such publications have been forwarded to the honourable member. These are: (a) "Adding insulation to house attics" published by NRC. (b) "100 ways to save energy and money in the home" published by the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources. The NRC publication provides a sample of comparative data on the relative cost and effectiveness of several insulating materials, however, no agency is currently publishing such an economic comparison on an ongoing basis. The limitation of these comparisons is that they fail to consider other equally important parameters such as installation cost, resistance to fire, etc. No agency publishes comparative data identifying the product of a specific manufacturer. The evaluations carried out by NRC are performed under commercial contract with the manufacturer or his agent. The results of such specific evaluations are therefore confidential. Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation requires that certain materials used in National Housing Act construction, including all of the insulation, be tested for compliance with certain standards, notably C.S.A. Standard No. A-101 in the case of mineral wool insulation. All suppliers who wish to serve this market i.e. those using imported or their own domestically manufactured goods, are obliged to have their products tested for acceptance.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE—EMPLOYEES FROM PRIVATE EMPLOYMENT AGENCIES

Question No. 1,537—Mr. McKenzie:

1. Has the Department of Justice obtained (a) part-time (b) full-time employees from private employment agencies in (i) British Columbia (ii) Alberta (iii) Saskatchewan (iv) Manitoba (v) Ontario (vi) Quebec (vii) New Brunswick (viii) Nova Scotia (ix) Prince Edward Island (x) Newfoundland and, if so, in each case, how many?

2. Are such employees paid from supplementary estimates and, if not, from what estimates are they paid?

3. By province, what was the (a) average hourly rate paid to employment agencies (b) average hourly rate paid to employees (c) total amount paid by the Department in (i) 1975 (ii) 1976?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice):

1. (a) Yes.

		1974-75	1975-76
I	British Columbia	23	26
II	Alberta	1	2
III	Saskatchewan	4	2
IV	Manitoba	Nil	Nil
V	Ontario	163	253
VI	Quebec	1	Nil
VII	New Brunswick	Nil	Nil
VIII	Nova Scotia	Nil	Nil
IX	Prince Edward Island	Nil	Nil
X	Newfoundland	Nil	Nil

(b) No.

2. No, Main Estimates

		1974-75	1975-76
3.	(a) British Columbia	5.80	6.00

	Quebec	6.25	N/A

[Mr. Poulin.]

(b) Information not available. This information is known only to the private employment agency and its employee.
(c) I 1974-75 $191,827.66
II 1975-76 $209,008.23

MINISTRY OF STATE FOR URBAN AFFAIRS—EMPLOYEES FROM PRIVATE EMPLOYMENT AGENCIES

Question No. 1,552—Mr. McKenzie:

1. Has the Ministry of State for Urban Affairs obtained (a) part-time (b) full-time employees from private employment agencies in (i) British Columbia (ii) Alberta (iii) Saskatchewan (iv) Manitoba (v) Ontario (vi) Quebec (vii) New Brunswick (viii) Nova Scotia (ix) Prince Edward Island (x) Newfoundland and, if so, in each case, how many?

2. Are such employees paid from supplementary estimates and, if not, from what estimates are they paid?

3. By province, what was the (a) average hourly rate paid to employment agencies (b) average hourly rate paid to employees (c) total amount paid by the Ministry in (i) 1975 (ii) 1976?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): For the Ministry of State for Urban Affairs: 1. The ministry has not obtained part-time or full-time employees from private employment agencies, employees being people placed on our paylists at the central pay office.

2. Not applicable.

3. Not applicable.

UIC—BENEFITS

Question No. 1,604—Mr. Herbert:

1. By province, in each of the past five years, how many persons received unemployment insurance benefits for the full period of their entitlement?

2. Does the government monitor whether and how such persons find monies to survive after the termination of receipt of unemployment insurance benefits?

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): 1. In so far as the Unemployment Insurance Commission is concerned: statistics are not available prior to 1973 and since then only by region.

	Atlantic	Quebec	Ontario	Prairie	Pacific
1973	71,716	115,209	125,346	44,623	50,674
1974	53,816	92,547	81,599	20,166	39,032
1976	70,282	139,927	105,746	17,125	42,288

NOTE: These statistics show the number of claimants who were active in the last week of their entitlement. However, it does not follow that these individuals have received UI benefits for every week of entitlement utilized: some, for example, had to serve weeks of disqualification and/or disentitlement, others had earnings.

2. The Unemployment Insurance Commission has surveyed UI exhaustees in an attempt to determine what happens to these individuals when they have exhausted their UI benefits. These surveys were carried out in 1973 and again in 1976. It was found that the majority of exhaustees (63 per cent) were able to find work, on average, within six weeks while only a few 8 per cent, i.e. about 2 per cent of total claimload, resorted to welfare. Those who found a job worked, on average, four months out of the six month period investigated.

TRANSPORT—COST OF PUBLICATION "AT HOME WITH TRANSPORT"

Question No. 1,650—Mr. Mazankowski:

What is the cost of the Department of Transport publication At Home with Transport and how many issues were printed?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Transport Canada spent $1,357.28 for its publication "At Home with Transport" and 5,000 copies were printed through the Printing Bureau of Supply and Services, Canada.

PROPOSALS MAINLINE AIR CARRIERS AND REGIONAL CARRIERS FOR ROUTE CONSOLIDATION

Question No. 1,695—Mr. Howie:

Have any proposals been made by (a) Air Canada (b) CP Air (c) Air Canada or CP Air in conjunction with Pacific Western Airlines, Transair, Nordair, Québecair or Eastern Provincial Airways to consolidate routes or services and, if so, what do these proposals consist of?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): No proposals by mainline or regional air carriers for consolidation of routes or services have been made to the Canadian Transport Commission. Many carriers have, however, been reviewing their route networks to find ways in which air services can be rationalized and made more economic. Transport Canada is also giving high priority to a review of the roles of the mainline, regional and local carriers to determine whether a redefinition of these roles could be in the public interest.

STUDENT SUMMER EMPLOYMENT

Question No. 1,710—Mr. Howie:

For the year 1976, did the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs have any student summer employment programmes in (a) Canada (b) New Brunswick and, if so, in each case (i) what were they (ii) how many persons were given direct summer employment and what were the wages (iii) what was the cost?

Hon. A. C. Abbott (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Yes.

(a) Canada

(i) Program	(ii) Numbers	Wages	(iii) Cost*
Career Oriented Summer Employment Program (COSEP)	31	$69,216.32	$26.18
Non-Career Oriented Summer Employment Program (NCOSEP)	29	$70,776.42	$146.34
Puppet Program	21	$23,284.79	$29,754.74

(b) New Brunswick

Included in the above for the province of New Brunswick is the following:

Puppet Program	1	$1,267.44	$2,085.30

*Cost is interpreted as travel expenses and other related costs.

SOS STUDENT SUMMER EMPLOYMENT PROGRAMME, 1976

Question No. 1,714—Mr. Howie:

For the year 1976, did the Department of the Secretary of State have any student summer employment programmes in (a) Canada (b) New Brunswick and, if so, in each case (i) what were they (ii) how many persons were given direct summer employment and what were the wages (iii) what was the cost?

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): (a) Yes. (i) Student Community Services Programme and Hostel Programme. (ii) Student Community Service Programme—2,604 persons at $120./week. Hostel Programme, 371 persons at $120./week. (iii) Student Community Service Programme—$5,308,000. Hostel Programme—$790,458. (b) Yes. (i) Student Community Service Programme and Hostel Programme. (ii) Student Community Service Programme—141 persons at $120./week. Hostel Programme—29 persons at $120./week. (iii) Student Community Service Programme $259,805. Hostel Programme—$46,389.60.

TRANSPORT—HEAVY LIFT FACILITIES AT PORT OF SAINT JOHN, NEW BRUNSWICK

Question No. 1,724—Mr. Fairweather:

1. Does the National Harbours Board provide, on a regular basis, heavy lift facilities at the Port of Saint John, New Brunswick and, if not, are there any other major ports in Eastern Canada or on the Pacific Coast without such service?

2. Was the Glenbuckie fulfilling such a service at Saint John?

3. Was the Glenbuckie withdrawn from service and, if so, on what date?

4. Will alternative facilities be provided and, if so, on what date?

5. Have complaints been received by the National Harbours Board concerning the withdrawal of heavy lift capability from the Port of Saint John?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): The National Harbours Board advises as follows: 1. Heavy lift facilities have been provided by the Board at Saint John, New Brunswick, by means of the floating crane Glenbuckie from the mid-1940's until September 8, 1976. On that date the Glenbuckie, because of damage to her hull, was temporarily withdrawn from service pending the outcome of a study by the Port Authority in association with local stevedoring company managers regarding future heavy lift capability for the port. The National Harbours Board ports of St. John's, Halifax, Sept-Îles, Quebec, Trois-Rivières, Montreal, Churchill and Vancouver have heavy lift services provided either by the Board or the private sector.

2. Yes, although very few lifts were required to be made over the past four or five years because port operators have used land-based mobile cranes instead.

Order Paper Questions

3. The Glenbuckie was temporarily withdrawn from service on September 8, 1976.

4. Alternative facilities are available from private enterprise and have been used in lieu of the Glenbuckie.

5. No.

JOB CREATION BRANCH—RIMOUSKI CONSTITUENCY

Question No. 1,742—Mr. Allard:

1. Was a job creation centre established in the Constituency of Rimouski and, if so, on what date?

2. What (a) are the names of the persons employed by the Centre (b) is the duration of their employment (c) is the number of persons (i) employed by the Centre (ii) who occupied a position in the Public Service (iii) who were born in the Region?

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): 1. Yes. The office was established as a Job Creation Branch regional office when the Branch was organized in September, 1973.

2. (a) Name of Employee	(b) When Hired
Georgette Desjardins	October 1976
Claude Dubé	December 1973

APPROVAL OF PURCHASE OF C. AND G.T. RAILWAY COMPANY BY CNR

Question No. 1,744—Mr. Allard:

Has the purchase of C. and G.T. Railway Company by Canadian National Railways been approved by the government and, if so, on what date?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Yes. It was approved by Order in Council P.C. 1975-2355 of October 2, 1975.

RCMP—AGREEMENT BETWEEN NEWFOUNDLAND AND GOVERNMENT WITH RESPECT TO SERVICES

Question No. 1,809—Mr. Crosbie:

1. Has the agreement between Newfoundland and the government with respect to the services of the RCMP expired and, if so (a) on what date did it expire (b) is the contract continuing on a temporary basis until a new agreement is reached?

2. (a) Are negotiations now underway between Newfoundland and the government for a new agreement covering RCMP services (b) has the government agreed to provide 50 per cent of the cost of RCMP operations in Newfoundland under a new agreement or is it insisting on Newfoundland assuming more of the cost?

3. (a) What proposal has been advanced by the government in connection with cost-sharing for the new contract for RCMP services in Newfoundland (b) has the province agreed to any new cost-sharing arrangement and, if so, what is the agreement?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): 1. Yes. (a) March 31, 1976; (b) yes.

2. (a) Yes; (b) see reply to part 3(a).

3. (a) The proposed policing agreement offered to all provinces under contract and the territories is based on a direct costing approach. It provides for the provinces and territories to pay 52 per cent of the cost in the first year (1976/77) with an annual 1 per cent escalation until 56 per cent is reached in the last year of the agreement (1980/81). (b) Yes. As stated in (a) above.

REGULATIONS TO CLARIFY CERTAIN ASPECTS OF ABORTION LAW

Question No. 1,828—Mr. Jones:

Has the government taken any steps to promulgate or enact regulations to clarify and define certain aspects of the law on abortions and, in particular, with respect to clear guidelines and restrictions on the duties and responsibilities on therapeutic committees on abortions set up under the provisions of the Criminal Code and, if so, what are they?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): The government has not taken any steps to enact regulations regarding the abortion law. On the basis of the findings of the Committee on the Operation of the Abortion Law, tabled in the House on February 9, 1977, the government will discuss with the provinces ways of improving the application of the law.

NATIONAL DEFENCE—INSTALLATION OF ELECTRICAL EQUIPMENT AT CFB GAGETOWN

Question No. 1,832—Mr. Howie:

1. Do any plans exist for the installation of electric meters in PMQ residences at CFB Gagetown and, if so, what is the estimated cost of such an operation?

2. For the (a) year ending March 31, 1975 (b) year ending March 31, 1976 (c) the period April 1, 1976 to February 1, 1977, how much was paid and to whom, for (i) electric stoves (ii) refrigerators (iii) service and parts for electric stoves and refrigerators in PMQ residences at CFB Gagetown?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of National Defence): 1. Yes. However, an estimate of costs cannot be given at this time due to factors such as; whether salvaged old equipment can be utilized; the policy of the New Brunswick Electric Power Corporation, and the type of metering technique required.

2. (a) Year ending March 31, 1975, (i) $9,472, Enterprise Foundry, Sackville, N.B.; (ii) Nil; (iii) $15,361, Kenny Refrigeration Services, Fredericton, N.B. (b) Year ending March 31, 1976, (i) $55,010, Roy and Gibson Ltd., Assumption, Que.; (ii) $6,737, Roy and Gibson Ltd., Assumption, Que.; (iii) $12,160, Oromocto Electric, Oromocto, N.B. (c) April 1, 1976 to February 1, 1977, (i) $40,820, Roy and Gibson Ltd., Assumption, Que.; (ii) $28,417, Roy and Gibson Ltd., Assumption, Que.; (iii) $13,457, Oromocto Electric, Oromocto, N.B.

NATIONAL DEFENCE—BOOKSTORES IN GERMANY

Question No. 1,871—Mr. Fairweather:

1. Are bookstores on Canadian Forces Bases in the Federal Republic of Germany called "Stars and Stripes" and, if so, for what reason?

2. Do they contain any Canadian books?

3. Who is the distributor for the bookstores?

4. Will arrangements be made to ensure a supply of Canadian books to Armed Forces Bases in Canada and abroad?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of National Defence): 1. Yes. The bookstores at Lahr and Baden are operated under concession agreements with Stars and Stripes and have been operated under this agreement for the past nine years in Lahr and 25 years in Baden. Approximately a year ago a study was conducted on the feasibility of replacing the Stars and Stripes concession with a purely Canadian bookstore. However, the study showed conclusively that the operation would be too small and too distant from Canada to be financially viable. Stars and Stripes order in bulk and also act as the distributor to the numerous outlets in Europe and other parts of the world.

2. Yes.

3. See part 1 above.

4. Canadian books and periodicals are available in both official languages and efforts are continually being made to improve the number of variety of Canadian books and magazines sold in these bookstores.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Fairweather: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the parliamentary secretary would pay particular attention to starred question 1,187 which I placed on the order paper on November 26 last. It has serious nutritional import and could affect nutrition in Canada. My question reads:

What evidence has the nutrition branch of the Department of Agriculture produced to support the statement that "Beef makes people ferocious?"

The Minister of Agriculture alleged that beef-eating makes people ferocious. I am serious in asking this question and can hardly wait for the answer. Will the parliamentary secretary please provide it?

Mr. Goodale: Mr. Speaker, as is usual with all questions, we will seek to provide the information requested as soon as possible. I am sure the House will be interested in the response.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I might draw to the attention of the parliamentary secretary question No. 1,229 which has been standing in my name on the order paper since December 1. Its subject matter has to do with the decentralization of one particular government department as opposed to an agency or branch. It contains certain questions as to protections for the public servants who are involved. I am particularly concerned about a representation set forth in part 6 of that question as the Minister of Veterans Affairs stated in a letter dated October 28, 1976, that employees are protected to the fullest. I want to know what the government means by this kind of blandishment. I would appreciate the parliamentary secretary looking into that question. It has been there for a considerable time.

Mr. Goodale: Mr. Speaker, there are a number of questions on the order paper relating to the general matter of the decentralization of government. I can assure the hon. member that the answers are being collected and will be provided to the House as quickly as possible. I will take special notice of the point the hon. member has just raised and see if I can quickly obtain an answer.

Labour Conditions

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S.O. 26

[English]

LABOUR CONDITIONS

HIGH LEVEL OF UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), the adjournment of the House under Standing Order 26 for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter requiring urgent consideration, namely, the revelation this morning that the continuing chronic level of unemployment has reached a genuine emergency, with 932,000 persons officially unemployed—the highest level since the great depression and the highest level in the history of Statistics Canada. It is noted that these figures do not include over 500,000 persons who are the hidden unemployed, combining for a total of nearly 1½ million Canadians actually wanting work and employment. It is clear that the human misery and economic waste associated with this scandalous level of unemployment constitutes a crisis and an emergency situation.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) gave the Chair notice pursuant to Standing Order 26, of his intention to move the motion he has just proposed pursuant to the Standing Order. I would indicate, as I have on previous occasions when motions related to unemployment have been raised pursuant to Standing Order 26, that the matter, being one of continuing and chronic concern, it is not, in my opinion, a proper subject of special debate under Standing Order 26. That language was repeated by me as quoted at page 2296 of Hansard for January 24, 1977. I again refer hon. members to it.

In this particular situation there is, of course, an additional consideration; that is, it is one, as indicated in Standing Order 26(5), regarding which the Chair ought to take into account opportunities which are likely to present themselves for a discussion of the particular problem that is raised in the notice of motion given pursuant to the Standing Order.

In this particular instance I can scarcely ignore the announcement that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) will put forward a budgetary statement on March 31 and that the motion accompanying it will be debated for some six days. I understand there may not be specific agreement about the exact timing of those days, but nevertheless the debate will, I am sure, follow either immediately or very closely thereafter and unemployment, naturally, will be a very large feature of that debate. Accordingly, for those two reasons I regretfully decline the application for allowing a special debate on unemployment at this time pursuant to Standing Order 26.

[Mr. Goodale.]

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Last evening there was some question as to what the government would be proceeding with tomorrow. I understand from a conversation I had with the parliamentary secretary that it is the intention of the government to proceed tomorrow with the immigration bill. I would like confirmed, for the convenience of members of the House, that this in fact is the intention of the government.

Mr. Goodale: Mr. Speaker, that would be our intention. Of course, it will depend on whether the debate on the immigration bill proceeds to conclusion today. If that is not the case, it will be our intention to proceed with it tomorrow, barring some unforeseen development about which we do not know at the moment.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, in reply to the House business question posed last Thursday the government House leader indicated that he was not quite sure in what order he would be calling the Unemployment Insurance Act and the transportation act. Almost a week having passed, can the government indicate what business will be following the completion of the immigration bill tomorrow?

Mr. Goodale: Mr. Speaker, I do not know if I can give the hon. member a firm indication at this stage. In a preliminary way, however, I suggest to him that the unemployment legislation will follow the immigration legislation.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Thank you very much.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

IMMIGRATION ACT, 1976

AMENDMENTS TO IMPLEMENT CHANGES IN IMMIGRATION POLICY

The House resumed, from Monday, March 14, consideration of the motion of Mr. Cullen that Bill C-24, respecting immigration to Canada, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration.

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, in continuing the debate you will recall that last night I tried to make the point in forceful terms regarding the contribution that has been made, can be made and will be made by immigrants who come to Canada, including the visible minorities. I tried to bring to the attention of this House that notwithstanding the great contribution they have made, people from all over the world, of all races, colour and creed, some of them because of very high visibility, have been meeting certain problems the like of which have been explored and been brought to the attention of this nation. That is why, just before I concluded last night, I indicated that I was pleased with the activities of the Ontario human rights commission, the attitude and activities of the hon. Roy McMurtry and the introduction of the Canadian human rights legislation. At the same time I commended the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) for his role in that regard and indicated why I supported the "hate" bill.

These men and/or legislation are not actually talking about or legislating morality or love. That is not the point. What these men and these matters I have referred to in terms of legislation are doing, and will continue to do in my estimation, is spell out the type of conduct and/or attitudes which one finds unacceptable in this country at the present time. This is a type of unacceptable conduct that has been geared toward people who can be called progressive, intelligent, tough, proud, ambitious and law-abiding, many of whom are within the visible minorities.

In my travels throughout this country I have found that there are people from all backgrounds living, working and playing together, all dedicated to the advancement of a greater Canada. It is my view that Canadians as a whole will welcome this type of stuff, if you will, notwithstanding the irrational ravings of the bigots and racists. In my travels I found that the vast majority of Canadians realize that immigrants have built this country, are building it now and will continue to build it. Immigrants played a leading role in the mainstream of Canadian life. Success stories abound. At the same time, I found that there are many people, perhaps too many, who have conveniently forgotten that they are recent immigrants themselves and thus would deny the opportunities that they had as immigrants by saying, "Close the door. We do not need any more".

Frankly, that is not an attitude which permeates the immigrant society, but it appeared on these trips of ours across the country too often. I found that the immigrants who come to this country, regardless of race, colour, creed or sex, have integrated and become a meaningful part of the mainstream of Canadian life. I say without hesitation that Canada will need a continuous stream of immigrants. Although certain temporary difficulties arise, there is no denying that the benefits of immigration have proven to be permanent and meaningful.

On this fact-finding tour, if you will, that many of us had the honour of pursuing, I am pleased to say that the non-partisan committee was able to destroy many myths regarding immigrants. I think it is edifying for the Canadian public to know what this excellent committee was able to recommend. I would ask you, sir, to direct your attention to issue 53 of the Minutes of Proceedings and Evidence of the Special Joint Committee of the House of Commons. On page 7 we read the following:

> Canada needs immigrants. The committee is of the opinion that Canada should continue to be a country of immigration. In reaching this central conclusion committee members were particularly impressed by demographic and economic arguments as well as by the need to take account of family and humanitarian considerations for reasons specified elsewhere.

That is clear enough, and I commend the committee for reaching such a conclusion. We have heard much about the demographic factors and the declining fertility rate. What did the special joint committee have to say about this? I quote again from the report at page 9:

> The committee is well aware that in a time of high unemployment new immigrants may be seen by the unemployed in particular as competing for too few jobs... The committee accepted Dr. Harvey Lithwick's assertion that it is disastrous for the country to tie immigration policy to short-term economic developments. Immigration is a long-term investment in human resources. Its conclusion from this body of evidence was that for population reasons it is important to maintain a moderately steady flow of immigration.

I should like to bring yet another section of the same report to the attention of the House:

> Contradictory testimony was received regarding the significance of the contribution an expansionist immigration policy could make to the economies of scale. In the main, members of the committee went along with Dr. Raynauld's comment that this argument that immigration should be continued because it contributes to economies of scale was a very weak one. The committee believes that the benefits of immigration are obvious providing there are reasonable employment opportunities. Of course, immigration causes some special direct costs, as the brief of the Atlantic Provinces Economic Council pointed out, particularly in the fields of education, training and adjustment services. But these costs are balanced by the fact that immigrants arrive with training and experience acquired at no cost to Canada. All of this leads the committee to the conclusion that Canada would contribute to its own economic well-being by continuing to welcome immigrants in moderate numbers.

What about the fact of prejudice against immigrants? I want to quote from the report once again because this issue was dealt with very specifically and the committee did reach a conclusion in this regard. I read from page 10 of the report:

> A persistent theme of submissions hostile to immigration was the view that immigrants crowd into cities, exacerbating housing shortages, increasing the crime rate, bringing in infectious diseases, taxing the welfare rolls and government services and taking jobs from Canadians. The Mayor of Vancouver made the point that immigration to Vancouver had exercised great pressure on land and therefore on housing prices; immigrants had brought talent, money and culture, but they had not brought land. This is primarily a spatial question, not a racial question.
> The committee recognizes that all these are problems faced by rapidly growing cities, and concluded that they are caused by the economic, social and cultural dynamism of cities and their attractiveness to Canadians and immigrants alike. In fact, Canadians migrating within Canada from the country to the cities and from province to province are the main impulse for city growth.

In other words, when we talk of the harmful effects of immigration upon housing, social services, education, and so on, we are expressing a scapegoat philosophy. The committee destroyed that myth as it applies to employment, social services and the other services referred to. I again quote the report:

> Similar misconceptions also abound regarding the impact of immigration on social services and benefits and health care. None of the testimony supported with facts the popular notion that newcomers are using these services more than the native-born. If anything, the committee has the impression that use of such services by immigrants falls below the national average for the obvious reason that many come from countries where such services are traditionally provided by the family. Indeed, it would appear that interprovincial and rural-to-urban migrants make greater use of government support than persons from abroad.

Reading further from the report:

> Nor do immigrants participate less actively in the work force than long-term residents. Selection criteria are designed to ensure that newcomers are well equipped to secure employment.

That is an extremely important point. Another aspect was dealt with later in the report. I read from page 11:

> Some submissions contained allegations that immigrants, especially the non-white, contribute disproportionately to the crime rate. Expert testimony did not support this charge. Professor Frederick Zemans of Osgoode Hall said:
> "Most immigrants who come to Canada have a strong fear of the legal system itself and they are very concerned that they should not get into any difficulties or any trouble while in this country."
> And in a study prepared for the Ministry of the Solicitor General of Canada in 1974, statistics indicated that the crime rate for immigrants was approximately one-half that for native-born Canadians.

So I am saying, what a tremendous wealth of human resource we have when we open our arms and welcome immigrants, because they make a tremendous contribution to this country, and the myths associated with them are destroyed as far as this committee is concerned. I hope the people of Canada will read this report because it destroys myths and it brings about a proper conception of what this country is all about.

Having said that, I should like to state that this bill is silent on two important matters. I would say that one is the need for intensive training for immigration officials. Many submissions indicated to us, without exaggeration, the hardship which people suffer as a result of the insentivity of some immigration officers or because the officers lack understanding of their needs. It seems to me that because of the mosaic pattern of life we are experiencing at this time we need to concentrate on the public relations aspect of this work. I know that immigration officers have a difficult job, an onerous job, but it is a job where no insensitivity should be shown. People come to this country willing to take up the plow, willing to take up the shovel, and they expect to be treated with all the dignity possible. But some are unimpressed by the reception they get at our ports of entry.

Another point which I find a little strange, particularly in light of the fact that the immigration policy we are discussing is supposed to be non-discriminatory, is that there is no mention of the need for the relocation of Canadian immigration officers abroad. I state with all the sincerity I can muster that without this relocation of officers, the small number of Canadian officers in third world countries compared with the number in the United States and Europe indicates a de facto policy of discrimination; there can be no doubt about that. In view of the preamble to this legislation which calls for a non-discriminatiory approach, I hope the minister will review and reassess the point I have made. With so few coming from the third world and so many coming from the United Kingdom, Europe and the United States, the only conclusion that can be reached is that we are discriminating. I shall not dwell on that point because I think it is quite obvious.

Another point I have always registered my concern about is legislation by way of regulation. I want to dwell on this subject for a moment. The joint committee recommendations strongly favoured a stronger balance of the act; that is, the framework, the principles and the regulations. Under the present system, immigration law comprises mainly statutes enacted by parliament and regulations introduced by the government from time to time under the authority granted by the Immigration Act. The committee sees no alternative but to maintain the balance between the basic act, which establishes the framework and the principles, and the regulations which set out the procedures for putting the principles into effect. That statement is to be found in section 1976 of the joint committee report. Section 177 of the same report reads:

> However, as the green paper admitted, the essential criteria governing admissions to Canada are dispersed through the (present) act and regulations (somewhat haphazardly). This makes it unnecessarily complicated for anyone who merely reads the act to grasp the fundamental principles and conditions that surround the admission of immigrants and non-immigrants.

Under this new legislation there is no effective balance between it and the regulations, and one cannot possibly grasp the fundamental principles and conditions surrounding the admission of immigrants and non-immigrants merely by reading Bill C-24. Our spokesman on this matter, the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp), in no uncertain terms registered his concern about this particular approach. One cannot evaluate the immigration procedures of the government because they have not exposed the essential criteria which govern admission to Canada. The regulations must be made available. In view of the regulatory process, which I will deal with shortly, we cannot possibly deal with this legislation unless there is a concerted effort on the part of all of us to impress upon the minister responsible for immigration that unless we see the regulations we are back to where we were before, namely, legislating by way of regulation. This I find completely unacceptable.

Instead of an effective balance between the act and the regulations, this new bill yields more power than ever into the hands of the minister, the governor in council and the bureaucrats. If anything, this bill is even more arbitrary than the act. Aside from the powers of the minister and the governor in council, which are extensive indeed, clause 123 provides:

> The minister or deputy minister, as the case may be, may authorize such persons employed in the public service of Canada as he deems proper to exercise or perform any of the powers, duties and functions that may or are required to be exercised or performed by him under this act or the regulations . . . and any such duty, power or function performed or exercised by any person so authorized shall be deemed to have been performed or exercised by the minister or the deputy minister, as the case may be.

That is a complete abdication of powers to persons unknown, and that is wrong, particularly when one notes that the former act gave such delegation of powers only to the minister; and he could only delegate those powers to the deputy minister or to the director. This particular provision in the new legislation only intensifies the already arbitrary nature of the Immigration Act.

Let me give the House an idea of what we are talking about in terms of legislation by way of regulation. Here we have a bill some 75 pages in length which at the moment contains 129 clauses. There are two clauses in particular I should like to draw to Your Honour's attention. The first is 115, which provides:

(1) The governor in council may make regulations—

Then follow, as I count them, some 22 different subject matters with which the government can deal by way of regulation.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Major areas.

Mr. Alexander: Yes, major areas, matters of concern, matters which have the immigrant community exercised, frustrated and fearful. In light of this fear, which I suggest is extremely legitimate, we have another reason for wanting to see what the regulations will be so we can make sufficient input to the legislation in terms of possible amendments. In light of another provision in this same clause I can understand why the visible minorities in particular are, to say the least, fearful. Subsection (2) provides:

In other words, under any of the 22 paragraphs of the previous subsection.

—may be conditional or unconditional, qualified or unqualified, and may be general or restricted to a person or class of persons.

The possible impact of those words, Mr. Speaker, make even me fearful. We are receiving letters from immigrants, regardless who they may be, asking what this provision means and how it is going to affect them. I suggest we will have to examine this particular provision with a great deal of care. To carry the matter further, Mr. Speaker, clause 116 provides:

The minister may make regulations

(a) establishing the procedures to be followed—

And so on. Under this particular clause we have 12 very important matters which are to be dealt with by regulation. In other words, the bill itself is meaningless; it does not mean a thing because the actual meat of the bill will be contained within regulations. I have no doubt of this whatsoever. We are moving in the wrong direction because we are legislating immigration law by way of regulation outside of parliament. We have a hidden immigration policy with no opportunity for debate. Is that fair, Mr. Speaker? We indicated to the minister during committee hearings and when we reported back that we would find unacceptable any bill that dealt with immigration policy through regulation.

I should like to refer to a couple of matters in the bill that have even me frightened. First, let me turn to clause 115(1)(o). I understand the need for this, but I do not like it. Paragraph (o) provides:

—setting out the circumstances in which persons who seek admission or persons in Canada, other than Canadian citizens, may be required to be fingerprinted or photographed or otherwise identified.

What is this country coming to? What are we doing? The minister was careful to say "other than Canadian citizens", but does the minister not understand that countless thousands of people have been resident in this country for upward of 50 years? Are they included? Under this legislation they certainly are. That is the other frightening aspect that disturbs me. I want to know why the minister picks on residents who have been here upward of 50 years. What are we doing?

Another matter which surprises me, and I do not understand it, is that the minister seems to abrogate his functions to the public trustees in the provinces. As is known, upon the death of a person who does not have an immediate family, his assets, depending on his domicile or residence at the time of his death, go to the public trustee of the province. Everyone knows that; this knowledge is not restricted. But the minister, with all his expertise, seems to want to get involved with provincial jurisdictions. Have there been discussions with respect to that? Paragraph (1) reads:

—providing for the disposition of property carried by persons who die in Canada while at an immigrant station or other place in the custody or under the supervision of an immigration officer.

"Custody" and "supervision" can mean a number of things. It can mean that an immigrant could be under custody and supervision living in my home. I know the law, and I could refuse admission to an immigration officer wishing to dispose of the assets of the deceased. That is how far this thing can go.

I have a few more points to make. The government has made a pretty big deal out of its dedication to a demographic policy. This point was brought home by my colleague, the hon. member for Provencher, who was concerned about dealing with an immigration bill when we do not have a demographic policy before us. The government has taken great pains to stress the fact that demographic considerations are extremely important. The bill states, in clause 3, that demographic studies are one of its objectives, and it also stresses in clause 7 the importance of provincial consultation over demography. Yet when the minister is asked to table the report on demographic studies so that members of parliament can make an educated assessment of the bill, the minister's response is, "I will consider it". If, in fact, the demographic and population policy is to be one of the major factors affecting the determination of immigration levels, and perhaps even the points system, it too must be evaluated as an integral part of the new Immigration Act.

What I am trying to say is that when we bring in a bill of such consequence and importance, it must not only be fair and just but it must appear to be fair and just. In my humble estimation, with regard to the points I have made regarding legislating by way of regulations alone, I am led to have second thoughts as to whether I am prepared to vote for this bill on second reading. Our party's critic has indicated that we agree with the principle, but there is so much lacking in the bill because at present it is neither fair nor appears to be fair—I am sure hon. members on both sides of the House will agree with me in that regard—that a great amount of work will have to be done by members of the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration in order to bring about meaningful amendments to this immigration bill which will determine the immigration policy of this country for years to come.

Mr. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, in speaking on this bill, as we did a year ago when we debated Bill C-20 on citizenship, it is quite inevitable, because of the nature of the subject matter, that we approach it with strong emotions and that we inject our own personal experiences, as was the case last night in particular in the interventions of hon. members who spoke about their past when they first came to Canada an their experiences in subsequent years as well as their feelings for this country.

I thought these were very valuable contributions because they brought into the heart of this House a series of personal experiences which, even though they may be limited to the personal past of a particular member, allow the House and those interested in this topic to understand, at least in part, what immigration is all about in human terms, not only in legislative terms. Within that context I should like to compliment, also, the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) who is now leaving the chamber. Since I always compliment him when he is out of the chamber, I rush to do so now so that at least he can hear a positive comment on my part while he is still here. His interventions last night and today were thoughtful and to the point and certainly contributed to the quality of this debate.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Caccia: For these reasons, and having heard his personal experiences, I will refrain from speaking about my own. That should be the subject matter of an intervention at another time. Instead, I would like, first of all, to express some words of congratulations to the government for having brought out a bill at this point after having made it possible for a committee to travel throughout the country and to consult communities from coast to coast on this matter.

Therefore, we are now engaged in one of the final stages of a process which was initiated several years ago. I do not know of any government in the world that has approached such a sensitive area of policy-making in the way the government of Canada has. In that respect this Liberal government deserves congratulations for having brought this bill step by step to this point after having heard witnesses and having heard criticism from interested members on all sides of the House. This fact should not be forgotten. There has been a process, and the process is as important as is the objective, and so far the process has been sound and constructive.

Immigration has been described in many ways. I do not think I can improve on the way it has been put by a number of hon. members who have spoken before me. I will say that in my own experience from observations over the past 25 or more years I have consistently come to the conclusion that the average immigrant who comes to Canada from any part of the world as an adult is, in economic and cultural terms, an asset.

[Mr. Alexander.]

I will explain that. He or she arrives in this country as a person who has been been brought up and educated as a healthy individual at the expense of another jurisdiction. That immigrant has been taken care of for the first 20 or 30 years of his or her life in another country. He or she arrives here immediately able to enter the labour market and immediately in a position to earn a living and to contribute to the general economy of this notion.

When this is not so it is because of manpower dislocations and delays which are mainly the fault of our system. It cannot be attributed to the intense desire of the immigrant to find a job upon arrival, to become productive, to earn a living, to spend and to contribute to the general economic cycle.

This country has benefited from landed immigrants who have come to this country during the productive part of their lives. This country has acquired a human asset without having spent a penny for the education, the upbringing or for the healthy condition of individuals who have come here. If we look back over the decades to the year zero of immigration, we find that there have been immigrants working on the railways, the farms, the mines, the construction sites and the factories of Canada. There is not one sector of Canada's industrial and economic life in which we do not find, at a certain time in our history, the presence of immigrants. It is a well known fact that as a country we have looked upon immigration as a source of manpower to fill our needs. In this respect Canada has done very well. Canada has, in fact, done extremely well because it has been able to import productive manpower at no expense without having to invest in the education, health or upbringing of that manpower. As far as the labour market objective is concerned, which is one of the three objectives of our immigration policy, our nation has done extremely well.

As the years have gone by a trend has developed in immigration flow which has been described as the reunification of families. Immigrants coming to this country sooner or later have expressed the natural desire to bring over family members. This trend has become stronger as the number of immigrants has increased and accumulated over the decades. This is a very important and highly desirable component of our immigration policy and it is recognized in clause 3 of this bill. As we all know, the strength of a nation depends on the strength of families and on the network of their composition, and by recognizing the importance of family reunification the government of Canada recognizes a very important social and natural force which has to find expression in legislation. I commend the minister and the government for setting this out in clause 3 of the bill.

However, I have to add that while our intentions have been set out in these positive terms, for which we are all very glad and grateful, our performance in family reunification has not been as good as we have claimed it to be. There are still cases on file of brothers sponsoring brothers, brothers sponsoring sisters, sisters sponsoring brothers, and sisters and immigrants who after a few years have expressed a natural desire to sponsor their parents to come to this country. These cases are on file in a number of offices around the world and they have been turned down or not considered favourably.

These are typical cases of family reunification which are of great importance in the sense that they are cases of people wanting to bring members of their families closer to them. I urge the minister and the government to translate into reality a concept which has been expressed time and again, if it is really the desire of this country and of this government to bring about family reunification. Just for the sake of argument, if I were minister of manpower and immigration in these times of economic difficulty I would make family reunification a matter of top priority.

My second priority would be refugees, and my third priority would be to help fill the vacancies in our labour market. I do not know how I could stress more strongly the importance of family reunification. There is not a week that goes by for any hon. member who comes from an urban area in which he does not become acquainted with a case of this nature. If we accept the proposition I made a few moments ago, that for each productive immigrant we acquire at no expense a human asset which is immediately productive, depending on labour market conditions, surely we owe something to this person who has a natural desire to reunite with members of his family who are still in his country of origin. I think that is an elementary consideration which deserves the expression it receives in clause 3, but it also deserves practical application which goes beyond the words we hear outlined in speeches in this House in connection with this bill, and under other circumstances.

Some hon. members have made reference to clause 115. It is my opinion, as well as theirs, that this clause is the real heart of this bill. This bill can perhaps be compared to a fine-looking ship ready to be launched. The direction the bill will take once it is launched is embodied in clause 115. In that clause are outlined all kinds of powers which must be brought to the attention of the committee: they must be discussed, they must be made the subject of parliamentary scrutiny. Nothing less than that is adequate.

Let me explain why. In recent times we have had the benefit of the Standing Committee on Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments. In the investigations that committee has carried out it has become evident that the spirit, the letter and the general trend of legislation on many occasions has not been respected by the content of subsequently drafted regulations. Having had the benefit of that experience, it seems reasonable that this House and the government should make absolutely certain that the regulations follow the spirit of the objectives stated in clause 3 of the bill. I would like to commend the minister for already having taken a stand on this matter. On March 10 the minister spoke in this House and he said:

> The new act . . . establishes through the statement of objectives an explicit policy framework to which everything done under the authority of the legislation must conform; and it spells out precisely and circumscribes specifically the ground to be covered by regulations.

Those are positive words on the part of the minister and we all congratulate him for having spoken them. However, we are not eternal in general terms, even less eternal in political terms—excepting, perhaps, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). It is, therefore, necessary to spell out these regulations in order to allow them to become the object of parliamentary scrutiny so that it is clear and established to all interested persons that they extend to the direction and objectives set out in clause 3. I would not want, years or decades from now, to have perhaps the deputy minister of the department given the responsibility of drafting or modifying regulations flowing from this bill. I would not want in the course of time to see regulations or decisions inconsistent with the spirit of this bill.

I was stunned by clause 115(1)(f) which provides that the governor in council may make regulations—> —prescribing a system of priorities for the processing of applications made by immigrants.

What does that mean? Does it mean that at a certain time years from now a certain directive may go out from the office of the deputy minister to the office in Hong Kong saying that certain applications at the bottom of the pile will go to the top, or vice versa? Or could the same be done in Rome, Lisbon, Athens or South America? What does it mean? That clause has sweeping implications. Other clauses, too, have potential significance in this regard. I suppose we shall have an opportunity to examine them in committee. I am thinking particularly of paragraphs (a) and (b) of clause 115(1), the clause which has to do with the setting out of points.

We feel that the real purport of the bill, the real sense of direction, the method of dealing with applications, is contained in clause 115. That clause must be given full scrutiny at committee stage, and I suppose at subsequent stages, when regulations must be changed in future once the bill is pronounced an act of parliament.

In the fairly large number of briefs we have received from communities and interested parties in the country—some briefs have been helpful and excellent; others somewhat confused, even weakening their own case—attention has mainly been focused on four or five major areas which I wish to put on record for the sake of our collective memory when we deal with the bill in committee. A number of briefs have expressed the desirability of limiting the government's power to compel prospective immigrants to Canada to be fingerprinted or photographed. That provision is contained in subclause (o), clause 115(1). It will require an explanation.

Other briefs have recommended the desirability of specifying the amount of security deposited which immigration officers may require of visitors in order that such officers will not set prohibitively large sums to keep visitors out. Provision for such security is contained in clause 8. Other briefs have expressed the desirability of clarifying and restricting the powers and use of arrest without warrant. People want to know when arrests will be permitted, and under what circumstances, without use of a warrant. I believe some of these points were raised in the excellent presentation of the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin). I believe he also referred to the provisions of clause 5(2), which reads:

An immigrant may be granted landing if he is not a member of an inadmissible class and otherwise meets the requirements of this act and the regulations.

The question is, should an applicant who has proven to be admissible and has met all the requirements of the act and regulations be admitted, period, or should we leave discretionary powers in the hands of the officials, something we would be doing if we left the word "may" in the act. I am inclined to agree with the hon. member for Greenwood that "may" should be replaced by "shall".

We received a number of submissions to do with refugees. Such recommendations boil down to whether it will be desirable to establish a refugee claims board and whether there should be in the act some recognition of the special needs of refugees. Probably the minister will in committee address himself to these major questions. I imagine that if they are dealt with clearly and adequately it would remove much of the uncertainty and hesitancy which has been expressed by members who have spoken so far in this debate and by organizations—particularly in Montreal and Toronto—which have taken the trouble to send us briefs and express their views on this legislation.

Moving on, I wish briefly to deal with aspects of the bill which I hope the government will reconsider. I am thinking of clauses 14 and 15 which give power to immigration officers to grant a visa to an applicant provided the applicant is willing to go to certain designated areas in the country. For example, the applicant will be required to remain—that is, reside—in such area for a minimum of six months. I do not approve of this approach, for we can achieve much more with incentives than with coercion.

Let me give an example. Suppose an immigrant is told that he can enter this country provided he goes to a remote area and stays there for six months. He or she will go to that remote area and, finding the experience so filled with hardship, on the 181st day after landing in Canada, or six months and one day later, will pop up in Toronto, Montreal, Vancouver or any other of our major centres. I ask: if that happens, what have you achieved? You will still have an immigrant in a large urban centre where you hoped he would not go. He will not have remained where you wanted him to remain. In other words, you will have provided manpower in one place on a short-term basis and denied the worker the right to move for six months. What will you have achieved in the end? It seems to me that this clause ought to be removed.

I would rather see a policy whereby we provided incentives to go to a certain place in Canada and settle there. These incentives would have to be such things as good housing, adequate pay, cultural recreation, community amenities, and the like. The people would not stay for just six months but would possibly settle there. In addition, they may bring in their relatives to help expand the very community we want to have developed. It is through these kinds of approaches, via the route of incentives, that we may be able to find a satisfactory answer to the particular concern of providing immigrant manpower in those areas of Canada were there is a shortage and where development is needed. The approach of six months' compulsory work in designated areas does not convince me. For the reasons I have just outlined, it falls far short of its objective.

The second area I would like to deal with, because it disturbs me, is clause 115 (a) and (b). If an immigrant becomes a Canadian citizen, he will have the opportunity of sponsoring parents and grandparents at any age, at an age lower than the one permitted under the present act, namely 60. We are, in essence, saying to these people that if they want to sponsor their parents they had better become Canadian citizens. We are confusing two concepts, the concept of citizenship and the concept of sponsoring parents. We are mixing up two very important concepts that ought not to be mixed. If you want to become a Canadian citizen, it ought to be that you want to be a Canadian citizen, and for no other reason. It must be your choice, desire, ambition, emotional wish that this is what you are going to do. You should become a Canadian citizen because of the love you have for this country, not because you want to sponsor your parents. Those two concepts must be kept separate. Who would deny anyone the desire, wish and initiative of sponsoring his or her parents? If you can prove that you can take care of your parents, let that be done regardless of whether the applicant is a Canadian citizen.

We have perhaps the most outstanding record in the world whereby we do not deny to any resident of Canada, whether he is an immigrant or a Canadian citizen, any right except that of voting. We treat landed immigrants the same as residents and native Canadians. In this area we have done extremely well. We should continue this fine approach by not mixing the two concepts. Canadian citizenship is too fine and pure a concept to be mixed up with any other goals, no matter how understandable or desirable. We must continue to have the aim of Canadian citizenship for its own sake. Someone who wishes to bring in his parents and can prove he can do so satisfactorily ought to be allowed to do so without having imposed upon him the necessity of acquiring Canadian citizenship. In committee I would like the benefit of an explanation of the thinking of the minister and his officials when they arrived at this conclusion. I fail to understand the rationale of these two parts of the bill.

I wish to say a few words about farm labourers and migrants in connection with the very fine speech made last evening by the hon. member for Lambton-Kent (Mr. Holmes). Toward the end of his speech he put forward some very interesting observations on the question of the requirement of farmers for migrant labour. One can understand the necessity, but we must recognize that when we encourage temporary migration to Canada for some weeks or months every year we bring in a labour force that has to contribute to our social security system without being in the position of being able to draw benefits from it.

People who work here for a few months during the summer have to contribute to our unemployment insurance, old age security and other social security systems. They may do this year after year throughout their lives. However, when the need arises either at the time of retirement or unemployment they do not benefit from our social security programs as we know them and as they protect landed immigrants and resident Canadians. We should have a system in Canada whereby the farmer pays decent wages, provides decent housing and decent working hours. In this way we could draw from our own labour market rather than attract migrant workers. If this trend, however, is to continue, we must come to some form of international agreement with the countries from which we receive migrant workers. We must have bilateral agreements which give some protection to these workers. If we do not do that, we should over the years shift the emphasis in a way that would permit us to draw from the labour pool that we have in Canada. We cannot have it both ways.

I wish to deal briefly with immigration settlement and adjustment, the role of the volunteer sector and of the department. The vast majority of our immigrants settle in our large urban-centres, although they have arrived from rural areas. On arrival, people encounter difficult situations. These problems may continue for some time after their settlement in the respective cities. If the department is not able to assist immigrants in their orientation to local services, employers and the rights and duties in this country, it should help the volunteer agencies that are active in the day to day operations, in our major centres in particular. In Montreal, Toronto and Vancouver, there are a number of volunteer agencies involved in this kind of work. Every year they desperately seek financial assurance that they will be able to survive the next year and continue to operate under the kind of budget with which the federal government may or may not provide them. This kind of uncertainty and insecurity prompts me to appeal to the minister to look into the question of immigrant settlement and adjustment services. This matter has been discussed over the years with the minister and his predecessor. This element of uncertainty should be brought to an end once and for all. The volunteer sector in Canada is performing a valuable role. In terms of the taxpayers it is the least costly of any service that can be provided.

These volunteer agencies consist of people who are knowledgeable, who know how to make the contacts, who know how to assist immigrants upon their arrival and in subsequent years, who have accumulated experience over the years which is invaluable. It seems to me to be proper, as we debate this bill, to emphasize the importance of developing closer understanding and empathy with the volunteer sector. The volunteer sector is looking to us for leadership and assistance. It is willing to do this job, and all it asks is to be given more reassurance than in the past.

I cannot sit down without making reference to the role played by the Official Opposition on second reading debate on March 10. After a magnificent start, the official spokesman for the Conservative party expressed the necessity to outline the position of his party on demographic policy. Having listened on that occasion to a speech of 55 minutes which included statements such as, "Canada is a land of immigrants" and, "Canada is better because of the immigrants we welcome to our shores"—statements of that nature—we hear, as the contribution of the Official Opposition to this debate on immigration, that the position taken by this party is that it stands for moderate growth.

I ask you, Mr. Speaker, what does moderate growth mean, and what does the Progressive Conservative Party stand for? We do not know. It is clear that, having made a presentation which covers—on the surface at least—all aspects related to immigration policy, the Conservative Party has failed to take a real position. They say they stand for moderate growth—but what does that mean?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but the time allotted to him has expired.

Mr. William Skoreyko (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to speak for a few minutes on Bill C-24, particularly because I have heard in the House—as have other members over the years—promises by respective immigration ministers that a new Immigration Act was forthcoming. I heard these promises as far back as 1956. We now have a minister committed to a new act. I am not at this moment prepared to tell you, Mr. Speaker, that I can support all or part of it. I intend to deal with some of my concerns this afternoon.

For too many years we have operated under an outdated and outmoded act governed by secret regulations, these regulations being changed by order in council at the whim of the government whenever it suited them. This afternoon, the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia) expressed concern over some of the regulatory provisions of the bill, particularly section 115 A and B, subsections (f), (n) and (o). All these have been mentioned. Hopefully, we shall be able to deal with them in more detail when the bill goes to committee. Section 115(2) was referred to by my hon. friend from Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander). In this bill we have a letter from the predecessor of the present Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Cullen). In this letter he outlines the issues raised or proposed in the new bill. It is on the basis of this letter to us, dated July 12, 1976, and on the basis of the information contained in the bill, that I wish to deal with some of these aspects.

First, I should like to deal with the objectives contained in the bill. I think they are reasonably good objectives. What are they? The conduct of the Canadian immigration program; non-discrimination on grounds of race, colour, religion, and so on; family reunification; acceptance of refugees; relationship between policy and regional social and economic goals; immigration in relation to demographic policy.

Then the minister says he will be announcing periodically, after consultation with representatives of the provinces, targets for levels of independent and refugee immigration to be admitted over a given period. The minister said five years, I believe. I want to deal with that matter later in my remarks. He wants to set up a system of processing priorities to ensure that ceilings are respected. I presume this will be done by regulation at intervals. Where population growth is regarded as desirable, there will be designation of communities. There is legislation covering the admission of refugees and other groups on humanitarian grounds.

The part of the bill which concerns me is the selection criteria and the tremendous power vested in the bureaucracy by regulation. What does section 115 deal with? Emphasis is to be placed on vocational or occupational skills as opposed to professional or academic qualifications, and on designation to manpower need areas. I must say at this point that I doubt the designation will be workable; I doubt the effectiveness of this aspect. On the surface, dealing with demographic policy, it appears to encompass all the answers to the questions of admission, quantity, the flow to overcrowded cities, eliminating the ghettoes, and direction to areas where people are needed, fulfilling manpower needs and accomplishing other things in terms of quantitative immigration. The legislation has an aura of respectability and practicality. However, its practicality, and particularly its flexibility, needs some scrutiny.

I am somewhat skeptical about the degree of co-operation that the minister will receive from his provincial counterparts responsible for manpower in their provinces. How will Ottawa's first level of immigration be determined? Will it be by consultation with provincial ministers to assess projected needs for the ensuing year, and how far in advance can manpower requirements be projected and still be realistic? The minister says that the levels will be set for a five-year period. Is that a realistic time-frame, particularly when one examines the unpredictable Canadian economy?

The last five years is a typical period because it has been consistent. Since 1960 Canada's economy has been as volatile, unpredictable and challenging as any economy in the world. Less than four years ago, in 1972-73, we were in a period of the highest inflation level in our history. Unemployment was reasonably low, prices were rising, interest rates were rising, there was business expansion at record levels, and manpower requirements were unprecedented, particularly in the trades. In 1976-77 we find ourselves in a stagnant economy situation. The growth rate has slowed, interest rates have dropped, production is dropping, or at least lagging behind anticipated growth.

If the Canadian economy can experience that amount of turn-around, how can we project manpower needs or immigration requirements for a five-year period and be certain that those projections will serve the best interests of this country? On the basis of our experience it is reasonable to assume a more realistic posture. It is hard enough to predict requirements a year ahead, let alone five, and the minister is wise to assess immigration needs on an annual basis and to alter them annually to meet those needs. Even then the predictions will result in shortfalls or surpluses.

The minister—wisely, I think—avoided numbers which could be both misleading and unfair. What is a desirable goal in terms of population for Canada by the year 2000? That, I believe, is what our immigration policy should be geared to. The Science Council of Canada suggested net immigration of 50,000 annually. There are those in this House, I am sure, who will say that that figure is much too low, others who will say it is reasonable, and yet others might say that it is much too high. I like to think that locking oneself into a minimum-maximum quota would not serve the country's best interests. Surely, meeting our country's manpower needs can best be served by meeting them as they are required.

I have pointed out the dangers of quotas which could be too large or too small in light of Canada's unpredictable economic fluctuations. Many factors support the principle of determining manpower requirements which do not go beyond one year. As an example, Mr. Speaker, energy shortages, if they prevail, will substantially reduce production capacity, or at least competitive capacity, thus reducing manpower needs. Housing shortages, particularly in areas where manpower is needed, is another example. Of course there is surplus housing in Canada, but this surplus is not in areas where jobs are located. You do not designate a prospective immigrant to go to an area with surplus housing; rather, you direct him to centres where jobs are to be found.

The minister says that the new law will direct prospective immigrants to smaller towns, to the more remote regions. If the applicant agrees to immigrate on that condition, it will be easier for him to come forward. On the surface that seems like a splendid idea, and it is if it were meaningful. But how long does a new arrival have to stay and live in a remote area? Does he have to stay for two years, six months, six weeks, or six days? If the minister was serious about filling manpower needs in remote areas, why did he take the approach he took in clause 15, which provides:

(1) When a permanent resident who has been granted landing subject to terms and conditions has complied with those terms and conditions, they shall be deemed to have been cancelled six months after the day on which that permanent resident was granted landing.

That section implies that if an immigrant makes application to come to Canada and agrees to live in a remote area, he or she will be required to live and work there for six months. In the strictest sense, if that condition were in fact a contract to perform, a breach of that contract could result in deportation. One may judge that law as being fair since the government's view is that immigration to Canada is a privilege, not a right. Those who argue against a policy of immigration geared to manpower needs of a given country are in fact arguing that severe limits should be placed on immigration—and that philosophy I cannot buy.

Let me go a little further and see what the second part of that clause provides. In light of what I have said about clause 15(1), it does not seem to be an entirely bad break for a newcomer to Canada having to work for six months in such an area, if that is a condition on his coming to Canada and he thought so much of Canada that he would spend six months in any given area. Clause 15(2) provides:

> Where a permanent resident has been granted landing subject to terms and conditions, he may at any time make an application to an immigration officer to vary or cancel any such terms and conditions.

The six months' stipulation in clause 15(1) is now out the window. What is the difference between the old law under which you applied for landed status from within, and new clause 15(2) which provides that at any time an application to an immigration officer can be made to vary or cancel the terms and conditions of admission? The only difference, I suggest, is that under the old act you applied for landed immigrant status from within and you underwent security checks, health checks and the morality checks while you were in Canada, whereas under the new rules these are completed outside this country. That appears to be the only difference.

It seems to be the minister's intention to direct immigration away from the three main centres in Canada which are most appealing to prospective Canadians, namely, Toronto, Montreal and Vancouver. By inserting subsection (2) in clause 15 the minister is in fact saying, "Go to the boondocks, firstly for six months, but if you or your wife are unhappy at the end of six days or six weeks, then file an application and the terms and conditions under which you were admitted will be cancelled and you are free to go to the same cities I was trying to keep you away from in the first place".

If one gets the feeling, Mr. Speaker, that the immigration appeal board was worked too hard as the result of an ill-conceived policy some years ago, imagine the numbers game that will be played when the new act comes into force. A businessman in a major centre to which immigration is limited wants a particular friend in Canada. He arranges for him to apply for a job in an area acceptable to immigration officials abroad as a designated area. Permission is granted. Within a few weeks of arrival an application is filed with an immigration officer to vary the terms and conditions. This is granted, and a new immigrant destined to fill a job vacancy in northern Alberta winds up living in Vancouver. So the process repeats itself over and over, Mr. Speaker. I think the hon. member for Davenport made reference to this clause. He thought it should be scrapped, for a different reason. I suggest that it is contradictory and should be taken out of the act.

Let us pursue the subject of the demographic policy a little further. Anxiety exists in major centres in Canada regarding the number of Canadians flocking to major urban centres. Family farms are getting scarcer, bigger, more efficient. Vertical-type operations are now in vogue. The result is that displaced family farm people, whether retired or not, wind up in the cities where the best opportunities are, thus creating—on top of the existing housing shortage such as is the case in Edmonton—a still more acute problem.

Having dealt with the inadequacies of the law in relation to clause 15(2) of the proposed Immigration Act, I foresee discussions with the provincial ministers responsible for manpower and labour as being long and tedious in search of assurances and remedies. There are, and will be, ministers who will be very much concerned with this act fulfilling projected needs. If the needs are met, the ability of the department to sustain the needs will be questioned.

What about refugees, their status within the proposed act, their particular circumstance related to the intent of the act? Are refugees to be detained pending interrogation to determine to where a refugee should be destined? Or will refugees be dropped off in Toronto, Montreal or Vancouver to add to the frustrations of civil and provincial administrations? If they are to be directed to manpower-need areas, how do you enforce such a directive unless the conditions for admission as a refugee had been spelled out earlier? Does failure to comply constitute a breach of faith? If so, what is the penalty—deportation? If so, where to? Or does clause 15(2) come into play at once?

I realize that Canada has an important role to play in international politics. It must live up to a commitment in terms of refugee acceptance. What we do with them upon arrival is equally important. Admitting thousands upon thousands of refugees is doing our part in terms of refugee commitment. As a Christian nation, we have done, and will—hopefully—continue to do our part in providing for as many people as possible new hope and a new way of life in a new land. On the other hand, no matter how accommodating Canadians want to be, orderly assimilation of refugees into the Canadian mainstream is important to them and to us. Dropping off new arrivals at the refugee centres in any one of the major Canadian centres and not directing them into the manpower-need areas would be inhuman. Unless they are given guidance and direction they will inevitably end up in the refugee ghettoes as did some of their predecessors.

I ask the minister, if the number of refugees anticipated by the government is treated as a group other than those falling within immigration levels—I know the minister does not like to use the word "quotas"—predetermined by consultation with provincial ministers, what will the government do with the surplus? In light of international instability, any number of refugees could be available for absorption by Canada. In the negotiations with provincial ministers, is the number of applicants duly processed plus the number of refugees? Is it going to be a continuing policy of this government, in spite of clause 4(2)(b) on which the minister may or may not act, to welcome refugees without regard for their political beliefs? Since security seems to be occupying the government's attention as of late, does the government intend to exercise some caution in the acceptance of refugees?

I bring to the attention of the minister an example of some recent refugees who have, and are still, showing sympathy—indeed, dedication—to a political purpose, that of overthrowing democratic principles and democratically elected governments. I ask this government to review its double-standard of opening the door to one group fleeing after the removal of a Marxist government while the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has closed the door well in advance of the inevitable to another group which may well be required to flee from a Marxist regime.

Many people have contributed substantially to this debate. It has been a good one. In conclusion I want to say that I welcome the opportunity to speak in this debate and I look forward to its conclusion and to the bill being brought before committee for further examination. It is a sincere attempt by the minister to bring an outdated act up to date. Generally, the bill has some attractive provisions, but it also has weaknesses and they will not emerge until the law is put into practice.

Much has been said by a number of members about unfair restrictions imposed by the designation of areas of manpower needs. I simply say that if that is the kind of policy which allows more people to come into Canada and which will be beneficial both to them and to us, then I support that measure because I, too, am privileged. My great grandfather, who was married in Canada also considered admission to this country as a privilege, not a right. He acquired a piece of land many years ago and carved out a living. He raised eight children. He was grateful for the opportunities he had until he died. Designation did not bother him. He wanted to work and he wanted to build, and Canada gave him that opportunity.

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, we are discussing a subject of great importance to the people of Canada. In rising to say a few words about the subject I am conscious of the fact that with the exception of the Minister of State for Small Business (Mr. Marchand) and my colleague the hon. member for the Northwest Territories (Mr. Firth), all the rest of the members of parliament—all 262 of us—are either immigrants or the decendants of immigrants. My father came to Canada some 70 years ago. The parents or grandparents of other members came even earlier. But we are all immigrants. My colleague, the hon. member for the Northwest Territories, has said to me on occasion—I have never been sure whether he said it in gest or seriously—that had his forefathers had the views of many of the present members of parliament about immigrants, and had they been able to enforce their views, none of us would be here at present.

I believe the record of this country in respect of immigration, certainly since the end of World War II, is one which on the whole we and the people of Canada can be proud of. Our population has almost doubled since 1945. In each year since the end of World War II we have permitted anywhere from approximately 100,000 to 250,000 people to come to this country. The United States has a population ten times that of ours, and if they permitted proportionately the same number of people to come to their country as we have permitted to come into Canada, they would be permitting anywhere from 1.5 million to 2.5 million people to come into their country. Instead, they are permitting something in the neighbourhood of 300,000 people per year.

Compared with any country in the world, we have nothing to be ashamed of. Indeed, we have a great deal to be proud of. We have encouraged or permitted—depending upon how people might look on what we have done—people from all parts of the world, of all races, colour and religion, to come to Canada. The population mix in this country has completely changed since the end of World War II. If hon. members visited Montreal, Toronto or Vancouver they could not help but notice that change in the first half hour of walking around any one of those cities, and the same has happened to a smaller degree in many other cities of Canada. I, for one, welcome the change that has taken place. It has made this country a much more interesting and exciting place in which to live. The people of Canada, past governments and parliaments are to be congratulated for the very warmhearted and tolerant view they have taken in this regard.

I can only speak personally about what I have seen in the 15 years I have been in this chamber, but I cannot help but feel that in the past 30 years or so this matter has not been discussed sufficiently in parliament or outside parliament. I cannot help but feel that we did not often enough get the formal approval of the people of Canada. For example, in 1966 the government made the decision, which had the approval of members of parliament from all parties, that any vestiges in the regulations or the policies of the department which tended to discriminate against any prospective immigrant on the basis of race, colour or religion should be removed. I think all members of parliament, and particularly members from cities such as Winnipeg, Vancouver, Toronto and Montreal, know what a change that has meant in terms of the entry into Canada of people of Chinese origin.

However, to a large extent these decisions were made outside parliament and without public discussion. They were made by the government, and I suppose more particularly within the Department of Manpower and Immigration. I have no inside information and I do not think it is necessary that I do, but I presume that this kind of decision was reached between the minister and his senior officials.

To the extent that we believe this legislation spells out clearly our immigration policy, I commend the government. Let me put on the record what this bill respecting immigration to Canada provides. On page 5, under part I, "Canadian Immigration Policy", the objectives of the bill are stated. I quote from clause 3(f) as follows:

> —to ensure that any person who seeks admission to Canada on either a permanent or temporary basis is subject to standards of admission that do not discriminate on grounds of race, national or ethnic origin, colour, religion or sex—

I know I speak for every member of my party when I commend the government and the people of Canada for taking what I consider to be a humanitarian and democratic approach. I will come back to how successful we are in implementing that objective a little later in my speech. I would like now to deal with another subclause dealing with objectives and I quote clause 3(d) as follows:

—to encourage and facilitate the adaptation of persons who have been granted admission as permanent residents to Canadian society by promoting co-operation between the government of Canada and other levels of government and non-governmental agencies in Canada with respect thereto—

I say to the minister that we have failed miserably in attaining that objective. This is a subject which has interested me, for obvious reasons, since the day I came to parliament. Winnipeg is an ethnic city, and if there is an ethnic constituency in that city it is mine. However, despite the general knowledge which I have of the subject, I could not help being astounded by a submission which was made to the special joint committee on immigration. That committee dealt with immigration and the green paper on immigration. The Toronto board of education came before the committee and told the committee about its problems. I am now talking about the old, inner city of Toronto for which the Toronto board of education has responsibility.

I was surprised and astonished when that board told us that more than 50 per cent of the students in its school system come from immigrant families the parents of which do not speak English in the home, or come from areas like the West Indies, Pakistan, India or Hong Kong where the English spoken is, to say the least, substantially different from ours. The Toronto board of education outlined and documented the problems with which it was faced in trying to integrate these students and indicated what was required. I realized then how far we have to go before we will meet the objectives set out in this bill.

Mr. Speaker, may I call it five o'clock?

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: The hon. member for Halton (Mr. Philbrook)—Finance—Accuracy of statistics on payments to Quebec—Request for statistics on payments to other provinces; the hon. member for Okanagan Boundary (Mr. Whittaker)—Agriculture—Pesticides—Government position on importation—Suggested strict adherence to labelling regulations; the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. McCleave)—Veterans Affairs—Status of plan for new hospital system in Nova Scotia.

It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, public bills, private bills and notices of motions.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' PUBLIC BILLS

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Motion No. 12, in the name of the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Rynard). Shall the motion stand?

Mr. Goodale: Mr. Speaker, I think it is agreed that the House should deal with motion No. 21 standing in the name of the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock (Mr. Friesen).

● (1700)

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it agreed that orders 12, 15, 16, 18, 19 and 20 shall stand at the request of the government?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it agreed that the House will now proceed to consider order No. 21 standing in the name of the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock (Mr. Friesen).

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENT RESPECTING ABDUCTION OF CHILDREN

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock) moved that Bill C-221, to amend the Criminal Code (abduction of child) be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

He said: Mr. Speaker, for the past few days the leading international news stories have dealt with hijacking tours covering Spain, northwest Africa, Switzerland and Italy. But the central theme of the bill has nothing to do with any European tour: it has to do with extortion and the kidnapping by a parent of his child. Last October 22 I tabled Bill C-221, a bill to amend the Criminal Code. The operative part of the bill reads:

Every parent of a child who, with intent to deprive of the possession of that child the other parent or a guardian or any other person who has been granted by a court custody of such child, unlawfully

(a) takes or entices away or detains the child, or

(b) receives or harbours the child, is guilty of an indictable offence and is liable to imprisonment for life.

The bill was important to me last October 22. Because of recent events of the last few days it has become even more important to me, as I am sure hon. members recognize. As I speak on Bill C-221, an amendment to the Criminal Code, I am conscious that private members' hour is not noted for the degree to which it captures public attention since private members' bills often focus upon narrow aspects of public or private business. But what I thought was a bill dealing with an infrequent, though serious problem, has turned out to be one dealing with a national problem and has created national interest. There are people in the gallery today representing not only themselves and their interest in this bill but thousands of people across Canada who have experienced the terror of civil kidnapping or the constant threat of being victims of it.

I have received support for this legislation from all parts of Canada, from the maritimes to northern Alberta, from Halifax to Vancouver. Child welfare agencies from across Canada have written in support of the principle of this bill. I have received letters from both sides of this House, including at least one cabinet minister, supporting the bill. Other ministers have expressed favourable interest. I have received letters from the victims of this distress, from single parents whose trust in custody arrangements and the security of a court declaration has been raped by the callous vindictiveness of an ex-husband or ex-wife.

Most of all, I am convinced I have the support of the real victims of parental kidnapping, the pawns in the vicious game of post-separation or divorce retaliation. It is the children who suffer the most. It is they who suffer lifetime emotional wounds which may never heal. It is they who are asking the unanswered questions, "Where are you taking me?" "When will I see my mother, or father, again?" "When can I go home?" It is the children who suffer the constant mental anguish of torn loyalties, of fragmentary home attachments, of destroyed human relationships. It is the children who are exposed to the terrors of emotional as well as physical torment.

I know, Mr. Speaker, that there are cases where the court has granted custody to an uncaring and irresponsible parent. I know that any feeling and caring, loving parent, seeing his or her child neglected under the protection of a court order must want to right that wrong by forcibly taking such a child from those abject and destructive surroundings. That impulse stems only from a sense of humanity and decency. But our society can never condone any practice of breaking the law to correct a wrong. That is the road to anarchy. What we must do is immediately find ways to ensure that custody arrangements are made equitably, with easy access to redress.

In the meantime we are left with the stark reality that by far the most parental abductions stem from a heinous desire to continue to hurt the ex-spouse, from vengeance, vindictiveness, an attempt to barter a child for a better divorce settlement. In the United States the estimates run from 25,000 to 100,000 a year. For Canada that would mean 2,500 to 10,000 a year. Mr. Speaker, I would like to give just a few examples of what I am talking about. Other members speaking in support of this bill can add endlessly to the list. I know the honourable member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. Holt) is interested in this legislation, supports its principle and has worked hard for parents who have suffered the anguish of the circumstances to which I am alluding.

There is the case of Stephen Preston whose mother is a constituent of mine. Stephen was kidnapped by his father when he was seven years old. Through a very bizarre circumstance he was returned by the court to his mother three years later. The boy was taken from the courtroom kicking and screaming. Why? Because that fine lady had been painted by her ex-husband as a prostitute, as an alcoholic and any number of other vicious lies. During those three years Stephen Preston has lived under 12 aliases. He had less than a first grade education and could barely write his name. Two months later he was kidnapped again. We do not know where he is today. I ask hon. members, what kind of a young man do you think he will be when he is 18 if nothing is done?

Several weeks ago I received a letter from a lady in New Brunswick pleading with me to try to help her find her two children. Her husband took them one day six years ago and disappeared. She has pleaded with school authorities and with the police, but they cannot help her. Then there is the couple in Grande Prairie, Alberta: the ex-wife left for several years and has now come back to town, remarried. The grapevine around town has it that they have come back to take the children. What must it be like to send your children to school in the morning and then wonder all day, every day, whether that is the last time you will see them? Another lady in Alberta is in permanent hiding—only her parents know where she is—all because of the constant threat that her children would be forcibly taken.

There is the young mother whose son is in Coquitlam, British Columbia, snatched from a day-care centre here in Ottawa. She has neither the emotional strength nor the financial resources to find ways to bring him back. There is the tragic story of Vicki Starr, from Ottawa and Burlington, whose Iranian father took her to Iran eight months ago. Can you imagine the anguish of dealing with a government that does not recognize women's or children's rights even as much as we do? What must it be like for a 12 year-old to be virtually alone in a strange country, unable to speak the language and knowing she may never see her mother again?

Several weeks ago I was interviewed on this subject by a reporter. After we were through she said quietly to me, "You know, that's what happened to me when I was a little girl. My mother kidnapped me and wouldn't let my father know where I was till he promised her a different divorce arrangement." Believe me, Mr. Speaker, that young lady is interested in seeing this bill pass.

I know this bill is not perfect. I think several changes ought to be made at committee stage, for that is what parliamentary debate and committee discussion is all about—to perfect proposed legislation. I offer the following suggestions to members for discussion at committee stage. First, I think the age mentioned in the bill ought to be uniform with other legislation and should be changed to 14. Second, I think custody arrangements ought to include those in addition to court appointed ones, such as legal agreements arrived at in a law office. Third, and most important, there are some who feel the penalty provision of Bill C-221 as it now stands is too severe for some cases. I agree. Therefore, I would commend to the justice and legal affairs committee, or to the health and welfare committee, an amendment which would bring greater accommodation for the varying exigencies under which the kidnapping took place. I am not adamant about seeing this bill pass in its present form. I am interested in the co-operation of the minister in seeing the principle of this legislation go on to committee stage for discussion.

The most formative and enduring relationships we will ever have are those we build with our parents. It is from our parents that we first learn about our sense of identity, who we are. It is from our parents that we get our first feelings of worth and being wanted. It is with them that our need to be loved and wanted is first satisfied. However, what if these relationships are shattered, first by divorce and custody proceedings, and then by parental kidnapping? What is the harvest of emotional problems we are going to reap in the coming generation because we have not dealt with this problem?

We have spent a great deal of time and energy protecting the material rights of children. We look after their property rights, their inheritance rights, their rights of succession. We have health and immunization programs to protect their bodies. We have laws to protect them from all forms of physical contamination. We have laws which prohibit the transport of diseased cattle across provincial boundaries—all to protect the body. But if an estranged parent, father or mother, forcibly wrenches a child from the home that has given him security, takes him away from the parent with whom he or she is most firmly attached, and moves him into another province, into alien surroundings, and force-feeds his mind and emotions with the venom of a destroyed marriage relationship, and we offer that child no help, no warmth, no healing, no security, then surely that child must cry out that ancient pitiable cry, "Is it nothing to you, all ye that pass by?"

This is not a government problem, or an opposition problem, or a provincial problem; it is a human problem. All it requires is the will to make a few simple but fundamental changes.

The present law is based on the premise that parents cannot kidnap their children. The increasing number of marriage breakups, the increased mobility of our people, the increased expressions of hostility and violence in our land, make that premise obsolete. Bill C-221 recognizes the reality of that basic change.

At present, the provisions of the divorce act are portable across Canada and around the world, but the custody arrangements issuing from those divorce settlements enjoy only provincial recognition. So it is that a parent can kidnap his child, take him into another province and have almost total immunity from arrest. Ever since the 1957 ruling in Regina vs. Austin, this kind of criminal activity has escaped prosecution because of the loophole that exists in paragraph two of section 250 of the Criminal Code.

Even when all the provinces recognize each other's custody arrangements, as necessary as that is, it will not eliminate the furtive running and hiding by the parental kidnapper, nor will it take care of international implications.

Our Canadian Bill of Rights guarantees to each the right "to life, liberty, security of person". At this very moment there are countless children born with that right who have it denied them by the unconscionable action of a vindictive parent. Bill C-221 would go some distance in ensuring that right to those things for our children.

I trust hon. members will permit this measure to go to committee for examination, amendment, and approval.

Mrs. Simma Holt (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock (Mr. Friesen). I thank him on behalf of the people I have been working for and for myself. It seems we are perpetually confronted with at least one of these problems. I have not just been faced with province to province parent kidnappings, but also with international kidnappings. Just one case has kept me and many other people occupied for more than two years, and it is still not resolved. I will outline that in a few moments. If this bill goes through, we will then treat children born in Canada as though they were citizens and have the rights and protections of citizens.

When I first became involved in this the whole country was up in arms about the kidnapping of the heir to the Seagram's estate. There was a great outcry. However, when five small children were kidnapped from a Mission, B.C. mother no one cared if she got her children back. All the resources of legal aid were used to pay for some Hong Kong drug traffickers in Vancouver, but there was not a cent for this mother of five children to find her children, and virtually save their lives from the putative father in the Philippines, whose reputation and character were less than safe for these youngsters.

The hon. member for Surrey-White Rock questions what they will be at age 18. I ask that too. Perhaps they will grow up in another country. Did they, as Canadian citizens, not have the right and the protection of our nation under the law?

On July 30, 1975, because of the case of Mildred Watson Clarke of Mission, B.C., I rose in this House and asked for help from the then Minister of Justice. At that time I said, and I quote:

> Children are citizens and should receive all the rights and protection of a person, a citizen, within the law. However, throughout Canada children are being kidnapped by a parent in defiance of court orders on custody.

I asked then for criminal law to deter would-be parent kidnappers.

Although there were several cases many people were working on at that time, this was the most appalling case. The hon. member for Surrey-White Rock, the leader in the Senate, Ray Perrault and his staff, Mr. Kenneth Burke of the Legal Department of External Affairs, the Superintendent of Child Welfare of B.C., Victor Belknap were all working on the case. We even tried to break the law and kidnap the children back because we felt those children had a right to be home with their mother.

The law did not give them help, so we had to do everything, including trying to hire policemen and criminals to get them back. I asked in this House July 30, 1975, that we create laws so that extradition treaties could help youngsters such as these.

The children of Mildred Clarke of Surrey were kidnapped on Mother's Day, a very nice token. We talk of Mother's Day and motherhood with great warmth, but we do not do a darn thing to help a mother and her five children who need her love and tender care.

I support this bill completely. With a bill of this sort, I hope that we can get some extradition treaties implemented, identical to those we have for other kidnappings, hijackings, and theft of children.

In the case of Mildred Clarke, I want to tell the House what I went through to try to get help for this woman in 1975 when she first approached me. There was a petition with hundreds of names. I went to the legal operations staff of External Affairs, to a Mr. Burke. He has handled dozens of cases, and succeeded in reuniting some mothers and children.

I wrote to Mrs. Marcos, the wife of the president of the Philippines. I went to the British Columbia attorney general, a member of that great humane NDP government at that time, to see if he would intervene. He did nothing. However, he went to the United Nations international conference on crime in Geneva and got miles of world-wide publicity on his supposed concern over parent kidnapping children. He did nothing for Mrs. Clarke or the other women who were mentioned in this House.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) was approached directly. He tried to intervene. We were told that only the head of this state could get to the heads of these different states and obtain any help.

Today I have a new case, a child named Lucienne Dulong. The mother, Loredana Dulong, and the baby's grandfather, Peter Weichel, raised over $10,000 to get the child back from France. The provincial court of B.C. (family division) issued an order awarding custody of Lucienne to the mother, granting the father visiting rights and ordering him not to take the child out of the court's area of jurisdiction. The father agreed to that, and three days later he took the child across the border to Seattle, and flew from there back to France.

The French consulate in Vancouver was wrong and perhaps acted illegally by aiding Andre Mathew Dulong, the kidnapper, giving him the necessary documents to take the child out of the country. The consulate knew of the court order, and what they did once, they can do again.

The Vancouver police issued a warrant for Andre's arrest which, under pressure now from the French government to the federal government and the B.C. attorney-general's department, they want to set aside. This means that after kidnapping the child and having her brought back at tremendous cost to the mother and maternal grandfather, that man can again slip into Canada and kidnap the child. Hopefully this bill will be a deterrent to any such action and perhaps there will be protection for children and the rights of children.

It is fundamental that a child born in Canada should have the rights of a citizen and that court orders should not be defied. But it seems that where children are concerned they can be put to barter in our country, and that the destruction of a child is irrevelant when it comes to the law.

[Mrs. Holt.]

Yes, we will chase all over the country and use all the resources of international law to rescue the adult heir to a wealthy estate, but there is no protection in the courts, not even interprovincially, there is no unification in law, to protect children from these parents. We are using children in barter and retribution. The day is here when we must do everything to end this obviously criminal type behavior. In the meantime, I am personally fighting the so-called "reasonable access" to children. "Reasonable access" can become the right to kidnap a child if a parent has money, has mobility, or has a foreign connection.

I went to court recently with a girl who had been divorced from her Dutch husband. She had a nine-month-old baby. We fought in the court and we even got legal aid at the last moment so he had no access at all; the only possible access would be by court order and under tight supervision. This man would find it difficult to abduct the child and take her to Holland.

In most cases it is men. They do seem to have the resources, the mobility and just do not seem to be tied as much to the child as the woman.

The child, in school is also threatened. There must be protection within the school system for these children.

Today there are probably more children than ever before in history who are victims of broken homes. They have the right of Canadian citizens; they have the right to be protected; and they have the right of every resource of the law even more than any other kidnap victims in our society. I hope this bill is not talked out and that it does go to the committee.

Some hon. Members: Hear, Hear!

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I trust I shall not be getting out of line if I say that it has been indicated to us that the chances are good that the government side will agree to the subject matter of this bill being referred to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs. This being the case, I echo the sentiment just expressed by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. Holt) that none of us will prevent that happening by contributing to any talking out of this bill. Therefore, my remarks will be very brief.

I commend the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock (Mr. Friesen) for bringing this legislation before us. I commend him on the speech he made today and I hope that the suggested course of action will be followed. As a matter of fact, I may say that I am just as pleased that the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs is so busy that this matter will be referred to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs instead. I have in mind the fact that last session this committee spent quite a while studying a motion which came from a colleague of my friend having to do with the abuse of children. So the committee I have just mentioned is disposed to do what it can for Canadian children.

I recognize that the legislation may have to be looked at closely in terms of its legal provisions but I gather that what the hon. member seeks to do is not only make the kidnapping of children in these circumstances an illegal act but to write it in such terms that it would come under the extradition rules so that foreign kidnapping could be dealt with as well as offences between provinces in Canada. I think we are all in agreement with what the hon. member is proposing. I hope that others will be as brief as I have been and that we shall reach the point at which the promise can be kept and that at least the subject matter of the bill will be referred to the committee where I know it will be considered with concern and with compassion.

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I was very pleased when I learned early today that it was the intention of the government to accept the principle of the bill and not to follow what is, lamentably, the usual practice of talking out good private members' bills.

I want to commend the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock (Mr. Friesen) for the work he has done and the compassion he has exhibited.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): The bill which has arisen from his work shows his intense feeling for the people involved and I, too, would like to make a very short contribution to the debate because, like other hon. members, I would like to see the measure go to the committee.

Unlike those who have spoken so far, I have had an opportunity to see this not only as a member of parliament where I have had cases brought to my attention, but one of them, at least, occurred in my constituency. The abduction took place in my constituency. I am referring to the case of Vicki Starr, whose mother was formerly a constituent of mine—but also I have had occasion to deal with it as a lawyer.

I know of no more hopeless feeling than when advising a client of modest means that her only recourse is to move under the existing law on the civil side, in a province of Canada if she is fortunate, or in a state of the United States, or in a foreign country if she is unfortunate, to claim the rights which were given to her by the courts of the jurisdiction in which she lives. The cost is horrendous and, as the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. Holt) says, it leads people to flaunt the law. If that is the state of the law, we have to look at the state of the law because the law does not suit our needs.

I am always concerned about jurisdiction as between provincial governments and the federal government. We could, of course, wait for provincial jurisdiction, ten of them in Canada, to enact laws. That kind of thing is in fact going on. But the problem is here with us today and this is one opportunity where, using the jurisdiction within the federal sphere of legal affairs, we can on a national basis attack a problem which does not respect provincial boundaries.

Some will talk about the severity of the penalty. Some would say that life imprisonment is too severe a penalty for an offence like this. I believe there are crimes involving property under the Criminal Code to which a penalty of life imprisonment is attached. But if that is the case the committee will look at it and make recommendations. The main thing is that this is an opportunity to take up the initiative of the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock to deal with a human condition which is given prominence in the press when it relates to foreign abduction—that is where the prominence is. But a part of the human condition affects people whose cases are not spectacular. A child's right to the custody and care of a parent, however you want to look at it, is just as important in the human field as anywhere else, whether or not those cases or other cases are followed.

I join with all my colleagues in commending the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock on his bill. I should also like to commend the government—and it is not very often I do that—for seeing the worth of this private member's bill. I would not want to set a precedent so that the procedure of turning these bills back was upset, but I hope the government will look carefully at all of these bills that are brought forward, particularly the kind which deal with the human condition and the consequences that flow from what is really a breach of the law on the part of someone. Perhaps the only way to settle the matter is to look at it as a criminal offence, because that is the only way that we can attack it quickly on a national basis.

[Translation]

Mr. C. A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I would like to say a few words, not to kill the bill but rather to say that I approve the legislation put forward by the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock (Mr. Friesen), in which it is stated:

> The purpose of this bill is to make the abduction of a child by a parent who does not have legal custody of that child from the other parent or any other person who has such custody an indictable offence punishable by imprisonment for life as in the case of kidnapping or hijacking.

I am very much pleased that such a bill has been introduced in this House. We have been witnessing for years all types of abductions and I feel that our current statutes are not hard enough to deter such an unforgivable act. Children abducted years ago, maybe ten or even fifteen years ago, were never found again. It is also my feeling that although our laws may not be as stringent as they should be, there should be international agreement between all nations to ensure easier tracing of abducted children. At a time when most every thief is caught, I see no reason why international cooperation could not trace child abductors. I feel that tougher sentences should be provided, at least 25 years' imprisonment. The bill should also invite nations to sign agreements to prevent future abductions of this kind.

I know that another member would like to speak on this, so I conclude with the hope that the bill now before us will be sent to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs and later enacted, so there may be protection against such an unforgivable type of abduction.

[English]

Mr. W. Kenneth Robinson (Toronto-Lakeshore): Mr. Speaker, like my hon. friend from Grenville-Carleton, as a lawyer I have great concern about this kind of problem and I realize the difficulties many spouses have had over a number of years. I am hoping that this bill, or the substance of it, will be referred to a standing committee so that it can be considered in depth. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) indicated that last year we had the whole question of child abuse before the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs, which at that time came up with a very comprehensive report. It happens to be my committee so I am very happy that this matter may be referred to it. We will carry out our investigation in due course and hopefully see that this matter is remedied in the not too distant future.

First of all, Mr. Speaker, I should like to thank the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock (Mr. Friesen) for his untiring efforts on behalf of the children who have been the unfortunate victims of vindictive parents. Children should not be the pawns of their parents for any reason. Neither should parents be allowed to violate flagrantly the orders of a court regarding custody.

The hon. member by this bill would make the removal of a child from his legal guardian by a parent an indictable offence liable to the same penalties as kidnapping or hijacking. He argues that the circumstances are no different than a situation where the intention is to extort funds or concessions. In this the hon. member is correct. Surely it is apparent that there is little difference between kidnapping and the removal of a child from his legal guardian. They are both theft in its most malicious forms.

The main reason for this bill seems to be the virtual impossibility of enforcing custody decisions. While divorce is a federal matter, child custody is a provincial concern. Each province is charged with the responsibility of ensuring the physical and emotional well-being of a child. This, of course, presents obvious difficulties in the enforcement of parental rights.

It appears that, in most cases, parents who take their children from legal guardians also leave the province in which the custody order was issued. Sometimes they leave the country. Because custody is not only provincially assigned but is also a civil matter, there is no agency besides the court which will enforce custody decisions. The police, who have often suffered physically as a result of intervening in domestic disputes, are understandably reluctant to involve themselves in what is technically a civil problem. Consequently the deprived parent is prevented from taking any immediate action. This parent is helpless in preventing the abduction of his or her child by his or her ex-spouse.

By having to take the matter to court two serious problems arise: time and location. Time is of the essence in a situation such as this. It is very simple to whisk a child on to a plane to another jurisdiction, a jurisdiction that has no control over, or right to interfere in the battle for custody. If the offending party manages to keep the child away for a considerable length of time, and some court decision can be made, in the best interests of the child the court will usually grant custody to the parent with whom the child is currently residing. This is done to prevent any further upheaval in the child's life and routine, which is reasonable.

It would seem to me, Mr. Speaker, that what we have here is just the tip of the iceberg. There are reasons why some parents feel compelled to take this outrageous step. I submit that it often comes as a direct result of the inequitable way in which custody is awarded in the first place, and frequent denial of reasonable access. At present it is customary for a mother to receive custody of the children. It had traditionally been assumed that, except in the most extraordinary circumstances such as mental illness, alcoholism, or active indifference to the children, the mother is best able to care for the children, even if she is a prostitute. It is thought that she can fulfil the child's needs and that less strain is placed on a child if he or she is placed with his or her mother.

There was, and still is, a strong social stigma attached to a mother who decides she cannot manage her children by herself. Many mothers who love their children, but realize they are unable to take care of their offspring were, and are, forced into a position where they must accept the responsibility, which can be detrimental to both the mother and the children. Lest some hon. members think that I am exaggerating, let me illustrate more fully.

Statistics Canada reports that irrespective of who initiates the court action, the wife most frequently obtains custody of the children. In 1971, of the men who initiated court action, 40.20 per cent obtained custody. This compares to the 89.17 per cent in favour of women. In 1972 it was 37.55 per cent to 88.22 per cent; in 1973, 37.24 per cent to 88.38 per cent; and in 1974, 35.34 per cent to 87.70 per cent. This represents an average, 1971-1974, of 37.32 per cent in favour of the father, and 88.28 per cent in favour of the mother. Obviously this is discriminatory.

According to the Toronto Star of August 25, 1976:

> Fathers who filed for divorce won custody in 32 per cent of the cases but in only 3.7 per cent of the cases when the mother started the action.

In the same vein the Ottawa Citizen stated on June 12, 1976:

> To a father anxious to retain custody of his children it is obviously wiser to be the one suing for divorce.

In the majority of cases that have come to public attention it has been the father who has resorted to kidnapping to gain access to his children. This indicates to me that there is another problem here than outright kidnapping, and that is how custody is awarded.

Concerning the Law Reform Commission, the Globe and Mail reported on June 12, 1976:

> The court would decide which spouse should have custody of the children on the basis of which parent can better care for them and without reference to which spouse was guilty of an extra-marital offence.

The Law Reform Commission suggests an extensive examination of the pre-divorce relationship between a child and its parents, including: the kind of relationship the child has with the persons to whom custody will be entrusted; the emotional and physical need of the child; the capacity of the potential guardian to provide for the child; and the preference of the child who is at an appropriate age to make such a decision.

In working paper No. 13, under the heading of Divorce, the Law Reform Commission stated:

> The courts would treat fathers and mothers on an equal basis and no sexual discrimination would be made in determining who is the more appropriate parent to assume the responsibility for the children.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that this is the crux of the issue we are discussing. Custody is a right with responsibilities, one of which is providing reasonable access to the other parent. It should be granted on a non-discriminatory basis, after a thorough pre-trial examination has taken place, and should not be a rubber stamp decision by the court. This, I believe, is fundamental to the solution of parental kidnapping.

A comprehensive re-evaluation of all aspects of custody granting access to children must be completed. Interprovincial custody enforcement must be legislated, and then such incidents should decrease. By attaching this kind of kidnapping to the Criminal Code, we could then negotiate the return of children who have one non-Canadian parent and have been taken out of the country.

The hon. member's bill is a good solution to part of the problem. It should be incorporated into a series of changes and reforms concerning the granting and enforcement of custody so that the number of these tragic kidnappings will be reduced and eventually eliminated.

Mr. Leonard C. Jones (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, as usual my remarks will be most brief. Everything has been said that should be said on this subject, and in fact some of it has been said a second time.

I commend the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock (Mr. Friesen) for putting forward this bill and for the statements he made on it, and I also commend all other hon. members who have spoken on the bill.

Some hon. members who have spoken are lawyers. I do not hold that against them because I myself am a practising lawyer. I too have practised some family law. Any lawyer who has practised or is practising has a great deal of experience in these matters and suffers some of the problems that the parents and the youngster suffer. What happens in child abduction creates heart rending experiences. Often the child becomes the pawn, he becomes a chattel instead of a human being. This is what this amendment purports to stop. It is often the hatred for the other parent that the abductor inflicts upon the child. It is not enough that the innocent child must suffer the mental trauma created as a result of the separation of the two parents, a crime for which often the child is blamed. Why must we condone child abduction also? We, as members of parliament, cannot in all consciousness allow this injustice to continue.

I will conclude briefly by saying that we should permit this bill to go immediately to the appropriate committee for study and any necessary technical changes. We must do it, I was going to say tout de suite, but since I do not speak French too well, I will say, immediately.

Mr. Mike Landers (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I would be remiss in my duty if I did not thank the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock (Mr. Friesen) for providing the House an opportunity to discuss child-napping, a matter of most serious concern to Canadians. This question has concerned the federal government for some time. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) discussed the matter with the attorneys general of the provinces at the federal-provincial conference of attorneys general in October of 1975. At the end of their discussions at that 1975 conference the minister called on the provincial attorneys general to come forward with suggestions on how section 250 of the Criminal Code of Canada might be improved in order to deal with the problem of child-napping. As yet, not one of them has put forward a proposal.

There may be a temptation on the part of some to ask why the federal government does not go ahead on its own and change the Criminal Code. However, I am sure that most of us are aware that the Minister of Justice has an undertaking with provincial attorneys general that there will not be any amendments to the Criminal Code without consultation with them. This, of course, is quite proper since it is the provincial attorneys general who are responsible under the BNA Act for the administration of justice within the provinces.

In the meantime, five provinces have passed legislation to facilitate the interprovincial enforcement of custody orders, and three more provinces have such legislation at various stages in the legislative process. I must say that I welcome this because I think that to a very great extent this is a problem that is best dealt with by provincial legislation.

The criminal law is too blunt an instrument to deal with the problem—a problem which exists entirely within the context of the breaking up of the family. It would be nice if the proposals contained in Bill C-221 would do the job and bring an end to child-napping. But they would not. Indeed I would say on the basis of the experience I have had as a lawyer that no jury in the country would, with the potential of a life prison sentence, convict a parent for having taken his or her own child to another jurisdiction.

I suspect that one reason why the Minister of Justice has received no response from the provinces to his request of 18 months ago for proposals for a change in section 250 may very well be that the provincial governments, having studied the problem, have decided that the Criminal Code of Canada is a totally inappropriate instrument for dealing with this very disturbing problem. That would perhaps be why so many of them have chosen to go with the legislation I mentioned a moment ago.

However, I do not wish to minimize the problem of child-napping. I think we are all aware of the heart rending cases of parents who have been deprived of the custody of their children in violation of valid custody orders. As legislators we cannot help but be touched by the sense of loss and the helplessness that they must feel, and which has been articulated so well by Mrs. Lois Preston of Surrey and her Association of Parents of Kidnapped Children.

For the record I would like to refer to a press release which followed the federal-provincial conference of attorneys general in October, 1975. At the conclusion of that conference the press release pointed out that in relation to child-napping by parents:

. . . the Ministers were all of the view that this was a serious social and legal problem in Canada and agreed that both levels of government would take early action to develop a more effective legal framework whereby children abducted by a parent will be returned to lawful custody. The federal minister, commenting on the present provisions of the Criminal Code respecting kidnapping and abduction, invited provincial ministers to respond to his suggestions for possible amendments which might make these provisions more readily applicable to this situation. The provinces all agreed to consider following the lead of Manitoba in enacting legislation to give extra provincial effect to the enforcement of custody orders. It was hoped that such action by the provinces might facilitate progress in the international area as well.

There has been some comment with regard to Section 250 of the Criminal Code and amendments thereto, and I would like to put that section on the record. It states:

Every one who, with intent to deprive a parent or guardian or any other person who has lawful care or charge of a child under the age of fourteen years of the possession of that child, or with intent to steal anything on or about the person of such a child, unlawfully

(a) takes or entices away or detains the child, or

(b) receives or harbours the child, is guilty of an indictable offence and is liable to imprisonment for ten years.

Subsection (2) states:

This section does not apply to a person who, claiming in good faith a right to possession of a child, obtains possession of the child.

Mr. Speaker, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. Holt):

That all the words after "That" be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

"Bill C-221, An Act to amend the Criminal Code (abduction of child), be not now read a second time but that the order be discharged and the Bill withdrawn and that the subject-matter thereof be referred to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs".

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is my interpretation that the passage of this amendment disposes of the main motion as it includes the content of the motion.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, if there is any problem with that, we certainly give our consent.

Some hon. Members: Six o'clock.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it agreed that we call it six o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock p.m.

At 5.55 p.m. the House took recess.

AMENDMENTS TO IMPLEMENT CHANGES IN IMMIGRATION POLICY

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Cullen that Bill C-24, respecting immigration to Canada, be read the second time and referred to the the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration.

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, before five o'clock I was discussing the immigration bill with which we are dealing, and was referring to the submission made by the Toronto Board of Education to the Special Joint Committee of the House of Commons and the Senate dealing with the green paper on immigration. The board pointed out that a large percentage of children attending Toronto schools were immigrant children whose parents either do not speak English at home or come from countries in which the English spoken is different from ours. They pointed out that between 1950 and the 1960's the majority of people who came to Toronto came from non-industrialized rural communities, or countries like Greece, Italy, Spain and Portugal.

In most cases the parents and children had not had the necessary experience and educational opportunities to enable them to adjust successfully to the Ontario school system. Further, not only was their language different, but the gulf between the culture of their old country and their new home in Toronto was so great that in many cases severe adjustment problems were created both for parents and children.

The board went on to talk about the situation in the 1970's, pointing out that the school system in Toronto in the 1970's faced an additional challenge. Large numbers of immigrants from the West Indies, for example Jamaica, Trinidad, Guyana, whose first language was English but whose need for special consideration was as great as for Mediterranean immigrants because of dialect, lack of educational opportunity, and cultural differences, entered a school system already struggling to find adequate financial resources to maintain its new Canadian programs. The fact that these immigrants could be recognized by the colour of their skin posed a new and unfamiliar problem as well.

We know from recent news stories that prejudice continues, and that there are unfortunate incidents in schools and in the community at large involving people of different races. The Toronto Board of Education impressed the joint committee, because that committee in its report to parliament made several noteworthy recommendations. I now quote from page 166 of the joint committee's report, as follows:

As the Toronto School Board, the board with the largest number of immigrant children, observed, 40 per cent of all immigrants are children, many of them accustomed to different cultures and languages than those found in Canada. There are already some shared-cost language programs for adults. In view of the special needs of many immigrant children, the committee supports the principle of a federal contribution to the extra cost of educating immigrant children who require special training in English or French or other catch-up programs, providing these funds are clearly earmarked for the school systems.

When they appeared before the joint committee the board estimated that it would cost an extra $2 million per year to provide services they thought were necessary and advisable if immigrant children were to be integrated properly into our society. I have had similar reports from the core area of Winnipeg which is largely represented by my colleague, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), and myself. In up to a dozen of the core area schools, the majority of the students are from immigrant non-English speaking families or native families which have recently moved into the city of Winnipeg. The problems are tremendous. The city and the province are finding it impossible to deal with those problems as they believe they should be dealt with.

The joint special committee made another noteworthy comment when it reported:

Attention was also directed to the particular plight of immigrant women, and especially wives and mothers. When they are not in the work force they have little opportunity to learn the language and make personal contacts, advantages enjoyed by their husbands and school-aged and working children. . . . It was pointed out that language training is the single most important need of these women.

As the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia) pointed out this afternoon, there are a number of volunteer organizations which have begun this work. Some very excellent work has been done, work which has given us the kind of direction in which we should go to help meet the needs and solve the problems of the new immigrants.

All of these volunteer programs are relatively small. All of them have difficulty in meeting the costs. In no city are we providing the kind of services we should.

I have stated on a number of occasions in this House that the number of people who come to this country, the areas from which they come, and the languages which they speak, are almost exclusively decided by decisions of the federal government. It is wrong to hide behind the constitutional division of powers, to say that education is the responsibility of the provinces, the provinces give the responsibility to the local school divisions, and therefore the federal government has no responsibility for that. That is completely wrong.

The steps which have been taken are too few and too small. We need a major expansion of this kind of program. As I indicated earlier, merely spelling out in the act that this country does not discriminate against race, nationality, colour or religion is not good enough. We have to ask ourselves how well our policies have worked and how close we have come to meeting the objectives in the principles enunciated in this bill and earlier by ministers. All told, we have done a pretty good job.

I do not have experience in the day to day dealings with problems of immigration as do members from Toronto, Montreal or Vancouver. However, compared with other areas, I certainly do have extensive experience. My relationship with all ministers who have been in charge of immigration since I have been here, and with all the deputy ministers, has been good. I am glad to say I cannot remember one case in which I was asked to intervene where, when I was finished, whether the decision was favourable or unfavourable, I could say to myself or anybody else, "I know the department was wrong."

I am sure there is not a member of parliament, present or past, who can say he has had success with every case. I, personally, am not aggrieved. I do not say that the whole department or large numbers of the officials in the department are prejudiced, racist, or anything else. However, I do say that we have to think not only of how the system is working now, but how the system will work in the future with other ministers, other officials, and with the law which we are debating at the present time.

To assess how we have done, we have to decide on a number of questions that relate to the whole problem of immigration. As I said earlier, how many people have come to this country from year to year, from where do they come, and how are they chosen are questions we have to examine.

As I indicated earlier, there have been wide fluctuations. We have gone from as many as 250,000 in one year to less than 100,000 in other years in the past 15 or so years. How did that happen? Obviously a decision was made because of social and economic conditions in a particular year. At a specific time we may have had large scale unemployment and it was not a good period to be very easy with immigration. What happened last year and is likely to happen this year proves my point. Last year we had the heaviest unemployment since the late fifties. Unemployment was down in 1976 over 1975.

