a supplementary question for the minister who seems to have a very short memory because in 1974 the government made this business of commuter transit a federal responsibility—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: —by a solemn undertaking made by the minister's colleague, the then minister of urban affairs, and by the Prime Minister.

My question to the Minister of Transport is: given the fact that there is now considerable unrest within the Liberal caucus from members from metropolitan Montreal and metropolitan Toronto, including the hon. member for York East who has gone to the press on this, what programs is the minister prepared to discuss with CN and CP whereby the government of Canada, which still has responsibility for railways in this country, will underwrite some of the losses incurred on these commuter runs, especially in metropolitan Montreal and metropolitan Toronto?

Mr. Lang: I think it is quite clear that quite apart from whatever financial assistance may be offered over the time in relation to what is essentially a provincial program, it remains a provincial and municipal program, which is what I said when I said it is their prime responsibility. I also indicated that in connection with the commuter programs we announced a year ago we would make $100 million available over five years for the assistance of developed programs in the commuter field, so in that regard we did move to make some money available along the lines which had been indicated at the time of the 1974 election. What we have also faced, however, is a severe restriction upon financial resources within the total federal field, and therefore we have had to reflect carefully upon what other things we can do.

PROPOSED ELIMINATION OF COMMUTER SERVICES IN MONTREAL AREA—SUGGESTION MINISTER MEET WITH PARTIES CONCERNED

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, my final supplementary is for the Minister of State for Urban Affairs, who has assumed an even greater responsibility as far as the government is concerned in the province of Quebec. Given the fact that the government has now officially reneged on its commitment to the cities with regard to urban transportation, and given the serious situation developing in Montreal and the announced intentions of CN and CP to withdraw commuter services in that city, will the minister meet with representatives of the urban Montreal community, Canadian Pacific and Canadian National to try to ensure that there will be no cutback of commuter services in metropolitan Montreal, and will the minister make an annoucement in the House in that regard?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, my answer to all those questions is yes.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

DRILLING BY CANMAR IN BEAUFORT SEA—REASON FOR FAILURE TO HAVE INDEPENDENT REVIEW OF PROGRAM

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, and it concerns the continuing problems in the Beaufort Sea. I would like to quote from Page 72 of the technical assessment of the drilling program. I am quoting the minister's own technical report as follows: "The most important question that arises is why Canmar blindly drilled into an overpressured zone, taking into account all the sophisticated pressure detection equipment in use". Given the fact that this study is now being conducted by the same people who made the mistakes in the first place, can the minister advise why he did not make sure there was an independent review, separate and apart from the officials who made the decision on site to go ahead with that very risky drilling project?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, the review is not being carried out by the same persons who agreed to the drilling in the first place. I believe the hon. member is referring to certain preliminary reports or reviews which were prepared by different people and which are being submitted to the communities in the Mackenzie Delta for their reaction. Once we get that reaction we will then prepare a final report which will deal with the conditions and the obligations of Dome Petroleum with respect to any new drilling season, but the review process is presently under way. It is not being done by the same people.

PROPOSED FIVE-YEAR PERMIT TO DRILL FOR OIL AND GAS IN BEAUFORT SEA—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): I hope the minister will check his answer out with the director of the northern natural resources and environment branch, Mr. Joyce. As reported in Hansard at page 3047 of February 15 the minister indicated that a five-year drilling permit is a very speculative matter. Given the fact that the minister's own officials have publicly advocated a five-year drilling permit, and given that his own officials have gone public, would the minister undertake that there will be an independent review of this, and would he refer this matter to the standing committee so that there can be some objectivity in terms of the kind of drilling permit which is granted?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): The government will make the decision, and not the officials. Furthermore, our decision will be based on input from the communities and from outside persons and officials.

ENERGY

PROPOSAL TO MAINTAIN DAYLIGHT SAVING TIME TO CONSERVE ENERGY

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

Considering that in the near future our country will be confronted with a shortage of oil and natural gas and that several Canadian provinces have expressed the wish to return to daylight saving time, could the minister tell the House whether he intends to meet the provinces to restore daylight saving time throughout the year thus saving energy and making maximum use of daylight?

[English]

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, a number of studies have been made in respect of daylight saving time and the question of whether Canada would benefit by extending the season from I think six months to eight months. Those studies have been done for Canada and compared with the results in the United States. The information I have received is that it would not be in the over-all interests of Canadians to extend the period of daylight saving time even though there would be some savings in energy because there would be other costs associated with the change, including questions of personal safety.

[Translation]

Mr. Allard: Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary.

I thank the minister for his explanations, but I wonder how he has reached the conclusion that energy would not be saved, considering that during the war we were on daylight saving time for four years. It was done for war needs to expedite work and save energy.

[English]

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I indicated in my answer to the hon. member that in fact there would be a saving with a longer period of daylight saving time. I expect we will be going on daylight saving time very shortly and we would in this coming year spend the same length of time, which is roughly six months, in a daylight saving system as we did in prior years. The question I raised was whether there would be a net benefit in a longer period of daylight saving time. I indicated there would be, based on the studies I have seen, some saving by lengthening the period of daylight saving time but there would be other costs associated with doing that. One of those is the question of personal safety.

FUNDS FOR DEVELOPMENT OF URBAN TRANSIT SYSTEMS—PROPOSAL MINISTER MEET WITH PARTIES CONCERNED

Mr. Bill Kempling (Halton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. Noting the government's decision to withdraw federal funding from urban transportation as promised during the 1974 election campaign and being aware of the serious effect this decision will have on the GO system to Milton, Oakville and Burlington, will the minister reconsider this decision and see if funds can be diverted from other projects so that this program can go ahead, inasmuch as there has been a tremendous amount of planning done in this area.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I should again clarify to the hon. member that the difficulty is that fiscal and financial restraints mean that we cannot do fully what was contemplated at the time the announcement was made in 1974. We have, however, done certain things as I indicated earlier, in relation to the commuter field; we are also looking at ways of re-adjusting other programs and the question of the total amount of money available for the broad field of urban transportation. Final decisions in that field have not yet been made.

Mr. Kempling: Mr. Speaker, I thank the minister for his answer. Would the minister consider these two propositions: Would he meet with the municipal authorities in Montreal, the Toronto-Hamilton corridor and Winnipeg? Will he also give a reference to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications and allow it to examine the whole matter and report back to the House?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I have indeed met with some representatives of the groups to which the hon. member referred. I can give consideration to the other representations of the hon. member.

ENERGY

CANDU REACTOR—PROPOSED LICENSING AGREEMENT WITH RUMANIA—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Will the minister confirm that the government is in the process of negotiating a licensing arrangement with Rumania to supply that country with the design of the CANDU reactor and the engineering help to build it? And, if so, can the minister say how this conforms with the sentiments expressed yesterday by the Prime Minister that nuclear proliferation and nuclear safeguards are the kinds of issues that will determine the stability of tomorrow's world? Will the minister please explain how a nuclear licensing arrangement with Rumania is contributing to that stability?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I can confirm that Atomic Energy of Canada Limited has been in negotiation with Rumanian authorities with regard to the purchase of equipment and the licensing associated with a CANDU reactor. I think the hon. lady should know that no deal will be made, no licence arrangement will be signed, even though there will be substantial benefits to Canada, probably in the order of $300 million.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Horner: You mean we will lose that much on the deal.

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, the strange thing about the opposition is that one moment they are complaining we are not interested in unemployment. The next moment, when there is an export opportunity, they are hollering because they do not want us to take advantage of that opportunity. If they would deal with the issue seriously and permit me to give them a serious answer, I would like to do that. The point I made is very important. Canadians realize there would be thousands of jobs associated with the sale to Rumania. It is also very important that Canadians and the media understand the government will not authorize any licencing agreement to Rumania unless the full safeguards that Canada would insist upon would be put in place by Rumania. It is also important that the hon. lady realize that Rumania is a signatory to the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty.

Miss MacDonald: While there may be commercial considerations, there are also very strong moral considerations in this question. Can the minister say if in these discussions that are now taking place, it is the policy of the government to supply Warsaw Pact countries with nuclear facilities, bearing in mind that these countries are normally dominated by the U.S.S.R. which refuse to allow IAEA inspections, even though they may have ratified the NPT? Can he tell the House if Canada has discussed this sale with our NATO allies and what their reaction is to this whole new direction in our nuclear policy?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, there are a number of points which I think the hon. lady does not fully understand.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Miss MacDonald: I have been briefed and you haven't.

Mr. Gillespie: If you want to debate the issue, why don't you wait because we are going to deal with energy policy this afternoon? Perhaps that would be the time to make your debating point. If you want an answer to the question, I will give you one. I do not think you understand that Rumania is presently installing a nuclear facility. If your fear is that Canada will be providing to Rumania a facility which would enable Rumania or other Communist nations to build the bomb, quite clearly you are working on the wrong assumption. The second point is that we will not authorize such a sale unless there are IAEA inspections with respect to such an installation.

POSSIBILITY OF DREDGING ST. LAWRENCE RIVER AT L'ÎLE D'ORLÉANS

Mr. Raynald Guay (Lévis): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport.

Pursuant to numerous representations made to the Minister of Transport by the Chamber of Commerce and the industry of metropolitan Quebec City as well as several other agencies of the Quebec City area, namely the Quebec Urban Community, south shore industrial commissions and hon. members from greater Quebec City, concerning dredging of the St. Lawrence northern crossing, I would like to know whether the minister has made a decision with regard to a works program to overhaul and maintain in good repair the channel of the northern crossing at a minimum depth of 41 feet of water. No doubt the minister is aware that this is a priority for the economic development of metropolitan Quebec City. In the affirmative, would he let the House know immediately what his intentions are?

[English]

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I have had many representations on this question. Indeed, I have spoken with the Quebec members of the House of Commons about it. I will be meeting a delegation from Quebec City and I propose to discuss with them the question of how the cost of additional dredging ought properly to be borne. I indicated earlier that when one particular beneficiary of work like this is clearly identified, it is only reasonable to expect some contribution from that person or corporation. On the other hand, other benefits that may be assessed in terms of development or in terms of shared or diffused benefit may have to be borne by the government or the governments. The province of Quebec recently indicated its interest in seeing this project go ahead. I will be interested also in speaking with the government of the province of Quebec in relation to their possible role in sharing in the proposed work.

DELAY IN CLEANING UP RADIATION IN HOMES IN ELLIOT LAKE—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of the revelation that Treasury Board has held up funds for Atomic Energy Control Board to start remedial work on radiation contaminated homes in Elliot Lake, and in view of the minister's commitment as stated in Hansard on December 14, 1976 and I quote "we will not delay introducing the clean-up measures while we argue about whose responsibility it is", will the minister now state that he will live up to his commitment and not play fast and loose with the health of residents living in contaminated homes?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines, and Resources): Of course, Mr. Speaker. Let me also make clear to the hon. member that the problem he has identified is not a man-made one. It is a problem related to the natural outcropping. I think he will agree with me that the government of Ontario also shares a responsibility to help in this clean-up.

Mr. Symes: Does the minister agree that the AECB also has some responsibility in not surveying the land at the time the homes were built in a naturally contaminated area? In view of the fact that the health of people is at stake, this is no time for shuffling it off to the Ontario government on a jurisdictional question. This government should admit the facts, get the remedial work done and then iron out the cost-sharing arrangement.

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, work has been going ahead and I expect it to continue.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Woolliams: I knew I would finally lead this group to my left if I sat here long enough. Will the minister now rescind that arrogant order in council which set out that the head office of that company could not be moved from Vancouver to Calgary?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, because the order was not arrogant, it does not need rescinding. The order simply said that the move should not take place until the Supreme Court decision was handed down.

ARSENIC POLLUTION IN YELLOWKNIFE—DISCUSSIONS BETWEEN MINISTER AND HEALTH MINISTER PRIOR TO ESTABLISHMENT OF STUDY GROUP

Mr. Bob Brisco (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment. Prior to the appointment of a work committee from the Canadian Public Health Association by the Minister of Health to examine the arsenic problem in Yellowknife, did the Minister of the Environment discuss the arsenic problem with the Minister of Health?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member is referring to the appointment of outside medical personnel, the answer is yes.

ARSENIC POLLUTION IN YELLOWKNIFE—REASON FOR FAILURE TO ESTABLISH INDEPENDENT STUDY GROUP

Mr. Bob Brisco (Kootenay West): In view of the minister's answer, I would now ask why he did not implement the clauses that are clearly in place in the Environmental Contaminants Act which allow for and indeed urge the cooperation of the work of the two ministers together to establish an independent committee for such an examination. The provisions are there. Why was it not done?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, we have cooperated. If I understand the hon. member's question, it is referring to the Clean Air Act.

Mr. Brisco: The Environmental Contaminants Act.

Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): Maybe I did not understand the hon. member's question.

Mr. Brisco: I thought I made it clear that there are provisions within the Environmental Contaminants Act for the two ministries to work together, for the minister to appoint an independent committee, and that this work was not done in spite of the consultation that exists between the two ministers. Why?

Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): Mr. Speaker, we have a special committee in place under the Canadian Medical Public Health Association.

Mr. Jacques Lavoie (Hochelaga): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Labour.

In view of the milling trade strike now in progress in Montreal, the serious bread shortage as well as the increase in price of that product which affects especially low-income families, and the fact that for over a week now the federal cabinet has had before it the appeal of the union against the decision of the AIB to reduce the hourly rate which had been arrived at freely by the union and the companies concerned, can the minister tell the House when the cabinet will assume its responsibilities and reach a decision?

PROPOSED REFUSAL OF PASSAGE OF TANKERS TO PROPOSED REFINERY AT EASTPORT, MAINE—RESPONSE OF UNITED STATES

Mr. Fred McCain (Carleton-Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, I should like, through you, to direct a question to the Minister of the Environment. In view of increased activity in connection with the construction of an oil refinery in Eastport, Maine, and in view of the hazard this presents to the fishing industry not only in the Bay of Fundy but in an extensive part of the Atlantic Ocean adjacent to it, would the minister restate his position, and the position of the government, as set out by his predecessor, Mr. Davis, that under no circumstances will large oil tankers be allowed to pass through Canadian waters to supply any such refinery?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): The position stated by my colleagues, the former Secretary of State for External Affairs, the present Secretary of State for External Affairs, my predecessor as Minister of the Environment, and of myself is that Canada is opposed to tanker traffic in that area.

Mr. McCain: That is not as clearly stated as was previously stated—

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Mr. McCain: Has the minister's position been supported by the proper charts showing rock barriers both above and below the water surface of the bay and of the conflicting currents which exist in Head Harbour Passage and adjacent waters and has the government received any response from the United States authorities to the position it has taken?

ALUMINUM WIRING—MEASURES TO PROTECT PUBLIC AGAINST ALLEGED DANGERS

Mr. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. There is an increasing body of evidence about dangers connected with the use of aluminum wiring in homes and commercial buildings. In light of this evidence and resulting public concern will the minister take immediate action to bring aluminum wiring and devices for connecting it under the Hazardous Products Act to set standards for safe use, or take other appropriate steps to protect consumers from the dangers in question?

[Mr. Munro (Hamilton East).]

Hon. A. C. Abbott (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, officials of the department have consulted very closely with Mr. Jerabec who has been doing some personal research on this project. At this point there is no firm evidence that aluminum wiring with the connectors is hazardous as alleged. In the opinion of officials of the department, aluminum wiring is in itself certainly not hazardous. It is possible, though not proven, that installation of it as electrical wiring in homes might prove to be hazardous but in our view this would not be a matter to be dealt with under the Hazardous Products Act but would rather be a matter for authorities in the provinces and elsewhere who authorize such installations by electrical companies in homes.

DISPUTE BETWEEN NEWFOUNDLAND AND QUEBEC OVER ATTEMPTED RECALL OF ELECTRICITY—POSSIBILITY OF MINISTER'S INTERVENTION

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of the importance of developing the lower Gull Island site in Labrador to provide the Atlantic region with hydro, has the minister indicated that he might intercede in the controversy between Newfoundland and Quebec? Would the minister tell us whether he has taken any action to consult with both provinces in an effort to bring about a solution? I refer to the recall of 800 megawatts.

Mr. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): I think we should distinguish between the question of the Gull Island site and the recall of the 800 megawatts. They are separate questions. The latter issue is one which the governments of Quebec and Newfoundland expect to settle in the courts. As to the great potential of the Gull Island site, I have discussed that subject with the minister of energy in the new Quebec government and with the premier of the hon. member's province.

GULL ISLAND PROJECT—POSSIBILITY OF FEDERAL GOVERNMENT SHARING INCREASED COST

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): The minister indicated last year that there were $243 million on the line for Newfoundland to pick up to develop the Gull Island site. Has any discussion taken place with the Newfoundland government on the subject of increasing costs of such development? Would the minister consider increasing the amount mentioned because of the larger expenditure now involved?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): I talked to the premier of Newfoundland quite recently, within the last few weeks. I put it to him that we would very much like to sit down and discuss with him his most recent engineering and cost estimates for both the transmission system and the generation system for Gull Island. He responded very positively and I believe officials of the two governments are at this moment discussing an updated series of figures.

INDUSTRY

FOOTWEAR—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO PROVIDE PROTECTION

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister in the absence of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. This question was asked of the Prime Minister. It relates to the serious situation which faces the footwear industry in Canada. If no action is taken by the government it is my understanding we can expect significant lay-offs. What steps is the government prepared to take in order to provide some protection for this industry which is certainly calling for leadership at this point from the federal authority.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Acting Prime Minister): I can tell the hon. member that this subject was discussed yesterday between the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce with his cabinet colleagues at which time attention was drawn to the problems mentioned by the hon. member. The matter is under consideration at the present time. Further meetings will be held between the government and representatives of the unions involved, and if and when any specific measures are to be taken I can assure the hon. member they will be made known to the House.

Mr. Alexander: I am glad to see that for a change the government is on the ball. Would the minister advise us whether the government has ruled out the type of steps which were taken in order to protect the textile industry? Are we moving in that direction in order to protect the shoe industry?

Mr. MacEachen: The hon. member has drawn attention to the effective action which was taken by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce with respect to the textile industry.

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Mr. MacEachen: Comparable problems are being experienced by other industries in the country. The hon. member will realize, of course, that though similar measures may be needed to deal with the problems he has in mind, that is not necessarily the situation. But measures are under consideration.

● (1450)

Mr. Alexander: A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I understand that the Acting Prime Minister will be meeting with representatives concerned with this problem. Can he give me any idea when he believes that these meetings will have concluded in order that an announcement can be made in this House as to what steps the government will be taking? Has he a deadline in this regard?

Mr. MacEachen: No, Mr. Speaker. The meetings referred to are meetings to take place between the trade unions and the Minister of Labour within a matter of days.

TRANSPORT

WEST COAST FERRIES—IMBALANCE OF SUBSIDIES FOR EAST AND WEST COAST SERVICES

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. On February 11 the Prime Minister, in reply to a question of mine concerning subsidies for west coast ferries, took notice of the question on behalf of the Minister of Transport. The Prime Minister had said on December 22 that "there is an element still to be decided" concerning the west coast ferry subsidies. Can the Minister of Transport tell us if that element, whatever it is, has been decided and is the government now prepared to bring some equity into the method of subsidizing ferries on our coasts?

Hon. Otto. E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, we are having further discussions with the province of British Columbia at this time on the whole question of our respective responsibilities and the role which can be played. We are doing so in a very co-operative spirit and I hope there will be some further developments in this regard within the next several weeks.

Mr. McKinnon: A supplementary question for the same minister, Mr. Speaker. The minister's estimates show a little over $125 million for subsidization, directly or indirectly, of various ferry services on the east coast and nothing at all for west coast ferries. Are we to understand from that that the current inequities are to continue through to the next fiscal year?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, as has been made very clear, it is our objective to apply in an equitable fashion the policy in relation to water transport assistance and other programs in all parts of this country. It is toward that end that we have been working, both on the east and west coasts, as well as in other waterways. On the east coast, of course, there are two very exceptional services which have to be treated quite differently from any others because of their nature in terms of the constitutional arrangements which were made and which have to be taken fully into account.

Oral Questions

NATIONAL DEFENCE

PROPOSED RESEARCH CENTRE AT WINNIPEG—DELAY IN COMPLETING LAND PURCHASE AGREEMENT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence and is in regard to the defence research centre which is to be located in Winnipeg. Since the minister has had in his possession for approximately two months the land purchase agreement from the city of Winnipeg, I would ask the minister when the documents will be signed and returned to Winnipeg, along with payment for the land where the research base is to be located.

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, it is my understanding that negotiations are in abeyance until further decisions are made.

Mr. McKenzie: A supplementary question. Last Friday the minister announced that it was going to take six months to a year to establish whether or not the base will be located in Winnipeg. Is he saying that he is asking the city of Winnipeg to hold this parcel of land until he makes up his mind what he is going to do with the base, and is he prepared to pay the taxes on that piece of property in the meantime until he makes a decision?

Mr. Danson: No, Mr. Speaker, I do not expect the city of Winnipeg to hold on all that time.

FISHERIES

LOBSTERS—POSSIBILITY OF ADOPTING PROGRAM TO RESTORE DECLINING STOCKS

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment. As the minister is aware, the catch of Nova Scotia's inshore lobster fishermen is down by some 50 per cent when compared with last year's. Since it is now reported that lobster larvae are scarce in the inshore waters of Nova Scotia and it is also obvious that the offshore lobster fishery has to be regulated much more than it has been up to the present time, would the minister consider the establishment of a Canadian program similar to one that was established some time ago in the state of Maine where female seed lobsters are returned to the sea after being caught and marked and the fisherman compensated for his loss, in order to assist in rehabilitating the declining lobster stocks along the coast of Nova Scotia?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, reports that I have had from the scientists in my department do not indicate that the offshore impact on the inshore fishery is the determining factor at the present time for the poor catch of the inshore lobster fishermen. There are other factors, including unusually cold water temperatures for the season, and also very severe winter conditions. However, the suggestion made by the hon. member, because of his experience, is one which I will look at very seriously; I think it may have some very positive implications.

TRANSPORT

HALL REPORT ON PENSIONS FOR RAILWAY EMPLOYEES—INQUIRY AS TO GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport and I believe the Minister of Labour will be interested in it as well. On Friday, January 28, I asked the Minister of Transport a question relating to the report of Dr. Noel Hall on railway pensions which virtually throws the question of improving railway pensions back to the companies and to the government. The minister's reply was that the government would take a hard look at this report. Can the minister say whether the government is yet in a position to tell the House what it proposes to do about railway pensions in light of the Hall report?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): No, Mr. Speaker, we are not yet in that position. We are continuing to look at what is a very complicated matter.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Since the other part of my question on January 28 was whether the minister would take up with the CPR the particular recommendations made by Dr. Hall regarding CPR pensions, may I ask him whether he has been in touch with the CPR on this matter and, if so, what did the CPR say?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I have not yet been in touch with them. I would want first to look at the implications of the whole matter before I try to take a position on it with an outside body.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

DATE ANNUAL REPORT AVAILABLE

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board. Can the minister tell the House when the annual report of the Canadian Wheat Board for the last crop year will be tabled?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I do not know the date but I will ask the Canadian Wheat Board to inform the hon. member.

HEALTH

GENETIC ENGINEERING RESEARCH—REASON FOR LACK OF GUIDELINES—POSSIBILITY OF LEGISLATIVE ACTION

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of its inherent danger to the public interest, and in view of the fact that the United States has had guidelines regarding the control of genetic engineering research since last July and the British have had these guidelines since last August, would the minister explain why similar guidelines do not exist in this country until this day?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, several committees have made detailed studies and, at the present time, a committee—

[English]

The committee has submitted its report. The Medical Research Council is accepting the recommended guidelines concerning the handling of recombinant DNA molecules and viruses. The press release will be released some time today, or tomorrow at the latest.

Mr. Yewchuk: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that in addition to public institutions doing research of this kind private institutions are also doing it, and more research into genetic engineering could be expected to be undertaken by private institutions if it should become profitable, I would therefore like to know whether it is the intention of the minister to put forward legislative action of some sort to ensure that all aspects of this type of research are subject to the guidelines which might be proposed?

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, we are indeed examining this particular situation in order to determine whether legislation is actually required or whether it can be done under regulations existing at the present time.

POST OFFICE

SALE OF CANADIAN PHILATELIC MATERIAL AT DISCOUNT PRICES—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Postmaster General. Some time ago I asked the Postmaster General about the sale of certain Canadian philatelic material at discount prices in New York and he stated that he intended to give the House some information as well as some explanation which may be suggested by this question. I would ask him whether he is now ready to answer that question. In addition, since the 30 per cent discount given to foreign dealers in Canadian stamps results in windfall profits on stamp issues which sell out rapidly, would the government reconsider this policy of discounting stamps to foreign dealers?

Hon. J. -J. Blais (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, after this matter was brought to my attention I did conduct an investigation and sales have been conducted in a way I could not approve. The practice has now been discontinued.

COMMUNICATIONS

CONFERENCE OF PROVINCIAL MINISTERS—PROPOSAL THAT MEMBERS OF OPPOSITION ATTEND AS OBSERVERS

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a further question to the Minister of Communications in light of the minister's answer yesterday about the conference in the west next month. Knowing the gracious minister is always open to constructive suggestions and in order to underline seriously the ecumenical nature of this conference, and since it is not a federal-provincial conference as the minister said yesterday, would she give serious consideration to having spokesmen from the opposition parties in the House attend that communications conference as observers because, as the minister said yesterday, the goal of the conference is to discuss various problems and to try to come up with some coherent policy? There has been a precedent for this at some of the earlier federal-provincial conferences.

[Translation]

Hon. Jeanne Sauvé (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, the meeting in Edmonton would have been far more ecumenical had Mr. O'Neill agreed to take part in it. Still, it retains its consultative aspect which has become essential in the field of communications.

The communications ministers meeting in a federal-provincial conference had agreed to set up a ministers of communications council where, contrary to what happens at federal-provincial meetings, no firm decisions are made on the topics discussed. The council is therefore a forum in which the ministers can discuss the general communications policy and matters of common interest.

[English]

Mr. Roche: Mr. Speaker, since the government House leader has again denied the unanimous consent necessary to pass the motion of the hon. member for St. John's East, which would have the entire House join the worldwide demand for an investigation into the murder of the Anglican archbishop and two other officials in Uganda, even though this side of the House gave a formal assurance that there would be no debate—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Surely the hon. member realizes that the singling out of any member who has withheld his consent in respect of any proceeding in the House which requires unanimous consent is perhaps itself a cause for a point of order. If there is a serious point of order in what the hon. member has to say, I would be glad to hear it.

Mr. Roche: Yesterday, as recorded at page 3285 of Hansard, the government House leader took responsibility for denying unanimous consent to this motion. I only want to point out that since our side gave today a formal assurance that there would be no debate on this motion, which was the principal reason for not supporting motions under Standing Order 43, I think it is only proper to protest against his picayune interpretation of the rule—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member will realize that a motion put forward pursuant to Standing Order 43 requires unanimous consent in order that it be presented for debate. Once presented, it is debatable. Only last Friday the House learned that with great impact. Once the motion is presented, it is debatable and no member is able to guarantee that any motion, once put before the House, will not be debated by any other member because it is always the right of any individual member to rise to speak and that right cannot be denied either by the Chair or by any arrangement made in advance. Presenting Reports by Committees.

On the order: Motions.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Now that we are on motions, would the government House leader be prepared to present to the House a motion dealing with the situation in Uganda? Let it come as a government motion and let us deal with it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Paproski: MacEachen said no.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Only the ingenuity of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre could transform motions into a return to the question period.

[Translation]

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Drummond): Mr. Speaker, I rose earlier when the Chair called for the presentation of committee reports but inadvertently I was not recognized; would the Chair allow me to present a committee report?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Drummond (Mr. Pinard) wishes to table a committee report. Is there unanimous consent of the House?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Pinard: Then I have the honour to table the first report—

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Evidently there is not unanimous consent to revert to the tabling of reports.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. McCleave: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I recognize the difficulty in which the hon. member finds himself, because the same thing has happened to me in the past. When Your Honour asked for presentation of reports, I saw the hon. member rise in his seat. I think, therefore, he should be recognized.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. If, in fact—as is obviously the case—the fault was not with the hon. member for Drummond but with the Chair for failing to observe him when he rose at the proper time, perhaps the House will extend the courtesy to both of us by consenting to reverting to the tabling of reports.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

COMMUNITY EMPLOYMENT STRATEGY—BACKGROUND

Question No. 1,525—Mr. Laprise:

1. Which communities were chosen during phase one of the community employment stragegy?

2. How many persons, men and women, have been employed in these projects?

3. What was the duration of each project?

4. What was the cost of each project proposed by the Ministers of social welfare at the (a) federal (b) provincial level?

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): 1. Kamloops, Nanaimo, Lac La Biche, the entire province of Saskatchewan, northwestern Ontario, Hamilton-Wentworth, Lac St. Jean, Drummondville, Kedgwick-St. Quentin, West Prince, East Kings, Guysborough, Halifax (north-end/Spryfield-Kline Heights) Port au Port, Labrador Straits, Yellowknife-Rae Edzo.

2. The number of people placed in the existing labour market or in training as a result of CES activity is in excess of 2,000.

3. CES activity is ongoing in the above mentioned communities.

4. No costing for individual projects was agreed upon by the provincial and federal ministers involved. However, CES at a federal level has spent $6.4 million, which includes all operating costs in the regions and in Ottawa, as well as funding of the communities involved in the CES process.

USE OF PRIVATE EMPLOYMENT AGENCIES BY MINISTRY OF STAUE FOR SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

Question No. 1,530—Mr. McKenzie:

1. Has the Ministry of State for Science and Technology obtained (a) part-time (b) full-time employees from private employment agencies in (i) British Columbia (ii) Alberta (iii) Saskatchewan (iv) Manitoba (v) Ontario (vi) Quebec (vii) New Brunswick (viii) Nova Scotia (ix) Prince Edward Island (x) Newfoundland and, if so, in each case, how many?

2. Are such employees paid from supplementary estimates and, if not, from what estimates are they paid?

3. By province, what was the (a) average hourly rate paid to employment agencies (b) average hourly rate paid to employees (c) total amount paid by the Ministry in (i) 1975 (ii) 1976?

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Minister of State for Science and Technology): In so far as the Ministry of State for Science and Technology is concerned: 1. (a) 1975-76: 54 (Ont.); 1976-77: 71 (Ont.); There were no employees hired through private agencies from any of the other provinces. (b) 1975-76: 2; 1976-77: 4.

2. These employees are paid through Main Estimates under Professional and Special Services—Other Business Services.

3. (a) 1975-76: $6.10; 1976-77: $6.50; (b) figures are not available. (c) 1975-76: $50,191.96; 1976-77: $70,621.03 (expenditures to January 31, 1977).

USE OF PRIVATE EMPLOYMENT AGENCIES BY DEPARTMENT OF LABOUR

Question No. 1,536—Mr. McKenzie:

2. Are such employees paid from supplementary estimates and, if not, from what estimates are they paid?

3. By province, what was the (a) average hourly rate paid to employment agencies (b) average hourly rate paid to employees (c) total amount paid by the Department in (i) 1975 (ii) 1976?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): 1. (a)(vi) 6.

2. Main Estimates.

3. (a) $5.25; (b) Unknown; (c) (i) Nil; (ii) $1,124.05.

CP-140 AURORA PROGRAMME

Question No. 1,689—Mr. McKinnon:

1. In regard to the CP-140 Aurora Programme, during the period 1975 to 1981, is Lockheed Aircraft Corp. directly, or through its suppliers, ordering industrial benefits totalling $213 million and, if so, to Januray 1, 1977, what is the value of the orders placed in Canada?

2. Is Lockheed to place contracts in Canada for structural components and spare parts valued at $168 million and, if so, to Januray 1, 1977, what is the value of such contracts?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): 1. Lockheed Aircraft Corporation has a contractual obligation to provide to Canada industrial benefits for Canadian manufactures either directly or through its suppliers in the amount of $213.2 million during the period February 1, 1975—December 31, 1981. Value of benefits to January 1, 1977 not yet known. However, value to end of 3rd quarter, 1976 was evaluated at $40.2 million against a year end obligation of $30.8 million.

2. Lockheed has a contractual obligation to place contracts in Canada for P3 structural components in the amount of $168.0 million. The value of the contracts placed with Canadian industry in this regard is approximately $8.0 million to January 1, 1977.

SUBSIDIZATION OF PRIVATE COMPANIES UNDER LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAMMES

Question No. 1,702—Mr. Matte:

1. Has the government, through the Local Initiative Programmes, ever subsidized small private Quebec companies with branches in the United States and, if so, what are (a) their names (b) the amounts of the subsidies?

2. Do the subsidized companies offer services available to the public and, if so, what are these services?

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): 1. No.

2. Not applicable.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

[English]

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, in view of the lengthy and detailed nature of the answer to question No. 780, I would ask that it be made an order for return, and this return would be tabled immediately.

DEPARTMENT OF REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION—HIRING OF CONSULTANTS IN 1975

Question No. 780—Mr. Howie:

1. From January 1, 1975 to December 31, 1975, did the Department of Regional Economic Expansion hire consultants and, if so (a) how many (b) in each case, what was (i) their terms of reference (ii) the time and length of their work assignments (iii) the amount paid to each?

2. Which, if any, of the consultants reports are confidential?

Return tabled.

[English]

Mr. Goodale: Mr. Speaker, I ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Mr. McKinnon: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I have had a question outstanding on the order paper since last December 21. It is a very important question dealing with the strength of the forces, on certain dates. Unless they quit keeping records in the armed forces, they should have this information in about five minutes, unless they are trying to hide something, and I do not suspect they would want to do that. I ask the parliamentary secretary if he could tell them to hurry up. There is no reason for a two month's delay in answering a simple question.

Mr. Goodale: I would point out to the hon. member that in this session of parliament questions have been answered very expeditiously. The departments and agencies of government have been most co-operative and that has resulted in the highest rate of return for written questions that this or any previous parliament has seen for a long time. I can assure him that I will inquire into the specific question he has raised. If answering it is as simple as he suggested, I can assure the hon. member that an answer will be forthcoming very shortly.

Mrs. Appolloni: Mr. Speaker, I would ask the parliamentary secretary when we may expect an answer to my question No. 1,267 on the order paper, dated December 7. I might add that in view of the recommendations contained in the Badgley report regarding the dissemination of information on family planning and sex education, my question is particularly timely.

Mr. Goodale: Mr. Speaker, of course, the previous explanation applies in this case as well and once again I will undertake to look specifically at the question to see if the answer can be expedited, as I undertook to do for the hon. member for Victoria.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, would you be so kind as to call notices of motions for the production of papers Nos. 17, 19, 20, 21, 25, 42, 46 and 50?

Motions for Papers

COPIES OF ALL CORRESPONDENCE AND AGREEMENTS RELATING TO FINANCING OF SUGAR CANE COMPLEX IN IVORY COAST

Motion No. 17—Mr. Herbert:

That an Order of the House do issue for copies of all correspondence, notes, minutes of meetings, documents and agreements relating to the financing by the Export Development Corporation of a cane sugar complex in the Republic of the Ivory Coast to be built by Redpath Sugars Ltd.

[English]

Mr. Hugh Poulin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the documents requested involve papers which are confidential and not of a public or official character, and their production would publish information received by EDC in confidence from sources outside the government. I would therefore ask that the hon. member withdraw his motion.

Mr. Herbert: Transfer for debate.

Mr. Speaker: Transferred for debate.

COPIES OF ALL CORRESPONDENCE AND REPORTS RELATING TO HERITAGE VILLAGE, NEWFOUNDLAND

Motion No. 19—Mr. Marshall:

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency praying that he will cause to be laid before this House copies of all pertinent correspondence and reports between the government and the Province of Newfoundland surrounding the progress of a federal-provincial working group in the preparation of guidelines and criteria for the development of the concept and selection of a site to establish a heritage village to commemorate the Province's 25th Anniversary of Confederation.

[English]

Mr. Ed. Lumley (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, the answer to the question posed by the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall) is as follows. We have decided that it would not be in the best interests of federal-provincial relations to table these documents in the House of Commons at this time. The documents are confidential and relate to a federal-provincial activity. Moreover, the recommendations of the working group referred to in the inquiry do not represent the official positions of the respective governments. The recommendations of the working group have yet to be considered or approved by the two levels of government.

Mr. Paproski: Transfer for debate.

Mr. Speaker: Transferred for debate.

COPIES OF ALL CORRESPONDENCE RELATING TO ACQUISITION OF DE HAVILLAND AIRCRAFT CORPORATION

Motion No. 20—Mr. Whiteway:

Than an Order of the House do issue for copies of the minutes of all meetings, correspondence, telegrams, contracts and/or agreements considered by the government in the acquisition of de Havilland Aircraft Corp.

[English]

Mr. Hugh Poulin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the documents pertaining to the acquisition of de Havilland Aircraft of Canada Limited by the government are based on considerable internal cost information and legal and professional opinion which was freely and privately made available to the negotiators. The data base also included confidential projections of cost and market data which if published could be harmful to the company's position vis-à-vis its commercial competition. For these reasons I ask the hon. member to withdraw his motion.

Mr. Paproski: Transfer for debate.

Mr. Speaker: Transferred for debate.

COPIES OF AL L CORRESPONDENCE RELATING TO ACQUISITION OF CANADIAN AIRCRAFT CORPORATION

Motion No. 21—Mr. Whiteway:

That an Order of the House do issue for copies of the minutes of all meetings, correspondence, telegrams, contracts and/or agreements considered by the government in the acquisition of Canadair Aircraft Corp.

[English]

Mr. Hugh Poulin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the documents pertaining to the acquisition of Canadair Limited by the government are based on considerable internal cost information and legal and professional opinion which was freely and privately made available to the negotiators. The data base also included confidential projections of cost and market data which if published could be harmful to the company's position vis-à-vis its commercial competition. For these reasons I ask the hon. member to withdraw his motion.

Mr. Paproski: That is another cover-up. Transfer for debate.

Mr. Speaker: Transferred for debate.

COPIES OF ALL MINUTES OF MEETINGS AND MATERIALS CONSIDERED BY COMMITTEE ON SEARCH AND RESCUE OPERATIONS, LAKE WINNIPEG

Motion No. 25—Mr. Whiteway:

That an Order of the House do issue for copies of the minutes of all meetings of the interdepartmental task force on integration of government vessels and aircraft and copies of all materials considered by the committee on search and rescue operations and the patrolling of Lake Winnipeg.

[English]

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the documents requested are internal departmental documents of a confidential nature and cannot be produced. I therefore ask that the hon. member withdraw his motion.

Mr. Paproski: Transfer for debate.

Mr. Speaker: Transferred for debate.

COPY OF MEMORANDUM TO ASSISTANT CHIEF STATISTICIAN CONCERNING INACCURACY OF SOME BASIC SOURCES OF DATA

Motion No. 42—Mr. Mazankowski:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the Statistics Canada memorandum written by J. S. Wells, Director-General, National Income and Expenditure Accounts Division to G. Leclerc, Assistant Chief Statistician, concerning the inaccuracy of some of the Bureau's basic sources of data.

[English]

Mr. Hugh Poulin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the document requested is an internal departmental memorandum and cannot be produced. I therefore ask the hon. member to withdraw his motion.

Mr. Paproski: Transfer for debate.

Mr. Speaker: Transferred for debate.

COPIES OF FILES IN POSSESSION OF DEPARTMENT OF SOLICITOR GENERAL RELATING TO PRAIRIE FARM ASSISTANCE ACT ADMINISTRATION

Motion No. 46—Mr. Towers:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the contents of the file or files in the possession of the Department of the Solicitor General and/or the Royal Canadian Mounted Police relating to the investigation concerning Prairie Farm Assistance Act administration.

[English]

Mr. Art Lee (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, notwithstanding that the investigation in this connection was with respect to a federal statute, the alleged offence was criminal in nature and came under the jurisdiction of the attorney general of Saskatchewan. Production of the files is being denied because, as I have stated, they relate to a matter in which the province of Saskatchewan was concerned and the concurrence of the provincial authorities to the release has not been forthcoming. I would like to mention, however, that the transcript of the preliminary hearing will be made available to the hon. member, upon request, by the office of the deputy attorney general, Regina, Saskatchewan. In the circumstances, Mr. Speaker, I hereby ask the hon. member to withdraw his motion.

Mr. Towers: No, Mr. Speaker; transfer for debate.

Mr. Speaker: Transferred for debate.

COPIES OF ALL CORRESPONDENCE, DIRECTIVES AND PERTINENT MATERIAL BETWEEN CHIEF ELECTORAL OFFICER AND NEWFOUNDLAND COMMISSION

Motion No. 50—Mr. Marshall:

That an Order of the House do issue for copies of all correspondence, directives, telegrams and other pertinent material between the Chief Electoral Officer and the Commission appointed to carry out redistribution of boundaries in the province of Newfoundland.

[English]

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, there have been no correspondence, directives, telegrams or other pertinent material between the Chief Electoral Officer and the commission appointed to carry out redistribution of boundaries in the province of Newfoundland. I therefore ask the hon. member to withdraw his motion.

Mr. Marshall: Transfer for debate.

Mr. Speaker: Transferred for debate.

Mr. Goodale: Mr. Speaker, I ask that the remaining notices of motions for the production of papers be allowed to stand.

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY S.O. 58—ALLEGED FAILURE OF GOVERNMENT TO DEVELOP FAIR AND JUST POLICIES RESPECTING OIL AND GAS RESOURCES

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West) moved:

That this House regrets the failure of the government to develop and apply policies in the fields of the oil and gas non-renewable energy resources that are fair or just or adequate for the people or the provinces of Canada today or for the future.

He said: Mr. Speaker, it is with considerable regret that I have to be critical of the government again today, having had to be critical of it last night; but one has to be truthful when speaking in this chamber and the subject matter of this motion will fit in with what I was saying last night. Hon. gentlemen opposite came into office on the basis of co-operative federalism, but they have now degenerated to strong-arm federalism or, as I said last night, to forced federalism or goon-squad federalism—anything but co-operative federalism. They came into office on the basis of participatory democracy, which has also vanished into limbo because the only democracy now is conference-hall autocracy.

The same thing is true in the energy field. What is the good of hon. gentlemen opposite publishing the study called "An Energy Strategy for Canada" when they ignore the recommendations of their own study or twist it in their administration so that it is unfair and unjust, as this motion says. The motion says that their policies are neither fair, just nor adequate for the people or the provinces of Canada.

I want to touch on three subjects in the short time allotted to me which I believe is 30 minutes. First, I want to touch on the new conservation policy, announced by the minister at the beginning of February, for Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island dealing allegedly with conservation of energy in those two provinces and confining it to those two provinces for spurious reasons. Second, I want to touch on the failure of the government to adopt a fair and just policy with regard to offshore minerals, the minerals off the shores of British Columbia, Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island, New Brunswick, Quebec and Newfoundland.

Third, I want to touch on the failure of the government to do anything in the field of hydro development or in the field of financing or assisting hydro development, particularly with reference to the possible development in Labrador of hydro resources there; the government's picayune, penny-pinching policy with respect to those resources; and its failure to assist Newfoundland, for example, in developing the Gull Island project, one which would produce enough hydro energy to replace imports of 18 million barrels of oil a year.

With regard to the new policy announced by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) at the beginning of February, the federal government announced assistance to Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island. The minister announced a policy which would assist householders primarily in the provinces of P.E.I. and Nova Scotia in January and February. In the case of P.E.I., the program amounted to $12 million, of which $6.94 million was for a new home insulation program to be administered by CMHC. There are some other programs with regard to energy conservation and studies, but the main program is to help householders insulate their homes to save energy costs. This is a program of grants to householders in P.E.I. Prince Edward Island was selected and isolated for this treatment, together with Nova Scotia, because of its extremely high reliance on costly imported oil for electrical power generation.

The reason given for discriminating against the other eight provinces of Canada and restricting this program to Nova Scotia and P.E.I. was the costly imported oil for electrical power generation. In Nova Scotia and P.E.I., under this program people can get a grant of $350 if they want to insulate their homes themselves. They can get a grant of up to $500 if they have the work done by contractors. If you are a householder in Newfoundland, the Northwest Territories, Quebec, Ontario, British Columbia, Saskatchewan, Manitoba or Alberta, you will receive no assistance from the government except possibly a loan program from CMHC.

The reason given for this discrimination is that Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island rely heavily on oil for electrical generation. It is true that they do. As a matter of fact, according to the release issued by the minister, Prince Edward Island has a 100 per cent dependence on oil for electrical generation, and Nova Scotia 63 per cent. In making that point the minister's officials have gone on in a statement to give a misleading figure for Newfoundland. In appendix C to this release they say of Prince Edward Island—and the same in the release for Nova Scotia—that Newfoundland's dependence on oil for electrical generation is 1.2 per cent. That is to make Prince Edward Island and Nova Scotia, which are being treated differently, look more plausible. What appendix C does not state is that they include in the Newfoundland figure all of Newfoundland and Labrador, including the huge hydro project at Churchill Falls which delivers nearly all the 5,600 megawatts to Quebec. That is all put into the Newfoundland figure to show that our dependency on oil is just 1.2 per cent.

That is a false and misleading figure. As a matter of fact, Newfoundland's dependency on oil for electrical generation in 1975 was 8 per cent on the island of Newfoundland where the bulk of the population lives—about half a million of them. In the present year it is going to be in the order of 21 per cent because the island of Newfoundland no longer has any hydro resources to develop and is left with the only alternative, oil-fired steam. So the releases put out by the federal government are not true or factual. They are designed to mislead. They are neither fair nor just. It is not 1.2 per cent in Newfoundland; in 1977 it will be 21 per cent on the island of Newfoundland.

Be that as it may, Mr. Speaker, these two provinces are highly dependent on oil for generating electricity. But what has this to do with the new policy of helping the householder? The minister's own release shows, for Nova Scotia, that the percentage of households using oil heating, not electrical heating, is 90 per cent. That is shown in appendix E. In connection with both Prince Edward Island and Nova Scotia, the release shows the dependency of Prince Edward Island householders for heating purposes is 100 per cent oil. In other words, in Nova Scotia 90 per cent of all households are heated using oil, oil furnaces or oil stoves, and in Prince Edward Island it is 100 per cent.

How does this policy of giving a householder a grant of $500 to insulate his home to save energy costs have anything to do with electricity? How does it save the use of oil for electricity in Nova Scotia? It has no connection with electricity. If 100 per cent of the homes in Prince Edward Island were electrically heated, and 90 per cent of the homes in Nova Scotia were electrically heated, and the electricity came from oil, one would be saving electricity and the oil used to generate it. That is not the case when it is going to go to households heated by furnaces that use oil directly.

If the object of this policy is to conserve oil and to conserve the imports of oil in addition to saving people money, then is a barrel of oil saved in Newfoundland or in Ontario not just as good to Canada as a barrel saved in Nova Scotia or Prince Edward Island? Do the people of Canada realize they are being discriminated against in this way? Just because of geographical location in two of the ten provinces of Canada the householders can get a substantial cash advance to insulate their homes. The minister's statements say that if they do this properly they will save 40 per cent of their energy requirements—40 per cent of the cost of heating their homes. You can get that in Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island, but you cannot get it in the other eight provinces.

This is pure discrimination, Mr. Speaker. The government is using the excuse that there is more oil-fired electricity in those two provinces, but that does not carry any weight. It is not the real reason. This is going to be a $12 million program in Prince Edward Island and $80 million in Nova Scotia, of which $17 million is to come from the government of Nova Scotia. In Nova Scotia it is $33.41 million for the home insulation grant program and another $17 million for a home insulation loan program, and almost $7 million in Prince Edward Island.

What is the reason for this discrimination? It has nothing to do with the reason given in the statement. It has been stated publicly that Nova Scotia is the author of its own misfortunes with respect to high energy costs. The government of Nova Scotia turned down the opportunity to go into nuclear energy with New Brunswick. Because the government of Nova Scotia prevented increases in prices charged for electricity over the last three or four years—Premier Regan prevented them from going ahead when they should have commenced earlier—now there is going to be an abrupt jump. For political reasons they were kept down over three or four years when costs were climbing. The Nova Scotia Power Commission incurred heavy losses because of that political policy. That is the reason they are taking an abrupt jump in Nova Scotia now. It is because they had the benefit of an Imperial Oil contract to supply oil for electrical generation purposes at a very low figure. Now there has to be an abrupt jump. There have been abrupt jumps in Newfoundland and all the other provinces, Mr. Speaker.

The person who put forward these reasons for not giving Nova Scotia special help was the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources last year. He has been made to swallow his words by some forces beyond his control. What were those forces? They were political forces. The Liberal party of Nova Scotia got the government House leader down to Nova Scotia and pulverized him at a meeting about six months ago. They assured the minister that he had no chance of being elected and would have to go to the other place if he did not get a special program from the government of Canada. For six months Nova Scotia was rife with Alastair Gillespie jokes. It was not the Newfie joke in Nova Scotia; it was the Alastair Gillespie joke. The hon. gentleman has made a 100 per cent about-face in the face of this abuse.

Mr. Epp: He is still facing in the wrong direction.

Mr. Crosbie: After the abuse he took from the government of Nova Scotia, he brought in this new policy. There are two Liberal provinces left in Canada, Mr. Speaker, Prince Edward Island and Nova Scotia, and the federal government is struggling mightily to see that they remain Liberal. Nova Scotia faces an election this year. This about-face reminds me of the following ditty.

When Regan delved and MacEachen spanned
Who was then in command?
Certainly not the energy man.

I am sure the minister fought against this policy in the confines of the government, but he has been forced to toe the line by the government House leader and Premier Regan. This is a sad thing because the people of the other eight provinces are being discriminated against by the government. It is using tax moneys collected all across Canada to support a policy that discriminates against the other eight provinces, for no logical reason—nothing but a political reason. That is why this resolution decries the unfairness and injustice of these policies.

I have not the time to go into more detail about how silly it is to argue that only these two provinces deserve this policy because of their high content of oil-fired energy, 100 per cent in Prince Edward Island and 60 per cent in Nova Scotia. I support this kind of program in an attempt to induce energy conservation. It would be a step in the right direction were it applied all across Canada. But I say that what is good for Nova Scotia and what is good for Prince Edward Island is good for the rest of us Canadians.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Leggatt: You sound like General Motors.

Mr. Crosbie: The province of Newfoundland has been attempting to get equal treatment with Nova Scotia and New Brunswick since March, 1976, including letters from the premier of the province outlining reasons why we should receive at least the same treatment. I will briefly give some of these reasons; they would apply to other provinces as well. The people of Newfoundland are depending increasingly on imported oil to meet their energy needs—21 per cent this year. If hon. members opposite do not adopt a proper policy in developing hydro energy or to assist provinces with low capability to develop hydro resources, it will be ever-increasing: it will be 40 per cent in 1980.

● (1530)

We need assistance for that reason. We need assistance because the per capita personal income in Newfoundland is lower than in Nova Scotia, and about the same as in Prince Edward Island. If you look at need, you cannot just take one item such as the high electricity cost and isolate that. You have to look at all of the factors. The cost of living in Newfoundland is the highest in the country. You have to look at other factors like that to get that need. When you look at those factors you see that the need of Newfoundlanders is even greater than those in Nova Scotia and is equal to those in Prince Edward Island. It is also true for other parts of the country. Our climate has higher average temperatures than Prince Edward Island or Nova Scotia. We have higher wind velocities than P.E.I. or Nova Scotia.

An hon. Member: That is true.

Mr. Crosbie: I am not trying to illustrate that fact today. The cost of heating oil in Newfoundland is substantially higher than in Nova Scotia. It costs 3½ cents more for a gallon of heating oil in St. John's than it does in Halifax. The same is true of stove oil. The cost of heating oil is greater in Newfoundland than in Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island. Seventy per cent of our households are heated by stove oil furnaces. Therefore, the need is greater there. Our electricity prices are the third highest in Canada despite the fact that we have a lot of hydro. It is high-cost hydro because it was only developed in the last 15 years at a high capital cost. It is delivered to scattered outposts. In addition, we have a rural electricity program where half of the 10,000 people are receiving diesel power. They have to get diesel and not hydro.

I could go on with a number of other reasons which show that Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island should not be singled out from the other provinces with respect to all these needs. By 1980, 40 per cent of the people of Newfoundland will be depending on oil-fired steam power. We cannot use coal and we cannot use nuclear: we have only one alternative to our hydro power in Newfoundland, and that is oil. We will hear the minister attempt, if he can, to justify this discrimination when he speaks. I say to the people of the other eight provinces that it is time they woke up and put some pressure on this government to start treating them fairly and start offering them the same energy conservation grants that householders in Nova Scotia and P.E.I. have been offered, as well as those in the Northwest Territories. This is not an energy conservation policy. This is a policy of political poltroonery, political preference. It is the rankest kind of discrimination.

I do not know the population figures, but at least 90 per cent of the people of Canada should be getting this. They should all be able to reduce the energy consumption in their homes across the country. I will be interested in hearing how the minister is going to continue to support this as a policy for those two provinces without extending it to the rest of us across this country who are so badly in need. As a matter of fact, unless he does change that policy I will try, as I said last night, to get his salary reduced to two cents when the estimates come before the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: His energy strategy reads well until one looks to see how it is being carried out. It then becomes intermingled with the rankest kind of political consideration.

I now come to the second reason for moving this motion that the government's policies are unfair and unjust to the rest of the people of Canada. There are a dozen reasons and these will be discussed by other speakers. I shall only touch on two or three. I refer to the government's offshore minerals policy. The Liberal government in Ottawa argues that it owns and must control offshore mineral rights off the west and east coasts of Canada, our reserves of oil and gas. The Northwest Territories are not enough for them, the territories they already own; they want to own the resources that lie off both coasts.

An hon. Member: All three coasts.

Mr. Crosbie: However many coasts. They already have the Northwest Territories. In 1967 they got an opinion from the Supreme Court of Canada that in fact the federal government owns the continental shelf and controls and owns all the minerals that might lie off British Columbia. They got this through a narrow legalistic interpretation of the constitution. Because of that they are now attempting to claim that they own and must control the minerals that lie off the east coast as well. Why? What is the difference between minerals that lie under the land in Manitoba and Saskatchewan and minerals that are under the water off Newfoundland, Nova Scotia or British Columbia? Why, because they are under the water, should they belong to the government of Canada? If some court, through narrow legalistic reasoning, finds that the federal government has technical ownership, why should that government insist upon it? It would only insist upon if it was a centralizing government, a government that does not believe in federalism, a government that does not care whether the provinces stand or fall.

Does this government want the provinces to remain weak financially and subservient to the central power? The government has aggravated and irritated provinces such as Alberta and Saskatchewan because they want to use their own resources for their own benefit and get as much as they can out of it. It is the kind of government which claims it owns them and therefore is going to control them. That is the attitude of the hon. gentlemen opposite.

The federal government has entered into agreement with the provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island. At the beginning of February they made public an abbreviated version of the agreement reached with those three provinces. They have no agreement with Newfoundland or Quebec because we do not ever intend to agree with the Liberal policy in this direction. However, they have secured agreement with these three provinces which are not as strong as Newfoundland.

We were treated to a fantastic exhibition. Premier Regan almost laughed himself silly because he was so happy about this agreement. Why would he go along with such a piece of play-acting, because it is a pernicious agreement, an agreement that leaves all control with the government of Canada. It does not help those provinces fundamentally at all. The agreement gives away the control over oil and gas and the regulation of what the royalty system is going to be: all that is left with the government of Canada. The provinces are told they can have 75 per cent of the royalties or fees that might come from the areas where these minerals are discovered. Why was Premier Regan so happy? Why was he laughing and chuckling so much? He has an election coming up this year and has to try and make it sound like it really amounts to something. What will it be 75 per cent of? It will be 75 per cent of what the federal government decides it is going to be. Those three provinces will have no control over the administration, no control over the pace of development, no control over whether they go with companies that put their facilities on shore or not, or whether they have to employ Nova Scotians, New Brunswickers or Prince Edward Islanders. That will all be left to the minister and his government.

Would any one laugh and say this is a tremendous monument to confederation, if he did not have an ulterior purpose? There is only one reason—the election. Premier Regan should be crying all the way to the legislative assembly because of what he had to accept from the federal Liberals.

In addition, it has not yet been revealed—and it may be changed as I am revealing it—that the federal government is insisting that these three provinces cannot impose any provincial corporation or any provincial taxes on the income of permit holders in this offshore region. They are allowed to get 75 per cent of the royalties and fees, whatever they may be and whenever they come in, but they are not allowed to impose any other provincial tax on the income of the permit holders. That is some deal!

They have the maritime offshore resources board with three members from the three provinces and three from the federal government. If any decisions cannot be agreed to, or if there is a tie in any particular respect, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources is the final authority. It is a complete sell-out, an admission that the federal government has complete control. That is not acceptable in Newfoundland; it is not acceptable in Quebec. It is not acceptable to the Progressive Conservative party of Canada which has a policy entirely contrary to the one being administered by this government. This is a party that believes in a federal system. It believes in having strong regions and strong provinces as well as a strong federal government.

This party has made it clear that when it takes power the PC government is going to recognize the offshore provinces as having ownership and control of the minerals that lie off their shores on the continental shelf. It will give them some kind of a future. We all know that when the money comes in, if it ever comes in, eventually it will reduce the equalization payment and the need for it. But that is not the only reason. These provinces want to control the rate of the development. They want to see their own citizens share in it. They want to see that the oil companies build onshore in their province if they are using their resource offshore, and for a variety of other reasons. That is enough, I believe, to ensure our support in British Columbia and all four of the Atlantic provinces when the next election comes.

At the time publicity was given to this agreement between the maritime provinces and Canada, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources indulged in a bit of bullying. He decided that he would bully the province of Newfoundland while this agreement was being announced and he made a statement that EastCan had been talking to him and told him they were not prepared to go ahead with an exploration program next summer unless a dispute between them and the Newfoundland government over oil and gas regulations proposed by the Newfoundland government was settled. Now the Newfoundland government has prepared its own regulations and regime for the offshore, just as the federal government did a year ago. We have not seen the federal government's regulations since. They were promised last year but the regulations and the legislation are still not here. Well, Newfoundland is doing the same. It is giving the oil companies its suggested oil and gas regulations for their comments. So the minister made the statement that EastCan was not going to explore or drill next year because of these regulations which Newfoundland proposed and because of the jurisdictional dispute. This was an attempt to bluff the province of Newfoundland into surrendering on the offshore minerals question.

An hon. Member: Oh!

Mr. Crosbie: Well, if the hon. member would look at the editorials down there he would see what they thought of that. We in Newfoundland are not going to be bluffed into giving up anything. We are waiting until the hon. gentleman from Bow River, Rocky Mountain, or whichever that great district is, gets in. Mr. Speaker, the minister said he intended to intervene with the government of Newfoundland and that he hoped "moral suasion" would convince the province to change its stand. Here is a man who is trying to steal our resources, proposing to use moral suasion on the government and people of Newfoundland.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Crosbie: I should like to know whether EastCan authorized the minister to say anything about their discussions with him. I can tell him from the clippings I read that they were amazed and surprised that he had said anything like this. I am sure they do not like the federal regulations either, because oil and gas companies do not like any regulations which are going to be less generous to them than they were in the past. If the minister wants EastCan to go ahead next summer offshore and spend money, I suggest he settle their minds by agreeing that Newfoundland has jurisdiction, and that he does this by withdrawing the federal claim so that the company will be able to go ahead and deal only with Newfoundland.

It is strange, Mr. Speaker, but in the United States where the courts upheld that the federal government owns the offshore, and in Australia and other jurisdictions, the federal authorities have made much better arrangements with their provinces and states than has been offered by the federal government of Canada. It is because this government wants a unitary state. The Liberal government wants all power and authority in Ottawa, and they want to dragoon Newfoundland and Quebec into surrendering also. Mr. Speaker, under our policy the six coastal provinces of Canada will have brought to them relief from this onerous and crushing federal master that wants to take everything and give nothing in return. The other alternative to a new government being elected is to go before the courts, and that is where Newfoundland will go. It will never surrender on the offshore question.

I do not have time to deal with these matters now to the extent they deserve, but I would like the minister to know that we are not going to be bullied in Newfoundland. This illustrates something I want to say in connection with my third point. The document entitled "An Energy Strategy for Canada" refers at pages 5, 28 and 136 to the importance of oil and to the importance of hydroelectric power. We read on page 4 that hydroelectric power is currently the most important renewable energy resource in Canada. On page 28 mention is made of financial support for provincial or interregional nuclear generation and interregional electrical connection. We also find a note about the importance of developing hydro. On page 136 we read the following:

Energy Policy

One of the government's policies is to encourage the substitution of electricity generated from domestic energy resources including nuclear, hydro and coal for electricity generated from imported oil.

That sounds like a fine principle, and it is a good principle. But it is malarkey. It is not being carried out. In Newfoundland they are not helping us to get our future requirements from hydro which is available in Labrador. No less than 1,800 megawatts are available from the Gull Island site alone, with another 500,000 or 600,000 downriver at Muskrat Falls. There are other sites available for development, but the government is doing nothing to assist. The document goes on to say that their policy also calls for the provision of help in the strengthening of interregional electric connection. Not enough has been done in this field. The government's policy is supposed to be to lend 50 per cent of the cost of interregional interconnection or half the cost of nuclear generation for the plant in a province—up to 50 per cent. They did make an offer to Newfoundland in connection with the Gull Island project when the estimate of the cost involved was much lower than it is today. At that time I believe the estimate $1.47 million—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I have to interrupt the hon. member because the time allotted to him has expired.

Some hon. Members: Go on.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent to allow the hon. member to continue his remarks?

Some hon. Members: No.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Paproski: He is our lead speaker.

Mr. Crosbie: Might I move the motion, Mr. Speaker?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member did not get unanimous consent to continue. He has already spoken, and I have to recognize the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas).

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, Canada's dwindling supplies of oil and natural gas pose serious problems for the people of this country. It is therefore fit and proper that the government's policies for dealing with these problems should be discussed and, where necessary, criticized. Since I have only 20 minutes at my disposal I am prevented from dealing with the wide range of issues involved. I will therefore confine myself to dealing with two apsects of the energy situation.

The first matter I want to deal with is the government's failure to ensure that the increased prices being charged Canadian consumers are in fact used for the purpose of discovering and developing new supplies of oil and natural gas. In the past four years the price of gas has doubled and the price of crude oil has increased three-fold. The petroleum industry and the government have consistently maintained that these increases in price are necessary to ensure the cash flow needed to stimulate exploration and development. What has been the result? Exploration has not kept pace with the increased prices consumers have been required to pay. As a matter of fact, in 1975 there was a decline in exploration activity which represented the pressure on the government by the oil companies to raise prices. We are seeing a continuous decline in exploration.

At page 36 of the study "An Energy Strategy for Canada" we find that for every $1 increase in the price of a barrel of oil the industry will get 25 cents per barrel even if there is no increased exploration. If the companies carry out sufficient exploration work they will get 56 cents out of each $1 of the price increase. The federal government will get nothing; the balance will go to the producing provinces. On page 38 of the energy strategy study we find this illuminating statement:

Current estimates suggest that with existing fiscal systems and prices that gradually increase towards current international levels, the industry will retain, after taxes and royalties, in excess of $3 billion per year (in 1975 dollars) on the average, over the next five years.

If ever there was a windfall, this is it. The government has repeatedly assured the House that it would monitor these windfall revenues paid to the oil industry by the consumers of this country so as to ensure that these moneys were used for exploration and development. There is no evidence that this has been done. Indeed, all the evidence indicates the contrary. The government has consistently over the years refused to follow the course advocated by the New Democratic Party, namely, that all the additional revenue from the rise in oil prices, except that part which goes to the producing provinces, should be retained by the federal government in trust for reinvestment in exploration and development. This money could be paid to the industry as exploration programs are carried out, or the money could be utilized by Petro-Canada to carry on exploration offshore and for the development of our heavy oil and the oil sands in Alberta and Saskatchewan.

The second matter that I wish to deal with in the short time at my disposal concerns the efforts being made to push the construction of a Mackenzie Valley pipeline as a solution to Canada's need for natural gas supplies. It seems to me that this is an appropriate time for the House to express its opinion on this matter and at the conclusion of my remarks I propose to move an amendment which will give the House an opportunity to do so. It seems to me it is further made necessary by a statement which appears in this afternoon's papers from Washington where discussions are being held between the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Trudeau) and the President of the United States. In passing, Mr. Speaker, I want to pay tribute to the Prime Minister. I am sure all of us were proud of the eloquent and timely speech that he made to the Congress of the United States in which he represented the views, I believe, of the great majority of the people of Canada. The report from Washington reads as follows:

A Canadian official indicated here Tuesday that Prime Minister Trudeau is ready to do all he can to speed a decision on construction of the multimillion dollar Mackenzie Valley pipeline to carry Alaskan gas to Americans . . . the official said Trudeau explained to Carter that he would "like to be in a position not to embarrass him over the pipeline".

To me, Mr. Speaker, that has a very ominous ring and I think we ought to face up at this time to this question of the construction of a Mackenzie Valley pipeline. Let us recognize, in the first place, that the primary purpose of this pipeline is to move Prudhoe Bay gas from Alaska to the United States. We should recognize that the benefits to Canada are minimal. The best estimates of our proven gas reserves in the Mackenzie Valley are somewhere between four trillion cubic feet and five trillion cubic feet. May I point out that already all but 1.4 trillion cubic feet of that gas has been contracted to gas companies in the United States. But even if we get all the gas in the Delta—and there is every reason to believe we will not—five trillion cubic feet is only the equivalent of what we export to the United States over a five-year period.

It is a travesty to suggest that we should build pipeline at a cost of $8 billion—though the cost is much more likely to be $10 billion or $12 billion—and at the same time suffer the economic and monetary dislocations of such high capital expenditures, as well as environmental damage and a disturbing impact on our native people, in order to get a quantity of gas which we could procure by a more intensive exploration program in the southern areas of Canada and by offshore drilling.

There is nothing which calls into question more the viability of this proposed pipeline down the Mackenzie Valley than the fact that Canadian Arctic Gas Pipe Line Company has stated publicly that it will require financial guarantees from the Canadian government. One might well ask why, if this is a viable project, and since it is primarily going to carry Alaskan gas to the United States, the Canadian government should be asked to give financial guarantees.

As a matter of fact, I think it is significant that, despite repeated public statements to the effect that they want financial guarantees, this company has never formally applied for those guarantees. Why? Because they are waiting for a favourable report from the National Energy Board. Once they have a conditional permit in their hot little hands they are counting on pressure from Washington to secure financial guarantees from the government of Canada. The government of Canada will then be in the very difficult position of having either to refuse these guarantees or having to set aside a recommendation of the National Energy Board. The government will further be in the awkward position that, if the Prime Minister of Canada has agreed with the President of the United States to speed up a decision on the matter, and if the United States President has already indicated to Congress his preference for the Mackenzie Valley pipeline, they will have no alternative but to grant those guarantees and allow construction of the Mackenzie Valley pipeline.

The Canadian Arctic Gas Pipe Line Company Limited would then be able to say to the Canadian government, "You knew all along that we would need financial guarantees before we could proceed with this project, and you allowed the National Energy Board to grant us a permit to build the Mackenzie Valley pipeline; therefore, automatically, the granting of the permit involves financial guarantees". Financial guarantees for what? For moving 35 trillion cubic feet of gas from Prudhoe Bay to the United States? In the process Canada will get all the financial dislocation, all the environmental damage, all the dislocation of our native people, to secure, at most, five trillion cubic feet of gas; and the prospects are that most of that gas will go to the United States.

It will go to the United States first of all because, as I already said, most of it is contracted to American gas companies, but, secondly because that gas will come onstream ahead of the Prudhoe Bay gas and consequently it will come at a time when we will not be in great need of natural gas; and under the National Energy Board Act, which says that surplus gas can be exported to the United States, the American companies of course will apply for permission to export the gas from the Mackenzie Delta to the United States. It should be kept in mind that in this country we have, it is estimated, nearly 60 trillion cubic feet of natural gas. Annually we consume 1.5 trillion cubic feet and we export to the United States 1 trillion cubic feet. That means that we have quite a few years of lead time to find new sources of gas to meet Canadian needs without the environmental damage and the creation of problems for our native people that are associated with this project.

We maintain that the Mackenzie Valley pipeline is not needed at this time, that it has no economic benefit for Canadians. Naturally, we sympathize with our American neighbours about their desire to get Alaskan gas shipped from Prudhoe Bay to the United States, but I submit that there is a much less expensive and much less damaging alternative which should be considered. Proposals have been put forward by which we could ship gas from Prudhoe Bay down along the Alaska Highway which would provide the Americans with a land bridge that would take their gas directly to the United States. That should be considered if three conditions are met: first of all, that the Americans finance the pipeline; second, that the Americans be prepared to accept the one trillion cubic feet of export commitments which we have, and meet those commitments out of Prudhoe Bay gas. That would save Canada one trillion cubic feet of gas per year. In five years we would get all the gas which we would get from building the Mackenzie Valley pipeline.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): The third condition I would impose would be that during the construction of that pipeline, if it is approved, every cubic foot of gas which we continue to export to the United States should be on a swap basis, so that when their line is in operation we would recover that gas from the line going to the United States and we would have at that time six trillion or seven trillion cubic feet of gas coming to us which we could take when we wanted it and as we wanted it.

It seems to me that if those three conditions were met we should give serious consideration to what is commonly called the Alcan route, although I think the direction would be different from what has been proposed. But the general idea is to take the pipeline down along the Alaska Highway where there would be less environmental damage, less dislocation of the native people, and where we would not be required to make the tremendous capital investment which we will need for oil sand development, perhaps for nuclear reactors and for other forms of energy which this country must have.

The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) has said, as does this study, an "Energy Strategy for Canada", that we will need, between now and 1990, $180 billion in capital expenditures to meet our energy requirements. I contend that if this country ties up anywhere from $8 billion to $12 billion in a pipeline that will give us minimal benefits, we will not have the capital to develop the other resources which we must have in the 1980s and 1990s to keep the Canadian people from freezing in the dark.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Therefore, I hope that the House will avail itself of this opportunity to express to the government how we feel about the Mackenzie Valley pipeline, and I suggest that we should do it now, not if we wait until the National Energy Board has made its report and the cabinet has made its report. The reports will not be referred to the House of Commons, as the ministers have said repeatedly. This is the time, now, before they have gone too far, before the Prime Minister has made too many commitments, before the government has laid all its plans on the basis of a pipeline which will bring only minimal benefits to Canada, for this House to say in clear and certain terms that we think this project is not in the best interests of the Canadian people.

Therefore, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That the motion be amended by changing the period at the end thereof to a comma, and by adding immediately thereafter the following words:

"and this House expresses its opinion that the proposed construction of a Mackenzie Valley pipeline is not in the best interests of the Canadian people.

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to enter this debate and I welcome the fact that the opposition parties have put before the House a motion with respect to the energy policy. Indeed, I think most Canadians would welcome the fact that the opposition parties have introduced this subject, because for so long opposition spokemen have been quiet about the direction which they think this country should take with respects to the energy policy.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crouse: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Gillespie: I think I have the floor, Mr. Speaker.

[Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands).]

Mr. Crouse: On many occasions we have pointed out the need for establishing Fundy power as a means of alleviating the energy shortage in Atlantic Canada, but the government has taken no action.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) has the floor.

Mr. Gillespie: Apparently the truth hurts. If opposition members want to make constituency speeches, that is their right; but I think that the Canadian people are looking to the House to deal with the very important question of the over-all energy policy, not just a narrow parochial view—which may be an important view to those hon. members, perhaps—but a view which encompasses the whole of the country.

I listened to the mover of the motion. I must say that I was disappointed and I think many Canadians will be disappointed by his remarks. Quite clearly, it was a good constituency speech, but I am not at all sure that the Canadian people will find in that speech what they were looking for; that is, the view of the opposition regarding the direction this country should be taking on energy policy matters. Perhaps that is not altogether surprising. A moment ago I indicated that opposition spokesmen had shown themselves to be very shy when it comes to offering views about energy policy questions. Indeed, the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works received a reference from this House a week or so ago dealing with an energy strategy for Canada. The surprising thing is that when that committee was ready to go, the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas) was there but there was not one Conservative.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. McKenzie: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Would the minister please identify what meeting he is referring to? There have been two recently. Is he referring to both of them? If he is referring to yesterday's meeting, I was there, the hon. member for Calgary South (Mr. Bawden) was there, the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Ritchie) was there , and there was also one other member. I have been at all the meetings.

Mr. Gillespie: The hon. member is quite right. The three members to whom he referred were there at the end of the meeting.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, I, too, would like to correct the hon. gentleman. I was at the first meeting of that committee last week. I was not in town yesterday morning and did not know about the meeting. However, the minister was not there last week.

Mr. Gillespie: Apparently hon. members opposite have thin skins.

Mr. Crouse: Apparently you can't tell the truth.

Mr. Gillespie: If hon. members would look at the record they would see that the so-called energy expert of the Conservative party, the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie), was not present yesterday.

Mr. Crouse: And he said so.

Mr. Gillespie: Nor will they find that any one of the three previous energy critics of the Tory party was present. I ask whether the Canadian people are to believe that the Tory party is really serious about the important energy issues of today.

Mr. Bawden: Tell us how serious you are. Tell us about those northern regulations: that is the biggest road-block we have.

Mr. Gillespie: I listened very carefully to the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie). I thought he might want to put on the record his party's position with respect to energy prices, with respect to what they should be and whether oil prices should go up, and by how much. But at no time has his party really come to grips with what is one of the most important energy questions of the day. I suppose in the province of Ontario they would argue for lower prices and that would be popular. In Alberta they probably would be arguing for higher prices because that would be popular. But if as a national party they have a national view, they have kept it to themselves.

I think it is about time the Canadian people heard the views of the Tory party with respect to the present price of oil and what the price of oil should be next July 1, because we will be entering into negotiations very shortly. I think the time has come for the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) to make his position clear on that question, and if he disagrees with the position of the government that we should move toward world prices, let him say so because the Canadian people want to hear him. There are other matters upon which the people would like to hear the Conservatives.

Mr. Bawden: Tell us about the regulations which are holding everything up.

Mr. Gillespie: I can only assume from the remarks of the hon. member for St. John's West who made, as I said, an eloquent constituency speech, that he accepts the goal Canada has set, the goal of self-reliance for Canadians and the target of reducing our dependence on foreign oil to one-third by 1985. I assume that because he has not criticized that target. Indeed, I think his words were that "An Energy Strategy for Canada" reads very well. I assume from that remark that he accepts that target and that goal.

Mr. Crosbie: Wait until tomorrow morning.

Mr. Gillespie: If the hon. member had any other views he should have had the courage to put them on the record this afternoon.

Mr. Crosbie: I didn't have enough time.

Mr. Crouse: You wouldn't listen to him. You cut him off.

Mr. Gillespie: The hon. member says he did not have enough time, but he had 30 minutes, which was ten minutes more than the time allotted to the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands. The hon. member also had the floor last night for 20 minutes. He could have said something then, if he had wished to do so. This man has a loud voice. He is on his feet very often. I applaud his gymnastics when trying to be recognized. I hope that by the end of the session they will start to indicate—

Mr. Gilbert: He used to be a Liberal.

Mr. Gillespie: —where the Conservative party stands on the question of heavy oil. Where does the Conservative party stand on the Athabasca tar sands and their development? Where does the Conservative party stand with respect to a pipeline? Where does it stand with respect to conservation? What target would it propose to the Canadian people? Would the Conservative party accept the target we put before the Canadian people? How do the Tories feel about the target we have set for increased exploration and development in frontier areas?

Mr. Bawden: Tell us about that; it is off by 50 per cent.

Mr. Gillespie: I would like to know what targets they would put before the Canadian people and before this House.

Mr. McKenzie: That is your job now; you have your chance.

Mr. Gillespie: It is quite clear from the noise opposite that hon. members opposite are a little worried that Hansard will put down the kinds of questions which are being put to them.

Mr. McKenzie: I will be making a constructive speech.

Mr. Douglas (Bruce-Grey): Your first one.

Mr. Gillespie: The lead-off speaker, the mover of the motion, spoke about three things. He spoke about the conservation program for P.E.I. and Nova Scotia; he spoke about the policy with respect to offshore resources and he said something about hydro development in Newfoundland. I would like to deal with those points in my speech, but first I would like to turn to the comments made by the NDP spokesman, the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands.

Mr. Stanbury: At least we know where he stands.

Mr. Gillespie: He made it very clear where he stands on two issues. He put forward in very clear terms the socialist solution. The socialist solution is that for any increase in oil or natural gas 100 per cent of that increase ought to go to the government. I think he would agree that that is the interpretation any fair-minded person could put on it. If he does not agree, I would like him to clarify.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the minister would not want to misrepresent my views. I said that apart from what goes to the producing provinces, the rest should be retained in trust by the federal government and paid to the companies as they carry on exploration programs, or it should go to Petro-Canada which would then carry on exploration programs.

Mr. Gillespie: I appreciate the hon. member clarifying his position.

Mr. Benjamin: You weren't listening in the first place.

Mr. Gillespie: He made it quite clear that the funds from such increases should be channelled to governments to be used for exploration. I suppose that is not an altogether inconsistent position for his party to take, because some of the provincial governments have taken positions not unlike that with regard to the taxation of other resources in other parts of the country. I suppose that is particularly true in the case of the province of Saskatchewan when it comes to taxation. The hon. member knows very well the history of the taxation measures of the province of Saskatchewan. On a number of occasions that added up to more than 100 per cent of the revenues from the producing wells. I think the hon. member probably also knows that the result of that taxation philosophy was the choking of any additional investment, exploration or development activity in the province of Saskatchewan.

Mr. Benjamin: That is not true.

Mr. Gillespie: If the hon. member compares the activity in the province of Saskatchewan with the activity in Alberta, he can make a very clear comparison. In Alberta, incentives were provided. A significant part of price increases went to the producers. It provided a cash flow which generated substantial new reserves for the benefit of the people of Alberta.

Mr. Paproski: And Canada.

Mr. Gillespie: Yes, very much so for the people of Canada as well. I suggest to him that the shortsighted view of many socialists with respect to taxation policies will work to the disadvantage of Canada. You can have the most elaborate taxation systems that man can devise, but they are pretty worthless if there is not going to be any oil and no revenue to tax.

● (1620)

The other point he made very clear was his party's position on the pipeline. I suppose I should not be surprised that he should commit his party against a pipeline for the Mackenzie at this time, but I have to admit that I am. The hon. member has a very high regard for parliament, but I can only interpret his position as being in contempt of parliament and in contempt of parliamentary institutions.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): What say would parliament have?

Mr. Gillespie: It seems to me when the parliament of Canada sets up the National Energy Board for the purpose of examining applications of this kind, and then one party says, "Sure, the parliament of Canada set up the National Energy Board to deal with this question, but we know better. We will prejudge them, with all the work they have done over the last 2½ years or more. We are not interested. We have already made up our minds regardless of the facts," that it is contemptuous of parliament.

I believe, also, that the view that we should make a decision before receiving the report of Mr. Justice Berger is an insult to him. It seems to me, when he was given the demanding task of examining the environmental and social questions that are allied to a Mackenzie Valley pipeline, we at least owe him the benefit of receiving it without making up our minds first of all. I say I am disappointed that the hon. member should have jumped the gun on the pipeline issue at this time.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, would the minister permit a question?

Mr. Gillespie: If you put it at the end of my remarks.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Certainly.

Mr. Gillespie: Let me make it quite clear that the plan for insulation and conservation offered to the provinces of Prince Edward Island and Nova Scotia was to deal with two specific questions and needs. Hon. members will recall that the Premier of Nova Scotia appealed for assistance because electrical energy rates in his province had gone up very substantially and were likely to go up very much more in the near future. He said his province had nearly the highest electrical energy rate in the country. The highest, of course, is Prince Edward Island. When we looked at the situation it was quite clear there was a unique need in these two provinces. Prince Edward Island depended for 100 per cent of its electrical energy on oil; they had no hydro capacity. In the case of Nova Scotia, roughly two-thirds of all electrical energy was generated from oil.

The stated policy of this government which was put forward to parliament in the document "An Energy Strategy for Canada"—Policies for Self-Reliance" was to reduce our dependence on foreign oil. That was the goal. Clearly, there was a question of national interest on the problem that these two provinces had to deal with—their heavy dependence on foreign oil. When we looked at the situation it seemed to us that the most appropriate way of providing assistance to Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island was to do it in a way which would be fully consistent with the strategy of reducing our dependence on foreign oil. If we had accepted the proposal of the Premier of Nova Scotia to provide subsidies, we would have been going counter to that particular objective for Canada because we would have been subsidizing the continuation of the greater use of oil indirectly. The proposal we put forward for insulation in a typical home will provide savings in one year greater that the additional cost of electrical power for one year. Not only is it an advantage on a one-year basis, but it is a permanent advantage to home owners in Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island. The saving continues from year to year, whereas any other kind of assistance, such as a subsidy, would be temporary. We also provided incentives and assistance with respect to conservation measures for industry, and also substitution arrangements in the province of Nova Scotia for the conversion of an oil-fired generating facility to a coal-fired one.

I think it is clear that this is a unique situation. It is not discriminatory in the sense that other provinces would qualify because the next nearest province, when it comes to the question of electrical energy generated from oil, has about half the dependence of Nova Scotia. The hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) had some figures and I should like to reply to them. Newfoundland, fortunately, is very little dependent upon foreign oil for the generation of electricity on the island and in Labrador. The figures I have been given for electrical generation for 1976—and these exclude the demand for exports to Quebec—are 7,800 gigawatt hours and for oil-generated electricity in all of Labrador and Newfoundland are 400 gigawatt hours. The oil-fired generation compared to the total generation used in the province of Newfoundland is, therefore, in the order of 5 per cent, very much lower than that for Nova Scotia which has close to 66 per cent.

I can understand that the hon. member for St. John's West would want to emphasize the hydro potential for Newfoundland. He knows I share his interest in seeing that development take place. Indeed, I met with him a little under a year ago when he was minister of energy in the province of Newfoundland to discuss precisely that question and to try to see what steps the federal government could take to bring about the realization of the Gull Island facility.

I answered a question in the House today from one of the hon. member's colleagues. I said I had been in touch with the Premier of Newfoundland to raise with him the question of the transmission assistance which we had offered. There is $343 million still on the table with respect to the transmission of power from Gull Island to Newfoundland. I offered to discuss with him, as well, other forms of arrangement which the federal government might enter into. This would be a new departure, possibly even involving equity on the part of the federal government, which would deal with the generation facilities at Gull Island. I asked the premier, if he was still interested in pursuing this matter, and if so, to designate a senior official so that we could get on with the job of identifying the costs and engineering needed to bring about this major facility.

As hon. members will understand, the announcement two weeks ago of the establishment of a maritime energy corporation is very much a part of what I see to be the over-all strategy for the Atlantic provinces. I would expect there might be as much as 1,000 megawatts of surplus power in the Gull Island facility. I realize that the maritime provinces are going to require power in the future. Some of that additional power might well come from Gull Island. The maritime energy corporation would be the logical institution to purchase that power, to decide how it would be used and to arrange, if necessary, during certain periods of the year or perhaps certain hours of the day the sale of any of that power which might be surplus to the maritime region. I do not mean to suggest that I see the Gull Island facility as the sole answer to the future needs of the maritime region. Clearly, other projects are going to be important. It may be that an additional nuclear facility in New Brunswick should be contemplated very soon. I hope we will receive sufficiently encouraging news with respect to the study being taken on the Fundy tides. The project has been long discussed and the potential of it has been long recognized, but until very fairly recently the economics of it have not been very encouraging. These are some of the points I would make to the hon. member with regard to the maritimes.

The last point I want to deal with is the one the hon. member raised with regard to the offshore resources of Canada and the ownership of them. I can understand why he would want to take a strong, perhaps even aggressive stance on this. To some extent he has been the architect of a situation which is developing in Newfoundland, one about which I have very serious concerns. I think that when Canadians in other parts of the country know the facts they will have concern as well. I refer, of course, to the whole question of exploration and drilling on the north shore of Labrador.

The hon. member for St. John's West was a former minister of energy of the province of Newfoundland. It is he who can accept the credit and, presumably, the responsibility for having designed the new set of regulations which have in confidence been presented to the exploration consortium. That consortium has reacted in a positive way, positive at least in the sense of saying that the regulations presented to them are unacceptable, they are too stringent. They are far more stringent than the new set of principles which has been tabled by the federal government with respect to oil and gas regulations. They have indicated that if the Newfoundland government is prepared to give undertakings that their regulations, in the event that they were to win a court case with respect to offshore resources, will be no more onerous than those which the federal government has already put on the table, they would be prepared to go ahead. I can understand why the hon. member would want to take an aggressive stance on this. He perhaps, more than any other man, is the architect of the confrontation which has developed between the consortium and the province of Newfoundland.

Let us be quite clear about what is involved here. I have said that I might want to use some moral suasion to put before the Newfoundland government a very good argument to alter their position in light of the facts. The hon. member is suggesting that the federal government is in some way trying to steal the resources which rightfully belong to Newfoundland. He does not realize that as a result of his action he is preventing the people of Newfoundland from benefiting from the potential development of those resources. Close to $100 million of exploration activity was slated for the east shore this year. About one half of that was in Labrador. Unless we can find some accommodation between this consortium and the Newfoundland government, between $50 million and $60 million in exploration activity will not take place this coming season.

That clearly rests on the shoulders of the hon. member as much as anybody else.

The major part of the remaining portion will be undertaken by Petro-Canada. The Conservative party have been very ambivalent, and that is putting it charitably, about Petro-Canada. Their leader has said that he would wind down or wind up—it is never quite clear—Petro-Canada. He has never said how he would have dealt with the problem of offshore exploration in the maritimes if it had not been for Petro-Canada. The activity of Petro-Canada is essential to the maritime region at the present time. It may well become increasingly important to the Labrador offshore as well.

It is probably hoping too much that we will hear from opposition spokesmen today what they would propose by way of changes in the strategy which the government of Canada has adopted. I hope they will show interest before the standing committee which deals with this important matter. I hope we will hear from members opposite what they think the pricing policy should be with respect to energy. I hope we will hear from them with respect to Canadian content. We have not heard anything from them with respect to Canadian content.

I hope we will hear from members opposite as to our obligations under the International Energy Agency and the sharing obligations which Canada has accepted under our obligations to that international agency. I hope they will have something to say about the targets for conservation. I hope they will address themselves to some of the major national issues. I know that we can again look forward to some glowing constituency speeches in the future, but I hope they will deal with national issues as well.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, the minister graciously agreed to answer a question, which I would like to put to him now. He has suggested that I am being contemptuous of parliament by asking the House to express an opinion about the Mackenzie Valley pipeline. I would ask him if his reverence for parliament extends to his giving us a commitment that both the report of the National Energy Board and the report of Mr. Justice Berger will be submitted to parliament before the cabinet makes a decision with regard to the proposed pipeline.

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I have made it quite clear on a number of occasions that I very much hope the standing committee will deal with these questions. My predecessor is on record from away back with regard to that. I certainly confirm my own views on it. The committee should organize itself and its time to deal with these important questions. Whether the natural resources committee can or should deal by itself with the Berger report is something that committee and perhaps another committee might want to consider. Indeed, it is possible that the two committees might want to come together at some time. However, that is a decision for them. As to the question of a debate in the House of Commons with respect to this issue, that is something I would be very pleased to take up with the House leader.

[Mr. Gillespie.]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. In all fairness to hon. members who are waiting for their turn to speak, the Chair should recognize the hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Rondeau).

[Translation]

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased on this day allotted the opposition to take part in a debate on a topic of interest to all Canadians, namely the energy problem in Canada.

I shall waste no time in dealing with the scandals that beset the recent sale of Canadian reactors to foreign countries. I would rather take advantage of this debate to point out the growing enslavement of humankind at the hands of international or multinational monopolies exercised over every form of energy.

However, Mr. Speaker, I should like to tell my hon. colleagues that I recently met a businessman from Ontario who was proud of his car, a 1973 Buick burning only one gallon of gas to run 62 miles. That man also had another Buick, a 1976, that runs only 14 miles per gallon of gas. The difference between the two lies in the fact—and this I saw myself—that the 1973 Buick was scientifically and mechanically improved by his son, an engineer, who also made similar adjustments on seven or eight other cars belonging to his friends. Because his son was an engineer, extremely competent and specialized in mechanics, it seems he had discovered the secret of considerable saving of gas. However, Mr. Speaker, that engineer died in an automobile accident; his car smashed into a tree under as yet undetermined circumstances. That learned engineer, Mr. Speaker, whose father is still living, had never accepted any of the offers made to him for his secret.

Mr. Speaker, we have been brainwashed into thinking there is a shortage of energy in Canada so that we could be better exploited through increasing prices; while prices go up regularly, the product is still at the disposal of consumers who are fleeced through ever higher prices. Mr. Speaker, how can the governments seriously want to reduce the consumption of energy when, for instance, on gas alone, both at the federal and provincial levels, they reap in taxes more that 60 per cent of the retail price?

How can the governments be interested in reducing gas consumption for the benefit of consumers when they are the very first beneficiaries of the various taxes on gas?

Just as governments exploit consumers through various taxes on energy, so do the Arab countries in turn bleed the energy consuming countries. The lack of foresight of governments towards energy, particularly since the last 30 years when there was no forecast as to eventual energy needs, makes it that much easier for the Arab countries to exploit the energy situation in the world. The energy shortage is not caused by a limited potential for energy resources, but by a lack of long term planning in the development of energy resources.

Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, natural resources planning, like energy resources, has been left so far in the hands of multinationals with the sole purpose, which is not the public weal, of making profits at the risk of causing the death of people in years to come.

Mr. Speaker we have squandered our resources in raw materials through exploitation and exportation to enhance our balance of payments position without any consideration for our power supply and future needs.

Mr. Speaker, Algeria keeps its power resources in gas and oil for its citizens. Future needs in that area have priority over immediate gains for multinationals. Algerians are not afraid they might be short of power tomorrow morning. They are not concerned about the interests of international traffickers and owners of multinationals operating in that field. It is scandalous, Mr. Speaker, to realize that $125 million a day—I repeat, $125 million "a day"—are taken out of the pockets of western world residents to go into the coffers of Arab countries. This money is generated only through price increases of petroleum products decreed by the Oil Producing and Exportating Countries which they control; $125 million in benefits are gathered every day after the various increases which have occurred in the last five years. This Arab money goes into Swiss banks which in turn invest it for them throughout the world, even in Canada. The Arabs have already started to buy oil products with our own money through Swiss banks.

Mr. Speaker, the same racket is building up in the field of nuclear energy. International financiers who control world monopolies have started to do with nuclear energy what the Arabs do with oil. International finance magnates are against solar energy because they have yet to gain exclusive control over the sun. Therefore they favour nuclear energy which is easily controlled.

Mr. Speaker, the sun existed before multinational companies. It has never disappointed us. The sun was there before finance companies; God created the sun to serve man, to warm him. Tycoons have not yet bought the sun to control it, sell it or treat it as they see fit. Nuclear energy companies—and I could name many of them—are paying scientists to try to have us believe that solar energy is impractical, uneconomic, and so on.

The magazine Science Forum for August 1976, page 17, reports that, according to a release published on March 3, 1976 by the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources, the Canadian federal government spent $84.8 million for nuclear research during fiscal year 1975-76. The government spent $10.5 million for research on oil and gasoline, $8.6 million for energy conservation, $4.9 million for transport and transmission, and $2.8 million for coal energy.

The federal government has spent $1.6 million to assist research on solar and geothermic energy; so they spent 75 times more money on nuclear than on solar research. These figures speak for themselves, Mr. Speaker. The government does not want any research on solar energy; they want to develop nuclear energy because the international financial trusts are for research on nuclear energy whereas scientists are in favour of solar energy.

Mr. Speaker, in the April 28, 1976 issue of La Presse we could read that Mr. Claude Leroy, 29, who has a degree in optics, has discovered a revolutionary process for the use of solar energy at low cost.

> Mr. Leroy has developed a solar collector into which the solar rays penetrate in concentrated form thanks to a captor, and they cannot go out of this collector any more.

In the February 20, 1977 issue of the Ottawa paper Le Droit, another scientist says the following: According to Mr. Jean-Yves Cousteau, the sun could provide 80 per cent of the energy needed in the year 2000.

> He feels that solar energy is the only solution . . . The main source of solar energy is found in the oceans. Two thirds of all the solar energy which reaches the earth fall into the oceans . . . Properly tapped, solar energy could easily represent four fifths of the world energy before the year 2000 . . . Moreover, nuclear energy is the greatest danger . . . for its is a non solution . . . According to the data published by the United Nations, the $850 million which will be spent on nuclear energy up to the year 2000 will meet the needs of only 20 per cent of the world demand.

Mr. Speaker, a very interesting report appeared on January 15, 1977, again in La Presse, in which Jean-Pierre Bonhomme, the author, states:

> Solar heat will liberate the Quebec household.

And again in La Presse, on April 24:

> Solar Energy Electricity will come from the cosmos.

The newspaper adds that engineer Peter E. Glaser of the Arthur D. Little Company of Cambridge, Massachussets, suggests the installation of an orbital power station that would use . . .

> . . . huge surfaces of solar collectors to transform sun light directly into electricity in the same way as solar mirrors are used to feed energy to most of present day spatial devices.

Mr. Speaker, in Le Devoir of April 22, 1976, Ottawa architect Michael Glover contends . . .

> . . . that direct loans at low interest rates or tax reductions should be allowed to citizens who install home heating systems fed by solar energy.

Also, in the Canadian Consumer magazine of June 1, 1976, page 33, Mr. Ron Argue had this to say:

> Solar energy heating is the solution to traditional heating systems.

Again in Le Devoir of December 31, 1976, in an article signed by Mr. Gilles Provost:

> Solar heating can compete with electricity.
> For the first time, an American study states that solar energy heating can compete with electric heating.

Mr. Speaker, Ralph Nader who is well known in the United States stated the following:

> If the sun belonged to Exxon, we would already be using solar energy.

Some inexhaustible, renewable, clean and free sources of energy have always been available to mankind, but science does not enable us to use them effectively. There are many scientists, handymen and even engineers who have devised techniques enabling us to take advantage of our natural wealth without destroying it, to use the revenue without depleting the capital.

Mr. Speaker, if the economic structures are inconsistent with the use of soft techniques, the conservation of resources and the biological requirements of survival, we must then alter the economy, because we cannot change the laws of physics nor those of life.

On page 52 of the same magazine I mentioned a moment ago, Mr. Speaker, we can read this, and I quote:

The choice is therefore not only political, but also social and moral. It involves much more than capital. In fact, the whole western civilization is involved in that choice.

Here is what Professor Lebreton of the University of Lyons has to say on that subject:

One has to understand what the Carnot cycle is to realize that, far from being the miraculous source of energy which we were promised, the nuclear power station opens the era of the biggest thermo-dynamic waste ever invented by man.

As for burial sites of solid and liquid wastes of high and medium radioactivity, our children will not be able either to reconvert them to potato fields. Our generation is leading its children toward the point of no return.

Mr. Pierre Dansereau said, in "La terre des hommes et le paysage intérieur", and I quote:

Wisdom has more weight than science if we are to change the course leading our species to suicide.

Mr. Mouammar Kadhafi from Lybia, a world renown scientist, said:

Great and rich powers spend fabulous sums of money to make atom bombs, to develop intercontinental missiles, to implement space programs and to develop propaganda and psychological warfare plans, while the people of our planet are facing illness, hunger and skyrocketing prices. Those countries are in effect guided by the devil, and their volume of the sacred law is Malthus and not the Bible.

The great Einstein had this to say:

The scientist is aware that the applications of his research has concentrated in the hands of a small minority, first the economic, then the political power that controls the mass of the people who seem to be ever more amorphous . . . He degrades himself to the point of enormously developing on orders the facilities for total destruction of mankind.

Mr. Speaker, there is not the shadow of a doubt about the form of energy Canada should have chosen to meet our future needs, those of 2000 A.D.

All scientists who worked in that field are awed at the dangers of nuclear power for the Canadian people and the people of the world. On the other hand, there is no major obstacle barring the development of solar energy in the world.

One thing specially is to be regretted. The Canadian government is selling the false advantages of nuclear energy and its CANDU reactors. World uranium reserves on which CANDU are based are 85 per cent controlled by four world powers: the United States, Canada, South Africa and Australia. All those countries favour nuclear energy through the mining and exporting of products used to generate nuclear energy. Those countries have a colonial approach to the Third World.

These special goods which are bringing an excellent return to the industry are armaments. In a way the energy policy has the same function as the armament policy, namely to ensure a steady flow of capital, to make profits, to maintain and increase domination over others.

It is more and more evident that the big concerns controlled by the state and by the private sector will try to impose on dominated countries nuclear reactors which will bring them more profits, whatever the real needs of these countries may be. The sale by Canada of a $700 million reactor to South Korea illustrates very well. Mr. Speaker, that such a contract will be of no advantage whatsoever either to the Koreans or to the Canadians, but will profit the manufacturer of this enormous hot water kettle. The colonial approach of Canada, already seen in Brazil and the West Indies, is even more patent when Canada sells CANDU reactors to countries of the third world.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to quote a paragraph from a book about nuclear energy by Fred H. Knelman, called Nuclear Energy. Here is what he said, on page 238:

[English]

There are further value issues involved. Nuclear technology is an infraction of the principle that it is wrong to confront nature and life with impacts whose potential is beyond the bounds of acceptability. We should not incur risks or debts that we are totally unprepared to pay or have others pay. Finally, nuclear technology is big and centralized. It is thus an alienating technology. It invites and supports large power-concentrated political centres and a new priesthood of protectors and managers. And in decommissioning nuclear power stations, we are leaving a heritage of pyramids that cannot be entered, empty tombs of radioactive materials. The more we build, the more we shall have to foresake and the more unforgiving the legacy.

Radioactive wastes have the unique capacity to waste the future. Given the time-scales of perfect containment and the susceptibility of our basic hereditary material, the proliferation and profusion of fission wastes threaten the continuity of life. Pollution has no bounds and time eventually recycles atoms. The global atom cannot be contained forever by human ingenuity or synthetic constructions. When one compares the toxicity of plutonium with the projected quantities and traffic, the idea of perpetual containment and security becomes the ultimate technological illusion.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

[English]

Mr. J. Robert Howie (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, I should like to congratulate hon. members who have participated in the debate this afternoon for the excellence of their remarks and the constructive suggestions they have put forward. I should like to congratulate, also, colleagues on my left for the amendment which they put forward to our motion. I regret that I cannot support the amendment as proposed at this time, because we do not have the important benefit of the findings of the Berger commission and of the National Energy Board. To take a position now would be premature, in my opinion, and would preclude consideration of a most importantr set of facts. Indeed, it could be interpreted as an affront to the Berger commission and to the National Energy Board.

Canada is fortunate in the variety and size of such undeveloped energy sources as the Alberta tar sands, the western Canadian coal fields, the Ontario uranium deposits, the hydroelectric capacity of Quebec and Labrador, tidal power in the Bay of Fundy and the immense renewable energy source inherent in our forests. The challenge is to produce and utilize these sources so as to decrease our present dependence on dwindling oil and gas reserves, and to do it in ways that provide the greatest benefits in accordance with economic, social and environmental consideration.

Time is a basic problem. It takes time to build a hydro-electric dam. It takes time to develop a new coal deposit. It takes time to construct a nuclear reactor. It takes time to create tidal power development. And last but not least, it takes time to accumulate the capital for the type of large-scale enterprise which is necessary to ameliorate our heavy dependence on offshore oil—and this time is not measured in years but in decades. Thus, it is a venture for many years to come. We must learn to live with the fact that for the next 10 to 15 years Atlantic Canada will continue to import over 100 million barrels of oil per year to sustain an energy system greatly dependent on this commodity.

Dramatic increases in the cost of electric power in areas of Atlantic Canada have placed the region at a competitive disadvantage in the expansion of its industrial and manufacturing sector and inflicted a great measure of hardship on large segments of the population. While I intend to propose some suggestions to reduce these disadvantages, it must be recognized that this will be a battle not quickly or easily won. In the short term, until a fundamental improvement in the situation can be achieved there is a broad scope for cost-sharing programs and federal grants to promote energy efficiencies in new and existing operations. In the long term—beyond 1990—the prospects look far better as long as programs to exploit other energy sources are begun now. It is in the short term where our most intractable problems lie. Consequently, we must distinguish between short run policy initiatives, which will necessarily be of a palliative nature, and long run policy initiatives with which more fundamental changes in the energy system will be achieved. With this is mind, the objectives we are aiming at can be itemized.

I am going to mention a few of the objectives I would like to see us explore. First, diversify the energy base in Atlantic Canada, thereby reducing that region's overwhelming dependence on offshore oil. Second, pool wherever possible the various energy systems in Atlantic Canada to achieve economic and technical efficiencies of scale, and in conjunction with this strategy strengthen energy interconnections with adjacent provinces and states. Third, to introduce renewable energy forms to the greatest extent feasible, even if these forms have to be initially subsidized. Fourth, to reduce the rate of increase in future energy costs. Fifth, to achieve a much higher level of co-operation among the governments involved. Sixth, to reduce the energy demand so that pressures on supply are eased. Seventh, to set up an effective program of public education to ensure support and understanding of the initiatives being taken.

In my opinion the government has not acted to diversify the energy base in Atlantic Canada and thus reduce the region's overwhelming dependence on offshore oil. While it has introduced an ad hoc program to insulate older homes in Prince Edward Island and Nova Scotia, which should enable the owners of these homes to use less electricity, it has in fact, done nothing to reduce the cost of electric energy or the region's dependence on offshore oil which is increasing in price. A real conservation program would do more than insulate older homes. A government really interested in conservation would have regional and branch offices in the Atlantic provinces and a program that would reduce energy waste in commercial and industrial undertakings. It would work with DREE to promote greater energy efficiency and work with the provinces to develop a comprehensive conservation program. Perhaps its first move would be to extend its present band-aid approach at least to all the Atlantic provinces.

Clearly, the power pool concept achieving economic and technical efficiencies of scale is a major step in the direction of lower power cost. While the maritime provinces have taken a giant step in this direction with the proposed maritime power corporation, the federal government, which dragged its feet for years on the Fundy tidal power study, has adopted a different pose. Instead of offering to take an equity position and financially support such a worthy concept, the government is sitting on its hands. The government seems to lack an over-all strategy in approaching the problems of Atlantic Canada. It has announced financing for studies of some renewable energy forms which are quite commendable. But what about other energy forms, and what about indigenous energy sources in Atlantic Canada? There is no over-all strategy. The government cannot, or will not, come to grips with the total problem and in concert with the Atlantic provinces develop a strategy designed to solve the problems. As I have indicated, there are no easy answers, but there should be a commitment and a dedication on the part of the federal government to finding the answers.

I have some initiatives that I feel the government should immediately undertake in order to deal more effectively with the electric energy problems in Atlantic Canada. First, I believe the government should co-operate with the governments of the Atlantic provinces in giving priority to the economic supply and distribution of electrical energy in the region. The areas of co-operation I contemplate would include the development of a full maritime power pool with strong interconnections with adjacent areas of Canada and the United States in order that all the benefits of power pool operations may be optimized. This, in my view, would be a major step in the direction of integrating other provinces and other power pools into an eventual national power grid. Second, the government of Canada should give financial support to the Atlantic provinces to enhance the construction of electrical and transmission facilities which would be part of an agreed master plan of electrical energy supply. The agreed master plan to which I refer should not be dictated by Ottawa but should be the result of leadership given by Ottawa and co-operative action with the provinces. The provinces have demonstrated their ability to reach accord in matters of this kind. Ottawa has not demonstrated its commitment to the same extent.

Third, Canada should encourage the study and development of unused hydroelectric sites—especially the large, remote sites in northern areas of Canada—which could supply renewable energy into a Canadian electrical energy distribution system. The untapped hydro resources of 20 rivers in Labrador, the most dramatic being the Gull Island and Muskrat Falls sites, are the most attractive untapped hydroelectric sites in America.

Fourth, the government should accelerate studies of the feasibility of tidal power generation and encourage development of those sites which show a beneficial energy supply to Canadian energy requirements. Since 1969, lack of foresight and the complete absence of government policy have seen these studies move forward at a snail's pace. Even considering this continent's energy needs in the 1990s, and projecting the dwindling supplies and increasing prices of fossil fuels, Fundy looms as an attractive opportunity with tremendous socioeconomic benefits for all of eastern Canada.

Fifth, the government should investigate the use of low grade wood fibre as an important energy source in conjunction with an improved forest management program. Incentives should be considered to encourage wood-using industries to become self-sufficient for energy from wood fibre such as bark and debris from harvest. The government of Canada should make funds available to the eastern provinces to fund a study to determine the wood energy capability and uses of the wood resources in these provinces and a pilot project should be initiated to explore the utilization of waste wood in energy production.

Sixth, Canada should encourage research and development in all fields related to energy conservation from renewable and indigenous sources. We should challenge the free enterprise system with tax incentives and grants to move into this field and, without limiting the scope or generality of my suggestion, I would be particularly interested in seeing the private sector of our economy tackle the problem of generating electrical energy and heat from the sun, paying particular attention to storage problems, the efficiency of solar cells and establishing Canadian pre-eminence in a major energy source for the future.

Seventh, we should greatly accelerate programs leading to energy conservation and provide incentives to encourage the correction of sources of energy waste. Eighth, we should encourage the use of deposits of low quality coal and peat in eastern Canada as fuel for the generation of electrical energy. Ninth, we should encourage research and development into the feasibility of using new energy sources such as solar, wind, waves and biomass.

Finally, the government so far has failed to meet the challenge of a long-term solution to the energy problems of Atlantic Canada. The government has instituted a series of ad hoc measures, made grants for the construction of facilities, provided assistance for two provinces by way of an insulation program, and made some research grants. However, it has no master plan and it appears to lack direction, purpose and an understanding of both the potential and the problems in the Atlantic provinces. I have great respect for the minister and his senior officials, and I hope they will pay careful attention to the suggestions and recommendations I have made and that the energy department will demonstrate some energy in acting quickly on them. I can sum up my remarks in three words: Give leadership, please.

Mr. Maurice Dupras (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I would like to begin by saying that I found the minister charitable to the mover of this motion, the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie), when he branded his speech as a good constituency speech. I thought his speech was like those we have listened to in the province of Quebec for the last ten or 15 years made by some politicians. I thought it was a speech which was highly separatist oriented.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Dupras: I deplore the fact that he has not yet found time to shed his provincialism.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Dupras: I realize that he has been here only a few months, but if he had listened long enough before he spoke he would have learned from some of his colleagues that he should shed provincialism and regionalism and discover Canada. The hon. member says that the government does not believe in federalism. Near the end, the hon. member's motion states:

—resources that are fair or just or adequate for the people or the provinces of Canada—

All we have to do is read that part of the hon. member's motion to find proof of his provincialism. I ask, what is wrong with Canadians?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Dupras: Are the provinces of Canada not Canadian? Are we not representing Canadians? I thought these arguments were heard exclusively in my province and I am flabbergasted by the remarks of the hon. member for St. John's West. I am doubly surprised because this man is a former minister of a provincial government. I cannot understand his reason for promoting regionalism like this. I have a few words for him with regard to the government's federalism.

With regard to our energy problems, the previous speaker, the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Howie), does not seem to know about the programs which were introduced by the government lately. Let me refresh his memory. In recent months the arguments presented by Nova Scotia for temporary subsidy assistance on their electrical rates has overshadowed the measures being taken to bring about a longer term solution. Let me quickly list them: a specific offer of $343 million of financing for a transmission system from the Gull Island site on the Churchill River in Labrador; our general offer of 50 per cent financing of all regional electrical grids; our 50 per cent grant and 25 per cent loan support for the electrical cable connecting New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island; and our 50 per cent financing of the 600 megawatt nuclear power unit at Point Lepreau in New Brunswick. The hon. member for York-Sunbury should know that.

Mr. Howie: I know that.

Mr. Dupras: Other measures were Petro-Canada's involvement in exploration on the Nova Scotian and Labrador shelves, and our inventory programs for coal and uranium in the maritime regions. Let me add that since the inception of the compensation program for the price of gasoline or oil, over the last 2½ years that has meant $930 million to the Atlantic provinces.

Mr. Blais: That is nearly $1 billion.

Mr. Dupras: As the Postmaster General (Mr. Blais) indicates, that is nearly $1 billion.

Mr. Gillespie: That is nearly $500 for every man, woman and child.

Mr. Dupras: That works out to an average annual per capita saving in the range of $470 for every citizen of the Atlantic provinces. How about that?

Mr. Epp: How about it?

Mr. Dupras: Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a few remarks on what has just been said by my colleague from Shefford (Mr. Rondeau) who said in his speech that one of his friends or someone he knew could drive a 1973 Buick for almost 50 miles on a gallon of gas.

When I was in England with the Canadian Air Force I also met in a pub one of those scientists who was keeping for himself a famous invention which would have allowed us to drive a car or a motorcycle for hours and hours on a single gallon of gas. I told him: Why don't you go to the War Office in London and offer them this precious invention so that it can be developed? Think of the advantages we would have over the Japanese, the Germans and all those we are fighting! Unfortunately I wonder why I was unable to convince him that he should have shared his knowledge with officials of the War Office in London so that we too could save that oil which is so valuable, and God knows if in their high technological science, the Germans and the Japanese had succeeded in developing an engine which could operate for hours on one gallon of gasoline. I believe we could all benefit from it. We would not wait for the hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Rondeau) to show us this invention, which is long in being introduced.

Mr. Speaker, I come back to the comments of the hon. member for St. John West (Mr. Crosbie) who said this program affected only some provinces. Is he opposed to the assistance which the Canadian government has given to Prince Edward Island and Nova Scotia? That is the question I would ask him. If he is opposed to it, he should tell us so. The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) has indicated on several occasions, Mr. Speaker, the very particular situation in which these two provinces find themselves, and for the benefit of . . .

[English]

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I must point out to the hon. member who is speaking that I made it clear in my remarks that I am not against assistance for New Brunswick and Nova Scotia. I say it should apply to all the provinces.

[Translation]

Mr. Dupras: And in his remarks, Mr. Speaker, he failed to tell us whether he was speaking about Alberta and Saskatchewan. If such a program is applied in all provinces, it eliminates any way all the benefits . . .

[English]

Mr. Paproski: All provinces.

Mr. Epp: We are all Canadians.

Mr. McKenzie: You are splitting hairs; all provinces.

Mr. Dupras: I will get to this if you give me a chance.

Mr. Epp: We will give you a chance.

[Translation]

Mr. Dupras: Under the federalism of the present Canadian government, Mr. Speaker—and I pay tribute today to the people of Alberta—they tried to convince the latter that they should give up a part of the surtax charged to the Americans so that all the Canadian people may benefit from a Canadian price. That is Canadian federalism, and that is what they try to sell in my province. And when I see a member of parliament like the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) make the comments which I have just heard, I am puzzled! As a matter of fact, that is what Canadian federalism is aiming at, to enable all Canadians to take advantage of the resources of some parts of the country, and this is precisely what the people of Alberta have understood and I pay tribute to them for it. They agreed then and still agree today and since I am speaking of these benefits which my fellow citizens of the province of Quebec have taken advantage of, it enabled each and every citizen of the province of Quebec to get not less than $500 since the introduction of the price compensation program. In other words, between January 1, 1974 and June 1, 1976, this brought Quebec—and I hope I am talking loud enough for the whole population of the province to hear me—this brought $2.024 billion, and that is not all.

In 1976, even though deliveries to the United States went down because of a program aiming at keeping energy in Canada, this has been worth about $800 million to the population of Quebec. It is easy enough to add this up and to see what advantages the population has had because of this oil price compensation program. This—and I say so once again for the benefit of my colleague from St. John West—this is the good federalism of the Trudeau government. It consists in making all regions of the country benefit from the wealth of other regions. Today, Alberta and Saskatchewan have the resources from which we can all benefit. Tomorrow, it might be New Brunswick, the riding of my colleague from York-Sunbury (Mr. Howie), or another riding, maybe that of my colleague from Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKenzie). Who knows?

Mr. Speaker, because of the conservation policy and the price policy within the export program and the compensation program, the province of Quebec and the Atlantic provinces have received nearly $4 billion since 1974. I believe that this is evidence enough of the good federalism of the Trudeau government, and that there is no need to continue any further.

I would also like to speak a little of the action taken by the government to reduce the difficulties caused by the energy crisis for Canadians. First, the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources, through its capable minister, established an oil price policy aimed at reaching international prices as soon as possible. And this for several reasons. One, Mr. Speaker, is that Canadians must urgently become aware that oil is exhaustible and that the more quickly people will become aware of the importance of saving and keeping oil, the better and the longer we could count on the oil reserves required to heat our homes and drive our cars.

There is also a second effect which is to allow the oil companies to produce enough revenues to speed up and not only maintain exploration operations. Those who are familiar with oil companies' operations know very well that 1976 was a particularly busy year in this field in order to provide Canadians with oil at a cost they are not used to paying. If we compare the price that we Canadians pay with the price that Japanese or French or English people must pay, we see that in some country the price is almost twice the Canadian price. Once again, all Canadians benefit from this. This is another virtue of the Canadian federalism of the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), in the sense that some regions profit from the wealth of others.

As I said earlier, Mr. Speaker, 1976 was an exceptional year in exploration and it is good to see that corporations have confidence in the steps taken by the Canadian government. Corporations are also aware of their responsibilities to develop supply sources that will allow Canadians and the petrochemical industry and the Canadian industry in general to get oil supplies at a price much lower that the import price.

And exploration was extended, Mr. Speaker, up to the frontier areas of the country.

Some other measures have also been taken to ensure better oil recovery. In some oil producing countries like Saudi Arabia, for instance, only 30 to 40 per cent of the known reserves in some wells are extracted. In Canada, the promotion campaign for heavy oil exportation resulted in an increase in the rate of recovery from the sands from Lloydminster and elsewhere which resulted in a very large increase in the recovery of heavy oil and also, Mr. Speaker, a better market for heavy oil for the benefits of producers as in Canada we do not have any industry capable of using that oil, and under the campaign launched on January 1, 1977, I think that no fewer than 115,000 barrels a day are sold to the Americans.

This research is aimed at increasing the rate of recovery from traditional sources. Without new methods and expertise like the infusion of vapours and so on, this rate of recovery should reach 75 or 80 per cent in some cases. This is our goal. We are in close communication with countries in the same situation—Venezuela, for one—which also experiences recovery problems for their oil resources.

In the replacement program for heating oil and gas, enormous amounts have been spent for research and development and this year $128 million have been spent for research. It represents a sizeable increase over past years to make Canadian experts more knowledgeable about energy production methods and not only from oil.

Seventy per cent of that amount, Mr. Speaker, is spent on nuclear research. I will come back to that later on if I have time.

I will deal with the steps taken by the Canadian government with regard to the creation of a Canadian petroleum company to negotiate and deal with other countries at the national level and also ensure that Canadian reserves are used in a rational way, that is that companies with additional territories will have to develop them, put them into use or give them back to the Crown so Canadian companies can develop them.

Mr. Speaker, you remember how difficult it was for some members of the opposition to accept the creation of Petro-Canada. Many countries already praise the Canadian government for its decision to create a Canadian petroleum company, so the government itself would see to the exploration and development of its natural resources that are non-renewable and that are in fact running low very fast.

Mr. Speaker, those are so many steps taken by the government to increase the viability, and in some cases, access to Canadian energy reserves.

The mover, Mr. Speaker,—

● (1720)

[English]

In his remarks he indicated many times that he could not find answers in the blue book entitled "An Energy Strategy for Canada". I should like to remind the hon. member that this document was written in 1976. On page 3, the second paragraph, he will read the following:

> We are living in a world where past behaviour, while it provides a useful guide to future prospects, does not in itself provide sufficient information on which to base future energy policies. Energy supply projects are now so big and so expensive that one requires a much more precise recognition of the interrelationships between energy policy planning and other social and economic goals than was necessary in the past. There are a number of key questions—

● (1730)

There are a number of good questions that are still unanswered. One is, what will happen to international prices in the future? We all know that if it had not been for this special export tax charged to our neighbours to the south we would not have been able to adopt a Canadian price for Canadian consumers.

[Translation]

There is a host of steps, Mr. Speaker—unfortunately I see that you are about to tell me my time is up and recognize another member. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the party opposite made a mistake in choosing the subject matter of its motion. It might have found another topic that could have meant a little more for the party.

[English]

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, there are a number of subjects I would like to cover in the brief time available to me. I certainly do not agree with the parliamentary secretary that we chose the wrong subject for today. We chose the right subject, with the confusion in Canada today over energy and its problems. I would like to touch on a few of them. Last week there was a news release by the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources entitled "Role of Renewable Energy Strengthened". It states there was a $4.4 million increase for renewable energy and that a part of that was to go to biomass. I raised this subject in the Standing Committee on Natural Resources and Public Works yesterday. Neither the minister nor his officials could tell me the exact amount going to biomass because that will now be handled by the Department of Agriculture. I have been in touch with the Biomass Energy Institute. They do not know of any amount of money they are going to be receiving. Their concern is the conflict that has arisen between the Department of the Environment and the Department of Agriculture.

It does not look as though we are making any headway on biomass research. There is more confusion there. The Biomass Institute at their annual meeting last fall in Winnipeg pointed out there is very little support forthcoming from the federal government, at a time when the United States government has set up a $200 million solar energy program with biomass as one of the four components. Research into biomass and assistance to the Biomass Institute is of prime importance. There is enough biomass material going to waste every year to supply 30 times the amount humans need in the form of energy to run their civilization. That is one example why some direct action should be taken to assist biomass, rather than confusion between a couple of government departments.

I wish to refer to a speech which the parliamentary secretary made to the Energy Conservation Conference at the University of Saskatchewan on February 18. He said:

> In Sweden and Denmark and many other countries, district heating—

I imagine what he means by "district heating" is central heating, with which I am familiar.

> —usually through the co-generation of heat and electricity, is providing up to 30 per cent or more of the space heat, already in urban areas. In West Germany 28 per cent of electricity is produced from by-product steam in industry.

In Winnipeg we used to have two central heating plants. It was a very serious mistake to destroy them. They could probably be used to great advantage today.

> If we were to follow these examples, we would move a long way toward our zero energy growth goal.
> Unfortunately, too little consideration is being given by utilities and local governments to the role of district heating and co-generation.
> Half our energy demand is for low grade heat and we should be using our waste to satisfy this demand wherever it is economically feasible.

He said that municipalities should be looking into this type of energy and district heating. What research is the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources doing into federal government complexes such as military bases? I will give an example. In Norfolk, Virginia, there is a large naval base which is heated by their garbage in a district heating plant. Has the minister, or have any of his officials, investigated to see if all of our military bases across Canada could be burning their garbage to provide heat? I suggest we first look at St. Jean, Quebec, where they are making many other changes. They have a heating plant that could possibly be converted. It would certainly be showing leadership if there were some research into federal government departments and military bases burning their garbage to provide heat.

The parliamentary secretary referred to the great co-operation between the oil industry and the government in producing and improving energy supplies in this country. I have received exactly the opposite information. I have been in discussion with the oil companies. All I can get from them is that excessive government regulation is devastating to the oil industry.

In recent years the degree of regulation of the Canadian petroleum industry has increased dramatically. One reason is that energy supply has come to be recognized as one of the most important determinants of our economic well being. Energy suddenly finds itself in the spotlight as the result of greatly increased prices. Canadians should be concerned that one of their major industries is subject to regulations that are often unstable, unclear and unco-ordinated to the point that the industry's performance is impaired. There is no line of communication between the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources and the oil companies. They go on to say:

> The proposed new regulations are such that, instead of being able to plan from a fixed set of rules, the industry is in the position of having to try to predict how the ministry will use its discretion. This could turn out to be like playing blackjack in Las Vegas with the house announcing the rules as the game proceeds. Planning for major expenditures (individual wells in the Arctic can cost $25 million or more) is made very difficult when the rules are as uncertain as those set out in the proposed regulations.

The parliamentary secretary also pointed out how wonderfully Petro-Can is working. It is detrimental to Canada, causing the oil companies no end of problems. A recent story about Petro-Can states that oil firms resent the continuing loss of talent to Petro-Can. I quote:

> Top petroleum executives are growing increasingly resentful about the continuing loss of middle and upper management to Petro-Canada.

The heads of several companies that lost experienced people to Petro-Can during its first year of operation have taken up the matter with the federal government.

I hope there will be some line of communication there. There is no co-operation or communication. The government is over regulating, telling us there is nothing to worry about and that they have a great line of communication with the oil industry. I happen to know differently. I meet with these people from time to time. I am very concerned about this subject. There is not a day that you pick up a newspaper that does not contain a headline such as "Oil supplies at danger level in seven years". I quote from this article:

World daily oil production rose slightly more than two per cent since 1974, and now there's a warning that if demand continues to escalate at the present rate, supplies could soon be exhausted.

I should like to know how often the minister and his officials are meeting with the drilling companies to help correct this situation. Here is another headline: "Coming oil shortage a Doomsday scenario". The text reads:

We are headed into a potentially devastating shortage of oil. Not a phoney shortage concocted by the oil companies to jack up their prices, nor a paper shortage in which, although we produce too little oil ourselves, we make up the deficit by imports, but a true, stark shortage in which we neither produce enough oil ourselves nor can buy, anywhere, the extra oil we need. If not freezing in the dark, we could be shivering in the twilight.

Yet another headline reads: "Energy shortage is possible: OECD". The article reads in part:

The organization for economic co-operation and development has called for new government policies on conservation and energy development to head off possible shortages in the mid-1980s.

The minister says he has policies. According to this article they are asking for policies. I suggest the minister should communicate with the oil industry and help the industry with its problems, not bring in more regulations. That is the last thing we need in this country today. Here is one final headline: "Taxes choking oil companies says Shell head".

C. W. Daniel, president of Shell Canada Limited, says taxes and royalties are dramatically reducing the cash flow required to enable the oil industry to expand and meet rising energy demands.

We are getting one story from the parliamentary secretary about the government's ability to communicate with the oil industry. On the other hand, this is what we read in the papers. People I know in the industry tell me that government regulations are handicapping them more and more.

An hon. Member: What is your policy?

Mr. McKenzie: I want to say something more about biomass. With the current energy crisis reflecting the increasing scarcity of non-renewable fossil fuels, the prospect of using renewable sources of energy is becoming more attractive. There are now several examples of the use of waste materials for energy. Many pulp and paper plants heat boilers with bark, branches and other wastes from forestry operations. The benefits are twofold. Materials which previously might have been pumped into streams, causing pollution, can be used to save money on energy costs. We have found out today that the government has no policy, no direction and no communication whatsoever with the oil industry—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order. It being 5.45 p.m., it is my duty to inform the House that pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 58 (11) the proceedings on the motion have now expired.

[English]

The question is on the amendment. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the amendment?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): All those in favour will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Call in the members.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

SUGGESTED DELAY IN TRANSFER OF VETERANS' HOSPITALS PENDING COMMITTEE STUDY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, I wish to move a motion under Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. The long waiting period and lack of enough domiciliary and chronic care beds in veterans' hospitals transferred to non-departmental agencies is causing doubt and mounting concern among veterans' associations that agreements to effect those transfers ensure proper care when taking into consideration present and future needs. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro):

That until the matter can be dealt with during consideration of estimates before the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs, that this House orders that no further transfers of veterans' hospitals take place.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 43, the presentation of such a motion for debate in the House can take place only with its unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

PROPOSAL THAT MOTION REQUESTING INQUIRY INTO DEATH OF UGANDAN ARCHBISHOP BE DECIDED WITHOUT DEBATE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to present a motion under Standing Order 43. It seems clear that the House wants to say something with respect to what is going on in Uganda, but it wants to be able to do it without debate. I hope that this motion will solve that problem, and I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath):

That this House orders that a motion presented by the government, today or tomorrow, calling on President Amin to permit an impartial inquiry by the Commonwealth or the United Nations into the circumstances surrounding the deaths of the Archbishop of Uganda and two Ugandan cabinet ministers, shall be decided without debate.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Presentation of such a motion for debate pursuant to Standing Order 43 can be done only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

REQUEST FOR SUBSIDIZATION OF FREE DISTRIBUTION OF MILK IN QUEBEC SCHOOLS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, I request the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion concerning an urgent and important matter.

Since the Quebec Minister of Agriculture has already announced that, beginning next September, milk would be distributed free in schools and since that program will cost about $5 million to the province of Quebec for the financial year 1977-78, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Abitibi (Mr. Laprise):

That the Committee on Agriculture strongly recommend that the Treasury Board make available to the Minister of Agriculture the necessary funds to pay a part of this program whose first aim is to get young people used to consuming dairy products while improving their eating habits.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, the motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent; therefore the motion cannot be put.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

PROPOSAL TO REIMBURSE PERSONS AGED 65 WHO LOST THEIR RIGHTS TO BENEFITS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I seek the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion under Standing Order 43.

Considering that, effective December 31, 1975, people aged 65 have lost their eligibility for unemployment insurance benefits, and that some of them have successfully fought in courts to preserve this vested interest; considering also that the government announced some ten days ago that it would reimburse this category of recipients up to the moment they started receiving payments under the Quebec or Canada Pension Plans; and considering further that these people, misled by civil servants, have consequently incurred losses which could have been prevented, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Hochelaga (Mr. Lavoie):

That the House unanimously urge the minister in charge to reimburse these people the difference between the income under these two pension plans and the amount to which they were otherwise entitled under the unemployment insurance scheme. This, in my opinion, being the only possible way to right the inacceptable wrong done to this category of people.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The House has heard the hon. member's motion. Pursuant Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent; the motion therefore cannot be put.

INDUSTRY

PROPOSED INVESTIGATION OF FEASIBILITY OF LEARSTAR JET PROGRAM—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that the government of Canada has invested over $88 million in Canadair, including the guarantee of loans, the financing of private firms to purchase planes and now Canadair has embarked on the development of the LearStar jet, of which they must sell 400 to 500 just to break even, I would like to move, seconded by the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. McKinnon):

That this House instruct the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce to appoint an independent committee composed of three aerospace experts to determine if the LearStar program is feasible and to investigate the structural problems Canadair is experiencing and if there is a definite market for at least 400 LearStar jets.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for the presentation of such a motion?

SUGGESTION HOUSE DISASSOCIATE ITSELF FROM REMARKS OF PRIME MINISTER AT WASHINGTON PRESS CONFERENCE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to ask the unanimous consent of the House to deal with a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the remarks made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) at a Washington press conference yesterday in which he said the break-up of Canada would "be the worst thing that could happen to the United States", and in view of the fact that such remarks are a tacit invitation for a foreign power or interests to engage in economic or other such intervention in Canada against Quebec, I move, seconded by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt):

That this House disassociates itself from such remarks.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for the presentation of such a motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

RHODESIA—REDUCTION OF SENTENCE OF BISHOP LAMONT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, I rise to present a motion under Standing Order 43. Nearly four months ago my colleague, the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. McKinnon), and I were denied unanimous consent for a motion which would have protested against the severe punishment imposed upon Bishop Lamont by Rhodesian authorities. Whether or not the resulting controversy had any effect on the government of Rhodesia is, of course, uncertain. However, it was with pleasure that I noted today that the government of Rhodesia has reduced Bishop Lamont's sentence and he will have only one more year to serve. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. McKinnon):

That this House notes with some relief the action of the government of Rhodesia in reducing the severe sentence of ten years hard labour imposed upon Bishop Lamont late last year.

Mr. Speaker: The presentation of such a motion for debate in the House can only be made with its unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

REQUEST FOR CLARIFICATION OF PRIME MINISTER'S REFERENCE TO REVISIONS AND ACCOMMODATIONS FOR QUEBEC

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Prime Minister. I begin by welcoming the right hon. gentleman back to the House of Commons and extending to him the congratulations of this side of the House, and I am sure of all our colleagues, on the very effective speech that he delivered to the joint meeting of Congress.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: In that speech the Prime Minister said, and it was a point which drew particular attention from his American audience, and I quote:

Accommodations will be made, revisions will take place.

Subsequently, at a press conference yesterday morning in answer to particular questions as to the specific nature of those accommodations or revisions, the Prime Minister said, and I quote again from the transcript:

My accommodation is to get Canada to accept our language policy and our approach to the French fact and to get it accepted.

I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether that is all he meant by his commitment in his speech to accommodation and revisions?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Paproski: How come you're not applauding, Basford?

Mr. Trudeau: I will see him later.

I appreciate the words of the Leader of the Opposition, and I am sure the House would want me in response to express on behalf of all parliamentarians our sincere thanks for the very warm welcome that the Congress of the United States extended to me and to my fellow parliamentarians who were there on that occasion, and also to express to President Carter and Vice-President Mondale our thanks for the very co-operative and friendly spirit in which discussions took place between that administration and ourselves, including the Secretary of State for External Affairs and myself, and for the very warm way in which those relations were established.

With regard to the question asked by the Leader of the Opposition, obviously my answer at the press conference was not the sum total of ways in which we think accommodations should be made with the province of Quebec and the French fact. But if the Leader of the Opposition refers to the various propositions we have made over the years, he will find the ones we have made between 1968 and 1971 when the conferences on the Constitution were taking place, and more recently the proposal we made in the letter I sent to the premiers of the provinces when we were discussing the patriation of the Constitution. Let me point out also that I suggested various amendments and various formulae, including some which would support the concern expressed by many Quebecers for the guarantee of their language and culture. So, of course, there are many things that can be said but I doubt whether this would be the place to go into detail on all of them.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister, in his response, referred to a variety of potential accommodations that might be made—I think I am quoting him correctly—to the province of Quebec and to the French fact. Is it his view that the only accommodations that are required to be made, the only major revisions that are required to be made in the interest of national unity of the country, relate to Quebec, relate to language and relate to the acceptance of the French fact? We are trying to get some understanding of the perspective with which he views his responsibilities as the leader of the national government.

Mr. Trudeau: The answer is, obviously not. The series of proposals we made, and to which I just referred, between 1968 and 1971 were addressed to all the provinces. They had to do with the sharing or division of powers which would be offered equally to every one of the provinces. As the Leader of the Opposition knows, I have always opposed, and I continue to oppose, any concept of a special status for any one province. But in the case of Quebec's feelings now, my whole argument is that the rest of Canada must accommodate to and accept the French fact, much as Quebecers must accept the Canadian reality and not try to solve the problems by separating.

POSSIBILITY CHANGES IN ECONOMIC POLICY TO PRESERVE NATIONAL UNITY—GUARANTEE OF FRENCH CULTURE

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): In the spirit of accommodations and revisions designed to achieve the goals of which the Prime Minister spoke, can he tell us whether he and his government are seriously and actively contemplating any substantial changes in economic policy which might deal with economic tensions which exist in many parts of the country, including Quebec, whether they are considering a new and hopefully more serious approach to a conference such as the Western Economic Opportunities Conference, which failed so signally in western Canada, and whether they are considering any particular measures which might be seen by Quebecers as being a means to offer a greater guarantee of the cultural viability of that province?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, on the first part of the question, we do not envisage any constitutional changes at this point which would solve the particular economic problems to which the hon. member is referring, but initiatives of interest to all provinces will continue to be taken. There will be, certainly in the budget, economic measures which will be addressed to the benefit of all Canada.

I do not share the opinion of the Leader of the Opposition on the Western Economic Opportunities Conference when he says that we failed. On the contrary, my recollection is that just a few short weeks ago the premier of one of the western provinces said his fear now is about preoccupation with Quebec and that the federal government would deviate from the very important thing it was doing under the spirit of the Western Economic Opportunities Conference. That seemed to me to be a clear admission that the results had been very positive and that the premier in question just wanted to be assured that we would not cease to be interested in the west. The answer to that is, of course, that we will not.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: You haven't been in the west lately.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

PRIME MINISTER'S STATEMENT TO WASHINGTON PRESS CONFERENCE ON PLACE OF CANADA—UNITED STATES RELATIONS IN FOREIGN POLICY

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, my question arises out of the news conference the Prime Minister held following his address to the United States Congress. In that conference the Prime Minister seemed to have adopted a rather equivocal approach to the question of a third option in Canada's foreign policy. Could the Prime Minister give a fuller explanation to the House of the yes and no answer given yesterday in response to a question. I think I have the question correct when I quote it in this way:

> Canada-U.S. relations is the foundation stone of our foreign policy and consequently, whether that heralds the end of a more broadly based third option in foreign policy . . .

Is this an indication of a change in attitude in Canada? Is that what the Prime Minister meant by his answer, or can he explain the yes or no equivocation?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, in the question just read by the hon. member there were two questions. One was whether we consider our relations with the United States still to be the foundation stone of our foreign relations, and my answer to that was yes. The question went on to ask whether that means that we are changing our policy, which is described as the third option, and my answer to that was no.

DISCUSSIONS BETWEEN PRIME MINISTER AND PRESIDENT CARTER OF VIOLATIONS OF HELSINKI AGREEMENT—POSSIBILITY OF JOINT ACTION

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, could the Prime Minister indicate whether the issue of human rights, specifically with respect to Soviet violations of the Helsinki Pact, was raised with President Carter? If this is the case, would the Prime Minister inform the House what action is being contemplated and whether any joint action is being contemplated to condemn the violations of human rights which occur.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker, that question was discussed at some length, and the House well knows President Carter's interest in pursuing this objective of the respect of human rights. President Carter well knew the interests of this government in that same subject. I repeat that we discussed it at some length, and we agreed that there should be continued co-operation between our two governments in preparation for the review of the Helsinki Pact which will be held in Belgrade, probably in the fall of this year. We agreed to make available to the United States information we have which relates particularly to the subject matters contained in the Third Basket, the reunification of families and the free flow of ideas, and President Carter indicated his interest in getting that information from us.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Following on those discussions, has an arrangement been made with the government of the United States with respect to this particular matter for the carrying on of discussions preliminary to that review by the staffs and officials of both governments?

Mr. Trudeau: Yes, Mr. Speaker. The subject was dealt with in the way I just indicated and the Secretary of State for External Affairs will have his officials deal with officials of the State Department. We intend to co-operate with other signatories of the Helsinki pact who would be as interested as we were in insisting that the Third Basket be part of the Helsinki agreement before it was signed.

THE CONSTITUTION

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON CHANGES TO WHICH PRIME MINISTER REFERRED IN ADDRESS TO UNITED STATES CONGRESS—POSSIBILITY OF DEBATE

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I, too, would like to put a question to the right hon. Prime Minister. In so doing I should like to join with the Leader of the Opposition in congratulating the Prime Minister on a very fine speech that did justice to Canada and all the people in it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Brewin: I want to call attention once again to the passages in the speech which were mentioned by the Leader of the Opposition, namely, that accommodations will be made, revisions will take place. I call attention to the fact that these statements were very definite. He also said that there would have to be changes in some of our attitudes and we may have to review some aspects of our constitution so that the Canadian federation can be seen by 6½ million French-speaking Canadians to be the strongest bulwark against submersion by 220 million English-speaking North Americans.

Will the Prime Minister take the opportunity at a suitable time to make a full statement to this House and detail changes, the accommodations and the revisions of the constitution to which he was referring in his address to the Congress of the United States?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member also for his kind words regarding the honour I believe we all shared as parliamentarians, in being invited to address the Congress.

My answer to the hon. member's question would be quite a lengthy one and suggest a statement. I would attempt now to perhaps indicate the sense of any possible statement or action.

At the Victoria conference and in the correspondence to which I have just alluded in answering the Leader of the Opposition, we have already indicated several measures which in our view if introduced and guaranteed in the constitution, would constitute an entrenchment of the French fact in our constitution and give ample protection to some of the concerns that Quebecers express—the fear that they would not be protected permanently within the framework of our constitution. So, a lot is already on record as being part of the government's policy.

Beyond that, I would hesitate to undertake in any future statement to put before the House or before the Canadian public a whole series of amendments to the constitution just so that they be on the table for the provinces to reject or negotiate. I believe there has to be a will on the part of the provinces as well as the federal government to proceed with certain types of revision. We have certain ideas, to many of which I have just alluded to improve the constitution but I do not think it practicable to take initiatives which the provinces would merely find themselves free to reject. The hon. member will recall that in previous conferences the federal government had worked out positions jointly with one or several provinces thinking there was agreement, and then at the last minute the provinces would reject the whole package. We do not think that is a very profitable way to proceed.

By and large I have always said that the British North America Act is a pretty good one, that the basic framework of the constitution is still a pretty good one in my view. I have repeated the government's intention to be flexible. If the provinces see ways in which it can be improved, we see some ways, too. But we are not anxious to say that the constitution is not a good, basic framework. If the provinces want to make the case, we are prepared to discuss it with them and hear them out.

Mr. Brewin: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In light of his statement to the Congress about the sovereignty of parliament and the determination of Canadians to govern themselves with a parliamentary system, I ask if the Prime Minister does not think it would be useful to discuss in greater detail the up-to-date account of what changes are required, elicit the partnership of parliament and its members in dealing with the threats to Canadian unity and thus expand on the message he gave the United States Congress?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, of course, I would welcome debate on the subject, if the House would see fit to set aside time for that. I know the hon. member realizes, as we all do, that the matters to be dealt with are not purely or strictly constitutional. That is only one part of the whole series of accommodations which we must make within Canada in order to bind together even more tightly the Canadian people. The Leader of the Opposition was quoting some economic measures. There are social matters and other areas like immigration and communications which, without going into the constitution, might be the subject of administrative arrangement which would increase the bonds of national unity. So, I think it is rather difficult to reply to the hon. member only in terms of the constitution.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

UTILIZATION OF NUCLEAR ENERGY FOR PEACE AND MILITARY PURPOSES—AGREEMENT WITH UNITED STATES ON SAFEGUARDS

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I also have a question for the right hon. Prime Minister.

During the talks he had with the President of the United States, he probably made a complete political survey and discussed many matters with him. Could the Prime Minister tell the House whether, during his discussions with the President of the United States, they considered the issue of uranium and nuclear equipment sales for pacific purposes by both countries and whether they came to an agreement on the need for more severe safeguards in the nuclear arms trade?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this is indeed a very interesting question and, on this matter, I can tell the hon. member that we discussed this point and that the President of the United States seemed very interested by the decision of Canada to require more severe safeguards than those required by most countries. Of course I cannot talk in the president's name or commit him, but he was quite prepared to have more discussions on these safeguards and he said he wanted to co-operate with us as much as possible. I might add that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources is going to Washington, next week, I think, and will probably have the opportunity to pursue these matters further.

Mr. Laprise: Mr. Speaker, on a supplementary.

Can the right hon. Prime Minister tell the House whether disarmament was also discussed during that meeting?

Mr. Trudeau: Yes, Mr. Speaker. President Carter is highly interested in that matter. We discussed disarmament, as well in the context of the so-called strategic arms discussions, the SALT negotiations, as in the field of more conventional weapons. We dealt at length with both subjects.