We are now in the month of March. For the first time in many years, maybe the first time in the history of Canada, and certainly the first time since Statistics Canada has kept records, we have over 900,000 people officially unemployed. Given that situation, no government, regardless of its political complexion, could have wide open immigration. The people of Canada, both the employed and the unemployed, would not permit it. That is quite understandable.

Up until this time we have never had a statement, either once a year or at any time, by a minister in charge of immigration saying, "This is what we are going to do in the coming year and these are the reasons why." In introducing this bill the minister said it is the intention to make a statement every year. We commend him for that. However, I am skeptical about the minister's suggestion in his speech that the target, goal, or whatever you want to call it, for one year is not a long enough period of time, and possibly it should be for a five year period. I find it difficult to believe that is possible.

Imagine if in 1972 the minister had announced that we would permit, encourage, and arrange for a target of 200,000 per year over the next five years. In 1975, 1976 and 1977 we have had over three quarters of a million people unemployed at some time during each year. In my view the minister's suggestion just is not possible.

It is not just the act which decides how many people are to be permitted into the country. After all, how did we get these wide fluctuations about which I talked? The act has not been amended in at least ten years, so how did that occur? In my view, it is done in two ways. First, it is done by the staffing.

If the government or the department were to decide we were getting too many immigrants from, say, Hong Kong, all the government has to do, and I am not saying it is wrong for the government to do this, without changing the act or the regulations at all, is to cut the staff in Hong Kong or in any other country in half, and the number of people who come in for any one year from that area will be cut by half. If we want to increase the number of immigrants, increase the staff. I would not say the government has acted wrongly, or done a poor job. I am saying that if we think about this realistically, this is all that needs to be done—it is one way in which it can be done.

The other way is by tightening or loosening the regulations. I looked today at the copy of the regulations which I have. There are 45 pages of regulations. It is under these regulations that decisions about individual cases are made. These regulations never come before parliament. They are made within the department, and presumably passed by the cabinet through orders in council. Changes are made without consultation with outside opinion, whenever thought desirable. Very few people know what is in the regulations. It is extremely difficult to keep up with them. My hon. friend from Greenwood (Mr. Brewin) has had more experience in this field, to my knowledge, than any other member of parliament regardless of party, but even he finds difficulty keeping up with them. By changing these regulations it is possible to change the whole system. Let me illustrate this by outlining the changes in just one regulation which I think I understand. It is the regulation dealing with employment.

At one time if a person wanted to come to Canada and had all the necessary qualifications—the right age, the right sex, the appropriate education, and prior job training—he could get the points required under the points system and be allowed in. But at the same point—I am not sure precisely when this change was made—it was decided that no person could come to Canada unless he had a job offer. This worked for a while until a couple of years ago when it was felt—and quite frankly, I believe, it was necessary—that the regulations should be tightened up again. And suddenly the regulation about employment was changed. Not only did a prospective immigrant have to have a job offer but he had to have a job offer which the National Employment Service could certify that no person living in Canada wanted to take. Just think of the changes which have taken place—from no requirement for employment to the requirement that you have a job offer, to a requirement that you have a job offer that no person living in Canada wants to take. I am not saying those decisions were necessarily wrong.

[Mr. Orlikow.]

Mine is an ethnic constituency. I suppose 90 per cent of them are working people, and they are worried even though they themselves are the children or grandchildren of immigrants or, in some cases, immigrants themselves. Although few of their families have been here longer than three generations they are concerned about employment and they tell you "We have to cut down on immigration." I sympathize with them and, in fact, I agree with them. I do not fault the government for cutting back on immigration, given the economic plight of Canada at the present time. My point is that all this was done by civil servants, by bureaucratic decision. I do not think this is a good way in which to operate. The people of Canada have a right to know why governments are doing things and they have to have a right to express themselves, as they can under a democratic system, in favour of, or in opposition to, the way things are done. So much for the way the system works.

I want to draw attention now to a couple of clauses in the bill which make it very uneasy, uncertain whether we should vote for the bill or not. Let me refer to clause 111(2) which says:

> An immigration officer may require persons who seek admission to Canada and persons in Canada other than Canadian citizens to comply with such regulations as are prescribed providing for the identification of such persons by means of fingerprints or photographs—

Even with the shortening of the qualifying period it still takes three years before a person can apply for citizenship. I believe that when a person is admitted to Canada and is given landed immigrant status he is entitled to all the rights and privileges of a citizen. If we are placing certain restrictions on people who are not citizens, there have to be very good reasons. What is the necessity for requiring not only persons who seek admission but persons who are already in Canada as landed immigrants but who are not yet citizens, to be subject to this provision? Remember, there are people who come to Canada and who, for what they consider to be good reasons, do not become citizens.

Mr. Alexander: Some have been here for 50 years.

Mr. Orlikow: Yes. Some have been here for a long time. I myself wish they would become citizens but I respect their right to make their own decision, and I cannot imagine why this provision should be here. If the minister and his officials were not going to use that clause, why put it in? Was it simply to give some future minister or civil servant use of that provision? I cannot accept that.

● (2030)

Let me turn to another provision, clause 104(2). It provides:

> Every peace officer in Canada . . . may, without the issue of a warrant, an order or a direction for arrest or detention, arrest and detain or arrest and make an order to detain
> (a) for an inquiry, any person who on reasonable grounds is suspected of being a person referred to in—

Then follow some subparagraphs.

> (b) for removal from Canada, any person against whom a removal order has been made that is to be executed—

I expect every person living in Canada, whether citizen or not, to observe the laws of Canada. Surely we have not come to the point where it is necessary to arrest or detain persons without issuing a warrant or an order for arrest or detention. This, to me, Mr. Speaker, smacks of the kind of police state that we do not need in Canada.

I could quote other clauses in the bill but I want to deal with two illustrations to show why I, among other members, am perturbed about some of the things that the government has done. Let me refer to the case that was dealt with by my colleague yesterday of Professor Andre Frank. Professor Frank was to come here from East Germany to participate in a seminar at Queen's University. I am not going to put on the record again the letter received from Queen's University professors by the minister and other members of parliament. But having read that letter I am almost certain that I would pretty strenuously disagree with the views of Professor Frank about the Third World and how it can be developed. I also find it rather strange that the government was so worried about security that it would not permit the professor, who had views which were different from those of the majority of the people of Canada, to come to Canada for three days.

Surely the Canadian democratic system is not so weak that one person can subvert it, or come close to subverting it, in three days. Surely there is enough strength in our system not to have to worry about the views of one or two or even ten professors who want to visit Canada for two or three days. I think the government made a very serious error in that decision.

Before closing, let me say that while along with my colleagues I commend the government for the provisions of the act dealing with refugees and support the words of the minister in regard to refugees, I find it difficult to equate the very generous and open treatment of refugees who came to this country in large numbers from Uganda, Czechoslovakia, and Hungary with the way in which we dithered and worried regarding refugees who wanted to get out of Chile when the government of Chile was overthrown by that country's military. I am sure I would disagree very strenuously with many people who supported the former government of Chile—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. gentleman but his allotted time has expired. He may continue if he has unanimous consent. Has he unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Speaker, may I conclude by saying that I am certain I would continue to disagree with many people who escaped from Chile and whose views are contrary to those that I hold. I am sure there are many people who escaped from other countries, who came to this country easily and freely with encouragement from the people and Government of Canada, with whose views I would also disagree. But these people fitted in and, given some time, I think the people who wanted to get out of Chile would also have fitted in and made their contribution to Canada. If we believe in encouraging refugees to come to Canada, we should not pick and choose. We should have treated the potential refugees from Chile as generously as we treated refugees from other countries, but I do not believe that we did so.

[Translation]

Mr. Arthur Portelance (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the bill now before the House constitutes a major landmark in the social evolution, in keeping not only with the demographic and economic needs of a modern and dynamic country but also the world wide framework in which Canadian society operates, a society whose hospitality and generosity towards foreigners can compare with that of any other country in the world under any political regime.

Indeed are we not all ourselves, as has often been suggested, immigrants or descendants of immigrants? Since my time is limited, I would like to discuss immediately an important aspect of this bill dealing with increased consultations with the provinces. In that respect, it should be remembered that we are far from innovating entirely in this area, particularly with regard to the province of Quebec, which has already successively signed the Lang-Cloutier and Andras-Bienvenue agreements providing for special federal cooperation to attract more French-speaking immigrants into that province.

In fact, the formula which was adopted for Quebec is to a certain extent a pattern that might one day be followed for other provinces according to their particular needs. Let us remember also that this cooperation that proved so efficient between Ottawa and Quebec in recent years is based on one of the intangible basic principles set out in the Canadian immigration policy, that existed for that matter before the publication of the green paper, that an effort should be made to preserve Canada's percentage of French-speaking citizens, a goal our immigration policy can help reach. That principle was indeed formerly recognized in the report of the joint committee of Parliament on immigration policy of which I was a member. The committee suggested in its recommendations which were almost totally enacted into laws that the French fact is an essential element in the cultural and political life of Canada. That is in section 175 of the report.

The same point was made again in a recent statement by the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) on the program Question Period when he emphasized the importance of preserving the bilingual nature of our country and pointed out that the only advertising which was allowed by his department abroad was in French-speaking countries.

However, such efforts cannot do miracles as it is clear that there will not be more French immigrants than those who will decide to come to our country. Besides the same selection criteria apply to French-speaking applicants as others, as otherwise it would be unfair for those from other countries as well as for French-speaking applicants as it is not in the interest of a potential immigrant to let him come here if he does not qualify and does not have much chance of being happy among us.

Consultation and cooperation with the provinces will now be statutory with the new bill, for instance to set the annual immigration level throughout the country in order to reduce the present trend whereby more than half of the newcomers settle in the metropolitan areas of Montreal, Toronto and Vancouver. When the immigrant settles down and becomes integrated in Canadian society he needs services often offered by provinces, which gives the latter a participating role recognized by the constitution.

Also, the federal government subsidizes several provincial activities particularly those of COFI. Some people have asked, probably without much thought, that provinces be given final control over the movements of immigrants. Several constitutional and practical reasons are against such a policy particularly the fact that we could not forbid the movement from a province to another. We might say that the new legislation wrongfully stipulates that some immigrants will have to agree to live for six months in some remote areas. But, as the Minister of Manpower and Immigration pointed out, we forget that otherwise those people would not be able to come to Canada because of an insufficient number of points. So it is for them a marvellous opportunity, to quote the minister, and once here they will have to live in such or such place for a short period of six months at most. But this does not mean thay they will not be allowed to move, to travel as do thousands of Canadians who, for instance, go to work for the season at James Bay, in the Arctic or some other remote areas.

Mr. Speaker, the new legislation also mentions annual immigration levels. Once more, to those who wanted to speak of quotas, the minister explained that this last term had an American connotation that could make some people think that we practice discrimination by setting quotas for various countries. The levels will have an international connotation and will not impose a ceiling for one country or another and the annual goal mentioned by the minister, after consultation with the provinces, I repeat, will not prevent the coming of an additional number of unexpected immigrants of the family class or refugees in special circumstances. The new legislation is then more modern, more flexible, more humanitarian especially as it eliminates some restrictions that have become obsolete and unfair, such as the provisions concerning epileptics.

Unlike in the past, Canadians will now know in advance how many immigrants will be admitted during the following year. Some have claimed that this would prevent the entry of some 250,000 immigrants, maybe more, in the course of a year. On the contrary, if certain expert predictions materialize in a few years and Canada has a labour shortage justifying the entry of such a great number of foreigners, this new law will make it possible.

But in the meantime the government and all Canadians, who as citizens of this country have first and foremost the right to be considered and protected, agree that it is now desirable to limit immigration to our country, particularly for economic reasons. We do not wish to blame immigrants for our unemployment problem, for they become an integral part of our economy and investigations show that they are an asset for our country. On the other hand, if a numerous population is all it takes to make a country very prosperous, countries like India, Pakistan and a great many others would have proven it long ago.

Canada must therefore accept as many immigrants as possible for economic and demographic reasons. Even if we were to accept as many as two million immigrants at a time from some of the most heavily populated countries in the world, we would not relieve in the least, not even for an instant, the problems of that country. But contrast this with all the problems pertaining to work, education, housing and language that would arise from the entry into Canada of these two million immigrants. Nonetheless that is what the few but vociferous protagonists of a control free immigration clamor for inconsiderately, saying that immigration is a universal right whereas it is in effect a privilege extended to a stranger. Indeed no country in the world authorizes strangers to cross its borders under conditions which are often as strict going in or coming out.

In fact Canada's policy is more generous than that of any other country in the world with regards to ordinary immigrants as well as refugees especially nowadays when the rare so-called immigration countries become more and more particular in the choice of their new citizens. With the passing of this new bill, assistance to refugees, under the terms of the Geneva convention, becomes statutory in Canada. Indeed Canada has a well established tradition in this area with its admission of post-war refugees. Then, there were Hungarians, Czechs, Tibetans, and Ugandans. More recently, there were the Vietnamese. In passing, I would like to note that of the 6,531 Vietnamese refugees admitted to Canada before September 30 last year, 5,107 or more than 78 per cent settled in Quebec, mostly because many of them speak French.

Canada also has an assistance program for Chilean refugees for which the target has recently been increased from 5,000 to 6,000 and under which more than 5,200 Chileans have been admitted to Canada, including the members of 100 families of political refugees freed from Chilean prisons under a special pilot program. Canada has already received more Chilean refugees than all Eastern European countries together. Besides these refugee programs, Canada has decided in the last few years to help the population of certain countries in which there have been civil wars, like Cyprus and Lebanon. In this last case, especially through the establishment of a special reception centre in Limassol, on the island of Cyprus, Canada has already admitted in 1976 alone through a special program of assistance and family reunification some 6,000 Lebanese most of whom will settle down or have already settled down in Quebec.

Mr. Speaker, this generous action was taken not only by the Canadian government, but also by the Canadian people who have received these suffering people with sympathy as well as generosity. This has helped demonstrate the importance and the various aspects of a humane and realistic immigration, such as the new legislation will enable us to ensure.

Had I enough time I could still refer to three formulas which are to be substituted for the removal, formerly called the deportation of the undesirable, but with some differences so as not to stigmatize some minor cases, namely the deportation order, the exclusion order and the departure. The bill under consideration is also aimed at improving control over foreign workers, including their protection, especially when they become illegal immigrants and run the risk of being exploited by unscrupulous employers who will henceforth have to account for their abuses. I could refer to a more humane formula for the reunification of families since the matter of age is no longer taken in consideration or still to some improved mechanisms of appeal, especially the appointment of an adjudicator.

In short, Mr. Speaker, this bill is so logical, simple and reasonable that it has received a wide support in the country, except from a few extremists for whom there would be no acceptable solution but their own. It is a legislation worthy of a country such as ours, open to the modern world by its liberality and its realism.

Mr. Jacques Lavoie (Hochelaga): Mr. Speaker, I am very happy to have the opportunity to speak in this debate tonight, particularly after the speech of the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Portelance). I am all the more happy since he is present.

I shall try in my speech, as I usually do, to be at the same time objective and constructive. However, I shall obviously have some criticisms to direct, perhaps to the government, perhaps to the department, with regard to some items dealing with immigration. But before I come to that I want to mention that I favour a healthy immigration. Canada has space and resources and we need people to develop those, without taking the place of Canadians. On the contrary, we must develop those resources for the profit of Canadians and increase the population of our country. Let us not forget that future immigrants as well as their children will become new Canadians. That makes no problem.

We must also include in that regard, that is the development of our country, the emphasis on certain trades. There is nothing in this legislation to amend the present situation. Let me give you an example: a foreign physician who wants to practice in Canada and come as an immigrant must of course undergo a series of tests, which is perfectly normal, but I believe that after coming to Canada, he has to spend at least a full year in a hospital. But we all know that, since health insurance is in force in the province of Quebec, among other provinces—but since I represent a Quebec constituency, it is normal that I should give that province as an example—most of the doctors available for house calls are precisely, immigrants. I think the department should at least consider that kind of thing. It should not necessarily be in the act, but the regulations might make provision for such cases.

The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration referred to humanitarian cases. I fully agree with him, because I had some experience of such cases in my constituency. Before discussing a number of points, I should like to suggest to the government that it might be a good idea to revive a former program known as "My Country" and implement it every two years. It might prove useful to immigrants who came to Canada as visitors or temporary workers and who decided suddenly, since they were misinformed in their country of origin, that they would like to remain in Canada, because it is an open and democratic country where people can freely express themselves, say what they think without being necessarily put in jail.

I think that under these circumstances we should take this into account and not feel compelled to remove these people, especially when they are as respectable as some of those we have met. Officials are invested with a great many discretionary powers. I am not saying all these officials are not doing a good job, far from it, but I feel it is dangerous to give to much power to the officials responsible for the administration of the act, for they may be tempted to take advantage of their position, as has happened in a number of cases. I can say that the Immigration Act unfortunately discriminates between the legitimate child and the natural child, and that is why, when we dealt with the Interpretation Act last December, I moved that the word "child" be substituted, so that all children might be considered equal.

If I go over all these things, it is because there was at the immigration office a woman from Haiti who had submitted an application in her native country to come and live in Canada with her parents as a landed immigrant. Leter on, I discovered that she had been granted only a student permit because she was an illegitimate child. So this is a defect which has to be corrected, because when her visa will expire this young woman will have to go back to her home country according to the law and then come back here, and our country will have to pay to get her over there while she will have to pay to come back here. I think there should be a little more flexibility when dealing with people in a humanitarian way.

In my opinion, the department should offer more protection to immigrants here in Canada. I have seen evidence, which I still have in my possession, of abuses with regard to new immigrants coming in our country; they went to some lawyers in Montreal and were charged more than $300 only to have some immigration forms filled. That is exploitation! I think there might be some relevant legislation to punish those people who are exploiting immigrants. It seems to me that the department itself should initiate proceedings against those people who prey upon immigrants freshly arrived in our country and who, because they do not have yet any knowledge of our laws, trust nearly anyone and are pitifully swindled.

I am also thinking about a Portuguese woman who married a Canadian citizen. She was deported all the same. I understand that she may have got married soon before her deportation, but in any event, I think the young lady acted in good faith. She spoke French fluently and was living in the province of Quebec. In my opinion, such expenses should be avoided when prospective citizens are desirable. Why not keep them here, why treat them as if they were objects or animals? What nonsense!

There is another case that I should like to report, a humanitarian case to which I already referred in the House by the way, namely that of the Valdez family. Mr. Speaker, I will not be nasty towards the parliamentary secretary, but I might be towards the department itself. As regards the Valdez family, after making numerous representations to the department and to the parliamentary secretary, I understand that the government said: Listen, our official has decided such and such a thing and the matter went before the appeal court.

But when I read, for instance, a letter from the departmental assistant who in closing says, and here I quote: I am sorry that I have to send you such sad news—speaking of deportation—but it seems to me it would be cowardly to let that family believe there is a happy solution when none has ever existed. If it never existed, why then did the department let them appeal the decision? That is the question I ask myself. There again I feel there is a contradiction. Today, whether you want to believe it or not, because of the department the Valdez family lives in utter poverty in London. That woman is now sick. Naturally we are trying to get the children over here whose studies have already been paid for, but the fact remains that the mother will stay in London with the baby and the rest of the family, while the father has flown the coop. This is what we have done. We have put a family, a woman and her children in such a situation. Why? Not because the act was completely inadequate, but because we forgot to consider the humanitarian side of the problem, in spite of my representations. We simply bowed to the decision of the official who had the future of these people in his hands and we left it at that. Of course, I hope that the new act will be more flexible in such cases in the future.

I also hope that the department will finally become more responsible in immigration matters. I have another suggestion to make to the parliamentary secretary, which he might convey to the minister: Why not abolish this type of appeal procedure which is quite ineffective and replace it, for example, by something more worthwhile, such as a kind of ombudsman, a type of mechanism which may be much more equitable and less expensive for the State.

I could keep on for a long time, Mr. Speaker, but since I have to attend an important committee which will sit in camera, I shall only deal with a few more points. I am goin to discuss the matter of provincial responsibility. The provinces are to be more fully consulted, so they say. This is not good enough, in my opinion. In any case, I will have the opportunity to move an amendment to the legislation so that the provinces will be given more decision-making powers with regard to the acceptance of immigrants on their territory.

When I consider the province of Quebec, its culture and its language, I think it should have more say in the matter. The same applies to the other provinces, of course, but since the Francophone majority is in Quebec, I feel it is normal that we should be asking for a greater participation on the part of that province.

[Mr. Lavoie.]

In the departmental statistics for 1976, I believe, I find the list of countries from which immigrants come to Canada, the percentage of Francophones compared to other ethnic groups which speak more English than French. Mind you, I do not want to discriminate in any way, but I wish nevertheless to deal with the preservation of the Quebec culture. I think that if we examine the whole matter we realize that there are many more people speaking foreign languages than French-speaking people who come to Canada. Of course I believe that the immigrant selection is also determined by demographic, economic and social criteria. But as I indicated, for Quebec there is also the question of language and culture.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I would like to make one last suggestion to the government. Many times, we say: What does the federal government do for an immigrant? When coming here he does get a few things but it seems that when leaving his country of origin, all he is given is an ice cream cone with a nice cherry on top of it. On his way to Canada he eats the cherry and when he lands here there is no more ice cream. Why? Because he is not provided with the right information.

I think the government should print booklets in the various languages of countries where we seek immigrants; then the immigrant would know that in Quebec, for instance, French is spoken but that English is spoken as well. One works in French, but one can also work in English. In Quebec, he would get some social, economic and cultural benefits. In another province too. It seems to me that if all those details were given for each province and if the immigrant had the opportunity to read them before leaving his country he could choose between Ontario, Alberta, Quebec, and so on. It would then be possible, it seems, to prevent all those language problems we have in Quebec, what with legislation such as Bills 63, 22 and what next, I do not know.

It seems to me that if the individual who wants to settle in Quebec has previous knowledge of this, he will learn French because he will want to integrate into the French culture, he will want to live with Francophones. So it seems to me this would be the best. Anyway, this would at least provide adequate information, and whenever someone came to apply at an embassy or immigration office abroad, he would be given that booklet and when he came here he would know where he stands, he would know his rights. This might indeed avoid cases where immigrants are being exploited, a real agony for which there is not much help forthcoming.

Mr. Speaker, I still have a lot to say, but I will have an opportunity to speak on this in committee or at the third reading stage. To conclude, I hope that these suggestions will be considered.

● (2100)

Mr. Armand Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, I would like first to indicate that I was pleased to hear the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Portelance), and also the hon. member for Hochelaga (Mr. Lavoie). The parliamentary secretary suggested that certainly work could be found for some immigrants in James Bay or other remote locations. I would like to take this opportunity to suggest that before bringing immigrants in James Bay, the parliamentary secretary should try and find jobs for people in northwest Quebec who have been—

Mr. Portelance: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. The hon. parliamentary secretary on a point of order.

Mr. Portelance: Mr. Speaker, I have never said that we should bring in immigrants to work on the James Bay project. When I say that some Canadians are sent over to work on the James Bay, and when we criticize—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. This is strictly a matter of debate. The hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette).

Mr. Caouette: I apologize to the parliamentary secretary if I have misinterpreted his words, and I would indeed like that these people be able to work in frontier areas like the James Bay. But first we should find employment for our people who for many years have been seeking jobs on the James Bay project but to no avail. But at least, Mr. Speaker, like all members of the House, I am aware of the importance, of the immigration issue for the future of our country.

Depending on whether our immigration policy will be restrictive or liberal—and I smile because I do not want to talk about the Liberal Party—Canada in the year 2000 will probably be completely different from what we know today. We might find ourselves in an over-populated country in which people of different ethnic and cultural origins will continuously be tearing one another to pieces. On the other hand, we could succeed in creating a country in which everybody can live a decent life without being piled up on one another and in the mutual respect of various cultural groups.

All this will depend, Mr. Speaker, upon the immigration policy which Canada is developing right now. Without trying to dramatize the situation, Mr. Speaker, I believe that of all the bills which are presently before the House, Bill C-24 is by far the most important and most dangerous for our country's future. I for one do not feel out of line when I make these statements.

The many briefs which were submitted to us from every area of this country and from all organized groups which are concerned by this issue clearly show that Canadians, from British Columbia to Newfoundland, know that the future of this country depends upon the policy which we will follow regarding immigration.

Mr. Speaker, among the papers I received at my office on Bill C-24, one was taken up and endorsed by more than 25 organizations which even held press conferences to denounce this bill which they said was misleading, restrictive, repressive, discriminatory and unworthy of our society that claims to be developed, liberal and humanitarian.

Mr. Speaker, the least that can be said is that the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) failed to sell those organizations his bill. That situation is even funnier if one bothers to compare what the minister said of his bill before law students with the statement I quoted earlier, and I quote:

> For the first time, the bill clearly sets out the basic objectives of immigration, and for the first time it entrenches in legislation the principles of non-discrimination, of respect for the family and concern for refugees on humanitarian grounds.

As one can see, Mr. Speaker, there is somewhat of a disagreement between the minister and the signers of the statement I mentioned earlier. The minister says that the legislation entrenches the principle of non-discrimination; the organizations, for their part, were suggesting that the legislation was discriminatory. The minister says that the legislation includes the government's humanitarian concern; those same organizations to which I referred earlier say that the legislation is unworthy of a society that claims to be humanitarian.

Mr. Speaker, I point out that gap between those two interpretations to show how it is possible to come to contradictory conclusions on the same bill; it all depends, of course, on the point of view from which that same bill is examined. So the minister says he is very proud of eliminating certain provisions of the old act forbidding entry in this country to certain groups of individuals such as homosexuals and alcoholics. The minister is pleased with the fact that the legislation eliminates mentions of what was termed to be "moral turpitude" and resulted in the deportation of certain people.

Does that mean, Mr. Speaker, that the conduct of people who apply for admission to Canada should not be considered any more? Does that mean that as far as this government is concerned, the most vicious persons should be welcome as much as those who show respect for the rights of others as well as their own and abide by the basic rules of decency and good manners?

That is why I think moral turpitude is a criterion we should use to turn down, after investigation, undesirable applicants who could not make any worthwhile contribution to the development of this country.

Maybe it is because this government's moral standards are not high enough that it expects so much from prospective immigrants, but I cannot help wondering. As for the document I mentioned earlier, which is sponsored by more than 25 agencies, I had to admit after reading it, that it would be possible to have a government worse than the one we have at present.

Mr. Speaker, if the principles and suggestions proposed by such organizations as the Labour Council of Montreal, the Service de la Pastorale et d'échanges spiritains, the Office for Chilean political prisoners and several other organizations which support this bill, if the principles advocated by those groups were followed Canada would have no more control over its immigration and I think it would be a real mess.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to avoid any misunderstanding. I am not enthusiastic about the bill proposed by the Minister of Manpower and Immigration and I have the opportunity for a few moments to make specific comments on some provisions of that bill. However, I should like to underline the responsibility shown by some organizations that I mentioned earlier. A logical and rational immigration policy should, of course, be in the interest of the public, this is in the interest of all Canadians. If that priority is not respected and if our immigration policy is contrary to the needs of the majority of Canadians, it is anti-democratic, as obviously, Canadians want legislation to protect them and their social and economic interests.

The organizations that I mentioned earlier—including CUSO, an agency largely financed by Canadian taxpayers—suggest that anybody be accepted as an immigrant at any time. In their brief they say that the government's bill is and I quote:

Restrictive because its purpose at every level is to limit very strictly the number and type of immigrants according to our economic needs.

What is wrong, Mr. Speaker, in restricting the number of immigrants according to our economic needs? No country, no nation can survive if it deliberately bungles its economic stability by opening its door to everyone. It is absolutely essential to take into account the economic potential of a country to determine an immigration policy. We must know if we can offer to those immigrants suitable jobs and a decent living. If it is not possible because of lack of employment or because the country has trouble giving its own citizens a decent way of living, it would be irresponsible and criminal to open our doors to immigrants and make the problem even worse.

Yet, Mr. Speaker, this is exactly what the signers of this document are demanding. I feel it would be cruel to open our doors to people who could not be hired and to whom we could not guarantee an acceptable standard of living. We would be showing contempt if we let them come in Canada but could not assure them a decent life.

Further, the same document states that the bill is discriminatory as follows:

It is discriminatory both in its point system which systematically favours immigrants from developed countries over those from the Third World, the educated people over those who are less educated, etc., and in the introduction of the notion of conditional immigrants (who can immigrate provided they accept to live in remote areas or fill second-rate jobs unwanted by Canadians).

Once again, Mr. Speaker, I cannot get over the irresponsibility of these people and groups. They criticize the bill for taking the vocational training of immigrants into account. But is that not the most basic rationale? We live in an industrialized country where jobs require increasingly greater skills. It is only normal that Canada should seek immigrants who can adjust to our society and play an active role in it. There are more than one million unemployed in our country. I believe that is more than enough. If we allow unskilled or uneducated people to settle in Canada, we doom them to unemployment and poverty. It would be cruel to allow them to settle in Canada and to cast them aside later on because of a shortage of job opportunities or their lack of training. Just as it would be logical to accept certain immigrants on the condition that they settle in frontier areas where certain jobs are easier to find. This would prevent a concentration in the major urban centres of welfare recipients and unemployed.

It is absolutely essential, Mr. Speaker, that our immigration policy take into account the social and economical facts of our country. Those who claim the opposite are either irresponsible or foreigners afraid that they will not meet the standards set by the government.

I should like to point out, Mr. Speaker, that of the various organizations which have signed the document in question, more than half represent foreigners, Chileans, Argentines, Haitians, Iranians and so forth. It is easy to understand that these people would like to settle in Canada and become Canadian citizens. We live in a remarkable and tremendously rich country, with one of the highest living standards in the world. It is therefore understandable why so many people would like to share in this prosperity and in the promising future of Canada.

But, it must be kept in mind, Mr. Speaker, that our country could not maintain such a high standard of living if it threw its doors wide open to welfare recipients the world over. Our million unemployed represent a heavy enough burden for the Canadian taxpayers. Our duty and responsibility as legislators is above all to solve this problem. Having done so, we could welcome the immigrants who wish to settle in Canada and are able to provide the Canadian people with the required services and skills.

Mr. Speaker, I feel that the foreigners who signed the document I mentioned a while ago are meddling with the internal affairs of Canada. We certainly can do without foreigners dictating to us what our immigration policy should be. On the other hand, we must realize that Canada would do potential immigrants a great disservice if it welcomed them with open arms, and then condemned them to poverty and unemployment, for lack of proper jobs for them to do.

Mr. Speaker, I feel that the only way to set up immigration policies which take into account the interests of all parties concerned is simply to base them on the social and economic circumstances of the country, and to choose among prospective immigrants on the basis of these social and economic circumstances. Mr. Speaker, I am not referring here to the special cases where Canada has accepted political refugees. In some specific cases, the conditions must include humanitarian grounds.

With respect to the charges of discrimination laid by the groups I mentioned earlier, I find that kind of verbal exaggeration another sign of irresponsibility on the part of their authors. To choose among prospective immigrants those with the best occupational training is no more discriminatory than to put heavier taxes on the rich, or to hire the most qualified candidate for a job. Is the employer who hires the best man among the applicants being discriminatory? I, for one, do not believe that.

In any case, Mr. Speaker, I want to invite the minister not to take into consideration those who, like the groups I talked about a moment ago, bring forward policies which are against the most fundamental interests of Canadians. It is clear that the bill introduced by the minister is not perfect. More specifically, I see two possible changes that could be made. First, it would be desirable that the text of the legislation establish different sets of criteria for refugees and ordinary immigrants.

Clearly, as I said a while ago, the case of political refugees should be studied with more broadmindedness than ordinary applications. It therefore seems logical and desirable to me that the bill should set up a list of criteria for the eligibility for refugees that is different from that which applies to ordinary requests.

Still with regard to refugees, Mr. Speaker, I feel it might be well to set up a special committee to hear the people who request political refugee status. A committee could perhaps be set up along the lines of the arbitration boards in the field of unemployment insurance. It might be more equitable, at least with regard to natural rights, for people who want to be recognized as refugees to be heard by a body that is independent of the department, a bit as I said a minute ago comparable to the boards of arbitration and the umpires who are independent of the Unemployment Insurance Commission. Those then, Mr. Speaker, are the few suggestions I want to make to the minister with a view to improving Bill C-24.

I trust I shall have the opportunity of coming back to this matter at the next stage in the debate. In closing, Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the minister not to allow himself be influenced too much by the minority which is trying, by shouting louder than everyone else, to get an immigration policy that is contrary to the fundamental interests of the vast majority of Canadians.

[English]

Hon. Stanley Haidasz (Parkdale): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity of speaking on the second reading of this debate on Bill C-24, the new Immigration Act for Canada. I do this not only because of the great interest displayed in immigration policy by hon. members on both sides of the House but by many Canadians, especially Canadians in the constituency of Parkdale which I represent in the House of Commons.

Canada today has a population of some 23 million, and I believe it is very pertinent in debate on this bill to recall that more than ten million immigrants have come to Canada since Confederation. This is why we often hear hon. members and others, along with ministers in charge of immigration, state that Canada is a land of immigrants and that at least 50 per cent of Canadians are either immigrants or descendants of immigrants who have come to Canada since 1867. Many of these immigrants have achieved prominent positions and rendered great service to the development of this country over the last 109 years. In fact one of the members who sat in the House of Commons in 1867 was an immigrant from Poland. He represented the constituency of Saint-Hyacinthe in the province of Quebec and his name was Edward Kierzkowski. He came here after the defeat of the uprising of the Poles in 1830.

I welcome, as all hon. members did in speeches before me, the provisions in the bill which mainly have to do with removing iniquities in the present law and those which establish a modern and flexible framework for the future development of immigration policy, along with other items which will help the government to achieve its economic, social and demographic goals.

My intervention this evening has to do with the treatment of refugees. I should like especially to deal with the question of refugees from eastern European countries. This is a subject of great importance to constituencies where there are citizens who wish to bring to Canada relatives and friends who have difficulty in emigrating from their countries of origin, in particular from the countries of eastern Europe. I think to set this problem in perspective we should recall that after the second world war Canada accepted almost 100,000 refugees from all over the world, mostly between the years 1949 to 1953.

A great amount of interest was generated in 1951 when the United Nations Convention on Refugees was passed. It is of interest to note that Canada became a signatory to that convention only in 1969, and from then on complied in practice with both the exact letter and spirit of the United Nations Convention on Refugees. Since that time Canada has had an enviable record of helping people who have come to this country seeking the status of refugee, or seeking political asylum because of the threat of persecution or other forms of oppression which existed in their homelands.

When I speak of the enviable record of Canada in the matter of refugees, it must also be put on record that in 1957 Canada accepted 38,000 Hungarian refugees after the uprising in that country, followed by 12,000 Czech and Slovak refugees when the U.S.S.R. invaded Czechoslovakia in 1968. Since that time there was also the arrival of 228 Tibetan refugees in 1970, 4,420 Asians from Uganda in 1972, approximately 4,000 refugees from Chile in 1973, 1,000 refugees from Viet Nam in 1975, and 1,000 Lebanese refugees in 1976.

However, there are people who, as I mentioned, come from the countries of eastern Europe seeking the status of refugee after having arrived on Canadian soil. Up to the year 1969 the treatment of these people was what I would call very fair. However, since that time, and especially since the year 1974, the policy on refugees from eastern Europe has been tightened, and in 1974, of 345 east European applicants to Canada, only 30 were accepted, which means a rejection rate of over 90 per cent. In 1975, of 550 refugee applicants about 80 were accepted, which is a rejection rate of 85 per cent approximately. In 1976 we estimate that the rejection rate in this category will come to about 90 per cent. It is very frustrating, not only for these people, but also for their sponsors and for members of parliament who try to act as ombudsmen to help these people remain in Canada, when the interdepartmental advisory committee on the status of refugees in Canada is rejecting between 80 and 90 per cent of the applicants from east European countries.

In view of this evident hardship, Mr. Speaker, I hope the provision in the bill as well as the regulations, to which we are looking forward with great expectation, in fact with a lot of impatience, will help ease the situation in which these people find themselves. As you know, Mr. Speaker, we do not have many immigration consular staff in the countries of eastern Europe and the only way for them to emigrate to Canada, in many cases, is to come here, see the country, and try to make their decision to remain in Canada while on Canadian soil. As all hon. members know since November, 1972, it has been almost impossible to make application for landed immigrant status in Canada while here on a visitor's visa. So I hope that the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) will take into consideration this category of refugee consisting of people seeking a better life in Canada who have close relatives in Canada, relatives who very often are disappointed at the way their sponsored applicants are being treated under the present strict regulations.

I appeal to the minister on humanitarian and compassionate grounds to review these cases now, with the objective of showing that Canada really does care about these people who, through no fault of their own, find themselves in a web of various difficulties. These people and their relatives fought against Nazi tyranny and alongside the Allied armies during World War II, and it is none of their fault that they find themselves today on the other side of the Iron Curtain.

Another point I want to raise during this debate has to do with the report of Judge Claire L'Heureux-Dubé, who was appointed special commissioner to conduct an inquiry into certain problems in the Department of Manpower and Immigration. In January, 1976, the commissioner submitted a report outlining just a few flagrant shortcomings and recommending ways in which the minister should, on an urgent basis, put some order into the application of regulations and practices current in the department. The commissioner, among other recommendations, urged improvements in the legal representation available to visitors in Canada and recommended the expansion of legal aid plans, as well as the establishment of a system of control over those who are representing persons dealing with the immigration department in order to ensure a standard of competence and ethics.

Unfortunately, many of these visitors are directed to high-price lawyers and to so-called immigration counsellors who charge exorbitant fees and promise to help, but very often fail to help these poor immigrants or these poor visitors seeking landed immigrant status in Canada. I do not know what the minister is doing to curb the unethical practices that are still being conducted in Canada, especially in the large urban centres. No wonder there are so many complaints about the department, and so many people in this category of visitors in Canada who seem to go into hiding because of the fear of what can happen to them, not to mention the amount of money they have lost in trying to obtain landed immigrant status.

I want to conclude these remarks by saying that I welcome the provisions of the bill, and I congratulate the minister and the previous minister for making such a tremendous effort in coming up with Bill C-24, a modern immigration act which, I hope, will serve the best interests of Canada. I hope that the members of the commitee on immigration which will study this bill will take into consideration the remarks that were made by hon. members, as well as the briefs, that were presented to them during the study by the committee on immigration which travelled across Canada and heard representations on the so called green paper. I also invite the various ethnic groups which have a deep interest and concern about Canada's immigration policy to come forward with briefs and representations to the committee so that in the end we will have the best possible immigration act for Canada.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I certainly welcome the opportunity to speak at this stage of this bill. The subject of immigration has been one with which I have had a great deal to do as an individual member, and I am sure that my letters, some of them somewhat caustic, some of them downright rude, and some of them written on fine grades of asbestos because they were so hostile, are well known to various departmental officials in the Department of Immigration.

I have not been at all reluctant to express my ideas and disapproval of the way in which some of the regulations have been interpreted, and of the existence of other regulations. What I feel now is a sort of manic fascination in that department with the requirements of manpower. People have become ciphers, they are pushed about as so many statistics, and they can be brought to this country in much the same way as we import live cattle, in numbers set by quotas year by year. I do not like that. I do not like the philosophy that immigration, which affects human beings, family relationships, and the aspirations of individuals, should be treated as though it were just an importation of another skill.

I have had a great deal to say about what I consider the wrong philosophy with the points system, that it was a cream skimming operation of populations in other countries. No wonder our immigration offices in many instances were not welcome in these countries because our points system was a clear indication to other countries—particularly in latter years to Third World countries—that "we will take your skilled and most intelligent people", but those others from all walks of life, even though their chief asset was a desire to work and an ability to work, were not wanted because somebody said, "Oh yes, but they had only grade four or they had only four or six years of education" so that did not qualify them to come to Canada. It seems that our standards should be somewhere around nine to 11 years of education.

Let it be said that in many European countries six years of education is fully equal to nine years of education at some schools in this country, and this applies to preparation in trades also. The application of the points system, as it has been applied until now and is likely to continue, is a negative reflection on every immigrant who has come to this country since World War II until 1967, because those immigrants did not come under a points system but were admitted for many other different reasons. They were not graded. They were given what I felt was an arbitrary assessment by an immigration officer whose decision could not be appealed.

I remember looking at the files and questioning the ratings, but after we managed to upset some of the ratings, the files were closed off. Why? Because decisions were being questioned. That is something that must stop in the Department of Immigration. There has been far too much refusal to disclose proper information, even to the individual concerned. I realize that there are limitations with regard to security, but it used to be carried out. How? To ridiculous lengths. My colleague, the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin), has been strongly advocating open government. Those are things that must come out if an individual is to be refused admission. If he suffers from some malady or some infirmity and we do not want to include him among the people coming to this country, we must tell him so. But merely to say that this individual does not meet our standards is an insult to that person. That is why I say that this bill cannot be accepted in principle because it is only the tip of the iceberg.

Clause 3 is merely for cosmetic purposes. The real guts or workings of an immigration program are the regulations, but the regulations will not be published until the bill has been passed carte blanche at third reading, and then we will be told afterwards, as we are already told all too often, that parliament approved these regulations and that the administration of this immigration legislation is merely carrying out the will of parliament. That is eyewash; it is false and misleading to say that, because the regulations will have never been the subject of study and approval by parliament. The interpretation of the regulations will not be the subject of parliamentary scrutiny. From time to time, as certain types of decisions are called into question, there is a shift to close the door.

I am being very critical tonight, but in saying what I have said I do not mean to attack immigration officers personally because over the years I have received great co-operation from, I would say, all of them. Granted, my views have differed very strongly with theirs, but that is not unknown. I have been known to differ very loudly and emphatically, but I think not more than I have with the concept of our regulations and with the administration of our immigration.

There are many things we want to talk about, but all too often we hear that immigration should be tightened up. From time to time we hear the cry: "Tighten up on immigration; send them back." People who say that are despicable economic rednecks. One sometimes might wish that abortion could be made retroactive, and that deportation or non-admission could also be made retroactive. Some people who came to this country as immigrants only a few years ago tell me that we should tighten up on immigration, and that reminds me of what I call the lifeboat society. That is a polite term. The philosophy is, "Shove off, boys, I am all right, I am aboard". That in itself should not motivate immigration restrictions.

There are some immigrants who are members of this House, and some who are sons and daughters of immigrants. These people possessed a degree of desire, a desire which most immigrants have, because it takes a great deal of gumption—and I am not talking about refugees now—and motivation, to leave one's homeland and family to strike out for a land which is much different, to form new friendships, to struggle, but to get there.

I am sure hon. members have all known families which came to this country in years past. All they had was what they could carry, and beyond that it was what I call that most admirable quality which we should have in Canada, the willingness and the ability to spit on our hands, to find a job and to get on with it. The job need not necessarily be the one a person is cut out for. Immigrants do not displace anybody. In most cases they fill a void.

I do not care a whit for the cluck-clucking which goes on about these people having to take jobs at lower levels. Floors have to be swept and vegetables have to be cleaned. These are all jobs which have to be done, and why should we look down on a man who is prepared to do these jobs? Do we look down on university students who are prepared to take those same jobs on a part-time basis? No, we admire them because their objective is to earn money to help them get to where they are going, and to improve themselves.

There are thousands upon thousands of families in Edmonton and in many other parts of the country which have been prepared to work hard in order to improve themselves, and their children succeed at university.

An hon. Member: Ten o'clock.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): These people become our leading citizens. Mr. Speaker, may I call it ten o'clock, without the assistance of others?

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

FINANCE—ACCURACY OF STATISTICS ON PAYMENTS TO QUEBEC—REQUEST FOR STATISTICS ON PAYMENTS TO OTHER PROVINCES

Mr. F. A. Philbrook (Halton): Mr. Speaker, in a country like Canada, which is characterized by regionalism geographically and a federal system politically, we seem to have evolved the relationship of have and have-not provinces, or to put it more bluntly, who is getting what out of Confederation. This issue tends to become emotional sometimes, but certainly events like the Quebec election focus on the issue of federalism vs. separatism more acutely and included in this problem is the business of federal-provincial balance of payments.

Maclean's magazine, which I personally consider a Canadian asset, recently published an article which made the statement that Quebec made $3 billion in profit out of Confederation in 1976.

On March 3 I asked a question of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) regarding this article. The question is reported at page 3606 of Hansard. I specifically questioned the accuracy of this figure, whether any government statistics were available on the subject and whether such statistics were available from other provinces, out of fairness to our sister province of Quebec. The minister's answer was essentially that there were serious statistical problems in this area, especially when trying to compare ont province with another. The minister was personally against the balance sheet approach to national unity. I agree wholeheartedly with that.

There are two issues then: first, the feasibility of statistics; second, the relevance of the balance sheet approach, in other words, who is getting what from Confederation? For weeks in my office we worked on the matter of feasibility, without much success. It is a difficult subject. For example, if one talks about total transfers, not net flow, one notes the following discrepancies: Maclean's quotes the figure of $4.7 billion; the tri-level task force on public finance, $1.9 billion; and Treasury Board, in its annual blue book "How Your Tax Dollar is Spent", $2.2 billion.

A basic difficulty is this: where there is statistical doubt, the result is very different analyses. I am thinking, for example, of the value of federal employee pay rolls and, second, of the division of national debt as among the provinces. An examination of these figures leads, obviously, to some disagreement of the meaning and relevance of this entire question and begs for thorough study. Since others have already raised this question and broken the ice, the possibility of misunderstanding exists.

Referring to the matter of relevance and comparability, no matter whether comparisons are difficult or easy, it is important to make them once the subject has been raised. We should consider the special aspect of trade and investment in the private sector. This, even if not precise now, becomes even more important with the prospect of separation. There are presumptions in all economic analyses. As I mentioned before, this is similar to the question of public sector practice with regard to pay rolls and national debt.

The issue on the one hand is separatism versus the economic well-being of all Canadians and, on the other, conflict between the provinces. There is also the situation of the Maritime provinces to consider, not just of Quebec.

I think we are all against the balance sheet approach, the approach which says don't rock the boat with the "have" provinces, for example Ontario, Alberta and British Columbia. Some suggest that these provinces might be upset when they know how much money they pay to poorer provinces. But others will learn of this, the media, bigots and so on. We know this now. The important thing is to clear the air, to understand our country better, and to expose narrow regionalism for what it is.

[Mr. Philbrook.]

Mr. Bob Kaplan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, having heard the excellent, commendable statement made by the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Philbrook), I say there is not much of a question to answer. But I want to use the three minutes which are traditionally available to agree with him enthusiastically, to agree with his statement about the relevance of the balance sheet approach to Confederation. I remind the House of the Prime Minister's (Mr. Trudeau's) statement on the subject.

Mr. Paproski: What is this, an election speech?

Mr. Kaplan: He said as long ago as October 6, 1970:

> I do not believe that anyone can accurately measure in dollars and cents the benefits involved in belonging to a United Canada.

There are great difficulties in any attempt to unravel the complicated financial transactions in the public and private sectors which, together, make up the fabric of the Canadian economy. Mr. Ian Urquhart is the author of the article to which my colleague referred. He must have obtained much of his data on federal expenditures and revenues in the province of Quebec from the Department of Finance. The information he was given is generally available to all Canadians who ask for it. There are many other figures on federal expenditures and revenues available, by province, from published sources, information on such topics as intergovernmental transfers and payments to persons, such as family allowances and old age pensions for example.

For most other items Mr. Urquhart must have used his own assumptions in order to allocate federal revenues and expenditures to the province of Quebec. This is a most difficult exercise and many people will try it, but the problems involved cannot be overemphasized. For example, how would one distribute defence expenditures among provinces? Should it be on the basis of where the Department of National Defence spends its money, or on the basis of who benefits from national defence? Money goes to communities in which there are defence establishments or defence production plants, but all Canadians benefit from this activity, although not necessarily equally.

Similar problems arise on the revenue side, problems of what are called the incidence of taxation. Who actually bears the taxes collected from a particular business? Are the taxes borne by the shareholders where they are, by the wage earners where they are, by consumers where they are, or by other levels of government? Therefore, it would be very difficult to comment on the accuracy of the study published by MacLean's magazine.

As I said earlier, some of his data are publicly available, but since he has not specified his methodology it would be difficult to comment on them. We can only note, as the author himself indicated, that the province of Quebec has produced its own studies with very different results regarding federal expenditures and revenues in Quebec. The fact that the province of Quebec produced different results only shows that the results of such studies depend very much on the methods and assumptions that are used.

I had to note also that similar difficulties would be encountered by making parallel analyses and observations about any of the provinces of our Confederation.

AGRICULTURE—PESTICIDES—GOVERNMENT POSITION ON IMPORTATION—SUGGESTED STRICT ADHERENCE TO LABELLING REGULATIONS

Mr. G. H. Whittaker (Okanagan Boundary): Mr. Speaker, on March 7 I questioned the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) with respect to his policy regarding the importation of pesticides and herbicides from the U.S.A. by Canadian farmers for their own use.

This capitulation to the multi-national companies at the expense of the Canadian farmer was disguised as an environmental safety precaution. Moreover, the monitoring system which would ostensibly protect the farmer and ultimately the consumer will be headed by a toothless, bureaucratic body. Under the past system, some farmers were effecting real savings by banding together and going south of the border for their purchases of agricultural chemicals. This in turn forced Canadian distributors of the American products to cut their prices.

Suddenly we find that regulations under the Pest Control Products Act have been amended to revoke an exemption previously given to the farmers. This is supposedly the result of an in-depth study that concluded that the "own use" exemption was inconsistent with the intent of the act to ensure safe and effective pesticides use in Canada. apparently safeguards on imports by a producer for his own use were weaker than those on Canadian registered products.

The minister claims that protection of a domestic industry was only a secondary consideration. The move gives every appearance though of being a canny manœuvre to impose an embargo on pesticides in favour of multi-nationals distributing their products in Canada through dealers.

Of Canada's 300,000 farmers, the minister claims that 2,000 will benefit from the monitoring system. From past experiences, I am skeptical. Studies, reports to the minister, negotiations with the companies, procrastination, will frustrate the farmer and increase his production costs, which can only be reflected in higher food costs to the consumer.

The minister admits that 99.6 per cent of prairie farmers already buy a Canadian produced and distributed product. Was the embargo called for by the remaining .4 per cent or by Ontario corn farmers? Not highly likely! The pesticide companies became acutely aware of the benefits accruing to farmers who imported their own chemicals. They were forced to lower their prices to offset inventory surpluses and to attract their customers back. They asked for action, and were of course satisfied. The minister cannot honestly believe, and expect us to believe, that the embargo will foster a truly domestic pesticide industry, one where the decisions will be made by Canadians, in the interests of Canada.

In a speech to the Ohio Pesticide Education Association, the minister admitted that almost all pesticides used in Canada originate outside the country. The Canadian industry then is mostly a distribution business, almost completely dependent on active ingredients produced in the U.S.

Does the minister have any evidence he would like to share that, under the present circumstances, new industries are going to proliferate in Canada? My suspicions are that this is just another way the govermment has allowed multi-national companies to gain more control over our country.

The farmers' practice of importing their chemical directly, at a lower cost, was deemed an inequity partly because farmers living farther from the border could not profit in the same way. I maintain that the real price inequity was created by the middlemen, the distributors of the chemicals in Canada. This embargo will leave pricing totally in their hands. The farmers will be at their mercy. The watchdog committee does not impress me as an instrument to protect us from the gouging I foresee.

If the minister were truly concerned about protecting domestic agriculture, why did he not select one segment already established, one which is clearly in need of help—the food processing industry, for example? This industry has long suffered at the hands of the government's agricultural policies. This has had widespread effects on the survival of many segments of agribusiness. But the minister insists on promoting a domestic pesticide industry.

The fruit and vegetable processing industry has no guarantee of assistance beyond the arrangements provided for under the Customs Tariff Act and the Anti-Dumping Act. Overproduction in other countries frequently results in prices below cost of production, which can seriously affect industries here. Take, for example, the tomato industry in southern Ontario. Once a healthy canning interest, this segment has been continually jeopardized by cheap imports from Taiwan and Mexico. Now only a ghost of the former industry remains. Farmers, labourers, and the canneries have suffered.

Another example is the importation of "stripper potatoes" into Canada last fall. In the U.S. these substandard potatoes, culls from the regular harvest, are treated as secondary produce. But they were not so treated by the government here. Subsequently these imports enjoyed a favourable price position vis-à-vis domestic harvest. Why was there no embargo on these?

Low cost imports from the United States and Australia have cut into domestic peach and pear production as well. Processors have been forced out of business. Once the domestic industry is deposed there are no guarantees that foreign distributors will not raise their prices to whatever the market will bear.

The Horticultural Council has been calling for change for some time. I quote from its submission to the Tariff Board in 1973:

> The inequities which currently exist in the exceptionally benign entry terms for concentrated processed fruits and vegetables, especially those used for further manufacture, have inhibited the development of major processing sectors in Canada and have displaced potential Canadian fresh fruit and vegetable production.

It is not only imported processed products which enjoy advantages over domestic products. Canning materials and other packing materials also enter the country more cheaply. As part of the processed food package they do not carry a tariff. But as raw materials for Canadian canners there is a duty to be paid on them. The end price of Canadian processed food is to that extent higher than the price of American imports. There is no fair competition. Fruit and vegetable producers lose their markets. Eventually, with no competitive domestic food industry, there is no means of controlling the import price of goods.

If big chemical firms can be protected from the farmers by embargoes on imported pesticides at the farmers' expense, surely the farmer can be protected against the more detrimental effects of international trade by a comprehensive tax structure.

Mr. Irénée Pelletier (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, in spite of what the hon. member for Okanagan Boundary (Mr. Whittaker) has stated this evening, the decision to restrict the importation of pesticides into Canada to registered products only, is one which was taken in the best long term interests of Canadian farmers.

As all hon. members are very much aware, the reputation of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) is certainly not one of capitulating to multinational companies, and I am sure his record is sufficient evidence of this fact. The reasons for the closing of our borders to unregistered pesticide products become very clear to anyone who has made an indepth study of the issue. Nevertheless, because of the concern expressed by everyone, as well as by the Minister of Agriculture, a monitoring system has been established which will assure our farmers that they are receiving pesticide products at competitive prices. It is hoped this measure will assist in the growth of a Canadian pesticide manufacturing and formulating industry thereby providing producers with an even broader spectrum of products and services than is now available. The continued entrenchment of the Canadian pesticide industry which had been occurring prior to this announcement was serioulsy jeopardizing the future availability of pesticide products to Canadian farmers.

As the minister announced in his press release of March 4, an advisory committee is being established to inform the minister on a continuing basis of the supply and price situation in Canada and other countries. This committee will have representatives from government, the Canadian Agricultural Chemicals Association, and farm organizations. The minister has informed me that should any unreasonable situations occur he will be quick to take appropriate action.

Of course the hon. member may be able to cite instances in which pesticides are cheaper in the U.S. than they are in Canada. At the same time, it should be recognized that there are numerous instances in which the reverse situation exists. Taking into consideration the long-term costs which would be incurred by the importation of unregistered pesticide products by some 2,000 of Canada's more than 300,000 farmers, the security of supply and improved performance by the Canadian pesticide industry resulting from this decision will be of unquestionable benefit to the Canadian agricultural community.

VETERANS AFFAIRS—STATUS OF PLAN FOR NEW HOSPITAL SYSTEM IN NOVA SCOTIA

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, the veterans of Canada did me a very great service a number of years back, and I hope to do the veterans of Nova Scotia some small service by taking part in the late show this evening. I can put the case for the development of a new veterans complex on the Camp Hill site in Halifax no better than it was presented on February 24, 1970, to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), by Mr. D. A. Hartlen, secretary-manager of the Scotia branch No. 25 of the Royal Canadian Legion. In his letter to the Prime Minister he said, in part, that his members——do strongly oppose the phasing out of DVA hospitals across Canada and the reducing of staff at such hospitals.

Veterans stand apart in that they gave their all to their country, even through death.

For those who paid the supreme sacrifice there is little the government can do but to see their dependents are not in need.

I do not think that any words of mine could ever really add to the message which Mr. Hartlen so well presented to the Prime Minister at that time. The question was the future of veterans hospitals.

Perhaps the message did get through to the Prime Minister because the government started to develop the concept of a new veterans complex on the Camp Hill site in the centre of older Halifax. Looking at my file on this matter, which has mellowed through age but has not really achieved the results I would have liked to see, I notice that in 1971 I was engaged in brisk correspondence with the then minister of veterans affairs, Mr. Jean-Eudes Dubé, over the future of the Red Cross Lodge at the Camp Hill hospital and I was assured by Mr. Dubé that in the negotiation of any future agreements of transfer Red Cross Lodges would be fully protected for as long as the Canadian Red Cross continued their operations for the welfare of hospital patients, meaning veteran hospital patients.

Then I move on to the time when the veterans affairs committee met on April 25, 1972, when Dr. K. S. Ritchie, assistant deputy minister of hospitals of the Department of Veterans Affairs, said the situation so far as Camp Hill hospital was concerned was quite fluid at the time. He went on to say:

There was a task force established some two years ago—

That would be in 1970.

—to study the possibility of a joint-use hospital on the Camp Hill site which will involve the Department of Veterans Affairs, the Department of National Defence, the university—

That would be Dalhousie University.

—and the community in a community hospital, and also for rehabilitation.

Then let me march on briskly without further comment to October 22, 1974, when again the veterans affairs committee is meeting. At that time I raised certain questions, and Dr. A. F. Jones, director general of treatment services of the Department of Veterans Affairs, was answering. He said:

> Mr. Chairman, with respect to the consultants, there are four local Halifax firms under consideration by the Department of Public Works, which is charged with the responsibility for designating them with the concurrence of our minister, and this designation is to be made hopefully in the very near future. The target dates for the planning are one year from September, and hopefully the tenders will be let a year from September. This was the target frame proposed at the time the announcement was made.
> MR. MCCLEAVE: A year from last September.
> DR. JONES: That is right.

That was the exchange which took place almost three years ago. Perhaps even before that time—I am not quite sure, memory tends to fade over the years—there was a very beautiful brochure presented showing what Camp Hill hospital should be like. There were negotiations, discussions, and a great beating of drums between the federal and provincial governements; there were visitations back and forth, statements by the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald), and statements by the provincial minister of health in Nova Scotia, and still nothing concrete has been realized.

I suspect—I do not know—that the hospital perhaps has become a victim of a retrenchment program of the present government practised both here and on occasion by the provincial government of Nova Scotia, but I do not know, and that is the purpose of my speaking here this evening. I want to find out when we might expect either some meaningful activity, or a statement that it will not take place and that the veterans of Nova Scotia will not get what has been promised to them over the years.

It seems shameful in a way that these people should be treated in such a fashion. It has been a long, long time, and I could make the situation seem much worse by an outpouring of hot, heavy abuse. One might call it a dereliction of duty toward people who, after all, when they served us did not spare their efforts. But I am not going to do that. I simply want to know: is it going to be or is it not going to be?

Mr. S. Victor Railton (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to be able to answer some of the important questions that the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. McCleave) has raised with regard to the transfer of Camp Hill hospital. I think we should first realize that the principles under which the Department of Veterans Affairs has entered into this transfer business have been thrashed out in parliament over many years. It seems fairly obvious to many of us that the worry about not giving veterans proper care is not really supported by the facts that have taken place. It is our duty to care for veterans properly and creditably. Acute care is better carried out in acute hospitals which are under provincial jurisdiction, as the hon. member knows.

The care of veterans who have been disabled in the service of their country is assured. Veterans who have reached the age of infirmity, or have some handicap for reasons other than service, have some priority in access to beds. These are the principles under which we are working. Of course the hon. member will realize that these are the principles, plus the fact that it is important that the people who have looked after the veterans for many years as employees of these hospitals be not turfed out. The rights of these people should also be protected.

There is a certain amount of criticism. I do not want the hon. member to think that I am criticizing him for the sake of criticism. I think it is his duty to inquire and to make sure that veterans have proper care, but I assure him that we are giving proper care.

In the case of Camp Hill hospital, in 1974 a plan was developed to build a new active treatment hospital on the Camp Hill site, which would have involved the participation of both the Department of Veterans Affairs and the Department of National Defence. I think the hon. member realizes that.

In 1975, the very next year, the Department of National Defence was unable to participate in the development of the planned 250-bed active treatment hospital, leaving only a 150-bed requirement for the Department of Veterans Affairs, and this is not a viable unit for active treatment from the point of view of size.

There have been very recent discussions with officials of the department of health of the province of Nova Scotia with a view to the transfer of Camp Hill Hospital to their jurisdiction, and I expect a final decision on the matter will be made quite soon. In the event of such a transfer materializing, the amount of money which previously would have been the department's share of the new hospital development will form the capital grant on transfer, to be spent in developing facilities for the benefit of veterans. I think that should be reassuring.

In the event of a transfer occurring in Halifax, the terms and conditions required by the federal government will be in full effect—this is what I have talked about—as they have been in all previous transfers.

There will be a guarantee of priority access beds for active treatment of all veterans for their service incurred disabilities. That is the first category. In addition, it will be established that regional health facilities can fully respond to the requirement of other than pensioned veterans as far as active care is concerned. In other words, we have to be absolutely persuaded that this will be properly taken care of.

Full arrangements will be made for satisfactory transfer of all federal employees of the hospital so that they will have, under the new jurisdiction, globally equivalent rights and benefits to those which are now enjoyed in the federal Public Service. I might add that both veterans' organizations and staff associations have been kept informed of developments.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at two o'clock p.m.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.30 p.m.

PROPOSED COMMITTEE STUDY OF AGREEMENT WITH UNITED STATES ON INVESTIGATION OF PURCHASES OF BOEING AIRCRAFT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I propose to move a motion under this most useful of standing orders, Standing Order 43, which has to do with a matter of urgent and pressing necessity arising out of the collusive arrangements, which can best be described as a mutual concealment pact, made between the Attorney General of Canada and the attorney general of the United States, dated March 15, 1977.

An hon. Member: Beware the Ides of March.

Mr. Baldwin: I would move, seconded by the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Hnatyshyn):

That this House demands that the government explain fully the circumstances leading to this imprudent and dangerous agreement and, furthermore, on the basis that parliament has the primary responsibility to inquire into the proper expenditure of taxpayers' money for the purchase of aircraft and supplies from Boeing Aircraft, that the agreement of March 15 and related circumstances be referred to the Standing Committee on Public Accounts.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Pursuant to Standing Order 43, such a motion can only be presented for debate with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

HOUSING

REQUEST FOR INCREASED FUNDS FOR HOUSING FOR LOW INCOME GROUPS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I wish to move, under Standing Order 43, a motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the serious human misery and economic waste associated with the high unemployment level in all regions of this country, the tremendous need for low-income housing evidenced by long waiting lists in the urban centres of Canada, and the fact that the most recently available official statistics show that over 155,000 construction workers are unemployed, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin):

That this House urges the government, in the joint interests of creating employment and assisting low-income Canadians in their housing difficulties, to reverse the policy of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, as announced yesterday, and increase, not decrease, financial housing support for low-income Canadians.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Pursuant to Standing Order 43 such a motion can be presented for debate only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

SOCIAL SECURITY

POSSIBILITY OF ESTABLISHING GUARANTEED ANNUAL INCOME PLAN—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. C. A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the fact that Canada has the highest unemployment rate of its history, as there are over a million unemployed; that in the long run such conditions will only worsen unless we reject the entire modern technology; that owing to that technology it is increasingly utopian to think about full employment without going 50 years back, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert):

That this House urge the government to introduce immediately a bill to establish a guaranteed minimum annual income for all citizens from 18 to 65 years of age.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Under the provisions of Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there such consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent; the motion therefore cannot be put.

PROPOSED REFERENCE TO COMMITTEE OF METHODS AND PROCEDURES FOR FORECASTING UNEMPLOYMENT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the incredible inability of this government to come to grips with matters of unemployment in this country, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies):

That this House direct a reference of the methods and procedures of forecast and advice on matters of unemployment in Canada to the cabinet, and particularly the Minister of Finance, be made to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The presentation of such a motion pursuant to the Standing Order can only be done with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

LABOUR RELATIONS

PROPOSED COMMISSION TO STUDY LOSS OF JOBS RESULTING FROM MOVE OF CAST SHIPPING—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jacques Lavoie (Hochelaga): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, I request the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion concerning an urgent and important matter.

Last March 7, along with 17 government members, I visited the authorities of the port of Montreal. We saw then that a serious problem threatened the economic future of that port and might cause the loss of hundreds of jobs not only in the constituency of Hochelaga, but also in the neighbouring constituencies. Given the answer made last Thursday by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) to the hon. member for Sainte-Marie (Mr. Dupont), to the effect that it was not appropriate to make any comments at this stage, and considering that several thousands of related workers in the port of Montreal as well as 1,200 longshoremen are involved, and that the company appears to have decided to leave the port of Montreal, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Joliette (Mr. La Salle):

That the House unanimously request that the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) set up a committee composed of four representatives of the government and one representative of all other parties who would meet the employers' association and the Cast Shipping Company Ltd. to examine that matter on which the economic future of the port of Montreal depends, without any prejudice to all the other ports of the Atlantic.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent; therefore the motion cannot be put.

PERFORMING ARTS

REQUEST FOR RE-EXAMINATION OF GOVERNMENT COMMITMENT TO FUNDING—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of last night's excellent performance at the National Arts Centre by the National Ballet which marked their twenty-fifth anniversary, and in view of the Liberal government's inadequate support of the arts as witnessed by the necessity of IBM funding part of the cost of the performance, including paying for and giving to the cabinet a block of seats for the performance, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House request the government to re-examine its commitment to funding the arts in Canada, and in the future ministers pay their own way.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The presentation of such a motion for debate requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

REQUEST FOR BUDGETARY PROVISIONS TO REDUCE LEVEL OF UNEMPLOYMENT—POSSIBILITY OF NEW JOB CREATION PROGRAMS

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Prime Minister. Yesterday the Minister of Finance told the more than one million Canadians who are out of work today to just wait and see if their government cares enough about their predicament to try and create jobs. I would like to ask the Prime Minister, without revealing the details of his budget, whether he will give the House of Commons and the people of Canada, including the more than one million unemployed, a firm commitment today that a primary target of the budget that will be brought in at the end of this month, and federal economic policy generally, will be to break the existing pattern of growing unemployment and get Canadians back to work.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, if the Leader of the Opposition had been observing and listening to the government's words and actions, he would know that his question is purely rhetorical. It is obvious that the budget is going to be showing very great concern for the unemployment situation. We do not need the Leader of the Opposition to ask that kind of question.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, we have been watching the mainly words and ineffective action of the government during a decade of drift in national economic policy.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: So have more than one million Canadians, the highest total in the history of this country, who are now out of work because of the policies of this government. I ask the Prime Minister again, if not out of courtesy to this House then at least to demonstrate some care for the plight of the million Canadians, and millions more dependent on them, who are now out of work, to give us an unequivocal commitment right now that the major thrust of the budget which is shortly to be brought down and of government economic policy will be to break the pattern created by the government by its words and by its actions and create conditions as soon as possible which will find jobs for those who need work now in Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: The first intervention of the opposition was properly called a rhetorical question. And now, that is a rhetorical suggestion. Thank you very much.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: The Prime Minister plays word games while a million Canadians are out of work.

An hon. Member: What's a million?

Mr. Clark: My colleague asks the Liberal question "What's a million?" It is now "What's a million unemployed?"

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: I should like to ask the Prime Minister now, since the budget measures, if there are any, to create employment in Canada will take at least six months to work through the economy, and since the job creation projections of the government have already fallen short by 100,000 of their target for last year, whether the government is planning to introduce any new job creation programs which will help to get Canadians back to work?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the budget debate has not yet begun.

Mr. Clark: I missed the Prime Minister's reply, I presume, sir, I did not miss much.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

SUGGESTED DIVERSION OF PUBLIC EXPENDITURES TO SIX PROVINCES WITH HIGHEST LEVEL OF UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask the Prime Minister now whether the government is prepared to seriously consider changing some of its public spending policies to divert funds to those six provinces in Canada where the rate of unemployment today is above the national average.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): This is certainly something we are looking at and I would be interested to hear from which particular provinces the Leader of the Opposition would wish us to divert funds.

An hon. Member: That is easy.

POSSIBILITY OF INDUSTRIAL STRATEGY TO AVOID FUTURE HIGH LEVELS OF UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): My question is also for the Prime Minister. As we now, unfortunately, live with an unemployment figure of one million, would the Prime Minister tell us whether any steps have been taken at least to evolve an industrial strategy for Canada to ensure that in the coming years this chronic type of unemployment will not continue?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): The House has heard on different occasions statements on elements of our industrial strategy by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. I think one of the reasons the country is in difficulty is that Canadians are living beyond their means.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: The government is living beyond its means.

• (1420)

Mr. Trudeau: I can see that the opposition is prepared to start the budget debate now but not to hear the answers now.

Mr. Stevens: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Since the Prime Minister has told us that people are living beyond their means, is he aware that according to 1976 figures it was increased government expenditures which led all increases of expenditures in Canada; they went up 13.5 per cent?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Broadview.

Mr. Stevens: A supplementary question.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. At least adhering to the theory that a supplementary question must grow out of the answer to the one asked previous to it, I can scarcely grant a supplementary question to an unanswered question. The hon. member for Broadview.

FINANCE

REQUEST FOR INCREASED FINANCIAL SUPPORT FOR HOUSING FOR LOW INCOME GROUPS

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of State for Urban Affairs my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. In view of the fact that CMHC's budget, which was tabled yesterday, contains a massive swing away from the funding of rental housing for low and moderate income Canadians, and in view of high unemployment for construction workers and CMHC figures which show low vacancy rates in metropolitan areas across Canada, may I ask the minister to reserve the incredibly regressive and unfair policy announced yesterday and to increase financial housing support for low income Canadians?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I would have to consult with my colleague the Minister of State for Urban Affairs in this regard. I would remind the hon. gentleman that in the year just completed we have constructed a record number of houses, particularly, as he knows, in the low income area.

Mr. Gilbert: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that it has been decisively documented that the Canadian Council on Social Development has indicated that one third of all Canadians cannot afford decent housing, and that programs like assisted rental and AHOP do not help them because they are directed at families with higher incomes, and given our severe shortage of rental housing, how does the Minister of Finance plan to assist families with incomes below $10,000?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. gentleman knows, both from his constituency and mine, the government of Canada has taken the lead in providing housing for low income families, for example in the Dundas-Sherbourne project where we pay 95 per cent of the capital cost. It is a continuation of that kind of assistance which will, in addition to the AHOP program, be of most assistance on the government side.

Mr. Gilbert: A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I would draw the minister's attention to this year's record number of unsold and over-priced housing completions. In view of the fact that last year's record number of housing starts are priced at levels well beyond the capacity of most Canadian families, will the minister reconsider the budget allocations for the non-profit and co-op programs, allocations which, as they presently stand, have not been increased to account for inflation factors?

[Mr. Stevens.]

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Again, Mr. Speaker, I would just emphasize the fact that the great weight of the federal government's housing policy has been for those in low income groups.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

POSSIBILITY OF FEDERAL GOVERNMENT PARTICIPATING IN QUEBEC INQUIRY INTO OCTOBER, 1970 CRISIS

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the right hon. Prime Minister.

A book recently published by Mr. Pierre Vallières clearly infers that, both before and during the October 1970 crisis, the Prime Minister played a part which had consequences, which cast very serious doubts on his integrity during the October 1970 crisis. Would the Prime Minister tell the House what steps he will take to disprove these allegations?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Unless I am mistaken, Mr. Speaker, Mr. Vallières was himself a member of the FLQ. The hon. member should therefore realize that his statements might not be quite objective.

Mr. Matte: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question.

Since the Prime Minister has kindly offered to co-operate to a possible inquiry into the October 1970 crisis by the Quebec government, could he tell the House clearly and precisely why he limits his co-operation to a provincial jurisdiction?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I do not think that the Quebec justice minister would meddle with areas of federal jurisdiction. His inquiry cannot deal with matters under federal jurisdiction. I recently suggested to the hon. member that if there were ways whereby we could voluntarily provide the justice minister with information which could help him, we should be glad to co-operate.

REQUEST FOR PUBLICATION OF REPORT OF NOVEMBER 20, 1970 AND PROCEEDINGS OF COMMITTEE ON OCTOBER, 1970 CRISIS

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a final supplementary.

The Prime Minister knows very well that all explanations required by the House and the public are under federal jurisdiction. In other words, will he agree to make public the committee report dated May 7 and submitted to the federal cabinet on November 20, 1970, as well as the proceedings of the numerous working sessions of that committee which were held before the kidnapping of James Cross and Pierre Laporte and the promulgation of the War Measures Act?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not know to what the hon. member is referring when he gives those dates and references, but the question itself is misleading because he says it concerns essentially the federal jurisdiction. Moreover the hon. member should remember that his party supported the federal government at the time of the promulgation of the war measures. He should also remember that the federal government did nothing less than promulgate an act which allowed the province of Quebec, through provincial police forces, to take certain measures, to bring some people before the court, and that the province of Quebec also asked the federal government to send the Canadian army there. All the government did was to cooperate with the province of Quebec.

GOVERNMENT ADMINISTRATION

USE OF $1 VOTES IN ESTIMATES TO CIRCUMVENT PARLIAMENTARY CONTROL

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the President of the Treasury Board. It arises out of the presentation of estimates, particularly supplementary estimates (D). Given the importance which the Auditor General has placed upon the need to provide more adequate and meaningful information in the estimates as well as the methods of examination as a prerequisite to restoring parliamentary control and accountability, I ask the minister if he does not consider the extensive use of $1 items as presented in supplementary estimates (D)—I might say there are some 52 of these in total—as effectively circumventing parliamentary control and running against the grain of the recommendations of the Auditor General. I ask if the minister intends to do anything about this particular abuse since it is clearly in violation of the accountability and responsibility of parliament.

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board): The hon. member's concern about the use of $1 votes in supplementary estimates for potential policy items is a matter on which we would all prefer change, but I think the response to that would require a more thorough change associated with the procedures of the House to make it possible.

Mr. Mazankowski: I am not sure whether or not the minister agrees with the abuse of $1 items, but may I simply ask the minister if he can say to the House whether he concurs with the use of $1 items as a vehicule for establishing Crown corporations, for writing off debt, and for changing legislation, which is done in supplementary estimates (D) as they have been presented in the House? Does he not consider it to be an abuse, indeed a violation, of the rights of parliament?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. In so far as the hon. member's question relates to matters of procedure, it might better be raised by way of a point of order rather than as a question to the minister.

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, with all due deference I should like to point out that my question was not a question on procedure but a question on policy and on what the minister's position is with regard to the use of $1 items in supplementary estimates.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: That should be explored by way of a point of order, with all due respect.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

ALLEGED FRAUD IN SALE OF BUTTER—REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): My question is directed to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Is the minister aware of and investigating the following problem, namely, that throughout Ontario there is at present a massive consumer rip-off being perpetrated by segments of the butter industry? Specifically, I am speaking about disproportionate and large amounts of lard being used in the production of butter and the sale of margarine as butter by certain companies throughout the province of Ontario. Is the minister investigating this matter?

● (1430)

Hon. A. C. Abbott (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I confess that until the hon. member brought this to my attention I had not heard of it, but I will make immediate inquiries.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

ALLEGED FRAUD IN SALE OF BUTTER—POSSIBILITY OF INVESTIGATION

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, I would like to pose a supplementary question to the Solicitor General. Has it been brought to the attention of the Solicitor General that a fraud has been perpetrated throughout the province of Ontario by certain butter companies selling margarine as butter and selling butter containing lard? Is the minister investigating this problem? Has the government been aware of it for some time? Can the minister report anything to the House on this matter?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, no report to that effect has been brought to my attention.

INQUIRY WHETHER THE FORCE HAS BEEN ASKED TO PROTECT SEAL HUNTERS

Mr. Albert Béchard (Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Solicitor General.

Could the minister tell the House whether Newfoundland provincial authorities or any Canadian individual or organization asked him to dispatch RCMP reinforcements to protect Mr. Brian Davies and his host of Brigitte-Bardot-type whiners who have been viciously applying themselves these last few years and particularly last year and this year to prevent the fishermen who participate in the seal hunt on the ice in the Gulf of St. Lawrence at this time of the year from earning their living? These intruders act in violation of the security rules of the Department of Transport and of the rules of the Department of Fisheries and the Environment. Could he tell who made representations or demands to him, if any?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, the RCMP has established very close communications with the provincial governments and with security agencies in the provinces concerned. The first effect has been to increase the number of RCMP officers, even in some rural areas in Newfoundland, and in particular in St. Anthony's where the number of RCMP officers has been boosted from 5 to about 90. The RCMP is on the spot to maintain public order and peace, which should enable the fishermen to go about their work undisturbed.

[English]

ACTION TO PROTECT SEAL HUNTERS FROM HARASSMENT

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary for the Solicitor General. What steps is the minister taking to direct the RCMP to protect Canadian sealers, who are involved in a legitimate, government supervised operation, from harassment from these people on the ice?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, as far as harassment on the ice is concerned, the RCMP is acting in very close co-operation with the Department of Fisheries. The RCMP is there is to assist the fisheries officers on request.

HARASSMENT OF SEAL HUNTERS—POSSIBILITY OF CHARGES AND MODIFICATION OF LAW TO PROTECT SEAL HUNTERS

Mr. William Rompkey (Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador): Mr. Speaker, I have another supplementary for the Solicitor General. In view of obvious illegalities which have been committed at the front and in view of this unwarranted interference, have any charges been laid by private people or by the RCMP?

Will the Solicitor General consider modifications to the law in time for the sealing season next year to give further protection to sealers at the front?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I can well understand the hon. member's concern. I am not aware whether charges have been laid against any participants to date, but as I indicated before, the RCMP is there to ensure that lawful activities can be carried out.

As to the question of amendments to the law, I would be pleased to take up the matter with the Minister of Fisheries.

CASE AGAINST BRIAN DAVIES UNDER SEAL PROTECTION ACT—STATUS OF APPEAL

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Justice. Brian Davies is now proceeding to the seal hunt, and there is still a case before the courts concerning his deliberate contravention of the Seal Protection Act. Can the minister indicate what progress has been made with regard to the appeal? If the appeal is delayed too long, other people will use that as a precedent to contravene the Act just as Brian Davies did.

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, as I informed the hon. member some time ago, the notice of appeal has been filed. I do not know at the moment where it stands on the court list, and obviously the question of when it is called for hearing is a matter for the Chief Justice of the court and not for the Minister of Justice.

REASON FOR AGREEING WITH UNITED STATES TO RESTRICT USE OF INFORMATION CONCERNING SALES ACTIVITIES OF BOEING AIRCRAFT

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. In light of the fact that the agreement between the Attorney General of Canada and the Attorney General of the United States dated March 15, 1977, with which I am sure the Prime Minister is thoroughly familiar, places an extremely restricted use on information gathered with respect to the sales activities of the Boeing Aircraft Company in Canada, will the Prime Minister explain to this House why his government entered into such a silly and improper arrangement which has the effect of concealing information from parliament, which, after all, in the minds of some of us on this side is still the highest court in the land?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Canadian government itself wanted to make sure that in this agreement care was taken so that the extra-territorial application of United States laws in Canada or Canadian laws in the United States would not follow from this agreement, and that is the reason there was a great deal of care taken in the execution of this agreement.

REASON FOR AGREEING WITH UNITED STATES TO RESTRICT USE OF INFORMATION CONCERNING SALES ACTIVITIES OF BOEING AIRCRAFT

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Justice. I take back what I said about the Prime Minister being aware of the contents of the agreement.

It being now known that Canadians may use the United States freedom of information law to obtain facts, knowledge and documents which this government is afraid or unwilling to produce, was a reason for the agreement in question being made between the minister and the Attorney General of the United States to prevent the operation of that law both in the United States and in Canada so far as obtaining data about the sales activities of Boeing in this country?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is capable of the most perverse interpretations of the facts. The position taken by the hon. member is really rather an outlandish one. Only two weeks ago hon. members opposite were demanding to know what the government of Canada was doing about these allegations by the Security Exchange Commission.

Mr. Clark: Now we will never know.

Mr. Basford: As a result of our desire to find out whether there was any information involving Canadians which would warrant a Canadian investigation, the hon. member is now objecting to our entering into the very agreement which would allow us to have the information we require in order to make a proper assessment of whether an investigation should be conducted. It is no wonder that the Canadian public is so confused about the position of the opposition, and that confusion is indicated in the Gallup Poll.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

POSSIBILITY OF ALTERING AGREEMENT WITH UNITED STATES ON INFORMATION CONCERNING SALES ACTIVITIES OF BOEING AIRCRAFT

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, given the track record of this government of successfully stifling judicial and parliamentary inquiries—

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Baldwin: —into collateral improprieties and misdemeanors with regard to a number of incidents which have happened in this country and which hang like a necklace of garbage around the neck of this government,—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baldwin: —will the minister not consider securing alterations to this agreement so that information will be made available to this parliament so that we can exercise our responsibility with regard to finding out what happened to money belonging to the taxpayers of this country?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, such an agreement would not be obtainable from the United States. The agreement entered into yesterday is similar to agreements which were entered into by the United States in somewhat similar circumstances with, for example, Belgium and Japan with regard to the Lockheed matter. The agreement is drawn in accordance with United States and Canadian law and practice, namely that matters under investigation by police authorities are confidential until charges are laid. That is a well established practice not only in the United States but also in Canada, and thank heaven that that is the practice in Canada.

EFFECT OF AGREEMENT WITH UNITED STATES ON INFORMATION CONCERNING SALES ACTIVITIES OF BOEING AIRCRAFT

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is also to the Minister of Justice. Because this agreement is not a very subtle restriction of the free flow of information, and a confidential release of this information is restricted only, according to the agreement, to law enforcement agencies to be used exclusively in legal proceedings, where would this leave a valid, legal and justified examination, for instance, by the Auditor General with regard to the public accounts relating to this matter or by a parliamentary body such as the Public Accounts Committee if, for instance, we wanted to examine officials in the Department of Transport, Air Canada or particularly the Department of Supply and Services?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. By its very nature that question is hypothetical.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

INQUIRY INTO ALLEGED SEPARATIST BIAS OF RADIO-CANADA—REQUEST THAT MINISTERS FORWARD SPECIFIC CHARGES

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. In view of the Prime Minister's request that the CRTC conduct an investigation into the alleged separatist bias of Radio-Canada, charges of bias which have been made primarily by his own cabinet ministers, has the Prime Minister instructed those ministers to forward to the CRTC specific examples of separatist bias so that the CRTC can conduct a meaningful investigation under the terms of reference set out by its chairman?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that anyone in this country who has evidence of bias will be communicating with the CRTC. I hope they will do that.

Mr. Symes: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Since the CRTC has received fewer than six complaints about alleged bias, and since obviously the Prime Minister, when giving his earlier assurance that the inquiry was not a witch hunt, must have been convinced of the weight of the evidence of his ministers concerning such alleged bias, surely, since the Prime Minister called the inquiry on the basis of evidence which his ministers possessed, it is incumbent on him to instruct his ministers to forward those examples of bias to the CRTC, or else call off the investigation; because the chairman says that without hard evidence he cannot proceed.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I just answered by saying that I hope people who have evidence about bias will be communicating with the CRTC; and this includes ministers, Mr. Speaker.

REQUEST FOR REVIEW OF PAROLE PROVISIONS RELATING TO DANGEROUS SEX OFFENDERS

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, my question needs to be addressed either to the Solicitor General or the Minister of Justice. On February 25, 1977, the Saskatoon parole division wrote a letter to the Calgary parole division about a certain inmate who is now on mandatory parole by right of law, who has been charged and involved with indecently assaulting females aged seven, three and 18, and whose record goes back to 1971. The Saskatoon board has warned the Calgary board that this person is very dangerous and could in future dispose of his victims. My question is this: Will the minister review this case with parole authorities both in Saskatoon and Calgary and also review the law which permits, against the will of the board, this man to be free in society in these circumstances, even under mandatory supervision? The man in question is now at large in Calgary.

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, may I answer that question? May I point out to the hon. member that the individual to whom he referred was released because he had completed that part of his sentence under which he could be held. In other words, the statutory remission which was introduced by the prior government in 1961 applied, and the parole board had no authority to keep him behind bars. On the other hand, under an amendment passed by this government in 1970, the individual in question was brought before the courts in 1975 and a plea of habitual criminal was accepted by the courts at that time. If the individual is free today it is because he has completed his sentence according to laws in force in this country.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, may I ask this supplementary question? I know the law was changed in 1970; will the minister review that law which was passed in 1970, particularly section 15 which permits these people to be parolled; and neither the Parole Board of Canada whose head office is in Ottawa nor the regional boards have authority to prevent the release of such dangerous sex offenders before their term of imprisonment has expired? I ask this question because there have been two murders in Calgary in the last month. Two young girls were murdered and one accused is being charged with committing the murders while he was on such release.

Mr. Fox: Mr. Speaker, the whole question of statutory remission and of dangerous offenders will be brought before parliament I hope in the near future in the successor to Bill C-83, which dealt with a number of these concerns.

Mr. Woolliams: A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the anxiety of people not only in Calgary but in other urban centres of this country, will the minister investigate this case, to see if some other legal procedure can be taken to safeguard the public?

Mr. Fox: Mr. Speaker, of course I am willing to examine the matter, to see if there are any other safeguards which can be invoked. I am informed at the moment, after having examined the case in full detail, that there is really no legal recourse at the moment which would permit the reincarceration of this individual, since he has now completed his sentence.

Mr. Woolliams: What about the act concerning the mentally ill?

GRAIN

WHEAT—NATURE OF AGREEMENT ENTERED INTO WITH UNITED STATES

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport in his capacity as the minister who reports for the Wheat Board. It has to do particularly with negotiations which have been going on between himself and the Secretary of Agriculture of the United States, Bob Bergland, whereby, if press reports are correct, there has been an endeavour to establish a cartel or price fixing arrangement. Press reports on the subject have been meagre, but public opinion has been aroused among the farmers of western Canada and those of the United States because of the stockpiles of wheat which are mounting. In the United States there will be 1.1 billion bushels of wheat by June, and in Canada, 550 million bushels. I ask the minister this: Will he take the House into his confidence and let the farmers, particularly of western Canada, know what agreement he entered into, and say that farmers will not again have to submit to the control of acreage, or of quotas, such as prevailed under the LIFT program, whereby farmers lost tens if not hundreds of millions of dollars? That is their concern at this time.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, they are bound to be concerned if they have listened to very much of the talk of the right hon. gentleman, who refers to press reports and then obviously reads only a few of them. There has been a pretty full explanation—

Mr. Diefenbaker: By whom?

Mr. Lang: —of what we are attempting to do. Secretary Bergland and myself—

Mr. Diefenbaker: In parliament?

Mr. Lang: In parliament. The hon. gentleman was not present earlier to hear answers directed to the hon. member for Mackenzie, to which he could have referred. Those discussions are designed to lead to some sensible pricing at the bottom level, to protect farmers against what happens when reserves which are essential for food security in the world exist and are not appreciated as reserves but treated as depressants on the market. Mr. Speaker, I can say to the right hon. gentleman that as a result of five meetings I had last weekend across the three prairie provinces, and many more contacts with farmers, I know that they are delighted indeed that we are taking these steps, and look forward, unlike the right hon. gentleman, to the success of those negotiations and, once again, to firm guarantees against too low prices for grain.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, the gratuitous observation regarding western farmers being enthusiastic about the minister received an answer in two provincial by-elections in which he participated. Instead of making announcements outside parliament, to the detriment of the House of Commons, will he immediately explain something of the plans he has in mind, those ephemeral plans of his, which will result in the western farmer getting another "lift" in that part of his exterior to which no reference will be made by me.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, once again the right hon. gentleman sprinkled his question with complete untruth, even to the point of suggesting that I had participated in by-elections in which I had not participated.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, if, instead of the right hon. gentleman's making these false statements and silly insinuations, he would ask question of fact, of course I would answer them and he would have every answer to his questions. But of course, he chooses not to put any questions at all.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether words such as "untruth" and the like are parliamentary. All I can say to the hon. gentleman is that I will not depart from parliamentary practice when I say that his statements indicate the antithesis of what the truth actually is.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

USE OF WRITS OF ASSISTANCE—REQUEST FOR REPORT ON STUDY

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I will move on to another matter. I would like to address my questions to the Minister of Justice. Has the minister had an opportunity to consider the whole matter of writs of assistance in view of the compelling arguments against those statutory provisions whereby judges have no discretion in the issuance of these writs and there is no time limit imposed upon the duration of these writs? Having regard to the fact that some limitation will not impede law enforcement, is the minister now in a position to make a categorical statement that there will be changes in the statutes to bring these provisions within reasonable bounds?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member's question indicates that he believes that the use of writs of assistance should be continued. I indicated to the House that I was conducting a fundamental review of whether, and to what extent, they should be continued in our law.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Will the minister now commit himself to this House that in the course of his investigation he will, in conjunction with the Solicitor General, review all of the outstanding writs and make a voluntary termination of those writs that are not needed now by individuals in the RCMP in connection with enforcement of the Customs Act or for whatever statute they were obtained?

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, that is obviously part of the review that is underway. In the meantime, I have indicated that neither myself nor the Minister of National Health and Welfare will apply to the court for any additional writs. Obviously part of the review of whether writs should be continued will be a review of those ultimately holding writs now.

MANPOWER

DELAY IN PROCESSING APPLICATIONS FOR OFFSHORE FARM LABOURERS—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. William Knowles (Norfolk-Haldimand): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the minister has several times indicated that the offshore labour program would be operative for farmers in 1977, and further, I have firsthand information that large numbers of farmers in my area, in Burlington and in the Niagara district, have applied at their local CMC centres only to discover that their applications are not being processed, will the minister instruct his CMC officials to process these applications forthwith to permit these farmers to obtain the labour necessary to get on with food crop production on their farms?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, in arriving at the terms and conditions on which offshore labour would be hired this year, I fulfilled an undertaking I made to the minister of labour for the province of Ontario to write to her and giver her the terms and conditions, as I saw them and proposed to implement them. I have not had a reply from that minister. I telexed yesterday indicating that I wanted a response immediately because the farmers were waiting for an announcement.

POSSIBLE RESTRICTIONS ON WITNESSES APPEARING BEFORE KITIMAT PIPELINE INQUIRY

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Justice. On the weekend the minister announced the appointment of Dr. Andrew Thompson to conduct an inquiry into the seaward side of the Kitimat pipeline. In view of the fact that the Northern Association of Municipal Councils received some $25,000 for transportation assistance from the consortium that is seeking approval of that pipeline and those municipal councils could very well appear before Dr. Andrew Thompson during his inquiry into the pipeline, will the minister advise whether there are any restrictions presently under the law or under the Inquiries Act which would restrict this kind of lobbying of potential witnesses who may appear on such a sensitive matter as the Kitimat inquiry?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I made the announcement on behalf of my colleagues, the Minister of Fisheries and Environment and the Minister of Transport. Any questions as to the inquiry should be directed to those ministers. However, in so far as this question is concerned, without giving a legal opinion, the Inquiries Act is clear that it is up to the inquirer as to who he hears and under what circumstances he hears them.

TRANSPORT

KITIMAT PIPELINE INQUIRY—POSSIBLE FUNDING OF ADVERSARY GROUPS—LOBBYING OF WITNESSES BY PIPELINE CONSORTIUM

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I will direct my supplementary question to the Minister of Transport, as suggested by the Minister of Justice. As far as I know, and I hope the minister will correct me if I am wrong, the present inquiry by Dr. Andrew Thompson does not provide any funding for adversary groups as was done in the case of the Berger inquiry. Why is there no provision that those persons interested in the environmental side can receive funding? Can the minister also advise concerning the first question I asked of the Minister of Justice about the lobbying activities of the consortium in terms of the Northern Council? Is there any restriction on that consortium in terms of lobbying witnesses who may appear before that inquiry?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, it would be rather unusual to expect questions of assistance to various participants to appear in the actual order-in-council appointing the inquiry officer. That is a special and separate question which is being given some consideration, particularly by my colleague, the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment. As far as the other question is concerned, I would certainly be glad to have a look at any more specific allegations the hon. member would like to make. I rather think the commissioner of inquiry will be able to take care of himself and his inquiry.

POSSIBILITY OF RE-ESTABLISHING CAPITAL PUNISHMENT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Jacques Lavoie (Hochelaga): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Solicitor General. I will not talk about Fox, I mean phoques. I am sorry!

Given the current wave of sordid crimes, mainly in the province of Quebec, and given the fact that penitentiary guards are in direct contact with some dangerous prisoners and that they fear for their personal safety as well as for policemen who deal with such criminals who have no respect for the lives of others and, finally, since the people never know when they might come face to face with dangerous individuals, could the minister tell the House if in his knowledge and belief, he intends in the near future to introduce a bill to re-establish the death penalty in order to check the wave of crimes which has been increasing ever since capital punishment was abolished?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is referring specifically to a bill which was adopted by parliament in July last year. This bill on abolition was passed during a free vote taken by a majority of members of three parties including the three leaders of the four parties represented in this House and, of course, the leader of the party to which the hon. member belongs. It is not my intention, Mr. Speaker, to go against the will of parliament. I only want to take my responsibilities and see to it that laws passed by the Parliament of Canada are applied.

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, if the love affair can be interrupted for a moment.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Forrestall: Mind you, I am envious. With regard to the high unemployment figures, particularly in Nova Scotia and throughout the Atlantic region, is the minister prepared to take the House into his confidence with regard to any intervention he will make to ensure that Canadian seamen, and hopefully Nova Scotians, will be given preference on board the cruise ship, Mercator One?

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): My first comment is that jealousy will lead you nowhere, my friend. As to the main thrust of the hon. member's question about what we might be offering to the Atlantic region, as I mentioned to the hon. member for Egmont yesterday, we have indicated our support to the Atlantic area by signing an agreement with the province of Prince Edward Island. I look forward to going to Nova Scotia very soon where I will be having discussions with the authorities in an effort to escalate some of our discussions and conclude some of the agreements we have been considering for some time. As to the other part of the question, we are still looking into the matter and I hope we shall be able to achieve something.

CONFEDERATION

POSSIBILITY CONCESSIONS TO REGIONAL ASPIRATIONS WILL SATISFY OBJECTIVES OF PREMIER OF QUEBEC

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. It arises from a statement made by the premier of Quebec in a weekend speech that by political sovereignty of Quebec he never said this meant the breakup of Canada. Does the Prime Minister consider that further concessions by the federal government to regional aspirations will meet the premier's objectives for sovereignty without the dissolution of confederation?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I think it would be refreshing if the government of Quebec would say clearly that it was not looking for independence but merely for some form of interdependence. I indicated last week that if this were the case we would certainly be anxious to sit down and hear what better constitution they have in mind. But as a prerequisite to that, we would have to know that they are renouncing their objective of independence. I hope the hon. member will support me.

REQUEST FOR PROGRESS REPORT OF STUDIES IN SOLAR ENERGY

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

Since the government and the public are concerned about the depletion of our nonrenewable energy resources, could the minister tell the House if research into the use of solar energy is going on quite actively and if progress has been made in the last two years? While on this subject, could he say whether he sees early possibilities of trying to use that energy in industry?

[English]

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Yes, Mr. Speaker. There has been marked progress over the last couple of years in solar research in this country. There have been a number of demonstration projects supported by the federal government—I think there is at least one in every province across the country at the present time. A number of industrial applications are being considered, and I would be very pleased to provide the hon. member with details. We are considering a government demonstration project for Ottawa itself.

PRIVILEGE

MR. BALDWIN—AGREEMENT WITH BOEING AIRCRAFT

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege which I believe affects the rights of all members of this House. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) does well to put down his documents, because this also affects him.

My question of privilege arises out of an agreement between the Minister of Justice of Canada and his counterpart in the United States. It has already been the subject of exchanges between myself and the minister. The right of members of this House to inquire about the expenditure of public funds is as old and as cherished as the institution itself. Our rights today are so limited that any attempt sensibly to diminish them further must be regarded with alarm and form the subject of such a question of privilege as I am now raising. I shall be very brief because the issue is plain.

The agreement in question provides that with respect to information gathered covering the potential illegal sales arrangements or considerations or activities of Boeing aircraft and all its subsidiaries in Canada there is an understanding reached between the ministers, between the two attorneys general, which covers this particular activity of the Boeing company. Part IV provides that except as provided in paragraph 5, which deals with taking criminal and other legal proceedings, all such information made available by the parties pursuant to these procedures, that is, the procedures for gathering information, and all correspondence between the parties relating to such information and to the implementation of these procedures shall be kept confidential by both parties and shall not be disclosed to third parties, including government agencies having no law enforcement responsibilities—which, of course, covers this parliament, the House of Commons and all its members.

This agreement is a solemn convenant between two high officials of two governments to operate as a gag rule to prevent knowledge of certain facts being brought to the attention of members of parliament. It is not enough just to have criminal proceedings taken. The Minister of Justice may have in his possession a large number of documents and a great deal of material and information. All he has to do is make a conscious decision not to go ahead with criminal proceedings or, if he does, to limit the information to very specific cases. Everything else can go into the shredder, and there is no way under those conditions in which members of this House can discharge their constitutional responsibility to make an inquiry as to what are the facts.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baldwin: As my hon. friend from Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence) has said, if the Public Accounts Committee or the Auditor General in the discharge of their parliamentary duties saw fit to call before them government officials, they would be prevented by the terms of this agreement from gathering the facts which would be essential to making a parliamentary inquiry. I am not talking about criminal proceedings. That is outside our jurisdiction at this moment. But there are collateral inquiries governing issues of potential impropriety and misdemeanours which from time to time need to be the subject of an inquiry under the Inquiries Act, by this House or by a committee of parliament.

For these reasons, I say the agreement to which I have referred is an invidious and improper one, curtailing as it does the rights of members of this House, and if Your Honour holds that there is a prima facie case of privilege I would move, seconded by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker):

That this House demand that the government explain fully the circumstances leading to this imprudent and dangerous agreement and, furthermore, on the basis that parliament has the primary responsibility to inquire into the proper expenditure of the taxpayers' money for the purchase of aircraft and supplies from Boeing Aircraft, that the agreement of March 15 and related circumstances be referred to the Standing Committee on Public Accounts.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I shall be very brief. I do not have a copy of the agreement in front of me, so I am unable to cite chapter and verse. But there is no question of privilege involved here, and to suggest otherwise is specious. It is clear from the terms of the agreement that it is drawn up in accordance with the domestic laws of the requesting and the requested states. Nowhere in the agreement are the laws of Canada in any way displaced by the terms of the undertaking or by any action taken thereon.

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I am joined in the motion and I want to say I question strongly the position which has been taken so blandly by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) that the right of parliament to know about matters which may be under investigation and in respect of which criminal charges have not been laid, and therefore our right to discuss and question these matters, has not been infringed.

The Minister of Justice said he felt the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) was advancing a specious argument. I must say, if it is the position of the Minister of Justice that information will be denied parliament, and that is what the agreement says, that information will be denied to members of parliament or to the public accounts committee, that certain information will be denied to the servant of parliament, the Auditor General, I cannot see how, with respect to any matter that is being investigated and with respect to which a charge has not been laid, the minister can stand up and hide behind an agreement made outside this place. If ever there was a specious argument, it is the one advanced by the minister.

One more thing, Mr. Speaker. With regard to the level of secrecy involved, which may be normal, the first paragraph of the agreement recites that all requests for assistance shall be communicated between the parties through diplomatic channels. I can just hear how the minister of external affairs, the parliamentary facsimile of Ivan Head, would deal with the matter if someone ever had the temerity to ask a question. What this agreement does is effectively bypass parliament's right to question, parliament's right to information, and the servant of parliament's right to information. I do not suspect that the Minister of Justice has taken leave of his senses, but I do think that his observations with respect to what is right and what is wrong, in terms of disclosure to parliament, indicate that his attitude to parliament is all wrong. Surely this place, as much as the Minister of Justice, has the right to know.