ENERGY

OIL AND GAS—POSSIBLE COMMITMENTS ON DELIVERY OR SALE GIVEN UNITED STATES BY PRIME MINISTER—TIME-FRAME OF DECISION

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Prime Minister. According to press reports of yesterday it appears that the Prime Minister discussed with President Carter energy matters, particularly alternatives concerning pipeline proposals for gas deliveries to the United States from sources in Canada, or from Alaska. Can the Prime Minister say what was the nature of these discussions, what specific topics were discussed, whether he gave the president any assurances, promises or commitments covering the delivery or sale of oil or gas supplies to the United States from Canada, or from Alaska across Canada by way of pipeline or otherwise, or via the Mackenzie Valley Pipe Line or any other route to the U.S.?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the subject was of great interest to the United States government. They raised it and we, too, raised the subject. We did not examine in detail any of the possible routes, including the ones the hon. member just mentioned, but we did examine the time frame within which decisions would have to be taken, if they were to be taken usefully. We made each other aware of the structures of that time frame. Beyond that, the hon. member asks if any assurances were given. Mr. Speaker, I felt justified in speaking for the Canadian government and the Canadian people in indicating to the American President that we would co-operate in every way we can with the Americans, particularly in the area of gas, that we would, in so far as it is possible and feasible, not stand in the way of their bringing their gas to their people in the way which would be satisfactory to them, provided certain subjects of great importance to Canadians could be dealt with satisfactorily. I mentioned in particular the subjects of Indian claims, protection of the environment, the economic consequences of a vast injection of capital, and other such matters.

Mr. Crosbie: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Can the Prime Minister tell the House if he gave the President any assurances in connection with the time frame of the decision which Canada must make, or did he make any promises or commitments in this field? I understand he discussed the subject and discussed sympathetically American problems. Were there any promises, commitments, assurances or decisions with respect to certain time frames? Were there any commitments at all in this area?

Mr. Trudeau: Yes, Mr. Speaker. So far as we know, we will have the Berger report some time in the spring, and the national energy report is expected in June. We realize that the President will be under some pressure to make a decision, perhaps as early as September. We indicated that we would do our utmost to have the Canadian government express its views within that narrow time frame of June to September.

[Mr. Trudeau.]

Mr. Crosbie: A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the Prime Minister confirm that the only assurance or commitment made in connection with these important matters was that the Canadian government would attempt to make a decision by December? Is that the only commitment which was made?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, except in so far as the first part of my answer could be interpreted as a commitment, it certainly was an expression of goodwill.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

POSSIBILITY OF AGREEMENT WITH QUEBEC ON DEVELOPMENT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Albert Béchard (Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion.

Can the minister tell the House and the people of the Lower St. Lawrence, Gaspé and Îles-de-la-Madeleine whether the dialogue interrupted on November 15, 1976 has been resumed between him and his Quebec counterpart, and whether the possibility of the birth, in the near future, of an economic development agreement for that area, looks promising?

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, indeed I can advise the House and the hon. member that last Friday I met the Hon. Jacques Léonard, Minister of Development for Quebec. In the course of our two-hour conversation, we had a chance to review the objectives of the department and its activities in Quebec; I can confirm to the hon. member that negotiations have indeed been resumed between the two levels of government. It can be hoped that, in coming weeks or at the most coming months, we will be able to sign agreements through which we should be able to pursue the implementation of our programs in the province of Quebec.

INDUSTRY

DISCUSSION BETWEEN PRIME MINISTER AND PRESIDENT CARTER ON MEASURES TO INCREASE PRODUCTIVITY

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. Since industrial productivity in this country is now 20 per cent lower than productivity in the United States, since the gap between the two countries is widening steadily, and since the the steadily increasing productivity of the United States is one reason that country is experiencing a satisfactory increase in industrial activity at this time, whereas this country is not, I ask the Prime Minister if he, during his Washington visit, discussed this matter with the President, to see if he could learn of any useful initiatives the Canadian government might introduce to at least bring the productivity of this country up to the level of productivity in the United States?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I would want to check, to make sure that the hon. member's figures are up to date, because I know that the United States authorities are showing some concern about the rate of increase of their own productivity. Subject to that word of caution, Mr. Speaker, we did discuss the economic situation and offered each other helpful advice on ways in which both of us could come to grips with our woes.

● (1440)

Mr. Hees: First, I should like to assure the Prime Minister that my figures are, as usual, correct.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hees: Second, in reply to his non-answer in which as usual, he talked all around the question, would he, at the earliest opportunity, screw up his courage and tell the House just what he proposes to do to make good his promise to increase industrial productivity as he has been telling me he would do for two years, while doing nothing at all about it?

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CONFERENCE ON INTERNATIONAL ECONOMIC CO-OPERATION—REQUEST FOR PROGRESS REPORT

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Prime Minister with reference to his speech to the United States Congress. In his speech the Prime Minister cited commodity price stabilization, nuclear safeguards and special drawing rights as core issues in the building of peace. May I ask the Prime Minister what steps Canada is taking to advance the north-south conference on international economic co-operation dealing with these precise issues? Can he say what response Canada has made to the widely publicized call by Robert McNamara, President of the World Bank, for more willingness by the industrialized nations to come to grips with these real issues?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the House leader is co-chairman of the Conference of International Economic Co-operation and he has been meeting as recently as during the last fortnight with his co-chairman, Mr. Perez Guerrera of Venezuela. There are some difficulties in the conference but at this time we are hopeful that under the skillful direction of these two gentlemen the conference will make progress. We discussed it in Washington and there is great anxiety on the part of our government, certainly, to show progress in this area. I am sure that at the appropriate time the House leader will want to report on this particular matter.

Insofar as Mr. McNamara's appeal is concerned, we are very sympathetic to it and, of course, we have great respect for the goal he is proposing. However, we have some reservations as to whether we should set up this Brandt Commission, I believe it would be called, before the CIEC conference itself meets. Our reservations are to the effect that it would probably be better to have CIEC pursue its work before the Brandt Commission was set up, which might appear to many at the CIEC conferences as a diversionary tactic. It would not be our view, but there is a tactical matter here to be considered.

EFFORTS TO PUBLICIZE GOVERNMENT'S FIVE-YEAR STRATEGY FOR INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT CO-OPERATION

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton-Strathcona): I thank the Prime Minister for his informative answer. Again with reference to his speech to the U.S. Congress in which he said, and I quote: "We have failed to mobilize adequately full support of our electorate for the construction of a new world order", may I ask him what steps he is taking to ensure that the government's five-year strategy for international development co-operation, a document published 18 months ago, one which is practically unknown to Canadians, is made better known among the Canadian electorate?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I believe the hon. member is touching on an important point of communication here. We do our best to make sure that the Canadian people are aware of the policy directions the government is pursuing and we do try get the information out to the people without being suspected of trying to propagandize Liberal government goals. Within that structure we will continue to try to impress upon the Canadian people the necessity of making progress in this area. The House leader on this side is a very active and respected participant in this conference.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: I am somewhat gunshy, personally, Mr. Speaker, when it comes to selling to the Canadian people the need for a new order.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

NATIONAL DEFENCE

STRENGTH OF NATO UNITS—INDICATION OF PRIORITIES IN EARLY PRESENTATION OF OPERATION CANADA AND DELAY IN STRENGTHENING FORCES

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): My question is to the Prime Minister. Welcoming the Prime Minister to Washington, the President of the United States rather surprisingly referred to him as a senior statesman of NATO.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McKinnon: Would the Prime Minister inform the House when he plans to bring our NATO units up to full strength?

Mr. Paproski: Nato. N-A-T-O.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I think the hon. gentleman opposite will now join me in the ranks of senior statemen. He knows how to spell, too!

An hon. Member: What do you mean, "too"?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. McKinnon: My supplementary is for the Minister of National Defence, who may have more knowledge about NATO. The minister has apparently submitted his plan for Barney's Brownies or Operation Canada to the cabinet. The plan calls for a budget of $48 million by the end of next year. This amount is approximately the amount needed to increase the size of the Armed Forces by 4,000 which he so eagerly promised to the Conference of Defence Associations in January but now seems reluctant to present to cabinet. Can the minister inform the House if his early presentation of Operation Canada and his foot-dragging on the increase to the forces represents his order of priorities at this time?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I suggest the hon. member get his facts straight before asking questions.

ENERGY

MACKENZIE VALLEY PIPELINE—POSSIBILITY OF PROCEEDING WITH CONSTRUCTION BEFORE ENERGY BOARD OR MR. JUSTICE BERGER REPORT—POSSIBILITY OF DEBATE

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the right hon. Prime Minister regarding a press report in yesterday's paper from Washington. It reads:

> Canadian officials indicated here Tuesday that Prime Minister Trudeau is ready to do all he can to speed a decision on the construction of a multi-million dollar Mackenzie Valley pipeline to carry Alaskan gas to Americans... the official said Trudeau explained to Carter that he would "like to be in a position not to embarrass him" over the pipeline.

In view of the fact that during this morning's CBC news, Mr. Lougheed, the Vice-President of Imperial Oil has taken these remarks to be what he calls "a favourable sign", I want to ask the Prime Minister if this assurance that the President is not going to be embarrassed represents a tacit understanding that Canada will proceed with the Mackenzie Valley pipeline despite the fact that neither the National Energy Board nor Mr. Justice Berger's report has yet been received?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I can say that anyone who would play the stockmarket on the basis of that remark would probably be very seriously financially embarrassed. What went on between President Carter and myself in the presence of the Secretary of State for External Affairs was exactly as I have stated earlier in reply to a question from a member of the Conservative Party. There were no guarantees of any particular pipeline. Indeed, there were no guarantees of any pipeline at all. There was an undertaking to study this whole question with a view to co-operating as much as we can with the United States, within the obligations we have to meet Canadian objectives, too. I spelt them out in some detail. Insofar as the words "embarrassing the President" are concerned, they were never used, Mr. Speaker, and no intention was there to use them. I do not believe I would be concerned about embarrassing him. He is a very eminent president and he can conduct his own affairs without my messing.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): In view of the statement by what is alleged to be a Canadian official, that the Prime Minister assured the United States President that he would do everything he could to speed a decision, I want to ask the Prime Minister whether "speeding a decision" involves bypassing parliament. Will he give parliament an assurance, now, that before the go-ahead sign is given for the construction of a Mackenzie Valley pipeline the matter will be brought before the House of Commons so that members of this House will have an opportunity to vote whether they are in favour of proceeding with that pipeline or rejecting it?

Mr. Trudeau: I believe this whole subject was discussed during the opposition day yesterday. The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources gave the government position on this. To the extent, I repeat, to which I gave assurances, they were on the time frame. He explained in detail that there is no undertaking to bypass either the energy board or Judge Berger's report. We are waiting for these. I do not know what decision will be taken, but if it is one which necessitates the government's coming before parliament, of course we will come before parliament.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the statement by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources yesterday that he will consider having this matter discussed in a standing committee of the House, which the Prime Minister knows perfectly well does not mean it will come before the House itself, I think the House is entitled to some assurance that before such an important decision is made the House of Commons as a whole should be given an opportunity to express its views on this matter. I am asking the Prime Minister whether he will give that commitment so that the Canadian people will know that they will not wake up some morning and find that the government has committed itself to an expenditure which could have very little economic benefit to the people of Canada.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, these are the very subjects about which we will know more when we have the report of the National Energy Board. I, personally, woulld be very interested in knowing the position of various members of parliament, and indeed of the people of Canada, on this subject. It is a very important one, but as some of the member's party are saying, we voted on this subject yesterday. I think the NDP seems to have made up its mind before it has seen the report. We have not.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

POSSIBILITY OF INTERIM FISHERIES AGREEMENT WITH UNITED STATES ON 200-MILE ZONE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Miss Coline Campbell (South Western Nova): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. There have been reports that an interim fisheries agreement between Canada and the United States would be reached prior to March 1 when the United States declares its 200 mile jurisdiction. Can the minister indicate whether such an agreement has been reached and, if not, when we can expect such an agreement?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, to the best of my knowledge, some time within the last hour or so there was a joint communiqué issued from the United States capital and from here indicating that in fact an interim agreement had been reached by the negotiators as of about noon today. This was a follow on to the Prime Minister's meeting yesterday and I am delighted to be able to report this. The text, I understand, will not be released until tomorrow.

INCARCERATION OF ALEKSANDR FELDMAN IN SOVIET UNION—CANADIAN REPRESENTATIONS FOR RELEASE

Mr. Sean O'Sullivan (Hamilton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, my question is also directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs whom I commend for his courage in taking up with Soviet authorities the persecution of Jews within that system who wish to emigrate to Israel. Since the outrage of persecution is continuing, I should like to ask the minister whether he has made any representation to the Soviet authorities on behalf of Aleksandr Feldman, a prisoner of conscience, who is being held in a labour camp on bogus charges simply because of a courageous observance of his faith. This man is reported to be in ill-health, and if the minister has not made any representation on his behalf, would he take a personal interest in his case?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I would be more than pleased to take a personal interest, as the hon. member has asked. I am not in a position from memory to answer the first part of his question. I have explained in the House on previous occasions that we submit lists to the Soviet representatives from time to time. The most recent submission was last week and there were on the list some 136 or 137 cases, so I would have to check the list to see whether that particular name was included.

EMIGRATION OF JEWS FROM SOVIET UNION—DISCUSSION BETWEEN PRIME MINISTER AND PRESIDENT CARTER

Mr. Sean O'Sullivan (Hamilton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, may I direct my supplementary question to the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that President Carter, since taking office, has shown very real leadership on the question of prisoners of conscience within the Soviet Union, did the Prime Minister include this question in his discussions with the United States President, in terms of those of us who enjoy freedom and democracy occupying a common front against the Soviet authorities in regard to Jews who wish to emigrate to Israel?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker, we discussed this matter at great length. We discussed the best possible approach to get results in this particular area, and we agreed, as I indicated earlier, in preparation for the Belgrade review of the Helsinki Conference, to exchange information and to try together to ascertain what we believe to be the most efficient ways of getting results in regard to protection of human rights.

FINANCE

POSSIBILITY OF SHARP FALL IN VALUE OF CANADIAN DOLLAR—GOVERNMENT CONTINGENCY PLANS

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. In view of the widespread speculation that the Canadian dollar will fall to 90 cents or so, has the minister any plan to deal with any precipitous fall in the dollar and is he making any contingency plans?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the government's policy since 1971 has been to let the dollar float on foreign exchanges and there will be no departure from that policy.

Mr. Ritchie: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Does the minister consider that there is no need to worry about any precipitous fall in the dollar in the near future?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, as part of that policy the Bank of Canada does intervene for the purpose of smoothing out the market over any short period of time. As indicated, I would not propose to intervene in any other way but to accept market judgment as to the value of the dollar.

PROPOSED YOUTH CORPS—REQUEST FOR DETAILS

Mr. Paul Dick (Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Could the minister inform us whether or not his department or his office has prepared a detailed proposal relating to the youth corps, including proposals as to the amount of pay, where they would be housed, and the outbound type of program that they are envisaging?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, my department has done nothing specifically on this. As for the general question, I should be able to say something within the next couple of weeks.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

PROPOSED REIMBURSEMENT OF PERSONS AGED 65 WHO LOST THEIR RIGHT TO BENEFITS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

Since the hon. member for Lapointe made representations last week regarding old age people who have lost their entitlement to unemployment benefits because of an erroneous decision by this government, may I ask the minister today whether he has carefully analyzed this inequity vis-à-vis this group of people, and whether he is prepared to recommend to cabinet that some action be taken to pay those people the difference between the Quebec or Canada Pension Plan benefits and what they would have got through unemployment benefits? Thus, so as to correct this inequity, is the minister prepared to recommend such a proposition to cabinet?

[English]

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Well, Mr. Speaker, first and foremost I think we should remember that some 600 individuals did in fact refuse to take their Quebec pension or Canada pension, did see fit to appeal and in fact won their appeal. So they will be drawing the unemployment insurance as directed by Mr. Justice Addy under the terms and conditions established at that time. However, in the interest of equity, and because there were thousands of others who did not apply, I thought that rather than topping up the Canada or Quebec pension plan pension, which would be unfair to those who did appeal, what we would do is to pay the difference from the time they stopped getting their UI until they began getting their Quebec or Canada pension. The difference I refer to is that amount of money which will be paid from the time they stopped receiving UI until the time they received their Canada pension or Quebec pension.

GARRISON DIVERSION—POSITION OF UNITED STATES ON ABIDING BY INTERNATIONAL JOINT COMMISSION DECISION

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, I direct my question to the Prime Minister. Did the Prime Minister discuss the Garrison project with President Carter; and further did the Prime Minister receive an unconditional assurance from President Carter that the United States would abide by IJC decisions regarding the Garrison project, just as the Prime Minister committed Canada during his press conference in Washington to abiding by IJC decisions?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): We did discuss the subject, Mr. Speaker, but in reality the essence of the discussion consisted of my thanking President Carter for having taken at our request, and after many representations on the part of this government, action to suspend work on the Lonetree reservoir. We did not go beyond that. The law does not bind us in any way to follow the IJC's recommendations, but I hope that the Canadian inclination to observe them will be also shared by the United States. This is a tribunal that has the high respect of both governments. They cannot be bound by law, but they certainly will be morally inclined to listen to the recommendations of the IJC. I think the Canadian case is a very good one. We have had representations on the matter from both sides of the House and from people in Manitoba. Certainly, our entire Manitoba caucus has been very forceful in making representations on this subject. At this point the essential thing to underscore is that President Carter acted in a way very favourable to Canada and we are very grateful for it.

APPARENT CHANGE OF VIEW OF UNITED STATES BY PRIME MINISTER

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I am impressed with the visit of the Prime Minister in that the United States and Canada are now kissing cousins. I can recall another famous trip of his when he apparently alleged that we have something to fear from the United States regarding economics, culture and its military strength. Has the Prime Minister's visit to the United States now convinced him that he was wrong when he suggested we had to fear the United States culturally, economically and militarily, a statement allegedly made during his visit to the U.S.S.R.?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am somewhat embarrassed to hear the hon. member express his fear about anything. I should have thought he would have been more courageous than that. On our side, the reality of American domination in every area is a very real one.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Militarily?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, I want to pursue the matter with the Prime Minister. The right hon. member for Prince Albert wants further information. I hope the Prime Minister will continue that particular reference to the military strength of the United States.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the government House leader can indicate his intentions for government business over the next few days, and can he designate Friday, March 4, as an opposition day?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, as has been previously arranged, we will be calling first today the bill of the Minister of Finance on fiscal relations, to be followed by the human rights legislation. Tomorrow we will resume the debate on the unemployment amendments in the name of the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. We will continue with that on Monday if it is not completed tomorrow. As I have indicated, I have in mind calling the amendments to the National Transportation Act following the bill in the name of the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. I extend my usual co-operation to the hon. member and graciously designate next Friday, March 4, as an allotted day.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his courtesy. Do I gather that he has made up his mind to call the National Transportation Act on Tuesday, or is it possible we will be dealing with unemployment insurance matters if they are not finished on Monday? I just want to probe his thoughts on that.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, if at the end of the day on Monday we have not completed the second reading stage of that bill, after having spent four days on it, I will reconsider the situation and decide then whether to continue with the bill or call the National Transportation Act.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I put a question to the government House leader with respect to the House business? I realize that to ask about something that may be 51 weeks away may seem strange, but this government moves rather slowly. In view of the fact there was a good deal of disappointment that the House did not get the Heritage Day bill through in time for 1977, will the minister make sure that that legislation is dealt with in this session so that Heritage Day can be observed in February of 1978?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I have indicated my readiness to call the Heritage Day bill, and will call it only if I get an undertaking from other parties that we can conclude the debate in a day or so. Any time that undertaking comes forward, I will move the bill.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Bring it on.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, we give that undertaking, and the official opposition is now saying, "Bring on the bill". I therefore suggest that the onus is on the government.

Mr. Marshall: Mr. Speaker, in view of the extended absence of the Minister of Veterans Affairs—and do not quarrel with the reason—the holdup in vital amendments to veterans legislation has reached the point where they should be considered on an emergency basis. Can the minister give an update on the amendments to the Pension Act to increase pensions of veterans widows who are receiving less than 48 per cent? This is a very important bill and it should be brought forward.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I understand the importance of the matter raised by the hon. member. Unfortunately, I cannot give him an update today. However, I will make inquiries and provide him with the best information I can find.

TELEVISION INDUSTRY TARIFF REMISSIONS

Question No. 1,688—Mr. Brewin:

1. Does the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce remit duties on coloured televisions and, if so, for what purpose?

2. Has the Department taken any steps to (a) ensure increased television manufacturing in Canada (b) prevent lay-offs of employees in small plants that manufacture components for televisions and, if so, in each case, what steps?

3. Has the government taken any steps (a) to enable Renfrew Electrical Company Ltd., Toronto, Ontario to re-hire laid-off employees (b) by way of adjustment assistance to assist the employees involved in the lay-off and, if so, in each case, what steps?

Mr. Hugh Poulin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): 1. The Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce does not administer tariffs and thus has no power to remit duties. However, under the Financial Administration Act, the Governor in Council has the power to authorize Revenue Canada, Customs and Excise, to remit duties paid or payable in respect of goods imported into Canada. The Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce has set into motion a programme, which under certain conditions, will permit the remission of duties on imported television receivers paid or payable by manufacturers of television sets in Canada. The purpose of this programme is to prevent an imminent failure of this industry sector which has neither the technology base nor scale to remain competitive in the Canadian market even with the current tariff of 15 per cent. Under the programme, television manufacturers who maintain at least a previous level of production with at least 50 per cent Canadian value added in their production will be allowed duty remission on sets which they import. The amount of duty remitted will be determined by the ratio of the value of their production to sales. This programme will allow Canadian manufacturers to specialize in those types of production that lead to improved efficiency. At the same time, the market share they obtain is not expected to change although they would no longer make a full range of T.V. products in Canada.

2. (a) The department held negotiations with all Canadian television set manufacturers and with many of their parent companies with a view to increasing television production in Canada. No means was found to increase production in Canada that resulted in no higher costs to Canadian consumers, tax-payers or companies. (b) The new programme will include a Canadian value added requirement favouring the sourcing of components from Canadian component suppliers. Department officials have met with component manufacturers and are continuing to seek ways and means, in addition to the programme, to overcome the problems of a small domestic market.

3. The department has taken no special measures in regard to layoffs at Renfrew Electric nor has the company or its employees approached the Department directly, asking for special measures. Officials of the department have expressed willingness to discuss Renfrew's situation with the company management with a view to assisting the firm to improve its position in the market place.

TREASURY BOARD—EMPLOYMENT OF OUTSIDE CONSULTANTS

Question No. 950—Mr. Howie:

Were outside consultants employed by the Treasury Board between January 1, 1975 and November 1, 1976 and, if so (a) how many (b) who were the firms or persons (c) what amount was paid to each (d) for what purpose (e) in each case, is the report available to the public and, if not, will it be published?

Return tabled.

MEASURE FOR MAKING CERTAIN FISCAL PAYMENTS AND OF ESTABLISHED PROGRAMS FINANCING CONTRIBUTIONS TO PROVINCES, ETC.

The House resumed, from Tuesday, February 22, consideration of the motion of Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale) that Bill C-37, to provide for the making of certain fiscal payments and of established programs financing contributions to provinces, to provide for payments in respect of certain provincial taxes and fees, and to make consequential and related amendments, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, as so many members have shown in this debate, the question posed by Bill C-37 is not only fiscal payments to the provinces for the next five years, already decided at the first ministers meeting' last December, but whether this bill is a sufficient response to the crisis of federalism. I said in the first part of my speech Tuesday night that Bill C-37 does not answer the real question in the relationship between Ottawa and the provinces. That is why so many members, in speaking during this debate, have responded to that deep yearning across the land for some leadership in parliament about the ways Canada can be held together. The Canadian people, fearful of the consequences of separation, need encouragement that members of parliament are at least sensitive to the dilemma. It is not the esoteric algebraic formulae in this bill that we should be debating. Rather, it is the future of confederation.

It is not good enough for the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) to go to Washington and assure the Americans that Canada will remain united. He has a duty to come into the House of Commons and tell Canadians precisely what he is going to do to keep Canada together. I think the questions that were raised in the House today on the Prime Minister's speech in Washington reflect the very deep concern of the members of the House that some serious statements be made right here in this forum about the government's plans for the accommodations that will be necessary to hold all the regions intact and to ensure the integrity of Canada. It is all very well to dazzle Washington, but it will take more than a high-flown speech to the U.S. Congress to settle the problems of regional alienation in this country.

There is no doubt that the Prime Minister opened the election campaign with his speech in Washington. That election is coming soon. The east block wizards are preparing their electronic electioneering to fool the Canadian people again; to make the people forget what miserable leadership they have had for the past nine years; to make them forget that this recycled architect of unity is the very man who has split the country apart; to make them forget that the deep problems of regional alienation are caused by this government's rigid centralism. But the Canadian people are not going to forget or forgive the damage done to our unity by this government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Roche: There is no question that we as Canadians can hold this country together. We do not need a Washington declaration to make that point. What the Americans did not hear, however, is that this government, by debasing and demeaning our national institutions and taking power away from them, is itself a principal cause of the fracture of our national spirit and national identity. Mr. Speaker, the government has tried to fool the people once too often. There is too much doubt, dismay and discord in Canada today to be glossed over by yet another electronic mind-wash. It is the duty of the opposition in this debate on fiscal payments to get beneath the surface. It is the opposition members who have focused on the real concerns of Canadians in federal-provincial relations. It is the members on this side who have spoken out most sensitively and sensibly to the questions Canadians are asking about their future. It was the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) who spoke about the integrity of the country. He said:

[Mr. Roche.]

We need to establish again a unifying sense of purpose, a sense which applies to building, a sense that there is more to Canada than simply conflicts over constitutions or tax points. This requires us, as members of parliament, to look upon other governments and members of other legislatures in the land not as adversaries but as partners.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Roche: That is the speech of a man who will be, and deserves to be, the next prime minister.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Roche: The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald) struck the central note in this debate. She said:

It would be strange, indeed, if the parliament of Canada which so uniquely reflects the reality of federalism were to allow itself to be excluded from participating in the revitalization of that federalism. In the case of the bill before us today, parliament was relegated to the sidelines while these fiscal arrangements were being negotiated. Every time this happens, parliament is diminished—and at this critical time in Canada's history we need strengthened, not diminished, national institutions.

Advocating greater decentralization of the legislative and administrative systems through a national planning council that would develop a new national policy, the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner) said:

A truly national policy born of a consensus among all governments would, I believe, have a better chance of being accepted by the whole population because it would be more able to meet the objectives and priorities of each part of Canada.

That is a positive input into this debate that tells Canadians the direction in which the Progressive Conservative party is headed. The hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald) also enriched the debate from the perspective of the maritimes. He said:

The problem with which we must grapple, along with the complexities of this bill, is whether or not the arrangements which have been put before us and which were generally agreed to by the provinces in December hold out the danger of fundamentally increasing the sorts of disparities which exist now. When we look at the situation in the five eastern provinces specifically, and the swelling of the unemployment rate which has taken place in the past several months, we cannot be sanguine about this kind of proposed agreement and about the services which will be provided under this arrangement.

We want to be sure that the formula and framework which is being presented here will not be so rigid as to prevent effective action for dealing with disparities of income, employment, or unforeseen developments which may affect either existing revenues or bring about, indeed, a shortfall of revenues, or excessive costs in certain programs of the poorer provinces.

From the west we heard from the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Hnatyshyn) who pointed out:

This whole process of executive federalism, of dealing with the constitutional system of the country at only the highest and, in most cases, the most remote levels of government, belittles the House of Commons, renders the opposition meaningless, and contributes to a sense of high-level confrontations between political stars which heighten rather than reduce the centrifugal forces inherent in federal systems of government.

The hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Murta), another westerner, revealed his deep sense of Canadianism when he said:

We may be on the threshold of a new era of Canadian confederation, an era marked by greater awareness of provincial and regional needs and sensitivities, greater respect for the diversity of culture and heritage which characterizes the various parts of this country and, in the not too distant future, by a better balance as between the centre and periphery of the country. This is the concept for which we must strive, in both official languages, and all regions.

Mr. Speaker, these are the speeches of leadership. Let no one say the opposition in this parliament only criticizes. We are leading the way into a renewed Canada. We do not need show business tactics. What we are doing is studying the options and creating new policies.

Mr. Speaker, around the world people are asking, "Can democracy cope with the complex problems of a modern, interdependent global community? There is a crisis of political faith in the ability of democratic governments to respond. All the polls indicate a serious dropping off of public belief in the efficacy and trustworthiness of government. Canada is by no means exempt from this voter disenchantment. Distrust of a large, powerful and faceless bureaucracy in Ottawa is intensifying. People are paying higher taxes than ever to support an ever-growing government—and yet the problems of transportation, housing and safety in society are getting worse. Decentralization is not a magic answer to all this, but without decentralization the problems of the municipalities, the level of government closest to the people, will become chaotic.

The rate of urbanization is nothing short of phenomenal. Before the end of this century 94 per cent of Canadians will be urbanized and three-quarters will live in 12 major cities. Urbanization is caused by an interlocking set of developments spawned by exploding technology. Government efforts must be directed toward managing the process of urbanization. The special problems of urbanization—public assistance, transportation, environmental management, leisure, recreation and housing—interact on one another and demand more money which municipalities have no way of raising, thus exacerbating their dependence on provincial and federal government grants.

The quality of life in urban centres is diminishing, despite local efforts; the institutional framework of government was established long before the social impact of urbanization was ever dreamed of. As the role and level of government in Canada has expanded, each level—federal, provincial and municipal—has become involved in areas in which the other levels previously had a special or exclusive interest. Complexity and fragmentation of government has followed. This has resulted in a proliferation of duplicative, autonomy-seeking special agencies in each level of government, and hence has highlighted the problem of a decision-making mechanism which can no longer respond to the needs of a society in an era of accelerating social change.

Thus, a new philosophy at the top is needed to meet the super problems of big government and urbanization. Only a new philosophy can counter the mounting evidence that government is big, rather than strong; flabby, rather than powerful; that is costs a great deal and does not achieve very much. More tinkering with government will not be enough. That is why the present federal government's policies on decentralization are inadequate. They are focused on spreading out certain government departments such as DREE, Revenue, and Supply and Services, and diversifying the sources of federal purchasing. This approach is too narrow a concept of decentralization. A comprehensive plan based on a philosophy of streamlining is urgently needed—not more piecemeal solutions to mounting problems.

Decentralization is a theme running through the report on the constitution of Canada produced by the special joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons in June, 1972. The committee made clear that we need a new constitution to make possible a more functional federalism. It stated:

> A new Canadian constitution should be based on functional considerations, which would lead to greater decentralization of government powers in areas touching cultural and social policy and to greater centralization of powers which have important economic effects at the national level. Functional considerations also require greater decentralization in many areas of government administration.

The principal way in which constitutional decentralization can be brought about is contained in recommendation No. 50 which sets the division of powers in a more modern context as follows:

> Concurrent powers which predominantly affect the national interest should grant paramountcy to federal parliament and those which predominantly affect provincial or local interests should grant paramountcy to the provincial legislature.

Therefore, a complete policy on decentralization begins with full support of the constitutional committee's recommendations on decentralization and a commitment to implement them. A more functional allocation of governmental powers will benefit all regions. The committee proposes an expansion of provincial powers in such areas as income support, criminal law, marriage and divorce, educational TV, taxing powers and international arrangements. The committee supports limitation of federal powers with respect to appointments to the Senate and the Supreme Court and with respect to federal spending in fields of provincial jurisdiction. Correspondingly, greater centralization is necessary in the regulation of the economy. Hence, there should be a transfer of some existing provincial powers to the federal parliament; for example, an increase in federal jurisdiction over air and water pollution, international and interprovincial trade and commerce, incomes, securities regulation, financial institutions, unfair competition and foreign ownership.

The constitutional committee made a major recommendation concerning decentralization in the field of social security: the federal government should determine over-all spending in such programs as old age pensions, supplements and family allowances, and the provinces should determine how this total should be distributed within limits to preserve national standards and maintain the principle of redistributing income.

There is today a great deal of confusion over jurisdiction, and increasing political rivalry in promoting bigger social benefits. Integrated economic-social planning between the federal and provincial governments is imperative to prevent the escalation of universal benefits into a welfare state. Strategies for growth, housing and transportation are but three of the items in which the people will best be served by the three levels of government working closely together.

In considering ways to decentralization it should be reaffirmed that the federal parliament must retain the primary responsibility for general economic policy in the country. Thus, decentralization does not rule out centralization in primary areas. The federal parliament must have sufficient economic powers to regulate and influence the economy. However, in fulfilling this constitutional responsibility of centralization the federal government should explore more ways of decentralizing its operation so that federal policies can be regionally adapted. Decentralizing the decision-making process is of far more value than redistributing a handful of civil servants. The joint committee on the constitution of Canada recognized this and stated:

> Most Crown corporations could have their headquarters outside Ottawa, as many already have. Federal departments like agriculture, energy, mines and resources, environment, national defence and transport could have their principal offices elsewhere, and many other departments could give their regional offices more authority. Even when Ottawa must remain the effective centre of administration, a greater effort can be made to encourage regional input.

Surely this was the thrust of the message of Newfoundland which we heard the other night from the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie). To go to another part of the country, the western premiers, at the western economic opportunities conference, called for the establishment of industrial "centres of excellence" throughout the various regions of Canada. These centres would be based on natural and human resources, supported by research and marketing assistance to develop a vital economic unit capable of serving national and international markets.

Such a program concept suggests clear initiative on the part of the federal government in the establishment and support of new centres of industrial activity in Canada. It would involve decentralization of the technical expertise of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce to plan and support the development of such centres, and the major funding of research activities and new industrial enterprise in co-operation with other departments of the federal government.

We can see, now, the necessity of the federal government permitting the provincial governments and various local organizations to participate in the planning of broad economic development policies, in establishing regional industrial priorities, and in the development and implementation of programs. There should be, in short, decentralization of decision-making power on assistance programs, and strengthening of regional offices. True decentralization calls for massive changes in the financial system of Canada so that municipalities can provide the public transportation, housing, water and social services demanded by urbanization. Grants by senior governments that want the political credit for handing out money are not the answer; today there are so many millions of dollars of transfer payments being issued from one government office to another that it is impossible to keep track of it all, let alone provide accountability to the people.

In summary, I do not see decentralization as a cure-all for Canada's problems and I am certainly not suggesting it as such, but it is an approach which will enable us to find the detailed answers Canada wants this place to find at this very critical moment in our history. It is time for us to assert our will to succeed as a people, for a nation is primarily constituted by its people's collective will to live together. In every region of Canada people have common aspirations for a truly human life. It ought to be the function of government and parliament to help all Canadians deepen faith in their own country.

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, this has been an interesting debate, although sometimes one feels there is a certain sense of unreality because we cannot face up to the fundamental issues behind the bill just by the mere statistics and details of the legislation. While we defer consideration of the precise terms of the bill to a later stage, I was thinking as I glanced over this fundamental document that it might be something of an inadequate response to the challenge to confederation to look at something like as one of the formulae whereby we can work out the arrangements between the provinces and the dominion. That complicated formula cannot, of course, be the full and final answer, nor can we consider the clauses of the bill as sufficient discussion about the problem before us.

I have been impressed by those hon. members who have applied themselves to what I believe is the spirit of the law, as Montesquieu might say, and to the fundamental principles lying behind and beyond the law. I was notably impressed by the speeches of the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald) and of the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner). I was glad the Globe and Mail this morning showed the wisdom of reproducing his very helpful, very cognate and useful remarks. I cannot use her language now, but I thought the hon. lady made a masterful review of the situation, setting out fundamental truths and basic principles. I thought the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe made a moving statement of his credo on federalism. The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands—and this has been referred to by an honourable, distinguished and learned gentleman, the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Roche)—was profoundly correct when she pointed out the importance of this forum for discussion of great national issues.

As the House of Commons through the years has become something like a glorified sausage-mill of legislation we have tended to lose an understanding of its principal role. The House of Commons does not run the country; that is the job of the government. However, the House of Commons must, and should—and at its best, does—represent the country. So it is very important that in this body, which represents all the people and which is freely chosen by those people, we apply ourselves to fundamental questions. I was proud of the hon. lady for bringing forward that issue, and of the hon. gentleman for dealing with it.

This is the first time since the election in Quebec that there has been serious attention paid to that event. Without being an alarmist, I can say that Canada is in crisis. We are not asking just how we are going to be governed, or who is going to govern us—although that is important—but we are asking whether we will have a country tomorrow or at some not too distant date. While the shock, uncertainty and anxiety which followed November 15 is the most serious crisis in our country's history, it is well for us not to regard it as the first one. We have had threats before—threats galore—and we should always remember that not all the threats to this nation have been uttered or written in French. We learn that in some parts of the western domain people are a little annoyed if they, too, are not counted in what is called alienation. We should remember that in fact our whole history has been a series of threats. As one of my professors used to say, there is this constant interplay between the centripetal and the centrifugal forces, one which would draw us together and the other which would pull us apart.

Before we began as a country, but after our forefathers began the discussion on the creation of a country, one province—New Brunswick—voted against it. It took clever manipulation to get them on the track so that by 1867 they were willing to come in. In Nova Scotia, the premier made sure that the people did not discuss the issue, did not vote on the issue, nor did the legislature vote on the issue. When confederation came in 1867, Nova Scotia sent a raft of members of parliament to the confederated capital, all but one of whom were dedicated to breaking up confederation. Long after that people in the maritimes could win elections on an anti-confederation plank. So it is not a new situation. But the country pulled together then to resist the storms and weather the anxieties and attacks.

At that time we had very wise men who saw that after you made a country, you had to do something to keep it together. Sir John A. Macdonald saw what I am afraid many people today are not seeing, and some of them bear the same party label as I do. He believed that the whole was greater than the parts and must be greater than the sum of the parts; that a strong central government with reserved power was absolutely necessary because that was the only critical mechanism which represented all the people of the total entity and which had at best the ability to inspire the ideals and patriotism of the people. He did more than that; he launched us on a program whereby we challenged our problems, our difficulties, our history and our geography. He did not mope and grope about internal strains. He set out a broad area of challenge. Perhaps today we are a little too inward-looking.

I have mentioned the past, Mr. Speaker, not because I am so old or old-looking, but I believe we ignore it at our peril. It has been said that a true Conservative derives lessons from the past and the reactionary is bound by them. We are not bound by the past, of course, but we serve ourselves ill if we forget it. I am not here to pretend that I am back in my university classroom. I am not here to administer a history lesson. I am here to express my concern about some of the developments in this country, and often I am a little more disturbed about the reactions to the events than to the events themselves.

I have read where it is said it is not inevitable that Quebec leave; that everything is going to be fine and all will be well in the palsy-walsy world. I would say simply that it is not inevitable that they will not leave. There is no unwritten law that decrees we shall stay together. Much worse than that reaction is the reaction of those who say, "Let them go". That is a shocking, dangerous and, indeed, evil attitude for any Canadian to take. If there is no feeling of togetherness of people who have lived together and shared a country for over a century, then surely there is something terribly wrong.

Another suggestion we get is that Quebec cannot go. This is also dangerous. A state of Quebec would be no mean member of the community of nations. There are many perhaps a hundred—at the United Nations less capable and less viable economically than the province of Quebec. We should not build up illusions, nor should we foster narrow, bigoted attitudes that could be crippling and dangerous. I think it is important that we keep a sense of balance and a sense of moderation.

Another thing one hears is that if there is successful separation of Quebec, it will be followed by withdrawal of other units. This I find to be the lowest common denominator of national faith. Surely, if it should happen—and pray God it will not—that one of our prime members should leave, should not, and would not, all the other members draw more closely together instead of flying off into different areas? So I am not impressed by the suggestion that that would shatter our national dream still further in respect of others following the example. I cannot believe that patriotic Canadians, whether east, west, centre or farther, would believe in such an unworthy suggestion.

We cannot stand idly by and see separatism manipulated or stumbled into by demagogues or ill-advised zealots. It is our duty, to use an old-fashioned word, to keep this country together. I would not for a moment suggest that I am a better Canadian than anyone in this chamber or anyone in this country, but one of my great honours is to represent the cradle of confederation. I represent the place where it all began in 1864—Charlottetown. I do not want to see the dreams of those forefathers shattered in my lifetime. I do not want to see the great entity which they created destroyed in my lifetime or the lifetime of my children.

On the plaque of the confederation chamber in Charlottetown is a typical Canadian attitude, part of a verse from an American writer and part from an English writer, which reads:

> Providence being their guide,
> They builded better than they knew.

I have spent much of my life decrying the denigration of our founding fathers, the unwillingness to recognize them as among the greatest nation-builders in the world. With all the gravity at my command I would like to give my humble views on how we, as Canadian legislators dealing with the matter of federal-provincial relations, which is the essence of the federal system, can deal with something which is so important to us. First, we cannot do it by force. That would be unthinkable and probably impossible, if we were foolish enough to think of it. We do not have to look any further than to Lebanon or Northern Ireland to see the criminal folly of fratricidal blood-letting.

We cannot do it by fear. We hear it said, "They will never make it alone. They cannot do it economically." That will not help. It is a delusion. I think we can no more solve this situation by balance-sheets than we can by battalions. We cannot do it by confrontation, either. I differ strongly with those who say the best thing is to have a national referendum and let the whole country vote. That would polarize one against the other. We do not need polarization; we need accommodation; we need agreement.

The final thing that concerns me is that we cannot save this country by so diminishing the central government that there is nothing left but a loose alliance of dominion states. To so weaken the central government as to make it meaningless would be a defeat by default. We need to recognize mutual problems.

When I first came to this chamber 20 years ago, the fourth edition of Beauchesne's had been printed. Mr. Beauchesne was not a Scotsman. Members of the House who spoke French only and became involved in procedural arguments—they are difficult enough even when you know the English language—could only use the English version of Beauchesne because it had not been translated into French. It was not translated until 1964 although it was written in 1922. Also, at that time we who were not wise enough or fortunate enough to understand French could not understand what our French-speaking colleagues said because there was no translation system. And all this took place nearly 100 years after the country began, a country which began by saying clearly, as the British North America Act said, that the two languages are equal in the parliament of Canada. If they are equal in the parliament of Canada, would it not be logical to make the whole apparatus on which parliament rests reflect that bilingual equality? There have been great anxieties over the Official Languages Act and its implementation. But part of our trouble today is that we have tried to put right in ten years that which has been neglected for 100 years. We who are Anglophones in this House must remember these things and take cognizance of them.

I agree with much that has been said previously about the need for less bitterness in dominion-provincial relations, about the need for greater accommodation on many matters. I agree with what the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said a couple of hours ago, that the British North America Act is a pretty fine document. I think it is capable of great flexibility. Nova Scotia, through Joseph Howe, had it changed in a matter of months. Certain subsidies were written in. As I say, great accommodation is possible. I think the old document is fine. But if it be necessary to change the constitution in order to keep the country, let us change the constitution. A certain Protestant French prince once said that Paris was worth a Mass.

[Mr. Macquarrie.]

I think the British North America Act is a fine document, repatriated or not. But surely the country is far greater than the BNA Act. If in the process of bringing about new beginnings and deeper understandings it needs to be changed, so be it. In these days of instant communication, easy transportation, electronic media and sophistication, surely it is easier for us to keep this magnificient, modern country together than it was for our forefathers to structure a union between dissociated, dislocated, remote communities in a primitive age, when there was little certainty as to how great our future would be in material terms. I say our job should be easier. I believe that if we fail in that, if we become wreckers of confederation instead of fathers of confederation, we shall be unworthy of them and unworthy of ourselves.

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to speak on Bill C-37, an act to provide for the making of certain fiscal payments and of establishing programs covering financial contributions to the provinces. I particularly welcome the opportunity to speak immediately following my esteemed colleague for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie) for, like him, on June 10, of this year I shall have served this House for 20 years. In that time I know both of us have seen many changes in the country and in the House.

This bill is important and complex and comes before the House when there is much soul-searching in Canada. Scarcely a day passes without members of parliament, presumably of all parties, receiving letters from their constituents asking, "What has gone wrong in Canada? Where did we take the wrong turn in the road? How did we lose our way?" For example, our senior citizens are worried and concerned because the purchasing power of their savings has been eroded to the point where they may be unable to provide for their own physical needs in old age. Our young and middle-aged citizens are frustrated and perplexed by their inability to pay high interest and mortgage payments, by the inadequacy and high cost of housing and by the fear that no matter how hard they work they will never get out of debt. Our young people, to use the vernacular, can no longer "get with it," for the youth of our country represents the largest percentage of unemployed on our unemployment rolls.

We must ask ourselves, what does Bill C-37 do for them and what does it do to alleviate the present crisis in our nation, a crisis which is eating at our very vitals morning, noon and night? Unfortunately, it does little. This bill represents an agreement made between Canada's first ministers last December and attempts to bring about substantial changes in fiscal responsibilities and government programs applying to our two levels of government without seeking any formal amendment of our constitution.

As was said so ably by my leader and other colleagues, especially the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie), the premiers have been quoted as being in agreement with these proposals. But what else could they do? When you have a gun at your head and you need financial help, what else can you do? There was no way the premiers were going to throw their weight around and refuse the bone thrown to them. Since

I realize that Nova Scotia, my own province, needs every cent it can get, I intend to vote for this bill. But the manner in which it was conceived leaves much to be desired. To be frank, it seems to me that more problems of national import are examined and finalized in Ottawa's old railway station than in the House of Commons by Canada's elected representatives.

Apparently this is the Prime Minister's (Mr. Trudeau) concept of co-operative federalism. Unfortunately, the concept has failed and a new approach to our problems must be found if we are to go forward in unity as a nation. Perhaps the Prime Minister's greatest failure in this, our hour of crisis, has been failure of communication. For far too long this elitist, self-seeking, overindulgent government has been practising a policy of confrontation rather than of consultation. We have had confrontations with labour, business, management—with just about every segment of society, in which I include our provincial governments. Today our provincial governments are confronted with a "take it or leave it" attitude in revenue sharing. Our provincial governments are being asked to reduce the cost of their administrations by our pyromaniac Prime Minister who, having ignited the inferno, now asks the premiers to dampen the fires of inflation. This "con" artist has developed a lifestyle at public expense which would put an Arabian oil sheik to shame—a swimming pool, massive staff, Cadillacs—you name it, he's got it! After emptying the public purse to the tune of some $5 billion this year alone, he has the gall to ask the premiers to practise restraint. Some members of parliament seem to be unaware of this government's waste and extravagance. However, a short review of the record will soon establish the facts. According to the tables the hon. member for Westmount (Mr. Drury) presented to this House in 1974 when he was president of the treasury board, tables contained in the pamphlet entitled "How Your Tax Dollar is Spent", in 1967-68 when the present government was elected under the leadership of our present Prime Minister it took less than $10 billion to look after the needs of 20 million Canadians, or about $1 billion for every two million citizens. Now, ten years later, there are some 23 million Canadians. Using the same yardstick of $1 billion for two million citizens our budget should be in the order of $12.5 billion or, if I allow for inflation, about $13 billion. However, as we are all painfully aware, the budget is not $13 billion, $20 billion, $25 billion, $30 billion, $35 billion or even $40 billion—it is in excess of $45 billion.

Is it any wonder that Canadians of all ages are worried, or that the bonds which unite us have become frayed and torn? No nation, no matter how strong, can long survive this type of internal pressure. Just as families start feuding and fighting and breaking up when problems of money, or lack of money, become a central issue, I believe the same is true of the nation.

With the tabling of the estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1978, it is now obvious that it is not the intention of the government to treat the provinces fairly or justly or with due consideration for their economic needs. To realize the truth of that statement all one needs to do is compare the amount earmarked for public works in the Atlantic region with the amount which is spent by the Department of Public Works in the national capital region of Ottawa-Hull. The Atlantic region is to receive some $14.5 million, while Ottawa-Hull is to enjoy the benefit of approximately six times as much—some $87.9 million. Incidentally, Quebec is to receive around $128 million.

The federal energy department and its agencies are to have its total spending trimmed by some $500 million. But how is this to be accomplished? Most of the so-called saving will be the result of a projected $612 million cut in oil subsidy payments to the five eastern provinces. The federal so-called savings will thereby be financed by the people of Atlantic Canada who will be paying more for energy. This is the end result of the government's freeze on expenditures. The only ones who may freeze next winter will be the people of Atlantic Canada suffering under the policies of this administration.

In addition, the citizens of Atlantic Canada will be paying more next year in health and welfare costs since this government plans to cut its contribution to our region by around 2 per cent. It is interesting to note, also, that our unemployed have not been forgotten. The cut in the budget of the Unemployment Insurance Commission is bound to wreak more hardship on an area already suffering from a hopelessly high rate of unemployment. So what will happen? If neither jobs nor benefits are available for our people, we cannot, in all conscience, let them starve. They will have to turn to the local welfare rolls, thus placing a further burden on our municipalities, an elected level of government which has the lowest level of tax sources available to it.

Granted, the government plans to set aside around $286 million for a project designed to create jobs and train those who are out of work. I submit the announcement is not impressive when viewed in the context of what has happened in the past in the field of job-creation and training. In my opinion, what is needed is an entirely new approach to economic growth. In the past, grants have been made to business by a government department following an assessment of the future of the firm concerned. This assessment was carried out by public servants. In effect, the government has decided that public servants can take better decisions in the business world than can the businessmen themselves. This, of course, is nonsense, for if public servants really possessed this kind of expertise they would hasten to establish their own businesses. All the system has done is build up a bureaucracy while adding to the burden placed upon successful business ventures which in the end must provide the tax dollars to the government.

I believe the government should provide encouragement for businessmen to start new enterprises without direct government interference. One way to do this would be to establish a standard grant formula under which any firm setting up or expanding an enterprise would be entitled to assistance amounting to a certain percentage of the costs up to a fixed maximum. The government's role would only be to determine that the criteria specified in legislation were met by the participating firm. The grants would then be automatic. There would be no need for an army of bureaucrats trying to assess business factors. The evidence that a businessman, or a group of businessmen, showed willingness to risk capital in an endeavour would be taken and accepted as an indication of a favourable business assessment.

There is another method which might be used. The government could provide a tax incentive, something which would require even less bureaucracy. What I have in mind is a proposal that any person investing equity capital in a new or expanding business could write off a certain percentage of that amount against tax liability. The government would share the risk, as it does now, with a grant but under my plan the business decisions would be left to the private entrepreneur. Such an approach would be even more helpful to our young people with new ideas. They would be able to attract equity capital from other citizens, each of whom would make his own assessment of the viability of the project. Additional business judgment would thus be brought to bear on each new enterprise, adding to the probability that the business would be successful.

There are, undoubtedly, other equally valid proposals that could be made, but the key element in my suggestion is that the government would no longer be making business judgments and assessments. I submit that business assessments are not the function of government. This is, and must, remain the function of private enterprise if our system is to survive. I am not saying that the government should wash its hands of the entire matter and get out of the field of economic growth. What I am suggesting is a change in the government's role. The government can create the environment in which private enterprise, big and small businesses, can flourish. Experience over the years has shown that businessmen, if given half a chance, will start a new enterprise or expand an existing one if they can see a profit in so doing. I know, because I am speaking from experience.

The government can help by providing information on markets foreign and local. In fact, businessmen respond to opportunities for making a profit, and profit is only possible if goods or services can be sold. The federal government could provide some of this market by moving more of its government offices to areas of high unemployment such as the Atlantic region. In addition, the federal government, with its vast, persuasive powers, could help encourage the large labour-intensive administrative head offices of our insurance companies, trust companies, banks and labour organizations to locate in slow growth or high unemployment areas. This was not feasible in the past, but today we can communicate within seconds with men on the moon, or a spaceship on Mars—so modern communication systems make it possible to locate head offices anywhere in Canada.

In addition to these proposals, the federal government simply has to continue its equalization and transfer payment programs. These have been the main instruments for improving our business environment in the past. In my opinion, these programs should not be reduced at least until more positive economic conditions in our area have been created.

[Mr. Crouse.]

Throughout my remarks I have endeavoured to relate our present national plight to our economic plight. I believe that if steps are taken along the lines I have proposed to strengthen our economic situation we will at the same time strengthen our national unity. From the letters I receive from my constituents, it is obvious that they and the vast majority of people in Canada are concerned about the current political health of our country. There is pessimism throughout the land that I find unrealistic and defeatist in its attitude.

● (1600)

It was Sir Wilfrid Laurier who said that the twentieth century belonged to Canada. I, for one, believe he was right. However, if we are to get on with the task of nation-building, we must rekindle our faith in our national destiny. Our very survival as a nation has been because of our diversity. Each of us has inherited, and has been enriched by, the contributions made throughout Canada by a number of cultural groups. Today, I believe that each of us as individual citizens must develop a new sense of personal dedication and participation in the future of our country. The preservation and the development of Canada must be beyond political parties, beyond factions and beyond selfish interests. In my view, it must be done through the wholehearted co-operation of Canadians of all political views, all languages and racial origin.

Without this commitment on the part of the individual Canadian for his country, and for the ideals for which it stands, without the direct participation of individual Canadians in the decisions that will seriously affect this nation's future, the decisions unfortunately will be made by competing provincial governments, self-seeking politicians and a few powerful special interest groups. This simply must not happen. The job of reaffirmation to Canadian ideals, the job of reconfederation—that is the task that faces us—will have to be done within Canada and by all Canadians. It is a job that cannot be done by the temporary managers of our society. It is a job that will be done, a job that must be done, by the owners of our society, namely, the citizens of Canada.

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I shall confine my remarks on this complex bill to two or three phases which I believe are the most important, at least in principle; namely, what the government is doing in terms of financing in the health field. In a general way we support the thrust of the government's legislation in this regard. Since I came to this House I have been of the opinion that the federal government should by and large not be involved in the financing of health, welfare and post-secondary education, at least to any massive degree. Rather, this should be done by the provinces and returned to them at the earliest opportunity, with appropriate tax concessions.

I think this practice is a monster which has been built up largely at the instigation of the federal government. I remember that in 1969 the Weir government in Manitoba, the last Conservative government in the province, tried to negotiate with the federal government some type of control over medicare which would not be onerous to its citizens, yet were rebuffed by the federal government. We now have a quite massive program which has to be curtailed. I also believe that these financing programs have been one of the main causes of the threatened break-up of confederation because of their economic effect.

Before the advent of shared-cost programs in the field of health, welfare and post-secondary education Canadians lived with a great deal of national identity. In view of the affluence of the times it would appear that these programs should have brought Canadians closer together, whereas in fact they have separated them. Having been given vast sums of money to spend on health, welfare and education—and since 20 years ago each community has been largely responsible for its own level of education, medical and hospital care—this has now become the responsibility of the distant federal government. Even 25 years ago 80 per cent of local education costs up to university level was raised from property taxes, and virtually all Canadians paid for their own doctor and hospital care either out of their own pockets or under a plan from which they could draw no more than they had paid in by way of premiums. The shared-cost programs under which the federal government paid 50 cents on the dollar encouraged great expansion of the health and welfare fields, as well as education. Indeed, if the amount spent on health and welfare by the federal government were taken out of the budget, the budget would be quite manageable.

It is often thought by Canadians that their economic problems are unique, whereas in fact they are largely problems experienced in the English-speaking world. They are problems largely invented by Canadian public opinion and policy in the frequent and fallacious Canadian attempt to arrive at a national identity by perpetuating mistakes made by the two larger nations that we most envy and resemble, at least in our social structure, namely, Great Britain and the United States.

The central problem is the runaway welfare state whose Canadian identity is closer to that of Britain than the United States. One of the main problems was the adoption by the Canadian government of the Marsh report, a report written by Leonard C. Marsh in 1943 on social security in Canada. It was patterned after the Beveridge plan and it rested on the assumption that "cradle to the grave" social security would not undermine but would, instead, reinforce the traditional personal and social values of self-reliance and devotion to hard work. It was not realized that as new generations replaced the old and as people became used to the welfare state they would regard social security as their due; that work was only a means of qualifying for such, or a source of discretionary income and that in fact this discretionary income would increasingly not be worth working too hard for since it would be heavily taxed for the benefit of others.

Along with the social benefits of health and welfare, the commitment of the government to maintain high employment assumed that people would remain grateful for the employment and would not take advantage of the guarantee to seek higher wages, either by exploitation of monopoly power by powerful unions or by shifting part of the burden of taxes to other shoulders.

Inherent in this legislation is a discussion on where education is tending to go. The emphasis on the democratic right to free higher education has meant keeping a large part of the population in school during the period of young adulthood, where previously it would have had to start a career with reasonable lifetime prospects. This would not be so bad if school is serious hard work which drives a student to acquire useful productive skills. But in the three English-speaking nations I referred to, the self-fulfilment ideas of the teacher and the minimum effort objectives of the students combine to produce an incipient labour force that is well prepared to consume income and well-schooled in administering a job but has frequently missed the experience of exerting one's abilities to the limit in mastering the work involved. There is an important difference in the conception of the old idea of working and the modern idea of having a job.

The extension of the generous state-financed pensions to the retired is most widely acclaimed on the basis that it was the least objectionable aspect of the welfare state because it recognized that many old people could not work and could not fend for themselves. The advent of the old age security, the guaranteed income supplement and the Canada pension, plus the scourge of the elderly—the great fear that a man would be unable to care for himself, to pay for his drugs, for hospital care and for his doctor—has removed from the citizen the requirement of savings, retirement funds and pensions which have contributed substantially to the inflationary pressures that are now upon us.

I have often said that it is not necessary to have nearly the personal savings now as it was a few years ago, and the consuming portion of old age is not nearly as important as it was. For these people the problems of health are paramount. Earlier retirement and increasing attention to young adults programs are increasingly dividing the population into two groups of consumers, one young, one old, supported by an in-between adult group of producers carrying a heavy burden of taxation.

The most important features of the enormous government increase in expenditure are in the field of health, welfare and education. With the advent of the government-sponsored plans, costs have escalated enormously. Certainly, the government of the sixties that instituted these plans must bear a great deal of criticism for the state of our economy. Much of the thinking on entering these state-run plans was misdirected, but entirely understandable. I cannot help thinking of a clause or manifesto of the British Labour party which suggested that all sickness was the result of inadequate medical care. The paper debated by the Labour party permitted the idea that through better medical care the need for hospitals would gradually dry up and they could be closed. Indeed, modern medicine that reduces death and illness in earlier life only prolongs the lifespan so that the degenerative diseases of heart, cancer and plain old age bring the medical problems of the individual to much greater importance, and the financial obligations of the state are immensely increased.

The BNA Act, as I understand it, gave to the provinces health, welfare and education, and they should return there as quickly as possible. In my opinion, the so-called equality of medical and hospital care is highly overrated. An analysis of hospital care shows that it is becoming rigid. Hospitals are being run for the staff and the administration, with the patients being of secondary importance. They are only necessary to keep jobs for the staff. If one studies the hospital policy, it is obvious that the number of people actually involved in the care of patients is not a great deal more than what it was when patients paid for their own care. The great expansion has been in the ancillary and the administrative spheres. Many jobs in the periphery of hospitals are hard to justify. Mostly the problem with these programs is that there are no guidelines, no limits that may be reasonably imposed on medical, hospital and educational institutions. There are always new and endless programs that will benefit some in the community and certainly some that one has to consider as very worthwhile. It is very difficult to give up a program once instituted. It is always easier to try to start another program.

With the provinces having to finance and run their own programs, we can expect to have more efficiency and more innovation. There should not be the same drive to innovate new programs merely because some other province had them and that province needed them in order to save face. Perhaps the provinces, in turn, will involve once more local governments and even voluntary groups in the administration and financing of hospitals and medical care. The smaller the political unit, the much better the spending power used. It seems to me that municipal government gets more "bang for their buck" than the provincial government, and the provincial government seems to spend better than the federal government, at least in productivity for the amount of money spent. I believe that the federal government must negotiate in good faith. It must return these programs to the care of the provinces. I come from a province that receives some money. I understand that on balance the province of Manitoba neither gains nor loses much in the exchange.

The question of unity has been touched on in this debate by many people, most pointedly by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald). The election of Mr. Levesque has once more brought the country to considering the constitution and the make-up of confederation. Now that Quebec has forced the issue, the country cannot go back again. Suffice it to say the new mood in Quebec and in the other provinces has shifted dramatically against the federalism of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). Now, in 1977, if the issues are debated more calmly I think they are more dangerous. For the past number of years the government's very narrow and bilingual policies, which was the approach to Quebec nationalism, have increasingly come to be disputed and distrusted by English Canada, and growing skepticism of the value of Ottawa's bilingual policies and the independence of Quebec has become a subject of consideration. If the country is to avoid political disaster, it needs the good will of English-speaking Canada.

[Mr. Ritchie.]

It is doubtful if this government has the capacity to meet this crisis. If they had a policy and if it was aimed at anything, it was at preventing the Parti Quebecois from coming to power. However, the Parti Quebecois is now in power and Mr. Bourassa is studying arrangements for the Common Market in Brussels. Obviously, Ottawa's Quebec policy has failed. How can it be expected, unless that policy is changed, to overcome the PQ in power, and can this government, with its tight commitment to the central role, shift its faith and perspectives sufficiently to meet the changed circumstances? If there is to be a national policy capable of coming to terms with Quebec nationalism, it must be one which represents and asserts the will of English-speaking Canada to live for itself also as an independent community. If Quebec is to be granted the choice over its destiny, there must be a collective future awaiting the provinces and territories that remain. Will these diverse provinces be able to live together? The government has been in office a long time and it has a massive federal bureaucracy to back it up. If a federal government, made up of half of its members from the province of Quebec and one-third of its cabinet ministers from that province is unable to prevent the election of a Parti Quebecois government, then one has to conclude that the electorate, in electing Mr. Levesque, represents strong feelings on the part of the Quebecois.

There are those in the federal cabinet, including the Minister of Finance, who have suggested that provincial premiers who join Quebec in a united front during federal-provincial conferences make themselves accomplices to the PQ cause. The Prime Minister has said that the federal system is untouchable—"to abandon it now would be a sin against the spirit, to sin against humanity". These are hardly words by which politicians would be ready to enter an open and reasonable discussion on constitutional changes.

The province of Quebec has set its sights on independence, while Canada seems to be failing to search for the appropriate language, constitutional devices and the mechanism of change that will guide us. We have to respond to the challenge of Quebec with prudence and thought. All seem agreed that the new shape of things must envisage more independence for the province of Quebec. But what forms remain for the rest of the Canadian confederation?

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I did not intend to participate in the debate on Bill C-37. However, having listened to hon. members put forth their views and then using the bill as a springboard to discuss the whole question of Canadian confederation, and what has taken place in the last two days, I am moved to at least say a few words on this question. I can promise Your Honour that it will not last six hours.

We in this party oppose Bill C-37. We have argued that, in effect, once it is implemented, the poorer provinces in this country will suffer as a result of it and will feel the effects even more severely than the wealthy provinces which can sustain that sort of impact. But more than that, since this bill comes at a very important time in the development of the history of Canada, one thing that concerns me greatly is the colonialist mentality which we as Canadians still seem to have.

I recognize the fact that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) was following the long tradition of potential actors and performers who have to go to the United States to become successful and who then bring back their success to Canada. While I recognize the quality of his speech, I would have appreciated it far more had it been made in Canada to Canadians, because in effect the problems facing us as Canadians today must be solved by Canadians. We are the ones who will have to solve the problems, instead of running to Big Brother in the hope that Big Brother will help us in this game to solidify Canadian unity. It seems to me to be betraying a colonialist mentality which we have not yet outgrown. I refer in particular to the comment made by the Primer Minister at the press conference when he said:

> The greatest threat to the United States is the disintegration or the break-up of Canada.

It struck me immediately, as I read it, as being a tacit invitation to Big Brother. Here is the Prime Minister, the leader of a country, saying in effect to our neighbour that their security depends on Canada being united. So if, for example, Mr. Levesque and the Parti Quebecois are seen as endangering that unity, it is not beyond the realm of possibility that all sorts of agents, agents provocateurs, CIA and other characters will want to invade this country in an effort to destabilize the situation in Quebec. Indeed, it is an open invitation to American investors to stay out of the province of Quebec, thus creating a situation of hardship in Quebec so as to bring the people of that province to realization of the error of their ways and so as to convince them not to support separation in any referendum.

I say that the people of Quebec made their choice, and they had the democratic right to do so. I think it really puts me down as a Canadian when the leader of my country goes to the capital of a foreign country and makes a press statement in which he says, in effect, "Boys, the greatest threat to the United States of America would be the break-up of Canada".

Mr. Malone: Speak on Bill C-37.

Mr. Rodriguez: Since we are discussing the whole question of Canadian unity in Bill C-37—and the Tories have done it also, in spite of their catcalls—it seems to me it is only fair for us to put our comments on the record. I believe, since other members have expressed their views on what they want for Canada, that I should express mine—as a naturalized Canadian who was not born in Canada—namely, that I stand for a free Quebec, just as I stand for a free Ontario, a free Manitoba or a free Saskatchewan. The only way that can come about is for Canada to be free. From my ideological perspective, we should have a free socialist Canada because, in my view, that is the only way in which Canada can guarantee the cultural rights of all groups within Canada and of all provinces.

I hear giggling on my right, but the fact remains that foreign ownership in Canada is still a great threat. What is the good of coming through the other struggle as a united Canada when, in effect, we have no control over our consumer patterns and no control over our own culture, when the culture we have is by and large a foreign culture and when our standard of living is based on what is happening in the United States so that when they have a tough time we have an even tougher time. We must be able to say to Canadians that we want a free and independent Canada, but that to achieve it we will have to make some sacrifices. Yes, we will even have to be prepared to accept a lower standard of living as we try to achieve some economic independence and, we hope, the cultural independence which will follow.

What we have done is, in effect, to give up that whole fight. There was a great froufra about foreign ownership in this country, so we brought in the Foreign Investment Review Act. I have received reports which state that six out of seven applications for take-overs are approved. As parliamentarians, we never see the basis for an approval or a rejection of a take-over. We see the spectacle of provincial premiers running to the boardrooms in foreign countries begging them to invest in their provinces.

Coming, as I do, from a colony and having seen the republics in the south and how they develop, I know that the investors will come in, but they will come in for a price, which is the loss of sovereignty. You lose the right to direct the way your country will eventually develop. To me, that is very important. That is an argument which we have to make in Canada, and the Prime Minister and those of us who are committed to an independent, united Canada must attempt to convince Canadians that there is a benefit in being in Canada which is united and independent, in spite of what it might cost us in terms of our standard of living.

I wanted to put those few remarks on the record because I think they are very important. They have been running through my mind since the Prime Minister's speech in the U.S. Congress and his press conference in Washington, and because everybody is basking in some sort of aura, saying to themselves, "The American senators love us. Aren't we just great? We have really come of age." Quite frankly, what the American senators think and do is their business and they have the right to run their own affairs, but I think we should balance out the picture because we are getting carried away and are basking in the euphoria of the success of the great speech made in Congress.

Mr. Blackburn: It was not great. It was good.

Mr. Rodriguez: But everybody is saying it, so we should look at it in a critical way and see it for what it really is. I would have been much more impressed had the Prime Minister set aside a day and made such a speech in the House of Commons. The House could have agreed to bring in the television cameras and it could have been televised in prime time across Canada. Of course, we would have had to be careful that it did not conflict with "Sanford and Son", or "Chico and the Man"—but we do not have control over that. The Prime Minister could have led off the debate in the House on where we go from here and how we go about ensuring independence. From our own perspective, we would have argued for an independent socialist Canada because that is the only political entity which can guarantee Quebec or any other province its cultural rights and other aspirations.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that I have received the following communication:

Government House
Ottawa

February 24, 1977

Sir,

I have the honour to inform you that the Honourable R. G. B. Dickson, LL.D., D.C.L., Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, will proceed to the Senate Chamber today, the 24th day of February, at 5:45 p.m., for the purpose of giving Royal Assent to certain bills.

I have the honour to be,
Sir,
Your obedient servant,
Edmond Joly de Lotbinière Administrative Secretary to the Governor General

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL FISCAL ARRANGEMENTS AND ESTABLISHED PROGRAMS FINANCING ACT, 1977

MEASURE FOR MAKING CERTAIN FISCAL PAYMENTS AND OF ESTABLISHED PROGRAMS FINANCING CONTRIBUTIONS TO PROVINCES, ETC.

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale) that Bill C-37, to provide for the making of certain fiscal payments and of established programs financing contributions to provinces, to provide for payments in respect of certain provincial taxes and fees, and to make consequential and related amendments, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I want to say just a few words. I want to congratulate the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez) on his remarks. His remarks can be echoed by all hon. members from northern Ontario. We do not have quite the same attachment to our provincial government that there may be in other parts of the country. The hon. member indicated that he chose to be a Canadian. Many of us did not have that opportunity: we were born here and perhaps we look at things differently.

[Mr. Rodriguez.]

I suppose in a parliamentary system I should not have been surprised, but I was yesterday when the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), the leader of the Liberal party, returned to this House. I was surprised because the Liberal members separated themselves from the rest of the members of this House. The Prime Minister did not go to the United States as the leader of the Liberal party; he went as the Prime Minister of Canada. Therefore, he was also my Prime Minister in that function. While I disagree with him on many matters, he did represent me and spoke for me and I was proud of the ability he has to speak for me.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Peters: Our parliamentary system is an adversary system, but there are times when we should be united. Perhaps this is one of the problems we have. For years the various provinces have been getting back money which the federal government has collected in various ways. During the war the federal government put a lot more money into its coffers than the provinces would have been willing to give it at any other time. Since then the government has been giving some of it back. But it is sad that when the federal government gives money to the provincial governments, the provincial governments are always expected to accept that money as if it were theirs alone. We have never really told the people of Ontario, Quebec or any of the other provinces that half the money which operates hospital plans is Ottawa money. That is federal money collected from all the people of this country and it is distributed to the various provinces. Fifty per cent of it comes from the federal government.

Mr. Malone: Which taxpayers?

Mr. Peters: All the taxpayers. That is really the point. I presume the hon. gentleman would like to separate the taxpayers of the various provinces. They make contributions to Ottawa and the government goes back to an arrangement. Through discussions, those arrangements are agreed to by the parties. This time they were not.

There has been a desire on the part of the federal government to limit such things as hospital costs, medical costs and post-secondary education costs. The federal government pretty well took a unilateral position. It is true that the provinces were there and agreed, but most of them did so because the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) said that the deadline was March 31. He told the provinces that the federal government had to have this agreement by then or they would not get any, and that from then on they would get only what the federal government wanted to give them.

I talked to a young French Canadian chap the other day and asked him if he really felt he was a Canadian or if he felt his nationality was that of a Quebecker. He said that he was a Quebecker. However, he said that it was funny, but his mother does not feel that way. I asked him why, and he said it was for the simple reason that his mother gets her old age pension cheque from Ottawa, that she looks to Ottawa as being the central government and that she has a relationship with it. I asked the young fellow whether that meant his mother has a Canadian attitude. He said, "No, just Ottawa, because the money comes from there." However, that money is Canadian money, put in by all the provinces and redistributed. That is really what federalism has been all about: the strong areas help the weak areas.

I come from the richest province of Canada, the province of Ontario, and yet the area I come from has some of the most abject poverty in the country. The poverty in northern Ontario is worse than the poverty in many of the smaller provinces which we consider to be have-not provinces. We have that poverty because there is not really any redistribution. In areas like that we count on redistribution by the central government operating on behalf of all the people. However, we should tell everybody that. We should tell them so they know Canada has some meaning to them and so they can relate. They would then know when they drive over the Trans-Canada Highway that half its cost is paid for by people in other parts of Canada. We should tell them that when they go to the hospital, half the expenses are paid by the federal government. The federal government also pays half the cost of all medical plans.

We should not have a situation where there is a Quebec Pension Plan and a Canada Pension Plan. We should have one pension plan, and that plan should be for the benefit of all Canadians regardless of where they live. As long as there has been a Liberal government or a Union Nationale government in the province of Quebec there has always been a willingness on the part of the federal government to treat Quebec differently. My party has been no different. We have considered the idea of a special status; we have considered the two-nation theory; we have tried them all. What we should really have been trying to do was develop Canadianism. That idea has never really been adopted because of the way money is given to the province of Quebec.

Many times in this House the former leader of the Social Credit party of Canada, the late Réal Caouette, spoke about the educational system. He used to say that our educational system should be directed toward developing a Canadianism which would enable all Canadians to feel at home in all parts of the country. He agreed with the suggestion which was made by other people—a suggestion I agreed with for a long time—that the only way to promote unity in a bilingual sense would be to put money into the elementary school level in Quebec and every other province.

That should not be done by force, however, because if it is we are going to lose one province or another. It should be done in such a way that everyone at the elementary level in Canada could have the advantage of learning two languages. That is the only difference there is between Canada and the United States. The United States adopted the melting-pot system whereby everybody became American and spoke English. We have had two languages in Canada for 300 years. We have allowed the use of those languages, where possible, in all government departments. But, Mr. Speaker, we went further than that; we allowed a lot of other languages. In Ottawa schools probably four or five different languages are taught. I know many young people who have gone to public school after the regular hours to learn the language of their parents, and there is nothing wrong with that. It has helped us develop our Canadian identity. There is nothing wrong with the bilingualism program itself—just the slavish position taken by the government on providing bilingualism by force to civil servants when it should be voluntary and available to everyone.

I watched a program in Ottawa recently about a fight over bilingualism in an Ottawa school. The fight was not about bilingualism in the particular classroom but about whether there would be an influx of other children to that school and then the bilingual children would have to be removed and sent to a school a mile and a half away. It should be easy to solve that problem by making bilingualism available in all schools, surely. The price may be that the federal government should put up the money for bilingual education.

I would also want to make bilingual education available in every school in Quebec. I am not in favour of asking everyone else to be bilingual and leaving Quebec unilingual, and I do not think that is the wish of the majority of the people in the province. It has certainly never been the practice in Ontario. The people I represent are 30 per cent French-speaking and about only 100 of them are not fluently bilingual.

The federal government should co-operate with the provinces and provide the money for bilingual training. It seems to me that, as one hon. member said, the government has always treated this matter in the old "union station" manner rather than in parliament. It is like one horse and one rabbit; when the government starts negotiating with the provinces, what weapon have the provinces got? The federal government has the money, and the provinces ask for their share but they have to take whatever is given to them. Over the years they have been able to get a few concessions, but all of a sudden the government says, "We do not have that kind of money now to meet all the 50-50 plans for health, medicare, post-secondary education and some other projects, so we are going to put on a ceiling and change the rules." How do provincial premiers or ministers of finance go to the old Union Station and say, "There is no way you are going to do that to us?" In the last round of negotiations they were told to take it or leave it, and if they did not take it by the end of March a decision would be made for them.

I would not object to the federal government making that decision unilaterally provided they said so and were willing to designate what they were paying the money for. We have to develop an attachment to the Canadian idea, to the Canadian people and to the Canadian government, Mr. Speaker. The kind of exercise we saw yesterday is divisive. It is not designed to unite; it is designed to divide.

When a cabinet minister gets up in this House and says things have to be their way, or no way, that the only salvation we have is one particular individual and he cannot see any other solution to the Canadian fabric remaining as is, then it seems to me we really should look at where we have been, because we obviously have not been in the right place or the problem would not have developed.

There have been a number of good speeches in this debate, except my own—

Some hon. Members: No, no.

Mr. Peters: —on what all of us feel very strongly about. I think it is true that, like myself, many Canadians do not have a provincial attachment. I come from northern Ontario and I have no attachment to the province of Ontario. I usually dislike Ontario—if you call it Toronto, I dislike it very strongly. There are a number of people I can speak for in northern Quebec who feel exactly the same way about Quebec City as I do about Toronto. It seems to me there are common bonds—places where we are stronger as Canadians than we are as provincials. We should be working toward that end. There have been a number of good speeches and I think that indicates that not all the wisdom is on one side. Although our Prime Minister may have had 20 people writing the speech which we all congratulate him on, he might have done better if he had taken the ideas of some of the other people who feel as strongly about this matter as he does, and represented a Canadian position, not necessarily the position of the Liberal party.

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker in joining in this debate I should like to touch on three basic themes. I should like to touch, first of all, on the fact that I believe—and many of my colleagues believe—that it is important in Canada today that there be a restructuring of the levels of government and their responsibility. Second, I should like to touch on the unfortunate urban transit reneging that has taken place at the federal government level. The commitment given to the Canadian public in 1974 to spend $290 million to assist municipalities and provinces with their urban transit needs has been reneged. I should like to give some further details of the implications that has for certain provinces, in particular my own province of Ontario. Third, in this general discussion I should like to look at what has happened with respect to federal government expenditures, what has been the restraint shown at the federal level, and to what degree has the federal government simply loaded on to other jurisdictions a still heavier load as far as financing needs are concerned in future than has been the experience for those municipalities and provinces up to the present time?

Dealing first with the topic of restructuring, I believe that most members of the House would agree that the day is coming when the Canadian public, Canadian taxpayers—who, after all, foot the bill whether it is municipal tax, provincial or federal tax—will insist that there be less duplication, less overlapping of governmental services than exists today. I think the federal government could take the lead in inviting the various levels of government to some type of conference where this overlapping could be reviewed.

Let me cite some examples where, surely, it would be fruitful to have discussions between provincial and federal governments to see, for example, if the overlapping cannot be restructured by either leaving a program or department at the federal level or leaving it at the provincial level—but, in any event, not allowing the programs to be duplicated at so many levels of government as is the case at the present time. In talking to municipal and provincial officials I have found that the situation is at the point where it is literally counterproductive. For example, officials of the Department of the Environment in Ottawa draw up plans and make proposals for solving environmental problems, but they find that there is a similar bureaucratic structure at the provincial level. The two sets of bureaucrats seem to spend most of their time debating with each other whose plan is correct. In the meantime, nothing is done to solve the environmental problem. We find that the hiring at the federal level of relatively senior bureaucrats at relatively high salaries triggers the hiring at both provincial and municipal levels of high price bureaucrats who do jobs similar to those of their federal counterparts, the idea being that the two levels of bureaucracy can deal with one another on an equal footing. But the sad part is that the taxpayers of the country, whom we have the honour to represent, must pay for this relatively non-productive activity.

• (1650)

Mr. Malone: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stevens: I say we ought to examine certain programs with a view to seeing what structural changes are needed. Surely we do not need similar structures at both the federal and provincial levels. I have in mind, for example, research and development programs relating to agriculture. There must be less overlapping of such programs. Is it necessary year by year to increase the size of the federal Department of Agriculture when that bureaucracy must oversee and direct ever decreasing numbers of farmers? Surely that is another example of Professor Parkinson's dictum about the growth of bureaucracy.

I could mention other programs in which there is considerable overlapping at federal and provincial levels, programs to do with insurance, loan and trust companies, corporations and securities. Bill C-16, now before committee, deals with the so-called better protection of this country's depositors and borrowers; yet we are finding in the committee that many of the provisions of that bill are nothing but poorly-worded versions of laws already standing on the statute books of most of our provinces. We are proposing to subject business to these further regulations and costs. Why? Why can we not clear away this underbrush of legislation, do away with this overlapping of jurisdictions and provide Canadians with efficient government? The same point can be made with respect to matters of culture, heritage and sports. Why can we not streamline our methods and avoid duplication and overlapping?

I come now to the question of housing. Surely our high cost of housing stems from the fact that four levels of government, four jurisdictions, are involved in deciding whether a house can be built on a certain lot. Those jurisdictions are the municipal jurisdiction: sometimes, in some areas, the regional jurisdiction, the provincial jurisdiction and, finally, the federal government. The federal government has some say with respect to housing developments which may be under consideration. We must direct our attention to these questions and I am disappointed because there has been so little debate in this House on the important subject I am raising.

I raise another point. This government often pays lip service to the need for greater productivity in industry. But could we not increase our productivity by making the government less non-productive? For example, in the field of industrial development and trade promotion do we need overlapping activities? Do we need, in our international activities, the sort of duplication in consulting, information services and direct lending which now exists? Surely it is worth taking a fresh look at the subject with a view to seeing if we cannot simplify our procedures.

There is considerable overlapping of activities in the field of energy conservation. Actually, the activities of one department of government may run counter to the activities of another. Such lack of co-ordination is counterproductive. As well, one level of government may do something that from the viewpoint of another level of government is counterproductive. Certainly, the efforts of various levels of government to conserve energy are often counterproductive. In addition, we must streamline our programs of manpower training, unemployment insurance, services to immigrants, communications, research and statistics. I choose those programs since in those areas the federal government could well take the lead in providing more efficient services for the taxpayers we represent.

My second point is this. If we are to create a climate of confidence as between provincial and federal governments, a climate which is essential if there is to be a meaningful restructuring of programs, we must make certain that there is a greater degree of trust between provincial and federal levels of government. Here I raise something which is absolutely shameful. The federal government gave the provincial government of Ontario an undertaking with respect to the purchase of urban transit equipment. The Ontario government, on the strength of that undertaking, went ahead and arranged for the building of that urban transit equipment. Now that provincial government finds that the federal government is reneging on that commitment. That is absolutely unacceptable.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I apologize for interrupting the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens), but there have been some discussions among the parties on this matter. Since private members' hour would be shortened by the royal assent at a quarter to six, I wonder if there might be agreement to dispense with private members' hour today, to continue with the present debate and allow the hon. member for York-Simcoe to continue his speech this afternoon.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. Does the House agree unanimously to dispensing with private members' hour?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Pursuant to Standing Order 40, it is my duty to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock (Mr. Friesen)—External Affairs—Cuba—Suggested reconsideration of relationship in view of support of Rhodesian guerrillas; the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez)—Manpower—Practice of supplying workers to companies whose employees are on strike—Government position; the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Brisco)—Environmental Affairs—Arsenic pollution in Yellowknife—Discussion between minister and health minister prior to establishment of study group.

Does the House give unanimous consent to continuing the debate which was just interrupted by my announcement concerning the adjournment debate?

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL FISCAL ARRANGEMENTS AND ESTABLISHED PROGRAMS FINANCING ACT, 1977

MEASURE FOR MAKING CERTAIN FISCAL PAYMENTS AND OF ESTABLISHED PROGRAMS FINANCING CONTRIBUTIONS TO PROVINCES, ETC.

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale) that Bill C-37, to provide for the making of certain fiscal payments and of established programs financing contributions to provinces, to provide for payments in respect of certain provincial taxes and fees, and to make consequential and related amendments, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, I was touching on the government's reneging of its promise with regard to the purchase of certain urban transit equipment. That question, I suggest, merits some further investigation in this House. May I also touch on the extent to which the government's estimates as tabled in this House early last week show evidence of government restraint, or to what extent did the government create the illusion of restraint which is non-existent? To what extent did the government transfer a great bulk of its expenditures to other levels of government? Hon. members will no doubt recall that the former minister of finance, Mr. John Turner, said on June 23, 1975:

> The government proposes to set an example of restraint . . . by imposing strict control over its activities and programs.

With those words, the former minister of finance began a publicity offensive designed to convince Canadians that the federal government was serious about reducing the growth rate of its expenditures and was leading the way in restraint. On Wednesday of last week the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras) tabled the main estimates of federal spending for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1978. These estimates were the second set of main estimates tabled since Mr. Turner's statement. The effectiveness of the restraint program since then is best indicated by the fact that proposed federal budgetary spending, as measured by the main estimates, will be $8,934 million greater than at the time of Mr. Turner's statement—an increase of 27.7 per cent in two years. If restraint has been practised, it has not been apparent.

The latest set of main estimates appears to be a model of moderation, in them the government proposes to increase budgetary spending by only 7.1 per cent over the main estimates of fiscal year 1977. But as the figures will show, once again restraint has been more cosmetic than real. Once again, the positive signs of spending moderation are awash in a sea of extravagance.

The greatest single item of what the administration calls restraint has been achieved in the area of grants, contributions and transfer payments. This area of expenditure is forecast to grow by only 1.1 per cent compared to the 1977 main estimates. I point out that it was to these areas of expenditure that ministers formerly appealed when pleading that further restraint was impossible. The record shows, however, that restraint is indeed possible here, for reasons which I shall describe.

As a matter of fact, all transfer payments, subsidies and public debt payments show a considerable moderation in growth. These items formerly deemed uncontrollable, together grew by 3.5 per cent between the main estimates of 1977 and 1978. But where expenditures are more readily controllable, no such moderation is in evidence. The operating and capital expenditures of all departments and agencies are forecast to increase by 14.5 per cent over the same period—a rate more than double that about which the President of the Treasury Board was gloating last Wednesday when he brought these estimates down. When the former minister of finance argued that federal spending controls would be "giving a lead to others in the exercise of restraint", apparently what he meant was that others outside the federal bureaucracy should bear the burden of restraint so that the bureaucracy could maintain the profligate style to which it has become accustomed.

[The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier).]

In percentage terms, the planned increase in the number of people employed in the federal public service appears quite small. The number of man-years authorized by the Treasury Board, which excludes military personnel and employees of Crown corporations, will increase by 0.6 per cent from the main estimates for 1977 to 1978. While a marked reduction from the spectacular rates of growth of previous years, a 0.6 per cent increase still means that an additional 2,081 man-years have been authorized for 1978. Further, the rate of increase of planned continuing employees—permanent employees—is 1.1 per cent over the same period, so 3,137 permanent employees will be added in fiscal year 1978.

The discrepancy between the rates of personnel expansion for permanent employees and those for authorized employees reflects a declining proportion of part-time and casual employees as well as a greater ability and willingness of departments to allocate more salary funds to permanent employment. The development is the continuation of an established trend. On a main estimates basis, in fiscal year 1974 the proportion of permanent employees to authorized employees was 90.2 per cent; in fiscal year 1975, 91.6 per cent; in fiscal year 1976, 92.6 per cent; in fiscal year 1977, 93.0 per cent: and in fiscal year 1978 this proportion will rise to 93.4 per cent.

The number of employees involved in this shift to permanent employment can be illustrated by one example. If the fiscal 1978 proportion, 93.4 per cent, were replaced by the fiscal 1974 proportion, 90.2 per cent, 11,238 fewer employees would be allocated to permanent employment. I mention this because when such steps as these are taken by the federal government they generally end up with a counterstep being taken at the provincial government level. Bureaucracy at the federal level begets bureaucracy at the provincial level and the financial implications are significant.

In addition to the fact that greater proportions of authorized man-years are certain to be used up, full-time employees are eligible for the benefits of public service employment, particularly that of an indexed pension. As well, if the federal government ever should decide to make a concerted effort to reduce the size of the public service, it will be much more difficult to lay off permanent employees, who have a sort of tenure, than to simply discontinue the hiring of casuals. Wages and salaries within the public service, excluding Crown corporations, are forecast to rise by 10.7 per cent between the main estimates for 1977 and 1978. Some part of this increase is accounted for by the increased size of the public service, but still on a per-capita basis wages appear to be forecast to rise at a rate greater than that permissible during years two and three of the anti-inflation program—8 per cent down to 6 per cent.

It is unlikely that the federal government would be so blatant as to contravene its own AIB guidelines. If the public outcry against excessive federal spending has taught the present administration anything, it has taught it to be subtle and cunning in the ways in which expenditures may be raised. The reason per capita salary increases are likely to exceed 10 per cent may be traced to the continuation of the trend toward a greater proportion of higher echelon employment. While conclusive evidence cannot be supplied until the completion of a comprehensive study of the new estimates, a survey of departments indicates that a greater proportion of executive, professional and senior administrative persons are being appointed than technical, support and operational staff. In other words, the federal public service is becoming more and more top-heavy. The trend has been conclusively established for the period from fiscal year 1974 to fiscal year 1977, and it appears as if it is continued into 1978. Insufficient data is published to reveal the precise financial implications of the shift; however, the general implications of it are clear. Even excluding wage increases and staff increases, the average cost to the public purse of a civil servant is rising.

Another component of the cost of the federal bureaucracy is to be found under the heading "Other personnel costs", and again I draw attention to this because it is bound to provoke a like response at the provincial level. These costs, which include government contributions to pension funds as well as allowances of various kinds, have risen by 14.3 per cent from the main estimates 1977 to 1978. This category of expenditure has grown very quickly over recent years. Whereas government budgetary expenditures grew by 27.7 per cent between the main estimates of 1976 and those for 1978, "other personnel" costs grew by a remarkable 47 per cent. Yet the government dares tell the Canadian public it is showing restraint.

The inability of the present administration to control the size and cost of its bureaucracy is well illustrated, I suggest, by the figures I have cited. However, one sidelight which sets the tone for this inability may be added. The number of man-years authorized under Treasury Board control has increased by 2,081 between 1977 and 1978. The number of man-years authorized not under Treasury Board control has remained stable, and even decreased.

Another category of federal expenditure where restraint is not in evidence is that of "Purchase, repair and upkeep", the term used in the estimates, which grew by 19.7 per cent between the 1977 and the 1978 main estimates. This category does not include all the repair and upkeep costs of the government. Those which are undertaken by a department directly are accounted for elsewhere; this item only includes repairs and upkeep that is contracted out. Since the present administration began its restraint program, either breakages have been very high or departments have been less willing to perform repairs themselves. From 1976 to 1978 this category of expenditures is expected to increase by 69 per cent. I said repairs and upkeep are contracted out. It will be interesting to see to what extent they have been contracted out to friends of the Liberal party.

A further example of immoderation in spending is found under the heading of "Utilities, materials and supplies". Money expended under this heading is applied to the more prosaic "necessities" of the bureaucracy ranging from the gas bill and supplies for indigent Indians to mail bags and even paper-clips. While one might have hoped that significant restraint could have been achieved here, expenditures are forecast to grow by 13.9 per cent from the main estimates for 1977 to 1978; and by an amazing 40.1 per cent between 1976 and the upcoming fiscal year.

Other areas of significant increases in government expenditure are those of construction and acquisition of land and buildings—up 10.6 per cent—and machinery and equipment, up 15.6 per cent. Also of note is that the cost of funding the public debt has increased by 15.1 per cent, although this cost would only be controllable by bringing the rest of government expenditures under control. As mentioned previously, controversy over federal spending increases has taught the government to be cunning in the ways spending is increased. Not surprisingly, then, the single greatest spending increase in percentage terms occurs in the category for which there is little accounting: the term is "All other expenditures". All other expenditures include payments to Crown corporations and what the Treasury Board calls "Sundries". From main estimates 1977 to 1978, these expenditures increased by 30.3 per cent; from 1976 to 1978, by 49 per cent.

Crown corporations account for nearly 70 per cent of spending in this category, and spending in these corporations is forecast to average an increase in excess of 35 per cent. Crown corporations are those entities about which minister after minister stands in this House and tells us they will not respond to questions concerning their activities. How often are we told that these corporations have their own boards and that the boards are to be left as laws unto themselves, with no proper supervision by the House or those who are responsible to the House?

Large spending increases in this category are not confined to Crown corporations. Indeed, the very department that stands in the vanguard of the restraint program, the Treasury Board, is guilty of rapidly increasing spending in this area. The "All other expenditures" category of the central administration of the public service program of Treasury Board—meaning "Sundries" at the departmental level—is forecast to increase by an astonishing 978 per cent between main estimates 1977 and 1978.

Turning to areas of expenditure where restraint apparently has taken place, one may note an expenditure increase of 1.5 per cent on information, of 6.5 per cent on rentals and of 8.7 per cent on professional and special services. In these cases, however, it should be noted that restraint is forecast to take place in fiscal year 1978 only after a mammoth spending spree in fiscal year 1977. Since the announcement of the restraint program, taking main estimates 1976 as a base, spending on information has risen by 26.6 per cent; on rentals, by 43.3 per cent; on professional and special services, by 28.6 per cent. While it may be appropriate to applaud reformation in these categories, the conversion took place from a base of excess rather than normalcy.

I have mentioned that the principal area of expenditure restraint was in the category of grants, contributions and transfer payments. These payments, formerly called "uncontrollable" by the present administration, are forecast to increase by about 1 per cent between main estimates 1977 and 1978. Because expenditures here account for 56 per cent of total federal budgetary outlays, near to zero growth in this category has the effect of halving the over-all budgetary impact of increases in other areas.

Although the former minister of finance, John Turner, argued in his speech on June 23, 1975, that economy measures will prove to be very painful, the present administration has found that the pain of restraint can easily be lessened by good luck, and by transferring the burden of restraint to others the present administration can take the credit for economy measures while achieving very few economies on its own. In short, Mr. Speaker, as we discuss fiscal relationships with the provinces at the federal level it is clear that the federal government has been less than fair to its provincial counterparts.

Payments to other levels of government are forecast to increase by 1.4 per cent from the 1977 to the 1978 main estimates. Proposed changes in the fiscal arrangements between the federal and provincial levels, and the transfer of the former shared-cost programs to the provinces, account for much of the reduction in expenditure growth. Transfers to persons, including family allowances, the federal contribution to the Unemployment Insurance Commission, and old age security and the income supplement, will increase by 3.6 per cent.

Subsidy payments are forecast to decrease by almost 28 per cent. A reduction in the cost of maintaining the national oil price is the principal contributor to the spending decrease in this category; the reduction results from a higher national oil price. Reduced costs of maintaining the two-price wheat system also assisted in the spending decline. Other transfer payments are forecast to increase by 20.3 per cent, led primarily by spending on job-creation projects, regional economic expansion projects, and foreign aid payments.

Clearly, federal spending restraint is more illusory than real. If Canadians were to follow the example of the federal government in its 1978 main estimates presentation, the message to them would surely run thus, "Spend more and more, but hide it well. Make sure that others pay the bills. Above all, dissemble and deceive".

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Would the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) permit a question?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Is it agreed that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) ask a question?

[Mr. Stevens.]

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): In view of the criticism the hon. member has made of the way the government is treating the provinces, would he indicate how he is going to vote on this bill?

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, I am sure I would not want to end prematurely the suspense the hon. member is obviously in.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Before recognizing the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) I must advise the House that he will automatically be closing the debate on Bill C-37.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, just before the question is put, may I just deal with a number of points which have been raised in the debate. Firstly I should like to reply to the point made by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald), and repeated by a number of other members, that, in effect, the arrangements made between the federal and provincial governments in some way shut out any role parliament may have in this regard.

I certainly recognize that there is a contradiction or conflict between the situation of the House of Commons and the Senate on the one hand which have to enact the bill and the arrangements that had to be made between the two levels of government to provide the substance of it. I am not sure how this can ever be resolved.

One can be quite certain that if the federal government had brought forward these propositions first, not by presenting them to the provinces but presenting them in a debate in the House of Commons, one would have heard from the provinces, objections that they were being called to comment on a set of proposals that had not yet been presented directly to them and upon which they had not had the full opportunity of consultation. Inevitably, the process has to start somewhere. It seems equally inevitable that a federal-provincial agreement of this kind should be preceded, as this was, by extensive consultation, recognizing of course that the House of Commons must ultimately pass judgment on the proposals put forward.

One of the points raised by the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent), and repeated by a number of members by that group, is that the transfer of taxation benefits to the provinces as arranged under the established programs financing would provide an actual deprivation for the particular province. I point out that the arrangements here not only provide in favour of the provinces a transfer of taxation room which, of course, will mean a difference in the ability to recover costs from province to province depending on the relative income in each province, but in addition provide for an equalization factor.

Not only is the province with a lower income getting the benefit of the tax resource, but the federal government pays a special equalization payment to bring the transfer payment up to the national average levels. In that sense, it is quite true that one of the provinces with a higher range of income, such as Ontario, will have the benefit of growth over time of taxation points. At the same time, the less well-to-do provinces will be protected by this additional form of equalization.

One of the members who spoke this afternoon said that the federal government had approached these discussions on a "take it or leave it" basis. If that had really been our approach, if that had been the formula, we would hardly have spent 18 months in official, finance ministerial and prime ministerial discussion with the provinces. After the meeting of December 13, certain premiers came away from that meeting—Premier Davis was one—saying that it was a tough negotiation and, like every negotiation, they did not get everything they wanted; but on the whole it was a pretty fair deal worked out for the next five years. It was far from being a "take it or leave it" proposition. There was extensive negotiation and extensive adjustment by both parties. It can fairly be said it is a bargain that has been struck between the two levels of government, the agreement arrived at, and not in any sense imposed on the provinces.

The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald), and other members as well, referred to the so-called conditions that will apply with regard to the transfer for post-secondary education and with respect to the existing established programs for medical and hospital care. My colleague, the Secretary of State (Mr. Roberts), dealt with the circumstances surrounding post-secondary education. The fact is, as hon. members know, that the field of education is being jealously guarded by the provinces. There are at stake national interests in education such as the ones referred to by the hon. member, the ability of students to move from province to province without financial impediment and the meeting of certain national goals in education. The provinces have resolutely insisted on making this decision in the absence of any direction and, until recently, any participation by the federal government. We agree with the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands that it would be desirable to achieve these national goals in education. However, she should recognize that it is difficult to meet these goals when the provinces insist that the federal government should not have a substantial say in certain aspects of the program.

With regard to medical care and hospital care conditions, the famous four points that were in the basic program, we would anticipate that the program is being well established; it really requires no enforcement by the federal government to make sure that the four points are adhered to. The electors of the individual provinces will ensure that the level of hospital and medical services to which they have become accustomed and to which they are entitled will be maintained by the provincial governments.

We have had an extensive discussion not only of this bill, which I concede is a difficult bill, but on a broader basis. I anticipate that myself and my two colleagues will be participating at some length in committee on more detailed questions. Therefore, at this point I will let the debate rest as we move on to the next stage.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): All those in favour will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion (Mr. Macdonald, Rosedale) which was agreed to on the following division:

Mr. Speaker: I declare the motion carried.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Mr. Speaker: There having been some indication that a message may arrive from the other place for Royal Assent it behoves those hon. members who are anxious to participate in that important parliamentary experience to wait here, and those others who are not so inclined might feel free to carry on some other endeavours.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

A message was delivered by the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod as follows:

Mr. Speaker, the Honourable the Deputy Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this honourable House in the Chamber of the Honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, Mr. Speaker with the House went up to the Senate Chamber.

● (1800)

[English]

And being returned:

Mr. Speaker informed the House that the Deputy Governor General had been pleased to give, in Her Majesty's name, the Royal Assent to the following bills:

Bill C-22, An Act to amend the Statute law relating to income tax—Chapter No. 4.

[The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier).]

Bill C-15, An Act to amend the Customs Tariff—Chapter No. 5.

Bill C-21, An Act to amend the Excise Tax Act-Chapter No. 6.

Mr. Speaker: It being after six o'clock I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock this evening.

At 6.10 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

CANADIAN HUMAN RIGHTS ACT

MEASURE TO PROTECT PRIVACY OF INDIVIDUALS

The House resumed, from Thursday, February 17, consideration of the motion of Mr. Basford that Bill C-25, to extend the present laws in Canada which proscribe discrimination and that protect the privacy of individuals, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, last Thursday, when we were debating this bill and before ten o'clock arrived I had just managed to mention the case of Bill Buchanan, the former chairman of the Anti-Dumping Tribunal, who was treated by the government in a very shabby way. The record indicates very well the approach the government has taken in the past to the protection of personal privacy.

Perhaps I should recapitulate Mr. Buchanan's history very briefly. He had been chairman of the Anti-Dumping Tribunal. He had done some private work for glass companies when he was in private business. Consequently, he did not sit on the hearing which dealt with the subject of imported glass being dumped in Canada, feeling there might be a conflict of interest. However, following some conflicting legal advice, he joined with the other two members of the tribunal in signing the final judgement when it came out.

Two years later, in 1972, federal tax investigators swooped down on Mr. Buchanan claiming to be carrying out a tax audit, searched his files and took away some documents related to his previous dealings with the Canadian glass companies. It was the former minister of justice, the present Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang), the person who introduced the last bill which was ostensibly designed to protect individual privacy, who then moved in the courts to overturn the tribunal's decision. He also passed the file to Mr. John Turner, who was then minister of finance, and Mr. Turner demanded Mr. Buchanan's resignation. Mr. Buchanan submitted his resignation. Subsequently the case was taken to the Supreme Court and the justices unanimously threw the case out. I think it worth while in discussing this case to quote Chief Justice Laskin's ruling. It read, in part, as follows:

> I resist the temptation to expatiate on the way in which records were obtained from Buchanan and on the attempted use of the appellants' documents against Buchanan, although obtained on a confidential basis for the purposes of the Combines Investigation Act . . . or of the Income Tax Act. I say only that unjustified tactics were employed.

I mention this case because it demonstrates graphically the difference between the rhetoric of the government and its performance. It was the minister of finance at the time, Mr. Turner, who made the statement in the glowing phrase which I read into the record when last I spoke on this bill strongly in defence of the principle of protecting human privacy. And it was of course his colleague, the minister of justice, the predecessor of the present minister, with the responsibility for piloting human rights legislation through parliament, who was also responsible for this. Consequently, Canadians have every right to doubt the sincerity of the government.

I have already mentioned that no one really knows how many computerized data banks there are at the federal level. What is clear, however, is that both the number of files about individuals and the amount of information stored in them has grown daily. Let me give the House some examples. In 1974 I put two questions on the order paper asking what sort of computerized data banks there were in existence at that time. Although the information now is dated, I think it is worth while to take a look at some of the answers.

First of all, all government employees have files kept on them, most of which are computerized. Some departments make provision for their employees to see the files; others do not. The Department of National Revenue reported that a record is maintained for each individual required by law to file a T-1 return. At the present time records are maintained for approximately 12.8 million employees. There are some 250,000 corporation tax returns, and some 770,000 lists of employers who are making payroll deductions from employees. The Ministry of Transport has a computerized data bank for some 75,000 pilot licence holders.

The Department of National Health and Welfare has a computer data bank of families with children entitled to family allowances, including parents and children up to 19 years of age. There are some 3.5 million families and some seven million children who have personal files in that data bank. There are some 1.8 million recipients of old age pensions and some 1.1 million recipients of the guaranteed income supplement recorded in a computerized data bank. The department also holds files on some 10.3 million contributors to the Canada Pension Plan.

The Department of External Affairs has a new data bank which was established in 1974, which at that time had only 600,000 names, but which was planned to include some 3.5 million people by its fifth year. Also some 30,000 people whose passports are being processed at any one time, and some 20,000 people who are not to be issued passports or whose passports have been reported lost or found, are recorded in the data bank.

The Canadian Wheat Board keeps computerized files for some 240,000 producers whose names appear on Wheat Board delivery permits. The names of some 43,000 children of up to one year of age born with birth defects in New Brunswick, Ontario, Manitoba, Alberta and British Columbia since 1967 are also recorded, as is the following information: the hospital number and serial number, the name, date of birth, sex, the birth weight, the gestation period, the place of admission or death, the residence code, the place of residence, and types of abnormalities. Obviously, Mr. Speaker, in the past two years many new data banks have been created, and the numbers of people who are on files have grown enormously.

I want to deal briefly with one other file system that the government maintains, and this is the one at the Canadian Police Information Centre, CPIC, which became operational on July 1, 1972. At the present time there are over 850 terminals in Canada. CPIC is also tied into the National Crime Information Centre, NCIC, in Washington, and NCIC has over 40,000 terminals around the United States.

There are a number of different categories of personal information which are listed at CPIC. The most interesting and potentially dangerous ones are in the observation category, described by CPIC as follows: "A person who is suspected of committing an indictable offence but sufficient evidence is not available to prosecute". Note, Mr. Speaker, that these are people who have not been charged with any offence, and all that is needed to open up a computerized file on an individual, which can be kept open indefinitely and made available to police agencies throughout Canada and the United States, with no provision for the person concerned ever to know that he is in the computer, is the claim by an authorized police officer that he suspects that the individual may have been involved in a crime with which he has not been charged.

In that particular computerized file the sort of information that is kept includes a description of the person's activities and a list of people who are seen associating with him. I was concerned when I learned that there were 6,556 people included in this category as of April 20, 1975. However, I had my office check today and learned that in less than two years the figure has grown by over 50 per cent, and that as of today 10,046 people are listed in this particular category. No one would quarrel with the assertion that our police in Canada deserve the most modern and efficient weapons to fight crime. But we must also ensure that the rights of our citizens are protected.

What are some of the provisions, Mr. Speaker, that I would like to see included in the right to privacy legislation? First, I should like to see the portions of the bill dealing with privacy severed from the rest of the bill and reintroduced in amended form in the context of an information package dealing both with the question of freedom of information and that of privacy. The guiding principles behind the bill should be that information is the property of the citizens of Canada and not of the government. When the government wishes to coerce personal information from an individual, or when it wants to deny him information about how public policy is made or about how his money is being spent, the responsibility should be upon the government and not upon the citizen to prove its action is warranted.

Second, the substance of the legislation should be contained within the bill itself, so that parliament knows exactly what it is voting upon. It should not be left to the government to legislate by order in council.

Third, the dangerously broad discretionary powers given any minister to create data banks, whose very existence is secret, simply by exempting them from the provisions of the bill, should be ended.

Fourth, specific provisions outlawing the gathering of certain types of information about individuals, requiring the destruction of files once the purpose for which they were created has ended, providing for an individual's access to his files, and allowing him to challenge the contents of his files, must be included in this bill.

Fifth, there should be an information auditor, similar to the Auditor General, who should be charged with reporting to parliament on how completely departments are complying with the spirit of the act.

Finally, there should be recourse to the courts if an individual feels that he has been unfairly treated. This legislation before us now would allow the government to be judge and jury in its own case.

The development of the computer, like any other advance in technology, brings with it both a promise and a threat. If properly used, the computer will enable us not only to provide services for a growing population more quickly and efficiently, but it will also allow us to build safeguards into the system that will go further toward protecting individual privacy. But, if the government reneges on its responsibility to draw up tough rules for its own conduct, the future of our citizens at the hands of an evergrowing and ever more intrusive government is bleak.

In this bill the government asks parliament and the people of Canada to trust it to regulate itself and not to abuse its enormous power. On the basis of its record, this government has become the most distrusted and disliked in the history of Canada. But even if its record were different and it had proven itself worthy of Canadians' faith, a further question would remain, and that is whether democracy can function on faith alone. In a dictatorship there is little left for the citizens except faith and hope. But in a democracy we know that there should be statutory guarantees to protect the rights of our people.

As a Conservative I know that the interests of the state and the interests of the individual are often in conflict and I know that the bigger government becomes, the smaller each and every citizen becomes. I implore the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) to prove that his professed intentions of giving adequate protection to all our citizens are real by allowing the portions of this bill relating to privacy to be substantially amended at the committee stage. If he will do that, he will have the full support of the members on this side of the House.

But if the government refuses to keep faith with parliament and the Canadian people, one of the first actions of a new government led by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) will be to introduce tough and comprehensive legislation to ensure freedom of information and the right to individual privacy. That is a commitment we make to the Canadian people and, just as this administration will be judged on its record, we are prepared to be judged on ours.

Mr. F. A. Philbrook (Halton): Mr. Speaker, once again I am very proud to have the opportunity to debate in this House a bill presented by our government which is clearly well conceived and well attuned to the needs of a modern, civilized society. It is not surprising that the government should see fit, through the human rights legislation that we now have before the House, to guarantee the rights of all Canadians to fair and equal treatment from each other and to the utmost sensitivity from their government.

Briefly I should like to review some of the major innovations contained in this bill which underscore its relevance for present day Canada.

Mr. O'Sullivan: Put your notes aside and see if you can still remember them.

Mr. Philbrook: Take your own advice and tell that to your previous speaker. It is nice to see you in the House for a change.

Mr. O'Sullivan: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): The hon. member for Hamilton-Wentworth (Mr. O'Sullivan) is rising on a point of order.

Mr. O'Sullivan: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member might be excused in view of his recent introduction to this Chamber, which will be for only one term anyway. However, under the Standing Orders he cannot cast a reflection upon the attendance of any member. If he checks the record, he will see that I match his any day.

● (2020)

Mr. Philbrook: Mr. Speaker, I think both interruptions were unfortunate. I would like to continue on the point I was making.

First, this legislation will entrench once and for all, with the teeth of the law, specifically prohibited grounds of discrimination—race, national or ethnic origin, colour, religion, age, sex, marital status, conviction for which a pardon was subsequently granted, and physical handicap in relation to employment.

Here, I believe, is a large and very significant step forward from the set of ideals that has protected our rights until today, the Canadian Bill of Rights.

Second, I view as evidence of the government's sensitivity to the real needs of the day the categories of prohibited grounds for discrimination included in this legislation which cannot be found in the Canadian Bill of Rights. These are ethnic origin, age, marital status, conviction in the case of a subsequent pardon, and physical handicap in matters related to employment. Nowhere in the Bill of Rights are these considerations mentioned, yet we hear daily of men and women in their fifties who cannot get hired; of the disabled who are considered mentally deficient just because they do not look "normal"; of wives who cannot get work because they are expected to get pregnant instead.

A third innovation which should prove to be a landmark in the history of civil liberties in Canada is the provision for a federal human rights commission. Here, finally, we would have the mechanism required to ensure that our anti-discrimination laws are applied, and applied effectively.

Currently, enforcement of human rights is a highly fragmented process. The provinces each have their own commissions to take care of their areas of jurisdiction, while Part I of the Canada Labour Code and a disparate sprinkling of anti-discrimination statutes provide a modicum of protection at the federal level.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, protection of privacy is another area where the government is charting new paths for Canadian society.

On the one hand our citizens will be given the right to see personal information about themselves contained in government records and to correct it if need be. On the other, meanwhile, the government will curtail its own information-gathering activities so that citizens need not be swamped with requests for information irrelevant to their particular case every time they must deal with the government. Moreover, with provision for a privacy commissioner to act as an ombudsman in overseeing the implementation of this aspect of the bill, I believe the Canadian public will be more adequately protected than ever before from invasion of privacy and possible harassment by the government.

I would like to make a few remarks on three special areas—women, the handicapped, and language or linguistic rights. I would first like to comment on the subject of women.

To begin with, there is probably no group of individuals in our society more deserving of this legislation than the women of Canada. They have lobbied long and hard for legislation such as this, and it is high time they got it, particularly with reference to their participation in the labour force.

This legislation, when passed, should herald the end of female job ghettoes and unjust pay differentials between men and women. When the effects of this legislation take hold in the labour force, women in managerial positions and the service industries will no longer be earning less than half of what their male counterparts make; women in clerical occupations will no longer have their average earnings exceeded by approximately 50 per cent by men; women in sales occupations will no longer find themselves earning 150 per cent less than men.

Furthermore, the current trend toward greater participation by women in the upper echelons of government departments and the Crown corporations will be strengthened through the encouragement of affirmative action programs, as provided for in this bill.

As hon. members should know, this draft of the bill currently before the House has been revised from the previous human rights bill which died on the order paper last session. Included in this revised version is the concept of equal pay for work of equal value, as opposed to the conventional notion of equal pay for equal or similar work. In the words of the Woman and the Law Association of Ottawa, one of several organizations responsible for inclusion of this principle into the new bill, "it is time women were paid what they are worth".

I can foresee that, in fact, this aspect of the bill may well encounter strong opposition from employers claiming that implementation of such a principle is not practicable. I concede that this could indeed raise problems and that it should be looked into thoroughly when the bill is in committee. In the meantime, however, I would refer those concerned about this problem to a publication prepared by the Department of Manpower and Immigration entitled "The Canadian Classification and Dictionary of Occupations".

This formula is not perfect, as my colleague, the hon. member for Trinity (Miss Nicholson), has indicated on a previous occasion in this House, but it is certainly a healthy beginning.

Since 1970 the Royal Commission on the Status of Women has been seeking legislative action by the federal government on some 122 recommendations. This bill, incorporating about 30 of those recommendations, would bring our record of implementation up to approximately 103 of 122 proposed by the commission. This record, I believe, indicates the government's serious desire to make up for lost time and provide women with every opportunity to gain an equal footing with men in our society.

The other area I would like to touch on, Mr. Speaker, pertains to protection of the handicapped. As a physician, and one concerned about this country's problems in the field of health care, I am especially pleased to note the extra provision included in this draft of the legislation designed to protect our handicapped citizens from discrimination in the work place.

Like the vast majority of women in Canada, most of our physically handicapped are financial dependants. As they have emphasized repeatedly, however, they do not want, nor do they need, simple handouts from the government or any other source. What they desire is the opportunity to secure a good job and fend for themselves. What has gotten in their way are old-fashioned attitudes and innate prejudice on the part of employers that an individual who does not look "normal" on the outside is necessarily "abnormal" inside as well. On top of this I would suggest that, to date, these people have not been given adequate help in trying to locate jobs which would be suited to their particular talents.

For these reasons, therefore, I believe that the protection extended to handicapped people through this bill should have profound repercussions on how we view these people in the future. Moreover, the sooner we can change employers' attitude the sooner we shall be able to draw upon the talents and productive capacity of these people as they contribute more fully to the general prosperity of the country.

[Translation]

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I would like to point out the impact of this bill on the issue that in the eyes of all Canadians is undoubtedly the most important at this time—national unity.

In 1908, on the occasion of the tricentennial of Quebec City, Sir Wilfrid Laurier stated:

"We are proud to say that Canada is the freest country in the world, that all civil and religious liberties are recognized here."

Mr. Speaker, I want to say that such pride is no longer enough today. We can no longer be satisfied with judging the quality of our freedom by comparing ourselves to other countries because there is no doubt that compared to the U.S.S.R., Chile or South Africa we are a free nation but that is not saying much. So we must aim for a higher ideal, an ideal based on our own set of values and reflecting those moral values.

In the Canadian context language rights are a basic element of both individual liberties and national unity. Such rights must therefore be guaranteed and recognized by legislation similar to that which is now before us. In that sense it gives me great pleasure to see that Bill C-25 provides for the creation of a Human Rights Commission which:

(a) shall develop and conduct information programs to foster public understanding of . . . the principles described——in the Act and—

(b) shall undertake and sponsor research programs relating to its duties and functions—

—under the Act.

I share the opinion that, in most cases, bigotry and racism are caused by ignorance. The act, by allowing us to know one another better, will therefore play a very important role. I cannot stress enough the importance of the task entrusted to the Commission and the need for the latter to be able to count on the full support it needs to fulfill it. In this area we can no longer afford the luxury of failure.

On the other hand, I would also like to stress that the legislation as it now stands does not include language as a prohibited ground of discrimination. If any true significance is to be attached to human rights, as this bill apparently suggests, and if we really want to ensure that every Canadian has a right to deal with the government—

● (2030)

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I ask hon. members to listen to the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Philbrook).

[Translation]

Mr. Philbrook: —as the bill seemingly suggests, and if we really want to ensure that every Canadian has the right to deal with the government in either one of our official languages, I would then feel that such a ground of discrimination should also be included in the act.

The air controllers issue for one amply demonstrates the extreme difficulty of the language rights issue. But if we are to safeguard national unity, there is no choice. We must tackle that problem.

Mr. De Bané: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. The hon. member for Matane (Mr. De Bané) on a point of order.

Mr. De Bané: Mr. Speaker . . .

[English]

Mr. Speaker, I was most disgusted to see that when the hon. member switched to the French language, members on the other side laughed. I cannot stand that.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. De Bané: I have been watching for some time those who interrupted the hon. member only when he spoke French.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. De Bané: Let there not be hypocrisy here. I will not stand for it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please.

An hon. Member: Cheap shot.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): The remarks of the hon. member should be addressed to the Chair.

[Translation]

Mr. Philbrook: As far as I am concerned, my belief is it will be much easier, once linguistic rights are enshrined in the human rights bill, to deal with this issue in a quiet, courteous and legal way.

[English]

These then, are the observations I would make with reference to Bill C-25 at this time, Mr. Speaker.

As I said earlier, I believe it is an excellent piece of legislation which will go a long way in righting some of the wrongs which have plagued our society in recent years. I have taken the opportunity, meanwhile, to suggest areas where perhaps the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs would do well to focus its attention and recommend additional improvements. In its entirety, however, I have no hesitation whatsoever in voting for passage of Bill C-25 through second reading, and indeed I congratulate the minister on his fine efforts in this area.

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, the last speaker indicated the necessity for passing this bill on Canadian human rights because the underlying base of this bill is tolerance, but we saw a display of intolerance in the last few minutes, especially when the hon. member for Halton (Mr.

Philbrook) spoke. I heard the remarks of the hon. member for Matane (Mr. De Bané) and I say to him that we must not be intolerant of intolerance. It is very important to be tolerant of those who are intolerant.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gilbert: I hope that we will approach some of the problems of national unity which we are facing, in a very tolerant way, otherwise we will have a divided country.

I promised that I would speak for only a few minutes because most of us want to pass the bill tonight and send it to committee to be examined in detail. I might say that all the lead spokesmen of the different parties have praised the main principle of the bill, which I think is a worth-while bill and which all of us welcome. I might say that all the provinces have passed similar bills, and this one is the final bill to give human rights to all Canadians. Therefore, it is a very important bill.

If I were to use a text, I would use the text that eternal vigilance is the price of liberty. From the commencement of time we have seen the trampling and violation of human rights, but in the last generation we have seen serious violations of the liberties of man. I cannot help but think of what happened during World War II and subsequently, and I cannot forget what we in Canada did to the Japanese Canadians. I think it behooves all of us to remember this. In a few months a conference will be held in Belgrade on the Helsinki Agreement. We should keep in mind the trampling and violation of human rights which the people in eastern Europe have suffered, and we should keep in mind some of the terrible discrimination suffered by our black friends in the south. We should also keep in mind the necessity for eternal vigilance because it is the price of liberty.

I hope that this is the first of three steps. When I read the speech of the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Fairweather) I noted that he said we had the Canadian Bill of Rights but that it was not enshrined in our constitution. It was his hope, as I am sure it is the hope of many of us, that we will reach the stage when we can enshrine the Canadian Bill of Rights in the constitution. It is something for which the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) should be remembered. I share the thoughts of the hon. member for Fundy-Royal and his hopes that we will finally enshrine our Bill of Rights in the constitution.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gilbert: There is one other matter that we should remember, that is, the Universal Declaration of Human Rights which was passed by the United Nations on December 16, 1948. The main thrust of that Declaration is that all human beings are born free and equal, in dignity, and with rights. We in Canada have not seen fit at this stage to adopt a country-wide declaration of human rights. It seems to me that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) and the government should give leadership in Canada and move toward the adoption of such a declaration. It should go hand in hand with the Canadian Bill of Rights, and it should go hand in hand with the Canadian human rights legislation we are studying at the present time.

● (2040)

I think the main purpose of this bill is to define the prohibited grounds for discrimination, which are race, national or ethnic origin, colour, religion, age, sex, marital status, physical handicap in relation to employment, or conviction for an offence where a pardon has been granted.

As set forth, the types of discriminatory practices covered in this connection are refusal to employ, a differentiation between persons with regard to promotions, discrimination in advertising of jobs or in questionnaires to be filled out when applying for a job, the exclusion of individuals from membership in employee organizations or segregation of members, refusal to employ the physically handicapped whose handicap does not interfere with performance, and differentiation in wages based on jobs of equal value in the same firm. These are some of the things covered by the legislation, and the setting up of a human rights commission would be for the purpose of enforcing these provisions.

It has been said before, and it should be repeated, that we hope the approach of the commission will be an approach of conciliation rather than prosecution, because in the final analysis conciliation is the proper approach. We cannot legislate freedom; we have to persuade people to be free and to allow freedom for all persons.

I feel that I represent a riding which is a microcosm of the United Nations. The Broadview riding embraces all the races and nationalities of this world. When I moved into the riding in 1948, it was 98 per cent Anglo-Saxon, but as of today it is about 45 per cent Anglo-Saxon, and the rest is made up of the different races and nationalities of the different parts of the world. Hon. members can appreciate the stresses and strains which are imposed on a constituency like Broadview. However, those stresses and strains can be multiplied throughout the city of Toronto and in some of the other, main cities across the dominion.

In recent months we have seen some forms of racism in the city of Toronto. Most Torontonians are not proud of the acts of a small number with regard to the treatment of minorities there. There has been an attempt to reduce the amount of racism in Toronto by trying to bring about a change of attitude in the people who live there. This bill gives some strength and force to the protection of human rights for all persons of all nationalities. Therefore it strikes me as a bill which is very important, and I think all have said that it is important to have as its underlying basis the process of conciliation instead of prosecution.

In a city like Toronto there is not much to be gained by a large number of prosecutions for violations, but I can see a great deal to be gained by the approach of some churches, schools, and social organizations within the communities in an effort to learn the different cultures, languages, and backgrounds of the different people. I am proud to say that within my riding a group has organized which has held meetings which were attended by people of different races and nationalities. They have shared their common heritage and their differences in language and culture, and the results have been very encouraging. That is an educational approach, and with a change of attitudes the spirit of conciliation will bring about a fulfillment of basic human rights.

If there is one part of the bill which needs study it is the part dealing with the protection of personal information. My colleague, the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin), was very critical and harsh with regard to those provisions. Tonight the hon. member for Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo (Mr. Beatty) told us how many organizations are compiling data with regard to persons and their activities across Canada. The compilation of records is massive, it is mountainous, and in some ways it is quite scary.

Mr. Friesen: And secret.

Mr. Gilbert: And, as the hon. member says, possibly secret. I hope the minister will review these parts of the bill, that when the bill gets to committee he can defend his position, and that there can be some assurance that there will be full protection of personal information, because this is important.

Those are the main comments I wanted to make on this bill. I hope Canadians are the most tolerant people in the world. I hope we can be tolerant about intolerance. I hope we can move forward with an expression of conciliation and with a change of attitude so that we can have a united Canada rather than a divided Canada. I hope this measure strengthens the bulwark of liberty within Canada and strengthens basic human rights, and that we as Canadians will dedicate ourselves and our work to the full acceptance of the principles set forth in this bill.

Mr. Peter P. Masniuk (Portage): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to take part in this debate at second reading of Bill C-25, to be known as the Canadian Human Rights Act. All hon. members are aware that this legislation is not new and that it has been around for some time in one form or another. During the last session it was Bill C-72. In spite of that, however, Bill C-25 does represent, as far as I know, an original effort on the part of the government to provide some form of human rights protection at the federal level.

We in this party have no real quarrel with this legislation. Other spokesmen for our party have said earlier that we are prepared to allow the bill to proceed through the House at second reading as quickly as possible, so my remarks will therefore be brief.

The areas of discrimination which this bill will proscribe, and the fundamental human and civil rights which it would protect, are very necessary, worth-while and long overdue measures for enshrinement in a federal statute. Certainly the federal government lags far behind all the provincial governments in the area of civil or human rights legislation.

Part I of this bill would make it an offence to discriminate on most of the usual traditional grounds such as race, ethnic origin, skin colour, sex, and also adds a few innovative ones. Of course age discrimination is not new, but it is a very common discrimination today against which protection is necessary. Marital status as grounds for discrimination in relation to employment is also something which I am pleased to see included in this bill. Most of us are aware, I am sure, of instances in which a job applicant was discriminated against because he or she was single, or in some cases because he or she was married, or widowed, or divorced.

Also in relation to employment this bill would make it an offence to discriminate on the grounds of a physical handicap. Unfortunately, however, the bill seems to be more concerned here with actual physical disabilities, such as blindness, or paralyzed or amputated limbs, and although epilepsy is specifically included it does not seem that a disease like diabetes, for instance, is included as a grounds for discrimination in employment. Mr. Speaker, I am sure that all members are aware of the rather celebrated case which occurred up in Pembroke, I think it was, a few months ago, in which a telecommunications clerk was fired because he was a diabetic. Here is an example of discrimination taking place practically on parliament's doorstep. How can we as Canadian parliamentarians defend ourselves against the frequent charge made today that parliament is irrelevant in the modern, contemporary life of this nation, if we cannot address ourselves to a situation like this involving discrimination? The physical handicap clauses of Bill C-25 should be given some more attention in committee.

Making it an offence to discriminate against anyone who was convicted of a crime for which a pardon was later granted is a worth-while protection against a certain type of discrimination. I think, though, that discrimination against convicts who have already served their sentence or otherwise paid the penalty is a far more common type of discrimination against which some protection should be provided in law. Maybe some would say that the percentage of convicts trying to go straight is not very large, but nevertheless this is still discrimination when it occurs. Broadening this part of the bill in this way would seem to be the only logical extension of the type of human rights protection which is envisaged in this particular clause.

I think that the general tone of this bill in the area of proscribed grounds for discrimination is quite progressive on the whole. Perhaps it is too bad that the drafters of the bill could not also have included a few other categories of discrimination such as certain types of unpopular or dissenting political views, as well as religious ones, plus certain types of what are known as alternative lifestyles, that is, interpersonal relationships, and perhaps also sexual orientation, as proscribed grounds for discrimination. These things today are, after all, only in accord with contemporary reality and modern schools of thought or opinions on these subjects. They no longer shock us the way they once did, Mr. Speaker, and extending legislation into these areas does not have the same radicalism about it that it once had. Certainly the only true concept that can underlie any genuine human rights legislation is that social or public discrimination based on one's privately-held beliefs or on one's private life, which is not society's business to begin with, is just as unjust as discrimination based on race or skin colour.

The other provisions of this bill do seem to be real attempts to deal with some contemporary discrimination problems. We have the usual prohibition against discriminatory signs and notices. This would make illegal the notorious "No Englishmen need apply" type of signs which were common in western Canada a half century ago. Of course discrimination today is much more subtle than this. As well as signs and notices, this bill also deals with the use of the telephone to spread racism and discrimination. The universal and automatic telephone has today become an easy tool for the racist hate mongers, and this bill addresses itself to that problem by making the use of telephones for racist hate campaigns an illegal act, subject to fine or imprisonment.

Of course, Mr. Speaker, proscribing certain practices as discriminatory, and protecting in law certain fundamental human rights, are useless unless the law can be enforced, and for this purpose Bill C-25 provides for a Canadian human rights commission. It is intented that the independence of this commission will be ensured by having the eight members of the commission appointed by order in council and removable only on an address of the House of Commons and the Senate.

I think it is interesting that the bill does not limit the human rights commission to an enforcing role but also gives it an educational, or what should perhaps more accurately be described as a public relations role. Human rights in Canada would be furthered through public education programs, although it is hard for me to envision how these programs would take place in practice. As part of its public education role the commission could conduct research into discrimination. This is an interesting power to give to the commission. However, it is one which I think could be easily abused. The research would have to be of a hard, practical nature. The nature and scope of prejudice and discrimination have been thoroughly studied by now by various social scientists, and any research which the Canadian human rights commission might do would have to be useful and original and not just chasing after some will-o'-the-wisp.

In addition to this power to undertake research, the commission would also be able to review and comment on federal regulations, rules and orders, to ensure that they are consistent with the principles stated in the bill. This is a very unusual power, with the possible exception of the Anti-Inflation Act, Bill C-73. I think that this is one of the very few times that a bill sets up an internal mechanism for reviewing its own application and enforcement.

It is the latter part of this act, the privacy or protection of personal information provisions of Bill C-25, which our party does not like, Mr. Speaker. These provisions would give an individual access to personal information about himself which is contained in information banks maintained by certain federal government departments or agencies. Bill C-25 in this part makes a weak gesture into the area of freedom of information, but that is the best that one can say about it. I know that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) think that this particular aspect of this bill is a tremendous and progressive innovation in Canadian legislation and, given the closeted secrecy which for so long has characterized this government, I suppose that is probably true. But this is not 1940 or 1950, Mr. Speaker. The examples of other countries, particularly the United States and Sweden, show us what can be done in the area of access to government files.

I know that Bill C-25 is not meant to be freedom of information legislation, but the Prime Minister himself suggested at a press conference a few weeks ago that the protection of personal information provisions of this bill might be some sort of substitute for it. This is absurd. It is just another example, similar to the so-called gun control bill of last year, of the government trying to give the impression of doing something about a situation while not really doing anything substantial about it at all. The exemptions attached to this right of access to personal information banks in the federal government are so widespread and comprehensive that in practice this whole part of the bill will be worthless. For instance, I see in the schedule attached to this bill that one of the federal government agencies which the individual would presumably have access to is the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. However, one of the exemptions provided against access of the individual is, and I quote:

> . . . information or matter . . . obtained . . . in the course of investigations pertaining to the detection or suppression of crime generally.

But by definition a police force's very function is the detection and suppression of crime, and all of the information which it possesses will be obtained through such investigations. In practice this means that nothing in RCMP files will be accessible to anyone. Mr. Speaker, this matter is not just academic, in light of the Prime Minister's statements in this very House only a few days ago that the RCMP probably has files on millions—and those were the words he used—millions of Canadians. This part of Bill C-25 is a good example of how not to approach the whole issue of giving the individual greater access to some government information.

Hon. members are aware that our party has advocated a true freedom of information act for some time. The hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) has spent a great deal of time and effort on this, but his tremendous efforts do not seem to have had any effect on the government. I wonder how long the government can go on denying the Canadian public what the citizens of many other democratic states now take for granted. The denial of something which has become such a populist public issue is a position which is, for any government today, almost indefensible. There has not been a time in our recent history during which the public has been so suspicious of government. I am amazed that the present Liberal government, which is already facing such a crisis of confidence among the Canadian people, would adopt such an intransigent attitude with respect to the freedom of information issue.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): The hon. member is against television in the House.

Mr. Masniuk: I said earlier that my comments tonight will be brief. I will not say any more about Bill C-25 at this time. As I indicated earlier, in spite of the many reservations which we have about clause 4 of this bill, our party supports the principle of Bill C-25, the Canadian Human Rights Act.

Mr. Arnold Malone (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, I take great pleasure in speaking this evening on Bill C-25, the Canadian human rights bill. I think members of all parties support the principle of this bill.

According to archaeologists, human civilizations date back at least 50,000 years. For most of that time the law of civilized societies dealt with commodities, commerce and property. Only recently in human history has the focus of attention shifted to human rights, to a person's feelings which are not part of the external, objective world, but which are most important to every human being.

I am pleased to be a member of the political party which brought forward the Bill of Rights, the cornerstone of our human rights legislation. I say that although my party will vote for the bill, it will by no means end the discussion on human rights in Canada. This bill is only the beginning of the whole debate on human rights which must take place in this country. We have embarked on a new era for human rights, because really for the first time we are passing a law which has to do with a person's feelings, not with trade, commerce, commodity or property rights.

All this being so, is it not ironic that at this very time when the parliament of Canada is debating this human rights legislation, the government refuses to give a strong rebuke to the government of Uganda for its involvement in the death of an archbishop of that country and two Ugandan cabinet ministers, deaths which occurred under conditions of great secrecy and grave doubt? Surely our human rights philosophy must be extended, must be projected to govern our international relations with other countries. In other words, it will not be sufficient to establish fundamental human rights in this country without paying attention to the question of human rights generally in the world.

Historically we have come a long way. We are to enshrine in law the rights of persons. We are passing a law which does not deal with trade, or commercial relations. However, let me point out that passage of this bill will not give us assurance of adequate human rights in Canada. We must recognize that other laws and regulations must be amended if we are to advance significantly our concept of human rights. Perhaps I can give hon. members one or two examples of what I mean.

This human rights bill will not, by itself, assure all of equal opportunities. Why do I say that? At present a farmer is allowed to claim a deduction of $1,830 for his working farm wife. Mr. Speaker, we all know that you cannot hire help on the farm for that sum. But the farmer's wife works on the farm; she may be hauling bales, milking cows, or doing any number of farm chores. Under our tax laws the farmer is not entitled to claim her as a hired employee—although this difficulty is partly overcome if he incorporates the farm. As matters now stand, the farmer is not entitled to treat his wife as a hired employee for tax purposes; he is entitled to claim a deduction of only $1,830 for his wife who may work full-time on the farm. Such laws must be changed in the name of equity.

Full human rights must be granted to all, and all must be treated fairly. Unfortunately many of our laws treat our native Indians as if they are of second-class status. I am aware of the provisions of the Indian Act and the historical background to that act. Unfortunately, the law abuses our native peoples. The unemployment rate among native peoples is high, as high as 95 per cent on some Indian reserves. At present our national labour force statistics do not include native Indians among the unemployed. Why not, Mr. Speaker? If we are to provide adequate human rights for all our people, we must change many of our laws which presently restrict human rights in Canada. I see no reason for not counting among the unemployed our unemployed native citizens. They should be included in unemployment statistics when those are put forward.

The hon. member for Halton (Mr. Philbrook) spoke about the handicapped, and I wish to draw to the attention of the House the existence of regulations which discriminate against certain disabled people. I suggest that such regulations must be corrected if we are to ensure human rights for all. At present those who are blind, confined to a wheel chair, or completely bedridden are allowed a tax deduction of $1,400 a year over and above the normal tax allowance. My quarrel is with the way in which the categories of the incapacitated are defined. The three categories mentioned are entitled to the full tax deduction. Unfortunately other people who are totally incapacitated for health reasons are not included under those provisions of our tax laws.

Last fall when I was in British Columbia I met a number of people in Kamloops who were seriously ill. One of them had had a heart attack, another was wearing a metal brace because of a severe back problem. These people wanted a tax deduction equivalent to that available to the blind, bedridden, or those in wheel chairs. Their request was turned down. As a matter of fact I received a letter on this subject just today. Surely those people are entitled to be treated in the same way as those in the first category I mentioned. I am citing these examples to show that we must amend many of our regulations and laws, otherwise some of our citizens will be denied their human rights. As I said, passage of this bill will not, by itself, bring full equity to all Canadians. Unless we change our other laws and regulations, we shall not see full human rights in Canada.

This bill should establish the broad parameters of human rights in Canada. I believe the bill should place a high degree of trust in the courts. Its interpretation will, no doubt, be subject to variation in accordance with our changing Canadian culture.

It would be naive to assume that legislation could ever be written in such a way as to ensure human responses in all circumstances. Perhaps I might give some examples in this regard. It is stated in the bill there is not to be any discrimination on the ground of age. The fact is that, in the absence of opportunities for the courts to make judicial decisions in this regard, discrimination in this sphere will continue to take place. One must certainly question what appears to be happening at the present time—the concept of forced retirement which is so often approved by labour unions as well as by management, business people, and government institutions.

People are considered to be useful and employable at the age of 64, and somehow fit only to be passengers at 65. It seems to me this is not only a tremendous waste of talent and skill but that it is really an affront within the context of this bill. It is an affront to all our human rights because to remain meaningfully involved in our country's affairs is the prerogative, surely, of any citizen. Nevertheless, given the manner in which society is structured at present, the bill before us will not alleviate the situation.

People over 65 who want to work and who have the capacity to work will not be given the opportunity to continue. I am speaking now about the discrimination in respect to age. The bill is not sufficiently specific to be useful in this regard. We read that among citizens over 45 years of age, 37 per cent of the unemployment is long term, while for men of all ages only 27 per cent is long term unemployment. Again, we can turn to the analysis of the data relating to the job retraining program which clearly indicates that citizens over the age of 65 are denied the advantages available to younger people. What we find, then, is personal discrimination in Canada based on age. The bill before us, of itself, fails to take adequate steps in the direction of removing this discrimination.

I should like now to talk for a few moments about the concept of equal pay for equal work, specifically as it is applied to women. The words themselves are, of course, poetic rhetoric. Most women are cast into job ghettoes which are cemented by tradition. The nurse, the telephone operator, the secretary, the bank teller and the waitress can all enjoy equal pay for equal work and still be undervalued. In recent years, according to Statistics Canada, the gap between wages paid to men and wages paid to women for similar work has widened.

The real test should not be "equal pay for equal work" but rather whether the person who is being paid measures up in terms of skills expected, effort exerted, responsibility demonstrated, and training or experience required. Conditions of work are a further factor which should be taken into consideration. To take any other view is simply to say that those jobs which have traditionally been reserved for the female part of the population will continue to be so, and that those engaged in them will receive lower salaries and wages than are paid to others employed in work to which different forms of measurement are applied when estimating its value to Canadian society.

I turn now to other aspects of the bill which ought be examined carefully, both here and later in the committee. I refer first of all to Part I, clause 11(1), which states:

> It is a discriminatory practice for an employer to establish or maintain differences in wages between male and female employees employed in the same establishment who are performing work of equal value.

The question is: why is this principle limited only to pay discrimination by sex? Why are the other prohibited grounds of discrimination such as race, religion, and age not included in this clause?

I turn next to another clause of the bill which also needs to be reviewed, in my opinion. I refer to clause 3 in part one which sets out the proscribed grounds of discrimination as follows:

> For all purposes of this act, race, national or ethnic origin, colour religion, age, sex, marital status, conviction for which a pardon has been granted, and, in matters related to employment, physical handicap, are prohibited grounds of discrimination.

You will note, Mr. Speaker, that this list is much less inclusive than is the United Nations Declaration of Human Rights. That 1948 Declaration was ratified by the federal government in 1976, after provincial consultation and agreement. Article II reads:

> Everyone is entitled to all the rights and freedoms set forth in this declaration, without distinction of any kind, such as race, colour, sex, religion, language, political or other opinion, national or social origin, property, birth or other status.

While we have taken a step forward, the government has failed to go even as far as the United Nations in this regard because the definition I have just read in connection with prohibited discrimination suffers from being a closed list in the legal sense that anything not included within it is automatically excluded.

A bill of rights is a bill of principles, not a catalogue of acceptable behaviour. What we really find in the bill placed before us is a catalogue of behaviour rather than an acceptable set of principles subject to a judgment which is left to the courts. The government has sought to anticipate all the possible behaviour of human beings and to determine which kinds of behaviour are acceptable and which are not, without recognizing the fact that it is not possible to predict the changing conditions of our culture. What would be acceptable today might, therefore, not be acceptable at some future time.

The purpose of Part IV of Bill C-25 is to protect the privacy of individuals. While it has been well stated by many members of this party that this part of the bill is one of the most offensive parts to the members on this side, the bill at most gives citizens the right to inspect their files which are held in government information banks. The truth of the matter is that the bill does not define the limits or conditions within or under which the government or any other agency may collect or store information on persons. It is not enough just to be able to inspect individual files in this country; what is more important is that there should be limits placed on the kind of criteria establishing such information banks on individuals.

Far more important than this kind of restriction on the right to inspect files is to impose strict conditions upon the government establishing, either on its own behalf or through any other private agency, a data bank on human beings in this country. This provision is not made in the bill but I hope it can be discussed in committee and amendments made to the bill, so there is not only the right to question the kind of data that are kept on individuals, but so the law itself spells out clearly the limitations placed on the keeping of information on the citizens of Canada. To do otherwise, I think, would be a great affront to Canadian freedoms and human rights.

I should also like to point out that while the bill provides the right to inspect our files, it does not give us the right to appeal any misjudgment that we believe exists on those files. As the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) said a couple of days ago when he was speaking on this measure, there is no right of appeal provided; the only recourse is to a bureaucratic tribunal, not to the non-partisan judgment of the Canadian courts. So in a case where there is a file kept on a person and the person is not satisfied that the information on the file is accurate or that there should be a file, he does not have full access to the Canadian court system. This kind of biased perspective should not be in a bill that embraces the concept of the Canadian Bill of Rights.

Bill C-25 provides that the privacy of individuals should be protected to the greatest extent consistent with public order and well-being. Compare this modest statement with the wording of the principle enshrined in Article 12 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights of 1948, which states as follows:

> No one shall be subjected to arbitrary interference with his (or her) privacy, family, home or correspondence, nor attacks upon his (or her) honour and reputation. Everyone has the right to the protection of the law against such interference or attacks.

While the government has taken a step forward, it is not as significant a step as we would like to see. To say that we have the right to inspect our files is certainly admirable. But what the bill does not provide is even more important, and that is the setting down of conditions under which any agency in this country can collect data and, file that data away. If we are truly interested in the protection of individual and human rights in this country, that protection would be narrowly defined and cast into the cement of the law. Then agencies would not be able to collect data on people unless they fell within that definition. It is often difficult to find out who has the information, let alone go to the file to see the information for ourselves.

It has been a privilege to speak on this bill, Mr. Speaker, and I want to congratulate the House for having come this far, where we are not only talking about commodity rights, the rights of commerce, trade and property, but also are starting to talk about the rights of human beings. But this bill has not taken the complete step forward. Many changes will need to be made as well to other pieces of legislation. I hope the minister will be amiable enough in committee to make a number of amendments which will tighten up the bill in certain areas, so as to move away from the concept of cataloguing human behaviours. Rather, we should establish the broad principle of the bill and a framework to work within, from which we will develop a proud Canadian act that protects the human rights of all Canadians.

[Mr. Malone.]

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, it has been a pleasure to listen to the speeches made on this bill. As the previous speaker has said, we have come so far as to talk not only about protection of the rights of commerce and other fields of endeavour, but also about human rights. A few years ago the United Nations passed the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and we in this country passed an act having to do with a Canadian Bill of Rights. We are now talking about placing a code of rights into our constitution, so it seems to me we have come a long way.

The hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Gilbert) pointed out very clearly that the bill has many good parts, and that it places in federal legislation provisions that appear in many pieces of provincial legislation. But what the bill does not cover, certainly according to representatives of the Canadian Bar Association, is the protection of personal information and the right to privacy.

It is all very well for lawyers to tell us that we should examine the information on which the government assesses us as individuals, but I am sure most Canadians would ask what business it is of the government to collect such information in the first place. What business has the government to collect information which is not collected to protect the security of the nation? If I were a bank robber and crook—

Mr. O'Sullivan: Then you would be a Liberal.

Mr. Peters: Not necessarily. While I have not engaged in the activities I named, I once did have an RCMP file for some time containing information that I knew about. It also had some information dealing with my small part in a very major strike in the gold mining industry, and some difficulties I had had with the Ontario Supreme Court. There was also information on some small matters, like a little case of assault and battery in which I was involved in some court case. But then the information went on to disclose that I was a rabble rouser, a dangerous character because I had engaged, innocently, as Your Honour would be well aware, in some small disagreement with the government over a veterans' school. The government did not have a very big majority at that time and was very upset about the way that certain discussions had been carried on. There were number of little things like that which were not significant to the security of the nation. However, I have no objection to that being collected because it may lead to something the country should know about. Certain agencies should be established to collect that information.

● (2130)

However, under no circumstances is it important how much money my children receive in family allowances. What business is that of anyone's? The government has to keep an account in order to make a payment. The fact that I receive so much for each child is an accounting detail. Why should that information be put into a computer bank? This is particularly important when you have grandchildren, or possibly great grandchildren. What is the significance of collecting that kind of information? However, that is the kind of information the government collects. In fact it collects a lot of information we do not even know about.

There are now television cameras on Parliament Hill. They scan the area and, if it is desired, pictures are taken of anyone who comes here. These people could be here for peaceful purposes, or for a demonstration. If anyone walks in front of the parliament buildings, the RCMP can take a picture of that person. That can be related to anything else. They then start a file on that individual.

The public are well aware that the bureaucracy is being increased every day. I am sure that to collect these pictures, label them, and identify them will involve dozens and dozens of people. It is done for no specific reason.

Whenever there is a demonstration, the RCMP take pictures. That has always been their little game. Now it is being played in an economic field. It is being played with regard to credit arrangements. We will soon reach the point where it will not be necessary to ask your bank manager whether you can borrow $1,000. All he will do is take your social insurance number, feed that into a computer, and he will know about every debt you have ever owed. He will know whether you owe the income tax people $50 or whether you have a loan with another bank. Some smart kid with a little black box will also be able to get that information on anyone in this country. If it served a purpose, that would be all right. We must be developing a psychotic attitude when those in government believe they need that kind of information. I do not know why they think it will be of any value.

These people must have been watching the movie on television "2001" where big brother in the form of a computer had all the information and knew everything about everybody. I do not see why we need all these computer banks. If the general public knew the extent to which information is collected, they would revolt against it. Do the civil servants require this information because they are going to run this country? The general public would certainly object to that.

The Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) is a learned member of the bar. I understand he had a distinguished career in that field. Therefore, his personal thinking must not be too far removed from the Canadian Bar Association. That association says that if we are to have a well developed country, there must be a disclosure of personal information. If this information is disclosed, I believe that less and less will be collected.

The Bar Association is not my favourite organization. I have no connection with it. My background is that of an underground hard rock miner. Any relationship I had to the law was always on the wrong side of it. However, the Bar Association is violently opposed to this legislation being passed without personal protection. Its members are so violently opposed, they have in effect become apolitical. They have gone so far as to say that, if the minister wishes, they will draft legislation that is in keeping with that of other countries where there is a full disclosure. I suggest the minister consider that offer and bring that before the committee as well.

I was surprised at some of the explanations given by members of the Bar Association with regard to United States legislation respecting disclosure. The example was given of a person living near an airport. If that person wanted to object to that airport on the basis that there would be too much noise in the vicinity, he could ask the government to disclose to him all documents prepared by the government in relation to the noise surrounding that airport. Then that information could be used by him to prepare a case against the government. The theory is that the information obtained by the government was paid for by individual taxpayers. Therefore all information in the hands of the government should be available to the individual, as well as to the government, in preparing his case.

I was very interested, because normally when lawyers get involved in legislation by regulation they confuse the matter. It usually makes it worse. However, I understood from a representative of the Canadian Bar Association that under United States law you can make an application for disclosure of information which affects you. The agency has ten days to present that information. If it does not present it, it must have good reason. If the information is not made available, the decision can be appealed and the appeal must be heard within ten days. If the appeal is not successful, you can then take the matter before a judge who has another ten days in which to make a decision. I know that is hard to understand because judges do not work very fast.

What happens in the United States is that the matter goes to the top of the docket and it is the first thing the court hears. The judge then receives the document for which the individual is asking. All this is done without lawyers being involved. The judge then looks at the information, considers the arguments that have been made, and decides whether the information is to be made public. If he decides the information is to be made available, it is then released to the individual. If he decides not to release the information, the matter can then be appealed to the highest court. All this must take place within a period of 30 days.

Under that law, it is not necessary to have lawyers on both sides arguing the matter. If the information is to be produced, it is done quickly. For all three stages of the law to be carried out in 30 days is very quick. That disclosure of information means something to the general public and certainly means something to the individual.

I think the minister will be hard pressed to say that the information, whether it is in a computer or in the form of a document concerning the individual, should be disclosed to the individual involved just as it is to the agency, which in this case would be acting as his adversary. But it seems to me that that information should be made available to him. To a layman like me who is not a lawyer it seems only logical that such a disclosure should be made, and there is no reason for not doing so.

I agree that in the case of information affecting national security and also information on criminal activity should be restricted. But in other cases, why should public servants put a stamp saying "Confidential" on every document they handle, or stamp "To Be Seen By The Minister Only" or some other foolish statement? Are they doing it just to protect themselves against having their work seen and being judged incompetent? In 99 per cent of the cases the document is stamped confidential only to protect the incompetence of the person who produced the report. If that were not so, the author of the document would be proud of producing it and would want it seen.

In other countries people like to see their names on the documents which they prepare. In the United States, for example, many documents are tabled because someone wants his name seen by the public. But in this country everyone is stamping "Confidential" on documents, which are then put away some place where no one can see them, and the only reason for doing so is to hide the incompetence of the person who has prepared them. I am sure it is not the ministers who say that a document should not be released but public servants.

We took a very small step forward when we passed the Canadian Bill of Rights. Many other countries have gone far beyond what the minister is suggesting in the legislation before us, and they have passed their legislation a long time ago. We move very slowly. This legislation has been around for some time. For some reason or other we do not have the proper machinery to update our legislation. The minister has put forward legislation which originally was prepared two or three years ago. Since that time it has not been updated because we do not have the proper mechanism with which to do it.

I hope the minister will agree to accept the offer of the Canadian Bar Association to assist him. I suppose it is the only time in history when they have been prepared to do something for nothing. They are offering to supply the services of some people for free to help the minister. It would be the minister's legislation, but they would be pleased to give him any help he wanted. They were asked what they will get out of it, and they replied, "Nothing. We believe in the rights of the individual, and we want to enshrine in the legislation every possible protection for the individual against the technology that is developing which makes all kinds of information on individuals available to governments and agencies, information about which the individual may know nothing and which he cannot check to ascertain whether or not it is correct". The Canadian Bar Association believes that this is fundamental justice which should be contained in the human rights bill, and that it is absolutely mandatory.

Perhaps I have been misled, and perhaps the minister could indicate some reason why there should be all this secrecy. Perhaps he could go even further and give me a good reason why public servants want to keep so many documents confidential. Let me tell you that in my view there are 20 per cent too many of them, and everybody in the country will agree with that.

Mr. Nystrom: 25 per cent.

[Mr. Peters.]

Mr. Peters: If we got rid of the top 25 per cent—

Mr. Stevens: When do we do it?

Mr. Peters: There is an interesting comment which I should like to make about this.

This afternoon I was reading about the chairman of the Bell Telephone Company. Apparently when he came to Canada from IT&T his first order to Northern Electric was that they should get rid of their sales people. He said, "We must stop making all the sales we are making and we must get rid of many of our people. We must get down to the point at which we can compete, the point where everyone is hungry and everyone wants to keep his job, and everyone is scared that, if they do not, they will have no job". Perhaps some hon. members know something about Northern Electric, because that is exactly what he did. He trimmed the organization from the top. The managers went first, then he got rid of some of the sales staff. One salesman on the staff was making $1 million worth of sales. Anyone might think that the chairman was crazy, but in the thinking of IT&T if you eliminate a certain percentage from the staff at the top and you increase the efficiency of those who are left, you get a bettter organization. Those who expect an increase in their pay in accordance with their productivity are rewarded.

Everyone will agree that there are many people in the civil service in the top bracket who are just staying in their jobs awaiting their pensions, and who certainly do not want to rock the boat.

The minister knows full well that he has a great opportunity to move forward and not have to follow someone else. He should take the offer of the Canadian Bar Association with regard to the clause relating to the disclosure of personal information. He should accept their kind offer, their generous offer to pay a number of people to provide the government with assistance. We should move forward in this direction as fast as we can.

As my last remark I would like to say that I would be surprised if our country, which believes in the rights of individuals, does not withdraw our ambassador to Uganda. I believe that this legislation would have no teeth unless we agreed to attend the next Commonwealth conference only on condition that Uganda is not invited, because if there has ever been a country going in the opposite direction to what we want to achieve through this legislation it is that country.

If the government really believes in this legislation, then we will withdraw our representative in Uganda, and we will not sit with the representatives of that country at any international conference until their regime is changed. It might even be wise for us to talk to our CIA friends and ask them to put out a contract to eliminate that unsavoury situation so that people in Uganda can again have some rights such as they had under their previous leader, Milton Obote.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. Before recognizing the hon. minister, I must inform the House that in speaking now he will close the debate.

● (2150)

[English]

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I have just a few minutes in which to close the debate so that this bill can be referred to committee this evening. I appreciate the debate we have had, and the co-operation we have had from all quarters in the House. We had a sufficient debate to deal with the issues of principle involved in this bill and still get it referred to the standing committee this evening.

Just at the tail end of this debate, however, we heard a most outlandish proposal from my friend who just spoke. He went on about freedom, human dignity, civil and human rights, the need to curb police power, and the need to put proper restrictions on the police and on governmental authorities. However, he suggested that somehow we should employ a foreign police force to go out and assassinate someone.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): He is just a simple socialist.

Mr. Basford: I hope, for the sake of himself and his party, that he was being facetious. I would not want to call what the hon. member said a joke because it was so silly. I trust he was not even trying to make a joke.

I wish I had time to deal with a number of misunderstandings and misconceptions which arose in this debate about certain provisions and intentions of this bill. Obviously that is something for the committee, when the bill gets there.

The struggle for human rights is an ongoing, ever-present and never-ending one, as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) said. In this debate we heard discussion of the international scene and, in particular, discussion about Uganda. I am not drawing attention only to the reference just made; references were also made in earlier speeches. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has just returned from Washington where the Helsinki Agreement was discussed. It was on August 1, 1975, that through our Prime Minister our country signed the final act of the Conference on Security and Co-operation at Helsinki, and among the principles with which the 35 governments concerned themselves was the determination to respect and put into practice Principle 7, namely, respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms, including freedom of thought, conscience, religion or belief.

In subscribing to these principles each government, including the Canadian government, undertook to promote and encourage the effective exercise of civil, political, economic, social, cultural and other freedoms. I think this bill represents a concrete step, in Canadian legal development, toward giving additional legislative expression to our commitment to the Helsinki Agreement because it extends the existing Canadian human rights laws, both federal and provincial, still further. I therefore hope that before the up-coming conference reviewing the Helsinki Agreement we will be able to have this bill passed and become part of the law of the country.

I cannot and will not deal extensively with Parts I, II and III of the bill relating to discrimination. There was much reference in the debate to the Canadian Bill of Rights, and in my introductory remarks I mentioned it myself and paid credit to the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker). However, some hon. members, particularly the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams), seem to think that we do not need a human rights commission; that we could just legislate, take a legalistic approach, and have all these problems solved in the courts.

I was glad that there were other hon. members, for example, the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Fairweather), the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow), and the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Gilbert) who recognized that there must be, in addition to a Bill of Rights, and in addition to a legalistic and judicial approach to this question, a human rights commission which not only has power to investigate, examine and, if need be, impose penalties, but also power to educate and promote or, as the hon. member for Portage (Mr. Masniuk) said, engage in P.R. on behalf of the issue of human rights and anti-discrimination. To solve some of these problems we need a commission with the power to conciliate between parties. I am glad that need was recognized by a good number of speakers representing different parties because this aspect has been criticized by some. Undoubtedly that approach should be recommended.

With regard to Part IV of the bill there is immense confusion, it seems to me, about two subjects. One is freedom of information or freedom of access to government documents, and the other is the right of privacy. These are two quite different subjects.

We made it clear in the Speech from the Throne that we would be tabling before the Standing Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments, through the Secretary of State (Mr. Roberts), a set of proposals on the first of those subjects, namely, freedom of information or the right to government documents, and to the information upon which the government makes decisions—and this bill does not deal with that issue. Part IV of this bill though deals with the right of individuals to protection of their privacy in terms of government information, the right of an individual, and no others, to see his file and to correct that file. While hon. members can be critical of any proposal, I hope they will make sure they are making that very fundamental distinction, a distinction which is recognized in Sweden and in the United States. There are two things we are talking about, and in Part IV we should be talking about the right of privacy.

With regard to exemptions, every act of this nature has some exemptions. I hope hon. members will examine the exemptions in this bill, not with rhetoric but with care. I thought the hon. member for Portage made an excellent speech tonight, but he attacked the exemption for information used in the course of investigations pertaining to the detection of suspicion of crime. Surely, however, we cannot give drug traffickers the legal right in the course of a drug investigation to apply to the government and obtain the police file on that investigation. If that is to be the case, there will be literally no drug prosecutions or drug convictions in the country. I implore hon. members to look at these exemptions carefully and study them carefully. Obviously it is my job to justify those exemptions in committee. I submit that I will be able to do that.

There is much more I would like to say, but I will have to say it in committee. I appreciate the remarks of hon. members. I appreciate the concurrence with my opening statement that I hope we can have the bill passed by June 30. There seems to be general co-operation and support for that proposition. The Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs is immensely busy right now, and I hope all hon. members will co-operate with that committee to see that we achieve that objective.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS—CUBA—SUGGESTED RECONSIDERATION OF RELATIONSHIP IN VIEW OF SUPPORT OF RHODESIAN GUERRILLAS

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, I want to begin by thanking the parliamentary secretary for making it possible to return to this subject. The department somehow became confused in the returning of answers the last time I raised this question during the adjournment debate, and the parliamentary secretary was good enough to insist to the Clerk and the department that we return to the subject as soon as possible.

● (2200)

The Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford), in the closing minutes of the debate on Bill C-25, displayed what I think we could call some mock shock when the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) suggested that perhaps the Canadian government should hire the CIA to investigate the activities of Idi Amin. I do not think I am stretching the point by saying that perhaps we are doing somewhat the same thing in our relationship with Cuba.

A year ago a question was raised in this House about the use of our facilities at Gander by allowing the Cubans to land planes there. On that point the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Jamieson) said that we had made it clear we would not tolerate any such use of Canadian facilities for military purposes, if indeed that was the case. A year later we have the shocking declaration that Cuban officials have been using facilities on Canadian soil to train guerrillas to be operatives on the continent of Africa.

Two or three weeks ago newspaper headlines were screaming about the assassination of seven missionaries in Rhodesia. There are allegations and suspicions that the missionaries were assassinated by guerrillas who had been trained by the Cubans. When I posed the question to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) two weeks ago he said he thought the question was based on a non sequitur. The very fact that we are giving some form of economic aid to Cuba does not seem to impress the Prime Minister, and it is probably allowing Cubans to carry on furtive activities in other countries in a way they could not if we did not give them the aid. I said in that question that some of the aid is very extensive, and I want to put on record some of the figures involved. It strikes me that if we are giving Cuba aid by way of CIDA almost to the tune of $23 million to $100 million at 3 per cent interest, that is a relatively extensive boost to its foreign aid. I am not speaking of foreign trade but foreign aid. I know there are thousands of people in Canada who would love to have a 3 per cent loan to pay off their mortages. That could be a good war on poverty. Right now the Cubans are waging war, but it certainly is not a war on poverty.

The figures tell us that Cuba has up to 7,000 troops and advisers in the Middle East, 4,000 in Syria, 3,000 in Yemen, and 2,000 in Africa apart from the 12,000 they had in Angola. If we can lend Cuba up to $100 million at 3 per cent interest perhaps that releases some of their other resources for the kind of activities going on in Rhodesia at the present time, so I cannot see why the Prime Minister would say my question was based on a non sequitur. The Canadian people are faced with the dilemma of trying to find out what is the foreign policy of this country. Are we against this kind of activiy being carried on by the Cubans in Africa? If we are, why are we continuing with aid that allows them to carry it on?

The Prime Minister has just come back from Washington saying we ought to be friends with our best friends, who happen to be the Americans in his eyes, at least for the time being. If that is the case, presumably we are thinking of principles of democracy and self-determination, but if at the same time we are allowing the Cubans to carry on guerrilla activities, we cannot be espousing the principles of democracy.

I should like the parliamentary secretary to give us a clear statement of the policy of the Department of External Affairs and of the Prime Minister.Does he in fact espouse democracy as we usually think of it, or does he intend to continue the kind of economic activity with Cuba that will allow them to carry on those activities and let them rape the sanctity of Canadian soil in the process?

[Translation]

Mr. Fernand E. Leblanc (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I shall answer the question asked by the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock (Mr. Friesen) concerning the advisability of reconsidering our relationship with Cuba because of that country's support of Rhodesian guerillas.

[English]

The government's position on foreign intervention in Africa, and particularly in Angola and Rhodesia, has been clearly stated on a number of occasions. We are completely opposed to foreign military intervention into these countries. This opposition as it then related to Angola was reiterated on a number of occasions in this House, as well as in a public statement made on January 20, 1976, by the then secretary of state for external affairs, the hon. member for Cape Breton Highlands-Canso (Mr. MacEachen). It was also brought to the attention of Premier Castro by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) during his trip to Cuba early last year. This opposition to the introduction of troops and material is still the policy of the government of Canada, and the Cuban government has been made well aware of it.

With regard to our relationship with Cuba, I do not think it would be in the best interests of Canada to reconsider it, as it has served us well in the past. It is not our policy to tie the provisions of our development assistance to any given country to the suitability to Canada of that country's foreign policy. We offer our assistance on the understanding that aid will not be used for political purposes but rather for bettering the standard of living of the people of the recipient country. We apply this approach fairly to a number of countries with different political, economic, and social structures. We believe that pursuit of the goal of long-term betterment of the standard of living of the peoples of the developing world is in our best interests, as it is in theirs.

In the case of Cuba we do not believe that the best way to ensure that our advice is followed is by going back on commitments made—or for that matter by tampering with our commercial relationship. Rather, we shall continue to urge them and any others involved to refrain from intervening militarily in the affairs of other nations.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS—ARSENIC POLLUTION IN YELLOWKNIFE—DISCUSSIONS BETWEEN MINISTER AND HEALTH MINISTER PRIOR TO ESTABLISHMENT OF STUDY GROUP

Mr. Bob Brisco (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I have asked both the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) and the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment (Mr. LeBlanc) who is looking into the Yellowknife arsenic pollution problem? The Minister of National Health and Welfare said in part, as reported at page 3190 of Hansard, that the Canadian Public Health Association has been asked to set up a work committee. The minister, in his customary sarcastic manner, suggested that I had failed to understand the nature of the exchange which had taken place between the minister and the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent) on the previous day, February 17. I understand exactly what was said.

In his exchange with the Minister of National Health and Welfare the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby referred to the Clean Air Act. On February 18 the Minister of National Health and Welfare was referring to the Environmental Contaminants Act, as is evident if one reads the exchange reported at page 3190 of Hansard. The minister said:

> ... The question of the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby dealt with a very specific matter, namely the setting up of standards under the Environmental Contaminants Act.

If the minister had read the question of the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby, he would have seen that it referred to the Clean Air Act, not to the Environmental Contaminants Act. Nevertheless, the Minister of National Health and Welfare finally admitted after that long exchange with the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby that a joint committee had been set up under the Ministry of the Environment and, one must assume, the Ministry of National Health and Welfare. Its purpose is to consider every aspect of the issue currently confronting the people of Yellowknife.

On the face of it two separate committees have been established, the one established by the Ministry of the Environment and the other by the Ministry of National Health and Welfare, under the auspices of the Canadian Public Health Association. Yesterday, when I asked the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment questions, in an attempt to determine if the Environmental Contaminants Act was being invoked, the minister failed to understand the thrust of my question. Previously, the Minister of Health said I should consult with the Minister of the Environment:—"He knows what I am talking about, ask him when he returns to the House; I am sure you will get this matter clarified."

It was clarified by the Minister of the Environment yesterday when he said to me, "Maybe I did not understand the hon. member's question", and when I put it to him again, he said, "We have a special committee in place under the Canadian Public Health Association".

The point is that parliament passed a bill called the Environmental Contaminants Act, a bill which comprises a schedule of contaminants clearly laid out and which must be investigated by the Department of the Environment. Arsenic is one of the substances listed in that schedule. On reading the bill I find that the Minister of the Environment and the Minister of National Health and Welfare may jointly appoint advisory committees to review any data collected pursuant to the act, more specifically with reference to environmental contaminants. Obviously such a committee is not in place. There appears to be some sort of joint committee which has not been defined, though it could have been defined in the response the Minister of the Environment gave yesterday. But this he failed to do. We have that committee, we have a Public Health Commission, and protection under the Environmental Contaminants Act which the minister has failed to implement.

The Environmental Contaminants Act is not a lengthy bill. It is interesting to note that it went into force on March 1, 1976, and that to date no charges have been laid under the statute. I am pleased, of course, that we should have such a clean environment and that everything is moving so smoothly. But when I consider that we also have on the statute books an Ocean Dumping Control Act which was assented to even earlier, an act which really pertains to the same objectives, though in the oceans and inland waterways, I become somewhat doubtful since no charges have been laid under that act either.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the Ministry of the Environment has totally and completely failed to implement anything in the Environmental Contaminants Act, to exercise any of its rights under that act as well as under the Ocean Dumping Control Act. I suggest that the Minister of the Environment in his response to me yesterday clearly showed that he does not know what is going on in his own department with reference to an act which is of paramount concern to that ministry.

Mr. Fernand E. Leblanc (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Brisco) presumably refers to section 3(4) of the Environmental Contaminants Act in which it is stated:

> The Minister and the Minister of National Health and Welfare may jointly appoint advisory committees to review any data collected pursuant to subsection (1) and paragraph (3)(a), to receive representations from interested parties or concerned members of the public and to advise the Minister and the Minister of National Health and Welfare respecting measures to control the presence in the environment of any substance or class of substances.

The Department of Fisheries and the Environment, the Department of National Health and Welfare, and the Department of Indian Affairs have been addressing the Yellowknife arsenic problem for some time under their respective legislation. These considerations have included federal government authority under the Clean Air Act, the Fisheries Act, and the Northern Inland Waters Act. It is doubtful whether establishing an advisory committee at this time under the Environmental Contaminants Act would have contributed anything more to the solution of this problem than is already being done.

It should be emphasized that the focus of the Environmental Contaminants Act is upon the widespread contamination of the environment associated with the commercial use of problem substances. I might add that arsenic is included in the list of priority substances under consideration for major investigation under the Environmental Contaminants Act.

A priority setting exercise has been under way for some time in an attempt to establish short lists of problem substances. The two departments are now reviewing responses from across the country, greater than 100 replies to date. It is planned to distribute a summary of this survey for further comment.

[Mr. Brisco.]

No advisory committees under the Environmental Contaminants Act have been appointed as yet. We have had working groups and task forces to examine the technical issues about such chemicals as PCB's and fluorocarbons. Formal advisory committees may be required to examine in detail the wider issues of acceptable risk and social-economic impact once technical issues are resolved.

With respect to the specific Yellowknife arsenic problem, the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment (Mr. LeBlanc) supported the Minister of National Health and Welfare in the appointment of the special Canadian Public Health Association committee to provide an independent appraisal of the risk to human health.

MANPOWER—PRACTICE OF SUPPLYING WORKERS TO COMPANIES WHOSE EMPLOYEES ARE ON STRIKE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, a week ago the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) told this House that when it came to strikes his department was neutral. He made that comment in response to a question I had raised concerning the fact that the Manpower Department was referring workers to work in legally struck plants, specially at the Ottawa Journal and Wyandotte Chemicals in Scarborough. Manpower has referred unemployed workers to both these plants. Mr. R. Lapointe of the Manpower Department stated in a telegram, in relation to the Wyandotte plant:

> Wyandotte Chemicals Limited has had a standing job order for storemen since December 10, 1976. To date 26 referrals have been made by C.M.C. resulting in six placements.

There are two questions involved in this particular issue. One is impartiality, and the minister's answer touched on the question of impartiality. The minister says that what has taken place is all right. He said last Thursday in response to the question I asked in the House, as reported at page 3137 of Hansard:

> If an employer, who also pays substantial taxes, wants to make use of Canada Manpower Centres to indicate a job vacancy, we tell the workers that there is a vacancy but that the plant is on strike. If the individual opts not to go he is not penalized.

Well, Mr. Speaker, the workers pay taxes too, and thanks to the way that the government has handled our tax structure, they pay a great deal more in taxes than employers do. But that is not the question I want to raise tonight. What benefits do they get from the minister's department during a strike or lockout? As for the question of impartiality, the very nature of the Unemployment Insurance Act forbids their receiving unemployment insurance during a work stoppage as a result of a labour dispute. The act is very clear in this regard. So they do not get unemployment insurance.

The government claims that if it paid these people unemployment insurance it would be taking sides in the dispute, and no one will argue with that. That is a quite correct position to take. It is not taking sides in the dispute when it funnels people to jobs formally held by other people involved in labour disputes. This is what the minister would have us believe. But I suggest it is taking sides when it allows a Canada Manpower centre to be used as a referral centre for jobs at a legally struck plant.

It seems to me that on the one hand the government says it is not taking sides when it lets the Manpower centre be a referral centre for jobs at a legally struck plant; on the other hand, the government says it is not taking sides when it comes to paying the strikers unemployment insurance. It cannot have it both ways, Mr. Speaker. It cannot have its cake and eat it too. If the government is to be neutral, it has to be completely neutral. The Manpower centre ought not to be used at all by either employer or employee during a legal strike.

The government says that people involved in labour disputes can go to Manpower centres to get temporary work. This at this time in our history is a sick joke. The government knows that there are about one million people out of work in this country today. It knows perfectly well there is a big difference between finding a new job and filling one that is advertised.

The second point is even more serious than the whole question of impartiality. When the government and the Manpower Department allow Manpower centres to be referral centres for jobs at legally struck plants, they pit brother against brother, worker against worker. In this economy there are desperately few jobs being created and a very large number of people are unemployed. It is obvious that people want to work. Manpower makes these jobs in the struck plants public to all people who frequent Manpower centres. In fact men and women looking for jobs will jump at the opportunity, even though it states in the fine print that a legal strike is in process. It is most dehumanizing placing brother against brother, sister against sister, in the scramble for jobs.

The government's practices in this regard are even more evidence that when it comes to a difference between business and labour, the government's neutrality is pretty one-sided.

What does business get out of this? It gets a large pool of unemployed people. The private sector gets a guaranteed supply of scab labour to fill its plants every time there is a strike or lockout. It gets it from a government agency paid for out of the taxes of Canadian workers. Those on strike pay taxes and their taxes go to support a Manpower centre that is participating in an effort to replace them in a legally struck plant.

What do the employees get? Nothing. They cannot get unemployment insurance benefits while the government is sending scabs in to fill their jobs. That would not be neutral. That is why workers at The Journal were denied unemployment insurance. Their jobs were filled by workers referred by the Manpower centre and escorted to their jobs by the police. These workers are on a legal strike. While they are out on the pavement, their jobs are being filled by scab employees referred by the Manpower centre. These people are being denied relocation grants because Manpower says there is a strike in process.

The jobs are not there for the workers, thanks to the government's deliberate attempts to wreck the economy in the name of fighting inflation. If people doubt that the government works only for business, they will sure have their noses rubbed into that fact if they are ever forced into a strike or lockout situation. This is the situation as it exists.

Mr. Fernand E. Leblanc (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the Department of Manpower and Immigration does not participate in any activity aimed at breaking a strike. On the contrary, it tries to keep its neutrality in all labour conflicts.

Nevertheless, the placement services of Canada Manpower Centres are available to all employers and employees affected by a conflict and who want to use them. That is how Manpower Centres register striking employees and present them to other employers. They also receive job opportunities offered by employers who face a labour conflict and try to fill them. However, before offering a job, Manpower Centres inform workers, orally and in writing, that the employer in question is involved in a labour conflict. Once they know this, workers are then free to accept or refuse the offer. That way, employers and workers can both decide whether they will avail themselves of the placement service of the department if a labour conflict arises. By keeping its neutrality, the department tries not to cause any prejudice to either party.

The hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez) will certainly understand that although department officials may observe the strictest neutrality in this type of situation, they will always be criticized by both parties involved, each claiming that they are acting against its own best interests. If it offers the employer the workers he needs, the unions will accuse the department of helping management to break the strike. On the other hand, if it does not, both the employer and his organization will accuse it of helping the union stop the operation. Although each of the parties will generally consider the minister is favouring the other, any impartial observer will find that he is really neutral.

The Unemployment Insurance Commission also remains neutral in cases of employer-employee conflicts. Should a recipient refuse to fill a vacancy resulting from such a conflict, he will not be prevented from receiving unemployment insurance benefits, because such a vacancy is not deemed as a normal working opportunity under the Unemployment Insurance Act. Under our collective bargaining system, employers and employees negotiate freely, without governmental interference. The Unemployment Insurance Commission maintains its objectivity by refusing its financial assistance to workers who are unemployed because of a working conflict. I am sure that the hon. member for Nickel Belt will recognize now that the Department of Manpower and Immigration and the Unemployment Insurance Commission are doing their utmost to remain impartial whenever industrial conflicts arise.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until eleven o'clock tomorrow morning.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10:29 p.m.

PROVISION OF FUNDS TO MUNICIPALITIES FOR DEVELOPMENT OF URBAN TRANSIT SYSTEMS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, I rise in accordance with Standing Order 43 to put a motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity which I believe, given the present disposition of many members on both sides of the House, will receive wide support. In view of the government's announcement to renege on its promise to provide $290 million of funding for urban transit systems and in view of the fact that many municipalities and provinces had made plans on the basis of this promise, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker):

That this House calls on the government to provide funds for those municipalities and provinces where planning has proceeded and decisions have been made on the basis of the government's promise for funding and that the government re-imburse all municipalities and provinces for funds that have so far been expended for purposes related to the promise of federal funding for urban transit systems.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: The presentation of such a motion for debate pursuant to Standing Order 43 can only be made with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: No.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

SUGGESTED PREPARATION OF NEW WHITE PAPER ON DEFENCE POLICY FOR COMMITTEE STUDY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Andy Hogan (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I rise under a matter of importance and urgency. In view of the fact that the recent conference of defence associations criticized Canada for not having a comprehensive defence policy and in view of the fact that the same conference indicated that various statements by the new defence minister and the Chief of Defence Staff represent reversals of government policy as stated in the past white papers, and in view of the fact that the present minister seems to be wanting to escalate defence expenditures by increasing our fighter plane capacity, I move, seconded by the hon. member from Greenwood (Mr. Brewin):

That a new white paper be prepared for submission to a special subcommittee of the parliamentary committee on defence.

Mr. Speaker: The provisions of Standing Order 43 require unanimous consent for the presentation of such a motion. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: No!

HONOURING OF PROMISE TO PROVIDE FUNDS FOR DEVELOPMENT OF URBAN TRANSIT SYSTEMS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I, too, rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to move a motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. It being now apparent that in the absence of federal aid as promised, the CN and CP are proposing to raise fares and reduce commuter train services in the Montreal area while the Province of Ontario is unable to continue with plans to increase commuter services in the Toronto area, and since members of this House who support the government have indicated concern over this matter, feeling a promise is a promise and should be honoured, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Edmonton Centre (Mr. Paproski):

That this House instruct the government to honour its commitment to certain provinces with respect to urban transit financing, including, in the case of Ontario, an assurance that federal authorities would finance $38 million worth of commuter equipment which had already been ordered by the province on the strength of the federal commitment.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can only be presented with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there such consent?

Some hon. Members: No!

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

PROPOSED COMMITTEE STUDY OF DRILLING IN BEAUFORT SEA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Wally Firth (Northwest Territories): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 as a result of further news reports this morning regarding the drilling operations which took place in the Beaufort sea last summer. The news evidently revealed the failure to announce at the time, or reveal in the technical review, that containment of the blowout was made very difficult by amendments to the safety drillcasing program which was approved by the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, and the failure to make public at the time, or reveal in the technical review, that drilling was allowed to proceed with insufficient tests and that the absence of those tests made containment of the blowout almost impossible. Therefore, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development conduct an inquiry into his department's review of the drilling program, and that the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development be empowered to conduct a complete review of drilling in the Beaufort sea that took place last summer.

Mr. Speaker: The presentation of such a motion for debate pursuant to Standing Order 43 can only be done with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

NATIONAL SECURITY

DEPORTATION OF RUSSIAN SCIENTIST FOR ATTEMPTING TO PURCHASE DOCUMENTS—REASON FOR FAILURE TO PROSECUTE

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister arising out of the reports that a Russian scientist who was arrested and subsequently deported was on an exchange visit. Is it the intention of the government to make a statement with respect to this matter, and in particular could the Prime Minister inform the House how such lenient treatment of a person caught in this type of activity—at least to the extent that some action was taken—could possibly act as a deterrent to other people who might wish to engage in such practices? Is this the best the government can do under those circumstances?

[Translation]

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, the individual involved, Mr. Khvostantsev, was deported last evening under section 18 of the Immigration Act. Indeed, he was deported as the result of an investigation carried out by the RCMP through the co-operation of a Canadian NRC scientist. Following the investigation made by the RCMP, it was clearly established that even if some unclassified material had been delivered, no privileged or secret material was handed over.

[English]

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I want to thank the Solicitor General for telling us exactly what we can read in the Globe and Mail in any event this morning. The question I will now put to the Solicitor General, since he seems to be the person with knowledge, is, why was this lenient treatment given, and are there any undertakings, any agreements or conditions that scientists are subject to on these exchanges which give them some form of diplomatic immunity or that would allow those people to be treated as if they had diplomatic immunity, and why was the man not prosecuted for offending the law of Canada, because surely that is what happened?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Fox: Mr. Speaker, as I said the individual was deported under section 18 of the Immigration Act. As for any criminal offence, I am advised that since there was no delivery of confidential or secret documents, there was no violation of the Canadian Criminal Code.

[English]

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Even the report in the Globe and Mail, which the minister may not have read, indicated he tried to do that. The question I want to ask the Solicitor General or the Prime Minister is, when will these matters start being treated in a serious way? In other words, at what point in time does an activity like this, and activities such as the involvement at the Cuban embassy, cease to be acts requiring only deportation to the homeland of the offender, because the offences are against the laws of this country? In other words, when will the government begin to act in these matters in a serious way.

[Translation]

Mr. Fox: Mr. Speaker, we are beginning to see great changes. For the first time in a few months we are getting some support from the opposite side of the House in respect of the RCMP security services and I am happy about it. Of course this matter has been well conducted and one of the goals of the RCMP security services is to prevent violations. We are trying to act before criminal acts are perpetrated. Of course some dealings may be wrong when they are made in Canada by foreign agents, but they do not necessarily constitute a violation of the criminal laws of this country. If the hon. member wants to move amendments to the Criminal Code or to the Official Secrets Act, he is at liberty to do so, but at the present time the situation is as I described it and I am told that there has not been any violation of the laws of our country.

[English]

NATURE OF CHARGES AGAINST PERSONS WHO ALLEGEDLY AIDED ILLEGAL ENTRY OF ALIENS—INQUIRY IF COMMUNIST PARTY INVOLVED

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my questions to the Solicitor General as well because of activities in addition to the one referred to by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton. I am referring to the activities which took place at Waterloo, Ontario. Canadians are shocked at the increasing number of incidents of this nature in Canada.

Reports out of Waterloo, Ontario indicate that RCMP and immigration officers conducted raids resulting in six persons being charged with illegally aiding aliens to enter Canada and once in Canada harbouring them in contravention of the Immigration Act, one of these six persons being Hardial Bains, Chairman of the Communist Party of Canada, Marxist-Leninist.

I would like to ask the minister what the specific charges were. Were they laid only under the Immigration Act? Were they also laid under the Criminal Code, especially in view of the nature of these crimes and in view of the fact that these persons might intend to leave the country? This government has shown a lenient attitude. These persons are presently not in custody, nor was bail set. What were the charges, and why were these people not kept in custody?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I shall have to ask for a report on the case mentioned by the hon. member. I do not have any precise information on this for the time being, but it indicates that the RCMP security services are obviously doing their work.

As far as establishing bail conditions, this is a matter that comes under the jurisdiction of the courts and not of the RCMP.

[English]

Mr. Epp: In view of the fact that these investigations have been going on since November of last year, I feel the minister should have more information. In view of this shocking development could the minister indicate whether the Communist Party of Canada has aided the entry of illegal aliens into Canada in order to facilitate subversive actions of groups engaged in subversion, intelligence gathering and spy activities?

[Translation]

Mr. Fox: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is anticipating a little on the investigations. If his allegations were justified, the necessary steps and procedures would be taken immediately.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

ALLEGATIONS BY MINISTERS OF SEPARATIST BIAS IN RADIO-CANADA—REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE NO EMPLOYEE FIRED WITHOUT JUST CAUSE

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Prime Minister regarding statements which appear in the Toronto Star of February 23 quoting the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce as saying that as far as Radio-Canada is concerned it might as well be called Radio-Quebec and the statement of the Minister of National Revenue to the effect that the French language CBC reflects separatism and nothing else. In an interview the President of the CBC stated that he looked closely at the French programming and found no evidence of the bias charged.

In view of the fact that all members of this House want to see fair and unbiased reporting on the CBC, whether it be on the English-speaking section or the French-speaking section, can the Prime Minister not find a more appropriate way to resolve this problem rather than having the unseemly spectacle of cabinet ministers publicly attacking Canada's public broadcasting corporation?

• (1120)

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the CBC is not under the direct jurisdiction of any of these ministers mentioned by the hon. member.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: Wait a minute. This is Friday morning—

An hon. Member: Yes, and it is Ottawa, not Washington.

Mr. Trudeau: It is Ottawa, not Washington.

An hon. Member: Back in the real world.

Mr. Hees: No more of that "Your Excellency" stuff. You are back in the real world.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I hope the hon. member of the New Democratic party can judge from this exchange that nobody is taking his question very seriously.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: You are the only one.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, there may be members who do not take it seriously, but even on a Friday morning I would have thought the Prime Minister would have taken seriously the question of cabinet solidarity and collective responsibility.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): May I ask the Prime Minister a question with respect to the report which appeared in La Presse of Montreal on February 24.

An hon. Member: He does not read that any more.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): It says that the Minister of State for Urban Affairs has said that he has a list—

An hon. Member: Oh, another list.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): —of CBC French employees who are out to destroy the country. He is quoted in the Toronto Star of February 23 as saying he is challenging CBC president Al Johnson to "fire the bloody guys that are working separatists". What I want to ask the Prime Minister, and I hope he will take this seriously, is whether he can assure the House that no individuals will be fired because of the views they hold but only if they have violated the guidelines set down for fair, unbiased and balanced reporting?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member of the New Democratic Party really is knocking down a straw man. He knows the government cannot fire any employees of the CBC.

An hon. Member: Oh, come on.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): You could transfer them to Inuvik.

Mr. Trudeau: I am somewhat bemused by the rushing of the opposition parties to the defence of the freedom of speech of the CBC. The government annually votes a very substantial budget to the CBC.

Mr. Baldwin: I thought parliament did that.

Mr. Trudeau: I accept the correction, Mr. Speaker. The government puts before parliament annually a very substantial budget for the CBC and we treat it at arm's length as a corporation with which we cannot interfere in terms of its programming. From there to say that cabinet solidarity is at stake because some ministers having viewed the CBC feel it is not showing an unbiased series of opinions, I do not take that step and I disagree with the hon. member. I think members of cabinet or any member of this House is entitled to look at the CBC and to say "that is a lousy story; it is biased and I disagree with it." I will not rebuke any minister for saying that.

ALLEGED PREPARATION BY MINISTER OF LIST OF SEPARATISTS IN RADIO-CANADA—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I want to ask the Prime Minister if he condones the idea of cabinet ministers announcing publicly that they are preparing lists of people who ought to be fired for attempting to destroy this country. Surely if the government has any evidence of people trying to destroy the country the matter ought to be referred to the Solicitor General. I want to ask the Prime Minister if he will take steps to see that members of cabinet do not prepare lists—we have had enough lists in the past few weeks by the former solicitor general and others—which can only have the effect of attempting to intimidate and create fear among people either in the public service or in the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have a very basic disagreement with the hon. member. I think hon. members on this side, at any rate, are very concerned about the possibility of CBC Radio-Canada propagating separatism.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands).]

Mr. Trudeau: I am not all offended that they think so and that they say so. As for the rest, the matter of proposing estimates and seeking corrections should be and is being done in the proper way. We are dealing with the head of the CBC. He is responsible for defending his estimates in cabinet and questions are being asked of him. He is not being assaulted or persecuted in any way. Some hon. members feel that there is separatist propaganda on the CBC. I believe, if they have that opinion, they are perfectly entitled to state it, and if the hon. member feels the contrary, that Radio-Canada is fighting hard for Canadian unity, I think he is perfectly entitled to say so as well.

RESEARCH

REQUEST FOR INCREASED FUNDS

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Science and Technology.

Since Canadian researchers are uncertain because of last year's reduction in grants and since government expenditures have increased by 16 per cent during that same period, would the minister be in a position to say whether he considers putting an end soon to that time of lean kine for research in medicine and other fields?

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, I suggest that if the hon. member were to read the blue book he would know there will be an increase this year.

KNOWLEDGE OF PRIME MINISTER OF ALLEGED LIST OF SEPARATISTS IN RADIO-CANADA—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, I should like to return to the earlier series of questions concerning the CBC. The Prime Minister was discussing separatism in Radio-Canada which, as he pointed out, is a matter of opinion. But we still have not heard an answer about the list. Is the Prime Minister aware of a list, allegedly made by the Minister of State for Urban Affairs, of people who work for Radio-Canada and who may not be in sympathy with our federal system of government? Is the Prime Minister aware of such a list? What has been the disposition of that list, and are people on the list able to speak about the list?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: What do you mean?

Mr. Fairweather: Just a moment. If you want to ask questions, you can—

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I had not heard about this until it was asked a few minutes ago. I have before me a clipping which does not say that Mr. Ouellet is circulating lists or asking the government to act on lists. I am told that he has volunteered to give the CBC the names of people he thinks are separatists and propagating their ideas in a way they should not be. I congratulate him for offering his services to the CBC. If they want to take him up, if President Johnson of the CBC—

An hon. Member: Oh!

Mr. Trudeau: Oh! If President Johnson of the CBC wants to ask Mr. Ouellet or any other citizen—

An hon. Member: They are not doing their professional job.

Mr. Trudeau: Who do you think is not doing a professional job? Perhaps we could look at their job. I see no objection to that. It is up to Mr. Johnson to make up his mind.

Mr. Fairweather: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I was not aware the government had been reorganized and that it was the function of the Minister of State for Urban Affairs to compile lists of people whose loyalty may be in doubt. I have never seen thinner skins that those exhibited round here in the last few weeks.

Mr. Paproski: In the last couple of days.

Mr. Chrétien: Look at the facts.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Fairweather: The orchestra is a little blurred, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Fairweather: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if people could settle down, because I want to ask another question.

An hon. Member: Well, ask it.

Mr. Fairweather: Mr. Speaker, this is a fairly serious issue, although it does not appear to be so to some. Will the Prime Minister recall, for the edification of ministers and others, including the opposition, the definitive statement regarding the separation of the publicly-owned corporation from the government which was made eloquently in this House by the late George Nowlan and supported in subsequent statements by Mr. Pickersgill and Miss LaMarsh.

• (1130)

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, in this House, I have, as have other members, sometimes shown impatience with the media, including the CBC. This does not seem to be an offence against any rules of this House or against any conception of freedom of speech. However, hon. members on the other side, for reasons which I respect, are trying to make sure that freedom of speech still prevails. I congratulate them. I assure them that I have not asked Mr. Johnson, and I am sure the minister has in no way told him to do anything in particular, to get rid of any members he feels are separatists.

An hon. Member: Not yet.

Mr. Trudeau: No, not yet. I would think that members on the other side would not try to use their political advantage. There is a very real concern on the part of many citizens, particularly those who listen to Radio-Canada, that that can be a separatist propaganda machine. Indeed, it can be used to get the people of Quebec to believe more in separatism than in federalism. This government is very concerned about that. We are trying to act on that in a proper fashion. I hope we will have the support of hon. members opposite who believe in freedom of speech but still believe it is the duty of the CBC to promote Canadian unity and not separation.

NATIONAL SECURITY

DEPORTATION OF RUSSIAN SCIENTIST—ACCESSIBILITY OF CLASSIFIED INFORMATION TO SCIENTIST FROM ANOTHER COUNTRY

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, with your permission I would like to come back to the question first raised by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton. I ask the Solicitor General, having in mind my curiosity was aroused by the suggestion in the story that the scientist from whom the Soviet agent attempted to secure information had access to classified information which would be denied to members of this House or the public, to give a categorical assurance that the scientist from another country did not have access to classified information which would be denied to myself or to other members of the public.

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I am advised that the scientist from the Soviet Union who was recently deported did not have access to classified information.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, I do not think the Solicitor General quite understood the point. The scientist from another country from whom the Soviet agent sought information was alleged in the story to himself have had access to classified information. Apparently the Soviet scientist did not because he would not have sought to buy it otherwise. Did the scientist from the other country from whom the Soviet agent sought information in fact have access to classified information which I would not be allowed to have?

Mr. Fox: Mr. Speaker, the Soviet scientist's discussions took place with a Canadian scientist employed at NRC. My understanding is that the scientist had access to classified information of a scientific nature.

DEPORTATION OF RUSSIAN SCIENTIST—INQUIRY OF CHARGES RECOMMENDED PRIOR TO DEPORTATION

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Solicitor General. I must say I did not fully hear his response to the first question. Will the minister advise whether charges were recommended to be laid by the RCMP prior to this deportation?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, my understanding is that the information which was amassed by the RCMP was brought to the attention of the Department of Manpower and Immigration and they thought the appropriate procedure in that instance was to proceed with a deportation order.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

ALLEGED LIST OF SEPARATISTS IN RADIO-CANADA—SUGGESTION SEPARATISTS BE NAMED AND GIVEN CHANCE TO DEFEND THEMSELVES

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of State for Urban Affairs, I will direct my question to the Prime Minister. Having regard to statements made by the Minister of State for Urban Affairs to Broadcast News with respect to a number of journalists engaged by Radio-Canada, and having regard to the fact he accused these persons of plotting to destroy this country, will the Prime Minister in the interest of protecting the fine reputation of this network and most people there ask the minister to name these individuals of whom he has compiled a list so that they can be made to account for their actions and have an opportunity to defend themselves against these charges, or is the handling of this whole matter to follow the EPO concept of political blood testing?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as far as we are concerned, people on this side can make lists of what they want. I have some lists in my own drawer which contain the names of the politically inept members of the opposition.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: Now that I have made that information public, I am sure I will be challenged to make those names public so that hon. members can defend themselves. I will give it some thought.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Oberle: I can understand the Prime Minister's dilemma. We do not have the same problem because everyone on the other side is inept. Therefore, we do not have to single them out.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Mr. Fox.]

Mr. Oberle: I ask the Prime Minister to answer my question. Will these people be named? Will they be made to account for their actions? In the interest of the survival of this country, will the Prime Minister consult with the minister who made these unfortunate statements, particularly the statement that it is a fact of life that he, as a minister, will interfere with the president of a Crown corporation, smearing by innuendo the reputation of fine civil servants? Will the Prime Minister state here and now whether he will take some action, whether he will consult with his minister, whether we will be told who these individuals are and what action is going to be taken against them?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: I am surprised that the hon. member says they do not make lists. They hire private agencies to spy on the opposition.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

COMMONWEALTH CONFERENCE

REQUEST THAT HUMAN RIGHTS IN UGANDA BE ON AGENDA

Hon. Robert Stanbury (York-Scarborough): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. Will the Prime Minister request that the state of human rights in Uganda be placed on the agenda of the Commonwealth Heads of Government Conference scheduled for June in London?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will convey to the secretariat of the commonwealth the suggestion by the hon. member. I am sure they are getting a lot of suggestions for the possible agenda. I will convey that suggestion.

Mr. Stanbury: Mr. Speaker, I think perhaps the Prime Minister missed the full import of my question. I asked, will the Prime Minister request that this item be placed on the agenda.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I will be communicating with the Commonwealth Secretary General. I will ask him if there are agenda items dealing with this particular subject. If there are not, I will consider putting it on.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

UGANDA—OPPORTUNITY FOR HOUSE TO EXPRESS CONCERN OVER DENIAL OF HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister. In order to give this House, representing as it does all the people of Canada, an opportunity to express its concern over what is happening in Uganda, will the Prime Minister bring forward as a government order a motion reflecting this attitude of the House, either in the form of a formal motion or by allowing a Standing Order 43 motion to be placed before the House without debate?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I believe this is a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I will convey it to him.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

DRILLING IN BEAUFORT SEA—SUGGESTED DELAY IN ISSUANCE OF PERMITS PENDING COMMITTEE STUDY

Mr. Wally Firth (Northwest Territories): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, I will direct my question to the Prime Minister. We have already heard how an amendment to the casing procedures permitted by the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development made the shutting off of the blowout of the Dome petroleum well site last summer very difficult. A news report this morning indicates that failure to perform a routine check for low pressure testing made containment of the blowout virtually impossible. I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he can assure this House that no further drilling permits will be granted until the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development has had a chance to review the whole question of drilling in the Beaufort Sea?

● (1140)

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this is a technical question which I do not have the knowledge to answer, but I will bring it to the attention of the minister.

AIRPORTS

PRINCE ALBERT—INQUIRY AS TO APPROVAL OF EXPENDITURE FOR IMPROVEMENTS

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the President of the Treasury Board. It has to do with an agreement which has been entered into between the government of Canada in the right of the Department of Transport and the city of Prince Albert concerning the possibility of there being an expenditure of some millions of dollars being made to improve and bring up to date the airport at Prince Albert. I ask the minister whether or not Treasury Board has agreed to this expenditure?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I am afraid that I would have to take notice of that question and get the facts for the right hon. member. I do not recall from memory what the disposition of the matter was but I will check into it and let him know.

Mr. Diefenbaker: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The reason the matter becomes urgent is that two or three days ago the Minister of Transport signed the agreement in Prince Albert and there just happens to be a by-election there on Tuesday or Wednesday, which of course is purely coincidental. Would the minister find out by Monday and let the House know whether or not this agreement is simply padding during an election campaign in order to help the helpless?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, I would doubt very much if that would be the case but I will certainly get the information for the hon. member.

TRANSPORT

TORONTO TERMINAL PROJECT—REASON FEDERAL FUNDS NOT AVAILABLE IN ACCORDANCE WITH PROMISE TO AID URBAN TRANSIT

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the right hon. Prime Minister. Since it has been indicated that a 1974 promise of $290 million for urban transit will not be forthcoming, would the Prime Minister indicate whether he is aware that the Toronto transportation terminal project, which is needed to relieve congestion in that area in which federal authorities joined at the planning stage, will not be completed without federal funding and, if so, would the Prime Minister indicate why he feels that this project is not a suitable one for the application of funds pursuant to his 1974 promise of $290 million for such urban development?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the matter of metropolitan urban transportation is before cabinet now. There has been no decision one way or another but we are keeping the various arguments in mind, including the desire in every part of this House to keep expenditures down, as well as an often expressed desire by the provinces themselves that the federal government refrain from continuing to invade areas of provincial jurisdiction, that we should decentralize more, that we should let the provinces do more things. The question of intra-city transportation is one of these dubious cases. I believe there have been arguments put by the Tory party that we should be getting out of housing and out of a lot of areas where we should not be.

Mr. Paproski: Just keep your 1974 promise.

Mr. Trudeau: But, Mr. Speaker, we learn from the opposition. When they tell us to spend less money we take that seriously.

ALLEGED ASSURANCE TO ONTARIO OF FUNDING FOR TRANSIT EQUIPMENT

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): A supplementary question for the Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker. Is the Prime Minister aware that the previous minister of transport, Senator Marchand, gave an assurance to the province of Ontario that the government would fund the purchase of 80 tri-level transit cars at an approximate cost of $38 million; and if the Prime Minister is aware of this assurance, does he at least intend to see that that commitment is honoured?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I am not aware of that particular assurance but I do know that the former minister of transport, and indeed the present Minister of Transport, would like to spend more money in helping the cities in their problems of metropolitan transportation. I just gave to the opposition the consideration that the government has to take in mind when it is considering those proposals of the Minister of Transport.

Mr. Stevens: A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. As members of both sides of the House are greatly concerned about the question of urban transit funding, and since it has been indicated that certain supporters of the Prime Minister may vote against Bill C-33, to amend the National Transportation Act when it comes up for second reading, Would the Prime Minister indicate whether, if there is a defeat of his government on that bill, he will regard it as non-confidence?

FINANCE

ALLEGED PROMISE OF FINANCING FOR EDMONTON SUBWAY SYSTEM—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance and it concerns the related subject of urban transportation and promises made by the former minister of transport and the former minister of urban affairs, the present Minister of National Defence, in regard to the financing of long-lead items for the Edmonton subway system, in regard to which it is recognized that all levels of government are participating, although on the basis of engagements of the two ministers certain steps were taken in connection with long-lead items. Is the government of Canada now reneging on its participation in the financing of that system?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I would have to confirm the premise in the hon. member's question in regard to Edmonton in particular. So far as Edmonton and indeed the Toronto transportation terminal are concerned, the hard fact remains that within the blue book, within the budget, and indeed within the financial projections for the next several years, there is only so much room available. As I indicated to the mayors of metropolitan Toronto, it is important to state priorities as to how funds should be used among the various alternatives in urban transportation. As for the specific Edmonton question, I would have to canvass that further.

ALLEGED PROMISE OF RAPID TRANSIT SYSTEM THROUGH FRASER VALLEY TO VANCOUVER—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Alex Patterson (Fraser Valley East): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister. In view of the efforts of the government of British Columbia to obtain a rapid transit service through the Fraser valley to Vancouver, would the Prime Minister advise this House as to the efforts he has made to fulfil his election promise to the residents of Fraser Valley East that a rapid transit system would be put in place if his government were returned in the 1974 election?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, that particular line was not made the subject of a promise. The government indicated that it would be putting substantial funds into intra-city and inter-city transportation. We have already put $100 million into intra-city transportation. We have made other expenditures of funds. The question before the government, and I think before the opposition, is how fast we want our expenditures to grow. We generally have criticism from the other side when our expenditures grow. I am just reminding them of this now, that we are undertaking in the blue book to keep the growth of our expenditures at a certain rate, and we have to try to meet this objective, which means that we cannot spend as much money as the opposition would like us to.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

INVESTIGATION OF USE OF WRITS OF ASSISTANCE—REQUEST FOR REPORT

Mr. John M. Reid (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Revenue. Has the minister completed her investigation into writs of assistance as they apply under the Customs Act, and is she prepared to take the House into her confidence as to her decision? If she has not yet made her decision, would she indicate when the decision will be made?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, in answer to that may I say there are a number of us reviewing writs of assistance. In the meatime, I have ordered my officials not to request any further ones. Having read the judgment of Mr. Justice Collier, I am sympathetic to the comments that he made about the lack of information with which the court is provided. No further writs of assistance will be asked for, either by myself, or by my colleague the Minister of National Health and Welfare—under the Narcotic Control Act—until the matter is at least reviewed. If writs of assistance are to be continued, the court should be provided with full information.

In the meatime, we are continuing our examination as to whether they are needed at all.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

ALLEGED SEPARATIST BIAS IN RADIO-CANADA—REQUEST FOR INQUIRY—POSSIBILITY OF ATTACK ON PRIVATE STATIONS

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Halifax): My question is directed to the Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker. I should like to associate myself with the concern expressed by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands with regard to Radio-Canada. I do not think it is a question of proving who is the most loyal Canadian in this chamber. We are hearing some of the same kind of charges being made as were made at the time of the troubles in Quebec in 1970, charges which were never substantiated, and fearing very much that there may be some on the other side who might be inclined to demagoguery for their own political reasons, and not wishing to see the CBC or Radio-Canada destroyed in the process, would the Prime Minister please institute promptly a full inquiry, through a House committee or in some other appropriate way, of the charges being made by ministers and others, and in the meantime suggest to his ministers that they retain a reasonable degree of discretion in order that we may not see the CBC English network and Radio-Canada destroyed? It is always popular to attack those organizations but they are set up to serve the country.

Will the Prime Minister please cease the kind of tactics which were followed in 1970, the rumour-based charges which were never substantiated, and will he please have an investigation made to determine whether there is anything in the charges which are now being made?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): The hon. member for Halifax says it is always popular to attack the CBC. It would seem to me to be more popular to spring to the defence of the freedom of the press at any time and at any place anywhere, and that is what members of the opposition parties appear to be doing.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: The hon. member for Halifax indicates a way, perhaps, of getting to the bottom of some of these suspicions and fears that the CBC French side may be promoting separatism. I think it is a moderate and constructive proposal. I do not see any necessity of drawing a parallel with what happened in 1970. The issue, then, was not freedom of the press; the issue was kidnapping and murder. We dealt with it in the best way we could with the support of the opposition parties. So, I will give some consideration to the hon. member's suggestion. I can assure him that nobody is trying to promote himself as a hero or saviour of confederation—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: I believe those are the words the hon. member for Halifax used; I imagine he used them with some intent. But I do want to say to him that if the CBC, a government-owned corporation, were promoting separatism it would be a matter for very grave concern on this side, and I would hope we would have the support of the other side rather than these phoney rushes to defend freedom of speech.

Mr. Stanfield: It would be of concern to all of us, just as it is to some of us, to hear these charges being made by ministers and others without any effort being exercised to substantiate them. I ask the Prime Minister whether it is not a short step from this kind of assertion being made to attacks on private stations which, after all, are licensed by the CRTC and reach a far greater proportion of the people in Quebec and French-speaking Canada than does Radio-Canada. It might be quite unnecessary, but can the Prime Minister assure me that the next step in whatever is going on will not be an attack on the private stations for their allegedly unbalanced reporting on the grounds that they are licensed by an agency of this parliament?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: Those who are fairly attentive viewers of the CBC and of private stations in Quebec, to mention that particular province, are of the opinion that the private stations seem to carry less separatist propaganda messages than does the CBC. I do not think the opposition appears to be aware, and I am telling them with all the candour I can command, that almost everyone, including the high officials of the CBC, would be prepared to concede that the overwhelming majority of employees in the CBC are of separatist leaning. I have heard them say that. They are just asking: what can we do about it without infringing freedom of speech?

This is the question which is puzzling the government. We do not wish to judge people for their ideas. We want to judge them on the basis of their professional integrity. This is the question which is being brought up by a lot of members on this side, in this caucus, in and out of cabinet. It is a question which I am sure the CBC is asking of itself. I am informed they are holding seminars or groups of inquiry to try to get the opinion of people about the content, separatist or otherwise, of broadcasts from the French CBC stations. This is a matter of very serious concern to the government. I have answered this on other occasions. I am not sure how it could be dealt with because we do not intend on this side to police thought and we have never contended that the separatist ideology was not a legal one. We merely say that the CBC, the property of the Canadian people, should not be used to help destroy the country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: There are people on this side of the House better informed than I am on these matters who know militant separatists who are doing their job at the CBC. They want that to be stopped, and I agree with them.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: Would the Prime Minister as head of the government please try to figure out some way of dealing with the problem which is worrying him and, apparently, worrying others?

An hon. Member: Are you not concerned at all?

Mr. Stanfield: I do not intend to stand here to apologize for my views as to whether I am a Canadian or not.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: Of course we want to see the CBC and Radio-Canada give us balanced reporting. We are concerned when we see what appears to be powerful people in the government leaning on an institution. I do not doubt they are holding many meetings with regard to what is going on. All I ask is that the Prime Minister will stop what seems to some of us to have elements of demagoguery about it, but seek some way of attacking the problem which is worrying him without destroying Radio-Canada in the process.

Mr. Trudeau: It should be obvious from my previous answers that we are seeking some way to stop Radio Canada from being a propaganda machine for the separatist party, if indeed it is. The hon. member for Halifax has made a suggestion as to one way, in a previous question, and I said I would look into it.

ALLEGED THREAT TO REDUCE BUDGET OF CORPORATION UNLESS SEPARATIST BIAS ELIMINATED

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): The Prime Minister mentioned earlier that the government has a responsibility for preparing the budget of the CBC and submitting it to parliament. A Canadian Press report today of an extraordinary meeting between a section of the Liberal caucus and the President of the CBC yesterday reads as follows:

● (1200)

A number of Liberal MPs who attended the caucus meeting said Johnson was raked over the coals. They threatened to slash the corporation's proposed budget increases unless he took action to get rid of pro-separatists.

May I ask the Prime Minister whether the government has any intention of threatening the CBC with budget cuts unless there is a purge of separatists within the CBC?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I missed part of the question during the shouting, Mr. Speaker, but I have beside me the hon. member for Matane who says that this is not true, that is not what happened there.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: I know that if I were a member—

An hon. Member: Get up on a question of privilege.

[Mr. Trudeau.]

Mr. Trudeau: —if I were in caucus, I would be very concerned with the subject we have been discussing in the past little while. Before voting the budget for the CBC or any other Crown corporation, I would want to make very sure that it is not acting to destroy Canadian unity, and that does not seem so to me.

ALLEGATION BY URBAN AFFAIRS MINISTER THAT SEPARATISTS ARE HIRED AND PROMOTED—POSSIBILITY OF EVIDENCE IN SUPPORT OF CLAIM

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State who is responsible for the CBC. In view of the fact that in the interview with the Toronto Star which was given by his colleague, the Minister of State for Urban Affairs, the minister was quoted as saying the following:

If you're a separatist, you're hired and you're well paid and you get promotions.

Has the minister discussed this allegation with his colleague, the Minister of State for Urban Affairs and, if so, has the Minister of State for Urban Affairs offered one scintilla of evidence to substantiate the allegation he made?

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I cannot recall having had a conversation with—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Roberts: —the Minister of State for Urban Affairs in particular, but I confess I have had extensive discussions with members of the cabinet, with members from the House from all parties, and indeed with many citizens who have expressed to me their concerns about the activities of CBC, concerns which may or may not be justified. So there have been wide ranging discussions. It seems to me that my role as the link between the House of Commons and the CBC does require me to pay attention to those representations which are made to me, and I try to communicate them to the CBC for their information.

IMPLICATION OF PRIME MINISTER'S STATEMENT ON ALLEGED LIST OF SEPARATISTS IN RADIO-CANADA—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Again I have a question on the CBC for the Prime Minister. In view of the policy of the president of the CBC not to take political blood tests of employees in order to preserve freedom of speech, and the Prime Minister's statement earlier today that he encourages his ministers to forward a list of alleged separatists in Radio-Canada to the president of the CBC, is the implication of such an action not that the president of the CBC should reverse his stand and carry out such a witch hunt?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we are back to the lists, and I can assure the hon. member that I know of no such lists. However, to repeat what the Secretary of State has said excellently, it is his job, and perhaps my job as Prime Minister, to make sure that the CBC is aware of certain complaints, some of which might be justified and some might not be. I put it to the hon. member: If a well known and militant separatist is in the CBC at the head of, shall we say, some public affairs program, there is something uneasy about that, even if he does not take a blood test. If he is consistently producing programs which are of a separatist nature, it would be the duty of any listener, including members on this side, to convey that information to the head of the CBC, and I presume that that is what is being done by some hon. members referred to by the hon. member.

Mr. Symes: In view of that answer and the supposed independence of Crown corporations from political interference, would the Prime Minister, before that list is sent to the president of the CBC, personally look at it and look at the evidence to convince himself that it is indeed a valid list, and also, if such a list is sent, that the employees be told of it so they have a chance to defend themselves in view of the paranoia which exists among the ministers?

Mr. Trudeau: No, Mr. Speaker, I will not do that. If any citizen or any person in this country wants to complain to the CBC, he can do it by picking up the phone and having his message registered. If he wants to do it, I will not try to interfere.

PRIVILEGE

MR. CHRÉTIEN—REMARKS MADE IN CONNECTION WITH RADIO-CANADA

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I have listened to the debate and heard my name referred to a couple of times. The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield) spoke about substantiation. I would like to say that in my statement to the Toronto Star I said that citizens in my riding do not call Radio-Canada by its own name any more; they call it Radio-Quebec. I reported that. The second point I made was that one night when driving my car I noticed that Radio-Canada was no longer playing the national anthem of Canada. I reported that to the vice-president of the CBC. He confirmed this and said that "O Canada" had not been played on Radio-Canada for there months. He told me that this was a technical error, to which I replied, "My eye".

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Chrétien: I do not believe it, and I do not think this was a technical error in the present climate. At the time the Parti Quebecois was elected in Quebec. I do not think it was a technical error that Radio-Canada had not played the anthem of my country for three months. This is a fact that I reported, and I said it in public. This is not a witch-hunt but a fact which I observed. I did not believe the explanation which was given to me. I think it was my duty to report that to the press because there were no complaints in the press that the CBC had not been playing "O Canada". Since that time they have started playing it again, and I am grateful for that.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Halifax): I do not think it is a question of privilege really, Mr. Speaker, but my name was mentioned by the minister who just spoke. All I ask of him is that if he has these concerns, would he please get together with the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and have an investigation carried out of the sort that I asked for? May I say to him that I and some other members of the House will have suspicions, until this is done and ministers keep making these kinds of assertions—and will wonder what the purpose of the exercise really is. We would like to believe that the purpose of this government is to keep the country together. We would not like to believe that the purpose is incidentally to destroy the CBC.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Come on.

Mr. Stanfield: So long as this kind of attack goes on without substantiation and investigation, some of us will wonder.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, on this question of privilege—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Chrétien) has risen to participate in a question of privilege. It was not accompanied by a motion. He has been met by an equal contribution on the other side, and as there is no question of privilege within the definition of our rules the discussion should close.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I should like to raise a question of privilege. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) in the course of answering questions made the statement that when the government invoked the War Measures Act in October of 1970, this was supported by all parties.

Mr. Trudeau: I did not say that.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): His exact words were, "by the opposition parties". It was in the plural.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): It having been Friday morning, the Prime Minister may not have meant "all the parties" when he said "opposition parties," but I assume that meant all the opposition parties in the House of Commons at that time. I think the record should be set straight, that the official opposition of the NDP, of which I was leader at the time, was in opposition to the invocation of the War Measures Act.

● (1210)

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I do not remember if I said "opposition" or "oppositions", but I would accept the plural if the hon. member insists. At least two parties opposite supported the government when we invoked the War Measures Act, and three parties opposite supported us when we brought in the Public Order Act which did exactly the same thing as the War Measures Act.

An hon. Member: Oh, no.

Mr. Trudeau: Oh, yes.

Mr. Speaker: For the record, by way of a question of privilege the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas) raised a difference of interpretation respecting the remarks of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). As is well known, that is not technically a question of privilege. The hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands set the record straight from his point of view. The Prime Minister added a further interpretation. Neither constitutes any indication of a question of privilege, and the matter ought to terminate there.

The hon. member for Abitibi.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister has now—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands will realize at once that what was raised by him initially was a matter of disagreement with what the Prime Minister said, or an interpretation of it. That in itself precipitated a debate. To disagree further will only provoke further retaliation. Either it is a matter of discussion on debate or a difference of opinion, which does not constitute a question of privilege.

The hon. member for Abitibi.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): I ask, Mr. Speaker, that you at least hear my question of privilege. My question of privilege is that in the course of answering my previous question of privilege the Prime Minister made a new charge, and that is that all parties in this House voted for the public order bill. If the Prime Minister would take the trouble to look at the record, he would find that at third reading we voted against the public order bill.

Mr. Trudeau: All right, Mr. Speaker; they voted for the principle of the Public Order Act and then changed their minds at third reading. So what?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: This, again, obviously would be seen to be a disagreement of interpretation. No suggestion of deliberate misleading was made and no question of privilege exists.

The hon. member for Abitibi.

[Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands).]

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege because I am sorry I did not get the floor during the oral question period today to take part in an important debate on the French network of the CBC.

You will surely recall, Mr. Speaker, like all hon. members in the House, the enthusiasm with which the former leader of the Social Credit Party of Canada, Mr. Caouette, fought against Radio-Canada in the past, over a period of years. I wanted to ask the Prime Minister, now that he is confronted with the facts, whether he is not sorry he did not follow the advice of the leader of the Social Credit Party and lock-up Radio-Canada which has become an instrument of divisiveness in Canada, not only through the written press, but by fattening up scores of so-called artists who, even with their songs, spread disunity in Canada?

Mr. Speaker: Order. Clearly it is now impossible to recognize all hon. members who unfortunately did not have the opportunity of putting questions during the oral question period this afternoon.

[English]

Mrs. Holt: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. There was an insinuation in this House that the issue of the CBC strictly refers to Quebec. I can tell the House that at the meeting we had the westerners were equally concerned, and it was wrong to make—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This subject is not on the floor for debate. It is not permissible to discuss or debate this subject at this particular time. The matter was raised during the question period. That is one way of getting at the subject—never a sufficient way to explore such a very important subject—but in any case if it was now open to me to allow all hon. members who want to to comment on some of the questions raised during the question period, I am sure the debate would go on for some time. Any point of order at this time has to be related to irregularities during the question period.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order with respect to a ruling made during the question period by Your Honour. I refer to the question I put as a final supplementary to the Prime Minister asking whether he would regard a defeat with respect to a bill such as Bill C-33 to be a vote of non-confidence. I felt it was important that we understand beforehand whether such a vote, in the mind of the Prime Minister, would be so regarded, as opposed to having some afterthought in case that bill was defeated subsequently in the House.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for York-Simcoe raises a point of order with respect to a decision I made during the question period. I am sure that despite the importance and impact of his question, he will realize at once that any projection on an action of the government based on an eventuality which lies in the future is, in its own terms, a hypothetical question in the purest form.

MINISTRY OF STATE FOR URBAN AFFAIRS—PERSONNEL

Question No. 673—Mr. Lachance:

Between the date of the presentation of the last budget May 25, 1976 and October 12, 1976, did the Ministry of State for Urban Affairs, National Capital Commission and Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation hire, dismiss or transfer employees to other departments and, if so, how many?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): In so far as the Ministry of State for Urban Affairs is concerned: Hired, 9; Dismissed, 0; Transferred out, Urban Affairs, 32; Canadian Habitat Secretariat, 14.

In so far as the National Capital Commission is concerned: Hired, 4; Dismissed, 0; Transferred, 6.

In so far as the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation is concerned: The employment practices of CMHC are matters of internal administration which, by statute, are the responsibility of its Board of Directors. Employees of CMHC are not included in the provisions of the Public Service Employment Act, and hence a procedure does not exist through which employees may be transferred to government departments.

NEW SUB-MINISTRY RESPONSIBLE FOR SMALL BUSINESS

Question No. 701—Mr. Jelinek:

1. What will be the cost of establishing the new sub-ministry responsible for Small Business?

2. What number of personnel will be responsible to the Minister of State for Small Business and what will be their salaries?

Hon. Len Marchand (Minister of State (Small Businesses)): 1. Expenditures, including salaries of exempt staff members for the Office of the Minister of State, Small Businesses, for the fiscal year 1976/77 are estimated at $127,500, which amount will be accomodated within existing departmental funds.

2. As of the date of this question, the Minister employed four persons through his exempt budget within salary ranges the maxima of which are shown below: three Special Assistants at up to $22,900 per annum. One Private Secretary at up to $17,900 per annum.

STERILIZATION OF NATIVE WOMEN OF CHILD-BEARING AGE

Question No. 765—Mr. Holmes:

How many native women of child-bearing age reside in (a) Repulse Bay (b) Chesterfield Inlet (c) Pelly Bay (d) Gjou Haven (e) Hall Beach (f) Rankin Inlet and, in each case, how many were sterilized between January, 1966 and October, 1976?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): For Canada as a whole, the sterilization rates and live birth rates during recent years for which figures are available are as follows:

	Sterilization rate	Live birth rate
1971	9.26 per thousand	16.8 per thousand
1972	12.54 per thousand	15.9 per thousand
1973	13.54 per thousand	15.5 per thousand

For the period January 1966 to October 1976, the following information is provided: (a) Repulse Bay (i) Inuit population fluctuated between 148 and 265 over the ten years. The number of native women of child bearing age was 48. (It should be pointed out that because over the ten year period a number of women have entered the child-bearing age range-15 to 50 years of age—and a number have left it, the figure listed above for the number of native women of child-bearing age is therefore calculated to represent the average number over the ten-year span.) (ii) There were ten sterilizations carried out over the ten-year period. (iii) The age of those sterilized ranged from 21 to 43 years, with the average age being 38.1 years. (iv) Those sterilized all exhibited multiparity. Average parity was 11.2. (v) The sterilization rate per thousand during the ten years ranged from 0 to 13.3. (vi) The birth rate per thousand during the ten years ranged from 44.8 to 72.8. (b) Chesterfield Inlet (i) Inuit population fluctuated between 199 and 254 over the ten years. The number of native women of child-bearing age was 54. (It should be pointed out that because over the ten-year period a number of women have entered the child-bearing age range-15 to 50 years of age—and a number have left it, the figure listed above for the number of native women of child-bearing age is therefore calculated to represent the average number over the ten-year span). (ii) There were ten (10) sterilizations carried out over the ten-year period. (iii) The age of those sterilized ranged from 28 to 44 years, with the average age being 33.3 years. (iv) The average parity of those sterilized was 7.9. (v) The sterilization rate per thousand during the ten years ranged from 0 to 12.3. (vi) The birth rate per thousand during the ten years ranged from 35.7 to 63.2. (c) Pelly Bay (i) Inuit population fluctuated between 138 and 251 over the ten years. The number of native women of child-bearing age was 40. (It should be pointed out that because over the ten-year period a number of women have entered the child-bearing age range-15 to 50 years of age—and a number have left it, the figure listed above for the number of native women of child-bearing age is therefore calculated to represent the average number over the ten-year span.) (ii) There were five (5) sterilizations carried out over the ten-year period. (iii) The age of those sterilized ranged from 27 to 43 years, with the average age being 31.6 years. (iv) Those sterilized exhibited multiparity, except for one with a history of complicated pregnancies and deliveries. (v) The sterilization rate per thousand during the ten years ranged from 0-10. (vi) The birth rate per thousand during the ten years ranged from 43.8 to 105. (d) Gjou Haven (i) Inuit population fluctuated between 215 and 592 over the ten years. The number of native women of child-bearing age was 90. (It should be pointed out that because over the ten year period a number of women have entered the child-bearing age range-15 to 50 years of age—and a number have left it, the figure listed above for the number of native women of child-bearing age is therefore calculated to represent the average number over the ten-year span.) (ii) There were eleven (11) sterilizations carried out over the ten-year period. (iii) The age of those sterilized ranged from 28 to 41 years, with the average age being 36.1 years. (iv) Those sterilized were all of high parity (i.e. 5 to 13), with average parity being 9.1. (v) The sterilization rate per thousand during the ten years ranged from 0 to 10.5 (vi) The birth rate per thousand during the ten years ranged from 25.7 to 98.7. (e) Hall Beach (i) Inuit population fluctuated between 148 and 301 over the ten years. The number of native women of child-bearing age was 64. (It should be pointed out that because over the ten-year period a number of women have entered the child-bearing age range-15 to 50 years of age—and a number have left it, the figure listed above for the number of native women of child-bearing age is therefore calculated to represent the average number over the ten-year span.) (ii) There were eight (8) sterilizations carried out over the ten-year period. (iii) The age of those sterilized ranged from 22 to 37 years, with the average age being 31.1 years. (iv) Those sterilized all exhibited multiparity. Average parity was 7.1. (v) The sterilization rate per thousand during the ten years ranged from 0 to 6.7. (vi) The birth rate per thousand during the ten years ranged from 40.5 to 91.6 (f) Rankin Inlet (i) Inuit population fluctuated between 310 and 664 over the ten years. The number of native women of child-bearing age was 146. (It should be pointed out that because over the ten-year period a numberof women have entered the child-bearing age range—15 to 50 years of age—and a number have left it, the figure listed above for the number of native women of child-bearing age is therefore calculated to represent the average number over the ten-year span.) (ii) There were twenty-six (26) sterilizations carried out over the ten-year period. (iii) The age of those sterilized ranged from 28 to 44 years, with the average age being 33.3 years. (iv) The average parity of those sterilized was 7.9. (v)

The sterilization rate per thousand during the ten years ranged from 2.2 to 12.9. (vi) The birth rate per thousand during the ten years ranged from 32.6 to 57.5.

APPOINTMENT OF DIRECTOR GENERAL FOR PROVINCE OF NEWFOUNDLAND

Question No. 1,132—Mr. Marshall:

1. Was there a delay in the appointment of the Director General for the Province of Newfoundland, to integrate UIC and Manpower and, if so, for what reason?

2. Has an appointment been made and, if so, who was appointed and what are the details of his duties?

3. (a) What are the organizational criteria in setting up such an office (b) what is the purpose (c) where is it to be located (d) what were the considerations given to that location?

4. Was any consideration given to decentralization of departments to Newfoundland to places where unemployment is highest and, if so, what are the details?

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Department of Manpower and Immigration and the Treasury Board Secretariat as follows: 1. No.

2. Yes, the Public Service Commission appointed Mr. Gerry Everard as Director General for the Province of Newfoundland on November 24, 1976. He will be the senior officer of the proposed Canada Employment and Immigration Commission in Newfoundland and will be responsible for the management of all manpower, unemployment insurance and immigration programmes in that province.

3. (a) A head office for Newfoundland is being established as part of a plan to establish a regional organization for the proposed Canada Employment and Immigration Commission in each of the 10 provinces. The field offices of the present Unemployment Insurance Commission and Department of Manpower and Immigration are organized into five regions. (b) The purpose is to permit the decentralization of authority from the national headquarters and to increase the sensitivity of policies and programs to regional and local needs. (c) St. John's. (d) It is the largest city in the province and, as the provincial capital, the location of the provincial departments with whom the Director General's office will have regular contact.

4. Yes. All areas of Canada are considered. Both the needs of the communities and the practicality of the relocated unit discharging its assigned task from each proposed location are taken into account in arriving at decisions.

FOREIGN GOVERNMENT GRANTS OR LOANS

Question No. 1,363—Mr. Jones:

1. Does any Department or branch of the government scrutinize, investigate and approve grants or loans by foreign governments to firms, individuals and organizations in Canada and, if so, which one?

2. Does any Department or branch of the government scrutinize, investigate and approve grants or loans by the government of France, indirectly or directly, to (a) the French daily newspaper L'Évangeline in Moncton, New Brunwick (b) the University of Moncton (c) any other firm, individual or organization in Canada and, if so, which one?

3. Is the government aware of the purposes of such grants or loans and the conditions under which they are made?

4. (a) Is the government aware of the circumstances and financial arrangements under which citizens of France are permitted to take up employment as professors, teachers, instructors or members of the staff of the University of Moncton and, if so, how long have these persons been in or coming to Canada (b) is the government aware that these French citizens can do this work instead of going on active service with the French military?

5. Are investigations and surveillance been conducted by the Canadian Armed Forces with respect to a possible military build-up on St. Pierre and Miquelon?

6. Is a full French Consulate office located in the City of Moncton, New Brunswick and, if so, for what reason?

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Departments of External Affairs and National Defence as follows: 1. Foreign government grants or loans to individuals, firms or organizations in Canada may come to the attention of government departments but they do not require approval and are not systematically scrutinized.

2. (a) No. The fact of a grant having been given is, however, well-known. (b) No. The fact of assistance in the field of cultural programmes is, however, well-known. (c) No.

3. The government is aware of the purposes and conditions which generally lead governments to provide such assistance to persons or institutions in countries where they have cultural or business interests. In the cases mentioned, the purposes appear to be analogous to those which have led the Canadian Government to give financial and other forms of support to university centres of Canadian studies in a number of countries including France.

4. (a) Yes, inasmuch as this is provided for under the terms of the laws and regulations administered by the Department of Manpower and Immigration and of government agreements with France. Such persons have been coming to Canada since the establishment of the University for stays of varying lengths. (b) The Government is aware that there is a worldwide programme of the French government providing for employment in a foreign country in lieu of military service. This programme has been functioning in Canada since the mid-sixties, and persons participating in it generally spend sixteen months here.

5. No.

6. Yes. The Consulate carries out the functions of a consular office for the area of the Atlantic Provinces, consular representatives of France in other centres in this area being honorary.

CRTC—SURVEYS INTO ADMINISTRATION OR INTERNAL OPERATION

Question No. 288—Mr. Orlikow:

1. For the fiscal year 1975-1976, what contracts for professional services were let (a) for studies, surveys and analyses into present or future policies, programs or information analysis, and their efficiency and effectiveness (b) into the examination of the administration or internal operation of the Canadian Radio and Television Commission?

2. How much was committed on each contract and to whom?

3. What were the comparable figures for the fiscal year 1973-1974?

Return tabled.

Mr. Goodale: I ask, Mr. Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

EMPLOYMENT AND IMMIGRATION REORGANIZATION ACT

MEASURE TO ESTABLISH DEPARTMENT OF EMPLOYMENT AND IMMIGRATION, ETC.

The House resumed from Wednesday, February 2, consideration of the motion of Mr. Cullen that Bill C-27, to establish the department of employment and immigration, the Canada employment and immigration commission and the Canada employment and immigration advisory council, to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971, and to amend certain other statutes in consequence thereof, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration.

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, when this debate adjourned on February 2 I had halfway concluded my remarks. Perhaps it would be useful at this point, since the debate is now being resumed after three weeks, if I were to commence by repeating the suggested amendment that has been placed on the record by my colleague, the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander), which of course will be moved on behalf of the official opposition when this bill goes to committee. The amendment is as follows:

● (1220)

In high unemployment regions, the minister may, with the approval of the governor in council, make regulations —lowering from 12 weeks down to a minimum of 8 weeks the number of weeks referred to in subsection 16(1) and 17(2)(a) —defining high unemployment regions, delineating the boundaries thereof and determining residence and eligibility within such region;

—setting a date of termination for any such regulations—

Mr. Speaker, I hope my hon. friend from New Brunswick who is interrupting me will support the amendment because it is very important to northern New Brunswick. This bill will affect northern New Brunswick as much or probably even more than my own province of Newfoundland.

Mr. Breau: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, as I only have limited time I will gladly accept a question from the hon. member at the end of my speech.

• Mr. Corbin: You would change your whole speech if you listened to him.

Mr. McGrath: Again, the hon. member from New Brunswick who interrupts should support our amendment which could change the whole course of this bill. I do not see how any member from the Atlantic provinces cannot support the amendment. Unemployment in northern New Brunswick is among the highest in the country and will take a great deal of explaining by the hon. member, more than I suspect he is capable of.

I am glad to know there is concern, as was exemplified by the interjections at the commencement of my remarks by my learned and friendly colleague from New Brunswick. That province is on record as having the second highest unemployment rate in the country—second to my own province. When you get into the northern part of New Brunswick—where the hon. gentleman who continues to interrupt me comes from—then, of course, the unemployment rate is as bad and in some cases is worse than it is in Newfoundland.

Since the debate adjourned on February 2—and perhaps I should underline and emphasize again the importance of this bill—the latest figures have been issued by Statistics Canada referring to unemployment for the month of January. One thing we can draw from those figures is that if we needed proof, it is obviously here, that the present method of measuring unemployment by Statistics Canada is, to say at least, grossly inadequate. I have referred to the seriousness of that already. It is based on these figures released monthly by Statistics Canada that allocations are made for the government's make-work programs such as the Local Initiatives Program, the Canada Works program and Young Canada Works program.

If we examine the figures for the month of January we find that on a seasonally adjusted basis the figures for Newfoundland were 13.6 per cent, representing a decline of two decimal points from 13.8 per cent from the previous month. Of course, taking into account the seasonally adjusted figures, more people were reported unemployed for the month of January than for the previous month.

The same situation applies to the national figures for the month of January which places unemployment in Canada, on a seasonally adjusted basis, at 7.5 per cent compared to the same figure for the previous month of December. Yet for the month of January we reached an all-time record. There were more people out of work in Canada in the month of January than in the history of this country since records have been kept. That fact was brought out quite forcibly in an article which appeared in the February 12 edition of the Toronto Star. It listed figures that had been leaked by someone in Statistics Canada showing the real rate of unemployment in Canada for the previous year, 1976.

According to these figures, the official unemployment rate in the province of Newfoundland in 1976 was 14.7 per cent, and officially represented 25,000 people. But there are others who were not regarded by this new methodology of Statistics Canada which was adopted a year ago, and they represent another 28,000 unemployed unreported in the statistics, for a total of 53,000 unemployed, or 25 per cent. There is obviously something wrong with our method of measurement.

Let us look at the methodology for the country as a whole, using the same figures. In Canada as a whole, the rate for 1976 was 7.1 per cent, representing in official terms 735,000 Canadians. But another 450,000 people in the country never qualified to be reported in these statistics: these are the hidden unemployed, the unemployable, the unemployed unemployables. These are the people who have given up, who have been on the labour market for so long that they had given up looking for work, either for lack of skill, surplus in a particular skill or through sheer frustration at their inability to find work. That brings the total unemployed in Canada to 1,185,000, or 11 per cent. Yet officially—and these are the figures on which the government bases its programs—the figure was 7.1 per cent, or 735,000 people unemployed for the year.

Let us look at the method of measuring unemployment. I refer to a document released by Statistics Canada last February to explain the new methodology, entitled "Conceptual, Definitional and Methodological Changes in the Labour Force Survey". Under the heading "Methodology" it reads:

Except for the new questionnaire design, the methodology used is obtaining labour force survey data is similar in the LFS and RLFS. However, the revised survey has introduced a number of refinements and some of the more important improvements will be presented in this section.

LFS is "labour force survey" and I presume RLFS is "revised labour force survey". The document goes on to define some of those refinements. At page 3 it reads:

Finally, persons not in the labour force are those who are unwilling or unable, during reference week, to supply labour services under existing labour market conditions.

Obviously, half the total of the unemployed fall into that category. Then we go to the end of the document and find this statement in the summary.

—more precise measures of employment and unemployment and the generation of additional information—

Finally the document reads:

When taken in conjunction with the additional information collected about persons who are classified as not in the labour force, the data users—

Those are people who go into the field one week out of four to gather this information.

—can, and in fact are encouraged to, formulate definitions of unemployment which are best suited to their particular applications.

● (1230)

I suggest this puts far too much discretion in the hands of surveyors, the people who actually gather the data. There is ample evidence of the correctness of my contention. According to Statistics Canada, 29,000 were unemployed in my province in January. However, on checking with the Unemployment Insurance Commission I discovered that in that same month, January, there were 60,000 drawing unemployment insurance benefits—60,000 out of a total work force of 168,000 persons.

You can only qualify for unemployment insurance if you are available for work; availability for work is a prerequisite qualification for the receipt of unemployment insurance benefits. If you are available for work, you must be in the work force. Clearly, therefore, the unemployment figures for Newfoundland and for Canada as a whole are misleading. They do not show how serious is the unemployment situation in this country. That is also why I question the judgment—indeed, the humanity—of the government in bringing forward this bill at this time.

I do not deny that the bill contains some excellent features. Obviously, the move to combine the functions of the Unemployment Insurance Commission and the department of manpower is long overdue since those two services are complementary. But if the bill passes it will eliminate many Canadians from the unemployment rolls and force them onto the welfare rolls of the provinces. This is not the time to do it. Although this bill may represent a reform, and even though, as my colleague from Hamilton said, it would provide more incentives to work or more disincentives to not work, I submit this is not the time to bring forward the particular amendment to the Unemployment Insurance Act embodied in this bill.

The C. D. Howe Research Institute, in a policy paper entitled "New Directions for Manpower Policy" which was released on November 1, 1976, said in part:

The government's main response to cyclical unemployment should continue to be unemployment insurance and fiscal and monetary policies.

I note the words "should continue to be unemployment insurance and fiscal and monetary policies." The C. D. Howe Research Institute is a well respected and highly regarded institute or "think tank", if you like. I quoted the research institute to support my argument, namely, that this is not the time, during a period of critically high unemployment, to tamper with the Unemployment Insurance Act.

Mr. Breau: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: I am glad my hon. friend agrees. I knew he would because he is genuinely concerned, as I am about the present situation. He, too, comes from one of the Atlantic provinces. Let us consider the effects of this bill. Who will be affected by the provision changing the qualifying period from 8 to 12 weeks? I shall put forward the figures pertaining to my own province. My hon. friend opposite can refer to the figures relating to New Brunswick. Mr. Speaker, my province will be hardest hit because we have the highest rate of unemployment in the country by far. Bear in mind, Mr. Speaker, that 74 per cent of all those affected are male. When you consider that 44 per cent of that group are 25 years old and older, it is obvious that families will be hardest hit because the heads of families will be disqualified from unemployment insurance benefits. I say that, sir, notwithstanding the assurances given in June by the minister's predecessor who said that these reforms would affect, basically, only students and housewives. The fact that heads of families in my province will be hardest hit gives the lie to that statement.

As I have already said, the burden will fall heavily on the low income earner. Let me illustrate. In Newfoundland, 45 per cent of those affected earn less than $90 a week and 30 per cent of the group affected earn up to $129 a week. What do those figures tell you? If you earn $90 a week, it means that you can draw up to $60 per week in benefits.

Mr. Speaker, it is difficult enough to live on $90 a week anywhere in Canada, especially in my province where the cost of living is high. Surely it is nigh impossible to live on unemployment insurance of $60 a week. I say this to give the lie to those who charge that we must get people off unemployment insurance. Canadians do not, by and large, draw unemployment insurance from choice. They draw unemployment insurance because they cannot find work. They must fall back on unemployment insurance as a means of supporting their families.

Taking people off the unemployment insurance rolls will do something else in the hardest pressed provinces where unemployment is highest. It will place an additional, heavy financial burden on those provinces, especially Newfoundland. At present, people can qualify for unemployment insurance benefits after eight weeks of work. But if they are taken off the unemployment insurance rolls or disqualified they will fall back on our welfare system. At least half of welfare payments must be financed by the province under the Canada Assistance Plan. It is estimated that if this bill passes Newfoundland this year will have to bear an additional 16 per cent increase in the cost of welfare benefits.

My colleague from Egmont (Mr. MacDonald) talked about the seasonality of work in the Atlantic provinces. Seasonal jobs are a fact of life in many parts of Canada, certainly in the Atlantic provinces. Bear in mind that work projects under the government's Local Initiatives Program usually last about two months. I do not think that is coincidental. I think such programs have been geared to last that long in order to enable those who would otherwise or normally be unemployed with work for a long enough period to qualify for unemployment insurance benefits. Until such make-work programs are phased out—in other words, until we reach a situation in which there is full employment or almost full employment which might be based upon an unemployment rate of 4 per cent or less—I do not think we should tamper with the Unemployment Insurance Act. I say this because at present our make-work programs are geared to the existing provisions of the act.

Obviously, we need a comprehensive employment strategy in this country. We have heard talk in the Atlantic provinces of such a strategy for a number of years. For the last six or seven years the DREE program has been available to us. The DREE program was to be the be-all and end-all of the fight against high unemployment in the high unemployment areas of the country. Unfortunately, the DREE program was not productive. That is to say, it was not successful because as a program it operated in almost total isolation from other government policies. It operated in isolation from monetary and fiscal policies, transportation policies and the government's own tariff policies.

Also, it was necessary to consider all those policies in order to formulate a comprehensive employment strategy. After all, there is not much point in offering industry DREE grants to locate in the Atlantic provinces, on the one hand, and increasing freight rates on the other. One policy, obviously, is counter productive with respect to the other. Until this country has a job strategy or an employment strategy we shall continue to be plagued with high unemployment—and when we have high unemployment in Canada as a whole we have critically high unemployment in the eastern regions of Canada.

There is one other thing we should bear in mind. In the past number of years, going back as far as I can remember in this House—in fact, ever since fishermen were included as qualifying for unemployment insurance in 1956—we have been promised a special income stabilization program for fishermen. The Gill report, which was the last major study into the Unemployment Insurance Act in 1970, had this to say:

> Income stabilization is imperative in the commercial fisheries, with particular reference to the remoter fishing communities, and, pending the completion of plans being prepared specifically for this purpose, self-employed fishermen will be covered by unemployment insurance.

That obviously referred to plans which were under way at that time. In the election of June, 1974, in a speech at Yarmouth, Nova Scotia, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said, and I quote from "Notes for remarks by the Prime Minister—Liberal party policy on fisheries, June 21, 1974":

> And, of great importance to fishermen and their families, we are committed to bring in an income stabilization plan to ensure a reasonable average level of earnings.

I appeal to my colleagues opposite from the Atlantic provinces who come from areas where there is heavy dependence upon the fishing industry, where fishing is a major economic factor, not to proceed with this amendment to the act at this time. Withdraw this amendment until the government brings in its promised and "long under development" income stabilization program for fishermen. Otherwise this amendment which changes the qualifying period from eight to 12 weeks will not only hit hardest the heads of families and low income earners in this country but it will hit also hardest the fishermen, the plant workers, the seasonal operations in this country, whether it is processing, packing, fishing for lobster in Nova Scotia or New Brunswick, or the more seasonal fishing operations of the northeast coast of Newfoundland where you can only fish for a short period of time. The produce of that very short fishery has to be processed in less than 12 weeks.

All the people in these seasonal fishing operations in the Atlantic provinces, the Magdalen Islands and the eastern part of Quebec, will be disqualified from drawing unemployment insurance. Given the seasonal nature of their work and the limitation of employment opportunities in these regions, they will have no choice but to fall back on the welfare rolls of these provinces. They are proud people. They should not have to go on welfare. These provinces should not have to add to their already overburdened welfare rolls at this time in our history.

Mr. Breau: Mr. Speaker, will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: This can be done only with unanimous consent, because the time of the hon. member who had the floor has expired. Is the House ready to allow the question?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Breau: Mr. Speaker, in view of the eloquent plea the hon. member has made for changing this bill, could we hear from him whether some members of his party, either in committee, at report stage or elsewhere, will move an amendment which will do what the hon. member would like to do, namely, change the law, not making these amendments part of the law, rather then the phony amendment he talked about earlier in his speech that all we should do is skate on both sides of the issue and say "we wanted this but the government would not give it." Will the hon. member state whether he or someone else in his party will move amendments to do what he wants to achieve?

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Breau) is a good friend of mine. He is an experienced member of the House and a former parliamentary secretary. I expected better from him. First, I am sure he knows we cannot move an amendment at this stage. However, we can—and we intend to—move the amendment I repeated which was placed on the record earlier by my colleague for Hamilton West. We intend to move that amendment in committee. I suggest that the hon. member for Gloucester read the amendment very carefully. It is not a phony amendment.

The amendment will enable the minister to use discretion and eliminate the abuses which take place in the big cities where unemployment is not the major factor. That is where most abuses occur. It will also enable the minister to continue the eight-week qualifying period in the areas hardest hit due to economic, cyclical and seasonal factors—areas such as the constituency of Gloucester which is represented in the House by the hon. member. I hope that he and his colleagues from New Brunswick will make a speech on this matter. Not only do I look forward to hearing him speak, but I look forward to his support on this very worthwhile amendment.

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) a question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Again, this can only be done with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I suggest that hon. members have agreed to one set of rules for one member. I think there could be agreement to do the same for the hon. member in all fairness.

Mr. Goodale: As long as the question does not last a week.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Rodriguez: I can understand the reluctance of members opposite to listen to words of wisdom. My question is along the same lines as the question asked by the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Breau). I listened to the very excellent remarks of the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) for whom I have a great deal of respect. I also listened to the speech of the official spokesman for his party with respect to the amendment they intend to introduce. I am sure that the hon. member for St. John's East knows how long it takes for the government and the bureaucracy to move on anything. Does the hon. member not consider it unwise to agree to a change in the Unemployment Insurance Act and then later try to force the government into moving the bureaucracy to bring in a change correcting the obviously inadequate situation with regard to certain parts of the country?

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, I listened very carefully to the hon. member. I tried to understand the purport of his question. Obviously, there are very attractive features in this bill. It is in the best interests of the country to have the two agencies, the Unemployment Insurance Commission and Manpower, with their job-creation services, housed once again, as they once were, under one agency. That is a very progressive and useful suggestion, one which is very helpful at this time.

I also believe that given the majority of the government in this House, it is our responsibility to try to improve legislation. I believe the amendment which we have put forward is a reasonable amendment and will commend itself to the House. I hope, at the very least, it will commend itself to individual members of the House and will be accepted.

Mr. Paul Dick (Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to speak on Bill C-27 dealing with Unemployment Insurance, manpower and the integration of the two. If the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Breau) wants to carry on a conversation, he should cross the floor, go outside or try to get the attention of the Speaker so that he can make a speech. The fact that the minimum period for qualifying for unemployment insurance will be 12 weeks perhaps has some merit in view of the rip-offs and the problems resulting from some people misusing or taking advantage of the eight-week period in urban areas and other areas of this country.

I represent an area of Ontario that has some of the highest unemployment in the province—indeed, in the whole country. In one community 20 per cent of the working population is unemployed. For this reason I am concerned about this 12-week landmark that the government has established for all parts of Canada. We frequently hear it said that regions of Canada are affected by various problems and for that reason we should have flexible federalism. I am not suggesting that we need flexible federalism or a balanced federalism, but that federal government programs should be sufficiently flexible to take account of the circumstances obtaining in various regions of the country.

I think there is support among all parties in the House for the proposition that in areas of high unemployment where the situation is markedly different from the low level of unemployment in large industrial areas the period of 12 weeks should be reduced to eight. I realize we do not like giving the governor in council discretionary powers, but we must consider human problems in the various regions of this country. Therefore, I think the best solution is to exercise discretion in favour of people in depressed areas.

If the government carries out all the programs it has announced to improve the employment situation, this particular problem may disappear and we will not have to designate certain regions for special attention in terms of lowering the 12-week period to eight weeks. However, in my own constituency, if the government had carried out the DREE programs that it promised, perhaps we would not have had the crisis in unemployment which may require us to make application for some special consideration. For example, in 1973 the federal government announced that it was going to negotiate with the province of Ontario the establishment of a basic infrastructure for the county of Renfrew, but to date nothing has been done in this regard.

The province of Ontario could not get the federal government to commit itself, and finally the province had to act on its own. Had the federal government lived up to its oft-promised participation, and federal money been poured into the area, we would have been much better off and further ahead than we are today, with the province using its limited resources to support a program which was originally announced to be a joint project.

If the federal government had instituted proper DREE programs and co-ordinated its industrial programs, I am sure it would have eliminated some of the regions of high unemployment in this country. In that event, the discretionary power suggested in the amendment would not be required. Since that is not the case, for the sake of those living in disadvantaged areas and, indeed, for humanitarian reasons alone, the amendment proposed by our party will be introduced at the committee stage and I hope will be accepted by the members of the House and become the law of this country.

I feel that the electoral success which the Progressive Conservative party, and particularly myself, had in my region in 1972 was because there was a feeling that the Unemployment Insurance Commission and the manpower department were completely unable to fulfill their respective roles. I readily admit that throughout that election campaign I campaigned on the platform that UIC and manpower should be joined together, that they could not do their job effectively when the left hand did not know what the right hand was doing. There was a great hue and cry during the election campaign on that issue. Although this government now has a majority in the House, it has been unable to come to grips with the problems facing this country and only now, almost 4½ years since the election, has started to take action. This shows how inept is this government.

I appreciate that this bill is a difficult one to swallow so far as some aspects are concerned, but it would have been much easier from the point of view of government business to bring it in last June or even earlier. In fact, the government did have some legislation on the order paper in the twenty-ninth parliament that covered some of the provisions in this bill, but it remained on the order paper. This is an indication that the government does not react very quickly at times, and this I regret.

I want to talk about youth unemployment in this country, Mr. Speaker, but seeing it is almost one o'clock perhaps it would be convenient to call it one o'clock and I will recommence after the luncheon recess.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it agreed to call it one o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being one o'clock I do now leave the chair till two o'clock this afternoon.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

[Mr. Dick.]

Mr. Fox: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. In the course of the question period this morning I attributed Canadian citizenship to an NRC scientist in connection with deportation proceedings involving a Russian scientist. My answer should have indicated that the scientist was an NRC scientist, without reference to nationality. This was brought to my attention when the House rose at 1 p.m. This is the first opportunity I have had to make a correction.

Mr. Dick: Mr. Speaker. Just prior to the lunch break I tried to bring my thoughts on the topic of Bill C-27 to the attention of the House in dealing with the government's bill to try to make minimum benefits payable only to a person who works for 12 weeks. The amendment which our party has suggested is that in special circumstances, when humanitarian concerns are most evident in places of high unemployment, this period could perhaps be reduced down to as low as eight weeks.

I also tried to indicate that some concerns about unemployment insurance, some of which are being dealt with under this legislation, were first raised in the 1972 election campaign. A bill on the order paper of the twenty-ninth parliament died on the order paper, and have had to wait 4½ years for the government to take any action.

I want for a moment to deal with what is perhaps the major unemployment problem in Canada, which is youth unemployment. Today in Canada 46 per cent of the people who are on the unemployment insurance rolls are between age 14 and 24. This is absolutely ridiculous. It is unfair to an age group which is offering so much to this country and which wants to offer so much to this country that they are the ones who are being denied an opportunity to make the contribution they wish to make.

As somebody once indicated, the logic of Manpower's approach toward unemployment in Canada affecting those between 14 and 24 years of age was obscured by the growth of Manpower's many programs. That person indicated that the program failures were always being met by band-aid remedies. We have a perfect example of some of these band-aid remedies. Last year, prior to Christmas, the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) announced two "brilliant" new programs for the creation of jobs. They were really going to do wonders for the Canadian economy. He announced the Canada Works program and the Young Canada Works program. He announced that they were going to be five-year programs. I suppose if one were skeptical about it, one would assume that the government believes it is going to be so inefficient over the next few years that it requires these make-work programs to be in place for five years to get over the government's ineptness. However, the young people in Canada, the people between 14 and 24 who make up half the unemployed, have been given a special program—the Young Canada Works Program—and as we see from a Manpower advertisement, it is geared generally to students who will work on community benefit programs which will enable them to test their career aspirations.

If we read further we find that students can expect six weeks of consecutive work. I am sure that in those six weeks the students will be able to discover all the facets of their career aspirations! It goes on to say that the program can work up to 14 weeks. So between a 6-week and a 14-week period the department of manpower believes young people in the age group between 14 and 24 will find jobs which will help them in their career aspirations.

This is just ludicrous. Maybe they are creating jobs, but they are certainly not creating jobs which will help people generally in their careers. First of all, they are restricting the jobs to community benefits. In other advertising it is indicated that work will be created by a community group, a group responsible in the community, perhaps a municipal council. It is just another band-aid. It will generate some jobs like Opportunities for Youth. In the past we have had LIP, which closely resembles Canada Works, but this is only a band-aid approach and a scratch on the surface.

Also, we are going to have, as indicated in answer to a question I asked the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Danson), a department responsible for a program which may become entitled "operation Canada". Indications that I have are that it will be under the Minister of National Defence. The minister submitted to cabinet on December 1 a plan for "operation Canada" which will bring Canadians between the ages of 17 and 22 together for a ten months' period. This "operation Canada" program is to demonstrate that through physical development, mental fitness and the resilience of Canadian youth, they will provide a greater service to the Canadian nation. They plan to start on a pilot program involving about 1,000 people in this youth corps, and it will cost in the beginning about $5,145,000, or a little over $5,000 per person for the ten months during which they will be employed. That program might start in July, 1977, and they hope they will have 10,000 participants involved by January 1978, with a budget of about $48 million.

I asked the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) a question about this youth corps about a week ago and he said about the program—which was mentioned in the throne speech—that he did not know when it would be enacted or under which department it would come, but it would be introduced in the second half of this session. It appears to me that the government threw the idea into the throne speech without thinking it out. Now, some five months later, they are trying to think a bit more about it. They will set it up under the Minister of National Defence. I do not know whether it will be a paramilitary group in the outbound movement mode, as the Minister of National Defence expressed it. Perhaps they will even teach them the proper and safe use of firearms; I do not know. There is to be an option whereby people working in the youth corps will have an opportunity of joining the forces.

I am very interested in this program but I am not sure how it will help the youth in this country, who are underemployed right now, to meet their career aspirations, unless one considers the limited number of people who may have career aspirations in the military or who do not know what they are going to do and take ten months to work in this paramilitary group, this youth corps, the establishment of which was announced but on which the government cannot give us any figures or any specifics. Again, this is a band-aid approach. We do not know whether in this youth corps the young people will be taught any life skills or career skills. They will be taught how to get along with their neighbours and how to get along in the outdoors, as far as we know.

This program, along with Young Canada Works program, does not attack the real problem of future unemployment in this country. Canada Works, which is much like LIP, will not attack the real unemployment problems in this country because under the Canada Works program they are accepting applications for bits and pieces of work which some organizations would like to sponsor, and which will benefit communities, which would normally be of 32 weeks' duration but may be extended to up to 52 weeks. So, again, it is a temporary program. A person cannot find a career job in any one of these government band-aid programs.

The Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Cullen), prior to Christmas, in a paper which he put forth announced the Young Canada Works and Canada Works programs and went on to say how much help they would be to help students at universities find career opportunities. At that time I believe there were 72 Manpower offices located on university or post-secondary institution campuses. He announced that he would increase that number by another 17 so that there would be about 89 Manpower offices on the campuses of secondary institutions.

It is strange that the government keeps spending money in this way when the return it is getting is so limited. One of the major universities in Ontario carried out a survey of their student population who had graduated and left university, to see how many of them found jobs through Manpower offices. They found that some 9 per cent of the graduate students had found jobs through Manpower offices. They were, basically, people who did not know what they wanted to do and had taken a construction job or another hourly or weekly paid job through the student Manpower office. After another nine months, that figure went down to a little over 5 per cent of the students who obtained their jobs through a Manpower office.

Expanding the Manpower network on university campuses may not be a wise expenditure of money, because obviously the vast majority of students do not find the Manpower office to be the place to go when looking for a job. Indeed, the experience in my riding is that even people who want an hourly or weekly paid job do not go to the Manpower office to look for it. Also, people who have real career aspirations, whether it be in business, in law or in any other career option which a person may have by getting post-secondary education, do not generally leave it to the Manpower office on their local campus to find them a job. Usually they get a job through their own initiative, or perhaps even by going to one of the specialized personnel agencies which hire for executive, management training jobs or sales jobs.

To show that the Department of Manpower and Immigration is rather contradictory in its approach, let me point out that the figures on youth unemployment are a scandal. They are the highest Canada has ever had, in absolute terms—meaning in the number of unemployed—and in percentage terms, since the department started collecting special data on youth unemployment in 1952. Oddly enough, last year, in spite of this the Department of Manpower and Immigration withdrew the budget for collecting student unemployment data. Since the 1950s the department, in co-ordination with Statistics Canada, has always done, in the months of May, June, July, August and September, special student unemployment surveys in which they have asked whether the person was a student in the preceding month of March, whether the person was looking for summer employment now, and whether the person intended being a student the following September. By this series of questions they could isolate who was really a student and intended to continue his studies and thus could put an actual figure on student unemployment.

Last year the government, in its wisdom, decided to withdraw the small budget—which I think amounted to around $12,000—to carry out these surveys and instead incorporated in its general survey questions which initially they said would indicate student unemployment. They asked, "Were you a student last week? Are you a student now? Will you be a student next week?" Of course, if the person was asked in the last week of July whether he had been a student the previous week, his answer was "No", because the institution had closed in May. To the question whether he was going to be a student the following week, the first of August, the answer, of course, was "No", because the institution would not open until September. So, naturally, they did not get the correct figures for youth student unemployment. It was a neat little trick, and rather deceitful. It did not give the government the correct statistical base to plan appropriately for students entering the work force in the years ahead.

I was very pleased to hear that as a result of a condemnation by this party, other parties and members of this House, the department has rethought this shortsighted policy. As a result of questions asked by the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) in the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration, the minister indicated that he would reinstitute student employment surveys this coming summer. I think that is part of a program which may be more helpful than the rather shortsighted programs the government has used in the past. At least it will provide some statistical base for dealing with some of the youth unemployment in this country.

The government should concentrate on this problem and really do something to try to find employment for the young people of this country. As chairman of the Progressive Conservative caucus committee on youth, I have tried over the last number of months to get to many youth conferences, to a number of universities and to other places where young people gather, to try to find out what they want the federal government to provide. I have found out, from the limited exposure I have had, that they do not want more OFY, Young Canada Works or LIP-type opportunities.

Young people laugh, they say that these programs are a rip-off and that they are a waste of taxpayers' money, but if the government is going to be so stupid as to give it out this way, they might as well take their share of it. I suppose that is a reasonable attitude to take, but these young people really want career opportunities, full-time jobs, jobs in which there is an opportunity for advancement. They want jobs which they believe contribute to Canadian society as a whole. They want jobs which they see as being productive and helpful. When I say "productive", I do not mean working on an assembly line and increasing the output of canned meats from 19,000 cans per hour to 22,000 cans per hour. They want to be productive by doing something which will help society.

In my university days, back in the late fifties and early sixties, the attitude was that we wanted jobs which paid high salaries. There were all kinds of people around recruiting in universities at that time. In the late sixties and early seventies people took time off, travelled, bummed around and had experiences, but not working experiences. Students today have returned to some extent to the approach taken in the late fifties and early sixties. They want serious jobs, jobs with career opportunities and jobs which are socially useful to Canadian society as a whole. They want jobs which are meaningful to them, but perhaps they are influenced by that other era of the late sixties and early seventies in that they are not necessarily demanding high-paying jobs. Perhaps they would take a job which pays $12,000 rather than $15,000 if they felt the environment in that lower-paying job was more appropriate to them.

They may be more selective in that they might like to work in a small town or for a small company rather than for a large, multinational company or in a large city. They are more selective with regard to the environment and the type of job, than they are with regard to the dollar value attributed to the job. This is the kind of thing the young people of this country want. They do not want band-aid programs, although they will take advantage of them while they are still around and while the government tries to rely on them. However, this government will not substantially improve the climate for these students until it tackles the real job, and that is the job of expanding business in this country and expanding business opportunities so that business can grow and will require more employees in full-time jobs.

I feel that the government has let down Canadian society as a whole—and this is one of the reasons for the quarrelling and grumbling of today—because it has not approached business in Canada in an enlightened way which would encourage business to expand. For example, in the textile industry we find that in the United States 85 per cent of the textiles sold are produced there. In the European Economic Community, 90 per cent of the textiles used there are made in that community.

What has our government allowed this country to do? Only 45 per cent of the textiles used in Canada are made here.

Because of our do-gooder attitude, our Boy Scout attitude, and as a result of GATT negotiations, we have lowered our tariffs and our quotas on imports. This has wiped out thousands of jobs in this country. It has been estimated that in the textile industry alone, if we could come back up to 75 per cent or 80 per cent fabrication in this country almost 200,000 more jobs would be created. As anybody who follows the textile industry would know, we have been closing down textile plants at an alarming rate, so much so that finally last fall the government, through political considerations or finally just seeing its folly, realized the problem and just prior to the completion of the Quebec election campaign the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Chrétien) announced quotas on imported textiles.

I am sure that was not motivated by political considerations any more than the announcement a week before provincial by-elections that the Department of Veterans Affairs was moving to Prince Edward Island, or any more than the announcement in Prince Albert last week that there would be a new transportation policy affecting that area. That announcement is prior to two by-elections taking place in Saskatchewan next Tuesday. I would not have thought the government would come out with these goodies in provinces where by-elections are taking place, just for political reasons; but I was very pleased to see that the government finally, for whatever reason, decided to put a quota on some textile imports. Hopefully, over the next few years we will be able to re-establish that industry, create more jobs, take some of the people who are presently unemployed off the unemployment rolls and put them back into useful, productive jobs.

The knowledge the federal government had that it was going to close down the textile industry goes back to the late sixties and early seventies, because in 1970 the federal government introduced legislation—actually, by order in council, the Appropriations Act No. 4 of 1970—and regulations to benefit clothing and textile workers. It was updated in 1974. This legislation provides a form of pension plan under the unemployment insurance scheme for people who are in the textile industry which the government was in the process of closing down across the country because of its do-gooder policy. There were jobs there which would have taken youthful Canadians off the unemployment rolls.

In the electronics industry the government is doing the very same thing, because in our negotiations at GATT Canada said it would abide by those GATT agreements and allow underprivileged and underdeveloped countries to export into Canada duty-free. Now it appears that because of diminishing trade in the television industry we have lost 20,000 jobs in the electronics industry since 1973. As a matter of fact I can give substance to that, Mr. Speaker. RCA had a plant in Renfrew, Ontario, which in 1972 provided 440 jobs. By 1974, that plant was down to 240 jobs as a result of the government's Bill C-170 in the twenty-ninth parliament which gave benefits to the so-called underdeveloped and underprivileged countries. That plant is now closed. There are no jobs whatsoever. That is an example of where 440 jobs in my constituency are a part of the 20,000 lost by the television industry in the last few years.

There are other areas which show the government is making a mistake and is not pursuing an intelligent policy of full employment. In my constituency there is the only magnesium mine in Canada. It has a capacity of over 10,000 metric tons per year, and in 1968 was producing at capacity. As a result of this government's policies it is now producing only 4,000 metric tons, or a little over 40 per cent of capacity, annually. But imports of magnesium have gone from 2,000 metric tons in 1968 to 8,000 metric tons today. This is not because it is a rotten, "no good" facility—it may be all of that, or none of that—but in 1968 Canada had a 17 percent tariff and in 1975 it had a 5 per cent tariff. The United States has a 20 cent tariff on magnesium imports. The European Economic Community, which does not have any mines, has a 9 per cent tariff; and the Japanese, who have perhaps the most sensible program, have a 15 per cent tariff on imported magnesium until all domestic magnesium is used up. The Boy Scouts of this government go out saying that we will have the lowest tariff nation in the world, and to hang with the jobs. Well, we have lowered ours to one of the lowest, weak groups—5 per cent, and we are now importing more than ever before.

Mr. Speaker, the saddest example of government bungling in the last few years concerns a plant which wanted to employ 80 people. It applied to Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce in 1974 to set up scissors manufacturing in Canada. Canada has never manufactured scissors. The department said it was a brillant idea and made a report showing how well it could be done. Based on that and other considerations, the company went ahead, and largely through an Ontario Development Corporation loan of almost $500,000 built a modern, efficient plant to produce hot, forged steel scissors in Canada. But then this government passed the infamous bill allowing imports from countries, so-called developing or underdeveloped, into Canada duty-free. Now scissors are flooding into this country from Brazil and this company cannot employ the 80 people it wanted to employ. They only employ 25 and are having to diversify—so we have lost 55 jobs there. At the same time, we certainly get equal treatment from Brazil; their tariff on imported scissors was 150 per cent, but it was changed a few months ago to total prohibition. If we are to provide business opportunities in this country, we must have a more constant approach—

Mr. O'Connell: Hear, hear!

Mr. Dick: —when dealing with tariffs and small business. The present situation is scandalous. We should provide the permanent jobs, the meaningful jobs, the career opportunities and advancement that young people want. They no longer want government hand-outs in 14-week programs. Those things are just a sop. They want something which is meaningful to the productivity and betterment of our country. I think it is time the government realized this and, instead of pouring money into wasteful programs, started to improve what we have. The government could reduce the high rate of youth unemployment, over 50 per cent, if they took a more intelligent approach and helped this country generally.

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, the bill before us deals with changes to the Unemployment Insurance Act, but it is significant in not only what it does about the unemployed who seek benefits but also as a statement of the government's employment policy or lack thereof. I should like to spend a few minutes looking at the issue of unemployment and then relate that to the bill before us, making a few specific criticisms. I will then put forward what I hope are some constructive counterproposals on the question of getting Canadians back to work.

What worries me is the sense of complacency, almost, among the general public that unemployment is a natural state in Canada and that somehow we have to accept high unemployment as inevitable. It is shocking that today there are more people out of work than at the height of the great depression in the 1930s; yet we do not see mass marches of the unemployed and letters to the editor and the media taking up the cause of this great human crisis.

It is argued that is because the benefits we give to the unemployed are adequate to carry them through. That may or may not be correct, as the individual case would tell. Beyond that, however, is the fact that Canadians have come to accept the lack of solution by both the old line parties, Liberals and Conservatives, to solving the problem and have accepted the situation as just the state of the Canadian economy from which we will extricate ourselves. I reject that kind of complacency. I think that when we have over 800,000 Canadians out of work according to the official statistics, and when we take into account the hidden unemployed—those not measured by Statistics Canada because they have tried week after week to find work and have given up the search—the unemployment figure is closer to one million Canadians.

The cost, both in human and economic terms, is devastating. How demoralizing it must be for a young worker with a family to support to find that no matter how hard he tries he cannot find employment. Think of the emotional stress this must place on him and his young family and the kind of marital problems it could bring. It is something that those of us who have jobs all too easily forget.

From workers in the electrical industry who presented a brief to the New Democratic Party labour committee only yesterday we hear of lay-offs in General Electric and Westinghouse ranging from between 35 per cent to 50 per cent of the work force. You cannot tell me that those working people accept a situation like that calmly and will act as if nothing has happened. Those laid off, those unemployed for many months, have little chance of finding another job if the jobs are not there to be found.

At present in this country we have about 40,000 job vacancies and one million people unemployed. No matter how much you try to shift workers around, no matter how much you try to move the unemployed to areas in which there are jobs, you will still face an immense shortfall in the number of jobs available. Surely the government and we, as parliamentarians, should be concerned about the cost of unemployment in human terms, the erosion of self-dignity and the work ethic.

This government is not proposing massive solutions for curing unemployment—unemployment which is exacting a great toll from Canadian workers in human terms. Nor does the government really know what high unemployment year after year costs our economy. It seems to me that most Canadians do not realize that unemployment costs our economy billions of dollars worth of goods which are not produced. Unemployment costs the Canadian taxpayers hundreds of millions of dollars in extra taxes needed to supplement the unemployment insurance fund, the fund from which we pay benefits to hundreds of thousands of unemployed. When unemployment insurance benefits run out, the taxpayer is called on to pay for welfare in order to prevent the jobless from starving.

My party has calculated that last year unemployment cost each taxpayer an average of $264 extra. The calculation took into account revenue which would have been paid as income tax but was not—since the unemployed do not pay income tax—extra money paid into the unemployment insurance fund and the loss to the economy from lost production. In the face of this, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) has the gall to stand in this House and say that we cannot afford to stimulate the economy, we cannot put Canadians back to work because that would create another inflationary cycle. So far as the Liberal government is concerned, inflation, not unemployment, is the number one problem. That is utter nonsense.

The Minister of Finance well knows that the Canadian economy is operating at only 85 per cent of capacity, that there is slack in the economy, and that if measures are taken to stimulate the economy, to stimulate consumer demand which will lead to increased employment for Canadians, the result will not be another round of inflation. At present we have a situation of massive unemployment which is being met, it seems to me, with massive indifference on the part of the government and to a large extent on the part of the Canadian population.

A thinking Canadian must ask himself, why has the government year after year tolerated such high unemployment? In a country as industrially advanced as Canada, possessing natural resources and abundant human resources in the form of talented working people, why should there be persistently high levels of unemployment? The answer in part to that question must lie within the capitalist system and how it operates. Our free enterprise or capitalist system has within it certain built-in biases which say that high unemployment is not only necessary but tolerable. I came across an article written by Professor Robert Lekachman of the Herbert Lehman College, City University, New York, which was published in this month's Harper's magazine. In it he wrestles with this very question: what, within our economic system, allows the existence year after year of high unemployment? I will read part of his analysis. He said:

> The brutal fact is that unemployment at "moderate" rates confers a good many benefits upon the prosperous and the truly affluent. If everyone could be employed, extraordinarily high wages would have to be paid to toilers in restaurant kitchens, laundries, filling stations, and other humble positions. Whenever decent jobs at living wages are plentiful, it is exceedingly difficult to coax young men and women into our volunteer army. Without a volunteer army, how can the children of the middle and upper classes be spared the rigours of the draft?
> Unemployment calms the unions and moderates their wage demands. Business periodicals have been noting with unconcealed gratification that last year's contract settlements between major unions and large corporations were considerably less expensive for employers than those of 1975, even though union members were steadily losing ground to inflation. When people are scared about losing their jobs, they work harder and gripe less. In more dignified language, absenteeism declines and productivity ascends.
> Better still, factory and office workers, alert to potential layoffs and plant shutdowns, are unlikely to nag unions and employers to make work more interesting, and less menacing to health and personal safety. It cannot be mere coincidence that in Sweden, where job enrichment and plant democracy have had their greatest success, unemployment is practically zero and astute management of their economy protected Swedes even from the world-wide economic crisis of 1973-75. The new government, elected on the fortuitous issue of nuclear safety, has promised to extend even further the social benefits for which Sweden has become celebrated. American employers preserve themselves from Swedish experiments in good part by keeping the industrial reserve army plentifully manned.
> Nor is this quite the end of the tale. The hunger of communities and regions for jobs and tax revenues has allowed large corporations to extort an endless assortment of valuable concessions from local and state governments, either as blackmail to keep existing installations or bribes to lure new ones. Few major corporations pay their fair share of property taxes. Propaganda by oil, steel, chemical, and paper industries has noticeably slowed the pace of regulation to protect the environment.

I commend the reading of the article to all members of the House. The professor pointed out that in the capitalist system unemployment is a benefit. As long as there is massive unemployment, the demands of workers who, after all, produce the goods and make the profits for the company, will be moderate. They will keep down their demands for wages and good working conditions. Of course, corporations can pretty well state the conditions on which they will enter into an industry. The only way of narrowing the gap between rich and poor is for a full employment program. That, of course, is a threat to the status quo of those who have a privileged economic position in our society.

In a sense, this analysis of the contradictions in the capitalist system and why unemployment is at high levels explains why this Liberal government or any future Conservative government are limited in what they can do in coming to grips with the problem of unemployment. They will never restructure the capitalist system and the way it operates. That, of course, would challenge the status quo, the very powerful business elite in our country. The options open to them are reduced to tinkering with the system. We have ample evidence of that kind of tinkering.

The temporary job programs such as the Local Initiatives Program, Opportunities for Youth, and the new fancy ones, Canada Works and Young Canada Works, and the hand-outs of millions of dollars through the departments of Regional Economic Expansion, and Industry, Trade and Commerce to induce business to locate in an area or expand really never comes to grips with the fundamental contradiction in our present economic system, namely, that if you have full employment, you begin to threaten the status quo, those who have wealth and power. Until we have the option of a party such as the New Democratic Party, which is willing to challenge the powerful corporate elite in our economic system, we will never have more than temporary tinkering measures with regard to job-creation from either the Liberals or the Conservatives.

The second reason we have had perpetually high unemployment surely lies with the degree of foreign ownership in this country. For example, over 90 per cent of our oil industry and over 60 per cent of our manufacturing industry is foreign-owned. Therefore, decisions as to expansion of branch plants or location of subsidiaries lies beyond the control of the Canadian economy. It rests with the decision-makers of the parent company outside Canada. If there is a slowdown in the economy of the United States, obviously it is to the advantage of the parent company to lay off workers in Canadian branch plants before workers in the parent company in the United States. Unless we come to grips with what foreign ownership is doing to our economy in terms of downplaying the creation of the manufacturing industry, which of course is job-intensive, and enhance resource exploitation, we will continue to have high unemployment.

There are always more jobs created in processing raw materials than in taking the raw materials out of the ground, yet our economy has been locked into a continental structure whereby Canadians are still the hewers of wood and drawers of water. We are still the ones who take the minerals, oil and natural gas out of the ground and export them to the United States and elsewhere. In return, we import manufactured goods. We import more than 70 per cent of our manufactured goods from the United States, paying for them with Canadian dollars. The only way we can get back Canadian dollars to help solve our balance of payments problem is to export more and more raw material such as oil and natural gas to the United States. That, of course, is one of the reasons for the great pressure to build the Mackenzie Valley pipeline. If we want to create jobs, we have to regain control of the Canadian economy so that it will be receptive to direction from the Canadian government in terms of creating a national job-creation plan. Neither the Liberal party nor the Conservative party is in any way serious about regaining control of our economy for that purpose.

We will continue to have unemployment as long as we have Liberals and Conservatives managing, because of the existence of the capitalist system. They cannot challenge it or restructure it. Therefore, they are limited to job-tinkering programs and doing what we see before us today in Bill C-27. As the number of unemployed increases, because of the contradictions I have outlined the cost of paying unemployment insurance premiums increases. It has come to the point where it is so embarrassing in terms of the billions of dollars being paid out in unemployment insurance funds that, quite naturally, this government takes up the only other option open to it. Rather than create jobs, they begin to tighten up on those who are receiving benefits from the unemployment insurance scheme. Therefore, we see in Bill C-27 a list of provisions designed to cut people off the unemployment insurance roll in order to reduce the cost of that program and be able to say to the Canadian taxpayer "what good boys are we."

Let us look at some of the implications of the legislation before us. This legislation flies in the face of the whole reason for an unemployment insurance program in the first place. The basic reason is to ensure workers against the day when they become unemployed. If a fundamental precept of the program is that a worker has the right to be insured against the calamity of unemployment, how does this government justify taking that right away from workers? We often hear people complain about the unemployment insurance scheme. However, they forget that putting money in the hands of the unemployed helps keep the economy going. These people have to buy food for their families from the corner grocery, the farmer and all down the line. It keeps other Canadians employed.

What are the arguments this government puts forward to say that we can afford to throw people off the unemployment insurance rolls? The evidence soon becomes apparent when we look at the clause of the bill which provides that they will have to redefine the entrance requirement or qualification period in order to become eligible for unemployment insurance benefits. Until now, if a worker works eight weeks within a 52-week period and becomes unemployed, he is eligible to receive benefits. This government, despite the record unemployment we have today, wants to raise the qualification period from eight to 12 weeks. This will remove some 330,000 people a year from the unemployment insurance rolls. It is really the old principle of robbing Peter to pay Paul. If people are taken off the unemployment insurance rolls and they cannot find work, they have to go on city on provincial welfare, and the taxpayers end up paying anyway. But this government does not look at the consequences; it is trying to protect its own political hide by this change in the qualifying period.

What is this going to mean to certain regions of the country? It seems to me that the requirement of 12 weeks employment instead of eight weeks to qualify for unemployment insurance is going to discriminate against people in poorer areas of the country which have been suffering severe economic hardship and high unemployment for years. I think particularly of Atlantic Canada, Quebec, and some northern regions, especially my own area of northern Ontario.

When we realize that in the province of Newfoundland, for example, 48 per cent of those who are receiving unemployment insurance benefits had less than 20 weeks' work, the implications of this change to the Unemployment Insurance Act have got to be severe. My leader and I, and a few others of our caucus, recently travelled to Atlantic Canada to witness first-hand the problems of the unemployed. We heard stories about how it was impossible for them to get work in a fish factory for 12 weeks or more; often all they could get was temporary work. Yet the government ignores this kind of economic reality and proposes to increase the qualifying period for unemployment insurance. The jobs are just not there on a long term basis, and until they are it seems to me that this kind of amendment does not make sense.

The Minister of Manpower likes to say, "Well, we are not really after those who are serious about looking for employment; we are making this change to discourage young people, housewives and others, who are not really dependent upon the extra income to keep the family going but who just want to supplement the family income to raise their standard of living. Really women and young people do not count; we can afford to take them out of the unemployment insurance scheme."

Let us examine the actuality of the situation. Is it true that women and young people who fall into this category are from upper and middle class families and do not really need to work, and so we can afford to take them off the unemployment insurance rolls? Do they just want to work for eight weeks, quit, and then collect their benefits? Let us see what the situation is according to figures issued by the minister's own department and Statistics Canada. Here are some facts on the disentitlement of those who work from eight to 11 weeks. What kind of people are they who are now going to be cut off? We find that in the first five months of 1976 those who worked from eight to 11 weeks, the eight to 11 weekers, made up only 15 per cent of all those in receipt of unemployment insurance benefits. The way the government talks, great numbers are abusing the system, but the government's own statistics reveal that only 15 per cent of the recipients are in this category.

In the first five months of 1976, 63.8 per cent of all eight to 11 weekers were in Quebec and the Atlantic provinces, areas which just do not have long-term work available. The minister keeps telling us, and the media have swallowed the bait, that by eliminating the eight weekers it will be mostly women who will be removed from the unemployment insurance rolls. What are the facts? The facts are that more men, some 214,000, compared with 115,000 women, will be affected by this change. The hardest hit sector will be construction, which is virtually a male preserve.

Those who work for only eight weeks basically come from very low income families that desperately need this extra income from part-time jobs, or more hopefully long-term jobs. When they are laid off and become unemployed, their unemployment insurance benefit is crucial to keeping the family above water in terms of paying bills and feeding themselves.

Again to disprove the suggestion that the great proportion of eight weekers are women who really do not need extra income, I would point out that in August StatsCan published a study of unemployment in the years 1973 and 1971, and it was discovered that in both those years unemployed wives tended to come from families of low income. For example, in 1973 the unemployment rate for all wives was 13.5 per cent. Of that figure, 21.4 per cent came from families with incomes between $4,000 and $7,000, whereas only 8.6 per cent came from families with incomes over $15,000. The evidence is clear that unemployment among low income families and particularly among low income working women, was the real problem. The wage of these women in the low income groups was crucial to the family budget. A survey of women in the $4,000 to $7,000 group revealed that they contributed 22 per cent of the family income, whereas women in the $15,000 category contributed only about 17 per cent.

This legislation to change the qualifying period does not make sense. It will continue to discriminate against the poorer regions of the country and poorer families. I think it is disgraceful, in light of the economic calamity that is facing us, for the government to introduce legislation of this kind. There are other examples in the bill of qualifying periods being reduced and of attempts to use some of the unemployment insurance money saved for temporary job training programs, and so on. Some of my hon. friends have gone into this and criticized it. I do not want to do it at this time because my time is running out. I should like in the few minutes remaining to me to put forward some alternative suggestions.

Rather than go after the unemployed and punish them as we are doing under this legislation, why cannot the government prepare and bring forward job-creating programs to get the unemployment rate down to manageable levels? I know it will not come forward with serious programs to challenge and restructure the existing system, but within the framework of the present economic system it could bring forward short-term policies which would help to bring down at least by several hundred thousand this tremendous rate of unemployment.

We in the New Democratic Party have been calling upon the government to bring in personal income tax cuts immediately for low and middle income families to stimulate purchasing power, increase production, and get people back to work. As we have explained, such a move would not create another round of inflation. We have called on the government to reactivate all federal works projects and to encourage the provinces and municipalities to follow suit, at the same time lifting restraints on the shared funding of such projects. This positive approach would get people back to work. Why does the government not take it?

We could have a program, in consultation with the provinces, to expand capital budgets for low income and co-operative housing and land assembly. Today there is a housing crisis. People cannot afford houses. People need houses. The housing industry is one of the most job productive. If we had a massive program to create and build homes we would fulfil an important social need and get Canadians back to work at the same time. We could have a program to upgrade insulation in public buildings and private homes, which would not only conform with the government's stated purpose of conserving energy but also provide employment.

Most important of all, we have to come to grips with the long-term problem of unemployment, and that is the fact that private enterprise has failed to create the jobs needed to keep Canadians employed. It is time the government recognized its democratic responsibility to the electorate. Where private enterprise has failed it has the responsibility to decide, through use of a public investment fund, where private enterprise should expand and locate to get Canadians back to work. We can no longer leave this decision-making process in the hands of private industry most of which is controlled from outside the country.

Sweden has demonstrated most successfully a co-operative program between government and private industry through an investment fund which requires industry to allocate a certain percentage of profits in a central investment fund in return for certain tax advantages. Under such a scheme the investment could only be carried out when and where the government approved in order that we could really stimulate regional economic development, and when the economy went into a decline we would have investment funds to provide the necessary new capital to get Canadians back to work. However, as I said, I do not see the Liberals or the Conservatives tackling the long-range weaknesses of our economy.

I hope that the government at least will have the good sense to listen to some of the proposals I have put forward for the short-term, proposals it can live with and which will at the same time create jobs. Amending the Unemployment Insurance Act hits the unemployed but does nothing to create jobs.

[Translation]

Mr. Albert Béchard (Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine): Mr. Speaker, the introduction of Bill C-27 in the House and the debate on second reading prompt me to make to the minister and the government some comments which are often drawn to my attention by my constituents.

Before doing so, Mr. Speaker, I wish to say to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) that I am satisfied with the federal decision which is consistent with the wishes of members as well as their constituents and also adjusted to the speedy development in the employment field, to make, through that bill, some important amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act. I am especially pleased with that progressive and realistic step taken to amalgamate the Manpower Centre with the Unemployment Insurance Commission. Indeed we hope that such an amalgamation will remove any inconvenience for the workers who had to fall from Scylla into Charybdis as they had to seek a job and at the same time apply for unemployment insurance when temporarily out of work.

Hopefully, from now on the unemployed will at least find everything from the same person if not under the same roof. This is truly a realistic and consistent policy. My remarks will bear mostly on the following approaches to Bill C-27 and on the Unemployment Insurance Act in general, on the increased number of working weeks before seeking unemployment insurance benefits, on the eligibility for certain jobs, on the delay of the process taking place between application for and receipt of benefits and, finally, on the abolition of discrimination against the handicapped.

Hon. members will recall that in 1971, after many months of cogitation, continuing the social policy innovated in Canada by the party now in power, the Liberal party—coming to grips with new social requirements and, one must add, inspired by an unfaltering minister—improved the condition of thousands of Canadians who were unemployed because of various factors over which they had no control and, in many instances, who were deprived of unemployment insurance benefits.

● (1520)

The Liberal government of the time decided it was high time to amend the Unemployed Insurance Act. The considerable difference between wages and benefits which existed at that time and which had not changed with the gradual increase in wages, was enough to justify the 1971 revision, aimed at creating a more realistic and fair balance. But the act went further.

In order to guarantee an income to those workers who could count on employment for only a part of the year, and several members have stressed this before me, as was and is still the case in Canada and particularly in my region where the fishery, forest and other industries like tourism are seasonal activities, it was imperative to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act. Unfortunately, as almost always happens, experience has shown us, since the enforcement of the act in 1971, that some intolerable abuses have taken place, which the present legislation seeks to correct. The good will have to pay once more for the improper conduct of those of their fellow citizens who, it is sad to say, would rather draw unemployment insurance than work.

On this subject, Mr. Speaker, I would like once again to point out to the minister and other members that available jobs do not have the same diversity and the same permanent aspect in every regions of this country. In the Magdalen Islands, for example, where fishery is the main industry, the islanders are inevitably fishermen or work somehow within this industry. Directly or not, people in the islands live of fishery. When the season is closed, the fishermen or fish processing plant workers cannot be all absorbed by the other sectors of the economy on the islands. What can they do then? Where will those people go to earn a living during the five, six or seven months before the next fishing season?

Those people are not exactly unskilled. Most of them if not nearly all of them can work at other things. Several of them, the luckier, accept to exile themselves and go to work elsewhere when they manage to find a job, but what about the others? They are left with only the unemployment insurance benefits, when they have been able through fishing to accumulate the required number of weeks, or with social welfare allowances. In this respect, Mr. Speaker, the manpower centers scattered thoughout our regions should demonstrate a little more initiative and imagination, and use employment pools other than the sole employment service for available or unemployed labour.

[Mr. Béchard.]

It remains—I am willing to admit this—that even with the best scheme, a number of unemployed could not find a job. In cases such as those which are found in the Magdalen Islands and elsewhere in my constituency, as well as in the Gaspé peninsula generally, including the Gaspé and Matane constituencies, and some neighbouring areas, the whole Restigouche area, the Gloucester area and New Brunswick as a whole, it should be possible, wherever the industrial base is very limited, to adopt special measures, as mentioned by previous speakers, until such a time at least when the government decides to organize the economy in a way which would guarantee a more permanent employment of our active population. Just as the duration of benefits varies and the number of weeks increases depending on the difference between the local or regional rate of unemployment and the national average, so, in my humble opinion, should the number of working weeks before obtaining benefits vary in the case of the Magdalen Islands and the Gaspe peninsula in general, as well as the New Brunswick and the Atlantic provinces ridings. Let us put an end to the ridiculous practice whereby an applicant must file evidence that he is looking for a job in a region such as ours where there are few openings, if any. Instead we should require all employers to report job openings to Canada manpower offices, including those they fill themselves without going through the manpower centres. This way manpower officials will always know what jobs are available.