This agreement with the Boeing company, its subsidiaries or affiliates, does not strangle parliament, but it does close a door on parliament. In that sense my rights and the rights of all members to question are affected and I hope Your Honour will so find.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) gave the Chair notice of his intention to raise a general question of privilege relating to some documents in the possession of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) but was not any more specific than that in his notice. Certainly, no more specific notice was required by the Standing Orders. This question touches on the interpretation of an agreement. The Minister of Justice does not have the agreement here and, as he said in his brief intervention, he was not yet prepared to cite it.

I wonder whether it would be advisable, under the circumstances, to put the matter over for further argument for 24 hours to enable a better argument to be made. I would expect to reserve and to examine that argument carefully, and to pronounce judgment on it at some later time. If that benediction is understood, at three o'clock tomorrow afternoon I will call for argument. I would not expect it to be lengthy, but at least it would be in more detail by making sure that the parties had an opportunity to make reference to the agreement specifically. The argument might then be of more assistance to the Chair in coming to a conclusion on this very important question.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I rise on another point of order having to do with an observation that Your Honour made in the course of the question period which concerned me and some of my colleagues. I do not think it was a ruling and I know I should not question your ruling, but when the hon. member for York-Simcoe was attempting to be heard on a supplementary question to the Prime Minister, a question supplementary to one which the Prime Minister had not answered—in fact, he remained in his seat—Your Honour used the words, and I think I got them down, "a supplementary cannot flow from a question that is not answered".

I rise only to ensure that Your Honour did not mean that no question at all could flow from a question that was not answered. I put it to Your Honour, with the greatest respect, that quite often failure to answer might raise a question. If that ruling was allowed to stand, it could apply to any question following a question that was not answered, and it could leave us in the position where, if a minister did not wish to answer a question with respect to any matter and he anticipated a supplementary or a series of questions, he could refuse to answer the one question. If that was the ruling which Your Honour made, though I do not think it was, then no other question could flow. I raise this matter so that if Your Honour does wish to clarify the matter, I would certainly like to hear such clarification.

Mr. Speaker: I can put at ease the mind of the hon. member and other hon. members. I have no difficulty in saying that there could be situations where an unanswered question might give rise to a supplementary. I must confess some difficulty in allowing supplementaries where a question is not answered, because in fact supplementaries ought to flow out of an answer that is given to a question. While that may be the norm, I would not want to make it a general pronouncement that under no circumstances would I permit another question if the one which had been put had not been answered. That would not be the general case.

AMENDMENTS TO IMPLEMENT CHANGES IN IMMIGRATION POLICY

The House resumed from Tuesday, March 15, consideration of the motion of Mr. Cullen that Bill C-24, respecting immigration to Canada, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, last night before the adjournment of the debate I was canvassing the situation with regard to the present Immigration Act. I had a number of very serious criticisms to make with regard to the application of the act, the introduction of regulations and the postulate that these regulations have expressed the will of parliament, and a number of other points. I do not retract any of the statements I made last night.

Now I should like to turn to the bill before us. I want to make it very clear that while I have some pertinent questions to raise with regard to some of the clauses as they now appear, I think the present legislation, in some respects, is an improvement on the previous act and its application, and therefore it should receive the approval of the House to at least send it to committee where representations will be made. I have heard the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Haidasz) and others on the government side say that representations will be made on behalf of various interested persons and that the minister and his officials will be questioned much more closely as to the intent in the administration of the act and its interpretation, and also that the minister and his officials will have an opportunity to introduce the regulations. That point should be almost non-negotiable for the further passage of this legislation beyond the report stage. The regulations should be there to be seen, because they are the heart and core of this act. I hope the House will agree, either later this day or at a very early opportunity, with the sending of this bill to the committee for further consideration. It is not acceptance in principle.

There are a number of points that I want to raise with regard to the bill. Under clause 12 it is proposed, quite rightly so, that every applicant for landed immigrant status in Canada shall appear before an immigration officer. That is understandable. But what concerns me is that now, in many ports of entry, the immigration officer in the first line is a customs officer. It is not every Tom, Dick and Harry who is trained and qualified to be a customs officer who should be an immigration officer. An immigration officer is a man of particular skill who has important decisions to make. True enough, if the first-line immigration officer has any question about the application of the applicant, then it passes on to a second-line examination carried out, I understand, by an immigration officer, not a customs officer.

I have a particular interest in the Department of National Revenue, and I know the problems they are having with the customs officers. I understand that adequate steps will be taken—and this is a point I will make on another occasion—to provide adequate facilities for the better training of our customs officers so they can cope with both customs problems and immigration problems. It may be a training college or some other facility, but it would be more than just passing an examination of the public service. The requirement would be attendance at a familiarization course of indeterminate duration and then being placed at a port of entry where that individual would perform both as a customs and an immigration officer. If this first-line immigration officer is merely a reader of stamps and visas to see whether the page conforms with what has been laid down in some manual, then I question the value of that requirement. But if that person is going to be a functioning immigration officer, then let us be sure that he is adequately trained and has the adequate background knowledge of the Immigration Act and the regulations, that his decision shall be reviewable and that there shall be a second-line decision. This is one point to which I take grave exception.

Applicants for immigration to Canada, under the present act, who are in the field arrive at a decision with regard to the assessment of points or other factors. If the total does not add up, the decision is not reviewable. That is totally wrong. It is an injustice to the individual concerned or any individual representing that person. As a man who has had a great deal to do with immigration, I do not want to see this practice continue under the act. There must be a procedure developed within the department. It is not a question of going to the Immigration Appeal Board, but there again I am uncertain because I have also serious doubts as to civil rights and natural justice in the denial of access to the Immigration Appeal Board. Frankly, between what was passed two or three years ago with the limitation on the Immigration Appeal Board Act and the changes embodied in this act, I could almost say that the Immigration Appeal Board is a superfluous luxury.

The jurisdiction and the administration of that board which have been introduced into the immigration process on account of rights and justice have been cut away, frittered, although not entirely, but I think also the board has become too much like a court. Members of the board have imposed upon themselves certain rules which I think were not intended. So I think the whole question of the Immigration Appeal Board should be reviewed. It is not exactly relevant to discuss it here, but I have the report of the Law Reform Commission of Canada with regard to the Immigration Appeal Board.

I suggest that the report of the Law Reform Commission of Canada with regard to the Immigration Appeal Board be referred to a House committee for examination, because it makes some strong recommendations with regard to the workings of that board. I think that there should be some changes to the Immigration Appeal Board Act, but not those brought forward by the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Cullen), who himself is subject to the jurisdiction of the Immigration Appeal Board. In other words, the minister makes himself the prosecutor and the judge by bringing forward legislation which controls the Immigration Appeal Board, to which he later must submit. How do we load the dice? There will have to be some answers to that question.

There is another point to which I would like to refer. As I recall it, this bill says that there shall be no discrimination on the grounds of race, creed, colour—practically everything except age. For years I have been fighting the Department of Manpower and Immigration over its points system and with regard to penalties against people over age 35. I have been saying that this has been a practical denial of the government's stated intention that there should be no discrimination as to age. The public is not supposed to discriminate against people with regard to employment or any other thing on the ground of age, but the regulations under the Immigration Act say that that is allowable. I say that is wrong. I suggest that Bill C-24 is in contravention of clause 8 of Bill C-25. Clause 8 of Bill C-25 reads as follows:

> It is a discriminatory practice
> (a) to use or circulate any form of application for employment, or
> (b) in connection with employment or prospective employment,
> (i) to publish any advertisement, or
> (ii) to make any written or oral inquiry that expresses or implies any limitation, specification or preference based on a prohibited ground of discrimination.

Discrimination on the ground of age is prohibited, and under the Immigration Act as it is presently applied—under Manpower form 1234—in any inquiry with regard to employment there can be an inquiry as to age. That is now to be prohibited under Bill C-25 but not under Bill C-24. Since this immigration legislation is to be geared to manpower requirements—and that is the prime purpose of Bill C-24—an inquiry as to the age of a prospective immigrant and the allocation of points based upon age is, I suggest, in flagrant contravention of clause 8 of Bill C-25. I am glad to see, for instance, that with respect to reunification of families, parents under the age of 60 will be admitted regardless of Manpower form 1234. That is a big step forward, because there has been great heartbreak and difficulty because parents aged 45, 50 or 55 have been "totally unemployable" in this country.

These people have been considered to be totally unemployable in areas where the officials have said there should not be any admission of unskilled labour. They are talking about the service industries where people can act as assistant managers in local restaurants. To the officials, that is an unskilled occupation. They think that working in a kitchen as an assistant cook is an unskilled occupation; but these immigrants know the language required, they have the necessary family connections and, I suppose, the ability to make a particular operation work. However, do not try to explain that to a bureaucrat. When you try to explain that to departmental officials, you get the blanket assertion, signed by the minister or any number of officials, that it is the policy not to admit any unskilled labour.

Who says they are unskilled? Is it Manpower? Do these people have to fall under the headings of bricklayer, carpenter, electrician, certified by a union or certified by a provincial labour board? I would like to see those who make that assertion try to operate those establishments and find out whether they are skilled or unskilled. Some of them could not operate a corner peanut stand, yet they call others unskilled. There has to be a complete change of thinking in this area.

Let me assure this House that all of Canada is not to be painted with the same bland brush. There are high demands today in certain areas of the country for so called unskilled labour. There is a crying need for people in some regions, and yet suitable prospective immigrants are turned down. We are told we can put Greeks into Chinese restaurants, or Italians into Hindu restaurants. This is the same throughout the service industries. I am told this in letter after letter. This nonsense is compounded by Manpower officials in the Department of Manpower and Immigration and sometimes by the human rights legislation of some provinces. This is just not practical.

I am hopeful that under clause 19 one of the carryovers of the old act will be eliminated. I refer to epileptics. The wording is not as clear as I would like it to be, because to me there are some weasel words of discretion which will make it very difficult in appropriate cases to get at the reason a medical officer who has different views from others will be more restrictive. I suppose I am getting back to the question whether the prospective immigrant or his or her representative can gain access to the information they need. In the past I have had experiences where people have been ruled not admissible on medical grounds because of active tuberculosis. All that was required was a set of X-ray films examined by a radiologist and confirmed by a non-departmental official to determine that the original diagnosis was wrong. Over the years I have had many cases on simply that point. It is a question of being able to get at that information and question it. That is what I ask.

I raise another point which will have to come out in committee. The Immigration Appeal Board Act, which I do not have before me, provides that any person had a right to appeal to the Immigration Appeal Board if the appeal is made within Canada. Somewhere along the line an innocuous-looking order in council was passed which said that "any person" shall be defined as a "Canadian citizen." Therefore, we have the case of a landed immigrant, say a woman who has been here four years, marrying a person and not knowing that that person was not admissible to Canada. Perhaps he was here illegally. There could be extenuating circumstances which, for a number of reasons, one could argue before the Immigration Appeal Board. But, Mr. Speaker, unless that wife is a Canadian citizen there are no grounds for appeal and deportation must follow, even though the spouse in this country could then apply to bring the other spouse in from the other country, subject to ministerial approval. Mr. Speaker, how cruel; how wrong! What right is there, when the statute speaks of "any person", to abuse the right to pass regulations by saying that "any person" shall be limited to "Canadian citizen"?

To me, that is one of the orders in council that before the statutory instruments committee should be struck down because it is an abuse. That order in council, limiting the definition in that way, is entirely contrary to the spirit of the statute. But it made things very much simpler for the Department of Immigration. It applied a restriction on the Immigration Appeal Board, or the rights of persons to appeal to the Immigration Appeal Board which might rule against the decisions of immigration officers. That order in council, to me, is a denial of justice and a denial—indeed, an abuse—of the parliamentary process.

I hope that in the regulations we shall see some clarification of that much abused term "moral turpitude" which has been used, like some of the general orders, in the Queen's regulations. If you cannot find anything else with which to charge a person, you allege that he or she was guilty of moral turpitude. Even the signing of a statutory declaration, which the person did not understand, signing under pressure from the spouse, was deemed to be moral turpitude and an excuse to exclude the wife of a man already in Canada as a landed immigrant. I hope that we shall get some explanation of section 10, and that students will not be limited to university and other institutions over and above high school. There are so many young people who must clear up one or two subjects.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but I must inform him that his allotted time has expired. He may continue with the unanimous consent of the House. Does the hon. member have unanimous consent to continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I thank you and hon. members of the House. I shall take only three or four minutes to make some positive suggestions which I want to see included in the regulations and in the statute. I think we have accomplished a great deal in our program of immigration by admitting students who have come into this country to finish their high school education so they can be eligible for university entrance. The trouble is that the requirements for university entrance are not uniform across Canada. Why say, then, that they shall all be qualified for university entrance only? Why cannot we bring them in, perhaps to improve their English? There are institutions, colleges and high schools which would do this. I have no difficulty introducing high school students to high schools in Edmonton on a selective basis. The classes are half empty in some places, and they are happy to do it. I am thinking of Mount Royal College, Calgary, and Concordia College in Edmonton, which can prepare students for university according to the standards of the university they have chosen. But section 10, unless amended by regulation, prohibits that. I think that is wrong. There should be more flexibility in that section.

Also, I want to see something done about the regulations and the application of those regulations with regard to special inquiries. I have read transcripts of special inquiries which to me, as a lawyer, cry out as an abuse of justice. They were filled with hearsay evidence, unexplained requirements, and so on. Individuals were intimidated by the very nature of the formal process. Frankly, they did not have a nickel's chance of beating the rap, to use that term, unless accompanied by counsel well versed in what goes on at special inquiries. Over the years I have read transcripts of some special inquiries and if those proceedings had been taken against the criminal it would have taken a court of appeal less than ten seconds to throw them out.

Also, why should the criminal have a higher right than the poor individual coming in as an immigrant? This process must be looked at, Mr. Speaker. If a special inquiry officer makes a decision, that should be reviewable on the spot by a senior officer, not somebody far removed, as now, at regional headquarters or headquarters. Why do I say this? A special inquiry officer may order the detention of a person, just like that, and it is not appealable. I also say this—and let me say here that I exchanged correspondence with the minister and I know the problems he is facing—that in Edmonton if detention is ordered by a special inquiry officer, it will be at the Fort Saskatchewan jail.

Mr. Speaker, there can be no more inhuman decision taken than that taken by special inquiry officers to place men or women into that common tank, that jail of hardened criminals. There is no requirement at the present time for separate facilities which would have to be maintained full-time. I would invite the minister, the deputy minister or anybody else to accompany me into the tank at Fort Saskatchewan jail and see the conditions to which they submit persons who have not been guilty of a criminal act but for some reason or another have run afoul of the Immigration Act. They would not force that upon the meanest cur, but they would do it to a fellow human being. I protest that. Hopefully, negotiations are under way with the appropriate provincial authorities so that there will be adequate detention facilities for persons charged under the Immigration Act—but not the criminal tank. That is not their place.

I have had a lot to say about this act. I hope my colleagues in this House will allow me to appear at the committee when we have hearings because I am firmly dedicated to getting a most workable and humane Immigration Act. I have had 20 years' experience as a member of parliament and have fought many cases before the Immigration Appeal Board. Incidentally, I have not lost one of those I have taken to the Immigration Appeal Board. I can assure the minister that when it comes to the interpretation of the law in so far as those two acts are concerned, his officials have not been quite up to the mark in those cases where I have appeared. At least, the board has always ruled in favour of some poor individual.

We have to get a workable Immigration Act that responds to the needs of the country and the people. They shall not be mere chattels or cattle that we will be importing. We shall not handle them in this country any different than we handle Canadian citizens. They are human beings and they have the dignity of human beings. To direct an immigrant to go to such and such a place under penalty, or possible penalty of expulsion if that person should move, is not right. We would not do it to one of our fellow citizens. We have a great job to do with this act. I hope that parliament, in its wisdom, will accomplish it. I hope I have the opportunity of contributing in that respect.

I commend to my colleagues the passage of this bill to go to the committee so that we can introduce the necessary amendments and have the necessary explanations. Since many of us who could not attend the public hearings have a great deal of experience on all facets of immigration, perhaps we could make a contribution. I thank you, Mr. Speaker, and the House for these additional moments.

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, the bill under study contains statements of principle which, at first glance, invite our support. However, for a country like ours immigration is becoming a vital question, considering that through immigration we can or could control in a way the very nature of our country. Otherwise we would be ignoring the fact that different nations exist in this country. And since November 15, that fact has no doubt become more obvious.

Indeed, we saw last week the Quebec minister of immigration object to at least some provisions of this bill. I would like, Mr. Speaker, to deal with some of the factors which make immigration a sensitive question in Canada. Of course, we ought not to fall into generalizations and charges such as those the Minister of National Revenue (Miss Bégin) indulged in last night when she said that the Quebec minister of immigration was being racist in his statements on immigration.

Mr. Speaker, that is absolutely not the question. We all know that every man should at the outset be considered as perfectly equal, no matter his colour, race, religion; this is obvious and of course I agree with that as does every one else in the House. But one would be blind not to find that to this day immigration in Canada has been a self-destructing factor for the province of Quebec, since immigration in Quebec has always been contrary to the national interests of French Canadians of Quebec. I would much rather it were not so, Mr. Speaker. But the strongest evidence of that lies in famous Bill 22. For some years now, the successive Quebec governments have all tried to deal with the language problem in Quebec, and up till now they have all failed and all met with disastrous consequences.

Mr. Speaker, Bill 22 would never have been introduced if immigration in Quebec had been dealt with normally but, as it was always dealt with abnormally, it follows that when the people demand that things be set straight which were always upside down, some think that they are revolutionaries who want to destroy everything. But, Mr. Speaker, nothing is to be destroyed at all when one says that it would be normal for anyone, regardless of where he comes from in the world, who decides to come and live in Quebec, for that person to integrate into the spirit of the majority of the people in Quebec. Is there anything more normal than that?

But for years and years the opposite happened, with the result that in the province of Quebec, where only about 4 per cent of the population are of Anglo-Saxon origin—yes, only 4 per cent in the whole of Quebec—16 per cent are still Anglophones in a Francophone province. Why? Because immigrants continually joined the minority instead of the majority, so much so that they had better schools than the majority.

They had more English-speaking universities in Quebec than there were French-speaking universities. The minority had more universities than the majority. And yet we Quebec taxpayers paid more from our own pocket to allow such a situation. This is ridiculous, as much as all Canada is ridiculous, and this is why we will have to reconsider the whole thing some day. In the meantime, when the minister introduces legislation concerning such a vital matter as immigration, it is very important to establish priorities. One of them already exists, and the minister admits it, for his bill refers to consultations with the provinces. It would have been shocking to leave out this priority.

But I think this legislation is deficient because it provides for consultations but not for a government priority as regards immigration. Although the Canadian constitution allows both the federal government and the provinces to deal with immigration, we should be wise enough in this parliament to decide that the priority should go to the provinces. In my opinion, there is nothing to argue about it.

Obviously the problem is not as acute in the provinces with an overwhelming English-speaking majority. Of course I understand that this matter is of secondary importance for most Canadian provinces but its essential and vital importance to Quebec should be recognized. Therefore I can only agree when the minister responsible for immigration in Quebec says categorically and clearly that an agreement is required in this area.

I understand that we could trust the honesty of the federal government but, Mr. Speaker, the people of Quebec know what that means. We have trusted it for years and where are we now? The effect has been that more often than not we are second-class citizens, who are full of complexes and who ask themselves to what extent they can consider Canada as their own country. This is where we are now. Therefore others seem to be aware of this now. It is strange that this awareness comes at a time when Quebec is on the verge of independence and that we have been waiting so long, but these are the facts.

So I think that the government should display a more efficient flexibility and when it legislates on matters such as immigration it should at least realize that in that field the province of Quebec must have priority. That is why I feel consultations are not sufficient. Mr. Speaker, everybody knows that we almost have dictatorship with the present Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). We know very well that consultations can sometimes amount to precious little and if we go back to November 14, 1976, we all recall that the Prime Minister was still taking the liberty of saying to the provinces: whether or not you accept it, that is what is going to be done. So he said.

He did it again. Even in the evening of November 15, his first reaction was not a wise one but rather he said: we are going to organize Lévesque and his government. His first reaction was one of disillusion, like somebody who wants to kick over the traces. Mr. Speaker, since that time he has become almost bland and he wants to change everything. He is ready to do anything. We do not know what, however, but he said he would go as far as amending the constitution. If he is ready to do all that, he should begin by making changes in his bills so as to prove his good will, because people have had enough talk. Quebec has had enough. We want action, we want proof that federalism is worthwhile, that it will not continue to be a burden for us. So, to prove it, things must be made clear when such a bill is introduced. That is what I find unfortunate, and I think that it is so important that failing to think of solving that problem would prove there is no intent on his part to solve all other problems.

But that problem, Mr. Speaker, is so important, so essential that I wonder if, before introducing his bill, the minister should not have met the authorities of other provinces, especially the province of Quebec. Then he could have introduced the bill and said that he had the agreement of all provincial ministers responsible; we would have been able then to discuss the subject matter, its form, and reach a worthwhile and efficient conclusion.

But since that was not done, we are faced once more with a dilemma. I gave a concrete example of this a minute ago while discussing Bill 22. Some members seemed surprised at my making a connection over this but, Mr. Speaker, I could come back to it for a few seconds to show that it is a fact. Who created problems with regards to Bill 22? It is common knowledge that it was the Italian community of Montreal. It was not the Anglo-Saxons since there are none in Quebec. The vast majority of English-speaking Quebecers are of Italian origin, plus many other nationalities; they did it. I understand them and do not blame them.

But the successive administrations in Quebec have always tolerated these abnormalities, that is why it seems revolutionary to talk of correcting them, as I said earlier. Nevertheless, truth always prevails and we must see things in their true perspective. And if there is a problem in Quebec today and that terrible mess about Bill 22, it is because we have not been diligent enough to give the responsibility with regards to immigration to those who are best able to judge in this respect and, this being so, the provincial authorities should have had such a responsibility. That is why I still hope that the consultations indicated in the bill will have some effect and bring about an understanding to define precisely the powers of the various levels of government in this area.

But fundamentally, I believe that these things had to be said in the House. We will have to consider more and more the possibility of amending this bill to establish clearly certain priorities for the control of immigration at the level of the Quebec administration. Once we have control over immigration at that level, we will have nothing else to criticize, to find fault with in the federal administration in this area. Indeed there are those who will jump to the conclusion, Mr. Speaker, when considering the facts I have enumerated a while ago, that we are trying to drown systematically the French-speaking element in Quebec. I am not saying they are right, but considering the way things are going on, we are inclined to think so. This is why I think the minister has very well pointed out the advantages of this bill, putting particular emphasis on the consulting process with the provinces. He took pride in the fact that he had introduced this provision in the bill. I can only congratulate him for having done this. But, Mr. Speaker, consultation is not enough nowadays, in 1977. Terms of agreement have to be determined and this is nothing less than giving control over immigration to those who are able to give it a direction likely to favour emancipation and openness.

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I will not take too much of the time of the House, but there are some specific aspects of the bill with which I want to deal since I think that the ramifications of particular provisions for Canada's international relations are very serious indeed. Why I relate specific provisions to Canada's international relations is because of the Helsinki accord and our capacity as a nation to persuade countries that refuse to allow their citizens to leave, such as the Soviet Union, Czechoslovakia and a good many of the eastern European countries, to observe that accord. If we are going to be successful in terms of persuading such countries that their citizens have the right of freedom of movement from one country to another, then why, in God's name, have we included in this bill clause 115(1)(n)? Let me read this provision, since I fear the significance of it has been lost to some extent on the general public and it should be brought to their attention:

> The governor in council may make regulations . . .
> (n) requiring any person or class of persons to report to an immigration officer before leaving Canada and prescribing the information to be provided and the manner in which such report shall be made to the immigration officer by any such person—

Any plain reading of that provision leads me to the conclusion that this is the beginning of exit visas for Canadians. I am glad to see the minister is flipping through the bill, because I should like to hear his response. Surely it is hypocritical of this government to condemn the Soviet Union, Czechoslovakia, Poland and all the other countries who wrongfully refuse to allow their citizens to rejoin their families and who have violated the Helsinki accord, when the government inserts into this law the capacity to require exit visas for its own citizens before they leave this country.

The minister will probably say that this is a catch-all section, that the government is trying to catch some of the bad boys. Or he may say that this does not really apply to any particular person but refers only to illegal immigrants who are leaving the country. But the clause does not say that, Mr. Speaker. I have read what it says and I do not accept explanatory notes.

Clearly, there is authority under this provision to require exit visas for Canadians before they leave the country. If we are going to embark upon that route, I will feel awfully funny when I write to the local Czech chargé d'affaires, as I have been doing to try to unify a family in my community, and as I am sure other members have who have similar cases, and ask why this oppressive regime does not allow the unification of families and why they continue to violate the Helsinki accord. The answer of the chargé d'affaires at the Czechoslovakian embassy to me will be, "Look at clause 115(1)(n) of your own Immigration Act". He will say that all countries do this and we are no different from any other.

I urge the minister to withdraw this provision from the bill. The Helsinki accord cuts both ways, not just one way. We love to jump up and complain about other regimes, but let us look to home first and make sure that our act is clean. Then when the hon. member for York-Scarborough (Mr. Stanbury) goes to the United Nations he will not have to hide clause 115(1)(n) when talking to his counterparts about their consistent violation of the Helsinki accord. I urge the government seriously to reconsider that particular provision. Although I have reservations about photographing and fingerprinting, to me this particular provision is the most iniquitous because it clearly gives the government power to restrict the movement of Canadian citizens from this country.

I remember a long time ago we condemned the United States for refusing to allow a man called Paul Robeson to leave that country. The reason was that he was saying some very anti-American things abroad. He was complaining that society was racist and he was embarrassing his government. If a Canadian citizen wishes to leave this country and to criticize Canada, that is his right and I do not think we should restrict this kind of freedom of ideas under the provisions of this law.

I submit to the minister that what was done to Paul Robeson can clearly be done to any person in Canada no matter what are his political views. If this government did not want him to travel, they could clearly apply clause 115(1)(n). This is one of the reasons out of many why we in this party will oppose this bill. We think this provision is so serious in terms of our international relations and the reunification of families in Canada that it strikes at the heart of the principle of what to some extent this country stands for, namely, the freedom to travel and to go abroad.

I am concerned, as many Canadians are, that we are dealing with the immigration bill at a time when we have officially one million people unemployed in Canada. At a time when we have high unemployment we face a very high risk in Canada of increasing racist tensions among people, particularly working people who feel far less secure about their employment and about the competition which may come from immigrant groups for their employment, and because of that increasing tension we have to be cautious about the approach we take to immigration. Some of the evidence that racism is growing in Canada need not be repeated. There are many examples of it. I am getting a little tired of going back to my riding and hearing someone in a men's club telling racist jokes. We should all look into ourselves and say that is not a respectable thing to do in this country; it is too dangerous.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Leggatt: I am tired of people who cloak racism under articles about immigration. The idea that we have to maintain a certain ethnic character in this country is an idea I reject. I think we can bring in people of whatever origin so long as they are needed in Canada. The problem up to now has been that we have not properly assessed our needs in terms of immigration. I do not see immigration as anybody's right to come to this country; I still say it is a privilege.

I know my friend, the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin), does not agree, but that is what makes our party so healthy. We have healthy disagreements on a number of questions. I say that those who see it as an excuse to apply racism in terms of their chance to deal with the unemployment situation should not be allowed to do so. I reject that out of hand. But we must consider immigration in terms of Canadian need.

The B.C. schools trustees association in my province recently made a decision that a film that had been made about the history of British Columbia which dealt with our own attitudes to various racial groups, particularly the Chinese, the Japanese and the East Indian communities, should not be shown in those schools. The argument they used was that that kind of film would be inflammatory. I say that their refusal to allow the history of B.C. to be told in the school system is itself inflammatory, is itself wrong.

We have to expose the history of Canadians in terms of the racial tensions that have developed. I am including, of course, the problems with regard to the Japanese and the rotten record of the Liberal government of that time in dealing with the right of the native Japanese Canadians. We have a poor race record in Canada, and let us admit it. We have a bad record with regard to the toleration of other groups, and the sooner we get it out of the way, the faster we can move on to tolerating people of various ethnic backgrounds.

Let me say how this is related to this bill. I am delighted the bill clearly does not discriminate on the basis of national origin, and I must say that that is a feature in the bill which could almost persuade me to change my mind about voting against it on second reading, except for this fantastic power that is given in terms of the discretion under the regulations. That in itself is too bitter a pill to swallow, even in the face of what seems to be some improvement in other sections of the bill.

I want to deal now with another principle which this bill does not protect. There are visitors to this country and there are immigrants to this country. Once in a while we have a visitor to this country who has very radical ideas, ideas with which probably very few people would agree. I am referring to people whose ideas may be unpopular in this country. But we should not be afraid of ideas. Surely we should be able to explore ideas. I am referring to the recent case of André Frank and the refusal to allow him to come to this country. Mr. Frank had something to contribute to the academic life of this country, but he was denied access to Canada. We have done it before. We still seem to have trouble distinguishing between revolutionary ideas and people who might commit terrorist acts. I say that the record is a bad one in Canada. We err continually on the side of excluding those people with unpopular ideas who are no danger whatsoever to Canada. I think we are strong enough and big enough as a country to explore a whole range of ideas. A few of them might rub off, and this would not hurt us at all.

I do not want to take a long time on this bill. There are provisions in it which require fingerprinting and photographing. I should like to ask hon. members how they would feel if they were fingerprinted and photographed each time they entered another country. I realize that this again is under a regulation that can be narrowly interpreted. We would like to see it limited. We do not want to wait and hope that discretion will be exercised in a proper way, because there have been instances in the past when that discretion has not been exercised in a fair way.

I want to say that I stand this afternoon in opposition to the immigration bill. I accept the principle that we have to limit the population in Canada in accordance with our needs. I also happen to think that this country does not need 50 million people.

I see the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) is here. I remember his famous remark about that subject some years ago. I liked the population of Canada in 1939. It was a nice place at that time. We had a lot of room and our ecology was well protected. I do not think we need to have all this growthmanship of developing another giant on the north American continent. We can be cautious about population growth. We can set an example to the world in terms of the way we relate our environment and our geography to the number of people who are in Canada, and we can keep this country one of the most desirable countries in the world by having a reasonable program of family planning and a reasonable program—

Mr. Epp: A program for abortion?

Mr. Leggatt: —in terms of the country as a viable combination of population. I hear my friend saying, "Abortion from my point of view". I want to tell him that I do not favour abortion. I do not think he does. I suppose we could relate that to the bill. I do not favour abortion, but I do favour family planning. I do favour the right of the family to have a certain number of children for which they can plan, and I must say that the question of abortion is related to population, no matter how much we want to avoid that question, and we had better get to work on family planning or we will continue to have too many abortions in Canada. I can deal in another context with the civil liberties question. But we must continue to oppose provisions which embarrass us abroad, as clause 115(1)(n) does, and which have the capacity for giving to this government far too draconian a power in terms of regulation.

• (1630)

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, the first reading of Bill C-24 took place on November 24 of last year. Since then I have been concerned about the approach of the government to this most important subject. When we brush aside the sweeping generalities and the gloss in the bill, the proposed legislation simply asks parliament to give the government and its advisers a free hand in establishing immigration programs of unknown and unspecified characteristics. This raises an important question: does this government's past performance justify the kind of trust it is now asking for?

I will not dwell on the weaknesses or the purpose contained in this badly written and questionable bill; spokesmen for our party have already covered this ground pretty thoroughly. But I would like to give one or two illustrations of the defects of the bill before questioning the minister about the relationship between the bill and the government's immigration record. The minister's first objective is to establish and obtain demographic goals with respect to the size, rate of growth, structure and geographic distribution of the Canadian population. What does this mean? The government does not tell us how it will establish its demographic goals. It does not even define the term "demographic". We can only guess at the intention of the government. Does the government mean that it will decide how many people will live here and there, and what their origins must be? If this, or anything like it, is so, I want to know what right a democratic government has to determine the composition and nature of a nation. There is a reminiscence of George Orwell here, and I do not like it. I am sure most Canadians will be equally concerned. The minister should tell us what he really has in mind.

The bill also states that the government will enrich and strengthen the cultural and social fabric of Canada by taking into account the federal and bilingual nature of the nation. Here is another fuzzy area. What does the government really mean? Bilingualism certainly has a number of different meanings in Canada today. In Windsor it may mean the forceful introduction of French schools over the objections of local residents. In Quebec it means French only for immigrants. I do not think the minister should allow any doubt to exist in this matter. Some people may feel that the government intends to continue catering to Quebec by ignoring legislation like Bill 22 and by sending to that province immigrants who are French-speaking or who are prepared to accept the racial policies of the Parti Quebecois and the previous Liberal administration. What does it mean for the rest of Canada? Are we to continue to receive large numbers of non English-speaking immigrants who are encouraged to retain their languages and customs? I think the minister should come clean and tell us what he really has in mind.

I would also like to know what the minister means when he states that we must not discriminate in the selection of immigrants on the grounds of race, national or ethnic origin, colour, religion, or sex. This sounds more like a pious hope than an immigration policy. I am sure all Canadians wish to be fair and want their government to judge a man by his qualities rather than by his appearance or origin. However, having said that, I wonder whether Canadians would support an immigration policy which could make a fundamental change in the nature of Canada's population.

Surely the people who come to this country do so to join us, not to change us. So it must be advantageous for us to recruit people who are most likely to adapt to our way of life. Charity begins at home, and whatever we do in immigration should be geared to the interests of the Canadians who are now here, so in that sense, surely, it is important for us to discriminate. But once again the minister should make his position crystal clear. If he wants to turn Canada into a multiracial society without roots and without unity, then he should tell us. If he is really giving lip service to old clichés, then he should tell us that as well.

I am also troubled by the inference that the government may allow its immigration policy to be influenced by foreign governments. I suspect that this may have happened in the past, and I hope that my suspicions are unfounded. When the government states that one of its basic policies will be to meet its international legal obligations with respect to refugees and to uphold its humanitarian traditions with respect to the displaced and the persecuted, I wonder what this really means. If the minister intends to follow automatically the lead of the United Nations, then we may find ourselves supporting refugees of one type but not another. Events in Africa could easily lead us to a racial situation of the very worst type, and I do not think we should be tied to an international obligation that would place us in this position. Will the minister tell us precisely what the government has in mind?

While I am dealing with this subject I would like to have the minister's assurance that foreign governments are not involved in Canada's immigration program and that there has never been a foreign government involved in an immigration movement that has taken place without the knowledge or consent of this House. I am not talking about colonial times; I am referring to the more modern period that began after World War II. I am a little amused by the last objective, and if the government really means it, I must say it is long overdue. The problem, of course, is how the government is going to manage it. The bill states that Canada should promote international order and justice by denying the use of Canadian territory to persons who are likely to engage in criminal activity. All I can say to this is, "Thank God the government has finally come to its senses". But what is it going to do about the international criminals who are already here? The minister should tell us how many criminals are living in Canada illegally. He should list the number of persons with criminal records who have been permitted to remain in Canada in spite of such criminal records during the last five years, giving the reasons why these people were permitted to remain.

Now let me come back to my question. Does this government's past performance justify the kind of trust it is requesting? During the last ten years Canadian immigration policy has been a national disgrace. There seems to be no rhyme or reason to the way in which it is handled, and I often have the impression that it has been running along out of control and out of harmony with national interests. This may not be justified, but my concern is shared by many others, and now that we are discussing the whole question of immigration the minister has an opportunity to put the record straight.

The problem of illegal immigrants must be fully outlined and considered. As I understand it, these people came to Canada as visitors and then stayed without obtaining immigration status. Most of them were people who could not meet our overseas selection standards or were barred from entering Canada because they were criminals, subversives, or in other prohibited classes. As they were permitted to enter without any form of registration or screening, there was no way of determining whether they were still in Canada after their visits were over.

How did we get into this mess? The costs have been staggering and the government has ended up allowing tens of thousands of workers to remain here who do not have anything like the minimum qualifications that are normally required, while others are lined up at immigration offices around the world. This has created imbalances in our labour force, taken jobs away from Canadian workers, placed great strains on our social welfare services, and is an important reason for our current unemployment situation. I want to know what has happened and who was responsible for it. When our party was in office, immigration was under the management of the Hon. Ellen Fairclough, and later under the Hon. Richard A. Bell. Most visitors, other than persons from a few countries like the United States, the United Kingdom and France, required visitors' visas to enter Canada. This gave us their names, and if they overstayed we knew who we were looking for. But even more important, the requirements screened out most criminals and subversives because they did not present themselves to our overseas officers.

When was this system changed? Who changed it? Why was it changed? Did the people responsible for the change understand where their actions would lead? The minister should list the names of all people who participated in these deliberations, with details about their advice and why it was or was not taken. He should also indicate how the situation will be handled under the new legislation.

One of our great economic problems is the low productivity of our labour force. There is no doubt that illegal immigrants who do not meet our worker requirements have contributed to this problem, but I understand that the entire flow of immigrant workers, when balanced against Canadians who migrate to other countries, does not give us the occupational balance that is needed to improve or maintain our productivity. Some time ago the immigration branch worked out a scheme with most of the provinces for surveys to determine the provincial worker requirements that should be filled through immigration. I am told by provincial officials that when the immigration flow was geared to this program it was very successful, but it was suddenly stopped without explanation. Would the minister tell us how long the program ran, who was responsible for it, and, most important, why it was stopped? He should also indicate how the new legislation will work in this area and what provision, if any, is being made for the systematic involvement of the provinces.

Some of my colleagues believe that most of the current immigration problems began back in 1966 and 1967, just after the old department of citizenship and immigration became the Department of Manpower and Immigration. They still talk about the extraordinary events that took place during the discussions on the 1966 white paper on immigration. As most of us were not here at that time it would be helpful if the minister would tell us what really happened. I have read the white paper. It is an interesting document. The words were right. But why were the results so different? Perhaps it will be clearer if I quote from the paper, which states:

—the unproductive worker, exposed to unemployment, will be the uneducated one who lacks the capacity for learning new, more complex skills... the productivity of the work force should not be offset by the immigration policy as it would be if a large proportion of the immigrants were unskilled.

This sounds great, and it is certainly an approach that could be supported by members on all sides of the House who have the best interests of the nation at heart. My colleagues who were here at that time tell me they went to the initial meetings of the parliamentary committee, convened to consider the white paper's proposals, with great expectations. But to their surprise it became clear that Liberal backbenchers on the committee were against their own government's position and began a campaign to have it changed. Meetings were held all through the winter of 1966-67 and they gradually became less and less productive. One by one the good ideas were discarded. Departmental officials had little to contribute and began to act as technical advisers. One provincial official from my province sat up half the night preparing for the questions he expected after the presentation of his brief. He was amazed when he was not asked one significant question. Then, suddenly, the whole process ended.

On April 11, 1967, Jean Marchand, now Senator Marchand, told the committee that the white paper would be abandoned and he unveiled a completely new plan. Our members had spent the whole winter discussing a formal government proposal which was abandoned in 20 minutes without an opportunity for discussion. They thought they would be asked to consider a new plan, but there were no more meetings. It was a highly unusual move. Now that we are considering a new Immigration Act, I think the minister should tell us what happened.

When Mr. Marchand said that the white paper would be set aside he indicated that his department had devised a point-rating scheme for the selection of immigrant workers, and then he increased the number of classes that could be nominated by distant relatives. Rather curiously, in spite of what he had stated in the white paper, he stressed the importance of personal suitability over education and occupational training. He said that a brother would not be admissible solely because he was a brother, but he would be admissible as long as he ranked very modestly in the other selection categories. Provided he had good personal qualities, he would be admissible virtually without skill or education.

What did he mean? I think the minister should explain it in detail. Did he really mean that workers would be allowed to enter Canada without skills and educational levels needed in the labour force? I have noted that the percentage of unskilled immigrants entering Canada that year was 32 per cent higher than it was the previous year. Why was this allowed to happen at a time when the percentage of unskilled persons in the labour force had been steadily dropping at the rate of about 27 per cent for five or six years? At the same time unemployment was rising, as it is today, and the same Mr. Marchand had previously said that the unproductive worker would be the uneducated one who lacked the capacity for learning new or complex skills.

Mr. Marchand abandoned the white paper in April. Four months later an order in council was passed to introduce the new point-rating system. Why did it take so long? It would be helpful if the minister would tell us what really happened during this period. When was the rating system really established? Who were the people responsible for it? Did it require changes or modifications after its initial introduction? If so, what were the reasons for the changes, and who authorized them?

Now I want to turn to a very serious matter that requires immediate clarification. For some time it has been rumoured that the immigration department had used unofficial quotas to control immigration from our traditional sources of immigration. I should tell the minister that I find this extremely difficult to accept, but I want his assurance that it has never happened, and will never happen in the future.

I have also heard that immigration advertising in some of the traditional countries was substantially reduced and that this was done at a time when offices were being opened in other countries where it was obvious that we could only obtain large percentages of unskilled applicants. I would like the minister to comment on this as well and tell us if there has ever been an instance where this has occurred. It would be a sorry day for Canada if it should turn out that this government has restricted the flow of traditional immigrant workers while encouraging the flow of unskilled people.

I have heard reports that one deputy minister of immigration told a representative of the provincial government that he would limit the flow of immigrants from one traditional country regardless of that province's requirements for skilled and professional workers, and that no explanation was given. It was even suggested that some kind of mathematical formula would be applied to restrict immigration flows from certain areas. I find this incredible and I want the minister's assurances that it has never happened.

I understand that one of the planks of the proposed legislation is the idea that people who are willing to go to designated areas where their services are in greater demand will be given preferential consideration at the time of selection. The idea sounds great—but does the minister really think it will work? I understand that it is not a new idea and it was tried out in the early 1950s and abandoned. I wonder if the minister will tell us about the the early farm workers, about the track workers' programs? I would like him to explain why they were not successful and describe some of the by-products of fraud and manipulation that went with them. There is no point starting back into the same old problem area. I want the minister to describe his reasoning.

In conclusion, let me say that I am not satisfied with the provisions of this bill. If it becomes law, the department will be able to go on its own course without parliamentary approval or understanding. Its track record, even in the few illustrations I have given, certainly does not justify this kind of power. On the other hand, if the minister will sit down with us openly and will honestly confide in us in the committee, we may be able to come to a mutually satisfactory position that will be in the interest of all Canadians.

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, a number of members who have spoken on this bill have suggested that it probably will prove to be the most far-reaching and important legislation to come before this House not only in the present session but in the life of this parliament. We are deciding, in this legislation, what kind of country this is to be. It deals partly with economic questions and it certainly deals with demography.

My grandparents came to this country from southern Russia 102 years ago. They left Russia because the political climate of the country was volatile then, as it was for several generations afterwards, and because they were concerned about the future of their family. They did not want to raise their family in that political climate. They were people of very strong religious beliefs. They wanted to pass those beliefs, values and traditions on to their children, and knew that if they stayed in Russia those opportunities would be jeopardized and family life would not remain as it had been. So they left, at considerable economic disadvantage, and moved to the prairies of our country. They lived in sod-houses. They lived in southern Manitoba and moved to Saskatchewan before Saskatchewan was a province and was part of the Northwest Territories.

Later, my parents lived in an isolated part of British Columbia. Being concerned about the conditions under which their family was growing up, they decided to move again, once more at considerable economic disadvantage, from that isolated area of British Columbia to a more populated area of Canada in order to give their family the benefit of all the advantages which could accrue to them. Again it was the family that was most important to them. One thing that I have appreciated about my grandparents and parents—and I know that other members can say the same—is that they passed those values on to me. In my home the family is the most important thing to me. That is one of the reasons I sponsored the private members' bill which government members and members of other parties in this House supported yesterday. It is the protection of the children we are after. If we do not protect the family in our society, our country will go downhill on greased skids. It is the family that is important.

I am not the only member of this House who shares that kind of tradition. There are those in this country who think that members of our party are looking for a sanctuary for Anglo-Saxons. That is such a distortion of the truth that it deserves no attention. I would, however, like to put on record a list of the names of our caucus members which ought to be indelibly imprinted upon members of this House and upon the Canadian public. Let me just read to members the following names: Diefenbaker, Alexander, Mazankowski, Paproski, Hnatyshyn, Andre, Skoreyko, Epp, Yewchuk, Korchinski, Alkenbrack, Schumacher, Oberle, Jelinek, Masniuk, Elzinga, Friesen, Mitges, Schellenberger—

An hon. Member: La Salle.

Mr. Friesen: And La Salle.

Mrs. Holt: You are being racist against the Anglo-Saxons.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Friesen: Jack Marshall is another one.

Mrs. Holt: You should object; he is being racist.

Mr. Woolliams: You are not a Tory, but you will be.

Mr. Friesen: Yes, you'll be Tory. There are those who want to label and almost libel members of our caucus because we want to have a responsible immigration policy. With the kind of a heritage we have in this caucus I should not have to emphasize, but seemingly I do, that we want an immigration policy because our tradition stems from that kind of policy. I am offended by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Lee) when I read in Hansard at page 3900 that he said the spokesman for our party, the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp), said that the members of this party "do not give much importance to the principle of family reunification". I am offended by that. As the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) said this afternoon, there are some words in this House that are considered unparliamentary. That statement by the hon. member for Vancouver East is diametrically opposed to the truth. He went on to say:

> He is against grandparents of any age sponsored by a Canadian citizen being included in the family class and the retention of the nominated category. His rationale for rejection of the nominated category is that they congregate in the urban areas but independents do not.

Again I want to emphasize that I resent that kind of statement being made by the hon. member for Vancouver East because it libels members of this caucus. It does not do any justice to the truth. The kind of tradition and heritage that we hold in this caucus and in this House ought to put some kind of restraint on a member like the hon. member for Vancouver East. I might add that I and other members of this parliament refuse to be whipped into servile, cringing submission to government measures by that kind of emotional blackmail.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Friesen: What we are looking for is a responsible policy that is well defined so that we, as legislators, and the Canadian people know where we are going. We want a policy that is clearly defined. Other members have said that we need to have a copy of the regulations and the opportunity to debate the regulations just as much as we want to debate the statute itself. The minister has sat there and nodded his head, saying in effect that he will provide the regulations at committee stage. All he will do is nod his head. He will never put it on the record.

I wish the minister would say emphatically and unequivocally that the regulations will be before the committee for open discussion, the committee will be responsible for the revision of those regulations, and that they will be the regulations under which the immigration department will operate. Right now we do not know what we are debating because the operative part of the act is in the regulations. Let me illustrate. I turn to page 2 of the bill, the definition stage. Under the word "family" I read:

> "family", for the purpose of any provision of this act, has such meaning as is prescribed for the purpose of that provision—

That was obviously written by a bureaucrat. What in the world does it mean? Where are we going with that kind of definition? Who knows what it means? I turn to page 60 of the bill. Under "Regulations" It reads:

> (c) exempting members of the family class from any of the requirements of the regulations and prescribing, in substitution for such regulations, special regulations for the purpose of determining the ability and willingness of persons who sponsor applications for landing to assist such members in becoming successfully established in Canada,

Nowhere in the bill do we have a clear definition or statement as to what is a family. Every culture is entitled to its definition of a family. However, we do not know what that definition is. If, as the minister proposes, we are going to be able to predict the immigration flow into our country, somewhere along the line we will have to know what we are talking about.

Mr. Woolliams: They will make orders in council in reference to that.

Mr. Friesen: The hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) is correct; that is the way it will be done. The minister has become an Artful Dodger: now you see it; now you don't. Does he mean a nuclear family as it is normally and traditionally thought of in the North American sense? Does he mean the larger family unit that is thought of in some other cultures? I again reiterate that every culture has its own definition of a family unit. It ought to. That is not to say that defining it means we are any less caring about other members of the larger family unit. We are. How else would the minister and his department work on immigration, not ceilings but targets, as he calls it? How in the world can you establish a target if you do not know what the definition is under which you are operating?

Having said that, I refer to the recommendations made by the committee which studied the green paper and travelled all across Canada listening to briefs, listening to Canadians. I was a member of that committee and I recall the many hours we spent struggling with the formulation of recommendations. I also remember hearing people all across Canada saying, "I guess this is another government exercise which will cost close to a million dollars, but what is likely to come out of it? Will there be any relationship between the recommendations of the committee and the new bill which the government is proposing? "Well, here is an example. One of the recommendations appearing on page 45 of the report of the committee reads as follows:

> Significant changes in regulations should be explained and defended before the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration.

Again I challenge the minister. Does he intend to take significant regulations, such as the regulation which has done away with the humanitarian clause, and include it in the family clause—I think that is a significant regulation—and take the time to show respect to the committee by explaining and defending them before the committee? The committee recommended that where possible this course should be followed before regulations were put into effect. Mr. Speaker, I have here a copy of the flow chart of the implementation network which the minister and his officials have outlined. We see that back on February 14 they had already decided they would revise manuals and then refer the material to management. Apparently these regulations are already set for operation. The forms have been printed, the regulations have been drafted and they are ready to go with regard to them. Why is the minister so reluctant to tell us what these regulations are?

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): That is the catch.

Mr. Friesen: Has he something to hide? Do the Canadian people not have a right to know what the implications will be? If he has nothing to hide, he will share them with us. Another of the views expressed by the special parliamentary committee studying the green paper read as follows:

> The committee objects to the practice of issuing regulations under the guise of confidential departmental directives.

Again I would remind the hon. gentleman that all across Canada citizens were coming to us saying, "Is there to be any kind of comparison possible between the findings of the committee and the new immigration bill?" The most significant thing which in my view identified the bill before us with the old act is the fact that in both cases the regulations are being kept from the Canadian public. All we can do is read the Canada Gazette to see whether the regulations have been changed, and then we can find out what departmental policy is at a particular time. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that this is pretty shabby treatment of the Canadian people. I should like to illustrate what I mean.

Just a few days ago I received from the department the quarterly statistics manual, "Migration, '76" showing migration statistics up to the third quarter of 1976. As everyone knows, we are facing an unemployment crisis in our country; one million people are unemployed. So I was naturally interested in seeing what the Department of Immigration was doing in relation to the number of immigrants coming to this country in a time of such high unemployment.

On page 8, in table 3, the department outlines the flow of immigrants by occupational groups and province of destination. I may say I find this to be a very helpful document and I am grateful to the minister and to the department for sending it to us. But I was amazed to find out some of the things that are happening. Under the heading "Teaching" I find that in the first three quarters of 1976, 1,998 teachers came to Canada—effectively, 2,000 in the first nine months of the year. I do not have my finger on the need for teachers all across this country, but I do know that in British Columbia teachers are looking for jobs and I am sure that is true of other provinces as well. Yet I find that the department of immigration brought in, as I say, 2,000 teachers in the first nine months of 1976. I see here that Quebec, with 10 per cent unemployment, received 409 of these teachers, and Ontario 711. I wonder whether the Teachers' Federation of Ontario is aware of the number of teachers who came to Canada last year, and particularly to that province, in face of the unemployment picture today. The number of new teachers admitted to British Columbia was 263.

What startles me is that in order to qualify to come to Canada these teachers have supposedly to apply to the professional division of Canada Manpower in the central offices of large provinces; they have to qualify in the professional centres before coming here to work. I do not know about the experience of other hon. members, but any time I have gone to the Manpower office in my riding I have found they are very honest with me. They say, "Unemployment is running at about 9¼ per cent and we cannot really do very much." Any time I try to intervene on behalf of a constituent to help bring someone into the country under the unification of families policy, a Manpower official says, "Yes, but with the unemployment figures we are facing today it really cannot be done." So I run up against a brick wall.

Nevertheless, we find that in a nine-month period 263 teachers came to British Columbia. Let me go down the list. Clerical workers. I would imagine that with unemployment running at 7½ per cent across Canada, 10 per cent in Quebec, between 15 per cent and 20 per cent in the Maritimes, and about 8 per cent in British Columbia, clerical people are looking for jobs everywhere. There should be people lining up for clerical positions. Yet I find that in nine months no fewer than 7,478 clerical people were brought into Canada. Of those, 1,303 went to Quebec, 3,864 went to Ontario, and 1,101 went to British Columbia. Just a few weeks ago I tried to find a job for a secretary in British Columbia. I called up the Manpower office and asked whether there was any shortage of secretaries in the province. I was told that these people were coming out of his ears, that he had more than he could handle. Yet the immigration department ratifies admission of 7,500 in nine months—all by regulation!

As for sales, I guess this is another area in which jobs ought easily to be filled. In a period of high unemployment many people who are unemployed would gladly take on a sales position if only they could get a job. The immigration department brought into Canada 2,040 sales persons in nine months, and I am wondering what the hundreds, if not thousands, of unemployed sales people would think if they found out that some 2,000 extra sales people were admitted to this country by the immigration minister. Of that number, 414 went to Quebec, 999 to Ontario and 332 to British Columbia.

In the area of machinists we are facing a critical situation, yet 2,400 came to Canada in nine months, from where I do not know. I wonder whether the machinists union is aware of that? With 10 per cent unemployment in Quebec, 400 machinists went to the province, and 158 went to British Columbia. In the fabricating trade, 6,533 people were admitted to Canada. Of that number, 1,769 went to Quebec. Just think of all the textile workers who are unemployed in that province, yet the immigration department brought into the province another

1,700. In addition, 2,782 went to the province of Ontario, and 671 to B.C.

As for the construction trades, we are facing a decline in the construction industry and a lot of construction workers are out of work, as well as carpenters, carpenters' helpers, masons—you name it, Mr. Speaker. Despite this, the immigration department brought into Canada 3,208 construction workers. With one million unemployed in this country, do we want to bring in additional construction workers? Of that 3,208, 388 went to the province of Quebec, 1,573 went to Ontario and 399 went to British Columbia. I know that in the lower mainland of British Columbia there are construction workers who would like to have a job.

Is the department serious about enforcing its regulations governing the need for a manpower permit to enter Canada? How is it that 400 construction workers in nine months enter British Columbia, in view of the kind of unemployment that industry is facing there? The number admitted in nine months was 48,590, but with their dependants, amounting to 68,921, the total figure in the first nine months of last year for immigration was 117,511.

I am not concerned so much with the total number of immigrants; rather, I go back to the time when I represented people who were dealing with immigration officers and manpower officers in an effort to help them unify their families in Canada. Or there have been occasions when a businessman has come to me and told me he needs a man who is qualified to do a certain kind of work. I would tell him to go the Manpower and to have Manpower advertise the job for 30 days all across Canada. If in 30 days no one applies for the job, then I tell him he can bring in a person from outside. I think that is a fair arrangement if everyone were playing by the same rules. However, I have struck out every time except once. Only once was I successful in helping an employer bring an employee into Canada, and that was because no one else in Canada could do the job, which was a very esoteric and unusual one. On every other occasion Manpower has advertised jobs across Canada.

When I see these immigration figures, Mr. Speaker, I wonder what is going on, whether there is one regulation for one group of people and another regulation for another group. If, for example, there is an oversupply of staff in jobs such as sales, how is it that by the department's own admission 2,040 sales persons were brought into Canada? I have no objection to people coming to this country, Mr. Speaker, because I think it is wholesome for Canada to have an infusion of immigrants. But the same rules should apply to everyone, and somehow I do not think this is the case.

This reminds me of a man who came to me several months ago. He had lived for some years in one of the British possessions in the Third World and had raised his family there. Finally he decided to move to Canada. His adult son decided to move back to England, where he worked in a professional capacity chartering cargo planes. This young man is the only member of that family in England; I do not think he has even an uncle or a cousin there. All the members of the family live in different parts of the world, but his parent and one sibling are in Canada.

Having read press reports concerning the government's policy on family reunification, the father went to the local immigration office and applied for his son to come to Canada. In effect, the immigration officer said he would try, but that since he was now an adult he had to apply under the independent category. He applied, and naturally was struck out. Finally, the father called me and I contacted not only the local official, who was as helpful as he could be under the regulations, but also the immigration officer in London to see whether he could find some ingredient which would enable the one son left in England to come to Canada. But, Mr. Speaker, there was no way.

The government says it believes in the reunification of families, but I go back to what the hon. member for Vancouver East said. The government wants to parade itself to the Canadian people as believing in the reunification of families, but when I try to reunify one family it does not work out that way. This policy is good only for certain people. I have yet to be successful in bringing that young man over to Canada, even though he is the only member of that family left in England. Is that justice? Something has to be done, and that is what I mean about the injustice of having the regulations separate from the bill. The minister seems determined to make sure that we will never see them and debate them on the floor of the House, and the Canadian people will be kept in the dark as to how the immigration policy of our country will operate. And they call this the just society!

There are a couple of other aspects of the bill which give me cause for concern. I think the whole area of the refugee class is something we should reconsider. I reiterate that we are members of the Canadian family or are members indirectly because we left a country or our forefathers left a country for political reasons. I have a great deal of sympathy for those people, and more than sympathy, compassion, for those who are faced with a future in a country that is hostile to their convictions and where their life is at stake. But in the intervening years, in the last 100 years, we have been facing a new philosophy in this world; that is, the philosophy of pragmatism which says that whatever works is right, that there is no such thing as absolute morality. Truth is truth if it works, and it is no longer truth it it does not work. That is pragmatism.

There are a lot of political activists across the world who believe in that philosophy and who are politically active in their country. They even believe in the violent overthrow of their country. Their morality is based on pragmatism. What we have to define for ourselves is what their relationship would be to our way of life here. We would be totally irresponsible Canadians, and certainly irresponsible legislators, if we did not examine thoroughly the implications of that philosophy as it pertains to the immigration policy.

Surely we owe it to ourselves, to the future of our country, to our children and to our children's children, to make sure that the people who want to come to Canada are those who believe in the validity of our institutions, who want to see our way of life perpetuated and who believe in democracy as we know it today. But more and more we see around the world societies and political systems that do not hold to our way of life. It is all too easy to declare yourself a refugee from that kind of society. I reiterate that we need to be very understanding of the plight of refugees, but it seems to me that the United Nations' declaration may be a little too tolerant in that area. Certainly, I do not think we should allow them to define, in Canada, whether or not they are political refugees.

If I understand the act correctly, one of its provisions is that the judge who is adjudicating the final stages of a refugee's disposition within Canada must ask of that refugee, "Are you a political refugee"? If you do not believe in the absolute right or wrong, or the absolute truth, and you are pragmatist, then surely anything you say can be justified; and if the judge asks you whether you are a political refugee, then of course you are going to say "Yes" if it means staying within the country rather than being deported to your hostile homeland. Somehow we will have to come to grips with this provision in the Immigration Act. I reiterate that we need to be very compassionate and understanding of the plight of the refugees, but we have to do it in the knowledge of the new philosophy which exists in our society.

Finally, there is one other provision in the bill which I believe should be examined carefully. I think this provision was drafted with the intent of being more fair and finding a more operative and equitable way of admitting people into Canada. It has to do with what is called the inadmissible classes. What concerns me about this is the fact that there are about 750,000 people who apply to come to Canada every year, and there are probably 1.5 million who want to come, but only half of them take the first step, that is, to apply to come to Canada. Even under the present regulations most of them are refused. There are six or seven times as many people who apply to come to Canada as are admitted to this country.

With that kind of reservoir of people of whom probably 99.9999 per cent would be wholesome contributors to our way of life, it concerns me that we want to spend so much time examining the ways in which we can get people to come to the country who might be a threat to our society. Why should we spend so much time on that when there are so many people who would appreciate the opportunity of living here and who would contribute to the welfare of our society? I think all members would agree that for some classes of people it has been too difficult in times past to come in, and I am glad to see provisions in the bill which eliminate the discriminatory aspects of the bill, such as health provisions and so forth. But in the previous act they were the so-called prohibited class. Now the drafters have used some cosmetics; they have used a less offensive term and they are calling this group of people the "inadmissible class."

As I look at the provision, I see it as a nightmare for the people who are supposed to administer the act to find ways of making it as equitable as they want it to be. Is it the intent of the act to make sure that people who have been convicted of crime in their country are treated the same way under our system of jurisprudence?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but the time allotted to him has expired. Is there agreement to allow the hon. member to continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Friesen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I will conclude my remarks in a couple of minutes. I cannot help but think that under this provision we are creating more problems than we can solve. If we are to take our Criminal Code and superimpose it over the criminal codes of every other country in the world, what a nightmare that will be. We would have an army of bureaucrats trying to make sure that every provision of the Criminal Code matched a similar provision in other criminal codes. Can you imagine what kind of a job that would be? In the United Nations alone there are 150 countries, each with its own lifestyle, traditions and set of values. What is a crime in Canada is not necessarily a crime in other countries. How in the world will we standardize our laws? I think we have good intentions, but how are we going to do that? These are the things the minister and his officials have not examined thoroughly enough. They have to be examined further if we are going to have a bill which will benefit Canadians now and in the future.

• (1730)

I will conclude by saying, as I said at the outset, that the immigration bill has probably the most far-reaching implications for Canada of any bill we will be debating in this session and probably in this parliament. It behooves us, as legislators, to examine this bill more carefully and to demand of the minister good stewardship of his department. The minister should provide the regulations so that we can examine them and be responsible for them, as we ought to be. If he will do that, he will be doing a service both to parliament and to the Canadian people.

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, I can assure the House that my speech will be short. This has been a lengthy debate and I do not want to jar its tenor in any way. I simply want to contribute two points to the debate before it is wound up by the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald).

The first point I would like to make is with reference to refugees. We need a better procedure for refugees, and I hope this bill will provide a procedure to take care of cases like the one about which I am going to talk. This case concerns a teenager whose uncle moved to Canada and established a very successful business in Halifax-East Hants. When trouble broke out in Lebanon, the young man managed to move to Cyprus. He was in a position to move to Canada at a moment's notice if we had had a procedure for making him a Canadian citizen. His uncle here wished to adopt him. His parents wished that he could have that right. They were prepared to give their son up, and under all the circumstances it seemed to me to add up to a pretty humanitarian type of situation. However, there was great frustration in trying to bring it about. There was frustration in dealing with the regulations in the act which we have now. There was frustration in dealing with the school system in Nova Scotia and in dealing with a dozen and one things, including the attitude of the bureaucracy in Cyprus. So, all in all, what seemed to me to have been a step which should have been taken very quickly turned out to be a step which even with the best help of those in the minister's office here in Ottawa we were not able to take.

I am prepared to share my frustration with the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) in the committee and to present this as a classic case in which there should have been not only more discretion but also the ability to move rather quickly. This matter has really bothered me and I present it for the public record now. However, when the committee is asked to deal with the refugee part of this bill I would like to have at least five minutes in the sun.

There is another point about which the House might expect me to speak at more length than I will, and that is the point about regulations. Regulations sometimes take on horrendous or even Frankensteinian-monster proportions to the people in this place and in the other place. For reasons which are probably pretty apparent, having worked in the committee which deals with regulations I know that one can live with a certain type of regulation, but with other regulations it is very difficult indeed. Those who argue that the regulations should be seen beforehand make a very good argument. I think the Minister of Manpower and Immigration, whose attention I hope to get eventually, would be well advised to take the same attitude as the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) about the proposed regulations under the gun law; that is to say, they shall be looked at in committee before the act becomes final. I think that was a very useful precedent in our parliamentary process. We all know that that particular bill did not go to its final conclusion, but the fact that that offer was made was, to my mind, a substantial improvement over anything we have seen before with regard to regulations. I hope the Minister of Manpower and Immigration will accept this proposal as being reasonable.

I do not think it hurts to have proposed regulations examined from the standpoint of the criteria which have been adopted both in this House and in the Standing Committee on Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments. I gather I am not to have the ear of the minister, but perhaps my contribution can be drawn to his attention. I make my proposal very seriously. Perhaps I can repeat that it would be a very useful step, when new legislation which contains broad powers for dealing with problems by way of regulation is introduced, to have the regulations attached to it brought in so that they can be examined. They do not necessarily need to be examined in the committee which I have the honour to head; I think they should be examined in the committee which deals with the legislation.

[Mr. McCleave.]

In that committee there are likely to be experts. For example, I am looking at my friend, the hon. member for South Shore (Mr. Crouse), and I think many things should be brought into the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry by way of regulation so that he can have the first crack at them, rather than the Standing Committee on Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments. As we all know, the legislation dealing with statutory instruments provides that future regulations shall be presented to that committee.

The second thing is that some of the tactics the privy council office has used on our parliamentary committee to keep future regulations away from that committee should be restricted. I said I would speak only for a brief period of time, but I make these points sincerely. I would be inclined to raise hell, if I may use that word, if no regard was paid to the two small representations I have made this afternoon.

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I have read with interest some of the remarks made earlier in the debate. I did not have the opportunity to hear them all firsthand. However, I listened carefully to some remarks today. The hon. member for Surrey-White Rock (Mr. Friesen) said that this bill is likely the most important legislation we will deal with in this parliament, and I know other people have made similar statements. I believe that the whole subject of immigration and migration policy as it affects the jurisdiction of the federal government is indeed a major responsibility. I do not think anyone, no matter what his views with respect to this important and, at times, controversial subject, would say otherwise.

There are a couple of basic questions which I think have to be examined at the outset with respect to the legislation which is before us. I suppose the principal question which must be asked at some point in the process is why new immigration legislation is being proposed. Perhaps that is an overly obvious question to ask, since it has been well documented by the minister and others who have participated in this debate that a process has gone on for three or four years which has involved the initial commitment of his predecessor, the publication of the green paper and supporting documents, the reference to the special committee, the work of that special committee, its report, obviously made after lengthy consideration on the part of the committee and, finally, this legislation.

I think this question must be raised at the outset: Why are we launched on this particular process? The best argument I have been able to hear, either from the minister, his officials or his predecessor, is that the legislation of 1952 is obviously obsolete. It is obvious that the reference to obsolescence has as its basis those prohibited classes which now are an anachronism. They bring to mind words like moral turpitude, epilepsy, and the names of other illnesses which in all justice we would not want to see included today in any legal definition.

If the intent was primarily to remove the obsolescence built into the present legislation, one feels that it would not have been necessary to embark on such a major process involving special reports, special committees, examinations by special committees, concluded by a fairly lengthy debate on this matter in parliament. Obviously, much more is at stake than the occasional anachronism in a piece of legislation.

There have been, as I suppose the minister and his officials may say, very real pressures for a new act which could give us some kind of new approach, a more modern approach, to the question of immigration. I think we come closer to the truth when we hear the minister or his officials talking about more effective management of the immigration program. We use certain code words, Mr. Speaker, and when certain public people use code words in talking about immigration we must examine those words most carefully. I am of the firm belief that some of the code words have to do with management, efficiency, the effectiveness of resources and some of the other things listed in the objectives set out in this bill for the first time, to which I shall refer in a moment. Those code words should be looked at carefully and as penetratingly as possible, because they may tell us a good deal about the real intentions of the government, the minister and his officials.

I believe that the government is attempting to respond, perhaps even reinforce, some perceptions which have received a good deal of publicity and discussion during the past few years. Those perceptions do not see immigration as a kind of objective or neutral social phenomenon; they see it as being a major problem, a major social difficulty which we must confront and somehow solve.

It seems strange to me that almost everybody seems to believe we are dealing with a difficult and complex problem, a problem which somehow must be controlled, managed and brought under effective jurisdiction. I find this a disturbing concept from two points of view. It disturbs me because it flies in the face of the evolution of this country. Numerous speakers on both sides of the House have indicated, as they have shown with documented evidence, that we are in a very real sense a nation of immigrants. I think the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Haidasz) mentioned that something like ten million immigrants have come here since confederation. Clearly, at present more than half the population consists of either first, second or third generation Canadians or is related to those who originally came here as immigrants within the last 100 years. Indeed, some time ago, when reflecting on the public attitudes of a couple of years ago and of a decade ago when Mr. Marchand introduced the white paper and amendments to the Immigration Act, I looked at a number of editorials which were written a decade ago. I examined a good deal of the publicity which had surrounded the introduction of that white paper.

I have the white paper here, but I will not quote from it. If hon. members read it, it should become obviously and painfully apparent to them that this same government, under a different leader and minister but listening to essentially the same bureaucratic advisers, took the position about a decade ago that immigration was a powerful tool, a powerful process which has been extremely valuable in the total development of this country. One recalls the rhetoric surrounding various events of our nation's history, the appeals by public figures to Europeans and statements about this great land of promise, Canada. We know the extent to which previous governments in our history invested large sums of money in order to ensure an adequate flow of new Canadians to populate this country and open its virgin territories. As late as a decade ago, indeed, after we had existed for more than 100 years as a nation, this government was able to talk in positive terms about the continuing phenomenon of immigration as being an asset to the further development—the exploitation, if you like—and exploration of this country.

The green paper produced two or three years ago contained none of that positive, buoyant atmosphere. It was, indeed, a document which left one with the feeling that although immigration perhaps was not an evil it was a problem, and that if we did not cope with it we would find ourselves living in a social situation which could rapidly get out of control. When we are told we need a new immigration act, it is not just a question of revising or eliminating anachronisms in a piece of legislation 25 years old: it may, indeed, be turning around the question of immigration. That is what has bothered me so seriously about the measures which the minister has brought before the House in this bill.

We are not debating a piece of legislation which would enshrine Canada's continued belief in the importance of having new people come here with new ideas to populate this country, although there is lip service paid in the objectives to those kinds of values and cultural advantages—but they are far down the list when compared with advantages of trade and commerce. Lip service is paid to the notion of effectively regulating, managing, controlling and dispersing the immigration phenomenon of this country.

We have been taken in, Mr. Speaker. When problems have developed concerning unemployment, inadequate or unavailable housing in urban centres and the occasional reports of racial or ethnic disturbances or confrontations, we have allowed extremists in our society to propagate the belief that immigration is a problem and that we must effectively control this dangerous gene of immigration. I suggest that the seeds of such beliefs were sowed ten years ago with the introduction of the points system, because that system allowed us to enunciate a new kind of discrimination.

At root, what bothers many people about the green paper is that it considers immigration as a problem. Basically, it sees immigration as negative, as something to be managed. It is much more concerned about systems management than about dealing with people as people. That, certainly, is the atmosphere pervading this legislation. The points system, to which I will refer in a moment, laid the groundwork of a new kind of discrimination with which we have had some years of experience. I say, at the outset, that in a sense we have turned the subject of immigration on its head. I think we should all be clear about what has happened to us, because all of us have to some degree fallen into an enormous trap. The trap is simple, but many threads and nuances run through it. It is that immigration is no longer to be considered as basically a positive force; it is no longer to be considered as essential to the further unfolding of this country.

This is, in fact, increasingly a problem-oriented situation which must be increasingly controlled, regulated and brought under some kind of effective systems management. It has also been a very convenient scapegoat, particularly for government apologists or others who want to blame many of the social ills of our country on those who are new or different. We should not be surprised at this. This is not something altogether different from other societies.

If we study some of the social development and cultures to the south of us, or in Great Britain, and the problems that have arisen with regard to urban slums, unemployment and abrasiveness of situations which exist in educational centres, all have caused people to look for some effective solution or basic cause as to why we are faced with these particular problems. If we can point to the stranger, the person with a different accent, different customs, different language or different skin colour and blame many of the problems of our society on those we regard, quite frankly, as outsiders and strangers, that is a very dangerous situation for any society to arrive at. To be aware of that in the context of this debate is certainly to be very irresponsible. To allow for the growth of these kinds of myths is to strengthen beliefs and harden situations which will make it more difficult in the final analysis to solve some of the very real social and economic problems that we face.

The objectives set out in the bill claim that this will allow, for the first time, as the minister said in his press release at the time of the tabling of the bill:

> The bill explicitly affirms, for the first time, the fundamental objectives of Canadian immigration law; family reunification, non-discrimination, concern for refugees, and the promotion of Canada's economic, social, demographic and cultural goals.

It is noteworthy that in spite of the government being preoccupied with this matter for the better part of three or four years, neither this minister nor his predecessor have given us a very firm indication as to our economic, social, demographic and cultural goals. The furthest we seem to get on this is some statement by the minister that there will be a process of consultation before such things as levels or quotas are arrived at. Clause 3(f) of the bill reads:

> —to ensure that any person who seeks admission to Canada on either a permanent or temporary basis is subject to standards of admission that do not discriminate on grounds of race, national or ethnic origin, colour, religion or sex—

To use the word "non-discrimination" to apply to that is certainly something I would hope all, or almost all of the people in Canada would strongly support. It is in line with previous declarations that have been made in the past ten-year period. Certainly, it was an important step forward in making that kind of assertion. I say that because, as I think previous speakers have mentioned, our record with respect to complete neutrality and non-discrimination concerning Oriental and Asian immigrants is not one of which any of us can be proud. The situation with regard to the Chinese, Japanese and Indian people has been one that should give us all cause for thought, when we are all inclined to say all too quickly that Canada has had a great and long tradition of non-discrimination when it comes to race.

What disturbs me is that while the minister has enshrined in the objectives admirable sentiments, which I think are agreed to by many other countries similar to Canada, the points system as it has been established and as it will apparently continue will indeed perpetuate if not exacerbate discimination in other areas with which we have yet to come to grips.

It may be true that we do not discriminate against those who are of different racial origin, but very clearly our points system discriminates against the poor. It may be true that we do not discriminate against those who have another creed, but we very clearly discriminate against those of lesser education or sophistication. It may be true that we do not have any particular discrimination against people from any particular origin, but it is true that we locate our offices and the processing of those who apply for immigration very much with a view to origin and geographic location. As I have said, the points system discriminates very much in favour of those who are already here. It is a self-serving one, self-serving in a negative sense in that those of us who are here feel increasingly threatened by those who want to come.

There is, within the context of this kind of points system, a sort of siege mentality which, given the kind of world we live in, will increase interaction between nationalities, groups and cultures which is exceedingly dangerous. In fact, the points system is a kind of clever put-down of those of different economies, societies and cultures. Behind much of the debate on points and quotas is the very real question of a protection of privileges. There is in a sense an attempt to achieve a kind of monolithic, cultural and economic enclave. While an enclave may have some appeal on a short-term basis, its long-term virtues for all the citizens of this county are greatly to be doubted.

It is important that we realize the sense of the Immigration Act is to move, not toward a more open society but toward a more closed one, one that will require more regulations and more rules and regulations that are not really public knowledge. I shall mention that again, because I think the lack of commitment on the part of this minister to, in effect, explain how the act is going to operate is nothing short of shocking, given the importance of this bill to every Canadian.

I would hope that within the time the bill is being debated on second reading, perhaps before we come back to debate it again, the minister will reflect on the numerous calls he has had from many members of this chamber for full disclosure of the regulations before we conclude second reading. Only in that way can we be sure that when the minister said future immigration levels are made a matter for open decision and public announcement in advance by the government, his commitment to such open decision will in fact be a credible one.

May I call it six o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being six o'clock, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 2(1).

At six o'clock the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

ST. PATRICK'S DAY

TRIBUTE TO CONTRIBUTION TO CANADA MADE BY IRISH PEOPLE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing importance under Standing Order 43. I move, seconded by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath):

That on this important day, March 17, we pay tribute to one of the greatest races of people in the world, the people who have contributed so much to the development of this country, who have not done it without suffering and so on, and that we long remember the contribution that they made and are still making to this country.

The people I refer to are the Irish.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

INDUSTRY

SUGGESTION CORPORATIONS GIVE THREE MONTHS' NOTICE OF INTENTION TO CLOSE PLANT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a motion of urgent and pressing necessity. As a result of irresponsible action by the multinational ITT corporation, 107 men, many with long years of service have been made jobless with the closing of Ontario Malleable Iron in Oshawa. This action was taken without respect or concern for the employees or the community. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas):

That the government introduce legislation requiring multinational corporations to give a minimum three months' notice in advance of a plant closure and be made responsible for protecting full pension benefits of employees with 20 years or more service.

Mr. Speaker: The presentation of such a motion pursuant to the standing order requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

AGRICULTURE

REQUEST FOR MEASURES TO HALT DECLINE IN FARM INCOME—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Statistics Canada has just reported that farm cash receipts have dropped by some 31 per cent this January over January of last year, and since this is only the first blow of what is shaping up as a devastating income year for the farmers of this country, I would move, seconded by the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie:

That this House direct the government to announce programs to halt the continuing slide in farm income.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion under the terms of Standing Order 43 requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: No.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

INVITATION TO PRIME MINISTER TO LIVE ON UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE BENEFITS AND REPORT RESULT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, seconded by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas), I move:

That this House, noting the view expressed yesterday by the Prime Minister that one of the reasons we have more than a million unemployed persons is that Canadians are living beyond their means, invites the Prime Minister to join the ranks of the unemployed or to live on the amount available to them as unemployment insurance for six months and then report to the House as to whether he still holds the view he expressed yesterday.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion under Standing Order 43 requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there such consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed!

Some hon. Members: No!

REQUEST FOR JOB CREATION PROGRAMS FOR YOUNG PEOPLE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I wish to move, under Standing Order 43, a motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that almost half of the Canadians without jobs are between the ages of 15 and 24, and that in another two months several hundred thousand students will also face a hopeless search for summer employment, and in view of the fact that the unemployment rate for the 15 to 24 age group is now 14.4 percent on a seasonally adjusted basis—more than 2.5 times the unemployment rate for those 25 years of age, and in view of the fact that the severity and chronic nature of the youth unemployment problem in Canada, as well as its long-term effects, make it economically, and socially explosive, I would like to move seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre:

That this House urges the government to initiate substantial job creation programs oriented towards the youth in Canada.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion under the terms of Standing Order 43 can be presented only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: No!

FINANCE

EFFECT OF UNITED STATES LAW CONCERNING CONVENTION EXPENSES—INTEREST AND DIVIDEND IMBALANCE WITH UNITED STATES

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. As interlocked with rising unemployment we have current account trade balance deficits among the highest in the world, including travel deficits which rose sharply over last year amounting to $1.1 billion in the last year for which we have figures, would the minister tell us whether he has received any confirmation from Washington of an exemption or other alteration with respect to the Washington order affecting convention expenses as they pertain to Canadian institutions?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, as I stated in the House last week, I discussed this question with Secretary Blumenthal during my visit to Washington. It was pointed out, of course, that Canada as well, in its tax law, applies restrictive provisions with regard to conventions and it was suggested by me that we might seek some reciprocal provisions so as, on one hand, to protect taxpayers generally, while on the other to make certain that the long standing practice of exchanging conventions across the border will continue. That is a subject which will be actively considered in the treaty negotiations which are now reaching the completion stage.

Mr. Stevens: A supplementary, again to the Minister of Finance. Included in the current account deficit figures not only do we find this tourist imbalance but also an interest and dividend imbalance of $2.5 billion, would the minister indicate whether in the current year he anticipates this deficit will grow even higher?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): As I indicated to the hon. member in the standing committee, it is difficult to know exactly what provincial and municipal governments and private borrowers will do with respect to their financing in the current year. There is reason to believe that provincial demands on the money market may be somewhat lower this year than they were last year, but this will depend very much on the difference between United States and Canadian longer-term interest rates. At the moment it is difficult to predict exactly whether there will be a substantial difference in this current year.

TREND OF DEFICIT ON SERVICE TRANSACTIONS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, again to the Minister of Finance; not only do we have deficits in the two items that I have referred to but we also have a $2 billion deficit on other service transactions up 11 per cent over the previous year, would the minister also indicate if he anticipates that this deficit will continue to rise in this most unsatisfactory year as far as our economic condition is concerned?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that this trend is the least likely to change in the sense that it represents payments for shipping services overseas, insurance and other invisibles of that kind. In that sense I do not anticipate there is any prospect of a very dramatic reduction there.

POSSIBILITY OF CHANGES IN METHOD OF ECONOMIC FORECASTING AND DEBATE ON CONDITIONS PRIOR TO BUDGET

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. I would like to ask the right hon. gentleman, in relationship to the current economic situation, the high levels of unemployment, rising inflation, balance of payments deficit and more particularly to the fact that over the past few years there has been a fair degree of discrepancy between the forecast and the realities of economic performance, whether or not the Prime Minister is satisfied with the way in which we are organized in this country for the development of economic policy? I have in mind specifically whether or not he would consider the possibilities of changing the budget procedures so there might be debate on major economic trends before the budget comes down, and a new role for the Economic Council of Canada, the possibility of a council of economic advisers or some new arrangement whereby we might feel that we are getting perhaps a broader and better interpretation of economic forces and economic outlook that is ahead of us?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, there is an indication in the question of very legitimate concern by the hon. member and some suggestions for improving our institutions. I will consider them. The hon. member himself might want to consider elaborating on them in a speech in the budget debate and certainly the Minister of Finance, myself and other members would be interested in improving in any way our procedures.

SUGGESTED COMMITTEE STUDY OF INSTITUTIONS CONCERNED WITH ECONOMIC POLICY

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the right hon. Prime Minister would give serious consideration to the appointment of a select committee of this House to examine the institutional framework for economic policymaking in this country with the terms of reference requiring a report by the end of this year so that some of the recommendations might be taken into account, if accepted by the House, in the preparation of the budget for the next fiscal year?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this calls for the same type of answer. I will consider the various suggestions. However, if the hon. member could find some moment to elaborate on them, either inside or outside the House, I would be very interested.

FINANCE

DEFICIT AS RESULT OF CANADA-UNITED STATES AUTO PACT—DISCUSSIONS WITH UNITED STATES

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. Given the need for government initiative to create jobs for the more than one million Canadians who need them, will the minister confirm the figures I have that the deficit in automotive parts trade with the United States increased a further $200 million in 1976 for a total of $2.7 billion in deficit for that year and if so, could he tell us what he said about this when he went to Washington recently, because such an imbalance obviously means a profound loss of jobs to Canadians and completely goes against the spirit of the auto pact?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the first part of the hon. gentleman's question requires a statistical answer and I would be prepared to seek that. I do not have it to hand at this time.

On the second and broader aspect of the question, indeed the question of the auto pact was referred to. As the hon. gentleman knows, there have been parallel considerations within both Canada and the United States with respect to the trade in automobiles and auto parts, a parallel preparation of positions of the two countries in this regard. We would anticipate that in this area we would have opportunity of comparing those respective positions of the two countries as a step toward a further examination of the auto pact.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, a year ago last month the minister informed me in the House in reply to a question that the government was then preparing its position on the auto pact and considering that the deficit now is of the magnitude that I just told him, I am astounded that he did not have these figures at his fingertips when he went to Washington last week. Does the minister know that we have not got our share of investment in the auto pact in each of the years for the past half dozen years, and if he knows this, could he tell the House why he did not bring this major job creating pact supposedly for Canada to the attention of the Americans when he was there last week?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I think it will be evident from the nature of the question that it is obviously a matter of a difference of opinion, for example, as to what is the appropriate share, and indeed the preparation of viewpoints on that matter has been underway. I have to remind the hon. member that there was little prospect of achieving progress in negotiations with the United States during the period of time in which that country was in the process of selecting its administration for the current term.

POSSIBILITY GENERAL MOTORS WILL CEASE PRODUCTION OF VEGA AT STE. THERESE—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO PROTECT JOBS

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, one view of the share would be that we get investment in the industry at least in proportion to the amount we consume in the industry on this side of the border. We have been getting about half that amount for the past half dozen years.

My final question to the minister concerns the announced intention of General Motors to shut down production this coming fall of the Vega automobile which is currently produced at Ste. Therese, Quebec. Has the minister investigated this report, and if so, has he obtained assurances from General Motors that that company will not shut down production of the Vega, or if it does that, the jobs involved—and there are hundreds of them—will be fully protected through the production of another model of that company's line at that plant on this side of the border?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. gentleman knows, detailed dealings with the automotive industry in Canada are the responsibility of my colleague, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

Mr. Broadbent: He is not here.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): He is not here, but I am quite prepared to bring to his attention for his consideration the question asked by the hon. member.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

INCREASE IN COST OF FIRE INSURANCE—GOVERNMENT INSURANCE

Mr. C. A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

Is the minister aware that 80 per cent of Quebec fire insurance companies have jointed into a combine to control the insurance rates which have gone up by 100 per cent in the last two years, and to determine themselves the appraisal of insurable properties on the basis of replacement value, which means a total increase of 200 per cent in three years ? Is his department responsible for these companies and what is the minister doing against this monopoly which is going to be prejudicial to 75 per cent of small fire insurance policyholders?

[English]

Hon. A. C. Abbott (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the companies mentioned and their practices could come under the examination of my department. Subsequent to the raising of a Standing Order 43 motion I asked the director of the combines branch to report to me on this question, and I will advise the hon. member as soon as possible.

[Translation]

Mr. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question of the minister?

I thank the minister for his answer. Now I want to ask him whether it would be possible to proceed immediately with regard to this combine which has started its activities because, as I said before, this would make it impossible for 75 per cent of the people to get fire insurance.

[English]

Mr. Abbott: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his representation, and I will look into the matter.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

STATUS OF CFB CORNWALLIS

Miss Coline Campbell (South Western Nova): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence. In the past there have been rumours that CFB Cornwallis is to be closed down. Can the minister tell me and the people of South Western Nova the status of CFB Cornwallis at this time?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, CFB Cornwallis is certainly an active Anglophone recruiting centre. Not only is it continuing, but its size is being increased by about 100 new recruits per month. Base operations are going on. There are refittings for a new mess hall and an expansion of existing facilities, so the hon. member can be assured that Cornwallis is strong, alive and producing mighty fine troops for our armed forces.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

MANPOWER

PROGRAMS TO GIVE EMPLOYMENT TO NATIVE PEOPLE—EFFORTS TO OBTAIN UP-TO-DATE STATISTICS

Mr. J. R. Holmes (Lambton-Kent): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration and is related to the exceptionally high unemployment rate in the Indian, Inuit and Metis communities which averages between 45 per cent and 60 per cent and at times is as high as 95 per cent. In view of the fact that the policy announced by the former minister on May 17, 1976 has failed to attain the objectives of increased participation in the labour force and to decrease the unemployment rate, can the minister say what new programs he will be introducing to correct this serious problem.

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I disagree with the premise of the hon. member's question. I recognize of course that the unemployment level of that particular group is in fact high, and that is why we set the figure at 75 per cent and brought the status Indians under the Canada Works program so that on a constituency to constituency basis some effort was made in that direction. In other projects that we have operating across the country in conjunction with both DREE and the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development we are endeavouring to do what we can to assist at the government level.

Mr. Holmes: The minister referred to the Canada Works program. If the unemployed status Indians were included in the unemployment statistics for February, the number of Canadians out of work would be substantially more than one million. What steps is he taking to obtain accurate, up-to-date ongoing unemployment statistics for status Indians, and indeed for Metis and non-status Indians, so that the government can immediately introduce programs to correct the serious unemployment problem and, in addition, to permit the government to develop a long-term employment strategy in anticipation of the exceptionally large number of status Indians who will be entering the labour force by 1980?

Mr. Cullen: As the statistics for non-status Indians are not included in the labour force survey, the hon. member's question might better be directed to my colleague, the Minister of Industy, Trade and Commerce. We did recognize the fact, and the statistics are available for the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. For that reason we used those particular figures in establishing criteria under the Canada Works program. With regard to the other groups to which the hon. member referred, they are included in the labour force survey. However, they tend to be swallowed up in the over-all unemployment figure. On that basis I met in particular with the Metis and the non-status Indians to see what could be done to accommodate them under the provisions of the next phase of the Canada Works program.

MINISTER'S VIEW OF FAILURE TO INCLUDE NON-STATUS INDIANS IN LABOUR STATISTICS

Mr. Arnold Malone (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same minister. Does he consider it in accordance with human rights that the non-status Indians are not considered within the over-all labour statistics?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): As I said, I am not sure that this has direct relevance to my department. So far as I am concerned, I will see what we can do about cutting down the numbers of unemployed. The figures are available, they are incorporated into the criteria used by my department, so there is no discrimination. We err on the side of going higher rather than lower in the figures we consider.

TRANSPORT

SUGGESTED RECONSIDERATION OF FUNDS FOR DEVELOPMENT OF URBAN TRANSIT IN TORONTO AREA

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. In view of the fact that it has been established that a further $800,000 would be added to the cost of improving Union Station in Toronto, should this project be postponed by two years as a result of the refusal by the government to abide by its 1974 campaign promise to aid the urban transit system in that area, can the minister, in consultation with the Minister of Finance, reassess the government's position in this regard and make funds available, as promised, for the very important purpose of improving the over-all urban transit system in that area, particularly in view of the increased cost if it is postponed for several years?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, our exact position in reviewing this question was stated in the House in the last day or two, and I would refer the hon. member to the answer on that day.

REQUEST FOR RECONSIDERATION OF COMMITMENT TO SUPPLY FUNDS FOR URBAN TRANSIT DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): In view of the minister's answer, I should like to direct my supplementary to the Prime Minister. Last year the same government made grants available amounting to millions of dollars for such purposes as, "to study the role of the harmonica in a social culture of each region of Canada"—

• (1430)

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps, if the hon. member has a supplementary question to ask, he will ask it.

Mr. Jelinek: Mr. Speaker, my question is this: In view of these grants, I wonder if the Prime Minister could ask the cabinet to reconsider its priorities in respect of this matter, and the grants in order at least to fulfil its election promises, particularly when they pertain to an area as important and serious as urban transportation, which affects perhaps millions of Canadians.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member's question to the Minister of Transport was a repetition of an earlier question, which I allowed. But the hon. member has now repeated it.

GOVERNMENT ADMINISTRATION

USE OF DEPARTMENTAL STATIONERY FOR FUND-RAISING LETTERS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I have in my hand a purported copy of a letter written by the Minister's parliamentary secretary, on the departmental stationery of the office of the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Grafftey: It says, "Dear Sir, as you know—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Grafftey: —the federal government favours the participation directly by citizens and businessmen in the financing of the Liberal party. It says—

[Translation]

Be assured that your contribution will be greatly appreciated. Liberally yours, Fernand Leblanc, member for Laurier.

[English]

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Grafftey: My question is this: Does the minister approve of the practice of fund-raising letters being sent on behalf of the Liberal Party on departmental stationery; is he aware of this practice? If he is, does he approve it, and will he take up this matter with the parliamentary secretary?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I will make the usual and thorough inquiries into the matter and respond later.

Mr. Grafftey: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Was the Secretary of State for External Affairs aware that fund-raising letters for the Liberal Party were going out on departmental stationery? If so, does he approve of this?

An hon. Member: He answered that.

Mr. Grafftey: With respect, he said that he would investigate.

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, I assured the hon. member I would look into it thoroughly. It may not be the letterhead of the departmental secretary. I should point out that there are letterheads prepared for members of the House of Commons, on which their parliamentary status, as parliamentary secretary or of various other offices in this House, is included.

Mr. Paproski: Why are you blushing?

Mr. Jamieson: I am not.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Jamieson: I am not saying that that practice is suitable or unsuitable. I am merely saying that I have not seen the letter in question. If the hon. member will give me a copy of it I will find out whether it is written under the Department of External Affairs letterhead, or one from the House. If it is from the House, the House itself can decide whether or not that is an improper use of stationery.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: You are no diplomat.

NATIONAL ENERGY BOARD

POSSIBILITY PREMIER OF MANITOBA OFFERED POSITION OF CHAIRMAN OF BOARD

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister and pertains to Manitoba. In view of continuing stories in Manitoba that the Manitoba premier has been offered the position of Minister of Finance in the cabinet of this government—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Epp: —may I ask the Prime Minister if the Premier of Manitoba has been offered the position of chairman of the National Energy Board and, if so, when will that appointment take effect?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I would not want to contemplate such an appointment before the next budget. I will consider the matter after that.

Mr. Paproski: You are on trial, Don.

Mr. Epp: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Disregarding the fact that the budget is to come down on March 31, can the Prime Minister say if the premier was offered that appointment to the National Energy Board? I ask this question, because Manitobans would like to know if they will be asked to vote for a Liberal-Socialist government or an NDP-Socialist government.

[Mr. Grafftey.]

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I would be happy to consider that as a suggestion. We are always looking for people to join the federal cause and if the premier is interested, we will get him.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Why don't you get Jim Richardson?

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

RIGHT OF QUEBEC DELEGATES TO SPEAK FOR QUEBEC AT INTERNATIONAL CONFERENCES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Jean-R. Roy (Timmins): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the right hon. Prime Minister.

As it has been reported that two ministers from the province of Quebec who are members of a Canadian delegation attending two international conferences have said that they speak directly on behalf of Quebec and not Canada, does the government intend to prevent that type of shabbiness in the future, or does it plan to allow all the provinces to act on their own behalf at all international conferences in which Canada takes part?

[English]

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I suspect the hon. member's question was based on the news reports which I also saw. I can tell him and the House that the news reports were quite a way from being factual in this particular case. As for the second part of the question, all provinces, when they have a special provincial interest in an international conference are invited by the federal government to come as members of the Canadian delegation. That is the case with the conference in question, and will continue to be the case.

TRANSPORT

DISCUSSION WITH MARITIME PREMIERS ON BUS AND RAIL SERVICE—REQUEST FOR REPORT

Mr. Leonard C. Jones (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. When the minister or his officials met with Maritime premiers or their officials, was it proposed to subsidize bus service and abandon or abolish certain rail passenger services in the Maritime provinces? Did the premiers agree to those proposals and what were those plans and proposals?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, there were detailed discussions on the general advantage of saving money on certain services which cost a great deal and do not provide adequate service to the people of an area. That involves possibly the exchange of rail service for an improved bus service. The matter was complex and a long statement was issued in relation to it, but the actual details will be pursued following the hearings to be held by the Canadian Transport Commission in relation to rail services.

MANPOWER

MEASURES TO REDUCE LEVEL OF UNEMPLOYMENT AMONG YOUNG PEOPLE—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In view of the severity and chronic nature of the youth unemployment problem in Canada today, the youth unemployment rate being more than two and a half times higher than the adult unemployment rate, is the minister's department considering introducing a series of employment generating projects and policies oriented to reducing the chronically severe nature of youth unemployment in Canada today?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Yes, Mr. Speaker. We have our ongoing student summer employment and activities program. In 1977 we will be allocating $60 million for this program—$20 million for ongoing departmental programs, and $40 million for job creation activities. In addition, under the new legislation we have offered to the provinces the co-operative education program. We have a summer and winter component proposed for the job experience and training program. We have increased the number of Canada manpower centres in universities and increased the number of Canada manpower centres for students. So, to that extent we are fulfilling our role, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Orlikow: A supplementary question, Mr Speaker. Since funds allocated for programs such as the Young Canada works program are sufficient for only one, two or three projects per constituency, whereas there may be 50 applications; the programs are not meeting needs; and since the Canadian Council of Social Development indicated that if this problem is left unattended the situation will become explosive, will the minister not say if he will consider bringing in measures similar to those introduced a few days ago in the United States by President Carter, who will be spending $600 million on a national conservation corps, to combat youth unemployment?

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, we have actually received a commendation from no less an authority than Senator Hubert Humphrey for the lead Canada has taken in this field. The speech I made to that group on youth unemployment has been incorporated into the Congressional record, indicating Canada's lead in this field.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

PROPOSAL TO ESTABLISH YOUTH CORPS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Paul Dick (Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence. In view of the current high level of youth unemployment and the fact that in the Speech from the Throne of last fall there is a statement to the effect that the government is considering the establishment of a youth corps, can the minister tell the House whether the youth corps, which might help to alleviate the high levels of youth unemployment, will be in place soon so that youth can participate in that youth corps, say in the months of June and July this year? Second, will the youth corps all be under one ministry or under more than one ministry? If so, which one?

● (1440)

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I am not able to answer all of those questions at this time. As I indicated to the hon. member earlier, I hope to make an announcement and answer all of those questions by the end of the month.

MANPOWER

YOUNG CANADA WORKS PROGRAM—REQUEST FOR ADDITIONAL FUNDS

Mr. Paul Dick (Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton): I guess the Minister of National Defence is not aware of what they are doing in that youth corps. I will direct my supplementary question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In view of the fact that applications for the Young Canada Works program are running in dollar amounts ten to one over the amount of funds available, will there be supplementary funds going into that program for this summer?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Needless to say, Mr. Speaker, both my department and the government are very pleased with the reaction to and the reception of both programs, Canada Works and Young Canada Works. I thank the hon. member for his support for more funds.

GRAIN

GOVERNMENT'S PLANS FOR ELEVATOR FACILITIES AT PRINCE RUPERT

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. It is in connection with the grain handling facilities at the port of Prince Rupert which are owned by the government and the wheat board. Is it the intention of the government to upgrade or fix up this facility so that an orderly movement of grain can be programmed through it or does the government have other intentions, such as selling the facility to private owners?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, as grain elevators come under the Canadian Grain Commission and I report to the House for the Canadian Grains Commission, I will reply to the question.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I wonder if I might ask those hon. members who are bent upon some conversation with other hon. members if they might conduct their conversation outside the chamber so that the questions and answers can proceed?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Whelan: We are considering, I believe, four submissions from different people who want to operate the Prince Rupert facilities. I met with the Canadian Grains Commission about ten days ago with regard to the submissions that have been received. We are also considering expenditures on the grain elevator at Prince Rupert ourselves. No decision has yet been made, but we hope to make one in the near future.

ANTI-INFLATION BOARD

SUGGESTED INSTRUCTIONS TO HOSTESS FOODS ON REFUNDING EXCESS PROFITS

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance while he is still the Minister of Finance.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Friesen: Recently the Anti-Inflation Board ruled that Hostess Foods had made considerable excess profits on the marketing of their potato chips, all in eastern Canada, and to refund this excess profit to the consumer, the company plans to issue 20 cent coupons, price reductions and free goods in certain sizes of packages, but all in British Columbia where they have never been in the market. Will the minister give an undertaking that he will instruct Hostess Foods or the Anti-Inflation Board officials to instruct Hostess Foods to restrict the distribution of this cut rate product to the market where they made the excess profit?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have to point out to the hon. member that in a law passed by this parliament the Anti-Inflation Board has been given the responsibility of making this kind of judgment and, indeed, making appropriate arrangements with the particular firm found in an excess revenue position as to how this is to be returned to the public. In that sense, his suggestion that I might direct the board to do this is counselling an illegality. I will be glad to bring to the attention of the board the hon. member's opinion on this question.

ALLEGED ILLEGAL FINANCING OF QUAI D'ORSAY HOTEL—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Justice, notice of which was given him on Monday last. It arises out of a reply to my question from the Minister of State for Urban Affairs in which he admitted that the guaranteed loan financing for the Quai d'Orsay Hotel was made under Section 6(1) of the National Housing Act. Since there are no provisions under the National Housing Act, Section 6(1) or elsewhere, for funding hotels and since the advertising for Quai d'Orsay clearly indicates beyond any doubt that this is a hotel, what steps does the minister propose to take as Attorney General of Canada since there appears to be an act of some illegality?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the hon. member giving me notice. I would advise him that the matter is in the hands of the legal officers of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation who are not officers of the Department of Justice. Those officers advise the Minister of State for Urban Affairs and his answers are given accordingly.

CENTRAL MORTGAGE AND HOUSING CORPORATION

ALLEGED ILLEGAL FINANCING OF QUAI D'ORSAY HOTEL—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of State for Urban Affairs whether he has contacted or consulted with the law advisers of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, and has he satisfied himself that this was a proper loan guarantee made in accordance with the provisions of the National Housing Act, Section 6(1)?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, originally the loan was granted on the strength of the information given to the corporation. It is true, as the hon. member said, that somewhere along the way the building was put to another use than had originally been planned. Still, the legal advisers of the department told me that nothing, in the terms of the mortgage insurance policy issued for that project, stipulated that Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation should cancel the insurance if the building was put to some use other than the one planned initially. That is why nothing else has been done. We have asked the legal advisers of the corporation to look into the matter further with a view to establishing whether it might not be wise to change our rules to prevent such occurrences in the future.