Another serious problem, Mr. Speaker, particularly in our rural regions, is the plight of workers who earn their living by doing little jobs here and there for their neighbour which is not a contractor. For example, let us imagine a good citizen of the Bonaventure riding called Arthur who is a carpenter. His neighbour Alphonse asks for his help to build his house; he cannot afford to complete it all at once so he is building in stages. Alphonse or Gaston keeps Arthur busy for one month with this job. As required by the law, the employer, Alphonse, has deducted from Arthur's wages the federal and provincial income tax, the unemployment insurance and pension plan contributions. Two days after Arthur has finished working for Alphonse, Gaston asks him to work for him. Arthur is a good carpenter and Gaston has decided to have his basement finished. So Arthur works for Gaston one month and a half, until the month of December.

Both employers have deducted all the marginal benefits. But at the end of December, Arthur is unemployed. When you have no job, you are supposed to be unemployed. So Arthur applies for unemployment insurance at the nearest UIC office. His employer gave him the forms relating to the employment termination. And what is the result of his application? Well, the UIC refuses to pay the benefits. For what reason? It is most unfortunate, but the period during which Arthur worked for his neighbours Gaston, Alphonse or Romeo does not count for unemployment insurance purposes as far as the Department of National Revenue is concerned.

I now have to deal with a case the Minister of National Revenue (Miss Bégin) is looking into; I hope it will not take her too long to solve it—although it has already dragged on quite some time—and solve it in favour of the party concerned, before he dies. The employer, in this case, as required by law in the province of Quebec, did obtain his contractor's permit, if you please, but did not get an unemployment insurance number allowing him to give stamps to his employee. He did, however, take the precaution of getting a contractor's permit from the provincial government before starting to build his house, because that is what he was building. And so, as provided by law, this employer, this individual, on the strength of a contractor's permit, deducted all the marginal benefits: unemployment insurance, taxes, etc, and they are many! Despite that, his employee has been refused unemployment benefits since December. I find that totally unfair and intolerable. In addition, what about the people who happen to be relatives of an employer? I confess that in this case there can be abuse, but it does seem to me, Mr. Speaker, that today accounting procedures are easy enough to check without having to go through all kinds of investigations and ridiculous annoyances.

That reminds me also, Mr. Speaker—and I do not know whether or not you have lived with that kind of situation in Ontario but we did and we are still living with it in Quebec—how ridiculous are those who insisted and still insist that persons seeking social assistance get rid of their cows or their garden before becoming entitled to social welfare, or those intelligent social workers who suggest that couples separate to get more financial help.

I say that such middle-ages machiavelism and tortures must come to an end. Such practices are immoral and unworthy of a civilized society like ours. I urge the minister, the cabinet and the government to take at once the necessary corrective measures. I do not want to generalize when I mention the unbending and distorted feelings which inspire certain officials either in Quebec, in the federal government or at all government levels, but some of them would feel more at home with Idi Amin Dada's cohorts.

I would also like to point out how long it takes, in some cases, to settle benefit claims. I admit that to err is human and that, as Jean-Jacques Rousseau said, "as long as they are human beings, there is human failure", but I refuse to think that everyone is dishonest and lazy. Yet, it is a computer which carries out most of these operations during this process. Is the electronic brain to be blamed? If I take as a basis the argument so often used to answer our recriminations and our unremitting demands, it is this computer which is responsible for most of these delays. Should we come back to manual processing? As strange as it may appear, there were fewer mistakes and less delay when the UIC did not use the computer. You would not have me believe, for example, that, concerning the general construction strike last summer in the province of Quebec, it was not possible to come to a decision before December.

I should say to conclude how pleased I am—not on these matters—but to see that the department is finally admitting that there is discrimination on the ground of physical handicap. Nothing is more stupefying than to see the contempt some employers show for people less endowed by nature or who have been incapacitated by illness or accident which, without preventing them from working, reduced their abilities and is considered as a handicap by these employers, when they come to ask for a job.

I have in mind an outrageous case in the riding of Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine, the one of a man built like an athlete, a very hard worker able to squash the army of whipper-snappers who reject him with the back of the hand because he is a diabetic. This man is Mr. William Sawyer from New Carlisle. The Canadian National Railways deny him a job because of his diabetes. This man, who always was a construction worker, or something hard like that, wanted more security so he applied to the Canadian National Railways. Of course these days one might wonder just how much security there is working for the CNR. But in any event, he was required by the company doctor to pass the usual examinations, including the check-up. He was hired and went to work, doing his job without any trouble for about two weeks. His was operating a drilling machine. Without further ado coming back from work after 15 days he was dismissed because of his illness. Another doctor of the Canadian National Railways had considered him unfit for that work, unlike the first doctor, and on the report of the first doctor who had sent him to work.

That, Mr. Speaker, is revolting when the Canadian Diabetes Association has proven that a person suffering from that disease who follows his doctor's instructions on his particular case can normally go about his business without danger. Above all, let the CN not use passenger safety as the pretense for dismissing Mr. Sawyer. So I say bravo to the minister for taking that discrimination out of the legislation, and I hope that the Unemployment Insurance Commission and the government will do their duty and bring that Crown corporation to reason, and that it will correct that injustice against a Canadian by rehiring him immediately.

Mr. Speaker, those are the reflections I felt I had to make on this bill, as well as the Unemployment Insurance Act, and certain anomalies in its application, and particularly on many injustices and worries resulting therefrom. Let us give our future Canadian Employment and Immigration Commission offices the necessary staff and tools to function not like a body without soul working in the cold regions of pure civil service but with a soul filled with the desire to fulfill a humanitarian task, a soul and a heart vibrating in harmony with those of their fellow citizens in whose employ their work and the government have placed them.

[English]

Mr. Alex Patterson (Fraser Valley East): Mr. Speaker, so that we might be reminded of the scope of the measure we are currently debating, I would like to read once again its description. It is, and I quote:

> . . . to establish the Department of Employment and Immigration, the Canada Employment and Immigration Commission and the Canada Employment and Immigration Advisory Council, to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971 and to amend certain other statutes in consequence thereof.

I realize that the unemployment insurance aspect of this bill is one of the most important aspects contained in it. I believe that underlines once again one of the most persistent and, at this point in time, one of the most urgent problems confronting the nation, and that is, of course, the problem of unemployment.

Since returning to this House in 1972 after a period of rest and recuperation, I have noted that each budget address has included in its state of the nation résumé a statement to the effect that unemployment is one of the most pressing problems, that the government is dedicating its energies to its solution, and that it is going to take remedial action to overcome it.

However, I suggest that through the failure of the government to take effective action, principally because it is unable to understand the problem—let alone take remedial action—the prospects for the coming months are rather bleak indeed. Once again we are faced with a series of patchwork programs which, unless they break out of the circle of failures which befell their predecessors, will do little to inspire confidence or hope for the future of Canada.

When the government recessed parliament for Christmas on December 21, 1976, no doubt it hoped that the intervening 32 days would bring some improvement to the economic situation facing Canada. Throughout the fall session the government consistently evaded opposition questions about the economy. It stalled on taking any effective action to remedy the sickness which was afflicting our nation during that period, and which continues to afflict it today. Then in a hastily put-together package the government announced make-work programs such as Canada Works, which really seemed—and I think this is proving to be the case—to spend money, while giving only the appearance of remedial action as far as unemployment is concerned.

I would like to make it quite clear today that I am taking part in the Canada Works program by nominating persons to the minister for appointment to the ministerial advisory board. I do not, however, have very much confidence that the minister really knows what he is doing, other than spending a great amount of taxpayers' money. I hope I am wrong, but the program was thrown together too quickly, the deadline for applications came too quickly, and as my colleague, the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander), pointed out when speaking in this debate, some parts of the nation had the application forms while other parts did not.

It seems to me that this is very haphazard way of trying to implement a program which was designed specifically to meet the problem of chronic unemployment we are facing at the present time. When this matter was brought to the attention of the minister and it was suggested that the deadline be extended, he decline to extend it until after the expiry date, and then he pointed out that the government had agreed to let it go for another week. Of course this was completely useless because those who were not able to file by the deadline took it for granted that that was the end of the matter and they did not have time to process applications to meet the new deadline that had been established. It seems to me there must be some more consistent and deliberate attention given to programs if they are to serve their purposes to the ultimate degree.

Now we are faced with the very serious problem of unemployment in Canada. After the Christmas recess we expected the government to be ready to move ahead with a program of business. The first item on the government's list of priorities, however, was a resolution dealing with televising the proceedings of this House. Mr. Speaker, I do not think any substantial percentage of the people of this country worry whether the proceedings of this House are televised or not. Personally, and I know others have attested to the same thing, I believe there is absolutely no indication that the people are interested in it. But when we had a national unemployment rate approaching 8 per cent—or 12 per cent— the government wanted to debate televising the proceedings of this House.

The next resolution to come before us concerned metric conversion, something of minor importance in comparison to the other problems facing Canada. How the government can establish such a set of priorities and expect to maintain credibility with the people of Canada is beyond my comprehension.

To top it all, when my colleague, the hon. member for Hamilton West, led off the questioning on the first day back by asking the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) if he would make a state of the nation type of address outlining the problems facing the country in the areas of unemployment and inflation, and announce the government's initiatives to improve the situation, he was met with what can only be termed a total abdication of leadership. The question was turned over to a parliamentary secretary for reply.

Later in that same question period the Prime Minister condescended to answer a supplementary question and stated that when and if such an announcement were made it would be in a budget speech by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald). While this country was facing the three most serious problems any country could face, the government was playing games and not facing up to the problems which required its leadership and direction.

It would have been reasonable to expect that during the Christmas recess of 32 days the government would have met with its economic advisers to formulate a plan to pull the country out of the recessionary trend with which we were faced. Instead, the government took the time of the House to debate issues of relatively minor importance.

One of the most reliable economic forecasting agencies, the Conference Board in Canada, predicted during the middle of January that economic growth in Canada's two most populous and heavily industrialized provinces, Ontario and Quebec, will slacken this year to "drag national production downward and significantly raise unemployment". The board went on to say that the nation's economic situation was considerably less optimistic looking than it had appeared in the fall, and predicted real growth in Canadian output would decline to 3 per cent from last year's 5 per cent "unless the government took action to stimulate the economy".

The board went on to say:

> The outlooks for spending on capital goods, consumer goods and housing have all been revised downward since the fall and this is reflected in the projections of total output in manufacturing and construction industries in the year 1977.

Since these industries play a relatively greater role in the economies of Ontario and Quebec, one can readily see the outlook for growth in these provinces is considerably less favourable than it was in the fall.

As we think of the situation across the country, the growth rate in Saskatchewan is expected to be the nation's worst with a predicted production decline of 0.8 per cent. The unemployment rate in Newfoundland—and this has been vividly brought to our attention by my colleagues in this debate—is anything but bright; in fact it is catastrophic.

At the same time as the Conference Board in Canada was making its economic predictions, analysts reported to the Toronto Dominion Bank that "only additional stimulus will improve Canada's economic performance in 1977 but the trends are not good". In its winter issue of "Canada's Business Climate", the bank's economists suggest:

> Real growth in the economy will remain weak, advancing only 4 per cent. Prices should moderate slightly but unemployment will average 7½ per cent.

From every angle then, we can see that the nation is facing declining production and increasing unemployment. In fact among Canada's foremost economic forecasting organizations only one has predicted an economic improvement in the months ahead, and that is the Economic Council of Canada—an offspring of the federal government. All the rest, including the Conference Board in Canada, the chartered banks and the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development, have warned of deteriorating conditions.

There is a desperate need in the country for some economic leadership. The government has passed the buck, has blamed everyone but itself for the situation that has evolved. We have stated many times in the past and we reiterate that the government's own spending habits have contributed more to the inflationary spiral than any other single factor. Its mismanagement in other economic areas has been documented and stated clearly in this House on many occasions. It is little wonder that, as far as the popularity of the government is concerned, it is at a very low level right across the nation.

For several months now the leader of my party has been advocating some of the measures he believed in and was advancing in order to meet the challenge of these days in which we live. He advocated an immediate tax cut in personal income tax as a stimulus to the economy. The government has consistently refused to agree that this measure would be desirable and effective. In the meantime investment capital is continuing to flow out of Canada because of social and political uncertainty, but most of all because of economic uncertainty created by the government. Economic experts claim that this uncertain climate for business means that Canadian money as well will continue to flow out of the country. This Canadian money should remain here and be available for Canadian entrepreneurial activity. We have a situation where Canadian money is being invested outside Canada while foreign investors are reducing or curtailing their direct investment here.

The Minister of Finance addressed the Canadian Club of Toronto some weeks ago. He said:

> There is no question that we need a progressive recovery in private investment if we are going to be able to provide adequately for job creation and rising productivity... The control of profit margins has been no tonic for investment... We recognize that fact.

I must say that the minister does not seem to believe what he was saying, nor do I believe that the government is really interested in fostering a positive climate for business.

I listened with a great deal of interest to our friend from the New Democratic Party extolling the philosophy that his party espouses. He talked about the failure of private enterprise to meet the challenge of these days. I should like to remind him that I live in the province of British Columbia, and when the New Democratic Party formed the government there they certainly did not introduce any Utopia. We would not look forward to a return of that government, although there is no possibility of it.

Mr. Symes: Nonsense.

• (1550)

Mr. Patterson: It seems to me that the hon. member's party has a tenuous hold on power in those other provinces presently governed by an NDP government, but after the next provincial elections they will be in the backwoods.

An hon. Member: In Manitoba, too.

Mr. Patterson: Yes, in Manitoba and in the other provinces where the hon. member's party forms a government. The hon. member need not think he is putting anything over; he is not fooling us. We are not naive enough to accept his kind of argument. We know what the NDP's philosophy is, and what happens when it is applied.

I alluded to the Canada Works program earlier. I think these make-work programs serve as a good illustration for what I was saying about the government's real attitude about private enterprise. The need for make-work programs is based on government policies that have failed to create the economic climate in which private enterprise could flourish, produce goods, and provide services, thereby providing the job opportunities required for our work force. Make-work programs like Canada Works or Young Canada Works become necessary when the government, rather than encouraging and assisting personal initiative and enterprise, strangles private enterprise and makes it incapable of fulfilling its economic and social role in society.

The throne speech which opened this second session of the Thirtieth Parliament made mention of "improving the efficiency of the labour market and actively hastening the return of unemployed workers to productive effort." That sounds great. It has a nice ring to it, just like "the just society" or "the land is strong." This government has a way of coining beautiful phrases; unfortunately they are not reflected in any of the programs or policies the government brings forward.

The government, while talking about returning unemployed workers to productive effort, is led by a man who just a few short years ago told the people of Canada that his concept of the work ethic was that if anyone did not want to work, he should not have to work; the inference to be drawn was that it was the responsibility of society to make certain that those who do not want to work have sufficient cash on which to live, without making any constructive contribution to society.

When we compare the Prime Minister's attitude with that demonstrated by the Minister of Finance when the latter talked to the Canadian Club in Toronto, we find that there is a large credibility gap. The minister claimed in that speech that he knows the problem. What solutions did he propose? He failed to propose remedies. All he gave us was simply more government rhetoric. That was as far as he went. The theory of the government appears to be that if you talk enough about a problem, surround the discussion with enough statistics and wait long enough, the problem will go away. This bill deals with one of the problems created by unemployment. If we are to meet the problem envisaged in the bill and resolve it, the government will need to be more constructive and take greater initiatives.

A recent report of the Economic Council of Canada entitled "Jobs and People" found that the Prime Minister's attitude is reflected in the operation of the Unemployment Insurance Commission. The report documents that "the structure of the unemployment insurance benefits, coupled with the ease of entry into the program"—as a result of the government's lax attitude, I might add—"have combined to undermine the work ethic." As well, recipients are remaining on UIC rolls for increasingly longer periods of time. While the average coverage lasts approximately 15 weeks, the report reveals that 75 per cent of females, and over 65 per cent of males, remain on UIC benefits for over 20 weeks, that is, into the extended benefit period. That is an indictment of the operation of the unemployment insurance program.

According to the report, the disincentive factor built into the operation now accounts for approximately 10 per cent of additional unemployment. Some say that is not much, that we should not complain bitterly about a relatively small figure. But in real terms it means that the 1971 revisions have induced between 60,000 and 70,000 additional Canadians to become unemployed. They are Canadians who otherwise would have been contributing to this nation's productivity. If the government is really serious about improving the efficiency of the labour market and actively hastening the return of unemployed workers to productive effort, as the throne speech states, then this is one area in which it can start acting. As my colleague from Hamilton West said, unemployment insurance should be just that, insurance. It should not be operated as a welfare program.

Our party is committed to a policy of support for small and medium-sized businesses. I have said on other occasions in the House, and I repeat it, that small business in Canada guarantees more employment, more real growth, more tax revenue, and bears more of the cost burden of government than does so-called big business. Small businesses are the backbone of the Canadian business community. They create over 50 per cent of the taxes collected by the government, and employ close to 60 per cent of the people working in Canada.

In the last budget the government expanded its definition of small business by offering more tax reductions. This will help somewhat and we support even this small step because we believe that anything done to encourage the small business sector of the economy will have a positive effect on the employment situation.

I should like to mention a number of proposals which have been emphasized, indeed brought forward on a number of occasions, by members of my party. Our attitude to this serious matter now before the House is not destructive. The issue is too important to warrant the presentation of its darker or bleaker side only. Perhaps on another occasion I shall be given the opportunity to present some of our constructive proposals, Mr. Speaker.

An hon. Member: Four o'clock.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order. It being four o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, notices of motions, public bills, private bills.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' PUBLIC BILLS

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Does the House give unanimous consent that all orders preceding order No. 26 stand at the request of the government?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

BANK ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND MONETARY QUALIFICATIONS REGARDING BANK DIRECTORS

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal) moved that Bill C-226, to amend the Bank Act (qualification of directors), be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I hope the House is not inhibited by the black dispatch box before me. It is rather like the British system—a convenient place in which to keep one's notes.

Mr. MacFarlane: Is it Pandora's box?

Mr. Fairweather: No, it is not Pandora's box. It belongs to the House leader of the official opposition. I got hold of it and brought it here.

It occurred to me that the House might like to think for a little while about the somewhat restrictive provision now contained in the Bank Act with regard to directors. This matter came to my attention because of the extraordinarily insensitive statement, I think, made by the head of the Royal Bank of Canada, who said that during the last few months he had unsuccessfully scoured the country for an eligible woman to serve on the board of directors of that bank. Some people, when they come across inherently silly statements of that kind, write letters to the editor. However, members of parliament are given the privilege of suggesting to their colleagues a possible amendment to the Bank Act. I did not write to an editor, but I did decide to put forward a private member's public bill in order to get the whole matter of qualifications of directors discussed in this forum by my colleagues in all parties.

● (1600)

My first thought was to deal with the Bank Act by merely adding a section to try to deal with the matter of women as directors. Then I thought why should boards of directors of banks be so restrictive anyway? In other words, the matter of the status of women has advanced so far in our country that we really should not be in the quota game. We should not be in any game which involves a substantial stake in a bank in order to give the bank good advice. It occurred to me the simplest thing to do would be to repeal that part of the Bank Act which had a monetary directorial qualification. As a result directors would be drawn from the whole mass of the citizenship in this country.

I must give the head of the Royal Bank credit. I am sure that the stupidity of his statement so aroused the public of Canada that he retracted, searched again and, from information I have, was able to find from among the 11,500,000 women in this country one or two, in his opinion, who are eligible to give the bank wise advice on directing its affairs.

If hon. members do not mind, I would like to read into the record the explanatory note of this simple bill. All the bill does is repeal a subsection of the Bank Act. I would like the explanation to be on the record, particularly when the major revision of the Bank Act comes forward in the next few months. The explanatory note reads as follows:

> The section as it stands is discriminatory to all but a few who can meet the financial requirements and therefore restricts directorships to a small and unrepresentative segment of the population.
> Subsection 18(2) of the Bank Act at present reads as follows:
> "(2) A person is not eligible to be a director unless he holds stock of the bank as the absolute and sole owner thereof in his individual right and not as a trustee or in the right of another, on which not less than
> (a) three thousand dollars, or such greater amount as the by-laws require, have been paid up, when the paid-up capital stock of the bank is one million dollars or less;
> (b) four thousand dollars, or such greater amounts as the by-laws require, have been paid up, when the paid-up capital stock of the bank exceeds one million dollars and does not exceed three million dollars; or
> (c) five thousand dollars, or such greater amount as the by-laws require, have been paid up, when the paid-up capital stock of the bank exceeds three million dollars;
> except that in the case of not more than one-quarter of the directors the minimum requirements with respect to holdings of stock in paragraphs (a), (b) and (c) shall be reduced to fifteen hundred dollars, two thousand dollars and twenty-five hundred dollars, respectively."

In the particular case of the Royal Bank of Canada, it is my understanding from the publicity given at the time of the president's statement earlier this year that the qualification for becoming a director would be something in excess of $100,000 in stock in that bank. Other members will want to participate and will make their own comments about that qualification. I have not yet, since I have flown this kite in the way of an amendment to the Bank Act, seen any statement which appealed to me which could defend the reasonableness of anybody needing to have such a large amount of stock in a bank in order to be a director, hence the reason that I put forward this amendment.

The whole matter of representation of the general public on bank boards will, I am sure, be dealt with when the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) brings forward a draft act, which is due in 1977. Why should there be a monetary qualification at all? The same bank that was so insensitive to the need for having the good advice and sensible opinions of a woman on its board has been very progressive in having banks established in poorer parts of our large urban centres. The Royal Bank of Canada is conducting a very successful experiment in Montreal, Toronto, and Winnipeg. It has bank branches with different office hours. They make small loans, even in the amount of $20 I am told, so that people can avoid having to pay exorbitant interest rates. As a matter of fact I am told that half the business done by these experimental banks is with people who have never had any custom, if I can put it that way, with banks before the Royal Bank established this type of a branch. That progressive move should be welcomed.

I hope the banks can confront those people in society who make their business from loansharking. The way for what is now euphemistically called free enterprise or private enterprise—I prefer the mixed economy myself—to survive is for people to confront head on those factors in society that are going to destroy it. One thing which will surely destroy the mixed economy is exorbitant interest rates and an unsympathetic or unresponsive banking system.

I very much hope that some of the ideas that I have included in this short amendment to the Bank Act which, as I said earlier, had its origin in the failure of one Canadian bank to find anywhere in Canada a qualified woman to serve on its board, will commend themselves to the House.

I serve on a board—not of a bank because I have no way of qualifying in monetary terms—of a Canadian university. Of course there is no monetary qualification required. It is all the other way around. It is a matter of civic responsibility which I am very glad to undertake. That board, and other boards in Canada, up until very recently found they were unable to have representation on them from students. It was thought to be pulling down the highest foundations if a student ever got to the stage where he or she could sit on such a board. Now, of course, universities have faced that issue, and I cannot imagine any university in this country without representation from the students, the faculty, and so forth, on its board of trustees. The universities have faced this issue without the whole democratic state crumbling into nothingness. If we can face it in universities, perhaps our formidable and efficient banking system can find it within its heart—perhaps that is not the right word; within its legal competence, to try a lawyer's term, might be better—to widen representation on the boards of directors of Canadian banks.

There are a couple of interesting books about what I might call the "closed shop" in our corporate system in Canada. Other hon. members would probably agree with me that one of the most important books ever written was John Porter's book "The Vertical Mosaic". Of not quite the same importance was Peter Newman's book "The Establishment". Both these books—one being an empirical study of our system; the other leaning toward more popular readership—showed there is a sort of network at work which finds within its system a way to exclude a good many people from participating in many of the senior directorate jobs in the banks and corporations of this country. I think this is to the detriment of these corporations. Basically speaking, corporate life would be much better served if boards were substantially broadened.

Parliament will have an opportunity to test this thesis of mine when the Bank Act comes up for revision later this year. Since parliament will be the leader in this field and will be telling the corporate world how we feel such boards should be constituted, I hope we will not be hesitant in substantially broadening the opportunity for a large segment of the Canadian population to serve on bank boards.

This is an hour that is given to private members and I could entertain the House with a polemic against the Canadian banking system, but I have no such polemic today. Personally, I have been well served over the years by various Canadian banks which somehow have been able to support my overdrafts and loans. There will be other opportunities for polemics about banks. I happen to believe that the Canadian banking system, with some exceptions, one of which I have mentioned here, has basically served us well. As one coming from one of the poorer parts of Canada, I would feel more comfortable with a little more sensitivity to those regions that would flow from a more flexible lending system, but there will be other opportunities for me to discuss this aspect of our banking system.

What I seek to do through this amendment is not to tear down the altars of Canadian banks or enter the vaults, or to do anything more than give the banks an opportunity to see how well they could be served if that half of the population who are women had a chance to serve on their boards. If the banks could get used to that idea, perhaps they would like also to give an opportunity to the 22 or 23 million Canadians who will never have an opportunity to serve because they could never meet the test. And the test now is a substantial financial stake in the banks. This is why I propose this private member's bill, and I look forward to hearing what other members have to say about this issue.

Mr. Gilbert Parent (St. Catharines): Mr. Speaker, I look forward to speaking on this particular bill, especially since I have very high regard for the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Fairweather). I know that in debate we are not supposed to say "me too!" along the way too often, but the fact of the matter is that I agree with many of the points he made.

Mr. Paproski: That sounds good coming from you. Why don't you join us?

Mr. Parent: I do not know if I have to join you because I agree with the hon. member. I could counter your proposal by saying perhaps you would like to join us, and of course you can do that virtually any time.

The hon. member referred to one book I am familiar with and said that there was a network of people who consistently make up directorships on many bank boards across Canada. I think he was being very kind. I do not know whether I am being as kind when I say that in one sense this breeds a kind of financial mafia which appears on many boards across the country.

The statement was made earlier that it was supposedly difficult to find a woman or women who were of sufficient calibre to sit on the boards of directors of banks. Having canvassed the possibility of having students sit on university boards, I wonder whether some consideration might be given by these boards to having people who represent workers serve on them. I know we are all workers, but I refer to unionized and non-unionized workers. Their input would be invaluable and they would have something to contribute. Perhaps here lies a great source not only of opinion but of knowledge as yet untapped.

This amendment will eliminate from the act any requirement on the part of directors to hold shares in a bank. This question some months ago received general attention, particularly in relation to the ability of women to meet the necessary requirements. The hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Hnatyshyn) asked the minister to tell the House whether he intended in this present session to introduce legislation to amend the Bank Act in order to facilitate the appointment of women as directors of our chartered banks, and in reply the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) had this to say, as reported at page 102 of Hansard:

> Mr. Speaker, I have noted the statements of a number of senior bank executives in this regard. I am sure the hon. member was as delighted as I was at this morning's announcement that the Bank of Nova Scotia has now appointed a woman director.

He went on to say that legislation would be introduced to bring about greater participation in such directorships not only by women but by others in the community. Here again, I would ask how many educators are there on the boards of banks? How many union workers and students serve? I wonder how many housewives would be asked for their opinion. Some people might think that high finance is way beyond them, but surely they are blessed with as much common sense as the members of the House of Commons and many directors of banks.

The matter under discussion is not as easily defined as the proposal would suggest. This has been recognized in a number of ways. The minister has received letters urging that the requirement be wiped out altogether. The hon. member used the term "reasonableness". Would it be reasonable to appoint people as directors of these banks when they did not hold shares in them? Perhaps when they do hold shares it is likely they would take a greater interest in the investments and financial arrangements for which they are responsible. I am not fully prepared to argue all the pros and cons at this time. I am simply pointing out that there are arguments on both sides and that there might be solutions to this problem other than the one proposed in the bill before us.

The matter was not totally ignored in the white paper on Canadian banking which was issued by the Minister of Finance on August 23, 1976. The bill to revise the Bank Act which the minister will be bringing before parliament will attempt to bring the Bank Act, in so far as is appropriate, in line with the Canada Business Corporations Act. The hon. member alluded to this, I believe, a few minutes ago. This undertaking has generally been welcomed. It is, however, a big task and one which is adding considerably to the length and complexity of the process of preparing the new legislation.

It is perhaps worth while in the context of this discussion to review what the Canada Business Corporations Act has to say on the subject. The key section reads as follows:

100 (1) The following persons are disqualified from being a director of a corporation:

(a) anyone who is less than eighteen years of age;

(b) anyone who is of unsound mind and has been so found by a court in Canada or elsewhere;

(c) a person who is not an individual; or

(d) a person who has the status of bankrupt.

(2) Unless the articles otherwise provide, a director of a corporation is not required to hold shares issued by the corporation.

(3) A majority of the directors of a corporation must be resident Canadians.

The last paragraph is, to my mind, one of great importance. We do need Canadians on these boards so that decisions can be reached in the light of what is good for all Canadians. This, in itself, would be an important consideration.

Section 100 (2) is the key section for purposes of this debate. Under it, a director of a corporation is not required to hold shares unless the articles of that corporation otherwise provide.

An important royal commission has been meeting on questions related to corporate concentration. The Bryce Commission is expected to report shortly and may well have something to say on the subject of directors and requirements affecting directors. It would be useful for the House to have the advantage of this report before considering this kind of legislation.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether it is sensible to try to deal with such important legislation as the Bank Act in a piecemeal fashion. It would seem unwise to amend the legislation at this time without being able to consider the whole range of proposals that will be brought forward by the minister.

The minister has already indicated his intention to bring a short bill before parliament which will extend the powers of the banks to do business for a further period of time after July 1, 1977, when under the existing legislation these powers expire. This will provide him with an opportunity to explain the state of preparation of the decennial revision legislation and when it might appear. When the decennial legislation is brought forward, the House will undoubtedly want to hold public hearings and this is an obvious time to explore in greater thoroughness a whole range of questions, including the one which is before us today. Consequently, Mr. Speaker, while I am sympathetic to the general objective of the proposal before us today, I would urge members to be patient until this matter can be discussed thoroughly in the context of the banking legislation which the Minister of Finance will be bringing before the House.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to congratulate the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Fairweather) on introducing this bill. I also wish to commend him for the excellent statement he made on it this afternoon.

When I saw that the hon. member was bringing in a bill to amend the Bank Act with respect to the qualifications of directors I took it for granted he was endeavouring to get at a restriction which denies women the right to be members of boards of directors of banks. Then I discovered, as he did, that there was no prohibition against women as such but that the limitations involved in the financial requirements did have that effect. I am delighted that he seized upon the notion that two things might be done at once, in other words, that we could change the Bank Act so that women would be the equal of men in qualifying as members of the boards of directors of banks, and also do away completely with the financial requirements.

I am interested to see that there appears to be general support for the idea, though it does become a little tiring to get the kind of support from the government side which says, "We like your idea, but be patient for a while; this could be carried out when the Bank Act comes up for review next year." Well, it could be next year, or ten years from now. As for the argument that we should not deal with the Bank Act piecemeal, it strikes me that this is such a simple measure and one so elementary in terms of justice that it would be a good idea to get it out of the way. We could deal with it right now by amending the Bank Act, making the present financial requirements unnecessary, and thus save the minister from having to deal with it later.

I am glad the last speaker indicated a desire to see the appointment to boards of directors of banks of persons other than those with financial interests. He seemed to put this proposition forward hesitantly, but at any rate he did put it forward.

The issue is simply this: do banks in this country exist for the purpose of making money? If so, you put millionaires on the board. Or do they exist for the purpose of serving the people of Canada? If that is the case, the boards of directors should be representative of the people. I support without hesitation the idea that workers, farmers, educators, students, housewives, and others who are representative of Canadians generally, should have a voice in the policy of our banks.

I suppose it is rather interesting, almost a coincidence, that the hon. member's bill about positions as bank directors is being discussed at the end of a day during which we have been discussing unemployment. I suppose the hon. member chose to have this bill debated today for that very reason. Here are jobs that could well be filled by some of the unemployed people about whom we have been concerned in our earlier debate on Bill C-27. All told, I think it is an excellent idea. I like the way the hon. member put it that we have made progress, and I hope this is true, with respect to women's rights. There are a number of instances in which we may still have to lay it down that positions are to be divided equally between men and women. Perhaps we will have to do it in this context. I hope the day will come when persons will be persons, but it is still true that women are so far behind in enjoying their rights in this country that we may have to do something pretty drastic about it.

I said the other day in another debate that there have been elected to the parliament of Canada in the last 110 years about 3,000 men. In that same period of time in 30 elections there have been elected only 28 women. Certainly since the early 1920's the status has been equal. It was true in the last election and it will be true in the next. Every woman in the country has an equal right to get here.

Mrs. Holt: Why do you not have any women in your party in the House?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): We did our best. As a matter of fact, I believe we ran more women than other parties did in the last election. The public has not got around to realizing their value fully. But we have had them, from Agnes MacPhail to Grace MacInnis.

The point I am making is that until we reach the stage where there is equality, we may have to go in for a quota system. Perhaps this is not the place where it will be accepted, but certainly something should be done to ensure that there will be women on boards of directors of banks, and something also must be done to ensure that persons who represent the various strata of life in Canada are there. The hon. member's bill does that by removing the financial qualifications altogether.

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

Again I wish to express my disappointment at the suggestion that comes from across the way that this is a good bill, a good idea, but let us leave it for later. It would be far better if we said in the House that there is nothing wrong with the idea at all and it would be a good idea to make this change in the Bank Act even before the major changes come. Therefore I strongly support the bill now before us.

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I hope that the wish of the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Fairweather), which has been expressed again by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), will be realized today and that this question, which obviously merits support both on its substance as well as on its succinctness in terms of being a relatively minor change and a single change to the banking legislation of this country, will be carried today.

I think it is particularly important that we not forget the context in which this bill is put forward. Although we are facing legislation with regard to the general revision of the Bank Act, and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) has said there would be some changes in the qualifications of directors which would meet the matter raised in the House by the hon. member for Fundy-Royal as it affects women, the fact is that there is no likelihood that this revision will take place this year.

My understanding of the situation is that what we are likely to face in terms of general banking legislation this year is a one line bill which will merely extend the operation of the existing Bank Act. Therefore, if this House does not deal with this matter today, then the inequity which the bill is designed to attack is likely to carry on for a long time, and I do not think there is any member of the House who would want to see that happen. For those reasons I hope the House will approve the bill today.

Aside from that fact, I think there are many good ideas which come forward in private members' hour, a lot of sound ideas advanced by private members which are doomed to go to the foot of the list, and be brought back again and again. Sometimes persistence pays off and patience wears thin. Problems continue, and a whole host of things can happen as a result of the failure of our system in the House to deal with those good ideas, either by sending them as legislation to the appropriate committees or by sending the various subject matters, to committee for further study.

I share in general the view that the monetary investment by a director in a company or in an organization—particularly an organization which is institutionalized in the Canadian context—spells out his or her level of interest in that institution's affairs. The hon. member for Fundy-Royal has mentioned his involvement in universities, and many other members of the House are directors of organizations in which they have no other interest except sharing the interest of the individual organization in the community. That is the foundation stone for service on those boards. I am satisfied that banks could very well be one of those institutions.

The other aspect on which I wish to speak generally is that despite a large amount of lip service given to the status of women in this Chamber and elsewhere, whether with respect to representation in the House or with respect to involvement in the political process generally or advancement in the professions, in business, and in those areas which are important to the well-being of our community, there is a great underrepresentation of one section of our society.

I speak as one who many years ago employed a young student in my office, a woman who came to my law office under the cloud of being a woman and having to prove herself beyond the degree required by a male student of law. She had to adapt in a professional world which, to a greater extent than is the case today, was alien to the presence of women. That woman is now one of the partners in my law firm in which, unfortunately, I cannot take part at present. She has progressed by her own efforts which, I think I have to say, generally in my profession requires more effort by her than would have been required of a student who is not a woman.

Mr. Breau: Are lawyers chauvinists?

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): No, I do not think there are any more chauvinists among lawyers than in any other group. But the fact is that the traditions of our society have said to women—that view is changing now—that there are other roles for women. Women should be nurses, or secretaries, and they should not advance into management for which men are better qualified—that is what our society has said. I think that the statistics will show that although there have been improvements in the opportunities for women, those opportunities have not really kept pace with the abilities of women in Canada to participate in the professions. As each one advances in a profession or business, it gives the lie to old traditions. They are gradually being whittled away.

● (1640)

In the Public Service of Canada there are equal job opportunity directives issued with respect to women, but the fact is that as the number of public service positions increases, the proportion of women involved in those positions decreases. As the upper management of the Public Service of Canada increases in size—and it is still going to increase in size—the proportion of women who have been able to find their place in upper management positions has actually decreased. There have been some major advances in the middle-management areas of the public service, but the statistical facts are as I have given them. That is why the Public Service Alliance of Canada and the Professional Institute of the Public Service indicated their concern, and that is why it behoves this House to consider a bill directed to women on the one hand but directed as well to broadening the base of representation on bank boards.

I know there are other hon. members who want to speak, and I intend to sit down, but I want to commend the hon. member for Fundy-Royal for advancing this piece of legislation, and I am very proud to second it.

Bank Act

Mrs. Ursula Appolloni (York South): Mr. Speaker, there are times in this House when I feel I have been invited to the Mad Hatter's tea party. I have just had the pleasure of listening to four men, one after the other, talk about their willingness to give equality to women. It has taken hon. gentlemen exactly 45 minutes to let one female speak.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: You've made your point, Ursula.

Mrs. Appolloni: If I could paraphrase Shakespeare, I would say "that man doth protest far too much".

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Appolloni: I was invited to join this debate because it is "a women's issue". While I counted to ten and bit my tongue for the umpteenth time since I have come to this place, it occurred to me that such a thing should not even exist. We should by now have evolved to the stage where we do not have such things as women's issues. They should be people's issues, and that should be it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Appolloni: However, I am grateful to the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Fairweather) for bringing this to our attention. I had no idea that in order to become a director of a bank a person had to go through a means test. That is the kind of thing we were discussing last night with regard to old age security. There is still a means test just to become a director of a bank, for goodness sake!

In a way I am sorry Mr. McLaughlin and the Royal Bank were singled out. I am sure he has lived to regret his statement. I notice that he has not been chastised except by a few. Some comments were cautiously printed in some newspapers, obviously written by men. I do not see one female named here. However, Charles Lynch, another male, in an article in the Gazette on September 20 said that a woman bank director who now holds important political office informs him that intellectual excellence is the last thing a banker is likely to consider when seeking a candidate for the board. Under those circumstances perhaps it is a good thing there are not very many woman directors.

Let us go back to the means test. Why on earth do we have to have money to become a director of a bank? We do not have to have any money to become directors of most of the other institutions which we, the women of Canada, keep going on a voluntary basis. Nobody pays us for our time. Sometimes we might get a pat on the back, but that is all. But in order to be a bank director we need money. Why? Presumably because the original idea was to ensure that the candidate had a stake in the institution. I object most to this. Like it or not, women in this country have a stake in every institution in Canada, be it financial, economic, social, political, educational, artistic, academic, technical, cultural, judicial, or any other kind of institution affecting the stability and progress of mankind.

We have been told that this subject is in the white paper on banking. With all due respect to the government, this is exactly the kind of thing which makes the women of Canada sick to their stomachs. We are sick of being surveyed, analyzed, and dissected in every paper, no matter what colour, which comes from the government benches and which just lies to rot and gather dust in the archives of parliament. Stop with these papers, stop with these motions—especially these pious ones—and let us get some action.

Mrs. Simma Holt (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Holt: Hon. members opposite would not do that if I were talking about a non-women's issue, but I appreciate their applause very much.

I am pleased to follow the hon. member for York South (Mrs. Appolloni), another woman. To use her words, these pious bills and these little condescensions to women are mere stalls. I only have to look at appointments—and I say this about my side and about the other side—government appointments of women to Crown agencies, committees and commissions to make my point. In one of the last reports on the status of women of Canada 1,162 positions were shown and of that group 120 were held by women. That is the kindness, love, devotion and tolerance of our male colleagues here. Hon. members keep mentioning their concern for women's rights. Many including the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Fairweather) have been here long enough to clean up the act the law for directorships. I would like members of boards of directors of banks to be decided on the basis of the Canada Corporations Act. But when we look at that act we see the insidiousness of the discrimination there, the discrimination in the use of male pronouns through all the law and, of course in the Corporations Act, defining the right to the top jobs in the nation as though for males only.

I will read part of the Canada Corporation Manual, as follows; the underlining of the male pronoun in each case being my own:

> . . . he or any other company of which he is an officer or director, is a shareholder, and, if the by-laws so provide . . .

And they could change the by-laws to fit what we want, but all the gold-plated chauvinists, the Earle McLaughlins and his ilk, including some in this very House, will not appease the women of Canada with patchwork amendments to correct this subliminal discrimination.

Mr. MacFarlane: There are some women who are chauvinists.

Mrs. Holt: Well, they are not gold-plated. They will hold back their gold-plating from the Earle McLaughlins and the other people if this goes on, and so they should. However, hon. members should note the wording of this. None of them has ever moved to change these statutes, to say "he or she" with regard to employment. Nobody in this side or on the side opposite has done so, and many men have been here long enough to have cleaned this up. This manual also says the following:

> Except as mentioned below no person is to be elected as a director or appointed as a director to fill any vacancy . . .

This is under the Canada Corporations Act.

> . . . unless he or any other company of which he is an officer or director, is a shareholder, and, if the by-laws so provide, owning shares absolutely in his own right . . .

Note all the male pronouns. The Hansard reporter should underline "he". Then part of the ruling which I think is quite important is as follows:

> The amount of the share qualification of directors is regulated usually by the by-laws, which may provide for the number or class of shares which must be held by a person to qualify him for election as a director.

And hon. members will all give me that nice little Interpretation Act as their cover-up. It has been the ploy throughout the centuries to allow this subtle, vicious discrimination. They say it is subliminal advertising or subliminal propaganda that the Interpretation Act covers; wherever it says "he" it means "he or she or it", they tell me. Nonsense!

● (1650)

I am delighted to discuss the matter, and I am grateful to the hon. member for Fundy-Royal because I know he is sincerely concerned about matters affecting women. Maybe he did not realize that all these other inequities existed or could not do anything about them. I know he understands the injustices meted out to women and the discontent of these extremely competent people. I know too he is trying to find solutions. I do not think, however, that the measure of quality for bank directors should be monetary. If you measure the quality and intellect of women with their capacity and variety of background experience, wisdom and knowledge, the monetary aspect is irrelevant.

Much as I should like to see this one small change by this bill I cannot settle for little compromises, Mr. Speaker. I do not want little bits and pieces; and I do not think the women of Canada—half of our constituents—want that either.

The current approach to improving the quality of the fabric of our lives is slipshod. We do not reweave the whole fabric of our society as we should. That is true of law and of everything in this House. We do not reweave the fabric but just put a little patch here and a little patch there. We do not use women and men equally in a society that man created. It is a man's world—created by men for men to satisfy men and keep men in power.

Mr. Paproski: That is passé.

Mrs. Holt: It is not passé. Look at you all seated over there. Where are the women?

An hon. Member: There and there.

Mrs. Holt: Twenty-eight women have been elected to this House throughout its life. They could have been recruited but they are not wanted. We do not want your small solutions to an incomplete social fabric—a little thread here and a little thread there. It is invisible mending of the fabric. I want the whole Bank Act changed; I do not want it patched. Mr. Speaker, I would point out that the meaning the underworld attaches to the word "patch" is appropriate here. A patch is a bribe—a sop to the squares; so it is very appropriate.

For me the "Ms." and the opening of a door is not bribe enough. I think most women would sacrifice being called Ms and open their own door in exchange for equal opportunity. When that gold-plated bank president, W. Earle McLaughlin, made his infamous statement he was not speaking in isolation. He was not unique. He was the voice of the thousands and thousands of men who run this country.

The pictures that appear of executives—and until recently of cabinets—are always of men. Where are the women? In the annual reports of banks or big companies the women are usually standing by the filing cabinet. Even now, when women are wearing long skirts and pant suits, these pictures still show the women in short skirts because it tittles—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mrs. Holt: —it gives men pleasure. These big bank, big company annual reports are the cheap business man's Playboy. It is not even well done.

Mr. Paproski: Simma, you deserve more than to be a backbencher. You deserve to be a cabinet minister.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Holt: I certainly know most of the women here have the intellect and capability to do that job very well. But I do not want to be there. I do not want to toe the male line. I want to change the rules of this House to be more sensible and practical—change from Robert's Rules of Order to Roberta's Rules of Order.

Women are allowed a peripheral place in society. I do not want to be "allowed" anything, and if I have to fight I am going to fight for what is the woman's right. Men like to say that women are the power behind the throne and how great they would be behind the throne of a bank manager. But the route to that throne has been precarious and devious. That wisdom has been short circuited. From the time the male executive first leaves home until he gets to that office on the top floor of the bank, he is indoctrinated by all the males en route and the wisdom of the competent woman behind that throne is lost. The whole of our nation goes that way—perhaps to male disaster.

Since there are other people who want to speak, I simply want to say that while I appreciate deeply the intent of this bill I would appreciate it more if it were part of the great whole. The hon. member for Fundy-Royal should clean up all the law—as a lawyer—and because it is so subliminally discriminatory by being written as though for men only in the corporations of this nation.

Mr. F. A. Philbrook (Halton): Mr. Speaker, I should like to keep my comments brief and assure my colleagues on the other side that I am not standing up in a partisan way or out of meanness to talk this bill out, but I should like to make a couple of comments that are important to me.

First of all, I should like to take the opportunity to congratulate the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Fairweather). It is a privilege to speak on a bill sponsored by him because of his well-recognized humanity. Even as a relative newcomer to this House one can see that.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Philbrook: If he is embarrassed by that he should not be, I would say, because of his sheer consistent common sense in all matters in this House. It is a pleasure to talk on the bill as well because of what it attempts to do to eliminate one more area of discrimination in our way of life. I think it is proper and timely right now because we happen to have been debating human rights legislation. I spoke on this last night and it was a pleasure to speak then on the subject we were debating today, the place and province of women in our society. I was happy to mention at the same time the problem of handicapped people.

I have said I would like to see the bill go through, but I understand there is a catch in that the government is seriously considering this measure in its own Bank Act draft and considering it from the point of view—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. The hour appointed for the consideration of private members' business has now expired. It being five o'clock I do now leave the chair until Monday next at two o'clock p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 2(1).

At 5 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

THE BUDGET

SUGGESTED PRESENTATION WITHIN TEN DAYS WITH PROVISIONS FOR JOB CREATION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, considering that according to figures released by Statistics Canada a few hours ago, real gross national product declined in the last quarter of 1976 by .6 per cent and considering that unemployment forecasts done by the Department of Finance indicate further economic deterioration for 1977 with an unemployment average of about 10 per cent in Quebec and 13 per cent in Atlantic Canada thus promoting disunity in the country, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House instructs the government to bring in a budget within ten days which will have as its purpose the expansion of the national economy and the provision of jobs, both of which are essential to the maintenance of national unity.

Mr. Speaker: The presentation of such a motion pursuant to Standing Order 43 can be made only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

PROPOSED SIX MONTHS' DELAY IN ENFORCEMENT OF NEW TIMETABLE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. C. A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the terms of Standing Order 43, I request the unanimous consent of the House to present a motion dealing with a matter of utmost importance and urgency to the Saguenay-Lac-Saint-Jean area.

As according to the new CN passenger service schedule becoming effective in early April, the only passenger train will be arriving into Montreal at 23:30, as at that late hour all connections with other trains is impossible and as, according to that new schedule, three days and two nights will be needed to spend one business day in Montreal, that waste of time never having existed previously because the same trip is now made during the night, and as the implementation of that new schedule will cause serious prejudice to the travelling public in the area to the extent where the clientele will disappear, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Abitibi (Mr. Laprise):

That the Minister of Transport exert immediately the required pressures with the CN president and Mr. Jean-Marie Beaulieu, general superintendent, to delay the implementation of the new schedule for six months, with a view to allowing local organizations to present their suggestions in that regard.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Under the terms of Standing Order 43, the motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: As there is not unanimous consent, the motion cannot be put.

ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM

POSSIBILITY OF PROGRAM ENDING ON OCTOBER 14 AND THAT RATE OF INFLATION REDUCED TO FOUR PER CENT BY JANUARY, 1978

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance and it arises out of continuing uncertainty about the termination of wage and price controls in Canada. Specifically, I should like to ask the Minister of Finance for the validity or the nature of the documents that have been reported on this weekend that suggest that the control program is to end on October 14. What is the nature of those documents, are they official documents, and can we believe what they say?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, as I have indicated previously to the House and outside the House, we now have under way a process of discussion with the provincial governments and with other major economic decision makers on a possible date for the termination of the controls. I should say that, more than a possible date, it is a range of dates and an analysis lying behind each of them. The documents or statements referred to over the week end appear to have been taken from some of the working papers that have been under discussion with the provincial governments. As I said, those papers indicated a range of possible dates commencing next October 14 and running into the next year for the possible termination of controls. No decision on this point has been taken by the government as yet. We have not had a full and definitive response from the provincial governments as yet.

Mr. Gillies: Is the minister saying that the October 14 date is not a possible date for the termination of controls, and when will he get rid of the uncertainty which is dominating the economy? When will business and the people in this country learn from the government when these controls will be terminated or what the government's views on them are? I ask this question particularly in relation to the fact of the continuing decline in the confidence of business, which seems to be apparent in the figures for the last quarter of last year with respect to real growth.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): The hon. gentleman asked whether this is a possible date. I indicated there was a range of dates set out for the provincial governments. The position we have taken in this regard is that in a program of this kind, which was brought into effect with the co-operation of the provincial governments, it is entirely reasonable for them to be fully consulted on the possible dates for the termination of the program. In that sense, we have gone to the provinces and put to them a series of solutions and sought their response. It seems clear from this that the government of Canada will have to make its choice among possible dates, but I think it makes sense to have full consultation. I hope we can have definitive responses from the provinces at a very early date, in which case I, too, would look forward to the possibility of making a statement on the projected termination date. However, until we have had the full consultation it would be difficult to make a final determination.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I would like to address a supplementary question to the Minister of Finance. AIB vice-chairman June Menzies told the Winnipeg Society of Financial Analysts on February 18 this year that Canada must maintain wage and price controls until the annual rate of inflation reaches 4 per cent. She also stated that, and I quote, "the time to decontrol is not yet", since the objective of the program is to move to a 4 per cent inflation rate during a three-year period. Since the Minister of Finance implied at the financial ministers' conference in January that the controls program would end in January 1978, is it his contention that a rate of inflation of 4 per cent is possible before January, 1978?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I have indicated that it is not the government's conclusion that such a rate would be attained during the current calendar year. Just to pick up a specific reference of the hon. gentleman, we indicated to the provincial ministers both at the conference and since that we are looking at a range of dates, but not specifically the January date.

Mr. Alexander: Will the minister confirm whether it is the intention of the government to retain controls until a 4 per cent rate of inflation is reached?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): We will have to make a judgment in that regard and, in particular, if we can find some assurance from major economic decision-makers in the country of the same commitment to reducing inflation, it may be possible to get out before that time.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

EFFECT OF OIL PRICE INCREASE—REQUEST FOR EARLY BUDGET TO STIMULATE JOB CREATION

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. Would the minister confirm that the price of oil going up as much as 4.6 cents on Wednesday of this week and a further increase of 4 cents by next September will cause the loss of an estimated 80,000 jobs? I assume his department has done some studies on this. Assuming that to be the case and considering that the existing levels of unemployment are felt disproportionately on a regional basis in the country and thus contribute to disunity, will the minister give us some assurance that he will bring forward a budget within a matter of five to 10 days which will have as its principle objective the creation of jobs in the Canadian economy?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I would have to check as to the accuracy of the calculation to which the hon. member referred in the first part of his question.

On the second part, I am not anticipating bringing forward a budget in the next five to 10 days.

ENERGY

SUGGESTED HOME INSULATION PROGRAM TO AVOID INCREASE IN HEATING COSTS

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Considering that the almost 10 cent increase in the price of oil which will come by next September will be felt by all Canadian homeowners as they purchase oil to heat their homes for the winter, will the government embark now on a national program of residential insulation similar to that established by the government for Prince Edward Island and Nova Scotia, both as a means of creating jobs now and of heading off energy cost increases in the fall?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I think the preamble of the hon. gentleman's question suggests that Canadians are already paying a very high price for home heating oil. There is no question that prices are going up, but I think we should also realize that because of the government's policy Canadians are paying less for their home heating oil than people in other countries.

Mr. Broadbent: Now answer the question.

Mr. Gillespie: The second part of the hon. gentleman's question dealt with the question of insulation. I agree with him that reinsulation programs are very much in the interests of individuals and in the interests of the country as a whole. The policy we introduced for P.E.I. and Nova Scotia was aimed at helping offset very heavy increases in electrical energy costs. I have suggested that there are other ways Canadians might be able to benefit from reinsulation. I hope that the public utilities across the country—oil companies, for example, and other companies, including banks—might introduce programs which would encourage Canadians to save.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

REQUEST THAT CANADIAN NATIONAL PURCHASE RAILS FROM SYDNEY STEEL TO AVOID PLANT CLOSING

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, the minister took two minutes to say no. I will ask a final supplementary of the Minister of Finance.

Unemployment in the Cape Breton region in real terms is about 30 per cent. Mr. Tom Kent, president of SYSCO, said last Friday that work operations at the steel plant in Sydney will be suspended completely by this coming summer unless some orders for rails are received by the company. Given the continuing need for rails in the future by the CNR, will the government now make a commitment to SYSCO to purchase the rails in order to preserve those existing jobs?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to take that as a suggestion which I will discuss with the Minister of Transport.

INDUSTRY

INQUIRY WHETHER INVENTORS HAVE FILED PATENTS FOR MOTORS USING LESS GASOLINE

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

Considering that the price of gas and other fuels is increasing and might continue to do so, and considering that this increase considerably affects freight transport which in turn raises the cost of living, can the minister tell the House whether inventors have filed patents regarding the manufacture or the invention of new engines which considerably reduce the fuel consumption of cars and trucks.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of this problem. I will make an inquiry and report to the hon. member.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

USE OF WRITS OF ASSISTANCE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Justice relating to his answer of a few days ago concerning the curtailment of use of writs of assistance. I want to ask if it is a fact that although the minister proposes not to authorize the use of any more such writs, there are approximately 900 outstanding? I understand they will remain outstanding until they are specifically cancelled. What does the minister intend to do?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I indicated we were reviewing the law and practice relating to writs of assistance and that I had instructed my officers not to apply for any more. I thought I would not touch the existing writs until I decided what should be done in the future.

Oral Questions

AIRPORTS

PRINCE ALBERT—INQUIRY AS TO APPROVAL OF EXPENDITURES FOR IMPROVEMENTS

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board. On Friday last I put the following question to him:

It has to do with an agreement which has been entered into between the government of Canada in the right of the Department of Transport and the city of Prince Albert concerning the possibility of there being an expenditure of some millions of dollars being made to improve and bring up to date the airport at Prince Albert.

May I ask whether the minister agrees?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, Treasury Board has not yet received a formal submission with regard to this item.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, the minister is always very frank. I thank him for that negative answer. I suggest to him that this is a matter of great importance and that an agreement has been entered into. I want to know whether this agreement made between the Minister of Transport and the city of Prince Albert is simply designed to cover up something with an election in the constituency of Prince Albert set for Wednesday, March 2?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, I would certainly think that the right hon. member might better address his question to the Minister of Transport who I am told made his comments about it on the basis of the possibility—the right hon. member also used the word "possibility"—of this airport improvement being forthcoming.

Mr. Diefenbaker: A final supplementary, Mr. Speaker. I think this should be taken into consideration, the way things are today. The Minister of Transport cannot either land or depart from that northern city, the gateway to the north, because jets cannot land there. Does he realize how important it is for an improvement to be made so that the minister will not lose any time getting to that important city?

AIR SERVICE BETWEEN EASTERN SASKATCHEWAN AND WESTERN MANITOBA

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, my question is related. With reference to air service to communities of eastern Saskatchewan and western Manitoba which the Minister of Transport announced would commence this year, may I ask the President of the Treasury Board if he will be providing funds for the upgrading of airport facilities in these communities in preparation for the service?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, general proposals concerning the Department of Transport or any other department come forward to Treasury Board in two forms, one of which concerns general proposals in the main estimates for main programs, which are under review now. I would have to check on the particular item to which the hon. member referred. I do not keep each one in my memory.

Mr. Dinsdale: A supplementary question to the Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker. In view of the long delay in implementing this air service which is so vitally important to the economy of the region, an air service first announced by the Prime Minister during the 1974 election campaign—

Mr. Hees: Ha! Another one of those.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Dinsdale: —will the right hon. gentleman urge the air transport committee to give early consideration to the designation of a carrier to provide this service?

Mr. Hees: It's only three years later, Pierre.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have not been following the exchange of questions and answers, but I will take note of the question and see if I can satisfy the hon. member.

Mr. Paproski: The promise was made only three years ago.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

RESIGNATION OF CANADIAN AMBASSADOR TO U.S.A.

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, may I direct my question to the Prime Minister? Given the continued reports and speculation that the Canadian ambassador to Washington resigned as a result of continuing conflicts between officials in the PMO and Department of External Affairs officers, could the Prime Minister now confirm that the arrangements for his visit to the United States were handled by his special adviser, Ivan Head, and his staff, rather than by the established professionals in the Department of External Affairs?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Since widespread media comments and a number of officials in the External Affairs department do not reflect the Prime Minister's view, and given the possibility that the PMO's activities, which bypass normal diplomatic channels, threaten our established system of diplomacy, could the Prime Minister undertake to provide the House with a specific listing of Mr. Head's responsibilities and, in particular, his relationship to the Department of External Affairs?

An hon. Member: We want his "head".

Mr. Trudeau: Yes, Mr. Speaker; Mr. Head is my adviser on foreign matters.

Mr. Hees: What about the minister responsible for External Affairs? Where does that leave Don Jamieson?

Mr. Paproski: Yes, and what about Allan MacEachen?

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister is apparently continuing his trek to having some sort of presidential system put into effect in this country.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: I ask whether or not he has, in his department, a group similar to the group of seven economic advisers which caused his former colleague, Mr. Turner, so much concern that he resigned from the cabinet.

Mr. Paproski: Answer that, your excellency.

Mr. Hees: Come on, your excellency. What do you say to that?

PENSIONS

BASIS OF ACTUARIAL ANALYSIS OF FUND—NAMES OF ACTUARIES

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, my question, addressed to the President of the Treasury Board, is related to the somewhat confusing announcement he made regarding an inquiry into pension funds. Can he specify if the independent actuarial analysis he was planning to commission will examine the general pension fund or the supplementary retirement benefits fund?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, the particular assignment is to verify or otherwise the actuarial assumptions underlying cost calculations, with particular regard to the indexation of public service pensions. But it will, in relation to that, be looking at the broader question, that of the existence of the fund and the basic pension fund as well.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the minister be prepared to table the terms of reference of the group inquiring into those areas and the names of the actuaries employed for that purpose?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, it is my intention to make these matters public on the first possible occasion.

PRIVATE PENSION INDEXATION

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Minister of Finance who is also concerned about pensions. When he made statements outside the House having to do with the carrying over into the private sector of pension indexation, was he thinking that that ought to be handled by the Canada Pension Plan, or a separate fund? What did he have in mind in this regard?

Mr. Paproski: He doesn't know.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I must apologize to the hon. gentleman. I thought he was addressing his question to my colleague and I was not following him.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I repeat my question. The Minister of Finance has been making unclear statements outside the House about pensions. I am seeking clarification. He was talking about extending indexation to the private sector. Was he planning to have this handled through the Canada Pension Plan, or through a special fund? Or what did he have in mind when talking about this matter?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman is not reporting accurately what I said. We are conducting an intensive study on the question of retirement income, in conjunction with the Department of National Health and Welfare. It will include, among other things, the impact of inflation upon the private pension system.

MANPOWER

AGRICULTURE—OFFSHORE LABOUR PROGRAM

Mr. William Knowles (Norfolk-Haldimand): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. With respect to the offshore labour program for agriculture, what conditions must the farmer fulfil in order to qualify to receive this type of labour to harvest his crops?

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, probably one of the more successful programs run by this department is the offshore assistance given to farmers. We are in close consultation with them, asking them to help us in setting some of the terms and conditions. We have indicated the housing conditions that must be met and the salaries or wages we feel should be paid. We have arranged for a liaison officer from the West Indies on occasion to be there as a liaison person for the workers. This is probably one of the better integrated and co-operative efforts we have with the farm community. We have received many kudos from them, as they have from us because of their continued co-operation.

Mr. Knowles (Norfolk-Haldimand): Can the minister give assurance that tobacco farmers will be given the same access to offshore labour as farmers producing other crops, and will the minister now announce the wage scale for offshore workers for the 1977 season?

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, I cannot announce the wage scale other than to say the figures I heard quoted at a recent convention were somewhat in excess of what we anticipate establishing. We feel the wages should be put at a level that, hopefully, will attract some Canadians into that field as well.

AGRICULTURE

REFRIGERATED RAIL CARS FOR CARRIAGE OF EASTERN CANADIAN POTATOES

Mr. Eymard Corbin (Madawaska-Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the fact that the minister's colleague, the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board, announced a few weeks ago the building of another 2,000 grain hoppers, which brings the total for western Canada to 8,000, could the minister use a bit of pressure and some arguments to bring his colleagues to realize the importance of building a sufficient number, somewhere between 500 and 1,000, refrigerated rail cars for the movement of potatoes in eastern Canada?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I just want to put the record straight. The 2,000 hopper cars referred to are to be used in all commercial grain growing areas of Canada. We had a meeting on reefer cars this morning. A lot depends on the producers themselves, the use that is to be made of these cars and whether they will make a commitment guaranteeing a certain use of them. If we are to build them in order to leave them idle on the tracks, it will not do anyone any good.

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, some time before Christmas of last year the minister indicated on one or two occasions that he was preparing a memo with respect to the building of reefer cars. After Christmas he indicated that that memo was still in preparation. Is that still the case? With respect to his comments of a moment ago about the possible continued use of these cars, does the minister not have a very firm assurance from the Prince Edward Island Potato Marketing Board, as well as the New Brunswick potato growers, with respect to the absolute need of 1,000 of these cars in the foreseeable future, particularly because of the rapid deterioration of rented cars from the United States?

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, if they would give an absolute assurance that they will use these cars and guarantee a certain usage of them—and this does not only include the potato growers in the maritimes; the horticultural producers in western Canada are making representations about more, better and more modern cars. They are also considering whether they should use the refrigerated type of trailer that can ride piggyback on railway cars and be unloaded at the point of destination. This type of program is being considered. We have done a lot of work on this matter, trying to arrive at a unified approach to this kind of program for the construction of these cars. We realize that more people would be put to work in the construction of reefer cars; therefore, there are a lot of things in their favour.

[Mr. Cullen.]

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): It is very important that the minister clarify this issue with the potato growers of eastern Canada as well as the potential apple growing market in western Canada. Has he determined from Canadian National Railways the actual condition of the present cars in usage? There is a very grave possibility of shortages. In fact, some shortages have been reported this year. There will be many difficulties in the next two or three years if we do not have adequate cars, and there will be a kind of mixed system for many years to come. Will the minister take action to clear up any difficulties because of the absolute need for placing the orders now, and not some months from now?

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, we definitely know that you should use rail cars to ship produce to Montreal, Toronto, and so on. They do a better job. However, if you are shipping produce to the port of Saint John you can probably do a better job by truck. I might also state that the railroads have failed miserably. I have visited the areas and have seen the horrible equipment they are using. There is no doubt about it. They are renting equipment that will not be used in the United States. They use it here, saying they are providing a service. As far as I am concerned, the railroads have an obligation which they are not fulfilling. It appears the government may have to do it for them.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

LOG HOUSING PROGRAM FOR NORTHERN CANADA

Mr. Wally Firth (Northwest Territories): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. It is with regard to an important matter that I have spoken about on many occasions both in the House and in committees; that is, the need for a good log housing program for the north, a program that will make use of local labour, local renewable resources, and will fill a local need. Is the minister doing anything to implement a log housing program at least in the Mackenzie district of the Northwest Territories?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I will have to check with the territorial government and my officials on this matter. I do not know the status of that program.

DREE GRANTS FOR NORTHERN TERRITORIES

Mr. Wally Firth (Northwest Territories): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. It is on the question of DREE grants for the Yukon and the Northwest Territories. I first raised this question in the House on March 17, 1974. I was assured at that time by the hon. member for Saint-Maurice that an announcement would soon be made. Can the acting minister advise the House of any progress that has been made since then?

Mr. Ed. Lumley (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I will take the question as notice and get back to the hon. member accordingly.

INDUSTRY

PURCHASING AND STOCKPILING OF STEEL RAILS BY CNR—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, I raised the question of the purchasing of steel rails by Canadian National from SYSCO and stockpiling, if necessary, before the Christmas recess. In view of the fact that the Prime Minister did not look upon it with any great frowning—in fact, he seemed to be quite encouraging—I now wish to pose a question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce with particular emphasis on industry and trade. In light of the fact that, unfortunately, there was nothing definitive at all in last week's throne speech in the Nova Scotia legislature as to either modernizing the present steel plant at Sydney or bringing a new steel complex to Cape Breton, and in view of the situation whereby this minister and other ministers of the government have continually professed great interest and, indeed, commitment relating to the subject, namely, federal involvement, is this minister and the federal government in a position to bring the House up to date as to the progress being made on this very serious matter?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I am not in a position at this time to give a definite answer to the hon. member because I have not discussed this matter thoroughly in recent times. However, I do know that we are trying to promote the sale of equipment produced by this Cape Breton Island company in several government enterprises. We believe that some progress has been made in certain cases. As soon as we have detailed information on the sales prospects, we shall inform the public. As far as the modernization of this industry is concerned, I am not aware of any particular program on this. I shall inquire about this and inform the hon. member.

[English]

Mr. Muir: Mr. Speaker, I thank the minister for his reply. Is the minister aware that the Department of Regional Economic Expansion supposedly has a committee dealing with this specific problem, and is he also aware that the present work force at the SYSCO plant has been reduced in the last two years from 3,900 to 2,250? If so, in light of the extremely high unemployment rate in Nova Scotia what plans does the government have to assist these workers to resume their employment? If the minister does not have the information today, will he look into it and make a more comprehensive report tomorrow?

FINANCE

REAL GROWTH IN ECONOMY COMPARED WITH LAST YEAR

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. Is the minister now in a position to tell us the real growth in the economy last year, and could he at the same time inform the House how this figure compares with the estimate of real growth made at the time of the budget last year?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): The government's estimate of real growth for the current year is now lower than it was at the time of the budget. The forthcoming publication of national accounts for the fourth quarter will confirm this, but the final figures will not be available until some months have elapsed, when full adjustment is made for the year as a whole. It is difficult to give a definitive figure.

Mr. Stevens: In light of the disappointing results for 1976, would the minister tell us whether a prediction of real growth as low as 3 per cent in the current year might also be his estimate, and would he at the same time let us know when he will be bringing down his budget which is urgently needed now to alleviate the present unsatisfactory situation?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I would not make an estimate at this point. As to the second question, I hope to announce the date within a matter of weeks.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

TRANSFER OF JURISDICTION OF VETERANS' HOSPITALS—REQUEST FOR GOVERNMENT RECONSIDERATION BECAUSE OF WAITING TIME FOR BEDS

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): My question is to the Minister of Veterans Affairs, Mr. Speaker. I know we all welcome him back to the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Marshall: In view of the fact that the schedule of availability of domiciliary and chronic care beds in hospitals already transferred and not yet transferred shows a waiting time of up to 18 months, would the minister now tell the House what his plans are with regard to the transfer of further hospitals? Would he consider putting a stop to all transfers of hospitals until this waiting period and the lack of treatment and care of veterans is reviewed?

Hon. Daniel MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, in answer to the hon. member may I say that at this time there is no thought of stopping the transfer of hospitals to the provinces or the municipalities. The ones we have transferred so far have been quite successful and we are reasonably pleased with the treatment the veterans are receiving. We get this reaction from the veterans' organizations and we also get it from the veterans themselves. With regard to space in hospitals for domiciliary care treatment, etc., this is actually a medical decision. We have many people waiting for different treatment in various hospitals who can wait. This is the general practice, not just in veterans' hospitals but in all hospitals. The question was fairly long. What was the last part?

Mr. Marshall: I asked the minister whether he would put a stop to further transfers of hospitals until a complete review is made of the lack of domiciliary care beds.

Mr. MacDonald (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, I think I answered that question. I thought there was another one.

Mr. Marshall: The minister is his usual succinct self. I am sure he is well. Would he look at the schedule prepared by his own treatment services branch and note, in particular, one comment they make, that in one hospital applicants are on a points system as well as having to wait for a vacancy? Applicants with the lowest points could in some cases wait forever. Would the hon. gentleman look at this seriously, review the situation and make a statement on motions after he has had a chance to look into this problem?

Mr. MacDonald (Cardigan): I will be more than glad to look into this matter. As far as that goes, we have followed the performance of various hospitals very diligently. I have just had some of my people with my chief medical doctor out in Western Canada, and my deputy minister, and this was the main function of the trip.

DEER LODGE HOSPITAL, MAN.—USE OF EMPTY SPACE FOR NURSING HOME CARE

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. As the liaison committee of the Manitoba Medical Association and the Manitoba Association of Registered Nurses has approached the government of Manitoba with regard to using the empty space in the Deer Lodge Hospital for nursing care, there being a list of 1,200 persons waiting for entry into nursing homes in Manitoba, has the minister had any correspondence or communication with the Manitoba government on this subject, and does he intend to allow the unused sections of Deer Lodge to be used for nursing home care?

Hon. Daniel MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): This comes within policy formation as to what we should do with veterans' hospitals. We are not really set up to serve the public generally. I will have to look at this. We had some correspondence some time ago, but I am not aware of any correspondence recently.

INDUSTRY

REQUEST FOR REPORT ON SWEDISH INVESTMENT AT MAGOG, QUEBEC

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Drummond): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

According to some reports, the Quebec premier recently expressed his intention to appeal to the Foreign Investment Review Agency, which is under the authority of the minister, to support the request for an important Swedish investment at Magog, Quebec. Is the minister prepared to help the Quebec premier reach that goal and can he tell the House where that matter stands?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, only Friday did we receive from the Quebec government approval of the request that was made to the Foreign Investment Review Agency before Mr. Lévesque became premier of Quebec. We sent the request from the Quebec government in late November and we got a final answer only Friday. We will now be able to proceed within cabinet and make our decision in a few weeks.

ENERGY

INCREASE IN PRICE OF GASOLINE AND HOME HEATING OIL ALLOWED BY ANTI-INFLATION BOARD

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources? It arises from the decision of the Anti-Inflation Board to permit the price of gasoline and home heating fuel to rise by up to 4.6 cents a gallon, and the statement by the minister in a speech in Toronto last Friday that we could expect an additional 4 cents per gallon increase after July 1 as a result of allowing the price of crude oil at the wellhead to rise by $1.25 per barrel. Has the government in mind, when it discusses this matter with the provinces, suggesting a price of $11 per barrel for crude oil and, if so, what is the justification for such an increase?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): I am sure the hon. member knows the answer to that question; I have stated it many times, and quite recently before the standing committee. If the hon. member would like to raise the question again before the standing committee, I will go over all the reasons why it is necessary and why the government has adopted a policy of moving oil prices toward world levels.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): In view of the fact that the present minister and the previous minister have argued that the justification for raising the price was to give the oil industry more money for exploration and development, and in view of the fact that the present minister and his predecessor promised as far back as 3½ years ago that this increase in price and the consequent increase in revenue to the oil industry would be monitored to ensure that the money would be spent on exploration and development, I ask the minister two questions. First, would he tell the House the result of that monitoring over the past 3½ years? Second, would he tell us what mechanism he intends to put in place to monitor present and future increases, bearing in mind that his own departmental report entitled "An Energy Strategy for Canada" says that over the next five years the industry will retain, after paying taxes and royalties, $3 billion a year for the next five years? I ask the minister what he proposes to do, first with respect to the report of the past monitoring and, second, with respect to monitoring in present and future years.

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, again, the transcript of the proceedings before the standing committee makes my answer quite clear and it is not necessary for me to repeat it to the hon. member. But I am pleased to do so for the benefit of the House. I indicated to him before the standing committee that I hoped within a matter of a few weeks to be able to present to the standing committee the results of the exploration and development activities related to the increased cash flow for the petroleum producing companies over the last five years. So the answer to the first question is, "within a few weeks' time". I would hope to do this before the standing committee which is now dealing with the question of an energy strategy for Canada. As to the monitoring mechanism in the future, again I have made it clear in the past, and I reaffirm right now, that it is my intention to bring a bill before the House of Commons dealing with the whole question of monitoring future cash flows.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): A short supplementary, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that we cannot get the results of the monitoring in 1977 regarding price increases which were granted in 1974, are we to assume that the monitoring for 1977 on the price increases that are going on this year will be received by the House in 1980?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

MANPOWER

GRANTS TO CONSTITUENCIES IN RESPECT OF MANPOWER MOBILITY

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. I gave him notice and he acted on one part of the question; I thank him for that. I confess that I am doing this so I can raise the matter at ten o'clock. Will the minister ask his officials to investigate the mix-up which resulted in a failure of his department to authorize a manpower mobility transfer grant resulting in extreme hardship to a constituent, Mr. Carl Champion, and his family.

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, given the individual situation as the hon. member has indicated, I did look into this particular case and found that where allegations were made against my department for being slow in acting, this particular individual moved to do something in 1971 and then proceeded to move across the country and did not come back until 1976. So it was a little difficult to move quickly on that particular matter. However, when the information did come to our attention we moved quickly and, naturally, used ministerial permission to give effect to what the hon. member was asking for. I am satisfied that, given the second problem, we can probably deal with that just as competently.

Mr. Fairweather: Ten o'clock.

NATIONAL REVENUE

ADVERTISING IN PERIODICALS—GOVERNMENT POSITION ON "NOT SUBSTANTIALLY THE SAME" PROVISIONS

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Revenue. In view of the fact that the Minister of National Revenue's predecessor, in order to get Bill C-58 past the Senate last July, agreed that he would bring in legislation at an early date which would define the "not substantially the same" provisions in the law relating to advertising in periodicals, would the minister indicate whether or not the government intends to keep that promise and, if so, what sort of formula is going to be followed to define whether or not a periodical's contents are "substantially the same" as those of another periodical?

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I will do my best to keep my predecessor's promise concerning the bill on the Canadian content of periodicals but I cannot say more about this to the House because it would involve a bill related to the budget.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

GUN CONTROL—RCMP INQUIRY INTO SALE OF FIREARMS AND AMMUNITION

Mr. Bob Brisco (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for either the Solicitor General or the Minister of Justice. In view of the fact that Bill C-83, the notorious gun control bill, died a merciful death in the last session of parliament, will the minister please advise why, subsequent to that event, the firearms and ammunition control system of the RCMP was, and is, making inquiries of retail outlets concerning firearms and ammunition sales, and are these inquiries still being conducted?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I will take notice of the hon. member's question and report further to him. I understand that in preparation for the possible passing of the legislation certain inquiries were made by the RCMP in order that they would be ready to implement the legislation had it been passed.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

PRIME MINISTER'S MEETING WITH PRESIDENT OF U.S.A.—DISCUSSIONS ON COMMUNICATIONS POLICY

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister, who has been getting a little news. It concerns his trip to Washington, which was less than a week ago but undoubtedly seems much longer to the Prime Minister. Did the Prime Minister have any discussions with the President on communications policy matters between the two countries and, if so, were any commitments given or agreements made?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it is so long ago that I am not quite sure I can remember.

Mr. Paproski: Oh, come on! This is Monday, not Friday.

Mr. Trudeau: We did cover a lot of subjects. I will have to check my memory and get in touch with the hon. member.

Mr. Nowlan: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate the Prime Minister's dilemma, because I was trying to get to him a little earlier last week when the subject was a little more current, and many things have happened. But memory has been transcribed into print, and one of the Prime Minister's answers on February 24, as reported at page 3371 of Hansard, in reply to a question, was that there were many areas other than the constitution which could be settled, such as administrative arrangements affecting social matters, immigration, and communications. I wonder whether the Prime Minister can tell us in fact what administrative arrangements are being considered or have been considered by the government, so that the question of national unity can be enhanced in the field of communications?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, in this particular area there is the very recent arrangement which the government of Canada signed with the government of Manitoba, which is a perfectly good example of an administrative arrangement within the framework of the present constitution. It satisfies the government of the province and obviously is acceptable to us. This was the fruit of long negotiation, and I congratulate the minister of communications for having conducted it very successfully.

STATISTICS CANADA

METHOD OF FORECASTING PRODUCTION AND REQUIREMENTS OF DAIRY INDUSTRY

Mr. John Wise (Elgin): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Last year the minister gave a very firm commitment to investigate the method used by StatCan, the thought and the purpose being to minimize or, hopefully, eliminate errors in forecasting our domestic needs, our current levels of production and future requirements in the dairy industry. I would like to ask the minister what progress he has made with reference to this investigation.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): As far as I remember, Mr. Speaker, the difficulties concerning these data have been discussed and settled by Statistics Canada and the Canadian Dairy Commission. However, if there is anything to add, I will check and tell the House.

AGRICULTURE

REPORTED MOVE TO CLOSE CANADA-U.S.A. BORDER TO IMPORTATION OF HERBICIDES AND PESTICIDES

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture. Since there is growing concern in farming areas of Canada that the government may move to close the Canada-United States border to herbicides and insecticides passing from the United States to Canada, and since the Minister of Agriculture has consulted with, I believe, four farm groups on the matter, may I ask the minister the outcome of his consultation with those groups and what they were asking the government to do; and if the government has made any decision whether or not to restrict the flow of herbicides and insecticides into Canada?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, no decision has been taken. We have met all the farm groups, as I said we would, and I think we will be making a decision shortly. Let me say that herbicides, insecticides, pesticides—or whatever you call them—will still be allowed to move into Canada freely, regardless of the decision we make.

Mr. Murta: A supplementary question. Since the minister appears sympathetic to the chemical companies, I should like to say to the minister that there will be strong opposition from farmers and also from members of the opposition if he tries to move to close the United States border in this regard.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD—POSSIBILITY OF ESTABLISHING WHEAT CARTEL WITH U.S.A.

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Agriculture with regard to the Canadian Wheat Board. Possibly he could answer it, in view of the absence of his colleague. Reports indicate that discussions are taking place between the United States and Canada to explore the possibility of establishing a wheat cartel on a similar basis as the oil cartel established by the OPEC countries. Can the minister say how far the discussions have gone, and whether a decision in principle has been made by the Canadian government to participate in a wheat cartel?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I have not had the opportunity to discuss with the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board what actually took place in Washington when he met the secretary of agriculture, Mr. Bergman. I look forward to discussing this matter with him at greater length. No decision has been taken at this time, but I would say that what I know of the new secretary of agriculture of the U.S.A. would lead me to say that he is making sure farmers will have the use of the programs that were announced in their election campaign, programs which are not very different from those of the Canadian Minister of Agriculture.

Mr. Epp: I have one supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I would like to ask the Minister of Agriculture how it is that he does not know the government of Canada has brought forward this idea. I find it strange that as Minister of Agriculture he does not know that. If such a wheat cartel is in fact formed, would this cartel be only between the U.S. and Canada, or is Canada thinking of expanding it to other wheat producing countries such as Argentina and Australia?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The question is hypothetical.

Mr. Gillies: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I should like to ask whether under Standing Order 41(2) the Minister of Finance might table the documentation between the government and the provinces with respect to the date of the termination of the incomes program, on the grounds that today in answering the question he referred to dates in that document. On the ground that such a document would be invaluable to all members of parliament in ascertaining the way in which these programs are advancing, I would use citation 159(2) of Beauchesne's as the ruling on it, and under 41(2) I would hope the minister can table it. I would think that Your Honour's ruling would depend upon whether or not the dates mentioned by the minister were a quotation.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am not in a position, from memory, to refer to the exact language used by the Minister of Finance in answering the question during the question period today. In order to give effect to the argument raised by the hon. member for Don Valley on a point of order I would have to be satisfied that within the precedents and the language of the Standing Order the minister had cited the document, as the language has been used in the past. Therefore, I would have to reserve my judgment until I have examined the answer to see if that was the case.

As I indicated when this point was raised in the recent past, the spirit of the rule is that if the minister has used the document to his advantage during either debate or discussion in the House, in fairness that document should be tabled so that all hon. members can use it. That has never been extended to the point of a minister making reference to a document or simply to its existence in answer to a question. But in this case I will have to examine the specific answer to see whether or not there might be any compulsion, within our precedents, upon the minister.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, if it will assist you, may I point out that I do not have the documents with me this afternoon, so obviously I did not cite from them in answering the question.

HAZARDOUS PRODUCTS ACT

AMENDMENT TO RECOGNIZE DANGER OF USING ALUMINUM WIRING IN DWELLINGS

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming) moved the first reading of Bill C-402, to amend the Hazardous Products Act (aluminum wiring).

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Peters: The purpose of this bill is to recognize the danger of using aluminum wiring in the construction of homes, apartments, hotels and rooming houses. There is growing evidence that when connected in traditional electrical outlets, aluminum wiring causes fires from which death has ensued to sleeping persons. Human life is precious, and any doubt with respect to the hazard of aluminum wiring should be resolved in favour of protecting human life.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC SERVICE—WAGE INCREASES FOR PHYSIOTHERAPISTS

Question No. 1,088—Mr. Howie:

1. Since January 1, 1976, have any wage increases for physiotherapists in the Public Service been approved by the Anti-Inflation Board and, if so, what rate increase was approved?

2. During the same period, were rate increases for physiotherapists in the New Brunswick civil service disapproved by the Anti-Inflation Board and, if so, what are the annual wages being paid in 1976 to (a) federal physiotherapists (b) New Brunswick physiotherapists?

Mr. Bob Kaplan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): 1. Yes. There are some 65 occupational and physical therapists in the Federal Public Service. A two-year agreement from January 1, 1976 to December 31, 1977 was subject to review by the AIB in June, 1976. A regional rate of pay structure was proposed with different rates of pay for the following regions: Maritimes, Quebec, Ontario, Yukon and Northwest Territories, Manitoba, Alberta and British Columbia. The group's compensation increases for both years were within the maximum permissible under the AIB regulations (i.e. 11.95 per cent in the first year and 8.55 per cent in the second year). In addition, however, the two parties to the agreement requested exclusion of payments made in both guideline years to react to both emphasized recruiting and retention difficulties. The parties argued the exclusion of these payments on the basis of Schedule C of the AIB Compensation regulations which deal, in part, with vacancy rates and recruiting plus retention difficulties. The AIB decision allowed the exclusion and approved the collective agreement as negotiated. In the Maritime Region the annual rate for the working level therapists is as follows: Effective December 29, 1975, $11,225 to $12,995; Effective June 28, 1976, $12,011 to $13,905; Effective December 27, 1976, $12,491 to $14,461; Effective June 27, 1977, $12,991 to $15,039.

2. During the same period an agreement for the New Brunswick Pharmacy, Mental and Physical Rehabilitation Group covering a period from March 1, 1975 to August 31, 1976 was received by the AIB. The agreement provided for a compensation increase of 29.91 per cent. This increase related to an arithmetic guideline of 14.09 per cent for the group's first guideline year. The parties could not support a historical relationship argument and did not present detailed information for exclusions on the same basis as the Federal Government therapists. The AIB decision was to allow the arithmetic guideline increase of 14.09 per cent for the first year. The parties have implemented a further 12 per cent increase for the second year from April 1, 1976 to March 31, 1977. The following rates of pay apply to the New Brunswick physiotherapists: April 1, 1976, $9,932 to $12,428.

FEDERAL MONEYS RECEIVED FROM AND TRANSFERRED TO THE PROVINCE OF QUEBEC

Question No. 1,143—Mr. Lawrence:

1. For the year (a) 1973 (b) 1974 (c) 1975, what was the total of government revenues emanating from the Province of Quebec?

[Mr. Goodale.]

2. For the same years, what was the total of government expenditures and transfer payments to the Province of Quebec and to residents of the Province?

Mr. Bob Kaplan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): 1. At the present time the information requested is not available for the Province of Quebec or for any other province.

2. At the present time the information requested is not available for the Province of Quebec or for any other province. However, a considerable amount of information concerning federal expenditures by province is available in section 34 of Volume II of the Public Accounts of Canada for each year.

EQUALIZATION PAYMENTS

Question No. 1,163—Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse):

1. For the year (a) 1973-74 (b) 1974-75 (c) 1975-76 did the government make any equalization payments and, if so, in what amounts and to which provinces in each case?

2. For the same years, did the government make any payments to the provinces under its various programmes and, if so (a) in what amounts to each province (b) under which programmes and in what amounts in each case?

Mr. Bob Kaplan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): 1. The federal government made equalization payments to seven provinces in respect of each of the fiscal years 1973-74, 1974-75 and 1975-76. The payments were as follows:

	Amount of Payment
Province	1973-74 (final)*	1974-75 (final)*	1975-76 (subject to adjustments)
	$'000	$'000	$'000
Newfoundland	157,583	173,759	201,393
Prince Edward Island	33,745	43,513	49,025
Nova Scotia	184,890	230,760	258,762
New Brunswick	148,548	173,383	197,612
Quebec	728,170	908,188	1,000,310
Manitoba	111,964	124,166	145,415
Saskatchewan	117,097	53,921	69,412
Total	1,481,997	1,707,690	1,921,929

*Subject to adjustment in respect of population change following completion of 1976 census.

2. Complete information is not available. However, a comprehensive list of federal payments to provinces is set out in the Public Accounts of Canada for each fiscal year. See section 34 of Volume II of the Public Accounts of Canada for 1973-74, 1974-75 and 1975-76.

PAYMENTS UNDER THE MUNICIPAL GRANTS ACT

Question No. 1,234—Mr. Herbert:

1. By province, what amount has been paid under the Municipal Grants Act in each of the past five years?

2. Are any payments presently being contested and, if so (a) which ones (b) for what reasons?

Mr. Bob Kaplan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): 1. See statement following:

2. Within the context of the discretionary nature of payments under the Municipal Grants Act, discussions are held with those municipalities concerned with respect to issues of (a) eligibility and (b) amounts of grant.

CON-ACT PROGRAMMES

Question No. 1,263—Mr. Stanfield:

Has the Department of the Solicitor General received a community based residential centre application or request from the programme known as CON-ACT Programs and, if so, is the Department considering this application and, if not, for what reason?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): By Canadian Penitentiary Service and the National Parole Service: Yes. However, after due consideration, this application was not approved for the following reasons: (a) The CON-ACT Program authorities did not have adequate facilities to accommodate the parolees. (b) The department has a contractual agreement with the Halifax YMCA for the provision of basic accommodation and meals for the members of the group who are granted day parole. (c) The original proposal did not meet the minimum standards for the establishment of a community residential centre as specified by the National Parole Service.

NATIONAL DEFENCE—MANPOWER, STRENGTH OF SERVICES SINCE 1965

Question No. 1,450—Mr. McKinnon:

1. What was the strength of each of the three services on January 1, 1965?

2. What was the strength of each of the three elements (sea, land and air) in the Canadian Armed Forces on December 1, 1976?

3. What was the strength, military and civilian of National Defence Headquarters on (a) January 1, 1965 (b) December 1, 1975 (c) December 1, 1976?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of National Defence): 1. Navy, 19,613; Army, 46,579; Air Force, 48,173.

2. Only those personnel who were enrolled in the Forces prior to February 1, 1968 can be identified by their former services elements. Personnel who enrolled in the unified Canadian Forces after 1 Feb., 1968 are not assigned to a specific single service element, but are assigned classifications (officers) or trades (men). Some of these classifications/trades are readily identifiable i.e. artillery man, infantry man, etc., but the total of the 90 odd classifications/trades would not give meaningful data in terms of sea, land and air elements. The Canadian Forces are organized on the basis of functional commands and the effective strength by functional commands as of November 30, 1976 is presented below: Mobile Command, 17,907; Air Command, 22,856; Maritime Command, 10,210; National Defence HQ, Canadian Forces Communication Command, Canadian Forces Training System, Canadian Forces Europe, Elements such as workshops, supply depots, military colleges, staff colleges, recruiting units, medical centres, project teams, Liaison centres (London and Washington), military attachés, NORAD personnel, standardization groups, etc., which report to NDHQ, 27,127; Total, 78,100.

3. (a) Military, 3,232; Civilian, 4,402; (b) Military, 3,100; Civilian, 4,169; (c) Military, 3,032; Civilian, 3,892.

POST OFFICE—FIRST-CLASS MAIL FROM THE UNITED KINGDOM

Question No. 1,467—Mr. McKinnon:

1. Is first-class mail from the United Kingdom, in particular, the blue letter forms, treated as second-class mail in the Vancouver Post Office?

2. Does such mail receive a lower priority than domestic first-class mail?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Postmaster General): 1. No.

2. No.

NATIONAL DEFENCE—EQUIPMENT CONTRACT FOR GASMASKS

Question No. 1,513—Mr. McKinnon:

1. Were masks and mask carriers contracted for by the Department of National Defence in December 1976 at a price of $238,654 and, if so, what kind?

2. On what date will the masks be delivered?

3. How many masks are to be produced?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of National Defence): 1. A contract for a quantity of 29 components used in the assembly of C-3 Chemical Biological Masks was let in December, 1976, at a cost of $243,523.20.

2. Delivery is to commence in February, 1977 and be completed by March 31, 1977.

3. Seventeen thousand eight hundred.

NATIONAL DEFENCE—MANPOWER STRENGTH FROM MILITIA AND NUMBER FROM NEW BRUNSWICK

Question No. 1,514—Mr. Howie:

As of January 1 (a) 1976 (b) 1975 (c) 1974, how many persons were members of the Canadian Militia and how many were from New Brunswick?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of National Defence):

	Canadian Militia Strength	New Brunswick Militia Strength
(a)	15,225	903
(b)	14,166	953
(c)	13,200	881

NATIONAL DEFENCE—EMPLOYEES OBTAINED FROM PRIVATE EMPLOYMENT AGENCIES, 1975-1976

Question No. 1,546—Mr. McKenzie:

1. Has the Department of National Defence obtained (a) part-time (b) full-time employees from private employment agencies in (i) British Columbia (ii) Alberta (iii) Saskatchewan (iv) Manitoba (v) Ontario (vi) Quebec (vii) New Brunswick (viii) Nova Scotia (ix) Prince Edward Island (x) Newfoundland and, if so, in each case, how many?

2. Are such employees paid from supplementary estimates and, if not, from what estimates are they paid?

3. By province, what was the (a) average hourly rate paid to employment agencies (b) average hourly rate paid to employees (c) total amount paid by the Department in (i) 1975 (ii) 1976?

[Mr. Danson.]

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of National Defence): 1. No.

2 and 3. Not applicable.

COLLECTION OF SALES TAX BY ROYAL CANADIAN MINT

Question No. 1,640—Mr. Jones:

1. Does the Royal Canadian Mint charge and collect sales tax for those provinces which have such a tax and, if so, by what authority?

2. Are the Provinces of Quebec and Prince Edward Island exempt and, if so, for what reason?

3. Does this provision apply to the purchase of coins and other items commemorating the 25th anniversary of the accession to the Throne of Queen Elizabeth II?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): 1. The collection and remittance of provincial retail sales taxes are governed by the respective Provincial Retail Sales Tax Acts. The Royal Canadian Mint numismatic products, when sold for an amount in excess of face value, are subject to a provincial retail sales tax in the following provinces at the rates prescribed in the respective Provincial Retail Sales Tax Acts: British Columbia, 7 per cent of selling price; Manitoba, 5 per cent of selling price; Saskatchewan, 5 per cent of selling price; New Brunswick, 8 per cent of selling price; Nova Scotia, 8 per cent of selling price; Newfoundland, 10 per cent of selling price; Ontario, 7 per cent of selling price. Alberta, Yukon and Northwest Territories do not impose a retail sales tax. It follows, therefore, that the Royal Canadian Mint collects and remits provincial retail sales taxes in accordance with the above.

2. The Provinces of Quebec and Prince Edward Island have advised at the time of registration that Royal Canadian Mint numismatic products are exempt from provincial sales tax in these provinces. No specific reason was mentioned.

3. This provision applies to all coins (when sold for an amount in excess of face value) and other items commemorating the 25th anniversary of the accession to the Throne of Queen Elizabeth II. In so far as the Royal Canadian Mint products are concerned, yes.

NATIONAL DEFENCE—STUDENT SUMMER EMPLOYMENT IN CANADA AND NEW BRUNSWICK, 1976

Question No. 1,715—Mr. Howie:

For the year 1976, did the Department of National Defence have any student summer employment programmes in (a) Canada (b) New Brunswick and, if so, in each case (i) what were they (ii) how many persons were given direct summer employment and what were the wages (iii) what was the cost?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of National Defence): (a) and (b) Yes. The program, the number of persons who were given direct summer employment, the payroll and the overhead costs are given below:

	Canada			New Brunswick
	Number Employed	Payroll	Operations Costs[1]	Number Employed	Payroll	Operations Costs
Cadet Training	973	$ 812,968	$887,032	70	$ 61,740	Not Available
Reserve Training	4,233	4,239,927	660,073	298	324,149	Not Available
Community Assistance	922	920,566	31,434	69	65,011	Not Available

NOTE: [1] Overhead costs consist of transportation, rations and clothing and equipment.

ESTABLISHMENT OF BRANCH IN MONCTON, N.B.

Question No. 1,820—Mr. Jones:

Is consideration being given to establishing a branch of the Royal Canadian Mint in Moncton, New Brunswick and, if so, on what date?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): No.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

[English]

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, if question No. 215 could be made an order for return, this return would be tabled immediately. Once again, the reason for answering in this way is the lengthy and detailed nature of the answer.

AIB—PERSONNEL

Question No. 215—Mr. Orlikow:

1. Since January 1, 1976, how many persons, by public service classification, were employed by the Anti-Inflation Board and in what capacity?

2. Since March 1, 1976, by public service classification, how many persons were employed by the Anti-Inflation Board and in what cities?

3. Does the Anti-Inflation Board have regional offices and, if so (a) in what locations (b) on what date was each opened?

4. Does the Anti-Inflation Board rent premises and, if so, in each case (a) in what location (b) who is the lessor (c) what is the monthly rent (d) what rent was paid by the previous tenant?

Return tabled.

[English]

Mr. Goodale: I ask, Mr. Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I should like to inquire about question No. 1,304. It is a starred question which has been on the order paper since December 10 last, and it is a very important one. Starred questions are supposed to receive prompt attention. The parliamentary secretary gave a partial verbal reply to the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra the other day, so obviously the information is available. The question seeks information on the loss of revenue from depreciated stamp sales in the United States.

Mr. Goodale: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member indicates that starred questions should receive particular attention. I can assure him that all questions on the order paper receive close and careful attention. I took particular note of that question and will try to secure an answer as quickly as possible. But it bears repeating that the rate of return of answers in this session has been very high indeed.

Mr. McKinnon: Mr. Speaker, I have the same type of point of order. It is with regard to question No. 1,040 which has been on the order paper since November 10 last in my name and has not yet been answered. It is very similar to a question I put in December which has been answered. These questions are on a series of payments being made to Lockheed on the LRPA contract. I am puzzled why the one in December could have been answered but not the one in November. I fear there has been an oversight, and I would like to have this question answered as soon as possible.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Mr. Peters: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order relating to the question put just now when it was asked whether the questions would be allowed to stand. Does that require my consent? I think the question is archaic and we should change its form. I assume it does not need unanimous consent to stand them. If it does, then I am prepared to withhold it and go on with questions. In raising this point of order I suggest that we change the procedure which is being followed, because I do not think it means anything.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Timiskaming has raised an interesting point of order. There are two or three aspects of the routine proceedings that I have raised with representatives of the parties in respect of the manner in which we call routine proceedings each day. For example, we call government notices of motions and we call first reading of Senate public bills every day, yet we do not take advantage of the two items in routine proceedings more than two or three times a year. I wonder about the necessity of continuing to call them.

In fact, in respect of the business of standing questions, the Standing Order is phrased in such a way as to indicate that with the consent of the government the remaining questions can be allowed to stand. It would appear to be something that the government is consenting to. In fact, the consent to the standing of the remaining questions is for the benefit of hon. members who put the questions on the order paper, because if we do not stand them every day presumably they will disappear from the order paper if not answered and will have to be refiled. To a certain extent this is for the convenience of those who have questions outstanding. However, I will take the remarks of the hon. member under advisement to see if there is not some better way.

● (1510)

Mr. McKenzie: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I was waiting to see if any starred questions would be answered today. But they were not. I placed a starred question on the order paper on January 24. It was a very simple question; I asked whether the government has purchased a Gulfstream-2 executive jet. The answer to that question could be obtained in one hour, and I would appreciate having an answer as soon as possible.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

EMPLOYMENT AND IMMIGRATION REORGANIZATION ACT

MEASURE TO ESTABLISH DEPARTMENT OF EMPLOYMENT AND IMMIGRATION, ETC.

The House resumed, from Friday, February 25, consideration of the motion of Mr. Cullen that Bill C-27, to establish the department of employment and immigration, the Canada employment and immigration commission and the Canada employment and immigration advisory council, to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971, and to amend certain other statutes in consequence thereof, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration.

Mr. Alex Patterson (Fraser Valley East): Mr. Speaker, although the government has not indicated any real interest in or concern about solving the problems of unemployment in Canada, I think we have to say that everyone in this House is concerned. It is impossible to think of many thousands and possibly close to a million people of out of work who are unable to provide for their own needs or the needs of their families without feeling some concern and sympathy for them. However, I believe that as we look at this matter of unemployment today—and we are dealing with this within the context of the Unemployment Insurance Act—everyone should have an opportunity to voice his or her views and opinions. Then the government should really get down to the business of analysing the problem and analysing programs which are suggested to meet this problem and bring some remedial action to bear upon it.

As four o'clock came last Friday afternoon and brought to a close my remarks, I indicated that I was going to propose several simple measures which we believe will assist in solving this problem. I do not believe there is any instant solution but I believe there are some steps which can be taken to assist us in finding some solutions to the problem. I believe it is necessary to consider productivity in our country. It seems as if the government has accepted as a fact of economic life a growth target of zero in our gross national product. This question has been raised on a number of occasions but the government has failed to respond to it adequately. It has failed to indicate its concern and it has not indicated in any way how it intends to deal with this matter. In a speech made in the Yukon territory back on July 9, 1976, my leader made this statement:

> We have had virtually no economic growth for two years in this country. That's because the Trudeau government believes the premise—and it's a false premise—that economic growth will feed inflation. I believe, rather, that sound economic growth is the only long-term solution to runaway inflation.

Over the weekend I read some articles with regard to this matter. I found one of them in the Ottawa Journal of February 22 under the heading "Life gets harder for Canadian entrepreneurs". The article has to do with the provision of employment opportunities through the expansion of business enterprises. It is datelined Calgary, and it reads:

> The day of the entrepreneur is fading rapidly, particularly in Canada, says the president of a recently-formed venture capital investment company.
> Dwindling funds and a lack of tax concessions make it tough to be an entrepreneur, Gerald Knowlton, founder of Congress Resources Ltd., said in an interview.

Further on the article reads:

> He said the amount of capital available for entrepreneurial activities in Canada is growing smaller and that medium-sized ventures are the first to feel the pinch.
> "The very large operations can go to world money markets for funding and the very small operations can approach relatives and friends to get started. The medium-sized projects just don't fit into any category."

This illustrates the problem business is encountering in endeavours to expand operations and provide job opportunities for the Canadian people. If the government cannot see its way clear to doing something in this respect, we will continue to face this serious problem. Along the same vein, another article, dated Saturday, February 26, is found in the Ottawa Journal. In that article, Mr. Jay G. Scott made this statement:

> A solid and expanding Canadian economy is required if meaningful employment is to be provided for a rapidly growing and better educated work force.

I could give other quotations but I think these are sufficient to show that we cannot accept the zero growth concept. As outlined by my leader, we in the Conservative party believe that the target should be in the range of 5 per cent. Our national economy simply cannot survive if the government accepts anything less.

My second suggestion is that there be a gradual reduction in the government's share of our total national income and a reduction of its percentage share of the gross national product. The fact that this government's spending has been excessive in the last ten years has been placed on the record. Federal government spending has quadrupled. It took 100 years for the federal government to reach a budget level of approximately $10 billion in 1967. That figure doubled in the following three years, and doubled again in the next four years to a total of some $42 billion last year. When governments take that much out of the economy, they certainly do not leave very much for the other sectors of the economy to find solutions to the problems which are facing us at the present time. I could cite other figures but I think the figures I have cited sufficiently indicate that we are in serious trouble with regard to unemployment because of the action, or lack of action, of the federal government.

We believe, as well, that our educational and retraining system must reflect more closely the manpower needs of the country. This relates directly to the issue before us. In this respect I would like to point out that the Senate committee report on Canada Manpower, published some five months ago, said that employers see the Manpower centres, and I quote—

Chiefly as a source of unskilled labour—very few regard the Manpower service as place to recruit highly skilled, managerial or professional employees.

The Department of Manpower and Immigration is expected to spend a total of about $833 million this fiscal year. The money is there and it is being spent. However, because of confused government priorities much of it is being misused and, indeed, wasted. Even in the peak years of Manpower spending in 1972-73 only 32 per cent of the Manpower budget went into direct job creation. Most of the rest went, and even today goes, into training and into Manpower centres even though the Canada Manpower centres are known to have an extremely poor placement record and the training all too often equips people for jobs that do not even exist on the labour market. The government has more than adequate staff, I believe, and more than adequate resource personnel to forecast what will happen in the economy and to take corrective action. There are at the present time three or four quite prestigious forecasting institutions that are actually doing that job. I believe the government would do well to avail themselves of this material in order to lay out a program that will provide a solution and reduce the unemployment rate we face today.

Bill C-27 proposes to implement the integration of the Unemployment Insurance Commission and the Department of Manpower and Immigration to become the Canada employment and immigration commission. This is something we have been looking forward to. In fact, we never agreed with the department being split up when that was done some years ago. It did not make sense to separate a department concerned with finding jobs from the agency concerned with paying unemployment benefits—unless, of course, the Unemployment Insurance Commission were to become mainly an agency for the redistribution of income. I suspect this is the reason the government made the change some years ago.

We have felt for some time that too easy entrance into the program has had an unfortunate effect on the work ethic in Canada. We have felt, and have been advocating, that the qualifying period for unemployment insurance benefits should be increased from eight weeks to 12 weeks, recognizing, however, the regional inequalities of job opportunities. We are advocating, as well, that the governor in council maintain the right to make special provisions in areas of extremely high and chronic unemployment such as, for instance, Newfoundland and the maritimes. My colleague, the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander), gave notice of the amendment he intends to move on behalf of our party covering this situation.

An overhaul and simplification of the benefit structure is good news as well. Presently the regulations are, to my mind, unnecessarily complicated, as evidence by the number of people who contact their member of parliament about unemployment insurance claims. Many are completely baffled by the system, and even after their claim has been processed they are not sure why they are receiving benefits other than knowing that they paid into the plan for so many years. If that is the way it is looked upon by those receiving benefits, how much more difficult is it to explain to those who do not qualify for benefits why they are in that situation?

We all know that just because a person pays into the unemployment insurance scheme for ten or 20 years that does not ensure he can claim benefits for that length of time. The plain fact is that many people look upon unemployment insurance as a pension or retirement plan of some sort. I hope the new benefit structure and new procedures will emphasize the fact that this is an insurance plan and not welfare, pension or some other form of redistribution of income. On a number of occasions I have raised the point, as have others, that in many instances it seems to be too easy to receive benefits under the unemployment insurance program. But the other day I came across an article in a newspaper that pointed out that department was going to continue searching the records to make sure those who are receiving benefits under the plan are justified in doing so. I believe that is as it should be.

A great many people are bothered, however, that some people receive unemployment insurance benefits for a long period of time after perhaps working only a short while, yet others who have been working for many years and paying into the scheme are cut off after receiving three or four months of benefits. That situation should be looked into, Mr. Speaker. I can give one instance right on point. I received a communication from a lady who had worked in the same place for about 13 years, paying unemployment insurance premiums. The shopping centre where she was working was destroyed by fire. She was given about three weeks to find alternate employment. This lady was possibly over 50 years of age. Although she had been working for many years, she did not own a car and walked to work. She had to try to find alternate employment at least until the shopping centre was rebuilt. After three weeks she was told that was long enough to find alternate employment and she was cut off benefits even though she had tried in other areas as well to find work. In fact, she went to a major community about 30 miles away and made inquiries. Everywhere she went she was told there was a list of people ahead of her and there did not seem to be any possibility of work.

It seems as though these people are forced to journey back and forth considerable distances to try to find employment in other communities, yet the stores in those communities have lists of local people also seeking employment. If they were to hire the one from out of town it would leave someone in their own community unemployed. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that in some of these instances more careful consideration ought to be given at least to those in the upper age bracket so that they can bridge the gap between the cessation of employment and re-employment perhaps in the same situation in the same locality—perhaps even with the same company that had to lay them off because of unfortunate circumstances. We are in favour of removing from the rolls those who are not qualified and should not receive assistance, but I believe attention should be given to people facing impossible obstacles.

Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to make these comments. Enough has been said to point out that I am in favour of the action being taken, but there are some areas where the government ought to make adjustments and take remedial action.

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, I approach this debate with a rather jaundiced eye and with mixed feelings.

An hon. Member: And with mixed metaphors.

Mr. Blackburn: It seems to me that in this country unemployment insurance has been terribly misinterpreted by those who have never experienced the process. Our greatest critics inside and outside the House—mainly outside—have been those who had job security and never had to enter an unemployment insurance office. As a practising politician—

● (1530)

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Are you still practising?

Mr. Blackburn: Yes, still practising. To repeat, when I go home on weekends and sit in my office between nine o'clock and three p.m., I find that half the people coming to me have unemployment insurance problems. One must endure the emotional spectacle of watching a man in his fifties crying because his unemployment insurance has run out and he must fall back on welfare. People like that, through no fault of their own, are unemployed. They do not control the economy; they do not have the economic input of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald), other cabinet ministers, or our captains of industry. Some of these people remain unemployed for several months, sometimes for as long as one or two years. Such unemployment leads to tremendous family conflict and personal depression—depression which needs medical treatment.

The government's proposals as embodied in this bill puzzle me. Why, when more people are out of work in this country than at any time since the great depression, does the government want to tighten up unemployment insurance? Why is it changing the qualifying period? There is no logic to it. As far as I am concerned, it is immoral. Neither the government nor industry can move the economy forward. Approximately one million people are out of work, and the government chooses this very time to tighten unemployment insurance. Why? I suggest that the government is bending to the wish of a minority of rednecks, is bending the wishes of people who don't know the first thing about unemployment. They have picked out one or two examples in their communities to show that somebody has been caught ripping off the UIC fund. They therefore think that a great minority of recipients, or even the majority, are cheating on UIC. Once and for all, let us put that myth to rest.

On February 1, 1977, the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) tried to convey desperately to this House and the country that Canada has the most advanced employment and job insurance programs in the world. Although official figures show 889,000 people as being unemployed, the minister was able to say with a straight face and serious-minded mien that Manpower services generally, as well as the newer job-creation programs, have been greatly strengthened and matured in the past ten years. After hearing this, someone was led to comment that if we have much more of this kind of strength and maturity we shall most likely be doomed.

I want to concentrate on two main aspects of the bill, the integration of the Department of Manpower and Immigration and the Unemployment Insurance Commission, and the charges in entrance requirements which must be met if one is to obtain benefits under the unemployment insurance scheme. I touched on the latter point briefly in my opening remarks. I wish to review these changes within the context of our present economic situation and then assess the effect of the proposals on those presently unemployed and on others who will no doubt be uprooted from their jobs in the months to come.

As various spokesmen have said, our number one economic problem in Canada is unemployment. My party has been stressing this point for the past two years. Finally, in the past few months the government has begun to recognize that employment is our number one problem. Official figures published by Statistics Canada show that more than 889,000 men and women in this country are now unemployed. I stress "official" figures because, as my leader showed, those figures do not take into account the hidden unemployed, those who have simply given up looking for non-existent jobs. They are the hidden unemployed. I submit that there are at least 450,000 people among the hidden unemployed, and if you add their numbers to the official figure the real unemployment rate rises to approximately 11 per cent. That is a disgustingly large figure for this country.

In my riding, Brant, Canada Manpower officials recently listed 4,261 people as unemployed. That was the last figure available, in January. At the same time there were 106 job vacancies listed in my constituency which has a population of over 100,000. In all the country there are only 42,000 job vacancies at present. This means that if every job vacancy were filled, 889,000 people would still remain out of work. If you add to that number the number of the hidden unemployed, you can see that more than one million people altogether would be out of work in this country. At present more than one million individuals in this country have no recourse except apply for unemployment insurance. Their livelihood depends on it. Canadians have every right to ask why, in this rich country, this is allowed to happen. The answer is straightforward: the government does not care any more. If it did, the Minister of Finance would not wait until April before introducing a new budget.

Mr. Benjamin: It's Herbert Hoover's policies all over again.

Mr. Blackburn: The magnitude of our unemployment, aside from the misery it is inflicting on our people, is costing Canadians millions of dollars in lost productivity and extra money spent on social assistance programs. The social services office in the city of Brantford, Ontario, is currently handling between 25 and 30 requests for assistance a day. I am often accused of coming from the "golden horse shoe" area where everybody is a millionaire or worth at least half a million dollars. I am cataloguing the situation in Brantford because it is one of the relatively wealthy parts of Canada. I am informed that the number of out-of-province requests is increasing as well. The administrator of the social services office in my constituency stated that last year $33,000 was spent assisting people who had moved to Brant county from other provinces looking for work. Those people had come from provinces where unemployment exceeded 15 per cent. They do not want hand-outs. They move into the area in the hope of finding employment. They do not want make-work programs which last for three months or even six months. They want jobs on which they can depend. Unfortunately, the job situation is disastrous not only in my constituency, but right across the country.

Further, forecasts for the months to come are gloomy. The consensus among economists is that the unemployment situation will worsen before it gets better. Referring again to my own constituency, local businessmen do not expect any improvement in the unemployment situation for the coming year, this at a time when it is being rumoured that there might be an election within the next few months. This is rather interesting.

● (1540)

An hon. Member: Are you ready?

Mr. Blackburn: We are, but you sure as heck aren't. It is against this background that we should examine this bill. The minister, in his preamble during debate on this bill, would have us believe that everything is coming up roses. Like his predecessor, he is very conversant with the services his department renders. The minister and his colleagues take great pride in the unemployment insurance scheme we have in this country. Like his predecessor, the minister is of the opinion that unemployment is not really a serious problem because our unemployment insurance scheme relieves the unemployed of the worst financial hardships that used to go with the loss of a job.

Possibly that is the reason this government has totally neglected the underlying problem that job opportunities were not, and are not, developing fast enough to keep pace with the growth of the labour force. The minister is shaking his head. Why, then, do we have nearly a million people out of work? Answer that. Instead of spending its time developing policies which would create more jobs and get people off unemployment insurance, this government is preoccupied with possible abuses of the insurance scheme. Dealing with those very few people who abuse the unemployment insurance system during this period of high unemployment shows that the government has a somewhat warped sense of priorities. This is an affront to all those who are legitimately receiving payments as a result of something totally beyond their control.

As W. A. Wilson stated in an article in the Montreal Star:

> For all the fears that the insurance system has been exploited, human beings are by nature active, and for most men and women, this means that they work and indeed want to work.

Mr. Wilson added something else which I want to stress especially to some members to my right. He said:

> The maximum benefits from UIC are generous enough in terms of keeping the wolf from the door, but they must seem small to a wage earner who becomes unemployed and finds the payments on his automobile or television set do not fit in to his reduced income.

This reduced income comes about overnight. We talk about an average pay-out of $94 a week. What about the emotional effect on the breadwinner, the head of the family, going from $200 a week down to $94 a week? We still hear people say that that person would rather get $94 a week and do nothing than the $200 he was getting while gainfully employed. That is a psychological jam which some people in this country—indeed, a few in this House—have that I do not understand. According to recent statistics, and I am repeating myself here, the average pay-out is $94.56. That was as of November, 1976—just a few months ago.

This leads me to discuss the main purpose of Bill C-27, which is to change the entrance requirements for unemployment insurance benefits. The minister said in the House that the main reasons for changing the entrance requirements were that the present system provides too many people with a disincentive to work, that eight to 11-weekers are mainly individuals without dependants, young, or secondary earners and for that reason, following the minister's logic, they really do not require financial assitance. Furthermore, the current entrance requirements reinforce unstable work patterns. I believe that is a quote from the minister's speech. I want to deal with each of these arguments in turn.

The view that the present unemployment system is a disincentive to work is not novel. The only problem with this view is that it is not supported by facts. Even the eight weeks of steady work needed to qualify for unemployment insurance benefits can be hard to come by when job seekers outnumber jobs by almost 20 to one. The minister does not understand or, even worse, does not know that in many parts of this country it is extremely difficult, if not impossible, to get even eight weeks of work. At least the former minister, despite his shortcomings, with respect to this aspect of unemployment insurance acknowledged that increasing the qualifying period was not the way to tighten up the unemployment insurance system. In May, 1975—and that is not a generation ago—the former minister had this to say about the qualifying period, and I quote from his statement in the House:

> —if you examine where those short term attachment people are, you will find that they coincide with areas of this country that have the more chronic conditions of high unemployment—

He went on to say, as was pointed out by those members of my party who were on a fact-finding trip to Atlantic Canada:

—they occur in Quebec and the Atlantic provinces to a higher degree because the conditions of disparity there are such that people get marginal jobs which are almost coincidental with short term attachment jobs—

The minister mentioned the young as those who would probably lose out as a result of this change. I suppose he is suggesting young people in this country have no incentive to work. If he cared to examine the present situation, he would realize that the young do want to work. Many university graduates are accepting menial jobs and are accepting positions which underemploy them. But the basic fact remains: There are about 387,000 unemployed between the ages of 15 and 24 and they, along with the over-25 group are currently scrambling for the some 41,000 jobs that are available in Canada. Instead of creating satisfying, fulfilling jobs for these people, the minister simply eliminates many from unemployment insurance rolls. That is what will happen if this bill passes.

The other group affected by this change is secondary earners, many of whom are housewives. We are led to believe that these individuals do not really need financial assistance; they do not need to work. This is sheer nonsense, and the minister knows it. The Minister of Finance, during debate on the income tax bill, stated that the average income in Canada in 1975 was $16,232. That average income was derived in most cases as a result of two or more people working in the family. It has become an economic necessity over the past ten years for both spouses to earn an income in order to make ends meet. Finally, it was suggested that the current entrance requirements reinforce unstable work patterns.

I would ask, Mr. Speaker, what are the effects of prolonged joblessness? Does this government even consider the frustration, the deteriorating morale caused by lengthy idleness? What, for that matter, are the effects of temporary jobs? I refer here to the type of jobs created by the minister's employment strategy. Make-work programs may have short-term social benefits, but as the Economic Council of Canada pointed out last year they can also have a debilitating long-run effect. Make-work programs such as LIP and Canada Works, Young Canada Works, and so on, do not and were never intended to provide permanent employment. As many of us know, having been involved with the LIP program, the main dissatisfaction among LIP workers is the lack of job security. This is the very thing we should be trying to eliminate in this country. We should be providing job security, not insecurity.

We know, from studies carried out, that programs such as LIP do not contribute a significant stepping-stone to regular employment for unemployed, marginal or poor workers. Rather, for a substantial majority of participants in make-work projects the job constitutes a temporary source of employment income, to be followed by unemployment, labour force withdrawal, another make-work project, social assistance or a combination thereof. They get themselves into a vicious circle. They go on a LIP project. They are there for six months. The project terminates and they are thrown back on the labour market. They go through the process of seeking employment. They draw unemployment insurance benefits. They carry out an active job search. Before they know it, they are called upon by some person who was lucky enough to get a grant for a LIP program. "How would you like to come back?" The man answers, "Well, I have just got on unemployment insurance, so why should I get off unemployment insurance and go back to LIP?" He is talked into it, and he goes back to LIP. He works another three or four months and the same thing happens again under that program.

Hon. members opposite know what happens in practice as opposed to what happens in law. These people get into a cycle and they find themselves asking, at the age of 20, 40 or 50, "I do not have a permanent livelihood ahead of me; I am going from one job-creation program to another; there is no permanent aspect about what I am doing." I wonder how many of us around this place would feel if we knew we had no future at all. I am not talking about being defeated, but suppose we knew there was nothing there of substance for us should we be defeated in politics, or should we decide to resign, except the unemployment insurance fund, even though we are not entitled to it? I wonder how such a situation would affect us. I am not saying we are a special group in this country. We are citizens in the same way as everyone else. But would it affect the way we legislate? At times we tend to forget there are a lot of people outside the House who depend upon us for a reasonably happy and secure future. I fear that these make-work projects are becoming a permanent fixture under this government. No longer is permanent employment a goal. I strongly urge the minister to determine what kind of work patterns are being reinforced by this binge of make-work projects.

To conclude my remarks on the proposed changes in the entrance requirements I should, again, like to quote the former minister of manpower and immigration. Speaking on the qualifying period, he said:

I think it is a bit of a red herring. I think there are other areas in the act which have to be tidied up, areas which are far more significant than the favourite whipping boy of the short work claimant.

That is what the former minister said about a year ago. Now everything has changed drastically. These are my sentiments. I do not support these changes which would penalize individuals for something which is entirely out of their control. If a person does not want to work, don't give him anything. That is his choice, as I said at the beginning of my remarks. The vast majority of those who are unemployed today are people who have no control over the economy or over the business decisions of the various factories or institutions in which they work. They have no control over politics, either, except when there is an election.

At the same time, I cannot support the amendment introduced by the Conservatives which would allow for selective reduction in the qualifying period from 12 to eight weeks. It is obvious that the party to my right introduced this amendment not on the basis of known fact but, rather, on the basis of the number of votes to be gained. They do not care about the welfare of the citizens of this country. This was shown by the way they voted on the tax bill on February 14, only a few days ago. It has also been shown in the course of the debate on the bill we are presently considering. On February 2, the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp) commended the government for bringing in the 12-week qualifying period. As far as he is concerned, unemployment insurance is a means of getting something for nothing. His colleague from St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) said on the same day that this was not the time to tamper with the provisions of the act in such a way as to increase the qualifying period from eight to 12 weeks. In typical Conservative fashion, members to my right have straddled the fence and opted for selective reductions in the qualifying period.

Obviously, this was a device for gaining support in those areas of the maritimes where unemployment is so high and where it is difficult to get a job for five or six weeks, let alone for eight or 12 weeks. That is the kind of politicking I do not like. We are all Canadians, and we should all be treated equally and do everything possible to hold the country together in a positive way. When you start making changes to suit various areas of the country, you are just putting another nail into the coffin of the country and dividing it more than it is now.

When I came here in 1971, this country was not too badly divided. When the present Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) was elected in 1968 there was not one Parti Québécois member elected to the legislative assembly in Quebec. Look at the situation today. After nine or ten years during which the present government has been in office we have a bitterly divided country. It is not just Quebec. We have western alienation—Alberta, British Columbia and the prairies. Yes, and Ontario too; northern Ontario. I am not blaming the Prime Minister entirely for this, but I hope he does not go on one more of those emotional binges he went on in 1968 and try to tell the people of Canada that he is the only federal leader who can keep the country together, when the country today is more divided than when he was elected nine years ago.

An hon. Member: Disgraceful.

Mr. MacFarlane: What have you guys been doing?

Mr. Blackburn: We have not been trying to divide the country.

Mrs. Campagnolo: You are doing it right now.

Mr. Blackburn: I see I am getting a little rise out of members opposite. They are being a little sensitive.

Mr. MacFarlane: Sensible, you mean.

Mr. Blackburn: They are hustling to get to the ballot boxes because they have to send their leader out of the country to make a half decent speech.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order. I would ask the hon. member to get back to the bill.

Mr. Blackburn: I appreciate your advice, Mr. Speaker, and will do so. If the Conservative amendment were to be passed we would have a situation whereby an individual unemployed in Steinbach, Manitoba, would not be entitled to benefits, whereas someone in St. John's East would be. I have come to accept this kind of thinking from the government benches, but it now appears as though the Conservatives are competing with the government to see who can waffle the most on any issue.

● (1600)

I should now like to turn to the subject of integration. In a period of our economic history where close to 8 per cent or more of our population is out of work, it is ironic that the minister is now going to establish a new department of employment and immigration. I have to agree that that is the power of positive thinking, but I think it is a lot of nonsense. The minister took it as a sign of great efficiency that, as a result of the co-operation between Canada Manpower Centres and the UIC, half the claimants for unemployment insurance benefits now register with Canada Manpower Centres and such claimants constitute 70 per cent of the total clientele of the manpower service.

According to the minister, in order to improve these superior services—I underline "superior" services—integration is a must. I suggest that, before the minister proceeds with this move, he takes a look at the shortcomings of the present system, and indeed there are many of them. I think we would have to admit that Canada Manpower Centres and the Unemployment Insurance Commission have not really worked in harmony. In many instances they have worked against each other. I know for a fact, having talked to one or two employees of Canada Manpower, they sure as heck do not want to be loaded with unemployment insurance problems.

Manpower services at the present time are woefully inadequate. That is the consensus in any given neighbourhood or community. This has been pointed out both by the Senate committee that investigated this matter and also by the Economic Council of Canada in its report entitled "People and Jobs".

Both these reports said that employers see Manpower Centres chiefly as a source of unskilled labour. Canada Manpower Centres are used for only 25 to 35 per cent of the total number of hirings that occur during the year. Many of those, I might add, are in the category of which I spoke earlier, namely, of very temporary nature. Furthermore, a considerable number of the jobs listed by many Manpower Centres are in the primary sectors where turnover is high and employers simply put in standing orders.

Another legitimate complaint about Manpower services was brought to my attention by the United Steel Workers of America. We have witnessed, over the years, situations where companies which are in dispute with their employees list vacancies with local manpower offices. This happened again recently in Scarborough, where workers at Wyandotte Chemicals have been on legal strike seeking a first contract since November. During the strike area manpower offices have posted employment openings for the company. Although these notices indicate that a labour dispute is in progress, nevertheless they encourage people to interfere in a legal dispute between a company and its employees. As a staff representative of the United Steelworkers of America said in a recent letter, Manpower seems prepared to help companies make a profit even when they face a legal strike; why do they not provide the same kind of help to workers when they are locked out? That is a good question. Someone should ask the Minister of Manpower in the question period how he would answer that. There is no provision in this bill to deal with this situation. The government is quite content to continue this policy of what I call legal scabbing.

Generally speaking then, Mr. Speaker, most of the jobs registered at Canada Manpower Centres are unattractive, frequently of relatively temporary nature, low paying, and non-unionized or not organized in any way. As the Economic Council of Canada was forced to conclude, these factors limit the over-all effectiveness of Canada Manpower Centres and adversely affect their public image.

I am not addressing my criticisms directly to the counsellors who work in Canada Manpower Centres; I am simply saying that the way the centres are structured they are not doing their job efficiently. They are not doing the job for which they were originally set up. This is not really the fault of the employees. It is the fault of our economic system; it is the fault of employers in many cases who look upon Manpower Centres as a source of cheap labour, not expert, skilled or even semi-skilled.

The minister is quite content, ignoring these facts, to proceed to rationalize and to harmonize the present services to provide a one stop service to clients. It matters not that the present services are virtually useless. The minister hopes that integration will eliminate whatever defects exist. Most important, how does the minister hope to overcome the problem of matching—and this is a very conservative figure—the 750,000 job searchers with the 41,000 available jobs? No flow charts or diagrams will accomplish this, regardless of what the minister says.

This bill also promises financing for on the job retraining, administration of labour market programs and the policies underlying these programs. Pumping more money into training programs and into make-work programs will not alleviate unemployment. The only way to deal with unemployment is to create a job for each and every Canadian who wants one.

I conclude on this note, Mr. Speaker. I do not care if Manpower and UIC reach 100 per cent efficiency. I do not care if LIP, Canada Works and Young Canada Works achieve 100 per cent efficiency within their terms of reference. I do not care how efficient any government department is in the country today. Unless we can get the economy moving and provide jobs for the 750,000 or 800,000 people—we might even say the one million people—who are looking for work, then it does not matter how much money we spend on make work programs, temporary jobs and all the rest; there will still be ill-feeling and restlessness in the country which will increase over the years. If we cannot solve reasonably well the economic problems of the country and create more jobs, then what is the point of spending all this money and energy on make work projects? What is the point of even taking a serious look at Bill C-27 when it is not going to alleviate the basic problem of providing meaningful work for people who want it?

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, while Bill C-27 deals with various matters, I wish to make only a few comments on certain amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act. As I understand it, there are three major changes to be made to the act. In his speech on second reading the minister listed, first of all, the increase in the number of weeks a person must work before being entitled to draw benefits which, as the House knows, is from eight weeks to 12; the second change is in the benefits structure, which is the framework used to determine the duration of a claimant's entitlement; the third change is the outlining of more productive and developmental uses of unemployment insurance funds, such as income maintenance for persons taking approved training courses, job creation projects, and work-sharing programs. It is not my intention to comment on all of the changes, even though I realize their importance. Some contain pitfalls, some are improvements.

Job training is a subject on which I could spend 40 or 50 minutes. The minister and I have discussed it both in the House and outside the House, and it is difficult to know what the minister of labour in the province of Nova Scotia is looking for so far as training is concerned. He has made some loud statements about all the training that is going to take place, but in the meantime at the Point Edward training school in Cape Breton instructors are being laid off. However, I will deal with that on another occasion.

I should like to discuss first the increase from eight to 12 weeks of employment before entitlement to unemployment insurance benefits is achieved by those who are no longer employed. I believe, as other speakers have said, that this amendment is a backward step. It discriminates against that area of the country where the rate of unemployment is very high. As is the case in most regions of Quebec, the Atlantic provinces and the constituency which I represent suffer from a very high rate of unemployment.

I am glad to see here the hon. member for Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine (Mr. Béchard) who last Friday told the whole story. His words are worth quoting. He made a very commendable speech, as he always does. Those comments which I wish to quote are to be found on page 3446 of Hansard. I trust the minister will listen very carefully to this. The hon. member said:

> It remains—I am willing to admit this—that even with the best scheme, a number of unemployed could not find a job. In cases such as those which are found in the Magdalen Islands and elsewhere in my constituency, as well as in the Gaspe Peninsula generally, including the Gaspe and Matane constituencies, and some neighbouring areas, the whole Restigouche area, the Gloucester area and New Brunswick as a whole, it should be possible, wherever the industrial base is very limited, to adopt special measures, as mentioned by previous speakers, until such a time at least when the government decides to organize the economy in a way which would guarantee a more permanent employment of our active population.

I certainly commend the hon. gentleman for that statement because it spells out the problems with which we are confronted in the Atlantic region and in most areas of the province of Quebec. He went on to say:

Just as the duration of benefits varies and the number of weeks increases depending on the difference between the local or regional rate of unemployment and the national average, so, in my humble opinion should the number of working weeks before obtaining benefits vary in the case of the Magdalen Islands and the Gaspe peninsula in general, as well as the New Brunswick and the Atlantic provinces ridings. Let us put an end to the ridiculous practice whereby an applicant must file evidence that he is looking for a job in a region such as ours where there are few openings, if any. Instead we should require all employers to report job openings to Canada Manpower offices, including those they fill themselves without going to the Manpower Centres. This way Manpower officials will always know what jobs are available.

This is good advice from the hon. member for Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine. As he said, we are faced with a situation where people get tired going to Manpower offices and hearing the same story over and over again that no work is available. They are told they must make a job search. They go to see five or six employers who tell them that there is nothing available. This is ridiculous. We know there is no employment in the first place. The Manpower officials know that. It is no reflection on them. They do the best they can to place people.

For example, in the Sydney office the latest report for January, 1977, showed that the number of those seeking employment was 13,134 and there were only 210 job vacancies, so you can see what they are faced with. As was mentioned by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) on Friday, this is the situation. In his riding the official unemployment figure was 29,000, but when he investigated it thoroughly at the Manpower offices he discovered that the actual figure was 60,000.

I do not understand why the government is bringing in this bill now. I recall very vividly that when it was first introduced it was supposed to be the greatest thing since Bryce Mackasey, not since sliced bread. Here we are with our unemployment rate higher than it has ever been. We are making it more difficult for people who are truly serious and honest in trying to find work to receive a few dollars. I am not trying to protect those who abuse the fund. I condemn the judges and the magistrates who tap them over the fingers, people who are guilty of defrauding the system and of defrauding the government. All they are told is, "Don't you boys do any more of this, and everything will be all right". We should condemn them and give them the severest of penalties. Remember the postal strike when we discovered the ski bums who were not there to collect their cheques? There were none from the Atlantic provinces or the eastern regions of Quebec among them, because in most of those areas people cannot afford to buy ski equipment, let alone go skiing and collect unemployment insurance.

It is great for members of boards of directors sitting in back rooms to say that, "So and so does not want to work anyhow, so cut him off." That is absolutely incorrect. I think the frequency of abuses is minimal, particularly in the regions about which we are talking.

As I said, in my constituency in industrial Cape Breton where the rate of unemployment is very high it is very difficult to obtain an accurate figure. It is estimated to be somewhere between 25 per cent and 30 per cent. I hope it is less than that, but I am afraid the rate is even higher. I know the sources of employment in that area and I know they are shrinking, while the labour force is growing. It is difficult to justify the change, and I can tell you that those arguments have no validity whatsoever in the region that I represent.

The minister and others have tried to justify this amendment by stating that it is an incentive, especially for young people, to work longer. All I can say is that this argument does not apply to either the younger or the older workers in my area, in the Atlantic region or in eastern Quebec. The young people there do not need incentives to stay in the work force. Their big problem is more to get into the labour force and obtain employment in the first place, than to keep it. Those who may be in and out of the active work force are the victims of an economically depressed area. I can tell you this, Mr. Speaker, because I know these young people.

As many other hon. members do, I discussed this with the young people and also with my older constituents. I know they are anxious to be part of the active work force, and it is a sad state of affairs when they do get a job that it only lasts for a few weeks. Certainly they would rather work than be on unemployment insurance. They would love to have a permanent job. They would love to have job security so they could plan their future with confidence, free from the worry and anxiety of loss of work.

To say there is a 25 per cent or 30 per cent rate of unemployment is startling. Of course other people talk about a rate of 14 per cent or 15 per cent, but 25 per cent to 30 per cent is terrible.

These statistics are called hard figures. Personally, I think of those men and women who make up these percentages, and when I hear the word "claimant" or "bodies"—bureaucratic lingo—in reference to the unemployed, I think it is shocking. I think of the man or woman seeking employment or seeking unemployment insurance as human beings. In so far as industrial Cape Breton is concerned, I deny most vigorously that the number of people in and out of employment has increased and that these people are doing so of their own free will. They are doing so from necessity, not from choice. I agree that if there are abuses under the UIC Act then those abuses should be corrected, but not by increasing the period of employment from eight to 12 weeks. An abuse will not be corrected and a real hardship will be inflicted.

I noticed that in his speech on second reading the minister also mentioned that unemployment insurance will continue to provide a measure of income protection to unemployed workers while they conduct an active search for jobs to locate the most suitable and satisfying employment available to them. This puts the pressure on the individuals, and that is only right because he or she should go and look for jobs. But surely if a Canada Manpower Centre, which is the official government employment agency of the federal government, does not know where there are jobs, where will the people find jobs? They will have to go through this phony deal of going to a series of businessmen and being told there are no jobs available. They know that from the beginning.

I only wish there were no necessity for this active search for jobs in my area. The time is past when they have to conduct this solitary, ineffectual search for work. If employment is not available—and the officers should know whether or not it is available—then the insurance should continue to be paid under the legislation. For whom will this create a hardship? It will create a hardship for fishermen, lumbermen, fish plant workers, construction workers, and all those who work part time. I commend the minister for changing what is commonly known as the four-week rule. It is proposed that it be done away with. At the present time it results in a claim being terminated if benefits are not paid for four consecutive weeks in an extended benefit period.

This rule is considered a serious disincentive to individuals who might otherwise take short-term jobs. There are many hundreds of people caught in that trap. There people are anxious and willing to work, particularly construction workers, fish plant workers and so forth. They go back for a day, two days, or three days, and they think they re-qualify. However, they are told that they are out, that they do not have any chance to collect benefits or to continue collecting benefits. This will continue, as others have said, to put more people on welfare, but the municipalities cannot stand it. At the moment it is difficult for municipalities in the regions I have mentioned to get by. They just cannot afford to pay more welfare, and people will just be hungry.

I am not being dramatic or anything else when I say that there are people on Cape Breton Island who are losing their homes. They cannot pay the cost of electric heating. They cannot pay their mortgages. They formerly worked at the steel plant. Their benefits are running out quickly, and some have already run out. There is no way for them to carry on. If we adopt this measure, we will make it much more serious than it ever was before. It will take millions of dollars out of the economy in those areas of the country where it is needed most.

Some ask—the previous speaker included—why we should pass a law to suit certain regions of the country? This government and previous governments have done that to suit certain regions of the country. We cannot pass a blanket law which will treat everybody equitably across this vast country. I spoke to a Liberal member from Saskatchewan the other day. I asked him what is the employment rate out there and he said it is 2.8 per cent. Well, now, that is rather nice.

Mr. Leggatt: That is NDP country.

[Mr. Muir.]

Mr. Muir: I expected that, but I wonder why it was higher before. Incidentally, hon. members to my left always preach the great philosophy of socialism and that kind of thing. If socialism is such a millennium, why in hell are Callaghan and Britain in such a mess? Why have socialist governments been turned out in other countries? I wish the hon. member would not try to divert me. I am really after the Liberal government. I am asking the ministers to try to change the rules and regulations, but often I hear some misplaced clergyman and others to the physical left of me in this House attacking the Conservatives as if they formed the government. It is strange that they attack the people to their right but not the government. There seems to be a bit of a liaison.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): An incestuous relationship.

Mr. Muir: What did you say?

Mr. Leggatt: Celestial.

Mr. Muir: I doubt that. At any rate, I would be less than frank with the government and this House if I did not reaffirm that I cannot under any circumstances but oppose in every way available to me the proposals contained in this package of amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act.

I wonder if in this package there is anything to deal with a case whereby a group of whizz-kids came to a regional office and to local offices to conduct so-called investigations as to the possibility of alleged padding of placements. I do not know if that is quite correct. It is supposed to have happened. I trust the minister is listening very carefully. In the interim three senior people who have 30, 40 or 50 combined years' service in the public service were suspended immediately for a week with pay. No charges were laid. There was no money they could have stolen.

There is an investigation going on. These people still receive their salaries, but they have been warned not to talk to anyone in that office nor to be seen around that office. When that kind of thing is allowed I wonder what we are coming to. I do not at all blame the minister for that, but I hope and trust he will look into situations like that. In a small area if John Brown or Joe Blow is suspended, people immediately get suspicious and wonder what is going on. They think that where there is smoke there is fire, and that something has to be going on. The character of the people involved can be grievously injured because to this point nothing has been proved against these people or any of the staff in that office. I hope the minister will take this into consideration either in his legislation or investigations.

It has been mentioned by others that there are roughly 39,000 or 40,000 job vacancies across this country at the present time but that there are over one million who are unemployed. The hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent) has been making great noises about that, and rightly so, but if hon. members would look up the comments I made here two or three years ago they would find that I said the same thing. I said that we do not get true statistical figures because many people get tired of going to Canada Manpower Centre offices, they head out on their own and just keep chasing around anywhere they can trying to find a job on their own, therefore they are not considered as being unemployed as far as the C.M.C. is concerned. Hon. members know that. These people come to their member's offices every day and, if they do not, some hon. members must live in a wonderful part of the country. I know that places like that exist because people have come to me telling me that in Toronto there is difficulty getting employees. My goodness, I wish we had that problem on the east coast.

Coming from an area which suffers unemployment to the extent that one would have to conclude that Cape Breton in many ways is akin to the developing countries of the world, without the interest-free loans which are available to the developing countries, I probably have one of the most honest methods of describing the terrible plight of our area. If we want an example of why this nation is in a state of almost complete chaos, we need only examine the multitude of proposals which have been made in an effort to combat the problems of the Atlantic region and then to witness nothing more than lip service—and that can be lip service or LIP service—as the end result. Every question I pose and every suggestion I make in this House is taken by the various ministers of the government as if they are deeply and truly concerned about our problems, but as soon as they disappear from the House the gravity of the situation seems to disappear with them. The only result is a continuation and worsening of the problem.

In my own area I look back on the loss of General Instruments Corporation. That corporation assembled radio tuners. I look back on the loss of Canadian Motor Industries which assembled Toyota automobiles. I look back on the loss of Kaiser Strontium. Two years ago, as I said earlier in the House today, 3,900 employees worked at the Sydney steel plant, but that number is now down to 2,250, and there is no assurance that that figure will be maintained. I look at the drastic cut-backs by Canadian National in the Atlantic region and at the Canadian National marine services on the docks at North Sydney where in peak periods in the summer there once were 1,000 people employed. In the winter the number was about 500, 600 or 700. Now we have only about 200 working there every day. There were 1,000 people working at General Instruments, this in an area of chronic unemployment. Such industries with that kind of employment opportunity were allowed to leave. This happened under the Trudeau and Regan administrations. What would have been required to keep General Instruments or Canadian Motor Industries in operation there would probably have been far less than the amount which has already been expended on unemployment benefits and welfare.

All this is not to mention the human degradation associated with any form of assistance as compared with gainful employment. No one knows better than I and other hon. members from the Atlantic region about the operation of UIC and Manpower offices, particularly in my area. Probably three quarters of our work is associated with the problems of constituents in securing employment or securing unemployment insurance benefits. The time which is not involved with those two operations is associated with welfare, with schemes of the Department of National Health and Welfare, the provincial department of social services and those of the Department of Veterans Affairs. People in Cape Breton need hope, and hope comes in the form of jobs. It is not a matter of taking people off the unemployment insurance rolls because they will not take the jobs available; there just are no jobs.

My efforts are geared to trying to get people enough work to get them on the unemployment rolls, and it is difficult to get that much work. It means two months work out of 12 months if this bill goes through. A number of people in Cape Breton would not qualify if this were in effect now because they have not been able to get very much work in the last 12 months. They do not even figure in the statistics. When I ask them if they have gone to the Manpower Centre they tell me they have, but there is nothing for them. They are the forgotten Canadians. Because they are not included in the unemployment statistics they do not get a passing thought from the government. Do not talk to Cape Bretoners about the break-up of Canada because the government shows more concern for the underprivileged in other parts of the world than it does for the human misery that has become their way of life.

Some will say that is a terrible thing to say when some people in the world are starving. I do not think there is anything wrong with foreign aid, but I do think we should try to help people in this country who are truly having problems. A week ago the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Chrétien) said that he did not think anyone in this country was starving. I can tell him people are starving in this country, Mr. Speaker.