ENERGY

POSSIBLE MEASURES TO AID NEW BRUNSWICK CONSUMERS OF ELECTRICITY

Mr. Eymard Corbin (Madawaska-Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of the fact that the chairman of the New Brunswick Electric Power Commission last week labelled the Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island home insulation programs and grants as blatant political discrimination, can the minister tell this House if he is going to get in touch with the New Brunswick government to correct their cockeyed perception of ongoing generous federal assistance for electrical energy production in that province? Can the minister also inform us if he is considering further direct or indirect help to New Brunswick consumers at this time, above and beyond, for example, price stabilization of fuel oil, gasoline and so on?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I look forward to an early opportunity to meet the premier. I expect to be doing so in a matter of two weeks, along with other energy ministers to discuss the whole question of the next price rise for oil and natural gas in Canada. At that time I will take the opportunity of reminding him that the federal government provided very generous assistance in the form of 50 per cent of the financing of the nuclear reactor at Point Lepreau and a further $14 million within the past ten days with respect to the financing of an electrical interconnection with Nova Scotia.

POSSIBILITY OF CONFERENCE ON METHOD OF RAISING FUNDS TO CREATE EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the right hon. Prime Minister.

Being aware of his responsibilities in the unemployment situation which prevails throughout Canada and given the fact that federal measures were inefficient in lowering the unemployment level, as everyone would wish, and considering also that the Minister of Finance will soon bring down his budget, I would like to ask the Prime Minister whether in the circumstances he would be prepared to do his utmost, namely to call a meeting before the presentation of the budget with members from the Economic Council of Canada, union representatives as well as provincial and federal officials. This would enable the minister to receive judicious advice and to provide for efficient and short term credits.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it would certainly not be possible to hold such a conference before the presentation of the budget but as far as the budget itself is concerned, we are always prepared to listen to the proposals of hon. members of the opposition, and I would add that if the hon. member for Joliette has some brilliant ideas before the budget he could perhaps convey them to us and we shall try to consider them.

HAMILTON—STEPS TO IMPLEMENT RECOMMENDATIONS OF COMMITTEE STUDYING NEED FOR EXPANSION

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Now that the report of the ad hoc committee studying the need for regional expansion in terms of airports in the Hamilton district has been filed with the minister, can the hon. gentleman tell the House and the city of Hamilton what steps will be taken to see that the recommendations of that committee are implemented?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): We will take a look at the committee's report. I will then expect an analysis and a recommendation from my officials, after which decisions and announcements will be made.

STATUS OF ALLEGED COMMITMENT OF FUNDS FOR EXPANSION

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): The recommendations came from citizen participation. This was the format. They have made a decision. The most important question is with respect to the flip-flop for which the government has been responsible in the past with regard to its commitments. Can the minister assure me now that there will be no flip-flop with respect to the $25 million commitment made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs a few years back? Have we still that commitment with respect to the funds which were earmarked for the expansion of Mount Hope airport which is where the extension was supposed to be taking place?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): I am informed by my neighbours here that it is the hon. member himself who has been doing the flip-flopping. I am glad, however, that he recognizes the importance of the procedure we have adopted in involving the full participation of citizens in developing plans and analyzing future airport expansion proposals. We have now received that input and obviously the next step is serious consideration by the government, consideration of the timing, and a determination as to when various forms of action can be taken. I cannot at this point, before examining the recommendations and an analysis of those recommendations, make a decision. I presume the hon. member would say he can, but I am not sure he would do that, either.

Mr. Alexander: There has been no flip-flop on my part. I have always indicated that I was in favour of the expansion of the Mount Hope airport. It is the minister's colleagues who have been flip-flopping. Will the minister answer my question: is that commitment still there or is it not?

Mr. Lang: Surely, the hon. member knows that we are very anxious to provide good, desirable airport facilities for communities across the country and that we are doing this, often without very much support from the hon. member or his hon. friends.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Alexander: So we do not have it any more.

STATUS OF WOMEN

SUGGESTED CHANGE IN VOTERS' LISTS TO REFLECT STATUS AND OCCUPATION OF WOMEN

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I wish to direct my question to the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that we may soon see another federal election—

An hon. Member: On June 6th.

Mr. Crouse: —on June 6, I am told—and that voters' lists as presently prepared discriminate against women by listing them as Miss, Mrs., Spinster, Widow or Housewife, will the Prime Minister consider changing the rules as forwarded to enumerators so that women are given the opportunity to use their own names if they so desire and the right as well to be listed by their occupations, such as teacher, secretary, business manager, receptionist or nurse if they are trained, for example, in those vocations?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I can see that that list could certainly be improved by adding to the number of professions that of professional photographer—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: But I will certainly look into this.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

AGRICULTURE

MEASURES TO HALT DECLINE OF FARM INCOME

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I would like to flip-flop to a member of another profession, the Minister of Agriculture, if I could ask the friendly leprechaun to go back to his seat.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nystrom: Before he flies off for Saint John, can he tell me, in the light of the fact farm income as reported by Statistics Canada has dropped by 31 per cent, and since the Prime Minister told us yesterday that Canadians are now living beyond their means, how much further must farm income drop before farmers will be living within their means?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member realizes, I am sure, the argumentative nature of the question. Does he have a supplementary question?

Mr. Nystrom: Perhaps I can rephrase the question and ask the minister this: in the light of the fact that national farm income has dropped by 31 per cent and prairie income by 38 per cent, can he tell the House what new programs he intends to announce shortly in the areas of dairy, cow-calf and grain income to halt this slide which is devastating in its effect on Canadian farmers?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): The hon. member has recognized that part of the problem arises from world conditions. I take this from what he said, because the lower world price of grain has been responsible for a big reduction in farm income. Then, there is the fact that we are dealing in beef products on the basis of the world price. I have made certain suggestions; I made them in the hon. member's own province yesterday. I might also tell him I referred to his comment about my trip to pay tribute to the Irish tonight in Saint John, New Brunswick: the people resented very much his suggestion that I should not go there, just as they would any suggestion I should not go to a Polish, Ukrainian, Hungarian or Italian—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Whelan: I just want to say, Mr. Speaker: May the little people be kind to him.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, the minister would not know what the grass roots looked like if they were staring him in the face.

An hon. Member: Shame!

Mr. Nystrom: I should like to ask him this: does he agree with the statement made in this House yesterday that farmers are living beyond their means, and, if he does not, what programs does he intend to announce in the near future to bring about an improvement in their income situation?

Mr. Whelan: I am not aware of any statement about farmers living beyond their means. But I do know this: more people are going on vacations; more students on winter break went to California and Hawaii than ever before in our history. More people have money in banks and credit unions than ever before.

An hon. Member: Now you are in trouble!

ALLEGED FRAUDS IN SALE OF BUTTER—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, following the massive butter frauds in the province of Ontario which have now come to light in Burlington, Hamilton, St. Catharines, Welland, Toronto, and, now, in the Ottawa Valley, can the Minister of Agriculture inform the House whether he has received a report of the investigation from his departmental officials or from the law enforcement agencies and, if so, what does he intend to do about it?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I have received a report. I have not had time to study it thoroughly but I can tell the House that according to the information we have no dairy is involved, no organization for which we in the Department of Agriculture are responsible. We are, of course, concerned about the activities of any group which is putting a fraudulent product on the market, as is the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Our people are working on this investigation also, and if we can find whoever is responsible, charges will be laid.

Mr. Lawrence: In view of public reports that there is no question that an adulterated form of butter is being passed off on the citizens of this province as butter—surely there is an offence there—I am asking the minister whether charges are being laid. This is an interprovincial matter and one which falls under the minister's authority. Certainly, we should have more specific word than that "buttering up" by the minister on the subject.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, I did not intend to smooth over the subject in any manner or form. I just wanted to say to the hon. member that we have laid charges to prosecute people in the past. I believe it was in the area of Barrie, Ontario that they found this situation existed. Unscrupulous people do crop up from time to time. It is difficult to make sure that it does not happen again, but if it does there will be prosecutions.

An hon. Member: They won't!

RESULT OF MEETING WITH MARITIME EMPLOYERS ASSOCIATION

Mr. Raymond Dupont (Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Labour.

Following the minister's meeting yesterday with the Maritime Employers Association concerning labour relations in the port of Montreal, could the minister tell the House the result of that meeting?

[English]

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I did have a meeting with the MEA with reference to the whole situation of the port of Montreal and I had representations from the longshoremen involved. As a result of discussions yesterday, I have appointed Guy De Merlis, director of mediation and conciliation to get the parties together as soon as possible. I believe the most convenient time is this Monday in Montreal.

USE OF DEPARTMENTAL STATIONERY FOR FUND-RAISING LETTER—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs following the question asked by the aggressive member for Brome-Missisquoi. He handed me a document which is in French, signed by Fernand E. Leblanc, Député de Laurier. I am translating it in my own way so the minister will understand—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: "As you know the federal government favours a participation more direct of the citizens and the men of affairs—that is businessmen—in the financing of the Liberal Party.

The new electoral law permits you to obtain credits—" and he goes on to set out what the credits will be when the contribution is made.

"Your contributions—" and I am translating still.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: And I translate with the same ease that I read English.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: "Your contributions will be recognized by an official receipt sent out by the central organization and will be accepted by the Minister of National Revenue. Be assured that your contribution will be greatly appreciated. Liberally yours, Fernand E. Leblanc"—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: There are three "Ls", Leblanc, Liberal, Laurier.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacFarlane: Fantastic; good translation.

Mr. Diefenbaker: They apparently recognize he is in the House. He is sitting three seats behind the minister. Can the minister just get in touch with him because I do not believe in asking questions of parliamentary secretaries.

Mr. MacFarlane: It is below your dignity, is it?

Mr. Diefenbaker: The hon. gentleman may be an authority on athletics, but parliament is a little out of his way.

Mr. MacFarlane: You did not answer my question.

Mr. Diefenbaker: In order to satisfy the curiosity of the House, I would like to find out whether he sent this and whether he had any basis for saying the federal government favours the participation more directly of citizens and businessmen in the financing of the Liberal Party.

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, first of all, I must, of course congratulate the right hon. member on his remarkable translating capability.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jamieson: A number of years ago had he understood French as well as he knows it now the whole course of history might have been changed.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, while I congratulate him on his new skill in French, I am surprised that such a renowned Tory member could get out three such distinguished Liberal words as the ones he mentioned without choking over all three of them.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jamieson: On the basis of his question I undertake, as I always do with the right hon. gentleman, to make a detailed inquiry and I will let him know at the first opportunity.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: I appreciate very much the observations of the hon. gentleman. I read French and translate just as I always did, and there has been no recent study such as he is endeavouring to speak about—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Laurier.

[Translation]

Mr. Fernand E. Leblanc (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Laurier on a question of privilege.

Mr. Leblanc (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Grafftey) is making a storm in a teacup. What he forgets to say is that during the leadership convention, while he was a candidate for the Progressive Conservatives, he sent requests for financial support on House of Commons stationery.

However, I must free the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Jamieson) of all responsibility in that matter, for he was not even aware of my subscription campaign in the constituency and I did not see fit to discuss it with him because it is with the leader in Quebec, the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde), that I discuss those things.

Moreover, Mr. Speaker, nothing in what I did violates the election legislation passed by this House nor runs counter to the normal use of our stationery. If I am not mistaken, yourself, Mr. Speaker, three weeks or a month ago, when the question was put to you and we discussed it, said that someone had asked you if that practice was acceptable, and if I remember well you told me that a minister may use his stationery in those circumstances, just like his parliamentary secretary, and anybody else may use the House of Commons stationery, if being a member is their only title.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, on this point of order; I think it is very important, sir, in view of the remarks of the parliamentary secretary, to point out that notwithstanding the answer of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, this indeed is not House of Commons letterhead. This is letterhead which relates directly to the office of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Now, sir, when letterhead of this sort is used with respect to the solicitation of funds and statements are made in the course of the letter that the government will expect persons to make contributions for the betterment of the Liberal Party, you can understand the apprehension that might be caused in the minds of certain citizens within the constituency within which it was sent. Seriously, therefore, the question of privilege is that this is an exceptional matter with respect to which I should move, seconded by the hon. member for the Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) that this matter be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

● (1510)

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Both questions with respect to this matter were, quite properly, directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs whose letterhead was involved either directly or indirectly. I have not examined the letter. Those questions were directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs to determine whether that action met with his approval, he being the minister whose letterhead was being used in this way. The minister undertook to answer that question as soon as possible. That answer may precipitate actions which the House may want to take. It seems to me that it would be orderly to wait for the response of the minister who takes responsibility for the conduct of his portfolio and for the use of his letterhead before entertaining any motion such as the one just put. I am not ruling out of order any such motions, but I think it would be more orderly now to await the developments which have been initiated today to see whether they will lead us to further procedures.

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. It being Thursday, I wonder if I can direct to the government House leader the usual question with respect to the business anticipated today and during the course of next week.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, the business for today is a motion in the name of the leader of the opposition. Tomorrow the first item of business will be amendments to the Pension Act, followed by the report stage and third reading of the bill regarding advance payments for crops. Hopefully, on Monday we will deal with the immigration bill, and if it receives second reading we may wish to agree to defer the vote until a more convenient time in the week. On Wednesday I intend to call, if in the meantime the committee has reported, the amendments to the fiscal relations bill. I am not sure whether the committee will report by that time, but if it does I would consider calling that item. Tomorrow I will indicate what days will be designated as allotted days for next week.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question which arises out of the fact that there seems to have been some change since we discussed this matter this morning. I should like to ask the minister when the debate on the motion regarding the report of the statutory instruments committee will be called. I should also like to ask what we will deal with on Monday if we finish second reading of the immigration bill before the day ends.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I realize that there has been a shift in plans, as the hon. member mentioned. That is because it is not possible to have all those who wish to participate tomorrow on the motion in the name of the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants. However, it is still open to call that motion for a certain period on Monday following the immigration bill, and if we do call it for this certain period it would have to be agreed to by all those who wish to participate and, particularly, additional time may have to be provided for that discussion if the motion to concur is called very late in the day.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, the minister also mentioned an understanding about a vote on Bill C-24, if one is called. So that we may know what we are doing, I wonder if the minister would ask for agreement now, that if a vote is requested on Bill C-24 on Monday it be deferred until a time on which we might agree.

Mr. MacEachen: I suggest that it be deferred until Wednesday, and because there is considerable notice I suggest we agree to a 15-minute bell.

Mr. Speaker: I take it an agreement is being sought that in the event of the calling of the immigration bill on Monday, and in the event that a vote is required during that time, that vote will be deferred until Wednesday upon calling of orders of the day and that the bells be of 15 minutes' duration. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Grafftey: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. In reply to the question of privilege of the Parliamentary Secretary to the Secretary of State for External Affairs, what he said in terms of my franking fund-raising letters was not true. I have double-checked with my office, and at no time during my fund-raising campaign for the leadership of my party did I use a frank or parliamentary stationery. I used blank notepaper and paid for my mailing.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

PRIVILEGE

MR. BALDWIN—AGREEMENT WITH BOEING AIRCRAFT—RULING BY MR. SPEAKER

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Yesterday a question of privilege was raised by the hon. member for Peace River and reference was made to an agreement entered into, or purportedly entered into, between the Minister of Justice and the attorney general of the United States. I indicated that it might be propitious to hear further argument today with specific reference to the agreement. I see that the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar, and perhaps the Minister of Justice, are prepared to extend further argument.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, I merely rise to apologize on behalf of the hon. member for Peace River who is required to be out of town at this time. I wonder if it would be possible to forestall deliberation on this interesting point until such time as my colleague is back in the House and when the Minister of Justice is also here. If that meets with the approval of the minister and your approval, Your Honour, I make that suggestion.

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, naturally, I am in your hands. As I understood Your Honour's remarks yesterday, the arguments had been made but neither I nor your Honour had the agreement in front of us and we were unable to refer to it as to specifics. I am ready to proceed today. As I understood Your Honour's remarks yesterday, you wanted to hear specific reference to the agreement and then your Honour would reserve on the matter. I am ready to go today, but if it is the wish of the Chair to have the hon. member for Peace River in the House, I would be prepared to wait until tomorrow.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have to confess that upon study of the question of privilege raised by the hon. member for Peace River my first impression is that if there is merit in the essential point he faces a secondary difficulty in that it may be hypothetical; that is to say, basically I think there is recognition of the fact that the point raised by the hon. member for Peace River was that entering into the agreement potentially raised a situation regarding which the House might be deprived of information.

It is not even certain whether the House would be deprived of information, but in any case it is absolutely certain that if the difficulty does exist, it exists potentially rather than in reality. That being the case I would be very much inclined to consider, that the proper time to raise the point would be when it is a reality instead of a hypothetical case as it is now. However, in view of the unavoidable absence today of the hon. member for Peace River, and because the matter is not immediate in itself, it does not seem to me that any harm would be done to defer the matter indefinitely until such time as parties may wish to deliver a brief argument. But that does not alter my basic disposition in any way.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

HOUSE OF COMMONS

BROADCASTING OF PROCEEDINGS—COMMITTEE REPORT

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to present the second report of the special committee appointed to supervise the implementation of radio and television broadcasting of proceedings of the House and its committees.

VETERANS AFFAIRS—FIRST REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Prosper Boulanger (Mercier): Mr. Speaker, it is an honour to present a report following your presentation. Let me also say that, it being St. Patrick's day, the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs did a tremendous job this morning.

MANAGEMENT AND MEMBERS' SERVICES

NUMBER OF VASECTOMIES PERFORMED IN THE NORTHWEST TERRITORIES

Question No. 1,244—Mr. Firth:

What are the number of vasectomies performed on (a) Inuits (b) Indians (c) others in each community in the Northwest Territories for each year since 1970?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): (a) None recorded; (b) None recorded;

NOTE: For most communities in the North, data on vasectomy procedures is not available. Since the vast majority of vasectomies are performed as out-patient procedures in doctors offices, data exists only in individual patient records maintained in those offices. Moreover, the computer maintained by the Northwest Territories Medicare officials has not been programmed to record and retrieve this vasectomy data. For the reasons outlined above, these statistics relate only to procedures performed on in-patients in some hospitals and probably understate the over all situation in terms of the number of vasectomies performed. Due to the small number of vasectomies performed and the small populations in these northern communities, the rate per hundred thousand, although strictly accurate, can be misleading.

MANPOWER AND IMMIGRATION—HIRING OF EMPLOYEES FROM PRIVATE EMPLOYMENT AGENCIES

Question No. 1,535—Mr. McKenzie:

1. Has the Department of Manpower and Immigration obtained (a) part-time (b) full-time employees from private employment agencies in (i) British Columbia (ii) Alberta (iii) Saskatchewan (iv) Manitoba (v) Ontario (vi) Quebec (vii) New Brunswick (viii) Nova Scotia (ix) Prince Edward Island (x) Newfoundland and, if so, in each case, how many?

2. Are such employees paid from supplementary estimates and, if not, from what estimates are they paid?

3. By province, what was the (a) average hourly rate paid to employment agencies (b) average hourly rate paid to employees (c) total amount paid by the Department in (i) 1975 (ii) 1976?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): As on January 25, 1977: 1. (a) and (b) (i) (ii) (iii) (iv) (vi) (vii) (viii) (ix) (x), Nil. (a) (v), Nil. (b) (v) 15.

2. No Private employment agencies are paid from the departmental operating budget.

3. Based on fiscal year basis to January 25, 1977: British Columbia, (a) (i) and (ii), Nil; Alberta, (a)(i) and (ii), Nil; Saskatchewan, (a) (i) and (ii), Nil; Manitoba, (a) (i) and (ii), Nil; Ontario, (a) (i) $5.36; (a) (ii) $5.80; Quebec, (a)(i) and (ii) Nil; New Brunswick, (a) (i) and (ii) Nil; Nova Scotia, (a)(i) and (ii), Nil; Prince Edward Island, (a)(i) and (ii), Nil; Newfoundland, (a)(i) and (ii), Nil. (b) (i) and (ii) Employees are not paid by the department. Payment is made directly to private employment agencies. The hourly rate paid to employees is the subject of negotiation between employees and agencies. (c) (i) $286,081.67; (c) (ii) $250,983.53.

FITNESS AND AMATEUR SPORT PROGRAMME

Question No. 1,559—Mr. Marshall:

1. Were all universitites in Canada made aware of the Fitness and Amateur Sports Programme and, if so, (a) in what manner (b) were applications received and were they approved?

2. Was Memorial University in St. John's or Corner Brook, Newfoundland, advised of the Programme and, if so, on what date and by what means?

Order Paper Questions

Hon. Iona Campagnolo (Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport)): 1. (a) A total of 52 degree granting institutions, contained in a list supplied by the Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada, received a letter from the Minister of National Health and Welfare outlining the terms and conditions of the Physical Resources Development Programme. The provincial ministers responsible for sport and recreation were similarly informed. (b) Applications were received from 21 institutions. On December 4, 1976, the Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport, the Hon. Iona Campagnolo, announced contributions to eight Canadian universities.

2. Memorial University in St. John's was advised of the Physical Resources Development Programme by letter from the Minister of National Health and Welfare to the President of Memorial University (St. John's Campus) on March 20, 1975. Memorial University (Corner Brook Campus) was not specifically advised of the programme since it was not, at that time, accredited and not included in the list supplied by the Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada prior to March 21, 1975.

NATIONAL LIBRARY BOARD—NEWFOUNDLAND REPRESENTATION

Is Newfoundland represented on the National Library Board and, if so, by whom?

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): I am informed by the National Library as follows: Members of the National Library Advisory Board are appointed by the government and all provinces are not represented on the board at any one time. However, one of the most active members of the National Library Advisory Board has been Miss Margaret Williams, Assistant Librarian of Memorial University, St. John's, Newfoundland whose term of office was recently renewed and who is currently Chairman of the Board's Committee on Bibliographic Services for Canada.

AIB—ROLLING BACK OF PRICES AND WAGE SETTLEMENTS

Question No. 1,694—Mr. Howie:

1. In how many cases to date has the Anti-Inflation Board rolled back (a) wage settlements (b) prices?

2. (a) In how many cases were fines levied (b) what was the total amount in each case (c) against whom was it assessed?

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Anti-Inflation Board and the Department of National Revenue as follows: 1. The Anti-Inflation Board from October 14, 1975 to February 1, 1977 has received 27,402 compensation agreements. In 3,553 cases, the terms of the agreements were rolled back. As of January 31, 1977, the Anti-Inflation Board has received 1,343 price prenotification reports. Companies were required to give prior notice of increases in those Canadian selling prices which would increase a company's projected annual domestic sales revenue for any product line by more than 2 per cent (1½ per cent effective February 8, 1977). As of the end of January, the Anti-Inflation Board has intervened in 25 cases, either disallowing the requested price increase or requiring that the increase be deferred. The remaining increases, which were allowed, were in accordance with the guidelines. While the figure 25 represents the number of times that the board has intervened directly in the raising of an individual price, the board is also instrumental in controlling prices through the restraint it imposes on the amount of profit that individual companies may earn. To date 294 companies have been in excess revenue. This excess revenue is disposed by the companies through the reduction of individual prices, the paying of rebates or the delay of intended price increases.

2. (a) One; (b) $25,000; (c) Irving Pulp and Paper Limited, Saint John, N.B.

PEI NATIONAL PARK—ENTRANCE FEES

Question No. 1,700—Mr. MacDonald (Egmont):

1. Does the 1975-76 Annual Report of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development state "it is Parks Canada policy to consult with the public on National Parks proposals" and, if so, what public groups were consulted prior to the original imposition of the National Park entrance fees in Prince Edward Island and on what date?

2. Is there a public advisory type committee for the Prince Edward Island National Park?

Mr. B. Keith Penner (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): 1. Yes. The matter of National Park Motor Vehicle Fees for Prince Edward Island National Park was discussed in mid-February, 1975, by the Hon. Judd Buchanan and the Hon. Gilbert Clements. On February 21, 1975, Parks Canada officials met with officials of the PEI Department of Tourism to brief them on the entrance fee policy and regulations and to invite provincial comments. The provincial department of tourism subsequently discussed the matter with the PEI tourist association. The announcement of Parks Canada Five Year Programme made by the minister on March 14, 1975, contained the information that the motor vehicle licence fee would be imposed in all developed national parks. Following Mr. Buchanan's announcement, a protest telegram was sent by the newspaper, the Guardian, to the Prime Minister. The various communications led to a decision to delay the implementation of the motor vehicle licence fee for one year in PEI National Park to allow Parks Canada time to carry out construction of kiosks and extensive road entrance changes. Parks Canada officials discussed the fees situation with residents adjacent to the park who could only get access to their property by travelling through the park. They also met with tourist operators, moss harvesters, fishermen and Community Improvement Committee members. On December 5, 1975, a committee of concerned citizens placed a two-page advertisement in the Guardian in protest of the entrance fees. The radio station conducted an open-line program and television interviews on the topic were held also. Citizens in the other Atlantic provinces were concerned also and made their views known to Parks Canada. As a result of these concerns, a revised schedule of motor vehicle licence fees was announced by Mr. Buchanan at a press conference held in Halifax on February 27, 1976. The following day Mr. Buchanan met with Mr. Clements and the PEI tourist association in Charlottetown. Later a newsletter was mailed to all residents of PEI explaining the revised schedule and inviting residents to get in touch with the superintendent of the national park for further information.

2. There is no public advisory type committee for Prince Edward Island National Park. However, the public participation process described below fills the same role as a public advisory committee: Parks Canada is co-operating with the government of Prince Edward Island in a planning project for the north shore central zone of the province. The services of a planner and a financial contribution of $50,000 has been given to the project. Through open consultation between local communities and government it is the objective of the planning process to: (a) prepare a concept plan for the north shore central region; (b) express mutually agreed (community and government) resource management and development objectives; (c) document policies and proposals which are not agreed upon by both government and community, as a basis for on-going consultation. Five series of meetings and one round of open houses have been held in six communities in the area. The sixth series began February 7. Policy, planning and operational questions raised at the first series of meetings were responsed to in written form by Parks Canada officials and discussed by them with community participants at the second series. At the seventh series of meetings the goals, objectives and planning options will be discussed in relation to the project, and at the subsequent open houses.

TRAVEL EXPENSES OF CANADA CUSTOMS PERSONNEL

Question No. 1,738—Mr. Cossitt:

1. What was the total amount of public money used for all aspects of travel, including living expenses etc., on the part of Canada Customs personnel for each of the past four years and what is the estimate for the current fiscal year?

2. What was the overall total for the same periods?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Revenue): 1. F/Y 1972-73, $3,021,526; 1973-74, $3,437,570; 1974-75, $4,336,772; 1975-76, $4,615,204; 1976-77, $4,867,000 (Estimate).

2. $20,278,072

NATIONAL HEALTH AND WELFARE PUBLICATION—"SEX EDUCATION: A TEACHER'S GUIDE"

Question No. 1,807—Mr. Dinsdale:

1. How many copies of the Department of National Health and Welfare publication Sex Education: A Teacher's Guide were printed?

2. (a) What was the cost of the printing (b) how many were distributed (c) is the government reprinting the publication?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): 1. Number printed: English, 6,000 units of six booklets; French, 3,000 units of six booklets; Total, 9,000 units of six booklets.

2. (a) $23,500; (b) 9,000 units of six booklets; (c) The Family Planning Division of the Department of National Health and Welfare is reprinting the publication.

MINIMUM WAGE RATES—NORTHWEST TERRITORIES

Question No. 1,883—Mr. Herbert:

1. What are the current minimum wage rates in the Northwest Territories?

2. What were the rates in each of the past two years?

3. Have any changes conformed to the guidelines of the Anti-Inflation Board?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): 1. Effective May 7, 1976, the minimum wage rates are: $3 an hour for workers over 17 years of age. $2.55 an hour for workers under 17 years of age.

2. From May 7, 1974 to May 7, 1976, the minimum wage rates were: $2.50 an hour for workers over 17 years of age. $2.25 an hour for workers under 17 years of age. $2 an hour for workers 15 to 16 years of age. $1.75 for workers under 15 years of age.

3. There is no relation to the Anti-Inflation Board Guidelines, since the guidelines do not apply to wage rates under $3.75 per hour.

OFFICIAL PROCLAMATION OF CITIZENSHIP ACT ON FEBRUARY 15, 1977

Question No. 1,903—Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West):

1. How many persons were brought to Ottawa at public expense in conjunction with the official proclamation of the Citizenship Act on February 15, 1977 and (a) how many were (i) judges and officials of local citizenship courts (ii) candidates for citizenship (iii) members of the general public (b) how much time was spent by judges and officials in receiving instruction on the interpretation and procedures under the new Act (c) what was the cost of (i) transportation (ii) food and lodging (iii) other allowances with respect to such persons?

2. How many regional courses of instruction in the interpretation of and procedures under the new Citizenship Act have been held, involving how many persons and at what estimated public expense?

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): 1. (a) 30. (i) 30; (ii) none; (iii) none. (b) Four days. (c)(i) Travel, $3,832. (ii) Food & lodging $4,972. Total $8,804. (iii) Nil.

2. Regional courses of instruction in the Citizenship Act.

Location	Number of Courses	Number of Persons Trained	Estimated Expenses
Toronto	3	54	$ 3,944
Montreal	2	27	2,974
Winnipeg	2	26	9,535
Vancouver	2	26	5,942
*Ottawa	2	41	14,279
Total	11	174	$36,674

CANADIAN AND BRITISH INSURANCE COMPANIES ACT

AMENDMENT TO CLARIFY DEFINITIONS

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance) moved first reading of Bill S-3 (from the Senate), to amend the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act and the Foreign Insurance Companies Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY S.O. 58—SUGGESTION THAT BUDGET CONTAIN PROVISIONS TO STIMULATE EMPLOYMENT AND CONTAIN INFLATION

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition) moved:

That this House condemns the government's failure to set or fulfil reasonable economic goals, and urges the Minister of Finance to be forthright with the people of Canada by revealing in the budget the specific goals he will be seeking to reach with regard to employment, inflation, Canada's trade balance, and the rate of economic growth.

He said: Mr. Speaker, we are dealing today with a motion that should not have had to come at this time to the House of Commons but is brought before the House because of two events which occurred this week: one was the revelation by Statistics Canada of the worst record of unemployment in the history of this country, and the second, almost as serious, was the repeated refusal of the government to give any indication, under questioning in the House, that it would give a commitment to the House of Commons and to the more than one million Canadians who are now out of work that there would be, as the central purpose of the new budget, the creation of new jobs, a stimulus to the economy which is needed to create new jobs, and a serious coming to terms with this problem which is critical for all of us, but critical for none more than the one million Canadians who are out of work in Canada.

We are dealing today with a government which has been responsible for running the affairs and the business of Canada for the last nine years. At different times, when faced with their failures, they have blamed the weather, the opposition, international factors, and even Radio-Canada. But now the fact is clear that they have much to answer for after nine years in office as the government of Canada.

One clear area of failure of this government has been in their responsibility to unite this nation. They came to office in the afterglow of the centennial and the Expo celebrations; they came to office with the good will of a great majority of the people of all the provinces and the territories of Canada. However, after nine years, as a direct result of the inflexible centralizing spirit in which this government has governed, we are a much less united nation now, with a government formed in Quebec by a party dedicated to the partition of Canada, with distress deepened in western Canada, and with cynicism and alarm throughout the land. We need only look at the record of this government to see what has soured the spirit of co-operation in Canada. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) attacks the Premier of Quebec—and he is quite non-partisan about it; he attacked Mr. Bourassa with the same fervour he attacks Mr. Lévesque.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) attacks the Prime Minister of Ontario. The Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) attacks the Premier of Saskatchewan. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald), in his capacity as minister of energy, mines and resources, attacked the premier of Alberta. That has been the government's constant program and tactic, to attack their partners.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: Confrontation.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Clark: We know the results—we see them all around us—of that antagonistic, confrontationist approach in a country which can only be held together by a national government that is prepared to act in a spirit of partnership and co-operation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: But it does have to be said that on the question of unity the government at least had an approach; at least it knew what it wanted to do. There has been a clear pattern of centralizing authority and of using almost exclusively one agent, namely, a language policy to seek to make French-speaking Canadians feel more at home in the whole of Canada. The language policy, as is well known in this House and across the country, is accepted by all members and all parties in the House. The centralizing policy remains in place and it remains a cause of disunity in Canada wherever it is applied. But at least on the question of national unity there was a policy, there was a pattern. In the field of economics there has been no pattern at all to what the government has done over the last decade. My colleague adds that there has been no pattern except failure, and perhaps they plan that too, although I think that had they been planning the failure, given their track record, it would not have been as thorough as what we have seen.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: There has been no pattern, there has been no consistent policy. It has been, in terms of economic development, a decade of drift. The consequences are known to all of us, but they are known with particular bitterness by those Canadians, who now number more than a million, who cannot find work in a rich, young country like Canada because the economic drift of this government has made it impossible to create the jobs or the stability that would let Canadians get to work.

One of the most damning statistics in the report released this week by Statistics Canada was the figure which indicated that fully 52,000 Canadians who have been in the habit of looking for work in Canada are no longer looking for work, and they have given the reason. The reason is that they have given up hope. Under this government they believe there is no work to be found, there is no point in looking. They believe, because of the conditions this government has created, that there is no work available for them to look for, and that is among the serious consequences of the economic policies that this government has allowed to function in this country. This government has allowed the economy to drift into a mess which is ruinous enough for Canada today. What is even more alarming is that it has set the stage for even worse to come.

The economic mismanagement of recent years has set off, ticking in our midst, a time-bomb for the future of Canada. The unemployment of today and the balance of payments deficits of today will damage Canadian society and the Canadian economy for years to come, perhaps for decades to come. While the government continues to walk in its sleep, it tells the idle and the unemployed—as it did yesterday and the day before—just to wait and see what will happen, if anything.

It was walking in its sleep at the time of the last budget. At that time, let me remind the House, the Minister of Finance confidently predicted a quarter of a million new jobs for Canadians created by an export-led recovery and new direct investment in this country. None of those hopes has materialized, and Canadians now and in the future will pay the price of this government's failure to look forward. The fact of the matter is that the government does not care about economic policy. I suggest to the House that if the government of Canada paid half as much attention to the economic needs of the Canadian people as it does to picking fights with the provinces or seeking out saboteurs in CBC Canada, this would be a better place in which to live and work.

Let us review the basic facts of the situation. There are one million unemployed in Canada, the largest number in the history of such statistics, and the rate is the highest in nearly 20 years. In the fourth quarter of this last year Canada's balance of payments deficit stood at nearly $1.4 billion, a record deficit. For the whole of last year Canadian portfolio indebtedness increased by $8 billion, twice the figure of the previous year. In the last two years Canada has added $12 billion to new foreign indebtedness. The flight of direct investment capital from Canada last year was of frightening proportions. The outflow of capital last year was almost $1 billion.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Clark: Those are all records—record unemployment, record indebtedness, record outflows of capital. In the olympics of economic failure this government is a winner, hands down. The unemployment figures, as usual, hide more than they reveal. Behind the national figures lie striking regional variations. Those of the provinces of Canada which are above the national average include two of our three most populous provinces. Once, sir, if you remember, Canada had a strong economy, with a few weak spots and some depressed regions. Today Canada is well along the road to becoming a whole country of depressed regions. Those of you who find time to go home and watch television will know the hamburger advertisement. The problem we face in this country is that the whole of Canada today is suffering from a "Big Mac attack."

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Sir, we deserve a break from the Minister of Finance, a break from "Big Mac." We had a break from his predecessor who was as ineffective in bringing direction to the Canadian economy as is the present incumbent of that office. We need, fundamentally, a change in the commitment by the government of Canada to the need for economic development in this country.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, unemployment is an economic phenomenon with serious political implications. It forces people to turn to radical political solutions, as was the case in Quebec recently. In recent months, the level of unemployment in that province has remained at almost 10 per cent. It is interesting to note, Mr. Speaker, that the evolution of the separatist feeling was most pronounced outside Montreal, where the rate of unemployment is usually higher than in the metropolisis. That is the result of bad economic administration, both on the part of the province and the government of Canada. Bad Liberal administration in both cases.

[English]

Sir, one of the most important features of the Canadian labour force in recent years has been the increased participation in the labour force of women, from under 30 per cent 15 years ago to over 40 per cent today. But the unemployment rate continues to mount in this category. According to the latest figures, that rate is now 7 per cent for women over 25 and double that for women under 25. This cannot be passed off easily since so many—fully 43 per cent of working women, according to the figures of the minister responsible for the status of women—work out of economic necessity as the only household wage earner. This is a serious crisis, not only for the women affected but also for the families which so many of them are obliged to support in this country.

Another of the hidden aspects of the gross unemployment statistics—"gross" in several ways—has to do with the way the government deals with young Canadians. The unemployment rate among the young is now nearly twice the national average. In the Atlantic provinces it is now over 20 per cent of the national average, and in Quebec it is nearly that figure. Our young citizens who make up one-fifth of the Canadian population form two-fifths of the army of the unemployed in Canada. They are starting on what should be their work careers, without jobs to go to, without training which can be found, and with no incentive except to be unemployed. Sir, this large group of our population upon whom the future of Canada rests is being scarred by the tragedy of unemployment in a way that threatens to alienate them permanently from Canadian society. Beyond those actually unemployed, Mr. Speaker, there are tens of thousands who, as the Canadian Council on Social Development recently showed, are working part-time or at jobs which lead in no direction because there are no full-time or meaningful jobs available for them.

In brief, what is happening under this government as a result of the economic policies they have followed as a government for the past nine years—and I cannot believe they did not see the young coming—is that the largest generation in Canadian history is growing up with only a marginal attachment to the labour force. Sir, I am not one of those who believes that the youth of Canada have lost the work ethic but there must be work for youth to have the ethic about.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: So the price of today's high level of youth unemployment is being paid now in terms of lost growth, lost production and lost hope in the promise of Canada. But it will also be paid tomorrow in terms of social unrest and dissatisfaction with a society which promises more than it can deliver. Sir, the first time bomb for tomorrow is in those statistics.

Turning to the balance of payments, we find another record, a record last quarter deficit of $1.4 billion, indicating an annual rate of $5 billion. Our relatively small surplus on merchandise account, the smallest surplus which has been recorded since 1969, was more than wiped out by our $2.5 billion deficit on interest and dividends paid abroad, a year on year increase of 30 per cent over 1975. That is a figure which we can expect to increase as a consequence of the government's complacency both in the past year and in the years in which it has had responsibility for managing the economic future of this country.

Deficits today can only be financed by borrowing against tomorrow. Canada cannot live for long on borrowed dollars and borrowed time. This government is borrowing today against our children's future in order to buy time for its own political survival today.

As I have indicated, our national level of foreign indebtedness has increased by more than $12 billion in the last two years, two-thirds of that in the last year alone. Over that period, the bond interest rate has averaged around 10 per cent, creating debt servicing requirements that could have the most serious consequences for our long-term balance of payments situation. This is the second time bomb for tomorrow.

[Translation]

If the government keeps on borrowing from abroad at the present rate, the burden of financing the national debt may reach monstrous proportions. If debt financing increases by a mere 2 per cent of the gross national product, the burden will lead to a serious and continuous increase in our deficit. Indeed, the country will have to continue borrowing, just to pay back the interest on its debt. To my mind, that way of managing things is irrational, and would impose on future generations an unacceptable burden.

[English]

Investors recognize the state to which Canada's economy has fallen. More than one investment analyst has concluded that investment-spending in Canada is, to quote one of them, "flat on its back". That is an interesting quote because "flat on its back" is a condition that sometimes occurs in the sport known as wrestling, a sport to which reference has been made by the Prime Minister and his colleagues from time to time. It is clear that what this government has succeeded in doing is wrestling investment to the ground.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Both Canadian and foreign investors are voting with their feet when it comes to investing in Canada. In 1974, Canada invested $50 million more abroad than foreigners invested in Canada. In 1975 that figure was $30 million. Last year the gap widened dramatically as foreigners reduced their direct investment in this country. The gap is now almost $1 billion. That is an outflow that causes lost jobs and lost production today and tomorrow. Today's investment, as we all know, creates, or can create tomorrow's jobs. The fact that Canada is no longer an attractive place in which to invest, either for Canadians or foreigners, is the third time bomb for tomorrow which has been set off by this government. That investment situation is inevitably associated with the control program and the government's lack of planning and lack of candour about the removal of that program. When they introduced the controls program—and it was the only justifiable reason for introducing it—they had the opportunity to act during the period of controls to bring about other adjustments in a national economy. It was only on that basis that controls could be justified in a country like Canada.

The government has done nothing at all with the time that it purchased with the imposition of controls. We have had 18 months wherein the role of the Minister of Finance has been that of little more than a spokesman for the Anti-Inflation Board. Instead of using the time that controls provided to bring together their partners in the Canadian economy, to work out changes, to bring direction to its economy, this government simply dragged its feet. Now we suspect it is looking for an opportunity to drag its feet a little longer.

It is clear that the controls program has brought serious distortions to the Canadian economy, including distortions in investment patterns. It is clear, also—certainly on this side of the House—that a young country like Canada, which depends so much upon imagination, investment and entrepreneurial spirit cannot have a regime of permanent controls. If we continue to maintain a controls regime over a long period of time because we think it is difficult to wind it down now, we will be creating a climate for permanent controls, a climate which will deeply endanger our capacity to grow as a country.

One of the things the budget must do on March 31 is make it abundantly clear what the government of Canada intends to do about this controls program, when it intends to wind it down, and what steps it intends to introduce to ensure that the winding down will not cause more problems than the regime of controls as practised by this government caused on its own.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: I can only presume that the Minister of Finance intends to do that in his budget. It became evident in his answers to questions earlier in this House before the budget date was set that he and his colleagues were thinking of a later date when the question was first raised as to when the budget would come forward. They then changed that, bringing it up to March 31. It is clear to all who can see that the reason the government brought forward to March 31 the date of the budget was that the Progressive Conservative Party had introduced and had carried in this House an amendment that would have forced a debate upon controls the day after the date chosen by the minister for his budget.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: The crisis that we face as a country today comes at a time when the government should be seeking all the economic advice it can get from this House, from the private sector and from its own economists. However, like all governments that are running out of steam; it closes off the avenues of advice at a time when every breath of fresh air in economic policy making is necessary. This government hints about winding down an agency such as the Economic Council of Canada.

The economic problems that we face are severe. There are many of them; some painfully apparent, others just below the surface ticking like time bombs. They are complex problems. There are no simple solutions. No one in this House pretends that there are. However, we believe those problems will never be resolved until the government is prepared to look them squarely in the eye. The government must realize that it has a responsibility to go beyond its particular view as to how to unite a nation. It goes beyond fighting with the provinces. It leads also to giving economic leadership to the people of Canada and creating a climate in which the other partners in the Canadian economy can make their creative contributions. It will take time, but the process has to start.

I want to suggest a couple of areas where the government can start a process of reconstruction. First, the government has a major obligation to stop contributing to inflation. The governor of the Bank of Canada made a step in this direction by gradually scaling down the growth in the money supply. That has to be followed. The federal government has a very clear obligation to continue a reduction in the growth of its own expenditures. It has to be a real reduction, not one that is accomplished by some sleight of hand.

I want to talk for a moment about sleight of hand because behind the sleight of hand of the statement of the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras) that expenditures will grow only 7 per cent in fiscal year 1978 is the fact that operating and capital expenditures will increase by 14.5 per cent. The federal government can, and must, do more to restrain the growth of its expenditures. It is not enough to say that the growth of government expenditures will follow the growth of the gross national product. That constitutes acceptance of an unacceptable status quo. The federal government must commit itself to reducing substantially, over time, the share of the economy which it and other levels of government have taken for themselves.

Third, there has to be determination to stimulate growth in this country. Savings in expenditures have to be passed on to Canadians. In doing so the administration can create jobs and stimulate economic activity without acting in a way which will further increase inflation. The tax burden on individual Canadians can be reduced. Thus, confidence will be restored, or a step toward restoration taken. At the same time, the purchasing power in the hands of Canadians would be increased. To assist in the expansion of investment, businesses also have to be given a tax break.

There are further important measures needed. This party has proposed reductions in personal taxation. The argument of the present administration that it has already passed on a tax break through the indexation of tax brackets is nothing more than a sham, an accounting trick. All the indexation of tax brackets does is compensate for past inflation; it replaces the profit the government makes from generating inflation in Ottawa and allowing it to develop across the country. There is no merit at all in returning to individual Canadians what was theirs in the first place. The stopping of confiscatory taxation is not an act for which the government deserves applause. It was their duty in the first place and they must now address seriously the requirement to bring in real, not sleight of hand, tax cuts.

In our view, tax cuts should be aimed directly at producing benefits for Canadians earning less than $8,000 a year, with lesser benefit for those earning from $8,000 to $16,000 a year. The purpose of tax cuts of this kind is to stimulate consumption among those who have borne the greatest burden of inflation. Some benefits in increased saving would also result. Thus, more capital would be available for domestic investment. The government should also consider a reduction in the manufacturer's sales tax, not necessarily across the board—that might work out to be a quite small reduction—but it should consider a sales tax cut in particular areas. Perhaps the remaining sales tax on building materials could be removed. We would certainly welcome and expect government initiatives in this area.

Obviously, the greatest burden of our national unemployment is borne by the five eastern provinces, as I mentioned earlier. That is an area of the country containing about 34 per cent of the population but carrying 45 per cent of the unemployment. In 1976 almost 80 per cent of the increase in the number of unemployed in Canada took place in the Atlantic provinces and Quebec. I suggest to the government that tax policies must recognize these facts and take steps to solve the problem.

A tax rebate or credit scheme for investment in research and development projects could be effective. Having more research and development done in Canada is one step we could take to reduce our truly mammoth deficit in trade and manufactured products. If the maximum benefits of such a credit were made available to companies and, I would emphasize, to small businesses investing in research and development in the Atlantic region and Quebec, then a positive contribution would be made to assisting the growth of employment in these provinces, one which would provide the basis of an industrial structure as well as assisting in the long term improvement of our balance of trade in manufactured products.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: The government should also examine the possibility of introducing long term fiscal or tax contracts for companies investing in Quebec or in Atlantic Canada. I reviewed this proposal for the House earlier and I think it is one which has worked well in New Hampshire and in southern Ireland. I think it deserves some kind of consideration here. There should also be specific tax assistance to encourage investment in small and medium-sized business, particularly owner-managed enterprises. The government has received a lot of excellent proposals for a program like this. My predecessor, the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield), called for—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his allotted time has expired. Nevertheless, he may continue if he has unanimous consent.

Some hon. Members: Go on!

Mr. Clark: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. There have been a number of proposals put forward. I will not reiterate them at length, but there was one proposed by my predecessor some years ago calling for a small business investment tax credit. The government of Ontario, in 1974, suggested venture investment programs. The Canadian Federation of Independent Businessmen suggested its own approach to deal with this problem. Whatever method the government decides to adopt, it clearly has to act to create encouragement and incentive for this highly productive, highly important segment of the Canadian community, particularly because incentives to small business will have a direct impact upon some of the smaller communities in Canada where larger government and other programs might not be as effective.

Even if the government does act on the measures suggested, even if it does bring in programs designed to encourage job creation, it is going to take some time for the effects to be felt through the economy. There will be no immediate aid for the more than a million Canadians out of work today. That is the reason my colleagues and I have been urging in the House in the last few days that some emergency action be taken by the government, either in the field of direct job creation programs or, just as important, by changing some of the priorities in existing federal spending programs. The expenditure is already committed, but the question which has to be put is whether or not it is intelligent and in the national interest, given the necessity of restraint, to focus some of those expenditures in areas where they could be delayed at the cost of denying those expenditures to regions and people in Canada in desperate need of them now as their only means of obtaining jobs.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: When I raised this very question with the Prime Minister yesterday, he answered with his usual seriousness—not answering at all. He suggested I should indicate where some of those savings might be made. I can suggest some areas which, cumulatively, might be able to stand the delay of expenditure for a year or two in the interests of the unemployed. We are spending $6 million building a new Canadian embassy in Yugoslavia. Might not that sum be better spent helping the unemployed in Newfoundland? We have spent $10.5 million in agents' fees for services in countries which deny having even heard of agents. Might it not have been better to have directed that money toward job creation in Quebec instead of investing in a phanton in Korea?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: According to answers to questions on the order paper the other day, this government, which is unprepared to find jobs for the unemployed, spent $200,000 on pencils for the census. They are spending now, on an annual basis, $100,000 a year to stick Mirabel back together again because a Liberal administration, with its capacity for planning, used the wrong adhesive to hold together the slabs on the tarmac. They did not take into account the fact that this is a country dominated by winter, so we are spending $100,000 a year for as long as we can see ahead to keep Mirabel together instead of helping Canadians to find jobs.

What else is the government doing? It is spending $175,000 to study washroom usage in Canada. It is spending $133,-757.50 on briefcases. It is, of course, a question of priorities. We believe that expenditures of this kind, together with many others which are projected by the government, would be far better made if they were directed to job creation for the more than one million who are out of work today.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: To try to regenerate the confidence of Canadians in our economic future so that there will be more willingness to invest in job-creating, capital projects, the federal government could make a positive contribution by providing to all Canadians the benefit of its thinking on the future course of the economy.

● (1600)

As a start, sir, I think that the budget brought down by the minister on March 31 should provide forecasts not just to the end of the fiscal year 1978, as would be consistent with past practice, but at least to the end of fiscal year 1979. The forecasts could include real growth, expected real growth, inflation, job creation, federal revenues and expenditures. In addition to this longer range forecast the government should suggest its targets for economic performance for five years, in this case up to 1982, in much the same way as the Economic Council of Canada has done.

The use of longer range forecasts and targets will provide an indication of where the government wants to take the economy. It will stand as a guide to Canadians and as a measure of performance. Right now there is no guide to Canadians. We have a government that has operated without bringing in northern land use regulations for seven years. We have a government that changes the rules regarding controls in the middle of the night and then changes the administrative rules daily. In the operation of the Anti-Inflation Board there is no certainty at all, and the only standards by which we have to judge the effectiveness of government policy are the kind of statistics which were released this week which show that more than a million Canadians are out of work as a result of the policies of the government.

A second very important step to revive the confidence of all Canadians in the future of their economy would be to call a national conference on the economy to discuss its future course. This should be a multiparty conference where all sectors of economic activity would be represented, not only large industries and big unions. Non-organized labour, small businessmen, all levels of government, consumers, farmers and other interested groups would also be represented.

At this conference we could discuss not only the long-term planning of the economy by the government but also the matter of the share of the GNP held by the government. Such a conference would have the advantage of removing the debate from the restricted and closed circles where the powerful generally meet. The economic future of our country should be discussed openly and in public. The Economic Council of Canada has already sponsored two similar conferences. Most participants found that process useful but questioned its validity for nobody ever followed up on the recommendations which were then expressed. I do not suggest that the federal government should give up its responsibilities for managing the national economy in favour of a consensus resulting from a conference. I suggest that the federal government should commit itself to follow up on the recommendations of the conference or, on the contrary, to reject them in a rational way. Only such a mechanism would ensure that Canadians have a say in their own economy, the only way they will be protected against sudden and dramatic turnabouts in economic policy.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, the essence of this philosophy is that the economy of Canada is too important to be left to the cabinet of Canada and a handful of its bureaucrats. There must be—

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Especially to this cabinet.

Mr. Clark: This or any other cabinet, but this cabinet is particularly dangerous because we can see what they do.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: We are speaking here of a process, and there clearly must be, in a democratic country where the private sector is so much more important to our growth than the government sector, a process that will allow everyone affected by major economic decisions to have some influence upon those decisions, and a process that will allow the government to escape from the prison of its own advice and its own advisers and consider the good advice and the good sense of people who want something more in this country than to get the economy going.

We face a serious crisis today. We face it for two reasons. The first is that we have a government that fundamentally does not care about economics. It was elected with a mandate to unify and it will be judged at other times on its capacity to unify this country, a capacity which, as I say, has become more clear in recent months in the province of Quebec and in recent years in western Canada and in other regions.

The other reason that we have a crisis today is that the government has consistently been freezing out other opinion—and that must change. The consequences, sir, are all around us. We have crisis today. We have, as I have indicated, time bombs built in for tomorrow. The budget is ahead. There is still, I would presume, some time to affect it. We have asked during the last two days that there will be a clear commitment to generating jobs as a major priority of this government. No commitment was given. The only instrument we have, as representatives of the people of Canada—representatives of the unemployed in Canada who obviously have no spokesmen on the government side—is to dramatize this crisis to a government which asks, in effect, "What's a million unemployed?", when bringing this matter forward in debate as we have done today.

The Minister of Finance will be replying. I hope he will give some indication of the general direction in which he intends to go. I hope he will give us some commitment that there will be in his budget a priority determination to create jobs for those Canadians who are out of work now, and I hope that he will give us some commitment that the budget will begin a process of much more open decision making. I express to him in advance my apology that I will have to read most of his remarks in Hansard—

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Oh, come on.

Mr. Clark: You had to sit through mine, and I do apologize for this. But I will read them with the avidity that I do all his remarks, and I hope the minister will in his remarks today and in the budget that he brings in reverse a record that he and his colleagues have set—a record of contempt for the unemployed in Canada, of blindness to the need for economic confidence and growth in Canada, and failure to exercise its fundamental responsibility for national leadership. Clearly, if that is not done, this motion must express a majority view of the House of Commons as to the failure of this government to carry out its responsibilities to bring economic leadership to the country.

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, Canadians are in serious trouble. Outside this House we have the most serious unmeployment rate of any period since the depression, and inside the House—as has been demonstrated day after day since last September—we have a government which neither cares nor knows what to do about the problem. Just as in the depression, instead of advancing creative or innovative thoughts, the government has produced a new rigidity respecting conservative economics. So, too, today do we have a government which watches month after month as unemployment figures increase and responds to that with the most absurd banalities one could imagine.

Just yesterday in the House of Commons the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said that the cause—not the only cause, but one of the principal causes—of our situation is that Canadians are living beyond their means. I thought I was listening to R. B. Bennett all over again. The statement made by the Prime Minister was both incredible and sad. It was incredible because the Prime Minister ought to know better, and I think he does know better. It was sad because the statement he made betrayed an insensitivity—which is almost beyond belief—about the more than one million Canadians who are out of work. Certain people are living beyond their means, and I suggest that the Prime Minister is pre-eminently among them. Canada's poor and unemployed are certainly not living beyond their means.

This government displays lack of thought, lack of action and no caring at all. Instead, we hear commonplace utterances of the most conservative economic banalities one could dig up, and I say that with all seriousness. Instead of the present crisis leading to the imaginative application of new ideas, and instead of the implementation of progressive ideas which are not necessarily new, we have inaction by this government. In my view, this government's response to the unemployment crisis can only be described as traumatically regressive. It is indifferent to the human and economic consequences of one million people being unemployed.

The figures are alarming and disturbing. They ought to concern the some 90 per cent of Canadians who have jobs. The official rate is now 9.1 per cent, with 932,000 unemployed. We know that the real rate is much higher and that the real number is much greater. If we add to the official figures produced by the government all those Canadians who would willingly take a job in this country, instead of 932,000 Canadians unemployed in 1977—not 1937—the figure would be 1.479 million. There would be a real rate of unemployment in February, 1977, of 13.7 per cent instead of the official figure of 9.1 per cent.

In a civilized industrial country some 40 years after the great depression that is a scandalous situation. Eight of the ten provinces have double digit inflation as well as double digit unemployment. If we look at the real figures—not the official government data—eight of our ten provinces have double digit unemployment. In Newfoundland the figure is 31.8 per cent. These are February figures, and I have added to the official data those people who in the view of my party ought to be included in the monthly data, namely, those who would be in the labour market if jobs were available.

Based on that, we get the following figures for Canada in 1977: Newfoundland, 31.8 per cent; Prince Edward Island, 25.9 per cent; Nova Scotia, 20.1 per cent; New Brunswick, 25.7 per cent, Quebec 16.6 per cent; Ontario, 11.4 per cent, Manitoba, 11.3 per cent; British Columbia, 13.4 per cent. Even in the two provinces where unemployment is not in the double digit category, what do we have? In Saskatchewan the figure is 9.2 per cent, and in the best of the lot, in Alberta, the figure is 7.3 per cent. It was not many years ago that even Liberals talked about 3 per cent unemployment being a serious objective for an industrial society and a target we should aim for in terms of job creation.

Fortunately, the economy of the province of Alberta has been stimulated because of the international oil situation, but it still has an unemployment rate of 7.3 per cent. I repeat that this is a scandalous situation in both human and economic terms. It should cause the government to express concern and to come forward and say, "We are trying to do (a), (b), (c) and (d), and perhaps over four years we will reduce the level significantly." I do not expect that to happen tomorrow, but the government should come forward with a program which will do something over a period of three or four years. But do we get those expressions of concern? Not at all. We get the flippancy of the Prime Minister who says we are living beyond our means. Like fun! Today the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) made reference to farmers spending their time in Florida, or California; I do not remember which.

An hon. Member: Hawaii.

Mr. Broadbent: The minister should tell that to farmers whose incomes are going down at the rate of 30 per cent per year. He should tell that to the one million Canadians who are unemployed. That is the kind of attitude this government has—and this is the government which has control of our fate. God protect us! If the general picture is bad from region to region and from province to province, it is particularly bad for the young people of Canada. Almost half of those unemployed are between the ages of 15 and 24. In another two months there will be several hundred thousand young people leaving our schools and universities to go on to the job market. It will be the worst job market since the depression. Many of these young people want to stay in the job market. They are willing to work and contribute to the well-being of their families and communities. But jobs are not available, they will not be available and, reluctantly, many young people will go back to school. They will be doing so reluctantly, because returning to school is not their wish. At this stage they do not want to further their education, but because there are no jobs from coast to coast they will return to school.

The situation is serious and it is particularly serious in the province of Quebec. To use a phrase of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark), we indeed have a real time-bomb. Unemployment is at catastrophic levels among the young people of that province. It is no coincidence that young French Canadians in Quebec voted overwhelmingly for the Parti Québécois. The survey of the attitude in the province of Quebec which came out a few days ago shows that there has been a doubling of support for separatism since the election of the Trudeau government. I suggest that the young people of the province of Quebec are contributing to the increase in the commitment to have an independent province of Quebec. Surely that, if not humanitarian considerations, should bother this government.

We have had a number of debates on the subject of unemployment in the House since last September when my party first said that this should be recognized by the government as the leading political and economic question in this country. That has been carefully and benignly ignored by the government. At various times, on behalf of my colleagues, I have suggested what ought to be done both in the short run and in the long run. Today I will wait until near the end of my speech to repeat some of those suggestions, if time permits.

However, what I would really like to do this afternoon is report to the House and to the people of Canada on a three day visit my colleagues and I had in the province of British Columbia this past weekend. Four of us went to the province of British Columbia, for two reasons. We wanted to learn directly from people who are unemployed what it means to be unemployed in Canada in 1977, and how it affects their lives and the lives of their families. Second, we wanted to learn from the people who were experiencing this unemployment if they had some suggestions to make, because it is my serious view that the bureaucrats, the ministers and, indeed, the leaders of political parties on this side of the House all too often assume that we know the right generalizations, we know the broad framework of economic analysis and therefore we do not have to learn on the spot from ordinary people their proposals about what to do with their particular circumstances. It has been one of the things I have learned as a politician that ordinary people do in fact have a remarkable grasp of the significance of their own situation and a remarkable capacity for making proposals for improving that situation based on common sense and a lot of economic sense in a general way.

I would like now to report on our trip to three communities in British Columbia, to report to the House the thoughts and feelings of the ordinary people of B.C. on the question of unemployment, and report to the House some of their suggestions about what could be done and what should be done in their communities to deal with this national and regional problem. First, we spent last Saturday in the very attractive seaport town of Nanaimo and we heard a dozen or so briefs on Saturday afternoon in that community which has an unemployment rate of about 14 per cent at present.

I will just give the House illustrations from some of those briefs which document the experience and contain some suggestions for improvement. First, I will refer to the briefs submitted by Chief Modeste of the Cowichan Band Council. I would like the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Cullen), as well as the minister responsible for our native people, to read that brief because in it they will find a very moving description of the extent of unemployment on this reserve and its impact on the lives of the Indian people in that reserve, on their families, what it does to motivation and what it does in terms of expectations for their life in this land of ours.

It is not a charming piece of material to read. It would not move one to great feelings of optimism and high expectations about the future of Canada as seen from the perspective of a member of the Cowichan band in that part of our land. It is, indeed, a sad document, and I remind you, Mr. Speaker, that what is true in that band holds true universally for our native people in Canada, almost all of whom are excluded, I might add, from the official unemployment figures that come out month after month. At the conclusion of this very moving brief the last sentence reads:

> An old Indian teaching is that no man can suppress another for very long for he will pay for his action in the end.

That was not said in a polemical or threatening way; it was said seriously and movingly by a man who was acting as the spokesman for his people. A brief was presented by the Alberni District Labour Council. It describes, again in plain language and therefore movingly, the particular situation of our young people and how unemployment begins to destroy their incentive, begins to sap their energy and take away their commitment to this country. I quote from it as a recommendation to the government of the day. At one point it reads:

> Along with the right of education, health and housing, there has to be a right to a work place.

My party accepts that. It accepts the view that what we should have on the law books of Canada is a full employment act which says that in principle every Canadian from St. John's in the east to Victoria in the west has the right to a job. It is not utopian that a government of the day would be expected to lay down a four or five year program to achieve over that period full employment and then make annual reports to the House about its target and its success or failure in achieving that target. But we have no such legislation, no such commitment to full employment from this Liberal government, nor have we had it from any of its predecessors.

Mr. Stevens: How about a right to work law?

Mr. Broadbent: It depends entirely on what you mean by that concept. If you mean that Canadians should have the right to a job instead of welfare, you have the 100 per cent support of my party.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: The third brief to which I should like to refer came from the Gabriola Island fishermen. Again, it was one that contained not only a moving description of the circumstances in which fishermen on the west coast find themselves but had some pertinent recommendations to make. It was concerned about the revival of the salmon fishery in that part of British Columbia. They objected to a proposed change in the division of our coastal waters in B.C. which would be harmful for small boats and trawl fishermen. I will not go into details at this time. Their point was that they did not want the announced change that had been outlined to them to take place because it would be harmful for the fishermen there. But what did they call for? They called for an independent commission whose purpose it would be to recommend practical means of reviving the salmon fishery in their area so that, as they put it, "fishermen can make their own living independent of subsidies, welfare or unemployment insurance". What they wanted was not some form of hand out, some form of charity; they wanted a sensible fishery policy which would enable them to live with dignity doing some work.

Mr. Friesen: What did Barrett do?

Mr. Broadbent: Let me tell the Tory backbencher that since the Tory-Liberal-Socred alliance has come in in British Columbia, unemployment has gone up and inflation has gone up, not down. The fourth brief we heard in Nanaimo—

Mr. Wenman: Tell us about the high income tax in Manitoba.

Mr. Broadbent: It is obvious the Tories have had nothing constructive to say the whole time Canadians have suffered such a high rate of unemployment, and now they are sensitive about the issue. The fourth brief to which I should like to refer is the one which was submitted by the Nanaimo Association for Intervention and Development. They provided a very disturbing set of statistics.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon gentleman, but I must inform the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens), that we must respect the decorum of the House and refrain from wearing a hat on this day.

Economic Policy

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I would like to point out that there is a Standing Order under which all hon. members have the right to wear a hat in the House. Our only obligation is to take it off when we address the Chair. I will be glad to look up the appropriate citation, Mr. Speaker. As the descendant of a Healy and a McDermett and others on the Scottish side, I have to defend the hon. member's right to wear that particular hat.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. The hon. member for York-Simcoe will not have to rise on a point of order. The Chair withdraws its remarks. It has been the practice of the House, and if hon. members are prepared to allow it with unanimous consent I will allow the hon. member for York-Simcoe to wear his Irish hat.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, thank you very much for your intervention, and I am particularly pleased that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) has, in this instance at least, co-operated in my endeavour to pay tribute to my fine native land, Ireland. If I may, I should like to wear my hat in the House on the understanding that if I address you, Mr. Speaker, I will certainly remove it.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, this recent exchange boggles the mind. Here we are, in the midst of a debate on a motion moved by the Official Opposition expressing concern about unemployment, and the financial spokesman for the Tory party comes into the House and frivolously puts on a ridiculous hat. I say to you as seriously as I can that all Canadians of Irish ancestry who are unemployed hold the hon. member in nothing but contempt for this frivolous indulgence at such a serious time. I mean that. I note that some hon. members are smiling. Perhaps hon. members will be moved by the following statistics. One of the briefs suggested that of the people who attempted suicide in Vancouver between October, 1975, and September, 1976, 45.8 per cent were unemployed. Unemployment to them was not a joke. They did not have time to fool around celebrating St. Patrick's day. For them unemployment was a serious issue. I say through you, Mr. Speaker, to all hon. members that it may be fine for us to smile, to smirk, to kid. We are living well. We are fully employed. We have good incomes. But for the more than one million—in fact, there are almost 1.5 million unemployed—without jobs the situation is serious. Many of them have no income, and unemployment is not something for them to joke about.

Mr. Stevens: Who's joking?

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, from Nanaimo we proceeded up the coast to that beautiful community in British Columbia known as Powell River.

Mr. Pearsall: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I understand that the hon. member opposite who claps represents that community. If he really represents it he must know that 25 per cent of the community of Powell River is unemployed.

Mr. Pearsall: You are wrong.

Mr. Broadbent: The hon. member suggests I am wrong. I welcome correction. If the hon. member rises and says the rate is 24.6 per cent, I will accept his correction. I tell him that the unemployment level is 25 per cent. We heard people of that community describing their attempts to find jobs. We were told, for example, of the provincial government's decision to do some budget cutting and of the federal government's attempt, allegedly, to co-operate with that budget cutting effort.

The provincial government asked the federal government to change the designation of Georgia Strait to that of an inland water system. I understand a decision has not been reached on that request of the British Columbia provincial government. But what would it mean? What would it do? That proposal, made by the Socred government of British Columbia, would mean, if accepted, cutting back the crews on ferries from 31 to 14 members. It would mean a net loss of employment in the area of 450 jobs. Not only would jobs be affected but, as I was told by seamen at Powell River, Vancouver and Nanaimo, the safety of the passengers on ships would be significantly affected by crew cutbacks since those waters sometimes become rough. That would be the result if the size of ships' crews was cut in half. The Socred government made that proposal to the federal Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang). Knowing our minister's previous attitude on transport, I fear the worst.

We also heard a moving story from a worker who had been laid off from the Texada mines in Powell River. He was dismayed, not at being laid off— for the mine was run down and the iron ore pretty well depleted—but at the way the unemployment insurance people treated him. He had lived in the community for some time and raised his children, and over a period of 20 or 30 years had accumulated his severance pay. When he was laid off he collected his severance pay, and when he applied for unemployment insurance was told he was not eligible. He was told to use up his severance pay to which he had contributed all his life.

Mr. Speaker, why should a man be put in that position? Since he was available for employment, why should he not be entitled to collect unemployment insurance? Under the regulations, if you are unemployed you are eligible for unemployment insurance if you are available for work. He was available for work. Therefore, I do not see why his severance pay should run out before he or any other Canadian should be entitled to collect unemployment insurance. The sole criterion ought to be, is he ready and willing to work? If he is available for work, he should be entitled to collect unemployment insurance.

Mr. Friesen: Right.

Mr. Broadbent: From Powell River we moved on Monday of this week to Vancouver. In Vancouver we heard extensive testimony on the problems of living, with the high unemployment levels of the province and particularly of the city. The British Columbia Federation of Labour submitted a brief which contained many proposals, to some of which I will refer. It noted particularly the large gap between job forecasting at the federal level and the meeting of those forecasts through the manpower retraining programs. The federation told us of men and women who had been trained for jobs for which there was no demand and which were often non-existent. Interestingly enough, they also told us that some skills were needed but there was no manpower retraining program for meeting those needs. The department did not provide the requisite courses. What the federation told us in British Columbia was exactly similar to what we had been told in St. John's, Newfoundland, two months ago. We were told that manpower retraining centres in St. John's were turning out hundreds of hairdressers. They turned out more hairdressers in St. John's than there were women in Newfoundland to use their services. That was a perfectly absurd situation.

The B.C. federation said that manpower retraining programs should bear some relationship to demand for workers in the market place. No reasonable person can question that suggestion. The federation appropriately stressed the cruelty of changing at this time the eligibility criteria for unemployment insurance—that is, upping the ante, so to speak—from 8 weeks to 12 weeks before people could be eligible to collect unemployment insurance. Surely that is a profoundly cruel action when more than one million Canadians are unemployed. It simply adds insult to injury.

Another question of concern raised in the brief was that many now being employed on LIP projects are simply doing work which would have been done in other ways by skilled workers. The federation told us of community projects on which, normally, plumbers or carpenters would be employed. Since the work was done under a LIP grant, either volunteer workers or workers who worked for substantially lower wage rates were hired to do the job. That ought to concern all of us. We support the LIP program. I do not want that misunderstood. But it is important not to be deceived about some of the consequences of these projects. We are simply giving one group of people jobs which otherwise would be performed by men and women earning a much higher salary. We ought to be concerned, since we are merely shifting the locus of unemployment.

Another submission I found moving was that of the representative of the Canadian Union of Public Employees. This was a very moving documentation and a generalization that at a time of high unemployment, women are the last to be hired and the first to be fired. The case that was generally made was at this time with this level of unemployment, women in Canada suffer disproportionately more than men. Again they provided the data to document the case. It was a sad one.

It should concern us that the female sex in Canada, which has historically been unfairly treated, and those of us in the opposite sex in the past few years are gradually becoming conscious of that fact—

Miss Campbell: It is long overdue.

Mr. Broadbent: I agree with the hon. member that it is long overdue. I will add that it is long overdue on my part. All I say is that we should be increasingly aware of this inequality. We should be aware of the discrimination that exists toward the female sex which is particularly felt at times of unemployment.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired. Nevertheless he may continue if there is unanimous consent.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Broadbent: I thank hon. members for their indulgence. A further brief was submitted by the minister of the First United Church in Vancouver. It might interest hon. members to know that that church is located in the east end of Vancouver, not one of the more posh parts of town where doctors, lawyers and well paid university professors reside. It is a poorer part of Vancouver with a disproportionate number of drifters, unemployed, and those who are down and out.

I was told by people on the scene that the minister worked very hard preparing the brief. I commend him for bringing this to our attention. It indicates that the controls in operation, allegedly from province to province, controlling rents have no effect at all for most of the people for whom he was speaking.

The people for whom this minister was concerned in his brief live in small hotels. There is no control on the rates for the rooms in small hotels. In many cases the people pay a weekly or daily rate for a room. They do not rent an apartment nor do they own a condominium. They simply have a small and in many cases barren and cold room. He found that the rent went up, not by 10 or 15 per cent, but in some cases by 80 per cent for those rooms in the east end of Vancouver.

I do not know whether this survey was conducted in his parish. It was certainly an area of Vancouver that he knows well. He found that these people spent between 75 and 80 per cent of their income on rent. On the average, they had $1 a day to spend on food, clothing and anything else they may need.

Amongst these people, and I suspect the majority of them, were the unemployed. Are they the people who the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) refers to when he says we are living beyond our means? I have my doubts. If we are concerned about rent control and applying it effectively, surely that is an area that we should move into quickly to ensure that the small hotels do not exploit in a very unfair and cruel way the poor people who live in that part of Vancouver.

Another brief I was given had been prepared by the Vancouver and District Labour Council. They stressed the important issue of hidden unemployment. They were concerned that the unemployment figures in Canada were really much higher than official statistics suggest. In particular, they stressed that hidden unemployment was very real, direct and meaningfully felt by young Canadians in their part of Canada, stating that it was they who had given up.

Some cases were cited, not as part of the formal brief but in informal conversation, of young people in the Vancouver area who had been out of school for two years, had been searching incessantly for jobs and had found none.

One has to draw the conclusion that as people get depressed, they lose their incentive as well as their respect for government and authority. It is a perfectly understandable normal reaction by people who grow up in a society which treats them indifferently. They are inclined to react in an indifferent manner. We will get exactly what we deserve from such young people, no better and no less.

A sensible proposal that the labour council made to create jobs was to completely modernize the port of Vancouver. Surely it makes sense to carry further the containerization process on the west coast. If needed capital were put in there, it would provide jobs now, as well as provide an expanded harbour operation for the future. That makes good sense. It is a practical proposal that should be taken up by the national government, and if not, by the government of British Columbia.

Finally with regard to the briefs I will refer to in Vancouver was the one presented by the British Columbia Employers' Council. That is not exactly a hotbed of socialists. In fact, if you look very hard at their membership, it would be hard to find one socialist. I do not say that in any critical sense. They happen to be a group of people who, as a rule, differ in their perspective from that held by my party. They presented a serious brief. In fact, it was presented by the former postmaster general of Canada, Mr. William Hamilton. Mr. Hamilton, on behalf of the Employers' Council of British Columbia, urged an early end to the controls program, something we have been advocating since the controls program was brought in. He made the point that we made at that time, that this controls program has a harmful effect on job creation, that we should put an end to it quickly and introduce measures that will produce more jobs for Canadians.

I want to conclude the report on my three day visit to British Columbia by citing what I think is the most moving testimony of all. It was presented by a 59 year-old mother of two teenage children. She was looking of a job. This woman told the story of a job opening in Abbotsford, a small community. It appears that for a very short time there was an ad in one of the papers by MacDonald's, the hamburger chain. It stated that they were going to open at a new location in Abbotsford and that they wanted to hire a handful of young people, I think in the neighbourhood of 20. Within 24 hours a line up three blocks long appeared. These were young people looking for jobs. They came with haversacks and sleeping bags and stayed overnight in that community looking for that handful of jobs. What does that story tell us? It tells me that among the unemployed in Canada, and I think particularly of unemployed young Canadians, there is not a shiftless attitude. There is not an attitude that they would prefer welfare, the easy life, or hand outs. Quite the contrary. The attitude among the young people of Canada is that they want to work. They want to be able to make their contribution, to look after themselves, probably to marry before long and to raise families. They want to have the same opportunities in their lives as immigrants to this country for the last 100 years, and as the parents of those who have grown up in the past couple of decades always assumed, that this would indeed be a land of promise. That is what the three block line up in Abbotsford meant. But because it was three blocks long and because people came from the surrounding areas so quickly to get the jobs, we see that unemployment is indeed a very serious problem and that there are now thousands out of work. It indicates not only the healthy attitude of Canada's young but the alarming and cruel failure of the government.

[Mr. Broadbent.]

There is no more serious issue today than unemployment. It affects every community in the country. It is running at 30 per cent in Newfoundland, 28 per cent in Cape Breton, 25 per cent in the Gaspé region, 25 per cent in the Powell River area, and 14 per cent in Nanaimo. In Montreal the figure is 20 per cent. It is a national crisis and it is time the government, so long frozen into indifference and inertia, began to act.

Mr. C. A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, first I must congratulate the mover of that motion who gives us an opportunity to deal with issues which deeply concern us; I congratulate the spokesman for the Progressive Conservative Party but at the same time I am rather surprised when reading his motion to note that while condemning the government he has probably forgotten to make suggestions which his party would have in mind to solve our problems.

Indeed, we read in the motion that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) is condemned and urged to be forthright with the people of Canada by revealing in the budget the specific goals he will be seeking to reach with regard to employment, inflation, Canada's trade balance and the rate of economic growth.

As to the representative of the New Democratic Party, he gave us an interesting report of his three day tour in British Columbia. I congratulate him for that, but frankly if I talked about all the cases that go through my office on weekends alone, Mr. Speaker, I think I would have enough for a week. That is why I will spare you that narration. I will just simply talk about a few items in today's motion.

I just read a very interesting book dealing with the funding of Confederation, a book that impressed me because it is a résumé of all the meetings that were held since 1867, including all provincial government and federal government relations. What transpires from those discussions? It was a prime minister at the very outset of Confederation who said: Never forget that Confederation is based on a compromise, and one realizes at the end of every meeting they had that everything was solved on the basis of that compromise. I mention this simply to say that if we really want to come to grips with the problem facing Canada today, that compromise will have to be discussed because I feel that employment, unemployment, and inflation concern the provinces as much as the federal government. This government is being blamed—one could include all previous governments—only because it took over from its predecessor, and so on.

The problem facing us today is not necessarily a problem of one government, it is a national problem, a problem of generation, and it must looked at from that standpoint. Speaking of employment, of course, everybody realizes today, one does not have to be a prophet or a soothsayer to know that our labour force is for the major part unemployed. When dealing with the issue of employment in the present situation we only look for short term seeming remedies to the unemployment afflicting us today. I say "afflicting us" because the plague of unemployment is a natural consequence of our economic evolution. We must indeed realize that it is simply a natural consequence because you do not try to solve unemployment with full employment. Temporarily, yes. And all means are being used, and previous and present ministers are trying with all means available to bring down unemployment but they will always be temporary means.

We must stop thinking for the immediate future. We should at last initiate a discussion to find long term solutions, although we have had all kinds of new projects in recent years. I still remember winter works, as everybody else does. Those were about the first big projects to be initiated to try and reduce unemployment, like for instance the ARDA projects, regional economic expansion projects and manpower training courses whose purpose was to retrain workers who had been laid off in some sectors. Those workers must be retrained to go back to the labour market, but after such projects we realize that even those workers, whose retraining was supported publicly, do not find jobs either because they simply increase the number of workers in already overcrowed sectors.

Today they say: At least we will train educated unemployed. But that will not give them a job. How many of them are coming to my office nowadays, young people who have completed their up-grading course or vocational training and who say: Now we could work but we have no job. The requirement is two or three years of experience. While these poor young people have just completed their studies, three years of experience are required. I believe it is merely another way for the employer to say: We have no job to give you.

We have also developed programs such as LIP, Opportunities for Youth, and now we have Canada Works and Young Canada Works. All these programs are aimed at temporarily lowering the current unemployment rate. We should first of all seriously wonder what is the best long term solution, not to eliminate unemployment, which is impossible, not to create permanent employment, because we will never achieve permanent full employment now, unless we decide once and for all to reject out of hand all modern techniques, unless we chose to move 50 years backwards.

If we moved 50 years backwards and returned to the era of the small shovel and the pick, unemployment would probably disappear but this is impossible. We cannot take regressive steps and we cannot deny our present economic evolution simply because society could not follow a parallel development. Economics is not at fault. As far as economics is concerned, we are advanced and are not lagging in any way behind any other industrialized nations. I suggest we have completely forgotten to adjust the social sector to the economic sector. Therefore, if a machine or a given discovery, as we see them everyday, is going to remove 200, 300 or 1,000 workers from their jobs, if that machine produces less than those 1,000 workers, let us get rid of it.

But such a technique produces ten times as much as any group of workers, and yields ten times as much revenue for the state. The proof it yields much more revenue is that each year we see the gross national product increase. Therefore, it means that our economic development does not work against the nation, but for the nation. But because of our economic development, are we going to allow those people to starve to whom this technique is prejudicial? No. I think there are some measures to be adopted. If our country's production is ten times greater because of our economic development, we should be able to find some measures to allow those people to get retrained, but in the right sense, without considering that to let them live we still have to keep the old principles, the obligation to work.

We used to say, 50 or 60 years ago: "You do not work? You have no right to live!" That is not so today. Somehow we must find a way for the unemployed, now representing some 20, 24 per cent of the manpower, to live in our rich country. In other words, we have to change principles. We made scientific and economic progress, so Canadians must now share in that progress, because they were responsible for the whole process.

They must not be cast out because they produced too much, rather, they must have a share in this country's production. Such is the proposal we have been putting forward all along. As long as this government does not consider that proposal of a guaranteed minimum income for every Canadian from 18 to 65, or better still 18 to 60 when full pension is provided to Canadians 60 and above, this problem will be with us. We shall go on putting band-aids as we are now doing. I do not blame the government for what they are doing today, it is the most they can do now.

It is always possible however to consider something else. Pending a major operation, the patient is given temporary medication to strengthen and prepare him. All those small projects we now have can be no more than temporary medication to prepare our society for real action, for the long term cure that will ensure a parallel course between economic and social progress, so Canadians can share in this country's fantastic production.

It is therefore imperative in my view that we enter soon into the a very serious discussion that is vitally needed, since things are getting worse all the time. We heard it said that the government is to be blamed for the rising rate of unemployment. It is not so.

The unemployment level rises because we refuse to evolve socially. We do have the required billions, but only about 20 or 30 billionaires benefit from them. We must absolutely get out of this system and if we reject Social Credit, then let us create a new system of our own so that the population can take advantage of this considerable production in Canada.

I am told that my theory may encourage laziness. Have no fear because unemployment insurance and social assistance can also breed parasites in society, and so can the guaranteed annual income. The difference is that unemployment insurance, social welfare and the guaranteed income supplement require armies of inspectors and it is costing us more for inspections than if we simply handed the money to the needy. The guaranteed annual income would eliminate those thousands of inspectors and all the maintenance offices, and it would be like a family allowance.

The annual guaranteed income does away with all discrimination and God knows how much there is of it. We have to cope with it every day. We are being told that someone was denied unemployment insurance benefits because a lowly official who knows nothing has been giving him a hard time for two or three months. I even know someone who waited a year and half for his insurance benefits. He will be paid soon, they say, but for more than a year his family has suffered because of a lowly twenty four year old official who does not know anything about it. Such a sad thing! However I do not hold it against him because, basically, it is not his fault, it is the system which discriminates. That is why I have been saying and repeating that 80 per cent of our social legislation is discriminatory because of it. We have been discussing unemployment all afternoon. I too would have liked to say a word about inflation since I had prepared some notes on the subject. I hope the minister caught the solutions I am suggesting to him to cope with unemployment.

We often wonder where inflation comes from. I will tell you in a few words. I recall that about ten years ago, when I was sitting on the House committee on finance and we were discussing the famous question of interest charges, that is the control of interest charges, the department decided to remove any ceiling on bank interest charges, therefore extending interest charges everywhere. I then warned the committee that it was the beginning of inflation, the end of which would never be seen. All that started at that time. That is why governments—no more this government than others—are said to be responsible for inflation. When somebody sets a house on fire, he is the one responsible if it burns.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to inform the hon. member that his allotted time has expired. He may continue, however, with unanimous consent. Does the hon. member have unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Mr. Gauthier (Roberval).]

Mr. Paproski: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I hope the hon. member will take no more than perhaps five, six or seven minutes because there are a large number of hon. members who want to speak. I know the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) would like to speak. The House would appreciate it if the hon. member would go along with this suggestion.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): I am sure the hon. member will co-operate.

[Translation]

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member who just spoke and I can assure him that I will take no more than four minutes of the House's time. I only want to add a few words on the inflation issue. I was saying that interest charges, as you will agree with me, are responsible for inflation. That is the cause of inflation. In 1969 we were paying $9 million a day in interest charges on the national debt, as opposed to $15 million today. At the rate we are going, we will soon be paying $30 million a day to service the national debt.

We are going to be more and more in debt. Recently the minister said that we had goods for those 84 or 90 billion dollars. However we are not paying for goods but for interest. What are we doing today? We are borrowing an amount equal to the national income this year to give temporary credit on year to year production. As long as we are going to borrow every year's production to put that production on the market, we will have what we have today. Recently I was asked what we should do to prevent the national debt from increasing. If we want to do that let us stop producing. As long as you produce within a screwy system, what you have produced becomes a debt the day after because you are required to borrow money to pay for your production. As long as we let the commercial banks administer this country and fail to give the Bank of Canada responsibility for the public sector and chartered banks responsibility for the private sector, if we fail to do that we are going to be in debt, and debts hurt. I hope you realize we are asking Canadians to pay $15 million in interest every day.

We must do something. I do not know what the government thinks about it but the other day they mentioned the seaway debt. They quickly wrote that one off. I was surprised recently when we asked the Minister of Finance to tell us to whom we owed that money, the $15 million a day. He told us he could not answer right now. So we pay $15 million a day in interest and they do not know to whom we have to pay that money. We must draw the line somewhere.

Once again, I hope the minister will think about it and that we will stop looking for the cause of inflation. It is the interest that Canada would not have to pay if it could control its monetary system. We are told that they control the monetary system, they control the money, but we do not control a cent of those credits which today amount to 92 per cent of all the money supply. The whole problem is there. We will have to control the 92 per cent as strictly as the 8 per cent in paper money. I apologize. I do not want to go on because I told my friend that I would not take more than four minutes. So I thank hon. members and I hope the minister will take notice once of all of my suggestions.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock (Mr. Friesen)—Transport—Disparity between subsidies for ferries on east and west coasts; the hon. member for Churchill (Mr. Smith)—Manpower—Canada Works Program—Differentiation between status Indians on and off reservations.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY S.O. 58—SUGGESTION THAT BUDGET CONTAIN PROVISIONS TO STIMULATE EMPLOYMENT AND CONTAIN INFLATION

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Clark:

That this House condemns the government's failure to set or fulfil reasonable economic goals, and urges the Minister of Finance to be forthright with the people of Canada by revealing in the budget the specific goals he will be seeking to reach with regard to employment, inflation, Canada's trade balance, and the rate of economic growth.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am sure hon. members who have read the motion put down by the leader of the opposition have found it to be rather obscure in several ways, not the least of which is the suggestion that there should be a forthright statement in the budget as to the anticipated or expected levels of growth, job creation, unemployment, inflation, and so on. Budget statements have always included such estimates.

Mr. Dick: Not always. Turner left them out one time.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): The rather interesting thing hon. members will have noticed is the use of the word "goals" by the leader of the opposition. I suppose one could have said that if this had been a motion proposed by the leader of the New Democratic Party the concept of "goals"—which to me at least implies a more precise setting of patterns like the Soviet Gosplan—is something one might expect from a socialist party, but it is strange to me that the leader of the Tory party should use that word. Total control of determinants does not now exist in our economy and has never existed. As the leader of the opposition should know our economy operates on the basis of many thousands of private decisions on the impact of the international economy of our interdependent world and on a range of variables beyond the control of man or any group; for example, determinants in the agricultural area, such as climate.

Mr. Friesen: In other words, don't even try.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): We may make estimates of assumed levels of performance, but any sensible person would recognize that they are only guesstimates, and they are subject to many uncontrollable variables. To me, that is the basic and simple answer to the motion.

Mr. Dick: I am glad you support it.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I do not support the motion; it is totally irrational. The leader of the opposition dealt very little with the motion. I would like for a moment to deal with some of the remarks of the leader of the opposition. This is an economic debate and I normally would not have gone into this particular point, but the leader of the opposition had quite a bit to say about national unity and about the contribution of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) to national unity. By raising that question, the leader of the opposition brought himself in as a figure to promote, or otherwise, national unity. The leader of the opposition is not here now, and indeed the pattern of his leadership has been that he has been out of the House and out around the country.

Mr. Paproski: That's not true.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Indeed, the leader of the opposition himself said that he was not going to be here. He has been out and around the country making himself better known and communicating so that people can see the kind of man he is the kind of leader he is and the kinds of principles he espouses.

Mr. Paproski: He has been promoting national unity.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): The hon. member says he has been promoting national unity. Caesar once said, "I came, I saw, I conquered". The leader of the opposition has gone out, he has been seen, and he has been seen through by the people he has met.

● (1720)

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I repeat, to adopt the comment that Caesar once made, "I came, I saw, I conquered", the leader of the opposition has gone out there, he has been seen, and he has been seen through by the people he has met.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Paproski: I hope you will repeat the same thing in a couple of months.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): The leader of the opposition is concerned about a survey, but it is not the labour force survey of Statistics Canada that has had him on his feet shouting; it is the Gallup poll which has made it clear that Canadians certainly do not see the leader of the opposition as the man for our time to deal with the crisis of national unity.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: What goes up must come down.

Mr. Paproski: We will try harder.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) has the floor. I suggest we allow him to speak.

Mr. Paproski: Say something.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): It is a standard pattern. Members on this side of the House have listened to the leader of the opposition without interruption and have given him a careful hearing. Hon. members opposite are now trying to shout me down. That is what we expect from them. I can indicate that perhaps we can judge how well the full thrust of the measure has gone home by the number of decibels being produced on the other side. The leader of the opposition put some emphasis, as well, on the centralizing policy of this government.

An hon. Member: What about Mirabel?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): There go the decibels again. The big mouth over there is flapping again. The leader of the opposition has spoken about centralizing policies and has presumably espoused the process of decentralization. But at the same time he spoke about the government setting down as a goal a five-year plan for the attainment of an economic performance in this economy. May I point out that that is one of the obvious contradictions that ran throughout his statement. The interesting thing was that he would read the contradictions in his speech without even recognizing them.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): The leader of the opposition said that Canada cannot live for long on borrowed dollars. The fact of the matter is that in our economy over the period of the last 110 years Canada has been a substantial importer of capital, and our anticipation is that we will continue to borrow capital. One wonders whether the leader of the opposition is proposing, for example, a $5 billion reduction in federal government expenditures. He was saying that if he had responsibility for the economy, he would do just that by moving out of deficit financing. One would have to ask which of the programs he would propose to cut—the transfer programs to individuals, the expenditures on capital works? Which of those programs would he reduce in order to take $5 billion out of present government expenditures?

[Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale).]

Mr. Stevens: My leader did not say that.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): What is interesting is that at one point the leader of the opposition said that the portion of the present government's expenditures which is related to operating services and the capital budget was too high and had to be cut down. Then what do we find? Several minutes later he said the federal government should be engaging in job-creating capital projects. This came from the same man who said several minutes before that the federal government should cut down that part of its budget. That is a part of the melange of confused suggestions. Probably he has a series of speech-writers, everyone contributing a page, and by process of accident he happened to get them all together in one document.

The leader of the opposition says the government should not borrow on foreign markets. The fact is that the government has not borrowed on foreign markets for many years, and the leader of the opposition should not mislead the House by making such a comment. It is the provinces and municipalities which have borrowed on foreign markets, and so have corporations. But there we get back to the centralizing question. Is the leader of the opposition suggesting that the government should restrict the access of other levels of government to foreign markets? It is an interesting suggestion which, I am sure, would fall in a very interesting way on the ears of the ten provincial treasurers who traditionally have sought foreign as well as Canadian sources for their financing.

Mr. Stevens: They were pushed out by you.

Mr. Paproski: When do we take over?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): The leader of the opposition was perhaps less than candid with the House when he said that direct investment in Canada dropped in the year 1976. He knows, and Statistics Canada figures are available, that that particular figure was reduced in 1976 because of substantial repatriations by Canadians of foreign holdings in Canada, for example, the acquisition by Petro-Canada of the foreign holding in the Arco properties which has brought back for Canadians significant parts of our natural resources.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): The leader of the opposition can oppose that repatriation if he wishes, but he should make his position clear to the House and to Canadians.

Mr. Paproski: The minister hasn't a suggestion of his own. All he does is refer to the leader of the opposition.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): The leader of the opposition spoke about lack of planning in relation to decontrols. One has to wonder where he has been in this country. Indeed, he has asked me questions about the process of consultation and planning with regard to decontrol in which we have been engaged for the past two or three months, about meetings we have had with provincial governments, with the Canadian Labour Congress and with other labour movements, about meetings with leaders of business and with other organizations in Canada on the question of decontrols. One can only ask if it is not evident to him that we have commenced the process of decontrol by careful consultation with other governments and with other economic decision-makers in the country. If we cannot do it by consent, then he should not rise in the House to complain about this government being arbitrary. He is suggesting the most arbitrary course of all if he is suggesting we should take off the controls by a single federal decision.

Mr. Stevens: How will you get yourselves out of trouble now, tell us?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): The Leader of the Opposition spoke about distortions in investment due to the Anti-Inflation Board. That is not what the Conference Board said. The majority of the 200 corporations which have been canvassed by the Conference Board found that the anti-inflation program has not affected adversely their investment decisions. The hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies) said we should have an advance discussion in this House of the trends in the economy. One might have expected an informed, accurate, relevant discussion by the Leader of the Opposition of his perception of the economy, but I have quoted some examples of the kind of garbage, if I may say so, that he laid out on the record—and then got up and ran away.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Paproski: He wrote you a letter telling you why we had to leave.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: You are the spokesman of a dying government.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. The Minister of Finance has the floor. I ask hon. members to allow him to speak.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I will say to the whip of the Conservative party that the Leader of the Opposition chose today to move his motion. If he had wanted to hear the debate on the matter, he could have stayed here.

Mr. Paproski: He wanted to hear from you. Make your comments.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): It would be neither realistic nor responsible to pretend that the factors which influenced economic events in Canada are subject to control by the government in a way which lends very great precision to the setting or achievement of the kinds of detailed goals referred to for growth and employment. These are facts of life which do not just apply to Canada; they are common to all the industrial democracies. They reflect the growth of interdependence in the international economy. This is of particular significance to Canada as a major trading nation which is dependent for its livelihood on success in foreign markets and a capability to meet import competition.

The growth of interdependence which has occurred in the international economy has a positive side to it as well. It has been accompanied by a great degree of co-operation and harmonization in the development of economic policy by the nation states. Canada has participated in that process both in the economic summits and through its role in the International Monetary Fund. There are now continuing efforts to develop an effective response to the major problems of inflation and unemployment. The economic summit to be held in London in May will provide a further opportunity for countries to assess the progress made to date on both fronts and to consider the prospects ahead. But the record shows that there are, and will be, elements of uncertainty and unpredicted developments which have to be acknowledged in economic management.

We have had in recent years the enormous economic shock from the quadrupling of oil prices by the OPEC countries. This has meant that the dependent countries have suffered a substantial loss in their real income and purchasing power, affecting consumer prices and industrial costs in a dramatic way. That single external event has had and continues to have major repercussions on growth and employment and the balance of payments.

We have seen the dramatic impact of climatic conditions on food production and supply, leading to large swings in food prices and agricultural incomes. We have at present to consider the possible impact of drought conditions on the western agricultural economy which introduces a further element of uncertainty this year.

Because of our important trading relationships we are much influenced by the policy actions taken by other governments, particularly the United States, Japan and West Germany. The record of growth among the OECD countries in 1976 was less than anticipated, and this has had an effect on our own growth performance. I should make clear that the growth of output in the OECD countries has been less than was forecast by the OECD in the July economic outlook.

Mr. Stevens: Tell us what your forecast is.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): These are some of the realities which limit the precision of economic forecasting. They are part of the parameters of economic policy making, beyond the direct control of any particular government. They are a recognition also of the highly decentralized system of decision-making which is fundamental to the industrial democracies with their emphasis on the role of the marketplace.

While our economic policy is designed to give greater stability to the path of economic growth and expansion, it does so in concert with the major role of the private sector in Canada. We reject the kind of dirigiste, ever present government control which is implied by detailed planning of the economy and in the five-year plan idea set out by the Leader of the Opposition in his speech.

Mr. Stevens: How can the Americans do it, but we cannot?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): As between rigidity and flexibility to meet changing circumstances, it seems to us that the course of common sense is to remain flexible for dealing with changes in economic circumstances as they occur, rather than locking ourselves into the matrix of a five-year plan.

Mr. Stevens: You say that because you do not know where you are going.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Throughout 1976, fiscal policy and monetary policy have operated together with the anti-inflation program to reduce inflation and maintain growth of output and employment.

I would recognize that this is a difficult task which requires continuing surveillance and adjustments to be made in light of developments. It is also a task which cannot be accomplished quickly. The government has a responsibility for the future growth and stability cf the economy. I believe the basic policy of a carefully staged recovery which is being followed by Canada, along with the other countries of the industrial world, is in our long run interests.

Mr. Stevens: What carefully staged recovery?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): It is designed to achieve continuing growth without a return to double digit inflation. We cannot adequately protect jobs or ensure the creation of new jobs for our growing labour force if our prices and costs are out of line. The control of inflation is essential to create more certain conditions for business planning and investment in the private sector where the majority of the new jobs must be created.

I believe 1976 has been an important year of consolidation, laying the foundation for non-inflationary expansion to reduce the level of unemployment. We have over the last three years outperformed our trading partners in terms of real output growth.

In 1974 real output grew in Canada 3.2 per cent. In the United States it fell 1.8 per cent. In 1975 real output grew 0.6 per cent in Canada. In the United States it fell 1.6 per cent. In 1976 real output in Canada was 8.6 per cent above the 1973 level, while in the United States it was 2.5 per cent higher. That is not a record of indifference to growth and employment. It is a record of a balanced effort to fight inflation and maintain growth. The government has recognized that the reduction of inflation and unemployment poses great difficulty because of a variety of structural factors which are more and more evident in modern industrial economies.

We have to look to improvement in the structure and operation of the labour market in Canada. Our unemployment problem reflects particular factors in the composition and skills of the labour force; it reflects the deep-seated structural problems of the less advantaged regions; it reflects the impact of income maintenance programs on the operation of the labour market; it reflects the expectations of Canadians for particular kinds of jobs and for rising real incomes; it reflects the problem of frictional unemployment and the continuing requirement for retraining and redeployment of labour.

In each of these areas the government, through the programs of the Departments of Manpower and Immigration and Regional Economic Expansion, continues to improve the prospects for job creation. Our commitment to these programs is beyond doubt. They are as advanced as anywhere in the world. The fact remains however that we have to earn our way in the world. If we want steady growth of employment in all parts of Canada we have to get our costs and prices right. In that sense there are no miracle cures. Let me say that I am confident we are on the right track. A substantial amount of important cost cutting has taken place, both in the public and the private sectors.

The growth of federal expenditure has, for example, been cut back and will be below the growth of GNP this fiscal year. In 1977-78 federal expenditure growth is anticipated to be around 7 per cent. Growth in federal manpower will be less than 1 per cent. In the private sector there has been a significant moderation of wage cost increases. This moderation was reflected in a lower increase in unit wage costs which was around 10 per cent in 1976 compared to about 14.5 per cent in 1975. I continue to be encouraged by the moderation in consumer prices. The rate of increase in non-food prices declined further in February to 8.2 per cent.

Mr. Stevens: How about over-all prices? What happened to them?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): There has been important stimulus to consumer spending already injected through automatic indexing of personal taxation and direct transfers. I recognize that some further adjustments may be required to maintain the level of real growth in the 4 per cent to 5 per cent range and I will be addressing this question in the budget.

The motion refers to the balance of trade. As is the case with inflation and unemployment, this question cannot be treated in isolation. Our trade balance reflects a variety of factors, not the least of which is our competitive position as it interacts with the exchange rate of the Canadian dollar.

We have seen a very substantial turn around in our external trade position, and the trade account moved back into surplus during 1976. It is essential for the Canadian economy that a favourable trade balance be maintained to service our substantial external debt.

Canada as a growing economy continues to need substantial long term inflows of capital to support investment. While 1976 was a somewhat unusual year in terms of the heavy provincial, municipal, and corporate borrowing abroad, the fact remains that foreign lenders continue to express confidence in the Canadian economy and its ability to service that debt. I would note that the cost of servicing our debt in relation to GNP is at about the average level for the post war period.

The combination of reduced borrowing requirements and lower interest rates in Canada will ease the volume of external borrowing, and we are seeing the exchange rate adjustment take place which is consistent with that. The decline in the value of the dollar will in that sense provide further stimulus to growth by giving us a competitive edge that we will have to guard very carefully.

Mr. Stevens: I suppose the minister thinks that that will lower inflation, as well.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): In conclusion, I would like to reiterate that I do not believe it would be responsible or realistic to presume a greater degree of certainty about the future of the economy than is consistent with our decentralized economy or our position in the international market place.

The government's economic strategy is in place; we are on the right track, given our objectives to achieve steady growth in output without rekindling inflation. I am confident we shall make further progress in 1977 with the co-operation and support of all Canadians.

To the extent that adjustments in policy are required, I will be making a further report to the House on budget night.

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure what the minister will require Canadian taxpayers to pay for that speech, but I must hasten to say whatever the fee was, I hope he asks to get his money back.

During the course of that speech the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) said that they were in the midst of a carefully staged recovery. Just before he concluded, he said that the government's economic strategy is in place. I hope he tells each of the one million who are out of work today that there is a carefully staged recovery under way in Canada.