Now we are being told that the qualifying period for benefits should be increased from two months to three months—this at a time when over a million Canadians are without work. We are telling people we will legislate them off the unemployment insurance rolls and onto the welfare rolls. Mr. Speaker, I will not condone that nor will I co-operate in order to have this type of ordeal perpetrated on the people of Cape Breton Island, of the Atlantic region or of anywhere else in Canada that is having unemployment problems. This government can tell me it wants a longer qualification period for unemployment insurance benefits when it can also tell me there are jobs so that people can obtain employment long enough to qualify for benefits, or indeed work permanently so that they do not have to apply for benefits. When that happens I will be pleased to support this proposal, but not until then. I see no sign of that happening, so I was pleased that the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) moved an amendment that would maintain the present program in areas of higher unemployment than the national average. I will support that amendment, but there is no way I can support any lengthening of the present qualifying period.

This government said a few years ago that this bill was a great thing, but there were not so many unemployed then. There are thousands more people unemployed now. If the government can live with itself after proposing such callous and unfeeling legislation let it, but I will have no part of the decision.

The terrible financial mess the government has put the country in will not be loaded on the shoulders of the working men and women of Cape Breton Island so long as I represent that area. For too long the working people of this nation have been the scapegoats of the horrendous ineptitude of the government. There has been one example after another of alleged scandal, corruption and mismanagement. The poor people are singled out as the culprits in government waste and extravagance. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and others tell the people to stop spending, but they do not have money to spend. Government spokesmen blame them for their spending and extravagance as the cause of inflation. They are much like the Romans who found themselves in the arenas facing the lions because they were the entertainment of the nobility and the mobs alike. This government tries to trample on the rights of the poor and the defenceless but, Mr. Speaker, it will do it against the strongest opposition I can muster.

It is easy to say that people will not work, but in areas of New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island, Newfoundland, Nova Scotia, and almost all of Quebec, most people try very hard to find work. They just cannot find it, Mr. Speaker.

We cannot afford the luxury of this government and its unrealistic and uncaring schemes. If we are to have a country in the future we had better meet the challenge of the people of this nation to be able to reside and work where they want to themselves. Government spokesman may say that people in Newfoundland, Nova Scotia, and Prince Edward Island who cannot find work should move and they will be paid a mobility grant.

Mr. Peters: Move where?

Mr. Muir: Indeed, where? If they could move what are they faced with? They have worked hard all their lives to get their homes. Maybe they have a couple of children in school—even university if that is possible. If they move to Ontario or the west it is going to cost them so much to buy a home that they just cannot do it. The work has to be provided where they live and that is why I have been pressing continuously the government to do something about steel in Cape Breton which is the backbone of the economy of Nova Scotia. I think possibly the government might be trying to do something.

People in this country should be able to reside and work where they wish. That is not possible and will not be possible so long as proposals are brought forward that are so out of touch with reality. I am surprised that the minister would go along with this. I have the highest regard for him. I know that he has been out of work in his time and has had to pound the roads looking for work. He has worked in the mines as I have as a miner, and knows what that is all about. Surely he will listen to his backbenchers and not only to his bureaucratic advisers, and think seriously about the amendment our party proposed.

I mentioned the steel situation, Mr. Speaker. Many people have been laid off. On November 25 last I posed a question to the Prime Minister regarding the possibility of the government purchasing steel rails for stockpiling. It has been done with coal, uranium, and wheat, so it could be done with steel and it would get people back to work until there is an improvement in the market. The Prime Minister gave the following reply as reported at page 1360 of Hansard:

> The hon. member raises a question which the Minister of Transport has been discussing with me and some other colleagues. It is a suggestion that has considerable merit, but as the hon. member would recognize, it requires considerable expenditures and at a time of restraint...

The Prime Minister did not completely frown upon my suggestion, so I hope he will give it consideration and people will not have to depend on unemployment insurance.

Before I resume my seat, Mr. Speaker, I should like to read from an editorial in the Halifax Chronicle-Herald of February 10 written by the editor-in-chief and prominent newspaper man, Harold Shea, a former member of the Press Gallery here. Under the heading "Unemployment Taken Calmly" he writes:

> One of the most puzzling aspects of the country's current unemployment situation is that so many people are seemingly unmoved by the extend of the problem.

● (1640)

Those words apply to the government, but the government is unmoved. Government ministers figure that they are giving the workers many benefits; I say they are doing little to help our people find work.

I do not have time to read all of the editorial. I commend its reading to hon. members. It is available in the reading room. Perhaps I can quote one or two more sentences. The author goes on to say:

> Thank Heavens there are no riots, name-calling incidents, or something worse. But neither is there much concern—even quiet concern—about the idleness, which is disgraceful and demoralizing...
> Nowhere is the situation more difficult than in our own Atlantic provinces. Statistics show that in some parts of the area, unemployment is running 50 per cent above the national average.

I point out that the unemployment rate in Cape Breton Island alone is between 25 per cent and 30 per cent. I continue quoting:

> The report that unemployment is rising in Ontario, Alberta and British Columbia, too, is just as worrisome, because it is these rich provinces—the Big Three—that contribute in such large measure to the equalization of wealth and services across the country.
> We can't afford to yawn much longer. The government should speed up the production of the budget and get on with the job of stimulating the economy. The lethargy must end, and the sooner the better.

In conclusion, I say that no way, in no way, can I support the concept of this bill. I will not support it, despite what some hon. members, including some members of my party, say about it. They do not live in the real world or know what is happening. Some hon. members who live in or near Toronto say that they cannot find employees for their factories. Mr.

Speaker, we do not even have the factories in my area. They are moving out all the time. I raised this question with the ministers responsible, but little has been done. I have raised those questions I mentioned earlier with industrial planners, provincial organizations, and with DREE, but little has been done.

I hope the minister will give every consideration to my remarks. If he does not wish to accept the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Hamilton West let him bring in his own amendment, or let another member of the government party propose an amendment that would give the government the credit for acting. If the unemployment rate were 4 per cent, right across the country, perhaps the government's proposal would be acceptable. But that is not the case. Therefore I plead with the minister to give every consideration to my suggestion, for the reasons I mentioned and for a heck of a lot more I did not have time to mention.

Mr. G. H. Whittaker (Okanagan Boundary): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak on Bill C-27 I will attempt to keep my comments brief. All concerned are anxious to have the bill proceed to committee where the merits of the proposals are going to receive the deliberation they deserve.

The recently disclosed monthly labour force survey shows 889,000 Canadians as officially unemployed; two-fifths of these were heads of families or single people living alone. It is enough to provoke another round of hand-wringing and gnashing of teeth, but because there are commendable suggestions in the bill, which we have for years been advocating, I will try to restrict my comments to a general appraisal of the government's approach to unemployment and job creation.

Not since 1953, when the Dominion Bureau of Statistics began compiling such data, has the monthly rate of unemployment been so high. Added to these official figures are the controversial hidden unemployment statistics which range from 108,000 to 573,000. Depending on whether we consider those who looked for work in the last six months but not in the last four weeks, those who have thrown up their hands in despair, or those temporarily laid off or intending to start a new job within a month, we can conceivably get quite different interpretations of the unemployment picture.

If we continue to concentrate on figures, statistics, the attempts to define the typical unemployed Canadian, we tend to lose our perspective and turn our backs on the real issues. The situation has been labelled a human crisis. We ought to concentrate on the debilitating loss in productivity, the human degradation, the frustrations and cynicism that are fostered by having 889,000 Canadians, who are ready and willing to work, resort to transfer payments to subsist. We hear accusations that, according to the figures, secondary wage earners, wives and youths, not the principal sources of income for the family, are collecting the majority of insurance benefits. Every member has, I am sure, a thick file of correspondence from constituents complaining of lack of employment opportunities or injustices at the hands of manpower and unemployment insurance administrators.

Some of us represent ridings that suffer proportionately greater hardships than others, either due to the lack of natural resources or the failure to accrue the full benefits of exploiting the nation's wealth. These inequities have long been recognized and programs set up to mitigate the harsher effects. Recently we saw the doubling of LIP allocations to $200 million, the addition of $50 million for labour-intensive projects in high unemployment areas and the cut in unemployment insurance premium rates for employers and workers. A $40 million program for occupational training was added, supplemented by an expansion of the Canada Manpower Mobility Program to $13.7 million.

In the final three quarters of 1976, about 39 per cent of corporation profits was paid out in corporation taxes. This helped meet the cost of a wide range of public services. Another 40 per cent was used to expand and improve productive capacity, creating and maintaining jobs for the future. But the increase in production was not sufficient to reduce unused industrial capacity appreciably. Nor, do we discover, did it reduce the unemployment rate. Although total employment rose by 2.4 per cent last year, the unemployment rate climbed marginally from 7 per cent in 1975, through 7.2 per cent in 1976, to 7.5 per cent in December of 1976. Moreover, the additional employment was not uniformly distributed among the various industrial sectors. For instance, employment declined in the export-oriented industries, reflecting the cyclical downturn of world markets. We cannot place the blame totally on world market situations, though. It is obvious that the economy as a whole should grow faster to reduce unemployment. We need a new budget, and we need it soon. Personal tax cuts, business tax concessions to promote expansion and reduced government expenditures, are requisite.

I notice that the government has abandoned its publicity campaign to convince the public that it is serious about austerity. With an increase in spending of 14 per cent, I do not blame the government. How long could you keep that type of spending spree under wraps? The effects will filter down through the economy, causing more inflation and doing nothing to create more jobs, because the spending priorities are all wrong.

Unfortunately, the expectations for the rate of recovery in the industrial world have been revised downward since the middle of 1976. We can expect Canadian exports to be adversely affected, which will reduce the external stimulus to the Canadian economy, this in turn being translated into continued high levels of unused industrial capacity and high unemployment. One is struck with the realization that conventional wisdom and traditional policies are not at all adequate to tackle the problems. In fact one wonders if the government has even selected the most popular priorities.

While a recent Gallup poll showed 48 per cent of the respondents thinking that the government should give greater attention to unemployment, only 42 per cent agreed with the Liberals that inflation was of greater concern.

There has been no dearth, either, of public sentiment on the functioning of the UIC system. It is in the context of these factors—Canada's labour market, the nature of our unemployment, and the history of the acceptance of the UIC scheme—that we must address the proposals included in Bill C-27.

● (1650)

Prior to 1966, the Unemployment Insurance Commission and the National Employment Service worked closely together, sharing the same facilities, and by close association and co-operation were readily able to discern whether or not claimants were eligible for unemployment insurance benefits. Once again the merging of these services, provided the process is properly administered and how large a bureaucracy is created, is hard to find fault with. Indeed, we have witnessed the disturbing phenomenon of job vacancies rising hand-in-hand with the unemployment rate, except in some severely depressed areas. This is an indication that joblessness today has become the outgrowth of an increasingly high turnover in the labour market as more and more people abandon old jobs in search of new, more rewarding and fulfilling ones.

In British Columbia this January, for instance, there was an unemployment rate of 8.8 per cent. When broken down to sex and age we find that 6.8 per cent were men out of work, 12.2 per cent were women, and 17.6 per cent were in the 15 to 24 age bracket. The figures are slightly higher than the Canadian average but the proportions are roughly the same.

Unemployment insurance benefits have generally been touted as good for frictional unemployment, moving from job to job or re-entering the labour force after raising a family. They are also found to be beneficial for sufferers of cyclical unemployment, victims of the vagaries of the business cycles.

Although insurance benefits are not as appropriate for structural unemployment, the mismatching of skills and labour requirements, or seasonal unemployment, it could still be said that our jobless were being maintained by one of the most generous and comprehensive social security systems in the industrialized countries.

The inappropriateness and the abuses have given rise to scrutiny and study of the scheme which corroborated, to a certain degree, intuitive doubts and misgivings about the system. While induced unemployment in British Columbia. was low as compared to the ratio of induced total unemployment in Canada, residents are still inimical to tales of rip-offs. In 1976, 274 British Columbia residents were convicted of defrauding the Unemployment Insurance Commission, almost double the number in 1975.

It can be argued cogently on both sides that the change from eight weeks' work to 12 weeks' work for qualification will discourage those who flit in and out of the labour force, simply in order to qualify for benefits, or on the other hand that individuals will be deprived of the occasion to search for appropriate positions leading to satisfying employment.

Our work force suffers from under-employed, over-qualified people unhappy in their unsuitable positions. In fact, the study which revealed the inducement effect of insurance benefits also indicated that the greater inducement was not to quit but to remain unemployed for a longer period of time. There was an average of 32,000 college graduates out of work in Canada last year. How many more were under-employed? Or, what may be the level of hidden unemployment, those so discouraged with the system that they are not looking for work? We have only estimates.

Will the joining of the two services accommodate those cases where the individual legitimately takes the time to seek the employment he or she is trained for, and who won't receive compensation because he or she is classed as a new entrant to the labour force or as inexperienced, as so many housewives are labelled when they enter the labour force after raising children?

What is needed is an improved job search program, increased training funds, and job creation funds in areas of high unemployment.

Training succeeds in improving skills. It increases the productive capacity of the Canadian labour force, which in turn reduces the risk of inflationary pressures. Skill shortages are less likely to occur during periods of strong economic growth. The complaint is often heard that there is too little on-the-job training or that federally sponsored industrial training takes place primarily in small firms. These have little training capacity, or teach only skills which lead to dead-end low wage jobs.

It has to be assumed, for a program's success, that training will provide the trainee with skills to match demand and that there is some creation of skilled jobs as a spin-off from the training program. Such a program can be much more effective in stimulating employment than other fiscal measures involving the same amount of money.

Hand-in-hand with the notion of training programs goes mobility grants. It has been argued that they lack efficiency as well as equity. This does not mean mobility grants should not be given to the poor and disadvantaged; it can be learned from data that people with low incomes and with unemployment experience are more mobile than others. In fact further orientation of the Manpower Mobility Grants Program in this direction would probably have a beneficial effect in terms of income distribution.

The phenomenon of the mobile unemployed individual is probably largely misunderstood. Persons experiencing short periods of unemployment have high mobility rates. But as the duration of unemployment lengthens the mobility rate falls, and mobility rates vary inversely with the number of weeks worked. The workings of the adjustment process appear to be influenced by general economic conditions in the country as a whole. May I call it five o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Norfolk-Haldimand (Mr. Knowles)—Citizenship—Delay in providing forms to Simcoe, Ontario—Possibility subcourts phased out; the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Hnatyshyn)—Indian Affairs—Legal authority of department to remove children from custody of parents—Suggested compliance with provincial law; the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKenzie)—National Defence—Proposed research centre at Winnipeg—Delay in completing land purchase agreement—Government position.

It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, notices of motions, public bills.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Notice of motion No. 4, in the name of the hon. member for Ottawa-Vanier (Mr. Gauthier).

Some hon. Members: Stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The motion stands at the request of the government.

Notice of motion No. 7, in the name of the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall).

Mr. Kaplan: Mr. Speaker, I think you will find there is general agreement to consider motion No. 25 standing in the name of the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies).

Mr. Ellis: We agree to that, Mr. Speaker.

PERPETUAL BONDS, 1936

SUGGESTED REDEMPTION BY GOVERNMENT

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should reconsider its decision not to redeem the 3 per cent perpetual bonds, issued in 1936, through a scheme whereby (a) original purchasers would receive full face value for their bonds (b) all other holders would receive payment for each bond according to the market price for the year in which the bond was purchased (c) that an immediate freeze be placed on the market value of the bonds to prevent speculation.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this is the third time that this motion, or a variation of it, has been brought to the House for consideration at private members' time as a private members' bill. The motion should be changed slightly because the government agreed last March to redeem the bonds in 1996. The motion should now read:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should reconsider its decision not to redeem the 3 per cent perpetual bonds, issued in 1936, on September 15, 1996, and redeem them instead through a scheme whereby (a) original purchasers would receive full face value for their bonds immediately—

Parts (b) and (c) remain as printed.

The story of perpetual bonds in this House of Commons has been, I might say, perpetual. For a long time we have tried to get the government to remove these bonds from its portfolio altogether.

● (1700)

Perpetual bonds carry an interest rate of 3 per cent. They were bought, for the most part, in the depths of the depression by people who believed they were acquiring a security which would help them in their retirement. The government supported this idea by advertising that no one had ever lost a cent by investing in the government of Canada, so these people, who were willing to invest during the worst period of our history, economically, came forward. What happened was this: as interest rates rose during periods of inflation the value of the bonds fell. It has fallen to such a point that they are now worth around $45 or $46. In terms of real purchasing power, the people who were ready to lend the government money in the depth of the depression now hold something worth around $10. This is surely an iniquitous situation and one which ought to be remedied.

Various ministers of finance have wrestled with this problem and sought to devise means to remedy it. I believe it is recognized that it is patently unfair to those Canadians who now hold these bonds, senior citizens, most of them, that they should have no hope of getting their money back.

When the former minister of finance announced a retirement date of 1996, it did have the effect of increasing the yield on the bonds as anticipated. The difficulty is that '96 is not a realistic date because most of the people who bought the bonds back in 1936 will be dead by then. It is important that these people should be able to get their money back, money which they lent to the government in good faith. This is why it is essential that members on all sides should support my proposal.

The bonds themselves are a very small thing in the total portfolio of the government's debt but they represent a big consideration for those few thousand people who still hold them, perhaps the difference between a reasonable lifestyle and none whatsoever. It is not a matter of much consequence for the government to get rid of this $55 million in perpetual bonds. There are no others of the kind in the portfolio. They were put out only once. They are not an integral part of the Canadian debt structure. To ask the purchasers to wait until '96 is an unconscionable thing to do because at that time many of them will not be around.

There is no question but that there has been some trading in this issue. There is no question but that there may have been some speculation. There is no question but that some people might have taken advantage of the government's action to reap some sort of windfall gain—those who bought the bonds in the last years of depressed prices from people who were forced by circumstances to sell them. But this is inconsequential when measured against the benefits which could be gained by redeeming these bonds at face value for the benefit of the people who have kept them and whose badly needed resources went into their purchase.

I think this is the third time I have spoken on this subject. There is not a single party in the House which at one time or another, through one of its members, has not addressed this question seeking an improvement in the present position. It would seem to me to be a matter of showing humanity on the part of the government in a day and age when government generally is remote from the concerns of the population. It would be an indication that governments, no matter how large, can still be concerned about the individual.

Redeeming these bonds at face value would make little difference to the government's investment picture. It would get this type of security out of the portfolio and, once and for all, we could get this issue settled to the advantage of those who bought these bonds in good faith in the thirties.

Mr. Kaplan: I should like to get an understanding of what the hon. member means by item (c) in the resolution which asks that an immediate freeze be placed on the market value of the bonds to prevent speculation. Would the hon. member accept a question?

Mr. Gillies: No, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies) did not accept the question, so the parliamentary secretary, if he speaks, is on his own time.

Mr. Lloyd Francis (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I want to commend the mover of this motion. If anyone deserves a reward for effort, it is he. He is not the first to raise this matter. I remember that in a previous parliament Mr. Steve Otto showed an interest in this subject. He was a supporter of the government and he explored in debates during the private members' hour, as we are doing today, various measures which he thought the government should undertake.

I, too, find some difficulty in understanding exactly what the hon. member wishes to do, though I wish to make it quite clear that I am in total agreement with his assertion that something should be done. However, I think the cause would be best served if we knew exactly what the hon. member had in mind. Like the hon. member for York Centre (Mr. Kaplan), who attempted to put a question a few moments ago, I have some difficulty with regard to the third part of the motion. It asks that a freeze be placed on the value of the bonds. How could this be done in a free society? The hon. member is well skilled in financial matters. He is by no means an amateur. I think it is clear what the government should do.

I have in my constituency a lady who inherited some of these perpetual bonds from her father's estate—I hope the hon. member will listen, because I am trying to make a point. In this case they had been held in the family since 1936. According to the strict terms of the hon. member's motion, she would not be eligible because she inherited the bonds from her father. I suggest that is not the criterion which should be used. I do not know how much of the original $55 million issue would be in the hands of the original purchasers, but I doubt it would be more than $5 million to $10 million. I think this bill is based on too narrow a concept. Having inherited from one's father's estate and kept oneself during the years should qualify just as much as being an original purchaser.

I think there are other situations closely akin to this. I am going to get a telephone call tomorrow from this lady, I am sure, when she reads today's Hansard because she has called my attention to this inequitable situation persistently over a long period of time. I can only say to her that I am willing to do everything I can as a member of this place to try to correct something which I believe is wrong.

What is the solution that should be adopted, Mr. Speaker? I do not know how a government can freeze prices in a free market. Either the government redeems or it does not redeem. It seems to me that the government should redeem at face value the debentures of those who have demonstrated that they have held them for a certain period of time—I suggest ten years would be sufficient. If purchasers could demonstrate they had owned this security in their own personal title for a period in excess of ten years, I would say that would be good and sufficient grounds for redeeming the debenture.

The question of speculation is a very serious one. In every previous debate on this subject in the House, those who spoke on behalf of the government have said, "Think of all the speculative gains that are going to be made; think of all the banks, those terrible creatures, that will gain; think of the insurance companies that bought on speculation; think of the professional speculators, how terrible it would be if they were to make a dollar out of this sort of thing".

I agree that the speculators should be taken out of the game, but surely the most reasonable way of dealing with the speculator is to establish for those who have not held the securities for the required minimum period a date at which the government would be prepared to go on to the open market and purchase. There is nothing wrong with the concept each year of having something equivalent to a sinking fund for purchasing a certain proportion of the issue that is outstanding. The price at which the government would take the issue off the market would be raised a little to reflect interest, and at a certain date all of it would be retired. I think the date of 1996 is ridiculous; I think it should be something like 1986, or at least ten years sooner than 1996.

If the government were to accept the suggestion that I am making today—I am sure I can convince the hon. member who moved this motion that this makes sense—first to redeem at face value in the case of anyone who could prove continuous ownership in excess of ten years; second, to establish a price at which the government would go on to the open market and purchase offerings, which purchase would be the discounted value of, say, face value in 1986 or some date like that, retiring the issue in an orderly way between now and then, it seems to me that this would meet all of the criteria the hon. member has in mind. First, there would be some equity to the long-term holders who purchased in good faith; secondly, there would be protection against those who purchased for speculative purposes. I agree no one should make a windfall gain out of this, but I think people are entitled to get their money back on some kind of equitable basis.

The incredible thing about this, Mr. Speaker, is the government's reluctance to move. I do not believe it is the government but rather a few senior civil servants who are giving this advice. It is such a picayune item in the total handling of the government's debt. This issue could be retired, I suspect, over a period of years for something like $30 million to $40 million, and the handling of this part of the government's debt is absolutely nothing in terms of debt management. What is at stake here is surely a question of good faith. What is at stake is the assurance to those who purchased government securities that the government is not going to be a hard-nosed private bargainer. The government is in a position of being more than a private bargainer; the government sets the rules of the whole game—the financial market, management of the currency, and the whole question of the degree to which the currency retains its value. The government can influence all of this.

As was argued very ably by the hon. member who proposed the motion, it seems to me that the government has the responsibility of saying to those men and women who bought its securities that while there is no perfect equity in the business market—there are good deals, bad deals; caveat emptor, you take your choice—beyond a certain point the government is going to play fair. Beyond a certain point the government is going to recognize that what has been done was a very serious inequity to those small numbers of people who tried to do the fair, the right, and the honourable thing, as they saw it, and let the government have the use of their funds as part of the government debt.

I think it would be a little easier for the government to be credible if it did this, because in the period ahead it is highly likely that we will have to call upon Canadians for levels of savings and investment in different types of securities. Canada Savings Bonds have, of course, been made extremely attractive, and do not deserve to be mentioned in the same breath as perpetuals. If the government is to maintain its credibility to its citizens and encourage a positive program of savings and investment in government securities, it is an article of faith with me that the government must do something a little better for that group of citizens who bought 3 per cent perpetuals, especially for those who have held on to them during difficult times.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Would the hon. member permit a question?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Would the hon. member for Ottawa West permit a question?

Mr. Francis: I would be delighted to, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): What would the hon. member have in mind to compensate these long time holders against the ravages of inflation over the last 15 years, where those who might have acquired them through devolution or by some other means are now going to be paid 50 cents on the dollar face value?

Mr. Francis: Well, Mr. Speaker, there is no perfect equity in this land. There is no perfect fairness. I do not have an answer to that. What I am suggesting, which I think is a logical flow from the motion before us, would give such people something more than they have now, and the old maxim of half a loaf being better than none is the best answer I can offer to the hon. member's question.

Mr. F. A. Philbrook (Halton): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity of speaking to this motion and I will keep my remarks brief.

Mr. Gillies: Good.

Mr. Philbrook: A popular move. A great deal has been said on this subject and I am happy to say a few words, partly to learn a few things about the subject that I did not know before, in the hope that it will be resolved once and for all and we will not have concerned elderly people worrying about what is going to happen.

In my short experience with perpetual bonds I have discovered that most of our predecessors who have spoken on the subject have regarded them with some amusement, saying "Oh, that old thing again, the good old perpetual bonds". At the same time, I think it is a fair impression that these bonds have been of real benefit to Canadians over the years. However, their day seems to have come. The history going back to 1936 was well covered by the previous speakers. As well as the original provision for calling these bonds, such as 60 days' notice, some provision to call them by lot is necessary if only some of the bonds were called, and also some measure to try to protect the bond holders.

• (1720)

As we know, in September of 1966 new bond certificates were issued for 30 years. To go back in history, these bonds have had their ups and downs in market value, but mostly down. Apparently the bonds did go up a little after the war, but that was for a very brief time. Within recent years, interest rates in Canada and elsewhere have risen to higher levels. This has made them rather unpopular in terms of the lower interest rates which originally applied.

With regard to the motion moved by the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies), it seems to me that one important aspect is the problem of the distribution of bond holders. That seems to be a very complicated proposition at the moment. However, if we can say one brief thing about that, there seems to have been a substantial change in ownership of the registered bonds since 1966. Since 1936 that change in ownership has been almost complete, so perhaps this mitigates a little the concern for the older bond holders not making it to the final date of 1996.

I understand also that there is some concern about there being a difficulty for the taxpayer in the proposal before us. The government has had a great deal of advantage from having these funds over the years, but it is considered somewhat difficult to ask the taxpayers—many of whom do not have investments of any kind, such as bonds and others—to bear additional interest costs in order to benefit those investors who bought bonds on their own initiative way back in 1936 and since then. It is even more difficult to justify the fortuitous benefit that would be derived by the vast majority of present holders with regard to the change in ownership that I just mentioned.

From the government side, how practical is the motion put forward by the hon. member for Don Valley? There are a number of concerns on the government side. First, there is the problem of trying to identify the original purchasers. Second, there is some problem with discrimination in the proof of purchase. There are problems concerning those bond holders who are deceased and the role of the successors in holding the bonds. There is a problem with selling recently at a loss, which would occur with some people. There is the problem with the proof of ownership once it has been discarded. It would discriminate against those people and would be in favour of those who maintain their ownership. There are various problems with redeeming prices below par.

Apparently various governments have looked at this possibility from time to time. The hon. member for Don Valley mentioned that the United Kingdom has gone very heavily into this type of investment as part of its debt structure, and there are others. The conclusion that has been reached by most of them has been that it would not be in the nation's best interest to fix the maturity date on these obligations.

There is also a concern about setting a rather difficult precedent, an implication that once we take some action to protect the investors from the vagaries of the market there is some discrimination against all other investors. Contrary to what some would propose, this does not apply to the issue of Canada Savings Bonds.

Therefore we have come down to the present solution proposed by the government, which is this. Having regard to all the circumstances, and although not necessarily to the current advantage of taxpayers, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) announced on March 18, 1975, that the 1936 issue of perpetual bonds would be redeemed at par on September 15, 1996. The legal process will be completed by June 7, at which time the Government of Canada will be irrevocably committed by law to redeem the bonds in 1996. Prior to the announcement the bonds were quoted at $37.25 per $100 for a yield of 8 per cent in perpetuity. At the present time the bonds are trading at a price of about $50.75 for a yield of 8.02 per cent to maturity. This yield is now comparable with other long term Government of Canada marketable issues.

Mr. Francis: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the hon. member a question?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Would the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Philbrook) permit a question?

Mr. Philbrook: I am just about to finish, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Francis: Mr. Speaker, I would like to get this correctly. What is the present price, and the present yield? Could the hon. member just go back to that? What is the quoted price and yield?

Mr. Philbrook: As I said, at present the bonds are trading at a price of about $50.75 for a yield of 8.02 per cent to maturity.

However the motion is resolved, I think it is obvious that the time has come for these very valuable historical bonds, and I simply hope that the people involved, although they might not have the ideal solution, will be able to accept the government's proposal as a reasonably fair one under the circumstances.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, on previous occasions when this matter has been debated we have spoken about it from this corner of the House as well. As a matter of fact my colleague, the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas), has taken a leading part in trying to get the government to do something about these perpetual bonds.

It still strikes me that it was one of the silliest things ever to write into a statute that a bond was to last in perpetuity. The other place where I know that word appears in a statute has to do with the Canadian Pacific Railway which promised to provide certain rail services in this country—passenger and freight—in perpetuity. If the word is not being lived up to by the CPR, I suggest that the holders of these bonds should not have to hold them forever, into all eternity, and then on to perpetuity.

I think all of us who have spoken up to this point support the principle or the spirit of the motion that is before us in the name of the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies). There has been some criticism of one or two of his suggestions, such as that of putting an immediate freeze on the market value of the bonds. But even those who have said that, have come down very strongly for settling this issue. It is cliche to stand in the House and say, "Let us settle something once and for all," but when the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Philbrook) said it, I wanted to say "hear, hear" because I think he has already indicated that the change which was made a couple of years ago has not resolved it, and trying to shift the ownership of these bonds has opened up room for speculation. That is my quarrel with the suggestion of the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. Francis) that there be a 1986 date. Any more dates down the road, I think, will produce further shifts in the ownership of the bonds and create a further opportunity for speculation. I think the time to settle it is right now.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) should take his responsibility and admit that the Liberal government in 1936 did not quite know what it was doing—that is par for the course with Liberal governments anyway—and redeem these bonds, working out a formula that pays the full value to those who have held them all the time and a lesser amount to those who have held them for a shorter period of time. I do not think we should try to resolve all the details here in this private members' hour.

I suppose it is too much to hope that the motion might pass just because the spirit of it is right, but I hope that all the voices which speak will be in favour of what is in the motion and that the government will pay some heed to that.

As I say, I welcome the strong stand which the hon. member for Ottawa West took on the matter. I forgive him for finding fault with one or two phrases in the motion, but he said one thing I wish he had not said, and that was that it probably is not the government which is doing it; that it is some civil servants. That surprises me, particularly coming from an Ottawa member. I hope civil servants do give advice to the government. That is what they are there for, but the final responsibility is that of the government. The final responsibility rests with the Minister of Finance, and I hope that in this case the minister will take his responsibility and, in the words of the hon. member for Don Valley, settle this issue, and in the words of the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Philbrook), settle it once and for all.

Mr. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, we have before us a motion proposed by the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies). It looks like a very reasonable proposition. The hon. member made a short speech appealing to the sense of humanity of the government and of this House. He called on the government to do something. Then when he sat down the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Kaplan) got up to ask him a few questions about the motion, questions which evidently have to do with technicalities and the major effects of this motion if it were passed, and at that point I could not believe my ears and my eyes when the hon. member for Don Valley refused to answer questions.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Caccia: The hon. member is a frontbencher of the official opposition. The official opposition criticizes the government daily in its questions, and it feels it does not receive adequate answers. There is quite a difference between a private member's motion which is prepared carefully in due time and what goes on in the question period when the frontbenchers of the official opposition shoot questions at ministers without any warning.

A motion in private members' hour allows its proponent to prepare himself to answer questions. That is much easier than the task of ministers in the question period. In question period hon. members opposite expect adequate answers. However, here is an aspirant to the ministry in case his party might—God forbid, of course—be elected to govern, who refuses to answer questions about his own motion.

Mr. MacFarlane: Secrecy!

Mr. Caccia: This is really a very sad moment.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): He didn't want to talk it out.

Mr. Caccia: Perhaps the only conclusion we can come to is that it is expecting too much of members of the official opposition to answer questions about their own proposals. Perhaps I am in error in attributing to them standards of performance which we on this side of the House apply every day as a matter of course when it comes to question period. Once in a blue moon an opportunity for us to ask questions of the official opposition arises, and today the most unbelievable thing has happened: our questions have been turned down or not accepted.

I wonder whether at this point there would be unanimous consent in this House to allow the hon. member for York Centre, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance, a second try. The parliamentary secretary is obviously a person who would have to justify the passage of a motion of this kind. He would have to have facts, and I presume those facts would have to be on the record. Perhaps he could be provided a second opportunity to ask the hon. member for Don Valley the questions he has in mind, and perhaps the answer could be put on the record so that we will know more about the effect and the result of a proposal of this nature.

Without wanting to stretch the point too far, it seems to me that this is the minimum required in any parliamentary exchange of thoughts. The proposal sounds reasonable, but when someone asks questions those questions should be answered so that a reasonably intelligent decision can be made on the basis of certain facts. I am sure there would be unanimous consent to permit a second try for the parliamentary secretary to ask questions of the hon. member for Don Valley about, I suppose, technical points with regard to the motion. I submit this request to you, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. The time of the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies) has expired, but if he will accept the questions I will ask the House if there is unanimous consent to allow the hon. member for Don Valley to answer the questions of the hon. member for York Centre (Mr. Kaplan). Is that agreed?

Mr. Gillies: Mr. Speaker, the reason I am not answering questions is that we only have an hour to discuss this matter. I do not want to have the matter talked out. I presume there is a willingness on the part of hon. members in this House to do something for the people of Canada, and I do not want to waste time answering questions.

Mr. Kaplan: Mr. Speaker, on the same point of order, it is very well to want all debate on the motion to be heard so that we can proceed to a vote, but is it not reasonable for the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies) to tell some hon. members who do not understand some of the provisions of this motion what he means by them? It is one thing to talk a bill or resolution out, but we have an hour. That gives us a lot of time to consider the matter, and I think the hon. member ought to be prepared to devote four or five minutes to clarifying and explaining his motion to us, rather than giving us such a flimsy excuse.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, I must say that to hear the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Kaplan) admit bold-facedly to this House that he does not understand the motion is really an affront to this House. When he tells us that with all the resources, expertise and bureaucrats available in the Department of Finance he and the minister do not understand the implications of this motion, that is an affront not only to parliament but to the sense of decorum of this House, and I suggest hypocrisy has no place in the House of Commons.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Kaplan: Mr. Speaker, at this point I am rising to participate in the debate.

Mr. Ellis: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I would like to indicate to the hon. member for Hastings (Mr. Ellis) that the parliamentary secretary asked the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies) if he would accept a question. The hon. member for Don Valley said no. Therefore the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Kaplan) should proceed with his speech.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Obliged?

Mr. Ellis: Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to challenge your ruling, but when the question was put to the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies), he very clearly said he would not answer it. With all due respect, Mr. Speaker, you clearly told the parliamentary secretary that that was on his own time, and I suggest he has started to speak twice on the same matter.

● (1740)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. The hon. member for Hastings' (Mr. Ellis) question was refused by the parliamentary secretary; therefore the parliamentary secretary has his 20 minutes. The hon. Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Kaplan).

[Mr. Gillies.]

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): It is now 19 minutes to six and the hon. member has 20 minutes.

M. Bob Kaplan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Hnatyshyn) began by being rather critical of the minister and myself because I asked for some clarification of the wording of the resolution. He made the assumption, I suppose that if there was something in this resolution that we could not understand, that was our fault. I would like to suggest that there are some problems with the resolution that make it difficult for anyone to understand who wants to look at it objectively and see what the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies) wants to do.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) pointed out that one should see the spirit of the resolution. Certainly I can see the spirit of it; I know what he is getting at but I cannot understand one part of it. I should like to read the resolution and indicate the part I do not understand. I should then like to make comments about the equity of it, the spirit of it, and why the government introduced the policy of redeeming the perpetuals in 1996 and not immediately.

As the hon. member indicated, redemption would not cost a large amount of money, certainly not something which would show in the estimates of the government. The point is that to redeem the bonds might do justice to a small number of people who are involved but it would do injustice to a number of other people who have been involved in the story of these perpetual bonds. I want to come to the story of the other people who have been affected by the perpetual bonds. The hon. member for Don Valley offers nothing to the people who have disposed of their bonds. It is a small amount of money, and if small amounts of money can buy perfect justice—and in a lot of cases they can—I think it ought to be done.

Mr. Ellis: Put forward a better idea then.

Mr. Kaplan: It would not be hard to put forward a better idea.

Mr. Ellis: We will accept a better idea.

Mr. Kaplan: The resolution reads as follows:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should reconsider its decision not to redeem the 3 per cent perpetual bonds, issued in 1936,—

Then the hon. member introduced an updating of his own because since the time his resolution was formulated and submitted to him the government acted in a way which has affected the value of the bonds somewhat in favour of the people who hold them. The resolution continues:

—through a scheme whereby (a) original purchasers would receive full face value for their bonds (b) all other holders would receive payment for each bond according to the market price for the year in which the bond was purchased (c) that an immediate freeze be placed on the market value of the bonds to prevent speculation.

I have some trouble understanding what the point of (c) is. If, after all, the bonds are to be purchased by the government at differential values depending on whether they have been held since they were first bought or have been purchased subsequently, then what is the purpose of the freeze? Presumably the bonds would cease to exist if they were to be redeemed and if they are redeemed they do not have any continuing market value. The holders and subsequent purchasers receive payment for them. When I read (a) and (b) I understand, but I am puzzled by (c) which reads:

(c) that an immediate freeze be placed on the market value of the bonds to prevent speculation

What further speculation is there to be in these bonds once the government announces it is going to buy them?

Mr. Ellis: Even the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia) can understand that difference.

Mr. Kaplan: I do not understand it. I asked for some assistance from officials in the Department of Finance. I take it from the hon. member's unwillingness to give an explanation that there is none. Why would we want to freeze the market value of bonds that are going to be redeemed if this resolution is adopted?

I indicated that to understand the equities of perpetual bonds one has to go back over the whole story which began in 1936 when the government of Canada issued $55 million of 3 per cent perpetual bonds at a price of $96.50 to produce a yield to first purchasers of 3.11 per cent in perpetuity. The issue was offered for cash as well as in exchange at par value to holders of a certain series of four year bonds maturing in 1936. A total of $11.3 million in bonds of a total issue of $55 million were issued in exchange for maturing bonds, and the balance was presumably purchased for cash.

The original certificates for the $55 million of bonds bore coupons providing for semi-annual interest. There were 30 years of coupon forms attached to the original bonds so that the last of the coupons would be payable on September 15, 1966. In 1936 the 3 per cent yield was considered relatively attractive because it provided a perpetual annuity on reasonable terms, so as a result it was broadly distributed. That was the first occasion and, I believe, the only occasion on which the government of Canada issued perpetual bonds. But there was a pattern of perpetual bonds, Mr. Speaker. They were an understandable security throughout the world of bonds. Similar bonds have long been an important part of the debt structure of the United Kingdom, and the hon. member for Don Valley aknowledged this. It was not some novel security never heard of before, but was well known in many countries. In 1935 about 60 per cent of the marketable outstanding debt of Great Britain was in the form of perpetual or undated bonds called consols.

The 1936 issue included a provision that the bonds could be called in whole or in part on 60 days' notice by the government at par any time after September 15, 1966, the date of the last coupon. If less than all the bonds were called by the government then the bonds to be redeemed would be determined by lot. Again, this call provision in a government perpetual security was a common feature of long maturity bonds issued by enterprises in the private sector. On the one hand, such a feature is intended to protect the bondholders from having their bonds called prior to the call date. This prevents the issuer from calling the bonds during periods of lower interest rates and refinancing them with bonds offering a lower yield.

In the case of the 1936 issue, the 30-year period did provide protection to the holders on those occasions when the bonds traded at prices exceeding the issue price. There were periods when they did trade at values in excess of the issue price. On the other hand, the right of the issuer to call provides protection to the country's taxpayers by permitting the bonds to be called subsequent to the call date should lower interest rate levels permit them to be refunded and replaced by lower cost debt. The 30-year call provision is therefore a trade-off between the interests of the lender and the borrower and, together with yield, constitute the basic determinants of the market value of a security of any given term. In September, 1966, new bond certificates were issued, with an additional supply of coupons attached sufficient for an additional 30 years. They replaced the 30-year-old bond certificates.

The perpetual bonds are marketable and their price is therefore determined by the play of market forces. Since they were issued, their market price has generally reflected changing levels of interest rates in Canada. For several years after the war the market price exceeded the issue price and, consequently, sellers of the bonds at that time could have and did obtain a capital gain. Within recent years interest rates in Canada and elsewhere have risen to much higher levels and the market prices of perpetual bonds, as for the vast majority of fixed interest obligations everywhere—I include government fixed rate obligations and fixed interest obligations issued by private sector enterprises—have, as a consequence, declined substantially below their issue prices.

At the end of 1976 about 45 per cent of perpetual bonds were held in bearer form. It is impossible to determine with any degree of precision which of these holders bought the bonds at the original purchase price, or at prices higher than the current market price. However, the balance of $30 million worth of bonds were held, at first issue, in registered form.

At my request the Department of Finance tracked down about half the number of bonds issued, namely, the registered bonds. They were held by 3,575 investors. Today, 1.3 per cent are held by investors who purchased the bonds at the time of issue in 1936. Those untransferred bonds are held by 109 investors, three of whom hold 60 per cent of the $379,000. Therefore part (a) of the motion, which calls for original purchasers to receive the full face value for their bonds, will apply to only 1.3 per cent of the total value of the issue. We are considering only the original bonds issued in registered form. Clearly, we are talking about a small amount of money. The hon. member is right. And we are talking about 109 people, a relatively small group.

Let us assume that the unregistered bonds have been held more or less in the same ratio. That would mean that we are talking about, say, 200 people who have retained their bonds from 1936. Their bond issues would now be valued at, say, about $750,000. The hon. member wants to call our attention to the injustices suffered by those who have had to hold their bonds for such a long time. Naturally, bonds not held by the original issuees have been sold to others. Some of those buyers bought at prices higher than face value, and others may have bought at below face value. The motion goes on to call on the government to repay the difference to bond holders.

The trouble with the motion is that it only calls for justice for those who presently hold those bonds. If you are putting the case on equitable grounds you must ask, are the equities greater for those who still hold those bonds, that is, for those who bought them on the date of issue or bought them subsequently, or for those who sold the bonds? The question arises, should one feel more sorry for those who have held the bonds all this time, or bought them within ten or 15 years of issue, when the price was not the same as the present price, or should one feel more sorry for those who took big losses?

The hon. member for Don Valley in referring to those people acknowledged that they had probably taken big losses. But he spoke of people who still have those bonds in their portfolios. Perhaps the people who were forced to sell did not have portfolios. Perhaps they had to sell because they needed the money, not for investing but for living. If you want to approach this issue on equitable grounds, would you not also want to hear from those who had to sell their bonds over the years and were forced to take less than they paid? The motion says, nothing about that group. If I were to guess, I would say that that group of people might be far worse off, having suffered more from inflation, than the group which presently holds the bonds and to whose cause the hon. member has been recruited.

There is a broader issue to consider. The hon. member's motion calls for justice for one small group of people hurt by inflation. But many people in this country have been the victims of inflation, and they have not all been victims at the hands of the government—if I can put it that way. If the government could write a cheque, to redeem the damage done by inflation, that cheque would have to be for an extraordinarily large amount. The victims of inflation tend to be the aged, tend to be those on fixed incomes, tend to be the poor. If we are to begin remedying injustices and compensating for inflation, does the hon. member suggest we should begin with bond holders? Perhaps we should take the amount of money involved—whatever it is—and compensate for inflation by helping those in society who are the worst off. I know the hon. member would agree with me when I say that the bond holders in Canada, the holder of government securities, are not usually among the worst off. I could refer to many existing programs of the government which fight inflation and seek to compensate its victims.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. It being six o'clock and the hour appointed for the consideration of private members' business having expired, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock p.m.

[Mr. Kaplan.]

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

EMPLOYMENT AND IMMIGRATION REORGANIZATION ACT

MEASURE TO ESTABLISH DEPARTMENT OF EMPLOYMENT AND IMMIGRATION, ETC.

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Cullen that Bill C-27, to establish the department of employment and immigration, the Canada employment and immigration commission and the Canada employment and immigration advisory council, to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971, and to amend certain other statutes in consequence thereof, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration.

Mr. Whittaker: Mr. Speaker, when we adjourned the debate on Bill C-27 at five o'clock, I was speaking about the mobility of workers.

When employment conditions generally worsened in 1970, the migration responses to differences in income prospects became less significant, and the short-term income increases experienced by migrants became less favourable. Of course, while the migrant may benefit marginally from the move, the migration process contributes in a minor way to the structural problem.

When an unemployed person leaves a region, he takes with him his expenditures on locally produced goods and services, which to a large extent is financed from federal transfer funds such as unemployment insurance and general welfare payments. Through the multiplier process, his reduction in expenditures produces an unfavourable effect on the sending region's employment.

Under the new phase schedule, this effect might be mitigated by compensating for high unemployment. Regions with unemployment rates near, or slightly above, the national average will be much better off, whereas places like Vancouver and Victoria would receive only eight weeks of national extended entitlement and receive no regional extended entitlement under the present system. The three-phase schedule would grant these regions 14 to 20 weeks of regional extended benefits in those circumstances where the national rate is 8 per cent.

I am skeptical, at best, about regional adjustments wherein unemployment figures are compared to the national average. The example of the Canada Works allocation in my riding and the fiasco surrounding the additional allocations for materials, have not endeared me to the government's generosity. Regional manpower figures certainly do not jive with those used as criteria for eligibility; but then the minister has assured me that "other factors were used".

That specific criticism aside, I wonder about the wisdom and intent of using 8 per cent unemployment as a benchmark for computing benefits and schedules. While this does not seem overly optimistic on the government's behalf, I suppose it is only realistic. Faced with the possibility of such a rate, the government must consider the ramifications. The financial impact of the new three-phase benefit structure at that rate will be, unfortunately, minimal. The logical course then is not only to try to minimize the losses, as this proposal thankfully does, but to attack the source of the problem—a sagging economy.

We know, for instance, that the pulp and paper industry is suffering. Sales started to recover in early 1976, but by mid-year demand was dropping. There was a price increase announced for July 1, 1976, and publishing companies responded by placing large orders early in the year and were fully stocked before the increases took effect. So we need new markets.

The construction industry association in British Columbia has indicated that, while there is no shortage of workers, the level of construction by private enterprise will be very low this year. This raises the cost of housing. Paradoxically, a high cost of housing is translated by the Department of Manpower as a sign of a healthy regional economy and disqualifies a riding from Canada Works funds. So less jobs are created, the price goes up even further, and on and on until about 21 per cent of union carpenters and labourers across British Columbia are collecting unemployment insurance. The government might suggest work sharing to ensure that their incomes be higher than U.I. benefits and that they don't lose their skills. The unions don't look too favourably on the idea, and seniority tends to affect the sharing scheme.

Fortunately, I can speak today with the benefit of the findings of the comprehensive review of the unemployment insurance program in Canada tabled earlier. It suggested further areas of study which I find to be the real crux of the issue and which the government has not had the courage to approach.

The extent to which the unemployment insurance program facilitates productive job search and speed in return of unemployed persons to productive employment relevant to their skills was one area. It cannot be argued that we do not need a program to insure against temporary loss or wages. But disincentives to work are inherent in the scheme, and the lack of an effective job creation and job search program only aggravates the situation. The labour force experience of the covered population has to be monitored. A more ambitious analysis of claimant behaviour before, during, and after a claim is necessary to evaluate the effects of the U.I.C. program in meeting its twin objectives of providing adequate income replacement and helping workers to a rewarding and stable employment.

After all, the effectiveness of the U.I.C. program depends on government's over-all social and economic policies and, in particular, on manpower policies and programs. We need policies to alleviate the problems, not some mechanical reaction to statistical quotations and budget estimates. We have to re-appraise the unemployment insurance, not only because it is costing too much but, because it is the wrong approach, it is a defensive reaction rather than an offensive assault on unemployment itself.

It is inhumane to threaten Canadians, to threaten to cut them off insurance benefits without promising to engage in job creation programs. It is demoralizing and damaging to the work ethic to charge so many Canadians with what amounts to fraud. We on this side of the House are the first to admit that there are rip-offs but these can and are being controlled at the administrative level. What we should be discussing, what we should be planning, are alternatives to unemployment, not alternatives to the insurance scheme.

It is frustrating for unemployed Canadians that nothing is being done. It is doubly frustrating for young Canadians contemplating post-secondary education to know, before they begin, that chances are poor of having the opportunity to apply their acquired talents. Those individuals have to be encouraged. We can't cop out on them now. They need and should be rewarded with a new budget which takes into consideration all the ills of our economic environment, and that addresses itself to these by providing stimulants. We need sales tax cuts and promotions for the housing industry. Industries should be encouraged to reinstate research and development programs. They should also be encouraged to locate in areas where unemployment is at its highest.

These approaches would cost, in the long run, less than trying to support close to a million people on transfer payments, because employment not only reduces the cost of the insurance scheme, it helps the economy get rolling again. Instead, we know that new capital investment will be down in Canada this year. We have to make every effort to recreate a climate of confidence in Canada or we will continue to see the great potential of this country wasted.

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, the introduction of this legislation is certainly timely, if only because it gives us an opportunity to discuss the unemployment insurance program, something which has become a major factor in our economy and, indeed, in our performance around the world.

I thought there were significant implications contained in the comprehensive review of the unemployment insurance program tabled in the House. It drew attention to the fact that expenditures on unemployment insurance are the equivalent of about 10 per cent of the total federal budget and 2.1 per cent of the gross national product. It is evident that the over-all economic and social impact of the program can hardly be underestimated, and its administration is of corresponding importance.

Unemployment insurance has come a long way since the thirties when the concept was to provide some sort of basic insurance against unemployment. While in its earlier days the provisions of the act constituted, for the most part, a true insurance program, the present act is obviously filled with items such as income maintenance, social welfare and other benefits, including "job creation" and so on.

With the bill before us, the government is putting a few patches on the act, proposing, among other things, that 50,000 people should be cut off the unemployment insurance rolls at a saving to the government of $110 million a year. The cost of the program today has certainly escalated since the days when Mackenzie King first introduced it. The estimate, then, was $70 million a year, whereas now the scheme runs through $70 million in a week and a half. Over the years a great deal of welfarism has crept in, the most obvious example being the provision for insuring groups with intermittent employment opportunities, for example, fishermen who, being self-employed, should not have been covered on any insurance basis. There is no doubt that fishermen should have a program available to them, but it would not be easy, as I understand fishermen, for them to be covered by an insurance program. I understand from conversations with many maritimers that if the fishermen were covered by some other program the statistics would not be nearly as bad, and the assessment of programs could be made on a sounder basis.

These new costs sent the fund into bankruptcy in the 1960's. The Gill Commission suggested that the fund be restricted to insurance purposes and further proposed that everyone, not just groups at risk, should be called upon to pay for coverage. The extension of coverage along these lines was obviously an important feature of Mr. Mackasey's reform of unemployment insurance in 1971.

Presumably Mr. Mackasey believed his new system was sacred. It has already been tinkered with. Last year people over 65 were dropped from the rolls. In addition the federal treasury was relieved of $600 million which was transferred, through a pay roll tax, to employers and employees. This year it is proposed to chop at the other end. People who work for less than 12 weeks may not claim benefits. This, I might point out, is in itself a departure from the insurance principle. The government takes money from these people, through deductions, and gives nothing back.

● (2020)

The diverting of money from the fund to a work sharing scheme is certainly not part of the insurance principle. No plan will ever be perfect, but the most serious criticism of the attempt to reform the unemployment insurance system is that it still leaves an element of welfare where needs are financed by a regressive tax which tends to hit the low income people harder than those of high income.

[Mr. Ritchie.]

The changes last year concerning the moving average system of deductions increases the employer-employee share to a higher and higher level, so that eventually the whole system will be borne by the employer-employee and the cost to the federal treasury will diminish to nothing. Indeed the thought arises that deductions would be so great that a system of contract might even replace wages, which seems to have been happening. I think this is an important observation because, since the government is going to transfer money to certain groups for a scheme, the cost of which is entirely borne by the employer and employee, with the government not putting in any money of its own, we could be in serious difficulties.

As a parliamentarian, and having observed the workings of unemployment insurance in 1971, in my opinion two main things have happened. The first was that the benefits were greatly increased over their pre-1971 level. As I recall, the level of benefits in 1971 was approximately 41 per cent of the average weekly wage, with many benefits as low as 30 per cent. The highest was slightly over 50 per cent, but even then the individual had to be in the low income brackets and have numerous dependants. Since the 1971 legislation it has been obvious that the program has shifted drastically from the insurance principle to income transfer, through the combination of welfare coverage, greater benefit entitlement, and federally financed extended benefits.

As the comprehensive review of the unemployment insurance program asks, should unemployment insurance play an increasing role in the redistribution of total income maintenance and in the government's over-all social and economic policies? In other words, should only those parts of the country that have a strong economy support those regions that have a weak economy? Certainly this is happening at the present time. Does this practice over a period of time merely perpetuate discrepancies and allow individuals to have as good a living and standard of care in one part of the country as in another, particularly when substantial groups of people do not need to work compared with those living in other parts of the country?

A study of the relationship between cost and employer-employee benefits and deductions shows many interesting things. For example, in 1974, the last year for which I have figures, citizens of Newfoundland received benefits of $114 million, with deductions of $26 million. Nova Scotia received benefits of $93 million, with deductions of $50 million. New Brunswick received benefits of $105 million, with deductions of $39 million. Quebec received benefits of $740 million, with deductions of $408 million. Ontario received benefits of $609 million, with deductions of $669 million. Manitoba received benefits of $49 million, with deductions of $71 million. Saskatchewan received benefits of $46 million, with deductions of $44 million. Alberta received $66 million, with deductions of $123 million. British Columbia received benefits of $281 million, with deductions of $178 million. Total benefits paid were $2,115 million, while deductions collected were $1,600 million. With an additional cost of $150 million for administration, the total cost of the plan was almost $2,300 million. In other words, $700 million had to come from the federal treasury, or out of general revenue.

Assuming that citizens in all parts of Canada paid approximately the same in tax, it is obvious that there has been a shift of money out of the prairies and Ontario to Quebec and the maritime provinces, while British Columbia broke about even. As one who comes from the prairies, I know there are many people in my area who leave for greater opportunities in British Columbia, where wages are considerably better and work opportunities greater. In short, in a province with primarily a high agricultural base, a number of its working force do quite poorly in terms of benefiting from unemployment insurance. They have to pay large amounts toward general tax revenue, but since they are a self-employed group they are not able to partake of the many benefits of the plan.

The review discusses the fundamental alienation of adequate income protection and work disincentives, and I think this is the central core of the whole program. All members will remember the large number of claims that were brought to their attention once the new act was introduced. I am sure many hoped, as I did, that as the program began to work itself out calls on individual members would settle down into some kind of regular pattern. This, in my experience, has not happened, and I think it has not happened because of the definition in the act that, in order to collect benefits, a claimant must be actively seeking work. Obviously this condition is very difficult to define, especially in rural areas.

Many people in my area have been cut off unemployment insurance because, in the eyes of the unemployment insurance officer, they did not have adequate transportation. Immediate job opportunities are often sparse in rural areas. The question arises whether or not rural workers are not disadvantaged, as it is much more difficult for them to prove they are looking for work than it is for those who live in cities.

Again, Mr. Speaker, I have been struck by the fact that I have little trouble with workers who belong to large corporations or large unions. These people seem to have a much easier time proving eligibility for unemployment insurance than those who work in less organized industries, particularly casual workers on farms, small company employees and so on. Where a claimant receives benefits it is, in large measure, a kind of lottery in that one has to make the right answers on the right form.

Naturally, Mr. Speaker, the decision on whether an individual receives unemployment insurance rests with the unemployment insurance officer. With this in mind, the amount of money paid out by the UIC depends on what a specific officer thinks of a specific application. I think this is the weakness of the plan. It does not appear to be fair and is not fair to many recipients.

There is no doubt that there is a large element of cynicism about who should receive benefits. The tribunal that was set up to guard against this does not seem to be very effective. In the past I advised applicants in my riding to appear before the tribunal to state their case, even though they may have had to travel 200 or 300 miles to do so. Judging from the actions of the tribunal, in my opinion they have always supported the unemployment insurance officer; as a result, I have quit advising people to make the journey because it is almost certain that the tribunal will find against them. Indeed the tribunal seems to go out of its way to make things difficult in some instances. For example, claimants have received a notice to appear after the date that was set for the hearing. In fact tribunals have themselves been doing their bit to clamp down on unemployment insurance by virtually always agreeing with the unemployment insurance officer.

Another important aspect is what effect unemployment insurance has on the work ethic, job attentiveness, and so on.

● (2030)

We hear much about the fact that people should have rewarding and fulfilling jobs, whatever that may be. Much of this would indicate that the necessity to work is not related to productivity or to doing a job that society finds useful. In effect most jobs are boring and unrewarding to the spirit, but there is little we can do about it. Life is like that. During the war an army selection group was supposed to put the square pegs in the square holes and the round pegs in the round holes, but as the war progressed people could neither be placed in positions they wanted nor could positions be found to suit them. At one time 90 per cent of the men had to go into the infantry because that is where the losses were the greatest.

When you consider Table C-5 of the comprehensive review which indicates that work shortages accounted for only 27 per cent of the lay-offs while voluntary separations amounted to 41 per cent, it is certainly interesting to note that of most people who quit their jobs only 25 per cent did so due to lack of work. The table also indicates that of those who quit voluntarily many did not make claims.

There are some interesting comments on disqualifications and disentitlement, one of them being that females have a significantly higher incidence of disqualification and disentitlement than males, regardless of insured weeks or dependency status. In other words, it appears they quit their jobs without any just cause in the eyes of UIC.

In Table C-15 there is a most significant factor in assessing the over-all effect on unemployment insurance. It indicates that only 26.8 per cent of males who received benefits had dependants, while 37 per cent who received benefits had no dependants. This was also significant with regard to females. Only 1.7 per cent of females who received benefits had dependants, while 34 per cent who received benefits had no dependants. In other words, of the total number of claimants, 71.5 per cent were single—or at least had no dependants. Further statistics showed that there was a significantly larger number of claimants under 25 years of age than people of that age in the work force, which is to be expected.

All of these facts should be a lesson to us, or at least an assessment of the way in which things are going. If only 27 per cent of job separations are due to shortage of work—and I doubt the number is that high because certainly most private employers, even when the job separation is voluntary, make out certificates indicating that there is no work available in order to enable the claimant to make his claim earlier—it certainly seems significant that almost 72 per cent of the claimants are single so far as the income tax is concerned. In other words, these single people in the labour force—at least single so far as income tax is concerned—did not worry too much about job separation and must have left their jobs because of personal reasons, unlike those who have dependants.

The question arises that if 66⅔ per cent of the average weekly wage is not too great a sum for single people—at least if we are to maintain the spirit of the UIC Act—then I believe that the crux of the problem is the benefits obtained by single people under this legislation. In fact in a country with our cold climate, if an unemployed person is to receive 66⅔ per cent of his wage in unemployment insurance benefits, there is some truth in supposing that many would consider themselves as well off not working, especially when the job entails working outside in cold weather, buying expensive clothes and working in unpleasant conditions. There are also complications with cars which refuse to start in cold weather, and other such difficulties resulting from the cold climate. We are all entitled in a free society to make the best we can in the circumstances, and I imagine that there are always some people in any society who arrange things in such a way that they do not have to work as hard as their fellow workers. No one, least of all myself, disagrees with their right to do this, but I think the question is whether or not they should receive equal remuneration for less work.

Another area that brings unemployment insurance into disrepute is the fact that the program makes little allowance for the dollars earned in any one year. With wages as high as they are now, particularly in certain industries, in a few months a person can earn $10,000 to $20,000 and yet draw unemployment insurance for a substantial portion of the year. Meanwhile there are many people who toil for a much smaller total yearly return, who are never unemployed, and who never draw unemployment insurance benefits. These people become very discouraged and resentful because they feel the system to be inequitable when deductions from their wages go to pay unemployment benefits to people who make a great deal more money than they themselves do because their jobs are seasonal.

Unemployment benefits should certainly be related to the total yearly earnings, and perhaps methods should be considered whereby the unemployed, particularly those in lower income groups, could have their deductions reduced or eliminated if they are unemployed for a number of years.

In my opinion benefits amounting to 66⅔ per cent of the previous wages are too high for claimants with no dependants. I think a good case can be made for claimants with dependants receiving this percentage of wages. I believe there is substantial evidence that when benefits amount to more than 50 per cent there is an abnormal call on the benefit structure. This is certainly true in the case of unemployment insurance related to job separations of many millions of people. Such a benefit structure plays a large part in encouraging excessive work changes and separations without just cause, at least causes other than the unavailability of work.

With regard to the change of the eight to 12 weeks I have mixed feelings, but certainly I think the old requirement of the eight to 16 weeks was far too generous. However, if a person pays unemployment insurance for eight to 12 weeks and then receives no benefits at all, he or she is unhappy, and it certainly seems unfair that they should not be able to receive some benefits for their contributions. Certainly they should not be able to receive the extended benefits received by those with a real attachment to the labour force, but it is debatable whether they should have nothing for their deductions.

We should consider the circumstances in our cold climate where much of the work is seasonal, and students are not entitled to benefits because they cannot qualify. This raises an issue which I think should be considered. Some of these people can only work for a few weeks and they will not be able to claim the benefits, so they should have no deductions from their pay.

The effect of this bill will be to reduce the claims on the unemployment insurance fund, but it will certainly not cure all the problems. The allocation of moneys for the partial payment of wages does not seem to be in keeping with the insurance principle. It does not attack the problem in the benefit structure which seems to encourage unemployment, particularly in the younger age group. On the national level it seems to create the problem in that regions with a high unemployment rate continue to have that high rate of unemployment. Furthermore, job mobility from one region to another will not be discouraged by high unemployment insurance benefits.

It might be wise for the government to bring forward some statistics along the lines produced in the comprehensive review showing whether or not job mobility from one region to another is being discouraged by high unemployment benefits and, if so, to what degree. There are still a good many unanswered questions in this legislation, and I hope the minister will provide some answers in committee.

Mr. Eymard Corbin (Madawaska-Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I think that when this government wants to sell a rather shoddy or questionable product it usually tries to package it together with some good which, at least apparently, looks more palatable. That is how I feel about Bill C-27, establishing the department of employment and immigration, the Canada employment and immigration commission and the Canada employment and immigration advisory council; a department, a commission, a council, it looks merely like a rearrangement of already existing institutions.

If all this commotion, this jumble of re-definition of terms of reference and structures, on both national and regional levels, were really to do some good to the country, I would certainly support the bill. Of course, a small army of officials has already spent a long time studying this issue. Some well-paid officials would have been more productive trying to solve our present problems instead of devising new structures which would clear up all difficulties. However, I would take a chance to support this part of the bill, not without strong reservation. I shall return to this later on if I have time.

For the moment, I want to come back to my preliminary comments on the title of the bill dealing with the reorganization of government services and also with the working labour force and is aimed at amending the Unemployment Insurance Act of 1971. It is on that part of the bill that I wish to make a few comments. It is also to that part of the bill that I referred at the beginning when I spoke about a shoddy product packaged with a palatable added as an appendix to be shaken off.

Everyone in the House knows that there are some people in this country—and by this I mean employers—who openly condemn unemployment insurance and pay wages which hardly reach provincial minimum wages. For such employers, the removal of unemployment insurance would be just like giving them carte blanche to take unfair advantage of a captive and poor labour force ignorant of their rights and the legislation. There is also another group of employers who can live with the Unemployment Insurance Act, but only to a certain extent.

The law allows them to make the best of difficult situations, generally to their advantage and at the expense of the employee. It is a way for those employers to get their activities subsidized. It is also a convenient way to free themselves of their social responsibilities and to pretend at the same time that they have a social conscience. That kind of employer consciously takes advantage of the system, and let nobody try to have me believe that only workers abuse the unemployment insurance system, when there are abuses.

The kind of employers I am referring to often take advantage of a slow period or a temporary or seasonal decrease of activity to lay off employees they should keep come rain or come shine. Those people simply say: "Society will take care of them, if they just apply for unemployment insurance." That is the reaction of those masters with little conscience.

I should point out that those two types of employers, that is the one who rejects unemployment insurance totally, and the other who accepts it because of the egotistical advantages the system provides for business and profits, those two types of employers can go into the same bag. Both refuse to recognize the right of their employees to organize into unions to protect their interests and will lay off any employee of theirs who talks about labour association. And it is not suprising that the employers of this type are found very often in areas of generally high unemployment. I could state names, but I shall not take advantage of my privileges as a member of the House to do so. However, I shall mention them outside when the time comes, Mr. Speaker, as I have already started to do.

And yet, when do we hear about these bad employers who abuse the system? Most of the time we hear about the small wage earner who can neither defend himself nor make use of the media to present his views. Apparently it is better not to mention these bad employers who hurt small wage earners who are defenceless.

If I have mentioned these two cases, Mr. Speaker, it is because I want to get rid once and for all of all these stories about workers who are supposedly taking the system for a ride. It is unfair on the part of the news media to spread these stories and to make generalization from exceptional cases. Rather, let us talk about employers who force some of their employees into ambiguous situations where often the weakness of human nature prevails.

It is unfortunate to use this bill to reduce the revenue of the poor, for such is the effect that this bill will eventually have. And at this very moment, Mr. Speaker, most of the workers do not realize all the implications of this bill. They do not realize that they will be the victims three months, six months, two years from now whenever this bill will be enacted, if ever.

I do not like this legislation and I say so quite frankly, I do not like it being introduced along with a measure of administrative reorganization. I can support the first part, which is not perfect but which has undoubtedly become necessary because of the defects in the old organization and particularly because of the lack of integrated services to the working force over the years.

Last Thursday evening, while driving home, I listened to a review of the area press in the Atlantic provinces. It was a CBC broadcast and the commentator who was reviewing some press reports said at one point that the government had been forced to amend the UIC Act to calm down the outcry raised particularly in Ontario during the last general election.

I cannot believe, Mr. Speaker, that this is so. Oh, we all heard those self-righteous voices during the last general election as well as during the previous one asking the federal government to cut down unemployment insurance and force the people to go to work. If this is the situation the commentator was referring to last week, he was probably right in guessing that the government simply wanted to improve its electoral position with an eye to the next general election, but never would I believe that measures that have proved beneficial until now and have dealt with a situation in our economy that had to be corrected as it has been since would be abandoned.

I warn hon. members from Ontario, the province from which rose the outcry. Regardless of the side of the House on which they sit, it seems to me it is their duty to explain to their electors—and perhaps I could make the same request of hon. members who come from more privileged areas in Canada—that there are areas in Canada whose rate of growth is still lower than the national rate. It is also their duty, as I see it, to counterbalance what the press reports about the few persons who abused the unemployment insurance system. Is that any reason to punish everyone by reducing, across the board the number of weeks giving entitlement and benefits? To my mind, that is a blow to the poor worker who cannot defend himself.

It is difficult for city dwellers—and in this, I am not making a personal reference to the colleague who sits across from me this evening—but it seems to me it is difficult for people who come either from Forestville or Westmount to understand or try to imagine the situation a family head, father or mother, without work, as there are some now in my riding of Madawaska-Victoria where a number of work activities producing employment depend essentially on the seasons, and where the difference between work and unemployment depends on outside factors and decisions more often than otherwise than on the will to work of my elector.

As several hon. members said before, it is not a matter of working when we feel like it and then taking holidays at the expense of the Unemployment Insurance Commission. When there is work in Madawaska-Victoria, people work! They are eager to work! Whole families, for generations, have gone into exile in the United States to respect their right to work, to earn the daily bread on their table, to feed their children and send them to school. And even today, in my province of New Brunswick, many citizens leave their city, their town, on Sunday night, to go and work in Saint John, in New Brunswick, and come back home late on Friday night or early Saturday morning.

Those people want to work, they go where they can find work. However, there are limits, Mr. Speaker; some people cannot travel. Some people have too many local obligations to be able to sacrifice everything to a rather temporary job. Unfortunately no mention is made of such situations.

There is very little industrial decentralization in favour of underdeveloped areas in spite of the considerable effort made by the present federal administration which provides for loans without interest, subsidies for manpower training and many other programs. Indeed the government decided a bit late to decentralize their own operations, which is an excellent move. Far be it from me to try to minimize the important part played by the Department of Regional Economic Expansion since 1969. I give them very high marks because they tried to improve the regional economy of the Atlantic provinces in particular. However, I give the highest mark to those industrialists in the Atlantic region who took full advantage of the DREE programs to create temporary and permanent jobs in our part of Canada. But I have yet to see, except for some very rare exceptions, the private sector of central Canada, of the very prosperous city of Toronto for instance, send us industries and take advantage of the benefits offered by the Department of Regional Economic Expansion.

I am quite aware, Mr. Speaker, that we are discussing the unemployment insurance plan and the reorganizing of federal employment services. Yet, it is difficult not to mention the Department of Regional Economic Expansion in that context, and I seriously wonder if the reorganization went far enough, if some components of the reorganization of the Department of Manpower, as we know it at the present time, would not have made more sense being linked with some of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion whose main task is to create and promote creation of new industries in the Atlantic area.

However, if we have missed the boat this time, we must hope to get on board later on. We must achieve not only a better coordination of components within the Department of Manpower and Immigration and the Unemployment Insurance Commission but also better relations between this and other government departments.

Mr. Speaker, I am not in the mood to support the amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act as contained in this bill. Tonight we talk about the principle in general. I deliberately avoided going into details; I hope I will have that opportunity further on at the committee stage or when the bill comes back to the House, if we are not successful in having some amendments passed. Several times in the last few months, I examined that question, not individually but with several of my colleagues, and I must admit quite frankly tonight that I do not have a clear conscience about the bill as it is now presented. I cannot say all I have to say, but I only want to express what I think is the concern of many of my constituents, many citizens from New Brunswick and even from the entire Atlantic region. And I will have the opportunity, as I said earlier, to come back to that matter.

[English]

To conclude, Mr. Speaker, I should like to refer briefly to a fairly thick document received a few weeks ago entitled "Comprehensive Review of the Unemployment Insurance Program in Canada" published by the Unemployment Insurance Commission. This study, said to be the first of its kind, was done with the help of official departmental experts and a number of outside consultants. It is presented as the first major analysis of the impact of unemployment insurance on Canadian society and economy.

The study is, if I may say so, rather non-conclusive in many of its conclusions. One of the statements which has drawn my particular attention is found in the concluding observations on page L-8, and I quote:

> It should be noted that the review did not examine the more beneficial socio-economic impacts of UI, such as maintaining dignity, supporting a skilled job pool, etc.

Goodness knows what they mean by "etc.". It is beyond my comprehension that the document which is presented under the guise of the first major analysis of its kind would leave out such a fundamental concern as the one I have just referred to, that is, "the more beneficial socio-economic impacts of UI, such as maintaining dignity, supporting a skilled job pool, etc."

It is for these two reasons that I cannot go along with the bill as much as I know of it and as much as I have read about it. Perhaps I am a slow learner. I do not have the legal training of the super experts who have made statements on the bill. In certain respects it is a jungle. Only an experienced lawyer can make his way through the mumbo-jumbo of some of the propositions of the bill. But one thing hits home, openly and directly—the small worker, the small man and his family, will be adversely affected by some of the clauses modifying the Unemployment Insurance Act. I do not like that.

[Translation]

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to make a few comments on the legislation before us. At the outset, I would like to say that I have followed very closely the speech made by the hon. member for Madawaska (Mr. Corbin) who, in my opinion—

Mr. Corbin: Madawaska-Victoria!

Mr. La Salle: —Madawaska-Victoria, granted, who, in my opinion, seemed concerned about this legislation. He said that his fellow citizens are also concerned, and I believe that on the government side, there are also other members who are as concerned as he is. I would hope that, like the previous speaker, they will have the courage and the candour to point out to the minister the concerns and dangers involved in this legislation.

It is true that reference is made to restructuration and reorganization. It is also true that this is an experiment, and since this government has made several such experiments in the past decade but not always with the anticipated results, I believe, like the hon. member for Madawaska-Victoria and this side of the House, that we have every reason to be concerned and to entertain serious doubts about this new experiment of the government and the minister. Moreover, when considering the bill before us one might well wonder why the government had to introduce such legislation. About two weeks ago, I said in this House that the government was much more willing to introduce social measures than to create jobs, and in view of its numerous failures, I feel we have been very generous towards unemployment insurance and other social measures.

Today we want to apply a certain rigidity, which we did not dare do a few years ago, and as it then seemed to be a makeshift or a short term solution which is now turning into a long-term solution, we are forced to back up to a point where we will embarrass thousands of Canadians. Given this legislation which requires 12 weeks instead of eight for claimants to qualify, it is clear in the present context that the period was never so ill chosen to introduce such a bill.

Perhaps a measure of this kind could have been introduced a few years ago but they waited for years and years. At the very moment when specialists forecast an increase in the rate of unemployment for 1977 we are presented with a legislation that will in effect send thousands of Canadians directly to welfare offices without considering—and perhaps the government thought about it—that the provinces are responsible for the additional expenditures for people they will help financially because they are no longer entitled to unemployment insurance benefits. We believe, of course, as the government does, that work incentives must be put in—we agree on that—but I do not think that the period was well chosen to introduce such a legislation.

And there is absolutely no concern about those areas facing great difficulties with that plague called unemployment. Thank God, an amendment will be introduced in due time to ask Parliament at least to enforce that minimum qualification period of 12 weeks only in areas where the unemployment rate does not cause too much hardship. We hoped, of course, to have the support of a majority in this House considering that I think this amendment is quite humane and quite logical in view of the economic context in which we find ourselves if we seriously want to avoid the worst from the results of this legislation.

So, as I was saying, Mr. Speaker, in the absence of adequate policies to create jobs, they managed to introduce measures to keep people on unemployment. Indeed, I repeat that the Prime Minister did warn us that we would have to get used to a rate of unemployment that was at the time much lower than it is today. But when we talk of about one million unemployed in this country I seriously wonder, Mr. Speaker, whether that is really the best time to introduce such a legislation. Once again, it seems that the government could not care less about the amount of money the provinces will have to pay to these persons, once they will be on welfare. I think we will find other short-term solutions. One hears of course of all the savings which will be made on the cost of the programs and which will be used to find all kinds of new policies to help raise our productivity and create job training or job creation programs. But, Mr. Speaker, the government has already adopted similar policies through its Canada Manpower Centres with a certain success but this did not prevent unemployment to increase in Canada to the present high level.

I think this is the very moment to invite the minister to weigh seriously the effects that the enforcement of this legislation could have, particularly on the most disadvantaged areas, and when I say disadvantaged I mean the areas where the present rate of unemployment is totally unacceptable. To think that all people who draw unemployment insurance benefits are not seeking jobs is totally wrong. In the area I represent, I met this morning with some union representatives and I had the opportunity to discuss with them and with journalists who are seriously studying the situation in my constituency where the rate of unemployment seems to be now around 10 to 13 per cent, a rate which we had never seen in this area before. There is a great deal of concern there about this legislation.

I do not know yet to what extent this legislation now before the House will not be implemented. Under normal conditions, I would be in complete agreement with the minister. If we had a reasonable unemployment rate, I would fully agree with the government. But the hon. member for Madawaska-Victoria (Mr. Corbin) referred to the concerns, the dangers and the hardships that such a legislation would cause, and I think that we, on this side of the House, have been quite outspoken on this issue.

Are these comments enough to make the minister realize the seriousness of the present situation? All this because the government failed to develop adequate policies and to have enough leadership to prevent us from facing a catastrophe.

Unemployment is the main disease of Canada. But once again, we have long said that the government has not had the foresight even to protect Canadian industry, which, in my opinion, if more courageous action had been taken, could have maintained a much lower unemployment rate than the present one.

May I also remind the minister of a flagrant injustice concerning this whole unemployment insurance policy? I want to mention it particularly because the government has already referred to and agreed to rectify an injustice, a monumental mistake that some officials made in December 1975 concerning people aged 65 who were declared ineligible for unemployment insurance benefits during the following year even if they did not find any employment. I would like to note that this concerns a group of people of which nearly 99.9 per cent had seldom received unemployment insurance benefits and who had been most proud and laborious for 40 or 45 years.

The decision made by the government in December 1975 rendered them ineligible for unemployment insurance if they wished to stay in the work force. Of course, when those people lost their entitlement to unemployment benefits and had to rely on their old age security pension, they naturally claimed benefits from their retirement pension plans, whether the Canada Pension Plan or the Quebec Pension Plan. They had no other choice, and since the officials had told them that it was all over, they applied for the Quebec Pension Plan. Recently, after a number of people complained about a vested interest, the government lost this case and it is now obliged to pay unemployment insurance benefits to these people. But in this case, in its own typical way the government has deceived these people of 65, stating that it would pay back only those who have not applied for retirement pension benefits. I know that when you claim benefits under the Quebec Pension Plan or the Canada Pension Plan, you recognize effectively that you no longer wish to work. But it is necessary to remind the House that if those people have applied under a pension plan, it is because they were deceived when they were told they would no longer be entitled to any unemployment insurance benefits.

In a most generous move, the minister is prepared to pay them back until they get the first pension plan cheque. But we all know, Mr. Speaker, that they would have been better off if they had received unemployment insurance benefits to which they were entitled. They have won their case. It was more interesting than claiming under their retirement pension plan. In order to eliminate this inequity, last week I moved a motion under Standing Order 43. It was rejected by my friends opposite. I was asking the government to agree at least to pay the difference between the retirement pension plan and unemployment insurance benefits to which these people were entitled.

And I hope the minister will take that opportunity to correct the injustice towards those senior citizens for whom we as members of parliament must have the greatest respect considering their age and their services to society. Is it necessary to talk about it for 20 minutes? I hope not, Mr. Speaker, but I think this is the most abominable action taken by a government against senior citizens. And I am sure that on the other side of this House some members agree with me and have already made recommendations to the minister to correct that unacceptable and indefensible injustice towards those senior citizens.

I do not know by what means I could defend that category of people, but as limited as they might be, I should not hesitate to insist that justice be rendered to those senior citizens manipulated by civil servants or by the government concerning a vested right. I find it absolutely scandalous that the government hesitates to correct completely an injustice. Of course, some people will tell me, that the situation will be partially corrected but we have no right to hesitate to correct completely a mistake made by civil servants and that the minister agreed to correct partially. The minister understands very well my view. If the minister has a minimum of human feelings, I think he can understand that those people are not only entitled to those allowances, but that they need them. I hope that those few comments and this appeal to the minister will be taken seriously and that eventually, and as soon as possible, the minister will announce, maybe tonight, that he will correct completely the injustice made by his own civil servants or his own department.

I also wish to mention that it might be important for the minister to consider a question that was put to me this morning, Mr. Speaker. I was asked if in the case of a person who normally would have been entitled to make a claim for unemployment insurance allowances and complying with all the criteria imposed by the minister, if the spouse could benefit from her husband's entitlement?

This has not been cleared up adequately. I have put this question to many persons who told me to put it to the minister since it seemed to bother him. It annoys me also but I believe that the government will respect the vested right of the widow whose husband was entitled to unemployment insurance benefits in 1976, regardless of the term, and will pay to her the benefits to which her husband was entitled.

Mr. Speaker, I will add also that the bill under study will probably annoy the farming community. In my riding as elsewhere in general, we know that there is a high manpower demand during the summer months. The claimant entitled to unemployment insurance benefits for a few months still will hesitate before accepting a summer job planting or harvesting if he is not guaranteed a minimum of eight weeks' work.

Obviously, the 12 week qualifying period will mean that thousands of claimants will be reluctant to work on farms next summer and they will possibly be called lazy but we must understand that if they do not work 12 weeks—and no farmer will want to guarantee them 12 weeks—they will surely not try to qualify for such employment next summer, since they are almost certain that it will be for only eight, nine or ten weeks. Such a situation not only prompts this type of worker to claim unemployment insurance but also annoys our farmers who do not have the help they need. They will lack workers and face enormous difficulties. I wonder whether we should not be seriously considering other similar categories. It seems to me that farming already has enough problems and difficulties. After federal policies have hit the dairy industry, is this the time, Mr. Speaker, to impose new problems on our farmers?

I wonder whether serious consideration was given to the implications for our farmers and producers. It is my hope that at the committee stage, amendments will be put forward to avoid hindering more people, to make this legislation positive. I feel it is my duty as a member to express these concerns, and as I said I am very much pleased that an hon. member opposite is worried by the bill and flatly stated he was not prepared to support it tonight. He hopes as we do that certain amendments may remedy the weaknesses. I will spare the House with data that were so aptly referred to by hon. members before me.

I commend the hon. member from Hamilton who stressed the need for an amendment in favour of areas now facing tremendous difficulties, and in my view the government cannot refuse to consider the amendment we will be putting forward. It is also my hope that the government, the minister in charge will remedy as fast as possible the injustice done to people 65 and over. This is the main item I wanted to bring to the attention of the House. I will conclude with the hope that the minister as I said will seriously consider my remarks as well as all remarks and recommendations that have been and will be put forward by my colleagues.

[English]

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to take up the time of the House for long. I must say that the measures which the government has introduced to tighten up the unemployment insurance provisions are not necessarily measures I would oppose, given a different economic situation, given a different approach to the question of unemployment. But since we start this debate with unemployment at 8 per cent, perhaps 11 per cent in real terms, it seems to me the government continues to put the cart before the horse.

It is the duty of any government worth its salt to provide work for those of its citizens who wish to accept it. The present government and the government before it have failed appallingly in terms of their obligations to the citizens of this country. Let me say this: it is also the duty of all the citizens of this nation to accept work. I do not believe for one minute that we are a society capable of lying around in parks and dreaming while making this a worth-while community. If this House would accept a reciprocal ethic, one which says we have an obligation to provide work for the citizens, and that the citizens have an obligation to accept that work, we would not need this bill and we would not be sitting here arguing and worrying about the deficit in the unemployment insurance fund. We would then have a society which was starting to build together, a society with a common purpose. Therefore when I deal with the specific provisions of the bill I do not want to sound like a dog in the manger.

I want to tell you, Mr. Speaker, that an NDP government does not like people cheating on unemployment insurance any more than anybody else does, and that we would be just as firm in making sure that the rules were obeyed. But I also want to tell you that in the constituency I represent, New Westminster, in one week in January 1,500 people showed up to get their unemployment insurance claims in. These were not people who were skiing out on Whistler or flying to Hawaii. They are not cheats. They are genuine, ordinary people, people this economy has failed. They want to do something productive. They do not want to sit around and loaf. To suggest they do, is a myth propagated by those who do not understand the nature of the Canadian people.

Not only did 1,500 people apply for unemployment insurance in my riding in one week in January, but in one trade alone, that of carpenter, 450 people registered as unemployed. No less than 450 carpenters, heads of families, were unemployed. Why? One of the reasons is that the OFY, LIP, Canada Works, Youth Works programs, you name them, are starting to take over some of the jobs they used to do, and instead of paying carpenters' rates they are paying lower rates for the same jobs.

Carpenters do not want to go on unemployment insurance. They want jobs. They are in the hiring halls every day but they are not called. They are not called because the government will not embark on capital projects to put them to work. We used to have a winter works program, not make-work, but real work. We could even now put our municipalities to work. I am pleased to hear the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. Holt) applauding. I know she agrees with this. We need capital works. I am looking at the minister now and hoping he will agree, too. We cannot continue to hold the fabric of Canadian society together with LIP. That doesn't work. We are not ready to sit in sloth in this country. We want meaningful capital investment.

If the minister would like to show some leadership I could take him to my riding; we could clear up the bars in my constituency along the Fraser River. It would take five years and thousands of people to do it. It would be creative in terms of people sitting on bars fishing. There is a whole recreation potential there which is fantastic. But we will not do it because an entrepreneur has not got up to say, "I want to do it." Mr. Speaker, if free enterprise refuses to do the things which create work, I believe there is an obligation upon the government to do so. But it has not done it, and it will not do it. I believe ministers will not do it because they are stultified. They refuse to see the other side of the equation.

We have to put people to work in order to reduce the crime rate and build this country back together. The crime rate is only one aspect of the social disintegration which has gone on as a result of the permissive society of the sixties. That society was not healthy, and the sooner the government recognizes it the better this country is going to be.

God knows, I would not stand in this House as a member of the New Democratic Party and object to unemployment insurance. Of course it is necessary, it is desirable, and it is humane.

But a good government would not need very much unemployment insurance, and we would not be taking part in a raging debate over the subject if we had good government. We have experienced high unemployment because there has never been in this country a national government with a will to create full employment. I hope some day the people will wake up and vote for a government which has as its number one plank the creation of full employment. It can be done. It has been done in many societies, and it does not destroy the economy. It can even co-exist with free enterprise. But because chambers of commerce moan and groan we shall not move decisively in this direction.

Then again, we live in a society which is foreign-dominated, which means we cannot manufacture here; we simply dig out and ship, and until we come to grips with this aspect we shall not solve our unemployment problems.

● (2130)

Something that bothers me about this legislation, Mr. Speaker, is clauses 52 and 53, and I should just like to deal with specifics for a moment. As the minister knows, these provisions deal with experience rating. He has decided to abandon the principle of experience rating. My constituents who work in the mills are getting a little tired of having to subsidize other people. The guys who work all year long, apart from their three week holiday, and who do the tough job of pulling lumber off the chains, or who work in Oshawa manufacturing cars, are also getting a little tired of paying their unemployment insurance contributions knowing they will never collect. They would like to see their industries experience rated so that their premium is reduced. I think people in the construction industry, including my friends in the trades such as carpenters and plumbers, would be willing to see their industries experience rated as well. I think it is time we quit subsidizing contractors in Canada in that they have a ready made pool of labour available whenever they need it. It is a mistake to abandon experience rating. We should keep it in mind because it could make a significant difference in terms of the way we fund programs.

I said something about unemployment insurance cheaters. I want to give a commitment to the House that this party would be just as vigorous in prosecuting those who do not abide by the law. But I am a little tired of hearing about middle class families signing the weekly card for, say, a daughter in Hawaii, and then complaining about what a terrible society we live in. Honesty is for everybody, not just a few. One aspect to this life is that everybody wants to get as much as they can while giving as little as they have to, and that is wrong. I think we have all seen examples of the rare cheater on unemployment insurance, and the sympathetic mother who says, "Well, she has worked very hard and needs a holiday, and actually she would have taken a job if one had been available". We must prosecute people who cheat; otherwise the credibility of the whole unemployment insurance program will be brought into disrepute.

[Mr. Leggatt.]

Having said that, I am still unsympathetic to the change from eight to 12 weeks. I have heard that it is proposed to move an amendment at some stage to the effect that 12 weeks is all right in some parts of the country, but there are areas where more than 12 weeks is all right too. This would not wash very well with someone in my riding who works eight weeks and cannot get unemployment insurance, and then he hears of someone in Nova Scotia who has worked eight weeks and can. If this House accepts that kind of amendment we will have lost our sense of proportion and justice. Any worker in British Columbia who works eight weeks is entitled to unemployment insurance every bit as much as someone in Nova Scotia or Newfoundland.

Mr. Caccia: Nonsense.

Mr. Leggatt: It is not nonsense at all.

Mr. Caccia: Have you never heard of regional economic development?

Mr. Leggatt: I would be happy to listen to the hon. member. Could he tell me why constituents in my riding are second class citizens? Why should a worker be entitled to draw unemployment insurance after eight weeks in Nova Scotia but not in British Columbia?

Mr. Caccia: They do not pay the same premiums. You are talking nonsense.

Mr. Leggatt: I would be happy to listen to the hon. member, who appears to be supporting the proposition that there is one law for one part of the country and another for another part. When a person is poor, he is just as poor in British Columbia as in Newfoundland. Poverty itself is a rotten thing, and those who are poor need help from this legislation, no matter in which part of the country they live, so let us not get sucked into the idea that because one part of the country has a higher unemployment rate than another part, the rules should be different in terms of collecting unemployment insurance. That would be a mistake. It would be divisive and would not contribute a darned thing to national unity.

I believe there are some obvious things that the government can do. The minister keeps shrugging his shoulders over what are remarkably practical propositions which have been made by members of this party and which, in effect, are supportive of the capital system. A tax cut at the lower income level would do a great deal to help small businesses in my community, but this has been rejected. A federal winter works program and additional housing programs have also been referred to by hon. members.

Then last, but I do not think least, cannot we somehow put the two major problems of increasing energy costs and unemployment together so as to reduce energy costs and create employment? What I have in mind is a national insulation program. Why in God's name this is rejected out of hand by the government is beyond my comprehension. There are six million building units in this country in need of insulation and of government financial assistance, yet the only move in this direction was a minor effort in P.E.I. and Nova Scotia. I think the will to govern is starting to slide.

Mr. Herbert: Where are you going to get the insulation from?

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): If you do not know that, you should not be here.

Mr. Herbert: There is already a shortage of it.

Mr. Leggatt: Is the hon. member telling me he cannot find any rock wool and people looking for work? Let him try some of the 800,000 unemployed; they will tell him how to put insulation into a house. They do not need the hon. member's kind of sophisticated university training for that; they know how to insulate a house, and they will find a way to do so.

I understand the minister's concern to see that this legislation works in a rational way. If he were to bring the legislation back after having reduced unemployment to 4 per cent, then he might get some help from this party. We are facing a national crisis not only in terms of unemployment but of what many of us see as a breakdown in the social fabric. I think we need a Canada youth corps. The Minister of National Defence (Mr. Danson) did bring in a bill to this effect which he abandoned.

● (2140)

I hope that we can give consideration to enabling the youth of this country to spend two years contributing to the country and learning about it, not merely in terms of the military—that should not be excluded—but in terms of a whole range of activities. As a result we would, first of all, effectively reduce the number of unemployed, we would reduce to a large extent the deficit we are now facing and the problems we are facing with unemployment insurance, but, most of all, we would be making a contribution to holding this country together. We could ask young people from 18 to 24 years of age to donate their time to this country, to go across the country and get to know Quebec, the maritimes, the prairies and the west coast. We would be doing a great service, and this would take us out of our ideological straitjacket. We would be doing something imaginative, something that would be a positive contribution to the two major problems we are facing, namely, unemployment and national unity. I ask the minister to give serious consideration to something more than the kind of sophistry we have been facing in the House for so long.

Mr. Anderson: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I wonder if the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt) would allow a question.

Mr. Leggatt: By all means, especially since I ran out of time.

Mr. Anderson: The hon. member mentioned in his speech the winter works program. I wonder if he would agree to a winter works program that is not simply oriented toward labour, in other words, that contains grants for labour as well as grants for material and equipment and thus be of practical use in those communities in Canada that have a difficult time with finding money for such programs. I hope the hon. member would agree that the winter works program should include not only grants for labour but also grants for capital expenditures for equipment and materials in order for the program to be meaningful, especially in small communities which do not have the same financial base as do the larger communities.

Mr. Leggatt: I am delighted to hear the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Anderson) support the main thrust of my remarks tonight. I agree with his point. Certainly I was not restricting capital investment to labour. I am quite prepared to accept the fact that these capital grants should be on capital projects. They would have to include materials and be administered by the municipalities themselves, which this government and previous governments have starved of money. Let us put the responsibility back at the local level. We do not need the bureaucracy to do it; we already have small municipalities in place to administer these funds. What we need is a major and massive capital investment at the municipal level to create the kind of employment we need, and I am delighted to hear the hon. member support my point of view.

Mr. Cecil Smith (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, it certainly gives me great pleasure to rise to speak on this bill because I come from an area of Canada where the rate of unemployment is very high and where unemployment insurance is abused, and I will speak on the latter point later.

I have been dubbed here in the last two weeks as the $5 million constituency man, not only by people outside the House but by some members of the House and some cabinet members. I do not know whether they expect me to take my hat off to them, but let me point out that the estimated unemployment rate of 19.74 per cent in my area is underestimated because we have communities in northern Manitoba where the unemployment rate is running closer to about 90 per cent or 95 per cent.

Starting last fall we had a $1 million LIP allocation in the constituency. Before we could even snap our fingers, another $1.4 million was made available through FLIP. Then of course on March 20 the Canada Works program was brought in. The first indication we had of the Canada Works program was on December 20. When the allocations were made, a total of $943,000 was made available through Canada Works. The Indian allocation amounted to $843,000, and the regular allocation was $100,000. I believe the reason that one allocation was made to Indians and a separate regular allocation was made is that whoever devised the Canada Works program had his head in the sand and did not realize what the implications would be. The money is all divided up by a ministerial advisory board which O.K.'s the project. I will tell you what it does.

It completely eliminates the Metis and the non-status Indians and the others, which is what we call white people in the north. This is consistent across all communities in the north. It drives a wedge between the community that has status Indians and the one that has non-status Indians and Metis. It divides these communities. The line is often through the bush. Often there is intermarriage and someone on the other side of the line is just as unemployed and just as deserving as the status Indians living on the reserve who will be getting the benefits.

I brought this to the attention of the minister because I thought there was no need for a ministerial advisory board to divide up something that has already been decided by the dreamers or the designers of this country in a program to which little thought was given. This program was thought up very quickly to give band-aid treatment to the problem of unemployment.

The next program that was brought out was Young Canada Works, with an allocation of $379,000 to the Churchill constituency. By this time whoever had designed the Canada Works program was at least smart enough not to make an Indian allocation and a regular allocation because they could see what would happen. They realized it would drive a wedge between the communities in the north. Next came the FLIP program. The FLIP program was for $1,088,000. Again this program was rushed into with little or no thought given to the allocation of moneys, and there was no planning of the projects that were to be carried out. In the course of about four months $2.4 million was allocated under LIP, $1,088,000 under FLIP, $943,000 under Canada Works, and now $379,000 under Young Canada Works. On top of this we have a program called LEAP which is also injecting money into the constituency.

I would not be surprised if the government were to come up with a "FLOP" program pretty soon. It would be called the federal labour optional program. The way the government is going the FLIP program and the "FLOP" program would fit in quite nicely, because the government is flip-flopping around the country trying to alleviate the unemployment situation. However, what it is really doing is thoroughly confusing people who are really in need of jobs.

● (2150)

What came along with the Canada Works program was a new batch of project officers. The project officers who worked in the LIP program were not even considered. Along came a whole new batch of project officers for each of these programs, and I will tell the House exactly what happened in the north. Some communities are 200 miles away from a central distribution point, and the only way to get to them is by air. One project officer was working on a LIP project, one on a FLIP project, and one on a Canada Works project. There were three different project officers who did not even know what the other project officers were doing. They were chartering aircraft into these communities to look after their part of the program, which is absolutely ridiculous. People in isolated areas of this country do not know whether their project officer is there for LIP, FLIP, Canada Works, or the LEAP program. They do not have any idea of what is going on.

One would think that with this much money going to the north there would be a saving on welfare payments I did some checking into this, and I found that in communities living totally on welfare, even though several of these projects have been approved for them, the welfare is going to decrease by only 25 per cent.

Let us consider, for instance, the LIP program. Under the program there is a miniumum weekly wage of $167, from which deductions have to be made. In order for a family to survive it has to have its income supplemented, and this is where the welfare comes in. It seems that rather than one project officer looking after LIP and then somebody else coming in in connection with welfare to supplement incomes, it would be more reasonable to pay the person working on one of these make-work projects a decent salary so that he can keep his family in one of those isolated communities. This would cut down on the number of people spending money to travel into these communities, money which should be going to the communities.

I understand that for FLIP, LIP, Canada Works, LEAP and Young Canada Works, Manpower officers must make the referrals for jobs. It has been brought to my attention that the Manpower officers are just not capable of doing this job because they do not have the information required. They have a heavy workload as it is, and they do not have the confidence of the communities that they are capable of doing a good job of placing people in employment.

I will refer to a newspaper clipping which came out of the Winnipeg Free Press just last week. This story is from South Indian Lake. South Indian Lake is a typical northern community where unemployment is high. It is estimated 70 per cent of the residents are living on welfare—and an official from the community claims that ten people who collect unemployment insurance also collect welfare, even though they are working on one of these make-work projects. So what happens? The jobs with Manitoba Hydro on clearing projects which are available have not been filled. Six men were needed to harvest ice for next summer's fishing. These people could not be found in the community. No one wanted to go to work. People had to be brought in from outside in order to harvest the ice for next summer's operation.

The president of the local fishermen's association said that transport rates for fish to the Transcona plant went up to 8.5 cents a pound. There is a contract for five cents a pound, but because the trucks were not full the fishermen who were fishing were penalized. Meanwhile, 20 active fishermen make good money, and another 40 fishermen who are licensed are either back home working on one of the make-work projects, they are collecting UIC benefits, or they are partly on welfare. This is jeopardizing the entire fishery and penalizing fishermen who are out there trying to make a living at fishing.

The official said that the worst offender is the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, which is responsible for 60 per cent of the 650 residents who are treaty Indians. This is what is happening in most of the communities. There are only so many people in those communities. Everybody comes in with a new program, but what we should be looking for is one delivery system for these make-work programs. Why should we have four project officers spending thousands of dollars flying into one community to administer programs to try to give the people some benefit? The people at the other end are the losers because much is taken up in the administration of these programs. That money really is not getting to the people it should be reaching.

Canada Northlands is another good example. Even though money is going through Canada Northlands, the people are not benefiting from this program for the simple reason that the people who make the decisions are far removed from the needs of the communities, and they do not even know who is employed or who is not employed in these particular communities. The job creation branch is also involved in this. It is in charge of the project officers, and it also has to work very closely with Manpower, which is having a real problem because it is not able to look after the clients it now has in some communities.

I would like to call it ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I would like to ask the acting House leader what the intention of the government is with respect to business tomorrow.

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, I do not know who the acting House leader is, but we will not be going on with this bill tomorrow. I believe we will be dealing with the transportation bill.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

[English]

CITIZENSHIP—DELAY IN PROVIDING FORMS TO SIMCOE, ONTARIO—POSSIBILITY SUBCOURTS PHASED OUT

Mr. William Knowles (Norfolk-Haldimand): Mr. Speaker, my request for an opportunity to elaborate on my question in the adjournment debate arises out of a question reported in Hansard of February 21 at page 3232 where I asked the Parliamentary Secretary to the Secretary of State (Mr. Guilbault) for some explanation as to why the citizenship court in Simcoe is not able to process the many applications which came in as a result of the proclamation of the new Citizenship Act. The parliamentary secretary was at a bit of a disadvantage on that occasion. He was not aware of my question. He gave me the best answer possible under the circumstances, and I thank him for it. It was because he was not prepared to give a complete answer that I asked to be allowed to elaborate at this point.

Since that time the parliamentary secretary has communicated with the Secretary of State (Mr. Roberts), who was kind enough to write a letter to me explaining this matter in greater detail. There are two paragraphs of the letter that I should like to read into the record:

● (2200)

> My officials have investigated the points you raised and inform me that a slight delay did, in fact, occur in sending application forms under the new Citizenship Act to one or two county courts in Ontario. A telephone communication with the Simcoe county court on February 22, 1977, however, confirmed that the forms had been received on Friday, February 18, 1977.
> On the matter of citizenship work currently being done by county courts, we have undertaken, at the request of the Ontario attorney general, a review of the situation. It is possible that as a result of this study the county courts may be relieved of their responsibilities . . .

That last is the sentence that concerns me, Mr. Speaker, and I will elaborate on the letter later in my remarks.

The predicament and confusion at Simcoe were disastrous, to say the least, to those people who came to make application for citizenship. The forms finally arrived a few days later, as has been indicated, but there was no letter appointing His Honour Judge John Pringle, the county court judge, to do the work in the citizenship court, nor the clerk of the county court to process the applications, so we are still without a citizenship court in the town of Simcoe. Their duties were terminated by a letter from the Registrar of Canadian Citizenship dated December 22, 1976, the relevant paragraph of which reads as follows:

> Persons currently dealing with citizenship matters either in the judicial capacity or in the application taking function, will require new appointments. Further advice will be forwarded to you in this regard as soon as administrative details have been completed.

That advice still has not been received at the citizenship court in Simcoe. Over 100 people presented themselves at the court during the two or three weeks following the proclamation and, to say the least, there was frustration, as can be understood. The appointments of the judge, and of the clerk to take applications, still have not been made.

I have a letter here from the sheriff of Simcoe, and had a telephone conversation with his office this afternoon. In the letter he wrote:

> The new appointments have not arrived to date and, therefore, the county court judge and the county court clerk are not authorized to accept applications.

This was confirmed, and the letter of appointment had not arrived by this afternoon. Mr. Speaker, how do we resolve this difficulty?

The county court clerk defines the problem as insufficient staff to take applications. He has to use the staff of the sheriff's office to do the work of the citizenship court for a federal department. He has been advised that a Mr. Peter Gale from the Hamilton citizenship office will be in Simcoe on Friday, March 18, from 8.30 a.m. to 4.30 p.m. to process applications. This would help take the workload off the sheriff's office, but it seems to me that help once a month is not sufficient to handle the flow of applications in that area where there are a great many ethnic groups anxious to become Canadian citizens.

The county court judges in Simcoe and Gayuga do an excellent job in handling citizenships. Judge John Pringle in Simcoe and Judge Leach in Caledonia make the ceremony more than an examination and swearing in of the applicant. The Canadian flag and the provincial flag adorn the courtroom. The band from the local high school leads singing of our National Anthem and God Save the Queen. A welcome committee made up of prominent citizens in the community and members of the RCMP attend a reception sponsored by the Imperial Order of the Daughters of the Empire where the new citizens are welcomed. This is a truly impressive and meaningful ceremony, and I would be concerned if it were not maintained.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I would like to refer to an article in the Simcoe Reformer. The judge told the newspaper's correspondent that he viewed the occasion with a little nostalgia, and feared some of the meaning of the old ceremony may be lost when the new Citizenship Act goes into effect this Tuesday.

Mr. Jacques Guilbault (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for bringing this matter to our attention. We have investigated with the department and found that there has been some delay in sending out the forms. We apologize to the hon. member and the people of the area concerned. I was not aware that the letter of appointment of the judge has not yet reached its destination. I shall look into that.

I ask for the indulgence of the hon. member and the people of the area. There is much work to be done in connection with the new act. The work of the department has been hectic in the last few months. We had been getting ready for the proclamation of the act. This has involved the writing of regulations, the drawing up of new forms, printing of three different brochures for the people to use, as well as the appointing of ten additional judges and 69 additional staff members across the country. All those people have had to be trained, and we tried to be ready by January 15. I contend that we did not do too badly, because occasions such as the one raised by the hon. member are rare. We hope that in weeks to come everything will return to normal and that the area mentioned by the hon. member will receive service similar to that received by people right across the country. I realize that help once a month for filling forms is not enough. We shall look into that matter, and I thank the hon. member for his suggestion. I ask him to bear with us for a couple of weeks to enable us to do the job properly and provide the good service to which all Canadians are entitled.

[Mr. Knowles (Norfolk-Haldimand).]

INDIAN AFFAIRS—LEGAL AUTHORITY OF DEPARTMENT TO REMOVE CHILDREN FROM CUSTODY OF PARENTS—SUGGESTED COMPLIANCE WITH PROVINCIAL LAW

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, my purpose in rising this evening is to attempt to obtain further information from the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Penner).

My intervention is the result of a question I asked on January 31 with respect to something almost incredible which happened in Saskatchewan. I was referring to children living on reserves in that province, children who had apparently been apprehended by departmental officials without legal authority, as the minister admitted when answering my question on January 31. I asked the question originally because some 700 children apparently have been apprehended by the department, and I felt that the matter affects a substantial number of children who may have been apprehended without legal or judicial assessment as to whether the apprehension was justified.

When replying the minister indicated to me that that particular action had been taken because a number of sad situations with respect to children obtained on the reserves. But I think that answer was not sufficient to meet the point of principle which I raised when I questioned the minister on January 31.

What has happened has not merely happened in the recent past. The matter has been of concern for the department for some years, apparently. According to my information some of these apprehensions took place over five years ago, when children were taken from their parents without a court order. They have been placed in foster homes, or reared in foster homes, for a number of years. I simply point out to the parliamentary secretary, who is a compassionate and sensitive person, the wrench that could take place where it is determined that the parents have the right to have their children back. These children may have accepted the foster parents as the actual parents and accepted the other children of the family as their brothers and sisters.

That is only one side of the matter. An even more important side is the right of parents in this country who have any agency, whether government or otherwise, take children from them without judicial review.

I suppose the answer the parliamentary secretary will give tonight is that there is no agreement between the province of Saskatchewan and the federal government. I realize we have a possible conflict in the sense of jurisdictional authority with respect to Indian children. However, it causes me a great deal of concern that over a period of some years, at least five years as far as I am able to determine, the provincial government and federal government have been haggling over who will pay the expense with regard to the administration of child apprehension on Indian reserves in the province of Saskatchewan.

I find it incredible that we have two levels of government haggling over the cost of this. The great social concern here is being ignored and being left to the rather arbitrary and, in fact, unlawful actions on the part of the department. It is a very basic principle of our law in Canada that as far as the taking of children is concerned in any province one cares to look at, the parents have a right to have a court review the circumstances and give an independent assessment as to whether the apprehension is justified.

The department in effect has been guilty of some acts of malfeasance in the cases to which I referred. I am concerned because we have these 700 cases. If they have been taken without a court review or without any application to the courts, we might have a situation where these 700 children may be ordered to go back to their parents or be left in a state of limbo.

I would like the parliamentary secretary to state this evening what precise action the department is going to take with regard to this sad and tragic situation. I say this on behalf of the parents who have possibly had their children taken wrongfully. I say it on behalf of the foster parents who may have received children and regard them as their own, with the children regarding the foster parents as their new parents. There will be an awful wrench if it is found to be an illegal seizure on the part of the departmental officials.

I ask the parliamentary secretary to tell us this evening if the department has any game plan with respect to this whole problem because there are many people concerned about this from the point of view of the rights of individuals. There are many immediate practical situations which we have before us. At least 700 beg some satisfactory answer from the department. I will be interested in hearing the response tonight.

Mr. B. Keith Penner (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased that the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Hnatyshyn) has raised this question because the department has a very satisfactory answer. It is a good opportunity for me to elaborate this evening on the concern which has been so well expressed by the hon. member.

The Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development pays full costs for maintenance of 778 Indian children in Saskatchewan who have been taken into care by the Provincial Superintendent of Child Welfare as a result of court action. Departmental staff and employees of band councils have arranged foster homes for an additional 607 children, also maintained at departmental expense. The hon. member will see immediately that there is no question at all about haggling over costs, as he suggested. In such cases, the child's parents have given consent for the arrangements, except in instances where we have been unable to trace or contact them.

When we are called in to help a child who has been abandoned, neglected or abused, we first try to locate the parents. If the parents are available, every attempt is made to help them improve the situation. However, if the parents wish to have the child cared for in a foster home, the best possible placement is arranged with their approval. I am advised that in a good many cases attempts to obtain provincial participation are fruitless.

When the parents of a child in need cannot be contacted, or when they refuse to take responsibility for the child's proper care, assistance is sought from the provincial department of social services or from the RCMP, since they alone have the authority to take custody of a child, or to take the matter to the appropriate court. When the province and the RCMP refuse to act, we are faced with a critical moral and human problem, and have no alternative but to make the best possible arrangements for the child.

It must be obvious to any honestly concerned observer that there is nothing illegal in arranging for foster homes when the child's parents consent to it. There is a very great difference between breaking the law and having no law under which to act. For many years, parents who needed such services depended upon the department to provide them. It would be unjust to deprive them or their children of this sort of care until such time as better arrangements can be made. There is no question of the rights of either the children or their parents being ignored, and there is no evidence that the arrangements that have been made for the children are unsatisfactory. Any parent who is dissatisfied can have their child returned at any time. I would hope, however, that any such decision would be made with care, and in the knowledge of its implications.

NATIONAL DEFENCE—PROPOSED RESEARCH CENTRE AT WINNIPEG—DELAY IN COMPLETING LAND PURCHASE AGREEMENT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, on February 23 I asked the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Danson) to tell us what the intentions of the government were with regard to the defence research centre for Winnipeg which was announced three years ago. Since that announcement the city of Winnipeg has been subject to an undue amount of procrastination and stalling tactics from the Liberal government here in Ottawa. This has cost Winnipeg a considerable amount in lost revenue and placed an unnecessary burden on the taxpayers of that city. I am referring in particular to the 111 acres of land on which the defence research centre is supposed to be constructed.

When one takes a look at the record of government in connection with the research centre one cannot but seriously question its motives. Is the government so unconcerned about declining Liberal popularity in western Canada that it is deciding to write off western Canada altogether, or is it sheer confusion and disorganization which have caused delay in the construction of the centre?

I think it worth noting that ever since the former minister of defence, the hon. member for Winnipeg South (Mr. Richardson) made the announcement in February, 1974, that Winnipeg would be receiving a defence research base, nothing has happened in terms of action by Ottawa. For the record I would point out that on October 22, 1976, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Dionne) stated in response to a question I put to him:

I am pleased to inform the hon. member that the new research establishment in Manitoba will be constructed in his constituency.

I wonder if that is still the intention of the government, because on February 18 the Minister of National Defence told us that the defence research centre project had been deferred for a period of between six months and a year. In the face of these conflicting and confusing statements, I contend that the government has a moral obligation to come clean with the city of Winnipeg and make a clear cut statement as to whether or not it really intends to purchase the land and build a centre. It is interesting to note that the 1977-78 estimates for national defence make provision for an expenditure of over $20 million for a defence research establishment in Manitoba, yet the government will not even tell us where in Manitoba it will be constructed or when the work will begin.

● (2220)

The government should be more responsive to the city of Winnipeg because there are a number of crucial matters at stake. First of all, Mr. Speaker, there is the matter of 111 acres of prime land that was originally negotiated to be sold at a price of $1,200,000 to the federal government. During the time the Liberal government has wasted in stalling, the value of this land has increased three times. The federal government in all fairness to the people of Winnipeg should renegotiate this deal so that the taxpayers of Winnipeg will not be the losers.

The second matter is that if the federal government does not intend to use this particular parcel of land it should notify the city of Winnipeg so that consideration might be given to using it for other purposes. As I say, this is one of the last prime pieces of residential land in the city.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, the federal government should not place a burden on Winnipeg taxpayers by not paying any taxes on this land. It should take the immediate steps necessary to reimburse the city of Winnipeg for the lost revenue on this land that it could have been collecting from private developers.

During the past three years there have been numerous communications between the city of Winnipeg and the federal government. Let us take a look at the number of communications since the fall of 1976. In each instance I must point out that the Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Guay), better known as the minister of nothing, has been aware of these communications, yet he has seen fit to do nothing. As I said, let us take a chronological look at the events since the fall of 1976.

On September 13 last a letter was sent to the Department of Justice from the city of Winnipeg enclosing a draft agreement. On September 21 an acknowledgement was received. On October 26 a re-draft of the agreement was received by the city of Winnipeg from the Department of Justice. On November 8 a letter was sent to the Department of Justice on changes to the agreement. On November 24 a letter was received by the city of Winnipeg on the price. On November 26 a memo was sent to the land surveys and real estate department of Winnipeg on discussions of price. On December 27 a letter was sent to the Department of Justice outlining changes to the agreement. On January 13, 1977, a letter from the Department of Justice advised that material was forwarded to Ottawa for consideration.

These, Mr. Speaker, are just a few instances of the constant communications going on over a project that was announced three years ago. What has the minister of nothing from St. Boniface been doing in the past few months to assist this project? The answer is quite simply, nothing. That is why he is called the minister of nothing and I suppose he is paid to do nothing. In the meantime the city of Winnipeg suffers.

In all sincerity, Mr. Speaker, I do not think that the national defence research centre should become a political football. Either the Liberal government is serious in its commitment or it is not. When the Minister of National Defence told me on February 23 that he did not expect the city of Winnipeg to hold on to the land, what did the minister of nothing do? Absolutely nothing. During all of these deliberations the hon. member has done nothing whatsoever to help resolve this matter. He did not even make the effort to communicate with the city of Winnipeg.

As I pointed out earlier, the 1977-78 estimates for national defence include a defence research establishment for Manitoba and I, along with many other residents of the city of Winnipeg, would like to know where and when the government intends to build this research station. After all, Mr. Speaker, surely to heaven the Minister of National Defence must have some idea as to the future of this project, especially if officials from his department have it included in the 1977-78 estimates. I really do not think it is fair to the people of Winnipeg to ask them to put up with this procrastination.

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member should know that the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Danson) has stated in this House that the project to create a new defence research establishment at Winnipeg is in temporary suspension. The primary reason for that is that the Minister of National Defence wishes to study the rationalization of the scientific, research and industrial processes in the Department of National Defence in relation to other industrial efforts.

The minister has stated:

I think we want to look for things which will serve the best long-term interests of Winnipeg and all of western Canada and also to rationalize our defence purchasing so that it is to the best advantage of Canadian industry and the armed forces.

I am advised by the DND that no land deals have been concluded with the city of Winnipeg for the proposed site of the research establishment. Would the hon. member not be the first to chastise the government for paying taxes or grants in lieu of taxes on property that it did not own? It would seem to me that the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Guay) has enough talent and ability to defend himself, and I would leave it to him. He must be something more than the "minister for nothing" because he must have done something to get under the hon. member's skin.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, the House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.27 p.m.

PROPOSED RESTRICTION OF IMPORTATION OF HERBICIDES AND PESTICIDES FROM UNITED STATES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I request the unanimous consent of the House to propose a motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity, that matter being the apparent decision by the Minister of Agriculture to restrict in the next few weeks the importation of agricultural herbicides and pesticides from the United States. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Hargrave):

That the restriction be on a selective basis, not include the more commonly used products, and that the chemical companies involved appear before the Standing Committee on Agriculture to explain their position on this most important matter.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 43, such a motion can be presented only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

FIRE INSURANCE ON BUILDINGS—SUGGESTED GOVERNMENT ACTION TO STOP CHARGING OF PROHIBITIVE PREMIUMS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. C. A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of S.O. 43, I ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a motion of urgent necessity concerning fire insurance on buildings.

Considering that three years ago, insurance companies agreed to create a monopoly to establish the assessment basis and premium rates; that since that time, the rates as well as the assessment increased threefold, at least in Quebec; that the assessment is based on the replacement value; and finally that for all those reasons, 70 per cent of small property owners and businessmen cannot afford insurance, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert):

That the government take action, through its anti-monopoly legislation, or by setting up an insurance board, or a State insurance, in order to help small property owners who are left defenceless in front of this monopoly.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The House has heard the hon. member's motion. Under the provisions of S.O. 43, such motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there such a consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There not being unanimous consent, the motion cannot be put.

SUGGESTED APPOINTMENT OF COMMITTEE TO STUDY ALLEGED BIASED REPORTING BY RADIO-CANADA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43, I seek the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

Considering the importance and seriousness of the accusations voiced by a member of the Senate as to the allegedly partisan intervention of Radio-Canada employees, accusations which I feel are unfounded and filled with bitterness, passion, bias and irresponsibility; considering the chain reaction they are likely to start among those who resent the decision Quebecers came to on November 15, and also the unfounded speculations that may be levelled at employees who are doing an objective job, and because Radio-Canada's mandate is to reflect both the Canadian and Quebec realities, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert):

That a special House committee be set up to investigate the allegations of partisan action on the part of Radio-Canada employees.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The House has heard the hon. member's motion. Pursuant to Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

REQUEST FOR CONFERENCE TO ACHIEVE UNIFORMITY OF GASOLINE PRICES IN QUEBEC—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, I request the unanimous consent of the House to present a very particular motion of general interest.

Since gasoline consumers in Quebec are upset by the fact that the price of this product differs from one region to another, a difference which may range from eight to ten cents a gallon, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier):

That the House urge the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources to call a conference with the Minister of Natural Resources in Quebec to try to achieve uniformity of gasoline prices throughout Quebec and thus do justice to all consumers in that province.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Under the terms of Standing Order 43, the motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

STATISTICS CANADA FIGURES ON GROWTH IN ECONOMY—REASON FOR HIGHER INFLATION THAN ANTICIPATED IN BUDGET

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Finance I should like to put my question to the Prime Minister. As figures released yesterday by Statistics Canada show that not only is the growth in our economy static or even declining, but that inflation rose 9.4 per cent last year, an increase higher than that anticipated in the last budget and an increase of a whole four points higher than that in the United States where there are no controls, would the Prime Minister indicate why we have had so much higher inflation than was anticipated in the last budget and so much higher than the United States, which is an unbelievable situation in a year with negative growth?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I would inquire where the hon. member got his statistics.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, the statistics come from yesterday's release from Statistics Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Stevens: They indicated that the implicit price increase in Canada was 9.4 per cent last year. I would ask the Prime Minister again if he could indicate why we had such high inflation last year when the last quarter of the year actually had a negative real growth?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I will check the Statistics Canada release, of which I have a copy here, but my recollection is that the AIB reported that the year-over-year inflation in the first year we brought in the guidelines was more in the order of 6 per cent than 9 per cent.

INCREASE IN GOVERNMENT EXPENDITURES—GOVERNMENT POSITION AS TO FURTHER RESTRAINT

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my final supplementary question is directed to the President of the Treasury Board. As the largest price increase occurred in government expenditures last year, whereas the implicit price index grew by 13.4 per cent in that year, and since current federal estimates for these expenditures—and I emphasize current expenditures, as opposed to transfer payments—are set at over 14 per cent more for the coming fiscal year, would the President of the Treasury Board indicate if he has made further overtures to his colleagues in cabinet and his counterparts at the provincial level for more restraint than has been shown to date?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, as I indicated in my statement to the House a week or so ago, current expenditures of the federal government, budgetary and non-budgetary, including all final supplementary estimates for 1976-77, will be below the 14 per cent committed to one year ago, that is, below the total dollar figure committed to. Forecasts for the expenditure year 1977-78 show an increase, year over year, of only approximately 7 per cent.

Mr. Stevens: I was referring to expenditures.

FORECAST OF DECLINE IN INVESTMENT IN CANADA—GOVERNMENT PLANS TO IMPROVE

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, may I direct some supplementary questions to the Prime Minister about the poor, indeed weakening possibilities for investment in this country in 1977? According to a Statistics Canada preliminary survey it can be concluded that private and private sector investment in 1977 will decline by 1.7 per cent, in real terms, and private sector investment alone will decline by 2.8 per cent. I point out that the decline forecast is slightly greater than that projected by the Conference Board. In view of that confirmation of the seriousness of the investment situation, will the Prime Minister state whether he is concerned about future investment plans, particularly in the private sector, and can he say when he expects the outlook to improve?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the answer to the first part of the question is yes. The answer to the second part is that we hope it will continue to improve after—

Mr. Paproski: After the next election.

Mr. Trudeau: —the budget has been brought down.

Mr. Alexander: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Considering the effect the AIB has had on private investment, does the Prime Minister expect private investment to improve while the controls remain in force?

Mr. Trudeau: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, I am glad the Prime Minister is being explicit this afternoon. We are all concerned about the direction in which this government is going. May I ask the Prime Minister this final supplementary question: As the level of investment has a direct bearing on job creation, does the Prime Minister regard new business investment as an essential part of the strategy to reduce unemployment, and will the budget reflect this concern?

Mr. Trudeau: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

REQUEST FOR EARLY BUDGET WHICH WILL CREATE JOBS

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. In his address to the United States Congress a week ago today, the Prime Minister referred to the necessity of accommodations being made to maintain national unity in this country. Considering that the decrease in the gross national product in the fourth quarter of 1976 came at a time when more than one million Canadians were unemployed, and since a major instrument for achieving national unity is a national government which is perceived as meeting the real human needs of the people of Canada, will the Prime Minister give the House the assurance now that we will have a budget soon whose prime purpose will be the creation of jobs in this country?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

INCREASED UNEMPLOYMENT—SITUATION IN QUEBEC

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister gave us a welcome yes. I hope that in replying to my second question he will elaborate and perhaps tell us if it is to come down within a few days, a couple of weeks, or when it is to be. My second question is this: is the Prime Minister aware that 50 per cent of the new unemployment which occurred in Canada last year occurred within the province of Quebec? If so, is he not concerned, as a Prime Minister who is concerned about national unity, about the need to create jobs specifically, but by no means exclusively, in that province and to do so soon?

Mr. Alexander: That is free enterprise.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member used the word "soon". My answer is yes, that it will be soon. On the latter part of the second question, I think he expressed it well, that we have to ensure that jobs are created in Quebec but not specifically for Quebec.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Broadbent for leader.

UNEMPLOYMENT—SITUATION IN CAPE BRETON—OPERATION OF SYDNEY MINES

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Finance may I direct my final supplementary to the Prime Minister. Yesterday I asked the Minister of Finance a question about the need for job creation, this time in Cape Breton, a part of the country that is also experiencing some fall-off in terms of its attitude toward Canada. Does the Prime Minister know whether, in the interim between yesterday's sitting and today's, the government has decided to make the advance orders that are necessary for rails in Canada in order to keep Sydney steel in operation?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker.

REQUEST FOR STUDY TO ACHIEVE UNIFORMITY OF GASOLINE PRICES IN QUEBEC

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

As there is more and more talk about energy, I feel it would be timely to set, once and for all, the prices that should apply to the energy we use in daily life. Now, although gas prices are normally set at the provincial level, the fact remains, Mr. Speaker, that it might be that the federal Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources should have consultations with the provincial ministers with a view to setting prices that are just and reasonable. Here is my question:

Has the minister had the opportunity to discuss with the Quebec Minister of Natural Resources the possibility of setting up a uniform price for gas throughout the province and so allow all users of cars and trucks to budget their expenses for the coming year and costs bearing relation to consumer needs?

[English]

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member addressed himself to a very important question. I understand the concern of his constituents and others in the province of Quebec about the difference in the price of gasoline from one community to another. Unfortunately, this is not an area of federal jurisdiction. The federal government is not in the position to declare what the price of gasoline should be in any one community. Our policy is to provide for one price with respect to crude oil in Canada and then place the problem before the AIB to ensure that no more than the normal costs of refining, marketing and those additional crude oil costs, whenever there is a price increase, are passed on to the consumer. Market forces, along with transportation—but primarily market forces—are the major determinant of gasoline prices in various communities in the hon. member's province.

[Translation]

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, on a supplementary.

I thank the minister very kindly for his very clear and specific answer. I already was aware of the provincial jurisdiction in that field, but in view of the difficult times we are now living, I merely wanted to express an opinion, hoping to find out whether it might be possible for the federal government, jointly with the provincial ministers responsible for the matter, to come to an agreement on setting a uniform price.

I therefore repeat my question as follows: Has the minister held consultations with the new Quebec Minister of Natural Resources with a view to coming to an agreement on the price of gas so that its price can be uniform throughout a given province such as Quebec, and equal chances are given to the consumers regardless of the area because at times there is a differences of 7, 8 or 10 cents a gallon from one village to the other?

[English]

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I have not had discussions on uniform gasoline prices with the new minister of natural resources or the new minister of energy for the province, for the reasons that I gave in my first answer. I can assure the hon. member that I shall be discussing with the new minister of energy a number of other important questions with respect to oil, natural gas, and perhaps gasoline as well, in his province. I will convey to him the representations made by the hon. member.

INCREASE IN FOOD PRICES—GOVERNMENT PLANS TO MEET SITUATION

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. Since it has been established this week that food prices continue to soar at an intolerable rate, affecting low income families in particular, and since many producers have not received an increase in their prices for almost two years, how does the minister explain the unacceptable increases in food prices at the present time? Further, apart from indexing family allowances, what immediate contingency plan does the government have to meet this situation?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): At this season of the year much of the increase in prices of fresh food in Canada relates to imported food products, and I would draw the hon. gentleman's attention to the difficult production situation which has existed in the areas which are Canada's traditional suppliers. I think we can expect, not only in relation to prices of imported food but with the recovery of food prices in Canada, that there will be some increase in this part of the consumer price index. It is because of the expected recovery of food prices that we have to be more than ever certain that in the other areas on the non-food side, particularly in the area of services, we should continue to restrain the growth of inflation in Canada.

REQUEST FOR IMPLEMENTATION OF SCHOOL MILK PROGRAM

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): I would simply comment that we on this side of the House do not accept the theory that imports alone account for the increase in food prices. My supplementary is directed to the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the situation described in my earlier question, one which especially affects low income Canadians, is the federal government now ready and willing to discuss with the provinces a school milk program to be implemented immediately?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, if a school milk program were to be initiated immediately, it would be done through the Department of National Health and Welfare. We have an assurance from our farmers that they would supply the milk if someone wants to pay for the program.

CHARGES OF UNBALANCED REPORTING BY RADIO-CANADA—STATEMENT BY CHAIRMAN OF CRTC

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. It is prompted by a statement made in Montreal yesterday by the chairman of the CRTC to the effect that no complaints had been lodged by anyone with the CRTC following the serious charges of unbalanced reporting by Radio-Canada. My question also relates to the ruling made on February 24 by the CRTC with regard to charges of unbalanced programming at radio station

CFCF in Montreal in the course of a series of programs on Bill C-22, which had this to say:

> The licensee's right to freedom of expression must not supersede the public's right to receive programming which provides a reasonably balanced opportunity for the expression of differing views on matters of public concern.

My question to the Prime Minister is this: In view of the serious charges made by members of parliament from Quebec, members of the cabinet and, indeed, by the right hon. gentleman himself, has he instructed the Minister of Communications to lodge a complaint with the CRTC and ask them to monitor Radio-Canada? If not, will he do so?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): On a minor point, I am not sure to whom the hon. member is referring when he refers to members of the cabinet. I get the sense of the question, though, and I think it is a very constructive one. I undertake to follow it up in consultation with the minister responsible for the CRTC.

AIRPORTS

PRICE ALBERT—INQUIRY AS TO APPROVAL OF EXPENDITURES FOR IMPROVEMENTS

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the President of the Treasury Board. Yesterday and last Friday the right hon. member for Prince Albert raised the question of an agreement signed by the Minister of Transport with the city of Prince Albert having to do with the improvement and renovation of the airport there. The minister replied that no submission had been received with respect to this expenditure. In order that there might be no question that expenditures to honour the agreement by the Minister of Transport will we allocated, would the minister now indicate his firm commitment to this funding?

● (1430)

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, until there is a submission to Treasury Board I think I would be totally irresponsible to make such a commitment. The hon. member should really address that question to the Minister of Transport when he is in the House.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Can the minister explain how agreements are signed by ministers of the Crown which indicate that expenditures of substantial moneys are to be paid before obtaining Treasury Board approval; and will the minister henceforth have his colleagues sign agreements only when they are able to carry out their intentions?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, my understanding, which was confirmed to my satisfaction, anyway, of the wording of the question of the right hon. member for Prince Albert was that he was alluding to the possibility of such an agreement. I cannot elaborate beyond that.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. There was an agreement which left the distinct impression with the people of Prince Albert that they were going to get these improvements. Would the minister tell the House whether that particular type of commitment will in fact be honoured, if it was made by a minister of the Crown, or will he at least instruct his colleagues to get Treasury Board approval before leading people astray and giving them false impressions?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, I think the judgment that any minister has led these people astray is certainly not at all established.

CROWN CORPORATIONS

ORDER IN COUNCIL APPROVAL FOR SUBSIDIARY CROWN CORPORATIONS AND AGENCIES

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board. It arises out of the request of the public accounts committee that the Treasury Board determine how many Crown corporations and agencies the government have created in this country, and out of early rumours or reports that in this search for the number of Crown corporations as many as perhaps a thousand have been discovered. My question is this: Is it the policy of the government to permit existing Crown corporations to create subsidiary Crown corporations or subsidiary agencies without receiving order in council approval from the cabinet?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, investment in subsidiary companies, which does not always involve the creation of a Crown corporation thereby, is in some cases the decision of the Crown corporation, and other require government approval. One would have to define it in terms of the Financial Administration Act, and we are looking at that very problem. We are aware of the fact that there has to be a much more complete list of Crown-owned corporations whether totally controlled or not.

Mr. Gillies: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the President of the Treasury Board tell the House whether or not the government is now discovering that it has perhaps as many as a thousand subsidiaries, Crown corporations and agencies; and would he also tell the House whether or not he is convinced or satisfied that all these agencies have been effectively audited and that effective financial controls are operating on these agencies?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, I would not join in the guessing game as to the number up to a thousand; I have not seen the final reports that have been requested.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Is the number too low?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, I am not party to the same rumours as the hon. member, but in any event it will all come out in the wash when we go through this.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

REQUEST GOVERNMENT MAINTAIN JURISDICTION OVER INTERNATIONAL AND INTERPROVINCIAL TRADE

Hon. Herb. Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice. There have been reports that the British Columbia broiler marketing board has been attempting to prevent certain supermarkets in Vancouver from selling at low retail prices broiler chickens imported from the United States, and this has led to court action in British Columbia. Will the federal government intervene in these law suits to maintain federal jurisdiction over international and interprovincial trade and to prevent a provincial body from seemingly attempting to control imports into a province, in light of the importance of this issue to consumers in British Columbia and across Canada?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I would agree with the hon. member's question in the sense that these are matters of great importance. Normally we do not intervene until such cases reach a higher level than the trial, but I will examine the particular cases to see whether there is a proper intervention by federal authorities at the present level of trial.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

INQUIRY WHETHER DISABILITY PENSION WILL BE RESTORED TO 1972 VALUE

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I join with the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe in expressing our welcome to the Minister of Veterans Affairs.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): We are glad to see him back in the House and looking so well. Has the minister had an opportunity to look at some of the questions which were asked in his absence and at some of the motions which were proposed under Standing Order 43, and in particular may I ask him about the rate of the 100 per cent disability pension. Since this rate has fallen behind the rate that was established in 1972 in relation to the composite of five public service groups by more than $500 a year, will the government take the necessary action, even if it means legislation, to correct this imbalance and to restore the 100 per cent disability pension rate to the value it had when it was established in 1972?

[Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton).]

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, in reply to the hon. member's question, may I say I am quite familiar with the Standing Order 43s which were presented in the House and also with the questions asked by hon. members. With regard to the legislation pertaining to pensions, this matter is presently under review by the department. I would remind hon. members, as they know, that a consumer price index has been established and has been in effect for a long period. The other matter is under review and we intend to bring it forward at a later date.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that the question relates to closing the gap because only the consumer price index has been applied to the 100 per cent rate which was created in 1972, may I ask the minister whether he will be prepared to discuss this and other issues in detail when his estimates come before the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs?

Mr. MacDonald (Cardigan): I see no reason why we cannot make some reference to it, Mr. Speaker, at that time.

REQUEST FOR LEGISLATION TO IMPROVE PENSIONS OF WIDOWS

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Further to the question asked of the minister's parliamentary secretary as to whether legislation was under consideration to provide increased pensions for widows receiving less than 48 per cent pension, and in view of the fact that figures show there are 65,000 disability pensions between the range of 5 per cent to 50 per cent, when is the minister going to take definitive action with regard to introducing legislation to overcome this hardship which has been caused these widows?

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, widows' pensions are also under consideration by our department, and when we have something noteworthy to report I will bring it to the attention of the hon. members.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

PRINCE ALBERT AIRPORT—GOVERNMENT INTENTION TO IMPROVE FACILITIES—NATURE OF AGREEMENT

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Justice and is supplementary to that asked by the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar relative to the agreement already signed by the local authorities and the Minister of Transport for improvements to Prince Albert airport. When such an agreement is entered into in good faith by the local authorities and executed by the Minister of Transport on behalf of the Crown in right of Canada, is such agreement binding on the federal government even if it has not yet received Treasury Board approval?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the parliamentary secretary has been briefed on this matter and is out of the House getting something for me which I will need at three o'clock. The agreement to which the hon. member refers was not only entered into in good faith by the people of Saskatchewan but also by the Minister of Transport who is also from Saskatchewan.

Mr. Lawrence: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. My question related to whether the agreement is binding on the Crown in right of Canada if it has not been approved or moneys have not been allocated by Treasury Board for such expenditure. Is it legally binding on the Crown in the absence of Treasury Board approval?

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, that would depend upon what is in the agreement, and I have not yet read it.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

POSSIBLE TELEVISING OF BUDGET PRESENTATION

Mr. Sean O'Sullivan (Hamilton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, before posing my question to the Minister of Finance I wish him, on behalf of everybody, a thumping good day on this, his birthday.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. O'Sullivan: I also wish to express the hope that as he approaches the mellowing of age—and I speak from experience, knowing the effects of that—it will be reflected in his budget. I want to ask the minister, in view of the fact that the House has recently passed a resolution allowing the televising of the proceedings of the House of Commons, whether in the important event of a budget being brought down the minister would be prepared to have the reading of the budget and the ensuing debate televised so that the Canadian people might see whether or not the economy is in full recovery.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): I thank the hon. gentleman for his good wishes since it has been suggested in some quarters that I have succeeded in passing from adolescence through to senescence without passing through any intermediate stage. May I say that personally I would be delighted to have the opportunity of presenting the budget on television and indeed witnessing the statements by other representatives on this question. The televising of the budget procedure would have my very full support. I would be glad to co-operate with members in all parties to bring about this objective, if we can.

An hon. Member: When?

POSSIBLE TELEVISING OF BUDGET PRESENTATION—REQUEST FOR EQUAL TIME TO BE AFFORDED OPPOSITION SPOKESMEN

Mr. Sean O'Sullivan (Hamilton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the government House leader who is in the chamber, but perhaps he would like to resume his seat for a minute. I knew it was a birthday; I did not know we would have musical chairs. Would the government House leader give the House the assurance that should the budget debate be televised, spokesmen for the opposition will be given equal time so that the proper economic policies might be presented to the Canadian people?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The question, although enticing, is none the less hypothetical.

CANADIAN RADIO-TELEVISION COMMISSION

ALLEGED PREFERENCE RESPECTING STATION CBUFT, B.C.—REQUEST TREATMENT BY CRTC BE UNIFORM

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Now that we have moved into the era of accommodation and revision, I would like to ask him a question about the future of television in British Columbia. According to one of the employees at CBUFT there are times of the day when there are as many employees in the studio as viewers watching the station, and yet the CRTC seems bent on giving that station one of the best and most clear channels on the dial. Would the Prime Minister make representations to the CRTC to see if it would change its opinion on that matter?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Again, that is clearly a representation as opposed to a question.

FISHERIES

PROCESSING IN NOVA SCOTIA—REQUEST GOVERNMENT ACT TO UTILIZE FACILITIES

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment. Two Nova Scotia companies have worked out proposals with Spanish and West German interests to have foreign caught fish from within the new 200-mile fishing limit landed and processed in Nova Scotia. In view of the present unutilized fish processing capacity of about 30 per cent in Nova Scotia, and a large number of shore workers who are unemployed, when can we expect an announcement from the minister indicating the approval of Nova Scotia's joint venture proposals?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, there are a certain number of proposals made by various companies that have been submitted for different species. They are being examined in terms of benefit to Canadians. In fact, my principal adviser on this issue is in the Atlantic area today, and tomorrow I expect a report from him. These proposals will be decided in due course.

Mr. Crouse: In view of the fact that joint ventures would utilize the processing capacity of the province and, in addition, would serve to provide the Nova Scotia fishing industry with exposure in the use of freezer trawlers and the catching of certain species now declared surplus to Canada's needs, would the minister indicate the type of policy he plans to implement which will assist Canadian fishermen to catch their share of the quotas allocated to them on the Hamilton bank and in other far northern waters?

Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): Mr. Speaker, I believe the phrase "joint venture" which would imply foreign capital is not an accurate one in these Canada foreign arrangements, because we do not see the need for capital. In relation to Canadians getting a larger share of the quota which is available to us, I really look at the economics of this industry and do not see that investing in trawlers costing up to $15 million for what would be essentially a very short season would be a wise move. I think some of the companies have come up with good proposals, and I hope that down the road they will be looking at charters with Canadian crews with the possibility of some gear technicians from other countries. There are vessels available for charter right now.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

INCOME TAX EXEMPTION FOR BEDRIDDEN OR PERSONS CONFINED TO WHEELCHAIR—GOVERNMENT APPROACH TO EXTENDING PROVISION

Mr. Arnold Malone (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the fact that an exemption from income tax is allowed to people who are blind, confined to a wheelchair, or bedridden, amounting to $1,420, but that that exemption from income tax does not extend to other people who are totally disabled, would the minister give consideration to recommending the broadening of the parameters of the definition of the word "disabled"?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I will be pleased to take note of the hon. member's question and to raise it with my colleague, the Minister of Finance, in the preparation of the budget.

AGRICULTURE

INDUSTRIAL MILK SURPLUS—REQUEST THAT DISPOSAL PROGRAM BE EXTENDED TO FLUID MILK AND CREAM

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture. Has the minister any plans to extend the levy to deal with the disposal of surplus industrial milk to cover fluid milk producers and cream shippers even in those provinces which did not contribute to the milk surplus, or if there is to be an extension, would the levy be based on surplus industrial milk?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I know of no intention at present to increase the levy to cream shippers. If anything is to be decided, as mentioned yesterday by the dairy organization, there is to be no levy on cream shipments at all. But there has been a suggestion that the levy be extended to all fluid milk producers in Canada because they all share in the markets one way or another and they are all affected by the total program. So I do know it is under discussion among the dairy farmers themselves and with our dairy commission.

Mr. Ritchie: Can the minister say whether the discussions have progressed to discussions with provincial marketing boards which deal with fluid milk producers?

Mr. Whelan: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I had a discussion in Winnipeg last week with the Manitoba Farm Bureau, and the head of the Dairy Producers Organization attended that meeting and expressed a view that if it were extended, it would not affect them at all because they are now contributing to the over-all production.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

UGANDA—INQUIRY WHETHER FEDERAL GOVERNMENT IN POSITION TO EVACUATE CANADIANS

Mr. Charles Lapointe (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Would the minister tell the House whether his department has taken any specific steps to get into communication with Canadians living in Uganda and would his department eventually be able to ensure their evacuation?

[English]

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as the House knows, this is a rather uncertain situation in terms of information. However, we have determined that there are approximately 85 Canadians living in Uganda, and that number of Canadians have registered with our high commission in Nairobi. Most of them are missionaries. Should the need arise—and to date there has not been any request—a member of the Canadian High Commission in Nairobi will be sent to Uganda to provide whatever consular assistance will be possible. In an emergency situation the French embassy in Kampala has agreed to assist Canadians pending the arrival of a Canadian official.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

POSITION OF CMHC ON USE OF ALUMINUM WIRING IN DWELLINGS

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I would like to put a question to the Acting Minister of Urban Affairs. In view of the fact that the federal Department of Public Works has been recommending against the use of aluminum wiring for years because of the potential fire hazard, and in view of the fact that no federal Public Works Department-sponsored building will be built unless copper wire is used, will the minister give an assurance to the House that in the future any housing firm assisted by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation will not allow the use of aluminum wiring?

● (1450)

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I will transmit this question to my colleague the Minister of State for Urban Affairs and tell him about the concern so often expressed in this House by the hon. member.