The Minister of Finance indicates there is a carefully staged recovery under way. Surely he has not forgotten that in the fourth quarter of 1976 there was a negative real growth in this country. Does he call that a carefully staged recovery?

We have had a great deal of playing with statistics by the Minister of Finance. However, he cannot avoid the ugly truth that nearly one million people tramp the streets of Canada today without jobs where they can be gainfully employed. It is this government that must accept the prime responsibility for that tragedy.

When we talk in this House and elsewhere about the unrest in Canada today, this government should look first and foremost at itself. Unemployment is up to 10 per cent in Quebec and up to 15 per cent in Newfoundland. Who could expect other than unrest in Canada today? It is due to the faulty economic architecture that has been laid by the Minister of Finance and his predecessor.

A little earlier in this debate the leader of the New Democratic Party returned briefly to the House to make a speech. At that time he deplored the present state of unemployment, as we all do. However, how short his memory is. Surely he does not forget that while he was a member of the New Democratic Party in this country, granted under a different leader, that that party consistently kept the Grits in power between October 1972 and July 1974. During the period of that little love-in, inflation in this country on an annual basis rose from 5.2 per cent annualized in October, 1972, to 11.2 per cent in July, 1974. That is the NDP-Grit alliance in action. Those are the economic results that they produced for Canadians.

The present leader of the NDP cannot deny the facts. When he is talking to the unemployed that he rightfully feels pity for today, let him also explain to them that it was the inflationary trends that he and his party and the Grits set loose that resulted in the unemployment that we have today.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Paproski: "Baby Face" Turner and "Big Mac" Macdonald.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Were you opposed to the pension increase?

Mr. Stevens: Those are the facts, Mr. Speaker.

An hon. Member: What are your proposals?

Mr. Stevens: A backbench member on the Liberal side, who is so far back that he is just this side of the curtains, says "what are your proposals?" I recommend that that member read my leader's speech of today where he set out very clearly some proposals that I hope the Minister of Finance will take into account when he is drafting his speech for March 31.

The Minister of Finance says that it is difficult to forecast, as we have indicated in our motion, exactly what they see for the next two, three or five years. He said they cannot do that forecasting. That is not true. The fact is they can put the forecast before us. They have it in their internal records. However, they decline to allow the Canadian public to see those forecasts because they realize that in some ways they are so negative the Canadian public would become alarmed.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stevens: Why do they say they cannot give the Canadian public annual forecasts up to five years? The Americans are doing it. The United States Congress now requires that such forecasting be done. For example, I could show the Minister of Finance, in government publications coming out of Washington, where they predict that by 1982 the level of unemployment in that country will be down to 4.1 per cent. I ask the Minister of Finance what do the internal records show as the level of unemployment in Canada as far as their forecast is concerned for 1982?

Mr. Paproski: He does not know.

Mr. Stevens: One of my colleagues says the minister does not know. That may be true. However, I say they can obtain the forecast or projections. They have been made and are available. They have got to be available or the minister could not bring in the March 31 budget that he is contemplating. I simply say, as the motion of my leader states, that that information should be shared with this House and the Canadian public in order to give a better indication of what way the government sees our economy heading in the coming years.

We have forecasts from private sources such as the Applied Economic Research and Information Centre of the University of Toronto. These forecasts are pretty grim. The latest publication of that body says that the pace of economic activity in Canada in 1977 will experience a substantial slowdown. The deterioration in the outlook for 1977 is the result of the impact of increased uncertainties of business capital spending in the domestic economy. They anticipate that economic growth will be a modest 3 per cent in 1977 and that, on average, unemployment will be 7.9 per cent this year. As we all know, in this month we have already attained a 7.9 per cent unemployment level.

That University of Toronto Centre also states that unemployment by the fourth quarter of this year will be 8.3 per cent. Is that the carefully staged recovery which the Minister of Finance says is in place? Is that the government's economic strategy in place, a contemplated 8.3 per cent unemployment by the fourth quarter of this year? If it is, I believe this House should say that it no longer has confidence in the government to run the economic affairs of the nation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stevens: Let me put it this way: they can put in any players over there they like, but there is not one of them who understands what the needs of this country are as far as the economy is concerned.

Look at the record over the past two years. Why would any Canadian want to vote for a government which, for the six years ending last October, produced 55 per cent inflation? Let the government not continue to deceive the public as to where that inflation came from. Sure, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) likes to pretend it is because of greedy labour, greedy business, greedy farmers—anybody but the greedy government. He says the main problem is that Canadian people are living beyond their means. But in his heart he knows it is his own government which has created inflation at its current level and that in turn we must suffer an unemployment rate rising to 18.3 per cent. There is no doubt the inflation we are now experiencing was manufactured in Ottawa by the Trudeau government. I have said they gave us 55.3 per cent inflation. Their own spending went up by 127 per cent in that six-year period.

Mr. Paproski: Shame!

Mr. Stevens: With a 127 per cent increase in the spending of this greedy, reckless government, and a monetary increase of 100 per cent, a figure which even the minister had to confirm was correct in committee the other night, how can the government expect the confidence of the electorate? To put it in another way, it took us 103 years since Confederation to reach the level of money supply which this government doubled in six years. With those figures, and a real growth of 31.7 per cent, is it any wonder inflation in this country amounted to 55.3 per cent? The minister may laugh. But will he go out and laugh in the face of the unemployed?

Mr. MacFarlane: Oh, go on!

Mr. Stevens: We are now feeling the effects of the reckless spending spree embarked on by the government, resulting in the doubling of the money supply in six years.

Somebody asked earlier: What happened in the Diefenbaker years? I should like to put on record what happened in those years.

An hon. Member: The highest unemployment ever.

Mr. Stevens: Let us not be too hasty. In the six years between 1958 and 1964, unemployment was less on an average than in the six years to which I have referred. Inflation amounted to 7.6 per cent compared to 55 per cent. Monetary growth was one fifth of the monetary growth under this government, and real growth was exactly the same. In short, those six years to which I have referred experienced a real growth as great as that which occurred in the six years to which the minister has referred today, but inflation was only 7.6 per cent as compared with 55 per cent under this government.

Of course the government likes to pretend that inflation was caused by something other than itself. Sometimes ministers say it is the weather. Sometimes they say it is international conditions. At other times they blame the provincial and municipal governments. How strange, Mr. Speaker! In what way could international conditions cause them to double the money supply in this country?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): The oil price increase.

Mr. Stevens: The minister says it was the oil price increase. He ignores the fact that when the increase occurred in 1973 we were a net exporter of oil, and this helped us financially.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): We were importing nearly half our needs—500,000 barrels a day.

Mr. Stevens: The minister does not even know the facts about one of the years we are reviewing. As an industrialized nation, we have resources on a per capita basis second to none. This being so we should not be expecting in the current year only half the growth the Bank of America expects the industrialized nations it reviews to obtain. That is totally unacceptable. That estimate of real growth on the part of the minister does not take into consideration the resources this country possesses. With our potential and the skill of our people we should be leading the real growth averages, not trailing.

I wish the Minister of Finance had spent more of his time—I understand that he referred to the speech made by my leader more than 40 times—

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I was correcting the falsehood.

Mr. Stevens: Perhaps the number of those references shows he already sees the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) as the leader of our country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stevens: I would have preferred it if instead of being obsessed with the speech made by our leader, the hon. gentleman could have assured us that he was charting the course which Canada should take, and is planning a degree of real growth which will ensure that our per capita income will not continue to be No. 8, where the government has driven it, but will be No. 1, the leader in the world. May I call it six o'clock?

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, in just summarizing my position and the position of our party, I would like to call the members' attention once again to the motion that is before us. We are asking that the government set or fulfill reasonable economic goals, and we urge the Minister of Finance to state specific goals with respect to employment, inflation, Canada's trade balance, and the rate of economic growth that he anticipates in coming years.

My leader indicated in his speech, when he proposed this motion, that five year forecasting would be in order. Mr. Speaker, the reason that we are suggesting this is that we feel it would help give confidence to the Canadian public, to the business community, to those who are being expected to produce the real wealth that is possible in Canada, give them what the game plan is so far as the government is concerned, and hopefully those targets will be reached. The Minister of Finance said it cannot be done. The fact is that it is being done.

Officials in the United States are now required by law to provide five year economic projections with each spending bill introduced to Congress. Under the Congressional Act of 1974 each public expenditure act must be accompanied by a forecast of anticipated future expenditure for the proposed program, as well as the projection of the impact of the program on future budgets.

The five year projections from all spending bills are combined each year at the presentation of the national budget to provide an over view of federal capital needs and expenditure requirements for the next few years. A special feature of the American approach to budgeting is the economic scenarios that are set out or constructed in order—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order. I regret to inform the hon. member that his allotted time has expired. He may continue with unanimous consent. Does the hon. member have unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Economic Policy

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, I thank hon. members for their courtesy, and I will be very brief.

As I was saying, a special feature of the American approach to budgeting is the economic scenarios that are set out or constructed in order to give some indication of the impact of federal spending on the economy as a whole. Thus the typical five year projection will include reasonable estimates of the real gross national product growth, the rate of implicit and consumer price increases, anticipated employment levels, expected tax revenue, and other vital indicators covering the period. At least 12 U.S. states have followed the lead of the federal government and have adopted similar budget approaches.

With that type of a guide I believe it would be possible not only to renew the confidence of business and the public generally, but it would be possible to have built into that five year forecasting a mechanism to get the government component of the gross national product down to a more realistic level in Canada.

At the present time government is taking approximately 43 per cent of the total gross national product of those who are producing the wealth in Canada. In the United States the present figure is about 35 per cent. That 8 per cent gap is the dead load of bureaucracy in government which is being borne by the people of Canada, and it contributes to the lack of competitiveness of our Canadian industry, to our higher taxation, and to our higher prices as a result of those two factors. Certainly it is desirable to have efficient governmental services for the people of Canada to the extent that they are required, but is is not desirable to have excessive services which become a burden on those who are producing the wealth in this country. That is another reason why the goals I have indicated would be desirable.

Let us identify what would be a suitable level of the governmental share of our gross national product. When that is identified, then let us ask governments to start working down their take of the public purse to a lower level in order to ensure that we have less of the oppressive government which has become so alarming in Canada.

Let us not forget that 20 years ago government took somewhere around 30 per cent of our gross national product. When this government took power, the figure was about 33 per cent at all levels as far as the governmental share of the GNP was concerned. The fact that we are now at 43 per cent is truly astounding. It is impeding the progress of this nation, it is contributing to the unemployment we all deplore and, strangely enough, the NDP—the leader of which spoke here today—contributes to that atmosphere of having more and more government in our society than perhaps any other group in Canada at the present time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stevens: That party believes in the misguided concept that government and only government can help the people. I suggest that that concept is out of date. It has been demonstrated to be totally unworkable in any country which has tried it. For example, in Great Britain—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): If you were in power we might have to change our minds.

Mr. Stevens: That is the most hopeful thing I have heard yet. According to the deputy leader of the NDP, if they were in power they might change their minds.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I said if you were in power we might have to change our minds.

Mr. Stevens: I could hardly believe my ears, because I have felt for a long time that surely in the hearts of members of the New Democratic Party they do not believe in some of the stuff they were trying to con the Canadian public with, with regard to governmental intervention schemes.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question? In the hon. member's remarks this afternoon he was blaming us for what we did during the coalition period in bringing on things which he says caused inflation. Since the hon. member is doing it again tonight, I would like to ask him if he and his party are opposed to the pension increases and other gains of that kind which we won during the minority government period?

Mr. Woolliams: That is nonsense.

Mr. Friesen: You can do better than that.

Mr. Stevens: If I could simply take the hon. member back to my remarks this afternoon—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I was here.

Mr. Stevens: —I said that during that happy little wedlock which existed between the NDP and the Grit government, spending in this nation soared. However, the most regrettable thing was that inflation doubled. In fact, it more than doubled during the wedlock, and unfortunately as a result of that inflationary pressure which built up during that alliance we now have the aftermath or hangover, so to speak, namely, unemployment.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): So you were against the pension increases.

Mr. Woolliams: Don't be foolish.

Mr. Stevens: We all decry the unemployment we are experiencing today. The hon. member asked me about my attitude with regard to pensions. He knows I was not referring to that when I was talking about increased government spending. I was talking about the growth of the bureaucracy and about the growth of expenditures which were aided and abetted during the alliance between the NDP and Grit forces in this House.

In conclusion, I ask hon. members to support the motion with their words as the debate continues tonight. In short, the government should start levelling with the Canadian public. It should give us an indication of its goals for the future, which we are asking for, and then let the Canadian public judge whether those goals are suitable for Canada and whether this is the government which can help us attain those goals.

Mr. Paul E. McRae (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, there has been a great deal of self-righteousness displayed in this House in the last two or three days, particularly since the latest unemployment figures became known. However, there has not been very much enlightenment. As the Globe and Mail said this morning, there has been a good deal of glib sloganeering and some rather facile answers. One month tax cuts have been suggested, although that suggestion did not come from the House. One side says we should not put all our eggs into government spending, and the other side says we should spend a good deal more. We have heard about the self-fulfilling prophecy that if you point in a given direction you will get there just by saying so. A conference has been suggested, and tax cuts in the business sector and tax cuts for individuals have also been suggested. These answers are all too simple. They might have sufficed in the sixties when the pressures were not as great, when problems were not so interrelated, and when one could adopt a monetary policy or a fiscal policy, or a combination of both, which would solve the problem. The economic problems we have today are very complex, and they will not be solved easily.

In the first part of my speech I would like to take a macro view of this matter to put into perspective some of the problems which have been mentioned by hon. members opposite. I do not condemn them for what they have said because we can identify the problems. The difficulty is identifying solutions. In the second part of my speech I would like to deal with unemployment and to look at it a little more intently.

Mr. Friesen: I wish you would deal with it.

Mr. McRae: At the international level there are limitations on what the government of Canada can do. There are some things it can do in concert with other governments, but there are definite limitations.

The United States senate finance committee carried out a study in 1973 regarding global corporations. I am told that global corporations have about twice the liquidity of all the national governments under which they function. There is a limit to what any government can do also because the liquidity of global corporations is much more fluid. These corporations are better able to move assets faster than national governments, even though there are such organizations as the IMF.

There is a degree of Canadian dependence that is also of great concern, and I feel this concern. The size of our foreign debt, the $5 billion a year required to service it, the manufacturing deficit which is partially made up by the sale of raw materials, the problem we have in terms of being competitive internationally—these are some of the difficulties we have to face.

Mr. Stevens: You had nine years.

Mr. McRae: I am giving an over-view of the situation. There is a series of international problems.

Then we go into national problems which I think are endemic in this country, such as the relationship of the provinces to the federal government, the ability of the federal government to decentralize its operations without losing control of the economy, and the problems relating to regional differentiations.

There is another massive problem which I am very much concerned about, and that is the forthcoming energy shortage. I think we really have not learned that energy is no longer a cheap commodity and that we will have great shortages which will create a number of difficulties. One of them is both an international and a national problem, that is, there will be a shortage of available capital. We are told that if we are to do all the things required to maintain an energy growth rate of 3.5 per cent to 4 per cent, we will have to spend $181 billion in the next 15 years. This amounts to about $30,000 per family unit in today's dollars, almost the amount that a family would expect to pay for a home.

All kinds of distortions can be expected, and these distortions can already be seen in our economy. For instance, in Quebec we see this in the fact that the James Bay project is using up a very high proportion of the capital dollars available. Therefore these capital dollars are not moving into some of the areas where they should be moving. I believe the pulp and paper industry in that province is grossly under-capitalized, while a massive amount of capital is going in one direction. The figure I have is that the James Bay project is likely to use up 40 to 50 cents in every dollar in that province. I see these as forthcoming problems.

The hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) has mentioned the growth of public spending. There is certainly no doubt that government spending presents a major problem, but it is easy to say, "Cut it back". If we see 30 per cent of our spending as being the amount required to operate the government of Canada, to run the post office, the defence establishment and all the other departments, and the other 70 per cent as transfer payments in various forms, then it becomes evident that it is not so easy to cut back, as the hon. member suggests. A good portion of these transfer payments, to my mind, are not net losses, as the hon. member has indicated, but they may well be the kinds of things that create demand in the sense that they take money from one pocket and put it into another pocket, and the money in that other pocket may create more effective demand than the money in the first pocket. I do not see these as a net loss. Certainly there are many subsidies to all segments of our economy that are pretty important, and these all come in these transfer payments.

Then we have the whole area of inflation. Again I feel we are dealing with it simplistically. The kind of inflation we have had since the early 1970's is rather unique. In the first place it is world-wide. It has been massive in the sense that it has affected most countries of the world, and it has been of long duration. It has not been the 1 per cent or 2 per cent that we could expect over a period of the last 100 years. It has been much more serious than that. As a nation we have a great deal of difficulty with this because we are so dependent on foreign trade, foreign pricing and so on. This is a very difficult problem. I agree that inflation has changed over the years, but there are many reasons why it is a problem.

Mr. Stevens: It is a problem with your government.

Mr. McRae: The inflation rate in this country—

An hon. Member: Quit the deception.

Mr. Stevens: It is the Trudeau government that has caused the inflation.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. The parliamentary secretary (Mr. McRae) has the floor. The hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) has had time to speak.

Mr. McRae: If the hon. member is correct and if this government is to blame for inflation, why are we doing the fourth best of all OECD countries in terms of inflation? There are 12 or 15 countries that are doing a poorer job of fighting inflation. To assume that this is a self-induced problem is a gross over-simplication.

In the few minutes I have left I should like to deal in much greater detail with unemployment because I think we have to look at it in a more careful and a more structured way, to look at structural unemployment to see where the real problems are. There is no doubt that the situation is serious, and anyone who would say otherwise is grossly underestimating the attitude of Canadians to this. We now have an unadjusted rate of unemployment of 9.1 per cent, regardless of the argument which we get back and forth as to whether or not—

Mr. Stevens: This is an international problem too.

Mr. McRae: I spoke about the international aspect; now I am dealing with the national problem. The rate of 9.1 per cent means that taking just the figure that was given of 932,000, close to 10 per cent of the population of this country is unemployed at this time, perhaps more or less depending on how we use the figures. It is an extremely serious problem. But there are some reasons for this problem, and we have to look at some of these reasons.

Since the 1960's at least Canada has created more jobs in both the private and the public sectors than any of the OECD countries. For every four jobs in Canada in 1972, by 1975 there were five jobs, or a 20 per cent increase. The only other country from among the OECD countries that can show anything close to this is the United States, and their figure is 8.5 per cent. So we have done a commendable job in this area, and it should be considered as having been done by both the government and the private sector working in concert.

Where has unemployment come from? Back in the mid-1950's we were dealing with about 60,000 young people a year leaving school and coming on the labour market. In the last couple of years this figure has grown to about 200,000. This is a factor of slightly over three. During the same period of time, the population of Canada has only grown by about 35 per cent. Therefore we have a massive influx of young people coming on the labour market. That is the first factor. Of course this has been very expensive because we had to built a large number of new schools, which were quickly filled, but now we are finding some of those schools are occupied below capacity. We have had to build a large number of new houses, which eventually will no longer be necessary.

We have massive labour problems in this country. It might be helpful to examine some demographic figures. For example, at present those between the ages of 18 and 24 comprise about 13 per cent of the population, as compared with 12 per cent five years ago. In ten years that group will comprise slightly over 12 per cent of the population, and at the turn of the century less than 10 per cent. These figures suggest that in future there will be labour shortages. As the present population grows older, fewer young people in the labour market will be asked to support much larger numbers of retired people.

It is important to point out that women have increasingly entered the labour market for jobs, and increased the labour force.

Mr. Peters: Women work because they are forced to help with the support of their families.

Mr. McRae: In 1953 women made up 20 per cent of the total labour force. By 1975 that figure had risen to 33 per cent. Let me break these figures down into age groups. It is significant that in 1953, 23 per cent of women between the ages of 25 and 44 were in the labour force. By 1974, according to figures I have seen, 47 per cent of that age group were in the labour force. What are the figures for the older age group? Seventeen per cent of women between 45 and 65 were in the labour force in 1963, as opposed to 37 per cent, according to the latest figures.

We use an index known as the participation rate, and understanding that index may help us to understand our dilemma. The participation rate is the figure arrived at through dividing the number of people in the labour force actually working by the number of people in th population over the age of 15. That gives us an idea of the percentage of Canadians who are in the labour force actually working. That figure has grown dramatically. In 1963 the participation rate was about 53.8 per cent, which means that 53.8 per cent of people 15 years and older were actually employed in the labour force. The figure for today is 59.7 per cent, unadjusted and, adjusted, as of February it was 61.3 per cent. Actually the participation rate went up in the last month by 0.3 per cent.

We must bear these figures in mind when considering unemployment.

Clearly there has been a massive movement of young people into the labour force. The rate for that group has tripled in the last 15 years. There has been a sizeable increase—a doubling in the number of women entering the labour force, and we now have a high participation rate. When you consider all this, and consider that per capita the influx of people into the labour force has been greater in this country than probably in any country in the western world, it becomes clear that we, as Canadians, have done well. I am not saying that we should not do more, but we have done well. All the same, it is clear that the answer to our problems is not simple to find.

Compare what has happened in this country with what has happened in the United States in recent years. I am referring to OECD figures which have been compiled in such a way as to give uniform results, since various countries approach these matters somewhat differently. According to OECD figures, in 1975 unemployment in the United States stood at an average of 8.4 per cent, whereas it stood at 7.0 per cent in Canada. In 1976 the United States unemployment rate came down to about 7.6 per cent, as opposed to our rate of 7 per cent. Today the figures of both countries are roughly similar; I have not seen the latest figures, but I understand that our rates are comparable. Therefore we cannot say that our government's programs have been a complete "bust." True, there has been a massive problem; we have gone some way toward solving it, and there is still much to do.

Let us break down some of the unemployment statistics to see where the significant unemployment exists. If we consider the breakdown by sex and age we shall find—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member to inform him that his allotted time has expired. He may continue with the unanimous consent of the House. Does the hon. member have unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. McRae: Mr. Speaker, I thank hon. members. I will not take long.

It is apparent that there are two major groups of unemployed. First, there is a major unemployment in the group 15 to 24 years of age. As well, there is very high unemployment in some of our regions. But there is not unemployment in all regions. For instance the unemployment rate in Alberta today is 4.6 per cent, but in Newfoundland it is 17.4 per cent. Clearly we have two structural, major problems. We know that many between certain ages are unemployed, and we know that people in some of our regions are unemployed. I suggest that the problem of the regions is by far the more difficult to solve. I wish I had time to deal with this question. We have tried our best to deal with this question by introducing standard solutions, at some of which we ought to look. I do not think I will have time to develop my ideas fully.

An hon. Member: Go ahead.

Mr. McRae: It is clear that we cannot solve the problem of unemployment simply by pouring more money into the economy, lowering income taxes, and so on. I say this because the unemployment rate for males over 24 in Alberta is less than 3 per cent, adjusted, which is about as low as you can get. Compare that with those under 25 in Newfoundland—28 per cent. Therefore, as I say, we face a massive structural problem, the problem we must keep in mind if we are to solve some of the difficulties of the regions. I suggest that it may be necessary to institute some kinds of regional monetary policies if we are to solve some of these difficulties.

I was going to suggest many things we could do; unfortunately, time does not allow me to do so. I hope that we will not leave this debate with the idea in mind that we can take some simple steps to solve this problem, with the idea that we can do what we have traditionally done in the past. If we are to solve unemployment we shall need to look analytically at the problem both in a micro and a macro way. If we are to act positively, we shall need to understand also not only the large workings of our own economy, but the workings of the world economy. Only then will be able to act in a positive manner.

[Translation]

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I wish to take this opportunity to make a few comments on the motion which I consider very timely in view of the current situation. Statistics Canada advised us of the situation which to my mind, and not only mine, is alarming if not catastrophic. The number of unemployed in greater Montreal is becoming alarming, as a newspaper reported yesterday.

This motion, which I find pertinent, gives us the opportunity of urging the government to take new initiatives. It also gives us a chance to find out what steps the government has already taken, though its efforts have clearly been inadequate for almost ten years. Not so long ago, I deplored the increase in unemployment which, in 1968, when the government came to power with its present Prime Minister, reached 168,000; we are approaching the million mark.

The former speaker said that was not necessarily a failure. I don't know what he considers a failure, and whether he feels that he can say unashamedly in the House that going from 168,000 to a million unemployed if not a failure. But I feel, Mr. Speaker, that it is a complete failure, and one that is costing a high price, and inflicting considerable hardship upon Canadians.

I should like to make a few remarks, Mr. Speaker. All the Quebecers who sit in this House know that the population has increased in the province of Quebec. Of course it is concerned about the future of Quebec, about the situation in Canada. And why, Mr. Speaker? Many reasons will be found to explain away our failures. But the fact remains that we have had and will have again discussion on unemployment. There will surely be many opportunities to discuss all the topics of concern to the Canadian people and especially those of Quebec.

I come from that province. I know what difficulties it has with regard to unemployment. There is considerable unemployment elsewhere as well. People wonder why the situation is what it is in Quebec.

We wonder why Quebecers appear reluctant to trust the government and to have unlimited confidence in them at the present time. Once again, Mr. Speaker, we will find countless reasons for this but not the real ones. Some will even go as far as blaming the CBC for our economic failure. However I do not think that the CBC contributed to the unemployment situation in particular. But here again we will find scapegoats to justify the position of the present government.

Mr. Speaker, there are also unemployment problems in Quebec, and I could begin by depicting the situation in my riding where the unemployment level is close to 10 per cent. In other areas it is as high as 20 to 22 per cent. Recently I had the opportunity to visit the constituency of Témiscamingue which seems very concerned about the absence of policy in an area called northern Quebec which, as any other area in Quebec, deserves economic input which would enable the people there to enjoy a decent living.

Once again in my region we have learned through the local paper that a textile plant might close its doors, perhaps the last one in my riding. It did employ 700 family heads a few years ago. There are about 125 left now. A year ago the owners of that plant saw fit to sell it to a good Quebecer—from Joliette to boot—who spent not only his energy but his capital as well in the operation of that plant. Our local paper reports today that this plant is likely to close in the near future because the government did not take in time the necessary action in the textile sector. So chances are another hundred family heads will be laid off in a few days and I think that kind of situation is spreading out through the province.

Mr. Speaker, government members will tell me that the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Chrétien) has taken a rather drastic decision lately by bringing back the 1975 quotas on imports.

And to think, Mr. Speaker, that for ten years, so important an industry for Canada, and particularly for Quebec, considering the large number of workers in that sector, has been allowed to deteriorate.

I received this afternoon a press release to the effect that the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce had the firm intention of reviewing the import levels in the footwear industry. Eventually, we will get a report, in a few months probably, telling us that the import levels interferes with the Canadian industry. That is what we will probably be told in a month. For the last five or six years, the opposition has been calling for drastic and equitable measures on behalf of the Canadian industry. At the same time, government members will also claim that the Department of Regional Economic Expansion has injected fantastic amounts of money to create new jobs.

As I said before, the serious mistake made by this government was to neglect this Canadian industry which deserved, I think, the protection of this government in the interests of the Canadian people in order to protect jobs, while at the same time creating new jobs. And that was not done, but I was shocked this afternoon, Mr. Speaker, when I heard the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) who had the gall to say: I think we are heading in the right direction. In spite of all our problems we have to face, we do seem to be on the right track. And the Minister of Finance in the last few years had all the time required to review carefully the measures he could have introduced, and he had the gall to claim he was on the right track, with nearly one million unemployed.

Hon. members will agree that today offers a good opportunity to deal with that problem and that we cannot help urging the government to find a new approach. Mr. Speaker, this afternoon I asked a question of the Prime Minister, a very objective question in which I stated that the government leadership has been woefully inadequate. Besides that considering the rising unemployment rate, the most dramatic plague that we have in Canada, I was referring to the announcement made by the Minister of Finance who is to introduce his budget and I wondered if it would not be appropriate to call a meeting of all sectors of the economy to help the government. I feel it was a realistic suggestion.

Of course members on both sides of the House want to find some solutions and I believe that the government has demonstrated in recent years that it had none. We should gather around the same table all sectors of the economy which might help the government. That is all we are asking, Mr. Speaker, that all those who could be invited, starting with the Economic Council of Canada—I think there are a number of important qualified economists—that the unions, the provinces be invited to a round table, but before the budget is tabled, to help the Minister of Finance define options for the future and allow him to see to it that his funds are spent efficiently in the short and the long run. I think that a meeting is needed on an urgent basis when we consider that the government has nothing else to answer but that there are countries which are worse off than ours.

We cannot be satisfied with answers like that from the government, and I deeply regret that the Prime Minister turned down that immediate, urgent meeting of those parties interested in improving the situation who would, I am sure, cooperate with the government in the interest of those living in Canada, and we would applaud such a conference if that made it possible to correct the current situation.

Mr. Speaker, while deploring the fact that the Prime Minister refused to call such a conference, I would also like to say here that while the government may try to justify its position, nevertheless it was warned, and I think that it is important that the members of this House and Canadians be made well aware. This afternoon the leader of our party gave serious figures, pointed to the alarming situation and called for urgent action from the government. I think that Canadians are behind him in that respect, there is something to be done, something must be done.

What is inconceivable and unforgivable is that this government was warned. Indeed I would like to pay tribute to the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield), the former leader of this party, who for the past five or six years warned the government repeatedly about the situation that would exist if this government continued to administer the country as it was doing and as it is still doing. No, no, they preferred, of course, to politicize the arguments or the suggestions put forward by the hon. member for Halifax.

They certainly succeeded in ridiculing him during the 1974 campaign about one of his proposals that the government did not hesitate to use. They succeeded in making most Canadians believe that the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield) was wrong, but today all Canadians recognize that his predictions were right. Unfortunately they did not listen to the hon. member for Halifax and we are now in an almost catastrophic situation. However, when we condemn this government, we are accused of lacking objectivity.

I think that Canadians are only waiting for the opportunity to treat the government as it deserves and to remind it that it failed to meet its basic objectives, its commitments and its appeals to the people. We recognize, Mr. Speaker, that the most important economic levers to deal with that situation are in the hands of the federal government, and the provinces admit it too.

Last week the premier of Quebec admitted in the provincial legislature that according to recent statistics, the economic levers were in the hands of the federal government and that the laissez-faire of this government was an important factor in the present situation. But on the other side of this House they like to ridicule—I deplore it and we all do—the statements from the provinces. I think we should understand and recognize the importance of provincial participation before such serious difficulties and problems.

It is also very obvious that the present government did not find and does not seem to be able to offer solutions to deal with that situation. I think the provinces are interested in participating in national decisions of that scope on a problem as crucial as the present situation.

In the last ten years this government, as was stated this afternoon and it will never be repeated enough, has shown an attitude of confrontation towards the provinces and an attitude of unilateral decisions. Today we ask ourselves why so many Canadians—and I am not saying so many Quebecers—wonder seriously about the future of federalism, not about the formula of a normal federalism, but about the federalism formula applied by this gouvernement. It is not federalism as such which is at fault, it is in its present implementation that federalism is basically at fault.

Mr. Speaker, we can talk about national unity, but it will never be possible to have a united country in unfavourable economic circumstances. Therefore, the economic factor is of vital importance. But in view of the problems that we are now facing, the economic situation is not very encouraging. Yet, some would like to make Candians throughout the country believe that national unity depends on the decisions of a single man, the right hon. Prime Minister of Canada. For my part, I have serious reservations when one man suggests that he owns Canada virtually by himself. I believe that there are members of this House who make up Parliament and they are entitled to discussions and must also call on all of those who can help find solutions. Coming back particularly to the province of Quebec, I believe that there is a tendency to criticize present decisions, aspirations or recommandations of the province of Quebec.

It is no secret, Mr. Speaker. Of course, we like to show a little partisan spirit once in a while. My party has never even considered negotiating the separation of Quebec. It would be false to imply that. We believe that there would be greater acceptance by the provinces within a constitutional framework much more flexible then the one structured by this government, a framework in which it would be possible to meet the aspirations of the provinces.

This is my party's rationale. I believe there is ample room between the two extremes facing us—on the one hand Premier Lévesque's option and on the other the status quo or rigidness of the government—to present a flexible program enabling the provinces to find the true dialogue they have requested for so long and a true participation at the negotiation level, a framework in which we would feel free to take decisions of national importance after having consulted the provinces. This is the type of federalism I believe we want and which would go with a new Canada. This is the main problem for the the time being and I believe that the government should try immediately to prove . . .

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but the time allotted to him has expired. He may, however, continue by unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Translation]

Mr. La Salle: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I believe it is our responsibility to cooperate as fully as possible with the province in which we live and I think that the 60 members of the House, first of all the government members, then my colleagues and the members of the Social Credit Party agree with me that it is urgent that we prove to Quebecers that it is possible to achieve or bring back a certain progress which would be profitable for Quebec within the present framework, provided we give it added flexibility.

It would be dangerous indeed, Mr. Speaker, to simply disregard the Quebec administration or try to embarrass it, just for the fun of it. What we must do, and I repeat it for my colleages of the House, is to show Quebecers before the referendum that it is possible to improve the economic situation of their province, to prove to all these Quebecers that we did not achieve this progress outside Confederation but within it, and so show them it is not necessary to divide our country to guarantee Quebecers even a minimum of their rightful aspirations, whether cultural or economic.

And I think that no Canadian would or will be reluctant to endorse any measure allowing Quebecers to meet their expectations the same way we from Quebec wish all people from all provinces to achieve that minimum of most legitimate expectations, for different reasons maybe, because of a different mentality.

I should also like, Mr. Speaker, to get this government to consider in the budget those funds that will be allocated to agriculture. We know that the province of Ontario also went through difficult times last year as a result of dairy policies. I know milk producers are waiting anxiously for the announcement of the dairy policy for 1977.

We know that in Quebec particularly from 5,000 to 6,000 milk producers are now out of business. Those who are still in business have probably been lucky or privileged, but they are quite concerned about the future of their operation. I hope that the Minister of Finance, in his budget speech, will provide some very special subsidies and will urge his government to absorb a good part of the powdered milk exports and ease by the same token the hardships suffered by the milk producers, which are the two main problems in that industry.

Mr. Speaker, I would not want to take undue advantage of my allotted time. We all realize, I am sure, the importance of this debate, and we all appreciate the situation in which Canada now finds itself because of the fantastic number of unemployed. We urge the government to show leadership. It can be sure of getting the co-operation of this party so long as it will bring forward positive or corrective measures that will contribute to the betterment of the community. Certainly we cannot congratulate the government, so long as it has no policy.

As parliament members, we must criticize the government from time to time and require it to show more leadership than it has until now to alleviate the situation. A continuing lack of policy to remedy the situation will show not only to Parliament members but to the majority of Canadians that the government has actually lost the confidence of the people and that we need an alternative. We hope to be able to do our duty as opposition members, to be very demanding and to support any positive measures so long as they meet the aspirations and interests of all Canadians.

Mr. Arthur Portelance (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I know that hon. members would rather hear the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) responsible for unemployment policy and the creation of jobs. He is not here this evening because he is appearing before the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration precisely to give detailed explanations about the various policies in his department.

With your permission, in my capacity as Parliamentary Secretary, I should like however to inform you about what is being done by the government and the Department of Manpower and Immigration. My hon. colleagues are aware no doubt of the fact that the seasonally adjusted unemployment rate of 7.9 per cent announced yesterday by Statistics Canada for February is one of the highest monthly rates in many years. High unemployment surely is a source of concern, but must not give rise to a general panic. I am convinced that hon. members opposite do not plan on using those figures for such a purpose. It is essential that we all understand the reasons for such high unemployment and the steps which the government is taking to reduce it and to prevent it from rising again.

I wish to point out in the first place that the rise in the seasonally adjusted unemployment for the January-February period can be ascribed to a single factor; the considerable increase of people looking for employment. There is a fact which has remained unnoticed all through the discussions about the problem, that is the substantial increase last month in the number of Canadians who are effectively working; that number has increased by 25,000 or 0.3 per cent, seasonally adjusted, between January and February.

Without trying to make any forecasts, I want to emphasize that if employment keeps growing at the same rate during the next 12 months, the number of jobs by the end of next February will have increased by 300,000. In spite of the severe winter we just had which proved disastrous for a number of industries, particularly those employing mostly males and in spite of the increasing unemployment rate in the United States, we have seen very substantial improvements in the employment picture in February. The seasonally adjusted figures show that employment remained at the same level or went up in six out of the ten Canadian provinces. These improvements showed up mostly in the socio-cultural, commercial and personnel services and in the business sector.

We would, of course, welcome a stronger trend in employment growth, but, clearly, the unprecedented unemployment in February is far from being as catastrophic as prophets of doom would have us believe. The increase in the seasonally adjusted unemployment rate is due to a sharp increase in the number of new arrivals in the labour force which went up by 74,000 between January and February. This is an extremely sharp increase from one month to another. It would not be an exaggeration to say that no economy in the world could absorb such a sharp increase in its labour force.

I should also make it clear that we had a similar increase in the labour force in January. As a result, the net increase in the number of job seekers amounted to 161,000 between December and January. On the basis of those figures, it can thus be said that the seasonally adjusted increase in the new labour farce participants will reach 966,000 after one year, which is a tremendous increase. New participants can certainly not keep on entering the labour force at such a rapid rate. One must not be fooled by the unemployment rate recorded in February and I would be less than honest towards the House if I said that I or the government are totally satisfied, with the employment trends of the past year.

[Mr. Portelance.]

We are all aware of the fact that Canada, like the United States and our European trading partners has experienced a somewhat slow industrial growth. The strengthening of the Canadian economy has been real, but not sufficient to absorb the very substantial and constant increase in the labour force. Even though the growth outlook in the private sector for the forthcoming fiscal year continues to be promising, however, it will be very difficult to bring the rate of our economic growth above that of our growing labour force.

It is with this in mind, as well as the problems with which we might be confronted in the forthcoming year, that the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) last October announced the implementation of the first stage of our employment strategy, to alleviate unemployment over the next few years. Under this strategy, some $350 million will be spent, in addition to the enormous amounts allocated to the training, employment and mobility programs by the Department of Manpower and Immigration. It will be a lot more than a band-aid approach as some hon. members have termed this strategy.

I wish to mention for instance the increasingly needed job incentive programs, such as the Canada Works Program, with $200 million, the Young Canada Works Program, with $30 million, the Summer Job Corps Program, with $10 million, and other direct employment programs for students during the Summer. The strategy also provides for a number of other longer term measures which will greatly help Canadians to find jobs not only this year, but also in the forthcoming years.

One of the most important of those measures is the additional $19 million which has been provided for the Occupational Training Program, for which $10 to about $70 million have been earmarked for the next fiscal year. The strategy also includes our new Job Experience Training Program, through which business will be able to hire (during winter and summer) young people who cannot find a job on the labour market and to provide them with relevant practical training and experience. This innovative program, which will be implemented jointly with Chambers of Commerce across the country, might very well turn out to be one of the most effective means available to us to fill the gap between school and the labour market. I expect that this year, some 7,000 young people will take advantage of the Occupational Training and Experience Program.

However, our immediate job will be to provide meaningful and productive employment for the great number of people entering the labour market. This is why, in addition to an employment strategy for 1977-78 with a $350 million funding, the Minister of Manpower and Immigration announced last fall supplementary estimates in the amount of $100 million for LIP projects this winter, which would bring the program's funding to $200 million and provide, as I said, for the creation of jobs lasting until June for tens of thousands of Canadians. LIP projects are a definite contribution to community infrastructures, they create thousands of extra jobs and help the people involved to acquire and maintain good work habits. Although the major part of the program's impact on employment is still to come LIP is one of the key factors in the significant job increase experienced in February.

Mr. Speaker, under the measures already announced, we will provide in 1977-78: 126,000 man-months of work under the LIP program for this winter; 288,000 man-months of work under the Canada Works program with a $200 million funding; 60,000 man-months of work under the Young Canada Works and the Company of Summer Workers; 19,000 man-months of work under the Local Employment Assistance Program (LEAP).

Overall, the employment strategy will help 135,000 participants, in addition to those who were already working on LIP projects this winter. I would like to stress that those initiatives are over and above our major manpower programs, such as: the manpower training program under which some 300,000 full-time participants will be trained at a cost of some $600,000; the manpower mobility program which will enable 15,000 unemployed workers and their families to move to a community where they will be able to find full-time employment, at a cost of some $14 million.

The programs under our five-year strategy are not rigid. Quite the opposite, they are very flexible and the minister is ready to bring in due time any changes and amendments that will prove necessary to meet the immediate and long-term needs of our labour force.

However, I do want to stress above all that the bill before us offers a new solution to the challenge which, day after day, work and unemployment constitute in a modern industrial industry society. Through certain amendments, we will replace welfare benefits with productive and satisfying employment which Canadians so dearly want.

The bill enables us to dispense training instead of distributing unemployment benefits. Indeed, it gives the unemployed the possibility of taking courses while receiving unemployment insurance, and using that money as the chief source of income during their training period.

This new system will enable us to make funds available and to admit as well a larger number of unemployed to much needed vocational training. This means that instead of searching, sometimes in vain, for a job difficult to find, thousands of Canadians will be able to use their time and skills to improve their "employability" and their long-term income, but it also means that we will be able to use present expenditures to give people the opportunity to get a more attractive and promising position on the labour market.

At the same time, the bill will enable us to develop pilot projects to determine whether it is possible to establish worthwhile links between unemployment insurance support payments and job creation projects. I do not expect this initiative to be one of the main factors which will contribute to reduce unemployment this year, but it could become very important next year if experiments prove to be successful.

Under this legislation, we will also be able to experiment the works sharing plan, which is already widely applied in Europe to reduce unemployment and maintain contact with the working environment. This system, whereby the plant can maintain all its employees at work during 75 per cent of the time rather than laying off 25 per cent of them, does offer certain benefits. For instance, it enables businesses to keep their workers and therefore avoid having to train new ones when production starts again. Employees are not losing their skills nor their working habits and they stay on the job. The net cost for unemployment insurance amounts to almost nothing. This system can therefore benefit all parties. The minister hopes to be able to initiate a number of worksharing pilot projects next fall and if they prove as successful as I expect, to expand them substantially in the future in the best interest of all Canadians. All these new ways of using unemployment insurance will help curb or reduce unemployment.

They will give workers opportunities which they do not have now and no one will have to participate. Their philosophy is largely based on recommendations made by the OECD in its recent review on a general employment policy. It seems to me that the programs which the government has implemented and is still implementing to fight short and long-term unemployment, have been dictated by our economic and by our international situation. These statistics must be considered in the aggregate and not just for any given month. The present government has probably found more positive ways to fight unemployment than most of our economic partners.

We have developed an employment strategy which has already produced positive results. In the coming months, our situation will improve further. We intend to combine the unemployment insurance support payments with our manpower programs. If things work well, these programs will allow us to expand our training and job creation programs and to develop a work sharing system.

The finance minister declared that he was going to bring down a budget providing for the best possible management of our economy and the necessary action to reduce unemployment without creating a new inflationary trend. If the unemployment rate for February should not create panic in the public, as some have claimed it will, I must admit that it is far from being satisfactory. We cannot ignore the human problems which are being created by our present unemployment rate and we cannot be indifferent to it. We are taking the very strong action which the present situation calls for so that as many Canadians as possible may find the productive and satisfactory job they seek. This question remains one of the major concerns for our government.

[English]

Mr. Bob Brisco (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, there are a couple of things I want to set straight on the record tonight, and among them are the subjects of LIP, DREE, Canada Works, Young Canada Works, and FBDB.

It is very strange to me that in this fiscal year 1976-77 under LIP the minister is trying to create at least temporary jobs. LIP is the program that employs a few people for a few months so that they can then go on unemployment insurance and subsequently go on welfare, and subsequently apply for the next round of LIP, and I think that is the best and kindest description of that program I can give.

I must say there have been examples, certainly there are some in my riding, where this program has been of benefit, so I must give the department credit on that score. It is significant that when funding was announced for the fiscal year 1976-77 the allotment for the Kootenay West area was for $279,000 and we had an increased level of unemployment. I find it strange in view of the fact that in the previous year the funding was for $608,000. Then overnight, catching manpower officials with their collective estimates down, the minister made a crash decision to throw more dollars into the breach. He injected into Kootenay West overnight another $329,000, and he expected the applications to be processed in two, three or four days. I wonder who put the pressure on the minister to make an assinine judgment like that? Even the job opportunities were greater at that time. I question whether all that LIP money was really needed. I wonder how many frivolous applications were subsequently sent in and funded as a result of that additional over night injection of funds. I would like to know what went on in the department that brought about that over night decision which left manpower officials in British Columbia astounded. They could not understand this kind of decision made by the minister.

After mentioning this reaction I would like to make a few comments in another area with reference to a couple of farces that have been worked on this House today, farces which give an example of the farcical nature of this government. The first one is the statement of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) who said that today, after making his speech in the House, the opposition leader left the House. The minister devoted ten minutes of his speech to the absence of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark), in spite of the fact that the latter had given the minister prior notice of his absence in the form of an apology explaining that he had a prior and long-standing engagement. In spite of his high stature, the minister demonstrated his mental smallness and his churlish nature. He certainly abused the courtesy extended to him by the Leader of the Opposition who provided the minister with a letter of explanation. If the minister had been a gentleman, he would never have wasted the time of the House on the scurrilous comments he made.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: Where is the minister now?

Mr. Paproski: He has not been here all evening.

Mr. Brisco: I would remind the minister in his absence—perhaps he will read it in Hansard tomorrow—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. The hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Brisco) has the floor.

[Mr. Brisco.]

Mr. Brisco: —that the circumstances of unemployment overcame the events of today. There has been in the past, and doubtless there will be in the future, occasions when the Leader of the Opposition has spoken and will speak in the absence of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). This arrogance, which is so endemic in this government, was clearly demonstrated the other day when the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) read a major policy speech for the minister responsible for Langair, hot air, and Canadair.

The other farce that was worked upon this House today was the disclosure by the Conservative member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Grafftey) that the Liberal member for Laurier (Mr. Leblanc) used his office and his official stationery to solicit funds for the Liberal party. What was the Liberal reaction to this shocking disclosure?

Mr. Clermont: Shocking, my—

Mr. Brisco: My what? I would like to hear from the hon. member on the Liberal side.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. Will the hon. member please address the Chair?

Mr. Portelance: On a point of order, I am surprised to hear the hon. member refer to the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Leblanc) who is not present in the House. The hon. member gave an example of a certain minister speaking about his leader not being here. He should practise what he preaches.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. That was not a point of order. I suggest we are getting into a debate.

Mr. Brisco: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I will not dwell on this point much longer, but I would like to see it stated on the record that the reaction of the government to this shocking disclosure was not silence, was not shame, was not embarrassment. It was none of these, Mr. Speaker. They laughed, they hooted uproariously, they treated it as a funny joke. That laughter will haunt them in the future, like Mackenzie King's ghost, and so it should.

I should like to turn now to the band-aid patchwork solutions of the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) and his Canada Works program and the Young Canada Works program. Even the names of the programs are a farce. They are building false hopes by advertising a Canada Works program and a Young Canada Works program across Canada. I should like to know how much the government has spent promoting those two programs. I warrant it has spent more on advertising than on funding in Kootenay West.

Mr. Nystrom: With Liberal ad agencies.

Mr. Brisco: Mr. Speaker, I was enthusiastic. I thought the government would provide jobs for people in my riding, for unemployed fellow-Canadians.

Mr. Friesen: Don't hold your breath.

Mr. Brisco: The hon. member for Surrey-White Rock (Mr. Friesen) tells me not to hold my breath. How right he is. How deluded I was by this government and its economic policy!

The Minister of Manpower and Immigration sought the co-operation of members of parliament. He received mine. I spoke to groups in my riding and encouraged organizations to apply for funds. I told people about the program. Unfortunately I wasted my time, which could have been spent better in this House or elsewhere. I sought the co-operation of the people. They were enthusiastic. Even manpower officials were enthusiastic, as were students. After all, in my riding there is Selkirk College, a post-secondary institution with a large student enrolment, and Notre Dame University, also with a substantial student enrolment. Why should the students not have been pleased?

There were 38 applications for $1,609,983, but the allocation under the Canada Works program for Kootenay West was $153,000. There were 39 applications under the Young Canada Works program; the amount applied for was $483,-529. But the allocation for Kootenay West was the lowest in British Columbia, at $66,000. Mr. Speaker, if that is not a classic example of Liberal pork barrelling, I do not know what it is.

Mr. Friesen: Yes. Basford got half a million.

Mr. Brisco: You bet he did. And so did all the other Liberals.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. Would the hon. member please refer to the minister by his title?

Mr. Brisco: I am sorry, Mr. Speaker. I was referring to that hon. gentleman from Vancouver. Can you imagine what a crushing disappointment this meagre funding was, what an insult it was? I appealed personally to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration, and told him his own officials in Kootenay West disputed his figures and disagreed with him. I approached him twice, personally, on this issue. What was the minister's response? What did he say? He said no. He shook his head. He did not care and does not care now. Mr. Speaker, he said no to the 2,000 unemployed in the Trail area, which has a population of 12,000; he said no to the 2,000 unemployed in the Nelson area, which has a population of 12,000. He gave us some $66,000. If I could, I would hand the money back to the minister. He probably needs it more than we do.

Mr. Abbott: But you have it.

Mr. Brisco: Mr. Speaker, this government has weasled on the unemployed, on the young people in Kootenay West and across Canada.

Unemployment among those between the ages of 14 and 24 has been rising steadily since December, 1973. This process did not begin last year, or the year before. It began in December, 1973. The government has had ample notice. How much more notice do you want than four years? Can you not read your own figures? Are you blind? Are you deaf? Or do you not care?

Mr. Paproski: They do not care. They are heartless.

Mr. Brisco: Today young people between 14 and 24 make up 47 per cent of our unemployed.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Nystrom: They will never vote Liberal again.

Mr. Brisco: Those young people are proud to be Canadians, are proud of their country; they want to work in their country and for their country. And what is the government doing for them? It has given my riding $66,000. That is supposed to show the 2,000-plus students of my riding how willing the government is to help. Mr. Speaker, I would rather the government took a rest for four or five years. Let us stop these programs. Let us stop funding projects of this kind until we can introduce some permanent solutions. I would rather they stopped the LIP programs, the Canada Works and Young Canada Works programs, if only they could come up with long-term, permanent solutions.

Let me make some suggestions. I make them because, God knows, we often hear the government say that we criticize but we do not suggest alternatives. I see no reason why we cannot, even without provincial co-operation, undertake programs of training in trade schools and vocational schools, and upgrade some of the trade skills required by the labour market. That is my first point.

Second, I suggest that, as a nation, we should follow the example of Quebec. Let us provide funding for existing industry and new industry; let us provide a kind of accelerated DREE program which could be instrumental in taking the unemployed off the unemployed lists. Although in the past I have been unhappy at the amount of DREE funding going to Quebec, I must concede that the program in that province has succeeded well. The people of Quebec knew how to make it work, and they generated significant numbers of jobs. That option is open to the government, among countless others. I know that you will hear the NDP complain about money being given to private enterprise, to those capitalist rip-off artists. But they forget how much money is returned in taxes from the end product, in taxes from the employee and taxes from the employer. Those grants are returned a thousand-fold, but that never crosses the minds of those on my left.

Earlier today the Leader of the NDP (Mr. Broadbent) waxed eloquent about unemployment in Canada, and singled out that bastion of free enterprise, British Columbia, that province which has finally shaken off the mantle of socialism. He said unemployment in British Columbia is just terrible. Obviously he did not bother to look at the Statistics Canada figures, for they show that as of February 19, 1977, unemployment in British Columbia is down, by some 7,000 jobs, and that the province has the highest employment rate in Canada. I wonder what the NDP's answer to that is.

I recall a little mill in Jenpeg, Manitoba, which made Jenpeg logs. God knows, the people of the north need those Jenpeg logs to build their log houses. Then we saw government become involved with private enterprise. It was decided that the government of the province would operate the Jenpeg mill, and operate it better than private enterprise had done. So, the government of the province put one of its political appointees in charge. He hired 14 more people to do the work of five, and the whole operation was a disaster. It has gone down the drain. Taxation levels in Manitoba are the highest in Canada. Mr. Speaker, provincial taxes in Manitoba are higher than anywhere else in Canada.

That is why, for example, Saskatchewan is having some difficulties. They do not even audit their own books. The various departments were supposed to be audited. The premier of Saskatchewan stood up before the recent by-elections and said that the books had been audited. They were not audited at all. All of a sudden the premier of Saskatchewan comes up with egg all over his face, a not unusual circumstance for NDP'ers. He discovered that he had not audited his own books.

Let us go to the job opportunities created in British Columbia.

Mr. Symes: Tell us about Ocean Falls.

Mr. Brisco: I will get to that in a minute. Ocean Falls is an old pulp and paper mill on the west coast of British Columbia. The private enterpriser who owned that mill was not making a dime. In fact he was losing money. It would have cost a lot of money to make it work properly. The Barrett government took over and made it work. More power to them! I am quite prepared to hand out accolades where they are deserved. However, what is the comparison between one little pulp and paper mill on the west coast of British Columbia and the disaster wreaked upon British Columbia in the mining community? Thousands were thrown out of work as a result of the stupid policies of the NDP minister of mining, Leo Nimsick. He shut down the entire mining industry in British Columbia.

My constituency of Kootenay West is rich in mineral potential. Where is the development? It is gone. Where did the development in the east Kootenay's go? Where did the miners go? They went to Cape Breton, Newfoundland, Prince Edward Island, all over the maritimes. That is where the mining companies went looking for ore. They went to the Territories and the Yukon. They knew darn well there was no point trying to find ore in British Columbia under the regressive taxation policies of the NDP government.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his allotted time has expired. The hon. member may continue with unanimous consent.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

An hon. Member: No.

[Mr. Brisco.]

Mr. Brisco: Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I distinctly heard a no. The hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Symes).

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, in this debate on the state of the economy I would like, in the few minutes remaining, to focus on the problem of unemployment. As most Canadians know, under the present Liberal government we now have the worst unemployment since the great depression of the thirties, with over one million Canadians unemployed and only about 37,800 job vacancies. We know that about 13 per cent of the labour force is without jobs. These figures do not include the ones that go unreported by Statistics Canada.

What are the characteristics of unemployment today? I would like to zero in on that. Unemployment among women is higher than among men. We find today that women account for about 40 per cent of the total labour force in Canada, or about four million jobs. Women make up about 40 per cent of the unemployed today.

We find also that unemployment is disproportionately concentrated among young people, with 46 per cent of the unemployed in Canada under 25 years of age.

Unemployment is much higher in certain regions in Canada, especially in Atlantic Canada, Quebec, northern Ontario, and areas in northern British Columbia.

On past occasions I dealt with the problem of unemployment, its causes and solutions. Today I would like to zero in on the problem of unemployment among women and young people. It is sad to relate that women are the lowest paid and usually the first laid off in times of economic difficulty. They face discrimination in job availability. They often get less pay for the same job than a man would get.

Job opportunities are limited for women, especially in my area of the country, northern Ontario, where they find work mostly in the service industries in jobs such as waitresses, clerks, secretaries or nurses.

Many women today do not want to have a role solely as a homemaker. They want to branch out toward a fulfilling career. Times have changes as have attitudes and, of course, the educational qualifications of women.

We find as well that women with their skills are carrying out jobs that help keep the economy functioning, jobs which provide important services to people.

I would like to put to rest the myth which is perpetuated by some, including the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Cullen), that women in the work force are a luxury rather than a necessity, that somehow high unemployment among women can be tolerated because they are not really the breadwinner of the family and that the family can get along quite nicely without their income.

The fact is that about 43 per cent of women who work do not do so primarily because they want to pursue careers. They work because it is an economic necessity. The female spouses have to go to work today to make ends meet. With the high cost of living, they have to work to help pay for the cost of food, shelter, clothing and fuel. Young women must work to help pay for their education, job training, or to support themselves as they come to the age of majority.

There is another myth that women are taking jobs away from men. The fact is that most women are still limited to service industry jobs such as maids or waitresses, or jobs with particular skills that men do not have, such as nurses, secretaries, or those who work in the garment industry. Very few women are in the executive, professional or industrial work force.

The rate of unemployment among women over 25 years of age is about 60 per cent higher than for men over 25 years of age. According to figures published by Statistics Canada, most of the unemployed working women who are spouses come from low income families. In 1973, the last year for which we have statistics, 21 per cent of unemployed wives came from families with incomes between $4,000 and $7,000 a year. In other words their income was crucial for the total family income.

This government, because of its economic policies, particularly its anti-inflation program which has taken over $300 million in wages out of the hands of workers through wage rollbacks, and has reduced consumer demand and caused business to lay off workers, is still not doing anything meaningful in terms of getting people back to work, especially unemployed women and unemployed young people. The figures of high unemployment among women indicate that the government in its job creation program has not addressed itself to the acute problem of jobless females. The same could be said about its lack of attention to the plight of the unemployed young.

The young Canadian who wants to work is becoming increasingly desperate and cynical about society and its failure to provide jobs. It has become a demoralizing process for those with education or job training to go out into the world of work only to find there is no employment available. Consider, for example, the experience of a young welder who had completed his course at the top of his class. He told me, when he came to see me in my office, that the first question prospective employers asked him was whether he had any previous job experience. When he replied that he had no previous experience, the door was closed in his face. In addition, employers told him there was a waiting list of 20 welders at the local Manpower office who could not find work.

Many of these young workers are classified as underemployed. In 1975, for example, 54,000 young people held part time jobs, not because they wanted such jobs but because they were the only ones they could find. Today large numbers of university and community college graduates are working at jobs far below their qualifications. The example of a Ph.D. driving a taxi is no longer a joke.

Summer job prospects for high school and university students were dismal last year—2,519 young people were seeking jobs in my constituency through the local Manpower centre. However, by the end of the summer the centre had only managed to find jobs for 982 of these students. This coming summer things will be far worse. The government has put forward a Young Canada Works program, offering this as a solution. But we all know the program is not adequate. The allotment in the Sault is $120,000, based on an unemployment formula and the limited funds available. To date applications submitted to me total $270,000. There is just not enough money to fund all the worth-while projects which are being submitted.

Just as there are myths about women in the work force, so there are myths attached to the unemployment of young people. It is assumed by many that the young today are over-educated. The fact is that of those in the 15-19 year bracket who are out of school and in the labour market, 60 per cent have no more than grade ten education, and that in the 20-24 year old group 40 per cent have no more than grade ten education. Their job prospects are dismal. We also hear that unemployment among youth is of short duration. The record shows that in 1975, 27 per cent of all those out of work had been unemployed for 14 weeks or more. The corresponding figure for young people was only slightly lower at 23 per cent.

There is also a myth that unemployment among the young really amounts to paid leisure thanks to unemployment insurance benefits. The reality is that most of these young people are first time job seekers who have not worked for long enough to qualify for extended unemployment insurance benefits. Many do not qualify at all because they cannot fulfil the minimum eight week work requirement. The government is now introducing legislation which will increase the qualifying period from eight weeks to 12 weeks, a measure which will come down hard on young people trying to find summer jobs or short term jobs, and which will disqualify completely another 330,000 Canadians from receiving unemployment insurance benefits, throwing them on to the municipal welfare rolls.

There is a further myth that the youth unemployment problem will disappear as the population ages. In reality the result will be that their poor job experience early in life will be transmitted to the future, helping to create a generation of working poor.

The New Democratic Party has proposed a full employment plan, and my hon. friends and I have elaborated on this subject on other occasions. Surely, though, part of any national employment strategy must be directed to increasing employment opportunities among women and young people. I have some suggestions to put forward at this time specifically to meet the needs of these two groups. For example, I suggest that the government introduce effective laws prohibiting discrimination because of sex or marital status in recruitment, classification, promotion and advertising of jobs. There should also be a mandatory program of affirmative action to achieve sexual equality in all public service departments and agencies.

We need tough laws, strictly enforced, to provide equal pay for work of equal value, and incentives to achieve this goal. We need expanded opportunities for maternity leave with pay and the right of women to return to their positions without penalty as to salary or seniority. We need changes in the labour laws to provide collective bargaining rights and fringe benefits for domestic and part-time workers.

For youth, I believe we need closer integration between the world of education and the world of work. There should be an increased number of work study programs during the school year, and more vocational counselling services both in schools and in a family context. We need special government funded projects, for example, environmental clean-up, emergency capital works projects for municipalities which involve the hiring of students and young people, and the subsidization of farm salaries, thereby enabling Canadian farmers to hire more employees. These are emergency measures.

What we need in the long run is planning and goals designed to promote economic growth and bring down present unemployment levels which are costing the economy billions of dollars in lost production and lost consumer spending, not to speak of hundreds of millions of dollars in lost tax revenues and extra contributions to the Unemployment Insurance Commission. I submit that expenditures now will reap huge returns in the long run through full employment. The human and economic misery faced by one million unemployed Canadians, especially by women and young people, demands action now, and the government should be doing some meaningful work to get these people employed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order. It being 10 p.m. it is my duty to inform the House that, pursuant to Standing Order 58(11), proceedings on the motion have expired.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

TRANSPORT—DISPARITY BETWEEN SUBSIDIES FOR FERRIES ON EAST AND WEST COASTS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, on November 3 last the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) announced his handy-dandy made-in-Ottawa transport policy for northern coastal communities of British Columbia, which he called "improved shipping service". He said, and I quote in part from the announcement:

> The three B.C. coastal M.P.s, the Honourable Iona Campagnolo, Jack Pearsall and Hugh Anderson had assisted in producing the new plan and also will be watching developments and keeping in close touch with constituents to iron out any early problems which may arise.

[Mr. Symes.]

He went on to say:

> Rivtow, whose service will be non-subsidized, has agreed to hold the tariff rate while experience is gained in the operation and does not foresee any major increases.

On November 29 the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Anderson) was quoted in one of his own papers, the Campbell-River Upper Islander, as saying:

> The rationale behind the abandoning of the Northland subsidy was that it was distorting, not helping, Northern Navigational services. Competition could be improved if the federal government were not assisting only one company.

● (2200)

I would like to hear what the coastal communities have to say about that.

On November 30 it was discovered that the cost of some of the services within that one month's period had risen by as much as 150 per cent.

On December 3 the New Westminster Columbian reported statements of Mr. Bill New, president of Coast Ferries Ltd., and I quote:

> He said he feels that the friendship among RivTow President Cecil Cosulich, Roger Marsham, a federal ministry of transport administrator, and Goen Chestnut, an adviser to B.C. Transport Minister Jack Davis, acted as a detriment to his company's interests.
> "They, Chestnut and Marsham are acting in the interests of themselves . . . not necessarily to the benefit of the people who are being serviced by the companies that have received these funds subsidies," he said.
> "Currently, you could say it is to the benefit of RivTow Straits."

The article goes on to say:

> RivTow picked up much of the cargo business abandoned by Northland when Northland's subsidy ran out Oct. 31.

On December 6 the Minister of Transport finally got to Prince Rupert to listen to what the people had to say. He conceded he had waited far too long and that perhaps he had made a mistake in making the decisions he had. That was also when he said that he had to make the changes because the government was "hostage to Northland".

Also on December 6 the Vancouver Province ran another article in which it said that the Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) Mrs. Campagnolo had said to a staff reporter:

> . . . that unless she gets some quick action from Transport Minister Otto Lang that will soothe the unrest among her constituents, she'll quit the cabinet post.
> "I want some action," she said. "If there's no action, I have other recourses."

On December 8, according to the Globe and Mail, "Mrs. Campagnolo said Mr. Lang promised last weekend"—that would have been the first week of December—"to improve service within six weeks."

On December 21 the Premier of British Columbia sent a telegram to the Prime Minister saying:

> On a per capita basis and using your east coast subsidies as a basis for establishing subsidies, the west coast should be getting more than $100 million a year. Instead, your Ministry of Transport is in the process of cutting us off entirely.

Two days ago I visited with a resident of Ocean Falls and she told me she had to wait two days to get a plane to get out of Ocean Falls because they were always socked in. Since Christmas the Lumba Lumba, the boat that was supposed to provide such great service to Ocean Falls, has been there four times, twice in the middle of the night when the residents of Ocean Falls did not even know that it had come there.

On March 4, just two weeks ago, I put a question to the Minister of Transport. I asked him, regarding his recent visit to Victoria, whether the government would now present a 50 per cent subsidy to help the ferry system in British Columbia. The minister again gave a very inadequate answer, so I put a supplementary question to him:

> Since the new improved shipping arrangement for the west coast is now four months old, and it is a makeshift proposition, are we to assume that this will now be a permanent arrangement, or will there be an announcement concerning a new arrangement?

I take up the Vancouver Province, and today I understand there is another statement which I would like to read into the record:

> Transport Minister Otto Lang promised an inquiry in December, and earlier this week four regional districts sent a telegram to Lang saying the inquiry was long overdue and should be called immediately. Although she didn't have any special knowledge, Campagnolo said: "As far I am concerned it will still be heard but if there is a transfer of jurisdiction from federal to provincial then it's hard to say what will happen."

The latest word which I have just heard from the hon. member for Capilano (Mr. Huntington) is that RivTow is to have a subsidy. This is the system which was not to require any subsidy. All that the communities along the coast of British Columbia have received from the Minister of Transport is promises and delays. According to the announcement in the Vancouver Province what we have is another delay.

There is supposed to be an inquiry. We know that that is the surest way of getting another stall. It is a gimmick. I feel sorry for the hon. member for Coast Chilcotin (Mr. Pearsall) because he has been working hard for those communities, and the Minister of Transport, and the Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) have given him the shaft. It is time that the coastal communities got an answer—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to inform the hon. member that his allotted time has expired.

Mr. Marcel Roy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am always impressed by the presentations made by the hon. member during the late show, and I am also impressed by the representations made by the Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) (Mrs. Campagnolo) on this matter.

The hon. member for Surrey-White Rock (Mr. Friesen) alleges that there are disparities between subsidies paid to ferry services on the east and west coasts. This view appears to be based on a straight comparison of numerical totals and does not take into consideration the basic purpose of a subsidy program, which is to iron out unfair disparities and not to establish some sort of mathematical balance. Subsidies of the type administered by the Department of Transport are not handed out on a percentage basis but are calculated on the basis of evaluated need. In such circumstances it is possible that 100 per cent of all subsidies could be paid in one area and there would still be no question of disparity.

In drawing comparisons between the east and west coasts, the extent to which transportation assistance in any form may be required is clearly a function of geography and climate. In the east the main ferry services provide linkage between the Atlantic provinces. This should be contrasted with the situation in British Columbia where the coastal shipping services, including the ferries, are an integral part of the provincial communications network, and to a considerable extent play the role of intra-provincial highways.

The scale of subsidization on the east coast is, of course, primarily dependent on the constitutional commitments which were made by Canada at the time of entry of Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland into Confederation. Although the current levels of expenditure may be much higher than were originally envisaged, the constitutional obligations cannot be avoided. The nature of the geographical area and the dispersed population inevitably lead to heavy expenditures which, even without a constitutional amendment, could not easily be supported by what is relatively one of the poorer areas of Canada.

The situation in British Columbia is very different. This prosperous province enjoys the benefits of a mature transportation system in which subsidization has in fact been a disruptive element rather than a support. Indeed transportation services in British Columbia waters can to a large extent be effectively provided through normal market processes.

There is no constitutional commitment to British Columbia contained in the terms of Confederation since the province did not see marine transportation services as being as high on its scale of priorities as did the island provinces in the east.

With due allowance made for Canada's constitutional obligations, the government has been striving to establish a water transportation assistance policy—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to inform the parliamentary secretary that his allotted time has expired.

MANPOWER—CANADA WORKS PROGRAM—DIFFERENTIATION BETWEEN STATUS INDIANS ON AND OFF RESERVATIONS

Mr. Cecil Smith (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, my rising tonight in the adjournment debate stems from a question I asked of the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) which is reported at page 2777 of Hansard, and also from a question the hon. member for Lambton-Kent (Mr. Holmes) asked which is reported at page 3521 of Hansard. My question also follows upon a speech I made with regard to employment and immigration which is found at page 3505 of Hansard.

I want to zero in tonight on the Canada Works program and explain exactly what took place over a very short period of time. The first letter I received informing me of the Canada Works program was dated December 20. I received no more communications in this regard until I received a letter on January 20. That letter said that the Churchill constituency was in a category of 20 per cent unemployment? I will accept the figure of 20 per cent as representing the unemployment in the area. However, the next communication that I received from the minister's office stated that allocations had been made for each particular constituency, and that in the Churchill constituency the allocations were made in the following way: Indians, $843,000; regulars, $100,000. What this indicated to me was that the Indian population, who are the responsibility of the federal government—that was referred to by the Minister of Manpower and Immigration—were allocated a certain amount of money, but the figure on their unemployment was inaccurate. Unemployment among the Indians runs closer to 75 per cent.

The minister has asked each member of parliament to appoint a ministerial advisory board to look at the projects that have been submitted from the communities. Those boards are made up of people from the constituency and they are the ones who advise on which projects should be funded. I sometimes think that the person who designed the Canada Works program has never been out of Ottawa because he could not have known what he was doing in allocating separate funds to Indian people living on the reserve, and separate funds to regulars, which means anyone not living on the reserve, eliminated about 2,700 status Indians living in the constituency. What this did was to drive a wedge down the middle of the communities in the north.

Many of our communities are composed of status Indians, non-status Indians, and Metis people. There is a line dividing the reserve people from the others. These communities have been working in harmony over the years. They are trying their best to work together as one community. What this program is doing is to drive the wedge much deeper. I hope that when the next allocations are made on August 26 we will not run into the same problem.

The people who have been named to the ministerial advisory board are responsible constituents in the Churchill riding. One is the vice-president of the Manitoba Indian Association and another is the vice-president of the Metis Federation. They know how money should be allocated in that area, unlike the official here who decides how to allocate this money before it gets to the ministerial advisory board. I refuse to accept his criteria.

The other criticism I have of this program is that it gives little chance to people to participate in it. Perhaps that was the design of the program in the hope that application forms would not reach some of the remote areas. I have here a note from a community which reads:

Dear Sir:

Please excuse the lateness of this application. Mail is slow in this isolated community and the forms were received only three days ago.

This was dated on the day of the deadline. We fought hard to get the deadline on February 4 extended so that communities which were really in need of work would have the opportunity to get in their applications. I have received other letters indicating that some communities have never received application forms. We do not receive daily newspapers in our area, nor do we have radio and television to carry the news of the existence of projects such as this one.

In the speech I made the other day I made reference to the other programs in existence at present. First we had LIP with $2,400,000. Next we had FLIP with $1,088,000. Then we had LEAP. We also have the Canada Works program, and the Canada Manitoba Northlands program. These were dumped, so to speak, on those communities within a period of about six months. The leaders of those communities were not even given the opportunity to sit down, assess those programs, and take the best advantage of them. The result was that many applications were made hurriedly in the hope they would be approved. I suggest that there will be ramifications and problems, because the communities were pressured into making those applications.

Mr. Arthur Portelance (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, we paid a special allocation to Indians living on reservations and on Crown lands for two reasons. First, it should be made clear that they are not included in the labour force survey carried out by Statistics Canada, and they are unlikely to be receiving unemployment insurance benefits. So we make them a separate group to be sure that they are included in the basic allocation. Second, the federal government must naturally give special attention to status Indians. On the other hand, we do not give a special allocation to Metis and status Indians living off reservations because they are included in the labour force survey on the same basis as all Canadians, with the exception of Indians living on reservations.

However, departmental advisory committees are urged when they decide the amount to be paid to non-status Indians to continue to examine carefully the projects submitted by Metis and status Indians living off reservations. In addition, should an insufficient number of acceptable applications be received from Indians living on reservations and Crown lands the unused funds would then be added to the regular fund and Metis just like Indians would be the first to be able to benefit from it.

To be more specific, Mr. Speaker, as far as the riding of Churchill is concerned, the rate of surplus manpower in this case is 6.17 per cent, excluding status Indians living on reservations or Crown lands, which would normally entitle them to an allocation of $100,000. But because of the size of the population and the high rate of unemployment registered among status Indians living on reservations or Crown lands in that riding the special allocation in their case was $843,000.

Those arrangements, Mr. Speaker, allow me to suggest that status Indians living in remote areas receive a fair share of the funds allotted under the Canada Works Program.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at eleven o'clock a.m.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.21 p.m.

LACK OF JOB CREATION PROGRAMS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity with regard to the over one million unemployed persons of this country. Figures released by Statistics Canada indicate a 21 per cent decline in the job vacancy rate from November 1976 to February 1977, a 21 per cent decline in the chances of finding work for over one million Canadians. I move, therefore, seconded by the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander):

That the House strongly condemn this government's lack of effective job creation programs to correct the human tragedy of those thousands of Canadians currently seeking employment for whom no job is available.

Mr. Speaker: The presentation of such a motion for debate pursuant to the Standing Order must be done with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

SUGGESTED CHANGE IN LICENSING LEGISLATION TO PREVENT USE OF OLD AND INADEQUATE SHIPS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to move a motion of urgent and pressing necessity under Standing Order 43. In view of the impending lay-off of up to 1,000 workers at the Collingwood shipyards, and in view of the catastrophic economic effect this will have on the workers and their families and the entire town of Collingwood, and in view of the fact that the major reasons for the impending wholesale lay-off relates to inadequate federal government policy, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House urge the government to bring in legislation which would prevent licensing old and inadequate ships, originally sold for scrap, to be used in Canadian waters, which would encourage the construction of new vessels, avoid lay-offs and stimulate employment for Canadian shipyards.

Mr. Speaker: The presentation of such a motion pursuant to the Standing Order can only be done with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

REQUEST THAT AIRBORNE REGIMENT BE ALLOWED TO REMAIN IN EDMONTON—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wish to move under Standing Order 43 a motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity, a motion which has to do with national unity. Men and women in high places, military men, provincial and civic leaders and the general public in Alberta have been trying to make their voices heard for about a year to justify the massive expenditures involved in moving and re-establishing the Canadian airborne regiment. I would move, seconded by the hon. member for Edmonton East (Mr. Skoreyko):

That this House demands at a time when national unity is being strained, this regiment, made up of easterners and westerners, French and English-speaking Canadians, all living together, working together, raising their families together in a location which might be considered neutral ground, a fine example of the varied cultures co-existing and collectively serving Canada without bias or prejudice, be allowed to remain in Edmonton.

I would hope that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) would not say no to this motion.

Mr. Speaker: The presentation of such a motion cannot be done without the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM

ALLEGED VIOLATION OF GUIDELINES BY BELL CANADA IN GRANTING SALARY INCREASES TO EXECUTIVES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, the motion which I wish to make under Standing Order 43 is one which the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) may wish to second. In any case, I hope it will have the support of the government. I therefore move, seconded by either the Minister of Finance or the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas):

That this House, noting that the salaries of 29 top officers of Bell Canada in 1977 will average $102,000 a year, an average increase over 1976 of $13,000, calls on the government to take the necessary steps to block this flagrant violation of its own anti-inflation guidelines which limit an annual salary increase to $2,400, it also being the view of this House that Bell Canada has no right to seek telephone rate increases to enable it to pay such high salaries at the top.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The presentation of such a motion for debate pursuant to the Standing Order can only be done with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CENTRAL MORTGAGE AND HOUSING CORPORATION

PROPOSED INVESTIGATION OF LOAN MADE TO QUAI D'ORSAY HOTEL—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that serious questions have been raised about the legality of CMHC insuring a mortgage loan between 210 Somerset Corporation and National Trust for the building of the Hotel Quai d'Orsay, which was subsequently foreclosed by National Trust, and in view of the fact that one of the former principals of 210 Somerset Corporation is presently associated with the building of a $30 million apartment complex in Laval, Quebec, with financing again provided by National Trust and insured by CMHC, I move, seconded by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath):

That the minister cause a complete investigation to be made into the circumstances involved in the guaranteeing by CMHC of loans in connection with the above mentioned projects and report to the House as soon as possible.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion under the terms of Standing Order 43 requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: No!

MANPOWER

ALLEGED FAILURE OF JOB CREATION PROGRAM—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration regarding the latest job vacancy figures which only add to the evidence of the government's mismanagement of the economy and its incompetence in the field of job creation. Noting that there is a 21 per cent drop in the job vacancy rate from the three-month average ending in November and a 17 per cent drop compared to the same period of last year—in fact, the job vacancy rate has dropped in all provinces except Newfoundland—I would ask the minister in all sincerity whether he will now concede that the government's job creation program is a complete disaster calling for immediate action.

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Needless to say, Mr. Speaker, I disagree with most of the premise to the hon. member's question except the part where he says he is sincere when he asks it. I would again commend to him a careful reading of the statement made by my associate deputy minister, Mr. Jack Mannion, before the committee on labour, manpower and immigration. He said then that the statistic put out by Statistics Canada showing the job vacancy rate is misleading, and explained that last year between five million and seven million Canadians actually changed jobs—ours is an extremely dynamic economy in that respect. To use this statistic in the way the hon. member has used it is most misleading.

Mr. Alexander: I do not think the one million who are out of work and the 291,000 who have dropped out of the work force because there are no jobs available to them will find that answer very acceptable. Let us show more sensitivity to those who are experiencing human suffering. What additional measures are to be introduced to help those seeking employment for whom no jobs are available? Must they wait until around September when the effects of the budget are noticed?

An hon. Member: If there are any.

Mr. Cullen: Fortunately, the government announced back in October, 1976 that we were aware there would be high unemployment this winter. We set aside $358 million, and there are $1,300,000 worth of sensitivity in my department which goes to direct job creation.

REQUEST FOR BUDGETARY PROVISIONS GEARED TO JOB CREATION

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Statistics Canada figures show that in the last six months 291,000 people who were seeking employment have given up looking for work and are no longer in the labour force, believing no jobs are available. Will the minister now tell the House whether budgetary measures will be geared to immediate job creation, as he revealed last night, and will he give a firm commitment in this regard?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Here again there is a misuse of the statistic of 291,000. These are not people who are out of work and who have stopped looking for work. In that category there are some 10,000 people who have returned to school; there is another group in that category which is back at work. So it is misleading to say that. As I said last night and as I have said in this House on many occasions, we have a whole series of programs in place; some of them are operating now—the Canada Works program, and the Young Canada Works program as well as others. These are things which, at the government level, we are doing.

Mr. Alexander: I am amazed at the minister's callous disregard of the plight of thousands of Canadians who are seeking jobs. I want the minister to give me a firm commitment that the budget will be geared, among other things, to the immediate creation of jobs in order to assist those who are suffering because of the incompetence of the government in this area.

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, this is a question which should probably be more properly directed to my colleague, the Minister of Finance. I did not, last night, indicate what was going to be in the budget. I did say, however, that I had made my modest contribution by expressing the sort of thing I thought should be in it.

ENERGY

OIL—SUGGESTED MANDATORY REPORTING OF AMOUNT OF REVENUE COMPANIES PUT INTO EXPLORATION AND DEVELOPMENT

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, may I direct my question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. The reports which he tabled yesterday indicate that Canada's reserves of crude oil are steadily declining despite the fact that the price of oil has trebled in the past four years, with correspondingly vast increases in revenues for the oil industry. In view of the minister's assertion and that of the Minister of Finance repeatedly to this House that these price increases were required in order to find new supplies of oil , does the minister not think that the time has come for the government to bring down legislation providing for mandatory reporting by the oil companies as to the amount of this increased revenue that they are receiving which is going into exploration and development?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member's question is prefaced by some error. He referred to the fact that our reserves of crude oil had been declining. If he were to read the report carefully he would see that the reserves picture for crude oil is the same this year as it was last year; there has been no significant change. The report addresses itself to the question of probabilities with respect to the unknown areas of oil. It indicates that probabilities in certain areas are up but that as far as the frontier areas are concerned for crude oil they are down. The hon. member would also want to look at it from the point of view of natural gas, which has to be seen in the same context because the moneys going to the producer are being spent for drilling purposes—the producer does not know whether he will find crude oil or natural gas. I think he would find a more favourable picture for natural gas.

As for the question of mandatory reporting, he knows perfectly well that I have given an undertaking in the last couple of weeks that we will be introducing legislation having to do with mandatory reporting in a few weeks' time.

MACKENZIE VALLEY PIPELINE—SUGGESTED POSTPONEMENT OF CONSTRUCTION PENDING STUDY OF ALTERNATIVE ROUTES AND SETTLEMENT OF LAND CLAIMS

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The same report indicates that the reserves of natural gas in the sedimentary basins, have improved considerably, though that report deals only with the period up to December 31, 1975, and that an additional five trillion cubic feet have been found in western Canada during 1976, bringing our reserves which are readily available to 65 trillion cubic feet. Does this not indicate that this gives the government plenty of time to reassess the best route for bringing gas from the frontier areas, and that the Mackenzie Valley pipeline could well be postponed until a thorough examination has been made of the Alcan route and the polar gas route, which would be much more beneficial to the people of Canada and much less costly?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, this House knows that the hon. member and his party have already judged this issue. They have not waited for the NEB report, they have not waited for Judge Berger's report; they have already said that they do not want any pipeline down the Mackenzie. We believe that the National Energy Board has an important role to perform in assessing Canada's reserves and the environmental and social questions which will be raised by Judge Berger. We have not made up our minds as the hon. member has. We want the facts first.

I do not think, dealing with the last part of his question, that you can try to fine tune a project as massive as the kind of project we are talking about by one or two more years' delay just because there is a small change in the reserves probabilities picture. I mention "probabilities" because they are no more than probabilities.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, may I direct my final supplementary question to the right hon. Prime Minister? My question arises out of the fact that the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development has stated publicly that the Mackenzie Valley pipeline would not be proceeded with until native land claims were settled. A few weeks ago the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources said in Toronto that the Mackenzie Valley Pipeline would be proceeded with if approved by the National Energy Board, whether or not the native land claims were settled. I want to ask the Prime Minister what is the government's policy. Does the government intend to proceed with the Mackenzie Valley pipeline construction if recommended by the NEB, irrespective of whether or not the land claims have been settled?

● (1120)

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): The government's position has been that we would not want to make a decision on this matter either as between one pipeline or the other or no pipeline until we have the report from NEB and from the Berger commission. We expect both these to come in within the first half of the year, and that would permit the government to make a decision at that point. I hope that the land claims, to the extent that they might be affected by the decision, will have been settled, but the undertaking is not to make a decision until the reports are made.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

REQUEST FOR INQUIRY INTO ALLEGED INJUSTICE SUFFERED BY BENEFICIARY

Mr. C. A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I would like to put a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

It is about a beneficiary from whom the Unemployment Insurance Commission claimed back excess benefit payments. He could not reimburse them because he was out of work, so UIC officials had him arrested and he actually spent one month and a half in jail. Could the minister launch an inquiry into a case like that and could he tell us if the UIC office has the right again to seek payment by holding back the benefits they owe him today?

[English]

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I would be surprised if it was the result of not being able to pay. It may be in that particular case there had been some fraud. In any event, without prejudging the case I will look into the question that was raised if the hon. member will give me the name of the individual.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

UNEMPLOYMENT IN QUEBEC—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO STIMULATE ECONOMY OF THE PROVINCE

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. As the former chairman of the Economic Council of Canada, Mr. Raynaud, a Liberal MNA in Quebec, has predicted that the economic situation in Quebec will deteriorate even further in 1977, that the unemployment rate may exceed 12 per cent, and inflation will rebound to more than 8 per cent, would the Prime Minister, bearing in mind that the federal government is charged with the responsibility of maintaining a stable economy throughout the whole country, tell the House what specific steps he will take to arrest this continuing deterioration in the economy of Quebec, particularly when noting that the economy there has been faltering under his government for many years and unemployment has risen from 6.6 per cent just before he took office in 1968 to the present 9.8 per cent?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we will continue to apply our economic policies with impartiality in all parts of the country. In those parts where unemployment is higher we will seek to have special measures, and the budget may be the occasion to mention some more.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, bearing in mind that the Minister of Finance stated yesterday that his policies of carefully staged recovery had put the Canadian economy on the right track, would the Prime Minister tell the House whether he considers nearly one million unemployed to be a sign that the economy is on the right track, whether he considers negative economic growth in the last quarter of 1976 to be a sign that the economy is on the right track or whether he considers a record trade deficit in the last quarter and accelerating inflation to be signs that the economy is on the right track, and if so, would he indicate what he would regard as the wrong track?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I do not happen to have in front of me the rule in Beauchesne which talks about argumentative questions, but I am sure that this is one of those questions.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

LOSS OF INTERNATIONAL CONFIDENCE IN CANADIAN ECONOMY—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Noting that the widely read international publication Business Week has stated that the Canadian economy is in serious difficulty and that the collapse in the value of our dollar is "only the most visible symptom of the profound troubles in the Canadian economy" at the present time, is the Prime Minister aware of the decline of such international confidence in the future of the Canadian economy, and does he plan to take any concrete steps to restore international confidence in Canada?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member reads that article very carefully, he will see that it makes the same argument I made in the House a couple of days ago about Canadians living beyond their means, which brought such loud guffaws from hon. members in the Tory Party.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

MANPOWER

GOVERNMENT ACTION TO AVOID LAY-OFFS AT COLLINGWOOD SHIPYARD

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and the Minister of Labour, both of whom should answer this question, I will turn to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration and see if I can get somewhere with him.

Mr. Paproski: I doubt it.

Mr. Hees: In view of the impending lay-off of most if not all of the 1,000 man work force at the Collingwood shipyard because of lack of orders, which is symbolic of the condition this government has allowed the economy to get into, has the government been in touch with this important operation, and if so, what plans does the government have for averting this very serious lay-off.

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, when we get co-operation from employers, the Department of Manpower and Immigration moves its officials in to proffer what advice and help they can. In addition, in the event that we are advised that it is inevitable that there will be a lay-off, we invariably set up a team in conjunction with the employer to see if these people can find other jobs, get more training or be moved, through our mobility grants, to other regions of the country.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, as the company has been in touch with the government on this very important matter and as there have been no results, is the proposal to train people in the plant for other jobs the best the government can do? Other jobs simply do no exist because of the serious unemployment situation. Has the government no plans at all for trying to revive the normal operation of this shipbuilding plant?

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, it is the prime objective and the prime purpose—

Mr. Hees: Why don't you do something about it?

Mr. Cullen: —to do what can be done about the problem faced by a particular corporation. From time to time we have to face reality, but if a problem can be solved, we do what we can. We try to work in concert with the companies because it is in their interest, our interest and, most assuredly, in the interest of the employees to do everything we can to keep the company in operation.

Mr. Hees: Is that not government gobbledygook for saying "We don't care and we are going to do absolutely nothing"?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Ottawa West.

PUBLIC SERVICE

INQUIRY INTO APPOINTMENT AND EMPLOYMENT PRACTICES—DATE OF COMMENCEMENT OF OPERATIONS AND COMPOSITION

Mr. Lloyd Francis (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the President of the Privy Council. Further to the minister's statement of February 4 to this House, can he now state when the committee of inquiry into the operation of the Public Service Employment Act will start its work, and who will be its members?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the committee of inquiry to which the hon. member refers has begun its work. The hon. member may recall that in my statement on the subject I indicated that this study or review is to be a two-phased operation. The first phase is to consist of an examination by each side of the problems raised in the terms of reference, and when that first phase is completed there is to be a coming together of the two sides under a chairman. We have appointed the representative of the government side, Mr. Bruce Brittain, the Deputy Minister of Veterans Affairs, and on the staff side the representative is Mr. Des Davidge, President of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers. The work of the first phase has commenced, and when it is completed, or even before that, a chairman will be named to conclude the study.

COMMUNITY EMPLOYMENT STRATEGY—MEASURES TO IMPROVE PROGRAM

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration, who stated in reply to a question by me on March 11 that he would look into the efficiency and effectiveness of the CES program in his department and make it better. In view of the increasingly urgent need to use every means available to solve extremely heavy unemployment, can the minister now say what steps have been instituted to expedite this program and clear away bureaucratic impediments which may be hindering its effectiveness?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I had that particular situation looked into. There was one technical problem arising out of the agreement which was causing some delay in one region. I understand that has now been corrected, or is in the process of being corrected. I think that one of our better operations is our community employment strategy. I welcome the support of the hon. member for that particular type of operation.

Mr. MacKay: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The minister knows that unemployment has reached unprecedented levels in the country, in some areas. Over one million Canadians have no means to live beyond, as the Prime Minister gratuitously stated. Could the minister be specific and make sure that more of the CES funds are used for direct job creation, and less for administrative costs, for running the program. Also, Mr. Speaker, will the minister encourage the efforts of organizations and local boards, so that this program can live up to expectations of the minister's predecessor?

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, we have a good program, but are always prepared to make it better. I have noted the hon. member's representations.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

UGANDA—PROPOSED CONDEMNATION OF ATROCITIES AND LOSS OF CIVIL LIBERTIES

Mr. W. C. Scott (Victoria-Haliburton): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Secretary of State for External Affairs may I direct my question to the Prime Minister? In view of the continuing reports from Uganda and the mounting concern of Canadians, will the Prime Minister advise the House when the government will officially condemn the atrocities and loss of civil liberties in that country?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we have already indicated that concern and disapproval. I had occasion yesterday to indicate that the whole matter could be discussed at the Commonwealth conference, if the Secretary General is willing to put it on the agenda. My argument is that the Singapore declaration, which concerns itself with human rights and is a charter of the beliefs and values established by members of the Commonwealth, could easily give us the occasion to look into that matter seriously.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

SUGGESTION NEW CHIEF OF STAFF VISIT NEWFOUNDLAND

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence. Since the new chief of defence staff is to be a naval officer and Newfoundland is by tradition and history naval oriented, may I ask if one of the first tasks of the new chief of defence staff will be to visit Newfoundland, to make him realize the importance of Newfoundland in our over-all defence posture and the importance of expanding our air-sea rescue and surveillance capabilities? That expansion would be appropriate for the defence of Canada, would increase our ability to conduct air and surveillance operations, and would create employment for native Newfoundlanders who will be able to provide that service.

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that when the new chief of defence staff assumes his position he will be interested and objective about all services and certainly would want to visit Newfoundland at the first opportunity.

Mr. Paproski: What does he think of the new naval cadet uniforms?

REQUEST FOR SEPARATE BILL DEALING WITH REMISSIONS AND DANGEROUS OFFENDERS

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice. Since violent crime and murder are on the increase, and since the Solicitor General, in reply to my question of March 16 said, as reported on page 4034 of Hansard, that:

> . . . the whole question of statutory remission and of dangerous offenders will be brought before parliament I hope in the near future in the successor to Bill C-83, which dealt with a number of these concerns.

I ask, is the minister to bring in a new bill dealing with dangerous offenders, etc., and will he undertake that, rather than using this particularly serious problem as a means for forcing through parliament unpalatable legislation, he will have this matter dealt with in a separate bill, separate and apart from one dealing with gun control, since such a bill could pass all stages in this House and committee expeditiously?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, all the matters to which the hon. member referred are immensely important and urgent. I hope that parliament will soon deal with all of them. They were examined exhaustively in committee in the last session. It therefore seems to me that it would be within parliament's capability to deal with all of them expeditiously.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: It's a "Basford" of a bill.

Mr. Woolliams: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The government itself moved some 33 amendments to the previous bill, some of which the committee did not approve. Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Justice did not answer my question. I am asking him if he will bring in a bill dealing with dangerous offenders and statutory remission. This matter affects violent crime, even murder on the streets of the urban centres of our country. Will he bring such a bill in separately, so that it can be dealt with expeditiously? Will he answer that question, instead of waffling as he has done this morning?

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member and his colleagues had not opposed the bill in the last session, we would now have among the laws of this country measures relating to statutory remission, dangerous offenders and other matters which would assure the Canadian public of a degree of protection which they do not have right now.

To reply to the hon. member's question, I hope to introduce legislation dealing with statutory remission, that is, prohibiting statutory remission, dealing with dangerous offenders, and increasing the ability of the police to protect society against maniacs using guns.

Mr. Woolliams: A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Amendments which the present government passed in 1970 have created some of our present problems. They changed the Bail Act. Since members on my side of the House made concrete, positive suggestions in committee, does the minister not think he ought to accept them if we are to pass legislation which is workable and acceptable to the people of Canada?

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, I agree that many of those suggestions were valuable, and I and the Solicitor General accepted many of them on behalf of the government. For that reason I feel that the whole subject has been thoroughly canvassed in a committee of this House and I anticipate that such legislation can be dealt with expeditiously.

SUGGESTION OF MRS. MENZIES THAT FOOD POLICY BE ADOPTED—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. It has been reported that June Menzies, vice chairman of the Anti-Inflation Board, in a speech in Winnipeg yesterday said that Canada "must lose no time in working out a deliberate and co-ordinated national food policy". I ask the minister, in view of his responsibility for the operation of the Anti-Inflation Board, will the cabinet be responding to this further considered view that we do not have a national food policy and that one is needed, and proceed now to take decisions on it and announce such a policy? I also ask this question because Mrs. Menzies, as an appointee of the present cabinet presumably would have the confidence of the entire cabinet, including the Minister of Agriculture, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and of the Minister of Finance himself.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, there has been continuing discussion of the question of a national food policy in an attempt to arrive at a position which would take into account the interests of consumers of Canada and, at the same time, assure the viability of agriculture in this country. Obviously, this is a matter of fundamental importance, which has been given a great deal of time and attention.

TRANSPORT

SUGGESTED CHANGE IN LICENSING PROVISIONS TO PROHIBIT USE OF OLD SHIPS

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, may I direct my question to the Prime Minister? My question related to the impending lay-off of 1,000 workers at the Collingwood Shipyards. According to the director of the Steelworkers Union, which represents those employees, one reason for the shipyard's being on the verge of wholesale lay-offs is that the federal government allows ships sold for scrap in the United States to be licensed for use in Canadian waters. He said that 25-year-old ships which cannot be licensed in the United States can be purchased and used on the Great Lakes. I ask the Prime Minister if the government is considering changing the legislation, or the regulations, in order to prohibit the use of old ships in that way in Canada?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of the allegations, but if the hon. member will be patient, I will refer the matter to the Minister of Transport and the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

INDUSTRY

COLLINGWOOD SHIPYARDS—POSSIBILITY OF BUILDING NEW SHIPS REQUIRED FOR PATROLLING 200 MILE FISHING ZONE

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Will the Prime Minister discuss with the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and the Minister of the Environment what new ship capacity will be required to meet our needs if we are to enforce the 200 mile limit for fishing purposes? Such enforcement should require more ships which, possibly, could be built at the Collingwood Shipyards.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will take notice of the question.

Oral Questions

AIRPORTS

PRINCE ALBERT—INQUIRY AS TO APPROVAL OF EXPENDITURES FOR IMPROVEMENTS

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the President of the Treasury Board. About ten days ago, I think, I asked him a question concerning the undertaking apparently entered into by the Minister of Transport, and widely advertised in the press in Prince Albert during the by-election, which led to the general belief that between $3 million and $6 million would be spent on the Prince Albert airport. Has anything of this kind been brought to his attention and is it now before the Treasury Board?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, there have been discussions. A definitive answer to that would be best presented by the Minister of Transport when he is available.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Transport is not the President of the Treasury Board. I am asking the President of the Treasury Board whether there has been any formal application. I would suggest this to him, and I hope he will take it in the best of good humour, that unless this expenditure takes place, the Minister of Transport will not be able during the next election to jet himself into Prince Albert.

Mr. Andras: From my knowledge of the proposals, I would think that the Minister of Transport is totally responsible in his recommendations.

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I will see the minister at 12 o'clock.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

REQUEST FOR RETENTION OF AIRBORNE REGIMENT IN EDMONTON

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. I know the Prime Minister believes in participatory democracy. In view of the almost unanimous support to retain in the city of Edmonton the bilingual commando unit, will the Prime Minister now, in the interest of promoting the spirit of national unity in western Canada, reverse the decision to remove this unit to central Canada?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not think the hon. member is seriously suggesting that I reverse a decision made by the Minister of National Defence on the recommendation of defence staff and of senior military advisers. I see that the Chief of Defence staff has now left the gallery. I am sure if he were here he would think the question rather preposterous.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Paproski: As long as this country is not at war and the morale of the troups in peacetime is très important—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Paproski: —which should be the prime concern, will the Prime Minister reconsider this very expensive and foolhardy move?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, this has been dealt with many times by the Minister of National Defence, but certainly I will agree with the assertion that this country is not at war. Mr. Speaker, you see in your gallery we have Romeo and Juliet, two Canadians from Hamilton.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

MANPOWER

CANADA WORKS PROGRAM—REQUEST THAT HIRING AUTHORITY BE GIVEN TO MAYORS AS WELL AS MANPOWER OFFICES

Mr. Cecil Smith (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. I first want to assure him and the Prime Minister that no one in the Churchill constituency is living beyond their means. The unemployment rate in the Churchill constituency is in excess of 20 per cent. In order to qualify for the make-work programs, the unemployed must be hired through CMC offices. In many cases these centres are located hundreds of miles from communities. Will the minister give authority to the chiefs and councils, mayors and councils and community leaders who are better qualified to provide the placement of unemployed in their respective communities? Will he give them that authority to hire at the local level?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I think the CMC is more or less the co-ordinating unit. I will look into the situation to see whether we can do an even better job than we have done in the past.

ENERGY

PRICING AND TAXATION POLICIES FOR PRESENT AND FUTURE COMPANIES OPERATING IN THE TAR SANDS

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. It arises out of the report on the oil sands and heavy oils. I think it is absolutely disgraceful that it was not tabled in the House of Commons so that we could ask appropriate questions. Is it government policy to allow the same pricing for oil and the same tax regime for all organizations that operate or intend to operate within the tar sands?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I do not know what the hon. member is talking about when he says it was not tabled in the House of Commons. Both documents were tabled in the House yesterday afternoon. I think the hon. member was present.

Mr. Gillies: Mr. Speaker, there was no statement on motions, no opportunity to question this important document which I gather the minister does not think is significant or he would have been prepared to come here and talk about it in the House of Commons. Is the government going to allow the same price policy and same tax regime for all organizations that are now operating or propose to operate in the tar sands?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, this is under discussion at the present time with the government of Alberta.

TAR SANDS—GOVERNMENT INTENTIONS WITH REGARD TO CAPITAL EXPENDITURES

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, is the government of Canada going to put any money into the development of new technologies for extracting oil from the tar sands? I notice in the report that they are getting technical advice. Is the government prepared to put any money into this operation? If so, is that money now in the estimates?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, it has already put about $300 million into Syncrude.

MANPOWER

REQUEST FOR CLARIFICATION OF MINISTER'S STATEMENT CONCERNING APPLICABILITY OF DREE TO NATIVE UNEMPLOYED

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I tried to catch your eye to ask a supplementary question of the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. At page 4060 he was questioned by the hon. member for Lambton-Kent with respect to the exceptionally high unemployment rate in the Indian, Inuit and Metis communities which averaged between 45 and 60 per cent and at times as high as 95 per cent. His answer to the hon. member at the time was to refer to such programs as DREE operating across the country and, in cooperation with the Department of Indian Affairs, he was attempting to do what he could to assist at the government level.

In view of the fact that none of these people are living beyond their means as described by the Prime Minister, and the fact that virtually all of the Inuit people live above the sixtieth parallel, some 50,000 native people, virtually all of whom are unemployed, can the minister explain how DREE is going to help these people and whether he has discussed the application of DREE, which is supposed to be a national program, above the sixtieth parallel with his colleague, the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I indicated that these two programs and departments work in concert to do what they can about high unemployment in this particular area. The initiative and responsibility for them comes under the aegis of my colleague, the Minister of Indian Affairs. It would be more appropriate to put the question to him.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

POSSIBILITY PROGRAM WILL BE MADE APPLICABLE TO NORTHERN TERRITORIES

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, may I direct my supplementary question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, and remind him of a statement by his colleague, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, made recently in Yellowknife, that DREE was going to be turned into a truly national program and made applicable in the two northern territories, thus raising the hopes of northerners to a considerable degree. Can the minister now say emphatically that DREE is going to be applied to the two northern territories, finally making this a truly national program and perhaps alleviating some of the unemployment in those parts of Canada?