ALUMINUM WIRING—REQUEST FOR LEGISLATION BANNING USE

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. In view of the lack of responsibility displayed by the Canadian Standards Association, and because of the tremendous fire hazard associated with aluminum wiring, will the minister bring in legislation under the Hazardous Products Act banning its use in all residential accommodations in Canada until his department has undertaken significant studies in this area, and can the minister assure the public that its installation is not dangerous to human life?

Hon. A. C. Abbott (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I attempted to deal with this question in a similar form the other day. I said that there was an absence of necessary evidence that indeed a hazard does exist in homes with aluminum wiring. I tried to point out, as well, that aluminum wiring in itself cannot be considered hazardous and therefore is outside the purview of the hazardous products legislation. If the installation of aluminum wiring with terminals is in itself hazardous, this is a problem for power companies and utilities under provincial jurisdiction and the question would be more properly directed to them rather than to my department.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Rodriguez: Burn, baby, burn.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION TO PROTECT PRIVACY

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice. When speaking last week in Vancouver Quadra the minister said that freedom of information legislation is being drafted. He also cautioned that society must balance freedom of information with the right of individuals to privacy. In view of the fact that the present Bill C-25 fails to protect privacy or to provide freedom of information, when is the minister planning to introduce the legislation to which he referred?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I have not seen the press reports to which the hon. member refers. They obviously arise from an immensely successful and enthusiastic Liberal meeting I attended in the hon. member's riding.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Alexander: I don't believe you.

Mr. Epp: How many showed up?

Mr. Paproski: There must have been at least 15 people there.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Did you get them all in the phone booth?

Mr. Paproski: Stop splitting hairs.

Mr. Basford: I indicated at that meeting that the government is introducing legislation in the form of Bill C-25 to protect the privacy of individuals with regard to government information used for administrative purposes with respect to those persons. I also indicated that there was a twin need for freedom of information legislation and that we would, pursuant to our statement in the Speech from the Throne, be introducing to the Standing Committee on Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments a green paper on the subject. I expressed the hope that that would lead to an information act.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): In 1990?

Mr. Clarke: Since the minister also was speculating on the prospects of the Liberal party of regaining my riding, I wonder if he would like to speculate on his own prospects in Vancouver Centre.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

SPORTS

OLYMPIC GAMES, MOSCOW—INQUIRY WHETHER GOVERNMENT WILL INTRODUCE PROGRAM TO TRAIN ATHLETES

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Amateur Sport.

Considering the government responsibility for adequately training our national team in view of the forthcoming Olympic games in Moscow, I would like to ask the minister whether she is prepared to present a specific program to encourage and train our Canadian athletes? What will this program be? How will it be designed? And also what funds are going to be granted to such an organization, in the best interest of our national team?

[English]

Hon. Iona Campagnolo (Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport)): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member will be pleased to know that Game Plan at the present time is being augmented. As hon. members know, Game Plan was formerly assisted by the provinces, but the provinces having now withdrawn, the federal government will continue with this program on our own. This is a plan for assisting amateur athletes to augment their skills in the various sports in which they will be participating. This will include the 28 Olympic sports. We will be involved with the Canada Games this summer at St. John's, Newfoundland; next year, hopefully, with the Edmonton Commonwealth Games. In 1979 we will be on the scene at Brandon, and at the PanAmerican Games the same year. This government will be assisting our athletes, and we will be moving on with them in 1980 in Moscow.

ALLEGED FILM PRODUCED TO CONVEY MINISTER'S CHRISTMAS GREETINGS TO STAFF

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am sure that information can be obtained in some other way.

Mr. Alexander: The minister wants to answer the question.

AGRICULTURE

IMPORTATION OF PORK PRODUCTS FROM PEOPLE'S REPUBLIC OF CHINA—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. W. C. Scott (Victoria-Haliburton): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture and it deals with imports of pork and pork products from the People's Republic of China. In view of the fact that Canada is looked upon as a food producing and exporting nation, and taking into consideration the proficiency of Canadian pork producers, can the minister explain the necessity of importing pork products from the People's Republic of China when we should more rightly be concerned about the exporting of this Canadian commodity?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, there is certainly no law against people producing pork in Canada. There is an open and ample market here for them. At the present time we are importing about five million pounds of pork per week into Canada, not because producers are not making money on pork but because they can make more money selling grain. So they have discontinued producing pork. The amount of pork which comes in from the People's Republic of China is .35 per cent of the total amount of pork imported into Canada. We are selling them a lot of grain and many other things, but it is up to the pork producers themselves if they want to provide pork for Canadian consumers.

Mr. Scott: In view of the chaos in the beef producing industry in Canada, is the minister not afraid that this same chaos will befall the pork industry and create great uncertainty among pork producers in Canada?

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, there is legislation provided by this parliament which protects pork producers or any other producers who want to supply the market here.

MANPOWER

CANADA WORKS PROGRAM—REQUESTED ALLOCATION OF FUNDS TO METIS AND NON-STATUS INDIANS

Mr. J. R. Holmes (Lambton-Kent): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration and it relates to the Canada Works program. Notwithstanding the fact that funds have been allocated to status Indians, which are needed for their very serious unemployment problem, I would like to ask the minister why there has been no specific allocation made to Metis and non-status Indians. I ask that in view of the fact that the Department of Manpower and Immigration is fully aware of the serious unemployment situation as revealed by a recent labour force survey which was conducted by the department with the assistance of the Native Council of Canada.

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, in addition to the regular allocation made under the Canada Works program we have made a special allocation for status Indians on reserves. I did meet with hon. members and indicated in my letter to them that I was looking for other ideas, schemes and plans as to how we might accommodate in the criteria both these peoples in a different approach to the matter. I have spoken to Mr. Daniels, president of the the Native Council of Canada. I indicated to him some ideas I have about how we might change the allocation procedure. I think we have arrived at an agreement and I am endeavouring to incorporate that into the second phase of the Canada Works program.

● (1500)

Mr. Holmes: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, and I thank the minister for his answer. The fact is that the Canada Works program is having a divisive effect on the native community of Canada and contradicts the policy announced by the Department of Manpower and Immigration on May 17, 1976, in which the minister in a letter to the native associations stated:

> I am now able to present to you the main elements of a manpower policy designed to help the Indians, the Inuit and the Metis be more successful in the labour market.

I should like to ask the minister specifically if he will consider implementing the policies that were announced in that program of May, 1976, and provide a special allocation for assistance to Metis and non-status Indians.

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, rather than opening the floodgate to all kinds of special or different or any other groups, it seems to me, on the basis of the letter written by my predecessor to the Native Council of Canada, that we should see if we can find some method whereby they can be accommodated within the Canada Works criteria so that the approach we have taken is acceptable to the council. When we get all the bugs ironed out, we will be discussing it again with them.

ATLANTIC SALMON—FISHING BAN

Question No. 343—Mr. Nystrom:

1. Was a ban placed on commercial Atlantic salmon fishing in 1971 and, if so (a) what has happened regarding the biological stock over the past five years (b) are there any streams in which the stocks have been replenished so that commercial fishing could again resume?

2. If and when the biological stock reaches a sustained level where commercial fishing is again feasible, what will be done by the Department of the Environment (Fisheries) regarding the (a) number and allocation of salmon fishing licences (b) distribution of salmon yield between the commerical and recreational fisherman?

Mr. Jim Fleming (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): 1. A five year commercial fishery ban was implemented in 1972 on selected salmon fisheries within the provinces of New Brunswick, Newfoundland and Quebec. The commercial fishing ban has been effective in improving salmon stocks within rivers affected. However, while runs have increased, biological predictions indicate that they are not of sufficient strength to support a commercial fishery in 1977.

2. The whole matter of the status of salmon stocks in the Atlantic coast of Canada including the biological asscssment, the number and allocation of salmon fishing licences and the distribution of salmon yield between both the commercial and recreational fishermen has been the topic of a comprehensive review. The review concluded that because of the six year salmon cycle the full benefit of the closure would not be realized until we get the returns of the 1972 spawning. Accordingly, the ban on the commercial fishery will continue in 1977. An announcement of this decision was made on February 4, 1977. By 1978 it is expected that salmon stocks will have recovered sufficiently to allow the resumption of a modest commercial fishery. Prior to that, the details of the management plan considered most appropriate to the future well-being of the salmon resource and the particular interest of the user groups will be announced.

"CROSS CANADA COOKING"—GRANT TO SONDRA GOTLIEB

Question No. 1,318—Mr. Epp:

1. Were any government monies granted to Sondra Gotlieb, author of "Cross Canada Cooking" and, if so, how much?

2. Is any department purchasing the book?

3. Was an agreement made with Ms. Gotlieb, during the time of negotiations for her manuscript, that a certain number of her complete book would be bought by the government?

4. What is the number of "Cross Canada Cooking" books bought by the government?

5. What is the cost of the book's purchase to the government?

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Departments of the Secretary of State and Supply and Services as follows: 1. Under contract to the Secretary of State's Department as author of "Cross Canada Cooking" Sondra Gotlieb received a fee of $13,000.00. She received no other payment for the book from the Department of the Secretary of State, except for an amount of $2,091.00 (travelling expenses—$991.00, administrative costs—$1,100.00)

2, 4 and 5. Secretary of State 300 copies, $1,342.50; Supply and Services 5,000 copies, $22,375.00.

LANDFILL SITE—JACK'S LAKE, NOVA SCOTIA

Question No. 1,418—Mr. McCleave:

With reference to the answer to Question No. 1,069, what is the identity of the further information and the nature of the further engineering studies concerning the Jack's Lake, Nova Scotia landfill site, that the Department of the Environment requires from the provincial government?

Mr. Jim Fleming (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): The Department of the Environment has requested further information on the design of the proposed environmental control systems, the design of the landfill monitoring program, and the details of a contingency plan to be implemented in the event that leachate escapes untreated from the site and is found to be migrating away from the site within the localized groundwater flow regime. In addition the Department has requested further engineering study of the hydrostratigraphy of the area downgradient of the landfill. This information will be used as necessary to request modifications of the environmental control systems design to ensure that the landfills' impact on the surrounding environment is minimized.

PUBLIC WORKS—RENTAL OF SPACE HUMBER-ST. GEORGE'S-ST. BARBE

1. From January 1, 1974 to date, has the Department of Public Works made any agreements for the rental of space in the Constituency of Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe and, if so, in what locations?

2. Is the Department now seeking rental space in the Constituency of Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe and, if so, for what purpose and how much area?

Mr. Alexandre Cyr (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works): 1. Yes, at the following locations: Corner Brook, Stephenville, St. Andrews, Rocky Harbour, Port-aux-Choix.

NATIONAL TRANSPORTATION ACT

MEASURE TO REDEFINE OBJECTIVE OF TRANSPORTATION POLICY

Hon. Ron Basford (for the Minister of Transport) moved that Bill C-33, to amend the National Transportation Act and the Department of Transport Act for the purpose of defining the objective of the transportation policy for Canada and authorizing the consequential rearrangement of powers and duties relating to transport and to amend the Transport Act and the Railway Act in respect of freight rates and other matters, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, on rising on behalf of my colleague, the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang), to propose second reading of this bill, it is with great pleasure that I inform hon. members opposite that the Minister of Transport is in Vancouver attending a conference on economic transportation—

An hon. Member: How did he get there?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Did he get there by train?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please.

Mr. Basford: —which led last night to an important statement being made by the minister.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Outside the House.

Mr. Basford: The minister met in Victoria with his provincial counterpart, Mr. Davis, and Premier Bennett on questions of west coast transportation which I am optimistic will lead to a resolution of the problems that I and my colleague, the hon. member for Skeena (Mrs. Campagnolo), and others have been so actively involved with in the last few weeks.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Why is she blushing?

An hon. Member: She is too busy playing football.

Mrs. Campagnolo: I do not blush.

Mr. Basford: When the major elements of government's transportation policy were announced in this House by the former minister of transport in June, 1975, we stated that the federal government should play a positive and selective role to ensure that the over-all system develops in an effective way to meet national and regional needs.

An hon. Member: Tell us about the election promise in Cornwall.

An hon. Member: Tell us about Stewart, B.C.

Mr. Basford: We are going to come to Stewart in a moment.

An hon. Member: We will leave you there, too.

An hon. Member: What about the longshoremen in Prince Rupert?

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, I have a very long speech.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: It had better be a good one.

[The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier).]

Mr. Basford: I fear for the opposition. If we are going to have all these interruptions, the long speech may become needlessly long.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Miss MacDonald: It is needless anyway.

An hon. Member: Is it necessary?

An hon. Member: How much did it cost?

An hon. Member: Who wrote it?

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, I am disappointed that hon. members opposite regard transportation as such a light-hearted matter when in fact it has been—

An hon. Member: Where is the minister?

An hon. Member: Who is light-hearted?

An hon. Member: The minister is not concerned.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): The minister had to hire a lawyer.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I think in courtesy to the House and all hon. members we should hear the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford). He has the floor.

Mr. Basford: The general objective of that policy is to provide a transportation system that effectively supports the achievement of national and regional, economic and social objectives, is efficient and ensures a high degree of accessibility and equity for all users.

Miss MacDonald: Where?

Mr. Basford: We also emphasized throughout the new policy that there should be an efficient integration of the various modes of transportation by each service so that the best level of service is provided at the lowest possible cost.

The new policy recognizes, contrary to some elements of the 1967 National Transportation Act, that transportation in Canada is a mix of services, varying in the degree of development and maturity and in the degree of competition.

Our view is that the role of the government should vary according to the nature of the services and region concerned. Those services which are well developed and mature should be operated on a commercially viable basis within a general policy and regulatory framework provided by the government. Hence, in those cases where there is effective competition, rates and services should be determined largely through the forces of the marketplace. Yet in other regions or in other parts of the transportation system where services are required in the national or regional interest, but cannot achieve commercial viability or the required degree of technological development, the federal government is prepared to provide active support and financial assistance.

It has sometimes been suggested that our policy involves competition between the two concepts of commercial viability on the one hand and, on the other, the use of transportation as an instrument for the achievement of economic and social goals. The government does not see these concepts as conflicting but, rather, as complementary and mutually reinforcing. Because there appears to be some public misunderstanding on the point—a misunderstanding on the part of my noisy friends opposite—I should like to take a little time to explain how we see the relationship between those two objectives. The starting point is the proposition that it is the responsibility of government to see to it that the national transportation system—

● (1510)

An hon. Member: Who wrote the speech?

Mr. Basford: —to the extent practical—

An hon. Member: How much did it cost?

Mr. Basford: —provides freight and passenger services which adequately and efficiently meet the economic and social needs of Canadians.

Mr. Alexander: No wonder Lang isn't here.

Mr. Basford: This is true whether or not the users of each individual service can reasonably afford to pay the full costs of providing that service. There are, and probably will always be, some services which are required in order to meet legitimate economic and social needs such as regional development or access to remote communities but for which the particular users cannot reasonably be expected to pay the full costs. In such cases government support in the form of direct or indirect subsidy is necessary and reasonable. Government support of this kind to ensure the provision of necessary transportation facilities which cannot be commercially viable represents the use of transportation as an instrument for the achievement of economic and social objectives. But the resources available to government for these purposes are necessarily limited and should always be used for maximum effect because the legitimate claims upon them are extensive. It is therefore important, Mr. Speaker, that available resources be conserved for application to those situations where they are most needed, and not dissipated in support of transportation services which may only be convenient but not necessary or of other services which are necessary but capable of commercial viability without subsidy.

Subsidies so often distort the picture and hide real costs, so that more is spent in total on transportation than would have been without the distortion. That is waste; this is not cost effective. Wherever we can, therefore, we shall make decisions based on real costs. Where even the lowest cost is too high for someone to pay we should help him, if we see his needs, to have the service. Most often we should help him but leave him free to find the lowest cost and most effective transportation.

Given that policy approach, my purpose today, on behalf of the Minister of Transport is twofold: first, to give what is more or less a progress report to the House on several of the major initiatives which the government has undertaken or is about to undertake to implement that new transportation policy and, second, to introduce proposed amendments to the National Transportation Act, the Railway Act, the Transport Act and the Department of Transport Act in order to implement the new policy in areas that require changes to existing legislation. For the first purpose it might be useful to outline our activities in freight and then in passenger transportation.

Over the past few years we have undertaken a number of initiatives, often with the provinces, carriers and industries concerned, to move freight more effectively and efficiently within, to and from Canada. Some of our efforts have a regional orientation, others are more national in scope. In western Canada, various developments are under way or are in an advanced stage of planning. First, we are involved in a number of activities to improve and increase the capacity of the rail system to move commodities within the region and to export markets. These include the improvement of the CN and CP main lines through the Rockies and the prairies, the development of the northern British Columbia rail system and an examination of the possibilities of joint track usage.

Second, we are taking various steps to change and modernize the grain handling system, including the purchase of hopper cars, investments in new or improved terminal facilities, and recommendations of the Hall and Snavely commissions. Third, we have or will be adopting measures to add to the capacity, efficiency and annual throughput of port facilities in centres such as Prince Rupert and Vancouver. Finally, we are making investments in the primary highway networks of the prairies and in the development of highways in the western northlands.

In central and eastern Canada a similar range of freight transportation efforts is under way or planned, including port expansions and improvements at such centres as Quebec City, Saint John and Halifax; capital investments and essential research and development to increase the utilization of the St. Lawrence Seaway and the Great Lakes through lock and channel improvements and through the development of marine shunters and air-cushion icebreaking vehicles; and measures to increase efficiency and capacity in the railway system and in ferry freight operations and the highway network, particularly in the Atlantic region.

Northern Canada has historically also had unique transportation problems and needs. We are dealing with these through increased funding for air transportation infrastructure, continuing support for the Northern Transportation Company Ltd., improved Arctic resupply services, joint industry-government investment in the MV Arctic bulk carrier, and the analysis of future marine investments for the north, including perhaps a larger polar icebreaker to assist in the exploration and development of Arctic natural resources. Each of these efforts is aimed at meeting the development needs and potential of each region of the country by ensuring that the basic freight transportation system is there to accommodate and, where necessary, to stimulate industrial and commercial growth.

Besides these regional thrusts, freight transportation initiatives more national in scope are under way or planned. Soon the government hopes to table in this House legislation to establish largely autonomous port commissions at 20 ports of national significance and to improve the co-ordination and direction of all transportation port activity through the creation of a Canadian ports commission within the Department of Transport.

The methods of regulating freight transportation as well as passenger transportation are in continuous need of change and improvement as freight movements grow in quantity, variety and complexity and as traffic flows shift from one mode to another or from one trade area to another. The CTC has made a number of determined attempts to improve the efficiency of its regulatory process, especially in the area of rail transportation. The new legislative proposals which will be outlined shortly should help in freeing scarce resources in the CTC, enabling it to focus more exclusively on its regulatory functions. The proposed changes should also provide a more effective legal basis for rail freight regulations. While for a variety of reasons the federal role in truck regulation has never been clear since 1967, the government is hopeful that as a result of current discussions with the provinces and industry we will be able to fashion a more effective federal-provincial partnership in that important regulatory area.

A final freight transportation matter of broader national implication is the systematic analysis of various direct and indirect freight subsidies and assistance programs. These range from branch line subsidies through grain freight rate assistance and St. Lawrence Seaway deficits to Atlantic region freight rate subsidies. Most of these were implemented when the economic and transportation needs of the west, Ontario, Quebec and the Atlantic provinces were significantly different from what they will be in the coming decade. Some of these programs, however well-intentioned and effective years ago, now actually inhibit the development of certain regions and of parts of the transportation system. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Transport has proposed changes in a number of these assistance programs. We think that these changes will lead to a more efficient, effective and productive transportation system.

Another important element of the new transportation policy is the recognition that passenger problems are every bit as real to the country as freight transportation problems and that the challenge of moving people in the most effective and efficient manner increasingly calls for a multimodal approach; that is, an approach which emphasizes that every mode, whether it is air, rail, bus or car should be encouraged where it is likely to be the most effective. In the context of that approach the Minister of Transport announced last January a policy on rail passenger services. In the light of unacceptably high financial losses and deteriorating services in recent years on rail passenger operations, the government's objectives are to revitalize those services which are essential and potentially effective and encourage other modes to replace rail services which are no longer justified.

The Canadian Transport Commission recently issued a summary report on transcontinental rail passenger services following extensive public hearings on this subject. It is currently giving priority, as directed in the rail passenger policy statement, to the development of a plan for transcontinental and regional rail services in western and central Canada. As service is improved and subsidy per passenger decreased, it is the government's intent to increase its subsidy from 80 per cent to 100 per cent of losses. We are also negotiating with CN and CP for the establishment of a Canadian rail passenger corporation that will operate, manage and market the improved service across the country, Via Canada.

To demonstrate the possibilities of improved rail passenger services the government has chosen the Quebec-Windsor corridor. The first phase of the corridor improvement project, affecting the Quebec City-Montreal segment, has already begun. Over the next three years the government will spend approximately $30 million on this segment in order to acquire modern, high-speed trains and to improve rail lines, signals and maintenance facilities. Let me stress that it is also our aim to make improvements in several rail services in other areas of the country. Following completion of the CTC hearings, the remaining transcontinental and regional rail passenger services in every part of the country, not just in the Quebec-Windsor corridor, will be improved.

The broader multimodal approach to transportation has also caused the federal government to focus more closely on interprovincial bus transportation, the role of the automobile and the future need for urban transportation. We are working with the provinces to consider ways and means of improving bus transportation in certain parts of the country; the Atlantic region is one example. While there may never be enough financial resources to meet all needs for urban transportation, we believe that we have launched a number of positive steps, through the rail relocation, grade crossing and commuter rail programs, to improve public transportation in urban areas.

It has been the view of a number of Canadians, and perhaps even some members of this House, that in its approach to passenger transportation the federal Department of Transport has historically been unduly oriented toward the air mode at the expense of bus and rail. Certainly, the rail passenger initiatives I just mentioned should alleviate that concern. But it should also be kept in mind that the demand for air transportation has grown in leaps and bounds over the past two decades and, despite some cyclical slowdowns, is likely to continue to increase substantially in the future.

Hence, new facilities and services have been and will continue to be provided wherever necessary and desirable. Yet at the same time I would like to inform members that additional measures have been implemented recently to ensure that airports and air services are developed and approved, where the case is sound, with standards and facilities which the air industry and Canadians both need and can afford. In some way, our air services and facilities have been so good that we have perhaps come to expect too much; we may have to lower our level of expectations unless we are prepared to pay more through increased government expenditures and, hence, increased taxes.

While on the subject of government expenditures and taxes for transportation purposes, I might once again tell hon. members briefly why this government is so concerned about the need to increase the level of cost recovery from transportation services. As we all know, most Canadians are worried about rising government expenditures and about growing government involvement in almost every aspect of Canadian society. There is a general desire—sometimes I wonder whether it is shared by members opposite—to limit government spending and government involvement, and that desire applies to certain aspects of transportation as well. Where possible, the growth in government expenditures should be reduced and activities left to the individual, to the local community or to private enterprise.

Federal transportation expenditures have increased rapidly. For example, over the past five years the combined budget of the Department of Transport, including Transport Canada financing of Crown corporations, and the Canadian Transport Commission has almost doubled from $834.5 million in 1970-71 to $1,646.6 million in 1975-76. In this latter year our deficit for the provision of air services across the country totalled $448 million; ferry subsidies, largely in the Atlantic provinces, accounted for another $110.5 million; freight subsidies, east and west, were $118 million; rail passenger subsidies, $160 million; while the current debt of the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority and its 1975-76 operating and maintenance losses are $817 million and $17 million respectively. Besides accounting for more than one half of our total 1975-76 budget, these deficits and subsidies are increasing at a very rapid rate. For example, it has been predicted that without the positive government initiative I referred to earlier, the 1980 subsidies for rail passenger services alone would be approximately $400 million as compared with the 1975-76 figure of $160 million.

These subsidies also often distort the choice by users and consumers of the most economically efficient transportation means and have in the past led to real or imagined regional discrimination. For example, while in 1972 governments at all levels subsidized rail and air passengers by five cents and two cents per mile respectively, the bus passenger received no subsidy at all. Surely we should not bias the passenger's choice among competing travel modes in this way. This is particularly true in cases where the bias is counter to other important objectives such as environmental quality or energy efficiency.

In freight transportation a number of bulk commodity movements are currently subsidized through such mechanisms as the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority and the Crowsnest pass rates agreement. Finally, certain regions of the country often voice objections, many of them valid, that the direct or indirect subsidization of freight and passenger movements in one region inhibits the necessary development of industries and communities in other regions. Hence, our transportation deficits and subsidies are not only large and increasing rapidly; they are also often unfair and discriminatory. In addition, subsidies frequently tend to encourage inefficiency; the more one subsidizes a service, the fewer are the incentives to remain or to become efficient.

In light of these facts I think all members will agree that the federal government must ask whether the present variety of expensive subsidy programs and deficits is providing Canadians with the best possible return per dollar spent on transportation and whether they should be allowed to increase at such a rapid rate. Unless we can control our transportation expenditures, and unless we insist that whenever possible the users of these transportation services pay a greater proportion of the actual cost themselves, the taxpayer will simply have to pay more taxes or the government will have to increase its deficits. And as my colleague, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald), has pointed out repeatedly, that is simply not realistic in times of economic difficulty and in light of the general desire of most Canadians for fiscal restraint by all levels of government.

It is within this context that the agreement proposed, and discussed with many formally and informally, a policy of cost effectiveness; that is, to see how our deficits and subsidies can be reoriented to make them more effective, more equitable and as inexpensive to the taxpayer as possible. The policy basically implies that whenever national or regional, economic or social ends do not justify a transportation subsidy, then the user of the facility or service should pay. This certainly does not mean that all transportation services should be fully paid for by their users, regardless of circumstances. If that were the case, many necessary services such as air connections to remote northern communities or maritime ferry services, to mention a few obvious examples, would simply disappear.

That certainly is not our objective. If only for this reason, we have no doubt that government subsidies will continue to play a significant role in our national transportation system. Yet surely it makes sense that users should pay the cost of transportation services where it is economically practical for them to do so. Then the limited funds available for subsidies can be reserved for those special situations where necessary transportation services cannot earn sufficient revenues to cover their costs and can only be provided with government assistance.

These subsidy funds can and will be used to stimulate slow-growth regions and to provide essential transportation services. In the Atlantic provinces, the minister has discussed with the provincial premiers different alternatives for reallocating transportation funds to assist regional air, bus, rail and highway improvements. In the west, the federal government has helped in the strengthening of prairie highways and is implementing programs to encourage prairie air services and the movement of rapeseed products. I am somewhat startled at the ruckus we have seen in the last few days against my colleague, the Minister of Transport, sitting down with the mayor of Saskatoon and working out a general agreement for the improvement of the airport and the development of plans to enhance our services. When the opposition talks so much about the need for improvement in transportation services I am startled at the ruckus they have created during the last two days during the question period.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: We want to make sure it happens.

Mr. Basford: In British Columbia we are studying the future development of transportation infrastructure for the movement of regional resources, especially coal. In other words, by changing existing subsidy programs that are not totally effective we can reallocate scarce funds for more essential development purposes.

Mr. Speaker, I think the initiatives I have mentioned so far demonstrate the government's intention to adopt the positive yet selective role envisaged in our new transportation policy. But I want to stress that this role has not been exercised unilaterally. We have been, and intend to continue, planning and implementing changes in consultation and often in conjunction with the provinces, the carriers, industry, labour and the public at large. For example, over the past few years we have established formal federal-provincial committees for each of the western, Ontario, Quebec and Atlantic regions so that at both the ministerial and officials level there will be regular contact, dialogue and co-operation on major transportation issues. We have also improved our consultative mechanisms with the major carriers such as CN, CP, Air Canada, CP Air, with the regional air carriers and with carrier associations and industry groups too numerous to list in full today. Suffice it to say here that the list includes such carrier associations as the Dominion Marine Association, Canadian Trucking Association, port groups, the Air Transport Association of Canada and the Canadian Motor Coach Association, and such industry groups as the Canadian Industrial Traffic League and the Canadian Manufacturers' Association.

I hope, Mr. Speaker, that this quick progress report has been of some assistance to the House in informing the members, if only in a general way, about the approach to and main elements of our transportation initiatives. It will, I hope, also help to set the stage for the second subject which I wish to address today: the main elements of the transport policy legislative proposals which the Miniser of Transport would like to introduce for second reading. There are three main elements of the legislation: first, proposed changes and additions to the transportation policy objectives and principles under section 3 of the National Transportation Act; second, proposed changes and additions to the National Transportation Act and the Department of Transport Act relating to the responsibilities of the Minister of Transport and the Canadian Transport Commission; third, proposed amendments to the Railway Act, the National Transportation Act, and the Transport Act, relating to the legislation governing the regulation of railway freight rates.

The proposed revised statement of objectives and principles under section 3 of the National Transportation Act reflects the new policy thrust outlined in June, 1975, by the former minister of transport in his statement to the House. The amendments now being introduced have been discussed with provincial governments, the carriers and other interested parties. The government's intent, in proposing the revised statement of objectives and principles, is to retain those elements of the National Transportation Act which continue to be relevant to present requirements. At the same time, the changes and additions in the proposed legislation are significant. Our main proposals consist of four basic points: first, a statement which establishes that it is the objective of the transportation policy for Canada to achieve a transportation system that is efficient, is an effective instrument of support for the achievement of national and regional social and economic objectives, and is accessible and equitable. The concept of efficiency in the present act is not lost, but more emphasis is placed on service to Canadians and on the support of national and regional objectives. When this is referred to committee, the minister will propose, once having completed consultation with the provinces, some amendments to the transportation policy objective which will further strengthen the government's commitment to link transportation with the achievement of national and regional objectives.

Second, the recognition of the need for co-operation between the different levels of government, as well as consultation with the public in major aspects of the development and economic regulation of the transportation system. It certainly is our intention that no major policy initiatives will be put forward unless there has been a full and frank process of consultation with the provinces concerned. While, of course, this has to be a two-way process, we are firmly of the belief that by doing so we will have more effective policies and a better transportation system.

Third, a principle establishing the explicit goal of over-all commercial viability for the transportation system, yet allowing for financial assistance by the government when necessary, especially when the achievement of national or regional objectives requires it. Here, too, my colleague will propose an amendment in committee to ensure that the achievement of national and regional objectives is an overriding objective relative to the objective of commercial viability.

Fourth, the recognition that where effective competition exists, transportation rates and services should be established by the market place, but where it does not exist, rates and services should be regulated so as to give users the same protection they would have if effective competition existed.

These principles have the most immediate relevance for domestic transportation, but they also have relevance for the international shipping on which Canada's well-being as a major trading nation is highly dependent. By reason both of technological change and the policies which other countries are adopting to meet their national aspirations—policies and aspirations with which we have no basic quarrel—the competitive nature of international shipping is changing. In light of that change, Canada's own international shipping policy, which is basically one of reliance on free competition to provide adequate and economic services for our shippers, may require adjustment. This whole area is under review and it is already clear that we require legislation to enable us to work constructively with countries which prefer not to rely entirely on free competition to assure the carriage of our bilateral trade.

● (1540)

A second main element in the package of legislative proposals being introduced today involves proposed amendments to the section of the National Transportation Act which states the responsibilities of the Minister of Transport and of the Canadian Transport Commission. As early as 1973, the then minister of transport forcefully expressed his concern at the lack of authority which the minister has under the present legislation to ensure that adequate transportation policies are developed and implemented in the national interest. The amendments that are now being proposed can be viewed as part of the government's adoption of a more positive role in the provision of an effective national transportation system, which at the same time maintains the essential role of the CTC as a regulatory body.

Hence, the proposed changes and additions to the National Transportation Act include first, clarification that it is the responsibility of the Minister of Transport to undertake the necessary measures to achieve the objective of the transportation policy, consistent with the proposed revised statement of principles which I have just discussed. This involves the addition of the proposed section 3(3) of the act which specifies the responsibility of the minister. Second, the amendment of section 22 to transfer a number of policy advisory functions to the department. The commission would retain the regulatory powers it has relating to licensing, authorizing or requiring the operation of and controlling the rates and tariffs for those modes of transport under its jurisdiction.

Third, the addition of section 3.1(1) to permit the governor in council, by order, to transfer to the minister any powers, duties or functions conferred or imposed on the Canadian Transport Commission by this act or any other act; this section would not authorize the transfer of any power, duty or function relating to the commission's regulatory responsibilities for licensing, authorizing or requiring the operation of and controlling the rates and tariffs for any mode of transport.

Fourth, amendments to sections 3 and 22 which would permit the minister to transfer powers to the commission to be exercised on his behalf, and request the commission to undertake research and investigation that would be of assistance to him in the exercise of his powers.

Fifth, addition of section 3.2 to permit the governor in council, on the recommendation of the minister, to issue general policy directives to the Canadian Transport Commission; this section stipulates that each such directive shall be without specific reference to any particular matter before the commission.

The third main part of the government's transport policy legislation proposes certain amendments to the legislation governing the regulation of railway freight rates. Under the National Transportation Act of 1967 the Canadian railways have been generally free, with the important exception of the statutory grain rates, to set railway freight rates without regulatory approval so long as the rates are filed with the Canadian Transport Commission. The existing legislation under the Railway Act does include a minimum rate provision to prevent the railways from providing services on an non-compensatory basis, and a maximum rate provision to give some means of relief to shippers who rely exclusively on rail. However, these provisions in the Railway Act have been largely inoperative, and the so-called "public interest" clause—section 23 of the National Transportation Act—has given rise to frequent complaints from shippers about the costly and protracted nature of the regulatory process.

The rate-making freedom of the railways has been of concern to a number of provinces and shippers. Many firms are still largely dependent on rail transportation and often on one particular railway. In the case of bulk commodities, market competition has often been successful in reducing rates, but this success has been much less apparent in the movement of the more highly manufactured goods, especially those from central Canada to western markets. Our proposals to amend the legislation governing railway freight rates are generally intended to promote a greater degree of fairness, both regionally and to shippers, while taking into account the financial need of the Canadian railways. The government envisages that Canadian railways should continue to exercise considerable freedom in establishing freight rates where competitive forces can be expected to protect the public interest. Nevertheless, because of the importance of the railway system to the national economy, and the continued existence of some railway monopoly power in certain markets, it is proposed that the maximum and minimum rate provisions of the Railway Act should be strengthened.

The government acknowledges that maximum-minimum rules for regulating railway freight rates cannot be effective without a measure of railway costs which is accurate and which can be efficiently administered. Consequently, we intend to defer proclamation of the proposed amendments governing the establishment of new maximum and minimum rate rules until the Canadian Transport Commission has reviewed the 1969 railway costing order and has revised it through the public hearing process under section 330 of the Railway Act. We believe that the costing order requires revision in light of the economic and technological changes which have occurred since 1969.

Once a better costing system is developed, the government proposes that the present rules under the Railway Act should be amended. The principal amendments would be as follows: first, implementation of a more effective maximum rate provision which would grant discretionary powers to the governor-in-council to vary or eliminate the present "key weight"—of 30,000 pounds per carload—and to reduce the maximum add-on from the present 150 per cent above variable cost down to 100 per cent above variable cost. It is also proposed to make the maximum rate provision available to all shippers, instead of the present limitation to "captive" shippers.

Second, other legislative changes to ensure adequate enforcement of both the minimum and the maximum rate provisions. It is proposed to establish penalty clauses for the violation of these provisions, with the railways being liable for financial payments in the case of such violations. In the case of the minimum rate provision, this would continue to be based on variable cost, as redefined under the proposed new costing order, with an additional provision under the Railway Act which, if implemented, would require the CTC to annually submit to the Minister of Transport a report on any investigations of railway freight rates which are possibly below variable costs.

In addition to changing the maximum-minimum provisions of the Railway Act the government proposes to amend section 23 of the National Transportation Act in order to establish time limits for the handling of freight rate cases under this section by the CTC at the prima facie stage, while maintaining the discretionary authority of the regulatory body where leave to appeal has been granted. This proposal is intended to expedite the hitherto protracted nature of investigations under this section, while at the same time maintaining due process. The CTC will also continue its general efforts to improve administrative procedures in freight rate cases.

Finally, it is proposed to introduce an amendment which would directly address, for the first time, the problem of long-haul/short-haul rate differentials. The proposed amendment would require the CTC, on the basis of a complaint, to prohibit such rate differentials except where the CTC is satisfied that owing to competition it is expedient to allow such a differential to exist. This proposal is intended to modify an element of railway pricing which has been perceived, especially in the prairie provinces, as an example of unfair discrimination. At the same time, it will permit exceptions where a complete prohibition could place Canadian producers at a competitive disadvantage vis-à-vis foreign producers.

We think that the various legislative proposals I have just outlined will accomplish a number of things. The new objectives and principles will allow the government to provide a framework for the longer-term development of transportation policy. The reallocation of responsibilities between the minister, the Department of Transport and the Canadian Transport Commission will produce more effective policy development, program implementation and regulatory processes. The new freight rates provisions will lead to more equitable rates and better regulatory procedures.

● (1550)

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I would recall the words of the Minister of Transport in the policy statement of 1975 by reaffirming the historic role of transportation as an instrument of national purpose. We in the government believe that the major initiatives which have been taken to implement the new policy, and the package of legislative proposals introduced today, demonstrate clearly our continuing commitment to this historic role. It is a pleasure on my part to move second reading of this bill on behalf of my colleague, the Minister of Transport, who as I explained is unavoidably absent from the House on important transportation business on the west coast. Naturally, he will be joining the debate on this bill in due course.

[Mr. Basford.]

Mrs. Holt: Mr. Speaker, I wish to rise on a point of order. A national rail policy to unify and serve one Canada has just been introduced in the House, and only two reporters are present, not one of them from the CBC whose mandate and duty it is to unify and report—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. Considering the business before the House, I have serious doubts as to whether this can be recognized as a point of order.

Mr. J. H. Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, I am somewhat amused by the interjection of the hon. member for Vancouver Kingsway (Mrs. Holt). She is concerned about the press. Why is she not concerned about the minister whose obligation it is to pilot this legislation through the House?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Horner: We must reach rational decisions, and if the press reports them, that is fine, and if it does not, that is their loss. How can we sit idly by when the first major amendments to the Transportation Act—which was brought in in 1967 and which a former minister of transport said was in a mess—are brought in? We have endured that mess for four years, waiting for this legislation, but the minister responsible does not even show up.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Horner: He makes some announcement. I go along with the hon. member for Skeena (Mrs. Campagnolo) that he should have been out solving that problem on the west coast some months ago. She brought it to his attention, and my seatmate in the House brought it to his attention some months ago. What has taken him so long?

Mr. McKenzie: He is busy politicking in Saskatchewan.

Mr. Horner: The problem is that he has lost favour with the Liberal backbenchers, so the government has demoted him and sent him out west because they do not want the backbenchers of the Liberal party to enter this debate, and they felt that if he was here initiating the debate he would antagonize his own members and provoke a discussion.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Horner: So I believe it is an insult to the minister that the government did not allow him to make the introductory speech to pilot this legislation through the House. Certainly I would not blame the minister for feeling hurt. I know that in announcing his Via Canada transportation policy more than likely he took the train to Vancouver.

An hon. Member: He took "Lang Air."

Mr. Horner: A Liberal backbencher says he took "Lang Air". I guess he did. They know best. They are the ones who put up with him as their Minister of Transport. In my opinion, this is very important legislation and I think it is an insult to the House of Commons that the minister is not here to pilot it through. I think it is an insult to the House of Commons that he was not here to accept the good wishes of members. He did not have the good grace to announce his new passenger system in the House of Commons. The Financial Post had an article on the new passenger system in its issue of February 12. The minister did not have to go to Vancouver to make that announcement. He was in the House of Commons between February 12 and March 1 when he could have made that announcement in the House and it would have been examined by the opposition parties. Perhaps the minister could have explained it better and perhaps the media and the Liberal backbenchers would have understood it better.

I believe that this legislation takes the government from the mess it was in and puts it in another mess.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Horner: It changes the objects of the National Transportation Act. I agree that railway transportation has a very important role to play in the regional economic stability of this country, but it is also the object of the government to create stability, to create an economic atmosphere where there can be some thrust and some confidence placed in the guidelines and rules of the government of the day. The president of CPR said of this bill, at a transportation conference in Toronto recently, "You will have rate-making for political reasons".

An hon. Member: Good idea.

Mr. Horner: That is like drilling for oil for votes. Now you will have rate-making for votes. The president of the Canadian Trucking Association had this to say about the bill:

> Whether there will be instability and uncertainty in transport policy in future will depend on how "political" transportation policy is in future and also on the stability and continuity in the Transport Canada bureaucracy. In this regard, there is not much reason to be optimistic based on recent performance. Not only do we now have ministers playing musical chairs with portfolios every couple of years, but it would seem that senior officials and particularly those involved in policy planning, have taken up the same sport. This means that every two or three years there is likely to be a whole new wave of personalities involved in transportation planning, who for the most part, have little direct background in transportation. It will be these officials who are called on to respond to the political pressures that are exerted. Instead of cranking-up a royal commission or task force every ten years or so to review transportation policy, followed by an exhaustive legislative overhaul where all interested parties can be heard to the point of exhaustion, we will in future have an ultra-streamlined approach to transportation policy evolution so that whatever views on transport happen to be in the ascendancy can be implemented at a flick of an order-in-council. That may be progress—

However, he thinks it is slightly before its time. Certainly it is before its time. One of the points I want to make at the beginning of my comments is to ask the minister to assure the House that after second reading this bill will go to committee where we will be able to call as witnesses the president of the Canadian Trucking Association, the president of CPR, the president of CNR and the presidents of those companies that will be affected by this bill, so that parliament can know exactly what they are doing. I think it is of the utmost importance that we have that assurance, because when I look back to the time when we had a lengthy debate in the House on legislation setting up the Canadian Transport Commission and on the national transportation policy in 1967, I remember all the warnings we gave to the government.

● (1600)

We told the government that competition alone would not be good enough. We said that there should be some kind of review policy whereby the government could have some control over the CTC. We warned the government that it was giving all the power in connection with transportation to a non-elected body. The government paid no heed to us whatsoever, and what we said came true. Rather than the CTC being an independent body and adjudicating fairly, it changed completely. Now the CTC has gone the other way and become a political body which does the bidding of the minister. It will not be looked upon any longer as a fair and neutral authority adjudicating on what is right and what is fair. It will be looked upon as a servant of the political party in power. To me that is a retrograde step.

I believe the ministry should have the authority to command—second guess, if necessary—the CTC but the CTC should be viewed by the industry as a neutral authority prepared to hear both sides of cases, the user side and the supplier side.

It is very interesting to look back at statements made by ministers in this regard. It is particularly interesting today because the Minister of Justice is piloting this legislation through the House, and the Minister of Transport is away. We never know what ministers are going to say. On February 18, 1977, with regard to Crown corporations being allowed to run their own affairs, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) said the following:

> One of the conclusions that we have arrived at—and it seems to me to be a sensible one—is that one should entrust the management of CNR to the president and the officers of that corporation and let them manage.

This bill will hardly let the management of the CNR manage that company. It gives the governor in council power to interfere with the management of the CNR in any way it wants.

In a similar statement about Air Canada on February 10, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said this:

> This is a dilemma we are struggling with, and I think in the Air Canada Act which is before the House now we have indicated some of the directions in which we are trying to solve this by giving the government specific authority to issue directives of a general nature to Crown corporations.

Those two statements express a difference of opinion between the Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister.

Let us again consider this bill and some of the statements made by the Minister of Transport. In a speech on June 11, 1976, the minister made many interesting statements. He explained what the former minister of transport said when he stated that the transport policy was in a mess. He said:

What he meant to say was that the policy was a mess, that the conglomeration of approaches to transportation in Canada which had developed over the years was full of inconsistencies and contradictions, that it had built into Canada tremendous costs in the way of non-productive expenditure that was in fact counter-productive.

The minister recognized what former policies did, but nowhere in this bill can we see where he will eliminate any of those costs. He is going to create more costs, more insecurity, and more instability.

In that same speech the minister went on to say the following:

We will only be able to succeed in improving our transportation policy in Canada, and thereby our transportation system with our dollars, if we are prepared to be strong enough to stand up politically and draw the picture of what we are trying to accomplish in terms of removing the band-aids, not individually but one by one, in order to remove them in total . . .

He went on to say that we have had a patchwork of policies which have created subsidies piled one on top of another in answer to political demands.

I just indicated what the Minister of Transport had to say about the former transportation policy, and yet the presidents of the trucking association, the CPR and the CNR say that this bill will put them more in the hands of politicians. The Minister of Transport accused the old legislation of doing that. Many see this legislation doing the same thing. In this day and age of user pay, we have to take a great deal of interest in the most efficient mode of transportation and in who is paying the cost.

Before going any further I would like to compliment the research branch of the Library of Parliament. I would like to table four charts which came from the CTC. These charts refer to transport costs and revenues in Canada. They outline very clearly what each mode of transportation costs, the depreciation, the capital, the total costs, the annual revenue each mode of transportation creates, and the percentage of the cost that revenue is. These charts deal with roads, marine services, civil aviation, and railways. With the permission of the House I would like to table these four charts which came from the CTC and which were brought to my attention by the research branch of the parliamentary library or make them an appendix to Hansard because I think they set out very clearly who pays for what, and how efficient is each mode of transportation.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): I regret to inform the hon. gentleman that there is no provision for tabling such documents. They could only be tabled by ministers of the Crown, and they have to be official documents.

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, I ask that they be made an appendix to today's Hansard.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): It is acceptable to present them as an appendix to Hansard if there is the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Mr. Horner.]

[Editor's note: For statistical charts above referred to see Appendix.]

Mr. Horner: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and I also thank the House. These charts should be required reading for all those who are interested in and concerned about transportation. They clearly set out that we have a pretty efficient railway system in Canada today. They set out that the users of our railways pay 74 per cent of the cost. They set out clearly that the users of highways pay 64 per cent of the cost of the highways. The users of our civil aviation system, our airports and our airplanes, pay 31 per cent of the cost. The users of our marine services pay 19 per cent of the cost. When the minister says that we have heaped subsidy upon subsidy upon the railroad industry and that these subsidies have lead to inefficiency, we really must examine that very closely to find out in what way we are comparing the various modes of transportation.

I am not suggesting that in every part of Canada the railroads have operated efficiently, but generally speaking I think we can say they have, in spite of the actions of the government. We must also ask ourselves whether this legislation will make them more efficient, and I have to say no, it will not. The government has stated that it does not pretend that they will be more efficient. As outlined in clause 1 the government wants them to be an effective instrument of support for the achievement of national, regional, social, and economic objectives. The bill does not say that the government is prepared to pay or must pay for these social and regional objectives.

I am certain that both railways would like to think of themselves as being good corporate citizens and that they would respect the wishes of the government provided the government clearly stated somewhere in the legislation that it is prepared to pay these costs. Looking at that particularly, a few weeks ago the president of the CNR said, "We are going to sell those things which we manage, which we find a market for, and which we think are self-sustaining". The Minister of Transport made the same statement. But, Mr. Speaker, who will buy something that the government is saying must be operated as it decrees? I do not think that concept and this policy are compatible.

After reading the bill I ask myself where we are going in the area of transportation? Where is this legislation taking us? Will it solve the problems of the Snavely commission, the problems of the Hall commission, the problems of energy use in Canada today? I can only come to the conclusion that the bill falls far short of solving many of the problems that I see in the transportation industry today. It does not in any way set down guidelines which will motivate the government to direct the Canadian Transport Commission to do any of the things the government will have the power to do.

As I look at this great country of ours today I see we are deficient in oil and are likely to be so for many years. According to the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources, 50 per cent of the oil consumed in Canada is used for transportation. But will this bill direct the transportation industry to conserve oil? In his speech the minister mentioned that we should bear that in mind, but the bill does not give any direction in this regard.

When we examine the user-pay concept we see that the people using the railroad pay the most. Perhaps we should reduce the subsidy to the inefficient users of oil and, if necessary, even increase the subsidy to the efficient users of oil to entice more tonnage to rail movement rather than truck movement. It is estimated that, using the same amount of oil, the railways haul four tons of goods whereas a truck hauls only one. The growth in truck tonnage in Canada has increased by about 17 per cent whereas the growth in rail tonnage has levelled off, or at best is going up only by 1 per cent or 2 per cent. A national transportation policy should give some direction in this regard.

We know that 60 per cent of the oil used in Canada is used by automobiles moving people in and out of the major population centres. Just before the bill was introduced the government announced the election promise of 1974 to spend $290 million to encourage the building of an electrical system for moving people in and out of the cities, a commuter transport system, was to be shelved.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): It will be resurrected for the next election.

Mr. Horner: My hon. friend to my left suggests it will be resurrected at the next election. That would be an interesting resurrection. I do not think it would be believed; if it were, then the voters are more gullible than I thought.

I should like to see some indication in the bill that we are going to conserve energy through a transportation policy which would put us on the right road so that we could see a more efficient use of oil ten years ahead.

In his speech on June 11 the Minister of Transport suggested heavy subsidization. To date the heavy subsidization has been on Mirabel airport which we are told lost $50 million last year. The Minister of Finance tells us that most of that loss was interest charged on money. Mr. Speaker, who has ever borrowed money without paying interest? It is the cost of doing business. Why did they not consult the airlines before building Mirabel? If they had, perhaps the terminal would not have been designed the way it was or public transit vehicles used to move passengers from the terminal to the planes.

Many mistakes have been made in the past, and not by the transportation industry but by the bureaucrats. I have no axe to grind here. Mirabel exists and the best we can do is make good use of it, but I have recommended a couple of ways in which the service could be improved.

As I say, Mr. Speaker, the bureaucrats made most of the mistakes in our transportation policy, not the companies involved in each mode of transportation. Yet this bill gives more authority to the bureaucrats. Looking to the future as one interested in transportation, how can I say with confidence that our system will be better and more efficient? I cannot, Mr. Speaker. If I knew for certain that the game of musical chairs mentioned by the president of the Canadian Trucking Association was not going to continue, and that sooner or later the Minister of Transport would be educated to the problems and adjust to the conditions that he meets in the area of transportation, I might have some confidence. But the musical chairs will continue, Mr. Speaker. The present Minister of Transport will not be minister very long. In fact if he keeps flying around in government airplanes to bonspiels and electioneering in provincial by-elections, his time as minister will probably be shortened very quickly.

As I travel across the country today, Mr. Speaker, I find people are upset and apprehensive about the future. Transportation plays a greater part in the life of Canadians than it does in any other country. In the United States transportation does not cost as much in goods consumed or produced, as in Canada. They have a great inland waterway which lowers transportation costs. We do not have such a good natural system. The countries of the European Common Market have the Rhine River which lowers their transportation costs; we have the St. Lawrence Seaway which only takes goods to half the country. Transportation will continue to play a very important part in the lives of all Canadians.

Instability in the transportation industry deepens the apprehensions we find in Canada today. Millions of dollars need to be spent on transportation—billions of dollars even to keep the present system functioning. Long range planning is essential, but how can we have that and spend the money necessary without any certainty that the policy which exists today will exist tomorrow? That is how quickly changes could be implemented through this legislation.

● (1620)

The governor in council can change that policy with a flick of the finger, and that is of concern to the industry. When we debated the original National Transportation Act in 1967 we said that the clauses having to do with captive shippers and the public interest would be inoperative. Events have proven us right. If a captive shipper faces a prohibitively high freight rate, he ought to be able to appeal quickly the decision setting that rate. The rapeseed case, which came under the public interest clause and which prairie provincial governments argued before the CTC, lasted two years.

An hon. Member: Four years.

Mr. Horner: I beg your pardon, four years. The CTC was seized of it for two years, and the government considered it for two years. That long delay did not bring salutary effects. We must establish a mechanism which will allow a more rapid disposition of appeals relating to the captive shipper and public interest sections. Lengthy appeals hurt the interest of those appealing. If the parties were concerned about the situation at the beginning of the appeal, imagine how concerned they were four years later when the matter was concluded. The damage was very great.

The Minister of Justice announced on behalf of the Minister of Transport the government's new passenger service policy. What is the government to get in return? Apparently the CPR is being taken off the hook. Part and parcel of the CPR's obligation, in return for its land and money grants for building the railway, is the provision of passenger service across Canada. But the present proposal will take the CPR off the hook, to the great delight of the CPR. What we are to get in return from the CPR the statement does not say. My part of Canada will be greatly interested in the deal, for we want to know what we are to get in return for concessions.

The Minister of Justice said that we are prepared to spend $30 million to improve passenger service between Quebec city and Montreal. I am puzzled about that $30 million matter. I have ridden the trains on the north side and the south side of the river, between Montreal and Quebec. I learned, for example, that last year 40,000 passengers travelled between Montreal and Quebec city on the CPR rails north of the river; something like 170,000 passengers travelled on the CNR rails south of the river, but 900,000 passengers travelled by bus last year between Montreal and Quebec. You would think the government would spend money on the most efficient mode of transportation, or the mode which most people choose. Unfortunately the government chooses to help the service which fewest people use. That is where the government will spend the $30 million.

I thought the CPR route must cover the shortest distance. However, on checking I found that the CPR's route between Montreal and Quebec city is the longest. I fail to understand the rationale of the bureaucrats who have devised this policy. I only use this example to show current thinking, and one could allude to many more unfortunate examples.

I raise the question of the Via Canada service. The deputy minister, Mr. Cloutier, not long ago said in the transport committee that the CPR is to be awarded the run between Montreal and Ottawa. That statement caused railway workers great concern. The minister's news release concerning Via Canada suggests that unions and workers are to be consulted and their views taken into consideration. But that is not what the deputy minister said when he told the committee that the CPR is to run the service between Montreal and Ottawa. The CPR runs two trains daily between Montreal and Ottawa, and the CNR six trains daily. Why award the service to the CPR, especially since this is a matter of great concern to CNR employees?

The minister suggested that when a Via Canada train runs over CNR tracks it will be pulled by a CNR engine, with a CNR crew; when it runs over CPR tracks it will be pulled by a CPR engine, with a CPR crew. The board of directors of the enterprise will be divided among representatives of the government, the CNR and the CPR. I say that conglomerate will not work. You will have jealousies as between both managements and as between managements and the Department of Transport.

Senior employees of the CNR have told me that the Department of Transport wants to run the railroads of this country.

They conclude that the department also wants to be involved in the running of the Via Canada service. I therefore say that there will be conflict among the three management groups. If the government wants to provide a rail passenger service, it should consider this matter carefully. It should not run the service under three managements. If it wants to set up a separate Crown corporation, let it set up a Canadian version of Amtrack to run our rail service. The corporation could get rights of way across Canada, and provide passenger service. This should not be done by the conglomerate. I say that its establishment is fraught with danger, jealousy, and anxiety. In this connection I commend to hon. members a reading of "The Wreck of the Penn Central", a book about the problems having to do with the amalgamation of the Central Railroad and the Pennsylvania Railroad in the United States. That amalgamation was unsuccessful. I submit that the proposal of the Minister of Transport will run into the same problem. It will not lead to the provision of the passenger services which Canada needs and deserves.

I do not see why two cities 200 miles apart cannot be provided with good, clean, frequent passenger service which people will use. The people would use a frequent rail service between Ottawa and Montreal. But they will not use it if the railways do not use the right equipment or if the trains do not run at the right times.

I regret that the bill proposes to give the government all kinds of power. Nowhere do I see provision for checks on that power. One cannot say that parliament checks the government's power; parliament has lost ability to control government expenditures. The CNR has not been before the transport committee for three or four years. Air Canada has not been before the committee for five or six years, and the CPR rarely appears before the committee. Our bureaucrats in Ottawa are studying everything, but nobody says in which direction we ought to go, and that is the trouble with the government, and with this legislation. This bill provides no direction for this country. No wonder the people of Canada are apprehensive about the future. The government has failed to provide leadership in all areas of its responsibilities, and this legislation fails in that regard as well.

● (1630)

People on the prairies are concerned about the Snavely commission, the Hall commission, the rationalization of branch lines, as well as the government's intent to raise tolls on the St. Lawrence Seaway. We built the Seaway and it should serve Canada. I agree it should pay the operating costs, but not the capital costs.

Massive expenditures have to be made on rails. This bill in no way suggests how that should be done. The CPR track between Calgary and Vancouver now operates at 100 per cent capacity. The CNR track from Edmonton to Vancouver is in terrible shape. It may be slightly better than the B.C. railroad, but not much.

This bill creates a climate of instability and insecurity. It does not encourage long range planning or capital expenditures. I know there are some changes to the Railway Act. It will allow the railway to sell debentures in Canada and pay more than 6 per cent. CN recently sold debentures in Europe for more than 6 per cent. I am sure that if the Europeans knew of the uncertainty that exists within this rail policy, they would not be so quick to buy CN debentures.

I am sure this bill will go to committee and we in the opposition will have much more to say at that time. We will want to have the representatives of the CNR, CPR, the trucking associations, and maybe even of the marine association, appear before the transport committee to ensure us that they can operate and expand efficiently under this piece of legislation.

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I begin by endorsing some of the remarks made by the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner). We have been waiting many years for a significant revision of the National Transportation Act, the Railway Act, and the transportation policy of the government. However, on the day the bill is called for debate in parliament, the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) is not here. We on this side fully appreciate that he has to be in different parts of Canada from time to time on official business. However, if that takes priority over being in this place to introduce this vital legislation, or announcing the Via rail passenger corporation, the Minister of Transport is being derelict in his duty and has insulted the members of this House of Commons. Like the hon. member for Crowfoot, I suspect he is more likely in and around Saskatoon and Prince Albert messing around in a couple of provincial by-elections.

I want to say on behalf of the New Democratic Party that we will oppose this "user pay" legislation on the grounds that it endorses the notion of commercial viability as opposed to the concept of transportation as a public utility.

This legislation makes user pay the basis of the government's transportation policy. We take exception to the notion that the public interest should be denied in favour of competition and commercial viability. That is what got us into this transportation mess and has kept us there since the early 1900's, the concept of commercial viability and competition in transportation. Now the government restores the very kind of policy that maintains and strengthens the kind of transportation legislation that got us into this trouble.

A policy that relies on those two concepts, commercial viability and competition, will in effect, as it has done up until now, deny national, regional, social, and economic goals that this country should have. It will deny equity and accessibility to people who live in the outlying areas of Canada. It will shift the burden of cost of transportation, previously shared by the nation as a whole, on to those least able to shoulder the burden.

We submit that transportation must be treated as a public utility because it is something that everyone must use. A comprehensive and fair transportation policy should incorporate the following principles.

Our major modes of transportation should be publicly owned, operated, and accountable to the people and to parliament. Service to the public should take precedence over profitability. Every member of this House knows that all modes of transportation have to be subsidized. There is not a single mode of transportation that pays its own way. This is even more the case in a country like Canada than those countries which are smaller in geography and have densely settled populations.

In a country like ours which has a large geography, northern climate, widely scattered population, the transportation system cannot function properly when it is on the basis of private enterprise, competition, and commercial viability. The former minister of transport once said that competition does not work in transportation. It was not a New Democrat who said that but a Liberal.

We believe the transportation system must serve as an instrument to achieve national, regional, social and economic goals. I am sure members on all sides will agree with that. In fact words similar to that are in this bill.

We also believe a transportation policy must have equality of treatment and accessibility to the various modes of transportation, no matter where in this country people may live or where the goods are processed or manufactured.

People in this country have always been discriminated against because of where they live. Processors and manufacturers have been discriminated against because of where they have been located. Our transportation system has never provided equality of treatment. Central Canada, with the most dense population, for the free enterprise reasons we have had for the past 110 years, has had the best quality transportation services because that is where the main market is located. Users of transportation in central Canada get the best rates and fares. The rest of the country has been faced with inadequate service, discriminatory rates, impossible fares, and schedules that are unreasonable. This legislation does not provide equity and reasonable accessibility to all Canadians, no matter where they live in this country.

An efficient transportation system should be developed replacing competition with co-ordination and integration, so that the most appropriate mode of transportation is assigned its given task. I realize that some of these objectives are stated in the new legislation, but the government's commitment to these announced goals is expressed in terms so tentative, so limited, and so hesitant as to call in question the sincerity and strength of its conversion.

● (1640)

The National Transportation Act of 1967, based on the MacPherson Royal Commission, assumed that competition would guide the organization of transportation.

The former minister of transport, Mr. Marchand, had some second thoughts about the principles of competition. In his policy statement of 1975 he said:

. . . if you look at the size of this country and the distribution of its population you will see that you cannot have a transportation network which is economic everywhere; you cannot have an economic system of transportation to service the north, for example, or to service those regions of the country where the population is very thin. You cannot have an ecomomic system for regions which are remote from the centre.

In spite of these brave words, the actual policy tabled in June 1975 reflected little change from the policy which Mr. Marchand said in 1974 resulted in the transportation policy of this country being "in a mess".

In the new transportation policy of June 1975 competition and commercial viability remained enshrined as the guiding principles of transportation policy in Canada. Either Mr. Marchand had lost a major battle with his cabinet colleagues, or he was less than sincere in his public suggestions of drastic changes in transportation policies in Canada.

Much of the substance of this legislation is vague and general. Considering the minister's past statements on the Crowsnest pass grain rates and rail passenger service, one might be thankful that there were no specific references to these last remaining benefits. But make no mistake, the minister has specific intentions and this legislation will give him the power to carry his "user pay" policy to the painful extreme.

In his news release of Jan. 27, 1977, the minister said the amendments to the transportation legislation in Bill C-33 will provide the Minister of Transport with the legislative means to implement the transportation policy as announced in June, 1975. The June, 1975, policy states that the user shall pay for transportation services:

Generally, where transportation services are mature, the users should be expected to pay for the costs of providing the services.

As far as I am concerned, this means the people of western Canada can say, "There goes the statutory grain rate!" It also means that those in the maritime provinces can say, "There go the maritime freight rate subsidies!" In my opinion they have already been sold out by the four premiers of the Atlantic provinces—two Liberals and two Tories. I don't know what the minister said or did to them, but to my mind they have sold out; they have sold out their own people.

What are the mature transportation services referred to and for which the user is to pay? The policy states that movements in mature transport markets include: eastern forest products, northern Ontario resources, Quebec-Labrador ore, western bulk products, and B. C. forest products.

What about passenger transport, which most directly affects people? The June, 1975, policy states:

A more balanced approach to passenger service is required giving consideration to an eventual objective of full commercial viability, including recovery of infrastructure costs, except in remote areas, where traffic volumes may be inadequate and assistance may be required.

Carrying the user-pay policy to a conclusion means that only the rich or those on expense accounts will be able to travel. It means that those who live outside the central corridor will pay even higher charges than those who live along it. It means continued discrimination against Canadians based on where they happen to live.

[Mr. Benjamin.]

The bill is bad in principle because it strengthens and enhances the principles which were previously in the policy. There is no fundamental change in that policy. In fact, it is made worse. To apply the user-pay principle in a country such as ours would jeopardize the sale of our grain overseas. It would jeopardize the success of industries which could and should be started up in the prairie provinces and in the maritimes. Our transportation must have a relatively neutral effect upon the cost of travel or freight if we are to compete effectively either in markets overseas or in domestic markets which are far from the seat of production.

Parcelling out the national transportation system into commercially viable operations and those which are not, leaving the parts which lose money on the backs of the taxpayers, means eliminating the opportunity to cross-subsidize. Cross-subsidization is one of the ways of sharing the cost of transportation. Profits from operations in a densely populated area can help pay for losses incurred in a sparsely populated part of the country. But, no. This government, with the support of the Tories, wants private enterprise to keep the profitable part, letting them make all the money they can, while allowing the cost of the unprofitable part to be borne by those who use the services and by the taxpayers generally through subsidies. And the people who own the profitable parts of the system will be able to laugh all the way to the bank at the expense of our nationhood.

I agree that users should help pay for the operations of our transport system. The important question then is, what is an appropriate user charge? It seems to me that two things have to be taken into consideration here; (1) the cost of providing the service; (2) the value of the service to the national or regional interest and the goals of equity and accessibility.

The user charges for public transport should be set at a level to render the service accessible. In many cases this level would be below the cost of providing the service.

I suppose that the government's reneging on the promise of $300 million aid to urban transit is in line with its user pay philosophy in transportation. Clearly though, here is a case where the value of the service should be given priority. The cost benefit of that transit aid would include lower energy consumption, decreased need for new highways, reduced pollution, and decreased burden of automobile accidents.

Freight rates for products of our regional industries should be set at a level to give them access to the larger market of the whole Canadian people instead of the restricted market of the region. In many cases this toll would be less than the cost of providing the service.

The nation as a whole should share the costs of transportation because the nation as a whole benefits from it. It allows Canada through its Canadian grain producers to sell grain outside our borders in competition with other exporting nations which raise their grain close to the sea coast or which have access to inland waterways. Without those statutory rates, Canada ceases to become a competitor in the world market for export grains.

● (1650)

When the minister suggests that possibly the benefits of those rates should go to the grain producers in some other way, that is the most nonsensical, stupid, and inefficient method of sharing the cost of transportation that one can imagine. It would be an administrative nightmare, if nothing else. Can you imagine, Mr. Speaker, officials in Industry, Trade and Commerce trying to sort out all the way bills and each farmer's entitlement to some form of direct subsidy out of 180,000 grain permit holders, several million carload lots or partial carload lots? It is simply outrageous. Surely it is simpler and more sensible to continue to pay whatever is the deficit in the cost of transporting grain direct to the transporters, with the requirement that they maintain their trackage, service and equipment.

I do not believe that either of the railways, singly or combined, have the financial capacity to raise the necessary capital to rebuild their systems. This will require massive capital funding from the nation as a whole. Neither the railroad nor private enterprise and financial institutions will ever be willing, and in many cases are unable, to carry that kind of funding.

I should like to discuss some of the objectives and principles contained in this bill specifically, since we are debating the bill on second reading. We take exception to certain provisions within the bill, specifically the proposed section 3(2)(d), which provides that "competition within and between modes of transport should be encouraged where economic and technical factors permit." It was this very kind of competition which got us into the mess we are in in regard to all this nonsense about DC-9's, DC-8's and 727's flying 120 miles from Ottawa to Montreal. Both Air Canada and CP Air have been losing their shirts on that run during the last three years. It is inefficient and wasteful, particularly in terms of energy costs, to continue to do this. It is no quicker than a fast train. In fact at some times of the day it is not as quick as a fast train. But the government wants to maintain the mythology of competition between modes of transportation. This is what has got us into trouble.

The notion of competition in transportation conflicts with our advocacy that transportation should be operated as a public utility. I want to quote what was said by the former leader of our party, the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas). In the debate on the National Transportation Act in 1966 he had this to say:

> We will be leaning on a broken reed if we depend on competition to keep transportation rates at a price that is fair and reasonable . . . What about the areas where there are no alternative forms of transportation? The areas in the maritimes, in northern Quebec, northern Ontario and on the prairies . . . These regions will not have the kind of competition which would keep freight rates at a reasonable figure . . . I greatly fear that the removal of restraints and restrictions on the railways with reference to freight rates will mean that regions of Canada are going to pay the shot, and that some of the burden which heretofore had been borne by all the people of Canada is going to fall upon those areas of Canada which can least afford to carry this burden.

Of this legislation, Mr. Speaker, exactly the same thing can be said. If it were logical to have competing railways and competing airlines, it would be equally logical to have competing sewer and water systems, highways, telephone lines, electric lines, fire brigades, police departments—

Mr. Schumacher: And post offices.

Mr. Benjamin: Yes, and post offices. That would be ridiculous. If anyone seriously suggested that kind of competition, they would be locked up. For the government to suggest that kind of competition in transportation, it too deserves to be locked up.

When we talk about transportation under a utility that is publicly owned and controlled, publicly accountable to parliament, with a public utilities board or whatever method you want to use, it is not some socialist dogma. This is what has been done with transportation systems all over the world in countries of all political persuasions; it is not just some NDP or socialist ideology. Private enterprise governments and several variations thereof did this decades ago. For example, under Conrad Adenauer during the 1950's and 1960's the West Germans reorganized their transportation system. So did the Dutch, Belgians, Scandinavians, and French.

I do not completely agree with the comments of the hon. member for Crowfoot in his comments about the Via rail passenger corporation. The trans-European express is run by a separate corporation which owns all its own equipment. It uses different railroad and crews as it passes through five or six European countries. I suggest we could use some of the ideas under that system because it works very well. They are not all adaptable to the Canadian scene, but certainly we do not disagree in principle with the idea of a national passenger transportation Crown corporation, though it is second best; we would rather see all railroads and air lines brought under a national Crown corporation.

We suggest it is not logical, sensible or efficient to have competition and commercial viability in transportation because this will continue to discriminate against people in this country because of where they live. Competition between modes of transportation misallocates resources and wastes them by making inappropriate use of the various modes. It is just nonsense to have trains stopping every five miles; that is a job for buses. It is equally nonsensical to have planes make 200 to 300 mile trips. We are not using the various modes of transportation in a sensible and efficient manner.

May I call it five o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles)—Transport—Action to improve pensions of railway employees in view of Hall report; the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald)—Agriculture—Provision of additional refrigerated railway cars for transportation of potatoes; the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall)—Regional Economic Expansion—Dismissal of Mr. McNutt, vice-president of MAGI—Government position.

It being five o'clock p.m., the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, public bills, private bills, notices of motions.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' PUBLIC BILLS

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Public bills; Standing Order 19(2) applies. Order No. 12, the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Rynard). Shall the order stand?

Some hon. Members: Stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Stand at the request of the government.

Order No. 15; shall the order stand?

Some hon. Members: Stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Stand at the request of the government.

Mr. Landers: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, there is agreement to deal with Bill C-224, standing in the name of the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

DIVORCE

MEASURE TO STIPULATE "BREAKDOWN PRINCIPLE" SOLE BASIS FOR DIVORCE

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood) moved that Bill C-224, an act respecting divorce, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the bill which I am putting before the House is based upon the substitution, as grounds for divorce, of the concept of the breakdown of marriage in place of the present concept, which is largely dependent upon proof of what are known as matrimonial offences.

[The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner).]

There are two major theories on what should be the grounds for divorce. The first is that divorce should be based on fault; that is to say, that a court should determine that one of the parties to the marriage has committed a matrimonial offence, such as adultery, cruelty, desertion and so forth. The second is that when in fact marriage no longer exists for its basic purpose of enabling the parties to live together in harmony and there is no hope of reconciliation, then the marriage should be terminated. That is the breakdown theory which I have advocated. For a long time these two principles have contended with each other. In 1967 and 1968 the Canadian parliament chose the former course, and in substance our present act is based upon the concept of the matrimonial offence, the fault of one of the parties who, if at fault, cannot secure relief himself or herself.

● (1700)

When the matter was discussed by the joint committee of the House of Commons and Senate at the time of the passing of the previous bill, which is now our present act, a minority, which included the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin), the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Fairweather), Mr. Gordon Aiken who was then the hon. member for Parry Sound, the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters), and myself, urged the necessity for the broader reform, namely, the concept of marriage breakdown to replace the existing grounds of divorce. This proposal was fully developed in a report made to the Archbishop of Canterbury in England by a distinguished group of churchmen, lawyers, doctors and sociologists. Also, it was embodied in a book called "Putting Asunder".

The concept of breakdown of marriage as grounds for divorce was then supported by the United Church of Canada, the Anglican Church of Canada, the National Council of Women, the Canadian Mental Health Association, the Canadian Jewish Congress, and the Canadian Committee on the Status of Women. Now it has received powerful reinforcement by a report of the Law Reform Commission of Canada. I think it is an interim report of that commission which recommends that breakdown of marriage be the sole ground for divorce.

I have incorporated in Bill C-224 the main provisions recommended by the Law Reform Commission and the proposals in "Putting Asunder". Before dealing with the provisions of the bill in detail, I should like to make clear the basic point of view which the proposal sets forth. It is an acceptance of the centrality of marriage as the most important institution in society, linked as it is with the whole concept of the family. I have spoken of the centrality of marriage. There are many of us, among whom I am one, who speak also of the sanctity of marriage as being more than a merely human institution, although it is indeed a great human institution. If I may be permitted a more personal note, I speak with conviction on this subject through personal experience of a happy marriage and a happy family life.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Your wife is in the gallery to hear it.

Mr. Brewin: I would say it whether she was here or not.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): She would see to that.

Mr. Brewin: It would not be a very happy marriage if she could coerce me in what I say in the House.

Marriage has been defined as the voluntary union for life of one man and one woman to the exclusion of all others. I accept this definition and I regard the concept as one of indisolubility, and the purpose of this legislation which I am bringing forth is to advance and not diminish this concept. But it must be recognized by all of us that the hope and expectations of many for permanent union are dashed. Many marriages break down, and when they do serious problems arise, not only for the immediate parties but for the children of the marriage.

It is necessary, therefore, for the state to recognize the existence of the breakdown of marriage and make provisions for the legal ending of what morally is no longer reality. Indeed, some marriages are sources of strife in themselves. The approach of the matrimonial offences theory sets up barriers, and creates an adversary process in the courts which is both expensive and painful. Husbands and wives are often contending with each other. The present system creates these adversary procedures which, as I said, are expensive, provoke bitterness, and encourage—I say this advisedly—adultery, collusion, and sometimes perjury. The present system provides no effective means of encouraging reconciliation. When I say this I speak as one who has had some experience in the courts on these matters.

The present Bill C-224 defines the courts which have jurisdiction and provides that a petition for divorce may be presented when the marriage is broken down and there is no reasonable possibility of reconciliation.

When the husband and wife have lived apart and separate for one year, the marriage is deemed to have broken down. A duty is imposed upon the court to have special regard for the children of the marriage and to consider the possibility of reconciliation. Where in any stage of the proceedings reconciliation appears possible, the court may, with consent of the parties, adjourn the proceedings so that reconciliation can be worked at by the parties, or a person qualified in marriage counselling may be nominated to aid in the reconciliation. The court may refuse a decree if it would be unduly harsh to either spouse or prejudicially affect the making of reasonable arrangements for either spouse and for the custody, care and maintenance of the children of the marriage as might be necessary in the circumstances.

It is sometimes said that this is equivalent to divorce by consent, or divorce at the unilateral will of any of the parties. This is a misreading of the legislation. The proposed act provides that the court cannot grant a decree until two years have passed since the day of the marriage. This would prevent rushing to the divorce courts almost immediately after the marriage without time for proper consideration. There are cases now where divorce is granted on the basis of the committing of a single act of adultery. Under the breakdown concept the commission of a single act of adultery would not in itself justify a divorce unless it had led to the breakdown of the marriage and the breakdown of the reality behind the marriage.

It cannot be too much emphasized that the present system frequently brings the courts into contempt. The proposal we make would remove from the courts the sordid story of adultery and fabrication of evidence which are all too common at present.

In order to make this legislation work, it is clear that a different form of inquiry into the background is required, and we believe that there are those who are trained or could be trained in this field and who could report to the court on the facts of the breakdown of the marriage or whether there was a hope of reconciliation.

It may be asked what, in effect, is the breakdown of marriage. It is a condition or situation in which the life-long union of husband and wife is beyond hope of recovery; where the institution is not honoured, and human happiness and welfare are not being served, and the marriage has become a shell and ought to be declared non-existent.

It is our view that it is not divorce that destroys families, but bad marriages. As the Law Commission report says, the common assumption that liberal divorce laws breed irresponsibility must be challenged. We believe the number of people who marry and divorce without reason constitute only a fraction of our married population. If constructive solutions are to be sought, the answer lies not in our divorce laws but in family life education and marriage counselling.

Social welfare programs that reflect reasonable family policies and promote family cohesion must be developed to deal with such extrinsic facts as unemployment, sickness, and inadequate housing that place undue strain on the stability of marriage and the family unit.

• (1710)

I realize that the great objection many people have to this legislation, consciously or unconsciously, lies in the fact that it breaks new ground, but as the Law Reform Commission report indicates, the trend throughout the civilized world is to introduce marriage breakdown as the sole ground for divorce.

I urge this House to take a stand in favour of a more humane, more rational, and more civilized approach to the problem of broken homes and marriages. Many of the churches and other institutions I have mentioned, as well as the Law Reform Commission, have shown the way. It is up to us as legislators to have the courage to follow this way even if it is to some of us a new concept.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Simma Holt (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I congratulate the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin), and I appreciate his introducing this bill in this House. Again, however, I fear that the whole approach to the vast social problems we have with regard to matrimonial law and law involving children's rights is being corrected in a patchwork fashion. I wish the whole of our law could be repaired in one piece of legislation suitable for the society of the late twentieth century.

However, I support this bill completely, and I congratulate the hon. member for Greenwood for his persistence in trying to eliminate, once and for all, the terribly destructive adversary system and in trying to correct the tragedy and pain of marriage failure. Our laws have compounded the destructiveness which exists in the very private matter of marriage breakdown. I agree that marriage breakdown must be the only and absolute ground for dissolving marriages.

I think our matrimonial laws must have been written by self-serving men. Men must take the blame because they authorized all laws, civil and secular, and now we are trying to catch up and correct those laws.

Laws with regard to matrimonial affairs are obsolete, as are many of today's laws. They complicate matters rather than add to the peace and joy of today's life. Our matrimonial laws are simplistic; they are black and white. They must be black and white because people in courts do not seem to be able to think in any other way. It must either be black-white, right or wrong, angel or devil, but no gray or shaded area. That is too subtle for some adjudicators of law to understand.

When the whole tragedy of love going sour occurs, we must have someone to blame. However, both sides could very well be blamed and the whole matter resolved without added trauma. It is an anathema in the late twentieth century to have courts determine who is the matrimonial culprit in an unsuccessful marriage. It is like walking in cold to the middle of a street riot and trying to find the single one who started it.

When the law was changed from the single ground of adultery, the halls outside and inside the court rooms on divorce day in Vancouver, where I worked, were rather like a subdued pilgrimage of children—drawn, pale, and waiting to join that terrible internecine war between their parents. They were obliged to tell a complete stranger, the judge, in a totally strange world of black-robed people how bad, cruel, and brutal one parent was, and how the other in goodness suffered.

One parent is good, the other bad, and child must tell this to the court. I saw this over and over again with despair, because the amendment which corrected the law only made it worse. Children had to testify—under oath in many cases—for one parent against the other. They had to tell family secrets. They had to tell shameful secrets which are terribly disturbing to youngsters. They had to tell what went on between their parents in the privacy of their home.

Internecine war must be the cruelest and most vicious of all wars, and in this war the children are forced to the front line among all the bullets. They never forget. I have known children who have grown to adulthood who never forgot that they lived in that no-man's land of their parents' war, and for the rest of their lives some of them blamed themselves for causing the marriage breakups.

As immature and chauvinistic as the one ground of adultery was, it was better than what happened when blame became broader and had to be proved in law. However, both laws, the old one with regard to adultery and the new one which includes many grounds, were designed by medieval minds, and to say the least they are inappropriate in Canada in 1977.

Worst of all these laws damage all parties who must participate in these sordid charades. I am not saying I want freedom or licentiousness in our human relations, and certainly no one was more vocal than I in damning the type of behaviour which developed in the latter half of the 1960's. Lifestyles during that period deteriorated to a point where anything was right. Morality and discipline in human behaviour was sneered at. Marriage was looked on as a joke, as old fashioned. Doing one's own thing was acceptable and was even touted by some impressive voices from the media and from academe, who also wanted to do their own thing in sex perversion and drugs. They touted this philosophy so that they could have their own gratification.

Marriage and an essential commitment of one human being to another, a lifelong commitment, make people strong, if they can work out that complex partnership. Certainly it is the safest and most ideal framework in which to raise and nurture children. Strong human beings come out of strong marriages, especially those which are not only strong but happy as well. It takes remarkable women and remarkable men to raise children successfully alone without support.

It is in this regard that I say the state should be active, rather than in intervention in the breakup of marriages, in helping people to prepare for marriage and to succeed in marriage. Many have raised children alone quite successfully, but if marriage fails the danger to children should not be increased further by the need to turn one parent into an offender before the law; to force one parent to be bad and to leave the mark of that bad parent forever in the memory of the child. In all likelihood that child will identify with the "evil" of the parent, and somehow believe forever that they, being of that same cloth, are also "evil".

Partnerships break up because it is humanly impossible to have total perfection and compatibility in human relationships. Those which are successful survive because one partner is willing to compromise, to suffer hurt, and to accept less than perfection. On rare occasions each party will adapt to the foibles of the other and love the weaknesses because they love the complete human person they vowed jointly to love, honour and cherish through all life. Some stay together, however, in mutual tolerance, perhaps even in indifference and, of course, there are numerous people who stay together in pain.

But to have the adversary system, the fault system, and to have to go before a court of law to dissolve marriages is absolutely beyond conception in this day and age. Among those who set the original design have been men who perhaps never lived in marriage. Some were men of the church who were celibate, preserving their world for men.

When a marriage is irretrievably broken, and all attempts between the two people and the family involved fail, the state is best served if the psychological and physical battering which follows marriage breakdown and precedes divorce does not happen. Desertion and abandonment have been the solution for some. There are even instances in which a partner seeks escape quickly by murder, foolishly preferring it to the slow anguish of divorce and all the public recriminations.

Love cannot be rehabilitated once contempt, boredom or hate take over. The progression from love to hate can be very speedy, and anyone who dreams he can cure a broken love affair or a broken marriage is certainly in dreamland. People like that have seen too much of Hollywood of the early days and too much of the bad television of today. If somewhere between those extreme poles of love and hate, a final decision could be made rationally, without the rancour, without the violence that too often is as passionate as the early love, both the principals and the children would be safer emotionally and physically.

● (1720)

As it is now, children are too often used for the barter in matrimonial trade-offs. In exchange for money—the maintenance that was not paid—the husband is allowed to have the children for a week end or at Christmastime. Christmas is the popular time for barter. The children soon become wise to a most devious human technique to achieve desires, or even power—manipulating one parent against the other for their personal gain.

The reasons I agree with the hon. for Greenwood are many. The law must be changed to forever end this charade we call divorce and the seemingly inevitable internecine war that so often accompanies it and that so sorely damages the principals, but most of all injures the children who are our future.

There are many cynical lines about marriage and divorce such as: divorce is like matrimony, a fellow has to go through it three or four times before he knows how. There are many lines that can be quoted but, Mr. Speaker, it is a serious business. When marriage breaks it is the most tragic business of all. There are many jokes about it, but it is the tragedy of our time that there is so much divorce which clogs the courts and destroys families and children.

In Vancouver there was a sanctimonious fraud on the bench, now deceased. I should not speak ill of the dead. Nonetheless, I cannot forget how he lined up all the women after a day of divorce hearings, usually a Friday, and lectured them on religion, their duty to their children and their duty to their now departed, divorced mate. It was deplorable, but it indicated the power tripping that I have seen on the part of some lawyers—and a few judges—in the tragedy of divorce.

One lawyer who specializes in divorce does everything to degrade a woman when she comes to his office. He calls her a tramp, a whore, spewing out epithets laced with four-letter words. A psychiatrist might suggest he nurtures his sexual inadequacies by using four letter words over and over again even though the woman is a total stranger. The women come away degraded, beaten, with their already devastated self-esteem totally eliminated. However, the woman endures this despicable tirade because the lawyer has the reputation of winning, and of taking all for his client. But this is all part of what can happen in the long drawn out divorce process, where a lawyer can play around with blame.

To put it simply, perpetrating matrimonial offences in law does many things. First, it damages the children. Second, it forces children to become the catalyst in the court battle; third, as John Barrymore once said, "a paper napkin never returned from a laundry nor love from a trip to the law courts". Fourth, reconciliation by court or by law is impossible; it cannot succeed unless the partners want it to. Fifth, marriage in quiet despair and constant battle makes people less able to function in the general fabric of society and serve in their jobs, occupations or professions. When marriage breakdown occurs, that is devastating by itself. Why then is it necessary for the state to add to the pain of adversary law and matrimonial offence, the court process in which both men and women are strangers in this strange land?

My sixth point is that battles between man and wife are absolutely confidential. What rationale can there be for going public? Did lawyers create the adversary system to keep lawyers rich or perhaps for justification to force these people into the open for the gratification of a society that cannot change what has happened in the privacy of their home? As Oscar Levant put it; "My first wife divorced me on the grounds of incompatibility. Besides I think she hated me." Sometimes one wonders who gave these people more pleasure; the clergyman who married them or the judge who divorced them.

The seventh point is one that is much in the news but has probably happened throughout the century although we have just become aware of it, that is the plight of the battered woman and child. They are no doubt the victims of marriage breakdown. No person should have to come to court to obtain relief from battering in marriage. Nor should she have to prove no fault to escape from such a horrible situation. Cruelty, a ground in law, should be accepted as absolute in such cases and should not have to be debated in a courtroom. As one woman said, "Yes, my grounds were cruelty; he tried to kill me several times."

Human failure is devastating enough without having to expose it in court. It should be resolved quietly, by mutual consent, registering an end to marriage with vital statistics. That is enough. If it is not done by mutual consent, the individual—the parties—will go their own way anyhow and the venom in one marriage will spread to other marriages and other homes.

Adultery and the use of prostitution is another way of solving the problem. Perhaps the state should concern itself with nurturing the marriage and if it fails, let the parties be free to suffer the failure with a certain amount of dignity and with minimal pain.

Everything should be done to prevent divorce by serving and preparing for good marriage. It is the most important partnership undertaken—certainly more important than those based only on making money. Think of all the laws we have now to protect corporations and business when making money is the prime objective—school for eight, 12 or 20 years to prepare for that, but there is no preparation for the most important duty a human being is ever to undertake—marriage. If the partnership fails, there is no restoring it. The adversary attempt at reconstruction is sheer madness. As usual, it is the imagined remedy of men and lawyers. Women have not been active long enough in the policy-making areas of society to clean up the act, but maybe it will be a different world now that they are becoming more involved.

Mrs. Campagnolo: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Holt: The people who constructed our social order, made it too complex, too unjust—an impossible framework in which humans must strive to live in peace.

I am afraid lawyers must take the blame for complicating our lives almost beyond endurance. It is as though the whole of our lives was designed to make lawyers rich and make us fearful. As you know, a man will joyfully pay a lawyer $500 for untying the knot of wedlock, but he begrudges a clergyman $50 for tying it. That is how little regard the man has for a commitment to marriage, and how speedily he wants freedom. It is true now of women as well because they are economically freer to escape the bondage of a bad marriage. It also explains why lawyers are richer than clergymen.

Our whole society seems geared to litigation and is routed through the courts. Marriages should never have to go that way, and certainly children should not have to be the arbiters of the good and bad of their parents.

The male rules for morality nurtured immorality and kept women tied to a separate set of rules for male convenience and service. Thus, if a man engages in adultery he is a gay blade; a woman who becomes involved is a tramp—a whore. If a man engages the services of a prostitute, the woman is charged with the offence while the man goes free. His name is not even recorded in the crime report. The man, who should be the complainant, of course cannot complain because his name would go on the record and his reputation be destroyed. No male who wrote the law would ever want that to happen to one of his. But it does not matter about the woman. Chivalry? No! male self-preservation—by law.

Divorce is of the same design, but now that women have been freed economically by their own ability to make a living, maybe the double standard will diminish.

When marriage fails there is no question that there cannot be recovery for that marriage. I have seen attempted reconciliations but they have never worked. They have merely delayed the inevitable, or the couples and the children have lived together in silent and often violent despair. Many ended up in mental hospitals or certainly as disturbed people.

• (1730)

Love can be a terrible weakening process. After it has started to deteriorate, it can leave its victims physically and emotionally debilitated. We are so easily victimized if we love too much but, worse, devastated if we hate too much. To put it in the words of Helen Rowland, a columnist and author who seemed to have first-hand experience, a grass widow was the angel a man loved, the human being he married, and the devil he divorced. She also described love as the quest, marriage the conquest, and divorce the inquest.

I would wish for our society that which the hon. member for Greenwood proposes—that the inquest be quiet, peaceful, and without search for someone to blame. The litigation route is destructive.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, despite some of the things the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. Holt) said about men and lawyers, and that was an arguable point which I could debate with her, I must say that, generally, I agreed with her approach and with the approach of the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin).

I agree with the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway that the law was made by men. Originally it was made by so-called celibates. The ecclesiastical law for many years was the foundation of our divorce law. In mediaeval ages, and even later, the divorce courts were ecclesiastical courts. Henry VIII changed all that; he had a much more clear-cut way of getting rid of his wives—if I can make a pun. I remember reading a book about some of the oddities of the ecclesiastical law. According to that book, in the early days of the United Kingdom when a man took a wife he took her property and he also took her debts. But if he married her in her shift, he did not have to take her debts. I am sure the hon member for Vancouver-Kingsway will appreciate the dilemma of the woman in ancient days. She had to choose between getting dressed to kill, getting married in a beautiful white wedding dress and letting her husband pay her debts, and getting married in her shift and not letting her husband pay her debts.

I remember, when I came back from overseas after the last war, that I did a lot of divorce work. I was not happy to do it, did not like it, but it was work which had to be done. Many divorces arose because young people had married hastily in wartime and then parted quickly because one of the partners was in the armed services. When they met again they both discovered that their marriage partners were completely different from what they had envisaged. I did many divorces between 1946 and 1950. The divorce rate was fantastically high, compared with what it had been up to that period in our history.

I remember being in a building—it was not really a courtroom—and seeing the presiding judge grant 12 decrees nisi in one hour. Each divorce took five minutes on average. The lawyers knew it was a farce. It was all laid on. The marriage certificate was produced, there were photographs, proofs of service, proofs of the existence of children, evidence to establish that there was no collusion, evidence to establish adultery and, bingo, that was it. It took five minutes.

I remember the judge having difficulty with a newly minted barrister who was a little embarrassed at having to bring such evidence forward. The judge said to him, "Come on, hurry up. Adultery may be very pleasant to commit, but I have sat here for three days listening to such evidence, and listening to adultery cases is not my idea of a good time." He said, "Prove adultery, and let us end this case." That happened in a building in my town which had been turned into a courthouse. Actually, the building had been used before as a United Church. The new courthouse was being built at the time. One of the two clients I had in this series of divorce cases looked around him and said, "Mr. Baldwin, is this the old United Church building?" I said, "Yes, it is." He said, "My God, that's where I was married." Even though I believe in freedom of information I will not tell you what I charged him for his divorce, but I can tell you that it cost him much more to get his divorce than it had cost him to get married.

I agree with what has been said. I can say, on my experience as a lawyer, as a member of parliament and private citizen, that the reliance on fraud, perjury, hypocrisy, and all the nastiness involved in using the adversary system to prove adultery, bestiality or any of the other grounds which originally were grounds for divorce, is simply criminal in the eyes of society. Yet we persisted in this country for many years in accepting such grounds as the only basis for divorce. Our governments were far, far behind the people.

Finally in 1965 or 1966 a joint committee was set up under the excellent chairmanship of the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. McCleave) and Senator Roebuck, a distinguished member of the other place. That committee sat either for one year and a half or two years, heard many witnesses, read the book "Putting Asunder" which had been prepared at the instance of the Archbishop of Canterbury following an inquiry by a judge of the high court of England, a bishop, and one or two other people, and made some good recommendations. They did not go as far as the hon. member for Greenwood and I and others wanted them to go. On the basis of what we had read, heard and seen, we believed then, as we both do now, that marriage breakdown, properly established, should be the basic ground for the dissolution of marriage. But the committee did not go that far. It went half way to meet us.

I can recall that the hon. member for Greenwood, I and one or two other members of the day went to 24 Sussex Drive to see the then prime minister, Mr. Pearson. We proposed that marriage breakdown should constitute at least a major cause, or major ground for the dissolution of marriages. Mr. Pearson was quite receptive to our idea and said he would discuss it with the minister of justice of that day.

Ultimately the new divorce bill was presented in this House, either in 1966 or 1967. We found that not only had the then minister of justice not gone as far as we wanted, but he and his officials had not even gone as far as the committee had recommended. Try as we would, we could not persuade the then minister of justice to change his mind. I suggested at the time that, because of his attitude on social matters, politically the then minister of justice was slightly to the left of Ghengis Khan. That minister of justice became our present Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), Mr. Speaker. I have since come to the conclusion that he stands about even with Ghengis Khan.

Putting nasty politics to one side, I wish to repeat what the hon. member for Greenwood put forward: the adversary system is not the system to use in the dissolution of marriages. Adultery, cruelty and desertion are consequences, or the fall-out, rather than the cause of dissolution of marriage. A time may come during a marriage when only the ashes are left, when there is no spark to revive. When that happens it is futile to compel two adult people to go through this forlorn process of manufacturing or creating evidence of adultery and all the rest of it. I think it is wrong. That is why I like what the hon. member for Greenwood has proposed in his bill, because it would provide that a divorce may be granted when there is no reasonable possibility of reconciliation. Generally that does not happen today. If, under the adversary system, the petitioner establishes adultery or such other cause as is contemplated by the act, as far as the court is concerned, it is over. It is finished. The judge is not required to make any investigation into the question of reconciliation. That is quite important.

● (1740)

An experienced trial judge, with long knowledge of human nature derived from sitting on the bench, is probably very capable of determining whether the marriage is completely shot, whether it is kaput, or whether there is prospect of some reconciliation. The mandate to be laid upon a judge by this bill is much better than the situation which exists today.

When people use adultery as a ground for divorce, they often go right through the trial without even a hint of reconciliation being considered. The same applies to the question of children, compensation or alimony, as the case may be.

I go along with the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway. It would be excellent if jurisdiction could be combined with the whole matter of matrimonial life and the custody of children in one area or court. Obviously you are not going to get the kind of changes to the British North America Act which would bring this about. However, through the use of delegated authority the attorneys general of the federal and provincial governments could in due course consider this. Through the use of delegated power in the legislation, it is quite legal to transfer to one court or group, call it what you will, the right to deal with all aspects of matrimonial life including, where necessary, dissolution of the marriage, custody of children, and awarding of alimony and maintenance. This would be highly desirable.

I could speak on this for a considerable length of time but I think I have made it clear where I stand. Unless the hon. member for Greenwood has been more persuasive with members on the other side than is usually the case, I have no hope of this bill going beyond this today. However, I urge with all the strength I can that members on the government side take steps to emphasize to the members of the cabinet, the Prime Minister, and the Attorney General (Mr. Basford) that the public is ready for a reform of this kind.

I am perfectly satisfied that, far from increasing the number of divorces, legislation of this kind will probably lessen them. Using the grounds under the present law, manufactured evidence, and I am sure it exists now as it did 15 or 20 years ago when I knew what was going on, is probably used to obtain divorces without any attempt to provide for a reconciliation. A proper application of the philosophy contained in this bill would go a long distance toward minimizing the number of divorces. It would make certain that when the condition of the marriage had reached the stage where it was quite plain that nothing on God's green earth could save it, it would be dissolved. That is the kind of law we need.

Mr. Robert Daudlin (Kent-Essex): Mr. Speaker, I have some notes I would like to go through. Before I start, however, there are a couple of things which were said by previous speakers with which I would like to take issue.

The hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) alluded to the fact that under the present system the judges of our courts have no right, obligation or, in his view, desire to satisfy themselves that there is no possibility of reconciliation in these cases. If the hon. member had practised under the new law, which apparently he has not, he would have had the opportunity to know that before any court in this land can deal with divorce at this time, the first obligation of the judge, before the witnesses are even sworn, is to satisfy himself that there is no possibility of reconciliation.

In all cases and in all the courts in which I have appeared on matrimonial matters, I have never seen a judge fail to discharge that obligation. It might have been cursory. It might have been insufficient in terms of what the hon. member would like to see happen. However, it is required by the present act and, in my experience, it is done.

The hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. Holt) brought a very pessimistic approach to this House. I would like to add a little positivism from my point of view and experience, having done a substantial amount of family law work before coming to this honourable place.

The hon. member indicated that in no instance had she found that reconciliation ever took place once a marriage was on the rocks, or words to that effect. I would like to suggest to this House that on at least three occasions I have had the courts interject in the middle of the divorce proceedings and challenge both parties in the divorce cases that in fact reconciliation had not been tried enough. I had three that were sent back by judges. In fact reconciliation did take place and they are still together. It may not work as much as we would like, but it is working in some instances. It is not as pessimistic as the hon. member believes.

Like the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin), I agree there is a need for change in the divorce law. Having dealt with it, I am satisfied there is room for change. In the area of family law, reform should be introduced only after very careful study. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) expressed this point of view very well in his speech to the Family Law Section, Ontario Bar Association, in Toronto on January 26. I will not repeat his words. I ask only that hon. members interested in this particular issue look at the text of his speech at that time.

In speaking of the process of reform in which the government is now engaged, I shall assume, Mr. Speaker, that most hon. members are aware of the general nature of the recommendations of the Law Reform Commission of Canada, some of which the hon. member for Greenwood is asking us to enact in his bill. I should therefore like to direct my remarks more to the process of government consultation and the conscious effort to find a national consensus in the field of family law. I am directing my attention to these matters in order to explain why I think that it would be premature at this time to enact the bill proposed by the hon. member.

Following close upon receipt by the Minister of Justice of the Report of the Law Reform Commission on Family Law, the attorneys general met in Vancouver in June to discuss, among other things, family law and the administration of that law in the courts. The ministers agreed that it was important to move quickly to establish unified family courts, and there was a general recognition that both levels of government must move forward toward adopting the concept of marriage as a partnership of equals. During their conference the provincial ministers expressed the view that matrimonial property is exclusively a provincial matter. They agreed to urge their governments to press forward with matrimonial property law reform. There was a feeling that matrimonial property law reform should precede divorce reform.

The view that matrimonial property law reform should precede or accompany divorce reform is a view shared by a number of women's groups. They are worried that, if the grounds for divorce are changed before the matrimonial property laws are changed, then a wife who is economically dependent upon her husband could be deprived of her bargaining power in the dissolution process. I would not want to imply that these women's groups do not want a divorce reform. They are clearly dissatisfied with the divorce law as it now stands, but consider that any reform that would require a woman to support herself after a reasonable period of time must be accompanied by a property division that would reflect her participation in and contribution to the marriage.

● (1750)

By these arguments the federal government should wait and delay its reform of the Divorce Act until the law on matrimonial property is changed. On the other hand, as the Law Reform Commission emphasized, present divorce procedures are unsatisfactory because they are counter productive, that is, they aggravate problems rather than help to solve them. This happens, as the commission suggests, because the Divorce Act embodies the concept of marital offence or faults. To change the ground for divorce from fault to permanent breakdown or irretrievable breakdown, as suggested in the bill proposed by the hon. member, would be to move away from the adversary approach to divorce and to introduce a greater possibility of conciliatory action. This, perhaps, is an ideal, but if I could get away from my notes for a moment I would suggest to the House that I myself had an unfortunate experience with regard to the way in which the new legislation works out in practice. Where there is deemed to be a breakdown of marriage after so many years of separation, trained social workers are supposed to determine whether or not there has in fact been an irreconcilable family breakdown. I found that many of these trained persons relied on form-type letters to be checked off and signed by the individuals involved, and that they frequently advised the court that there had been a breakdown of a marriage without even having seen the parties involved.

Mr. Brewin: Shame!

Mr. Daudlin: I think that is a crying shame, as the hon. member for Greenwood said. Unfortunately the legislation now proposed could lead to even greater abuses unless we protect ourselves.

The Minister of Justice is well aware of both sides of the issue: the need, on the one hand, for property law reform to precede or coincide with divorce reform and for new courts or court services to be in place in order to permit new divorce procedures to be introduced; and the importance, on the other hand, of pressing forward with the actual divorce reform itself. That is why he said in his speech to the Family Law Section of the Ontario Bar Association to which I earlier referred, and I quote,

I would point out to the remaining provinces, however, and indeed to the legislatures of Ontario and British Columbia (as distinct from the government's of those two provinces), that if, as they say, matrimonial property is a matter within their exclusive jurisdiction, then they have a responsibility to act and to act expeditiously. If the provinces do not move expeditiously to put in place meaningful changes in the law relating to matrimonial property to take account of the economic needs and the rights of both spouses, there will obviously be increasing pressure on the federal parliament to endeavour to try to implement the recommendations, in one form or another, of the Law Reform Commission's report relating to the disposal of matrimonial property. Canadian women should not have to wait much longer for provincial action in this regard.

Before proceeding to discuss the details of the bill proposed by the hon. member, I should like to say a few more words in respect of another matter that I have already touched on—family courts. One of the reasons for proceeding slowly in divorce reform is the need to put into place new unified family courts or family court services in existing courts. If there is to be a movement away from the adversary system toward a more conciliatory approach to divorce, then counselling services in the courts are necessary. Other services such as investigatory services and enforcement services would be useful. If there is to be an automatic enforcement of maintenance orders, then enforcement services will be vital. The development of these courts takes time and is costly.

The federal government is encouraging the provinces in their efforts to create these courts by providing money to enable the joint funding of experimental unified family court pilot projects of various types to test a number of possible alternatives. Discussions in respect of such projects are under way at the present time with the provinces of Ontario, Manitoba, Saskatchewan, and Newfoundland. Further, the government is sharing in the funding of the evaluation of the unified family court pilot project that was undertaken by the province of British Columbia in 1974. It is hoped that from these experiments valuable guidelines will be drawn for the future development of family courts in Canada.

I am sure many hon. members will be aware of the announcement made on February 17 last with respect to the appointment of judges to the first unified family court in the Hamilton-Wentworth area. Some of these problems are highlighted by the fact that, following this announcement, a number of people opposed the appointments saying they had come too quickly, that it would be a disaster, that the family court as presently established could never handle the overwhelming weight of this type of action particularly when this involved property and its disposition.

Speaking directly to the bill introduced by the hon. member for Greenwood, I should like to say that while I think it is premature to attempt to replace the Divorce Act at this time and in this way, I agree with some of the principles upon which the bill is based.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Question!

Mr. Daudlin: The bill is inadequate in that it would repeal the Divorce Act but not replace many of the provisions of the Divorce Act that are essential to a scheme of divorce. For example, the bill does not deal with the subject of how the maintenance and custody orders made by a court in one province would be enforced in another province. This is an important problem that must be dealt with in any new divorce act.

Taking the clauses in their order, I would first have to comment that the definition "court" is not adequate. First, it does not reflect the correct names and divisions of the Superior Courts that hear divorces in various provinces. I think the hon. member is probably not aware of the amendments to the Divorce Act that changed these definitions. Also, I do not think that it is necessary to make reference to the county or district courts of the province. In a number of provinces, judges of the county and district courts hear divorces but, in such cases, they do so as local judges of the Superior Court of the province. When acting as local judges of the Superior Court, they have jurisdiction to hear property matters that they would not have jurisdiction to hear if they were sitting as judges of the county or district courts. While, in the future, it may become possible for divorces to be heard in courts other than Superior Courts, at the moment, for constitutional reasons, it would seem better to retain the jurisdiction in the superior courts and provide that cases may be heard by judges of those courts or local judges thereof. Clause 3 gives me some problems also. While I have some sympathy with the idea of granting divorces on the basis of irretrievable or permanent marriage breakdown. I question how the courts would view the words in subclause 3(2). If it were to be necessary to prove that there is "no reasonable possibility of reconciliation", trials to determine this question would probably continue to be necessary and many divorces that it would be reasonable to grant might be refused.

Subclause 3(3) relieves the onus of proof to a considerable extent by providing that where the parties have lived separate and apart for a year the marriage shall be deemed to be irretrievably broken down. However, nothing in the bill prohibits the parties from commencing an action prior to that year of separation. In those cases, acrimonious trials would probably continue. Spouses would still be coming to the court to make allegations against each other. I think that the hon. member wishes to provide for no-fault divorce and would not, himself, wish to see this new type of trial develop as a result of his bill. In order to avoid this result, it would probably be necessary either to prohibit divorces to be heard before the expiration of a year of separation, or to provide for proof that the marriage has irretrievably broken down to be given by some kind of non-accusatory evidence. I should like to see any bill put forward on the subject of divorce contain some provisions that would reduce the adversary aspects of the divorce proceeding and promote reconciliation and the preservation of the family unit to the extent possible.

The promotion of reconciliation brings me to another problem I find in the bill. I am not convinced it should be necessary for parties to live separate and apart for a year in order to qualify for a divorce. I think this is one of the problems with the present Divorce Act. The requirement for separation inhibits the possibility of reconciliation.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order. It being six o'clock, the hour for private members' business has expired.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

NATIONAL TRANSPORTATION ACT

MEASURE TO REDEFINE OBJECTIVE OF TRANSPORTATION POLICY

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Basford (for the Minister of Transport) that Bill C-33, to amend the National Transportation Act and the Department of Transport Act for the purpose of defining the objective of the transportation policy for Canada and authorizing the consequential rearrangement of powers and duties relating to transport and to amend the Transport Act and the Railway Act in respect of freight rates and other matters, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

[Mr. Daudlin.]

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, when the debate adjourned at five o'clock I was talking about the illogical efforts of the government, with the support of the official opposition, to retain competition and commercial viability in transportation. I said that if it were logical to have competing railroads and competing air lines, it would be just as logical to have competing sewage and water systems, streets, highways, telephone lines, and power lines. I want to quote a further excerpt from the speech made by the former leader of our party, the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas), in the debate similar to this one which we had in 1966. On that occasion he said:

> The fact is that I do not believe that free enterprise and the competitive system of transportation can give Canada an adequate transportation policy at a price we can afford . . . in a country of 20 million people, where . . . we are more dependent than probably any country in the world on getting our goods to market over long distances at competitive prices, where we spend more per capita on transportation than probably any other country in the world, I do not think we can afford the luxury of having a free enterprise, competitive transportation policy . . . I believe that what we need is more government control and direction, not less, in the field of transportation.

Those words are as valid today as they were in 1966. Competition between modes of transportation mis-allocates resources, in fact, wastes resources, through the inappropriate use of each mode. When it comes to rates, if a railway rate is too high, why not have the government intervene to regulate the rate? The free enterprise competitive system says that instead you should foster intermodal competition to hold the rate down by building another super highway parallel to a railway line, or subsidizing another railway line, or subsidizing some more airports and air lines.

I hope we will agree that it would be foolish, for example, to promote the trucking of heavy bulk commodities, such as coal, potash, fertilizer, iron ore or grain, over medium and long distances. Not only is it foolish, it is too costly in terms of energy and in terms of the misuse of a particular mode of transportation, namely, trucking. Truck transport of bulk commodities requires four to six times as much energy as rail transport.

Competition between modes of transportation denies the stated objective in the bill of integrating the modes together. For example, a bus company is not going to short haul itself to serve as a feeder to railway lines if it can get a full haul for its own revenues. Instead of intermodal competition, why not intermodal co-ordination? Why not integrate passenger ticket offices, baggage handling facilities and passenger terminals in common facilities? In many cases the facility already exists in former downtown railway stations.

Let me give an illustration, Mr. Speaker. In my own city of Regina, Air Canada established a new downtown ticket office in the new Toronto-Dominion Bank building which is very posh and plush. There are exactly two spaces to park a car in front of that building, and they are in a two-minute zone. If you want to buy an airline ticket, you will have to drive and then park your car several blocks away, if you can find a parking place. This may give a good image for Air Canada's brass, but it is hardly the place to encourage people to come in and buy their airline ticket.

● (2010)

There is a downtown railway station in Regina with ample parking facilities which are mostly unused. This is where the Air Canada ticket office should be, and where the CN and CP railway ticket offices should be. This is where the terminal for the airport limousine should be, where the taxi stand should be, where the city transit busses should stop, and where the bus ticket offices should be. Instead of that, we have the so called intermodal competition. They all have separate buildings and separate ticket offices, all of which adds to the cost of transportation in our country.

That kind of commercial viability and competition in transportation is sheer economic nonsense. No self-respecting free enterpriser or businessman, in that kind of enterprise or any other kind, would willingly or knowingly resort to such an operation. But as long as you have old line party governments which cling to nineteenth century mythology about competition and commercial viability in transportation, you will have those kinds of boondoggles in every city in this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Benjamin: As I said before five o'clock, the elimination of competition and commercial viability in transportation is not some socialist dogma. It is not just some ideology of the NDP. It is a fact in countries all over the world with governments of all political persuasion, from the extreme left to the extreme right and everything in between. Canada, and to a lesser degree the United States, remain the only two still clinging to this mythology of competition in transportation. The days of the railroad barons and "maggots" of the 1880's and 1890's are gone.

Commercial viability for a transportation company may deny the economic needs of an individual community or of our nation as a whole. We submit that service to the public and national and regional economic objectives should take precedence over profitability. For example, in freight rates the maximum rate provisions in this legislation are virtually worthless since the maximum ceiling is so high that railway companies may charge whatever they deem suitable.

Let me illustrate with some specific examples where people are discriminated against because of where they happen to live. The agreed charge rate for food stuffs—and I wish the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Hnatyshyn) were here because the agreed charge rate for food stuffs applies also to Saskatoon—hauled from Toronto to Vancouver is 2.63 cents a ton mile, but it is 3.53 cents a ton mile from Toronto to Saskatoon. An average of seven different agreed charges indicates that the railways are charging 53.4 per cent more per ton mile for like goods hauled from Toronto to Saskatoon than from Toronto to Vancouver.

Mr. Goodale: That is what this bill will eliminate.

Mr. Benjamin: No, it will not, because if the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Goodale) will read the bill carefully he will see that it says "except for competitive reasons". The legislation will not correct that.

Mr. Goodale: Yes, it will.

Mr. Benjamin: If the hon. member will pay attention a little longer, I will give him some examples.

Mr. Goodale: I hope they are more factual than what you have given so far.

Mr. Benjamin: Them is the facts. If the hon. member has kept his nose in the keyhole of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang), he has not sniffed out any facts there.

The maximum rate provision for railway rates is two and a half times the cost of service, not one and a half. Here is where the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford), in reading the speech of the Minister of Transport, was wrong, or at least perhaps he misread the facts in the legislation. That is on small shipments. For large shipments the maximum rate is greater than two and a half times the cost of service. The Minister of Justice, reading the speech of the Minister of Transport, said that that was protection. All I can say is, some protection! The 100 per cent over the cost of service that the Minister of Justice spoke about in the speech of the Minister of Transport is up to 250 per cent which, if my arithmetic is right, is two and half times the cost of service.

Mr. Goodale: There is no protection now, and the bill provides it for the first time.

Mr. Benjamin: The hon. member does not know one end of a box car from another. With that kind of a maximum rate there will be no intervention because they can go to that maximum without intervention, and those who appeal for intervention will not get it because the companies will be within the maximum, which can be two and a half times the cost of service.

Mr. Goodale: But they are over that maximum now. They will have to roll some back.

Mr. Benjamin: Except for competitive reasons, and that is still in the bill. That ruins half the principles.

Mr. Goodale: That is not on the maximum-minimum, Les.

Mr. Benjamin: The other items on freight rates that I want to comment on now are, for example, the prairie rapeseed crushing industry. They face inequities because it is more economical to ship raw rapeseed to central Canada for crushing instead of processing it on the prairies and shipping the processed products. Under the new rates—and I hope the hon. member for Assiniboia will make a speech and tell us how this will be corrected—published by the Canadian Transport Commission for rapeseed products, it costs 62.4 cents more per hundredweight to ship rapeseed products than it does to ship raw rapeseed from Saskatoon to Montreal. The previous difference was 25.3 cents; now it is 62.4 cents. The answer of the Minister of Transport to this inequity would be to jack up the rate on raw rapeseed so that it would move at a compensatory rate. This would price the western rapeseed products right out of the central Canadian market. They would no longer be competing with corn, peanuts, soyabeans, coconut oil or sunflower oil. It prices western processed rapeseed oil right out of the central Canadian market, let alone the export market.

It is bad enough when this happens under the Liberal Minister of Transport, but this had a lot of help from the Conservatives. They sold out to the government, as usual. I listened very carefully to the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner), who did not take any position on the bill one way or another except horizontal. He is neither for or against the bill. This is typical. It is no longer Joe who or Joe what, it is Jack what. On this issue of the processing of rapeseed in western Canada, the minister of transport in Alberta, who happens to be a relative of the hon. member for Crowfoot, not only opposed extending the statutory rate to rapeseed products but suggested that raw rapeseed be taken off the statutory grain rate. That is a lot of help from those Conservatives in Alberta.

The Tories talk motherhood about promoting decentralization and regional industry, but where are they when it comes down to the nitty-gritty of the future of our rapeseed industry in western Canada? They fell into line with profitability and commercial viability and said, "Take rapeseed off the Crowsnest pass rates". Like the Atlantic premiers, the premier of Alberta sold out. The Tories agreed with the Minister of Transport that there has to be competition and that there has to be commercial viability in transportation. The official opposition did nothing but some nitpicking with regard to this legislation. I listened to the hon. member for Crowfoot, and I like the man very much, but he did not take a stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired. However he could continue with the unanimous consent of the House.

[English]

Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): There is not unanimous consent. The hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier).

Mr. Benjamin: Mr. Speaker, do I have the floor?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): There was not unanimous consent. I recognize the hon. member for Roberval.

Mr. Hogan: Mr. Speaker, may I find out who said no?

[Mr. Benjamin.]

Mr. McKenzie: The member of parliament for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKenzie) said no.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. C. A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, before beginning my speech, may I say that I disagree with the government leader for having introduced this bill today, not because I am against the introduction of a bill on transportation, but because we were informed only half an hour before the House resumed of the change in the business of the House. Today we were supposed to discuss Bill C-27 on unemployment insurance and we got ready for that. A few minutes only before entering the House, we were told that the government had changed its mind and that we would be discussing Bill C-33 on transportation.

I asked why this sudden change. The answer was that this was because the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) was in the House and he wanted to introduce his bill himself, but here we were in for another surprise: the presentation was made by the Minister of Justice on behalf of the Minister of Transport. This demonstrates again the lack of planning on the part of the government in submitting the other leaders in the House an orderly schedule. We are lost in conjectures about the real reasons behind these changes which were made at the very last minute.

Still I am pleased to see this bill introduced because I have a lot to say about the administration of the Canadian National and about the passenger service which these officials seem to discredit. I see some of them up there smiling and conferring. They know they are protected because they sit behind the minister; it is impossible to find the name of a single one or to know their opinion about the Saguenay-Lac-Saint-Jean area.

For the last 15 years I have been struggling in this House to save to some extent what is left of the passenger service in our area. Barely 15 years after the flourishing period of our railway, we were visited by so-called specialists from the large cities; they closed all the passenger stations; they turned express and postal services over to the private sector because it gave them too much work; they dismissed all employees in those services and suppressed two thirds of the personnel entrusted with the maintenance of the railroad track and tripled the clerical work force. They forgot one thing: trains best operate on well-maintained railroad tracks and not on television screens. Even though the contrary may seem true, it was wishful thinking on their part. Today we have a bill dealing with railways and whose first clause reads as follows:

. . . the National Transportation Act is repealed . . .

We spend our time in the House repealing laws to replace them by others which are sometimes less efficient—

"3. (1) It is hereby declared that the objective of the transportation policy for Canada is to achieve a transportation system that

(a) is efficient,

(b) is an effective instrument of support for the achievement of national and regional social and economic objectives, and

(c) provides accessibility and equity of treatment for users, . . .

All that makes me laugh, Mr. Speaker. And we read in the recommendation that it is for the purpose of defining the objective of the transportation policy for Canada and authorizing the consequential rearrangement of powers. The rearrangement of powers and duties relating to transport, now that is important!

Mr. Speaker, when talking about rearrangement of powers and relations in transport, it means another change in the staff. As you see, there will be another rearrangement of responsibilities in the field of transport. In short, what do these proposals mean? More technocrats and bureaucrats who are going to strut about like their predecessors or spend their time sleeping in their sumptuously furnished offices.

We may read the whole bill but at the end at the very last line, Mr. Speaker, we read that the Minister of Transport will decide. What does that mean? It means that technocrats will keep their own preserve in the field of Canadian transport. That is that! Technocrats are never mentioned, they only refer to the minister, but we know very well what it means.

● (2030)

That was a realistic summary of Bill C-33. Mr. Speaker, it would be better for us to keep only the last line of the bill and throw the balance into the wastebasket, because in the end decisions will not be made in the House, but elsewhere. The goal of the bill is to meet the regional needs in an efficient fashion. If I had time to read again the bills on transportation passed since Confederation, I would always find the same goals set out, perhaps with a different terminology. That is a good indication how our high officials repeat themselves.

Then the minister tells us that the bill is aimed at combining the various means of transportation and set up joint public and private services. It has been done for a long time, Mr. Speaker. And I would add that if our public carrier did not have its annual deficits paid by the taxpayers, I mean freight transport, never could it compete with the private sector. As far as freight transportation is concerned, our public carrier was anxious to hide its own administrative incompetence, hence the agreements with its competitor, that is private enterprise.

I wish I had more time to provide you with background information on these freight rates. I should have a lot to say but I prefer to make use of my own time telling you about passenger services generally—since this bill deals also with this—but more specifically in my own Saguenay-Lac-Saint-Jean region. Someone may say that this is not the first time I have raised this issue in the House. However, following the remarks I made in the House the other day, I feel this is an excellent opportunity to tell you about this famous train.

I am afraid someone has called down curses from heaven upon our region, for technocrats have apparently decided to put down or even make us hate the only passenger service which has survived the devastating attacks launched by Montreal officials. Especially in the past 15 years officials have been anxious to prove to the authorities of the country that a railway in the Saguenay-Lac-Saint-Jean area is not profitable. Every trick has been used, such as no adequate maintenance of the tracks and antiquated passenger cars. They have even used the suburban cars of Montreal to provide service between Montreal-Chicoutimi-Dolbeau or still—

An hon. Member: Jonquière.

Mr. Gauthier (Roberval): —Jonquière is also included, so that the tracks are left clear for freight trains while passengers have to wait for hours and hours on a siding because freight trains have priority. We have to say how we are treated in our area. Or the passenger from the Dolbeau-Chicoutimi train must cool his heels for two or three hours at Hervey-Jonction waiting for a train from Abitibi when it would be more logical to proceed directly to Montreal as it has been done each Sunday night for years. But during the week one has to wait for the Abitibi train which must travel to Montreal in two and a half or three hours. As the Abitibi train is always late, we arrive late in Montreal. That's it! Finally, the favorite sport of senior civil servants is to play with schedules. They are interested in schedules, they often play with them. They juggle with them. It is a little like the torment of the drop of water. The latest draft schedule for April 1977 has not been published yet, but I have it. It is concrete evidence of what I just said.

Imagine, Mr. Speaker, that according to that new schedule, any passenger from Chicoutimi, Jonquière, Chambord or Dolbeau will leave Chicoutimi at one p.m. From Dolbeau, he will leave at noon and arrive in Montreal around 11.30 p.m. We might as well say midnight, because there is always a half-hour delay.

When I saw this schedule, I thought it was the height of stupidity. Those people should either go and see a psychiatrist or be confined. They are due for some mental rest. Let's imagine someone going to Montreal on business. Right now he can leave Dolbeau or Chicoutimi at seven in the evening. At 6:30 in the morning he gets into Montreal, does his business, and then at eight or nine o'clock in the evening he is ready to take the train back home. He does not lose time. Two nights aboard a sleeping car or a coach during eight and a half or nine hours. But with the new schedule, the train will leave Chicoutimi at noon and arrive at midnight: so the businessman getting into Montreal at night will have to check in a hotel, spend the night in Montreal and do his business the following day; but since the train leaves for Chicoutimi at seven in the morning, he will have to wait for the next morning train to go back to Chicoutimi. So he will have to take two days and three nights for his business. Anyone can imagine what results this schedule will have. And now, Mr. Speaker, this schedule will become effective on April 1.

Starting April 1, this schedule will be implemented. Never, and I want parliament to note this, never before would any public servants have had the gall to suggest such a ridiculous schedule. We can now imagine what the situation will be for the hundreds of workers who leave each fall for the fruit and vegetable harvest in Ontario, for the 600 to 800 workers, for entire families, who take the train to Ontario. They will reach

Montreal at midnight and they will have to spend the night on the floor of the station waiting for the train next day. With the present schedule, they reach Montreal at 6 or 6:30, which means that they can transfer as soon as they get off the train to another train going to Ontario. This is why, on February 28, I presented a motion in the House to appeal to the Minister of Transport so that this decision may be postponed for six months. My motion, dated February 28, reads as follows:

Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the terms of Standing Order 43, I request the unanimous consent of the House to present a motion dealing with a matter of utmost importance and urgency to the Saguenay-Lac-Saint-Jean area.

As according to the new CN passenger service schedule becoming effective in early April, the only passenger train will be arriving into Montreal at 23:30, as at that late hour all connection with other trains is impossible and as, according to that new schedule, three days and two nights will be needed to spend one business day in Montreal, that waste of time never having existed previously because the same trip is now made during the night, and as the implementation of that new schedule will cause serious prejudice to the travelling public in the area to the extent where the clientele will disappear, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Abitibi (Mr. Allard):

That the Minister of Transport exert immediately the required pressure with the CN president and Mr. Jean-Marie Beaulieu—

—He seems to be in charge there—

—general superintendent, to delay the implementation of the new schedule for six months, with a view to allowing local organizations to present their suggestions in that regard.

Mr. Speaker, I do not know if this time the minister will have the courage to act in the interest of the public, because I suspect premeditation on the part of the public servants who thought up this schedule change to try to prove to the minister that the Saguenay-Lac-Saint-Jean passenger train was no longer necessary because of a lack of customers. We can expect anything these days, especially on the part of those who have nothing to think about in their office except how to do a disservice to others while pretending that they are helping them. With such a schedule, who will want to take the train to spend two nights in a hotel in Montreal? Once again, if the minister wants to meet his objectives and meet the needs of the travelling public, he will have to eliminate certain public servants who are dedicated to destroying everything. One thing encourages me however, and this is the news reported in the newspaper Le Devoir of March 1, 1977, and I quote:

Lang Annouces Creation of VIA Rail for Passengers Federal Transport Minister Otto Lang announced yesterday the creation of VIA Rail Canada to operate passenger train services.

In announcing the news, Mr. Lang said the new corporation will be a subsidiary of Canadian National Railways, with plans and budgets subject to government approval.

Creation of the new corporation comes three years after it was first mentioned by the government in the 1974 election campaign.

That is where I started wondering, is he preparing another election campaign?

VIA Rail will take over routes gradually from CN and CP Rail, starting with that part of the network located in the Quebec-Windsor axis. Other lines will follow later.

I hope ours would be turned over immediately.

The Minister of Transport said the government is ready to contribute to capital requirements for trains and track and help with operating losses. Nevertheless, the government is now considering with CN and CP Rail ways to improve performance and minimize costs.

[Mr. Gauthier (Roberval).]

The new company will contract with CN and CP for the operation of passenger trains on existing routes.

The name of VIA Rail president will be known later this week. Already, Frank Roberts, now vice-president of CN's St. Lawrence region, is understood to be the choice.

That is precisely our area. I had heard that Mr. Roberts would be the president of the new corporation. I am very pleased with that, and I ask him to correct the mistakes of his predecessors and give our area a little bit more justice. I am convinced that if a good passenger service is set up between Montreal-Chambord via Dolbeau-Chicoutimi since the run goes well from Chambord to Montreal between 8 and 8:30, at night—I repeat at night—because of the energy restrictions that will soon be mandatory people will be surprised to see how well it will stand up against the competition, even of buses and airlines, because it is proved that rail service is always more reliable. I therefore ask the new president to hold an inquiry in the area and invite all hon. members, who will make it their duty to accept his invitation, to discuss that famous problem of passengers and solve it once and for all.

The problem will never be solved by civil servants in Montreal who barely know the area having gone there only a few times and, mind you, by plane. Mr. Speaker, I promise to ask all companies in the area to use the freight trains, and appeal to all municipal councils, all Chambers of Commerce and local R.D.C.s to prove to the minister and the CN that a passenger service is needed in my area; if it is improved, through both services and schedules, the clientele will triple within a year. Of course, the image of that mode of transport will have to be uplifted because it has been rather battered in the last few years.

Meanwhile, we must keep the current schedule before taking further decisions following the consultations I have suggested earlier. Indeed these consultations could deal with ticket prices, rates for beds—the actual rate is a ridiculous $45—and finally with everything that could attract the clientele and guarantee a satisfactory passenger service. One must never forget that the passenger train is first of all a customer service. It is not a money making industry but government officials are trying to convince the population that it must be a paying proposition. It is not worse than in other regions. The same goes for all other public services whose purpose is to offer the public a better service. Besides, the Canadian Transport Commission has come to the same conclusion and I quote Le Devoir of March 1, 1977:

The Canadian Transport Commission has already come to the conclusion that there is not a single profit making trunk line in all of Canada . . .

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that we are no worse off than these regions. No better, but no worse! We want the same services as the other regions.

[English]

Mr. Peter Stollery (Spadina): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Benjamin: The hon. member is going to rebel.

Mr. Stollery: —this is a particularly complex subject for an urban member like myself to discuss, but it is important that we discuss this important bill, C-33, effectively. It concerns rail passenger policy. It concerns not only national transportation policy but amends the Railway Act. It has an effect on the Canadian Transport Commission.

● (2050)

Transportation is an extremely difficult and complicated business for most Canadians. Canadians in the urban centres can never understand why members of parliament spend so much time on matters of transportation. Naturally, they use such things as urban transit, streetcars and buses and they do not understand the special difficulties in the west with regard to moving grain.

Members opposite are making remarks at the moment because they do not have the courtesy to listen to a few of my remarks, although I spent a lot of time listening to theirs. The hon. member who spoke previously spoke for 40 minutes on a rather contradictory speech. We sat here and listened to him. I should think he would let me get on with my few remarks.

Many of the people I represent understand the fact that transportation is one of the things that brought Canada together in the first place. The railway is a part of Canadian history. They know the story of the CPR and the way that railway had to be built in order to bring this country together. Perhaps it is appropriate that this subject be raised again at this time.

There are members in the House of Commons who represent areas in the maritimes which are concerned about better air service. We know of the difficulties in British Columbia with the coastal ferry service. There are many difficulties in Toronto with urban transit, such as the tremendous costs for subway construction and buying the kinds of vehicles needed to run a modern city. Even a few years ago this would not have been considered for the national government. It was a provincial and municipal problem. Now it has become so costly that the amounts of money required can only be provided by a national government.

I can only speak of the Toronto area with some knowledge. We have always understood that transportation in Canada has never been a paying proposition. We have always had to cough up. We have had to pay a lot of money because in this country we do not have the concentrations of population which makes transportation an easy matter to deal with.

We have the problems of freight subsidies, ferry subsidies, rail passenger subsidies, and other subsidies as well. I was looking at some of the figures. In his speech this afternoon the minister pointed out the deficit. Deficits can always be argued because the figures are so hard to obtain. But according to the minister's statement this afternoon, the deficit was $1.6 billion in 1975-76 to operate the Ministry of Transport in all the areas of Canada with which the Ministry of Transport deals.

Now, philosophically, I agree with some of the remarks made by the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin). Transportation in Canada is crucial to the unity of this country. I hesitate to use that word which is being thrown around these days. But it is the concern of all of us.

The fact is that transportation is as important in Canada today as it was in 1867. In fact it may be more important. In 1957-58 the whole world started travelling at 550 miles an hour, the speed of a jet plane. As the former minister of manpower and immigration knows, there have been scenes in this House with regard to immigration matters because populations can move around this planet at 550 miles an hour. That is something that has never been seen before and it has to be dealt with in this age.

But originally it was the railway that brought us together physically. Now we have the problem of what form of transportation should be used to bring us together. That is the big question which this House spends so much time discussing.

I have some figures. The cost of operating a railway is phenomenal. I am not using this as an argument not to subsidize the railways, but while the number of passengers declined 1 per cent between 1972 and 1974, the deficit rose 30 per cent. That is the kind of problem with which we have to deal. How do we go about what is needed to run our railway efficiently when the costs are so tremendous?

I was born and raised in Canada. Yet I could not afford to visit the city of Vancouver before being elected to the House of Commons. I imagine that was the case for many members of the House. I think most members get the picture.

The hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre referred to Europe in his speech. We have this habit of talking about how well the railway system operates in Europe and how poorly it operates here. In Europe there are high population concentrations that are fairly close together. They are easily served.

In the 1950's the government of France made a conscious decision to put its investments in the railways. When the French delegation left Paris for the Rome talks in 1958, they took the train. The delegation did not meet at the airport the way we do here. They met at the Gare de Lyons. It is a 15 hours trip to Rome. It is a good trip. The other side of the coin is that you cannot rely on airline service to get you from Paris to Rome. Those of us who have had the experience of European airlines know that their standards are not up to Canadian standards.

● (2100)

We talk about the tremendous railway system they have across the Soviet Union. The Soviet Union must have the best rail line I have ever seen in my life. It is fantastic the way it runs between the Soviet Far East and Europe. They do a tremendous business in trans-shipping. The railway line is several tracks wide for thousands of miles and it is most efficient. Any Canadian who rides it cannot believe that this is what a railway can be like. Of course, if he looks outside the train he notices there are no roads. They do not have any roads, and most Canadians probably feel they would like to have roads as well as a railway, and also they would like to have airplanes as well as a railway.

In Canada effectively we have a choice. We want all of them. We want everything. We want the ferries, we want the roads, we want the airlines, and we want the trains. I think that in Canada we should have the trains. We have a society with enough experience to find a proper balance between these various modes of transportation.

Something which has become apparent to me over the past few years since I have been here as a member of parliament is that we have given too much power to the Canadian Transport Commission.

Some hon. Member: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stollery: You know, the member for—

An hon. Member: Jack Pickersgill!

Mr. Stollery: The Conservative transportation critic who spoke earlier today gave me the impression that he did not think politicians should make political decisions about transportation in Canada. I think that is crazy. I think that when you have a choice between railways, roads, ferries, and airlines, when you have important services on the east coast, vital services on the west coast, and a large amount of investment to be made, political guidance is needed. We are not talking about just a few thousands of dollars. To my way of thinking, $1.6 billion is a lot of money, it is a heck of a lot of money. Allocating large sums between various forms of transportation has been a national question for more than a hundred years, so when an hon. member suggests to me there should not be political input into the question of how this money should be spent, I just think that is crazy.

Over the last few months we have had experience with Polysar. We have had our experiences with these different agencies which were set up in the 1940's and the 1950's. This is not a problem which is unique to Canada. This is common in many countries. There are only 265 of us. We have to do all the things which have to be done. There are committees, and all members know how busy they are. I guess at some point we decided we ought to establish an independent commission to do this, an independent committee to do that, and a non-political thingamajig to do this, and another mechanism here to do that. And the first thing we know, we have the Minister of Transport standing up in the House of Commons saying "It's a mess, it's awful, and I cannot do anything about it because I don't have the political control necessary to resolve this very difficult question."

We are dealing with a very complex issue, but I think that when I see on the first or the second page of Bill C-33 that we are redefining the objective of the transportation policy for Canada, and when I see this business that we are amending the functions, powers and duties of the Canadian Transport Commission, nothing gives me greater joy. A step is finally being taken to get the kind of control back over the transportation system in this country that the government should have.

Members opposite are talking about Pickersgill in 1966 or 1967. Well, it is 1977 now. They may have forgotten it, but we are living in 1977, so we are prepared to acknowledge that reforms have to be made because we have gone a little bit forward, we have found things that are not right and we are prepared to change them. I think that is perfectly sensible and reasonable.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Liberals have been saying the same thing for one hundred years.

Mr. Stollery: Well, Liberals have been doing things about 100 years. The hon. member opposite says that Liberals have been saying that for a hundred years. It is true, and Liberals have been performing things for a hundred years.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): As the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Chrétien) would say, "My eye!"

Mr. Stollery: Liberals have been making things better. Just before I opened my remarks on this area of transportation, the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier) spoke about the train service in his area. I take the train quite a lot from here to Toronto. This brings me to the point made by the hon. member for Roberval.

[Translation]

The railway issue is under consideration and the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier) has dealt with it. I understand perfectly well that story about the time required to go by train from Ottawa to Montreal, but personally I travel by train between Ottawa and Toronto and I remember that three weeks or a month ago there was a snowstorm. We left Ottawa at 5:30 p.m. for a 250-mile ride. Not 120 mile but 250 miles! And we arrived in Toronto at 2:30 a.m. Why? Because . . . I see the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia) next to me. We have travelled together a few times and we know very well that from here to Belleville the train runs at only 45 miles an hour because CP owns the line and passenger trains always yield to the large freight trains which we encounter because they have priority.

● (2110)

[English]

Mr. Ellis: A point of order, Mr. Speaker—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order. The hon. member for Hastings (Mr. Ellis) is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Ellis: Mr. Speaker, I must bring to the attention of the hon. member that only the track between here and Smiths Falls is CP; from there on it is CN. There is—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. This is a point for debate, it is certainly not a point of order. The hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Stollery) has the floor.

Mr. Stollery: Mr. Speaker, I am happy to learn that the hon. member knows that, because after all he is the member of parliament for Belleville and that is where the section gang changes on the train. If he does not know it, we are all in a lot of trouble. He is also a former mayor. I acknowledge that he knows more about Belleville than I do, and it is true that it is CPR to Smiths Falls and CNR from Smiths Falls to Brockville. But it does not matter. The fact is:

[Translation]

At any rate, one cannot go faster than 45 miles an hour between here and Belleville, no matter what railway company you may use. The speed is 45 miles and hour. And I know it because I have travelled by train for many years, at least 15 or 20 times every year to go to Toronto. Besides, I would like to see the hon. member travel by train with me one day because I have not yet met him on the train between Ottawa and Belleville.

[English]

Mr. Ellis: You know I always ride the engine, Peter.

Mr. Stollery: The hon. member always rides the engine. I ride in the coach so I do not see that.

Mr. Epp: Be careful, we have the engineer back in the chair.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stollery: We seem to have gotten off the track, Mr. Speaker. What I started out to say was that this very complicated question of transportation in Canada has, for the last ten years, been too much in the hands of—

Mr. McKenzie: The Liberals. That is why we are in such a mess.

Mr. Stollery: —of appointed officials. I think this bill is the first step to regain that power over transportation in Canada, and to me it represents a major step forward.

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, I want to intervene on second reading debate of these amendments for three or four particular reasons. First of all, as has been indicated, these are the first substantive amendments that we have made to the act since it was in front of us about ten years ago. These amendments are overdue. To a lot of us, for the time being it remains, at least on the surface, another piece of ad hocery. I see nothing particular wrong with ad hoc approaches to very complex problems, but I am a little cynical whether or not the amendments proposed by the government will achieve what they are touted as having been designed to achieve.

I am a sort of wait and see-er. We have to proceed with this debate with some degree of caution and try to attract the widest possible dialogue from the different regions of the country and the various economic sectors concerned with transportation. When we are in committee it is absolutely necessary that we have the widest possible opportunity to call witnesses and to pursue our own investigative work respecting the two or three principal suggestions in this particular package.

The first of these is the degree to which the legislation departs from the policies of the last ten years. I am not a great believer in bringing back on to the floor of the House of Commons details about how to run a national transportation system. I think that if we have a valid accusation to make regarding inaction in the last ten years, it is that we have lost political control over the policy of the government respecting transportation problems. If what we are learning from my hon. friend from Toronto is a lesson in the degree to which politicians should be running national transportation systems, then I think he had better get off the train and back on to an airplane, or take a taxi to get back and forth.

An hon. Member: What have you ever done for transportation?

Mr. McKenzie: You have made it a mess. Marchand says it is a real mess.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. The hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall) has the floor and I suggest we listen to him.

Mr. Forrestall: As long as it remains in a mess we will try to help you out and encourage you to do the right thing. If the hon. member wants, I will talk to him about transportation and about how little he has done for New Brunswick. What have you done for Nova Scotia today in the field of transportation?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I suggest to the hon. member that he address the Chair, please.

Mr. Forrestall: Do you want me to tell you what they have done about the "at and east" rates? Do you want me to tell you about the two or three thousand jobs that we are going to lose?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I suggest that the hon. member get back on the rails of the National Transportation Act.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Forrestall: I will address my remarks to you, Mr. Speaker. If they want to listen, they can. But I don't need chastisement from you, and I certainly don't need it from the people across the floor. We have one or two comments to make on this important piece of legislation. They fouled up the port of Halifax. They fouled up our shipping industry. They will foul up our transportation system. They have done this for the last ten or 15 years, and they sit there and ask what we have done. The absence of any meaningful direction in transportation policy in the last ten years stands as an indictment against the government. It indicates to me, as someone from eastern Canada, the real level of their concern for the hinterlands of this country. They don't care. Traditional Liberal thought in this country has never cared; it has been centralized.

An hon. Member: Oh, come on.

Mr. Forrestall: Go back and read Mackenzie King. Read a little bit of history.

Mrs. Holt: Why is it such a great country? Because the Liberals have run it.

● (2120)

Mr. Forrestall: Yes, they ran it right into the ground. Stand up and tell me that this is not ad hocery. It is a piecemeal approach to a complex problem. You fellows will try anything.

Mrs. Holt: You had the chance and you failed.

Mr. Forrestall: It is you who failed. This is just an attempt to do something. If you want some support for your legislation, listen once in a while.

Mrs. Holt: It is not worth while.

Mr. Forrestall: It just might be that I will support this aberration because, God knows, anything is better than nothing. We have had nothing for ten years. Perhaps it is a step in the right direction, but there are things we want to know about. What is it going to do for the port of Halifax? What is it going to do for the "at and east" rates? Where is all this grand money about which the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) tells our Atlantic premiers? All these words mean nothing.

The degree to which this piece of legislation will be affected and will be well received politically by the people in Atlantic Canada will be measured by the degree to which the minister does something with regard to the powers he will give to himself. Before giving him those powers, I want to know what he is talking about. I want to know where the extra funds will come from. I want to know what he is talking about when he says we will not only get rid of ineffective and inefficient subsidy programs, not only will we take that money and give it to the economically depressed regions to upgrade their transportation facilities, but we will find more money. Where is that money coming from and what will he do with it?

He went to the Atlantic provinces and came out of there with the blush of sunshine, praised by everybody about his user-pay principle reversal. How will he forgo that? It shows up here in the bill. The concept is there about avoiding it where economic contingencies come to the fore, and it should be avoided or set to one side. It has been there for a long time. What he is going to do for us, what is he going to do for Canada? All that he is doing here is to take unto himself enormous powers.

Let us go through the principles for a minute or two, the eight or ten principles. It says: the federal government will establish the national policies and the CTC will enforce them. How have we been running transport for the last 30 or 40 years if it has not been that way?

It says that the development and regulation of the transport system will be done in co-operation with all levels of government and the public. Probably I will support this bill on second reading, but before I do I want to hear from the minister—not the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) but the Minister of Transport—and from some members from Atlantic Canada. How will they consult with the general public about something as broad and sweeping as that particular principle? I welcome it, it has to be done, but stand up and tell me how you intend to do it.

It says here that competition within and between transport modes will be encouraged where other considerations permit. What other considerations? What are you talking about? What does that mean? Do not ask us to buy something unless you are prepared to tell us what it means and what it is all about.

It says here that conflict between public and private interests will be resolved in favour of the public interests. I am down to paragraph (d). I think Sir John A. Macdonald talked about this 110 years ago. What else is there? A little bit of mother love so far.