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Yes, Mr. Speaker. Indeed, I have been authorized by cabinet to begin the exercise of extending the DREE program to the northern part of our country. Negotiations have been going on for some time as to how we can achieve that. I hope within a few months, if not weeks, we can conclude the negotiations and extend the DREE program to the northern part of our country.

Mr. Nielsen: It's about time.

ENERGY

DISCUSSIONS WITH ALBERTA ON DEVELOPMENT OF HEAVY OIL—REQUEST FOR REPORT

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. It arises out of the report tabled yesterday and deals particularly with the report on heavy oil. Can the minister bring the House up to date on the status of discussions with the province of Alberta, discussions which are aimed at accelerating the development of heavy oil reserves, particularly in the Lloydminster area? Can the minister say specifically what federal government initiatives are being advanced in order to enhance the economic viability of this very important resource? Also, can the minister say what is being done to develop improved recovery techniques in terms of initiatives by the federal government?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): The broad lines of the discussion concern both the province and the federal government moving back in terms of their revenue take from the development and processing of the tar sands. I cannot say more at this point but so far these discussions have been positive and I hope there will be a result very soon. Perhaps the hon. member would repeat the second part of his question.

Mr. Mazankowski: I should like to know what specific new initiatives the federal government is taking given the fact that a huge amount of capital and expertise will be required from both the public and private sectors. Are any new incentives or initiatives being advanced to increase the participation of the private sector?

Mr. Gillespie: Initiatives are being taken on both sides of the Saskatchewan-Alberta border. A short while ago we were able to reach agreement with Saskatchewan with regard to the use of a substantial amount of funds for the purpose of developing new recovery techniques in the Lloydminster area. I hope that shortly we can announce a joint agreement by the federal government and the Alberta government with regard to the use of research funds—funds which were set aside for the use of the government of Alberta as a result of the 1974 agreement. I believe the main estimates show that there are some $10 million available for research this coming year.

HEAVY OIL—POSSIBILITY OF PARTICIPATION BY PETRO-CAN IN ESTABLISHMENT OF REFINERY

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Inasmuch as Petro-Can has expressed interest in the development of this resource, could the minister tell the House whether his department is actively supporting and promoting the establishment of refining facilities by Petro-Can in that area? When might a definite decision be made in this connection?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): We are actively promoting development in that area. Petro-Can might well wish to be a part of a group of companies interested in such a project. There have already been talks between potential private participants and Petro-Can as well as between that group and the Saskatchewan government. There is a great deal of interest at the present time, all of which I fully support.

FINANCE

POLICY ON BORROWING ABROAD—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, a question for the Minister of Finance. In view of the concern expressed by the Prime Minister about the country living beyond its means and in view of the fact that one way in which a country can live beyond its means is by borrowing abroad, can the minister tell us whether he has indicated any policy in this area to the provinces, the municipalities, or even private corporations? I ask this in the light of the hon. gentleman's answer to my hon. friend yesterday in which he said he really did not have much of an idea as to how much would be borrowed abroad this year.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): As I pointed out yesterday, borrowings abroad in the coming year will be a function, broadly, of the spread in interest rates as between this country and the United States, a difference which is difficult to predict very long in advance. I would make this comment: we have not, as has been the case in the past, sought to restrain the provinces from borrowing on foreign markets. We have not done that in the past year or so. I think the critical point which the Prime Minister would make—it is critical from the standpoint of our balance of payments and borrowings—is that with respect to the competitive position of Canadian industry, and particularly with respect to the decline in the value of the Canadian dollar, making it more competitive, we have to make certain that the inflationary impact not be passed on in such a way as to overcome the advantage we have gained by the drop in value.

Mr. Stanfield: Then I take it the minister is not concerned about the volume of Canadian borrowing abroad?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I have said a number of times that a volume of borrowing comparable to that of 1976 would definitely not be sustainable by the Canadian economy.

Mr. Stevens: That was $8 billion.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): However, I would point out that in the first quarter of 1977, that volume has not been maintained.

HUMAN RIGHTS

SUGGESTED STATEMENT CANADA WILL CO-OPERATE IN DEFENCE OF HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, may I direct my question to the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs? No doubt, he will have heard of President Carter's statement before the United Nations General Assembly yesterday that no nation can complain that the mistreatment of its citizens is solely its own business. The President also referred to the pledges of the signatories to the UN human rights charter to observe and respect human rights. Will the hon. gentleman make it clear to the President and to the leaders of other nations who share his views, that Canada will co-operate fully in the defence of human rights?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs): Yes, Mr. Speaker. There is certainly enthusiasm on our part over the position which the President of the United States took at the United Nations yesterday. We regard the text of the human rights charter as a fundamental one.

Mr. Diefenbaker: And done nothing about it!

Mr. MacEachen: Just recently, at the UN Commission on Human Rights, we attempted to get a resolution debated calling for an independent international inquiry into the systematic killing in Uganda. That was turned down, or put aside, because of the unfortunate double standard in this field which exists throughout the world. We have also undertaken obligations under the Helsinki Final Act under which we have agreed to monitor each other on the performance with respect to the commitment made under that act. So the message of the President is quite in accordance with our policy and will be supported by us in the future as in the past.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

PROPOSAL TO CANCEL ASSISTANCE TO COUNTRIES VIOLATING HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): I thank the minister for his statement, but will he carry it a stage further? Will Canada undertake to co-ordinate with other countries the termination of assistance, whether direct or indirect, through national or international organizations, to countries which have been found consistently to breach basic human rights?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs): That is a very large question indeed. I suppose every one of us could find that the cessation of food aid, for example, to impoverished countries is quite repugnant. Then there is the question of economic assistance; this was discussed recently by the Secretary of State for External Affairs when he posed the crucial question whether the installation of an irrigation system or a cement plant in a developing country helps the unemployed or the poor most, or whether it helps most a regime which might be unresponsive to the case for human rights. This is a very difficult question to answer but I believe the present circumstances of urgency attached to human rights leads us to examine our perception of this question, and that is what the Secretary of State for External Affairs undertook to do.

POST OFFICE

SUGGESTION PROCEEDS FROM INTERNATIONAL SALES OF NEW TWELVE-CENT STAMP BE ALLOCATED TO PROTECTION OF EASTERN COUGAR

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Postmaster General. It concerns the beautiful new 12-cent stamp which depicts the eastern cougar—official name, felis concolor—only 100 of which are known to survive in North America outside Florida. Since the common practice of paying models for posing is not followed by the Post Office, has any consideration been given by the government to allocating the proceeds of the international sales of this stamp to the protection of this animal before it becomes extinct?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Postmaster General): I thank the hon. gentleman for calling the attention of Canadians to the fact that the Post Office has put out a new stamp depicting a member of this endangered species. His question affords me the opportunity of doing a little salesmanship with regard to that stamp. Having said that, Mr. Speaker, may I also thank him for offering me the opportunity of doing a bit of salesmanship with reference to that particular stamp. As well, I should like to indicate to him that I will take his particular suggestion into very serious consideration, and hopefully enough money will be generated from the sale of this stamp to give his suggestion some consequence.

WILDLIFE

POSSIBILITY OF FURTHER RESTRICTIONS ON LICENSING OF PERSONS KEEPING MIGRATORY WATERFOWL

Mr. Bruce Halliday (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment may I direct my question to his parliamentary secretary. Does the parliamentary secretary know whether or not the minister is aware, or is he himself aware, that the Canadian Wildlife Service has decided, or is about to decide, to restrict further the licensing of persons who may keep migratory wild waterfowl in captivity?

Mr. Jim Fleming (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I do not believe there are further restrictions planned in the future, though there have been some recently which might have prompted the hon. member's question. I do not know that under the Act there is a requirement for a licence to be held by someone who is going to have in his or her possession a bird that falls within the regulations under the Migratory Birds Convention Act. I do not know of any immediate plans for further restrictions but I will check and report to the hon. member.

Mr. Halliday: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Given the parliamentary secretary's comments, does he know whether or not the minister will require the Canadian Wildlife Service to consult interested groups such as the Canadian Ornamental Pheasant and Game Bird Association before recommending any changes; and can he assure the House, if there are any changes, that they will be in keeping with, and not more stringent than, policies adopted by other signatories to the migratory birds convention?

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker, as parliamentary secretary I do not, of course, decide policy, but I will certainly take the hon. member's representation to the minister. The only caution I would present, if I may, is that there may be occasions when Canada would be pleased to be a leader in protecting endangered species, and therefore to say that we would never do anything more than another country would not be the traditional policy of the Canadian Wildlife Service, which has an excellent reputation.

PRIVILEGE

MR. GILLIES—STATEMENTS OF MINISTERS MADE OUTSIDE HOUSE

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I want to raise a question of privilege which has been raised many times before and I hope Your Honour will take it most seriously, as I am sure you will. It relates to the fact that yesterday the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) at a press conference put forth a document which in many respects is supplementary to the paper "An Energy Strategy for Canada" which was released two years ago. It was a most important document which was followed by statements, many of which can be challenged, many of which are incorrect, statements which should be questioned in the House. There should be an opportunity for the people of Canada to know what the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources has in mind in terms of energy for this country, but there was no statement made on motions.

With all due respect, Mr. Speaker, I think all of us know that parliament is in grave difficulty in this country. People are concerned about parliament and whether it is relevant to the governing of this nation. The role of parliamentarians is declining. Actions such as this, where parliamentarians are not given the privilege of examining, as they ought to examine, major policy statements of the government, do nothing but very seriously hurt parliament.

I urge, with all respect to Your Honour, that this government should go back to the practice which has been followed over the years, that when important statements are made, they are made in this House on motions so there can be appropriate examination of such statements. The privileges of all members of this parliament and of the people of Canada are really hurt by the procedure that is now being followed by the government, with the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources bringing forward a document which very substantially amends a major policy statement made just a couple of years ago.

Therefore, I wish to propose a motion in the following terms:

That the matter of the government's unwillingness to have statements by ministers on important documents be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections so that this matter can be examined in the context of what it is doing to erode the privileges of members of parliament and the people of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) on the same question of privilege.

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I should like to speak to this motion since I suggest it is based on a number of misconceptions. The hon. member said that this was an important document. I agree with him that it is an important document. But to go on to describe it as a major policy statement is, I think—

Mr. Gillies: It is an amendment to policy.

Mr. Gillespie: —overstating the point completely. It is a factual document. There are two documents dealing with an update of the oil and natural gas resources of Canada and with the oil sands and heavy oil prospects. It does not deal with any policy statement in the sense of recommended courses of action; it is strictly an informational document.

The second point I want to make is that the standing committee on national resources has a reference at the present time before it, "An Energy Strategy for Canada", and it is because the committee has that reference and is dealing with important energy questions that we thought it important to place this matter before the public so that it could be part of the committee's considerations.

I do not see how the hon. member can argue that these two documents, comprising hundreds of pages having to do with a great deal of technical and detailed information, are the sort of thing that one would want to respond to after perhaps half an hour's reading or even an hour's reading in some sort of debate on a statement on motions. Surely, if he wants to re-examine the important information contained in these documents, the best way is for the committee which is charged with the question of an energy strategy for Canada to receive it. I would also point out to the hon. member that I did not in any way meet with the press before I tabled those documents in the House. My officials gave a briefing to press officers, which is a great tradition of this House, but I did not meet with the press. I placed the documents before the House before I met with the press.

It seems to me there is one other point which we should not completely overlook. Yesterday was an opposition day, and I remember that in the past opposition members have been very unhappy at the government making a statement on motions which usurps—to use their term—a large piece of parliamentary time. I would think that it would not have been the sort of move which opposition members would have complimented us on had we taken that course. For all those reasons, Mr.

Speaker, I suggest that the hon. member's question of privilege is based on a misreading of the facts, a misunderstanding of the situation, and I do not think it is relevant to the question before us.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton) on the same question of privilege.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, on the same question of privilege, the statute that governs this matter is the National Energy Board Act. That act makes very clear that the National Energy Board is responsible for advising the government as well as performing a regulatory function. Here we have a report brought in by the minister, through civil servants in his department, which ignores the existing legislation which gives this responsibility to the National Energy Board. I think the question of whether the government is ignoring the National Energy Board Act by bringing in a report, not through the National Energy Board, the agency set up by parliament to do so, but through some section in the minister's own department, is an important matter affecting the privileges of this House.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I do not want to deal directly with the specific instance raised by the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies); I believe that has been dealt with effectively by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie). However, I do want to react positively to the general concern that he has expressed in his statement about the situation in parliament, and particularly about the image which parliament frequently has at the present time of not dealing with relevant events.

The right hon. gentleman from Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) on more than one occasion has outlined the necessity of having a debate, for example, on the subject of external affairs. It would have been useful in recent weeks if it had been possible in the House of Commons to deal with the question of human rights which is attracting the concern of certain people in many countries of the world. There are other issues that can be debated in the House, including energy issues, and questions of national unity, which will become more important as time goes on, and thus the House and its debates would appear much more relevant to us and to the people at large.

There is no question, at the present time, that our debates are becoming not only irrelevant to the people of Canada but irrelevant to the members of the House of Commons. I have observed the situation in the chamber since I came back to this job last fall. As I observed the situation, there is a malaise, a sense of boredom and a sense of drift among members of parliament with respect to the debates that take place in this chamber.

When the hon. member for Don Valley makes the general plea that we ought to do something to make our operations more relevant and more meaningful, I support him very much. His plea was sincere and made from the heart. I hope that before this session is over all hon. members will understand what we are doing to this institution in the way we conduct our business.

An hon. Member: I think it is time for an election.

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I think the remarks of the government House leader and some of the implications of what he said should not remain unanswered. It seems to me that all of us in this House and, I know, members of our party in the tradition of the right hon. gentleman from Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) have very high regard for the institution of parliament. It seems to me that any suggestion that there is a panacea which is available, aside from the organization of affairs on the part of the government with respect to its legislative program, is doing a disservice to this institution—

An hon. Member: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: —and is suggesting that there is a magic wand that may be waved. I simply make the point with respect to this issue that if the House leader of the government is in fact interested in bringing some relevance to the House of Commons, he should listen with sympathy to the suggestion made by my colleague, the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies), and encourage ministers, including the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang), to be present in the House of Commons to make major statements with respect to changes of policy in this chamber, and not before the television cameras.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, I think my colleague in fact has moved a specific and constructive motion to have this whole matter directed to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections. It would be an ideal opportunity for members of that committee, in the spirit of mutual respect that we have for parliament, to look at the over-all question of statements made by ministers, major amendments and the utilization of the rules in this respect. I think the suggestion made by my colleague is eminently sensible, and the government House leader, by his remarks, clearly indicates support of the motion.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The question of privilege raised by the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies) is, of course, not a new one. It was raised recently in connection with statements made outside the House by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) respecting changes in transportation policy. This happens whenever a statement is made or a press conference is held by a minister in respect of matters of that sort.

The intervention of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) gave an indication of the difficulty of attempting to frame any kind of rule which would have an intelligent application to these circumstances. It is evident, in this situation, that there is disagreement as to whether it was a statement changing policy in some way. Therefore, it gives an indication of the difficulty in attempting to change a regulation which might be enforceable in a reasonably consistent way, because who is going to have the responsibility of defining what is or what is not a major policy statement by a minister, what is simply the tabling of the document and what ought or ought not to be accompanied by a statement?

In any case, that only represents some of the difficulties which give rise to the existence of the precedent and the clear practices of the House that the failure, the option of the minister to make a statement either in the House or outside it, may be the subject of comment and is, as was the comment made today, but is not the subject of a question of privilege for those reasons.

I think I ought to add that privilege is a classification of a motion which, if accepted by the Chair, is coming within the classic definition of privilege and takes precedence over other motions that would be before the House in the ordinary course of business. The fact that it does not qualify within the confines of privilege does not mean that it has no importance. There are some standard motions that can be put before the House on the same subject in other ways. The question that the Chair always has to decide when a question of privilege is raised is upon the practices and precedents of the House. Does this question come within the classic definition of privilege so as to surpersede other business? On the precedents and their very clear application at numerous times in the past I have to find that that is not the case at the present time.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I prefaced my question this morning by saying that crude oil reserves in Canada have been declining in recent years. The minister said that if I had read the report which he tabled yesterday I would know that these reserves are the same. I know the minister would not want to mislead the House. I therefore refer to the document which he tabled, and at page 14 it reads:

> Current remaining reserves of conventional crude are down some 17 per cent from the peak year of 1970.

I was not referring to frontier oil of which only half a billion barrels have been found; I was referring to conventional crude oil. It is perfectly apparent from the document the minister tabled that there has been a decline. None of us is happy about it. I do not think the minister would want to leave the impression that there has been no decline in our reserves of conventional crude oil.

Mr. Gillespie: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I am pleased that the hon. member has clarified the preamble to his question, and as a clarification, of course, I accept his position. It was not the way I understood it when he put it to me. The impression he created for me, and I think for some others, was that there had in fact been a change from the previous year with respect to conventional crude oil reserves. That, of course, is not the fact: the document makes that clear.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the government House leader is in a position today to designate an allotted day next week, in view of discussions that have taken place since yesterday.

Mr. MacEachen: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I would like to designate Tuesday of next week as an allotted day.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. An interesting situation took place this morning over a motion moved by my colleague, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre in relation to Bell Telephone. I raise it because of some interesting studies that have been done in Bell Telephone which have come to my attention. The question was raised in relation to the high salaries and the fact that this had relation to the subscribers. In our discussion of a Standing Order 43 motion Your Honour heard a "yes" and "no" vocal declaration. There is a certain amount of anonymity which I presume is protection by no designation. I would question whether Your Honour is in a position to know whether there is a conflict of interest in this regard. It has been brought to my attention that a number of members of the House are closely connected with Bell Telephone Company.

• (1220)

Mr. Woolliams: We are all connected!

Mr. Peters: I am not talking about subscribers of Bell Telephone. They are the ones paying the high salaries of the people concerned. But there are other members of the House who are much more closely connected with Bell Telephone Company.

An hon. Member: Name them.

Mr. Peters: I would be happy to name them. They are much more closely connected because of the control of companies which own Bell Telephone. If they had been the ones to say no, or if the whip of the party had said no, that would be one thing; but if it had been any other member there would have been a conflict of interest. My point is that by using the method whereby no one has to say they are in favour of, or opposed to the motion, they may be involved in a conflict of interest and this would not be readily apparent to Your Honour.

Therefore, I suggest that for the protection of members who do not want to be involved in conflict of interest—because I assume that any member who has an indirect control of Bell Telephone Company has said no—it would be much better if we adopted a procedure whereby those who objected to a motion would have to say no, so there would be no doubt about the matter.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Timiskaming has raised a point which has been raised before and to which the Chair has given attention in the past. It may be a suggestion for changes in the procedures in the House which can be made in a positive way. Clearly, it does not constitute a question of privilege. The question of unanimous consent, in the circumstances, is clearly described in Standing Order 43. If it were the will of the House that refusal under Standing Order 43 was to be carried out in a way similar to the manner in which a recorded vote is carried out or the way in which objections are made to the extension of hours pursuant to the Standing Order, that within the last hour of debate in the day a member may put forward a motion for an extension of the hours unless a certain number of members rise in their place to object to it—if the language were to be used in that way it would, presumably, accomplish the purpose of the hon. member and those who have raised the point before.

However, that is not the wording of the Standing Order. Accordingly, unanimous consent means exactly what it says, that if any one member indicates to the Chair by the traditional method of saying "No" that his or her consent is withheld, then the Chair cannot proceed on the basis of unanimous consent. That consent may be withheld not in relation to the merits of the motion but on procedural grounds. It may be an unwillingness to set aside the business of the day, even an unwillingness to debate a matter or to let a matter go without debate. There can be all kinds of motivations. Whatever it is, the Chair is compelled now to simply determine whether or not unanimous consent exists.

The Chair must not proceed if it is the desire of the House to examine any possibility for doing it in a different way on the basis of the suggestion of the hon. member. That suggestion should be forwarded to the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization. It does not constitute a question of privilege.

Mr. MacKay: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a brief point of order. A few moments ago a memorandum was delivered to me intended for my friend, the government House leader. It is marked "Memorandum" and "Confidential". I wonder whether this is an innovation on behalf of the government, a more reasonable attitude toward freedom of information, or whether it is just an indication of lack of government organization.

Mr. Paproski: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I was surprised by the interjection of the Prime Minister when he recognized Thespius, from "Romeo and Juliet", during my serious and important question. However, in view of the answers the Prime Minister gave me during the question period, I hope he will go and take a jump in "Swan Lake".

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: 1,613, 1,614, 1,615, 1,616, and 1,826.

INDIAN RIGHTS AND TREATY RESEARCH PROGRAM

Question No. 1,613—Mr. Holmes:

For the fiscal year (a) 1972-73 (b) 1973-74 (c) 1974-75 (d) 1975-76, what projects were rejected under the Indian Rights and Treaty Research Programme and, in each case, for what reason?

Mr. B. Keith Penner (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): There were no projects which were rejected by the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development under the four year, $7.5 million Indian Rights and Treaty Research Program. The research program being carried out by the Indian associations was not project oriented, rather, it was geared to enable the Indian associations to set their own research priorities within the limits of available funds and to begin work on the identification and substantiation of Indian rights as well as to commence basic research into the resolution of grievances and/or claims relating to the administration of land and other Indian assets under the Indian Act, and to the fulfilment or interpretation of Indian treaties.

INDIAN RIGHTS AND TREATY RESEARCH PROGRAM

Question No. 1,614—Mr. Holmes:

1. Are the recommendations of the National Indian Brotherhood as set out in their December 1976 evaluation report of the Indian Rights and Treaty Research Programme being followed and, if so, to what extent?

2. What levels of research funding is the government prepared to allocate for each of the 17 major Indian research teams for the fiscal year 1977-78?

Order Paper Questions

3. What levels of research funding has been approved in principle for the next five years, taking into consideration the achievements of the research programme based upon the past funding arrangements?

Mr. B. Keith Penner (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): 1. The 12 recommendations as set out in the National Indian Brotherhood funding program evaluation report are being given serious consideration by the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and will be used in the development of future funding programs. Specifically, the department agrees with the NIB that the resolution of Indian claims will be a lengthy and complex process, and that financial support will be required for a considerable time. In line with the NIB recommendations, the department will be supporting regular Research Directors meetings, and will be involving the NIB in the decisions involving distribution of available program funds.

2 and 3. Decisions on the total level of funding and allocations to provincial Indian associations cannot be made until a program budget has been approved by Treasury Board.

FUNDING OF RESEARCH DEVELOPMENT AND NEGOTIATION OF SPECIFIC CLAIMS

Question No. 1,615—Mr. Holmes:

For the 1976-77 Interim Programme for the funding of research development and negotiation of specific claims, what projects were approved and, in each case (a) what is a brief description (b) what amount of funds was allocated?

Mr. B. Keith Penner (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): In 1976-77 the provincial Indian associations conducted research into specific claims which are defined as claims relating to the administration of land and other Indian assets under the Indian Act and to the fulfilment or interpretation of Indian treaties. (a) From this broad base, the associations researched and developed possible claims as their respective finances and priorities dictated. It would appear that most activity was involved in researching land surrenders. Sample research projects as being conducted by the Indian Association of Alberta, and the Union of New Brunswick Indians are as follows:

Indian Association of Alberta
Research Requests
Project	Band
Land entitlement	Alexis
Land surrender	Saddle Lake
Land entitlement	O'Chiese
Loss of trapping, livelihood claims	Cold Lake
Land entitlement and surrender	Goodfish Lake
Land surrender and entitlement	Horse Lake
Land entitlement	Cree/Chip
Claims Development Requests
Project	Band
Land surrender	Louis Bull
Land surrender and entitlement	Horse Lakes
Union of New Brunswick Indians
Project	Band
Claim for land at Meductic	Woodstock
Claim for land illegally occupied by Miramichi Timber Resources	Eel Ground
Claim for land illegally occupied by squatters at Big Hole Tract	Eel Ground
Land claim	Tobique
Settlement of land flooded by Tobique Dam	Tobique
Provincial roads never compensated for	Burnt Church

INDIAN RIGHTS AND TREATY RESEARCH PROGRAM

Question No. 1,616—Mr. Holmes:

1. For the fiscal year (a) 1972-73 (b) 1973-74 (c) 1974-75 (d) 1975-76, what projects were approved under the Indian Rights and Treaty Research Programme?

2. What is a brief description of each such project and the amount of funds allocated in each case?

3. Did the allocations respond to the needs as expressed by the Indian associations and, if not, for what reason?

4. Which projects have been completed?

5. Which projects have not been completed and, in each case (a) what is their present status (b) for what reason?

6. Does the funding meet the research needs of the bands and associations and, if not, what criteria are used by the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development to determine which research projects will be funded?

Mr. B. Keith Penner (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): 1. See reply to question 1,613 tabled this day. There were no "projects" approved by the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development under the four-year Indian Rights and Treaty Research Program. The Memoranda of Agreements enabled the Indian associations to "conduct research into Indian rights and treaties on behalf of their member bands".

2. See 1 above.

3. The program was approved by the government in 1972 at the level of $7.5 million. Total requests for funding approximated $14 million.

4. The National Indian Brotherhood, in its evaluation report of December, 1976, indicated that approximately 50 per cent of the "Indian Rights" research has now been completed and that claims research and development completion was estimated at between two years in Nova Scotia to in excess of ten years in Ontario.

5. (a) As in 4 above, the research and claims development process will be lengthy and complicated. (b) Because of confidentiality clauses in each research funding agreement, many Indian associations will not disclose details of claims now completed, nor those underway. In most cases the submissions of completed claims have been delayed pending government-NIB agreement on an acceptable claims resolution process.

6. Funding provided by the department under the terms of the Indian Rights and Treaty Research Program was considered adequate at that time to enable the Indian people to commence work on the identification and substantiation of Indian rights and to begin claims research within the limits of the funds available.

TASK FORCE STUDY OF ARSENIC IN YELLOWKNIFE

Question No. 1,826—Mr. Smith (Churchill):

What is the total expected cost of the task force study into the question of arsenic poisoning in Yellowknife to which the Department of National Health and Welfare is contributing $100,000?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): At the present time, it is not possible to state the exact cost of the task force studying the effects of arsenic in Yellowknife. A total of $100,000 has tentatively been set aside for this purpose for the fiscal years 1976-77 and 1977-78. The final cost will depend upon the recommendations of the task force at the end of Phase 1 of the study which will constitute a review of all currently available information.

PENSION ACT

MEASURE TO ESTABLISH REVIEW BOARD

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved that Bill C-11, to amend the Pension Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs.

He said: Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to move that Bill C-11 be read a second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs. This bill is to amend the Pension Act for the purposes of changing the constitution of the Pension Review Board in order to improve its capabilities. The Pension Review Board was created by parliament in 1971 following the recommendation of the Woods committee established by Treasury Board to survey the work and organization of the Canadian Pension Commission. The procedure for appeal was one of the most important aspects of the inquiry. The committee was mindful that on two previous occasions in the 1920s and 1930s experiments with appellate tribunals under the Pension Act had not been successful.

This history of unsatisfactory experiences with former appeal bodies under the Pension Act led one of the members of the committee to write a dissenting recommendation and gave rise to concern by veterans' organizations, members of parliament and others who had knowledge of these matters. However, the committee, by majority decision, felt that another attempt to set up a strong and independent appellate body was essential. It was agreed that another try should be made on the basis of a five-year term office but with provision for a reassessment of the board's ability to cope with any difficulties that might arise.

The board will have been in operation for five years by next March. I am pleased to say it has responded well to expectations and now serves fully the purpose for which it was created. These amendments will give it more flexibility and continuity. The Pension Review Board has five members including the chairman. Under the terms of the Pension Act they are appointed for a term of five years. This bill provides for a ten-year term.

The Pension Review Board is often referred to as the high court of disability pension law. It has two functions. It is responsible for hearing entitlement and quantum appeals arising from decisions of the Canadian Pension Commission. Second, it is responsible for interpretation of the Pension Act. Extensive authority is vested in the Pension Review Board by the Pension Act. Decisions concerning questions of law or fact are final and binding for all purposes of the Pension Act.

A short term of office of five years threatens the efficiency of the board. It takes a full year for a new appointee to acquire the necessary expertise to perform his full share of the work, and the assistance he requires during that time creates additional demands on the chairman and other members. The temporary nature of a five-year term is not conducive to career orientation and independence of mind. It is significant that the term of appointment to similar appeal tribunals is for life and that a ten-year term is the minimum for all administrative boards.

There is presently no provision in the Pension Act for the appointment of a deputy chairman. The chairman is chief executive officer of the board and must preside at all sittings of the board. With the anticipated increases in volume, extra sessions will be required if a backlog of hearings is to be prevented. The appointment of a deputy chairman would permit a more equitable division of the workload and allow the board to conduct more hearings. A review of similar boards reveals that all have a deputy chairman who acts in the absence of the chairman and who has the powers of the chairman when presiding at sittings of the board. It is essential to the efficiency of the Pension Review Board that there be continuity of leadearship provided by the chairman through his deputy.

The appointment of a deputy chairman does not increase the number of permanent members of the Pension Review Board, which remains at five. The bill provides that there shall be a Pension Review Board consisting of a chairman, a deputy chairman and three other members appointed by governor in council to hold office during pleasure for a term of ten years. This bill further provides for the governor in council to appoint ad hoc members if and as required for a term not in excess of one year.

In the last three years the number of appeals to the board has increased at an annual rate of 200. It is anticipated that the number of applications this year will exceed 600. Any further increase will severely tax the ability of the board to cope with the demands. The number of appeals to the Pension Review Board is directly related to the number of entitlement board hearings held by the Canadian Pension Commission. In 1973-74 these hearings increased in number by 60 per cent over the previous year and by 23 per cent in 1974-75. A minimum increase of 20 per cent is anticipated in 1975-76.

The use of temporary members to assist regular members when warranted by special circumstances is not new. The provision is found in the constitution of all similar boards with few, if any, exceptions. The practice has stood the test of time and will fill the need created by any further increases in the volume of applications while creating a buffer to overcome the problems periodically encountered due to illness and vacation of board members. There is one other amendment. It is to the termination of office section. It does not change the meaning or sense of the section. The purpose of the amendment is simply to improve the wording and clarify its meaning.

In conclusion, it was parliament's intention, in setting up this board, to provide veterans and their dependants with an expeditious avenue of appeal, and the Pension Review Board has provided just that. These amendments to its constitution will enable it to continue to do so. They will provide the element of flexibility required to meet changing demands, while still maintaining a level of quality performance.

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, I do not think my party has any quarrel with the bill and, hopefully, with the agreement of the other opposition parties spokesmen we will be able to get the bill to committee and passed quickly. I am sure the minister is aware of the co-operation from all sides of the House on veterans affairs bills. This bill provides for the appointment of a deputy chairman and, as the minister indicated, it increases the tenure of the board from five to ten years and allows for other normal appropriations of public revenue. As I have said, my party has no quarrel with the terms and conditions of the bill. As a matter of fact, we wonder at the delay in providing additional members. This will tend to bring about a more adequate service for veterans, particularly in adjudicating applications for pensions, and appeals.

The minister indicated in his remarks that over the last three years the number of appeals to the board has increased at an annual rate of 200. It is anticipated that the number of applications this year will exceed 600. This certainly indicates that the workload of the Pension Review Board, the Canadian Pension Commission and the Bureau of Pensions Advocates is increasing, and hopefully this bill will clean up the very serious backlog of 3,000 which now exists.

What the minister did not point out is that in addition to the fact that the number of applications will exceed 600 this year, in the "Veterans Canada" report it indicates that of the 1,011 disability decisions 653 were unfavourable and only 128 were favourable. There were 212 which were partly favourable. This indicates to me that the minister should reconsider some of the restrictions in the act which deny many veterans the appeal or satisfactory adjudication that they deserve. I refer to the "benefit of the doubt" clause. Much delay is caused by the fact that evidence has to be sought. In many cases widows are applying for their dead husband's pensions and it is impossible to find evidence. In many cases First World War veterans cannot substantiate that they are now suffering from conditions resulting from First World War wounds. Here, again, there are untold delays, to the embarrassment of everyone, because evidence cannot be found. We should look at the benefit of the doubt clause.

On March 7 I proposed a motion which dealt with 17 different anomalies which should be reviewed. I mentioned that it should be embarrassing that 58 years after the First World War we are still trying to clean up an act which has been in existence for so long. With all the expertise the minister has in his department, we should be at the point where the Pension Act is almost perfect. Last night I was reading a book entitled "Veneration for Valour". One sentence on pensions reads:

In Canada, since the time of the Fenian raids in 1866, the pension has been accepted as the basic reparation for injury or death in war.

It has been over the last 100 years that we have been dealing with pensions. I can only hope that we will get on with this backlog of applications and that every effort will be made to clean it up. As I have said, those applications still number 3,000.

We should consider the relationship between the Pensions Review Board, the Canadian Pension Commission and the Bureau of Pensions Advocates, because they are all related. One way the backlog could be cleaned up would be to follow the advice of a learned, interested veteran who indicates the following:

The Canadian Pension Commission admits there is a serious backlog in handling pension applications. A great part of this backlog is believed to be at the Entitlement Board stage, which requires a hearing in a city near the place of residence of the applicant.

Normally these hearings require three members of the commission. Section 72, subsection (2)(a) of the Pension Act provides, however, that the commission may designate one commissioner as an examiner to go to various localities in Canada to take evidence and hear argument respecting an applicant's case.

This can be done only where the applicant informs the commission that the place or time fixed by the commission for a regular Entitlement Board is not convenient.

It seems obvious that the use of examiners would speed up the Entitlement Board process and it is noted that the Woods committee recommended this procedure, where the commission ran into a serious backlog of cases.

● (1240)

The representation continues:

My understanding is that the Bureau of Pensions Advocates, which represents a large percentage of pension applicants, has not made use of the examiner procedure and I would like to ask the minister whether he would discuss this matter with the chief pensions advocate to determine:

(a) Whether the chief pensions advocate considers that this procedure would provide an equitable means of handling pension claims; and

(b) Why the chief pensions advocate has not encouraged pension applicants whose cases have been delayed to request a hearing before an examiner.

I also raised the question of the Pension Commission which is closely related. The "Veterans Canada" report says that as a result of changes in the act in 1971, anomalies were removed to ensure complete equality of status of male and female members in respect of rights and obligations under the act. I ask the minister and the House, what about the equality of widows about whom I and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) have been harping? I am referring to widows whose husbands were receiving a pension of less than 48 per cent. Mr. Speaker, I suggest that there is not equality in this area. For some reason, those concerned about the status of women do not know these facts.

I appeal to the minister to raise this matter in cabinet, to convince the cabinet that the question involves equality. At present there is lack of equality. The law at present is an anomaly and is discriminatory. We should correct this. We learned yesterday what it would cost to put right some of these matters. Back in 1917 we promised our veterans that they would never have to worry about being repaid for their sacrifices. I suggest that the people of Canada would be willing to accept an expenditure in this regard of between $35 million and $40 million.

We ought to consider that veterans in the category I have mentioned are greatly worried about what will happen to their wives and dependants after they die. That humane consideration alone dictates that there must be no more delays in introducing an amendment to the Pension Act which would include those widows. The recommendation of the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs indicates the pro rata basis on which this can be done.

I now turn to the war compensation legislation, a subject which the hon. member for Edmonton Centre (Mr. Paproski) brought to our attention in commmittee yesterday. We should have insisted including in that legislation veterans of the First World War, who are excluded. We neglected to include them, and for that omission I take some of the blame. I am sure the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre will agree with what I say. When the war compensation legislation was introduced and accepted we should have insisted on the inclusion of First World War veterans. I suppose I can use the excuse that the matter was not included in the terms of reference. We learned yesterday that there are only 200 veterans who would be affected and the cost of including them would be only $200,000 per year. Certainly, the ranks of World War I veterans 83 years old and older will be thinning out. Their numbers are declining each year. The Pension Act was introduced in 1866, I think. I am sure that anything we can do to help out those veterans and apply humane considerations would be most popular and would meet the approval of people all across this country.

As I said previously, we have no quarrel with the bill. If I can be somewhat political, let me point out that in our policy paper of 1974 my party dealt with the question of pensions. Some people say that my party has no policy. I want the minister to know that a Progressive Conservative government would take immediate steps to provide additional administrative and support assistance to the Canadian Pension Commission, the Pension Review Board and the Bureau of Pensions Advocates.

Mr. Paproski: The government took that idea right out of our book.

Mr. Marshall: Let me tell hon. members that our party would immediately introduce widows' pensions for widows whose husbands had received pensions of less than 48 per cent. Hopefully, we shall now be able to increase the Pension Review Board with an additional two ad hoc members and appoint a deputy chairman who will be able to preside over hearings, cut down the backlog of cases and help our veterans. At present, many veterans die without the opportunity to have their pension applications or appeals dealt with. I hope now that they will realize, before they die, that Canada really cares for them and has tried to repay for their sacrifices.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of my party I wish to make it clear that we readily support Bill C-11. As has already been made clear, its purpose is to strengthen the Pension Review Board by increasing the length of the term of the members thereof, and also by creating a deputy chairman so that at least two meetings of the board can take place at the same time. The bill has the further purpose of providing for the appointment of two ad hoc members. This, also, will enable the board to cope with the rising number of cases.

From my point of view, the best proof of the efficacy of this board is the record of the cases with which it has dealt. While I do not have the figures before me, I think that even as late as yesterday the rate of reversals was over 30 per cent. That means that more than 30 per cent of the cases referred to the Pension Review Board are reversed. In other words, the Pension Review Board gives a decision in favour of the veteran, whereas the Canadian Pension Commission, through its various workings, has ruled against the veteran. That is not to be taken as a criticism of the Canadian Pension Commission. It follows the law and tries to give the veteran the best break possible. We were also told in committee that the Canadian Pension Commission takes note of the decisions of the Pension Review Board and tries not to make the same mistakes.

It is also noteworthy that whereas previous attempts to set up an appellant body failed, this one, established following the Woods commission study in 1971, has been so successful that on all sides we are prepared not only to continue it but to strengthen it so that it can do its job.

I pay tribute to the chairman of the Pension Review Board, who was a member of this House when I came here some years ago. I refer to René Jutras. I pay tribute to him, and to all members of the board, for the good work the board has done.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I think the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall) has done a good service today in relating the work of the Pension Review Board to the work of the Canadian Pension Commission and the work of the Bureau of Pensions Advocates. I hope the plea he made will be considered, that the Bureau of Pensions Advocates will explore all ways for helping veterans to get their cases heard successfully. I hope that, as well, further efforts will be made by the Canadian Pension Commission to reduce the backlog of the cases before it.

It seems awfully hard on veterans who are making applications years after the war to find that their cases could take a full year or even longer. I appreciate that the backlog has been reduced a bit and that the delay will not be as great as it was a few years ago. But every veteran is concerned; every veteran feels he has the right to have his case dealt with quickly. I therefore hope that the department and the government will give whatever assistance is needed to the Canadian Pension Commission and the Bureau of Pensions Advocates to allow these cases to proceed as rapidly as possible.

There was an understanding among us that, since this bill does just a few things and we are all in agreement with it, we will not extend the debate. Actually, I hope we can very soon pass the bill on second reading. I think it is in order for members such as the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe and myself to take this opportunity to press again for the consideration of items of unfinished business in veterans affairs which we feel strongly should be given attention.

I am happy to say that the number of items not attended to has been reduced. The job done by the Woods commission, the job done by the Hermann commission, and before that by Dr. Richardson on Hong Kong veterans, the non-partisan way in which the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs works, and the help of the minister—who I feel does a good job trying to fight for veterans inside the cabinet he has to live with—have resulted in many improvements. The picture is better today than it was a number of years ago.

Even so, the points that my friend from Newfoundland just referred to must not be allowed to go on. I underline the case of World War I veterans who were prisoners of war. When we finally got around to compensating prisoners of war, why did the government leave them out? We got the word yesterday, and I repeat it, that there are only about 200 of them still living. It would only cost about $200,000 a year to give them that compensation. That is $200,000 this year; it will decline year by year. In a few years there will be not any of them left. I hope the minister will in this session bring in legislation to extend prisoner of war compensation to those who were POWs in World War I.

At the same time, I urge that the case that escapers and evaders have been making is a valid one and that they, too, ought to be covered as prisoners of war. I hope that this suggestion will receive earnest consideration from the minister. There is no doubt in my mind as to where his heart is in these things. It is those fellows in Treasury Board, Finance, and so on, with whom he has to fight. However, he has demonstrated throughout his life that he is a real fighter, and I hope that he will stay with it.

I also want to underline the matter that we have raised several times lately in questions, motions under Standing Order 43, late shows and in the debate on March 7 on the motion of my hon. friend. That is, what has happened to the rate of the 100 per cent disability pension? We set it in 1972 in relation to the average wage of five groups of federal civil servants. Although the committee which recommended it asked that the relationship hold, the government chose, instead, to fall back on the cost of living index. The result is that the rate for a 100 per cent disability pensioner today is $500 a year behind the composite rate of those groups of public servants that we accepted in 1971 or 1972. I insist that the tripartite committee which recommended that set-up was on the right track and it should have been accepted then. Since it was not accepted then, I call on the minister to do it now.

I am doing my best to abbreviate my remarks. I will end on the same point with which my friend concluded his remarks; that is, the case of the widows of veterans where the veteran's pension was below 48 per cent. I say, again, that we feel very strongly about it. We are not alone. Mr. Justice Mervyn Woods recommended this. Dr. J. D. Hermann recommended it in his report. The Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs voted that way two, three or four times. It is something that has been discussed over the years, pro rata pensions for all widows of disabled veterans.

We now have the support of the modern idea—it ought not to be modern, but it is—the idea of equal rights. Apart from the fact there is the question of women having equal rights with men, women should at least have equal rights with women. The fact that one widow gets a full pension and the next widow gets none at all because the veteran's pension was just on the margin above or below 48 per cent is quite unfair. There is a little more money involved in this than in the case of prisoners of war of World War I, but justice and fair play demand its consideration just as strongly and just as seriously.

I welcome this opportunity to indicate our support of the work of the Pension Review Board, which means that we shall be voting for this bill with pleasure. I also welcome this opportunity to remind the minister of the items of unfinished business to which I have referred. I hope he will act in such a way that in a few months from now we will not have to continue to make these requests on behalf of the veterans of Canada and on behalf of their survivors, but so long as it is necessary he knows that we shall do so.

Mr. Leonard C. Jones (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, we are all concerned about veterans. I commend the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald). It is the typical type of legislation one would expect from a minister who comes from the Maritime provinces. I echo the remarks of previous speakers, including the minister. I have no hesitation in supporting the bill and getting it through this House. I hope this will be some encouragement to the minister and the cabinet to bring forth the other necessary and proper legislation concerning our veterans.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs.

Some hon. Members: One o'clock.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock later this day.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

ADVANCE PAYMENTS FOR CROPS ACT

MEASURE TO FACILITATE MAKING ADVANCE PAYMENTS FOR CROPS

The House resumed, from Wednesday, February 16, consideration of Bill C-2, to facilitate the making of advance payment for crops, as reported (without amendment), from the Standing Committee on Agriculture; and the amendment thereto of Mr. Schellenberger.

Mr. Speaker: Order. When the House last considered the report stage of this bill a point of order was raised to the effect that motion No. 2, in the name of the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Schellenberger) went beyond the scope of the bill and was therefore out of order. Hon. members will recall that after hearing argument on the matter I reserved decision. I have now had an opportunity to consider the matter at some length and examine the provisions of the bill as they relate to the propriety of the motion.

Hon. members are aware that one of the most frequently raised rules and precedents concerning amendments is whether an amendment introduces a new proposition into the legislation and thereby goes beyond the scope of the original bill. The intent of the amendment in this situation is that since the bill provides for the making of advance payments through banks and through producer organizations, then in circumstances where no suitable producer organization is in place the intent of the bill could be carried out by eliminating the role of the producer organization and placing the producer, the government and the bank into the position to give effect to the advance payments arrangement without the intervention of a producer organization.

The question then becomes: is the role in the legislation of the producer organization simply a means whereby the intent of the legislation is carried out, or does it play such a fundamental role that an attempt to proceed without the use of the producer organization would mean the introduction of a new concept into the legislation?

Hon. members might bear in mind, for example, the provision in clause 4 of the bill which begins to set up the scheme. In the very first line we read, "Where an organization proposes to make an advance . . ." Again, in the first line of clause 5 and subsequent clauses the legislation is spelled out in such a way that it seems to me—and I hope hon. members will agree—the producer organization plays far more than an incidental role in the process of making advance payments through the banks on the part of the government.

I cannot resist the conclusion that the role of the producer organization in this legislation is such a fundamental role in the entire process that to attempt to do without the producer organization would be the introduction of an entirely new approach to, and a new concept in, the legislation. Whether or not that be a desirable course to follow, it would remain open to hon. members to put forward legislation which might have that effect or to ask the minister to have the matter considered in some other way. My only concern is whether procedurally this is a valid amendment to this legislation.

Again I say that the role of the organization spelled out in every clause in the bill is so fundamental to the operation of the statute that it is more than simply an incidental aspect of the machinery of the bill, and any attempt to try to produce the same effect without the producer organization would, in my opinion, be the introduction of an entirely new concept. I must, therefore, find that the proposed motion put forward by the hon. member for Wetaskiwin is not in order.

That being the case, the report stage motions would now appear to have been finalized. There were only two; one moved by the government, which was dealt with, and the second the one by the hon. member for Wetaskiwin which has now been set aside. Accordingly the Minister of Agriculture, seconded by the Secretary of State (Mr. Roberts), moves that Bill C-2, an act to facilitate the making of advance payments for crops, be concurred in as amended.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The matter having been considered to this extent at report stage on this day, the House is not in a position to carry on with third reading of the bill without its consent. The question would be for third reading and passage of the bill, if the House is agreed. Is there unanimous agreement that the House now proceed to third reading?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, there is not unanimous agreement; we will hold over third reading.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Four o'clock.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have no indication of business to follow the projected item of business, but I do know there is an item for consideration under private members' hour which would follow at four o'clock. An early adjournment of the House, obviously, would prejudice the carrying on with the four o'clock business this afternoon. Is it agreed that I adjourn the proceedings until four o'clock this afternoon?

Mr. MacFarlane: Mr. Speaker, I understood that there was agreement to proceed.

Mr. Speaker: The only question that now remains is, is the business for private members' hour ready to go ahead now? In which case I will call it four o'clock.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: It being four o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' PUBLIC BILLS

[English]

Mr. Speaker: For the sake of expediency, there are a certain number of orders which would stand in priority to the one that I understand it is agreed will be proceeded with. These are order Nos. 12, 15, 16, 18, 19, 20 and 22. Is the House agreed that we will stand those orders in order to proceed with the order standing in the name of the hon. member for Moncton (Mr. Jones)?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: May it also be understood that in seeing the clock at four o'clock now, the House will adjourn at 3.15 p.m. until 2 p.m. on Monday?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

SENATE AND HOUSE OF COMMONS ACT

INDEPENDENT MEMBERS OF THE HOUSE OF COMMONS

Mr. Leonard C. Jones (Moncton) moved that Bill C-233, to amend the Senate and House of Commons Act (independent members of the House of Commons), be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Management and Members' Services.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of Bill C-223 is to give greater heights of democracy to the House of Commons. It is presented to ensure that an independent member of parliament will have the opportunity to be on two standing committees. It is not my intention that any member of parliament will lose any special status because of this bill; this bill merely asks that the same rule apply to all.

Upon election to the House of Commons by an overwhelming majority in 1974, I was confident that some of the inconsistencies in the rules would end. The Canada Elections Act permits Canadians to seek office under the auspices of a recognized political party or as an independent. Upon further reading about this democratic country of Canada, one would gather that to run under the auspices of a political party as a member of parliament one would have to be duly elected at a nominating convention in his or her riding, as I was. But as history now records, this was proven to be purely theoretical and myth in my case. However, that incident in 1974 was caused by a certain party's disorganization and lack of unity and I certainly cannot blame the government side for that.

Upon election to the House of Commons by an overwhelming majority, as I said, I was confident that these inconsistencies would end. This was, indeed, a wrong assumption. The law with regard to an Independent's membership on House and joint committees states, to quote the guidelines of Standing Order 65(1), which virtually ignores political parties:

> At the commencement of the first session of each parliament, a striking committee, consisting of seven members, shall be appointed, whose duty it shall be to prepare and report, within the first ten sitting days after its appointment, lists of members to compose the following standing committees of the House:—

A list of committees follows, but no mention is made of party representation on them. However, when I endeavoured to seek membership of standing committees I was advised that they were only for party members. I think the House will agree that the practice followed to appoint committees is certainly inconsistent with the basic principles and traditions of this parliament, but many of the occurrences in this House of Commons have proven that traditions are rarely upheld.

Despite these facts, precedent shows that independent members have been selected for committees in this House. The constituency of Charlevoix-Saguenay was represented between 1942 and 1949 by Mr. F. Dorion who, as an Independent, appears in Hansard as a member of the House committee on banking and commerce in the twentieth parliament. Mr. P. E. Gagnon, independent member for Chicoutimi, was a member of the joint committee on printing. The constituency of Comox-Alberni returned Independents as members between the years 1921 and 1953. Mr. L. Gibson, who represented the area from 1945 to 1953, sat on the House committee on marine and fisheries and on the House committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines during the twenty-first parliament.

It appears quite obvious that in fact membership on committees has little or nothing to do with party affiliation, precedent or procedure. It is apparently entirely dependent on whether one's views and policies are acceptable to those in authority. I must say that generally speaking I have endeavoured to do my best to obtain a good rapport and cordial relationship with each and every member here—with a few exceptions, of course—keeping in mind the best interests of my constituents and the nation generally. You have reciprocated with the same high level of co-operation, again with a few exceptions. An Independent does, though, have a few freedoms that a party member does not enjoy. There is no question about that. Therefore an Independent does have more time to spend on business for individual constituents. This is not just my humble opinion. Let me quote from a book written by an Independent in the British House of Commons in the year 1963. That member speaks of the benefits of being an Independent when he says:

> A party career, an entirely legitimate and praiseworthy aspiration, involves assiduous and prior attention to party matters. I do not say that it is impossible for an M.P. to have a party career and at the same time be an excellent constituency member. It can be done with the aid of extreme self-sacrifice; and it is done occasionally. But it is not easy. If a constituency develops special problems, it is even less easy.
> Not only does a party member have a conflict between the claims on his time, but also, when special circumstances arise, he has often an inescapable conflict of loyalties also.

I was elected by the people, as was every other member in this House, and all that I ask in this bill is that I, and future Independent members, have the same freedoms and the same rights that party members enjoy. We sit in this House and pass laws on human rights and the like. This is all well and good. But do you not think that we should begin by cleaning up the act in our own backyard right in the House of Commons, by allowing all members of this House to have the same privileges? I have often been accused, one way or another, by members of this House of being a bigot. May I take this opportunity to say that by not supporting this bill and referring it to committee for the preservation of an individual's rights and the country's democracy, there is certainly more than one bigot in this House.

I could understand the refuting of this bill if it were only for my benefit, but I believe that the growing sense of division within the parties is proof of the fact that there will be many more members running as Independents in the next election. There are many in this House who, in all probability and possibility, could be in that position. They should be cautioned, though. By voting for this bill they may not be protecting their own future rights. They should consider that fact.

Years of service to a political party really mean nothing. My rewards for unremitting and conscientious service to the party system are well known. They can be briefly summarized as a good hard kick in the pants. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I would ask each and every member of this House to consider the implementation of this bill very carefully, and for once not to be guided in their decisions by their party whips but by their own consciences and the thought of their own futures.

There is an obvious injustice inherent in the present practice of the selection of committee members which must be regulated before history shows too many years of such malpractices in an era of a supposed state of absolute democracy in our country. It is time this system of selection was regulated fairly.

Mr. Cliff McIsaac (Battleford-Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, I rise to make a few brief comments in response to the remarks of the hon. member for Moncton (Mr. Jones) and the bill before us today.

Personally I have not had an opportunity to become that well acquainted with my hon. friend from Moncton. I want to present some different points of view. I appreciate the necessity of the viewpoint that he has put before us here today. I appreciate the point of view that he was making with respect to the rights and privileges of Independent members and a number of the precedents he cited, here and elsewhere. I want to oppose his view and the argument that he made here this afternoon because he made one remark, as I listened, to which I take exception, or that concerns me. I think he said words to the effect that there may well be, in a future parliament or parliaments, a great many more Independent members, and that we should ensure in some manner that the rights of Independent members are broadened. That may well be a good opinion, and he may well be correct in that, but I think that would be a direction that we do not want to see being taken in this parliament and in this country. The majority of us certainly do not sit here as independently elected members. We are elected by and in association with one of the four major parties.

Look at elections in India, the great variety of parties there, and at whether the opposition parties can indeed unite or remain united. Look at the situation in Israel and the fact that there has not been any basic change in government there. There are about 11 or 12 different parties that will be running in the upcoming election in Israel. They are having difficulty coming up with an opposition coalition that will stand up to the government coalition in that country.

We can also look to France, Italy, and a variety of countries. Denmark is another case of which hon. members will be aware. There was an election there not too long ago and some change in representation as a result of that. However, great coalitions of parties are not going to stand up that well. This brings us to the question of the party system and the difficulties for that system in a country like Canada, where we are looking at Quebec with its particular aspirations, and at making Confederation more meaningful.

Certainly in my part of the country we are looking for a more meaningful relationship in terms of confederation. A great deal of talk is heard about western alienation. I think that term is a little too strong. I think disenchantment might be a better and a more descriptive word to apply to the feelings of western Canada with respect to Ottawa and the federal government. The kind of feeling that we have in Quebec and have been dealing with, as a nation, for some time, is certainly not now confined to Quebec.

We, as parliamentarians and as members of the different parties in the country, should be looking to our own party structures, the party structure itself, and seeing if further changes could not and should not be made in the party system to allow for the kind of flexibility that will perhaps give us the same situation as in the United States where the two majors parties cover a broad range of ideology within each of them. We have that to a lesser extent here in Canada. Perhaps we should have that to a greater extent than we do. I would say to my hon. friend from Moncton that that is an angle and an aspect that perhaps he has not thought about when he seeks to ensure or bring about expanded rights for Independent members.

I have no quarrel with my hon. friend for seeking to be a member of one or two standing committees. He did say, I believe, that standing committees do not really relate to parties. That is not the case, it is not the fact because indeed they do. The representation on various committees is worked out by the party whips and it follows along party lines. While it is true that much of the debate that goes on in a number of committees does not follow party lines, the committees follow the same rules as the House, so in essence I disagree with the hon. member on that statement.

As an independent member he is free to attend committee meetings, to make his contributions, and to participate in the discussions in any of the standing committees. Having said that, I realize that that does not give the hon. member, or any other independent member, the right to vote in the committees, but it certainly does not prevent him from particpating in the committees and asking any questions he wishes to put in his field of interest.

I oppose the bill before us because I believe we should be looking for ways of broadening the party system in the country rather than trying to accommodate a wide variety of independent members and turning this Chamber into a kind of city council, which this parliament is not designed to be.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I listened very carefully to the hon. member for Moncton (Mr. Jones) and I also listened very carefully to the hon. member for Battleford-Kindersley (Mr. McIsaac) who represents that area where I was born. I support some of the arguments that he has advanced.

I want to say to the hon. member for Moncton, with whom I have always had good relations since he came to the House as an independent member, that I am sympathetic to the suggestions he advances in the bill, but if we were to carry the bill through to its ultimate conclusion on a mathematical formula, and we all came here as independent members, then all 262 of us would have the right each to sit on two committees. I ask where that would lead us? I doubt whether the hon. member for Moncton has really considered that. He looks on himself as the sole independent member in the House or as the only member who might be here as an Independent in the future, but I should like to remind him that although our parliamentary system might appear to be a poor system—

Mr. Francis: May I put a question to the hon. member?

Mr. Woolliams: I will answer the hon. member's question when I have concluded my remarks. I left my glasses in my office and I cannot read my scratchy notes. In fact even if I had my glasses I could not read my handwriting. If the hon. member does not mind, I will answer his question later.

As I was saying before I was interrupted, our parliamentary system, as I see it, is based on a party system. I do not think this place could function otherwise. This may not be a good system but, as Winston Churchill said, although it may appear to be the worst of systems, there is no better system because from this Chamber flows all freedom. I suggest that if we carried the hon. member's suggestion to its ultimate conclusion, we would find ourselves in the same position as some of our friends in Europe. For example, in France in the days before de Gaulle there were so many parties that one government after another was defeated in quick succession, which eventually brought about the de Gaulle government. That is why it would be wrong for any member of parliament, who represents his constituency and his province as well as his country, to suggest that we should put a limit on the number of parties, but on the other hand if we had ten or 15 parties represented in this House, it would function even more slowly than it does now.

Now I would like to say a few words about the party structure. It has always amazed me—and I say this in a kindly way—that if a member of the House, or several of them, differ from their party, the media report this as if it were a terrible sin. I say that if we all talked alike, there would be no thinking. In any party structure there must be some differences. The reason there are differences within a party is that we are not all representatives of the same region. Problems in the Maritimes differ from those in Quebec, in the prairies, or on the Pacific coast. The Conservative party is a national party, so are the Liberals, so is the NDP to a lesser extent, and so has the Social Credit party been at times, and members of those parties represent various regions.

I have always been interested in one fact since first coming to the House, and that is that a Liberal member from the prairie provinces often has more in common, in the problems he is trying to solve, with a member from the prairie area in another party than I would have, for instance, with a colleague in my own party from another part of the country. I say it is only natural to be part of the environment from which one comes, and to speak for one's region. Our environment has shaped and trimmed our thinking. Just because one happens to have a different point of view from a colleague in one's party does not mean that there is no unity in the party on a broad scale, whether it is this party, the Liberal party or the NDP.

Too much is made in the press at times of people differing on some issues with their fellow party members. The media report this immediately as a split in the party. If you are all a bunch of trained seals, you are not thinking at all. I am happy when I see someone on the other side vote against his party, and I have never objected to members doing that in my own party. That is their privilege and their right. That is what Eisenhower said about the Republican party. He was talking about a difference of opinion he was having with his party on broad principles.

I would say that on broad principles members of the Liberal party are in agreement, and the same would be true of our party, of the NDP and of the Social Credit party, but we may disagree sometimes among ourselves on less important issues. Sometimes a person feels deeply and sincerely about a subject, and if he disagrees with the position of his party on this subject he might abstain in a vote rather than become an embarrassment to his party and cause the media to report about a division in that party. If that gets across the country they say to you, "You are fighting among yourselves." I have never held it against anyone who has differed in his opinions from me. In my profession, if that were true we would always be in a fight.

Although I have some sympathy with the viewpoint of the hon. member for Moncton, I cannot accept his position because I think it would encourage, as the hon. member for Battleford-Kindersley pointed out, more people to come to the House as Independents. It might be good for their publicity, but I even question if it would be good for their constituency. I myself have gone through eight elections and I know that some people vote for the candidate and other people vote for the party.

My friend, the hon. member for Moncton, said that being a member of parliament has little or nothing to do with political parties. I suggest he is interpreting this institution as if it were a city council or a town council, as the hon. member for Battleford-Kindersley said. If that were the method we followed, this place could not function.

This is my suggestion to the hon. member for Moncton. If he feels he is being discriminated against, he should take this matter up with the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization, or when an election comes up this spring, if that is when it is to come. It is within the prerogative of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) to dissolve this House and to go to the country. He might wait until we increase the membership in this place to 283 when the new boundaries are in effect. That is a decision which the Prime Minister alone must make, or with the help of his advisers, whether they be cabinet advisers, parliamentary advisers or other advisers. However, if the hon. member for Moncton has a year or 18 months left, he should probably take his problem to the committee.

The hon. member is a reasonable man. He realizes that if every member of this House had the right to be on two committees we would be in difficulty. The hon. member never sat in this House as part of a government party like I did when my party had 208 members. With 208 members the whip always has a headache because everybody wants to be on certain committees. For example, our party had many members from western Canadian farm constituencies when we formed the government, and there was room for only 50 or 60 on the Agriculture Committee. Many were denied the right to sit on that committee even though they belonged to a major national party with a large following. With the greatest of respect to the hon. member I say that I do not think his bill would work. I do not think it would be practical.

I see my good friend, the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. Francis), wants to get to his feet. He is one of those semi-independents, and I am not being critical of him. He is sort of an independent yet not quite independent. I have seen people like that in this House. They are in and out of their parties like yo-yo's. I do not think hon. members should operate that way; however, I think they should be allowed to differ with their parties.

I have sympathy for any hon. member who is a member of the government party but not a member of the cabinet. These hon. members may not agree with a bill the government brings in, just as I disagreed with some bills which were brought in when my party formed the government. These matters have to be fought out in caucus. It is not easy if you are aggressive, ambitious, intelligent and independent, but if an hon. member possesses those qualities the best place to argue these matters out is in caucus. The press does not know about disagreements like that, and therefore our constituents do not know. Our constituents may write asking where we were, even though we might have put on quite a fight against our leaders or against certain cabinet ministers. I have gone through all that. I know what it is like and I see hon. members opposite nodding their heads.

Hon. members on the government side who are not cabinet ministers are referred to as backbenchers. I have never really felt that that term had any merit. I think we are all basically equal. Some people get the laying on of hands. The laying on of hands may create a bishop, but it does not always make one. However, this is the system under which we work.

I want to leave with the House one final thought. I am proud to be a Conservative. I do not know how other parties operate, but I would not want this party not to have a broad philosophical approach. People say that our party has in it people to the left and people to the right. I do not know what a rightwinger or a leftwinger is. If it means that I am a little more liberal with a small "l" on certain issues than some of my friends, I may be in the middle of the road. If I am a little more conservative with a small "c" on some issues, I may be just right of the middle of the road. If that is what it means, I suppose we do have people in our party who are to the right or to the left, but I am happy that this party does have people in it who have different philosophies. That means we can take a broad approach to the problems of this country because we have different personalities, philosophies, and backgrounds. That is what puts a party together. Without that, parties will not last very long as parties, and they will not do very much for their country.

I see my good friend, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), here beside me this afternoon. On many occasions when the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas) was the leader of his party and premier of Saskatchewan, my father supported his party.

An hon. Member: Oh!

[Mr. Woolliams.]

Mr. Woolliams: Somebody said "Oh". I will tell the House why my father did that. There were many things my father stood for which the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands also stood for. However, above all we had the Gardiner machine, and people became tired of it and wanted to throw it out. Many Conservatives voted for the hon. member. His party tried to nationalize a few things, and I certainly disagreed with that, but as an administrator, on the whole the hon. member was pretty good. He was a very fine premier because he was a man of integrity. I wish he was in the House this afternoon. People could disagree with him, but he never held that against them. The art of leadership and statesmanship is having that ability, and it is necessary whether we are premiers, leaders, cabinet ministers, or members of parliament.

The hon. member for Moncton is a distinguished member, and he has made a contribution to the House. No one can help but admire him for taking the stand he took. Some of us may not agree with him, but he took a stand, and that is his right. Mr. Woodsworth once said he had two sons. I hope I am telling this story correctly. One son was a conscientious objector during the war, and the other one was overseas in the RAF. Mr. Woodsworth said that they were both brave men, but sometimes it takes greater integrity and bravery to stand up against society or your own party for what you think is right. In this way I congratulate the hon. member for Moncton for taking the position he took. I did not agree with his position, but that does not mean I do not respect him. He stood up against great odds, against many people, and against his own party. That is why I would like to see him accommodated in some way, and I think this could be worked out in the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization.

I am glad the hon. member brought this matter before the House. Private members' bills allow hon. members to present grievances and have them aired in the House of Commons. I congratulate the hon. member for this.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Before I recognize the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. Francis) I must allow the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier) to speak because he seconded the motion.

[Translation]

Mr. C. A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I would simply like to explain why I seconded the motion. I am told that I am probably also an Independent but I sincerely supported this bill because I thought it was against the rules of the House. I know that if we concern ourselves strictly with the process involved, the bill now before the House is completely useless. But if we go further and if we consider the precedents of previous years, our judgment can be different because we have seen before Independent members sitting on committees. I do not know if, in those cases, there was an agreement with any party, but at any rate Independent members were allowed to sit on committees.

This year we have only one Independent member and several of his predecessors had this privilege, since I consider it a privilege for an Independent member to sit on a committee.

English-speaking members are very attached to this tradition, and I believe that it is truly a tradition to let independent members take part in the discussions of the standing committees of the House.

Earlier I listened to the hon. member who has just sat down—I do not remember the area which he comes from, but it is the Progressive Conservative member who has just sat down—

An hon. Member: For Calgary North.

Mr. Gauthier (Roberval): —for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) congratulate the hon. member for Moncton (Mr. Jones) and tell of all the good things that he was doing in the House and say that he was doing a good job. But I think that if he had congratulated him further, to conclude as he has done by saying that he likes his work in the House, it would have seemed that he did not want to work with him on standing committees. This is a very polite way of telling him: We like you well enough on the floor of the House, but we cannot stand you on committees. Like I said earlier, this is simply tolerated, but it has been tolerated in past years.

The Liberal spokesman said that it was necessary to have been elected within a party to be entitled to sit on standing committees. This is certainly stated in the Standing Orders, but I wonder if we could not at least accept to make an exception in the case of joint committees of the House and the Senate because indeed we have non-elected members on those joint committees. We have senators who are non-elected members of a party and who sit on committees. I think we could also accept an independent member on those committees because that would do away with the current requirement that he be an elected party member. To my knowledge, no senator is elected. They are all appointed by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and they sit on the committees.

I found today that the introduction of such a bill was logical. Therefore I thought it is impossible after what has happened in the past years for the House to reject the request of the member for Moncton (Mr. Jones). At least, if his request is rejected, he should be allowed to sit on joint committees. There is no reason why he should not be accepted because he is more than a senator since he was elected by the people while senators are not; they are appointed for political reasons, period.

I feel the hon. member for Moncton (Mr. Jones) is entitled to have his say not only in the House but also in committees because he is responsible. He was elected as all of us were in this House. He must face up to his responsibilities but if he is not given the opportunity of doing so, what will he do in his riding? He will be unable to assume his full role as a member.

It may be that the old parties are afraid of there being too many Independents in the House. I wonder why? I know that basically one wants to keep the majority. Each party, the Liberals, the Progressive Conservatives, are entitled to so many members on each committee in order to ensure the party in power a majority. If there were two, three or four Independents, they could control nothing because they do not belong to a party. But if one wants to control, let one say so; and let no one come and tell us that this is a democratic government: the government is dictated to at the party level. What is decided by the party must be voted here in the House, at any price. Let us be frank and say that what they want is simply to maintain dictatorship over all other parties. It is for that reason alone that they deny today to the hon. member for Moncton the right to sit on one or two standing committees of the House. That is the only reason. That is why I regret today that all those who gave their opinion until now have failed to mention this. I would welcome others to stand up and talk on behalf of the hon. member for Moncton, so that this bill might be passed by the House.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am glad the hon. member for Moncton (Mr. Jones) has had the chance to bring his bill before the House today and to have the situation of an independent member discussed. I sympathize with him and I know the problem he faces, but I must say at the outset that if his bill were to come to a vote I could not support it.

Let me put it this way. I still believe that the party system is good for an institution such as parliament. I feel that if we had 264 Independents and tried to run the business of the country as an amorphous gang, we would not get along very well. We have to associate ourselves with parties so that like-minded people can work together. After all, that is the party system. However, without launching into a lecture let me say this: if a constituency decides that it wants not a member of a party but an independent member to represent it in the House of Commons, that independent member should have rights equal to those of all other members. Some of those rights flow naturally from membership in the House. The member gets a desk and seat in the House of Commons, office accommodation, pay, travel allowance, and all the rest of it. In that sense he is an equal, even though he does not belong to any of the other groups in the House of Commons.

The point the hon. member raised, to the effect that he should have a place on committees, deserves consideration, and I hope that will come about as a result of his bill being discussed this afternoon. The hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) has already demonstrated the arithmetic, showing why we would be in difficulty if we began appointing, one member to two committee positions. By doing that we should run out of committee positions before we could get around to all members, so to speak. There are just not enough committee positions to give all members two committee memberships.

Something else bothers me, Mr. Speaker. I do not think we should write the rules under which we operate into a statute. A few of our rules are governed by statute. There is the quorum in the British North America Act, and the rights and prerogatives of the Speaker, which are also in that act. But it is generally accepted that we make our own rules, as a House of Commons. This extends also to committees. No rule says how many members each party shall have on a committee. There is no rule which divides such memberships. Standing Order 65 simply states the maximum number of members there shall be on each committee. We arrive at the number from each party by the process of bargaining; we do this at the start of every parliament.

As my hon. friend said, the tendency of the government when it is in a majority is to insist on a majority in committees, no matter what that may do the proportions from each party. I know that a party of our size sometimes gets a little more than its percentage of members on some committees, and sometimes a little less; but these matters are worked out by bargaining, and I think it should stay that way. Unfortunately because of the position of the hon. member for Moncton, that hon. member has not been at the bargaining table and has not had any chance to make representation. I hope that as a result of these discussions something along this line can be done.

I can say that in some parliaments when we have had more member spots, more memberships on committees than we now have—now we have only one on each committee and that is all—we have given up membership spots to a Social Creditor or an Independent. I make that point because, when we have only one spot on a committee, we can hardly give it up. If the hon. member asks for some spots to be given up, obviously that can best be done by the Liberals or Conservatives who have more positions.

I think what I have suggested should be done. There should be bargaining across the board, bargaining which should include the hon. member, so that he can get his rights.

Let me summarize. I do not think it is proper to write detailed rules into a statute. I would not like to see the Senate and House of Commons Act amended in the way my hon. friend proposes. I think that our rules should continue to stay in our hands and that there should be flexibility in the matter of committee memberships. However, I think the hon. member for Moncton does have a right to have his case considered.

● (1500)

Mr. Lloyd Francis (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I too am very pleased that this issue has been raised in the House by the hon. member for Moncton (Mr. Jones). The bill that he presents before us is not one that I can support in this form. However, I certainly hope something will come out of this debate and these discussions that will cure what is obviously an injustice.

The whole question of representation of independent members in this House is one that is very proper for this House to review.

The hon. member for Moncton has told me privately once or twice the problems that he feels he faces, first with regard to the financing of election campaigns where the law very clearly discriminates against him. There is no means by which he can currently fund for the next campaign using the tax deductability provisions of the statute. The only way he can do this is at the time the election writ is issued.

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

The other aspect about which he has complained, and I think with some justification, regarding discrimination, is membership on committees of this House. Other members who have preceded me in this debate have pointed out that there is no impediment whatsoever to any member of parliament attending any committee and making his or her views known. The issue of who has the right to vote in a committee is what is involved in the debate which we face.

I would first like to deal with what I consider to be a bit of a red herring in this debate, the question of the numbers. There are 264 members of this House. There are 32 members in the present cabinet, 26 parliamentary secretaries, and three or four persons associated with the office of Your Honour. The numbers of those who would be theoretically available would be in the order of 200. Multiplying 200 by two would make 400 committee posts. Members opposite, including the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), said there simply are not that many committee positions. I wonder if they have examined the committees.

There are 26 committees listed in Wednesday's Hansard of this week. An average of 15 members per committee would require 390 posts, which is just about right. There is nothing wrong with the arithmetic. Those who say there is a mechanical problem have not done their arithmetic. The problem is much more than that. It is well known that not all members of this House are interested in participating in committees. I for one welcome those who do. I find committee work among the more satisfying aspects of the parliamentary experience.

It is quite possible to deal with this issue in the committee structure. I think two committees per member is a good working rule. At times I have been a member of as many as four committees. You do not do much else other than attend the four committees, try to follow the procedure and work of those committees, and work conscientiously on them.

Defence and External Affairs are popular committees. There is a certain glamour attached to them. However, with a committee such as Public Accounts the whips have to work hard to make sure there is a quorum. That committee makes a careful, continuous examination of the report of the Auditor General. The members who participate in such a committee have to do quite a bit of preparation in order to be effective. Continuity is called for there.

Let's face it, the member of parliament who is trying to do a conscientious job in the Public Accounts Committee is not often interviewed on television. If there is a hint of a scandal or irregularity, there are certain members of the committee who show up. They have their own way of making their presence felt, doing those things that often help the member of parliament to be re-elected.

My concern about this bill is the same concern that was expressed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. I am concerned about a statute. The bill reads:

Section 4 of the Senate and House of Commons Act is amended by adding the following thereto:

(2) Members of the House of Commons who are not members of a recognized party shall be entitled to be a member of two Standing Committees of the House.

The first quarrel I have is why not members of a recognized party? It seems that the objective of a parliament itself should be official neutrality as to whether one is a member of a party or not. We are elected by those who mark their X's on election day to do a job on behalf of the people who elect us and the nation. Why not members of a recognized party? Why not say that any member of the House of Commons should have the right to be a member of two committees? If you happen to be in the disfavour of your whip, why should that be an impediment to membership on a committee? The whip of my party is here. He is giving me a little sly look at the moment. We get along perfectly. He will have an opportunity on April 13 to say something about me in another situation.

The principle of treatment of all members on the basis of equality in terms of participation in committees should be a basic principle of this House. It should be the way in which amendments to rules or statutes should be approached. Those who have said the way to do this is not by statute are correct. The way to do this is in the standing orders of the House of Commons, if necessary. It is to be done by a referral to the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization. An educational process should take place with the members of this place as well as those outside, including the press, the famous fourth estate that does so much to judge all of us. There are not many of them up there at the moment, but now and again we see them at this hour of the afternoon. They have a job to point out the injustices that exist.

The hon. member for Moncton has a valid point that the procedures of the House do not permit him to participate in the committee system on the basis that he would chose to participate. The whole question of the way in which parliamentary government is conducted is really what is at stake here. Why does the hon. member for Calgary North talk about people on this side who show some independence? He called them yo-yo's. He said they are in and out. On another occasion I heard him call them trained seals because they always vote with the party. Could he make up his mind? If he is determined to call people on the other side of the House names, whether they vote for or against the party, that raises a certain credibility gap with respect to the hon. member.

I believe there is a place in parliamentary institutions for those who have independent use of conscience and are prepared to take the consequences in terms of their own careers or as to what their expectations of achievement in this place may be. Surely there will always be some independent people, minds, and spirits, those of conviction, who will win their place by winning at the polls, earning their seats and their place, who will come into this House and find that it is a difficult road that they must follow.

I have watched the hon. member for Moncton in this House. I know what it was like for me to learn the rules when I came here. I had the assistance of a party organization, the whip's office, the assistance of a course which was organized for new members of parliament and presented by the Clerk of this place. He told us how to go about doing the things we want to do, how to use the facilities that are here. He told us about the customs and the practice—and this is a much more complicated and sophisticated area than meets the eye. I may say it is not always easy to catch your eye on occasions, Mr. Speaker, even when we feel we have something bursting within us to be said, something of the utmost importance to the nation.

I hope there will always be independent members and that the rules will be amended so that independent members, along with all members on both sides of the House, receive equality of opportunity and treatment.

Mr. Gus MacFarlane (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to speak on this bill put forward by the hon. member for Moncton (Mr. Jones). I know the hon. member is most anxious to serve his constituents in committee, and I have always had the highest regard for the work he does within his constituency because I know those people quite well.

I know there has been some concern about my surprise at the turn of events today. I imagine I must have been confused by what appeared in Hansard at page 4069. The acting House leader of the Conservative Party asked the government House leader about what the business would be for today. The answer was that we would go on to deal with the report stage and third reading of the bill mentioned. Since no objection was indicated at that time I guess I was fooled into thinking that was what would happen.

However, there was agreement to move on to private members' business. We have done so, and we are considering the bill which the hon. member brought forward. I also realize, on reading that page in Hansard, that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) had inquired about other legislation and, of course, there were indications that people would be out of town and that they would possibly want an opportunity to speak on various bills, so we would not be able to go on with business of that nature today.

The hon. member for Moncton should realize that as far as the whip is concerned it is not a matter of telling people how to think, but there is a responsibility to maintain a quorum. Sometimes people go into a committee and make their speeches and then leave. Attendance drops, and once a committee is without a quorum it is not possible to pass the legislation on which the speeches have been made. Independent members serving on committees might not feel the responsibility felt by the opposition or the government toward a particular piece of legislation. That is one of the reasons for which I would be concerned about independent members sitting on committees. But I do want to say that the hon. member for Moncton is certainly welcome to attend any of our committee meetings. Our chairmen will always recognize him for his comments; it is just that he does not have that official voting right.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please.

Business of the House

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Ellis: Might I direct a question to the hon. member, the senior member over there, I presume, to find out what the business will be for Monday?

Mr. MacFarlane: I think the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Hnatyshyn) asked that question yesterday, as well as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). The answer is recorded at page 4069 of Hansard.

An hon. Member: But have you changed your mind?

Mr. MacFarlane: We never change our minds, but you have done so today.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hour provided for the consideration of private members business having expired, this House stands adjourned until Monday at 2 p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 2(1).

At 3.15 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

STATISTICS CANADA

SUGGESTED INVESTIGATION OF ALLEGATION JOB VACANCY FIGURES MISLEADING—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. The Minister of Manpower and Immigration having stated in the House on Friday last that figures released by Statistics Canada regarding job vacancies are misleading, and having stated further, outside the House shortly thereafter, that such figures are useless and ought to be looked at with a jaundiced eye, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Perth-Wilmot (Mr. Jarvis):

That this House direct the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce to investigate the serious charges made by the Minister of Manpower and Immigration and thereafter report to the House on motions.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion under Standing Order 43 can be made only with unanimous consent. Is there such consent?

Some hon. Members: No!

CANADA PENSION PLAN

REQUEST FOR MEASURES TO PROVIDE FOR PENSION EQUALITY BETWEEN MEN AND WOMEN—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, because all members of this House are said to believe in equal rights as between men and women and because the subject matter of this motion is urgent, I ask leave to present it under Standing Order 43. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas):

That this House urges the government to bring in appropriate amendments to the Canada Pension Plan for the purpose of providing pension rights for homemaker spouses equivalent to the rights of those employed outside the home, and also to review all of its employee pension plans to the end that in all cases the pension of a surviving widow will be the same as that of a surviving widower, it being the view of this House that there should be pension equality as between men and women.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion requires unanimous consent under the terms of Standing Order 43. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No!

FINANCE

ACTIVATION OF MORTGAGE EXCHANGE CORPORATION BY PRIVATE SECTOR—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the government is reluctant to activate the proposed Federal Mortgage Exchange Corporation despite the assurances of the former minister of state for urban affairs that such a program would be operative by April 1, 1976, and in view of the fact that enabling legislation permitting such a mortgage exchange vehicle has been standing idle, now, for more than three years, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski):

That this House instruct the government to invite tenders from the private sector with a view to allowing the private sector to capitalize and activate the mortgage exchange corporation in the earnest hope that this would provide lower mortgage interest rates and more liquid funds for the housing industry in Canada.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be presented only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: No!

SOCIAL SERVICES

REQUEST FOR FUNDS FOR CHILD DAY CARE CENTRES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. R. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I, also, seek leave to move a motion under the terms of Standing Order 43. In view of the lack of federal funds to maintain and expand day care centres for children of all ages, which seriously limits the opportunities of women with children, who want to work or who are forced to work out of economic necessity, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin):

That this House instruct the government to provide adequate funding for child day care centres.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be presented only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

ALLEGATION UNITED STATES PAID CANADIAN TO PRACTISE GERM WARFARE AGAINST CUBAN AGRICULTURE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the terms of Standing Order 43. In the light of a story, just released, to the effect that a Canadian technician said he was paid $5,000 by American Intelligence in 1962 to use germ warfare against turkeys in Cuba, I should like to move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That the government be asked to investigate reports that U.S. Intelligence has paid a Canadian agricultural technician to practise germ warfare against Cuban agriculture.

Mr. Speaker: Such a presentation can be made only with unanimous consent. Is there such consent?

Some hon. Members: No!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): That will get you the turkey vote.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

MEASURES TO COMBAT UNEMPLOYMENT AMONG WOMEN WHO ARE HEADS OF FAMILIES

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister or for the minister responsible for the status of women, or anyone who is acting for either—perhaps it is the hon. member for St. Boniface, the minister responsible for Lord knows what. My question relates to the fact that unemployment statistics released last week indicate there is a particular crisis facing Canadian women who are out of work and looking for work. It relates also to statistics indicating that 9 per cent of families in Canada are one parent families and that 78 per cent of those are headed by women. In light of this serious crisis for Canadian women and for the families that many of them have, can the Acting Prime Minister tell the House whether the budget at the end of the month, or any other legislative initiative this year, is going to bring to this House of Commons specific programs to encourage jobs for women who are heads of families?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance will be presenting his budget next week and it is not possible for me to forecast what the contents of that budget will be.

PUBLIC SERVICE

REASON FOR SMALL NUMBER OF WOMEN IN EXECUTIVE POSITIONS—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): We understand forecasting to the government is associated with Communist ideology or some other foreign intrusion.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Perhaps even the weather.

Mr. Clark: Or perhaps the weather. I should like to ask the Acting Prime Minister about a matter that may be within his competence. Since the number of women employed at the executive level of the Canadian public service increased, from 1974 to 1975—the latest statistics which are available—by a total of three while the number of men in the Canadian public service at that level increased by a total of 94, can the Acting Prime Minister explain to the House of Commons why the increase in the number of women in senior executive posts in the Canadian public service has been so trivial?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will have to take this question as notice; it is not a field in which I have particular competence, as does the hon. member.

Mr. Clark: A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Neither the Acting Prime Minister nor his colleagues have any competence or any interest in this question, and that is what concerns us here. Since the latest statistics of which the Acting Prime Minister should be aware indicate that 70 per cent of the women in the Canadian public service now earn less than $10,000 while 70 per cent of the men in the Canadian public service now earn more than $10,000 a year, indicating that Canadian women in the public service are being frozen into the lower income categories, will the Acting Prime Minister now give us a commitment that the government of Canada will initiate immediately a review of the fundamental handicaps to women's career advancement in the public service of Canada?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has drawn the attention of the House to a matter of considerable importance. Obviously, I intend to ask the minister who is responsible for this particular aspect of government policy to look into it and to ensure that the facts which the hon. member has brought out are considered.

MANPOWER

MEASURES TO PROVIDE EQUAL EMPLOYMENT OPPORTUNITIES FOR WOMEN

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): We will try another minister, Mr. Speaker. May I direct a question supplementary to that of my leader to the minister of manpower. As more women worked both from economic necessity and also in order to pursue their goals yet their unemployment rate has been steadily increasing, as a matter of fact from 8.4 per cent in February last year to 9.8 per cent this year, what special measures can the minister announce to ensure that women in the labour force, or those who are not even able to be part of this dismal statistic, can have equal employment opportunities?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his expression of concern. It is too bad that he is just now catching up to the government and that it takes a demonstration on the Hill to get this question finally into the House.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): We have been asking you about this for years.

Mr. Alexander: Don't throw out red herrings.

Mr. Cullen: In point of fact, speaking of my own department, to which the question was directed, the government has initiated the LIP program for example, and 41 per cent of the jobs created by the LIP program went to women, which is about 4 per cent above their percentage of the labour force, and I think that was a good move. Our Canada manpower industrial training program makes provision for numbers in that category to be trained. Under our Canada Works Program I assume the percentages will be equivalent, hopefully the same or even higher than they are under LIP. Under the Canada manpower programs—perhaps we should call them person power programs—we are trying to do our best.

PROGRAMS TO END DISCRIMINATION BETWEEN MEN AND WOMEN IN EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, the demonstrations may have awakened the opposition to raising some serious questions; unfortunately they did not a waken the government or lead to giving serious answers. Given that unemployment consistently runs higher for women than for men, last month's figures being 9.8 per cent for women and 8.7 per cent for men, does the Minister of Manpower and Immigration say that the two aspects of his own department's program to which he just alluded constitute the government's total program to end discrimination between men and women in employment?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): No, Mr. Speaker. I was talking about my own department; I did not even spell out the affirmative action program, which is part and parcel of the initiatives my department has taken in this area. There is a responsibility resting on both levels of government and private enterprise to provide amenities like day care centres, in order that women can leave the home and enter the work force. Women must overcome certain handicaps and difficulties before entering the work force. Perhaps the initiative should be taken by some of the larger companies, and perhaps by the federal government. We shall need to examine this area and determine to what extent the taxpayer should bear the cost, or to what extent private enterprise should bear it if we are to remove that particularly significant barrier which stands in the way of women who want to enter the work force.

SUGGESTED ADOPTION OF AFFIRMATIVE ACTION PROGRAMS FOR WOMEN—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Perhaps the government could take some initiatives on its own in this regard. It should not have to wait for the private sector to do it. Given the example of the government of Manitoba and certain governments in the United States, which have introduced affirmative action programs within government agencies, will the minister undertake to make a commitment to the House that the government will undertake an affirmative action program designed to upgrade the skills of women, and to qualify them for executive positions, now, inasmuch as fewer women than men now fill such positions on a proportionate basis?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I will undertake to give careful consideration to the hon. member's representations.

EFFECT OF CONTROLS ON EARNING'S GAP BETWEEN MEN AND WOMEN—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, may I direct my final supplementary question to the Minister of Finance. Since one of the negative results of the controls program has been that it has widened the dollar earnings gap between men and women in the labour force, can the Minister of Finance tell the House what the government plans to do in order to redress this evil while the controls program remains in effect; or, how does it plan to close this widening gap after controls end?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the controls program right from its commencement contained specific exceptions to permit greater increases for women.

Mr. Broadbent: In how many cases were they applied?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Of course, the initiative in this regard rests with the collective bargaining representatives of the women in question. The delegation which was here at the weekend was invited to meet with Ms. Menzies, the vice-chairman of the Anti-Inflation Board, for the purpose of making clear to them the exceptions which are available, and also that the trade union movement itself must desire strongly to improve the position of the women for whom they bargain. They have to take the initiative in this respect.

HOUSING

JOINT PROGRAM FOR LOW PRICED HOUSES IN QUEBEC—POSSIBLE REDUCTION OF INTEREST RATES

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Prime Minister.

Is he acquainted—as he should be—with the joint program for the construction of low priced houses, especially in Quebec, with funds from the federal government? If so, can he explain to the House why the federal government is levying a 10 per cent compound interest rate from Quebec for those loans refunded on a 50-year basis? Is he also in a position to consider our proposal to review that interest rate so as to reduce the taxation level in Quebec while encouraging the construction of low cost housing?

● (1420)

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of the details of that particular matter concerning housing, but I have exchanged correspondence with the colleague of the hon. member on the general problem of interest rates. The special case mentioned by the member would come under the jurisdiction of the minister responsible for housing whom I will ask to take it in consideration.

ENERGY

SALE OF CANDU REACTOR TO JAPAN—POSSIBILITY MARUBENI ACTING AS AGENT

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of the press announcement from our Tokyo embassy late on Friday that Canada is on the verge of selling a CANDU nuclear reactor to Japan, can the minister inform the House whether AECL has retained an agent for the sale of a CANDU reactor in Japan and if in fact that agent is the Marubeni Corporation, which was the agent used in Japan by the Lockheed Corporation?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, there were press reports about the pending or possible sale by AECL to a Japanese utility. I think it is too early to say that that sale is about to be consummated. I can say that there has been a feasibility study, and the results of that study have been positive. As to whether or not the Marubeni Corporation is the agent for AECL, I am not in a position to say at this time. I think the hon. member will remember that Mr. Campbell indicated to the committee that there was a renegotiation taking place between AECL and Marubeni, but I will be pleased to give him an update on that.

Mr. Lawrence: Would the minister inform the House, as soon as he finds out, if the matter is being renegotiated, and in the meantime can he confirm to the House that under the original terms of that contract it was the Marubeni Corporation which was to receive an even higher agency fee than that paid to Mr. Eisenberg and the UDI group in relation to the South Korean deal?

Mr. Gillespie: I have confirmed on a number of occasions that the Marubeni Corporation was the designated agent by AECL. I have also made it very clear—and I repeat it—that that particular contract is, to the best of my knowledge, still under renegotiation.

SALE OF CANDU REACTOR TO JAPAN—TERMS OF RENEGOTIATED AGENT'S CONTRACT WITH MARUBENI

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Inasmuch as Mr. Campbell, the chairman of AECL, made it clear to the committee that he was renegotiating the contract, and given the fact that, when the contract with the agent in Israel was renegotiated on the Korea deal, that part of the renegotiation that took place was to guarantee to the agent that if another reactor were sold to Korea it would be handled by the same agent, can the minister tell us what was given by Canada to the agent in the renegotiation operation? In other words, were any arrangements made with the agent in Japan as to whether he could have the exclusive right to sell reactors in the Far East?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): I indicated in my answer to the first question that I would find out the status of the renegotiation. I will be pleased to do so, and will provide the information.

HEALTH

REQUEST FOR IMPROVED PROGRAMS TO COMBAT OCCUPATIONAL HEALTH HAZARDS TO WOMEN

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare who is also responsible for the status of women, but in his absence, I direct it to the Prime Minister. In a report prepared last October by the Advisory Council of the Status of Women, entitled, "Occupational Health Hazards to Women" it was statistically documented that occupational health research concentrates on males and on industries in which males predominate, even though two-fifths of the total work force is female. Is the Prime Minister aware of this study and, if so, what steps is the government taking at the federal level to redress this imbalance in research and to develop programs designed to combat health hazards specifically related to jobs held by women?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am afraid I cannot help the hon. member on this. I regret that the minister responsible for the status of women is not present in the House today. If he had had notice, I am sure he would have attempted to be here because we have taken a great deal of action on the recommendations of the advisory council and in other areas, and we have made considerable progress. For instance, of the order in council appointments since the beginning of the year, almost one in three were women. This is a percentage which is much higher than percentages in preceding years. There are many other areas in which we have acted, but I cannot give the hon. member an answer in this particular case.

Miss MacDonald: Mr. Speaker, I did not realize that the minister had to have notice to come into the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Miss MacDonald: My supplementary question refers to an unpublished federal study of 1976 entitled "Occupational Health in Canada" in which only one short section dealt with women and occupational health hazards. Since research into occupational health concentrates on such industries as mining, lumbering, pulp and paper and chemicals while neglecting many areas of manufacturing which normally employ large numbers of women, I wonder if the Prime Minister can say if his government is undertaking any initiatives with the provincial governments in order to re-orient research of health hazards to reflect the reality of women in the work force.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to take notice of the question. The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands must understand that ministers sometimes have duties which occupy them across the country, and they cannot be in the House every day. However, assuming that the hon. member really wants to get this information, I will take her question as notice, and I am sure the minister will be happy to answer when he is in the House.

CP AIR

REDUCTION IN OPERATIONS—POSSIBILITY OF ABSORPTION BY AIR CANADA—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Ron Huntington (Capilano): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. Given the fact that Canadian Pacific Airlines has had to lay off some 200 employees, which seriously affects the community of greater Vancouver, can the minister assure us that it is not the intention of the government to peel the orange from Canadian Pacific Airlines and render it to a condition where its only future is absorption by Air Canada, which would be a national disaster?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, most certainly the government has no intention of taking any action to interfere with that or other private airlines. Indeed, our action has consistently been to try to improve the atmosphere in which the airlines function, and I wish the hon. member would appreciate that fact.

Mr. Huntington: Mr. Speaker, can the minister advise why profitable CPA flights are bracketed by Air Canada, thereby causing both airlines to lose money on what could be profitable flights?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is now raising a question of the extent of competition which exists and the nature of that competition in the ordinary case. It was not because of the nature of one or other of the organizations that there is this competition, but because as a matter of practice over time it has been allowed to develop.

AIR TRANSPORT

REASON CHICAGO ROUTE GIVEN TO BRITISH AIRWAYS RATHER THAN CP AIR

Mr. Ron Huntington (Capilano): With reference to the bilateral agreement can the minister please advise why the Chicago-Canada route was given to British Airways, a foreign airline, instead of to Canadian Pacific Airlines, a Canadian corporation?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): If the hon. member wants detailed information of that sort, which goes back to long before I was minister, he should give me notice. I will take his question as notice and look into the matter.

PROPOSED MORTGAGE EXCHANGE CORPORATION—DATE OF IMPLEMENTATION—POSSIBILITY OF OPERATION BY PRIVATE SECTOR

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. Tomorrow it will be one year since the Minister of Finance told the House that activation of the proposed federal Mortgage Exchange Corporation had been delayed pending consultation with experts in the secondary mortgage market. Would the minister now indicate what has been the result of this round of talks? Are they still going on, and does the government still intend to proceed with this mortgage exchange vehicle?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, as a result of the consultations to which the hon.

member referred we arrived at the conclusion that the companies now operating in the private sector are making an adequate secondary market for mortgages in Canada, and for this reason we concluded that we would not proceed with that particular corporation. We decided that for the time being and in the light of restraint on government expenditures we will not be going ahead. Certainly, there is no provision for that in the budgetary estimates for the coming fiscal year.

Mr. Stevens: Many engaged in mortgage activity in the private sector do not agree that this corporation is not a desirable adjunct to facilitating mortgage exchange work. Will the minister indicate if any consideration has been given to allowing the private sector to capitalize the Mortgage Exchange Corporation and activate it in order to assure a more liquid second mortgage market in Canada and, hopefully, lower mortgage interest rates?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, that has not been given consideration. Before taking that action, I would want to consider whether powers that were sought for a publicly owned corporation would be appropriate for one operated by a private group.

WHEAT—NATURE OF AGREEMENT SOUGHT WITH UNITED STATES

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board. Will the minister clarify the government's objective or position with regard to the minister's recent meetings with the United States Secretary of Agriculture? Is it the intention of the department or the government to start working toward a new international wheat agreement which would encompass Canada, the United States, presumably Australia and possibly Argentina?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, it has always been our policy and our hope to develop an atmosphere in which an effective grains arrangement could be produced between importers and exporters of the world. The more recent discussions between Secretary of Agriculture Bergland and myself have been an exploration of our willingness to work jointly toward the necessary techniques or mechanisms to ensure that an agreement would be workable. The hon. member will remember that a previous international agreement did not work when it came under strain of heavy supplies and downward pressures on prices. Canada favours the idea of an international agreement which protects our producers against undue competition and when supplies are really needed, reserves are available. We do want working agreements. We do not want to get ourselves in the position we were in under the old agreement.

Mr. Murta: Did the discussions the minister had with the Secretary of Agriculture involve maximum and minimum prices in so far as the new agreement is concerned? The second part of my question is whether the Secretary of Agriculture will be in Ottawa on April 4 and 5. If so, will the minister indicate what the talks will be about? Will part of them be about the matter of an international agreement in so far as pricing of wheat is concerned?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, in our discussions in Washington, we did not discuss specific details of such things as minimum and maximum provisions. We were beginning the discussion on such questions as techniques or mechanisms which would be required to make sure the minimum was effective, if one existed. We knew we would want to have discussions at the official level as well as further discussions among ourselves before we reached any conclusions in this regard. I understand that Secretary Bergland has been invited by the Minister of Agriculture to come here to discuss a good number of things in the agricultural field. On such a visit I would expect also to meet with him. We may well pursue this subject further at that time.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

ROLE OF PROPOSED NEW FIGHTER PLANES—DIVISION OF EXPENDITURE BETWEEN OUTSIDE AND INSIDE CANADA

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Defence. He apparently announced a proposal to spend $2 billion to purchase new fighter planes. Against what sort of threat are these planes supposed to defend us? Is it not chiefly against a massive attack on North America by manned bombers and is this not entirely unrealistic in the age of missiles and immense nuclear retaliatory power?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the authority to seek bids on new fighter aircraft are for the various tasks our Canadian armed forces have to play with the first priority on defence of North American security, but also our role in NATO and elsewhere.

Mr. Brewin: If this $2 billion is in fact spent, added to the $1 billion for the long-range patrol aircraft, how much will be spent inside and how much outside Canada? What would this vast expenditure of capital outside of Canada do to our exchange rates, rates of inflation and unemployment in Canada?

Mr. Danson: Mr. Speaker, we are looking for the best and longest range of industrial benefit for Canada in this purchase. I am not certain at this time what percentage that might be. I have been asked what we are seeking. I would like to start off which industrial benefits of about 150 per cent of the contract. We are looking for the best proposals that will come forward for the best aircraft for the purposes for which they are being purchased.

SUPPLY AND SERVICES

ALLEGED REJECTION OF TENDER BY MR. BURTON OF IRMA, ALBERTA

Mr. Arnold Malone (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Supply and Services. To what extent does the Department of Supply and Services accept requests for tender by telephone and to what degree does the department imply that a tendered bid has been accepted and then some weeks later, after expenses have been encountered, host a meeting to reject the tender as in the case of Mr. R. E. Burton of Irma, Alberta.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That kind of detailed information should possibly be sought in another way. The hon. member may want to amplify his question now.

Mr. Malone: Mr. Speaker, I gave the minister notice by letter. Perhaps with that notice he can respond to it.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, I find it difficult to answer such a general question. Moreover, the hon. member provided me with the details of a specific problem, so I immediately asked my officials to make a report and I hope to have it by tomorrow to give the hon. member an answer.

GRAIN

WHEAT—POSSIBILITY OF INCREASE IN DOMESTIC PRICE

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board. Statistics Canada reported a large drop in farm income from $1.7 billion to $1.2 billion as compared with a year ago. A large portion of this is income received by grain farmers where a drop in total income of between 40 and 50 per cent was reported. Can the minister indicate whether it is his intention to take whatever steps are necessary to increase the price paid for wheat for domestic consumption?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the question of a review of that price is contained in the legislation. Currently, we are having discussions with the Canadian Federation of Agriculture and some other farm organizations in relation to appropriate procedures to be used in examining that issue. It is a fact that the drop in grain income is from levels which were indeed very high. At this time we are still seeing the income effects of a price for wheat which was close to $4 for the top grade, and really very high prices for barley, which were still really the impact of last year's $4.50 price for durum. The fact that these are drops from previous levels does not remove the fact that they were still quite attractive levels. The problems of further drops in farm income raises the problem in a very real way.

MEASURES TO IMPROVE FARM INCOME—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Since the minister responsible for the wheat board does not feel there is a serious problem in so far as the grain producers are concerned, I will direct my supplementary to the Prime Minister. Last Thursday the Minister of Agriculture suggested that many farmers are taking vacations and that their bank accounts are bulging. Everyone knows that an increase in the farm economy results in a boom in the total Canadian economy as farmers are great spenders. This also helps to relieve some of the unemployment problem. Can the Prime Minister indicate here and now whether he intends to have his government move in the direction of improving the farm economy so that the general unemployment picture will improve?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member's question will find its answer in the remarks just made a moment ago by the Minister of Transport responsible for grains, and the fact that we have introduced in this House the grain stabilization plan which has indeed been of great benefit to the farmers.

PENITENTIARIES

PROPOSED MAXIMUM SECURITY INSTITUTION AT SELKIRK—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Dean Whiteway (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Solicitor General. It has to do with the new maximum security penitentiary planned for Manitoba. I understand that both the minister's department and the province of Manitoba favour the town of Selkirk as the site. Can the minister assure the House that pending the outcome of the internal discussions by the townspeople of Selkirk, either by referendum, plebiscite or other means, if the decision of the people of Selkirk is that they do not want this maximum security penitentiary it will not be placed in the town of Selkirk?

● (1440)

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): I should like to advise the hon. member that no firm decision has been taken as to the location of the penitentiary to which he refers. A number of sites are presently being considered and one of them is that of Selkirk, which, I understand, is favoured by the provincial government. However, it is the policy of the department not to go to areas where the people do not wish a penitentiary to be established and where that will is expressed very clearly.

Oral Questions

THE ROYAL FAMILY

INVITATIONS TO HER MAJESTY AND PRINCE CHARLES TO VISIT NEWFOUNDLAND—REASON FOR FAILURE OF GOVERNMENT TO APPROVE

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. The government of Newfoundland, through the government of Canada, invited Her Majesty the Queen to visit Newfoundland during the jubilee year of her succession to the Throne but apparently the government of Canada did not recommend to her that she visit Newfoundland. Would the right hon. gentlemen tell the House the reason for taking that position, particularly in view of the fact that Her Majesty visited Nova Scotia, Ontario and New Brunswick last year in connection with the Olympics?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I dealt with this matter in the House last week. Perhaps the hon. member will check Hansard and find the answer to his question.

Mr. Crosbie: The government of Newfoundland also invited His Royal Highness, the Prince of Wales, Prince Charles, to visit Newfoundland during the Canada Summer Games in 1977. That invitation also was not approved by the government of Canada. Can the right hon. gentleman tell us the reason for that decision? Is there something against royalty visiting the province of Newfoundland?

Mr. Trudeau: It is my understanding that the Prince of Wales will be visiting the western provinces in the current year. I will check the details. But I would be very surprised if he would not have as much pleasure going to Newfoundland. I suppose he does not have time to do both.

RESOURCES

PLANS FOR OPENING NEW COAL MINES IN NOVA SCOTIA AND NEW BRUNSWICK

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, my question is intended for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Can he advise us whether any joint federal provincial initiatives are currently being undertaken to encourage new coal mining ventures in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia? I ask this because of the very high unemployment rate in these provinces and the need for alternative sources of energy to which attention has been directed so often by the hon. member for Cape Breton-The Sydneys.

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I believe the program we announced for Nova Scotia, the arrangements for home insulation and oil substitution, would fit into that category. Provision is made there for the conversion of oil fired generating plants to coal-firing, presumably using Nova Scotia coal.

[Mr. Fox.]

Mr. MacKay: Perhaps I did not make myself clear. I wanted to ask the minister whether there are any definite programs being undertaken to encourage the opening of new coal mines in that region.

Mr. Gillespie: There is a possibility of another strip mining coal property being developed in Nova Scotia and I am talking to the premier about it. It was his hope that this project might qualify under the program announced some time ago and I think there is a good chance it may. It is possible, though, that some environmental questions will have to be settled first.

ENERGY

ASSISTANCE TO NEWFOUNDLAND IN DEVELOPMENT OF LOWER CHURCHILL HYDROELECTRIC PROJECT—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): A supplementary question. Is the minister prepared to reconsider upward the offer made to Newfoundland in connection with the development of the Lower Churchill in the light of the inflation which has taken place since the offer was originally made? Is the minister now prepared to tell the House whether the government has taken any decision with regard to the exercise of the powers it possesses under the BNA Act with respect to the building of transmission lines so as to enable Churchill Falls or Labrador power to get into the Ontario grid?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): I stated in the House a short while ago that I had been in touch with the premier of Newfoundland and that I had raised the question of his interest in pursuing the Gull Island site—not just the transmission aspect but the generating facility itself. He responded in a positive way and our officials are at the present time updating the engineering and cost data with a view to working out an arrangement whereby this very considerable resource might be made available for the benefit of the people of Newfoundland, the Maritime provinces and, indeed, Canada generally.

Mr. McGrath: Given the serious unemployment situation in the province, coupled with the urgent need for energy, is the minister, on behalf of the government, prepared to expedite consideration of this matter, and will he look upon it as constituting a make-work project of considerable importance in the immediate future?

Mr. Gillespie: I cannot go any faster than I am right now. I am waiting for the premier.

POSSIBILITY OF FEDERAL PARTICIPATION IN MARITIME ENERGY CORPORATION

Mr. J. Robert Howie (York-Sunbury): A further supplementary to the minister of energy. Has the federal government reached a decision whether or not to take an equity position in the Maritime Energy Corporation?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): That decision has not been taken but as the hon. member will realize this is an option which, for the first time, we are prepared to consider with the Maritime Energy Corporation. Indeed, it is an option we are also prepared to consider with the premier of Newfoundland in connection with the development of Gull Island.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

PROPOSED CHANGE IN LAW RELATING TO MATRIMONIAL CAUSES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Justice. Has the minister given any consideration to the introduction of legislation with regard to divorce reform as proposed by the Law Reform Commission, with particular emphasis on the question of marriage breakdown, and has there been any consultation with provincial governments with respect to bringing divorce, alimony and maintenance under one common head, as has been proposed?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): There has been a good deal of discussion on the subject going as far back as the meeting of the provincial attorneys general in Vancouver last June. There have been consultations and discussions about various aspects of law reform relating to divorce and family law. What developed from those discussions was that we should immediately endeavour to make progress in the establishment across the country of experimental projects such as unified family courts and that action should be taken with respect to changing the law relating to the division of matrimonial property. I am happy to report that in line with the remarks in the Speech from the Throne last fall, very considerable progress is being made in both those areas with the provincial governments. In a third area, we are having consultations on the latter part of the report of the Law Reform Commission relating to the dissolution of marriage. I am not, at this point, in a position to indicate what, if any, legislation might be introduced.

Mr. Baldwin: In order to try to accelerate the slow progress which, if I read correctly between the lines of what the minister has said, is being made, I would like to ask whether the hon. gentleman is prepared to seek the advice of the representatives of the people by introducing a green paper for consideration by a committee of this House with suitable statistics gathered as to what has been happening under the existing act. Such a committee of this House might then be able to lend its services to the government.

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, that is a worth while suggestion and one which is already being considered. However, with regard to the first part of the hon. member's question I would point out that very real progress is being made in the areas in which the attorneys general and I agree. There is an agreement with the province of Ontario as to the establishment of a unified family court as of July 1. There is an agreement in principle with the government of Newfoundland. There is one to be established in Manitoba, but that was postponed for legitimate budgetary reasons. Discussions have taken place with the province of Saskatchewan, which indicated support for the scheme in its speech from the throne two weeks ago. There has been discussion with the province of British Columbia about modification of their unified family court and an active evaluation scheme is now under way there. I think, therefore, that in those areas upon which agreement has been reached, very substantial progress has been made.

ATOMIC ENERGY OF CANADA LIMITED

RENEGOTIATION OF AGENCY CONTRACT WITH MARUBENI—REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE OF PROPER DOCUMENTATION AND AUDITING

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources arising from his reply to the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham to the effect that Atomic Energy of Canada Limited is renegotiating its agreement with the Marubeni Company, which is its designated agent in Japan? In view of the fact that the Marubeni Company has already indulged in some questionable business practices in connection with the sale of planes by the Lockheed company to Japan, and in view of the fact that the Auditor General before the public accounts committee on February 8 of this year said that any agreement with agents which did not provide the necessary documentation and follow the proper auditing practices would meet the same criticism as the agreement which AECL entered into with Shaul Eisenberg, can the minister assure the House that in any agreement negotiated, renegotiated or otherwise with the Marubeni Company there will be provision to ensure that the proper documentation and the auditing practices commonly followed by the Auditor General will be included?

● (1450)

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I think I can give those assurances. Indeed, I can go further than that and say that the government adopted a set of guidelines for its Crown corporations and, of course, AECL will be required to follow those new guidelines.

SUGGESTION AGENT NOT BE USED IN SALE OF REACTOR TO JAPAN

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The history to date does not give me much confidence in that statement. In view of the fact that Westinghouse and other companies which are engaged in selling nuclear reactors have decided that there is no longer any need for the use of the services of agents, is the government giving consideration to suggesting to AECL that we dispense with the use of an agent in the matter of negotiating an agreement with Japan, particularly in view of the fact that we have competent trade and commerce attachés in the embassy in Japan, as we have in many other countries throughout the world?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I will draw that particular representation to the attention of the officers of AECL, but I would want to make this point. I think hon. members should realize the importance of the trading company in the commercial life of Japan. Indeed, it is the strength of the trading corporation on the importing side which gives it strength as an exporter. For that reason I think that if you are going to do business in Japan your chances are a lot better if you appoint an agent from one of the trading corporations.

POST OFFICE

PURPOSE OF INCREASE IN RATES—MEASURES TO RESTORE EFFICIENCY OF OPERATION

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Postmaster General. Now that Canadians are protesting yet another increase in postal rates, can the Postmaster General advise the House whether these regular increases are designed to decrease the post office deficit or to maintain the subsidy for an essential service?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I would disagree with the hon. member's premise. I have received some protests, but generally the protests have not been what I would have expected.

An hon. Member: Just wait a while.

Mr. Blais: I also wish to indicate to the hon. member that preliminary indications are that there is no loss of volume as a result of the increases. Indeed, the price of stamps today corresponds to the price in 1955 when we were dealing with an increase in the CPI.

Mr. Dinsdale: A supplementary question. Perhaps the protests are still in the mails. In view of the rapidly increasing costs and the continuing deficits and declining service which has been the pattern for the post office in recent years, will the Postmaster General inform the House of the steps he has taken since taking over responsibility to restore Canada's post office to its former high efficiency? In particular, what recommendations has he implemented from the Hays consultant report?

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to make a statement on motions at this time in reply to the hon. gentleman's question. I am pleased to note that his leader has finally received through the mail the invitation he launched for his leaders to attend in the hon. member's constituency, to make a welcome address, I am sure.

Mr. Clark: He had to deliver it personally, J.-J.

[Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands).]

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

JUSTIFICATION OF PROSECUTIONS—SUGGESTED CHANGE IN LAW

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister in charge of the Wheat Board. In view of the action of the Canadian Wheat Board in prosecuting many farmers, agents and grain handling companies, giving in effect criminal records to worthy, reputable and productive citizens, does the minister consider the workings of the Wheat Board Act as presently constituted reasonable and justifiable?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I do not think I would want to comment on matters which are before the courts. We had a good discussion on the question of law enforcement issues involved in connection with the Wheat Board. Of course, there have to be enforcement procedures for regulations, but I would not join the hon. member in referring to them as criminal records.

Mr. Ritchie: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Will the minister consider any other means whereby transgressions of the regulations by reputable citizens, often unwittingly and in the interest of production, can be dealt with without laying criminal charges?

Mr. Lang: That certainly might be looked at again, Mr. Speaker, the next time the act is before the House. I hope the hon. member will agree with me that in order to protect producers generally and to assure equity of delivery opportunities we do need rules and that we do have to enforce them.

PENITENTIARIES

PROPOSED NEW INSTITUTION FOR MANITOBA—POSSIBILITY OF SITE AT CHURCHILL OR LYNN LAKE

Mr. Cecil Smith (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, my question is supplementary to that asked by the hon. member for Selkirk and is addressed to the Solicitor General. May I ask the minister whether one of the locations in Manitoba that he is considering for the federal penitentiary is Churchill or Lynn Lake because of the high unemployment and the desperate need for economic development there?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, we are more than pleased to consider all possible sites within the province of Manitoba. I will take the hon. member's suggestions and refer them to the appropriate officials in my department, particularly the group concerned with the selection process in Manitoba.

TRANSPORT

SHIPPING ON WEST COAST—POSSIBILITY OF INQUIRY AND SUBSIDY TO RIVTOW

Mr. Bob Brisco (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. In view of the recent statement of Mr. Cosulich of Rivtow Straits that he can no longer operate without a subsidy, with reference to west coast shipping, and in view of the fact that the minister himself has promised an inquiry into the chaos that was created by his intervention on the west coast, can the minister now enlighten the House whether (a) there will be an inquiry, and (b) whether he is prepared to provide a subsidy to Rivtow Straits similar to the kind of subsidy Northland Shipping previously enjoyed?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I have not seen the statement to which the hon. member refers. Any question of a commission of inquiry would have to await completion of certain discussions which are going on between ourselves and the government of British Columbia. I should say to the hon. member though, that the form of subsidy which had been given to Northland, I trust, will not be thought of as being reintroduced by anyone. It encouraged really the wrong form of transportation where a far more cost effective form was available, one which in the very short run would be giving far better service to passengers.

Mr. Brisco: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The minister refers to "far better service". I wonder whether he is referring to past service or future service? I hope he is not referring to present service. Is he prepared to answer that?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Victoria.

CROWN ASSETS DISPOSAL CORPORATION

POSSIBILITY OF SALE OF SUBMARINE "RAINBOW"

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Supply and Services. Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): I will inquire, Mr. Speaker, and I will give an answer to the hon. member.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

LACK OF SUBMARINES ON WEST COAST—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): A supplementary question for the Minister of National Defence. In view of the fact that the Canadian navy on the west coast has two anti-submarine squadrons and no submarine to practice on but must borrow United States submarines for practice, has the minister thought of reactivating the Rainbow or of bidding on the sale of it, or indeed replacing it with a new submarine?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of National Defence): Yes, Mr. Speaker, we thought of it and discarded the idea. One of our submarines, the Ojibway, is on the west coast now working with the Athabascan and the destroyer fleet in an anti-submarine role. We do share these facilities with our American allies, as I believe the hon. member knows, and also other facilities in this range. There is a reciprocal arrangement which seems to be working out very well and in our view there is no justification for reactivating the Rainbow.

STATISTICS CANADA

ALLEGATION JOB VACANCY FIGURES MISLEADING—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the minister of manpower and remind him of that interesting exchange which we had on Friday regarding the job vacancy figures published by Stat-Can. I remind him that he said in the House that the statistics were misleading. Then, he ran from the House, gave a press interview and said that they were useless and needed to be looked at with a jaundiced eye. Does the minister not agree that these are extremely serious charges? Has he brought this particular matter to the attention of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce who answers for Statistics Canada? Surely, we cannot continue the publication of statistics the minister does not believe.

● (1500)

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, there is no way I could run from the House; my briefcase is too heavy for me to do that. I was commenting on the vacancy rate and the use or misuse which has been made of those figures. For example—and I had this in mind—Canada manpower centres place about one million people a year. We participate in filling between 25 per cent and 35 per cent of all vacancies. At the end of any given month some 100,000 vacant jobs are available, just through CMCs. That was my point, and to take a narrow interpretation does not do a service to the people looking for jobs.

Mr. Alexander: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. That was a lot of nonsense. The minister indicated in no uncertain terms that job vacancy statistics as published by Statistics Canada are useless, misleading and need to be looked at with a jaundiced eye. In all fairness, since the minister and the associate deputy minister believe it, will he now take up this matter with the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce who is responsible for Statistics Canada, in order that he may investigate this matter and report to the House. Surely, the minister can do that.

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, much as I respect the hon. member's views, merely because he says something is nonsense does not make it so. I was speaking of facts. He might be interested in another fact. The Canadian labour market—

An hon. Member: Yes, give us the facts.

Mr. Cullen: The Canadian labour market—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Cullen: Does the hon. member for Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton not want the answer?

Mr. Dick: Yes, but we want facts.

Mr. Cullen: The Canadian labour market is extremely dynamic. Over three million full-time jobs open up each year, something of which hon. members should be aware.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Dick: Answer the question.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

3. What is the present personnel strength of each office?

4. In addition to regional offices, are district or other sub-offices maintained and, if so (a) in what locations (b) how many?

5. Are the duties performed by those manning the regional and/or district offices line functions, in the chain of command from Ottawa to the operator in the field, or do they have other functions to perform and, if so, what are such functions?

Mr. Fernand E. Leblanc (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): 1. (a) Six regional passport offices are maintained by the Department of External Affairs. (b) They are located in Toronto, Montreal, Vancouver, Edmonton, Winnipeg and Halifax. (c) There are no defined geographical limits of responsibility or interest.

Office	Date Established	Personnel
		Permanent	Casual M/Y	Total
Toronto	March 1970	18	6	24
Montreal	February 1970	15	6	21
Vancouver	March 1970	8	4	12
Edmonton	February 1972	7	.25	7.25
Winnipeg	June 1973	5	.50	5.50
Halifax	February 1972	4	.25	4.25
		57	17	74

3. The 1976-77 establishment of each office is:

	Positions
	Permanent	Casual M/Y	Total
Toronto	27	13	40
Montreal	20	9	29
Vancouver	14	5	19
Edmonton	7	1.3	8.3
Winnipeg	6	.7	6.7
Halifax	4	.5	4.5

4. One sub-office is maintained in the Borough of North York, Toronto responsible to the Toronto Regional Office.

5. The regional offices report directly to the Director of the Passport Office who is responsible to the Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs for the administration of the Canadian passport service. From time to time, the officers of the regional offices respond to requests for assistance from other divisions of the Department of External Affairs, e.g. Consular, Protocol, Information, generally of an administrative nature.

PREMIER HATFIELD'S APPEARANCE ON CBC

Question No. 1,149—Mr. Jones:

1. Did Premier Richard B. Hatfield appear on CBC from Montreal, Quebec and act as a commentator on the Quebec election and, if so, what arrangements were made for (a) salary (b) fees (c) expenses (d) entertainment (e) other remuneration or the equivalent and, in each case, what was the amount?

2. Were the Premier's expenses paid by the government and, if not, who did pay for his expenses?

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): Department of the Secretary of State: 1. To be answered elsewhere.

2. No. Not known by Secretary of State.

I am informed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as follows: 1. Yes, but as a guest, not as a commentator. (a), (b), (c), (d), (e) None.

2. To be answered elsewhere.

MINISTRY OF TRANSPORT BUILDING—MONCTON, NEW BRUNSWICK

Question No. 1,360—Mr. Jones:

1. On what date and at what location will the proposed new old building for the Department of Transport in Moncton, New Brunswick be decided?

2. What site was recommended for the DOT building in Moncton?

3. What were the names of the tenderers and the amounts bid for the last tender call for the DOT building in Moncton?

4. (a) For what reason were tenders not accepted (b) for what reason was construction not commenced?

5. (a) Are tenders to be called again and, if so, on what date and at what location will the new DOT building be built (b) what is the estimated cost?

Mr. Alexandre Cyr (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works): 1. At the present time an accommodation study and plan are being prepared for the city of Moncton. It is anticipated that this plan will be completed this spring. At that time the various alternatives available including the possibility of constructing a new building, will then be investigated.

[Mr. Fox.]

2. The bid by Centennial Brunswick Limited, on their Weldon Street site, was the lowest tender acceptable to both the Ministry of Transport and the Department of Public Works. This site is within the downtown core area and was approved by the Moncton Planning Authority for high-rise developments.

3.

Offerer	Rental Rate (per square feet)	Adjusted Rental Rate (includes tenant improvement) (per square feet)
Castlemaine Management Limited	5.65	6.45
Centennial Brunswick Limited	8.25	9.05
W. H. Crandall and Associates (Management) Ltd.	8.82	9.62
Greater Moncton Developments Limited	8.84	9.64
The Hardman Group	9.69	10.49
Atlantic Shopping Centres Limited	10.04	10.84
Queen Court Limited	10.14	10.94

4. (a) and (b) A decision was taken at that time to re-examine both the Ministry of Transport's specific requirements and other federal government programmes generally in the area concerned.

5. (a) and (b) See answer to part 1.

INSULATION

Question No. 1,497—Mr. Herbert:

1. What are the names of the two largest manufacturers of insulation material for residential use in the Provinces of Ontario and Quebec?

2. Do these companies also manufacture insulation material in the United States?

3. What are the tariffs on wool batt and loose insulation material (a) exported to the United States (b) imported from the United States?

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Departments of Industry, Trade and Commerce and National Revenue as follows: 1. The two largest manufacturers of insulation material for residential use in Ontario and Quebec are Fiberglas Canada Limited, with plants at Sarnia, Ontario and Candiac, Quebec, and Canadian Johns-Manville Limited, with plants at Port Credit, Ontario and Brossard, Quebec. Both companies produce glass wool insulation products at these plants. Fiberglas Canada Limited also owns a vermiculite insulation plant in Lachine, Quebec. The plant operates under the name Vermiculite Insulation Limited.

2. Neither Fiberglas Canada Limited nor Canadian Johns-Manville Limited, operate insulation plants in the United States. However, the U.S. parent or affiliate does operate insulation plants in the United States.

3. (a) Fibre glass insulation batts and bulk glass fibres of the types for residential insulating uses are dutiable at a rate of 11 per cent ad valorem when imported into the United States. Mineral wool insulation batts, blankets and in bulk form for insulating uses are dutiable at a rate of 7.5 per cent ad valorem. Articles of various shapes and sizes, not decorated, would also be dutiable at the same rate of duty under an alternative classification in the United States tariff. Expanded vermiculite in material form used as insulation or as concrete aggregate is dutiable at 7.5 per cent ad valorem when exported into the United States. (b) Mineral wool loose insulation material is classified under tariff item 68905-1 and is subject to a duty rate of 20 per cent when imported from United States. Mineral wool batts with only sufficient binder to hold the fibres together are also classifiable under tariff item 68905-1. Mineral wool, when further manufactured than as mentioned above would be dutiable under tariff item 71100-1 at 17½ per cent.

Order Paper Questions

3. By province, what was the (a) average hourly rate paid to employment agencies (b) average hourly rate paid to employees (c) total amount paid by the Department in (i) 1975 (ii) 1976?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Nil.

SOLAR HEATING

Question No. 1,570—Mr. Herbert:

1. In each of the past five years, what amount has been expended in research projects on solar heating in residential construction?

2. What method is used to publicize the programme?

3. By what means are residences selected that obtain grants towards the cost of solar heating systems and what proportion of the costs are covered by these grants?

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): In so far as the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources in concerned: 1. 1976-77, Michael Berkowitz, University of Toronto, $19,000.

In so far as the National Research Council of Canada is concerned: 1. From 1972-75, Nil; 1975-76, $696,000; 1976-77, $800,000 (estimated): 1977-78, $3,058,000 (estimated: NRC $2,408,000; CMHC $500,000, DEMR $150,000).

2. The funding program in 1976-77 was announced in the Research and Development Bulletin of the Department of Supply and Services, March 1976; the Daily Commercial News; the Newsletter of the Solar Energy Society of Canada, Inc.; by direct mailing to attendees at the National Research Council Conservation Seminar; NRC Press Release. Successful recipients of contracts appeared in the DSS Research and Development Bulletins, October, November and December, 1976. Recipients of demonstration contracts were announced in a news release from EMR. Reports resulting from contracts will be housed in the CISTI library and announced to the membership of the Solar Energy Society of Canada, Inc. Same general procedure will be used in 1977-78.

3. On the request for proposals form from the Department of Supply and Services one section set out the Evaluation Criteria indicating relative weights of each criteria. Bidders were advised to address these criteria in their proposals. The evaluation of the proposals, using these criteria, was subsequently done by personnel of the National Research Council and the Department of Supply and Services. The contract price awarded covered the cost of design, solar hardware purchase and solar system installation.

PUBLIC SERVICE—SALARIES

Question No. 1,718—Mr. Howie:

1. As of April 30, 1976, how many male public servants held positions with an annual salary of more than $15,000, excluding Crown corporations, boards and agencies and what proportion of all males does the figure represent?

2. As of April 30, 1976, how many (a) male (b) female public servants held positions with an annual salary of less than $8,000, excluding Crown corporations, boards and agencies and what proportion of all males and females do the figures represent?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board): 1. As of April, 1976 the number of male public servants holding positions with an annual salary of more than $15,000 was 51,814 which represented 31.2 percent of all male employees.

2. (a) As of April 1976 the number of male public servants holding positions with an annual salary of less than $8,000 was 4,210 which represented 2.5 percent of all male employees. (b) As of April 1976 the number of female public servants holding positions with an annual salary of less than $8,000 was 12,637 which represented 16.8 percent of all female employees.

NOTE: The selection criteria for questions 1 and 2 were full-time indeterminate employees subject to Public Service Staff Relations Act, Schedule 1, Part 1. Source was Personnel Applications Centre, Supply and Services, Canada.

NUMBER OF PUBLIC SERVANTS IN EACH PROVINCE AND TERRITORY

Question No. 1,727—Mr. Herbert:

1. How many public servants are in each province and territory, excluding the National Capital Region?

2. Which of the provinces are being considered for additional public servants in the programme of decentralization?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board): 1 The number of full-time indeterminate public servants subject to Public Service Staff Relations Act, Schedule 1, Part 1, in each province and territory, excluding the National Capital Region is as follows: Newfoundland, 5,247; Prince Edward Island, 1,230; Nova Scotia, 14,524; New Brunswick, 7,323; Manitoba, 10,974; Saskatchewan, 7,754, Alberta, 16,235; British Columbia, 23,272; Northwest Territories, 1,239; Yukon, 833; Ontario, 51,915; Quebec, 41,943.

BORDER BETWEEN LABRADOR AND QUEBEC

Question No. 1,817—Mr. Crosbie:

1. Is the government aware of the statement of the Premier of Quebec, The Honourable René Lévesque, made December 9, 1976 during a visit to Wabush, Labrador that Quebec regarded the 1927 decision of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council concerning the border between Labrador and Quebec to be unfair and that an independent Quebec would bring its claim for possession of Labrador before an international court and, if so, does the government take the position that the 1927 decision defining the boundary between Labrador and Quebec was unfair or that it was fair and binding?

2. What is the government's position in relation to any question concerning the boundaries between the Provinces of Newfoundland, including Labrador, and Quebec going before an international court for adjudication?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): 1 and 2. Whatever the government of Canada may have felt following the decision of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in 1927 concerning the border between Labrador and Quebec, that decision became part of the Constitution of Canada under the terms of the British North America Act (No. 1), 1949. It is therefore now an internal matter and not fit subject for adjudication before an international court.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, if questions nos. 157 and 1,831 could be made orders for returns, these returns would be tabled immediately. I again point out that we are treating these questions in this manner because of the lengthy and detailed nature of the answers.

Mr. Speaker: Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Order Paper Questions

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I raise the point at this time since by so doing the Chair will have more opportunity to consider the matter than would be the case if the point were raised at the end of the day on which this matter will become extremely relevant. My point of order has to do with supplementary estimates D for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1977. I and others will contend, as has been contended in the past, that inasmuch as several of the items propose to amend bills other than the Appropriation Act, they are not in order. I shall be specific and indicate the particular items to which I refer. I am speaking of Energy, Mines and Resources, vote L62d; Industry, Trade and Commerce, vote 77d; Post Office, vote 1d; Public Works, vote 10d; Supply and Services, vote 27d; and Veterans Affairs, vote 45d.

If Your Honour examines each of these items you will find that in each case an attempt is made by means of a $1 item either to amend or to provide an exception to existing legislation. I should like briefly to indicate how these items are legislative.

Energy, Mines and Resources, vote L62d, proposes to allow Eldorado Nuclear Limited to issue securities up to a value of $40 million. This power does not exist under present legislation. Not only is a totally new authority being granted, but the issue will be decided "bearing such rates of interest and subject to such other terms and conditions as the governor in council may approve." Thus, we are to give the power to make more regulations outside parliament and would be basing it on a bill which parliament cannot discuss or amend.

The second one, Industry, Trade and Commerce, vote 77d, is even more blatant, in my respectful submission. It proposes to amend sections 26 and 28 of the Export Development Act to increase the amounts which may be guaranteed in the form of exports credit insurance by the Export Development Corporation. The original limits were set out in the act and have previously been amended by specific legislation. There was an amending statute in 1974, an act to amend the Export Development Act, chapter 17 of the statutes for the session 1974, 1975 and 1976. This was, and remains, the procedurally correct way to amend a statute. An increase in the guarantees available to exporters is important to our trade policy and should not be excluded from full discussion in this House.

Post Office vote 1d proposes to provide that, contrary to the Olympic Act, money from the Olympic stamps in philatelic packages will go to the Olympic account. This is a desirable and straightforward proposal, but the method is highly undesirable. We should be able to read the statutes to find what the law is, and not have to root around in scattered appropriation bills for "notwithstanding" provisions.

Supply and Services vote 27d will allow the minting of a $100 gold coin, contrary to the provisions of the Currency and Exchange Act on two counts. First, gold coins may only be issued when the dollar is pegged, and then the coin must be worth its face value in gold content. This twofold exemption from the act should not be passed without any opportunity for debate. It would be a curious irony to honour the sovereign by circumventing her parliament. Finally, Veterans Affairs vote 45d will deem employees of veterans hospitals, transferred from the jurisdiction of the federal government, to be public servants so they may continue to contribute to the public service superannuation plan. Again, a good idea, but if it is done this way it will produce a bad procedure. In many of these cases the objects are highly desirable, but it is not healthy for the future of the House of Commons to have things done in this manner, for while the convenience of the government is frequently the convenience of everyone, this will not always be the case.

Mr. Speaker, I will not dwell long on the rulings made in the past which relate to $1 items because I believe the precedents are quite clear and well known to you. For the benefit of other members who may wish to reply, I would draw their attention to Mr. Speaker Lamoureux's ruling of March 10, 1971. He said, in summarizing the argument of those who contended that the new rules prevented $1 items from being used as they once were:

> They suggest that the rules changes were effected to remove the consideration of detailed estimates from the floor of the House but that no decision was ever made that a motion which is tantamount to a legislative enactment should be removed from the floor of the House. They urge that the items which have a legislative effect should not be allowed to be proceeded with by way of items in the supplementary estimates but should be introduced in the usual way, as is done for all other legislation, by way of a bill.

That is certainly still our feeling. He then said:

> However, in relation to items 35c and 10c, I must come to the inevitable conclusion that, in view of the situation created by the new rules, these items are not before the House in proper form.

My respectful submission, sir, is that that is a resounding precedent in favour of the proposition which I am attempting to make to Your Honour. I should note, as well, that on that occasion the items questioned were speedily dealt with in the proper way after the matter had arisen. This question arose again on December 10, 1973. In again reaching the conclusion that the items questioned were improper, Mr. Speaker quoted from May's where that work described the temporary nature of an appropriations act and its unsuitability for long-term legislative goals. Mr. Speaker Lamoureux concluded:

> I suggest that if such justification were put forward, it would have to be based on emergency rather than on principle. The Chair has to make a ruling on principle and on this basis I would have to say that these three specific items are not properly before the House.

My submission to you, sir, is that these six items are legislative, and as such have no place in the estimates and in the appropriations bill where they cannot be amended or discussed in the House and where they are shielded from sufficient comment either here or in the committee. If you find that there is some point to the argument which I have begun, and which will be advanced by others, I am prepared to discuss with the government House leader the means for quickly disposing of those items which are urgent and uncontentious.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, this is a recurring debate that we have had from time to time. I recall that prior to the establishment of the CRTC it had been the attempt of the then minister of communications to create the CRTC with a $1 item in supplementary estimates. It suffered the fate it deserves and was totally rejected as a procedure. The government would not proceed with it because it realized that the practice was totally wrong.

My colleague, the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton, has referred to the rulings of Mr. Speaker Lamoureux. I would draw your attention, Mr. Speaker, to the one on March 3, 1969, March 10, 1971, and, again, on December 10, 1973. It is remarkable that it brings to mind a motion that I moved in the miscellaneous estimates committee in 1969 which gave rise to the debate in 1969 on a motion of the opposition based on the report of the miscellaneous estimates committee in which I criticized the government for bringing forward $1 items to amend legislation. In fact there were three such items. I recall that on that occasion I had the majority; the reason was that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) joined me in expressing that view. I find it strange that he should now be part of an administration which on this occasion moves to transgress that principle, not once but half a dozen times.

I would commend to Your Honour the House of Commons Journals of December 10, 1973, at page 737, in the first column, second paragraph. This is a quotation from a ruling by Mr. Speaker Lamoureux. It reads:

> Since the adoption of the new rules, it seems there has been only one item with direct and specific legislative import that has been included in estimates. This particular item, included in the estimates for the year 1970-71, was allowed to go unchallenged and no point of order was raised in respect thereto. Thus, no practice has yet been established except perhaps that particular items proposing to amend directly and specifically a statute, had not been included in supplementary estimates since the rules were changed in 1968 but for the one exception just mentioned. The House therefore has not had the opportunity at this point to reaffirm the proposition that such proposals, when they are clearly intended to amend existing legislation, should come to the House by way of an amending bill rather than as an item in the supplementary estimates.

● (1520)

That was a quotation from March, 1971. The ruling continues as follows:

> I think this was a good principle to guide the House in its consideration of legislation and estimates and I think I have to reaffirm the principle at this time.

My colleagues and I have pointed out a number of items in supplementary estimates D the purpose of which is to extend legislation. This is to be an appropriation act, not a legislative statute. We are not saying anything about transferring moneys from one vote to another. That is clearly the established and, I think, very justifiable procedure, because by so doing the government is coming back to the House and seeking permission to change votes of money. That move is unimpeachable, but to change existing legislation within appropriation bills or to create, in effect, new statutes as is proposed by the recognition of Via Rail is totally wrong. You, Mr. Speaker, being practised in the law, would recoil with horror to look at a statute and—without additional indices which would indicate going to an appropriation act—see a $1 item which totally reversed the trust of the legislation, either restricting some powers or expanding some others.

What certainty is there, if that is the way to proceed? Amendments to existing statutes must be brought before this House, accepted at second reading, considered in committee and come under the total legislative process. It is legislation; it is not a matter of the voting of moneys. Therefore, I ask that you, Mr. Speaker, take this matter into consideration and, if it is possible to do so, to indicate, as have Mr. Speaker Lamoureux and others in the past, that amending legislation by way of a $1 item is a reprehensible practice which must not occur, and that those items should be deleted from supplementary estimates D.

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, I, too, wish to rise on this very important and fundamental point of order which has been raised by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton. I say it is fundamental because as far as I am concerned we are dealing here with a matter that affects the main function of this chamber. Your Honour will recall that last week I raised the question of the extensive use of $1 items in supplementary estimates during the question period, and at that time Your Honour indicated that this was a matter which should be discussed and considered by way of a point of order rather than in the question period. It is with that in mind that we wish to elaborate on the issue before us today.

I want to contribute briefly to one aspect of this question, and that is the unsuitability of estimates and appropriations bills for legislative action of the nature proposed in these items. Reference has been made to the ruling of Mr. Speaker Lamoureux of March 10, 1971. The section which determined his ruling of that date is referred to in May's nineteenth edition at page 747. I believe that citation describes the limitations of the Appropriation Act. I think it is very pertinent to the issue we are discussing today and I should like to quote, for the record, the citation at page 747 as follows:

> On the one hand, there is, so far as this question is concerned, no legal restraint on the discretion of the Crown in presenting an estimate, or on that of Parliament in authorizing the expenditure provided by such an estimate by the Appropriation Act.

The question has repeatedly arisen in the past as whether in a particular case the authority given by the Appropriation Act is an adequate substitute for authorization by a specific bill. I refer again to May's as follows:

> On the other hand, the Appropriation Act is a general measure, containing a great many items, and is not adapted to defining the conditions, etc., of expenditure. Also, this act only gives authority for a single year, and is therefore not appropriate for expenditure which is meant to continue for a period or indefinitely. There have been cases, too, in which the Appropriation Act has been used, not merely as a substitute for specific legislation, but to override the limits imposed by existing legislation.

The next paragraph goes on to note that this practice has been justified in the United Kingdom on the ground of emergency but not of principle. But it is principle upon which our democratic assembly must base its decisions and its findings, and it was Mr. Speaker Lamoureux who rejected emergency as a proper foundation for that precedent. In this context I would also like to refer to Driedger's comment on the nature of the appropriation bill at page 214 of the new version of "Legislative Forms and Precedents". He said:

> These acts authorize the expenditure of a specific sum for the purposes enumerated in the schedules. The authority under these acts is to apply a specified sum out of the consolidated revenue fund towards defraying the several charges and expenses of the public service from the beginning of a specified fiscal year to the end of that fiscal year.
> The noteworthy feature is that the appropriation is for one fiscal year only; balances of the appropriations remaining unexpended at the end of the fiscal year lapse. The authority does not extend into any subsequent fiscal year.

It would be very odd indeed if we were to adopt the principle that an appropriations act can only authorize the expenditure of money for one year but can permanently alter totally unrelated legislation. There have always been problems with $1 items. Previously, the Appropriation Act could be debated and thorough consideration given to one of these items almost as if it was a proper legislative proposal. Now, however, we are subject to the new Standing Order 58. Estimates go to committee, and there is no debate on the appropriations bill, which means there can be no amendment. Therefore, there is effectively no way of dealing with a $1 item in the House outside of an opposition day. Even on such a day, or in committee, it is doubtful what could be done. By tradition, and under the terms of the Financial Administration Act, no alteration can be made in the form of an estimate and, of course, there is no point in moving to reduce a $1 item. Therefore, we have a legislative proposal which is inviolate in terms of amendment or effective debate, subject as it is to a guillotine after very restricted committee discussion.

I simply want to reinforce the point raised by my colleague, the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton. It seems to me that in this case the House of Commons is, in fact, being denied the right to debate a legislative proposal. To me, that is wrong in principle. To me, the right to debate a statute or an amendment thereto is a fundamental right of parliament and that right should be guaranteed and preserved. No legislation should be immune from the judgment of the House and so approximate in essence to an executive degree. In addition, there is bound to be confusion in the future about the proper course to take respecting bills which amend the Appropriation Act. I think all members of this House should work to make our statutes more, and not less, intelligible.

These considerations led the previous Speaker to disapprove of the use of appropriation bill for this purpose. I hope your ruling will agree with him and call for the deletion of legislative proposals from appropriations bills. I think the Speaker summed up his case very appropriately, as reported at page 8608 of Hansard of December 10, when he stated as follows:

> —legislation by way of a dollar item in the estimates . . . is not a practice which ought to be condoned and supported by the House.

It is also worthy to note that the second report of the Standing Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons on Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments had this to say about the use of $1 votes in terms of affecting legislation. I quote from page 34 of the report:

Legislating by means of dollar votes and altering the purpose of previous votes by a number of successive votes are practices with which the committee does not agree.

The actions of the government by using and abusing $1 votes in this connection may be expeditious as far as it is concerned. It may be shrewd parliamentary tactic on the government's behalf. This route may be acceptable to them, but in terms of preserving the role and supremacy of parliament, I believe the principle is wrong.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, I, too, would like to make a few remarks with respect to the point of order that has been raised by my colleague. I would like to make particular reference to vote 77(d) of Industry, Trade and Commerce being increased by the amount of $2 billion.

In weighing whether this $1 vote procedure is proper, we must do some degree take into account the magnitude of what would be passed tomorrow if this $1 vote were to remain part of the Appropriation Act. It would be a $2 billion extension of possible liability on the part of the government of Canada. We believe there is no authority to pass it in the form that is being proposed.

In committee we attempted to obtain evidence as to whether this procedure was in order. The vice-chairman of the committee stated, and I quote from page 24:29 of the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs:

I think that may be a question more properly brought up in the House with the Speaker, on a point of order.

With that reference from the standing committee meeting, I would point out that considerable evidence was given to us by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce as to why they had proposed this $1 item which would extend the eventual insurance guarantee limit of the EDC by $2 billion. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce has said they had been caught with only $46 million of available guarantee money left, and they had no alternative. The important things to bear in mind are the comments of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce to the committee? He showed very clearly that the government felt in all likelihood that it was out of order, and should not be proceeding in this way. As my hon. colleague from Vegreville has indicated, the government was pleading some type of emergency in order to get the legislative guarantee process through.

I would refer to page 24:14 of the proceedings of the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs. As to why this $1 item was included, the minister stated:

I agree, and I am not absolutely comfortable with it. I would have preferred to deal with this in the House of Commons, but I have to be a realist about those things when I look at the other papers and the speed by which those things are dealt with in the House of Commons.

In short, the exchange was simply that he was being pressed as to why he included it in the estimates that are before us. The minister, oddly enough, stated that he agreed that he would be more comfortable if it had been included or handled in the usual legislative way through the House of Commons. The minister at another point stated:

People have come and asked for the services of EDC and we have reached the limit. We either lose the business or change the limit. I am sorry to have to come this way;

That is, "I am sorry to have to come to the committee this way."

I would have preferred the other way. But I have no choice, and that is why I have taken the risk of coming before this committee.

Then he said:

I personally would love to have a better procedure, too.

Considering the magnitude of what is before us, it behooves this House not to pass a $2 billion extension by reason of a $1 item to amend the Appropriation Act. I hope it is found that this procedure is incorrect, and that it will be denied.

Mr. Goodale: Mr. Speaker, in considering this point of order we have heard, in general terms, three possible objections to the "$1 items" which appear in the appropriations legislation. They have been referred to in general terms. To itemize them, I think members are registering complaints that the measures referred to are, in the first instance, legislative in nature; second, in the form that they have been presented they allege there is inadequate opportunity to discuss them at this stage in our proceedings; and third, in some way they allege they are foreign to the business of supply.

With respect to the first two points with respect to the legislative nature of the proposals and, second, the inadequacy of debate, those two points, even though they may be of concern to members must, from a procedural point of view, fall immediately—because if they were of real and substantial difficulty in relation to the so-called $1 items which are before us they would surely be of more real and substantial difficulty in relation to those items which have a substantial amount of money attached to them.

In dealing with $1 items, it is no valid to try to single them out and object to them in principle and, in particular, on the first two points which I have mentioned. Surely, those two points, if they were valid, would apply equally as well to other items, and perhaps even with more impact because those items have substantial amounts of money attached to them. In fact, members opposite are not making those two arguments in relation to all the items in the Appropriation Act. Therefore, I do not think those first two objections can stand.

It seems to me that the argument reduces itself, then, to consideration of whether the matters which have been complained about today are, in reality, part of the business of supply. It would be my submission to Your Honour that they are properly part of the business of supply. This matter, as has been mentioned, has occupied the attention of the House in the past. The practice complained of today by members opposite is by no means an innovation. The precedents are long-standing in support of the practice. The most substantial commentary about the point at issue was made by your predecessor, Mr. Speaker Lamoureux, in 1971 as reported in Journals at page 395. If one carefully considers what Mr. Speaker Lamoureux had to say on that occasion, one would see that he based his decision largely on lack of precedent following a rule change made in 1968.

In other words, he was basing the decision he handed down in 1971 on a lack of body of law, or body of precedent, on the point at that moment in time some nine years ago. Since that time we have had in this House many precedents which in fact support the position which the government is taking in relation to the several items complained about today.

I refer to two sets of precedents in relation to the votes which have been objected to. It might be most convenient to refer to the precedents one by one as I consider the various specific items which were mentioned by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton. I would begin by referring to Industry, Trade and Commerce vote 77d. In this connection it is worthwhile to remember that since the adoption of our present supply procedures no fewer than 11 such items similar to this have been presented and carried. For the record, they are Fisheries and Forestries vote L20a, 1970-71; Privy Council votes L16c and L17c, 1970-71; National Health and Welfare vote 40a, 1971-72; Secretary of State vote 63a, 1971-72; National Health and Welfare votes 45b, 1972-73 and 50a, 1973-74; Finance vote 1d, 1974-75; Agriculture vote 50d, 1975-76; Regional Economic Expansion vote 40a, 1975-76; Secretary of State vote 62a, 1975-76; and Environment vote L23b, 1975-76.

I refer particularly to that body of precedent because those precedents are all subsequent to the decision in 1971 by Mr. Speaker Lamoureux. They establish the body of precedent which Mr. Speaker Lamoureux could not find at that moment in time in the records of the House subequent to the change in the rules of 1968. There is a second body of precedent that I would refer to, particularly in relation to Post Office vote 1d and Department of Supply and Services vote 27d. These precedents are also instructive on the point, particularly because they came after the decision by Mr. Speaker Lamoureux.

For the record, these precedents which I think might be helpful are as follows: Transport vote 70a, in 1970-71; Industry, Trade and Commerce vote 23c, in 1970-71; Labour votes 1c, in 1970-71 and 5b in 1971-72; Treasury Board vote 12b, in 1971-72; Veterans Affairs vote 30a, in 1973-74; Justice vote 1a, in 1973-74; and National Defence vote 1d, in 1974-75. All those precedents follow the decision in 1971 by Mr. Speaker Lamoureux.

There were two other specific items to which the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton referred. The first is Veterans Affairs vote 45d. I suggest that both sets of precedents which I have just mentioned to apply to this particular item. More particularly, I suggest that those precedents cited in relation to Industry, Trade and Commerce vote 77d have application to the Veterans Affairs matter. With respect to Energy, Mines and Resources vote L62d, I suggest that both sets of precedents again apply, but particularly the first set of precedents in relation to Industry, Trade and Commerce vote 77d.

I again make the point that although there have been some complaints in the past about the procedures that have been raised in the House today, there are ample precedents, both before the decision of Mr. Speaker Lamoureux and, in particular, since his decision in 1971. From reading his decision as reported in Journals, it seems that his primary concern was that there did not seem to be at that stage, after the rule change in 1968, ample precedent upon which to support the items which were before him. During the proceedings of the House since his judgment, a number of those precedents have come to exist. They might be instructive in dealing with the complaints raised this afternoon.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I was going to commence my remarks by saying that this issue is so important that it amazes me that up to this point no cabinet minister has spoken to it. I see that my concern about that is altered slightly by the fact that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources apparently wishes to rise. I assume he will do so after I have spoken. I see that another minister, the Postmaster General, is also going to speak on this question.

I will back up now and say that with all the respect I am prepared to pay to the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council for the way he tries to do his job, I think it was a failure to recognize the importance of this issue for a cabinet minister not to have participated in this debate long before this.

Mr. Blais: We don't want to give you the last word.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to say that Your Honour has the last word. I am satisfied it will be exercised in the responsible way in which Your Honour always performs his duty.

The other comment I would like to make by way of an introductory reference is that I was surprised, almost amused, at the Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council saying that members on this side are raising only $1 items; that they are not raising items in which substantial amounts of money are involved. The hon. member for Assiniboia misses the whole point. Treasury Board, by authority of the Financial Administration Act, has authority over estimates. Treasury Board has the right to put substantial sums of money into the estimates, main, interim or supplementary, and to ask the House to vote on them.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): He did not miss it; he just tried to avoid it.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, what we are discussing today is not the right of Treasury Board to put substantial amounts of money into the estimates, but the right of the government, through the President of Treasury Board, to use what are known as $1 items to achieve what ought to be achieved by ordinary legislation.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Before allowing the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre to continue, I might point out that as I understood the point raised by the parliamentary secretary it was slightly different from that which has been described. This is a point that interests me. Therefore, I want to straighten it out before we go further. If it is possible to amend legislation by a $2 billion item in the estimates, is it possible to amend it by a $1 item in the estimates? That is the point. Basically, since there was no complaint about occasionally amending legislation by an item in the estimates that was properly there, there ought not to be a complaint about it being done by a $1 item. My understanding is that if it cannot be done by an item in the estimates, it cannot be done where the item is there properly with every dollar and cent, comma and dot, or it cannot be done by a $1 item, equally.

The question of estimates, in my mind, is whether there is a limit to what can be done by placing an item in the estimates, whether it be a full and substantial item or a $1 item; or is that limit reached when the proposal contained in the estimate is to amend legislation? That is the point that seems to be at issue.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, if that is your understanding of the point raised by the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council, I shall be glad to deal with it in a moment or two. The other comment I would like to make on the remarks we have had from across the way is that no matter how many precedents the hon. member may be able to cite, if they are wrong, and if the House is being asked to repeat a wrong committed several years ago, that is no reason for us to continue committing that wrong.

I say, with respect—and I think what is in my mind now deals with at least part of what Your Honour has raised—that at times $1 items are simply an abuse. They may not be illegal, but are simply an abuse. There are other times when $1 items, in the view of some of us, are out of order and should be so designated by Your Honour. Let me put it yet another way. There are times when by a $1 item all the government is doing is, in effect, voting money; for example, when a $1 item proposes that money voted in the main estimates for a specific purpose be deemed to be available for a different purpose. I do not find that offensive. The government could achieve its end by letting money which was there for the original purpose lapse and by putting into the estimates the actual number of dollars it wants for the new purpose. In the end, no extra money would be spent. There would have been a higher appropriation and some of it would lapse. So when the government uses $1 items to cancel spending for a certain purpose and provide for the spending of the same money for another purpose, it would seem to me this is within the four corners of an appropriation act. It is a form of appropriating money, which is what a supply bill is all about. But when a $1 item is used to amend a statute other than an appropriation statute the government is certainly indulging in an abuse because it is denying parliament the right to discuss that other statute and deal with it in the normal way.

Let me take an example from last session. There was a $1 item to create Loto Canada. Some of us felt this involved the creation of a corporation and that it should have been the subject of a special act of parliament. But it was done by way of a $1 estimate. The result was that we did not have an ordinary bill, with first reading, second reading, reference to committee, third reading, and so on. Furthermore, the consideration of Loto Canada in the last session was put under a form of closure. It was put into an appropriation bill in respect of which there was no discussion on the floor of the House. There was some discussion in the committee, but when the bill came back it had to be dealt with under the form of closure which applies to supply bills. It seems to me that when the government does this, it ought to do so by way of legislation. It is legal to do as I have described, but it certainly is an abuse of the right of parliament to deal with legislation without going through the normal stages and thus making it subject to an indirect form of closure. We have experienced closure in various ways, for example, through the operation of Standing Order 75C in the present session, and there may be further examples.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Some hon. members across the way are applauding. That shows what they think of parliament. Let me say, further, that I think Via Rail Canada is a substantial proposition and is one which ought to be the subject of legislation. I will come to my point in a few moments, that it should not be a $1 item, but in the context of what I have been saying, if that proposal for Via Rail Canada were made the subject of a bill, that bill would be presented for first reading, second reading, and so on. But no: it is a $1 item in the estimates, so it has already been to the appropriate committee and it will be back among the estimates which will be voted on en masse tomorrow at 9.45 p.m. Parliament will be called upon then to deal with a major measure which is outside the confines of the voting of money without having an opportunity for debate. Therefore I say this amounts to an indirect way of imposing closure.

The other day when the hon. member for Vegreville, I believe it was, questioned the President of the Treasury Board on this point, the minister's reply was a revealing one. He said, in effect, "We feel that way about it, too, but the limitation upon parliamentary time is such that we cannot deal with all these things by way of separate bills." This is an indication, Mr. Speaker, that the government is putting a number of measures into supply bills because it cannot find the time in which to deal with them through ordinary parliamentary procedures. I suppose that if some day the government decides it wants to bring home the British North America Act, and parliament is running short of time, we will find a $1 item in the estimates deeming the British North America Act to be a Canadian statute. That is no more far-fetched than some of the things which are being considered now. Some of these things are an abuse of the rights of parliament, an abuse of our privileges, an abuse of our right to debate. Maybe in some instances that is all one can say; they are an abuse. But in other instances I believe they are contrary to the rules and are out of order.

Previous speakers in this discussion, in referring to the nature of a supply bill, have pointed out it is a bill for one year. I have in my hand a copy of Bill C-28, a supplementary estimates bill which we passed earlier in this session. So I know the bill which will be before us tomorrow will contain exactly the same preamble, that is, it will be an act for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the year ending March 31, 1977. Then there are some more words in which the Governor General says he has sent a message that "the said sums hereinbefore mentioned are required to defray certain expenses of the public service of Canada not otherwise provided for in the financial year ending the 31st day of March, 1977." That date appears time and time again. Sir, when you lead us over to the other place when this bill has finally been passed, and when you have the opportunity to present it to the Governor General or to his deputy, you will say:

May it please Your Honour, I have the honour to present a bill being sums required for the public service of Canada for the year ending March 31, 1977.

But lo and behold, we find in these supplementary estimates a number of matters in respect of which provision does not end on March 31, 1977. Continuous financing will be required, in some cases for a few years, and in others in perpetuity. For example, once we set up this Via Rail Canada it will cost money down the road as long as we can foresee, at least until we find some other way of dealing with our transportation needs.

Like other members of the House, I have done some study of $1 estimates over the years in which I have been here, and I recall having some correspondence with Mr. Watson Seller when he was auditor general, years ago. He had gone into the subject and he quoted from papers which had been prepared a generation earlier with regard to it. All those who have studied it have said that $1 items inserted in the estimates for convenience are legitimate, but that if they are used as a vehicle to evade the bringing in of legislation they become highly questionable. As I say, the act itself applies only for one year and then the authority it contains lapses. How, then, have we the right to include in the bill items which provide for expenditure down the road? The legal answer is, of course, to say that all we are passing is an estimate for $1. Well, take that Energy, Mines and Resources estimate 62D, on page 22, or take the Industry, Trade and Commerce item 72D, which is on page 52 of the book—perhaps I will take it rather than the other, because the sum is larger. There we are providing for an increase from $750 million to $2,500 million and then an increase from $750 million to $1 billion—despite the amount set out in the act, incidentally.

We will provide, as I say, for the expenditure of many dollars in future fiscal years, but the bill provides, of course, only for moneys to be spent in this fiscal year. All that is to be spent in this fiscal year is $1, though I do not think anyone even gets that; it is just symbolic. However, by the process of having parliament approve $1 in the fiscal year for which we are voting money we give the government the right to spend money next year, the year after and years down the road.

All of those who have wrestled with this problem over the years—and they have been wrestling with it certainly throughout this century—are right in their view that $1 items are all right for convenience, particularly when they specifically relate to the spending of money, but they are questionable—I would even say illegal—when they provide for the enactment of continuing legislation.

Let me take a moment to look up some of the precise items, despite the chiding we were given on this point by the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council. I think there are questions about all the items which were raised by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton and added to by one or two others. I should like to speak about three of them and then I want to speak about three or four items which they did not mention.

Let us look at page 22, the item L62d under "Energy, Mines and Resources". It gives Eldorado Nuclear Limited, "with the approval of the governor in council, power to borrow money for capital expenditures by the issue and sale of securities up to an aggregate amount not exceeding $40 million, bearing such rates of interest and subject to such other terms and conditions as the governor in council may approve". Either that is going to cost us money down the road and we will have approved it by voting $1, or it is a piece of legislation telling a private corporation what it can do. If it is a piece of legislation telling a private corporation what it can do, it should be before this House as legislation and subject to all the debating and procedural considerations attaching to legislation. I think my friend for Grenville-Carleton is perfectly right to raise that; I think it was his first concern as a case which is serious indeed.

Let me now turn to page 52, to the item I have already mentioned, namely, vote 77d under the Export Development Corporation. I have already used the figures in this vote, but what to me is more important than the figures, even if the money amounted to only a few dollars, are the words "to increase from", so and so, "the amount set out in section 26 of the Export Development Act". Then in (b) there is another set of figures, and the words "the amount set out in section 28 of the Export Development Act". This is legislation, Mr. Speaker; this is not voting of estimates. This is not just a case of voting $1. The item is a subterfuge. It is pretty close to being dishonest.

We are amending the Export Development Act and doing it under the closure which applies to a supply bill. We are departing from the whole purpose of supply legislation and are going beyond the right of Treasury Board to deal with estimates. Certainly, we are passing something which is beyond the requirements of a supply bill which Your Honour will present to His Excellency in the other place for the specific year ending March 31, 1977.

I turn to another item mentioned by my hon. friends to the right which appears on page 72, item 1d under the Post Office Department. To me, the offensive words in this item are "notwithstanding the Olympic (1976) Act". If this is legal,

Mr. Speaker, we can abolish the legislative process and just bring in a couple of sets of supplementary estimates over the course of year, put in a string of $1 items and—

Mr. Mazankowski: —shut the place down.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Yes, shut the place down, as my hon. friend says.

Mr. Abbott: It would not put you in Weekend magazine if they shut you down.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): All I can say to my hon. friend is that jealousy will get him nowhere.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): You are in enough trouble now with the competition bill.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The minister will find Canadian magazine annoyed with him now for having used the wrong name. Here, under the Post Office, is a $1 item by which we set aside the provisions of the Olympic (1976) Act.

I have picked out three items, Mr. Speaker, which my friends to the right have identified, and I think that in all cases they go beyond the rights and prerogatives of the government when it brings in a supply bill. May I now look at some other items which my hon. friends to the right did not include. I am not suggesting that they overlooked them; they probably felt they had enough. Let me go to item 1d under, Industry, Trade and Commerce, on page 48. This is a long item occupying half the page, but again the key words are "to authorize notwithstanding section 5 of the National Design Council Act", a transfer of certain sums of money and authority, and so on, and I see the figures of $9 million and $7,500,000. All of this is apparently contrary to the provisions of section 5 of the National Design Council Act. In other words, by this $1 item we are amending that act. How can that be justified, Mr. Speaker?

I know hon. members can go back to the record and probably find my saying this sort of thing a good many years, indeed decades, ago, but it is still wrong. This practice has continued and in fact it is getting worse. We have 52 $1 items in this book. I am sure my hon. friends across the way will say that, with all these precedents, what am I complaining of? But it is still wrong, Mr. Speaker. I have lots of sympathy for my hon. friends across the way in regard to how we use parliamentary time, but let us solve this problem in some other way, not by this subterfuge, this practice which I think is dishonest.

May I turn now to page 76, the Department of Public Works. My hon. friends raised another item under Public Works and I want to raise item 10d which again authorizes the Minister of Public Works "notwithstanding paragraph 4(1)(a) of the Public Lands Grants Act and section 39 of the Public Works Act", to sell, lease, and so on. We live by the rule of law, Mr. Speaker. When legislation is passed, the government is supposed to follow it. If the government wants to make changes, and it does not have time to get parliament to amend legislation in the proper way, it sticks in a $1 item and says that notwithstanding the legislation, it will be done in this way.

Let me turn to page 120 and also page 126, both under the Department of Transport. I think my hon. friend, the Minister of Transport, has a higher percentage of $1 items than his colleagues, but not doubt he will get his reward for that. I refer particularly to item 52d on page 120 which has to do with surface transportation. It provides, "With respect to surface transportation: (a) to deem Via Rail Canada Inc., a railway company incorporated pursuant to section 11 of the Railway Act". The largest committee room on this Hill is the railway committee room.

Why, Mr. Speaker? The reason is the importance of the railways for the whole country. Governments rose and fell on the railway question. Canada was brought into being as a nation from coast to coast by the railways. Having passed legislation which called on the Canadian Pacific Railway to provide certain services in perpetuity—I thought that meant forever—parliament is now to change all this by setting up a new corporation.

Perhaps it is a good idea. Surely if the setting up of the Canadian Pacific Railway was worth debating as a separate piece of legislation, the setting up of Via Rail Canada Incorporated should also be worth debating under a separate piece of legislation brought properly before the House of Commons. Most of a page is taken up with spelling out this item. I will not read it. It sets out all the privileges and authorities which are necessary. It talks about the reimbursement out of moneys to be appropriated by parliament of a railway company, uses the phrase "from time to time", and mentions the figure of $240 million.

We are establishing expenditures down the road and setting up a corporation to carry on down the road. All this has nothing to do with the principle of the suply bill, which is to provide, as you will say to His Excellency in the other place, funds for the operation of the public service of Canada in the fiscal year ending March 31, 1977. Similarly, on page 26, item L116d, under "Transport", will cancel a debt associated with the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority. The item uses the following words:

—and to authorize the minister, from time to time, to fix the amount that shall be paid by the authority annually out of its toll revenue as return on capital.

Note "from time to time". You know, years ago Mr. Bennett set up a $2,000 car allowance for his cabinet ministers to replace the use of chauffeured limousines. He did this with $1 item, and the members who passed it thought it was a good idea; it would save money, and it was to be temporary. Well, that "from time to time" lasted 30 years. They did something then which was allowed by a $1 item. And here we are, providing something again "from time to time" with a $1 item.

The only other item I shall mention is vote 30d, under External Affairs. That is a particularly interesting one. Vote 30d has to do with the Canadian International Development Agency, otherwise known as CIDA. That vote is a $1 item and is split in four parts, (a), (b), (c) and (d). I have complained mostly because these $1 items amend statutes or acts. But, sir, CIDA was set up with a $1 item. There was no proper statute. Now, with a $1 item we are to amend several of the $1 items which we passed previously regarding CIDA. How ridiculous can you get? We have estimates, we have supply for the voting of money, and we have ordinary bills for the passage of legislation. In the case of CIDA, no bill setting it up was passed. It was done with a $1 item. Now, when changes must be made, and they all may be good changes, they are to be made with a $1 item. We are now, by a $1 item, changing legislation which in the first place was established with a $1 item.

The hon. member for Grenville-Carleton has raised an important and timely issue, and I think Your Honour, your friends at the table and those in the office who assist you, will have an interesting 24 hours. You must give this question serious consideration.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I observe confirmation that Your Honour and your associates will have an interesting 24 hours. This is not just a passing point of order which the opposition has raised. Actually, we are not objecting to the items. Last year, when we spoke on these $1 items, I opposed Loto Canada. I do not think I particularly oppose any of these $1 items. Actually, some of them I favour strongly. I think we should put them through, particularly the ones concerning veterans affairs. If they were brought in as a separate bill, they would pass almost at once.

Sir, the principle of bypassing the legislative process, of imposing closure on parliamentary debate which this method entails, is wrong.

Mr. Mazankowski: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I hope Your Honour and your assistants will study this whole proposition carefully. We hope, particularly, that you will study carefully the particular items raised by hon. friends to my right, and the four or five I have added. I think most, if not all, of them should be ruled as not proper in a bill the legal purpose of which is to pass money for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1977.

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, you will be considering the learned arguments of hon. members who spoke this afternoon and considering, particularly, the procedures and precedents of the past. Much has been made of the government's effort to broaden or amend legislation or broaden the powers of the subject of the legislation. Eldorado Nuclear Limited has been cited as an example of that process. It might help if I were to deal specifically with this particular corporation. Hon. members mentioned vote L62d, which reads:

To authorize Eldorado Nuclear Limited, with the approval of the governor in council, to borrow money for capital expenditures by the issue and sale of securities up to an aggregate amount not exceeding $40,000,000 bearing such rates of interest and subject to such other terms and conditions as the governor in council may approve.

Hon. members should understand that Eldorado was set up with broad powers. It was set up as a proprietary corporation and was intended to operate as a commercially successful venture. It became, in the process of its birth and through the enabling legislation, an agent of the Crown which technically requires authority for borrowing. That is all we are seeking. We are not seeking funds from parliament; we are seeking only authority to borrow.

In committee hon. members had an opportunity to deal with the question of the borrowing powers and whether there was to be widening of those powers or any new direction with respect to those powers. I think members of the committee were satisfied on the point. This is not an attempt to widen the powers of Eldorado in any way. No new directions are contemplated. We were contemplating merely the financing of the corporation's growing operations. It does not seek money from the government. It does not seek a guarantee from the government, and it does not seek an appropriation of any kind from the government or from parliament. It is seeking permission to raise on its own credit, not that of the government, a certain sum of money up to a maximum. However, no specific amount is stated. This vote would provide the corporation with the flexibility it requires for its growing operations.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a few comments about the serious issue raised in connection with several votes in supplementary estimates D. I know Your Honour will have noted carefully the argument of the Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council about the parallel between the impact of items in the estimates which are substantial and those which are $1 items but have legislative impact. That point perhaps relates to the argument raised by the hon. member for Edmonton West about lawyers' procedural problems and difficulties in finding the law. Obviously, whether the item is substantial or a $1 item, the point remains that lawyers must keep track of the law and its many amendments, and many systems are available for helping them do so.

It is sometimes argued, in connection with substantial items or $1 items that if a certain amount is originally set out in the statute more cannot be added or voted in an estimate because the item would have to say. "Notwithstanding the statute, the following may apply."

It would seem to me to be rather strange that if in an estimate item one could vote $400 million for a new program one could not add $100 million to a program if in a previous situation a certain sum had been voted perhaps as a result of specific legislative enactment. It seems clear to me that the addition of money should be possible and that explains why, on occasion, items which are powers to borrow, and the like, rather than actual votes of money and which require a $1 item and have in the past in particular pieces of legislation or estimates been included as an accompaniment to the actual money voted, may themselves be changed by the $1 item in the estimates.

In listening to the argument of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre I found that he noted very carefully the many precedents which exist in defence of the practices that are contained here. The parliamentary secretary has mentioned them as well. It was clear that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre was arguing in favour of what he would like to see the procedures be, but was not effectively dealing with what they are in fact.

I would like to refer to one particular item and to clear up an apparent misunderstanding. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre referred to the Loto Canada precedent in supplementary estimates A for 1976-77 in June of last year. That would have been a precedent perhaps for establishing Via Rail or other similar organizations, but I should make it clear to you, Mr. Speaker, and to hon. members—because in the remarks of several members it was not made clear—that this is not an item to create Via Rail Canada Incorporated. That company has already been created under the Canadian National Railways' power to create a subsidiary, and therefore fully in accordance with the law of the land and with the order in council approving the acquisition by CNR of the shares of that company.

The item might come before the House from time to time with specific, large sums of money in order to accomplish the purposes of a better rail passenger service. The main reason it is here is in answer to some concern on the part of the men and women working on the rail passenger service that the regulations have an immediate statutory base, so the item is contained in the estimates to give that base. I do not think the fact that it is $1 rather than a more substantial amount can affect the argument, as the parliamentary secretary, the hon. member for Assiniboia, has said. In the case of the Seaway, I should like to point to the immediately previous precedent in vote 108b in 1976-77 with regard to the Northern Transportation Company Limited where the same type of item was used to transfer debt to equity.

I am not sure whether hon. members opposite would find it any different if, instead of the use of the $1 item, there had been a vote for the amount of $624,950,000 which could have been voted for to purchase shares in the St. Lawrence Seaway, which money would then be used by the St. Lawrence Seaway to pay back to the Receiver General the same amount. Clearly, that would have been a straightforward item in the estimates in any hon. member's argument. However, it would have been rather misleading if the $1 item which has been used for other transfers of funds were used again for what amounts to that transfer not between votes but, between forms of equity, being created. I think it is clear that the argument of the parliamentary secretary is correct. Items in the estimates which affect legislation or which purport to create new programs must stand on their own merit, and that argument is the same whether the item is $1 or is for a substantial amount.

Therefore, I believe Your Honour will find, in the deliberations you will give to this question, that the precedents are strongly in favour of the maintenance of $1 items of the type being attacked and that, as I said earlier, whether or not one could argue about what the procedures might be one day in line with what the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre said he would like to see, the fact is, and the precedents indicate, that our procedures support these items at this time.

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, the arguments have been canvassed very thoroughly and therefore I will be brief. With reference to vote 1d, the Post Office item, I think it supports quite readily the arguments advanced by both the Minister of Transport and the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council. First of all, this is a supply vote, an addition by $1 to the total Post Office vote, and therefore that $1 is deemed to be a supplementary estimate. Its purpose is to authorize the payment to COJO of amounts that will be received by the Olympic organization for the sale of Olympic coins and Olympic products after December 31.

Under the existing statute which was passed for one specific purpose, namely, the indirect financing of the Olympic Games and the sales of philatelic items, the authority to pay the income to COJO from philatelic products ceased on December 31. What we are doing through the $1 item, the vote for supplementary estimates totalling $1, is to pay to COJO the amount less $1. The figures have not yet been completely defined. Without the additional $1 it would be impossible to pay the amount to COJO and it would have to be included within the general Post Office revenue. All that proves is that in this instance we are dealing with the authority that is extended by the House, which is master of its own procedures, through a legislative measure, namely, a $1 item in an appropriation bill to authorize the payment of funds in a way that was not contemplated in the original statute.

I adopt the argument presented by the Minister of Transport in the sense that what we are doing, in effect, is to take a $1 item and, by adding it to the estimates which have been previously voted by the House and adding to it a description of the purpose of that $1 item, permitting, through a bona fide legislative measure, something which otherwise could not have been done.

The precedents have been quoted by the parliamentary secretary and they support the contention that this practice has been honoured for some time. Once you accept that it is possible through a $1 item, which is a supplementary estimate, to transfer votes from one vote which is unused to another vote, or, as quoted in the precedents which have been cited, created a corporation such as Loto Canada, it must be recognized that the practice is established and it is a valid way of legislating changes. This has been demonstrated time and time again in precedents, and I see nothing in the arguments of hon. members opposite which would justify a change in that practice.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Postmaster General said that the subject has been canvassed very thoroughly, and I am sure the matter can be successfully concluded by the hon. member for Peace River.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, as I understood the last remarks of the Postmaster General, he was in effect saying that if you successfully engage in embezzling funds once and get away with it another dozen times, it then becomes a precedent and it is perfectly all right. The government says it engages in embezzling funds because it is more convenient, it is simpler and it does not have to go through the process of bringing before those nasty members of parliament all the reasons it wants this money so that it can be discussed in standing committees or in the House. The government says it does this by the simple, slippery method of using a $1 item in the votes.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): That was the essence of the argument.

Mr. Baldwin: I ask Your Honour to take judicial notice, because you are now presiding, and I ask you, as judge, to direct yourself and the jury to take notice of the fact that it is now 4.30 on Monday afternoon and three ministers of the Crown have risen, not to defend the principle, which is secondary, but to defend their own particular connivance with regard to the use of this method of obtaining money.

These ministers did not deal with the principle. They completely forgot the principle. The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources said that all the government is doing by vote L62d is authorizing Eldorado Nuclear to borrow some money. That constitutes an appropriation of funds, as far as this parliament is concerned, and it is designated by the statement put out, as I understand it, by the government. The estimates division of the Treasury Board put out a list of $1 votes included in supplementary estimates D. Category E is defined as being votes which authorize, guarantee or affect existing legislation. Obviously, this is not a guarantee and this, therefore, constitutes an admission of guilt by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources at the very instance of the words which have been put into the mouth of the estimates division of the Treasury Board that it is legislation.

I am not going to retrace the arguments which have been made by hon. members on all sides of the House with regard to this question, but the primary purpose of parliament is to pass on the appropriation, the voting and the expenditure of money. That is what brought parliament into existence. That is why we continue, albeit with extremely limited powers. There is no doubt about it; Hansard is full of statements of that kind. Beauschene's, page 198, citation 233, reads in part as follows:

> It is one of the old standing principles of our constitution that the House of Commons should control the finances of the country. That is the right, privilege and duty of the House.

We cannot control practices of this kind. There is simply no way by which we, on behalf of the people of Canada, can control the expenditures of this government. I intend to prove that very briefly in my remarks. I call to the attention of Your Honour what was said by Mr. Speaker Lamoureux in a statement which has already been referred to. At page 4126 of Hansard, third session, twenty-eighth parliament, in 1971, Mr. Speaker Lamoureux said the following:

> The minister is right, of course, when he suggests that the introduction and passage of statutory items in supplementary estimates is not an innovation in this House. This is a practice which goes back many years. At the same time, it has never been accepted readily by the House.

So much for these so-called precedents.

> Our debates record many instances when members have taken exception to the practice. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre himself is not a neophyte in this regard. For example, on March 31, 1952—if he does not mind my going back so far—as reported at page 969 of Hansard of that day he voiced strong objection to an item in the estimates which, he contended, would circumvent section 3 of the Atomic Energy Control Act. Another example of such objection is a statement by the then hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings, who stated in part as follows: "You have statutes; you may repeal them; you may amend them; but you cannot do it by supply bills."

The then member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings was a very good friend of mine and a great parliamentarian. I am glad to be standing next to Mr. Nowlan's son at this time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baldwin: The gist of the argument we are making at this time is that hon. members of this House are deprived of the opportunity to check, to challenge, to call witnesses, to examine in detail and to see to what extent there is adequate protection for the tax paying public of this country. Those rights are indispensable to our obligation to discharge our duties on behalf of the people of Canada, but they are taken from us by the use of $1 items which are, in effect, not legislative items and they do not amend legislation.

I conclude by calling to the attention of Your Honour two or three examples which indicate the grave dangers which exist if this practice is allowed to continue. The hon. member for Vegreville referred to the second report of the Standing Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons on Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments. One of the things which was brought before that committee was the way in which the government slyly and surreptiously enacted regulations based on items of this kind in such a way that nobody was aware of what was being done, of how much money was being spent and the circumstances under which it was being spent. On page 33 of that report the following appears:

> In delving into the intricacies of enabling powers under votes, the committee soon discovered that the enabling powers were often not found in the votes themselves, but in items in the estimates to which individual votes related.

I pause here to say that the committee discovered that there were at least 104 illustrations of this practice from 1972 to 1976. There are still some we were not able to discover. The committee had occasion to consider two amendments to the shipbuilding temporary assistance program regulations. I suppose these regulations were enacted properly in connection with shipbuilding temporary assistance. We perused the votes of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, assuming that we would find the basis for those regulations. But we found none. We then went back and inquired of the department and we were told that the authority lay in vote No. 5 and the item entitled "Capital subsidies for the construction of commercial and fishing vessels in accordance with regulations of the governor in council", listed in the details of the printed estimates for 1970-71, five years earlier. Vote 5 read as follows:

Trade-Industrial—The grants listed in the estimates and contributions and to increase to $150,000,000 the commitments during the current and subsequent fiscal years for payments to develop and sustain the technological capability of Canadian defence industry, and to increase to $60,000,000 the commitments during the current and subsequent fiscal years for payments to advance the technological capability of Canadian manufacturing industry by supporting selected civil (non-defence) development projects.

On the basis of that vote six years later the government enacted regulations giving it the power to pay out moneys in connection with the shipbuilding program. Those are the dangers the House and the people of this country face if this kind of practice is allowed to continue without some caveat filed by us which is given serious consideration by Your Honour.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I certainly want to thank all hon. members who contributed to this discussion. As has been described, it is far from an incidental aspect of our procedures. It touches very fundamentally upon the right of parliament to function, the right to examine the spending program and to control the spending program through parliamentary votes, which is perhaps the most fundamental aspect of the work of parliament.

● (1640)

In conjunction with that is the legislative role. It is clear that some statement ought to be attempted to separate those powers which the House possesses by way of supply and those powers which the House possesses by way of legislation. That is not a task that I look forward to with particular relish. It is an important task. It is a statement that I will attempt in the hope that it may assist the House in guiding itself in future procedures. It is a responsibility which I take very seriously.

I thank all the hon. members for their very conscientious and well though-out presentations on the subject. I note that the last allotted day in the supply period is tomorrow. The first reading of the supply bill will be given in accordance with our slightly modified practices of recent date. By the order passed earlier today, the second reading of that bill is deferred until some other time. Is my impression incorrect?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, the supplementary estimates, with contain all these $1 items, are to be completed tomorrow night. It is the interim supply bill that has been put off until Thursday.

Mr. Speaker: During the course of the argument, I took a quick look at the order to see what impact it had, and I wondered if we were not leaving ourselves open to the deferral of a portion of the decision we would have to face tomorrow night. In any case, if it is possible to do so we will work around the clock to try to come forward with whatever statement I ought to make on this question just as soon as we possibly can.

[Mr. Baldwin.]

There was an indication, during motions, when the motion standing in the name of the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants was called that there had been some arrangement whereby his motion would be called during orders of the day.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Speaker, my understanding was that this matter would be proceeded with after presentation of the report of the statutory instruments committee.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed that we proceed with the immigration bill under orders of the day?

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): That is agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

IMMIGRATION ACT, 1976

AMENDMENTS TO IMPLEMENT CHANGES IN IMMIGRATION POLICY

The House resumed, from Wednesday, March 16, consideration of the motion of Mr. Cullen that Bill C-24, respecting immigration to Canada, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration.

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, members may recall that on the closing of the debate on this measure last Wednesday I was mentioning that it seems to me, in dealing with Bill C-24, that we have before us a basic change in terms of ultimate concepts, if not in terms of practices. I have before me a pamphlet that is widely available in immigration offices throughout the world and our own immigration office here. It is called "How Canada Selects Immigrants". It begins by responding to the question, "Who can apply?" The answer is given, "Anyone can apply to come to Canada. There is no quota on the number of immigrants who may be admitted from any area or country".

Theoretically, that has been the position of the government for many years, and certainly particularly so since the white paper about ten years ago. What we have been launched on over the last two or three years, particularly with the publication of the green paper, and subsequently with the work of the joint committee, has been an attempt to move away from that position with the very active encouragement of the government. I suppose that is the reason the committee, in issuing its report, said in section 29:

For these reasons, the committee recommends a shift from the present immigration system, which allows for the admission of everyone meeting certain criteria regardless of numbers, to a more managed system capable of regulating the total flow. However, the proposed system must do this in a fair and non-discriminatory, efficient, and manageable way.

That, perhaps, is the crux of the issue and the crux of the position that has been taken by the government in response to the committee's report. As hon. members may know, at the time the report was published I and a number of other members identified ourselves in the publication of a minority report. In addition to that, I issued a kind of minority comment of my own with respect to the work of the special joint committee, not in any way attempting to downgrade much of the work done by the committee but to point out some of the weaknesses of the process and some of the shortcomings of its final report.

What we have had over the past two years—and this has been supported by a number of volunteer organizations who have been extremely critical of this process—is a kind of illusion of full participation. There was the publication of the green paper with its extensive supporting documents. There was the intensive and extensive series of hearings across the country, some of them verging on violence with the kind of confrontation that took place. Finally there was the published report, and now the bill.

What the minister and many of the officials would have us believe is that there has been the widest kind of participation and consultation possible. Yet I do not think it takes much penetrating analysis to realize that there was not really an adequate consultation or an adequate probing beneath the surface of previously held prejudices and false assumptions. I said in my own minority comment on November 6, 1975, in terms of the work of the committee of which I was a member:

● (1650)

From the outset, the committee did not fully understand or agree on what a meaningful consultation on immigration involved... As well, by allowing extremely little time, serious-minded and extensive national organizations had insufficient time to consult their membership and stimulate a worth-while, educational and thoughtful response.

I went on to say:

The committee, perhaps without realizing it, became a sounding board for extremist groups and had little opportunity to balance the hearings in favour of those who were more thoughtful and did not have an immediate axe to grind.

If there is any doubt about the willingness of the government to engage in full dialogue with the people of this country, let alone the members of this government, it should be in the shocking reluctance of the minister to present to this House the regulations that have already been drafted with respect to this particular bill.

Mr. Cullen: Not true.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): If the minister indicates that it is not true, I hope he will be able to explain it to his senior officials who some weeks ago provided him with a packet of fairly well-defined draft regulations that would accompany this legislation. If it is not true, I would like to know how he expects, as he said in the debate, to discuss the substance of the more important regulations. The minister cannot have it both ways. If they have not been drafted, it will be impossible to discuss them. If they have been drafted, the only reason I can conclude he is not willing to present them to the House and the Canadian public is that he is not willing to trust their judgment, not willing to state the full ramifications of this new immigration policy on which we are being launched.

I would like to know why the minister is reluctant to take the Canadian people into his confidence. Why is he not willing to trust the people in their ultimate judgment, particularly on a matter which will so profoundly affect the unfolding development of this country?

I will be delighted to hear the hon. member speak and state his position with respect to the importance of these regulations. I will be very surprised if any member of this House, on either side, believes that the bill before us for debate this afternoon in any way adequately states or defines the basis on which, or the practices by which immigration policy is going to be followed in this country. While the minister may be accepting congratulations for the fact that a number of anachronisms are being removed from the legislation of 1952, a number of aspects of this bill strike me as the classic example of taking one step forward and two steps backward. I hope members on all sides will think very carefully before giving the minister and his department any more power than that which they presently enjoy.

Let me give a couple of examples of the way in which this bill seems to be, at best, a poorly-drafted document. I said on Wednesday last that this bill is particularly important because it deals with people. It attempts to regulate the comings and goings of people in and out of Canada. It is a major operation, when you think of something like 70 million crossings that take place with respect to our national borders each year. It is perhaps more than 70 million now: that statistic is likely out of date. I look at the bill and the statement of principles. While this may seem like a semantic quibble, surely it is a profound criticism with regard to the human quality of this legislation. Clause 5(2) reads:

An immigrant may be granted landing if he is not a member of an inadmissible class—

Clause 5(3) reads:

A visitor may be granted entry and allowed to remain in Canada during the period for which he was granted entry—

Clause 6(1) reads:

Subject to this act and the regulations, any convention refugee, member of the family class or other immigrant may be granted landing if he is able to establish—

I would like to know why immigrants are referred to throughout this bill as "he". Maybe I missed something along the line. I have looked at other legislation. It seems we have moved beyond the kind of sexist definition in legislation and refer to people as "persons", "individuals" or some other non-sexist definition. To provide a new immigration act in the seventies which has a sexist language base certainly is most inappropriate. Even the definition of the minister refers to him as being "he". I suspect that future governments might well want to question whether the Minister of Immigration should always be male. Of perhaps more profound concern with respect to this legislation is the general definition in clause 8, where it reads:

Where a person seeks to come into Canada, the burden of proving that he has a right to come into Canada or that his admission would not be contrary to this act or the regulations rests on him.

This seems to reinforce, or at least this puts into very definite law the situation where each and every individual—not just immigrants, visitors or aliens, but Canadian citizens—could well be faced with the position where, through no fault of their own, they might come to one of the national borders of their own country without specific documentation. Perhaps they are people who are new Canadian citizens. They discover that they are not able to document or prove what in fact, their citizenship is with respect to their own country. Here is a case of turning traditional British law upside down. According to this Immigration Act, a person is presumed to be an alien until he can prove himself a citizen.

What has bothered me most about this legislation from start to finish is that it has a kind of suspicious or mean quality to it. People are being taken, not at their best or not even as they might normally be, but potentially at their worst. I suggest a clear indication of that can be found in clause 19 of the bill where we find a marginal note used to explain the inclusion of a new definition with respect to inadmissible classes. The clause I am referring to is 19(1)(d). The following persons would not be admissible:

—persons who there are reasonable grounds to believe are likely to engage in criminal activity—

The marginal note says this is new and is intended to deal with persons who, though never convicted of any offence, are known to be closely connected with organized crime. This is an interesting definition. The marginal note is even more interesting: it provides for a new class of people who would be inadmissible to Canada because they might potentially be criminally-minded or criminally-active. While the note explains this is intended to deal only with persons known to be closely connected with organized crime, the clause obviously encompasses a much wider group of persons. How the minister, in law, can defend or explain this particular definition, given the nature of our society, profoundly disturbs me.

I do not know how the minister can think this kind of definition would be acceptable when people are increasingly concerned about the danger of false arrests. They are increasingly concerned about the way civil liberties can be so readily violated with regard to the use of secret information that is often traded between countries which in many instances cannot be adequately documented. I think, in particular, of organizations which have little definable reputation in this country, such as Interpol. I am not sure in what way the minister is able to defend this guilt by association clause which he has so willingly included in the inadmissible classes.

More important for people who will come here as legitimate immigrants is the clause which deals with the increased grounds for deportation. That has attached, now, terms and conditions. The minister, quite obviously, is attempting through this piece of legislation to provide some mechanism under the Immigration Act to determine where people will live and what they will do. This will not be in terms of incentives or in terms of the creation of a climate, as suggested by the joint committee report which talked much more about inducement than regulation. Perhaps this is the difference between the bill before us and the joint committee report. Sections 84 and 85 of the joint committee report deal with the problems of regional development and immigration. The joint committee recommended:

As now proposed, the only inducement offered to a prospective immigrant to settle in a designated community is the opportunity to emigrate immediately.

That, of course, was the backing-up of its position, explored by the joint committee, that there would be some kind of incentive to, as the committee said, jump to the head of the queue if a person would agree to settle in a community or area which would help to balance off the inflow of new immigrants. The committee went on to say:

That the proposal be approached imaginatively and that consultation with the provinces be undertaken about the various ways of applying the principle which the committee wishes to promote, the one of the goals immigration can help to serve in regional development.

That is a very different kind of proposal than that brought forward by the minister, one which would in a sense impose terms and conditions on the landing of this immigrant. If those terms and conditions are violated, that person even might be required or forced to leave the country. Indeed, if there was a violation of those terms and conditions, clause 27(1)(b) would allow for the deportation for any contravention of a term and condition even beyond his or her control. This certainly misses both the point and the spirit of this legislation.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Gilbert)—Finance—Request for increased financial support for housing for low income groups; the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKenzie)—External Affairs—Soviet action against symposium of Jews in Moscow—Possibility of Canadian protest; the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Fraser)—Income Tax—Possibility of change in treatment of revenue earned by Indian bands—Government position.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Notice of motion No. 4 in the name of the hon. member for Ottawa-Vanier (Mr. Gauthier).

Mr. Goodale: Mr. Speaker, I believe there is general consensus to proceed with notice of motion No. 12, standing in the name of the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall), which is the resumption of debate at this stage.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT

SUGGESTED AMENDMENT TO PROVIDE BENEFITS TO ADOPTIVE PARENTS

The House resumed, from November 22, 1976, consideration of the motion of Mr. Forrestall:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should give consideration to the advisability of introducing legislation to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act to provide benefits to the adoptive parent of an infant, similar to the maternity benefits now provided to workers who are unemployed due to pregnancy.

Mr. Arthur Portelance (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, this is not the first time we have raised this issue of paying unemployment benefits to adoptive parents. It has been under review by the Unemployment Insurance Commission for nearly five years. This issue has several aspects. For example, let us talk about the concept of adoption in society. There used to be a lot of children for adoption. Now there are fewer. More than ever single mothers are likely to keep their child. Contraceptives are more sophisticated and more widely acceptable. There are much fewer unwanted children available for an increasing number of adoptive parents to be. Let us consider also the possibility of a single parent adopting a child. Some 10 or 15 years ago that was unthinkable. Nowadays it is done much more frequently.

However, social values alone must not be considered. The phenomenon of adoption itself is being altered. Nowadays children's aid societies encourage the adoption of older children. It often happens that those children have physical and emotional behaviour problems. This is why the needs of those children and adoptive parents are really different. The development is carried on.

In this new world of adoption, it is probably true to say that adoptive families have an adequate income. The adoption agencies carefully select a family and the annual income is an important criterion. Thus most adoptive families have an adequate annual income. The necessity of providing some financial assistance can be reconsidered.

We cannot rule out the possibility of extending benefits to adoptive parents without considering the objective of the unemployment insurance scheme. It is indeed an insurance. A temporary income is provided to any individual who has lost an insurable job. During that time, the individual must actively look for some employment except when unable to work due to illness or pregnancy. Thus the unemployment insurance plan provides interim assistance to workers who lose their jobs unintentionally, who are able to work and who are looking for a job, or to workers who are not physically able to work for a while.

Let us consider this definition in the light of problems which face the adoptive parent. For example, is the fact of adopting a child reason for being unemployed and unable to find a job? I think the answer is no. Being able to work and being available for this purpose are the two main points of the unemployment insurance legislation. The adoptive parent may meet both requirements. For example, if the adopted child needs the constant care of an adoptive parent and if this parent is obviously able to work but not available under the provisions of the unemployment insurance legislation, the adoptive parent who retired from the labour force is physically able to work but not available.

Furthermore, a mother who has a child and who receives unemployment allowances is considered as physically unable to work. Consequently, if the adoptive parent is not available to work, he or she is not eligible for benefits under the unemployment insurance plan. Both principles of ability and availability enable to define clearly the eligibility for unemployment insurance benefits.

By giving benefits to the adoptive parents, however commendable in principle, we would somehow pay people who are able to work but who left the labour force of their own free will. This has nothing to do with the uncontrollable physical reasons I mentioned earlier. When they make their application for adoption, the parents are clearly made aware of the infant's needs. It may be necessary for one parent to stay home. If both parents work when they file their application, they voluntarily decide that one of them will stop working to stay home.

If the government were considering extending benefit eligibility to adoptive parents, it would create a precedent which would undermine the very principles of unemployment insurance. Anyone capable of working but unavailable for reasons other than those related to the labour market could take advantage of the system. To push the argument further, someone could advocate excellent reasons to say that he is unavailable for work and, consequently, he could be entitled to unemployment insurance benefits by deciding that he is not available.

I do not want in any way to discredit children adoption, quite the contrary. As I said earlier, adoption plays a primary role in finding a home for orphans or disadvantaged children or orphans. This is an opportunity to experience the joy of parenthood for those who cannot bear children or decide not to have any for reasons of their own. The question put before the House is not a vote in favour of or against adoption. Neither is it a vote for or against a kind of assistance to adoptive parents who need some temporary assistance to take care of their child. The Unemployoment Insurance Act is by no means the appropriate instrument to provide them with income security.

It is true that some adoptive parents need financial assistance whereas others do not. But neither these nor the others have been involuntarily taken away from the work force. The decision of adopting a child is taken consciously. So is also the decision to leave the labour force, which is a consequence of it. Let us think about the basic goal of unemployment insurance, which is to provide temporary income when somebody is no longer on a payroll, so that the worker may resume his place within the labour force as soon as possible. That is the basic goal of unemployment insurance. In Canada, unemployment is a serious problem, and the unemployment insurance plan is not a welfare program.

Nor is it a remedy to give general comfort in every new social need, regardless of how legitimate it may be. I am convinced that unemployment insurance is not the appropriate vehicle to supplement the income of parents who decide to adopt a child and who must, for extremely valid reasons, quit the labour force for a while.

As maternity benefits already exist, I understand readily why some would like adoptive parents to receive them as well. At first glance, it seems reasonable enough. But, in fact, this would conflict with the insurance principles on which the unemployment insurance system is based. Maternity benefits are paid out because the prospective mother is unable to work. Adoptive parents on the other hand are physically able to work, though the adoption centres require that a parent stay at home for a while.

Above all, the unemployment insurance system must not become a substitute for other social benefit programs. That is one of the great fallacies of our times: that unemployment insurance should be the mechanism through which the federal government meets all legitimate needs of Canadians. Unemployment insurance is a social insurance but not the answer to Canadians' need for income, regardless of their nature. The House of Commons is now studying Bill C-27 which will amend the Unemployment Insurance Act. During the debate, I am sure all hon. members will have the opportunity of presenting their views on the subject. The aim is to make unemployment insurance more efficient and to bringing it closer to its intended purpose. The amendments are drawn up in such a way as to reinforce the insurance aspect of the plan, to underscore its basic insurance principles.

I do not deny the fact that adoptive parents may really need some form of assistance for their worthy efforts. In some ways, the role of the adoptive parent may be even more difficult and demanding than that of a natural parent. Still, I cannot support the motion because I am convinced that, although adoptive parents may need help, unemployment insurance is not the vehicle through which it should be given.

[Mr. Portelance.]

[English]

Mr. J. Larry Condon (Middlesex-London-Lambton): Mr. Speaker, I have two immediate reactions to the suggestion that the unemployment insurance benefit be extended to adoptive parents. The first is to point out that this is not a new subject. Indeed, it has been considered by the Unemployment Insurance Commission on many occasions over the last five years. My second reaction is that adoptive parents certainly deserve consideration of the special problems that they face. There is little doubt that in some cases adoptive parents may—and I say "may"—have more difficulties in caring for their new child than the parents of newborn infants. So a proposal to extend UIC benefits to adoptive parents cannot be dismissed lightly. We have to see how adoptive parents and natural parents differ under the Unemployment Insurance Act and then weigh whether unemployment insurance is the proper program to assist both groups.

I am convinced that adoptive parents may well need support programs. In many cases I feel bound to question whether the Unemployment Insurance Act is the proper piece of legislation to provide this support. The adoptive parent plays an essential role in our society and the adoption process brings the joys of parenthood into many lives.

There have, of course, been dramatic changes in adoption in our society over the last several years. At one time the majority of adopted children were infants and there were in fact a large number of infants available for adoption. Now, changing social values have radically altered this pattern—for better or for worse it is an individual's decision to make. Conception control measures are more sophisticated. Single mothers are more and more tending to keep their babies instead of putting them up for adoption. For both reasons there is no longer a large surplus of unwanted babies available for an insufficient number of prospective parents; quite the reverse is true in many areas.

Social values regarding adoption are changing in many ways. For example, it would have been virtually unheard of 10 or 15 years ago for a single parent to adopt a child. While it is still far from the norm, it is happening more and more now. Children's aid societies are encouraging the adoption of older children. In many cases these are children with behavioural, psychological or physical problems. Their needs and the needs of their adoptive parents are, therefore, different from the need of many adoptive parents in the past.

In this new world of adoption it is probably fair to say that many adopting families have adequate means of income, although I must say that that is not the criterion of the Children's aid societies. Children's aid societies pay a great deal of attention to the suitability of adopting families, and income is one of the criteria which they use in making their decisions, though I can assure the House it is not the major one. Because of requirements like this, many adoptive families are in the middle or upper income brackets. Their need for financial support, including unemployment insurance, may therefore be questioned.

The core of my concern here is not whether adoptive parents may need some form of support. Some will, and others will not. I believe the issue before the House is whether the unemployment insurance program is the proper place to provide the support for those who need it. To answer that question we may have to consider the objectives of the unemployment insurance program, so often stated yet so often misunderstood.

The fundamental objective of the unemployment insurance legislation was, and remains, to provide adequate, short-term income maintenance for workers who, for reasons beyond their control, are unemployed, capable of work, available and seeking employment or temporarily physically incapable of work. Let us examine that definiton against the problems faced by adopting parents. The operative words are, first, "for reasons beyond their control". There can be no question that adopting a child is a voluntary decision, however laudable it may be. It is not, I submit, a reason beyond a person's control for being unemployed. Capability for work and availability for work are two cardinal principles of the unemployment insurance legislation. Here, again, the adoptive parent may or may not qualify.

If, for example, the early care of an adoptive child requires a period for one working parent to remain at home, clearly that parent is physically capable of work but not available for work within the meaning of the unemployment insurance program. An adopting parent who has withdrawn from the labour force is physically capable of work but not available for work. But the mother of a natural child, while on unemployment insurance maternity benefit, is presumed not to be physically capable of work within the meaning of the Unemployment Insurance Act. So if the adopting parent is not available for work, in terms of the unemployment insurance program, he or she is not entitled to any benefit. These two principles of capability with availability and incapability function as clear instruments to define those who are entitled to unemployment insurance benefits.

To pay benefit to adopting parents, laudable though this may seem in principle, would be to pay people who while capable of work are not in the labour force by their own decision. There is no question here of physical reasons beyond their control, as I mentioned earlier. In the adoption process, the particular needs of the child are carefully explained to the parents. Virtually, at the outset, the possible need for one parent to remain at home becomes apparent. If both parents are working when they decide to adopt a child and the adoption requires that one parent stay at home to supervise the child, adoption becomes a conscious decision that one parent leave the labour force at least for a short time.

Were the government to consider extending unemployment insurance benefit to adopting parents, this would set a precedent which would begin to cut away at the very roots of unemployment insurance principles. It would open the door to any capable but unavailable insured person whose unemployment was caused by exigencies not directly related to the labour market. Any person could, by this reasoning process, elect to become unavailable for work for any good purpose in their own mind, arguing that they were entitled to unemployment insurance benefit on the grounds that their decision made them unavailable for work.

Let me stress, again, that I am not attacking the valid and worthy process of adopting children, because I am an adoptive parent. As I have said, adoption plays a vital role in our society in providing good homes for disadvantaged or parentless children. It also makes it possible for parents who cannot, or choose not to, have natural children, for whatever reason, to experience the wonder of becoming parents.

The question before this House is clearly not a vote for or against adoption. Nor is it a vote for or against some form of aid for those adopting parents who may need transitional aid in caring for their adopted child. The real issue, I submit, is that the Unemployment Insurance Act is not the proper vehicle to provide adoptive parents with income security. It must be admitted that some adoptive parents need financial aid and others certainly do not. But in neither case are they involuntarily out of the labour force. Adopting a child remains a conscious decision and, for a working parent, perhaps a conscious decision to leave the labour force at least for a time.

Let us all remember that the basic purpose of unemployment insurance is to provide income maintenance where interruption of earnings has occurred, and to do so in a way which ensures that the worker will return to the labour force as soon as possible. This is the basic purpose of unemployment insurance.

Unemployment is a serious problem in Canada today. But unemployment insurance is not a welfare program. Neither is it a sort of catch-all mechanism which can be used to provide general support to every social need which arises, legitimate though it may be. My own conviction is that the unemployment insurance program is not the proper vehicle to provide income support to parents who choose to adopt and who must, for very valid reasons, drop out of the labour force for a short time.

At first glance there appears to be authority in the Unemployment Insurance Act for aiding adopting parents. Because the unemployment insurance program already provides maternity benefits, I can easily understand why some believe that these benefits should be extended to adoptive parents. Viable as this may seem at first glance, it would entail a radical shift away from the insurance principles upon which unemployment insurance benefits are provided. Maternity benefits are paid because of physical incapacity to work. Adoptive parents are not physically incapable of work, though adoption societies may require one parent to stay at home with the new child for a period.

Especially at this time the unemployment insurance program must not become a substitute for other social aid programs which are really needed. It is one of the great fallacies of our time that unemployment insurance is the general aid mechanism through which the federal government can solve virtually any legitimate social need of Canadians. Unemployment insurance is, in truth, social insurance, not a general answer to Canadians' income needs, regardless of their nature.

This House is considering amendments to the unemployment insurance legislation in Bill C-27. These are designed to make the unemployment insurance program more effective and more responsive in its true role. These amendments are quite rightly designed to reinforce the insurance character of the program and emphasize the insurance principles upon which it is founded.

I do not dispute that adoptive parents may very well need some form of support in their very worth-while endeavours. Indeed, in many ways the role of the adoptive parents is often harder than that of the natural parent. But I find I cannot support this motion because I firmly believe that if help for some adoptive parents is needed, unemployment insurance is not the right way to provide this help. I hope we can consider other ways to do this through different programs in the federal as well as in the provincial field.

Mr. F. A. Philbrook (Halton): Mr. Speaker, I congratulate the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall) and the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) for proposing and seconding the motion we are considering. Hon. members show, by proposing such motions, a concern for human need in society. The motion we are considering reads:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the government should give consideration to the advisability of introducing legislation to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act to provide benefits to the adoptive parent of an infant, similar to the maternity benefits now provided to workers who are unemployed due to pregnancy.

Clearly, the motion involves two areas of concern. One part of the motion recognizes that there is a need for people to adopt somebody else's child. The motion speaks of "an infant" but, of course, not only infants are adopted. The other part of the motion concerns the fulfillment of that need, and this is the part which raises difficulty. Nobody will deny the importance of the first part of the motion; for the need in this regard is evident in all parts of the country and all parts of society. However, the proposal that the Unemployment Insurance Act should be the mechanism for providing benefits to the adoptive parent can lead to great difficulties, especially at the present time.

Let me talk about adoption. Many of the points I shall raise have been made previously but I think they are worth repeating. Anyone who adopts a child deserves our greatest admiration. It is difficult enough these days for natural parents to bring up their own children; their children confront a changing world, a world in which our social and moral values are changing. It is difficult to raise children, and expensive. In fact, it is so expensive that many young people are not having children. But we must have them, for society must continue. We must do our best to raise good citizens. Everything I have said about natural children applies to adopted babies. They are fun to have around, and gratifying. But bringing up children entails sacrifice. For them we give up part of ourselves and in that way we help, not only the child but society in general.

[Mr. Condon.]

Difficult though it is to adopt a baby, it may be even more difficult to adopt an older child who may have gone from foster home to foster home. The history of such children is often tragic. I know this point is not strictly pertinent to the motion, but it is worth mentioning. The unfortunate foster child is often bounced, as it were, from home to home and, in the process, becomes psychologically disturbed. Perhaps the foster child is one of our most serious social problems. I raise this point to throw light on the role of adoptive parents, and because I have had some experience in this field.

Hon. members will recall that about two years ago there was great excitement concerning the adoption of Vietnamese babies. It was not long before members of parliament were aware of all the excitement and commotion, for I remember distinctly three cases in my riding, in my town. I looked into these cases. What I learned was not encouraging. One family which adopted a Vietnamese baby has done well. The child has been raised as one of their own children and they are all living together as a stable, traditional family. Another family left town, hence I do not know what happened to it. But the third family worries me. This couple took a long, expensive trip to the United States, to take charge of the baby. Within a few months of the baby's arriving home, I noticed that the mother was working again. I am not sure why she is working; the family is well off. I suppose it is the usual case of the woman wanting to pursue her own career and have her own job. But it ought to make us think carefully about the whole business of adoption.

Inasmuch as there are responsibilities and duties in adopting—and the adoptive parent certainly deserves credit for adopting—there are also joys and benefits that come from having an adopted child, particularly if it is the only child in the family.