It says here that there should be opportunities for both public and private ownership, national, regional, and local carriers, and for Canadian ownership of private carriers. What does that last little tagged-on phrase mean? You have all spoken to your truckers, to people in the transportation industry, and you know exactly what it means. There is enough authority in that one sentence to make a dictator out of the minister if he wants to be one. Why? We will not give it to him until we have heard. That is the purpose of our being here.

It says here that commercial viability for both transportation and related services is an objective. Of course it is a desired and good objective, but stand up and tell me what it means.

It says here: where government policy militates against commercial viability, the benefits and costs involved should be identified and the additional costs assumed by the government. What will that apply to? Will it help our neighbours, the provincial people in Prince Edward Island to move their potatoes to the mainland, or to move other produce into Newfoundland or out to the Madgalen Islands? Is that what it means, and if so how will it happen, because these are the things that are important?

It says here: the market place will determine costs and services where effective competition exists; where it does not, these will be regulated to give users the same protection that the competition will give them. It is not the market place that will protect them. The minister has assumed that right and responsibility himself. He has the power and the authority. When he stands up and tells me what he is going to do, only then will we make a decision on whether or not this is a useful and meaningful step in the right direction. Until he does, let him sit there and think about an area of Canada that cannot survive without an efficient and competitive transportation system.

We do not have a market area of 600,000 people to support secondary manufacturing in industry other than in the primary products such as forestry, fishing, and our coal industry. We cannot make shirts. We do not have enough people to sell them to within reasonable transportation distance. We have to come back up to Montreal or Toronto to get rid of our surplus production just to maintain the efficiency of our plants, and our plants are not inefficient due to bad management but they are hamstrung by ad hocery. There is nothing wrong with the word ad hoc. It is a good, useful word. Perhaps if it had been employed ten years ago, bit by bit we might have had some semblance of a transportation policy. I say it is ad hoc because it deals with a section of transportation. It refers to air, it refers to water, it refers to the upgrading and improving of the road system. It refers to taking dollars from this system and giving them to another system. Do not tell us all that vaguely without telling us what you are going to do.

One could go on with that for the next hour. There has to be the widest possible input in our discussion with respect to this because, while it sounds good and encouraging to those of us who live in areas totally dependent on transportation, I suggest that it skates awfully close to a very dangerous precipice.

What does the minister mean when he says to us that he is going to do away with subsidies that are inefficient and ineffective? Will he use those subsidies to give more appropriate help to some of the regions of Canada to overcome the disparity?

In the bulletin of the Ministry of Transport of February 8, Bulletin No. 18, at page 3 we are told about the agreements arrived at between the Minister of Transport and the Council of Maritime premiers meeting together with Mr. Morgan of Newfoundland. It reads:

Mr. Lang, Mr. Morgan and the Maritime premiers agreed in principle that improved passenger transportation could best be achieved by providing special assistance for upgrading bus and air services in that region, to be followed by changes to existing rail passenger-services, for which the demand is relatively low—

● (2130)

In the name of all that is holy how can we improve rail transportation by improving air services and bus services? Perhaps we can. We can in Newfoundland because the Bullet has been closed down. All there is from Port aux Basques to St. John's is a bus, and no doubt my friends and colleagues from Newfoundland can wax eloquently about that and about the difficulty that has been caused in that province with respect to its provincial transportation system.

However, leaving that little bit of logic to one side because, after all, this is just a press report, and it obviously was not written by politicians who have the answers to everything—or should have, according to some speakers here this evening—what does the minister mean when he says passenger services can be improved by operating air services and road services? Are we going to get dollars and cents to bring our highways up to Trans-Canada standards so that we can move potatoes from one end of Prince Edward Island to a dockside, so that they can be shipped to a rail siding, or so that the lumber industry and the primary industries of Nova Scotia can get into the woods eight or ten months of the year instead of four or five?

Are we talking about subsidies so that we can get from Bathurst to Port Hawkesbury, or from Sydney to Yarmouth without spending two days doing it? Is that what we are talking about? If it is, we welcome that because, yes, that would be a meaningful step ahead. But we do not hear that. We hear from the minister that he is going to assume the authority to do these things if he so chooses. This afternoon the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner) said we should be careful about freight rates when buying boats. They have a habit of kicking you in the teeth. That is exactly what will happen in the Atlantic region, if that is not what is intended.

You cannot raise the expectations of the people or play politics with transportation in Atlantic Canada. It is too serious and important. It is too vital to our lifestyle to take away the "at and east" rates from us, but in the mind of the minister I am absolutely certain he considers that to be an inefficient subsidy. What is he going to do with $3 million or $4 million? What roadway is he going to improve? What bus transportation system is he going to improve? How far would that amount go toward providing an adequate feeder aircraft service in the four Atlantic provinces? Not very far.

On the other hand, that is the vital lifeblood of the Port of Halifax and the Port of Saint John, and of grain elevators stretching all the way back to the Lakehead. We are not talking about a dozen jobs. Hon. members will pardon my anger when people play lightly with the jobs of maritimers. They are too damned scarce in the maritimes today. Unemployment there is too chronically high. Hon. members will pardon my justifiable anger. What is the minister talking about? These are some of the questions which have to be answered.

Where is the minister going to get the subsidies? What is he going to cancel? We know about the "at and east" rates. What else is there? We are going to save $200 million on this joint operation, this management passenger sales team? Are we going to get $5 million or $50 million of this $200 million we are losing? Are we going to be so efficient that we will recover enough money to direct elsewhere? What are we talking about, or is that all we are doing, just talking? Do we have some concrete plans? Do we know what we want to do?

I am sorry the minister is not here. I do not know whether he had to be out in British Columbia to make an announcement. Why could that not have been done in Ottawa on the floor of the House of Commons? We have known about this for a long time, but where are these subsidies coming from? What is going to suffer? We cannot help one part of this country by hurting or harming another section of its economy. We want to know the inefficiencies of those subsidies which are not considered to be effective, or which are considered to be less than effective.

I see nothing in here which moves us ahead. If there is nothing concrete, why are we not talking about restructuring the tax system so that there can be an incentive to encourage Canadian owners of merchant ships which are registered offshore for tax purposes? Why are we not talking about that so that we can at least encourage industry, encourage new jobs, and encourage more work for our shipyards? Those are the things we want to know about. There is nothing in this bill. We have not yet had the benefit of hearing the minister speak to us. There has been one speaker from the government side. He rambled on about going 45 miles an hour between here and Toronto. Well, hell, he has had ten years to complain about that. Why did he not go to the minister and do it privately to get something done?

Mr. Benjamin: That wouldn't help.

Mr. Forrestall: It probably wouldn't. Until we know what the minister intends to do with this enormous power he is taking for himself and with the right he is giving back to CTC under conditions he will determine and deem to be right in terms of time, structure, and content, this movement back and forth of powers is bound to lead to uncertainty and confusion. And when we have that, we have unrest and an impaired ability to utilize fully the structure because the people simply do not understand it.

We can go on with this reallocation of subsidies program. It sounds great, but until we know what is going to be taken away we are in the dark, and there is not very much we can do.

There are just one or two other items I will touch on because I know there are others who want to speak. They are related more to the institution of the minimum, maximum freight rates, than the discontinuation of the so-called long haul freight rate discrimination which has been built into our system. These provisions are somewhat important, not only to the rail companies, which is obvious, but they also have a serious impact on the trucking industry.

I think we all recognize that shippers who are attempting to broaden their market potential in their part of the country, in other parts of the country and abroad, are going to be very directly affected. As we understand it, the formula set out in the bill is not sufficiently clear to permit the people who will be most directly affected the opportunity at this point in time to make any substantive or in depth comment on whether they will in fact work or whether they will have the long-term effect of working backwards. The present act declares as its goal an economic, efficient, and adequate transportation system, and why not? What else should it have as a goal?

Mr. Benjamin: Motherhood.

Mrs. Holt: Fatherhood.

Mr. Hogan: Atta boy, Simma.

Mrs. Holt: Atta girl.

Mr. Forrestall: Those words have been amended now so that transportation is simply to be efficient and nothing else. That is all it has to be now. After that it has to be an instrument of government development policy. National defence is an instrument of national development and stability. Sir John A. Macdonald thought transportation was an effective instrument of national development 110 years ago, so this is not a new concept. We do not want platitudes, Mr. Speaker; we want programs, and we want to see the details. We want to know what the reallocation will be, how much money we are talking about, how much will go where—road improvements, harbour and port improvements, and so on. That is what we want, not this bland policy. I am prepared to accept what the experts say because I am not an expert.

• (2140)

Mr. Pelletier: We know that.

Mr. Forrestall: Is the hon. member an expert?

Mr. Pelletier: No, and I know it.

Mr. Forrestall: That is my point; we are not experts. This is not the place to cross the "t's" and dot the "i's". I do not think the minister's office is the place for the enormous amounts of responsibility that the legislation would seem to be extending to him. He wants to get the control, to get active, yet he cannot tell us on the floor of this House of Commons in broad general terms what he intends to do under the act. I suspect that at the present moment there are two or three people in the gallery who know exactly what they want to do. The minister has not even bothered to tell his own colleagues what he intends to do.

Perhaps ministerial powers should be looked at very carefully. They may have to be tightened up to ensure an effective use of the power. In effect, the minister could turn any part of the country on or turn it off. But, Mr. Speaker, he is a layman and does not know any more about transportation than I do, although it is likely he receives a good briefing every day. Indeed, he probably has so many briefings that he cannot keep track of them.

Another thing we will have to examine very carefully is the reallocation of subsidies. We want to know where the additional money is coming from and how the consultative process will operate—how the money is to be spent. We will want to be assured that the discontinuance of existing subsidies will not impair the ability of other parts of our economic structure—particularly in the Atlantic provinces—to operate. We must know, for example, that there will be no detrimental effect on the movement of basic materials into Sydney for the Sydney steel plant, and of coal out of the region into the central Canadian market. We cannot make real national progress by doing harm to one segment of the economy even though there may be a sincere intention to assist another segment.

I hope when we get to committee stage the government will permit the widest possible—

Mr. Benjamin: If we get to committee stage.

Mr. Forrestall: That is possible. This bill may never see the committee—it may die somewhere along the way. It was not a matter that was to have come before us at this time and the fact that it is here now is an indication that the government must be bereft of work for us to do. It shows the level of its sincerity in attacking the problem of transportation. The upgrading of airports and harbours and dredging programs—these are all transportation programs. I do not think the people want to hear about transportation programs just from somebody in Toronto. All of us have something to contribute to this problem, something more than just mouthing the motherhood words of the bill.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The hon. member for Halton (Mr. Philbrook).

Mr. F. A. Philbrook (Halton): Mr. Speaker, I would be happy to yield the floor to the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKenzie).

Some hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. The Chair recognized the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Philbrook).

Mr. Philbrook: Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to be able to speak on Bill C-33, the transportation bill. First of all I should like to compliment the previous speaker, the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall) for his usual very sincere and heartfelt representation on behalf of his area and the people there.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Philbrook: I hope he sees some progress in that area. I am pleased to speak on Bill C-33, an act to amend the Transportation Act, the Department of Transport Act, the Transport Act and the Railway Act. I should like to say, and I hope hon. members opposite will be pleased, that I intend to speak off the cuff and I intend to speak with some feeling because I have very sincere concerns about the state of transportation in our country and the state of our transportation policy at this time.

This bill has three main objectives, Mr. Speaker—first, to define transportation policy, that is, what to do; second, to define or authorize the rearrangement of powers and duties, that is, who is to decide and who is to do it; third, to amend freight rates and other matters, that is, how to do it better.

I can only agree with these general aims. I imagine most reasonable people believe that transportation anywhere, and particularly in this country, is a tough, urgent proposition. A big sprawling country with empty spaces and few people crowded together make for problems. Other speakers have reminded us that one previous minister of transport described the transportation situation in this country as "a mess". He was probably right, although this was often misquoted. It was a reference to the system and not to a sincere and well liked former minister.

The transportation problem has grown like Topsy. We are at the stage now where we have some urgent problems that have to be taken firmly in hand. Even the department is described as huge and sprawling, with a series of competing empires within one department, all in competition with each other. It has been described as a man-eater, and many people say it should be split into several different departments. The question is how to do it and who should do it.

Support for even a reasonable bill like this, a bill which could do some good if carried out well, has to be conditional on some other things—on previous commitments and on the order of business for the government which must be logical, reasonable, and honest. Members like myself support this bill. I certainly would not want to suggest that what the newspaper headlines mention will happen. I do not think there will be a revolt by backbenchers. We, on this side of the House, support our party's leadership. We support the government.

● (2150)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Philbrook: I say that in a general sense. When we come right down to it, our prime duty on particular issues is to support our constituents, and I intend to do it. I have no difficulty at all identifying with the constituents of Halton in their concern about the issue of transportation. My constituents feel strongly about transportation; they need help. Being an urban constituency, or a suburban riding, we need help, particularly in the area of commuter transit.

Mr. Benjamin: Read your election platform.

Mr. Philbrook: I am coming to it. As a private member I shall do all I can to make sure my constituents get that help. In 1974 the Liberal party showed leadership in transportation. I prefer to think of that as a sincere, imaginative effort, Mr. Speaker. That leadership was shown in the 1974 election campaign promises, which I feel must be kept, one way or another.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Philbrook: We have followed up these promises by bringing in the national transportation policy in June, 1975; the rail passenger policy on January 29, 1976; the program to improve inter-city passenger transport by rail, on January 21, 1977; and assistance to provinces and municipalities for urban transit, on January 21, 1977. Clearly we have done all this in an effort to carry out original election promises. They are an indication of the direction in which the government wants the country to go.

In the two and a half year life of the present parliament, what has happened to those exciting and imaginative election promises? I would say, little has happened in commuter transit, and in other areas as well. Toronto has sometimes been labelled Hogtown. Perhaps it deserved the label in the past, for its tendency to take more than its share of wealth. That name does not apply to Halton, lying half way between two great cities, Toronto and Hamilton. Somehow, in the consideration of transport questions areas like mine tend to be overlooked. Nevertheless, I still feel—and perhaps I am biased—that suburban areas still count for a great deal in this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Philbrook: Suburban life is the butt of a good deal of humour. Nevertheless, there are real difficulties connected with suburban living, and most Canadians are forced into that kind of life. Most jobs are in the city, but most of the places where we live are not in the city. Our people live in the suburbs. Mr. Speaker, rush hour traffic is terrible to endure and we must do something about it. The other day I myself was caught in rush hour traffic. Actually I was late for a TV interview on commuter transit and my experience brought the point home to me, especially as I had not undergone such an experience for a number of years.

On paper, the program which the government has put forward looks great. It includes provisions for transit, urban and commuter, for STOL systems for our small, outlying cities; for freight which, God knows, are urgently needed; for western grain, and so on. It could be called the Magna Carta of Canadian transportation. So far as I am concerned the bill is of top priority, for transport in Canada is the glue which holds Canada together, is the lifeblood which nourishes it.

Mr. Benjamin: This bill is going to undo the country.

Mr. Philbrook: We hope not.

The idea underlying the original transportation concept involves more than the mere spending of money, although of course it also involves the spending of money. The concept is in two parts, for besides providing better transportation for Canadians it will also bring industrial benefits. For example, there would be the opportunity to provide more jobs in Canadian industry. GM buses would be built in London, Ontario, and Hawker-Siddeley rail cars in Thunder Bay. The policy would enable us to get in on the ground floor of a home grown, indigenous industry, analagous to the American automobile industry. We missed our opportunity with that industry.

We need more industry in this country and our new transport policy will give us the opportunity to create more Canadian jobs, real manufacturing jobs, and not makeshift jobs like those you get under the LIP program, Canada Works, and so on.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Philbrook: The hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt) spoke on these questions. I agree with what he said. Makeshift jobs are fine for the short term, but they are not our ultimate aim. The creation of more industry and more jobs would also give us greater opportunities for export. We would import less and enjoy a better balance of trade. The policy would lead to a greater use of Canadian national resources in Canada. We should use them here instead of shipping them to other countries which manufacture goods for sale back to us at inflated prices.

The policy will mean greater Canadian control of our own economy, the opportunity for boosting this country's secondary industries, including manufacturing, processing and "value added" items. In other words it will put us right in the ball game, right in line to fulfilling our human and economic values.

This policy offers us the opportunity for more Canadian research, development, and design. It is not merely a money saver and job creator; it is an opportunity to offer our young people more interesting jobs and greater opportunities. Certainly one of the great purposes of this bill, which follows on the election promise, relates to energy conservation and lowering of pollution. We shall conserve energy as we use less the private car and airplane, and rely more on public transportation, particularly trains.

Finally, I suggest that the purpose of this policy goes beyond the provision of transportation. It would provide the general economic stimulus which this country definitely needs.

May I call it ten o'clock and resume tomorrow afternoon, Mr. Speaker?

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

TRANSPORT—ACTION TO IMPROVE PENSIONS OF RAILWAY EMPLOYEES IN VIEW OF HALL REPORT

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, when I posted for tonight's late show my question having to do with the report of railway pensions by Dr. Noel Hall, I assumed that because we were debating Bill C-33 today the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) would be here and prepared to answer my question. Since he is not with us I presume that a parliamentary secretary will answer for him, and I dare to hope that his answer will be even better than the answer we might have got from the minister.

I addressed my first question on this matter to the Minister of Transport on Friday, January 28, as recorded on page 2493. It had to do with the fact that the Hall report on railway pensions had finally been published, and since it virtually threw the question of the improvement of railway pensions back to the companies and to the government, I asked the Minister of Transport if he could tell us what steps the government was going to take to try to improve railway pensions. The Minister of Transport answered that the government would take a hard look at the Hall report.

I then asked the minister if he would do something about the specific recommendation made by Dr. Hall calling for the pensions of CPR employees to be brought up to the level of those of the CNR. That, of course, did not get an answer that day.

● (2200)

I returned to the subject on Wednesday, February 23, as reported in Hansard at page 3338. On the general question, I got the same reply I had received earlier, namely, that the government was not yet in a position to give me an answer as to what it was going to do about the Hall report. His exact words were these:

> We are continuing to look at what is a very complicated matter.

When I asked the Minister of Transport whether he had had any talks with the CPR about the recommendation made in respect of that company's pensions, he said that he wanted to have a position on the whole matter before talking to someone outside the government.

I think it is interesting that Your Honour is the occupant of the chair tonight. With your railway interest, you must have tried to figure out what the Hall report is all about and why we had to wait two years for it to be produced.

In all frankness, I have to say that railway workers and railway pensioners across this country are somewhat disappointed in this report. It contains a great deal of information in terms of facts, figures, and statistics. It is true that Dr. Hall finds railway pensions terribly inadequate, especially in the case of those already retired and who have had little or no indexing of their pensions. Dr. Hall does make the recommendation that the CPR ought to bring the level of its pensions and the level of that company's indexing up to that of the CNR. He proposes a kind of heritage fund to do something about the inadequate funds of all retired railway workers. However, in terms of anything specific, he literally throws the ball back to the companies and the government. Therefore it is appropriate that questions should be asked of the government as to what it is going to do about the whole matter.

As my previous questions of January 28 and February 23 have indicated, I see this under two general headings. One, there is the specific proposal made by Dr. Hall that the CPR should come into line with the CNR. The other aspect is the whole problem of all railway pensions in Canada.

Dr. Hall says there is no question about it, that those already retired are having a rough time because their pensions have not been indexed. He even goes so far as to say in one paragraph of his report that unless private pension plans can do something about keeping pensions up with the cost of living, their days are numbered.

I shall probably have to raise this matter a good many times judging from the length of time it has taken to get any action. My point tonight is to try to get from the parliamentary secretary an indication of what the government is going to do.

Railway workers and retired railway workers are getting a bit cynical. When the Minister of Labour (Mr. Munro) appointed the Hall commission two and a half years ago, they accepted that in good faith. I think the Minister of Labour also acted in good faith. However, when two and a half years later the workers and pensioners are handed a report that really does not recommend anything significant, they wonder if the whole operation has just been another snow job.

The government can set aside that cynicism. The government can answer the charge that it is a snow job by saying it now intends to do something. It is not good enough for the Minister of Transport, on the two occasions I put the question to him, simply to say it is a complicated matter, and that the government will have to take a hard look at it. Pensioners have been waiting a long time for an answer that you, Sir, as a railroad worker, would like to see.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but the time allotted to him has expired.

[Translation]

Mr. Jacques Olivier (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member opposite for raising this matter. Unfortunately he will no doubt agree that this is an issue of such significance that it cannot be comprehensively dealt with in three minutes. He knows that the 277-page report of the industrial board of inquiry on Canadian railway companies pension funds, as submitted by Dr. Noel A. Hall from the University of British Columbia, was published on January 20, 1977 by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Munro).

The report deals at length with Canadian railway pension funds, a complex and difficult matter. Indeed its highly technical nature made it extremely difficult to arrange for its French translation, which accounts for the delay in publication. During his exhaustive enquiry, Dr. Hall reviewed a number of issues connected with railway pensions. Possibly the most urgent that arose in the course of the study was inflation's repercussions on current pension funds. All along his report, Mr. Hall clearly stressed the need to avoid making recommendations when the parties involved are capable of solving issues of problems within the frame work of the established system of free collective bargaining. The improvement of railway pension funds is one of the areas the solution of which is the responsibility of the parties involved, in Dr. Hall's view, through consultations and collective bargaining. Mr. Hall stresses that unions and companies alike have shown they are capable of dealing with most of pension matters.

In the circumstances, it would seem the government should not intervene in areas that would hinder healthy collective bargaining relations. I should refer to the significant improvements made to railway pensions since 1973, when railway pensions became open to collective bargaining for the first time. To help the parties involved solve the highly complex question as to how pensions should be protected against dollar erosion, Dr. Hall assessed a number of methods for ensuring cost of living escalation under railway pension funds.

The choice of a method, however, is left entirely to the parties involved namely labour and management, in order that their pension and other general priorities may be met. In his study Dr. Hall proceeded at length to compare railway pension funds to other systems.

Mr. Speaker, it clearly stands out from that comparison that in many respects railway pension plans can be favourably compared with the best plans in both public and private sectors. However Mr. Hall did make specific recommendations aimed at achieving more uniformity between the provisions of the pensions plans of the two large railway companies. The government agrees with the hon. member of the opposition that it is a desirable goal. As for the fiduciary provisions, the plans were found . . .

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): I regret to inform the parliamentary secretary that his allotted time has expired.

AGRICULTURE—PROVISION OF ADDITIONAL REFRIGERATED RAILWAY CARS FOR TRANSPORTATION OF POTATOES

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, while the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) is not here this evening I presume his parliamentary secretary will be answering this question, I am delighted to see the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Lumley) here, as well as some officials from the Department of Transport still in the gallery, because the matter I have to raise clearly pertains to all three departments. It is not new, but it is of fundamental concern to those who come from the two provinces of New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island.

Perhaps we are fortunate, too, inasmuch as the parliamentary secretary has his roots deep in the province of New Brunswick and I am sure he is very much concerned about the subject I propose to raise, as is his colleague, the hon. member for Madawaska-Victoria (Mr. Corbin), who has also raised this matter in the House from time to time. I am sure he shares the view that something decisive should be done with respect to the railway situation affecting the movement of potatoes from eastern Canada.

While I was reviewing the background to this situation today with citizens of Prince Edward Island, we were shocked to discover that the movement of potatoes by rail from Prince Edward Island has been handled for many years entirely by foreign carriers and that the railroads of this country have never supplied any of the cars which have moved potatoes from the island to the central Canadian markets.

I suppose it is another very clear indication of the kind of long-term discrimination which has existed for eastern Canada that we have had to depend so heavily and totally upon the American railroads to supply us with rolling stock necessary to move our potatoes to market. Perhaps we would have gone along in this dependent state into the indefinite future had it not been for the fact that the Americans decided that it was no longer in their interests to carry on with this particular situation. Over the past few years we have seen a very rapid deterioration both in the quality and number of railroad cars available to move our potatoes to central markets.

I was very much encouraged by the comments of the Minister of Agriculture last fall when he made a commitment on one or two occasions to the effect that he was going to make a recommendation to cabinet with respect to ordering somewhere around 800 to 1,000 of these insulated boxcars. However, what disturbed me, not back on January 26 when the motion was put down for an adjournment debate, was the response of the minister yesterday. In response to my question on whether or not the memorandum was still going forward he said, as reported at page 3464 of Hansard:

—if they would give an absolute assurance—

He is talking about the P.E.I. potato marketing board and the New Brunswick potato growers.

—that they will use these cars and guarantee a certain usage of them—

He went on to include not only the potato growers in the maritimes but the horticultural producers in western Canada, and said he would do something with respect to pursuing the need for more cars. I found this an incredible response, because surely the Minister of Agriculture must know that the absolute decline in the number of rolling stock is exceedingly serious. We have somewhere in the neighbourhood now of 1,000 cars, yet it was only four or five years ago that we were servicing the same situation with 2,500 cars. In fact ten years ago we had well over 4,000 cars.

What the minister was saying was that this year almost all the early orders were going to the export market. So unusually for us, because of the great demand in the European market, many railroad cars sat idle for two months longer than normal before they got rolling some time in December. There was also a change apparently in the United States with respect to the previous per mile charge. They are now renting these cars on a per diem basis, so Canadian National was upset about paying for unused stock.

That the minister would use such an excuse bothered me, because it appears that he may now be prepared to wriggle out or slip away from his earlier commitment, something that I would find both intolerable and unacceptable, and is certainly not in any way dealing with the realities of the situation. In view of the present experience respecting the sale of maritime potatoes to European markets, the minister must know very little about the long-term situation with respect to potato marketing in eastern Canada. Or if he can predict when Europe will be hit with the next drought, I am sure the P.E.I. potato marketing board would be delighted to have him on their staff as a full time weather adviser because that kind of information would be most valuable to them.

I can accept, as I am sure all members can, that there has to be a definite balance between rail and the growing use of highway trailers. Obviously this has not been worked out. But given the existing situation where more of both are desperately needed, surely the minister could get production going now. I say this particularly in view of what has happened with respect to the order for grain cars placed at three plants across Canada, but particularly the one placed at the Trenton Car Works. This was referred to earlier in the House by my colleague from Madawaska. Hawker-Siddeley has called back 630 employees to work on the 688 railroad cars which have been ordered for carrying grain. But this is less than half of their total number of employees and, as they have indicated, they could still very actively use an order of this kind to guarantee further employment for about 400 workers who are still out of work, and for whom a job and a return to employment would offer tremendous incentive, and would deal directly with the very high unemployment situation which exists in the Atlantic provinces.

I hope that the minister's parliamentary secretary tonight can assure us that there is no holding up or fooling around with this situation, because I would remind him that last year the minister asked the eastern potato producers to put their own house in order, especially to have more organized marketing, before he could help them in a substantial way. It would be a poor show on his side of the bargain if, after the spectacular success of the potato producers in the export market in Europe, he would not move immediately to deal with our long-term domestic situation and give us an assurance that we would have these domestic rail cars ordered and in place, or else, quite frankly, we will see the real collapse of the transportation system as it affects both P.E.I. and New Brunswick in terms of servicing the market in the next two or three years.

I know the parliamentary secretary will want to take this question seriously and give that kind of strong assurance to the eastern potato producers.

Mr. Irénée Pelletier (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have this opportunity to respond to the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald) on a question which has been of prime concern, not only to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) but, as the hon. member has said, to several other members of the House for some years, especially members from the Maritime provinces, including the hon. member for Madawaska-Victoria (Mr. Corbin) who has on different occasions, I believe, spoken to the minister on this problem. I have noted the keen interest in this subject which has been indicated by members on both sides of the House.

When it became apparent that there were deficiencies in the transportation system for Maritime potatoes, an interdepartmental committee was established by the government to consider all aspects of this very important question. This committee has made significant progress and has kept ministers advised on their findings as they were developed. However, before committing the government to significant expenditures for the purchase of a fleet of new refrigerated railway cars, we must be certain that this would be the best means of assuring the industry of the most efficient means of transportation in future years. Therefore, the consideration that has been given to this question has involved not only whether additional railway cars may be required but also whether the expenditure of government funds in this area would be of the greatest benefit to Maritime potato producers in the years ahead. I am sure hon. members are aware of the advances offered in transportation by such modes as truck transport and containerization.

It has become clear that not only may there be deficiencies in the equipment presently available for the transportation of potatoes, but a very major problem has been the inefficient use of railway cars which are already available. For instance, it has been estimated that a more orderly system of scheduling cars would serve to reduce greatly the problems which now exist during the peak periods of the shipping season. Also of concern are the storage and loading facilities at the port of Saint John.

It must also be realized that 1976 was a year of good crops and has been most unusual in the export opportunities which have become available to Canadian producers because of the drought experienced last year in Europe. It is unlikely that this volume of exports can be maintained in spite of the efforts of the Potato Exporters' Association in this respect. Therefore it is necessary to assure that railway cars are not purchased solely on the basis of peak demand.

In summary, I would like to assure all hon. members that the government is giving considerable attention to this very important issue and is quite aware of the time constraints which exist.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION—DISMISSAL OF MR. McNUTT, VICE-PRESIDENT OF MAGI—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, I have a question or two further to the question that has been raised in the House by me and other members in recent months with respect to the operation of the so-called MAGI joint federal-provincial equity investment group in the Halifax-Dartmouth area.

• (2220)

What basically prompts me to bring this question out at this time is that MAGI, which started with great hopes and expectations and which is an equity corporation prepared to take certain risks—not necessarily investing in losing ventures but prepared to take equity positions—is a good idea. That is essentially what I am saying. It is a concept we badly need in metropolitan areas such as Halifax and Dartmouth.

It is an idea which got off to a very bad start. From the time it was announced in October, 1972, 38 days before that general election, by the then minister, Mr. Marchand—

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Good timing.

Mr. Forrestall: Great timing—nothing has happened. It was funded with $20 million, as the parliamentary secretary knows. It received no actual cash until sometime in 1975. In the intervening period between 1972 and 1975 there appeared to be a fairly substantial difference of opinion between the federal authority and the provincial authority as to how this would be operated. It was to have control of the appointment of the chief executive officer and of the board of directors.

That was done, MAGI got some money, and the only thing we know it has done to this point has been to invest in a cruise ship which for tax evasion purposes has gone off to the tax haven of the Bahamas for registry purposes, thus avoiding Canadian laws, the Canadian tax situation, and so forth.

The concept is a good one, too good to lose. When I am out making a noise about it, it is not because I want to kill it. Quite the opposite, I want to restore it to some vigorous health so that there can again be a viable instrument for the development of our economic climate in metropolitan areas. What concerns me it that the business community no longer trusts MAGI. It has lost its faith in it. Of the thousands of applications and inquiries made with respect to equity positions we understand that only a handful, perhaps two or three, have been proceeded with by the corporation.

Mr. Scott McNutt was removed from his position and put in charge of the Workmen's Compensation Board. Why? What is going to happen to the chairman and chief executive officer of MAGI, Mr. Haysom, who held a $75,000 a year position?

What happens to MAGI when these people are summarily removed without any reason given publicly? My basic questions arise out of the fact that what does happen, of course, is that there is a loss of confidence, and the business community does not use MAGI. These questions have to be answered, and they have to be viewed in a public forum of some type.

I wonder if the parliamentary secretary could briefly comment on two or three things. First, can he comment on the impact of the minister's visit to Nova Scotia a week or ten days ago? Can he comment on what role the minister played, if any, in the change of the senior executive officer and other changes which seem to be taking place? Indeed some changes have already taken place. Would the minister consider a reference to the Standing Committee on Regional Development of some MAGI matters so that the committee would at least be able to review this matter either publicly or in private? Even if it were done in private, the business community would at least know its elected representatives had an opportunity to review the matter, and if there is cause to go further in the investigation and make it public, that could be done as well. Failing that, would the minister cause himself to become fully informed? He should in a public way reassure members of the House that all is well with MAGI. Failing that, we should be informed if the minister would make a reference to the Standing Committee on Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments in order that we may be satisfied that MAGI is operating in direct response to the statute that was passed.

Going slightly further, I should like to know whether the parliamentary secretary could comment this evening on the proposed expansion of MAGI, and whether the minister intends to introduce amendments which would change the concept of MAGI and permit it to operate in another way. Failing any of those things, would the minister urge upon his counterpart and his colleagues in the province of Nova Scotia the urgency, as he would see it after investigating the situation, for the matter to be referred to a standing committee of that legislature with clear instruction for MAGI to be open and frank—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

Mr. Ed Lumley (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, needless to say we are gratified to hear not only from his comments tonight but from news stories in his riding that the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall) thinks the concept of MAGI is good and that he does not want to lose this type of venture equity.

I am sure that when the standing commitee meets, the hon. member will have an opportunity to question the minister on some of the points he raised tonight particularly as a result of the minister's meeting with the premier of Nova Scotia. Unfortunately I am not aware of the specific details of the minister's meeting with the premier, but it was reported after that meeting that the premier thought the proposed expansion of MAGI to other areas of the province deserved consideration. Based on the hon. member's comments tonight, I am sure that he and his party will endorse such a concept.

As the hon. member indicated, I am advised that Mr. Scott MacNutt has accepted the post of chairman of the Nova Scotia Workmen's Compensation Board and has resigned from the vice-presidency and board of directors of MAGI. As the hon. member was informed in answer to a question he raised two or three weeks ago, it is important to put the role of this government with respect to MAGI into proper perspective. It has a management, a board of directors, and shareholders like any other Corporation. It is intended to function much as an ordinary private corporation, and make profits.

The essential difference with MAGI is that its two shareholders are governments. They are not ordinary shareholders. In this regard the MAGI agreement of September, 1972, is quite specific. The agreement states: "The parties are not to intervene in the day-to-day management of the corporation." The shareholders have been careful in ensuring that this has been observed. The day-to-day decisions are and will continue to be made by the board of directors and by management acting for the board. The shareholders do, however, have a unique responsibility for ensuring that the corporation operates within its mandate, that it is well run, and that it conducts itself in a manner which is proper for a corporation whose shareholders are governments.

It is not the role of the shareholders to examine in detail the individual investment decisions of the corporation and to be involved in day-to-day operations. It is their responsibility to ensure good general management, that MAGI carries out its general mandate, and that the investment policies of MAGI are sound. The House may be sure that the minister will be careful to fulfil this role in his communications with the other shareholders and with the board.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at two o'clock p.m.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.30 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, March 2, 1977

The House met at 2 p.m.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

[English]

FINANCE

REQUEST FOR COMMITTEE STUDY OF CANADA'S INTERNATIONAL RESERVES AND DECLINE OF DOLLAR—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to move a motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Whereas figures released today by the Department of Finance indicate that Canada's foreign reserves have fallen by $573 million since the end of last year, and whereas those same figures indicate that our U.S. dollar reserves have declined by $565 million while the Canadian dollar has fallen to a 95-cent range, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Ritchie):

That this House ask the government to make a reference to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs so that a full review of Canada's activities with respect to its international reserves and the falling dollar may be made.

Mr. Speaker: The provisions of Standing Order 43 require the unanimous consent of the House for the presentation of such a motion. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ATOMIC ENERGY

ELLIOT LAKE, ONT.—HOMES CONTAMINATED BY RADON GAS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I seek leave to move a motion of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the new discovery by the Atomic Energy Control Board that over 260 homes in Elliot Lake are contaminated by radon gas, of which 14 need corrective action to prevent a health hazard to their inhabitants, and in view of the delays by AECB in commencing clean-up operations because of lack of funds, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond (Mr. Hogan):

That the cabinet authorize the expenditure of sufficient funds to clean up the radiation hazard now faced by hundreds of Elliot Lake residents.

Mr. Speaker: The provisions of Standing Order 43 require the unanimous consent of the House for the presentation of such a motion. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

REQUEST THAT GOVERNMENT FURTHER NATIONAL UNITY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Armand Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to ask for the unanimous consent of the House to discuss a motion on an important matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

Considering that the recent statements by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau)—who said that the separation of Quebec would have disastrous effects for the province—are not likely to promote a logical discussion on the advantage Quebec can draw from its presence in Confederation, appealing as they do to feelings like fear and panic, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier):

That the House urge the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) to stop trying to scare Canadians and instead administer the country in such a way that the people of Quebec have the impression that it is really worth being part of Canada.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the terms of the motion of the hon. member. Under the provisions of Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent; therefore the motion cannot be put.

INDUSTRY

SUGGESTED MODIFICATION OF LEGISLATION REGARDING SHOE INDUSTRY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the terms of Standing Order 43, I request the unanimous consent of the House to discuss a very important economic matter.

The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Chrétien) received lately a telegram from the Canadian Association of Footwear Manufacturers in which they say, among other things, that 55 per cent of the Canadian footwear market was being supplied through imports, thus putting on unemployment insurance more than 25,000 workers from one of the oldest Canadian industries.

I move, seconded by the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier):

That the Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs examine this situation as soon as possible in order to amend the Textile and Clothing Board Act so that the footwear industry can be also covered by the board to have quotas imposed upon footwear imports.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Under the terms of Standing Order 43, the motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent; the motion therefore cannot be put.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

ANTI-INFLATION BOARD

BOARD ROLL-BACK RECOMMENDATION RESPECTING MONTREAL FLOUR MILLS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Labour. I wonder if the minister could confirm that he has intervened or intends to intervene with the Anti-Inflation Board to request that the AIB reconsider a roll-back recommendation involving Montreal flour mills; and if he has or intends to, would he explain the specific reasons for this intervention?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I met with the CSN a week or so ago in Montreal. At that time they had drafted a proposal to go to the cabinet for reconsideration, but on reflection they drafted grounds on which they were basing an appeal to the AIB for reconsideration. They asked if I would take those grounds to the Anti-Inflation Board and have the board review them. This I did this morning.

Mr. Clark: Is it the policy of the Minister of Labour, in his capacity as Minister of Labour, to intervene on behalf of aggrieved unions in cases other than this particular one; and if not, will he indicate to the House how he intends to distinguish the precedent he has set this morning from a pattern of intervention in the activities of the AIB?

• (1410)

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, I think an accurate description of the role I played this morning was one of mediation in a labour dispute and people not working. I would advise the Leader of the Official Opposition that not only have employers come to me in my capacity as minister, but unions asking if I would make certain things clear to the AIB and in an unofficial way I have been a channel of communication to the AIB over a protracted period of time. I see nothing inconsistent in that role and the role of Minister of Labour.

Mr. Clark: A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Does the minister see nothing inconsistent in his role as an intervenor and his role as a member of the final appeal authority to which decisions of the AIB have to be appealed? That clearly is a case of conflict of interest, and we want to know whether the minister intends to continue to be both advocate and judge in cases relating to anti-inflation measures.

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): The short answer, Mr. Speaker, is no, depending on the type of interpretation the Leader of the Official Opposition wants to put on the word "intervenor". I see nothing—and I reiterate—inconsistent with my putting certain views of parties who feel they want their position clarified before the board, and letting the board make their decision.

INTERVENTION OF MINISTERS IN DECISIONS OF AIB

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I put a supplementary question to the Prime Minister? Is it the policy of the government that a minister of the Crown who sits as a member of a body which is the final appeal authority from decisions of the Anti-Inflation Board should be acting as an intervenor in the direct way in which the Minister of Labour acted this morning; and does the Prime Minister, if he approves this behaviour by his minister, intend to request that ministers who act in that way will absent themselves from decisions by the cabinet when cabinet acts as the final appeal authority?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I understand the concern of the leader of the opposition. He is raising a really difficult question. I think the relevant words in the answer of the Minister of Labour are that he did not act as an advocate; he acted as one who was conveying information and representation. In this sense I have had to make the same decision myself, Mr. Speaker, and I reached the same conclusion as the Minister of Labour. I have been asked by many people, members of parliament, members of the private sector and, indeed, I have been asked by provincial premiers; incidentally, not of my party—

An hon. Member: There are not many left.

An hon. Member: You are not kidding.

An hon. Member: How many are left—one?

Mr. Epp: Nova Scotia is your western frontier.

Mr. Paproski: It is Wednesday, March 2, and it is Ottawa.

Mr. Trudeau: It is really difficult to follow a train of thought, Mr. Speaker, but I think they get the drift.

Mr. Clark: The Prime Minister has told us that he has been asked to intervene. Has he intervened?

Mr. Trudeau: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, in what cases has the Prime Minister intervened? What were the special circumstances that allowed him to intervene in a case before a tribunal regarding which he is the presiding officer of the appeal board of that tribunal?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I thought I had answered the question by confessing that I had made the same assessment of the situation as the Minister of Labour.

An hon. Member: You made the same mistake.

Mr. Trudeau: Members of the House are free to judge that it is a mistake.

An hon. Member: We did.

Mr. Trudeau: I repeat, I was asked to convey information, not to advocate or plead or even enjoin in any way, but to convey feelings to the AIB and I thought it was within my duty as a member of parliament to do that, particularly when requested by provincial premiers, Mr. Speaker.

FUTURE POSITION OF GOVERNMENT RESPECTING AIB DECISIONS

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is also directed to the right hon. Prime Minister and arises from his answer to the House this afternoon in response to the question of the leader of the opposition. Can we now determine, since the cabinet is the final court of appeal for AIB decisions, that the cabinet gives full approval to any minister who intervenes with the AIB on anyone's behalf, be it management, labour or any other part of the economy? Since the Minister of Labour has set a precedent in this regard, will the cabinet, being the last court of appeal, support such interventions in future no matter where they originate?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, in answering the previous question and this one I am trying too be as candid as possible. I realize that by invoking my own practices perhaps I am sticking my neck out.

Mr. Alexander: Right.

Mr. Trudeau: I don't mind, because I know you guys don't have a very sharp axe.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): We shall see. We will use a club.

An hon. Member: We could use the other end.

Mr. Trudeau: Sure. You know where to put it, too.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: What happened in caucus this morning?

Mr. Paproski: Why don't you straighten your tie, too?

Mr. Trudeau: Of course, I cannot speak for the Minister of Labour. This is the first I have heard of this particular incident. I do not know in what way he talked to the AIB. But I do know that when people asked me to make that kind of representation, I made it very clear that they were asking me to talk to a quasi-judicial tribunal and I would not want to do it in any way that influenced their judgment. Also, I have enough confidence in Mr. Pepin and enough experience with his ability not to be swayed by any intervention, on the basis of the experiences I am referring to, to know that I was perhaps rendering a service to the people who wanted me to make a point, sometimes for political reasons, sometimes for reasons of substance.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: Therefore I did transfer these demands which were made of me to Mr. Pepin.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

COST-SHARING IN MASS TRANSPORTATION SYSTEMS FOR MUNICIPALITIES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I am certainly glad that the Prime Minister made it clear that the Liberals distinguish always between their politics and their substance.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: We can see right through you, too.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, if the claque would be quiet for a minute, perhaps I could ask my question.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Broadbent: Considering that shortly before the election of 1974 the Prime Minister promised the city of Toronto that if the Liberal party were re-elected it would guarantee to the municipalities some $290 million to be spent on mass transportation under specifically allocated cost-sharing programs, and in view of the statement the Minister of Finance recently made in the House, that "the government had reluctantly come to the conclusion that it could not extend financial assistance to municipalities in this field," I ask the Prime Minister if the Minister of Finance stated government policy. If so, does the Prime Minister not believe that this 100 per cent shift in government policy contributes substantially to the feeling of cynicism about politics in this country, regardless of the substance involved?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the leader of the New Democratic Party may not be aware that I answered this particular question about a week ago when I indicated that the matter was still before cabinet.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I think the Prime Minister is referring to his comment as reported on page 3423 of Hansard for February 25. He said:

—the matter of metropolitan urban transportation is before cabinet now.

My question has to do with the specific commitment made in 1974 in which many details were outlined as to how the federal government was to cost-share this important municipal need. I understood, as did several others, that the Minister of Finance said that the government had categorically changed its mind about that specific commitment. Is this the case, or has the government left that specific commitment open for review?

● (1420)

Mr. Trudeau: The latter, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister in that answer has clearly repudiated what the Minister of Finance said in the House. Is the government now reconsidering its 1974 election promise? Will they soon make abundantly clear to the municipalities and the provinces what their intentions are so that they can get on with the very serious and costly job of urban transit planning?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, that was the whole point of my answer last week, that the government was not reconsidering it but that it was considering it.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

POSSIBLE DISPUTE RESPECTING SECTION 2 OF CRIMINAL CODE AS IT APPLIES TO QUEBEC—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Armand Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Justice.

Can the minister tell us if he is aware of the statement of his Quebec counterpart to the effect that the latter intends to challenge the constitutionality of Criminal Code section 2 defining the jurisdiction of the Attorney General of Canada? If so, can he tell us what he intends to do to avoid a distressing constitutional debate on the matter?

[English]

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure that I caught correctly that it was my provincial counterpart in Quebec. If so, I am not aware of any such statement. There is a case in Alberta in which that very same issue has been raised.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary to the minister and I thank him for his answer to my first question.

Can he tell the House whether he is willing to initiate a meeting with the Quebec minister of justice to discuss the matter with a view to determining, as the minister said, whether in fact he is the one who made that statement?

[English]

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, I would be delighted to meet with my counterpart from Quebec if he made such a statement. The view of most of the attorneys general, and we have discussed this on many occasions, is that there is, or should be, no prosecutorial role for the Attorney General of Canada. That is a position I do not accept.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

ATOMIC ENERGY OF CANADA LTD.—AGENCY PAYMENTS TO FOREIGN COMPANIES

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the many requests of the public accounts committee for governmental help in tracing agency payments made by AECL and Italimpianti, AECL's partner in Argentina, and the undertakings by the minister's colleagues, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, the Minister of Finance and the Secretary of State for External Affairs that everything possible was being done, why has no request been conveyed to the government of Italy for assistance when, according to this week's Financial Post, Dr. Nicola Marvelli, the public prosecutor of Genoa, Italy, has completed a comprehensive investigation into Italimpianti's payment in anticipation of a request from Canada but that so far no request has been forthcoming from Canada. Why has no such request for governmental assistance been conveyed by the minister, his department or his government to the government of Italy?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have explained to the hon. member before, and I repeat now, that we will make those requests on the basis of a request from the hon. member, the chairman of the committee. I have a letter, which I believe is dated February 28, in the case of the Italian request. In any event, it was processed yesterday. All previous requests from the hon. member are in work. Whether we have had any replies or not, I am not sure at the moment. I will be glad to make inquiries. The question really is whether we should proceed on our own initiative. I have already explained that to the chairman of the committee. I would think the best procedure to follow is for him, through the committee, to make representations. I undertake, as we have done up until now, to put these forward as quickly as possible.

REQUEST COMMITTEE BE APPRISED OF DETAILS OF AGENCY PAYMENTS

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, I will direct my supplementary question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Mr. Lucien Secouri, the head of Italimpianti—for our purposes, anyway—has spoken to a Canadian journalist in Italy and to others. He has stated that some of the agency payments "found their way back to Argentina". Why was not this information obtained either by the minister or by AECL and conveyed to the committee long before this? Why do we have to rely on the news media to give out this information?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): I am grateful to the hon. member for the information he has conveyed to me and I will make a point of raising this matter with Mr. Secouri. As the hon. member knows, a letter went to Mr. Secouri asking for information.

REQUEST FOR RESULTS OF INVESTIGATION BY SWITZERLAND INTO AECL AGENCY PAYMENT

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): My supplementary is addressed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Is he or his department aware that the regional public prosecutor in Lugano, Switzerland, has opened an official investigation into AECL's $2.4 million payment to Intercontinental General Trading and the role of Italimpianti's Swiss bankers? Has the minister, on behalf of the Canadian government, made a request to the government of Switzerland for the results of that investigation and, if not, will he undertake to do so immediately?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): The first answer is yes, I am aware of it. Indeed, I acknowledge that it is thanks to the information provided to me by the chairman of the public accounts committee, and since that information was contained in his letter to me I have transmitted that letter in total to the Swiss authorities. Whatever information the Swiss authorities have and are prepared to provide, they will presumably make available. But we did put in all of the detail which was in fact in the letter I received from the chairman of the public accounts committee.

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): A supplementary arising out of the same news report. I should like to ask whether the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources has now decided to hold an inquiry to determine why Atomic Energy of Canada paid its half of the $5 million fee without having first obtained evidence that Italimpianti had paid its $2.5 million, in spite of the fact that the president, Lorne Gray, had advised that his board would not approve payment without such evidence?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I am doubtful whether a question of that kind is in order at this point, given the fact that the public accounts committee is dealing specifically with this subject. The hon. member sits on that committee and I am surprised he has not put that question to the officers of the corporation concerned.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): It has been put. Now we are asking the minister.

ATOMIC ENERGY

ELLIOT LAKE, ONT.—REQUEST FOR REPORT ON RADIUM CONTAMINATION OF HOMES

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): My question is addressed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. It relates to the program of retesting for radium contamination at Elliot Lake showing, I believe, about 214 contaminated homes compared to about 60 last year. Could the minister tell the House when he will be in a position to make a report on the most recent findings by way of a statement on motions or the tabling of a report dealing with this retesting program by AECB?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I would like to take advantage of the hon. member's question to provide an answer. I would like to do so right now, but I do not have all the facts before me at the present time. I can assure him there has not been any increase in the number of houses suspected of being radioactive or requiring remedial action. I can assure him also that the clean-up is proceeding. Proposals are being sought right now from engineers for purposes of project management, and I would expect an appointment to be made very shortly. As to the precise number of houses affected, my information is that there has been no increase. If the hon. member has any further questions he wishes to put to me, I would be pleased to try to answer them.

Mr. Jarvis: The minister is likely aware that the United Steelworkers union local in Elliot Lake has called for a public inquiry or public hearings with respect to this situation. Will the minister, on the basis of information he has received to date, tell us if he is seriously considering that request?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, not as far as a full-blown formal inquiry is concerned. But if the hon. member has any information he believes I should have, and which I have not seen, I hope he will put it forward. I am most anxious to provide as much information as possible to the community, to the steelworkers, the union workers and the people of Elliot Lake with respect to the situation and the clean-up. the Atomic Energy Control Board which has been managing the task force clean-up, which involves co-operation on the part of most federal government departments, the Atomic Energy Control Board and provincial government departments, has opened an office in Winnipeg. I expect that particular activity to continue. If there is any further information that we can provide, I will be very pleased to consider it.

● (1430)

RADIOACTIVE CONTAMINATION IN AREAS OF ONTARIO—REQUEST FOR REVIEW OF PROBLEMS BY GOVERNMENT

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Hastings): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Using the guidelines which have produced these results in Elliot Lake, would the minister review the problems in Deloro where a man recently died, in Port Hope where we have had some other problems, and in Bancroft where uranium is now being produced in quantity?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I would be very pleased to review the situation. Again, if the hon. member has any new information that I am not in possession of or which the Atomic Energy Control Board is not in possession of, I would ask him to send it. Quite clearly, this is the kind of situation which is under continuing review. The Atomic Energy Control Board has been very much involved in the clean-up at Deloro. They are very much aware of the situation in Bancroft. They have been involved in the management of the clean-up of the Port Hope radium refining wastes. If there are any new developments which the hon. member knows about which have not been made public, I would ask him to provide the information.

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. With regard to the radon gas radiation in Elliot Lake, a week or so ago the Atomic Energy Control Board stated publicly that it did not have enough funds to carry out a thorough clean-up operation for all the homes affected. I wonder whether the minister can assure the House that adequate funds will be forthcoming for AECB and, if so, when?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I answered a question almost precisely the same as this last week. I indicated that the federal government would be prepared to put up its share, but because of the nature of the radioactivity, of the natural outcropping, we would be looking to the province of Ontario or its agencies to pick up its share.

Mr. Symes: A final supplementary, Mr. Speaker. Since the health of residents is affected here, I think it is crucial that they know when funds will be forthcoming for the clean-up, and that is my question. Can the minister assure us that the funds will be forthcoming immediately, rather than prolonging the delay that has already been experienced?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I do not think the question is whether the funds will be forthcoming, that being the reason for any delay. The most important thing—I have always made this clear—is that the clean-up will continue, and continue regardless of who pays.

[Mr. Gillespie.]

REQUEST FOR PUBLIC INQUIRY INTO USES OF NUCLEAR ENERGY IN CANADA

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Would the minister agree that, given all these new cases which have been reported, and all the widespread confusion about the operation of atomic energy in this country, the time is now ripe for him to accept the recommendation of the leader of the opposition for a public inquiry into the use of nuclear energy in this country?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I received a letter from the leader of the opposition further to the questions that he put to me last week, and he detailed a number of points. I have since replied to him. I believe there may be a role in the form of a parliamentary committee hearing. I suggested to him that the appropriate place to put these questions would be to the standing committee on natural resources which has already received a reference from this House dealing with the whole question of an energy strategy for Canada.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

RENTAL POLICY FOR ARMED FORCES PERMANENT MARRIED QUARTERS

Mr. Hugh A. Anderson (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Defence. The minister advised the House some time ago that he would review the question of rental increases for permanent married quarters. Would the minister state the results of these considerations, and is he in a position to announce what rental policies will apply to members of the armed services; and if no decision has been reached, would he give every consideration to those who serve Canada so ably?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I am unable to give a final report at this time. This is a matter that is under personal attention. We are trying to work out an arrangement, which is in conformity with the present restraints program that we are asking people to observe, which will be satisfactory and acceptable to all members of the armed forces and a fair arrangement altogether. This is a matter that is getting my urgent attention, but it is a question of working out satisfactory rentals which reflect the realities of the day and the needs of the services.

POLYSAR CORPORATION

ALLEGED KICKBACKS—REQUEST FOR DETAILS CONCERNING WESTERN COMPANY

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that testimony in the public accounts committee by Mr. Justice

Aylesworth and Polysar president Ian Rusk supported the allegations made by the then auditor general, Maxwell Henderson, in a 1973 letter to the Prime Minister, and revealed that kickbacks in the form of cash or tax rebates went to a Canadian company based in western Canada, but Polysar officials did not give its name, will the government, as a major stockholder in Polysar, through its control of CDC, instruct Polysar to reveal the full details, including the name of this company, to enable the committee to fulfil its responsibility to parliament by calling relevant witnesses to give that evidence?

An hon. Member: Say yes, you will.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Yes, I will when I know what the question is. I am a little puzzled. The House is asking me to comment on matters that are now before a committee of this House, before that committee has reported to the House. I have not read the record and I obviously have not assisted on the committee. I am told that the committee or some witness was rather critical of Mr. Henderson for his conduct in this whole matter, but I am in no position to judge until I have read the report of the committee, and therefore I will not comment on the proceedings before the committee.

Mr. Towers: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question which I will address to the Minister of National Revenue. As Mr. Justice Aylesworth stated that the size of the rebates went far beyond what could be considered a volume rebate which could have been used to evade taxes and foreign exchange regulations, will the Minister of National Revenue ascertain whether or not the Canadian government has been defrauded?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Revenue): I will certainly make sure of that, Mr. Speaker.

TRANSPORT

DEBT ON ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY SYSTEM—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT OF GOVERNMENT POLICY

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, I have a question that I should like to direct to the Minister of Transport. Can the minister indicate to the House whether he will later on this afternoon call a press conference for the purpose of advising the government's position with respect to the eradication or wiping out of the $840 million-odd debt on the St. Lawrence Seaway system and in regard to the doubling of the existing tolls for the 1978 shipping season? If so, I wonder whether he would indicate why he feels that the House of Commons, on motions, would not have been a good place to make such an announcement?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I will be making an announcement later today about the intentions of the government with regard to the existing debt and accrued interest in relation to the Seaway, and also describing the nature of the discussions that we are having with the United States in connection with Seaway tolls. As for the question about where to make the announcement, there are so many matters involving transportation which are happening all the time in such an action-filled area that I would be making statements every hour of the day.

Mr. Forrestall: I wonder whether I might direct a supplementary question to the minister. I see he is smiling. When one wipes out $1 billion and has something to do with the area that suffers as a result, one wants clearly to understand the situation. Is it the position of this government that the debt will be completely removed and that there will be a provision to accommodate the debt, which is about $642 million, plus $200 million interest on the debt; or is this a position from which we will enter into further bilateral discussions with the United States respecting the future tolls situations. In other words, are we acting unilaterally in this matter, is it a firm position, or is it a position from which we will go forward and have further discussions with the United States?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, as far as the debt is concerned, there are two parts to the debt, the accrued interest which it is not intended to treat as a current liability and in due course to remove, and the balance of the debt, the initial construction cost, which it is intended to convert into equity. In that sense, we would wipe it out, but that is hardly a wiping out in the literal sense. It is our objective to have a Seaway tolls structure which covers operating and maintenance costs and, in addition, provides at the present time a very small extra amount such as, for instance, a 1 per cent return on the equity.

Mr. Forrestall: I have a final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate your accommodation, because this is a matter involving $1 billion. I wonder if the minister would undertake to do one of two things, either to have some reference of this matter, beyond the scope of the estimates now before the standing committee, to the standing committee or, short of that, table in the House the documents which would give us a better understanding of the internal pressures that this will have on the direction of the movement of grain, the degree to which it will force grains through the west coast ports which will reach Vancouver when we are not physically geared for it—in short, the studies which have led to the obvious and firm position the government has taken on this matter.

Mr. Lang: Simultaneous with the timing of the press conference, which is called for 3.30 this afternoon, I have given instructions to have delivered to all members of the House of Commons information on the nature of the steps being proposed, discussions which are under way, and also some background information such as the hon. member requests in relation to the impact of toll changes upon goods moving through the Seaway, and relativities between tolls as they are proposed and as they have been over the last 20 years.

Oral Questions

SHORTAGE OF VETERINARIANS—GOVERNMENT STEPS TO ALLEVIATE—NEW VETERINARIAN COLLEGE

Mr. Gus Mitges (Grey-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the fact that the latest information indicates that the health of animals branch of Agriculture Canada is still short some 144 veterinarians, have the minister and his department undertaken any active program to recruit veterinarians to fill these vacancies, because although the reputation of the department is impeccable, the morale on the whole could stand improvement and one concrete way to improve it would be to relieve the work load?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, it may sound insignificant, but I know we hired an extra one yesterday.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Whelan: We are trying to do our very best to find qualified veterinarians to fill the vacancies at present, and I am doing everything, even to going to Treasury Board for more money to fulfil this most important obligation we have to that part of society.

Mr. Mitges: Can the minister tell us whether a decision has now been made to build the new veterinary college and, if so, can the minister tell us where the college will be built?

Mr. Whelan: The independent committee has recommended that the college be built in Charlottetown, but that was with the understanding that the four provincial premiers in the east would agree. If I remember the minutes correctly, the premier of Nova Scotia thinks it should be located there, so they do not have full agreement.

TRANSPORT

DISTRIBUTION OF GOVERNMENT FUNDS FOR NEW TRANSPORTATION POLICY

Mr. Fred McCain (Carleton-Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. I would like to ask the minister if his policy is now an over-all policy, and will he extend the same largesse of government funds and forgiveness to other facilities owned by the Department of Transport directly or indirectly which have had trouble to make ends meet on a revenue basis?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I will simply take note of the description of the policy involved here and the hon. member's word "largesse", and frame it and send it to some of his colleagues from other parts of the country but sitting on the same side of the House with him.

[Mr. Lang.]

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY—CONVERSION OF PART OF DEBT INTO EQUITY—EFFECT ON CANADIAN OWNERSHIP

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, arising out of the statement by the Minister of Transport that part of this debt was being cancelled by simply being converted into equity, I should like to ask the minister whether the ownership by the government of Canada in this obvious institution is thereby going to be increased, or is this a mere kind of accounting sophistry for which one could go to jail if it were not the government doing it?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, rather than sophistry, it faces up to the real issue which his predecessor, as leader of the Conservative party, ignored completely and was a legal obligation to deal squarely and according to the law with the debt and equity structure or debt and infrastructure of the Seaway. It is quite plainly depicting the picture accurately. It is, in our view, absolutely ridiculous to carry an item as a debt, drawing interest, and then be in no position to claim or pay or even seek payment of that interest. Instead, therefore, we will very plainly and openly say that instead of treating that as a debt, it will be treated as equity. We will, therefore, measure what it is in terms of a return on investment, we will set a target, and that we will then receive. We are targeting, at this point, a 1 per cent return on that equity. I would like the hon. member and other hon. members opposite to get together with the hon. member for Carleton-Charlotte on the one hand, and the hon. member for Crowfoot on the other hand, to tell me whether 1 per cent is too high or too low.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: I ask the Minister of Transport simply whether he will openly say, as he seemed to be doing lately, that he was cancelling the debt, or whether he is going to do what he seemed to be doing previously, that is, trying to hide behind the operation through some kind of manipulative conversion into equity when the government of Canada now owns the whole thing anyway?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, with respect, I would say that I was trying to be very careful and accurate with the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East in that I said that if he wanted to call that action a cancelling of a debt, he could do so. However, it was being carried as equity on the books and would return a certain amount on that equity, which we are saying now is 1 per cent. As I said, if we said more than that I know that many hon. members opposite, particularly from the west and central parts of the country, would say that that would be unfair and an unnecessary imposition on the people in that region. It is, in fact, a modest return of course, but it is also necessary to recognize that when in transportation policies we are trying to move from the present position to an ideal one—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lang: —the transformation, the impact, the resulting correction in the conduct of a lot of people is so great, because of the failure of many in the past to face up strongly to the political issues involved, that it will take many years and we will have to proceed slowly, rather than attempting to make the transformation to the ideal forthwith.

AIR PASSENGER SERVICE IN ATLANTIC AREA—REQUEST FOR EARLY IMPLEMENTATION OF POLICY

Mr. Maurice Harquail (Restigouche): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. It has to do with the air passenger service in Atlantic Canada. Following the minister's meeting with the council of maritime premiers, can the minister inform the House what specific plans there are for early implementation of the air passenger service for the citizens of Atlantic Canada?

An hon. Member: An excellent question.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the question of air travel did arise only briefly in the discussions which I had with the Atlantic premiers. The discussion concentrated on a couple of fairly urgent railway and highway matters. Therefore, no definite decision was taken about further action in relation to air services.

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY—GOVERNMENT TREATMENT OF DEBT

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have two questions. I should like to direct the first one to the Minister of Transport. I appreciate the fact that he makes many announcements and that he cannot make statements in the House on every one of them. In view of the fact that the announcement he made yesterday and the one the made today involve well in excess of $1 billion of public funding as well as decisions on user charges, does he not consider it important and serious enough to warrant making a statement on motions in parliament and presenting the case to parliament before he does it at a press conference?

• (1450)

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure whether that question is hypothetical or philosophical, but it would take a long time to answer.

STATEMENT OF POLICY MADE BY MINISTER OUTSIDE HOUSE

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. The Minister of Transport made a major announcement of government action in Vancouver yesterday regarding the Via Rail Passenger Corporation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Benjamin: The minister's excuse was that no statement on motions could be made because he was in Vancouver. Today he is in Ottawa. Will the Prime Minister instruct the Minister of Transport to make a statement on motions in this House on a matter involving over $800 million of St. Lawrence Seaway debt, and the doubling of the St. Lawrence Seaway tolls, which is of sufficient importance for the minister to make a statement in the House, and to cease his contemptuous treatment of parliament and the arrogant manner in which he treats this chamber? He should make his announcement in the proper place and at the proper time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, like other ministers in the House, the Minister of Transport has about an hour every day to answer questions, and I think that with a little bit of ingenuity the hon. member could get the information he wants, but—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Benjamin: Mr. Speaker, I would like to inform the Prime Minister that we have yet to get a word from the minister—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

AIRPORTS

REQUEST FOR INQUIRY INTO AIRCRAFT CRASH AT SUGLUK, NORTHERN QUEBEC, AND IMPROVED SAFETY REGULATIONS

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport.

My question deals with the recent crash of a DC-3 at Sugluk in northern Quebec. Can he tell us whether he has ordered an inquiry into that accident which cost four lives, and can he also tell the House whether prior to it, he had received complaints about the shortage of equipment necessary to ensure proper operations at the Sugluk airport, and whether he intends to hold an inquiry, at the same time, on all the other airports in northern Quebec?

[English]

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I have not yet had a report on the circumstances or any possible complaints in connection with this matter. I can tell the hon. member, however, that our airport construction program is going forward in the area concerned. During the course of last summer we purchased the necessary equipment for airport construction throughout the northern Quebec region. Meetings were held in the region about the priorities and airport needs of Sugluk. They were put in the second category, and that will be the second airport of eleven being constructed under this new construction program.

Oral Questions

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

PRIME MINISTER'S DISCUSSION ON HUMAN RIGHTS WITH PRESIDENT CARTER

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister and it is with respect to the meetings he had last week with President Carter. I believe that during the course of conversations President Carter raised the matter of human rights with the Prime Minister, and specifically the question of his letter to a Soviet dissident, and he looked forward to the Prime Minister's response. Did the Prime Minister indicate to President Carter his agreement with the initiative of the President and his support for this, or did he offer any indication of what his action, as the head of the Canadian government, affecting human rights might be?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker, the question of human rights was discussed at some length between us, and when the President discussed his approach to this problem I congratulated him and indicated I was somewhat envious of his ability to get results by speaking directly. I told him that in the past we had used something called a more diplomatic approach and that we had some success with that approach, but that perhaps the more direct approach would be more successful and I was anxious to compare results with him. We agreed that before the Belgrade conference reviewing the Helsinki conference we would, through our officials, indirectly attempt to assess which is the more effective approach, the direct approach or the diplomatic representation approach.

However, I repeat that I think it is more satisfactory, from the point of view of the particular country which has a grievance, to say so out loud and very clearly. It is much more rewarding in terms of self-satisfaction. But the question of whether it produces better results is one which we will attempt to assess together.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): With respect to President Carter's comments later in the week stating that he was not limiting his concern about human rights only to the Soviet Union and other communist countries with respect to the action followed by Secretary Vance to announce the Carter administration decision to cut foreign aid commitments to Argentina, Uruguay and Ethiopia, a precedent-setting administrative decision, is the Prime Minister aware of this move by the American administration, perhaps from his talks with President Carter, and is consideration being given to similar Canadian initiatives to reduce our economic support for countries which consistently and in a gross way violate human rights?

Mr. Trudeau: I do remember this question being commented on by the previous secretary of state for external affairs. I think it is fair to say that until now we have not made it a condition of our assistance to starving people in the third world that their governments be above reproach.

Miss MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): What is Argentina?

[Mr. Lang.]

Mr. Trudeau: That has been our general approach. I am interested in what the hon. member says about the new approach of Secretary Vance and I will be looking forward to seeing how many non-democratic countries they will be aiding through their aid program, if indeed the hon. member has the message right.

MANPOWER

ACCESS OF TOBACCO FARMERS TO OFFSHORE LABOUR

Mr. William Knowles (Norfolk-Haldimand): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration arising out of an exchange on Monday of this week. I asked him a two part question and he neglected to respond to one part. I would like again to ask the minister if he can assure us that tobacco farmers will be given the same access to offshore labour as farmers of other crops.

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, in keeping with our agreement with the province of Ontario, I wrote to the provincial minister of labour stating our suggestions and recommendations about the conduct of the offshore labour situation this year, and until I receive an answer from her I would prefer not to comment.

FISHERIES

ALLEGED DUMPING OF PART OF SOVIET CATCH—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries. In view of a recent news report which quotes a Soviet sea captain, who received the Lenin Order for serving 16 years in the Soviet trawler fleet, stating that only one-third of the Soviet fishing catch of 13 million tons reaches consumers, while the rest is dumped into the sea or destroyed, I would like to ask the minister whether he is aware of this fact and, if so, have he or his officials discussed this matter with Russian officials whose fishermen are required to land so many pounds of fish, according to the established state plan, whether they are adult, half grown or fish from spawning stock? Also, will this problem be taken under consideration when next year's quotas are set some time this month, as I understand it, for fishing within our 200-mile zone?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, the quotas for 1978 are not to be set this month. Second, if the allegations reported by the hon. member are accurate, they are certainly a direct contradiction of everything I was told and shown when I went to the Soviet Union.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): What is surprising about that?

Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): If anything, I was impressed by the utilization Soviet processors made of their fish, contrary to some of our own wasteful practices.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

REPORTED INEFFECTIVE SURVEILLANCE OF THERAPEUTIC ABORTIONS—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO CORRECT

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice and it has to do with the Badgley Report on abortion. Inasmuch as the Badgley report emphasized that the management and surveillance of therapeutic abortion procedures in hospitals has been ineffective and has lacked direction, what instructions has the minister given the provinces with regard to monitoring the work of abortion committees to ensure that there is an even application of the law which specifies that abortions are permitted for health reasons and not for economic and social reasons, and would he table in the House the instructions he has given to the provinces.

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I trust that the hon. member appreciates that I am not in a position to instruct the provinces. That is a matter for provincial ministers of health. I made it clear the day that the Badgley committee report was published that following an opportunity by provincial governments and provincial ministers of health to study the report, my colleague the Minister of National Health and Welfare and I, either directly or through our officials, would be meeting with provincial health officials.

● (1500)

Mr. Friesen: Mr. Speaker, the minister has made several statements outside the House that he has no intention of taking the subject of abortion outside the Criminal Code. Would the minister make that statement inside the House?

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member would read Hansard he would see my previous answers.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence) on a question of privilege.

Mr. Lawrence: Mr. Speaker, I have a short question of privilege about the growing tendency of the ministry either to evade or not give factual answers to questions put on the order paper, and I seek your assistance and help. On November 18 I put two relatively simple questions on the order paper, to the minister—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. When questions on the order paper are called I will hear the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence) on that point. The hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent) on a question of privilege.

PRIVILEGE

MR. BROADBENT—FAILURE OF MINISTER OF TRANSPORT TO MAKE POLICY STATEMENTS IN HOUSE OF COMMONS

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege, and do not do so lightly, and do not do so in this House at all frequently. It pertains to what has become the persistent practice of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) to ignore his serious responsibilities to the House of Commons and, therefore, directly to the people of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: Members of this House do not object if ministers make statements outside the House infrequently on minor matters of policy, but when a minister of the Crown, twice within a period of 72 hours, deliberately ignores parliament—I will explain why I say he deliberately ignores parliament and make that point clear in a second—when he made a major statement in British Columbia, 48 hours ago, on transportation policy concerning passenger services primarily, and this afternoon he is scheduled, not in another province or at a distance but in Ottawa, to have a press conference at which he is going to announce another major policy decision of the government of Canada, then we object. This time it affects another significant part of our transportation system, and in both cases hundreds of millions of dollars of taxpayers' money are involved.

In both cases major policy alternatives have presumably been considered by the government and normally would be commented upon by opposition parties on this side of the House. Therefore I say that the minister is systematically avoiding his responsibilities to the House—two days ago in Vancouver and today in Ottawa—by making announcements of government policy outside the House.

What can be the reason for this, Mr. Speaker? The only reason is that the minister is trying to manipulate the news media; the only reason is that the minister knows that if he makes a statement on policy outside the House of Commons he is directly accountable to no one and he is not questioned here in the House.

The reply by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) to a question near the end of the question period, in which it was seriously suggested that the Prime Minister exercise his responsibility by directing the Minister of Transport to make his 3.30 p.m. announcement here in the House instead of across the street was, to put it mildly, deplorable.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: The Prime Minister said to a member that if he exercised a little ingenuity he might have been able to get the question out that he wanted to ask.

How can a member on this side of the House—or as happens from time to time a backbencher on the other side of the House—ask a serious question about a complex matter when the details have not been presented in the House?

Mr. MacEachen: Tomorrow.

Mr. Broadbent: The reply of the Prime Minister was at best disingenuous and, at worst, a contempt of parliament.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, if you rule that I have a prima facie case of privilege I will move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That the failure of the Minister of Transport to make important announcements concerning national transportation policy in the House of Commons be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the rules are clear that there is a good deal of discretion in deciding what statements of a policy nature are to be made in the House and thereby interrupt the regular and very important legislative business of the House—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lang: —to which we do not devote enough attention, and certainly because of the opposition not enough effective attention. It is that discretion which rests with the minister. In this particular case hon. members obviously paid no attention, or remember very little of what was said in this House in terms of policy statements. The announcement of our intention to set up a special corporation for railway passenger services was announced in this House in a policy statement made in January, 1976.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lang: That statement clearly laid out the two possible routes we would take in attempting to put that corporation in place, and the announcement was made on Monday when I was in Vancouver at a transportation seminar—and therefore I think in a very appropriate place to make the statement about passenger travel. I believe statements in the west and statements in the Atlantic region are important too.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lang: If the hon. leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent) looks at the January statement he will find it contained quite a number of elements on which specific action will be taken. It would not be my intention in regard to the others either to be back here at the time when tenders were called for those trains that we referred to as wanting to purchase, when the tenders are in and offers accepted. These will not be made in the House. They are ongoing matters which happened in that case to be reflected in a policy statement which was made in this House.

As far as the Seaway question is concerned, what I will be announcing today is what the intention of government policy is in relation to these matters. They will come before the House in appropriate ways for legislative action. If this House would spend some time on legislation instead of playing the games that the opposition delight in playing—

An hon. Member: Who is playing games?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lang: —then we would have more legislative action and not have to depend on executive action. In fact, the question of the Seaway to which I am referring this afternoon will be before the House in the form of an item in the estimates where, of course, it will be open to the House to discuss it in full.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I listened to what the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) used as an excuse for running around the rule changes that were made and agreed to by all parties in this House in regard to statements by ministers. The minister himself said that he made a statement that there were one or two possible alternatives that he had spoken about in January. If the government has made a fundamental choice then it should announce it in this House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): The second matter which he and all ministers should know is the philosophy behind the rule changes which deal with the question of statements by ministers in this House of Commons. What happened? The fact of the matter is that there had been a steadying increase in the tendency of ministers to make important public announcements on changes of policy or what have you outside the House.

After a long period of study the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization decided to make some changes because at least that committee recognized the importance of the House of Commons in terms of public announcements—much more important that the ill-defined and ill-directed discretion of ministers like the Minister of Transport. They provided a procedure whereby a minister would make his important statements in the House. Surely if it is important enough to set up a meeting outside this House at 3.30 this afternoon, and at a meeting the day before yesterday in a distant place, it is equally valid to say that the statement is important enough to be made in this place.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): The committee provided as well for the attendance of members of this House who are interested in the various subject matters covered by ministerial statements. It is the responsibility of members, on behalf of their constituents and in line with their responsibilities in parliament and as members of committees, to answer the minister, perhaps suggest alternatives, comment, and set forth other positions. It is important that they have the right to question.

● (1510)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): And the Prime Minister's suggestion is ridiculous. Why should we have to second guess and do a lot of other similar things about important questions?

I raised this question before with respect to a statement made by the minister outside the House involving a wheat sale to China. I objected and then the minister said this was an ongoing matter. I suppose, on reflection, he was right. But I suggest that he has brought forward this time some highly questionable changes which will affect the entire transport system of this country, which will affect transport by rail and by sea. One cannot say that this question is not fundamental, and it ought not to be regarded in the same way as a wheat sale to China.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I suggest that the Leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent) has brought forward a valid question of privilege and I hope Your Honour will accept it as such. It is an important point, particularly important now when members of the government are prepared to talk about parliament being televised. I suggest that they should talk in parliament before there is television coverage of our proceedings.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Otherwise government members, supported by the Prime Minister, would really be riding roughshod over the spirit of the rule changes which were introduced in this House after a great deal of debate. I commend the leader of the NDP for bringing the motion forward. We support it, and hope the Chair will support it as well.

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, if I may comment on what the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) said with respect to the question of privilege raised by the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent), may I say that I would narrow the question down even more, to that of the opportunity of members of parliament to question in a meaningful way the minister, question the policy, and question the full impact of the announcement he is about to make this afternoon.

I have examined the legislative program for the balance of this week and note that the matter now before the House has no relationship at all to the announcement which is about to be made. Later, when estimates are examined before standing committees, there will be an opportunity indirectly to question Seaway authority officials with respect to their operations for the coming year. The announcement being made is not relevant to his year at all. Rather, it would be more applicable to operations in 1978 and beyond.

I suggest to you, Sir, you who are our senior officer, that our privileges have indeed been called into question, have indeed been impaired when announcements have been outside the House. Such a course deprives those of us with constituency responsibilities and a continuing interest in significant matters about to be raised of the opportunity to question as soon as possible the policy decision.

A policy decision of substance is to be announced this afternoon. It will not have the benefit of opposition comment, at least not for possibly five or six weeks, by which time the matter will have passed from the minds of the general public. We therefore would be remiss in our responsibilities to the public if we did not ask questions, if we did not try to sort out what is intended. In view of all this I suggest that my privileges have been affected seriously, and I hope Your Honour will give serious consideration to the motion presently before the House.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like, in a moment, to address myself to what I realize is your problem, namely, what to do with the motion presented by the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent). Before I do that may I underline what already has been said.

It seems to me that when we re-wrote the rules of the House, particularly with respect to the making of statements by ministers, we put this phase of our procedure in a special category. I completely agree with the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) that there is a difference from what used to be the case, precisely because we have in our Standing Orders now a provision which permits opposition spokesmen to comment on statements made in the House by ministers. I would argue that since this is written into the rule book—and it is an interesting rule in the sense that there is a whole paragraph of explanation and not just a heading—it is implied that this is the place where ministers ought to make important statements.

All of us recognize that governments must make many routine announcements. Most of them are made by way of press releases, and not even by way of formal statements outside the House. But surely it is in keeping with the way we drew the rules that important statements of policy should be made here, in the House of Commons.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The place to make such statements is in this House, so that spokesmen for each opposition party may comment thereon, and also so that members may question the minister.

The minister says that this matter is to be covered in an item in the supplementary estimates which will be tabled later today. It is interesting to have that leak as to what is to be in the supplementary estimates. However, the estimate for this item will not have a statement attached to it. It will have a line or paragraph devoted to it, and a sum of money set down, but there will be no explanation which will let us know what it is all about.

I also point out that those supplementary estimates will not be discussed on the floor of the House of Commons. The motion for the reference of all supplementary estimates to standing committees has already been supplied to us, although we do not yet have a copy of the supplementary estimates. Therefore the suggestion the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) makes, that there is some sort of opportunity for discussion, is completely wide of the mark.

To suggest, as the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) did, that members can get at this sort of thing by asking questions ignores the fact that we do not yet have the statement before us. In order to ask pertinent and intelligent questions, surely we need to know what the proposal is which the government is to make. I therefore suggest, on all counts, that important announcements such as the one the Minister of Transport made in Vancouver, and such as the one he proposes to make across the street this afternoon, ought to be made here, in the House of Commons.

Now I come to the problem that arises in these circumstances, the problem with which Your Honour must deal. As the First Commoner among us, you have many privileges and a great deal of authority, but one authority Your Honour does not have is that of compelling a minister to make a statement, or of compelling anyone to say anything. If it appears that that is what we are asking you to do, if it were a case of our asking you to rule that the Minister of Transport must rise and make a statement, you would say of course that you do not have that authority. That is why I emphasize the words of the motion proposed by the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby.

He does not ask you to rule that the Minister of Transport must get up and say something in the House, today. He asks Your Honour to agree that there is a prima facie case of privilege for our contention that, given the way the Minister of Transport is handling important announcements concerning national transportation policy, the matter ought to be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

● (1520)

In other words, whether the Minister of Transport is insulting parliament and doing all the things we think he is doing is not something on which we ask Your Honour to rule. We are prepared to let the House take that decision on the basis of a study of the matter in committee. I underline the fact that that is what is before the Chair this afternoon. It is not a request or a demand that you force the Minister of Transport to speak, but a request that you recognize the prima facie case that we have for feeling we have been insulted or offended and, therefore, that the action or inaction of the Minister of Transport on the floor of parliament ought to be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

I hope, therefore, that you will find that in those terms the question of privilege which my leader raised is a prima facie one and that you will permit the presenting to the House of the motion he has offered to move.

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I would like to add my brief comments to those that have been made on this question of privilege. In my view the insulting manner in which we have been treated on two occasions in the last 72 hours is a great deception.

I became a member of this House having served in two very distinct ways, thinking I was doing a service to my country. I thought there was another way. I thought I would find here a meaningful forum for the consideration of national matters. I find instead, and this needs to be underlined, that this government and the ministers of this government have decided to treat this House with absolute disdain and contempt. I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, and through you to the members of the government that perhaps this is one of the reasons, a reason about which we all feel very deeply, we have the situation there is today in the province of Quebec and in the rest of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Frank Maine (Wellington): Mr. Speaker, there are two sides to any question. I would also like to see some of these statements of ministers made in the House. However, we should look into the whole problem of the responsibility of this House with regard to utilization of time.

The opposition are the architects of their own demise when they irresponsibly use the time of this House for a filibuster, as did the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez) recently. Because of situations like that we are getting no work through the House. The government has the responsibility to get legislation through this House. We must make the best utilization of time. We must therefore look at the proper form and the rules of this House in order that we will have a more responsible use of the time of this House, rather than the lengthy speeches with so little content that we so often have.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent) has raised, by way of a question of privilege, the failure of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) to make important announcements concerning national transportation policy in the House of Commons. He has asked that if the Chair finds a case has been established that the question be put to the House as to whether that failure ought to form the substance of a motion of referral of the failure to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

It has been clear, and the hon. member clearly understood and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) just pointed out, that there is a total absence of authority to be enforced by the Chair, or in the regulations of the House, to compel the minister to make a statement, just as there is a total absence of authority to compel an answer to be given by a minister during question period for the reason that the satisfaction of that kind of compulsory order would be most difficult to define and describe.

However, the question that is before me now is not whether it is preferable that the minister make such a statement or statements in the House, or preferable that parliament be given priority in respect to the making of these statements over press conferences.

The question before me is whether or not, within the definition of questions of privilege, the failure of a minister, either now or at any time, or the action of a minister in choosing to make a statement outside the House instead of inside the House, can ever constitute a question of privilege within the definition as we know it.

There is a tendency to refer to the establishment of a prima facie case of privilege. With respect, I think that that language is slightly misleading. What really is being sought is the action of the Chair in agreeing to withhold the putting of other questions or taking of other business in order to put the question which is moved, or which would be moved, as a priority matter, giving it that special priority because it relates to the privileges, either individually or collectively, of members of this House. Therefore the question for the Chair is: does this question so fundamentally relate to the privileges of the members of the House, within the definition of privilege as we know it, that it ought to enjoy immediate priority and that the Chair ought to put the question forthwith for a decision by the House?

The precedents are directly against that in respect to the actions of ministers in choosing, as they are of course entitled to do at any time. It is not appropriate for the Chair to make any comment on whether that is preferable. The only question is whether the minister has a discretion to choose to make statements outside or inside the House.

Not only is it clear that any minister would enjoy that discretion, in fact the language of the Standing Order says particularly that, when the procedures of the Standing Order are to be taken advantage of, a minister of the Crown may make a statement inside the House. That is the language that is used. His discretion, therefore, is not only, as always, to take whatever action he wants outside the House; the discretion even is one of an option for the minister to use the House for that purpose.

There is no need to repeat the language of the precedents. We did that when the matter has been raised previously. The language of the precedents is very clear. Nothing in the Standing Orders in any way interferes with the minister's discretion. The point, I think, has been fully amplified. It has been well and thoroughly discussed. It does not in any way change the precedent.

I should add one other matter. Although it does not constitute a question of privilege and therefore enjoy priority, that is not to say that the motion cannot be put forward in other ways, this or any other motion criticizing any act of a member.

Sometimes when such motions do not qualify within the four corners of a question of privilege, there is a tendency to believe the House is rejecting them out of hand. That is not the case. There are other ways of bringing motions before the House. A question of privilege gives a motion very special priority and, therefore, is defined within very narrow limits. Within those narrow limits I must find that the conditions of privilege have not been met in this particular instance.

TABLING OF DOCUMENTS

RULING BY MR. SPEAKER

Mr. Speaker: Before moving to the presentation of reports, I should indicate that two days ago the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies) raised a point of order as to whether, during the question period on that day, in using the following language the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) had referred to or cited a document in such a way as to be compelled by the precedents to table the document. The answer of the Minister of Finance to the question of the hon. member for Don Valley appears at page 3460 of Hansard and reads as follows:

> Mr. Speaker, as I have indicated previously to the House and outside the House, we now have under way a process of discussion with the provincial governments and with other major economic decision makers on a possible date for the termination of the controls. I should say that, more than a possible date, it is a range of dates and an analysis lying behind each of them. The documents or statements referred to over the week end appear to have been taken from some of the working papers that have been under discussion with the provincial governments. As I said, those papers indicated a range of possible dates commencing next October 14 and running into the next year for the possible termination of controls. No decision on this point has been taken by the government as yet. We have not had a full and definitive response from the provincial governments as yet.

The precedents to be referred to, as to whether or not that constitutes a sufficient quoting or citing of a document to demand the tabling of it, are clearly recorded at page 2441 of Hansard for January 27 of this year. Again I would refer to the very clear and explicit language used by my predecessor, which is always of great assistance:

> In fairness, looking at the matter as objectively as I can, I do not see how it is possible for the Chair to make a ruling at this point that a document which has simply been referred to but has not been directly quoted should be tabled in debate.

That language is quite explicit, and in the circumstances I cannot find that the hon. member for Don Valley has a valid point of order which would compel the tabling of the document.

TV AND RADIO BROADCASTING OF PARLIAMENT

First Report of the Special Committee on TV and Radio Broadcasting of Proceedings of the House and its Committees—Mr. Speaker.

Estimates

[Editor's note: For text of above report, see today's Votes and Proceedings.]

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, if the House would give its consent I would move concurrence in the report to which you have referred, later this day. I understand there has been the usual consultation between House leaders and that there is agreement that there will be no debate with respect to the report.

Mr. Speaker: Unanimous consent will be sought when motions are called.

Mr. Lawrence: It should be read.

[Later:]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. parliamentary secretary has given an indication that he would seek unanimous consent at this time, on motions, to move a motion on concurrence in the committee's report. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent.

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (D), 1976-1977

A message from His Excellency the Governor General transmitting Supplementary Estimates (D) for the financial year ending March 31, 1977, was presented by Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board) and read by Mr. Speaker to the House.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Orders 58(15) and 59(1), I move that the Supplementary Estimates (D), 1976-1977, tabled this day, be referred to the several standing committees of the House as follows—

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman has been kind enough to supply me with a list of the references to committees of particular estimates. I have had an opportunity to go over them and they are, I think, quite satisfactory. We could dispense with the reading of the list and it could appear as part of the record of the day as though it had been read.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Does the House agree then that the motion will be handled in the usual way and that the text of the motion which has been provided to the parties be printed as though read?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Mr. Speaker.]

[Editor's note: The motion above referred to is as follows:]

That the Supplementary Estimates (D), 1976-1977, tabled this day, be referred to the several Standing Committees of the House as follows:

HOUSE OF COMMONS

MOTION TO ADJOURN

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, in view of the refusal of the minister to make a statement in this House on an important matter, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters):

That this House do now adjourn.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Call in the press gallery!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Speaker: Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion (Mr. Benjamin) which was negatived on the following division:

TENDERS FOR RIFLE RANGE/TARGET PRACTICE FACILITIES, DRUMHELLER, ALBERTA

Question No. 499—Mr. Schumacher:

1. Did the Department of Public Works call for tenders for the erection of a rifle range and/or target practice facilities at the Drumheller Penitentiary in Drumheller, Alberta and, if so (a) what company was the successful bidder (b) what is the cost of constructing and equipping such facilities (c) for what purpose?

2. Is this the only facility of its kind attached to any penitentiary in Canada and, if not (a) where are the others located (b) what is the purpose, in each case (c) what was the cost of construction, in each case?

3. Are there plans to include such facilities at any other institution now in operation, or to be erected in the future and, if so, what is the location in each case?

4. In each case where such a facility now exists, is in the process of construction or is planned, by what degree of security is each institution designated and how many individuals are permitted to make use of each facility?

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Departments of Public Works and the Solicitor General as follows: 1. Yes. (a) Greene Construction Limited, MacCormack Landscaping Limited; (b) $201,566; (c) The purpose of the facility is to provide training and maintain proficiency in the use of rifles and side arms for employees of the Canadian Penitentiary Service.

2. Yes. (a), (b) and (c) Not applicable.

NOTE: At present, some of the institutions are using range facilities owned by the Department of National Defence, major police forces or rifle range associations.

3. It is planned to construct similar facilities at the existing and planned institutions or groups of institutions as shown in the following statement.

4. The designated security of each institution and the number of personnel permitted to make use of each facility exclusive of outside law enforcement agencies is indicated in the following statement.

OPENING OF VISITOR CENTRE—FORTRESS OF LOUISBOURG NATIONAL HISTORIC PARK

Question No. 748—Mr. Muir:

1. What was the date of the official opening of the Visitor Centre at the Fortress of Louisbourg National Historic Park and who was responsible for organizing the function?

2. (a) Who made the decision as to who would (i) be invited (ii) take part in the ceremonies (b) what are the names and positions of those who took part in the ceremonies?

3. Were the Members of Parliament for the constituencies on Cape Breton Island involved in the ceremonies and, if not, for what reason?

4. Was there a special seating arrangement for Members of Parliament and Senators representing Cape Breton Island in Parliament and, if not, for what reason?

5. (a) Was the Premier of Nova Scotia accorded a special role in the ceremonies and, if so, for what reason (b) were the provincial leaders of the two other political parties invited and accorded a special role in the ceremonies and, if not, for what reason?

Mr. B. Keith Penner (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): 1. Sunday, August 15, 1976. Parks Canada, Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development was responsible for organizing this function.

2. (a) (i) The Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development; (ii) The Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. (b) Rev. W. B. DeCourcey, Parish Priest, Louisbourg; the Hon. G. A. Regan, Q.C., Premier of Nova Scotia; the Hon. Judd Buchanan, P.C., M.P., the then Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development; Dr. Peter B. Waite, Nova Scotia member of the Historic Sites and Monuments Board of Canada; the Hon. C. L. Gosse, M.D., Lieutenant-Governor, Province of Nova Scotia; His Honour Guy Hiltz, Mayor of the Town of Louisbourg.

3. Mr. Andy Hogan and Mr. Robert Muir, Members of Parliament representing the constituencies of Cape Breton-East Richmond and Cape Breton-the Sydneys were invited, their constituencies being closely related to the Fortress. Mr. Hogan, the Member of Parliament for the constituency of Cape Breton-East Richmond, the riding in which Louisbourg is located, was invited to be a member of the Platform party.

4. No. However, seating was reserved for all invited guests, including Members of Parliament. At ceremonies of this kind, it has never been the practice to identify special areas within that reserved seating for particular groups or categories of guests.

5. (a) Yes. The Premier of Nova Scotia, the Hon. G. A. Regan, Q.C., was asked to speak on behalf of the people of the Province of Nova Scotia. (b) No, as they did not officially represent the people from the riding in which the Park is located and the Premier was officially representing the people of the province of Nova Scotia as a whole.

MOUNTAIN CLIMBING—KLUANE NATIONAL PARK

Question No. 1,173—Mr. Yewchuk:

Are mountain climbing parties in Kluane National Park required to (a) obtain a permit for the expedition (b) apply for a permit three months in advance (c) have at least four members (d) provide a complete list of members (e) furnish medical certificates, signed by a doctor, for each member (f) provide a complete itinerary (g) provide a complete list of personal and community equipment (h) appear at a ranger station for personal inspection (i) identify blood type for each member (j) possess a radio to call for help, or arrange for a regular aircraft flyby and, if so, in each case, for what reason?

Mr. B. Keith Penner (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Requirements for mountain climbing parties in Kluane National Park are set out in Section 23 of the National Parks Act. (a) Yes. Climbers must check in and out with the Park Warden Service when attempting a climb of any difficulty. Control is achieved by issuing permits. (b) No. This is a guideline. (c) No. This is a guideline. (d) Yes. This is for control purposes. Members are named on permit so park management knows exactly who is on the mountain. (e) No. This is a guideline. (f) Yes. In the event that rescue operations are necessary, this information would provide a starting point in search efforts. (g) No. This is a guideline. (h) There is no need to appear at Park Warden stations. This is a guideline. (i) No. This is a guideline. (j) No. This is a guideline. Depending on the degree of the climb, different degrees of preparedness are encouraged. All climbers are urged to adhere as fully as they can to the guidelines, but for the most severe climbs, such as Mount Logan, all of the guidelines should be adhered to. The primary purpose is concern for the safety of the climbing party. Following these guidelines aids in the prevention of costly and, in many cases, dangerous search and rescue operations.

CON-ACT PROGRAMS

Question No. 1,264—Mr. Stanfield:

1. Did the Department of National Health and Welfare's Non-Medical Use of Drugs Directorate and/or Non-Medical Use of Mood Altering Substances Programme (a) receive requests for funding, applications for funding and/or Reports from the CON-ACT PROGRAMS and, if so, on what dates were requests, applications or reports received (b) receive from the Halifax office of the Directorate, reports regarding the CON-ACT PROGRAMS and, if so (i) on what dates were the reports received (ii) did the reports recommend support of the program (c) request and/or receive research proposals to evaluate the CON-ACT PROGRAMS and, if so (i) what individuals and groups submitted research proposals (ii) was a research proposal approved (iii) who received the Department's approval to conduct an evaluation of the programme (iv) what were the costs incurred to evaluate the programme (v) has the Department received the evaluation of the programme?

2. Did the Department of National Health and Welfare's Non-Medical Use of Drugs Directorate and/or Non-Medical Use of Mood Altering Substances Programme support the CON-ACT PROGRAMS by way of grants, contributions or awards and, if so (a) in what amounts were the grants, contributions or awards made and on what dates (b) is the Department considering additional support of the programme and, (i) if so, for what reason (ii) if not, for what reason?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): 1. (a) CON-ACT submission (first) received February 6, 1975. Appraisal of CON-ACT Workshops at the Springhill Medium Security Institution from the National Parole Service in Truro, received March 20, 1975. CON-ACT submission (second and final) received April 23, 1975. (b)(i) Report of CON-ACT received from Halifax October 6, 1975. (ii) The report from Halifax recommended funding of the CON-ACT programme. (c) The Non-Medical Use of Drugs Directorate, Department of National Health and Welfare, received two research proposals to evaluate the CON-ACT programme. (i) The individuals who submitted a research proposal were: Janice Todd; Dr. H. V. Gamberg. (ii) Yes, a research proposal was approved. (iii) Dr. H. V. Gamberg received the Department's approval to conduct an evaluation of the programme. (iv) Costs: Contract to develop research methodology from February 16, 1976 in the amount of $4,900. Research contribution for the period August 1, 1976 to March 31, 1977 in the amount of $18,640. (v) From the contract, the Department received: an interim report, April 29, 1976; a final report, June 30, 1976. The evaluation report from the research contribution will be submitted at the end of the funding period.

2. (a) The CON-ACT programme received a contribution for the period January 15, 1976 to August 15, 1976 in the amount of $24,290. (b) The department is not considering further support of the programme. (ii) At the time when the Non-Medical Use of Drugs Directorate recommended funding of the project, it was agreed with the programme that the period of funding would be seven months. The purposes of support for the project were threefold: 1. To assist in the financial stabilization and in the diffusion of an effective rehabilitation programme. 2. To promote the preventative potential of CON-ACT. 3. To evaluate the rehabilitative process within CON-ACT. Evaluation of the programme is currently underway and will be completed by March 31, 1977.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, if questions 729, 1,037 and 1,199 could be made orders for returns, those returns would be tabled immediately.

Mr. Speaker: Is this agreed.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Text]

AIB PERSONNEL

Question No. 729—Mr. Coates:

1. What is the total number of employees involved in the operations of the AIB under salary arrangements and the number who have other forms of contractual arrangements with the Board?

2. Of those who are salaried employees, how many receive salaries of $25,000 a year or more and, in each case, what are their names, positions and actual salaries?

3. Of those who have contracts of one form or another, what are their names, positions and actual amounts of the contracts where the contracts are for more than $20,000 annually and, in each case, what is the length of the contract?

Return tabled.

BOOKAGENTS HANDLING GOVERNMENT PUBLICATIONS

Question No. 1,037—Mr. Bawden:

1. Is the government going to increase the number of bookagents in the private sector now handling sales of government publications because of the closing of the Information Canada Bookstores?

2. What are the (a) names (b) addresses of the official bookagents which handle government publications?

3. What requirements have been set by the Department of Supply and Services for a bookstore to become an official bookagent for government publications?

4. What instructions did each of the Information Canada Bookstores located in (a) Halifax (b) Montreal (c) Ottawa (d) Toronto (e) Winnipeg (f) Vancouver give to customers who inquired about where they could purchase government publications after November 5, 1976?

Return tabled.

4. For each year 1970 to date, what was the total cost to the government for language training for those individuals who were not directly employed by the Public Service?

Return tabled.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Lawrence: Mr. Speaker, I raise this question on the first opportunity I have been given to raise it. My question may be a question of privilege relating to the growing trend of the government's to give either not correct answers or not factual answers in respect of questions placed on the order paper.

On November 18 last, if my memory serves me right, I placed a simple question on the order paper relating to the total amount of money going from the government to the province of Quebec and the total amount coming back from the province of Quebec to this government. Yesterday, Sir, I received an answer to this question, an answer from the government, stating that such information was not available. Coincidentally, last night when I watched the CTV television news there appeared a program giving exactly that type of information I had requested.

On inquiring of the CTV news, I learned that the information had emanated from Maclean's magazine which, in turn, had obtained the information from the government. Sir, I put myself entirely in your hands, because I do not know how further to proceed. Is it not a question of privilege when a member of parliament, using acknowledged and correct procedures to obtain information from the government, is refused that information and finds that the media can get exactly the same information far more easily than he can? Is that not a question of privilege, Sir?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I shall recognize the minister in a moment. I am smiling, because the matter is difficult enough when definite arguments are raised concerning a question of privilege and I must determine the existence of a question of privilege. But the hon. member is asking me if there is a question of privilege, and that puts me in a much more difficult position.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I rise as acting Minister of Finance. That information from the department had followed upon some press reports which had been noticed.

Mr. Peters: Fly across the road and make a speech.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lang: I am informed, Mr. Speaker, that the information—

Mr. Peters: Go across the road and make that speech.

Mr. Lang: —which was allegedly supplied by the Department of Finance was public information from which certain persons drew their own inferences and conclusions.

Mr. Peters: Go across the road and say it.

[Mr. Schumacher.]

Mr. Lang: —is information which the department does not substantiate.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Peters: Fly across the road and say it on television.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Benjamin: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Is the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre rising on the same question of privilege?

Mr. Benjamin: No, Mr. Speaker, it is another one.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence) has not actually raised a question of privilege but has asked whether a question of privilege exists. Of course it is open to the hon. member, on the basis of preliminary information, to pursue the matter, and if he feels that he is justified in raising it again in the light of that information, which may give him further grounds to argue, perhaps that can be done at a later time.

MR. LANG—ANSWER BY MINISTER OF TRANSPORT

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question of privilege arises from part of an answer which the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) gave today. He suggested that every member of the House would get a copy of the statement he is to make today at the press conference he is to hold. Apparently that statement was neither important nor serious enough to be made in this House. To my knowledge, no member of this House has a copy of that statement, including the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). Certainly I do not have it, and the office of my leader does not have it.

There is a point in our procedures when Your Honour calls for the tabling of documents. I wonder if the minister would now cease his insolence and arrogance, and let members of the House have a copy of the press statement he issued. It concerns the $800 million transfer of debts and the doubling of Seaway tolls which the government has been agonizing and procrastinating about for three or four years. We have been trying to get answers for three or four years. He does not deem it important enough to answer us in this House. Can the minister table his announcement which he felt more important to be in the hands of newspaper reporters before reaching members of the parliament of Canada?

● (1630)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I understand that it is on its way to members' offices. I trust it will arrive there. I do not have copies with me. With the permission of the House, I will undertake to have it tabled just as soon as I can have it sent over from my office.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Without seeing the document or having it more accurately described, it is not clear whether a press release or something of that sort constitutes the kind of document contemplated in the Standing Order. If the House gives its consent, the minister has undertaken to table the document. Is there unanimous consent that the minister shall have leave to table the document referred to, later today?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

[Later:]

Mr. Brisco: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I was not certain whether Your Honour interpreted your call for unanimous consent to the tabling of the document as having received unanimous consent. If that was Your Honour's interpretation, I want it clearly understood that I said no.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Brisco) raises a valid point of order. I again say that the minister has given an undertaking to table the document. Without seeing the document, I cannot tell whether it is in the realm of the minister to table it. That is why I asked for consent to be sure. Consent being withheld, we are back to square one, so to speak.

Mr. Clarke: Mr. Speaker, my point of order arises out of the questions not answered by the parliamentary secretary. Two questions that I have had on the order paper will be celebrating their fourth anniversary on the tenth of this month. I want to bring that to the attention of the parliamentary secretary. Also, I have another question that has been around quite long. I had information from the Postmaster General (Mr. Blais) that he had answered the question on January 24. That answer has yet to appear in the daily reports of the parliamentary secretary and I would like to see if he can find it.

Mr. Goodale: Mr. Speaker, it would be helpful if the hon. member could give the numbers of the questions. Without the numbers, it would be difficult to trace the particular questions to which he refers. I would simply draw to his attention that I am not personally aware of two questions that are four years old that have not been answered. I can assure him, as I have said on other occasions, that we endeavour to answer each and every question as quickly and conscientiously as we can. We will continue to do that. If hon. members have a particular concern or a particular urgency attached to a question, I hope that either in the House or other ways they will draw that to my attention so that I can personally see that their particular question is dealt with as quickly as possible.

Mr. Clarke: Mr. Speaker, if I might be permitted to give the parliamentary secretary the two numbers, they are 1019 and 1032. I thought I made it clear it was four months they were going to celebrate on the order paper, not four years. The other one is question 1453, which the Postmaster General indicated he had signed the answer to in January.

Order Paper Questions

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, I rise on the same point of order. As you will know, Mr. Speaker, my department probably receives the most questions. The answers are given as expeditiously as possible. In this particular instance I was under the impression that we had answered the question. I subsequently informed the hon. member that I was mistaken and that we had not. We are trying to expedite the answer as quickly as possible.

Mr. Herbert: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. An extremely important question to my province has been on the order paper since October 13, question No. 333. I would be very glad if the parliamentary secretary would give attention to that one. It is extremely important that we have this information as early as possible.

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Speaker, I rise on the same point of order. I have had a question on the order paper since October 22, 1976, with regard to the number of employees in various sections of the Post Office. It had previously been on since July 1975. I placed it on the order paper again in the new session. The question is still unanswered. I think that the parliamentary secretary is derelict in his duty in not ensuring that these kinds of questions are answered.

Mr. Goodale: What is the number?

Mr. Rodriguez: I said question No. 775. Get your ears open.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Symes: Mr. Speaker, I rise on the same point of order. I would like to draw to the attention of the parliamentary secretary two questions I have had on the order paper since November 15, 1976, Nos. 1055 and 1056, concerning Reed Paper Company and the complicity of the government in providing grants to that company which has polluted the Wabigoon and English River systems.

Mr. Goodale: Mr. Speaker, on the point of order, perhaps it is simply the rather peculiar spirit that seems to exist in the House today. This kind of a procedure with respect to questions on the order paper is not a particularly productive one in the sense of encouraging answers. As I said a few moments ago, and I think it has been demonstrated by the rate of returns on these questions so far in this session, it is our intention and desire to answer the inquiries which hon. members present on the order paper as quickly and efficiently as we possibly can. I pointed out on other occasions that the rate of return in answering questions in this parliament has been very high. I suggest it is the highest that has ever existed.

Be that as it may, this kind of exercise in this House is not a particularly constructive use of House time. I simply repeat, if hon. members wish to draw to my attention in other ways the urgency attached to a particular question or the fact that they have an inquiry that has been outstanding for some time, I will be pleased to undertake to them in a personal way to pursue their inquiries and get the answers for them as quickly as possible.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I hope that the parliamentary secretary will re-read what he said just a few moments ago when he talked about the peculiar atmosphere in this House. He is wrong. The atmosphere which we have seen exhibited today is not peculiar. We have unhappily now become accustomed to seeing questions not answered, delays in answers to questions on the order paper, and a whole host of other things.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I am not suggesting that all of the blame should fall on the shoulders of the parliamentary secretary. He is led by others. That is the problem.

The other matter that concerns me is with regard to the answer given by the parliamentary secretary, and I want him to read it very carefully. He may not have meant it. He may want to correct it after he has read it. He implied a threat that if we continue asking legitimate questions, such as about old answers to old questions, that might affect the production of answers.

Mr. Goodale: I never said that.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): The parliamentary secretary denies that. I would ask him to read very carefully what he said with respect to this matter. I hope he is not suggesting it is improper for a member, whether on the government side or on the opposition side, whose question has been left unanswered for weeks or months, to stand up and ask when the answer will be forthcoming.

● (1640)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: The parliamentary secretary has asked us to let him know what questions we want answered. I put down a question on October 13, question No. 487, which I consider to be one of special importance, and I hope the parliamentary secretary will give this matter his immediate attention and try to obtain the answer for me rather than waste the time of the House and preventing us from getting on with legislation we all want to deal with.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): It seems to me this is a silly and shameful argument which is being carried on by members on the other side, wasting the time of the House, and it is becoming perfectly obvious that none of the opposition parties is prepared to get on with the orders of the day. It amounts to contempt for the Canadian people. Let us get on with the business of the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Mr. Goodale.]

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Mr. Goodale: Mr. Speaker, I would ask that all notices of motions for the production of papers be allowed to stand.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

NATIONAL TRANSPORTATION ACT

MEASURE TO REDEFINE OBJECTIVE OF TRANSPORTATION POLICY

The House resumed, from Tuesday, March 1, consideration of the motion of Mr. Basford (for the Minister of Transport) that Bill C-33, to amend the National Transportation Act and the Department of Transport Act for the purpose of defining the objective of the transportation policy of Canada and authorizing the consequential rearrangement of powers and duties relating to transport and to amend the Transport Act and the Railway Act in respect of freight rates and other matters, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

Mr. F. A. Philbrook (Halton): Mr. Speaker, when I interrupted my remarks last night to call it ten o'clock I had made a few preliminary remarks about Bill C-33. There are three main objectives—definition, authority, and improvement. I said transportation was a top priority, that it was a huge, difficult and urgent one, just like finding oil. I said this bill was worth supporting and I felt I could support it, depending upon what kind of general acceptance it found in its passage through the House, and upon what chances there were of its provisions being carried out.

There is, however, a logical progress of events, and I think this support has to be conditional upon something. It has to be conditional upon the fact that there are some election campaign promises already on the books which have not been fulfilled to the satisfaction of many people. In other words, first things first.

The national transportation program which has been outlined in some detail since 1974 is, in my view, an excellent program especially for the long term, but it really needs a strong short term start, something it does not appear to have. There are many advantages attached to this program, with its objective of providing better, cheaper, and more energy efficient transportation, giving Canadian industry a boost in the transport field and giving the economy a general boost. But besides transport there is this other issue—the business of honouring commitments, the business of keeping election promises, the business of the integrity and the credibility of government. In my opinion it is not good enough to say with regard to a top priority operation like transport that there is not enough money now.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Philbrook: It is not good enough to say this is not our business, that it is the business of the provinces and the municipalities. If this is important, then it is important to find the money, and if the Canadian people see this as their business, and if they want it to be the business of the federal government, we have an obligation to make it our business.

It is difficult to pin these promises down in terms of exact amounts. It seems to me something was mentioned about $300 million for five years for the entire transportation program, one third of which was to be available in the form of financial aid to commuter systems. Well, Mr. Speaker, this is really a drop in the bucket. It may seem a lot of money, but it is certainly not a lot in relation to the transportation needs of the whole country. The Toronto area alone needs $50 million just for starters—half the total amount mentioned. If there is anything with which I would disagree in relation to the campaign promises in this field, if there was one mistake, it was the open-ended cost-sharing provision. I think this is one part of the promise which the federal government could feel justified in breaking. It is the type of nonsensical thing we have been trying to get away from in medicare, and hospital care. We know the temptation is just too great. It simply does not work. But there is no reason why we cannot come up with a decent amount of money within a stipulated time frame.

The type of commitment which was made in terms of open cost-sharing—to the extent of 100 per cent for commuter rolling stock, 50 per cent for platforms and supporting structures, and 25 per cent for inner city transit—is obviously unrealistic. We have had some discussion about this, and one of the stipulations we would make in this connection is that all the equipment and all the machinery be made in Canada. Another was that there be a limited time frame, thus providing an opportunity to reassess the program—in other words, the budget would not get out of hand. Finally, due credit was to be given for the contribution of each level of government, including the federal government. This should not be a problem; we all want credit for what we do. Up until now it does seem to have been a problem in terms of the levels of government not getting along together.

The reasons given by ministers for restricting this program, perhaps for even cancelling it, are as follows: first, restraint. We believe in restraint. The caucus has been urging it on the government for two and a half years. The government seems, finally, to be doing a good job of it. But the question is: where should restraint be applied? Second, as I mentioned before, there is the business of jurisdiction and political games—a lack of credit for what is done.

Some have asked is there a federal role for urban transit? Why not? Certainly the federal government has assumed a role in urban housing. And there are other areas. If the provinces do not want that kind of support from the federal government they are free to refuse it.

There was an original premise built into this program, Mr. Speaker, and many people realized this. This was not just a way to spend money. This was not supposed to be throwing money down the drain. This whole transport program, besides being important in itself, was designed both to save and to make money by providing cheaper, more efficient transportation. Those things have to be taken into account when we talk of cancelling the program or restraining it. It does not sound as though they were taken into account. Against this is the cost of supporting air travel and private transportation as we have done up to now.

The costs of infrastructure at airports, and the upkeep and construction of roads and super highways, parking lots and all the rest are enormous. Surely there is money to be saved there which could be put into a better transportation program?

What about a possible tie-in with Canada Works? The opportunity exists in a transportation program to provide jobs. But in this case, if there is a public transit industry, we should provide real jobs, not makeshift jobs. Corporations under Canada Works are allowed to sponsor projects; why not projects concerning public transit? Presumably there is an opportunity to spend money there. I suppose this will require a budgetary exercise, a complete rearranging of our priorities and expenditures, looking outside transportation into other departments.

I heard recently that we may be planning to spend $2.5 billion on jet fighters. To my mind there is no question what are the priorities at the present time. I am all for adequate defence and support for the military, but good public transport comes first, in my opinion.

Perhaps we will have to take another look at our social and welfare programs and ask whether there are some unnecessary expenses involved, especially in regard to universality of payments, which means paying benefits to people who do not need them, to people who are wealthy and can get along without them. Perhaps there is money to be saved in limiting the bureaucracy, the size of the civil service. I think it is timely to think in terms of rearranging our budget priorities since we will soon be dealing with the main estimates. I think they are a little hard for the average MP to understand, but none the less we can tie this subject into them. Also we have a spring budget coming up which is designated to stimulate the economy.

There is a temptation, Mr. Speaker, for some people to think that the public and the media are not interested in this subject, that it will go away by itself. On the contrary, there have been a flurry of reports in the media and it is the number one subject of talk in my riding, and I imagine in many others. There have been many calls from reporters for interviews even of lowly backbenchers. For example, the Milton Champion reports that Milton definitely needs an extension of the Go train system but that federal funds had been withdrawn and Go train plans shelved. I know that will lead to a lot of disappointment. The Globe and Mail reported that Liberal MP's were considering a revolt over transit cuts. I think that is a little bit over-dramatic but it indicates the kind of feelings that have been generated.

Local Halton people are almost unanimously urging support for this program; I have heard no one speak against it. Telegrams from local politicians have been entirely in support of this transit program. I have received a telegram from Halton regional chairman, Rick Morrow, as well as from Burlington mayor, Mary Munro. Let me just read the telegram from Rick Morrow:

Wish to express serious concern regarding announced withdrawal of federal funds for urban transit. Will seriously affect planned extension of Go servicing to Milton, Oakville and Burlington. Request use of your office to seek government reconsideration of the matter.

"Ottawa Makes Chaos for Commuters" reports the Toronto Daily Star for February 22, 1977. The members for Halton (Mr. Philbrook) and Mississauga (Mr. Abbott) were cited as not helping, but that is incorrect and I think has subsequently been corrected. The Oakville paper, the Journal Record, carried the headline "Federal Transit Aid Delayed, Not Dead: Philbrook"; that was certainly a high hope in the determination. "The transit program has been curtailed due to restraint", said the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) in a recent Toronto interview. The Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) is reported by the Ottawa Citizen for February 24 as saying that the "onus is on others for transit". Then just at the end of last week the Globe and Mail attributes the headline "Transit Support Plan Still Before Cabinet" to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). So maybe we have a life yet.

We need many modes of transportation in this country, and we need them urgently. We need them for many parts of the country. We need faster intercity rail, not only for the Quebec City-Windsor corridor but for many other parts of the country, such as from Calgary to Edmonton and so on. Most of all, we need a lot of help for the maritimes, because they tend to be neglected. Then what about Newfoundland and the old "Bullet"? And let us not forget the prairie services.

Perhaps we also need plans to develop the controversial STOL aircraft for outlying cities, because what else is there? The people themselves say that trains and buses are not sufficient, and that is certainly correct if we want to decentralize and relieve urban crowding. We need better intercity transit for our urban areas, and we certainly need a much better freight deal to help solve our western grain and port problems.

I come from a suburban area, one of many in Canada. Perhaps there are 25 major areas like mine, and my particular interest is commuter transit in trying to convey people back and forth between suburbs and cities in a decent, civilized manner. Some people say there should be no problem, that people should live where they work, but I think at the moment that is a little unrealistic and will take a long time to bring about. Until this happens, we must look after these people. We need more Go trains now; we cannot delay such decisions because we do not want to bother changing the budget. Most of all, we need less emphasis on what we have had a bellyfull of in the last generation, namely, too much air travel.

Out Halton way—and this also applies to my colleague for Mississauga—we need $15 million fast to relieve terrible congestion, and I am sorry to say that this is half of the entire amount budgeted for the next five years for commuter transit. We need this money for Go trains and for extra rolling stock. We need additional Go train service to a place like Milton, which is virtually isolated despite the fact it is near a big city, not new Go buses. Improvements are required to Union Station to facilitate arrival and departure. We must relieve the bottleneck at the Bathurst Street crossing. We need improved trackage and, as I say, additional cars. The Ontario government and the Toronto city council have made commitments to spend money for this purpose, to the best of my knowledge, and the political lesson of this step has not been lost on them. If we do not come through and meet this requirement, we are going to be very, very sorry.

With all due respect to my party and my leader, Mr. Speaker, there is no doubt in my mind that my main responsibility is to my constituents at this moment. This responsibility of mine is closely related to the improvement of nation-wide transit and to campaign promises. Even our opponents in provincial and municipal governments have made commitments in this regard. They have stuck their necks out and are now left holding the bag, being faced with a great deal of expenditure.

I am prepared to support this bill, but this is certainly contingent on some kind of tangible evidence coming to light very soon that the government is prepared to follow through on its campaign promises to improve transportation. I would invite my colleagues to take the same stand.

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to speak on Bill C-33 this afternoon, to amend the National Transportation Act and the Department of Transport Act for the purpose of defining the objective of the transportation policy for Canada, and authorizing the consequential rearrangement of powers and duties relating to transport and to amend the Transport Act and the Railway Act in respect of freight rates and other matters.

It is interesting to note that proposed section 3(2)(d) provides that "competition within and between modes of transportation should be encouraged where economic and technical factors permit". I have nothing against competition. I am going to refer to the trucking industry of Canada, particularly in Manitoba, and to the problems the government is laying on Manitoba's doorstep at the present time with the introduction by the Post Office of their new postpak delivery service, which I suggest will unfairly compete with the trucking industry. I will go into that in more detail in just a moment. In subclause (3)(a) in the bill dealing with the minister's responsibilities it is stated:

● (1700)

—inquire into and undertake measures to ensure the effective and inefficient development of the various forms of transport over which parliament has jurisdiction;

With the introduction of the postpak delivery service we are certainly not going to have an effective and efficient development of various modes of transport, especially in the trucking industry. This postpak concept has been introduced recently by the Post Office. It is a new concept for moving merchandise from coast to coast. It is a mini container system using the mailbags to move goods in bulk. Mailbags can carry up to 66 pounds.

A couple of years ago the government commissioned a study costing a quarter of a million dollars on the difference in deliveries between the Post Office providing its own trucks, and private industry. This Samson Belair study contained recommendations, facts, and figures showing why all mail delivery should be left to the private sector because the savings would amount to millions of dollars. Unfortunately this detailed study and research were completely ignored, and the Post Office took over postal delivery and set up its own trucking system.

In the last parliament I tried to obtain a copy of this Samson Belair document but the government refused to table it. Fortunately I was able to obtain it. This study should have been referred to one of the standing committees discussing Post Office operations for a complete and detailed study and review of the recommendations made in it. I would like to read some of the recommendations in the report. It reads:

> In future the department should contract for city services unless there is conclusive evidence as to the unavailability of this service on reasonable terms from outside the department.
> The present government operations should be reviewed with the objective of securing the services outside. Potential savings from the conversion of the four existing government operations would amount to approximately $725,000 per year.

What they are saying is that it would be $725,000 a year cheaper to let a private trucking company handle postal deliveries. How such a recommendation could possibly have been ignored has never been explained. Now we find that the Post Office has come up with this postpak proposal which is causing no end of problems to the trucking industry, as I will explain in more detail in a few minutes.

The Samson Belair report goes on to say:

> The department should review all other government performed transportation and distribution services to determine whether new or increased needs could not be more satisfactorily performed by the private sector.

The study goes on to say:

> Considering only direct field costs, the four existing government operated urban services are more costly than an equivalent contracted operation. Were other costs such as rent, administration, interest on capital, and taxes on such items as gasoline, purchases, and corporate income to be considered, the argument for a contracted service would be further substantiated.

So you see there is no end of evidence as to why the Post Office should not have its own fleet to deliver mail. The additional cost is striking. What I am asking the minister to do this afternoon is to review this postpak proposal and consult the Postmaster General (Mr. Blais) with a view to disbanding this costly and unnecessary service being established by the Post Office at this time.

The report goes on to read:

> Operational factors such as level of service, performance, control and flexibility associated with an effective contracted service are at least equivalent to a government operation.
>
> The major factor in the cost gap between government and contracted services is labour productivity, and to a lesser extent administrative and supervisory costs.

The Samson Belair study stated that:

> A contracted operation for this service is less costly than a government operation.

So it is less costly to leave to private truckers. It seems to be plain common sense to leave it to them. The study states further:

> Payment on a point-of-call basis results in increased productivity and efficiency since the contractor is provided with an incentive to complete deliveries as early as possible.
> Payment on a possible point-of-call basis is easier to administer because it eliminates the need to maintain a detailed record of hours worked by the contractor.

I will give you an example of what happened when the Post Office took over the mail delivery service and established its own fleet.

These are answers to questions on the Order Paper with which the government provided me. When the Post Office set up its own fleet in the city of Toronto, it required 44 more trucks than the private contractor needed for delivering the mail. It required 100 more employees than the private sector needed when it handled mail delivery in Toronto. The city of Montreal needed 10 more trucks and 160 more men when the Post Office set up its own delivery service. In the city of London, Ontario, 19 more trucks and 18 more men were needed. In Hamilton it took 15 more trucks to handle mail delivery and 17 more men. In the Kitchener-Waterloo area 8 more trucks were needed and 7 more men were needed to handle mail delivery. You can see the fantastic additional costs.

The ironic part of all this is that this is the point at which the quality of the service started to deteriorate. In my riding there is a large area of small businesses. Prior to the time when the Post Office handled its own deliveries the businessmen could set their clock by the time when the private mail contractor would come around with the mail each day. After the Post Office set up its own operation in Winnipeg, the businessmen never knew when the mail was coming, and yet the Post Office employs many more men and uses many more trucks.

There was an article in the Manitoba Highway News dated February, 1977, dealing with the problems that the new postpak is causing in Manitoba. They have carried out a detailed study of this and they are continuing to study the matter. I should like to quote from an article headed "Post Office Now in the Trucking Business. Big Deficit Seen?" The article reads:

> Not content with acquiring a deficit of over half a billion dollars during the past year, the Post Office department has embarked on a scheme whereby, without too much more effort on their part, the bill the next time around could reach the billion dollar mark.
> A great part of this will come through the postpak idea which started several years ago with a great fanfare of superior service and much lower cost than the established services being held out to the shipping public.
> Low rates were established because the shipper had to be responsible for delivery to the Post Office and prepay all shipments which could consist of up to 50 lbs. in bags supplied by the Post Office or cartons of certain sizes and standards up to 66 lbs. In cities over 10,000 population delivery would be made by the P.O., otherwise the customer would be phoned. Delivery was to be similar to first class mail service. However, we find that it has been admitted that, under certain circumstances, the P.O. would also pick up at shippers' premises the postpak shipments. The development of this service can have a very serious impact on the truck service presently being provided by the regular over-the-road carrier as many small points have no other means of transport than the truck carrier on a regular basis.

Two main complaints arise from this operation. First, the trucker should not have to face a competitor that has access to the public purse to meet any deficits.

They will certainly be coming to the public purse to meet deficits with regard to this Postpak proposal, as shown by the other evidence I had read into the record this afternoon.

The trucker has no such access. Secondly, they should not have to compete with a delivery service by private contractors to the Post Office that are not required to meet the same standards as the licensed carrier. The Postpak system is said to bypass the ordinary P.O. procedures but does not require to move under bills of lading, or other terms and conditions as required by provincial regulatory boards. Labour regulations, either provincial or federal, are not required. The present licence fees for a truck hauling mail in Manitoba with a gross weight of 24,000 lbs. is as follows: based on a 1974 model truck, the fee would be $107.00, including insurance with $200.00 deductible all perils. For a semi-trailer carrying up to 80,000 lbs. the fee is $196.00 with no mileage limit. The regular line haul P.S.V. operator is required to pay $637.00 for an equivalent weight with a $500.00 deductible coverage. For the semi-trailer with 80,000 lbs. the fees would be $978.00 based on 1976 regulations.

Hon. members can see that this service should be provided by private truckers who are faced with these heavy licence fees; the government should not be coming out with this postpak proposal to hinder them and cause them more problems. We have enough problems with our sagging economy and so forth without the Post Office competing with private trucking companies.

The article continues as follows:

This problem has been brought to the attention of the various motor carrier boards in Canada and action has been requested to correct this inequity. However, it seems that most provinces are afraid to challenge the rights of the Post Office and, as a result, very little has been accomplished. At the present time the Canadian Trucking Association, through its national provincial standards council, is actively pursuing a course of action which we hope will bring some results.

Another activity of the Post Office is the lowering of charges on fourth class parcels. Recently they advertised in Winnipeg that they would guarantee next day delivery on fourth class parcels up to a weight of 35 lbs. This delivery was to be to any post office south of Lynn Lake, which is 600 miles north of Winnipeg.

The charge for a two-pound parcel was to be, for a distance of up to 150 miles, 60c.

Hon. members can see that taxpayers are going to be subsidizing this postpak delivery service which has been set up by the Post Office.

The article goes on:

On enquiring at the Post Office as to how many hands this parcel would go through before reaching its destination, it was said that six people would handle it! It would then be transported by air, if necessary, and delivered. Other weights were comparable.

Can hon. members imagine all this for 60 cents, six people handling it? It will be going by truck and by air. What a ridiculous proposal! The article goes on:

Efficiency plus: a tender has just been called for the furnishing of two one-ton trucks to provide service between Winnipeg and Thunder Bay. We wonder why, when there are several airflights each day, at least four buses and five truck lines per day.

Now we find that the government is going to provide two more trucks, when all it has to do is contract mail delivery and parcel delivery out to bus companies or to the five truck lines which run to Thunder Bay. How ridiculous can the government get?

Here we are discussing a bill to make it easier and better for transportation businesses in the country, and the government comes out with a proposal like this which will cause no end to competitive problems and unfair competition. The article goes on:

Maybe it's time that the opposition at Ottawa started asking questions about Post Office operations in this area.

That is the only part of the article I do not agree with, because the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale) and other hon. members on this side have certainly asked many questions about the Post Office, and I have certainly pursued Post Office problems in the last parliament and in this one. The article concludes by saying the following:

Is it any wonder that Post Office deficits in the neighbourhood of a billion dollars are believable?

When I obtained my copy of the Samson Belair study on postal operations and on whether mail delivery should be left in the hands of private trucking companies, I obtained information with regard to the number of additional trucks and employees which will be needed when the Post Office establishes its own trucking service, and I raised this matter in the standing committee. I presented a motion that we review the report and conduct a study as to why it will take 44 additional trucks to deliver mail in Toronto and so forth, but my motion was defeated. I remember the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin) being at that committee meeting, and he was very emphatic in saying that he did not want to conduct any investigation into this ridiculous and costly operation. That is why I said no to him last night when he was making his mundane speech on transportation and explaining why hon. members of the New Democratic Party support the government's getting into the trucking business and why they will not allow an investigation into the costly operation of the Post Office.

In closing, I ask the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang), and the Postmaster General (Mr. Blais), to get their heads together with a view to closing down this postpak proposal and to stop putting all these obstacles in front of the private trucking companies of Manitoba and of Canada.

Mr. D. M. Collenette (York East): Mr. Speaker, it is with great pleasure that I speak on this bill to amend the National Transportation Act because essentially transportation represents the history of this country. The history of Canada is the history of transportation. An area which is so large that it stretches from ocean to ocean has to be linked together one way or another. If we go back 200 or 300 years to the first movement of goods by canoe or by pack, we will see how integrally transportation of goods and people was part of the history of Canada.

The bill we have before us is basically a good bill. I agree with its thrust. The implementation of the National Transportation Act in 1967 and the creation of the Canadian Transport Commission created a number of problems. Too often parliament has set up an agency or a Crown corporation to operate the policies approved by parliament, and these agencies, Crown corporations or commissions become very removed from the day to day policy direction which should be followed.

Events change rapidly in our modern world, and acts such as the 1967 National Transportation Act have become impediments to the development of transportation goals in this country. I think transportation must be regarded as a tool of social development.

As I said, I basically support the thrust of the bill, but I have some grave reservations. My reservations are such that perhaps I will withhold my support from the bill. My arguments are basically similar to those put forward by my colleague, the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Philbrook). We are both concerned about urban transit, intercity transit, commuter trains, and the role of the federal government in these fields. Back in 1975—I think it was July of 1975—the then minister of transport, the Hon. Jean Marchand, tabled in this House three very impressive and well researched documents entitled, I believe, "A National Transportation Policy for Canada". They were in three parts. One dealt with movement of freight and commodities, one dealt with inter-city passenger service, and there was an over-all summary.

These documents represented years of well-thought-out research by the department and the government in an attempt to rationalize and come to grips with the transportation problems that affect this country. Nowhere in these documents, however, did we see any reference to potential federal government assistance to urban or commuter transit, and this is the main reason why I have great reservations about this particular bill.

Some people may say I am being intellectually dishonest to consider not supporting a bill to amend the National Transportation Act and the Department of Transport Act which does not really relate to federal assistance to urban and commuter transit. This argument is rubbish, Mr. Speaker. If we talk about federal assistance to urban and commuter transit, we do so in the context of a national transportation policy.

The bill before us is a good one; it is the keystone of the government's transportation policy and should be applauded. There may be those on the other side who lick their lips or howl in delight because supporters of the government decide they have reservations about a particular bill. I do not think they should put too much stock in the stand that I take, and I know I speak for the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Philbrook) in this. We are in no way nonsupportive of the government and its attempts to come to grips with the serious problems facing the country, whether they be problems of the economy or of national unity. We are 100 per cent behind the government. The fact that we are general supporters of the government, however, does not mean to say we have to agree with every aspect of government policy. This is where I am making this particular distinction.

Transportation problems do not constitute a major issue, according to the Gallup poll. We have to realize that there are some people on the Hill and off the Hill who live by the Gallup poll alone. While transportation problems do not constitute a major issue for a majority of Canadians, nevertheless those people who live in our cities, in Toronto, Montreal, and Vancouver are concerned about the credibility of a government that makes promises that it fails to fulfil.

Let me be firm on one point, Mr. Speaker. The promises made to assist urban transit were unrealistic in the first place. It is questionable whether the federal government has the constitutional obligation to finance urban transit. Further, the promises implied that the federal government would involve itself in an open-ended funding program. This is precisely the position the government is trying to reverse with the recent agreement with the provinces on medicare. That is to say, the federal government has the obligation to encourage universal programs and standards across the country, and further it would and should encourage such programs and standards only for a fixed period of time.

There is no doubt that the federal government has the right to encourage the development of public transport for obvious reasons, such as land use planning, energy efficiency and net social cost. The question is how it should be done.

Let us look at some of the promises made by this party in the 1974 election campaign. I am sure the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) wishes there were no copies of this document left floating around the House of Commons, but I have a copy and I should like to put those promises on the record.

The government promised to pay 100 per cent of the cost of new commuter vehicles manufactured in Canada; to pay 50 per cent of the cost of new stations and platforms forming part of the system; to pay 25 per cent of the capital cost of all vehicles purchased each year for public transit within Canadian cities and which were manufactured in Canada. Financial support was to be made available to encourage Canadian design and engineering of top quality urban and suburban transit vehicles, systems, machinery and equipment. For smaller municipalities the government offered assistance not only in design, engineering, and financing, but in the form of expert advice in bringing new transit systems into operation. The government was determined to encourage Canadian industry to develop so-called "off the shelf" standardized systems and equipment, such as telebuses and urban commuter trains which could save the country millions of dollars in development costs and which would encourage Canadian transport designers, engineers, and manufacturers to become world leaders.

The government was to encourage urban transit system innovations, including further demonstration projects financed by the federal government. The government offered to make best use of existing railway rights of way and track in urban and suburban areas for new commuter and urban transit lines with a view to reducing the high cost of such systems to Canadian municipalities.

The government maintained it would rapidly implement the Railway Relocation Act to ensure that railway relocations in cities also contributed to the right kind of city growth.

Only a few of these promises were ever discharged, the most notable being one I have not read. The government was committed to removing the 12 per cent sales tax on all 12 passenger and up vehicles which would provide service as part of an urban transit system. This was done in the budget of 1975. It has helped municipalities considerably. The 12 per cent tax on large transit vehicles, such as the acquisition of subway cars in Toronto, or high speed street cars, amounts to a very large sum. I know the Toronto Transit Commission is particularly grateful, and I am sure most of the other municipal transit systems in Canada are grateful for the removal of this tax.

To recap, Mr. Speaker, the three main urban and commuter promises made by the government in 1974 were to pay 25 per cent of the capital cost of all Canadian made vehicles purchased by urban transit systems; to pay 100 per cent of the cost of new commuter vehicles such as the Go transit buses in Ontario; and to pay 50 per cent of the cost of new stations and platforms used by commuter systems.

The basic problem with these promises is their total cost and their implication of ongoing funding. With the need of the government to reduce its spending it is quite obvious that there just is not the money available to meet these promises in their entirety. Like my colleague, the hon. member for Halton, I have urged the government to restrain its spending and I think it has done a good job in curtailing expenditures in a difficult economic period.

The provinces and the cities do have an urgent need for financial assistance, however, and the federal government needs to restore some credibility with the public by going part way to discharge its promises. This then is the debate in which I am involved with the government: how much can we afford to do, and at what time should this assistance be given?

Let us take a closer look at the federal responsibility in urban and commuter transit. While it can be argued that the federal government does not have the constitutional obligation toward commuter services as such, the government has, over the past year, assumed a constitutional obligation toward directing growth away from cities—an obligation toward the demographic features of Canada and, to a lesser extent, toward a more socially conducive use of land resources. This can be seen in the conceptual approach to the new immigration act now before the House, for some of the reasons mentioned were given as the rationale for the new Immigration Act. Therefore the federal government has some obligation and moral jurisdiction in this area. I was talking about commuters a few minutes ago, Mr. Speaker.

Similarly, while the federal government has no constitutional jurisdiction in the matter of urban transport, it has a constitutional obligation in the field of energy conservation, which includes an obligation towards Canadian industry and the creation of domestic job opportunities, in addition to its political obligations. Of course, speaking in purely political terms, we are obligated to help the municipalities and provinces.

Before I outline the extent of the commitment which would be appropriate for urban and commuter assistance, let me acknowledge that the government has made promises in the area of commuter assistance. There has been an ongoing program of assistance to provinces and municipalities with regard to urban and commuter transit.

Grants were first made available in the fiscal year 1972-73 for research and demonstration projects. About one year ago the government announced a program of capital assistance for various commuter projects. The first grants under this program are to be made on April 1, 1977. The purpose of the program is to assist provincial and municipal authorities to design and develop new technology, operations, innovations, etc. for urban transit. It is also to assist those authorities with the purchase of commuter vehicles and related facilities.

The provisions of these programs are as follows. Under the Department of Transport Act, the Transportation Development Agency may enter into agreements with provinces or municipalities to share the costs of transportation research over a set period of time. Besides providing financial support, the agency is to participate in the project, as a member of the steering committee. It is to monitor progress and provide advice and policy direction. In addition, under the capital assistance project for urban commuter services, grants will be made to provinces and municipalities to assist in the purchase of commuter vehicles and related facilities. The program will provide $100 million over five years, beginning April 1, 1977.

I contend that $100 million over five years, or $20 million a year, is not enough. My colleague from Halton suggested that the Go-transit system in Ontario needs to have an immediate $50 million spent on it, or about half the amount allotted for all of Canada. Clearly the government must make more money available for this program.

Let me now say a word about the achievements of programs designed to help municipalities and provinces in the field of commuter systems. From fiscal year 1972-73 to the end of the fiscal year 1975-76, a total of $1,233,900 was spend on research and demonstration projects. Projects were supported in Ontario, Quebec, the maritimes and each of the prairie provinces. Therefore it is incorrect to suggest that the government has not discharged the promises it made in 1974. The question is, to what extent has it discharged those promises and how much more should be done?

Mr. Leggatt: Keep them for the next election.

Mr. Collenette: Why not?

Mr. Leggatt: Once you discharge them, you have wasted them.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Collenette: Recently the Ontario government has made several statements about our obligation to keep the promise we made with respect to aid to commuter systems. The minister of transport in Ontario said that the recent statement of the federal Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald), that our promises to help urban commuter transit were dead, would mean a complete halt to the expansion of the provincially operated Go-transit system. That system was to serve Milton, in the constituency of the hon. member for Halton, Richmond Hill, and the area north of Toronto lying in the constituency of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Danson). The minister in Ontario contends that this service cannot be expanded. That is absolute nonsense.

The improvement or expansion of the Go-transit system in and around Toronto depends upon improvements to Toronto's union station, better access to ticket offices, expansion of platforms, realignment of tracks in stations, and also on the reconstruction of the Bathurst Street bridge. At present there is a bottleneck at the Bathurst Street bridge. There is ongoing maintenance of passenger equipment, a lot of shunting in the areas and, in addition, heavy industry on the waterfront of Toronto. This industry must have access to general rail lines of downtown Toronto.

I must say that the number of tracks now going under the Bathurst Street bridge constitute a problem; the railways have told the province that the bridge must be rebuilt and more tracks laid in order to accommodate increased services. The question is, do these two projects, involving the improving of Union Station, ticket facilities and so on, and removing the bottleneck at the Bathurst Street bridge, come under the government's promised program to give capital assistance for the purchase of equipment? I say they do not.

There is a perfectly adequate program of grade separation which is implemented across the country. Under it we remove railroad tracks, or put railway tracks under roads, or build subways and have the tracks going over the road. I am sure that money could be found in the existing budget for the improvement of the Bathurst Street bottleneck. Similarly, it would not need an astronomical sum to improve Union Station and those other facilities I mentioned. The amount is in the order of $10 million or $15 million, of which the federal contribution would be only a portion, perhaps 25 per cent. The city of Toronto has agreed to contribute money, and the province will also be responsible for much of the expense.

If I may digress, Mr. Speaker, it may be remembered that the two national railways a few years ago proposed to rebuild completely Union Station, or relocate Union Station and some of the tracks. The proposal included the expansion of the station, which could accommodate increased traffic, and the rebuilding of the subway access. In other words, it was intended to rebuild a large transportation complex which would serve the needs of Torontonians for many years. The railways offered to do this at no cost to the taxpayers of Toronto, Ontario or Canada—all of which are the same people, if one wants to look at it that way. Unfortunately the objection of a group of so-called radical reformers put this project in great jeopardy.

Toronto city council faced many difficulties. So many conditions were laid down, and so many complaints were raised about the project, that the railways finally said, "Forget it, we are not going to build metro centre. We will deny downtown Toronto this great revenue base which would include office buildings, apartment complexes and the new Massey Hall." The new hall was to be located in that general area as part of the project. Along with that went the promise of the railways to build a completely new transportation terminal for Toronto for next to nothing. I just mention that in passing.

If you read the newspapers, listen to television or the radio, you get the impression that it is just the federal government that is hampering the proper growth of transit services for commuters in Toronto. This, of course, is part of the Ontario government's tactic. They are in a very precarious position in the legislature, being attacked on all sides. They will use any ruse or argument for political gain. I suppose we have to understand their predicament, but we do not have to condone it.

It has been suggested, perhaps by the Minister of Transport and others, that a certain amount of the money which the Department of Transport allocates to each province for such things as grade separation, railway relocation, and other normal statutory expenditures is used for other things. The minister says to Ontario, "Here is your money, this is what you are going to get." Ontario does not have to apply that to grade separations or railway relocations, whether it be in Niagara Falls, and I know there is a project contemplated there, or in Sudbury. If it prefers to apply the money to improve commuter services in and around Toronto, it has that flexibility. That is very generous of the minister. However, he should not tell his colleagues and this House that that would constitute some discharging of our responsibility with regard to assistance to urban and commuter transit. These are ongoing statutory problems that have nothing whatsoever to do with the promises made in 1974.

My colleague, the hon. member for Scarborough West (Mr. Martin), who is in the House today, has done a lot of work, together with the hon. member for Scarborough East (Mr. O'Connell) on the problem of grade separations. I am sure he will correct me if I am wrong. However, $20 million to $30 million could be spent on this one portion in the east end of metropolitan Toronto, the borough of Scarborough, to eliminate the grade separations. It is not really good form for the minister to say this is Ontario's money under statutory programs, but they can use it for commuter services and we will count that as discharging our promises to commuter transit. That argument just does not wash with me.

I am not issuing ultimatums but, like my colleague from Halton, there are some general requirements that I would like to see met by the government. My support for this bill is somewhat contingent upon their being met. I wish to reiterate them briefly.

First, any federal financial assistance in the fields of urban or commuter transit must exclusively involve Canadian made systems and equipment. We have a pretty good record in this area. Hawker Siddeley of Thunder Bay have a world-wide reputation for making high speed, efficient, light subway trains. General Motors of Canada make most of the buses used by municipal transit systems. I believe they are built in London, Ontario. I am not sure whether the Western Flyer Company is still operating. In any event, they have received considerable orders from municipal transit systems over the past few years.

Second, all federal financial assistance must be allocated within specific time parameters. I touched on this earlier. The federal government cannot get itself into another open-ended spending program. It cannot just write a blank cheque for the provinces and municipalities to go on spending willy-nilly.

This has been done with very good intentions over the past ten or 20 years. We found that the provinces have not been responsible with the federal government's money. As I mentioned earlier, this was one of the main arguments for putting ceilings on medicare expenditures and the negotiation last November with the provinces to give them some of the tax points in return for them operating exclusively the medicare system. The federal financial commitments would not be forthcoming. They would get the money and spend it.

Mr. Leggatt: Mr. Speaker, will the hon. member permit a question at this time?

Mr. Collenette: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt) is always kind and generous. With that kind and generous spirit, I am sure he will recognize that the hour is fast approaching six o'clock. There are other points I would like to make. If the hon. member will take the matter up with me privately, I will be very pleased to answer his questions.

Third, all federal financial assistance given to either Canadian Crown corporations and provincial or municipal transportation systems must receive full credit as an initiative made by the government of Canada. This cannot be regarded as a petty argument.

When dealing with provinces which routinely break faith in federal-provincial agreements it is absolutely necessary that the taxpayers of this country know which particular level of government is granting tax dollars in the field of urban transit, commuter transit, or whatever it may be. Too often moneys are given to the provinces, whether it be 25 per cent, 50 per cent or whatever, and the federal assistance is not acknowledged. Canadians should be informed that this is an initiative taken by the parliament of Canada.

There are other stipulations or suggestions I would make. Stipulations is a very pejorative term, of course. I will say suggestions. Federal financial assistance to urban or commuter transit should pay for capital costs only, not operating costs. This is very important.

Finally, I would propose a re-adjustment of the formula outlined in June, 1974. I mentioned it earlier—25 per cent toward the cost of urban vehicles and 100 per cent toward the cost of commuter vehicles. We should reduce the percentages somewhat.

If we are getting into a period of fixed funding for three or five years, we should scale down the original commitment. However, we should make some commitment. We cannot ignore the promise of assistance to urban and commuter transit acquisitions for municipalities or provinces. It cannot be completely ignored.

I would suggest 10 per cent toward the cost of urban vehicles, 25 per cent toward the cost of commuter vehicles, and 10 per cent toward the cost of new stations and platforms forming part of any commuter system. This is a reasonable compromise.

It was mentioned earlier that we do not have the money to expand urban systems. In the absolute sense that is true, because we are engaged in a period of restraint. However, there is a lot of money for a lot of other programs. I am not talking about those outside the Department of Transport. I would be loath to start chopping at other areas of government expenditures, certainly those I am not as familiar with as transport.

Having been a member of the Transport Committee since my election in 1974, it strikes me that an awful lot of the department's budget could bear further scrutiny. It was only a year and a half or two years ago that the government was prepared to spend $400 million on the Pickering airport. We know that figure was completely unrealistic in light of the final costs of Mirabel, which is rumoured to have cost more than $1 billion. We cannot get a straight figure on how much it costs.

In any event, the government was prepared to spend hundreds of millions of dollars on an airport that had not been fully justified. Sure, it was justified, I believe, by the Gibson inquiry, but many other critics have suggested that the building of a second airport in Toronto would be folly. Nevertheless, money was available at one time.

• (1750)

Money has been available to buy grain cars for the west. I do not want my colleagues from the west to take offence. I realize the government is in a bind. For decades governments in this country have failed to solve the basic problem posed by freight rate levels in western Canada. The railways cannot make a dollar hauling grain. The CP is a private company and I suppose it ought to make a profit. CN is not, but we want CN to make a profit if possible. And we have not been able to do anything but say, "We shall give you the money to buy hopper cars." However, in a rational transportation system the federal government would not be called upon to subsidize the means of conveying goods. These would be provided by the companies themselves.

This brings us to the question of fair tariffs, of fair freight rates, as well as a lot of questions affecting regional development. I know the minister is trying to tackle this aspect. I have been very critical of the government this afternoon but I should like to pay tribute to the minister. I do not agree with him all the time. I know he has received some abuse this afternoon, and I am sure he has received abuse from his own colleagues from time to time. But he has devoted all his considerable mental powers to trying to rationalize the transportation system. I am not saying he has all the answers, but we have to give him credit for trying. For so long, successive governments have really been content to patch up the transportation system.

Where else is money available? I am sure that if I spent a few days, or a few weeks, looking over the transportation budget I could come up with lots more money. There is one example which comes to mind easily and which I see every week when I fly back to Toronto. It is the five or six storey parking garage at Terminal Two. Someone has told me that this is costing $127.5 million, complete with infrastructure of roads and so on. That was just the initial cost, I was told; the final cost will be much higher than that. I think the minister would say it is costing only $40 million. I contend this is quite a large sum when we are thinking in terms of the $50 million mentioned by my hon. friend from Halton.

For too long this government and other governments before it have developed the air system in this country to the exclusion of all others. I agree that air travel is a force for national unity but we have the most highly subsidized, the most expensive airport system in the world. We built Mirabel. Mirabel, according to the minister, is the first airport which will be paid for by a revolving fund through user charges. I suppose this is the user-pay concept.

We have built Terminal One and Terminal Two in Toronto. I see the hon. member for Edmonton Centre (Mr. Paproski) in his place. We have built a fantastic airport in Edmonton. I was there last year. My God, when people from Alberta talk about neglect on the part of the federal government they should go to Edmonton Airport and see what the federal government has done for them. It is scandalous the expenditure which has been made there. And I am sure it is not even needed. Now I hear there is going to be further expansion in Calgary. So there is money available. All that is required is a reallocation of priorities.

I only have three or four minutes left, Mr. Speaker, and I really did want to talk about the rail passenger system. It is particularly appropriate I should do so in the light of the announcement made by the minister in Vancouver this week. I was one who supported the former minister of transport, Mr. Marchand, when he called for the creation of a public Canadian railway passenger corporation which would operate the services now operated by both railroads. I believe this is a forward step. I suppose that what the minister is proposing to do is to give directions to the Canadian Transport Commission to allow certain passenger services in this country to be phased out and replaced by limousines or bus services, the 80 per cent subsidy now paid under the National Transportation Act to be saved, and the money—I suppose it would be around $200 million a year—to form the basis of capital for the Via Canada system. I think there are good arguments in favour of this as long as we do not cut off services to the cities. It doesn't make any sense to run railway services to some of the smaller points in western Canada—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, I regret to interrupt the hon. member but the time allotted to him has expired.

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to join in this debate. I am particularly interested in seeing the rag-tag group across the way calling themselves government supporters. As some of them know, they have been invited to come down and witness for themselves the congestion affecting public transport in Toronto on Monday, March 14, and I sincerely hope that in addition to standing up in the House and guardedly criticizing the government they will turn up on Monday morning, March 14, and start making some of the statements they have been making here today to the press as to how incompetent the government has been with respect to urban transit.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stevens: I personnally invite not only those members opposite but the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald), and the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) to turn up and witness at first hand the congestion the government is leaving the commuter in the Toronto area to experience day in and day out. There are working people, the people who are paying the taxes which the federal treasury is mis-spending.

Perhaps I might continue later, Mr. Speaker.

TV AND RADIO BROADCASTING OF PARLIAMENT

CONCURRENCE IN FIRST REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Mr. Goodale: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, following discussions this afternoon among representatives of all parties and, as well, with the independent member for Moncton (Mr. Jones), I would seek the unanimous consent of the House to deal with the report tabled earlier today from the Special Committee appointed to supervise the implementation of radio and television broadcasting of the proceedings of the House of Commons and its committees. In the first instance, Mr. Speaker, I would seek consent to revert to motions, and I would then ask unanimous consent of the House to move a motion seeking concurrence in that report.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Does the parliamentary secretary have unanimous consent to revert to motions?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Goodale: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I would then seek unanimous consent to move a motion.

Report of Committee

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Does the hon. parliamentary secretary have unanimous consent to move a motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I should point out that my hon. friend from Halton-Wentworth had intended to second the motion, but I do not see him in the House at the moment. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. MacFarlane):

That the first report of the Special Committee appointed to supervise the implementation of radio and television broadcasting of proceedings of the House and its committees, presented earlier this day, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

At 6.02 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

ATOMIC ENERGY OF CANADA LIMITED

PROPOSED JUDICIAL INQUIRY INTO PAYMENT OF AGENT'S FEES TO MR. EISENBERG—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, it has been reported in the news today that the vice-president of the Korea Electric Corporation, the purchaser of the CANDU reactor has said that no agent was used in the sale of the reactor and that the Korea Electric Corporation was specifically instructed by the government of Korea to deal directly with Atomic Energy of Canada, Limited, and the company had in fact complied with these instructions.

Considering that this assertion flatly contradicts testimony that has been presented both by a minister of the Crown and by AECL officials who have contended that not only was an agent essential but also that one was used at a fee of over $18 million, I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That the government order a full judicial inquiry with powers provided by the Inquiries Act to investigate all the circumstances related to the payment of commissions to Mr. Shaul Eisenberg by EACL.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion under Standing Order 43 can be presented for debate only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

SUGGESTED COMMITTEE STUDY OF INCREASE IN TOLLS ON ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to move a motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Whereas, the unilateral action taken by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) to increase the St. Lawrence seaway tolls will seriously and adversely affect our export trade, Canada-United States relations, primary and secondary industries including therein steel, agriculture and coal, to name a few, and will inflict severe irreparable economic hardship on the city of Hamilton and district and over all will increase unemployment.

And whereas, at least the provinces of Ontario, Alberta, Manitoba, Saskatchewan and the Canadian Chamber of Commerce, the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, the Canadian Labour Congress and the Canadian Seafarers' International Union and many others are unilaterally opposed to any increase in tolls. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Halton-Wentworth (Mr. Kempling):

That the issues of the St. Lawrence seaway and financial implications related thereto be referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications for the purposes of identifying the number of direct and indirect economic inter-relationships that exist with respect to the usage of the seaway and further determining whether the raising of tolls is in the best interests of Canada and until a report from the said committee is tabled and reviewed that no further action be taken to introduce a new tariff of tolls.

USE OF DOLLAR ITEMS IN ESTIMATES RATHER THAN LEGISLATION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I ask leave, under Standing Order 43, to present a motion dealing with a matter which many of us feel is of considerable urgency. It came to light yesterday, when the supplementary estimates were tabled, that the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) proposes to deal with Via Rail Canada and the indebtedness of the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority, not with ordinary bills which go through all stages, but by the device of a dollar item in the estimates.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): It also came out that of the 11 items in the estimates under the name of the Minister of Transport, ten are dollar items.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): The minister is afraid to face parliament.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas):

That this House calls on the Minister of Transport to present to parliament separate bills dealing with Via Rail Canada and with the indebtedness of the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority, instead of curtailing the right of parliament to discuss these important issues by using the device of dollar items in the supplementary estimates, it being the view of this House that for one minister to propose eleven supplementary estimates, ten of them as dollar items, is a flagrant violation of the rights of this House.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Pursuant to Standing Order 43 such motion can be presented for debate only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ESTABLISHMENT OF COMMITTEE TO EXAMINE AREAS AFFECTED BY WITHDRAWAL OF FUNDS FOR URBAN TRANSIT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill Kempling (Halton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity regarding the funding of urban transit in the Toronto-Oakville-Milton-Burlington and Hamilton corridor. Under the provisions of Standing Order 43 I move, seconded by the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander):

That this House urges the government to establish a special committee of the House of Commons, to examine the urban transit areas that will be affected by the withdrawal of the $290 million of federal funds recently announced by the Minister of Finance, and, further, that the committee be empowered to examine the $45.1 billion of spending estimates presently before the House with a view to finding $290 million which could be diverted from other projects to urban transit.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): The money could be diverted from the minister's salary.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Pursuant to the Standing Order such motion can only be presented with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN

REASON FOR CURTAILMENT OF FORTHCOMING VISIT

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I rise for the purpose of directing a serious question to the Prime Minister. It has to do with sovereignty, but not the sovereignty of the people as established yesterday in Saskatchewan.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

Mr. Diefenbaker: When Her Majesty was in Kingston during the Olympics, she indicated that she wanted to visit Canada and would spend some time here in the various provinces. She is to spend three weeks in New Zealand and four in Australia. I ask the Prime Minister why, if press reports are correct, she is being limited in Canada to four days in the Ottawa-Hull area? As part of my question I also ask why nothing was done following the statement the Premier of Ontario, made on January 12, that he was inviting the Queen to come to various areas of Ontario? Is the Prime Minister taking the stand now that she should be denied the right to see her Canadian subjects in a way that would enable her thereby to realize the affection in which she is held?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I believe the right hon. gentleman made some mention in his introduction about the Queen expressing the desire and the wish to be in Canada for a few weeks. She certainly has not expressed such a wish to me, Mr. Speaker. Therefore, that is something that is completely false. In so far as her desire to be seen by her Canadian subjects, I would point out that she has been in every part of Canada—except Newfoundland, but every province and territory—at least once and in many cases several times in the past nine years. Certainly, she has come to Canada more often and more regularly since this government has been in power than at any other time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: Her Majesty came under Mr. Pearson's government in 1967 for the Centennial. She came for a provincial centennial in 1969. She came for another centennial in 1970, which is two. She came for another centennial in 1971, which is three. She came twice in 1973, once for the Commonwealth and once, I believe, for another centennial, that of Prince Edward Island, which is five. She came again in 1976 for the Olympics, which is six. She will be coming in 1977, which is seven. She is supposed to come in 1978 for the Edmonton Games, which is eight times in ten years. I do not think the right hon. member should be concerned about Her Majesty not being seen by Canadians.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: Does the Prime Minister not realize that she was here for five or six weeks during the period of my administration? Having given this recital, does he indicate she is in Canada among her own people as Queen of Canada too often? Is that what he means?

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Does this indicate that the Prime Minister a year ago meant what he said that when the constitution came back to Canada we would determine whether we should have the monarchy and he would name the first president of Canada in the person of Jules Leger. That was his speech made in March one year ago. Is he going to deny to the premier of Ontario and to other premiers the right to have Her Majesty in their provinces? Let us get to the present and find out what the Prime Minister's plan is and why he takes so arrogant a stand.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, as far as the premier of Ontario is concerned, it is true he made a suggestion to me that Her Majesty stay longer in Canada and pay a visit to Ontario. I would remind the hon. member, as I did the premier of Ontario, that when she came for the Olympics last year, Her Majesty also visited Ontario. The one province that has not been visited in recent years is Newfoundland. I would think that they have a claim on a visit by Her Majesty before Ontario. It would be our plan to suggest that that visit take place when Her Majesty returns for the Commonwealth Games. It is still believed by a lot of people that Ottawa is a part of Ontario and that Ottawa is the capital of Canada. We feel this is a good way to show to Her Majesty that her visit to Canada on the occasion of her twenty-fifth anniversary is a pleasure to all Canadians including the right hon. member. By insisting that Her Majesty had been here for five or six weeks during his time, is he insinuating that she was here for too long during that visit?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

● (1420)

Mr. Diefenbaker: Let us get away from his evasion.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: I ask him whether, if the premier of Newfoundland would like to have the Queen there, a visit would be permitted? I ask him as well whether he told the premier of Ontario that he did not feel it would be good for the country at this time to have the Queen on a visit?

Mr. Trudeau: No, Mr. Speaker. That is an untruth of the grossest sort such as sometimes one expects on this subject from the right hon. gentleman.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

ATOMIC ENERGY OF CANADA LIMITED

SUGGESTED SUSPENSION OF AGENT'S FEES TO MR. EISENBERG—STATEMENT BY ENERGY MINISTER ON USE OF AGENT IN SALE OF REACTOR TO KOREA

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, I would direct a serious question to the Minister of Finance. In the light of the statement by the vice president of the Korea Electric Corporation, reported today, with reference to the sale of the CANDU reactor to that country that "We have used no agents; it was not necessary", will the minister undertake that all payments due to Mr. Shaul Eisenberg or to his company in connection with the sale be suspended immediately until the Public Accounts Committee is fully satisfied that Mr. Eisenberg actually performed the services he has claimed?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): The obligation lies between Atomic Energy of Canada Limited and the gentleman, or the company, named. I would be prepared to pass on to my colleague, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, the representation made by the leader of the New Democratic Party for his advice, and, in turn, to AECL in this regard.

Mr. Broadbent: I suggest that the cabinet as a whole has the major responsibility in this area and that it cannot be shuffled off in that facile way. On January 27, in reply to a question by myself, the hon. gentleman's colleague stated in the House:

An agent in this kind of transaction is a very important part of securing the transaction. I am told that competition in South Korea for a reactor was vicious.

Would the minister consider that statement made by his colleague in the House and compare it with the following statement by the vice-president of the Korea Electric Corporation which purchased the reactor:

After all, AECL had no competitor at the time and no agent was involved. All negociation was directly with AECL and all correspondence was directly between AECL and Korea Electric.

Given the evident contradiction between these two statements, one made by a Minister of the Crown in the House and the other by the vice-president of the Korean corporation involved, I would ask the Minister of Finance, having regard to his past connection with this matter, whether he stands by the claim made by his colleague when he made the statement, on January 27, which I have just quoted?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Yes, that was certainly the advice we had from the corporation at the time—quite to the contrary there was competition for the reactor with one, if not both, of the United States electrical manufacturing companies.

REQUEST FOR JUDICIAL INQUIRY INTO PAYMENT OF AGENT'S FEES TO MR. EISENBERG

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): A final supplementary, Mr. Speaker, which I will address to the Prime Minister. Considering that the public accounts committee, in part because of the rules established by this House, has been unable to sort out the wheat from the chaff in this very important matter, and considering that today we have had provided a statement by the vice-president of the corporation in Korea that bought the nuclear reactor which flatly contradicts testimony of AECL officials and also flatly contradicts the statement made in this House by a minister of the Crown, would the Prime Minister undertake to set up a full public judicial inquiry into this whole matter?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I would certainly want to look into the subject matter raised by the hon. gentleman and particularly try to ascertain what exactly was said by the Korean gentleman. For my part, if there is a contradiction between the two I will try to ascertain how that can be; but from the point of view of the leader of the New Democratic Party I would say that it seems to me that his choice is very simple. He has not shown that he has very great trust in the Koreans and he has been asking us not to sell our reactor to them. Therefore, if he is forced to this choice, I suppose he would be forced to admit that ministers are more trustworthy than the persons concerned.

PROPOSED CANCELLATION OF MR. EISENBERG'S AGENCY CONTRACT

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question on this matter which I would also direct to the Prime Minister. Because AECL has retained Shaul Eisenberg and the UDI group of companies of Israel to be the exclusive agents for the sale of a second CANDU reactor to Korea, and in view of what is reported in today's Toronto Daily Star in direct quotes by Mr. Sung Nack Chung, vice-president of Korea Electric, to the effect that Korean government policy is not to use any commercial agent and that in fact one was not used in the sale of the first CANDU reactor, would the Prime Minister take it upon himself either to cancel or to consider cancelling the contractual business relationship which now exists between AECL and the Eisenberg group of companies, especially for the sale of the next CANDU reactor in Korea?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): It would seem to me, Mr. Speaker, that this question can only be answered in the way I answered the question of the leader of the New Democratic Party. We have an allegation in a quote in a newspaper of some gentleman whom I am sure none of us in this House has ever heard of before. I would at least have to find out a little more about this before in any way doubting that officials of AECL or a minister of this government have not told the exact facts as they know them to be. I will look into the matter.

INDUSTRY

PROPOSED AMENDMENT OF LEGISLATION TO INCLUDE SHOES UNDER TEXTILE AND CLOTHING COMMISSION

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

Recently the minister received a long brief from the Canadian Footwear Manufacturers Association indicating, among other things, that 55 per cent of the Canadian footwear market is supplied by imports, increasing unemployment insurance applicants by 25,000 workers from one of the oldest industries in Canada. Does the minister intend to amend the Textile and Clothing Board Act so that the footwear industry can be included in its jurisdiction with a view to imposing quantitative restrictions to imports and, if not, what does he intend to do to avoid the bankruptcy of that important Canadian industry?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I looked into the possibility of bringing the problem of the footwear industry under the umbrella of the Textile and Clothing Board, but that would require the adoption of a new act. Having discussed the matter with the industry, we agreed to refer the matter to the Anti-dumping Board in such a way that the latter can give priority to a study of the problem and make recommendations to the government. That proposal was made to the industry some ten days ago. Since then, I have been in touch with my colleague, the Minister of Finance, who guaranteed his cooperation and that of the Anti-dumping Board with a view to finding a solution to the problem as soon as possible.

ATOMIC ENERGY OF CANADA LIMITED

STEPS TO ENSURE DOCUMENTATION FOR PAYMENT OF AGENT'S FEE TO MR. EISENBERG

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is supplementary to the earlier questions directed to the Prime Minister. Now that the vice president of Korea Electric Company has cast doubt on the active role of Shaul Eisenberg as an agent in the sale of a nuclear power plant to South Korea, and in view of the fact that the former president and the current president of AECL both testified before the Standing Committee on Public Accounts that Mr. Eisenberg is worth every cent of the $18 million fee, a sentiment that was endorsed by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, will the Prime Minister say what further steps the government is prepared to take to ensure that full documentation to support that $18 million payment in public funds is provided for the Public Accounts Committee and for the House at this time?

● (1430)

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we will try to ascertain whether the quotes were accurate and what exactly was said by the gentlemen, and if there is indeed a contradiction between the two positions, I will see what further action can be taken in order to comply with the lady's concern.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

REASON FOR FAILURE OF FORCE TO OBTAIN INFORMATION ON USE OF AGENTS IN SALE OF NUCLEAR REACTORS

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General. I should like to ask the minister why it is, given the fact that the Prime Minister, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and indeed all members of the government have said many times they want to get to the bottom of the case and the RCMP was asked to investigate it, a reporter from a newspaper can go to Korea and get this sort of information while the RCMP was not able to get it and lay it before the Public Accounts Committee?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): The investigation by the RCMP into the question which was referred to by the Department of Justice is an ongoing investigative matter.

Mr. Gillies: I should like to ask the Solicitor General if he does not think that by this time, when we have these sorts of reports coming in from reporters, the RCMP should at least have such reports. Can he tell the House when he will report to the House or to the Public Accounts Committee on that investigation?

Mr. Fox: Investigations carried out by the RCMP pertain to matters relating to the criminal law. If there is any evidence of a criminal offence committed in this country by Canadian citizens which can be brought to the attention of Canadian courts, the investigation will proceed in the normal fashion and charges will be laid in the normal course.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

ALLEGATIONS OF PAY-OFFS BY BOEING—REQUEST FOR REPORT ON INVESTIGATION

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence. Last night the minister was asked about reports that the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission, in its investigation of the Boeing Company for alleged pay-offs to officials of foreign governments and foreign airlines, was examining Boeing sales made to Canada in 1970-71. The minister said that he would be discussing this matter this morning with his Assistant Deputy Minister, Materiel, and the Minister of Supply and Services. Can the minister tell the House what the outcome of this discussion was, whether he feels there should be any further investigation and whether he has requested more information from the Securities and Exchange Commission?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I have to get more information on the basis of the reports which the Securities and Exchange Commission has. Until there is evidence of impropriety, there is no point in holding a full scale investigation. In the interim, however, my officials are making the files secure so that they are available and all evidence of people who were involved at that time is collected so that, in the event of an inquiry, all necessary information will be ready and available.

Mr. McKinnon: May I point out that the minister did not answer my final question, whether he would request more information from the Securities and Exchange Commission.

AIR CANADA

ALLEGATIONS OF IMPROPER PAYMENTS TO COMPANY BY BOEING—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): I should like to direct my supplementary question to the Minister of Transport. Will the minister tell the House what action, if any, he has taken or is taking with respect to the allegations that Boeing may have made improper payments to facilitate the sales of its planes to Air Canada during the period 1968 to 1974?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Air Canada took action immediately upon hearing the allegations to determine if there appeared to be any connection between the allegations and anyone connected with Air Canada. So far, that investigation indicates that there is no such connection. Of course, we will jointly want to seek whatever other information may be available beyond what has been obtained up to this point.

TOURISM

MEASURES TO STIMULATE INTERNATIONAL TRAVEL

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, if he would be so good as to return to his seat.

Mr. Trudeau: Don't be so pompous, George.

An hon. Member: Vite, vite, vite.

Mr. Hees: As this country had a record deficit in international travel last year amounting to $1.25 billion, despite the fact that we hosted the 1976 Olympics, by far the greatest tourist attraction anywhere in the world last year, would the minister take the first opportunity on motions to outline to the House just what he and his department intend to do to restore international travel to a positive basis in this country?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, in December last year I held a federal-provincial conference on that matter with all provincial ministers responsible for tourism. We discussed that very serious problem which resulted in a considerable debit balance for tourism. We have yet to find a practical solution. Of course, it would be hard these days to deny Canadians the possibility of getting a bit of sun in Florida. Unfortunately I have been told that the weather this winter was not particularly favourable in that region, so I hope it will be better next year. I am convinced that many Americans will come to visit us with great pleasure.

[English]

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, that was about the weakest answer I have ever heard in the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hees: As we rely completely on the weather, on the grace of God and on a few other things to restore things to the proper level, I ask the minister whether he would not agree that Canada has a tremendous number of attractions to bring people here to this country to spend their tourist dollars, and would he therefore not take some positive action to advertise throughout the world and in other ways make it possible for Canada to have a positive balance in this important field?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, as a matter of fact we have an advertisement program in the United States and elsewhere to invite tourists to visit Canada. We are doing a lot of advertising in the United States, in England and in various other countries. However no one can deny that the tourist season in Canada is much shorter than in other countries and since Canadian citizens are even more wealthy because of the good administration of this government, an increasing number of them can afford to go to California or Florida.

Mr. Hees: Would he mind substituting action for mere words.

NATIONAL CAPITAL COMMISSION

PARTICIPATION OF QUEBEC IN COST OF HIGHWAY NETWORK FOR THE REGION

Mr. Thomas H. Lefebvre (Pontiac): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Urban Affairs, who is also in charge of the National Capital Commission.

As the dispute over contracts for the construction of a regional sewage treatment plant in western Quebec seems on its way to settlement, could the minister tell the House whether the government of Quebec intends to go on sharing with the NCC the cost of improvements to the national capital highway network so that users would at least be provided with adequate and modern highways?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the hon. member for having given me notice of this question, which allowed me to check this whole issue with the NCC authorities. I learned that in fact a letter had been sent to the Quebec intergovernmental affairs department in early January, 1977 informing Quebec authorities that some $12 million were made available by the federal government for the improvement of the highway network in western Quebec. As we know, according to a federal-provincial agreement of some $300 million, the federal government is prepared to pay 50 per cent of the bill for upgrading this road system. However, we have not yet received any answer from this good and true government.

PLANS FOR COMPLETION OF OTTAWA RIVER PARKWAY— REQUEST FOR REPORT

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question to the same minister. In view of the importance of roads, which was mentioned by the hon. member who just resumed his seat, and in view of the importance of the quality of life, the movement of traffic and the general enhancement of the national capital, would the minister look into reactivating plans for the completion of the National Capital Commission parkway along the Ottawa River? I understand the engineering has been completed and this parkway is important to the development of facilities at the corner of Baseline Road and Woodroffe Avenue in the Township of Nepean.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Nickel Belt.

PUBLIC SERVICE

PROPOSED GOVERNMENT TEMPORARY HELP AGENCY— PROTECTION OF RIGHTS OF TEMPORARY EMPLOYEES— ONTARIO "GO TEMPORARY" PROGRAM

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board. In view of the fact that the use of temporary help in government departments supplied by private employment agencies does not involve man-year authorization, and in view of the fact that estimates suggest that millions of dollars could be saved for Canadian taxpayers if the government would put into operation its own temporary help agency, can the minister tell the House if he is now prepared to go ahead with plans for a temporary help agency under the auspices of the Public Service Commission?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, the answer to that at the present time is no. There are certain cost benefit analyses which indicate it is not the wisest decision to make. There still is a possibility, but at the present time we are not entertaining any ideas that we proceed on that basis.

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that people hired through private agencies get only one-half to two-thirds of the amount the government pays for them, compared with 95 per cent under the Ontario government's Go Temporary program, and in view of the fact that employees under the Ontario program have the right to compete for jobs in the civil service, unlike those hired through temporary help agencies, and in view of the fact that section 41 of the International Labour Code calls for the elimination of profit-making, fee-charging employment agencies, would the minister at least tell the House what steps his department is considering to protect the interests of people the government hires through these private employment agencies?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, all those factors were taken into consideration in the examinations which led to the decision not to proceed at this time. Private agencies are legitimate businesses. There are certain circumstances under which they obviously must charge in excess of the amount the employee gets in order to cover overhead costs and administrative costs. This is a stand-by service which is available on occasions when it is needed by the government and by other employers, so on balance at the present time the decision seems to be reasonable.

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Speaker, in view of what the minister has said it is fairly obvious that his officials have been snowed by private temporary agencies. Is the minister at least prepared to look at the Go Temporary program in the province of Ontario to see if the same kind of savings which were made there could also be made at the federal level?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, we have looked at the Go Temporary operation of the Ontario government, and if I could dig a little bit below the surface I would be glad to elaborate on that when I have an occasion to go into detail. It is not the rosy picture the hon. member portrays.

ALLEGED PROMISE OF FINANCING FOR EDMONTON SUBWAY SYSTEM—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Finance. On Friday last I asked him a question with regard to the rejection or the repudiation by the government of the 1974 electoral promise about $290 million for modern urban transit. At that time I asked him about Edmonton in particular, and the minister replied that he would have to look into this matter for greater precision. Is he now in a position to indicate his stand with regard to the undertakings given to authorities in the city of Edmonton?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have to apologize to the hon. gentleman. I do not yet have the information at hand. I will make a point of finding out overnight, and I will be glad to respond tomorrow.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, as the announcement yesterday indicated, the question of arranging these increases by agreement is a matter of negotiation, so it is not a matter at this point of talking about a commitment.

THE CONSTITUTION

ALLEGED STATEMENT OF MEMBER ON DISTRIBUTION OF POWERS—POSITION OF GOVERNMENT

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the right hon. Prime Minister.

Last Monday the hon. member for Montmorency stated before the Beauport Chamber of Commerce that, given the new autonomist trend expressed quite openly by several provinces, it seemed to him very plausible that matters such as communications, culture, immigration, urban affairs, manpower, social policy and agriculture could become exclusive provincial jurisdictional matters, I would like to ask the Prime Minister whether he himself and his government fully endorse the intentions or views expressed by the member, and whether he spoke on his own behalf or on behalf of the party?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as I said, the government I am leading, with the support of the hon. member for Montmorency and many others, is prepared to re-open the constitutional debate on that matter by starting off back at square one. If the opposition parties are really interested in discussing that matter, I shall be very glad to re-open the debate. I should like simply to repeat to the hon. member that in the last seven or eight years my government has made several proposals designed to set up a new power sharing, taking part in a debate on the Senate, the Supreme Court, the spending power, guaranteed cultural and language rights for Quebecers, constitutional guarantee for bilingualism, and many other issues.

I even wrote to the premier of Quebec asking him a very simple question: yes or no, did he want to patriate the constitution or would he rather launch the debate first on the issue of power sharing? Mr. Lévesque has yet to answer me. Apparently Mr. Morin has stated that he was waiting for the reply of the other provinces before giving his. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that the Quebec government should know where it is heading in respect of that matter and at least start by answering the letters that it gets.

Mr. La Salle: Mr. Speaker, considering the reply of the Prime Minister, I would like to have a clear answer and know whether the statement made by the hon. member for Montmorency is an indication that the government is prepared to negotiate with the provinces the redistribution of jurisdictions referred to by this hon. member.

Mr. Trudeau: Of course, Mr. Speaker, I said so in Quebec City. The question is which level of government will best meet the people's needs. These matters can be discussed and government members have their own views. I do not know whether this is also true for the members of the opposition, but we will find out if we have a debate on this.

FINANCE

VALUE OF CANADIAN DOLLAR—POSSIBILITY OF FURTHER DECLINE—ADEQUACY OF RESERVES OF UNITED STATES FUNDS

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Finance. With the Canadian dollar having fallen to the 95 cent range, having fallen again to 95.75 cents, while $570 million has been drained from our international reserve fund so far this year, in an attempt to smooth out irregularities in the dollar's fall, would the minister indicate if he feels it is likely the dollar will continue to be under pressure and to fall further, or has he been advised that it will likely stabilize at this level, as it has been reported that the Bank of Canada would like to see it hover in the 96 cent range for at least two or three months?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, as I have indicated repeatedly to the hon. gentleman, it has not been the policy of the government, with a floating exchange rate, to indicate any particular preferred level for the dollar.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, with $565 million having been drained from our United States dollar reserves, a 16 per cent drop since December, leaving about $2.8 billion in such reserves, would the minister indicate if he feels our reserves are adequate, bearing in mind that the present Canadian short-term borrowing position in the United States is about $5.4 billion and the estimated working capital alone of U.S. corporate affiliates in this country is about $6 billion?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I believe I rightly transmit the opinion of the Bank of Canada that the reserves are adequate.

● (1450)

ALLEGED PRESSURE ON PROVINCES TO REFRAIN FROM CONVERTING UNITED STATES DOLLAR PROCEEDS OF DEBT ISSUES

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Is the minister aware that the Bank of Canada has been using moral suasion on the provinces, including Quebec, asking them to refrain from converting United States dollar proceeds from debt issues that they have placed—refrain from converting them into Canadian dollars until the time is ripe and if so, will the minister indicate why it is necessary at the present time?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I would be glad to see if there is any truth at all in the hon. member's allegation.

[Mr. Trudeau.]

ACCURACY OF STATISTICS ON PAYMENTS TO QUEBEC—REQUEST FOR STATISTICS ON PAYMENTS TO OTHER PROVINCES

Mr. F. A. Philbrook (Halton): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. In view of a recent private report which stated that the province of Quebec made a $3 billion profit from confederation last year, and in view of the fact that such statistics seem hard to come by, may I ask the minister if in his opinion this might be accurate and in a spirit of fairness to the province of Quebec, are the corresponding figures available for the other provinces?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, just before I came into the House I had a chance to look briefly at the article to which the hon. member referred. Many of the figures of course are available from currently published figures of the government of Canada, particularly with regard to taxation and public transfers. Some of the figures involved in the account represent judgments by the author of the article as to how certain elements such as value of payrolls and national debt should be divided between the provinces. This is necessarily an arbitrary area and there is great difficulty making the calculation. I would say probably it would not be helpful to attempt to do that for all the provinces. Personally, I look upon Canada as being something more than a good balance sheet from one province to another.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, my question for the government House leader follows on some of the earlier questions. I should like to ask the hon. gentleman when he is going to initiate a system of providing information to this country so that we will not have a repetition of the shameful situation today with regard to the CANDU and Boeing matters, when we in this parliament and in this country had to go outside Canada to find out what is going on in the country?

May I ask if an investigation has been started and has the minister instructed his people to find out the name of the company and the people involved in that company who got that rebate in Canada and not overseas? Surely we can investigate that.

Yesterday in answer to a question put by the hon. member for Red Deer in reference to rebates that are questioned and questionable in evidence given in the Public Accounts Committee, she said she would certainly make sure it will be looked into. What investigation is her department carrying on to find out the same of this company, the people involved, and what kind of rebate was paid to a company in western Canada?

TRANSPORT

BRITISH COLUMBIA RAILWAYS—PROPOSED TAKE-OVER BY CANADIAN NATIONAL—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. Some time ago, I asked him if he could inform us whether he is examining the prospects of allowing the CNR to take over ownership of British Columbia railways. Would the minister be in a position today to enlighten the House and the people of British Columbia, in light of the intensive discussions that have been going on with that government and its officials, whether the federal government through the CNR or any other agency is prepared to participate in the creation of an infrastructure and resource access in northeastern British Columbia? Can he tell us whether the arrangements that have been worked out include the assumption of ownership of some or all the assets of British Columbia railways?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, of course we are very interested in the development of resources in northern British Columbia and are discussing the various possible routes to accomplish that with British Columbians. We have not had discussions, beyond the mere mention of the subject, of any change in the ownership or operation of the British Columbia railroad. The British Columbia government, of course, has created a commission in connection with that railway operation and I imagine anything to be done would await the outcome of that.

Mr. Oberle: Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question. Could I ask the minister under what time frame the officials of his department and other departments of government would be working, particularly in light of the serious economic situation in central northern British Columbia and the rest of Canada? Will it be this year, this month or later?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, that question is very broad. There are many things going on such as recent development in respect of progress on the northland road agreement in connection with the so-called northeast coal development. There are ongoing discussions with several federal departments and officials of British Columbia and with interested companies. We are looking at all aspects of the question. There is work going on on the ground with relation to the potential route for future rail development. I could go on but there is a tremendous amount being done.

TRANSFER OF ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY DEBT—POSSIBLE RESULTANT EXPANSION OF REGIONAL INEQUITIES

Mr. Ron Huntington (Capilano): Mr. Speaker, my question to the Minister of Transport is supplementary to those asked by the hon. member for Halifax yesterday. Could the minister tell the House how the regions which have honoured their interest payments on public investment and which have relatively low debt will be compensated in light of the transfer of debt to equity on the St. Lawrence Seaway? In other words, is the minister not expanding regional inequities by rewarding the big spenders at the expense of those who have been responsible for a good return on investment.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I continue to find it delightful that in the Conservative party there are such distinctively different views on how they handle this particular issue.

An hon. Member: Answer the question.

Mr. Lang: The non-payment of interest was something which was particularly associated with the right hon. gentleman some time ago. What is being done in the proposed restructuring is facing the real situation and making it more realistic in the way it is carried. The interest which was not charged, and therefore was not charged against the goods over the last 20 years, surely should not be charged against the goods of today and into the future. That is the explanation for treating that interest that way.

HARBOURS

WEST COAST PORTS—EXPECTED RETURN ON EQUITY

Mr. Ron Huntington (Capilano): The minister told the House he would be looking for an equity return on the restructured system. May I ask if he expects only a one per cent return on equity from the port of Vancouver and if so, will surplus earnings from west coast ports remain for the credit and use of those west coast ports?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, in connection with the new port policy a level of return initially around that level is contemplated. I would be pleased to hear further advice from different parts of the House on that.

[Mr. Lang.]

CRIMINAL CODE

POSSIBLE CHANGE IN PROVISIONS CONCERNING MARIJUANA—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, may I put a question to the Minister of Justice? In view of the statement by the attorney general of Ontario yesterday that the federal government has ducked the marijuana issue and as a result the public has been misled into believing that the marijuana laws are being enforced and the federal government has been irresponsible in that it has done nothing about it, is it the intention of the minister to decriminalize marijuana and if so, when?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I note the various remarks the attorney general made in the last 24 hours and his known ability in hockey. I would think that he has been doing some clever stick handling himself on the subject in the last 24 hours.

• (1500)

Mr. Hees: Now let us have an answer, Ron.

Mr. Epp: Is it yes, or no, Ron?

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, the Minister of National Health and Welfare, the Solicitor General and I have been actively considering the position put forward by the Senate some time ago in Bill S-19 and considering in what form the bill should be re-introduced into the House. We are in the process of making recommendations to our colleagues, and will be doing so shortly.

Mr. Gilbert: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Does the Minister of Justice agree with the attorney general of Ontario, that if marijuana is legalized, its sale should be regulated as the sale of liquor is regulated under the Ontario Liquor laws?

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, I would not want—

Mr. Woolliams: To commit yourself.

Mr. Basford: —to comment on what the provincial attorney general suggested, either with respect to the sale and distribution of marijuana or the distribution of liquor, which is clearly within his jurisdiction. As he clearly indicated we shall have to make a decision as to what the provisions of the Narcotic Control Act or the Food and Drugs Act ought to be, and we are now in the process of so doing.

FOREIGN INVESTMENT REVIEW AGENCY

DECISION ON TAKE-OVER OF JASPER SKY-TRAMS BY BREWSTER

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. I wonder if the minister can advise the House if he has received a recommendation from the Foreign Investment Review Agency regarding the proposed take-over of Jasper Sky-Trams by Brewster Transport, a wholly-owned subsidiary of Greyhound of the U.S.A. What was the recommendation of FIRA and what is the policy of the government of Canada concerning the foreign acquisition of facilities in Canadian national parks?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the application was rejected this morning.

Mr. Hees: I'll bet it was done five minutes ago, Jean, otherwise you knew you would get hell.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, judging by the noise, one would think it was Friday. It being Thursday, may I ask my colleague, the government House leader, what business he proposes for the balance of this week, and can he tell us what will happen next week as far as he can determine?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, today we shall continue debating the amendments to the National Transportation Act. Tomorrow is an allotted day. If today's debate does not conclude, we shall continue it on Monday. Tuesday is to be another allotted day, and on Wednesday I propose to call the report stage and third reading of the amendments to the Social Security Act.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on the same point of order. I assume that when the minister announced Tuesday as an allotted day, he was saying that it is to be so designated. That day has been assigned to our party. Also, may I ask him the question I asked this morning during the House leaders' meeting. He may tell me that I know the answer. Perhaps some day we will get a responsible answer. Where, on his list of items of business, is Bill C-30 having to do with Heritage Day?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, the Heritage Day bill is on the list, but far down because we missed the crucial date for 1977. It will probably be called when there is some understanding amoung the parties that we can deal with it quickly.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, since there is considerable speculation about who stands in the way of the passing of the bill, will the minister call it in an attempt to find out if there is any opposition, because he knows that we want to pass it quickly.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a different point of order. I am sure the Minister of National Revenue would not want to leave the wrong impression. I appreciate that anything a company or person includes on an income tax form is confidential, and I am sure the minister, as well as the Solicitor General understood that my questions about rebates and pay-offs involving a western Canadian company had nothing to do with confidentiality under the Income Tax Act. I refer to a short answer given in committee involving a customer who has a subsidiary in western Canada and to whom one of those questionable rebates was paid. I am sure the Minister of National Revenue would not want to hide behind the income tax regulations by suggesting that something questionable and illegal is confidential.

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Revenue): On the same point of order, Mr. Speaker, I should like to insist that Section 241—I may have said 231—of the Income Tax Act deals with the confidentiality of information concerning Canadians' incomes.

I suggest—and I feel that the matter is serious enough to insist on this—that the Minister of National Revenue must see to it that Canadian taxpayers are not deprived of sums of money which belong to the public treasury. It is my duty to demand, in the case of pay-offs, that the instructions issued by my department be strictly enforced, that the names and addresses of all agents as well as the reasons for all expenses be submitted, and that the amounts payable to the Department of National Revenue on these pay-offs be duly paid.

When we have reasons to suspect someone, we carry out an investigation within my department, as provided under the Income Tax Act, or in conjunction with the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, and it is only when we feel that the evidence warrants it that we lay charges under the Criminal Code through the Minister of Justice or under the Income Tax Act. Then and only then is the information made public.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT, 1971

AMENDMENT TO INCLUDE IN INSURABLE EMPLOYMENT PERSONS BETWEEN AGE 65 AND 70 UNDER CERTAIN CONDITIONS

Mr. Jacques Lavoie (Hochelaga) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-403, to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971 (disentitlement by age or pension).

Mr. Speaker, in short this bill tends to correct injustice towards senior citizens and enable them to get, as they did before 1976, unemployment insurance benefits, that is to say according to the number of weeks they were entitled to.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

FOREIGN AID PROHIBITION ACT

MEASURE TO PROHIBIT AID TO COUNTRIES VIOLATING HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-404, to prohibit aid to foreign countries violating human rights.

An hon. Member: Explain.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to guarantee the historical commitment of Canada to fundamental human rights and liberties. It would ensure that Canada does not, by means of economic aid or benefit, give support to any regime which consistently violates the basic norms of human dignity. It is similar to at least three items of legislation passed by the United States Congress between 1974 and 1976 and the initiative taken last week by the Carter administration.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

TABLING OF LETTER FROM COMMISSIONER EXPRESSING WISH TO RESIGN, AND REPLY OF PRIME MINISTER

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, with your permission I would seek to return to the item of tabling of documents. I have a document which concerns the House. It has to do with the Commissioner of Official Languages. I apologize for not having caught Your Honour's eye at the proper moment.

Mr. Speaker: Does the House agree to return to tabling of documents?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, under Standing Order 41(2) I would like to table, in both official languages, copies of a letter from the Commissioner of Official Languages expressing his wish to resign that position, and my reply to him.

[Translation]

My answer is self-explanatory. However all members of the House will surely wish to join me in paying a sincere tribute to Mr. Spicer for his outstanding contribution for promoting better understanding between all Canadians.

AGRICULTURE

REFERENCE TO COMMITTEE OF MARKETING OF BEEF AND VEAL

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, there is a motion standing in my name referring an agricultural item to the Standing Committee on Agriculture. I have had some discussions and I understand that this motion would pass without debate. I move:

That the Standing Committee on Agriculture inquire into the marketing of beef and veal and for that purpose that it review the report of the "Commission of Inquiry into the Marketing of Beef and Veal, 1976".

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

TRENDS IN MOVEMENT BY LANGUAGE GROUPING

Question No. 333—Mr. Herbert:

1. Does the government concern itself with movement in and out of the Province of Quebec by language grouping?

2. Other than immigration policies, are any measures taken to promote or control movement on the basis of language spoken?

3. Is any information sought between the times of the taking of the census to indicate trends in movement by language of the family?

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Department of the Secretary of State and Statistics Canada as follows: 1. No. However, Bulletin 92-745 ((1.5-5) Table 13) of the 1971 Census of Canada provides data on the population five years and over by migration status, official language, age groups and sex for Canada and the provinces. It shows for example the number of persons who have moved into the Province of Quebec, cross-classified by official language, age groups and sex. No data are published for persons moving out of Quebec by language groups but this could be made available by a special tabulation.

2. Not applicable.

3. Population estimates are made for Canada and the Province for intercensal years, and are based upon births, deaths, inter-provincial migration, immigration and emigration. However, none of these data are classified by language.

FORMER SENIOR CIVIL SERVANTS HIRED UNDER CONTRACT

Question No. 371—Mr. McKinnon:

1. How many former senior members of the Department of National Defence were put on contract by the government on their retirement from the Public Service in (a) 1972 (b) 1973 (c) 1974 (d) 1975 and, in each case (i) what was his or her salary at the time of retirement (ii) for how many years was he or she in the Public Service?

[Mr. Abbott.]

2. For each such contract, what was (a) its purpose (b) its duration (c) its amount and to whom was it paid?

3. How did the daily rate on contract compare with the daily rate on salary in each case?

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): In so far as the Department of National Health and Welfare is concerned: 1. (a) None; (b) None; (c) None; (d) One (1975-76 fiscal year); (i) $30,500 to $37,000; (ii) 23 years.

2. (a) To provide consulting services with respect to the development of guidelines in health research requirements. (b) 1975-76 fiscal year. (c) An amount of $12,125 was paid to the contractor, Dr. R. Bromiley.

3. The per diem rate on contract was $125. The per diem rate on salary was approximately $130.

In so far as the Ministry of State for Urban Affairs is concerned: 1. (a) None; (b) None; (c) One;)i) $23,500 to $30,000; (ii) 21 years; (d) None.

2. (a) To provide consultation on matters relating to property management and development. (b) The contract was for 185 working days over 23 months, of which only 109.5 working days were actually used. (c) The total amount of the contract was $27,750; the actual amount paid was $16,400. The recipient was the contractor, F. D. Millar.

3. The per diem rate on contract was $150. The per diem rate on salary was approximately $125.

All other departments and agencies have submitted Nil replies to this question.

TRANSFER OF EMPLOYEES

Question No. 652—Mr. Lachance:

Between the date of the presentation of the last budget May 25, 1976 and October 12, 1976, did the Ministry of State for Science and Technology,

National Research Council of Canada, Science Council of Canada, Canadian Patents and Development Limited, the Department of the Secretary of State, Public Archives of Canada, National Library of Canada, National Arts Centre Corporation, Bilingual Districts Advisory Board, Canada Council, National Museums of Canada, National Film Board, Canadian Film Development Corporation and Canadian Broadcasting Corporation (including term contracts) hire, dismiss or transfer employees to other departments and, if so, how many?

NOTE: The figure given for appointments includes vacation relief, temporary and Olympics staff who did not become part of the CBC's permanent establishment. The number of people who left the Corporation in the same period was 1461.

SASKATCHEWAN URANIUM REFINERY SITE

Question No. 820—Mr. Hnatyshyn:

Is Eldorado Nuclear Limited, a Crown corporation, considering sites in Saskatchewan for a uranium refinery and, if so (a) what sites are currently under consideration (b) have environmental impact studies been commissioned for each location and, if so (i) with whom in each instance have such studies been commissioned (ii) at what cost (iii) on what date will the studies be submitted (iv) will they be made public (v) what are the terms of reference for the studies (c) have any studies other than of an environmental nature been commissioned and, if so (i) with whom (ii) what are the terms of reference (iii) what is the cost?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): (a) Eldorado Nuclear Limited has publicly announced that it has acquired options to purchase 1,200 acres near Warman, Saskatchewan, so that detailed environmental studies can be conducted to determine whether the site would be suitable for a uranium refinery. (b) Arrangements for these studies now are being completed, and will be announced in early 1977. Prior to selecting the Warman site for more detailed environmental assessment, the Company conducted certain preliminary examinations of 14 possible refinery locations in 11 areas of the province. These preliminary studies were conducted with the assistance of Cambrian Engineering Ltd., which in turn retained the services of the Saskatchewan Research Council as environmental consultants.

Order Paper Questions

SASKATCHEWAN URANIUM REFINERY SITE

Question No. 821—Mr. Hnatyshyn:

On what date is it expected that Eldorado Nuclear Limited will announce the selection of a site in Saskatchewan for the construction of a uranium refinery?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Eldorado Nuclear Limited has publicly announced that it has acquired options to purchase 1,200 acres near Warman, Saskatchewan, so that detailed environmental studies can be conducted to determine whether the site would be suitable for a uranium refinery. These studies will begin in early 1977, and because of their comprehensive nature must examine a wide range of environmental factors over four seasons. The results of these studies will be published in the spring of 1978 in the form of an Environmental Impact Statement, as required by the environmental assessment guidelines and criteria established by the Governments of Canada and Saskatchewan. Both Governments also require that the Environmental Impact Statements be subject to public hearings, and that the public be given ample opportunity to examine the complete assessment documentation prior to the public hearings. The approval process is expected to take upwards of six months. During this period, the Company must also complete its evaluation of the amount and metallurgical nature of the potential supply of concentrates from new uranium mine-mill operations in the northern part of Saskatchewan, and reassess at that time the potential markets for refined uranium products. Therefore, because of all these factors the Company will not be in a position until the latter part of 1978, at the earliest, to announce whether it will proceed with applications to various authorities, including the Atomic Energy Control Board, for authority to construct a refinery at Warman.

SASKATCHEWAN URANIUM REFINERY PRODUCTS

Question No. 836—Mr. Hnatyshyn:

What products does Eldorado Nuclear Limited plan to produce in a proposed uranium refinery in the Province of Saskatchewan, and will any such products intended for the export market be subject to government regulations?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Eldorado Nuclear Limited has not yet determined whether a uranium refinery will be constructed in Saskatchewan or, if it will, what particular products will be produced. However, the environmental assessment now being arranged for a potential refinery site at Warman, Saskatchewan, assumes for the purposes of the comprehensive feasibility study being conducted that such a refinery would produce uranium hexafluoride as well as other intermediate forms of uranium. The product "mix" from a uranium refinery in Saskatchewan would depend on future market requirements as well as on the nature of uranium concentrates then available from Saskatchewan mines. Any products exported from such a refinery would require export permits under the Atomic Energy Control Act.

Order Paper Questions

NATIONAL DEFENCE—EQUIPMENT—PURCHASE OF ARMOURED CARS

Question No. 852—Mr. Rodriguez:

1. Is the government still negotiating for the purchase of armoured cars for the Canadian Armed Forces and, if so (a) with what countries or corporations (b) what departments or agencies are involved and what is their role (c) what (i) is the nature of the machinery being evaluated (ii) are the costs involved (d) what considerations are involved when deciding from whom to purchase?

2. If a decision has been made (a) what was it (b) how was it reached?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of National Defence): 1. Negotiations have been completed. (a) General Motors has entered into an agreement with the Swiss Mowag Company to have the vehicles built in Canada under licence. (b) Department of National Defence, Department of Supply and Services—Negotiation of the terms of contract; Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce—Evaluation of the project to ensure the highest practicable Canadian content is included in any contract with the manufacturer. (c) (i) Evaluation has been completed. (ii) Costs for vehicles, associated armament, repair parts, training and training equipment, ammunition, tools, federal sales tax, and transportation costs is estimated to be approximately $234 million. (d) Considerations which led to the decisions to purchase from Mowag were based on cost effectiveness, operational and technical requirements.

2. (a) As a result of tests conducted in Canada, it was decided to purchase the Swiss Mowag Piranha 6x6, to be built in Canada by General Motors which has entered into an agreement with the Swiss Mowag Company for manufacturing this vehicle under licence. (b) See part 1(d) above.

SASKATCHEWAN URANIUM REFINERY SITE INFORMATION PROGRAMME

Question No. 853—Mr. Hnatyshyn:

1. Has Eldorado Nuclear Limited, a Crown corporation, or any other agency on its behalf, undertaken any measures designed to inform or educate residents in the vicinity of any proposed site in the Province of Saskatchewan where the corporation intends to construct a uranium refinery?

2. Have residents in the vicinity of any proposed site on which Eldorado Nuclear Limited may build a uranium refinery been taken by the corporation or any agency of the government or the Government of Saskatchewan to view any other uranium refinery and, if so, what are the (a) details of such trips (b) costs involved?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): 1. Eldorado Nuclear Limited is committed to a comprehensive information program with regard to its activities and plans in Saskatchewan. In this connection, the Company has recently opened an office in Saskatoon, and has issued a number of press releases concerning its capital expenditure program at Beaverlodge and the environmental assessment of a potential refinery site at Warman, north of Saskatoon. This program of public information will be accelerated during 1977, and in the spring of 1978 the Company will publish the detailed results of its Environmental Impact assessment. This report will be subject to public hearings, and no decision to proceed with any such refinery will be made until the public concerned has had ample opportunity to examine these studies and express a view on the project.

[Mr. Gillespie.]

2. Certain landowners in the Warman area visited the Company's refinery at Port Hope, Ontario during negotiations for options on ther property. These negotiations were conducted on behalf of Eldorado Nuclear Limited by the Saskatchewan Economic Development Corporation, and arrangements for the Port Hope visit were made by the latter organization as part of its agency agreement with Eldorado Nuclear. Details of these commercial transactions are proprietary.

UIC—NUMBER OF PEOPLE IN RECEIPT OF INSURANCE

Question No. 1,021—Mr. Howie:

In each year as of November 1 (a) 1974 (b) 1975 (c) 1976, how many persons were receiving unemployment insurance from offices in (i) Fredericton (ii) Woodstock (iii) Minto, New Brunswick?

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): In so far as the Unemployment Insurance Commission is concerned:

		(a) 1974	(b) 1975	(c) 1976
(i)	Fredericton	2450	3146	3226
*(ii)	Woodstock	1193	1493	1737
(iii)	Minto	335	404	397

* Please note, the geographical boundaries used in written Question No. 1,021 do not correspond to the boundaries used in written Question No. 1,022.

CLIENTS REGISTERED WITH CANADA MANPOWER CENTRES

Question No. 1,022—Mr. Howie:

In each year as of November 1 (a) 1974 (b) 1975 (c) 1976, how many persons were registered for work in each of the manpower offices located in (i) Woodstock (ii) Fredericton (iii) Minto, New Brunswick?

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration):

	*Woodstock	Fredericton	Minto
November 1974	747	3146	663
November 1975	962	3645	714
November 1976	818	4173	720

* Please note, the geographical boundaries used in written Question No. 1,022 do not correspond to the boundaries used in written Question No. 1,021.

RE-CYCLING

Question No. 1,032—Mr. Clarke (Vancouver Quadra):

1. Has the government initiated a policy of waste-paper re-cycling as a means of conserving energy and our forests and, if so, what is it?

2. What incentives has the government given to the paper industry to use more post-consumer waste-paper in production?

3. What incentives has the government given to buyers to use re-cycled paper products in manufacturing?

4. For the fiscal year 1975-76, were any new export markets discovered for re-cycled paper and, if so, what are they?

5. For the fiscal year 1975-76, what percentage of paper consumed domestically was re-cycled?

6. Do quotas exist to regulate the amount of re-cycled paper which must be ordered by the government and, if so, what are they?

7. What was the total cost of paper products consumed by the government in the fiscal year 1975-76?

8. What percentage of paper products consumed by the government in the fiscal year 1975-76 were re-cycled?

9. Does the government consider overpackaging of products to be a significant contributor to the problem of waste control and, if so, what regulations exist to control the amount of (a) material used (b) re-cycled paper which must be used, in the packaging of products?

10. Is the government funding any independent research on solid waste disposal and, if so (a) with whom (b) in what amounts?

11. Does the government consider that the long-term success of re-cycling depends largely on improving processes of recovering materials and creating products from them and, if so, does the government intend to accelerate the research, development and technology of resource recovery especially to encourage the recovery of resources in municipal wastes?

12. Does the government have a definite strategy in regard to pollution abatement assistance or incentive programmes because of the millions of dollars that the pulp and paper industry must allocate to air/water pollution control in upcoming years, and considering the decreasing funds offered under DPAT?

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Departments of the Environment, Industry, Trade and Commerce and Supply and Services as follows: 1. As a matter of policy, the Department of the Environment supports waste paper and other materials re-cycling, as a means of conserving energy and other resources; as a way to lessen total environmental impacts; and does so in all cases where it has been shown that these benefits occur.

2 and 3. The government has not given direct incentives to either the paper industry or to buyers. However, the government has provided indirect incentives, by eliminating the federal sales tax on equipment and materials used by the commercial processors and re-cyclers of reclaimed waste paper.

4. No export markets have yet been determined specifically for re-cycled paper, however, waste paper is used as a portion of the fibre furnished by some newsprint manufacturers. The majority of newsprint produced in Canada is sold on export markets. Funds are available to the industry for export market identification and marketing adjustment under the Program for Export Market Development (PEMD) which is administered by the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

5. Re-cycling rates are traditionally calculated from data based on calendar rather than fiscal years. The latest full year for which complete data is available is 1973. The percentage of domestically consumed paper that was re-cycled in that year is approximately 18 per cent.

6. Quotas on re-cycled paper ordered by the government do not exist. However, the Departments of the Environment and Supply and Services are in the process of reviewing paper product specifications with the paper industry, with a view to increasing the use of re-cycled waste paper in government purchased paper products.

7. The value of paper purchased during 1975-76, for use for printing, duplicating, photocopying and typing is calculated at $11,800,000. The value of manufactured paper products such as pads, folders, etc., purchased through DSS in 1975-76 is calculated at $3,575,246.

8. National data is not presently available. However, in the 1975 calendar year, in the National Capital Area, approximately 30 per cent of the available waste paper in the government waste stream was re-cycled.

9. The Department of the Environment considers that the packaging of products contributes significantly to the municipal solid waste problems across the country. However, overpackaging is far less significant a contributor. Notwithstanding the subjective nature of deciding what is and what is not overpackaged, overpackaging tends to be product specific. No regulations exist to control the amount of material used or the amount of re-cycled paper contained in packaging.

10. The department of the Environment has funded in the past and is currently funding, outside the Department, research on solid waste disposal. A detailed listing of the work, the contractors and the amounts of the funding follows.

11. The long-term success of re-cycling depends on both an increased demand for recovered secondary materials and an improved processing of the supply of these materials. The Department of the Environment supports in principle research and development efforts to encourage the recovery of resources in municipal wastes. Unfortunately, funds available from within the department for this purpose are limited. Canada is a net importer of waste paper due to factors such as our population density and systems to collect and segregate mixed waste grades all of which limit available domestic waste paper supplies. The long term success of re-cycling of waste paper is seen to depend on the cost of systems to obtain adequate supplies of waste fibre, the cost of processing systems and market demands relative to product quality. The industry is eligible for assistance in these areas under the Program for the Advancement of Industrial Technology (PAIT). This program in the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce provides assistance by supporting development work in the areas of new or improved products for commercial markets.

12. The Accelerated Capital Cost Allowance (ACCA) Program has been in existence for a number of years to assist industries in installing air and water pollution abatement equipments and facilities. The Minister of Finance announced in the House of Commons on November 19, 1976, the extension of the ACCA Program for one more year. The fund allocation for DPAT during 1977-78 will be the same as in 1976-77, but the cash available for new projects in the coming year will be reduced due to prior commitment on multiyear projects. This program is for development and demonstration of new Pollution Abatement Technology.

FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE FOR ROAD CONSTRUCTION

Question No. 1,041—Mr. Howie:

Since January 1, 1975, has the Province of New Brunswick made any request for financial assistance for the construction of (a) a ring road around Fredericton (b) highway improvement between Fredericton and Saint John (c) improving the highway at Geary in Sunbury County and, if so, in each case, what was the dollar value of such request and what was the government's response?

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Department of Regional Economic Expansion and Transport Canada as follows: (a) No. (b) Yes. Dollar value of request is 90 percent of: (i) Fredericton, Geary, $21.2 million; (ii) Geary, Welsford, $5.0 million; (iii) Welsford, Saint John, $24.0 million. Total Project Cost $50.2 million; Total value of request $45.18 million. The projects outlined above are included in a joint submission presented to the Minister of Transport earlier this year by the four Atlantic provinces. The Government of Canada has not given a definitive response to date because the submission is presently being evaluated. (c) The Province of New Brunswick has asked Transport Canada for assistance in the construction of the Geary Bypass and the upgrading and paving of Route 7 between Geary and Welsford (see (b)).

"PLATFORM CBC"

Question No. 1,213—Mr. Herbert:

1. What is the annual cost of the public affairs programme "Platform CBC"?

2. How many Programmes are scheduled in a year?

3. What has been the individual Programme cost since January 1, 1976?

4. Since January 1, 1976, how many Members of Parliament of the government party have been panelists on the Programme and how many of these were Ministers of the Crown?

[Mr. Goodale.]

5. Since January 1, 1976, how many Members of Parliament of the opposition parties have been panelists on the Programme?

6. What are the gross receipts since January 1, 1976, from advertising on the Programme?

7. What is the audience rating as a percentage of those that can receive the Programme?

8. What is the air time of the Programme as a percentage of the total air time of the stations carrying the Programme?

9. Is it the policy of CBC to show a balanced viewpoint of the Programme?

10. Are panelists other than Members of Parliament chosen and, if so, on what basis?

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): I am informed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as follows: 1. It has not been customary to require the CBC to provide such information as the cost of programs. The background of this custom is explained in detail in the reply to question No. 2,530, May 22, 1975.

2. Sixteen.

3. See reply to part 1 above.

4. Ten. No ministers.

5. Eight.

6. Nil. The program does not carry advertising.

7. Averaged throughout the hour that it is broadcast, Platform has a weekly audience of just over 8,000 viewers. Since it is not known how many people are still awake and hence available for viewing at this hour on a Sunday evening, it is not possible to express this 8,000 as "a percentage of those that can receive the program". Platform's audience does, however, represent about 20 per cent of the total viewing audience in the Ottawa metro area at this hour, and about 25 per cent of the audience viewing English-language stations.

8. The program is produced by CBOT Ottawa and, through the CBC's Regional Exchange system, is also carried on other individual CBC stations but not on the CBC network. CBOT Ottawa (2 hours of 115 hours each week for 16 weeks) .017 per cent; CBOT Ottawa (42 hours of 5,228 hours each year) .008 per cent; Other CBC stations and services (12 hours of 5,550 hours each year) .002 per cent.

9. As much as possible, but not on the panel, which usually reflects one viewpoint. Panel members may invite eight supporters to participate from the audience; CBC invites 12 people known to either oppose or have a particular interest in the topic as audience participants. There is space for approximately 20 other members of the general public in the audience.

10. Yes. On the basis of their knowledge of, experience with, or interest in the subject.

ESTABLISHMENT OF CANADIAN EMBASSY IN SOCIALIST REPUBLIC OF VIETNAM

Question No. 1,297—Mr. Fairweather:

Does Canada intend to establish an embassy in the Socialist Republic of Vietnam and, if so, on what date?

Mr. Fernand E. Leblanc (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Canada is developing bilateral relations with the Socialist Republic of Vietnam and recognizes the long-term value of establishing an embassy in Hanoi. However, due to present budgetary restraint we will not be able to give consideration to opening an embassy in Hanoi in the immediate future. The Canadian Ambassador resident in Peking is, however, accredited to Vietnam; he and members of his staff pay regular visits to Hanoi.

ENLARGEMENT OF POSTAL FACILITIES

Question No. 1,362—Mr. Jones:

1. Are there plans for the enlargement of postal facilities and operations in the City of Moncton, the Town of Riverview and the Town of Dieppe in New Brunswick and, if so (a) what are they (b) what are the time schedules?

2. (a) For what reason are so many people who have addressed their mail to certain rural routes in the Moncton area having their mail returned marked "address unknown" (b) are any steps being taken to advise the public how to address their mail (c) is mail being returned if the postal code is not marked on the address?

3. (a) How can the ordinary citizen obtain a postal code for a specific address (b) is this made known to the public generally?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Postmaster General): 1. Yes (a) A new Mail Processing Plant is to be constructed which will serve the City of Moncton, the Town of Riverview and the Town of Dieppe. It will also act as a Gateway Postal Facility and Distribution Centre. (b) This Mail Processing Plant, which will be located in the Dieppe Industrial Park, is scheduled for completion late in 1979. Front Office services will also be provided from this facility. At the same time, the present Post Office in downtown Moncton will retain Front Office and possibly Letter Carrier Delivery services. Future plans call for the construction of a Postal Station in the Riverview area in 1980. However, this is subject to change depending upon further investigation once the new Mail Processing Plant in Dieppe becomes operational.

2. (a) It is difficult to comment on this question without having more precise information. However, it may be that the people experiencing problems were some of those formerly served by Moncton R.R. No. 1 and parts of R.R. Nos. 3 and 8 who were changed over to Letter Carrier Delivery. The change was made on R.R. No. 1 during 1974, and on R.R. Nos. 3 and 8 in 1975. (b) At the time of the changes, customers were given written notice of their new addresses, including postal codes and a supply of announcement cards for advising correspondents of their new addresses. The program was repeated at a later date and, in addition, directory service is still being provided. (c) Mail is not returned because of omission of postal code.

3. (a) An ordinary citizen can obtain a postal code for a specific address by contacting his local post office. (b) This information has been made known to the public by various advertising campaigns.

RESEARCH AND RESEARCH-RELATED PROJECTS APPROVED IN QUEBEC FITNESS AND AMATEUR SPORT

Question No. 1,371—Mr. Herbert:

In each of the past five years, how many applications have been (a) received (b) approved in the Province of Quebec for research and research-related projects in the areas of (i) fitness (ii) physical recreation (iii) amateur sport?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): During 1970-71 to 1975-76 inclusive, the Fitness and Amateur Sport Branch provided contributions only for external research projects initiated by the branch. This was due to program changes brought about by such reports as the Report of the Task Force on Sport for Canadians and the P. S. Ross Report.

	Number of Projects	Fiscal Year	Recipients
(i)	2	1975-76	Centre de Recherche des Sciences de la Santé, Université du Québec.
		1974-75 through 1976-77	International Congress of Physical Activity Sciences—Quebec City.
(ii)	2	1971-72 through 1974-75	National Study on the Supply of Sport and Recreation Facilities (Federal support for Quebec portion of the study)
		1975-76	Université Laval
(iii)	none

In the 1976-77 fiscal year, a program of support for research in fitness, physical recreation and amateur sport resumed. (a) Number of applications received, 7 (b) Number of applications approved, 2 (i) 1 (Contribution to Professor Alex Wright of Concordia University for "An Assessment of the Effects of a Developmental Motor Activity Program on the Self Image of Aged Females") (ii) none. (iii) 1 (Contribution to Dr. Pierre Lagassé of the Université Laval for the "La Stimulation Électrique: Ses Influences sur l'Apprentissage d'un Geste Sportif et sur la Performance Sportive.)

RADIOACTIVE FALLOUT FROM NOVEMBER, 1976 NUCLEAR TESTS IN CHINA

Question No. 1,382—Mr. Hnatyshyn:

Was radioactive fallout from the November 1976 nuclear tests in China detected in Canada and, if so (a) in what locations (b) in what amounts (c) what action, if any, was taken?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Radiactive fallout from the November 17, 1976, Chinese atmospheric nuclear weapons test was detected in 15 locations in Canada.

(a) and (b) Location	Maximum levels of gross beta radioactivity measured in surface air
Coral Harbour, N.W.T.	0.18 pCi/m^3
Edmonton, Alta.	0.32 pCi/m^3
Fredericton, N.B.	0.17 pCi/m^3
Halifax, N.S.	0.23 pCi/m^3
Inuvik, N.W.T.	0.16 pCi/m^3
Montreal, P.Q.	0.25 pCi/m^3
Moosonee, Ont.	0.16 pCi/m^3

(a) and (b) Location	Maximum levels of gross beta radioactivity measured in surface air
Ottawa, Ont.	0.19 pCi/m^3
Quebec, P.Q.	0.13 pCi/m^3
Regina, Sask.	0.36 pCi/m^3
Saskatoon, Sask.	0.26 pCi/m^3
Toronto, Ont.	0.16 pCi/m^3
Windsor, Ont.	0.18 pCi/m^3
Vancouver, B.C.	0.18 pCi/m^3
Winnipeg, Man.	0.21 pCi/m^3

(c) As these levels were low and quickly diminished because they were due to fresh fission products with short half-lives, they were of negligible concern to public health.

LEVELS AT WHICH RADIOACTIVE FALLOUT IS CONSIDERED HARMFUL

Question No. 1,383—Mr. Hnatyshyn:

Does the government or any of its agencies, set specific levels in Canada at which radioactive fallout is considered harmful to the public, wildlife or domestic animals and, if so (a) what are the levels (b) do the levels differ from those specified by the United States?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): (a) Radiation at any level is considered harmful in some degree. However, fallout is not subject to domestic control at source and the available counter-measures carry their own adverse health consequences. Therefore, protective actions must be based on a balancing of risks. Radiological health effects depend on the physical and chemical characteristics of the radioactive element involved, their mode of entry into the body and their deposition and retention in specific organs. For tropospheric fallout, iodine-131 is the element of greatest concern; for stratospheric fallout, the concern is chiefly with strontium-90. For both, the principal mode of entry into the body is by the consumption of milk. The amount taken into the body via other foods, drinking water and air is relatively small. The maximum permissible levels in milk, as derived from the recommendations of the International Commission on Radiological Protection, are 2,000 picocuries of iodine-131 per litre and 400 picocuries of strontium-90 per litre. The corresponding maximum permissible levels in air are 300 picocuries of iodine-131 per cubic metre and 40 picocuries of strontium-90 per cubic metre. For the complex mixture of radionuclides in fresh fallout in air, it is estimated that the equivalent level for gross beta radio-activity is about 2,500 picocuries per cubic metre. On this basis, it is considered that for short-term transient fallout exposures, levels in milk should not exceed the above value. However, if a period of widespread, long-term fallout was in prospect, more restrictive levels, approximately ⅓ of the above, would be specified to conform with the recommendation of the International Commission on Radiological Protection relating to the continuous exposure of a whole population. (b) The relevant United States levels are expressed in different terms, but in application do not differ significantly. The U.S. Environmental Protection Agency has recommended graded scales of action if the total intake of a radionuclide from air, water and food falls within certain ranges. Range III, which requires consideration of possible counter-measures (other than surveillance), is 100-1,000 picocuries per day for iodine-131 and 200-2,000 picocuries per day for strontium-90. These levels relate to average intakes by members of a sample population and they may be further averaged over a period of one year to allow for transient fluctuations.

ACTION IF RADIOACTIVE FALLOUT LEVELS BECOME DANGEROUSLY HIGH

Question No. 1,384—M. Hnatyshyn:

What action, if any, does the government consider it necessary that should be taken if radioactive fallout levels become dangerously high in Canada?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): If the level of iodine-131 in milk reached the level at which countermeasures became necessary, liquid milk would be withdrawn from the market and substituted by powdered milk which had been produced prior to the appearance of fresh fallout or which had been stored for a length of time sufficient to allow the short lived iodine-131 to decay. The permissible level for strontium-90 would not be reached unless there was continued nuclear weapons testing for a long time. Strontium 90 can be removed from milk by central processing. Technically, the treatment is not difficult, but its application on a national scale would involve very great expense.

MONITORING STATIONS MEASURING RADIOACTIVE FALLOUT

Question No. 1,385—Mr. Hnatyshyn:

Are there monitoring stations in Canada measuring atmospheric fallout from nuclear bomb tests which take place in other countries and, if so (a) where are they located (b) under what jurisdiction do they fall (c) is the monitoring going on continuously or periodically (d) are the monitoring records available to the public (e) what are the natural background levels of radioactivity against which such fallout levels are measured at the various testing stations?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): (a) Yes. The 24 monitoring stations at which samples of radioactivity in surface air and precipitation are collected are located as follows: Calgary, Alta.; Coral Harbour, N.W.T.; Edmonton, Alta.; Fort Churchill, Man.; Fredericton, N.B.; Goose Bay, Nfld.; Halifax, N.S.; Inuvik, N.W.T.; Montreal, P.Q.; Moosonee, Ont.; Ottawa, Ont.; Quebec, P.Q.; Regina, Sask.; Resolute, N.W.T.; St. John's, Nfld.; Saskatoon, Sask.; Sault Ste. Marie, Ont.; Thunder Bay, Ont.; Toronto, Ont.; Vancouver, B.C.; Whitehorse, Yukon; Windsor, Ont.; Winnipeg, Man.; Yellowknife, N.W.T. (b) The sampling equipment and the program are under the jurisdiction of the Health Protection Branch, Department of National Health and Welfare. The samplers are located at meteorological stations operated by the Atmospheric Environment Service, Department of the Environment whose staff collect and send samples to the Ottawa Laboratory of the Radiation Protection Bureau. (c) Air Particulates are collected continuously at the sampling stations. The measurement of the collected deposit, however, is carried out daily, instead of weekly, during periods of fresh fallout. (d) Yes. (e) The levels of radioactivity in surface air due to residual fallout remaining from previous nuclear weapons tests averaged 0.04 picocuries per cubic metre of air in 1975. The range observed was from 0.02 to 0.07 picocuries per cubic meter varying with location and season.

BRITISH COLUMBIA—FAMILY PLANNING AND SEX EDUCATION EXPENDITURES

Question No. 1,455—Mr. Oberle:

1. What is the total annual expenditure by the Department of National Health and Welfare in the Province of British Columbia for family planning and sex education?

2. What is the total cost to date and what is the future estimate of costs for the distribution of the information kit on sex education in British Columbia?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): 1. 1975-76, $108,668. 1976-77, Statistics on the total amounts granted to agencies and universities in British Columbia for the purpose of family planning and sex education will not be available until the end of this fiscal year.

2. Statistics are not available on the provincial distribution pattern of the publication entitled. "Sex Education—A Teachers Guide". Since copies were distributed on the basis of individual requests from British Columbia, neither the total cost to date, nor the future estimated cost can be determined.

BILINGUAL LABELLING

Question No. 1,507—Mr. Mazankowski:

1. How many inspectors are employed by the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs to ensure that the Order in Council respecting bilingual labelling of all products sold in Canada is followed?

2. (a) How many cases have been investigated (b) how many violations were discovered (c) how many charges have been laid?

3. What is the routine procedure followed by the Department to enforce the Order in Council?

Hon. A. C. Abbott (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): 1. The Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs employs 197 inspectors across Canada who are charged with the responsibility of ensuring that a wide range of products comply with the requirements of 9 Acts and Regulations. Part of the requirements of the legislation relates to bilingual labelling.

2. (a) and (b) As Inspectors are carrying out surveillance with respect to the many requirements of the legislation, not just solely bilingual labelling, it is impossible to determine how many cases specifically regarding bilingual labelling have been investigated. (c) No charges have been laid with respect to bilingual labelling violations.

3. The Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs conducts scheduled inspections of firms at all levels of trade with regard to all requirements of the legislation. This involves taking samples, examining lables, verifying net quantity, checking certain products against required grade standards, and other similar actions. Emphasis is put on educating the trade in order to achieve voluntary compliance. It is to be emphasized that these are general procedures with respect to all requirements of the legislation, not just solely bilingual labelling requirements.

DISABILITY PENSIONERS AND WAR VETERANS ALLOWANCE RECIPIENTS IN QUEBEC

Question No. 1,632—Mr. Coates:

1. (a) What is the total number of veterans in the Province of Quebec who receive pensions from the government (b) what is the annual total cost of such pensions?

2. (a) What is the total number of veterans in the Province who receive War Veterans Allowances or other allowances from the Department of Veterans Affairs (b) what is the annual total cost of such allowances?

3. How many employees of the Department are located in the Province and what is the estimated payroll for the fiscal year 1976-77?

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs):

1.

	(a)	(b)
Disability pensioners	13,450	$30,985,333
Dependants	2,492	11,852,427
Total	15,942	42,837,760

2.

	(a)	(b)
War veterans allowance and civilian war allowance recipients	6,399	23,084,380
Assistance Fund recipients	3,813	1,842,295
Education Assistance recipients (children)	137	139,439
Treatment allowances	*	710,000
Total	10,349	$25,776,114

* Treatment allowances are not of a continuing nature. Disability pensioners are paid the difference between a 100% pension and their actual rate of pension for any period of time in which they require medical treatment related to disability.

3. Employees: 2,220; Payroll: $33,511,379.

RETENTION OF LAWYERS IN CONSTITUENCY OF VICTORIA, B.C. BY NATIONAL ENERGY BOARD

Question No. 1,762—Mr. McKinnon:

What were the names and addresses of all lawyers and law firms in the Constituency of Victoria, British Columbia, who performed services during (a) 1975 (b) 1976 for the National Energy Board and, in each case, what was the total amount paid?

Mr. Maurice Dupras (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): In so far as National Energy Board is concerned: none.

RETENTION OF LAWYERS IN CONSTITUENCY OF VICTORIA, B.C. BY FARM CREDIT CORPORATION

Question No. 1,770—Mr. McKinnon:

What were the names and addresses of all lawyers and law firms in the Constituency of Victoria, British Columbia, who performed services during (a) 1975 (b) 1976 for the Farm Credit Corporation and, in each case, what was the total amount paid?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): The Farm Credit Corporation advises: Cecil Branson, Sullivan, Smith & Bigelow, 505-645 Fort Street, Victoria, B.C. V8W 1G2. Fees paid to lawyers used in the Constituency of Victoria, British Columbia by Farm Credit Corporation are paid as follows: (i) by the borrowers upon their direction out of the proceeds of the mortgage loans in which case Farm Credit Corporation does not maintain records of amounts so paid; (ii) by Farm Credit Corporation on mortgage proceedings, nil.

RETENTION OF LAWYERS IN CONSTITUENCY OF VICTORIA, B.C. BY CBC

Question No. 1,774—Mr. McKinnon:

What were the names and addresses of all lawyers and law firms in the Constituency of Victoria, British Columbia, who performed services during (a) 1975 (b) 1976 for the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and, in each case, what was the total amount paid?

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): I am informed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as follows: (a), (b) Nil.

US/CANADA TRANSIT PIPELINE TREATY

Question No. 1,778—Mr. Leggatt:

1. What effect will the US-Canada Pipeline Treaty have on municipalities or provinces wishing to tax relevant pipelines?

2. What is the taxation status of the pipeline cost under the terms of the Treaty?

Mr. Fernand E. Leblanc (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): 1 and 2. Article III.1 of the Canada/U.S. Transit Pipeline Treaty signed January 28, 1977, awaiting ratification before entry into force, specifically mentions the rights of public authorities, which could include provinces and municipalities, to impose a fee, duty, tax or other monetary charge on or for the use of any transit pipeline. The only limitation on such taxes or other charges would be that they also be applicable to or for the use of similar pipelines located within the jurisdiction of the public authority in question.

PREPONDERANCE OF FRANCOPHONES IN BILINGUAL POSITIONS

Question No. 1,791—Mr. Herbert:

Has the government studied the possibility that the preponderance of Francophones in bilingual positions in many departments could be reducing the proportion of first generation descendants of these French mother tongue public servants who claim or use French as their mother tongue?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of Treasury Board): No.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: The questions listed by the parliamentary secretary have been answered. Are the others allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[English]

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I want to bring to the attention of the parliamentary secretary that apparently a couple of things that happened yesterday caused him to really get moving and answer eight of my questions.

[Mr. Whelan.]

Mr. Goodale: That had nothing to do with it.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

NATIONAL TRANSPORTATION ACT

MEASURE TO REDEFINE OBJECTIVE OF TRANSPORTATION POLICY

The House resumed, from Wednesday, March 2, consideration of the motion of Mr. Basford (for the Minister of Transport) that Bill C-33, to amend the National Transportation Act and the Department of Transport Act for the purpose of defining the objective of the transportation policy of Canada and authorizing the consequential rearrangement of powers and duties relating to transport and to amend the Transport Act and the Railway Act in respect of freight rates and other matters, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, before the debate ended yesterday I had a few brief moments in which to commence my remarks concerning the national transportation bill. At that time, having heard several members who sometimes support the government in this House deplore the fact that the government is reneging—and having listened to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) with respect to their $290 million commitment to help urban transit in this country—I invited the Minister of Finance, who I hope will accept this invitation, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang), and other members who are now trying to get on the right side of this issue to turn up at the Toronto Union station at 8 a.m. on March 14 to see first-hand the congestion that exists in the metropolitan Toronto area as far as commuters are concerned. That invitation does not come just from me; it also comes from the regional chairmen in that area who are sending wires to most of the affected members of this House asking them to join with those chairmen on Monday morning, March 14, to see first-hand the situation that this government is helping to leave in the Toronto area concerning commuter travel.

For the record, I should read the telegram that is being sent out by Paul Godfrey, chairman of the Metropolitan Toronto council. The telegram reads:

Deep concern over the federal announcement that funds for urban transit are not to be made available. Request you to join me and the regional chairmen from the regions surrounding metro on Monday, March 14 at 8 a.m. at the Union station GO transit platform. We will at that time wish to discuss with you the effect the broken federal promise will have on all of us.

That shows the anxiety that now exists in the Toronto area concerning this very important matter. If I may, I would like very quickly to summarize where the uncertainty first arose. As most in this House realize, during the 1974 election campaign the Liberal party, seeking re-election as the government of this country, spewed forth much in the way of promises to help their way back into office. Included in those promises were very specific commitments concerning the assistance they were willing to give urban transit authorities in our various metropolitan areas. They even put a price tag on it. They said that the promises would probably represent about $290 million of federal assistance. The short fact is that government did get re-elected. Presumably those promises helped them to get re-elected. Now that they are in office with a majority, they are simply reneging on the promises they made to the Canadian electorate.

I say they reneged for this reason. I grant that there is a bit of confusion about this, but we find, in answer to questions put by my colleague, the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath), and myself, that the Minister of Finance on February 18 confirmed remarks he presumably made at a press conference the day before. For example, he stated, and I quote from page 3184 of Hansard:

—the federal government will not be able to extend its assistance to municipalities which we had hoped to assist in earlier years.

That, of course, refers to the question of funding for urban transit. As a result of that type of question I asked the minister whether he had ridden on the commuter train at rush hour going into the Toronto area in order to experience first-hand the congestion of that service. There was no meaningful comment on that, so I again reiterate the question and invite the Minister of Finance, along with his Prime Minister, to share, with other members of parliament and the local chairmen in the Toronto area, the experience of seeing how commuters in that area are now being handled because of the lack of forethought and funding for which the federal government is responsible.

Subsequent to that comment by the Minister of Finance, some confusion came into this question. In response to a question put by myself to the Prime Minister on February 25 concerning why he felt free to break his promise with regard to urban funding, the Prime Minister stated:

● (1520)

There has been no decision one way or another but we are keeping the various arguments in mind—

So it would appear there is hope the government may yet come to its senses. It might make the Minister of Finance look a little foolish; he spoke out of turn and he certainly did not speak wisely. I hope that whatever the background is, the goverment will acknowledge that it does have outstanding commitments to the public and that for the sake of commuters in the Montreal area, in the Toronto area, the areas of Vancouver, Edmonton and Calgary and other urban centres in this country which face pressing transit problems, it will live up to those commitments.

The confusion goes even deeper. Here we have a promise made in 1974. The Minister of Finance says, in effect, that the government cannot meet the promise, that it must renege. Then we find there are estimates before the House tabled by the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras), and when we look at page 2762 of those estimates we see, under the heading "Urban Transit" that an expenditure of $8,136,000 is contemplated by the federal government. I ask this question: Who is running the show? Who, exactly, knows on any day of the week what the government intends to do with regard to this question—and, presumably, with regard to many others? Why is the government being asked to approve an expenditure of $8,136,000 in relation to urban transit when the Minister of Finance tells us there is no money available to spend on urban transportation? We are entitled to an explanation.

I see the Minister of Transport sitting in his place. I am glad he has the nerve to come here. I think he should explain, after I have sat down, why he as Minister of Transport tolerated the Minister of Finance telling us there is no money available for urban transportation while his own estimate for $8,136,000 is before the House and will, presumably, be passed unless it is defeated at some stage of the parliamentary process. In short, the government seems to be in a dither. I believe it is time an assurance was given to the various provinces and municipalities that Ottawa is willing to help out by providing some of the funding needed to ensure that those who must travel to and from work can do so by the most effective means, which is a suitable system of urban transportation.

When I speak on this subject I do so with a strong sense of déjà vu. Unlike the Johnies-come-lately on the government back-benches who are only now beginning to understand the extend of the government's failure in the field of urban transit policy, we in this party have consistently pressed for common sense in this vital area. On no fewer than 90 occasions have we spoken in the House against Pickering airport. On more than 20 of those occasions I have put questions to successive ministers of transport with a view to persuading them to drop the ill-advised Pickering project and redirecting any unused funds to urban assistance. In fact, in my first speech in the House, made at the time the government could have saved many millions of dollars by shelving the Pickering airport proposal—I refer to a speech made on January 12, 1973—I put the dilemma facing the Toronto area as simply as possible. As recorded at page 251 of Hansard, I stated:

On behalf of those people let me tell the government once again, we do not need a second airport at Pickering. We do need, however, federal assistance to facilitate urban transportation.

The same is true today. Despite the promises of the Prime Minister and of no less than four ministers in his cabinet, there has been no substantial contribution to urban transportation in Toronto. In fact, the total federal government's contribution to date in Ontario has been one $10 million grant to cover rolling stock for the Richmond Hill GOline. In contrast, Ontario has spent nearly $429 million since 1964 to support urban transit. Beyond that, the provincial municipalities have spent $90 million annually to meet their transit needs.

Clearly, the government is turning its back on the 75 per cent of our population who live in Canadian urban centres. On the other hand, the same government has spent more than $110 million for land development and management at Pickering, and has lost an additional $130 million in two years at Mirabel, despite the fact that only about 10 per cent of the population use airports on any regular basis. When I say 10 per cent of our population, Mr. Speaker, I must qualify that statement by saying that I have removed from that calculation the Minister of Transport's travels in and out of our airports, in order to put the figure in a more meaningful context.

The Minister of Transport tells us that urban transit is the domain of the provinces and is the responsibility of the provinces and the municipalities. Yet we find as far back as May 15, 1973, in my first private member's bill, a recommendation to establish a national urban transportation authority which, though funded partly by the federal authorities, would have the power to establish local urban or regional transportation authorities. I refer again to the situation, as I did then, in the United States, Great Britain, France and other countries where local or urban authorities oversee the local harbours, airports, interurban rail transportation and all transit needs within their purview. If such authorities existed in Canada there would no doubt be a completely different range of priorities to that now being shown by the government.

One important fact often forgotten is that where there are local authorities which not only look after transit in urban areas but also look after airports, harbours and similar services, such authorities are extremely conscious of the needs of the area and of the cost consequences of their actions. New York is one example. This is why in Chicago or New York, they would not dare propose to build a Mirabel or a Pickering airport at the present time. If you spoke to the officials of those authorities you would find them saying, first of all, that there is no evidence of public travel needs rising to the point at which additional facilities on this scale are needed in those centres and, in the second place, they would say they cannot afford the cost. They would explain that they cannot afford to build new airports because those airports could only be financed by getting the airline carriers to sign sufficient long-term commitments to cover the costs of construction and operation.

This approach is significantly different from the one adopted in Canada. Unfortunately, the entire process is centralized here in Ottawa in the Department of Transport, with one little brain trying to run the entire show. The fact is that this little brain cannot possibly cope with the variety of needs which exist in our urban centres as far as transportation is concerned and, consequently, a lot of mistakes are made. Mistakes are made because bureaucracies like to build monuments to themselves. They have a Taj Mahal complex. They like to be able to build something, touch it and say that Mirabel is there because they thought it was a good idea. The fact that Mirabel was not needed is a secondary thing. The fact that for years and years Canadians are going to have to pay needless interest and operating costs to handle Mirabel is a secondary thing in their minds.

● (1530)

That brings me to the situation in Toronto. If there has been a co-ordinated local authority attitude taken in Toronto, the concept of a Pickering airport development before the commuter rail situation had been solved would not have been seriously advanced. The fact is that the local Toronto people realize that the No. 1 need in that area is to facilitate workers coming to and from work in a more humane way than that which exists at the present time. It is as simple as that. This government, centralized in Ottawa and acting under a minister who really does not understand, seems to accept the bureaucratic "build a monument" concept and says that we must have a Pickering. I am saying that money could be better spent developing proper urban transport facilities in the Toronto area, and the notion that a second airport is needed in that area is silly.

There are other ridiculous examples of where this minister and his predecessor, either directly or through agencies reporting to them, have done foolish things in Toronto with regard to priorities. For example, if the ministers choose to join us in the Toronto area on March 14, one of the things I hope they will sense is the congestion which exists at Union station. There are about 37,000 passengers going through Union station who use the rail service, and frankly Union station was not built to handle that many people. When the bilevel trains start in a few months it is likely that the congestion will be much greater. We need a new facility or some type of new transit facility to handle the crowds coming into Union station. That takes tens of millions of dollars to build. The federal government joined in the preliminary discussions with respect to that facility, but now, after those discussions have taken place, the government says there is no money to help facilitate the building.

On the question of priorities, why did the government allow the CN to build the CN tower which cost approximately $58 million and which will not make money in a meaningful way, when the very commuters who come to and from work every day in that city have to go by that tower and be subjected to congestion at Union station? Surely it is a ridiculous sense of priority to say that building the CN tower for $58 million should come before a decent facility to allow 37,000 people to come and go by way of rail transit which they choose to use.

Let me give another example. Not only is the rail station congested, but in the railyard itself the local GO transit authority cannot bring in additional trains from the west side of Toronto until there is a realignment of the trackage. Incidentally, that trackage goes right by the CN tower. It will cost approximately $57 million to realign that trackage, but here again priority was given to building the CN tower before the federal government was willing to spend money on trackage which is impeding further commuter lines coming in from the west side of Toronto. That is unbelievable.

However, clearly the only reason these inconsistencies occur in the Toronto area is that this minister, his predecessor, the government and the Prime Minister do not know what they are doing in relation to the Toronto problem. For example, with absolutely no reference to the Toronto area they chose to propose the Toronto waterfront park. They went ahead and bought that land. They did not ask the mayor of Toronto or the chairman of the metropolitan Toronto region if they felt the park would be a nice thing, or whether it was needed. They did not ask whether that was a priority or whether they should be spending money on that before helping people get to and from work.

They went ahead and bought it and, most alarmingly, when they are now questioned as to why they had money for the Toronto harbour front—and yet now they say, in relation to their 1974 promises concerning urban transit, that they do not have the $290 million to help with urban transit—what are we told? The President of the Treasury Board has the audacity to say in this House that the Toronto waterfront project was a 1972 promise, and he grinned, implying that the 1974 promises do not count. That is the mentality of this government. That is the mentality which has caused millions of Canadians to lose confidence in this government. They want to get rid of this government as quickly as possible.

I have outlined this, but perhaps for those who are not willing to take my word I shall read into the record an editorial comment in the Toronto Star of February 22. Under the headline "Ottawa makes chaos for commuters" this article reads in part as follows:

> Every day 37,000 rail passengers, mostly commuters, pass through a congested and antiquated Union station. It's clear to everyone of them, although not to transport minister Otto Lang in Ottawa, that the place was designed for a more leisurely era.
> A bigger crush is yet to come. This fall the first of 80 new double-decker trains will appear on the Lakeshore GO transit line, running between Oakville and Pickering, boosting capacity from 28,000 passengers a day to 42,000 a day.
> Union Station was to have had better tracks and wider platforms before the new coaches and additional passengers started arriving. But Ottawa's backtracking on its 1974 election promise to aid urban transit means it's unlikely the station will be expanded or the angle of railway tracks at Bathurst St. will be straightened out. Ottawa's refusal to keep its word is creating commuter chaos in metro.

This is an urgent problem. I am pleased that certain Liberal backbenchers who like to support the government are at least guardedly speaking and pointing out to the government that it is making a mistake. I hope they will have the courage to vote against this bill when the vote is taken at second reading. I also hope that if this bill is defeated, the Prime Minister will regard that as a vote of no confidence in his government and that he will resign.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: Don't count on it.

Mr. Stevens: The "on again, off again" promises of the Prime Minister lead us to ask just who is speaking for the government. Is it the Minister of Transport, the Prime Minister, or the Minister of Finance?

I know my colleagues want to participate in this debate, and I wish I had more time. I would like to have read into the record the promises which were made to the Canadian public in the 1974 election campaign concerning urban transit. Perhaps tomorrow as this debate continues, or on our own opposition motion, there will be opportunities to read some of those promises into the record.

However, those broken promises in all likelihood spell an end to $200 million of transit projects in the metropolitan Toronto area. They spell an end to the $57 million of upgrading and renovation of Union station, which I have referred to. They spell an end to the $25 million of extension on the Streetsville GO line. Also, they will spell an end to the $80 million of light rail line construction to the Scarborough town centre.

● (1540)

Mr. Roy (Laval): What about Montreal?

Mr. Stevens: They will spell an end to the $35 million purchase of rail cars for the Lakeshore GO system. Someone asked, "What about Montreal?" Montreal has a problem, too, and this federal government has failed to acknowledge the problem. I have the honour to represent an area just north of metropolitan Toronto and I feel that I have the right to stand in this House and point out the inadequacies of federal policy in regard to the Toronto transit situation. I would welcome it if the hon. member would stand in the House and speak in favour of more urban transit for people in Montreal and let the federal government know in no uncertain terms that Montreal, too, is being short-changed by a federal government that thinks more of its own political power than of serving the Canadian public.

I have referred to the fact that there has been a reneging on the part of the government in regard to urban transit promises. But it goes further than that. In our type of federation there must be great trust between the federal government, the ten provinces and the territories. When deals are made, those deals must be honoured. I think it is most reprehensible that a deal was made, for example, by the Minister of Transport's predecessor, now Senator Marchand, in which he gave an assurance—indeed, a commitment—to the Ontario government that if they wished to go ahead and buy 80 bilevel cars which they would order from Hawker Siddeley in Thunder Bay at a cost of approximately $38 million, the federal government would pay the cost of that purchase. Now the federal government is reneging.

If any member on the other side of this House doubts what I say, I would refer him to the statement in the legislature of Ontario made by the hon. James Snow, minister of transportation and communications, on December 16 of last year. He was quite clear. He pointed out in no uncertain terms that Ontario had made plans based on firm commitments given by federal authorities, and those commitments were apparently not going to be honoured. He further stated that he had had a meeting with the Minister of Transport and that he hoped the Minister of Transport would come back to him and show some realization of the situation and agree that the commitments would be honoured. He anticipated, as he spoke in the legislature, that he would hear from the Minister of Transport before Christmas of last year.

The fact is that to this point the Ontario government has not heard from the Minister of Transport, or from anybody else at the ministerial level in the government, in regard to these outstanding commitments in connection with the purchase to which the Ontario government has committed itself. I would recommend to any hon. member who wishes to join in this debate, particularly if he is on the government side, to take a look at the statement made by Mr. Snow in the Ontario legislature which vividly shows the uncertainty now existing between the Ontario authorities and the federal government over urban transit in the Toronto area at the present time—in fact, throughout Ontario.

I am pleased to have had the opportunity to make a few comments on the bill before the House. The important thing we must bear in mind is that if we are not careful, the highly centralized control which we have in the Ministry of Transport will not be responsive to the needs of the various cities and regions within this country to the extent it should be. The minister likes to say that he is evolving a policy of user-pay. There is nothing wrong with the concept. But when you start to analyse it, Mr. Speaker, you ask: User pay what? Who decides whether an operation is being run efficiently? Who decides if a Mirabel should be built and consequently paid for? Is it fair to talk to Canadians about user-pay, for example, in the case of a Mirabel or in the case of the operation of the Toronto international airport No. 1 or the proposed No. 2? Is it fair to say the user should pay when there is absolutely no control on the expenditure side with respect to what those users are being asked to pay? That, Mr. Speaker, can only be decided by the vote of the Canadian public.

In short, what is the point of the Minister of Transport saying that he has got a new theory, that users are going to start paying for services that are under his control, when there is serious doubt whether those services are, first of all, in many cases needed; and, secondly, are being run in an efficient way that warrants the user-pay concept?

More than that, Mr. Speaker, when you are in government there is never any question of who pays: it is the taxpayer who pays. All the minister is saying is that he would like to take from one group of taxpayers and give to another group and say that the users are paying. My point is that it is all very fine to talk of user-pay provided you can show that the government has acted in a frugal way, that they have moved only to build the facilities that are needed in a particular area.

Unfortunately, we have one of the saddest transport departments, in Canada, of any comparable country in the world. The government builds monuments to civil servants and then expects Canadians, either through their tax dollars or through their usage of services, to pay, and in many cases to pay for services that are needless. It is time that those who have supported the government to date showed their mettle. If they want to be re-elected in the Toronto area, then let them stand up, show a little courage and vote against this bill.

[Mr. Stevens.]

Mr. Cliff McIsaac (Battleford-Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, I have listened to the members on both sides who have participated in this debate so far, and I think that with the exception of the opposition critic practically the entire debate has been taken up generally with the problems of metro Toronto and other metropolitan areas in this country. While I fully realize there are such problems and that there is a delineation of responsibility between the federal government, the provinces and the municipalities, I suggest there are many other issues in other parts of the country that are equally important and which will be affected by the legislation which is before us today.

Bill C-33 is a very major bill which is of interest to every member of the House no matter which region he represents or to which particular party he belongs. I think the amendments proposed will go quite a distance in meeting many of the concerns that have been expressed, not only in this debate but in the House over the last number of years—almost daily in the question period—with regard to affairs of transport. I am quite sure the bill will not provide a framework which will solve all our transportation problems.

The general topic of transportation policy, the lack of it, the results of it, have been a favourite political whipping-boy for a very long time, and in many cases with good reason. I think yesterday we had pretty good evidence of that. Some of the shenanigans which went on in the House underline the concern of hon. members or this particular issue. Certainly, both political groups and other special interest groups will as well, I am sure, keep the issue before the government for some time in the future.

Some of the points I want to comment upon are related to achievements and to the progress which has definitely been made over the last few years in western Canada. Many changes have been made and a good deal of progress has been made to alleviate some of the long-standing sore points so far as western Canada is concerned. I am the first to say that by no means have we exhausted the list as yet, nor can this legislation provide answers to all those concerns.

It was less than ten years ago, as was mentioned by one hon. member participating in the debate, that this House extensively debated the present National Transportation Act which was adopted under a minority government. I am sure it had the support of the majority of members at that time, and I am sure they thought, also, that it would take care of the transportation needs and would form a framework for transportation policies for many years to come. That was only eight years ago. I am sure hon. members were satisfied then that they had the correct legislation and the correct regulatory mechanism basically in place to deal with those problems.

That act was the result of the MacPherson Commission study which had been at work for many years prior to that. The events leading up to some of these changes at which we are looking in Bill C-33 are worth noting. The former minister of transport—referred to by the hon. member who just resumed his seat—recognized the difficulties faced by him, by the government and by this country in his now famous remark to the effect that the transportation policy of Canada was a mess, a remark which was widely publicized and, I might say, widely misinterpreted.

The former minister certainly, was not being critical, as was the hon. member who just resumed his seat, of the thousands of dedicated people in the Department of Transport and in other agencies across this country who work, and have worked hard, to provide good transportation services of which we can be proud instead of continually criticizing it. I do not say that there is no room for improvement, but everyone seems to criticize our two major railroads. It is a toss-up between them and the CBC as to which is more of a politicial whipping-boy. But the fact is that those two major railroads, despite the odds of geography and severe winter weather and other difficulties with which they have to contend in Canada, get the job done in a remarkable way.

The changes that took place since the 1967 act brought about a review of policy and a review of programs and another look at the legislation, which led up to the introduction of Bill C-33 in the House in this session. For example, in the eight years since the present act came into force we have seen dramatic change. We have seen growth in the demand for and the price of our resources such as oil, grain, potash and coal, all of which place significantly increased pressure on the capacity of our transportation system in the first instance. Second, we are all aware, and, are becoming more aware every day, of the energy crisis which sharpens our awareness of the need to conserve energy. The change of attitudes and values resulting in our concern about growth rates and the environmental impact of the Mackenzie Valley pipeline, which is a major transportation issue, and the study on that, are a reflection of that fact.

Certainly, there are significant advances in transportation technology in a variety of fields too numerous to mention. Those are some of the changing trends and changing patterns that have developed in this country and are part of life today which perhaps were not so obvious a mere eight years ago when the former act was in place. It was the variety of policies and programs that had grown up in different parts of the country to meet different situations that had in some cases changed from the time they were first initiated, and this was the kind of thing that led the former minister to make the statement that he made that the transportation policy is in a mess and should be reviewed.

There was a growth in size of some of our very large agencies, usually accompanied by a growth in independence as a result, and that has been a trend in government—federal, provincial and others. Bill C-33 proposes to make the arrangements between the major regulatory body in this act—namely, the CTC—and the minister's office, the minister's powers and duties, a good deal more flexible than is now the case under the present legislation. The rate-regulating side of the CTC remains unchanged in principle, but policy and research functions should be primarily an MOT responsibility and the responsibility of the minister in charge. He is charged with those responsibilities; he is held accountable here in the House and across the country—and consequently he should have the authority in those fields.

As I have said, there have been a good few noteworthy improvements and achievements in recent years, despite the continued criticism and continued concerns coming from all parts of the country on transportation matters. In western Canada, so far as our grievances are concerned—and many of them have been there since confederation—a number of points are well worth noting. First of all, and perhaps most important, it seems to me that in the last two or three years we are learning more about the nature of those specific grievances. By hollering about high freight rates and generalities of that kind we will not change them. There are great distances to cover.

We are, indeed, captive shippers in so far as the railways are concerned, in the great majority of cases. We are learning more about those problems. We are identifying them and spelling them out more clearly. We are consulting with a great many more people involved. I am not talking just about the users, about the industries and about the unions and the people involved in providing the services. I am talking about the provincial governments and other governments involved and affected by transportation policies. The work of the former minister in initiating and setting up federal-provincial groups and committees in western Canada, in the maritimes, in Quebec and in Ontario—which practice has been developed and maintained by the present minister—has in itself gone a long way to help alleviate some of those problems by setting up a better consultative mechanism. As I say, in my view that has been a significant achievement in the last several years. Provincial governments today are much more closely involved than they were a mere four or five years ago.

Another move that was made by this government a year or so ago was to pass legislation forcing the railroad to provide its costs on specific rates and charges to the federal government on a confidential basis, which would then be made available to the provinces. Certainly this is working well and is enabling us to get answers to some of the concerns which were discussed earlier in the debate by the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin). We are getting more of the answers now.

We have been able to substantiate some of the facts. Bill C-33 will eliminate the long-haul short-haul anomaly that has long been not only a sore spot with western Canadians but a good deal worse than that. There is provision for certain exceptions which I hope the minister will deal with when the bill goes to committee. I realize that there are valid reasons for the flexibility being there and I hope the minister can elaborate on that when the bill goes to committee.

The reduction of the maximum rate is another move which I think will work to the advantage of all Canadians, particularly western Canadians. That amendment is contained in the bill. Hopper cars were mentioned in the earlier remarks of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford), in the absence of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang), as being another development and advance in transportation in western Canada. This is not covered by the bill, but it is one of those achievements which, as I mentioned, has taken place over the last several years. We should not assume, as we might from listening to some of the arguments advanced by hon. members, that we can completely reject the economic facts of life, and transportation is nothing more nor less than pure political posturing. The minister and the government have not said, nor did they ever say, that all transportation services must be economical.

● (1600)

What we have said, and what has been the policy and practice for many years—and certainly a very defensible one—is that we must ensure we are carefully spending the money and the funds, that are going to support the many special exceptions to the basic rule. The user, in the majority of cases, still must pay for services rendered. The transportation policy and this legislation will enable the minister and the government to ensure it now becomes a more effective government tool for alleviating regional disparities and promoting regional economic development. I think that is one of the criticisms that has been put forward, not only from the west but from the east and other parts of the country, that will in essence enable the minister and the government to respond to this concern.

There have been two or three other achievements over the past few years. In western Canada we are awaiting the Hall commission report dealing with the question of branch lines. We hope that will be handed down before long and will give us some direction. The Snaveley report on grain handling is another transportation-oriented issue. We are learning the real facts, and any time we come up with that result we will be able more sensibly to deal with the issues it provides for better resolution of the problems. There are still very many valid concerns in western Canada regarding transportation, and today we are delineating more of them, in co-operation with provincial governments and other groups, than we have for many years. We understand much better the nature of the problem.

The bill will go a long way, but of course it will not resolve our concerns although it will provide a better framework to deal with those issues and concerns. Transportation is a very important aspect of the social life of all of us, so important to the community and the economy, both domestically and in terms of linking us with our markets, that we cannot afford as a government to become less involved. I think that if need be we should become more involved. These amendments will provide that opportunity.

The amendments make it clear that the regulatory function which is necessary for the proper management of Canadian transportation—the Canadian Transport Commission—will continue in that role with less emphasis on legal procedures and with more administrative simplicity. The amendments will ensure that the Minister of Transport and his department is the principal source of transportation policy advice to the government. They will give the minister and the government a more acceptable means of giving policy direction to the CTC itself, but not in the context of any specific case that may be before the commission.

The government has made a good deal of progress in the last several years. Both the former minister and the present minister and their staff have devoted a great deal of effort and energy to the job. I am sure some of my hon. friends opposite will not agree, but I can certainly say that the minister has been tackling many of the problems in a very capable manner. The problems that have been plaguing the country for many years are not going to disappear simply because they are not recognized—problems compounded by inflation and the changing concerns of people and by working with policies and institutions that are not amenable to change.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, this is not the first time parliament has engaged in a debate on the principles of the transportation system of our country. Some of us remember the great hopes we had from the Duff report in the 1930s when it was recommended that the railways of the country, particularly on the prairies, be rationalized in their operation to overcome the mistakes of the early development period. After the war the problem was still with us. Then in 1949-50 we had the Turgeon royal commission. Once again, the commission made the same recommendation, that we should rationalize the operation of the railways and pay a bridge subsidy for going around the lakes.

Once again there were high hopes that the railway systems would begin to operate more effectively and efficiently. In 1959 the MacPherson royal commission was set up with instructions to end once and for all this wasting of the nation's resources in the inefficient, uneconomic handling of our transportation system. As a result of the report of that commission under the leadership of Mr. MacPherson, this parliament debated in the House and in committee from 1964 to 1967 proposals to put into effect the main recommendations of the commission.

The hon. member for Battleford-Kindersley (Mr. McIsaac) mentioned that at that time there was a minority government and that all parties supported the legislation. That is true, Mr. Speaker. There was general recognition on the part of the government—which was Liberal—and on the part of the opposition parties that we finally had to put our house in order. As a rough estimate, I would think that 40 per cent of the total economy of this country is in large measure dependent upon the efficient operation of some mode of transportation. What did we do when we put that legislation throughh in 1966-67? We accepted the principles of the MacPherson royal commission report. They were two. The first principle was that we should encourage the railways and other forms of transportation to compete with each other—railways to compete with trucking, air transportation, pipelines, and so on, as well as sea and water transportation. There was a principle of compensatory payments that was accepted in principle at that time.

Second, we accepted the principle that has been historic for every parliament since 1967—that when in the national interest we had to do something to help a region, an area or a group in the national interest, the taxpayers of Canada would pay for it and not require the payment to be made by the transportation carrier. Those two principles, of competition and compensatory payments, and the taxpayers willing to accept, for the national unity of the country, responsibility for anything we ask the carriers to do that was not economic, were accepted.

● (1610)

Almost 80 amendments were proposed during that debate. The government accepted most of them because there was a will among all parties to make the system work. All parties agreed, and decided that our transport system, involving new modes of transport and developments, was beyond the capacity of a single minister to handle—in fact, was beyond the capacity of two or three deputy ministers to handle: they did not have the time. The system is complex, vast, and all parties agreed that by putting so much responsibility on one minister who was busy with other duties and two or three deputy ministers, assisted by secretaries and engineers, we had made a mess of it. It was just too large for one small group to handle. To quote the words of the previous minister of finance, our transport system was "a mess".

Today I listened to the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens), an urban member, speaking about the problems of urban transportation, about the problems of people who must use urban transit to enter and leave our cities. In my 20 years as a member of parliament I have seldom heard an urban member discuss transportation. Usually, when we discuss transportation, the urban members leave the House because, after all, it is only a matter for the rural people, the people of the prairies, the maritimes, the people of Quebec, of northern Ontario and the remote areas of British Columbia and the territories. On this significant—you might say—historical day an urban member spoke about the government's record on transit. I join the hon. member for York-Simcoe in hoping that other members representing cities—Vancouver, Montreal, Winnipeg, smaller cities like Calgary, Edmonton, Regina, Saskatoon, Halifax and others—will also speak in this debate.

Rising transportation costs are a main element in forcing up living costs and production costs, and high production costs make us less competitive with our world competitors. Transportation is still probably one of the most important responsibilities of any department of government. It is no accident, as I have said many times, that the largest committee room in the centre block is the railway committee room. For most of the last 100 years members of parliament have spent much time considering questions of transportation. All this has passed and we no longer use the railway committee room except for banquets and social occasions.

An hon. Member: And committees.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): This legislation will not give us the chance to use it again. I shall now deal with the principles at issue. The decisions we made during the last ten years were based on attempts to make our railways run their operations rationally. Surely no fair-minded person who knows anything about transport techniques in the world will deny that Canadian National and the CPR—the two great national railways—and the PGE match in their operational techniques any railway in the world. Our railways are efficient. Compare them with the railways operating in the northeast United States. The railroads of our neighbours to the south are a mess. They are a catastrophe.

Consider the operation of the United States railway system which tries to haul tremendous tonnages of goods to southeast coast ports. It it were not for the Mississippi water system the transport system of the central United States would be a chaotic mess. We in Canada have fine, highly trained and dedicated working people doing a tremendous job on our railways. The failure of our railway system has been at the top level; the failure stems from management operating in Montreal and other cities, in offices remote from operations. You cannot learn transport problems if you are in a skyscraper. You must be out in the field, in the regions of the country, to learn about our transport problems.

Over the years people from all parts of this country have raised a litany of complaints about how the railways try to make money. Their lists of complaints would make a book as long as any you have read. Naturally, one tends to think of how the railways try to make money in one's own area because those examples come readily to mind. In my province of Saskatchewan we have a great tonnage of potash to move. One set of mines in my constituency produces close to three million tons of potash a year. But they could not get the railways to carry the potash. The railway said, "Oh, no. We are here for one purpose only, to carry wheat." So the government of Saskatchewan had to build a monstrous highway, superior to the Trans-Canada highway in quality, to allow trucks to haul that potash night and day to the American railway, the Great Northern, which took the potash to the great markets of the mid-west. Mr. Speaker, that kind of nonsense alienates the friends and supporters of our railway system.

Another example which gripes me has to do with the western portion of western Canada. In the early days, when we found oil and gas in that part of the country, we wasted much oil and gas—at least, we burned off all low pressure fuels. I went to one company which had a tremendous deposit of unused natural gas in the ground because they did not know what to do with all the surplus propane except flare it off, and I proposed to the company that they should go to the major railways and ask them to haul propane for an agreed charge. The company knew the propane was valuable and as good as natural gas, but they did not have the technology for shipping it.

I suggested they should haul the propane in big tanks covering the length of a couple of flat cars. I suggested they could service the prairies for 400 miles around and all Canada as far west as B.C., as well as markets in Montana and other parts of the United States. This fuel could heat our homes and run our cars and tractors. When the proposal was made to the railways, what did they say? Both of them said, in effect, "Yes, we admit this business will be a money-maker for us, but not in the first couple of years. We will not be ready for a couple of years, or not before you develop the market, for only then can we make money out of this traffic". Today the people of western Canada are bearing the heavy costs of pipelines built all over Alberta and Saskatchewan. Today one hears complaints about access to premium fuel for industry, fuel which should have been reserved for customers in the far distant regions of the country including Ontario and our American markets. The railways did this deliberately, 25 years ago, not because they were against making money but because it was not their policy to take a loss for two years while markets were built up. I shall touch on this subject again when we consider the bill clause by clause.

More recently, the Hall commission travelled to the west. At every meeting farmers and businessmen rose and cited examples to show that the railways could carry more tonnage. The railways had applied to abandon thousands of miles of line, but under pressure—the commissioners being there—the railways admitted that they could make money in southeastern Saskatchewan. Farmers, using the railways' own figures, were able to prove that if the railways hauled grain east instead of west and then back east again, they would make more money. They were able to prove that right in that area there was a market which would be equivalent of many millions of bushels of wheat, but for another commodity, gravel. One gravel pit supplies gravel-short areas for 100 miles around. With the price the railways charge for hauling gravel, a lot higher than wheat but much lower than the truck haul, the railways could have knocked the trucks out of the gravel business and saved our roads. There would have been a tremendous increase in income. This short haul of 100 miles would have put all those lines into a black position on the economic ledger. The railways had no choice, under the presentation of those figures and the presentation of the commissioners, but to admit that all these lines in southeastern Saskatchewan should be kept. When we ended up that day with the royal commission, the general feeling was that instead of taking out some of our main lines we should add 40 miles of line to make it more efficient. I point out these examples to illustrate the fact that this type of representation has been made to royal commissions since the thirties. Just as long as royal commissions have recommended rationalization, just as steadily has the management of railways refused to accept it. In Saskatchewan we have railway lines running parallel for 100 miles, one CN and one CP. Why they cannot use one line for both trains I do not know. Every royal commission recommends it. I will come back to that matter.

● (1620)

In effect, Mr. Speaker, I have been trying to make a case for the fact that parliament has on several occasions spent a great deal of time trying to put legislation and principles on the statute books of this House that will direct our system into a more effective and efficient management of the whole transportation system, not just the railways. At the end of that debate ten years ago, one promise was made by the then minister on condition that we let the legislation go through.

[Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain).]

The minister made a promise—which is on the record of this House—that no future abandonment of these reserve lines would be allowed until the railways showed their cost of operation. In spite of that promise by the then minister, the railways still have not provided to the people of Canada the cost of operating these lines.

The railways are a power unto themselves. Seven years ago some civil servants got permission from the government to convert Canada into the metric system. This group of civil servants told the grain companies, "This is going to be done. Do it." They told the oil companies, "This is going to be done. Do it". All those poor innocents thought that was the law and went ahead and prepared for it last February 1—but not the railways. They said that when they were good and ready they would convert. That is one issue. Parliament thought it had resolved that issue ten years ago. It has still to be resolved in this legislation. We have two commissions at the present time on this subject. The Snavely report is now before us. In plain, blunt terms, since the minister could not find any person in Canada who knew anything about railway costing—no one does, not even the railways—they went outside the country and got a man who came here to establish what it costs to haul grain.

Many members of this House have read the Snavely report. There is no evidence in there as to costing. There is simple and flat assertion that the railways say it costs this much, and another flat assertion from representatives of the grain companies that this is the estimate of the costs. All the royal commissioner did was to split the difference. They expect parliament, on that type of whistling in the wind or finding the wind with your thumb, to make a decision on what it costs to haul grain in western Canada.

Second, we have the Hall commission which deals with the rationalization of railways, the same thing we had in the three previous royal commissions. It also is to deal with rationalization of grain. That report is not in yet. Before we even try to discuss this bill intelligently we should have those two royal commission reports.

I want to move on to the main part of my remarks. I am going to differ from the hon. member for Battleford-Kindersley, the minister and the government, and put it into terms that every member of parliament will understand and, I hope, every person in this country will understand. In 1966-67, parliament—with the support of all parties—decided that the Minister of Transport, regardless of his politics, and the Department of Transport, were incompetent by their own track record to run this huge, vast, complicated, intermodal system of transportation in Canada. We, the members of parliament, decided to transfer the power of policy-making and regulation to a new board called the Canadian Transport Commission. That power was given ten years ago.

What does this bill do? It says, in effect, that the CTC is a mess, that it does not do the job parliament asked it to do. Therefore, we are going to change all the powers and policy-making from the CTC back to the minister, the department and the governor general in council. This bill centralizes the power of over 40 per cent of this country into the hands of one minister, with his department, which has a track record of failure going back 40 years. It says we made the mistake of putting it into an independent, neutral board. If you look at the bill you will find they still repeat the principle of the MacPherson royal commission report that rates must be compensatory. There must be competition where possible. In the national interest, the national taxpayer will pay. There is no mention of the costing principle which is vital to the control of all types of transportation.

This bill moves all powers of transportation, representing about 40 per cent of the economic segment, over to the minister. The minister will now be known as the czar of all the railways, the czar of all the airlines, not only "Lang Airlines" but the whole bit. He will be the czar of all pipelines and the czar of all water carriers. We have a measure of this czar from watching what he has done over the past five or six years, ever since the LIFT program of 1970.

What we are doing in this bill is transferring power from an independent forum to a political forum—to the minister and to the cabinet. There is no mechanism here for control by parliament. We are simply going back to square one. It was a mess for 40 years, and we tried to get out of that mess by putting things into the hands of an independent body. Now we are going back to the old system.

I ask this question: "Does parliament, does this country, want this tremendous power we have turned over to the CTC—which never used it—turned back to the minister and to the deputy ministers enabling them to move at any moment, make announcements outside the House, push in programs or scrap them without anything being said in parliament?" Members have heard what happened to the promises made in 1974 with regard to urban transit assistance. In the maritimes they are being betrayed by the "at and east" rates. In addition, the minister has suggested that the Crowsnest agreement, going back many years, should be changed. This is what we are objecting to. This is what we are being asked to do. There is no limit to the minister's power except the governor in council. It will reside in a cabinet barely able at the present time to keep up with its duties. Yet ministers will now be expected to watch over an industry so vast and complex that parliament decided some years ago it was too big for any one department and that it should be placed in the hands of a 17-man commission.

I hope members of parliament who feel themselves responsible for the successful working out of this country's economic situation will think long and seriously before accepting such a situation. I should like to suggest to the minister that the unity of this country is more than a matter of politics. It is a matter of economics as well. In Saskatchewan we have just finished fighting a couple of by-elections. I know that the Liberals have been complaining that we were bringing federal issues into provincial affairs. But we cannot avoid federal issues in Saskatchewan because our province is so completely dependent upon the economic policies of the federal government.

We see our province, as well as others, being attacked by the federal government in areas which are ours under the constitution. We think of the petroleum administration bill, of the intervention of the government in the case between the government of Saskatchewan and one of its own companies which it was taxing. The federal government has been interfering in matters which were none of its business, including even the metric system. Why does this administration go out of its way to make changes without telling the people, without telling the provincial government? Does it think it can continue to do this without getting into trouble?

I realize it cannot be pleasant for the minister to sit in the House and have to listen to what I am saying, but he is the chief architect of the unpopularity of the central government of this country in the west. What he has done, as minister in charge of the Wheat Board, as minister of justice and as Minister of Transport, with all the powers he has, is something the west is not anxious to tolerate any longer. If the minister will accept in good faith that we on this side would like to see a better transportation system, let him please give us the benefit of the thought that there might be some ideas better than those presented in the bill before us.

The other day the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner) made a speech in which he held forth as to the advantages of stability. He made it clear that the carriers and the captive shippers had to know what the policy was before the system could work properly—they had to make their plans, and so on. I should like to turn to an even more fundamental criticism of this legislation, but before I do so I wish to suggest that the CTC never had a fair trial. We set up this 17-man commission. What did the government do? It put in charge of that commission two washed-out, beaten-up old politicians. They had run out of steam in the political arena and they took refuge in an organization whose decisions could affect 40 per cent of the economy of this country. They took over, all they did was study, study, study.

They never directed the railways to do anything, for the reason they had no power to direct. It was a case of the Department of Transport saying, "You should do this," and of the CTC saying, "We are studying the matter". There was a dichotomy. But surely the answer is not to put the system back into the hands of those who have proved they could not run it before. The answer, in my view, is to get at the cause of the problems in the CTC.

I have referred to the government's bad habit of putting politicians who need a rest home more quiet than the Senate in charge of powerful commissions and agencies. I suggest we should leave the CTC as it is but give the commission the power to direct the various carriers engaged in the transportation business. The old legislation of ten years ago merely said that the commission "may recommend". Knowing the history and attitude of railway management, I can say that any recommendation from a transport commission or similar body set up by parliament has about as much effect as a fly on an elephant's hide. This has been proven for 40 years. They are so tough they do not even listen to the metric commission. The power has to be put into the legislation.

Tremendous efforts were made in speech after speech of mine ten years ago pleading with the government to give the CTC the power to direct. If that power were given, it would need to be accompanied by the power to enforce. Because we had accepted the principle of the national government paying for all the things the railways were asked to do in the national interest, we had the club in our hands. The minister at that time was Mr. Pickersgill. Members who read the answers he gave me over a series of weeks will see how they twist and turn. He said, in effect, "We are dealing here with private enterprise and we would not think of directing private enterprise to do something which was against its will". Then, when he ended up by appointing himself chairman of the board, it was obvious why he took the line he did. He did not want responsibility for directing anything.

Mr. Speaker, the power of direction and enforcement would give the CTC a chance to prove whether it can operate effectively or not. There is a second consideration, and it is dear to my heart. We have to give back to parliament control over the government of this country, and particularly over transportation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): I said earlier, and I will mention it again, that the biggest committee room in this building is the railway committee room. I want to see that railway committee room filled again with members of parliament, backed up by the most skilled staff which money can buy and which knows the costing procedure, can question the railways, the bus companies and other transportation bodies as to cost, that knows what the law is and how to enforce it.

● (1640)

The CTC has been in place for ten years, but it still does not know the costing formulas of the railways. That is the reason we had to go to the country and get the Snavely report. Parliament must be given back its control. The system I proposed ten years ago was incorporated in a motion moved by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin), and I seconded it. It was a very simple proposal. We used the example of the Commonwealth of Australia in suggesting that a statutory committee be set up. The statutory committee would not be dependent upon the whims of the prime minister and the cabinet. This committee of parliament would meet by statute with a chairman of the opposition and with a staff that was paid for by that committee and would be independent of the civil service and the carriers. This committee would watch the CTC, to see that it did not spend all of its time studying but directed and carried out the powers of parliament and laid down in the statute, and enforced government policies.

The question of costing was so embarrassing to Canada ten years ago that when the question of rates came up, one railway—the CPR—told the government that it lost money hauling grain in the year 1958; I think the loss was $17 million. This horrified the western grain companies in the prairie provinces and they collected an equal amount of money. They went down to New York, where the CPR had put forward its costing figures, and they hired an equally prestigious accounting group to look at the same figures. In due course they reported that the company had made money.

So you have one group of highly skilled accountants working for the CPR and saying that the CPR lost money. Another group of accountants working for the grain companies said the CPR had made money. What did the royal commission do? It hired an equally prestigious group of accountants to examine the same CPR figures, and they concluded that the railways either made money or lost money. I have their report here and all members should read it. They will never understand it because those who made it do not understand it.

I am simply pointing out, Mr. Speaker, that on this question of parliamentary control we must accept, in humility, that neither do we as parliamentarians have the time properly to control a CTC with such an involved, complicated and vast operation as they have to manage, but in that humility we have to accept that there is a need to hire people, if necessary at a cost of $200,000 or $300,000 a year, to give us the kind of competent advice needed to cope with the type of thing we are up against here in Canada where we do not know the costing of the railways. We do know more about the airlines and we know precisely the costing of pipelines because that matter is well in hand, but we do have to take on this question of railway costing.

I think that we in parliament would serve ourselves well if we were to provide, in this legislation, firstly that the CTC stayed with its present powers; secondly, that the CTC be given the power to direct and to enforce under the terms already outlined in the act; and, thirdly, that we in parliament should be the ones the watch the CTC, not the Minister of Transport. I would not care if he was the Lord himself; he would not have the time to look after this tremendously complex and vast operation.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Don't disillusion him; he thinks he is.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): The fourth provision I should like to see in this legislation, in addition to the three principles I have enunciated, is that a decision be made by parliament on this perpetual question of how we are going to pay for transportation in this vast regional country in a way that is fair to all. In his announcement, the minister—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to inform the hon. member that his allotted time has expired. He may continue with unanimous consent. Does the hon. member have unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt).

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): I distinctly heard some "no's" and that is the reason I recognized the hon. member for New Westminster.

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I want to assure you that I gave my consent to having the hon. member continue his remarks, and I did so for a special reason. I find it a delight to be able to follow the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton). I do not think I have ever listened to a speech of his in the House without learning something from it. I think his suggestion concerning the moving of gravel, for example, along with grain, merits a lot more attention than it has been given in the past. His suggestion about a statutory committee of the House and the return of some power to parliament is one that is certainly worthy of a great deal more attention and thought. I presume from the hon. member's remarks that he is going to vote against the bill, although I did not hear him say whether he was or was not. I presume the Conservative party is going to vote against this bill.

An hon. Member: Don't bet on it.

Mr. Leggatt: I still find it hard to distinguish between the government and the official opposition when it comes to transportation policy.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: You want to paint the trains red.

Mr. Leggatt: They will all be red. One of the interesting things in this debate has been to listen to the revolt of the backbenchers of the Liberal party. This has been a fascinating exercise. Every time we get members on the government side deciding that their personal ambition is somehow a little less than the ambition they have for their own riding, I find it welcome. I am glad to know that members of this House declare themselves interested in their constituents, as did, apparently, the hon. member for York East (Mr. Collenette) and the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Philbrook) yesterday. They held forth very eloquently in regard to their dissatisfaction with the promises that were made in the 1974 election campaign on the subject of urban transit. In fact, the hon. member for York East said his support of this bill was contingent, so I presume he has not yet made up his mind whether he is going to vote in favour of it. The hon. member said that his support was contingent on five factors, one of which was that financial assistance must be maintained. A second factor was that federal assistance must be within specific time parameters, and he referred to a number of other areas which he said would have to be dealt with before he would lend his support. I do not see the hon. member in the House today, but perhaps he will read my remarks in Hansard.

We would like to give the hon. member an opportunity of seeing whether his contingent support will be satisfied. All he has to do is to support a six months' hoist on this bill and insist that the government fulfil its promises in the field of urban transit before bringing back the bill. Standing in the House and declaring that his support is contingent on certain conditions is worthless. Once the bill goes through, it goes through. The hon. member for York East and the hon. member for Halton have an opportunity now either to support a six months' hoist of the bill or to vote against it.

Mr. Gilbert: So much for the Liberal revolt.

Mr. Leggatt: I am afraid that the Liberal revolt is, frankly, a bit revolting. In terms of urban problems in the area of the lower mainland, we have heard a lot about the problems in Toronto. I have had an opportunity to travel in Toronto when the Union station was jammed full, but I will tell you that the transport facilities available to people in Toronto are vastly superior to the transport facilities available in the lower mainland of British Columbia.

It is time someone in the House took notice of the fact that the worst transit urban area in Canada is in the lower mainland of B.C. Anyone who has come from that area and has had to go bumper-to-bumper for an hour or two in the morning in the Fraser Valley can testify to the problems and to the fact that the problems in Toronto, which are there and real, and the problems in Montreal, which also are there and real, still do not match the worst urban transportation situation in Canada. The reason for that is the crazy geography of the lower mainland. We have a long, narrow piece of land—a neck where people have to drive down a single corridor in order to get to work.

We have heard the promises made in 1974 about urban transportation. I want to remind the government of another promise, that there would be an urban transit corridor down the Fraser Valley providing easy rail commuter access to Vancouver. That is another promise that has not been fulfilled, another promise that no doubt this government does not intend to keep because it would not have the chance to use it again in the next election. I expect that if we have another election in a year or two we will hear the same old promise about an urban corridor down the Fraser Valley.

An hon. Member: You will not get the same old government.

Mr. Leggatt: That is right, we may not get the same old government.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): That is the way the government keeps its promises: it keeps them to use them again.

Mr. Leggatt: In any event, the greater Vancouver regional district has made substantial progress in this matter, no thanks to the federal government, because they have not had decent funding from the federal authorities. One of the things we could be doing is to put a rapid transit system right down the middle of route 401 so that everyone sitting in a car could recognize the advantage of urban transit. In fact, they might get out and try using it.

Yesterday, the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Stollery) gave us quite a long explanation about transportation. He said that many of us do not understand the country. He explained what a terrible piece of geography we live in here. I want to say that the hon. member does not understand the people in the country, although he might understand the geography. The people in this country are not looking for an ideological solution to transportation problems; they are looking for a rational approach. If you take a rational approach to transportation, and you get out of the free enterprise bias and look at public transportation as it exists in the various parts of the world, those people who so consistently vote Liberal and vote Tory would, I tell you, in a Gallup poll vote NDP on that issue in order to obtain a decent public transportation system in Canada.

An hon. Member: We don't need any more NDP governments.

Mr. Leggatt: Yes, we are going to be the government of Saskatchewan next time, too.

An hon. Member: Oh, no, you won't.

Mr. Leggatt: A couple of swallows came in from Saskatchewan yesterday. They think spring is here already. I can tell my Tory friends that in Saskatchewan the snow is still on the ground and will be on the ground for them next time around.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Five o'clock.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): He'll be back tonight.

An hon. Member: Let him talk until six o'clock. Who cares?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt), has the floor for the purpose of speaking on Bill C-33. I suggest he should get back to the bill.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Leggatt: I appreciate that, Mr. Speaker, and I want to tell you that the people of Saskatchewan are also interested in the problems of transportation. I would like to speak directly to the bill and deal with a couple of clauses in it. I think the two clauses which cause most reservation in this part of the House are, first, clause 3(2)(g) which reads:

> Commercial viability should be an objective both in the operation of transportation services and in the provision of facilities and services in direct support thereof—

Commercial viability has not worked in terms of transportation in Canada since confederation, and to place it in this bill as the key to the bill is to defeat the purposes of a national transportation system. That is why we cannot support the bill. It is not any kind of socialist dogma that we are talking about; it is just plain, old-fashioned common sense, because if you look at commercial viability and examine the user-pay philosophy, you should look at the question of cost benefit. Free enterprisers in this place examine transportation from a free enterprise point of view, and when they do they come up with a public transportation answer. There is no other answer to this question, because you have to take into consideration energy consumption in the cost-benefit study, decreased needs for highways, reduced pollution, reduced auto accidents and the subsidy to the private sector.

Let us examine some of the figures that the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin) and the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner) used. The railway services in this country are paying their own way up to 74 per cent of the cost of their services. They are the most efficient in terms of carrying their own freight right now, especially the public service.

Mr. Parent: You cannot even keep a straight face when you say it.

Mr. Leggatt: The worst offender is marine services. They only pay 19 per cent of what the rest of the country put in to support those services. All those services contribute only 64 per cent.

An hon. Member: Which Otto?

Mr. Leggatt: He has contributed enough in this place. Air services have contributed 31 per cent. Every time you buy an air ticket and get on an aircraft you are paying only 31 per cent of the cost of that service. The railways have been sabotaged in this country out of a bias that the minister and his predecessors, both in Liberal and Conservative governments, have had against railway services.

May I call it five o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp)—External Affairs—Soviet Union—Inquiry whether representations made by minister for release of Georgi Vins; the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Fairweather)—Manpower—Grants to constituencies in respect of manpower mobility; the hon. member for Northwest Territories (Mr. Firth)—Northern Affairs—Log housing program for northern Canada.

It being five o'clock p.m., the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, notices of motions (papers), private bills, public bills.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Notice of motion No. 1, in the name of the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall).

Some hon. Members: Stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Stand at the request of the government.

Mr. Goodale: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. I believe there is common agreement to proceed this afternoon in the next hour with a motion for papers standing in the name of the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Hnatyshyn).

Mr. Paproski: Agreed.

CORRESPONDENCE RELATING TO ESTABLISHMENT OF URANIUM REFINERY IN SASKATCHEWAN

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar) moved:

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency praying that he will cause to be laid before this House copies of all documents relating to the establishment of a uranium refinery near Warman, Saskatchewan, or elsewhere in the province of Saskatchewan, by Eldorado Nuclear Limited, and copies of any agreement between the government of Canada and the province of Saskatchewan or their respective agencies.

He said: Mr. Speaker, my reason for rising at this time is the refusal of the government to provide the documents I requested relating to the establishment of a uranium refinery in the province of Saskatchewan. The documents are agreements or other documents between the government of Canada and the province of Saskatchewan, and any other documents of Eldorado Nuclear Limited relating to the establishment of a refinery in Saskatchewan. It is rather coincidental that this motion is being debated today. There have been two important by-elections in the province of Saskatchewan and I am very happy to say that the candidates of the Progressive Conservative party were successful.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: I do not mention this to boast about a particular victory. I would never do that, because that would imply that the people of Saskatchewan did not know what they are doing—and they always know what they are doing, particularly yesterday. It is significant that one of the platforms upon which the provincial Progressive Conservative party ran was to the effect of sending a message to Ottawa and Regina; and I think it is important, when we consider the success of the Conservative party, to understand also that the two by-elections took place in ridings which are adjacent to what has now apparently been determined to be the prime location for the establishment of a uranium refinery.

I can tell hon. members that the people of these areas are very concerned about the development of this facility which apparently is to be built near Warman, Saskatchewan, which is about ten miles away from Saskatoon. The people there are concerned not so much about the fact that there is to be a government facility built there, as they are by the fact that they have been denied information by both levels of government, the federal government and the provincial government.

The matter has progressed to the point where the New Democratic Party, at its annual convention completed at the end of last year, received and passed a number of resolutions strongly condemning the provincial government for the position it has taken relating to the establishment of a uranium refinery near Saskatoon and the attitude which has been taken with respect to the giving out of information to the citizens of Saskatchewan relating to this project.

I was very surprised when the federal government took the position it did with respect to this motion. I want to remind the House of the response I received to a question I raised in the House last October 22 when I asked the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) whether, in the spirit of openness mentioned in the Speech from the Throne, he would table all documents relating to the establishment of the refinery instead of keeping the matter wrapped in the kind of secrecy which would be appropriate to wartime circumstances.

I want to quote the minister's answer specifically so that I cannot be accused of misleading the House. I know that the minister and the parliamentary secretary would not want anyone to mislead the House with respect to this issue. I quote the minister's words so that we can be clear on what basis I am surprised that the documents I have requested are not being tabled. The minister said the following:

I am not sure that the discussions have yet moved to the point where it would be useful to table documents. I can tell the hon. member that when the time comes, I will be pleased to table them, provided we also get the approval of the province of Saskatchewan.

That was an unequivocal undertaking on the part of the minister, subject to the approval of the province of Saskatchewan, to table documents relating to the establishment of this refinery. Whatever those doduments are, there was no qualification or limitation in the minister's answer. As I understand it, it was an undertaking, and if the minister is a man to be believed I see no reason for him to refuse on a very flimsy excuse—which I will deal with—and on very flimsy grounds to table the documents which are of such importance and interest to the people of Saskatchewan.

At the time this motion was called, the parliamentary secretary indicated that the government refused to table the documents, ostensibly because they are commercial documents and the information is proprietary. In the name of common sense, when a facility of this kind is going to be built at public expense, a facility built by a Crown corporation of the government of Canada, what kind of logic would compel a government to say it does not want to disclose the documents because there is some sort of commercial aspect to the establishment of a uranium refinery?

In this country we do not have competition with regard to control over uranium. I do not understand the argument that matters concerning uranium are shared or are joint matters. The government of Canada has complete and absolute control over uranium once it comes out of the ground. It has control over the processing of uranium. It has control over the export of any products which occur by virtue of that processing. This is not a shared responsibility. It is not a question of competition with a number of private concerns. The government has absolute control, regardless of the fact that there is some commercial aspect.

It is rather difficult for me to understand what the government is referring to. I fail to understand why the government denies this information to the people of Saskatchewan on this basis, particularly when in the Speech from the Throne there is an undertaking on the part of the government to have a new spirit of openness and a new spirit of participatory democracy with the people of our country so that we out in the boondocks of Saskatchewan can have some idea of what is going on and what will happen with respect to the establishment of this kind of facility.

It is interesting to note that the government has set up a set of guidelines respecting the production of papers. The document I have here has been presented to the House of Commons, and the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) is very familiar with it. This document sets out the exemptions with regard to the production of documents in the House of Commons. For the record, I would like to quote from it so there can be no misunderstanding of the spirit of these exemptions. The general principle stated in these guidelines is as follows:

> To enable members of parliament to secure factual information about the operations of government to carry out their parliamentary duties and to make public as much factual information as possible consistent with effective administration, the protection of the security of the state, rights to privacy and other such matters, government papers, documents and consultant reports should be produced on Notice of Motion for the Production of Papers unless falling within the categories outlined below in which case an exemption is to be claimed from production.

Mr. Dupras: Read on.

● (1710)

Mr. Hnatyshyn: I could go down the list and have the parliamentary secretary explain the reference to "proprietary nature". He will have his opportunity to speak.

Mr. Dupras: I have a list of the exemptions.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: The list is here, and it is quite clear. I am sure the government is going to say that this falls into some kind of contractual document. In reply to my question of October 22, the minister did not indicate he was going to claim any exemption. I would ask the parliamentary secretary to explain whether the minister at that time was innocently or otherwise attempting to mislead the House or mislead me, as the representative of the constituency where this uranium refinery is proposed to be established, and whether he is to be believed or his words are to be taken with a grain of salt from now on. This matter is not without importance in the province of Saskatchewan, and naturally there is great interest there.

I do not have to point out to members of the House the extent of the concern expressed with respect to activities around Port Hope, Ontario. As an individual and a citizen of the area concerned, I am quite prepared to accept reasonable assurances from Eldorado and the federal government that the planned facility will be built with the greatest safeguards, the greatest consideration for environmental protection, and that there will be no danger of any description to people in the area. But every time the government stonewalls what I consider to be a legitimate and reasonable request for information or documents, I become apprehensive about what is going on. I do not know why the government is trying to conceal this information. Do they think they know better than the people of the area, or are they concerned that if the information gets out the people of the area will have something with which to attack them? I just do not know why the government is concerned about keeping this to themselves.