Along with credit for adoptive parents who, by and large, are mostly capable, wonderful people, credit should go to our chief provincial agency, the Children's Aid Society. I think everybody will agree they are doing a good job of this, whether it is the business of adoption, their involvement in homes where there is child-beating, or their numerous other responsibilities with respect to runaways, and so on. It is a remarkable organization. I think of people such as Ron Copeland and Mrs. Joan Lee in my riding, whom I have personally seen in action. I have great admiration for both of them.

In the case of adoptions, probably the most remarkable job that the Children's Aid Society has done is in matching up children with parents. We have probably all made the same mistake of saying to adoptive parents, "My goodness, your child looks just like you" and then being told, with some embarrassment, that the child is adopted, that there is no physical relationship. This is the type of work that the Children's Aid Society does, and it makes a big difference.

They have a great responsibility in making sure that the income of adoptive parents is adequate. I understand that in some cases they go so far as to require what is called a supervising parent for a period of up to six months, but that is optional. This is an indication of the kind of care that is given in the adopting process and how well it usually works out.

That is not to say that there are no problems. We are all aware of the difficult adjustments that are required sometimes by the child, the parents, and anyone else involved in the process. In spite of the excellent modern work of the Children's Aid Society, there are physical and psychological problems that occur. Sometimes it is the question of both parents working. This is a serious enough matter with natural parents. There is a great deal of concern about what it does to the children as well as to the parents if one parent, usually the mother, is not at home. In spite of their income needs or wants, being at home when raising children, at least until they are psychologically mature at which time the parent who is at home can resume his or her career, is very important. The suitability of parents is certainly another serious concern, not only in terms of their ability, both natural and acquired, in terms of how much they prepare themselves to raise the child, but also their emotional stability and the stability of their marriage. The emotional and psychological needs of the child must also be considered.

The subject of income, as I understand it, unless our part of the country is not typical, is not a problem usually, and this bears directly on the bill before us. This bill is concerned with the income of the adoptive parent. What we find in Halton is that adoptive parents are well screened in this respect. They usually have the necessary income, and one of them has the motivation and desire to stay at home.

Then we get down to the availability of children for adoption these days. There has been a dramatic change in our times. There used to be a great shortage of adoptive parents; now there is a great shortage of children for adoption. That may change in the future, but it is an important factor which, I think, has a bearing on this bill.

With regard to the first half of the bill, I think we have a clear picture with regard to adoption itself. We all approve the adoption process. We probably all agree that in perhaps the majority of cases no assistance is necessary from the state to help the adoptive parents. They have their own income and one parent is prepared to stay at home. We all welcome the joys and the value to society of the adoption process and we recognize the fact that in some cases there may be a need for aid. I am not aware of any such cases lately, but I would certainly appreciate hearing if there are any. Perhaps there are parents who need some assistance who are willing to adopt children who are without an adoptive home.

Now we come to this whole business of unemployment insurance. For me it has been a very difficult and soul-searching subject for at least the last two years. Certainly it was a hot subject for me during the 1974 election campaign. I have been working hard on it with a great deal of agony ever since. As we know, originally the UIC program was designed to be a straight mathematical program for those who paid an insurance premium. Then it was extended to those who were included in the whole process of unemployment, and it became a national social program, which at first covered 4 per cent and later, under a certain formula, over 5.8 per cent, and perhaps the level will go higher than that. There is a great deal of concern about that. There are still some people who want this to be a straight program of insurance with no government assistance. This is a tough line, but at least we know where they stand.

It became more difficult a few years ago when certain other provisions were added, but there was an argument over the business of sickness benefits. Certainly sickness is not a form of unemployment, yet in many cases there was no good sickness coverage. Nothing was provided by the provinces to help people when they were laid off, workers who were not unionized. But somehow we managed to get by and most people have accepted it. Beyond that the next step was more controversial, namely, maternity benefits. I do not know what the experience of my colleagues was in that respect but it gave me a difficult time in the last election campaign.

There are people who simply cannot accept the concept of maternity benefits under the UIC program, and some of their arguments are understandable. There is the question of whether a person has a choice in being off work due to maternity, whether this was or was not a planned event. I suppose that in some cases it is planned, and in others it is unplanned. Nonetheless, there is a definite need in the case of some people and we will probably not have much luck in sorting out the planners from the unplanners, so we might as well include the latter in a universal program.

This leads me to the motion. If natural maternity is in question, what about adoptive maternity? There is no indication that the person had no choice. This is a voluntary process. The parents—in some cases the single parent—know what they are doing when they adopt. They have a clean-cut choice. They do not have to be off work, and that is the main point in considering whether or not maternity benefits should come under UIC. Unemployment insurance, even though it has become very complicated, is still a process of financial support for those who are out of work through no choice of their own. It comes down simply to that and no more. We have some grey areas, but when it comes right down to it, adoption is hard to imagine as one of those grey areas.

We have many other problems. For the first few years of this parliament the pressure was great—it certainly was for me as one member of parliament—on the question of abuses and disincentives. We all heard of the terrible outcry about the so called UIC ski teams out west, those who took UIC payments and used them for a holiday instead of trying to find a job and getting back into the productive work force. There are many other examples, even when there is a cracking down, a toughening and a tightening up which the government and the UIC have brought about.

There is tremendous concern about the total pay-out of unemployment insurance per year of $3 billion to $4 billion. That is perhaps 10 per cent of our total annual federal budget.

That budget is considered to have grown very fast, and it is very large at the present time. There is just too much money being paid out for too little productivity. The amount of money being paid out is high enough, but the loss of productivity is even more pronounced.

Without being the least bit partisan, it has to be mentioned that if the government has been pulled into line, part of the credit should go to its own backbenchers. Certainly the official opposition has traditionally taken a very stern, tough, clear stand on UIC payments, particularly abuses and disincentives, although lately in times of suddenly much greater unemployment it seems to have taken a more conciliatory stand, which makes life a little confusing around here.

I give credit to the New Democratic Party for its stand on unemployment insurance benefits and other social benefits. If rather one-sided about favouring these payments, the NDP has certainly been consistent. It certainly has not switched its position in any way at all. It is consistent, and we know where it stands.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Hear, hear!

Mr. Philbrook: We have a few problems. One is basically a misunderstanding of the character and purpose of this social program. Another one is the search for a proper vehicle for all our financial support needs as they come up. This bill brings to our attention a very real need. It is small but real. There is a temptation to use something like UIC as a catch-all if we cannot work anything else out in a logical way. Another problem is the timing of Bill C-27, the main purpose of which, as I understand it, is to go the opposite way, to pull in the reins on the UIC program, to rationalize and to bring some measure of control to this valuable program so that it is not discredited, even to the point of bringing it down to the original plan it was supposed to be.

To put it very frankly, we need to check abuses and disincentives, and people from the Maritimes, including the hon. member who proposed this motion, the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East, will certainly appreciate that because this is of concern to the people of the Maritimes, which now have a high unemployment rate.

I apologize to the House for talking for so long, but I think we need a real social welfare program for something like adoption, not the unemployment insurance program. That is just not the right program. That program already has too much pressure on it.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his allotted time has expired.

Mr. S. Victor Railton (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the fact that this motion has behind it an excellent intention. It was brought forward because of the character of its proposer and its seconder. They are generous people who are trying to find, through the Unemployment Insurance Act, some means of giving special benefits to a special small group. However, it should be pointed out that, as most of the other speakers have mentioned, the Unemployment Insurance Act was brought in for a certain purpose. That purpose must be adhered to; otherwise, we will need a completely new act.

The government has handled unemployment insurance in a very imaginative way in Canada.

Mr. Alexander: In what way?

Mr. Railton: I always enjoy talking to the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander), but I cannot do it directly right now.

Canada has been singled out by other countries as a leader in trying to deal with the tragic problem of unemployment. United States Senator Hubert Humphrey recently wrote to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Cullen).

The letter said that the United States is very fortunate to have a neighbour to the north which not only faces many of the problems of its own economy but which has the leadership and foresight to take innovative approaches to these problems.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Railton: The letter goes on to say that young people in the United States will be very fortunate indeed if the United States merely follows that lead and establishes the same kinds of programs there. I ask the hon. member for Hamilton West, what do you think of that?

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, is the hon. member asking a question?

Mr. Railton: That was a rhetorical question which does not require an answer.

I would like to re-emphasize that the basic purpose of the unemployment insurance program is to provide income maintenance where an interruption of earnings has occurred, and to do so in a manner which ensures that the worker will return to the labour force as soon as possible. My colleague from Brampton identified the needs of recipients of unemployment insurance, and he went into the question of how to fulfil those needs.

In 1971 the government recognized the need to cover interruptions of earnings relating to maternity, and that the provision of adequate maternity legislation was of the utmost importance in Canada where over one-third of the active labour force is female and where approximately one in six workers is a married woman. Because of the plight of many thousands of women who had little or no protection when unemployed due to pregnancy, in 1971 the government included in the Unemployment Insurance Act provisions to provide up to 15 weeks of unemployment insurance maternity benefits to women with at least 20 weeks of insurable employment.

Furthermore, the payment of benefits to major attachment claimants who have incurred an interruption of earnings due to pregnancy is a recognition of the principle that this condition causes a claimant to be incapable of work. I do not think anyone would gainsay that fact.

As a very young physician I practised for a short time as a country practitioner, and I think my instructions to stay in bed for a certain length of time were often ignored. I remember driving in my Model A and seeing a woman running from her back porch, and when I got in, she was in bed waiting for my call. This occurred sometimes. The same day that woman had her youngster, she was up preparing a meal for her husband and his hired men who were doing the harvest. There are real work barriers for women as well as for men. People like the woman to whom I referred are few and far between.

Usually after six months of pregnancy—in the third trimester—women are not welcome in places of work because there is a certain amount of danger, particularly in factories. There is a danger of too much activity and overwork which could lead to miscarriage. In addition, pregnant women deserve a certain amount of courtesy and help during that period of their lives.

After the baby is born, the first seven or ten days are frequently a matter of real illness, and certainly the strength of the mother does not return to a full pristine state for at least four to six weeks. I think the periods for maternity benefits from unemployment insurance are fairly sensible and we should not deviate from them. However, the payment of benefits to these people recognizes, as I said, the principle that the condition causes them to be incapable of work. From the medical standpoint, a certain amount of time is required before the woman can be considered fully capable of resuming her role as an active member of the labour force. These benefits are not paid to her because she has a new child. They are paid to her because she has been physically incapacitated and has been unable to do her job.

In the case of the adoptive parents, they do not experience the physical state which rendered the patient incapable of working for a period of time. For this reason it is not possible, according to the act, to consider granting maternity benefits to them. There is no doubt that adoptive parents play a very great role in our society, a very essential role. However, the unemployment insurance program is sometimes misconstrued—this was taken up by the most recent speaker—as a potential general aid mechanism through which the federal government can provide support to whatever needs can be identified. The needs of adoptive parents are quite legitimate though not through this act. The unemployment insurance program is not the proper vehicle to support incomes of parents who wish to adopt children and, who, for some legitimate reasons, think they should drop out of the labour force for a period of time. This is debatable.

It has been argued that there exists an anomaly in the unemployment insurance legislation which affords benefits to the natural mothers but which discriminates against adoptive mothers. This is so much ballyhoo. Adoptive parents emphasize that the experience of parenthood is similar, whether the parents are natural or adoptive. Adoptive mothers, they say, have the same need and desire to be with their child. Of course, but this is not why the benefits are being paid. They are being paid only because the natural mother was incapacitated, and she had to take herself away from the labour market for a certain period of time. When there is a couple who adopt a child, the woman is viewed as being capable of performing a job at all times, unlike a pregnant woman who is, to varying degrees, incapacitated during the period surrounding childbirth.

The quality of treatment of natural and adoptive mothers is an area of some concern to some women's rights groups, and has been studied in a preliminary fashion by the federal Advisory Council on the Status of Women. It is most interesting that this Council expressed the opinion that the unemployment insurance program would not be the best means of providing the adoption or maternity support that may be required. You must remember that unemployment insurance is a program designed to provide income maintenance during an interruption of earnings under specific conditions. It is supported by employers, employees, and the federal government. We feel we have a responsibility in that direction. It is not intended to be a general answer to the income needs of Canadians regardless of the origin of those needs. There are other methods.

We cannot avoid the question of whether existing programs are meeting the needs of adoptive parents. However, if we cannot, what sort of support should be provided and who should provide it? In the case of those families who need some form of income support and who are judged to be good prospective parents, the means of providing this type of assistance are available. There are provincial programs available to provide this type of help. In general they are supported by the federal government through the programs of the Department of National Health and Welfare. Do not forget that the federal government contributes 50 per cent to practically all these programs.

One of the things we are always harping on is the need for the provinces to take up, if they have not done so already, the question of the Canada Assistance program. Family allowance payments are provided for adopted children as soon as they are placed in the family. That is federal money. To provide unemployment insurance benefits to parents, on a needs criteria basis, would overlap with provincial and other federal efforts, and would undermine the income-related and the individual nature of the program.

Unemployment insurance benefits are intended to provide income replacement based on the previous earnings and the labour force attachment of an individual rather than on the needs of the family.

Mr. Forrestall: We are not talking about the needs of the family. We are talking about the income of the family.

Mr. Railton: May I continue for a few minutes, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Forrestall: Continue.

Mr. Railton: There have been some recorded Unemployment Insurance Commission experiences, just as the previous speaker emphasized, with examples of "beating the government" and so on. I do not think we can criticize the government social security programs in every way. I felt the article published in the Globe and Mail today by Mr. Malone, the publisher of that wonderful newspaper, was a little bit too critical. It was mainly saying that the government has been too generous in its social security programs. I cannot agree with this.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hour appointed for the consideration of private members' business having expired, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

IMMIGRATION ACT, 1976

AMENDMENTS TO IMPLEMENT CHANGES IN IMMIGRATION POLICY

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Cullen that Bill C-24, respecting immigration to Canada, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration.

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I am beginning to think this is on the instalment plan. When I was in college I was told that there were at least three good points to every sermon. I did not know there were three good sermons to every point. This is the third opportunity, on second reading, that I have been speaking on this subject.

I want to deal very quickly with two or three aspects of the bill which concern me very much. One has to do with respect to the violation of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. If one reads the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, which was passed in 1948 by the United Nations, Article 13 certainly touches on measures within this bill which would certainly come close to being in direct violation of the Universal Declaration.

Hon. members will recall that Article 13 states that everyone has the right to freedom of movement more particularly residents within the borders of each state and, second, everyone has the right to leave any country, including his own, and return to his country.

Clause 8(1) of this bill with respect to proof of citizenship deals with the individual who comes into his own country.

[Mr. Forrestall.]

Clause 21(1)(b) deals with the whole question of the regulated residency under the so-called terms and conditions of the bill. This certainly seems to fly in the face of Article 13 as it is stated in the Charter on Human Rights.

Third, in Clause 115(1)(n) the governor in council has the ability to make regulations, and I quote:

> requiring any person or class of persons to report to an immigration officer before leaving Canada and prescribing the information to be provided and the manner in which such report shall be made to the immigration officer by any such person;

The possibility of requiring some sort of notification, or even permission, before departure is one that I find most offensive, certainly offensive in light of the Declaration of Human Rights. More than that, more recently we have had the International Covenant on Civil and Human Rights. It is interesting to note Article 12 and 13, Article 12 in particular, which reads:

> 1. Everyone lawfully within the territory of a state shall, within that territory, have the right to liberty of movement and freedom to choose his residence.
> 2. Everyone shall be free to leave any country, including his own.

That is an additional reinforcement of the way Bill C-24 appears to violate the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the subsequent convention. The interesting thing is that the International Convenant on Civil and Political Rights was only acceded to by our country on May 19, 1976. It finally received the assent of a sufficient number of nations to bring it into force on August 19 of last year. Presumably that was just at the time when this particular bill was in its final drafting stages. It is for that reason that one cannot be sanguine about the possibilities and intent of this legislation. As it is stated in the explanation clause, Clause 115(1)(n) may be used at some time in the future to provide for examination of outbound travellers if this step becomes necessary for the proper identification and control of illegal immigrants. As the minister well knows, it does not stipulate that it will only be used in the case of those who are illegal immigrants.

This is one of the reasons I brought in Bill C-404 on March 3 dealing with the question of human rights. I will quote from one aspect of it, that part which, and I quote:

> denies its citizens the right or opportunity to emigrate or imposes a discriminatory tax, levy, fine, fee or other charge on any citizen as a consequence of such citizen's desire to emigrate.

These are the things which concern us very much about countries in eastern Europe which place very real proscriptions on those who desire to leave their own country. For us even to have the possibility of these provisions in the bill seems to be, quite frankly, an illiberal and retrograde move.

As I said before the supper hour, this bill, when compared to the joint committee about whose report I even had some considerable reservations, seems to fail both in the letter and in the spirit.

I mentioned earlier the problem with respect to regional development moving from inducements and incentives, which was in the joint committee report, to that of absolute regulation.

There is the whole matter of the question of refugees. The minister has taken a forward step by indicating there will be a new classification of refugees. However, in his statement and in the bill it seems to be almost totally tied to the United Nations convention definition of refugee. If the minister has read the report, in particular Section 93, he will note that the special joint committee stated very clearly that it regards the United Nations definition of refugee as too narrow and not adequate to accommodate the present variety of circumstances.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his allotted time has expired. He may only continue with unanimous consent. Does the hon. member have unanimous consent?

● (2010)

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I shall not take up much more of the time of the House as I know there are others who wish to speak on this subject.

To continue with that quotation from the joint committee report, section 93:

> One difficulty is the stipulation that the person be outside his country to qualify as a refugee. Canada has eased this requirement to accommodate Chileans and Ugandans.

More specifically, as the minister well knows, there was in the case of Uganda, and particularly in respect to Chile, the establishment of a new definition, that of the "oppressed minority" group to deal with the very difficult situation of people who to all intents and purposes would be suffering or experiencing the same kind of difficulty refugees normally encounter but who were still resident within their own country. For the minister to go only as far as adopting the UN definitions and conventions on refugees seems to me to be an inadequate approach. It is a fact, of course, that the minister has not stated clearly either the framework or the procedures for dealing with refugees. In view of recent problems concerning refugee movements from Latin America, this does not give one much encouragement or confidence in the fairness or efficacy of the refugee provisions in the bill before us.

The move to establish a system of visas as suggested in the bill, is ignoring the firm recommendation made by the special joint committee to use exit and entry cards as a first step toward proper and effective control of illegal migrant movements, which seems to me to have been a sensible recommendation from the standpoint of the committee. Again, the minister did not see fit to accept that recommendation, and moved instead to provide for the utilization of visas under the measure before us, something which at best will be cumbersome and, I think, at worst, could create some great difficulty for Canadians who have generally enjoyed satisfactory travel arrangements with many countries and would find it increasingly bothersome, if not offensive, to be saddled with the kind of visa requirements which the minister seems to be favouring.

The whole question of appeals under the Immigration Appeal Board is interesting. When the Immigration Appeal Board appeared before the special joint committee a great deal of discussion, and their recommendation, centred on a return to the pre-1973 situation with respect to providing at least the possibility of an appeal in each and every instance, rather than ruling them out automatically for a number of different categories or classifications. This was the substance of much of the discussion taking place before the committee before the recommendation was made. The attitude or response reflected in the bill has to do with a reduced ambit of power with respect to the Immigration Appeal Board.

With regard to the department itself, again the minister seems intent on moving in the opposite direction. The committee wrestled for a long time with the question of whether or not the Departments of Manpower and Immigration should be separated. There were arguments both pro and con on the advantages of such a division. There were also discussions on bringing in other aspects of immigration policy in terms of the whole demographic question, cultural questions, and citizenship.

As I am sure the minister knows from reading the report of the special joint committee, the recommendation was to develop an immigration department which would include much more than the narrow definitions of manpower and employment. Yet we have before us not only this bill, but companion legislation which the minister is presently bringing before parliament, Bill C-27, which attempts to establish a Canada employment and immigration commission. One reads of the structure and definitions outlined in that legislation and gets the clear impression that what the minister is attempting here is to direct the thrust of immigration policies more and more toward an employment and vocational kind of arrangement. The joint special committee made it clear that the tying of employment opportunities to the day to day movement of people with respect to immigration is to get into a program which, I think, becomes unworkable, and in many instances unjust.

If the minister has studied the workings of his own department in recent years he will realize that by the time much of the information made available with respect to favourable employment opportunities became available and could be matched with those who were applying as immigrants at various immigration posts around the world, there would really not be too much which could be made of it in terms of either the specific immigrants involved or the general health of the Canadian economy.

Now we come to the delicate question of the impact of immigration on the province of Quebec, the problem of the increasing assimilation of elements of the Francophone community and the larger Anglophone community of Canada and North America, and the necessity of doing as much as is, with justice, humanly possible under the Immigration Act to assist the development of the population of Quebec through immigration. Apart from the general references with respect to consultation which will take place under this new act with all the provinces, the specifics with respect to the Francophone community in Canada, and particularly in Quebec, are really neglected.

Most significant of all, perhaps, is the question of the actual numbers of people who will come. We are told very clearly that there will be an arrival of a definite number of immigrants after the appropriate kind of consultation, and that the minister will announce that figure. Mr. Speaker, I presume I do not have to remind the minister of the fact, but the special joint committee said very clearly that if this was to be seen to be a fair and just policy there would have to be some kind of parliamentary approval, likely by resolution. There should be a presentation delivered by the minister, not only of a target figure for the immediate year but also some kind of projection for a three-to-five year period. Then there should be some kind of resolution which would give parliamentary acceptance, and perhaps a referral as well to a committee of the House which would examine the proposals of the minister in detail. Again, there has been no willingness on the part of the minister to provide the House through this bill with that kind of opportunity.

Indeed, I suppose if one were to tackle this piece of legislation and its presentation by the minister, its greatest point of weakness would be that when you look at the opening pages of the introduction to the green paper and the final result in the bill before us, there is literally no explanation yet, no indication as yet from the minister as to what is the long-term demographic policy of this government. The references which are made in the minister's speech on the demographic question are fleeting, at best. They refer to establishing some kind of moderate growth by selecting a figure of somewhere between 140,000 and 150,000 immigrants annually. Surely the minister can do much better than that. If he has seen reports similar to the one which was presented to the committee, well over a year and a half ago now, on the demographic objectives for Canada, which indicated the implications of various immigration levels in relationship to the present fertility level in Canada, he would know that the figure he proposes is one of the lowest in terms of whether or not there will be any substantial growth in the population of the country, and indeed of whether or not there would be a fairly dramatic shift in terms of dependency groups toward the latter part of this century. For the minister not to tell us in greater detail what the conclusion and projections of the government are with respect to the responsibility for various dependency groups in this society, the way in which Canada's population should grow over the 10 to 50 year period, is really to have no kind of demographic policy at all.

I was shocked, quite frankly, when the minister was asked on February 1 by my colleague, the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp), whether or not, in line with the recommendations of the special joint committee, there would be a basic statement on the government's demographic policy. He asked whether the minister would table the government's demographic studies on which its well-hidden national population policy is based, in order that the information might be at the disposal of the House during second reading of Bill C-24. The minister replied "I will consider it." That was over a month and a half ago, and I presume the minister is still considering it. I say quite frankly, Mr. Speaker, that is not very good.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Perhaps he is still looking for it.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Maybe that is true. I will be happy to send him some of the documents that we on the standing committee received some time ago. But if that is the best the minister can do he has little justification in asking the House or the Canadian people to accept the measure before us.

We have before us a proposal which calls itself an immigration act. It has no definite policy attached to it. We have been given no hint whatsoever as to what regulations will apply or be enforced. We have the experience of the special committee to know how difficult it has been in the past to obtain a full and frank insight from the minister's own officials into how our immigration procedures operate on a day-to-day basis. As I said at the outset, this is one of the most important pieces of legislation which we will have to consider in this parliament. The minister has really shortchanged this House and the people of Canada in providing us with so little information on the basic question behind the establishment of this new Immigration Act.

I want to close by reading two brief quotations which I take from appearances before our committee, and which I repeated in my own minority comments at the time of the tabling of the report. The Council of Religious Sisters of the diocese of Charlottetown, Prince Edward Island, said this:

> What we need in Canada is a people policy, a policy that gives greater priority to the welfare of human beings than to material resources. We need a new economic order based on justice which is concerned about the people of our own country, and those of others.

Finally, I agree with the Young Progressive Conservatives of British Columbia when they stated before our committee:

> If we look at the long range problem of immigration, we believe that our general principles governing policy-making should be generally unselfish and world-wide in context.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, in speaking to Bill C-25 may I say at the outset that it is not a question of what the bill says but of what the bill does not say. I have either heard or read what other speakers on this bill have said, and every one of them have said that, after all, this country has been made up of immigrants from all parts of the world. So far as western Canada is concerned, they came from all European and Asiatic countries and settled there.

When we first developed the west we were a rural-oriented area; now we are like the rest of Canada and have become fairly urban. It was people who came from the Ukraine, Hungary, Germany, France, and the United Kingdom who settled on the land, and the first and second generations of these immigrants became professional and business people and built up our towns, villages and cities.

We are dealing here with a very important piece of legislation, one that sets the tone for the kind of culture that is going to prevail throughout Canada. I suppose that when in the early days la Verendrye, a French Canadian, and his sons forged out west, up various rivers, and saw the foothills of the Rockies for the first time, even he with all his imagination had very little idea how that particular area was going to develop into ranching, farming, cities and towns. I also suppose that when Cook and Vancouver came to the Pacific coast a little later, they too did not have the vision to see the great city of Vancouver and what has developed on Vancouver Island.

Let me come immediately to what concerns me about this bill. I have done a considerable amount of work on it, and perhaps when I am finished most members will agree that this will probably be one of my drier speeches in that I want to document what is in this bill. I feel it should be documented. As I say, this bill is to set the tone. All it does is build a house which has no siding, no roof, no shingles—nothing. Everything is left to orders in council.

It has been said before, but nevertheless I remind the House that in 1976, 3,326 orders in council were passed, of which only 653 were published in the Gazette so that Canadians would know about them. This means that there were 2,673 orders in council, pieces of legislation, about which Canadians had no opportunity to know. As we all know here, ignorance of the law is no defence, but how in the world can a person determine whether he is breaking the law if the law is not published anywhere?

This is why the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin), and Senator Forsey in the other place, are doing such an excellent job in regard to confidentiality and secrecy of government. Even Hitler, bad as he was, published his decrees so that the people there knew what was happening. But this government—and perhaps all governments, federal and provincial are moving in this direction—is administering the law by order in council, not by the passage of an act.

A former prime minister set the tone when he said this:

> Let us come to another point which I wish particularly to stress. I refer to the right set out in Magna Carta that no man shall be dispossessed of his rights without the lawful judgment of his peers under the law of the land; not the law as made by the Governor-in-Council, not the law as made by some unnamed and as yet unexisting body, but the law of the land as known to everyone.

I have already pointed out that 2,673 laws were passed in one year about which no one knew except those who drew them up, someone in the public service. He continued:

> It is an essential principle of liberty and freedom that the law of the land should be known, that it should be so known that every man as he runs may read. The law should not be something which is to make its appearance in the Canada Gazette after some board or Governor-in-Council, not Parliament, has passed a regulation; it is something that should appear in the statutes of the country.

Surely that is a fundamental principle. The late William Lyon Mackenzie King said that during a debate in 1934, and what he said then is just as true today. However, at that time we had not reached such complexity of government as today, when most legislation is passed by order in council.

I want to tell the House a story, a very simple story, to illustrate what the danger is here. Back in the 1970's a Chinese girl by the name of Pui Chan Inoue came to Canada. She was granted permanent residency, or landed immigrant status, as it is called. While in Canada she met a Japanese and they were married. They lived in Vancouver for a considerable length of time, had three children, and then went to Japan. When they got to Japan she found that he already had a wife, so she packed up her belongings, took one or more of the children and returned to Canada. She landed in Vancouver, but no sooner had she done so than she was arrested because she did not have a visa. She could not get one from Japan, she could not get one from Communist China, the only passport she ever had was from Taiwan and she had never seen that country. As a result she was thrown in jail.

It fell to my lot, Mr. Speaker, to do something about this case, and I did not realize until I looked into the matter and worked with a number of young students how complicated was the Immigration Act at that time, as indeed, the proposed Immigration Act will be complicated. I want to ask the question: if once you are given landed immigrant status, can you leave the country and return still retaining it?

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. Woolliams: My hon. friend says no. My next question is: if you give up your permanent status, have you the right to appeal before the Immigration Appeal Board? The answer to that question is, of course, no. I want to tell hon. members about something that developed at the beginning of this case. When some people come to Canada from other countries—a lot of people cannot leave communist countries because they will not let them out—to visit their relatives, if they do not want to return they make an application. This is why the Immigration Appeal Board had a backlog of some 10,000 cases. In fact the backlog reached 18,000 cases. Orders in council were passed; then the courts ruled against them. On July 28, 1973, after the government had said, "Look, things are getting so bad that we must straighten them out with an act of parliament" parliament passed the requisite act. The new act, being chapter 28, of July 27, 1973, said in part:

● (2030)

> 1. For greater certainty, subsection 28(1) of the Immigration Regulations, Part I, expressed to have been made pursuant to Section 57 of the Immigration Act by Order in Council P.C. 1972-2502 on November 6, 1972, shall be deemed for all purposes to have had, and to continue to have, the same force and effect as if it had been made on at day pursuant to an Act of Parliament that authorized the making of that subsection and, without restricting the generality of the foregoing, that subsection shall be deemed to have been applicable to any person who reported to an immigration officer as an immigrant in accordance with subsection 7(3) of the Immigration Act on or after November 6, 1972, and to be applicable to any such person who so reports to an immigration officer on or after the day this Act comes into force.

The government passed orders in council under the old act. Finally, realizing that was not legal, the government passed another law.

An hon. Member: You don't know what you are talking about.

Mr. Woolliams: If the hon. member is not interested in what I am saying, that is fine by me. Section 5(t) of the Immigration Act, Chapter I-2 reads in part as follows:

"(t) persons who cannot or do not fulfil or comply with any of the conditions or requirements of this Act or the regulations or any orders lawfully made or given under this Act or the regulations. R.S., c. 325 . . .

The government discovered that that law did not work. The point I am dealing with is whether a person who has been given permanent residency and leaves the country, can come back. Is he entitled to come back now, under the present law? According to the Immigration Appeal Board, "permanent resident" means a person who has been granted lawful admission to Canada for permanent residence under the Immigration Act. That is clear. Next I look at the Immigration Act, and it has this to say on the point:

"admission" includes entry into Canada, landing in Canada, and the return to Canada of a person who has been previously landed in Canada and has not acquired Canadian domicile;"

Please note the words "has not acquired Canadian domicile."

I submitted to the board, on the basis of the law quoted, that once you were a permanent resident you could leave Canada and return, without needing a visa. Despite my arguments, the lady in question was thrown in jail.

Let me tell you what happened. Mr. Speaker, I have placed on record definitions concerning permanent residency and admission. What did the government do? In October, 1974, it passed an order in council which said that "permanent resident" means an immigrant who has been granted lawful admission, for permanent residency under the act, and has maintained his place of domicile in Canada since that admission. Please remember what I said about residency, as defined in the Immigration Appeal Board Act. I ask Your Honour to bear in mind the words previously quoted "has not acquired Canadian domicile." Clearly, the order in council totally contradicted the definition in the act. This should be apparent if one compares the two sets of definitions previously quoted. But the consequence was that the girl went to jail. She finally got out and we went before the appeal board, but the point is that this is typical of what has happened.

We all know that an order in council is not supposed to contradict an act of parliament. Parliament passes the act. Regulations flow from the act, and as lawyers in this House well know, if regulations flow from two separate acts of parliament, the first set of regulations cannot apply to the administration of the second. The point I want to drive home is this: under the old Immigration Appeal Board Act, and under the Immigration Act, the department thought that not only did it have power to pass rules and regulations, but that it had power to contradict parliament.

Mr. Alexander: Shame!

Mr. Woolliams: The law said this was wrong. It was wrong. Unfortunately a person was denied her freedom for a short time owing to the shortcomings of the law.

[Mr. Woolliams.]

This is a dangerous bill, too. Let us examine what it can do. I ask, what orders in council can be passed pursuant to Bill C-24? Clause 38(2) provides among other things that:

. . . the governor in council may authorize the landing of any person not described in subsection (1) who at the time of landing has resided continuously in Canada for at least five years . . .

In other words the department can, by order in council, create substantive law affecting people who have lived in Canada for five years. Does that mean that somebody who has sneaked over the border, is here illegally, and gets somebody like Hal Banks to intervene with the minister, can stay in this country? Can this be done by order in council? Does parliament want to pass that sort of law?

An hon. Member: Oh, don't be so partisan.

Mr. Woolliams: Clause 40(4) says that after procedural requirements regarding reports on a person are fulfilled, the governor in council may make a deportation order under this section. In other words, there is to be power to contradict the act, even to make an order in council for deporting people, as the department sees fit. Then, clause 41(1) says that the governor in council can appoint the three-member special advisory board. There is nothing wrong with that. That is to be done by order in council.

Under clause 41(2) the governor in council is required to designate one of the members as chairman of the special advisory board established under clause 41(1).

Under clause 43(2), pursuant to the Citizenship Act, the governor in council designates a member of the Privy Council as minister for the purposes of that act, and it is to this person that questions concerning claims of Canadian citizenship are referred. Therefore by order in council it will be possible to make certain sections of the Citizenship Act relate to the new Immigration Act and the new rules which will be passed thereunder.

Under clause 59(2) the governor in council is entitled to appoint up to 18 members to the Immigration Appeal Board. Under clause 60(5) he may remove any member of the appeal board for cause.

Under clause 61(1) the governor in council designates the chairman of the appeal board, and up to five members as vice-chairmen of the board. The governor in council is also to establish the remuneration of members of the board, and also living and travel expenses.

Under clause 64 the governor in council has discretion to designate what members of the board shall live in the national capital region, which extends beyond Ottawa, as described in the National Capital Act, or within 40 kilometres thereof.

Clause 67 provides that, subject to the approval of the governor in council, the board may make rules "not inconsistent with this act", concerning the board, practice and procedure in appeals, applications for determination, and applications for release.

Clause 109(2) provides that, with the approval of the governor in council, the minister may enter into agreements with the provinces for the purpose of facilitating the formulation, co-ordination and implementation of immigration policies and programs. If that is not playing at politics, I do not know what is. In other words, the clause says that the federal government may make deals with the provinces. If a politically hot situation arises, say, in Quebec, Alberta or British Columbia, the federal government is allowed to make a deal with the provincial government with respect to matters of immigration, even though immigration under the British North America Act falls under the jurisdiction of the federal government. I suggest that the reasoning behind this clause stems from our make up as a people, that is to say, we are all supposed to be Canadians, period. We are not French-Canadians, English-Canadians, German-Canadians or Ukrainian-Canadians. We are Canadians. Hyphenated Canadians never had a place in this country. We are all Canadians. But that is put in there for a purpose, and I do not need to outline what the purpose is.

Clause 115(1) to (2) deals with extensive regulatory discretion given the governor in council to establish immigration selection standards. This is supposed to give equal opportunities to all people applying to enter Canada, whether they come from the Ukraine, Germany, Japan, China, the U.K. or France.

Let us find out what the bill says. It establishes immigration selection standards as regards education, family relationships, language, skills, occupational experience, personal attributes and attainments, demographic considerations, and labour market conditions. What we are really doing tonight is assigning to the public service, to officials of the Department of Manpower and Immigration and of other departments, the right to make the law for Canadians regarding what people we will allow to come to this country. Worse than that, we are putting it in the field of politics, because when you give public servants the right to make rules and regulations such as these, you give that right to cabinet ministers who might want to play a little politics by playing one province against another. This is playing politics with the most important thing in the nation, namely, the kind of people we will have here in the country, a right which is laid down in our constitution.

An hon. Member: We have been doing this for years.

Mr. Woolliams: Then they should be told they are wrong.

Mr. Peters: But it keeps them elected. Surely they will not change that system.

Mr. Woolliams: It is because people do not know what is in the act. I thought my friend would say that reading is dangerous. It is dangerous for some people.

The bill prescribes the classes of immigrants who may be sponsored by Canadian citizens or permanent residents. That is the very essence of the law. If you can do that by order in council, why can we not have one section in the act saying we will have a new immigration policy to be administered by the government of the day, and rules and regulations designating what kind of people we will bring here, how many of them, what language they will speak when they land here, what culture they will have, what standards they will have, and what labour requirements they will fulfil, instead of having this verbosity, this rhetoric, this big act which says nothing because all these things can be done behind our backs?

The bill exempts particular members of "the family class" from any requirements and regulations; and substitutes "special regulations" for such individuals. They even go further and make a regulation setting up a standard. Then they make a regulation to administer the standard, and finally they administer by regulation. That is what this act is all about, and that is why it should be scrutinized and carefully studied before being passed.

The bill designates the classes of persons referred to as refugees. If that does not enter into the field of politics, I do not know what does. I can imagine my friends to the left preferring left-wingers to come to the country, and my friends to the right preferring right-wingers. It would depend on what kind of government we have. They would pass regulations and choose the refugees that would suit the government of the day. As my friend says, we will elect that government and perpetuate its right to govern, which its members think is their divine right.

The bill would establish a system of priorities for applications. In other words, if you wanted to have people from the United Kingdom here, or if you wanted people from another country, you could give them priorities. You could set up your own priorities. If that is not dictatorial legislation, I do not know what is. Is that what the human rights bill is all about, or is the human rights bill a piece of window dressing to cover up the dust on the window, to cover up the fact that there is discrimination based on race, language, creed, etc.?

The bill prescribes the universities, colleges and other institutions for the purposes of academic, professional or vocational training, and prescribes the courses at these institutions for visitors granted entry for the the purposes of study. In other words, as soon as you land in Canada they tell you what university you will attend, where you will study, whether you will be an accountant, a lawyer, or a doctor. If they do not want you to be any of those, you can be forced to go to a vocational training school to be a carpenter or a plumber. And if you are not the kind of person who will bend that easily, you will not be admitted to Canada because a regulation will deny you the right to be here even though you have the qualifications spelled out in the act.

The bill prescribes the requirements for a returning resident permit. I suppose this means that if you wish to visit your brother in Chicago and you have landed status in Canada, you might be allowed to go to the United States and return here and retain your permanent residence in Canada.

The bill specifies the documentation that will be required of visitors. It prohibits aliens from engaging in employment in Canada, and also specifies the type of employment such persons may engage in. Imagine that! You pass an order in council and you tell these people, whom you call aliens, that they will be prohibited from engaging in employment in Canada. You tell them that now they are here, they cannot get a job. "You cannot work, but if you have the right to work, we will tell you what you should do, and then we will tell you in what province you will be, and in what village you will live." All that is done not through approval by parliament but by order in council.

The bill determines health and public safety factors in relation to the admission of a person, and whether such a person could become a charge on the health or social services of a community. I suppose that an American who takes saccharin will be denied the right to come to Canada. I do not know, but you can do that by order in council. Just think about it.

The bill requires health examinations of persons outside Canada to determine whether they will be admitted to Canada. I thought the human rights bill protected those who have some physical or other disability to enable them to function in society like the rest of us, without discrimination. This bill totally contradicts the human rights bill. In fact, if I had my way—and I do not have it because there are 264 members here—I would throw this bill out.

It is a horrible bill. It requires persons leaving Canada to report to an immigration officer before leaving the country, and prescribes the information required, the manner in which the report is to be made, and sets out fingerprint, photographic or other identification requirements for those seeking admission to Canada or for persons already here. That sounds as if it came from the U.S.S.R., and I talked to some of my Ukrainian friends who are trying to get their sisters and brothers over here for a visit.

I agree with members who have criticized the Communist countries for not allowing their citizens to leave and for their denial of international agreements. This bill is as bad as anything that has been put together by a dictator. Surely our friends, brothers or sisters who come here should not be subjected to fingerprinting before entering this country. All that can be done by order in council, and when we pass this bill we will be giving public servants the right to do that.

The bill would determine removal and detention costs and expenses. It would require that transportation companies ensure that immigrants and visitors have visas. The little Chinese girl about whom I argued did not need one. The board upheld my argument. In other words, if they do not have visas, Air Canada takes people to the RCMP, and they are either put into a motel room or locked up for the night.

The bill will establish procedures for inquiries, establish the procedure for re-determination of convention refugee status, and prescribe the duties of the special advisory board. These boards will be told what powers they will have. As I see it, the Immigration Appeal Board no longer has the right to hear an appeal unless the person appealing has already obtained or has at the time permanent status to remain in Canada.

The bill would authorize the making of loans to immigrants. They cannot go to a bank, even if they have security, because an order in council will tell them from whom they can borrow money, how much they can borrow, and at what interest rate they can borrow. And we advertise that Canada is the freest country in the world! That is quite a panic; it is hypocrisy of the worst kind. The bill would require licensing by a provincial bar before any person, except a member of the bar, can appeal before the board as counsel. If they do not like the Alberta bar, an order in council can be passed saying that counsel has to come from some other bar. I am talking about bars to which lawyers belong, not the ones they visit. The bill would authorize issuance of visas to representatives of foreign governments and international organizations, and prescribe almost any matter. I have read what it can do. I picked out the highlights.

Then there is a catch-all clause. It is a basket clause whereby public servants can pass orders in council prescribing any matter required by the legislation. Last year 3,326 orders in council were passed of which only 653 were published in the Canada Gazette. Most people do not read the Canada Gazette; however, 2,673 were not published.

I conducted the defence of Mrs. Inoue when she went before an inquiry officer. She was supposed to know the law of Canada. Even though she was a student she could not determine the law of Canada if there were some 2,600 laws which were never published or made known. If ever there was a bill which should be taken back and put on the tracing board, or at least taken into a committee, this is it. I am glad to see the hon. member for Peace River here because we are talking about government secrecy and confidential information. I never thought the situation was as bad as it is with regard to orders in council. You would have to be a Philadelphia lawyer to prepare appeals and to know how to present a case to the Immigration Appeal Board.

Mr. Baldwin: We have a government of pack-rats; they hide everything.

Mr. Woolliams: I think that would make a great headline for what I have said. In light of what the bill says, in light of what I have outlined, and in spite of the fact that the Immigration Appeal Board Act and the Immigration Act produced regulations which contradicted the substantive law of the two acts, we are now asked to give the government the full power to create its own immigration policy and to do what it wishes with people seeking admittance to Canada.

The committee should do the same thing as the committee dealing with the gun control bill did. Representing my party and as chairman of its justice caucus I demanded that Bill C-83 not move past the committee stage unless the regulations which were to be passed thereunder were laid before the House so that we could debate them the same as we could debate the clauses of the bill. That is what should be done now. This bill should be held up and stalled until the government comes forward with its package of regulations. And the way I see it, without any exaggeration, we may need a wheelbarrow to wheel in all the regulations which could be passed under this legislation and which will likely be passed. The government changes the law from Wednesday to Thursday, and from Thursday to Friday, and Canadians do not even know it happens. It will happen while aliens are here with permanent status, and it will happen before they get here. If that is the way this parliament is going to operate, it seems to me we have reached a sorry day and a sorry state.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Ron Huntington (Capilano): Mr. Speaker, I am grateful to have the opportunity to make a few comments in the second reading debate on Bill C-24, the proposed immigration act of 1977.

I want to say at the beginning that the first over-all impression I get from this legislation is that the manpower requirements for the evolving Canadian community are now to become secondary to the principle of family reunion.

I would like to draw attention to page 19, Volume 1, of the green paper on immigration which says that in 1966 the white paper on immigration set out more thoroughly than ever before the government's appreciation of the economic determinants of immigration policy. The white paper emphasized, and I quote:

> Immigration policy must be consistent with national economic policy in general and with national manpower and social policies in particular ... It must be related to the conditions of national and international life in 1966 and the years ahead rather than to past events.

Although this was written 11 years ago, according to the green paper, it capsulizes several ideas basic to sound thinking about immigration policy, and serves as a good introduction to an examination of the impact of labour market considerations on immigration planning.

The green paper states:

> First, the statement is a reminder that immigration is intimately linked to economic realities. Immigration policy must be shaped by the same general aims as national economic policy of which, from the manpower viewpoint, it is a constitutent element.
> Second, it stresses that policy on immigration must be forward-looking. The international and domestic setting is subject to such rapid change that the relevance of past assumptions and the effectiveness of yesterday's techniques are continually exposed to obsolescence. Both demand constant reassessment to prevent policy from becoming outmoded, and to ensure that the immigration process as a whole remains a national asset. There is no room for entrenched doctrine or rigidity in managing a program that must be geared to economic and social change.

I agree with the principle that Canada needs immigration, and I subscribe to and support the reasons given in the second reading debate by the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp). I also agree that a consideration of manpower requirements in our immigration policies is fundamental to the quality of life and the survival of the welfare system that makes Canada so attractive to so many people from other countries of the world. I therefore have to express my surprise that Bill C-24 seems to move away from this fundamental fact of life, contrary to statements in the 1966 white paper and more recently to the conclusions and recommendations of the special committee of this parliament which placed emphasis on a points system geared to our work and demographic needs and problems.

Today in Canada we have some one million without work, and I note that the special committee of parliament, which held 50 public meetings, heard some 400 witnesses, received 1,200 letters and read some 200 briefs, recommended that the limit for immigration annually should be around the 100,000 level. I am therefore puzzled at the minister's continuous insistence on the figure of 140,000 to 150,000 immigrants annually. I remind hon. members that this figure does not include refugees who, by the way, have accounted for one immigrant in ten since World War II. I drew that figure from the green paper. I also remind hon. members that, with the trend toward increasing instability of governments throughout the world, this figure will increase drastically in the years to come. I agree with the rationale for the 100,000 average as recommended by my colleagues on the committee, and urge the minister to lower his plateau of 140,000 to 150,000.

If one can assume the accuracy of statistics contained in the green paper on immigration and population, then I refer the minister to page 26 which shows that at a fertility rate of 2.2, and with an annual net international migration of 60,000, the population of Canada in the year 2001 will be 30.6 million. I also urge the committee of the House to hear the call of my colleague from Provencher, and insist that the quota for immigration be brought to the House each year for approval and discussion by the Standing Committee on Manpower and Immigration.

Although our joint committee of parliament favoured special treatment be given to families and refugees, it also recommended that the nominated category be dropped. It is on this point that we now find the minister and his advisers playing political games, to their everlasting shame.

As I understand it, the parliamentary committee recommended that the nominated category be dropped and that the family category, formerly the sponsored category, be expanded to include parents under 60. This recommendation reaffirmed the principle of "reunification of families", with which we all agree. However, the committee also recognized the need to protect the independent category which brought in the skills and attributes important to the economy of Canada. Paragraph 56 of the immigration committee's report to parliament lays out this concern in very clear and precise terms. I quote from it:

> The committee is concerned that over time the present classes of sponsored and nominated immigrants, given substantial advantages because they have relatives in Canada, would absorb an increasingly larger share of places available each year in Canada. To ensure that this does not happen and that "new seed" immigrants continue to find a way to enter Canada, all committee members except one recommended that the present class of nominated immigrant be dropped and that the ties between members of the non-dependent extended family be recognized in a different way.

Then it went on in that paragraph and the last sentence said:

> Of course such persons could still come to Canada but they would have to be assessed on a more equal basis with independents.

This parliament, to its credit, has gone to a lot of trouble to obtain the views of the Canadian people toward a new immigration policy and act.

When a recommendation by the parliamentary committee on a matter as important to the manpower requirements and future economy of Canada can be overruled by a minority of one, and when the minister and his advisers allow this minority view to show up in Bill C-24, then one surely can be allowed the conclusion that the democratic parliamentary system in Canada is not only degraded but its very survival as a meaningful arm of government is threatened. I urge the minister and the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration to give urgent priority to this point in their deliberations.

At this time may I ask why the bill mentions nothing about the sickening abuse of our concepts of family life through marriages of convenience for the purposes of circumventing the immigration laws. By allowing sponsorships based on non bona fide marriages we are, as a result, allowing prostitutes and the financially destitute to select immigrants for Canada's future. Mr. Speaker, on this point I am aware of a document outlining 102 cases of what appear to be marriages of convenience in the city of Toronto. In 70 out of 102 cases the sponsors were women of questionable reputations in that many had been convicted of prostitution or other charges and/or were considered mentally sick or retarded. In many cases large fees were paid. The married couples spoke different languages, and there are examples of 40 to 50 year age gaps. There are examples where the couples are divorced as soon as the sponsored person gains landed status. In most cases that were investigated, the couple never lived together.

In the Saturday, March 19, edition of the Ottawa Citizen I note that the 102 cases that I have been aware of have now expanded to some 250 such investigated cases in Canada, where bigamy has also been alleged. A Crown attorney, Dave Gorrell, told the court that so-called marriage brokers recruit Canadian women and pay them $1,000 to $1,500 to marry illegal immigrants to gain them permanent admission to Canada. The husband and wife in these situations do not live together. They do not intend to do so. They have no idea of each other's lifestyle, and usually the marriage is not consummated. He points out that there were more than 250 such marriages in Canada since January 1, 1976.

In these cases I know of, there was one where the registrar of marriages in the city of Toronto overheard the argument of a couple as to how much was to be paid. The woman was age 36. She was Jamaican and English speaking. She did not speak Hindi. The man was age 18. He was Indian and spoke Hindi, and could hardly speak English. Many are admitted illegally because the act does not provide for the discretion of immigration officers to deny entry in such cases.

I have another case that illustrates the problems that the immigration officials are facing. I will call them S and M. S was landed and married M. M received immigrant status on January 14, 1976. M was sponsored. M got a divorce on March 31, 1976, 2½ months later. M's lawyer handled the landing, handled the divorce, and S's sponsorship. All this happened in less than a year.

In committee consideration of Bill C-24 I urge that the following points be given serious consideration with regard to marriages of convenience:

First, that the minister allow immigration officers to refuse to approve sponsorships of questionable bona fides.

Second, where a bona fide marriage is doubtful, that the person be placed on a minister's permit for five years. In five years the department could again check if it is bona fide and, if it is, landing can be granted at that time. In the United States and in New Zealand sponsored people must wait a considerable length of time before they are granted landed status.

Third, that sponsorships be refused if either party is of poor character, i.e. has a criminal record, is a public charge, or made previous sponsorships where the marriage was not considered bona fide.

My fourth point is that an index of maiden names of wives who sponsor should be kept at every Canadian immigration centre and at immigration headquarters. At the present time women can make an infinite number of sponsorships using a legal name each time, because every time a woman marries she has a different legal name.

My fifth and last recommendation is that if a confession is made that it is a marriage of convenience, immigration officials should be allowed to proceed with enforcement action immediately. Under the present system, immigration headquarters approval must be obtained for withdrawal of sponsorship, which takes approximately eight weeks. Where a confession has been obtained and they have waited for immigration headquarter's approval to proceed, in almost 100 per cent of the cases the applicants have disappeared before approval has been received. What a spinning of wheels this exercise is!

I would now like to offer some comments on the refugee aspects of Bill C-24. As I mentioned before, one out of ten immigrants enters as a refugee, and the numbers are increasing. In the 20 years between 1947 and 1967 there were 45,267, which averages out at about 2,260 per year. In the five years between 1968 and 1973 there were 16,327 refugees, plus 7,000 Ugandans, or a total of 23,327 which averages out at 4,665 per year.

The point is that due to government instabilities in today's world, it is reasonable to expect that these figures are going to accelerate. The terms of the U.N. Convention on Refugees are such that it is almost impossible to prove that those entering under this category are in fact refugees. This leaves our immigration procedures open to abuse. Under the new act they can apply for refugee status from within Canada, and it has come to my attention that many people are now applying for refugee status after having their visitors' visas renewed several times.

If one reads the United Nations convention, page 103 of the green paper entitled "The Immigration Problem", one can see that it would be all but impossible to control the refugee status or category other than on an offshore basis.

I am told that traditionally we have processed refugees abroad. They were examined outside of Canada and this assured Canadians that basic criteria for entry were met and that the applicants had a chance of fitting into the Canadian mold.

Due to the very complicated and extensive appeal system contained in the new act for refugees, and the fact that they can apply from within Canada for refugee status and can only be deported if they have committed an extremely serious crime, we are losing our selection control, and risk a complete jamming of our appeal system. As I look at the critical path of the appeal chart, this could become constipated in a period of months.

I support the refugee status and intent of the act, but seriously question the mechanics that are being set up under Bill C-24. I would urge the minister and the committee to examine the hazards and re-examine the possibility of returning to offshore processing in order that we may retain a degree of selection control. Why has the minister ignored the two-year recommendation of the committee of parliament and opted for six months' service in areas in Canada that are labour short? How can a person get established or be meaningful in six months? I can remember when I was in the farming community and involved on the farms. We had people who were grateful to come to this country and remain on the farm or in the area of need for up to three years. These people today are the landowners and farmers of this country. What is this six months' business? It serves nothing. It is just one more of the minister's games.

On this point I would remind my colleagues again that if we keep the nominated category over and above the new expanded family category, there won't be enough room in our immigration quota to serve the work needs of Canada with immigrants from the independent category to whom this demographic work demand applies.

I also note that the act makes provision for entry-exist card controls, which I think are a great step forward, and, which make me wonder where we have been all these years. However, I have been informed that there is no rush within the department to implement this, and I suggest the committee examine this point.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I commend the minister on removal of restrictions on epileptics and retarded people. This is a very much needed and humanitarian situation. Both the minister and I have seen examples of the great relief his compassion in this area has given families.

I have dwelled on what I have considered to be serious shortcomings within Bill C-24. I urge both the minister and the committee of the House to give these points very serious consideration.

There is a balloon in the Canadian labour force that will pass through their productive work period and who will consider themselves entitled to the welfare and retirement benefits that they have paid for and supported for others. This expanded call on our tax resources will have to be carried by the productive work force of the future. Unless we enhance the skills of tomorrow's work force by protecting the independent category, we will have a welfare burden that will crush tomorrow's taxpayer.

We must have a balance in favour of productive work in our immigration policies and laws. We should do everything possible to clean up our act so that people will have respect for, not play games with, the laws of our country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stan Schumacher (Palliser): Mr. Speaker, Bill C-24 is one of the most important pieces of legislation that has been presented to this House since I became a member of parliament, and that says a lot for a Chamber filled with crises from unemployment, inflation, separation, and scandal. In all of these other areas we are dealing with matters that can be changed later. In all but immigration we have a second chance.

In immigration there will be no turning back. What we do today will, for better or for worse, determine what we will become in the future. It will determine the kind of Canada we will pass on to our children, and the standards and the culture under which they and their children will live.

If there was ever a time for statesmanship, this is it. The members of this House must put aside their narrow personal interests, stifle their natural political instincts, and place the nation first. If we fail to do this we will have misplaced the trust that the people have given us. We will have become the self-seeking politicians we are sometimes labelled.

How many times have we heard the backroom boys tell us to go easy on immigration or we may lose those precious ethnic seats in Toronto or in other areas? I have always thought that such advice was spurious and false, but even if not, it is better to lose such seats than to compromise the nation and its future.

Members on all sides of this House should put aside party politics, personal interests, and other narrow, partisan considerations. Let us make sure that what we do here with this bill in the weeks ahead represents our best effort. In the years to come, let it be said of this parliament that they were honest men and that they did their best. After all, legislation like this does not arise very often. The last amendments were made in 1952. This time we must be very careful about getting on the right track. The last time we got off the track and this caused serious problems to the country, something we have been aware of for the past five or six years at least.

First, let me say a word about the way this bill has been written and presented. I do not want to belabour points that have already been made, but the real meaning behind many of the clauses is obscure, and unless we gain access to the regulations we really won't know what we are being asked to approve. Different words mean different things to different people, and parliament cannot, and should not, be expected to make laws without knowing precisely what those laws mean.

I feel a little like the fellow who goes in to buy a car and is shown the paint job and the interior trim, but is not permitted to look at the engine or take the vehicle for a test run before making a decision on whether to sign on the dotted line. I would not want to buy a car in that way. I am sure I would not want to buy a used car from the minister. I am not sure I would even buy a new car under conditions like that. Not one of us would accept such an absurd situation, and yet this is what the government is asking us to do. The minister should tell us why he is taking this approach.

We are the representatives of the people. We have been charged with the responsibility for deciding how Canada's affairs will be managed. Why have we not been given the facts? Is it because the minister and his departmental officials do not know? This may sound absurd, but I wonder.

Several weeks ago, in preparation for this debate and the meetings that will follow, I asked the government to give me some routine information on the organization and management of the immigration branch. There was nothing unusual about it. I just wanted to know how the immigration branch was organized, who the people are, what they are supposed to do, and how the work flows through the department. These were questions that should have been answered in a few days. It was information that had to be available or the department could not function or prepare its financial estimates. A few days later I got a telephone call from an agitated departmental officer who told me it would be impossible to provide this information. When I insisted, I got nowhere. Then another person 'phoned and said that they would try, but it would be difficult. Of course I have not received any of the information I need.

It is difficult to feel much confidence in the department if their officials cannot even tell us how they are organized or how they operate. It doesn't exactly give me confidence that they will be capable of administering the vague legislation now being proposed.

There is only one area in which the minister gives us a slight glimmer of his intention. The underlying assumption in the proposed legislation seems to be that the country and parliament should accept, without question, the principle that our immigration program should be non-discriminatory, and racially and culturally colour blind. Let's cut away this politically oriented nonsense.

About 25 per cent of our people are of French-speaking origin, and their spokesmen have consistently maintained that their share of the immigration flow be designed to sustain and enrich French-Canadian culture. This has even been emphasized in the proposed legislation. When these spokesmen give lip service to the pious platitudes contained in this bill, they are thinking of the rest of Canada, not Quebec. And let us not be fooled by the notion that this suddenly occurred after the election of the Parti Québécois. This has been going on for years, and it has been supported from external sources with questionable motives.

And what about the rest of Canada? Do hon. members really think we can accept the introduction of large numbers of culturally different people without changing our whole way of life? Of course not, and I doubt very much if such a view would be supported by the average Canadian from any ethnic background if he really knew what was going on.

Let us take a look a little further down the road and see where all of this may lead. Obviously the government will continue to cater to Quebec, so we will end up with a double-headed immigration policy. One head will be racist and narrow. That head will be for Quebec. The other will be middle-headed and damaging. It will be for the rest of Canada. Quebec will end up united and strong. The rest of the country will become divided and weak. It is not a pretty picture.

Our immigration policy must be based on our ability to absord needed workers at rates consistent with productivity requirements, and without endangering or changing our cultural balance.

Let us use some common sense for a change before we become balkanized and lost. My parents came to this country because it provided us with a wonderful heritage of freedom and opportunity. I will not stand idly by and see this great society destroyed by short-range political greed and ambition.

Some time ago the government decided it would no longer record national or racial origin in its immigration statistics. Prior to this decision we were told how many people were entering Canada from various countries, but we were also told where they originally came from. For example, 5,000 immigrants might arrive from, say, Sweden. But this group might contain Englishmen, Italians and Ugandans, so this was broken down again to give us a clear picture of where our immigrants were originating. Suddenly this system was changed, and now we only know about the last country in which our immigrants were living before they set out for Canada.

What was the purpose of this change? The minister may say it was done because we do not discriminate, and because details about countries of origin or racial background are discriminatory. Surely this is the height of nonsense. Is anyone ashamed of his origins? Is a Scotsman ashamed of being a Scotsman? Is a German ashamed of being a German? Are Chinese, Phillippinos or Greeks ashamed of their national origins? Of course not.

These statistics were changed so that established Canadians would not really be aware of where immigrants were originating, and this was deceptive and unwarranted. When we are told the majority of immigrants originate in this or that country, the information is meaningless. How many of the last 50,000 immigrants who came here from the United Kingdom were English, Irish, Welsh or Scottish? And how many were West Indians, Pakistanis, or East Indians? We have a right to know, and no democratic government should withhold such information.

Now I wish to turn to the ugly questions which surround appeals, deportations, and illegal immigrants. I am seeking the minister's advice and assistance. I have trouble understanding the functions of the Immigration Appeal Board. I am told that it reviews appeals against deportation orders issued by the department. But what is the extent of its authority? It has been said it may not only quash deportations, but that it can also instruct the minister to give the appellant permanent residence in Canada without further immigration or medical examinations. If this is true, and I want the minister to put his cards face up, then the Appeal Board has taken over a function which belongs to the government and parliament. To have a quasi-judicial board review these cases is one thing, but to have it make management decisions outside of the law is quite improper.

The minister should tell us whether he, or any member of his staff on his behalf, has ever instructed his officials to accept these appeal board directives without question. He should also explain what happens in cases where it is later discovered that the immigrants in question have communicable diseases that would otherwise have barred them from entry. When we, as members of parliament, decide that people with highly infectious and dangerous diseases should not be permitted to enter the country, no Immigration Appeal Board should have the authority to overrule us.

If what I suspect is true, then this appeal board system is really designed to assume political responsibility and shift the onus for decision-making in awkward cases away from the minister and the government. It is a neat trick, but it is hardly consistent with the national interest.

The minister should provide the House with a list of all cases handled in the last five years where the Immigration Appeal Board has quashed deportations and instructed the department to grant permanent residence without further examination. The list should include the names, backgrounds, criminal records, dates, names of authorizing officers, and details of representations that may have been made on behalf of these undesirables.

It would also be helpful for the minister to provide us with the names and locations of the Immigration Appeal Board members. I hear that some are former secretaries to ministers, some are the widows of deceased Liberal politicians, and some are simply out-of-work politicians. To avoid any misunderstanding it would be useful for the qualifications and backgrounds to include details of any judicial experience these people may have had before being appointed to the appeal board.

The hon. member for Dauphin, (Mr. Ritchie) has asked some important questions about illegal immigrants. I endorse what he has said and urge the minister to answer his questions promptly. But there is another aspect of this terrible situation which requires explanation. There have been persistent stories about the possibility of immigration officials being directly or indirectly involved in illegal immigration activities. I suppose this is not very surprising as many of the illegal entrants are connected with criminal syndicates and other forms of crime. But it is of paramount importance that the immigration officers who handle these cases be clearly above suspicion. Will the minister tell this House if there have been any cases of this type in the department during the last five years? If so, what has been done about them?

I am not suggesting that the officers who may have been involved be named, because I am sure that we would all wish to protect innocent members of their families. Nor am I calling for some kind of a witch hunt, so let me give the minister a few leads that might help him to seek the answers to my questions.

We have heard about illegal immigrants being apprehended by the police as they attempted to jump bail while they were awaiting trial for criminal activities, and in connection with these cases there were indications that the actions of the bail jumpers had been known to immigration officials and had not been reported to the proper authorities. We have also heard about cases where immigration officials may have been blackmailed. There were others where police documents may have been found in the improper possession of illegal immigrants awaiting deportation proceedings, and it has been suggested that these documents were given to them by departmental officers. There have even been rumours that some illegal immigrants, while incarcerated in Canadian jails, have received official correspondence from immigration officials that may encourage them to think they will obtain permanent residence in Canada after they have served their sentences. I will not go on, to avoid becoming repetitious, but this does give the minister a sample of my concerns and I hope I receive prompt and satisfactory explanations.

There is one other thing that concerns me deeply. I have heard that the minister has deferred deportations for a number of people with criminal backgrounds and later it was decided that he could not reverse these deferments after it had become obvious that the deportations should be carried out. Perhaps in this case I should give a more specific example. Was Paolo Violi or any member of his family—and I mean his real family, not his criminal associates—ever given ministerial permission to remain in Canada, and later provided with permanent residence in spite of his criminal record? And in this connection, was there ever a time when a deputy minister of immigration was issued a permit to carry a revolver for self-defence after being threatened by any member of the Violi family?

The purpose of these questions is to determine how the present act has been administered so that we can have a better appreciation of the advantages and disadvantages of Bill C-24. We must be able to judge whether it will be wise for parliament to give this government a blank cheque to continue in the same pattern.

I am very uneasy about the entire immigration situation, and although I have dealt with only one or two aspects of the problem, I share our spokesman's concerns and the concerns that have been expressed by other members of our party. I urge all members to withhold their support for this bill until all the facts are available and the minister has been more forthcoming about what he really intends to do by letting us see the regulations that will be issued under the authority of this bill.

Mr. Alex Patterson (Fraser Valley East): Mr. Speaker, in view of the importance of the subject currently under discussion I appreciate the opportunity of making a few comments on the question of immigration. Since there is some disposition, I believe, to conclude this part of the debate this evening, I shall try to govern myself accordingly so that second reading stage is concluded.

Canada has never had what one could term a long-range or far-sighted immigration policy. Rather, our immigration policy could quite correctly be called a short-term reactionary policy moulded by relatively short-term interests and pressure. The government traditionally has responded to these social and economic pressures by changing the regulations governing entry and residency in Canada.

In this debate we have heard the word "haphazard" used to describe the government's approach to immigration policy. We have also heard the term "government by regulation" to describe this approach. This is particularly disturbing because we had been expecting a piece of legislation on immigration that would deal with statute law rather than simply regulations. As I have pointed out, our history in immigration within the last few decades has been that of immigration by regulation, and now we find when we examine this bill that, when you strip away the rhetoric and facade, we really have a continuation of that arbitrary system where everything of import is decided by bureaucratic decision.

My understanding of the report of the joint committee on immigration that held meetings all over Canada was that there ought to be a better balance between statute law and regulation. From reading the speeches so far in this debate I gather that a number of other hon. members interpreted the committee's report in the same way. What are we presented with, however? We are presented with a piece of legislation that has no effective balance between principles enshrined in law and regulations. In this sense it is no better than the 1952 act.

In fact, as far as delegation of ministerial authority to the bureaucrats is concerned, this bill is even worse than the present act. The minister may, under this proposed new act, delegate authority to "such persons employed in the Public Service of Canada as he deems proper". My hon. colleague from Hamilton West called this "a complete abdication of powers to persons unknown". I agree with that analysis and I would submit that it is dangerous for any matter of such importance to be so lightly dealt with as to provide for its administration and implementation in such anonymous, abstract, and unclear terms.

The regulations must be made available for debate and, as other speakers from my party have stated, we will continue to push for this information until the government comes clean. As well, I think it important for the minister to be absolutely clear about who will be delegated authority, as the bill says, "to exercise or perform any of the powers, duties and functions that may or are required to be performed by him". What is this line of authority? Who are these persons employed in the Public Service of Canada that clause 123 talks about? Surely the people of Canada have a right to know this line of authority.

To the extent that this legislation has incorporated most of the recommendations of the special joint committee on immigration policy, the government is to be congratulated. To the extent to which it has changed those recommendations and corrupted them, however, it is not to be congratulated. The government has a facility for taking good ideas, twisting them around and implementing them so that the least amount of good can come from them. I am afraid that is the case with the recommendations from the special joint committee.

It is a positive step to lay down in relatively clear terms in statute law, first, what the objectives of Canadian immigration law should be. Presently there is no such enunciation of intention, and possibly the instability of our immigration policy, or non-policy, is a result of that fact. If we do not really know what we want to achieve by immigration it is almost impossible to develop a coherent, useful immigration policy. I believe that the fundamental objectives of our immigration policy should be formulated in terms of what could be called enlightened self-interest. We should proceed from the premise that immigration is a privilege, not a right. It cannot be otherwise. This is not to imply that immigrants ought to be second-class citizens, or that they are somehow not as good from now on as were previous immigrants. On the contrary, we ought to make it clear to those emigrating to our country that they are privileged persons.

In the past, and there are some who would argue this way now, immigration to Canada has sometimes been looked on as a right, especially if that immigration had political overtones to it. Refugees, for example, are a special class of immigrants, and so they should be. However, I have received letters, as have most hon. members I am sure, from people lobbying for the admission of certain individuals to Canada from the standpoint that we "ought" to admit them.

Let us be clear on this point: Canada is not "obliged" to admit anyone other than Canadian citizens and established residents. Every one else who is in this country is here by privilege, or is here illegally. And at this point let me reiterate what was said last week by my hon. colleague, the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp), that an amnesty program to make legal that which is illegal will not receive support from this side of the House.

In 1972 when the amnesty program was announced, we supported it because of the uncertainty caused by the change in regulations implemented by the government. We felt that there ought to be a time lag whereby people who were living in the country illegally could make their residency legal. There is now no excuse for people who are in Canada illegally. Our regulations governing this have been in effect for some years now, and I submit anyone living here as an illegal resident is doing so deliberately and knowingly in contravention of our laws.

We are happy and, as I said, consider it a positive step to have enunciated in statute the fundamental objectives of Canadian immigration law. These objectives are family reunification, non-discrimination, concern for refugees, and the promotion of Canada's economic, social, demographic, and cultural goals. I think these are consistent with a position of enlightened self-interest and we commend the government for laying down our national objectives in such terms.

I feel that family reunification must continue to be a priority in our national objectives, and we should take every opportunity through diplomatic channels to achieve this end. I think every member of this House would applaud the minister's efforts to reassure those Canadians with relatives living in eastern Europe that, to use his words, "We shall continue our efforts to reunite their families and will apply our rules and procedures with compassion and flexibility." The family is the basic unit of our social system, and the condition of the family in our society is reflected in the condition of society in general. It is a natural, reasonable, and predictable response for people who come to Canada to want to bring their family here at some future date. Because we believe in the importance of the family, we must encourage and promote the reunification of our immigrant families.

A concern that is foremost in the minds of all Canadians, and I am sure is a concern of all members of this House, is that our immigration policy be non-discriminatory. A further concern should be that it be perceived as or believed to be non-discriminatory. The plain facts are that no immigration policy can be completely free from all discrimination, that everyone in the world, for example, has equal opportunity for making application to come to Canada. This was pointed out quite aptly by my colleague, the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander), in his speech on Tuesday, March 15, 1977.

As well we know that extra points have been given for educational level, special training, expertise in certain areas, personal assets, and so on. In a sense we are discriminating against individuals who do not have these certain characteristics. However, we do not call this process of selectivity discrimination, and the important thing we try to keep in mind and adhere to is that within the guidelines of educational status, special training and so on we do not favour one race more than another, or one language group more than another.

While it remains to be seen how the minister will interpret and administer the act and regulations, I feel most Canadians would be encouraged to see the principle of non-discrimination enshrined in statute law. I think that, on the whole, most Canadians would agree that in the past our policy in this area of non-discrimination has been fair and that those seeking to come to our country have been accorded reasonable and equitable treatment. I hope it will remain that way in the future.

I do not want to take too much time to discuss refugees, because other members from this side have covered the topic quite well. I want to say, however, that since Canada is a signatory to the United Nations Convention on Refugees, it is about time our nation did something to formalize our commitment in this direction. Canadian statute law has never confirmed this principle in any way relating to immigration policy. The government may consider claims for refugee status on the basis of fear of persecution due to race, religion, ethnic origin, or membership in a particular social group or political opinion. This is as it should be, and the government ought to have a certain amount of flexibility in handling refugee situations as they arise.

In recent times, and here I think of the emigration to various parts of the world of refugees from Vietnam and Chile, there has been some controversy over what a refugee actually is; and, further, what role political affiliation ought to have when consideration is being given to asylum in Canada. My understanding is, as well, that provision is being made by this legislation for the establishment by regulation of special selection standards for refugees, to modify the criteria applicable to normal immigrants so that special assistance can be made available within Canada to assist in the refugees' successful establishment.

I now come to the discussion of the area that is of direct enlightened self-interest to Canada, the promotion of Canada's economic, social, demographic, and cultural goals. The other areas I have spoken of are in Canada's interest, but really in an indirect way. The demographic goals and the lack of government direction in reaching those goals were well dealt with by my colleague from Provencher when he spoke for the Official Opposition the day this bill was introduced.

I think that the provision to steer immigrants away from our already crowded urban areas like Montreal, Toronto, Vancouver, Winnipeg, and Ottawa is a positive one. My feeling is, as I stated earlier, that immigration is a privilege and that it should not be unreasonable to expect people coming to Canada to help us achieve our economic and demographic goals. The bill provides for a period of service where the immigrant's abilities could be used for six months. I think the hon. member for Palliser (Mr. Schumacher) said that it should be longer. I agree. It could be extended. Some choice could be provided within particular types of categories. In other words if, for example, dentists are needed for rural areas of Canada, give the immigrant dentist a choice of rural Manitoba, rural British Columbia, or rural Quebec. I suggest that the government should provide incentives for immigrants to settle in certain areas. Canada is certainly large enough and diversified enough to allow some choice of location under this particular requirement for residency for six months in a specified area.

Another part of our social, economic, demographic and cultural goals involves the participation of the provinces. I believe in the principle enunciated in this legislation that consultation with the provinces will take place. I hope this means meaningful consultation, not the type of consultation this government is used to carrying on. All too often, for this administration, consultation means announcing or informing the other party of a decision after it had been made unilaterally by the federal government. I hope this will not be the case under this legislation.

As I said, I think the provinces should have a major role in decisions involving immigration, especially in the decision-making involved in matching incoming personnel with manpower or demographic needs. There has been a real need in the past for some rationalization of our immigration with respect to manpower and employment needs. I hope the government will make full use of the provincial resources available to determine areas or communities requiring available immigrant skills.

In conclusion I want to say a few words about unemployment. There are presently some one million people without work in Canada. That is a national tragedy. We are projecting an immigration flow of about 125,000 people for next year. The minister thinks the figure will be between 140,000 and 150,000, but I think that is too high in view of our present unemployment.

I know that immigrants bring capital to the country, I know they set up businesses; I know they have made a tremendous contribution to the development of the Canadian way of life. But I believe we must understand the fact that there are many Canadians who are unable to obtain employment, and I believe that careful consideration should be given to the level of immigration so that it does not contribute toward increasing the rate of unemployment.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Patterson: It does not make sense to permit immigrants to come to our country when there are a million people who cannot find jobs. We let them in and then say, "Sorry, boys, we do not have anything for you to do. You will have to sit on the shelf. There is nothing open for you, and therefore you will have to go on welfare". I do not think that is helping the immigrants, and it is certainly not helping Canada.

Mr. Gilbert: This must be Tory policy.

Mr. Patterson: It is Tory policy; it is sensible; it is sane. I reiterate that we would not be doing the immigrants a kindness by bringing them in if we are not able to provide them with work and to allow them to make a contribution when they come here.

I see that time is moving quickly to the zero hour. I thank all hon. members. I appreciate the opportunity to make these comments.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

[Mr. Patterson.]

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, having heard the representations from all hon. members, for which I am most grateful, let me say that I think we can deal with them more adequately and in some detail in committee. There is not too much that I should say at this time. Let us get the bill into committee where we can deal with it in some detail.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

Pursuant to the order made Thursday, March 17, 1977, a recorded division stands deferred on this question until Wednesday, March 23, 1977, upon calling of orders of the day.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Speaker, it was originally understood that the motion on the report of the Standing Committee on Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments would be called upon the conclusion of this part of our proceedings. We have had an all-star cast around all day. I think they could be persuaded to come back another day, as I am sure nobody would want me to take to the ice for about two minutes before ten o'clock is called. I wonder, therefore, if we could retain our place under motions rather than being shifted to government orders so that House leaders could pick another time for our deliberations to enable us to deal with this very important report.

Mr. Goodale: That is a very good suggestion, Mr. Speaker. I am sure the House leaders will want to get together shortly to select an appropriate time when this important debate can be commenced and given the scope it deserves.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): If I may explain, so that all hon. members, as well as the hon. member who has spoken, are made aware of what has occurred, there have been preliminary discussions with respect to finding an appropriate time. It has been our understanding—and I hope it is the understanding of the House—that the matter, if it is not proceeded with today, will not lose its place, as suggested by the hon. member in whose name the motion stands.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): That is our understanding, also.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In the opinion of the Chair, the matter not having been brought up for debate, it retains its present place. To make sure this is clear, let us make it an agreement of the House that it is understood that the House leaders will get together to find the appropriate time for this matter to be debated. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

FINANCE—REQUEST FOR INCREASED FINANCIAL SUPPORT FOR HOUSING FOR LOW INCOME GROUPS

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, on Wednesday, March 16, in the absence of the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Ouellet) I directed some questions to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) relating to the CMHC budget which had been tabled the day before.

I indicated that the CMHC budget showed a massive swing away from funding for rental housing for low and moderate income people. In view of the high number of unemployed construction workers and the low apartment vacancy rates in large cities across Canada, I asked the Minister of Finance whether the government would reverse this incredibly regressive and unfair policy, and increase financial housing support for low income Canadians, because this matter affects Canadians with an income of less than $10,000 who are forced to rent apartments.

The Minister of Finance, in his usual glib way, stated that there had been a record number of houses built last year, particularly low income houses, and he cited AHOP as being the salvation for all low income people.

What is the record of the government with regard to housing for low income people? What is the housing policy for Canadians? Most houses are well beyond the financial capacity of most Canadians. For example, a three bedroom house in Toronto last year cost $76,000. With a down payment of $6,000 it would leave a mortgage of $70,000. At an interest rate of 11 per cent, a person would have to pay $673.78 for principal and interest on a 25 year basis, and the total amount would be $202,134, which indicates that on principal of $70,000 a person has to pay $132,134 in interest. This indicates the record of the government with regard to building affordable houses across the country.

What is the CMHC record on low income or social housing? The CMHC budget for 1976 indicated that 16 per cent of its capital or money was for social housing. That 16 per cent amounted to only 2 per cent of all the new housing starts across the country. Mr. Speaker, only 2 per cent of more than 250,000 homes were built for low income people. That gives an indication of the minister's save-all policy for AHOP.

What has the Canadian Council of Social development said with regard to the attitude of CMHC towards those people who are trying to develop social housing, third sector housing? There has been an indication that it has been indifferent and difficult. It has built up all the necessary walls to prevent social housing from moving forward in Canada. In fact, there has been a far different approach to people who are interested in social housing compared with those who develop homes by way of private enterprise.

What is the result of all this? The result is that there is a crisis across the country as a consequence of CMHC budget cutbacks for rental housing. There is going to be a crisis of available apartments, and there is going to be a crisis of increasing rents across the country.

The House should not take my word for it; it should take the word of the experts as recorded in the Toronto Star no later than March 12 of this year, and I quote:

> As far as rental apartment construction goes, senior citizens and low-cost public housing is the only game in town.
> The number of private condominium and rental apartment units built in Metro last year dropped to 5,508 from 10,650 in 1975, according to a recent study by A. E. LePage Ltd., one of Canada's largest realty firms.

The following is the important line:

> Even fewer apartments are expected to be built in 1977.

Is it any wonder that we talk about a rental crisis developing right across the country? Here we have CMHC in its capital budget cutting back on rental housing. This indicates to me that the new minister is in the clutches of developers, builders, speculators, and financial institutions, and that he has spent little or no time on the housing needs of most Canadians, otherwise he would not cut back on the CMHC budget for rental housing. More money is needed for rental housing, not less. More money is needed for non-profit and co-operative housing.

Instead of the slight increases which were set forward in the CMHC budget, which did not even cover the inflation we experienced in the last year, it seems to me that the minister should spend more time on housing needs. If he spent more time on housing than he does preparing lists of separatists in Radio Canada, he would direct money to rental housing to meet the needs, we would overcome the apartment shortage which prevails across the country, and we would allay the fears of most Canadians about rent increases. It is for this reason that I bring this question to the attention of the House this evening.

Adjournment Debate

Mr. George Baker (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) and the Minister of State for Urban Affair (Mr. Ouellet) I will attempt to answer the hon. gentleman.

The hon. member is correct in his assessment of some reduction in certain of the housing program allocations in CMHC's 1977 capital budget. It should be noted, however, that in the public housing area, where the amount of money allocated for 1977 shows the greatest reduction, the number of additional households assisted during 1977 will not be reduced but will be slightly increased. This is to be done through a couple of mechanisms that have been added to this program, and which do not entail capital costs. These mechanisms were devised because of the negative reaction given by the provinces to this type of housing assistance.

In the other programs specifically mentioned by the hon. member, the co-operative and non-profit housing programs, he should know that although the allocations have not been increased for 1977 there have been, however, substantial increases since the inception of these programs in 1973, and a number of low income Canadians have already been assisted under these arrangements. I would like to add that the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation 1977 budget, as designed by the Minister of State for Urban Affairs, reflects a re-ordering of priorities in the light of the large proportion of housing built in 1976, as mentioned by the Minister of Finance last week, a large portion of which was moderate or medium cost housing. It also takes into account the desire on the part of the government to limit the increase in government expenditures in 1977-78.

I would also like to point out that in trying to assist the very low income people the government has substantially increased the number of households to be assisted through the residential rehabilitation program. It is estimated that some 22,000 units are likely to be assisted in this manner during 1977. This represents a substantial increase over the 1976 figure. The program is aimed at helping people in the very low income groups. This program also has a substantial employment generation element which should be very well received in light of the present climate.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS—SOVIET ACTION AGAINST SYMPOSIUM OF JEWS IN MOSCOW—POSSIBILITY OF CANADIAN PROTEST

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, on January 25, 1977, I asked two questions in the House concerning the Jewish symposium in the Soviet Union. My questions were, first, what steps has the Canadian government taken to indicate its dismay to the Soviet government of the stifling of the December symposium in Moscow, the symposium which was organized by Jews who wished to discuss the present state and possible future of Jewish culture in the U.S.S.R., and second, what effect this action will have on the intent and the meaning of the Helsinki accords?

[Mr. Gilbert.]

The minister answered in a letter to me which reads:

As discussed in our exchange of correspondence of November and December last concerning the emigration of Soviet Jews, the Canadian government's approach to the issue of human rights in the U.S.S.R. relies heavily on the Final Act of the Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe. I think those who are sincerely concerned about the implementation of the Helsinki Final Act and the promotion of human rights throughout the world will regret that action was taken to prevent what appeared to have been a serious effort to discuss a subject of concern to Jews in the Soviet Union.

The minister went on to say:

This is one of the subjects that will have to be looked at during the Belgrade meeting this summer that has been called to review progress in the implementation of the Final Act.

In a recent speech to the B'Nai Brith in Toronto on March 13, 1977, the minister stated:

The issue of human rights is commanding significantly greater attention on a global scale.

Then the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Jamieson), on March 16 in a speech to a seminar sponsored by the Canadian Council of Churches and the Canadian Council of Catholic Bishops, stated:

The Universal Declaration of Human Rights is not a binding legal instrument, and other covenants and conventions which may have enforcement provisions are binding only upon their signatories.

These are conflicting statements. This disturbs me somewhat.

I would like to bring a number of individual atrocities to the minister's attention which I feel he should bring up at the Helsinki Final Act meetings that are going to be held this summer. One of the particular cases is an Ida Nudel, who is under 30 years of age and has been waiting six years to emigrate to Israel. She has been subjected to vicious harassment by the K.G.B. She cannot leave her home because K.G.B. agents follow her everywhere.

Another case is that of Dina Zlotver and her husband, Isaac. They are living in the city of Sverdlovsk. Both are elderly and both have cancer. They applied to emigrate to Israel but were turned down by the Russians. Their children were allowed to immigrate. This is inhumane. Also, Mr. Speaker Mr. Zlotver was a World War II hero. Why is he receiving such treatment?

Another case I would like the minister to raise with the Russians is Joseph Mendelovich. He is 29 years of age and is serving the seventh year of a 12 year strict regime sentence at Vladimir prison east of Moscow because he wanted to emigrate to Israel. He is in poor health and should be released and allowed to emigrate.

Why will the Russians not let Jews emigrate to Israel or elsewhere? These are issues the minister should raise with the Russians at the meetings that will be held this year in Europe.

On January 22 of this year the Russian government produced and displayed a film entitled "Traders of Souls", a government inspired film on anti-semitism. Why are the Russians going to such extremes and using such inhumane methods against the Jews in Russia?

These are examples of individual cases which the Canadian government should discuss at the Belgrade meeting this summer on the Helsinki Final Act.

I wrote to the minister with regard to the treatment of Mr. Leib Khnokh, a Russian native who was sentenced to ten years for trying to escape. He still has four years to serve in Vladimir prison east of Moscow. The report is that he has become very ill, suffering from internal bleeding and has not received any medical attention.

The Toronto Group of 35, a Jewish group working to assist Jews in Russia who are being harassed, stated that Soviet policemen are beating and kicking Moscow Jews. An article in the Toronto Star reported:

MOSCOW (AP)—Twelve Soviet Jews said last night that auxiliary policemen kicked and beat them after they enquired about visas to leave the country.

The Jews, all previously denied visas, said they visited the public reception office of the Soviet parliament yesterday and asked for written statements on when to expect their exit documents.

After waiting all day for an answer, they told Western reporters at a news conference, about 30 men wearing red armbands of auxiliary police ordered them into a bus and drove them about 28 miles out of town to a wet, snowy field.

But they refused to leave the bus, said journalist Arkady Polishuk. "We said it was very dark, we didn't know where we were and we are afraid. Then they started to throw us out of the bus by force and were beating us powerfully at the same time, hitting us with their fists and feet, and striking us in our faces."

They did not know if the policemen had intended to beat them, or only did so when they refused to leave the bus. Although some of the group wore blood-stained clothes none appeared to be seriously injured.

These are the atrocities being committed in Russia against the Jewish community. These are the issues which the Secretary of State for External Affairs should be discussing with the Soviet government when its representatives appear at the Helsinki meetings in Europe.

The Toronto Group of 35 is a women's activist organization working on behalf of Soviet Jewry. They ask us to read the article which appeared in the Toronto Star on Wednesday, October 20, 1976, which I just quoted.

Mr. George Baker (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that the minister is interested in the cases that the hon. member has just mentioned.

The hon. member quoted from a letter in which the minister has said that he believes those who are sincerely concerned about the implementation of the Helsinki Final Act and human rights throughout the world will regret that action was taken to prevent what would appear to have been a serious effort to discuss a subject of concern to Jews in the Soviet Union.

It is our understanding that the Soviet government regarded the organization of such a symposium as illegal. That is not for us to comment on. It does, however, seem on the surface to be inconsistent with the undertaking in the Helsinki Final Act to facilitate the contribution which national minorities or regional cultures within their territory can make to co-operation among the CSCE participants in various fields of culture.

This is one of the subjects which will have to be looked at during the Belgrade meeting next year that will be called to review progress in the implementation of the Final Act. We think that this would be the most appropriate place for any Canadian comment.

INCOME TAX—POSSIBILITY OF CHANGE IN TREATMENT OF REVENUE EARNED BY INDIAN BANDS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, on February 18, as reported at page 3190 of Hansard, I raised a matter of considerable concern to Indian bands throughout Canada, especially the Musqueam Indian band which is in my constituency of Vancouver South. I asked the minister if she could inform the House whether there was going to be a change in the policy which has existed until recently, that is, that Indian bands with a certain status have been treated for taxation purposes as Canadian municipalities.

The minister did answer. She stated as follows—and I am reading from Hansard:

Concerning the specific point raised about the eventual change in the interpretation bulletin IT-62 which is the one to which the hon. member refers, I can assure him that the Indian band councils on Indian reserves are considered as Canadian municipalities. Should any change be envisaged in the future, consultations will take place.

That answer was very satisfactory—until it is viewed in the light of a letter dated November 25, 1976, from the minister's department and directed to the solicitors of this particular band council. That letter reads in part:

It is our position that Musqueam is not a municipal corporation pursuant to paragraph 149(1)(d) as the council of the Musqueam Indian Band does not qualify as a Canadian municipality pursuant to paragraph 149(1)(c), despite the fact that the band council, pursuant to sections 81 and 83 of the Indian Act performs in respect of the reserve many of the functions provided to communities elsewhere in Canada by municipal governments. It is our view that the term "Canadian municipality" contained in paragraph 149(1)(d) of the Income Tax Act refers to an incorporated body.

It is our understanding that Interpretation Bulletin IT-62 dated August 18, 1972 will be amended in the near future to reflect this view.

Until now the interpretation bulletin referred to in that letter and referred to by the minister has amounted to a statement by the government, if I can put it that way, that these particular enterprises on Indian reserves will be treated in the same way as those of Canadian municipalities for tax purposes. Since it now appears that certainly as long ago as November, 1976, departmental officials were stating that this policy is being changed, why is it that the minister should have stated as recently as February 18 that it will not be changed? If she had stopped at that point, I would be satisfied, but the minister went on to add:

Should any change be envisaged in the future, consultations will take place.

My question, therefore, to the government and to the parliamentary secretary, is this: what confidence can Indian bands have in a minister's answer when they find that only a few months earlier departmental directives were stating exactly the opposite? Does the minister's answer mean that the matter is still under review and that it may well be changed—but only after the Indian bands have been spoken to? I use those words wisely, because the word "consultation" can mean many things.

What the Indian bands need is a measure of certainty. I would ask the parliamentary secretary to clear up this point once and for all so that the bands, especially this particular one in my riding, can get on with the planning they must do if they are to serve the people on their reserves.

● (2220)

Mr. George Baker (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the minister was asked on February 18, 1977, by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Fraser) if there was to be a change in policy relating to the treatment under the Income Tax Act of band councils on Indian reserves. The minister replied briefly that "a key group of officials" of her department had been established and was working in conjunction with officials of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and with representative of Indians "on a better and more fair application of the Income Tax Act on matters of great concern for the Indians".

Regarding any possible change in the status of Indian band councils, she indicated that interpretation bulletin IT-62, dated August 18, 1972, was still in effect; that if a change is to take place, there will be consultations.

A change has been under consideration, but any new policy relating to the question had not been determined when the question was asked; in fact there has not yet been a final determination of a change. And the minister clearly promised there would be consultations before any change took place.

The interpretation bulletin to which I have referred deals in paragraphs 7 to 14 with the department's treatment of band councils, and generally provides that Indian band councils on Indian reserves are considered as Canadian municipalities. But, as the hon. member would be aware, that policy is extended only to certain band councils. Paragraph 11 reads:

> The powers exercised by Band Councils that have reached the advanced state of development required by Section 83 of the Indian Act and the powers exercised by other Canadian municipalities are so similar that such Band Councils will be regarded as Canadian municipalities for purposes of subparagraph 110(1)(a)(iv) and paragraph 149(1)(c) of the Income Tax Act.

The fact of a band council being a Canadian municipality within paragraph 149(1)(c) does not concern us greatly if that is all that is implied. The problem that arises is this: a band council might so qualify and acquire a municipal corporation within paragraph 149(1)(d), and hope to shelter its income no matter the nature of the corporation's activity or its source of income.

However, there is a legal view that a band council, not being an incorporated body, cannot be a Canadian corporation. Thus, a corporation it controlled could not be a municipal corporation within paragraph 149(1)(d). That is where the matter stands at the present. As the minister has stated, if a change is to take place there will be consultations.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at two o'clock p.m.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.25 p.m.

PROPOSED REVIEW OF SEASONAL TARIFFS ON IMPORTED AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, a little delayed but nevertheless under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity relating to the signs of spring, which unfortunately are not all that evident in the capital today but which do manifest themselves in the fresh daffodils from my riding of Esquimalt-Saanich, and which are available in the lobbies to all hon. members.

In view of the growing unemployment across the country and particularly in my riding, in view also of the unfair competition under which Canadian agriculturalists and horticulturalists in the west suffer from cheap products from abroad in the form of vegetables, cut flowers, shrubs and fruits, some of which are almost certainly dumped on to the Canada market from overseas, I seek the unanimous consent of this House for the following motion, seconded by the hon. member for Okanagan Boundary (Mr. Whittaker):

That the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) in consultation with his colleague the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) undertake a review of the regulations relating to the seasonal imposition of duties on vegetables, cut flowers, shrubs and fruits from outside our borders, in particular recognition of the early maturing stages of these natural products in British Columbia, so that agriculturalists in the garden riding of Esquimalt-Saanich shall be able to continue their commercial operations, provide employment, and provide their customers in the east and in the west with garden fresh fruit, vegetables and flowers for many years to come.

Mr. Speaker: The presentation of such a motion pursuant to Standing Order 43 requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

FINANCE

SUGGESTED REJECTION OF PROPOSALS FOR ECONOMIC POLICY BY GOVERNOR OF BANK OF CANADA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I too rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the latest forecast of the Conference Board of Canada indicating that the economy is showing "a generally poor performance" and that the seasonally adjusted unemployment rate will rise to 8.3 per cent by the fourth quarter of this year, and in view of the statements made by the governor of the Bank of Canada in his report tabled yesterday in the House suggesting that 1976 was a good year despite the fact that one million Canadians were unemployed, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House urges the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) to reject the totally regressive and thoroughly erroneous policy suggestions by the governor of the Bank of Canada on what is required for the Canadian economy at this time.

Mr. Speaker: The presentation of such a motion can be done only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CRIMINAL CODE

PROPOSED AMENDMENT TO MAKE HOSTAGE-TAKING AN OFFENCE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity to move a motion under Standing Order 43. In light of the fact that hostage-taking in Canada is occurring with such frequency as to be commonplace, and as such criminal activities are connected with violent crime, and further, as such crimes are a total curtailment of the rights and freedom of law-abiding citizens, I therefore move:

That the government bring forth an amendment to the Criminal Code of Canada making hostage-taking a crime calling for a minimum sentence of imprisonment for five years.

Mr. Speaker: The presentation of such a motion for debate pursuant to the Standing Order can only be done with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

COMMENDATION OF TORONTO POLICE ON SUCCESSFULLY DEALING WITH HOSTAGE-TAKING INCIDENT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the terms of Standing Order 43 to seek the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion about an important public matter. As members of the House will be aware, last night in Toronto at about 11.30 p.m. a hostage-taking incident involving 13 hostages came to an end peacefully. The successful conclusion of this incident, which ended without any injury, gave yet another example of the courageous and dedicated service given all Canadians by the police forces of this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Beatty: I would ask the unanimous consent of the House to move, seconded by the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp):

That this House commends the members of the metropolitan Toronto police force for their courage and efficiency in bringing the hostage-taking incident of March 21, 1977 to a peaceful conclusion and it recognizes with appreciation the daily contribution of the police forces from across Canada whose bravery and dedication help to preserve the lives and safety of all Canadians.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have some reservations about the urgent and pressing necessity of using the Standing Order in this way to extend these kinds of congratulations. It puts a very invidious choice upon the House as to whether such a motion should be debated or passed without debate. Nevertheless, under the circumstances I will put the motion. The unanimous consent of the House is required for the presentation of such a motion. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

SUGGESTED MAINTENANCE OF CRITERIA TO QUALIFY FOR BENEFITS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I rise in accordance with Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the harmful effects of Bill C-27 and the proposed changes to the Unemployment Insurance Act, and in view of the new opposition to the requirements that jobless people work 12 weeks a year instead of the present eight, to qualify for unemployment insurance benefits, which will have a drastic effect in all parts of Canada, and in particular the Atlantic provinces, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

[Mr. Speaker.]

That this House do urge the government to amend or withdraw Bill C-27 in order to maintain the present criteria in qualifying for unemployment insurance benefits.

Mr. Speaker: The presentation of such a motion for debate pursuant to the Standing Order can only be done with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

SUGGESTION MINISTER NOT ESTABLISH MARKETING BOARD FOR BEEF PRODUCERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Arnold Malone (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to move a motion of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that beef producers in the province of Manitoba, by the way of a referendum on March 18, 1977, overwhelmingly denounced the concept of a beef marketing board, a position that underscores the petition containing 5,000 signatures that I tabled in the House of Commons on December 14, 1976, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Hargrave):

That this House requests the Minister of Agriculture to refrain from dictating the marketing board concept in the face of such obvious producer resistance.

Mr. Speaker: The presentation of such a motion pursuant to the standing order can only be done with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

PUBLIC SERVICE

SUGGESTION GOVERNMENT NOT ACT ON RECOMMENDATION TO INCREASE SALARIES OF SENIOR EXECUTIVES

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Prime Minister. It concerns the report the Prime Minister tabled yesterday of the government's advisory group on executive compensation. Given the restraint program to which the government says it is committed, will the Prime Minister give the House of Commons an undertaking now that the government will not allow senior civil servants' salaries to rise to the levels recommended by the advisory group on executive compensation?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not think it would appropriate to give that undertaking. I want to bring the report on executive compensation to cabinet, discuss it with my colleagues and consider the very serious arguments that are always put forth by this committee of private entrepreneurs and managers who have always given very sound advice to the government.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister must realize that once again the reputation of his government on the question of the seriousness of its commitment to restraint is at issue here. What I am asking for, and what the House would like to have, is a commitment by the Prime Minister now on the principle that in a period of restraint there will not be an acceptance by the government of the very substantial increases recommended by the advisory group on executive compensation. Can we have that commitment of principle now?

Mr. Trudeau: No, Mr. Speaker. The Leader of the Opposition seems to forget very readily that the senior executive service has been frozen for one year. They, with members of parliament, are I believe the only people in the economy who have—

Mr. Blackburn: They are starving.

Mr. Trudeau: You do not look as though you are starving.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: I am not prepared to take the easy route of trying to find one group in the economy whom we can control directly and make scapegoats out of them as the Leader of the Opposition is suggesting.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, it would be encouraging to the elderly, the unemployed and other Canadians if the Prime Minister would show the same degree of concern for them as he shows for senior public servants who have enjoyed what must be regarded as a very comfortable freeze. I would like to ask the Prime Minister now in relation to the fact that we have seen in this country, particularly during the years of his leadership, a growth in the power of the public bureaucracy compared to the power of the cabinet and parliament, for an undertaking that the treatment given by his government to this report will rebut the assumption that the direction and management of government lies with civil servants and will instead underline the principle of parliamentary democracy in this country, that the people who are to make the decisions in this country are those who sit in this House and not the highly paid elitist group who are the beneficiaries of this most recent recommendation.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

ALLEGED ABDICATION OF GOVERNMENT FROM RESPONSIBILITY FOR ECONOMIC POLICY—FISCAL RESPONSIBILITY OF PUBLIC SERVANTS

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, my question is also addressed to the Prime Minister. I was wondering whether the Prime Minister has ever considered that the frequent recommendations made to him in recent months by the Auditor General, the Conference Board, the Economic Council of Canada and now the Lambert report are in essence an indictment of the government's capacity to accept full responsibility for the financial problems confronting this country and its preparedness to hand over that responsibility to the public service?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I am not quite sure what the hon. member means, Mr. Speaker, but I am sure the answer must be no.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): My question is again to the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that his government is consistently talking about the need to hold the public service accountable and the difficulty under our parliamentary system of making them accountable to this House, does the government not even envisage the need to ensure total fiscal responsibility from its public servants so that in turn parliament can require accountability from those who, in the final analysis, must accept responsibility for these acts, namely, the ministers on the front bench?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I remain confused about what the hon. member means by "fiscal responsibility". It seems to me that every citizen in this country has to be totally fiscally responsible. So what?

FINANCE

RECONCILIATION OF POLICY OF REDUCTION OF EXPENDITURES WITH RECOMMENDATION FOR SALARY INCREASES FOR SENIOR PUBLIC SERVANTS

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): This time I will address my supplementary question to the Minister of Finance. If I cannot get answers from the Prime Minister, I can at least try to get them from the Minister of Finance. On page 8 of the Lambert report the advisory group refers to the deception in the public mind of the government's undertakings to restrain and reduce public expenditure. In the light of this comment, can the Minister of Finance explain how he will reconcile that particular comment with the recommendations made later in the report on page 20 concerning substantial increases in executive compensation in the public service?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that what the commissioners were referring to was the fact that the public has been under some misapprehension with regard to reduction in public expenditures. I might point out to the hon. gentleman that the rate of increase of expenditures for the financial year which will end next week will be below that of the gross national product and indeed below our anticipation for the year, and for the forthcoming year the rate of increase of expenditures will be half of what was earlier anticipated.

ECONOMIC POLICY RECOMMENDATIONS OF GOVERNOR OF BANK OF CANADA—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I too have a question concerning another well paid public servant. Can the Minister of Finance tell the House whether he has met recently with the governor of the Bank of Canada and, if so, did he make it clear to him that the government totally rejects both his foolish suggestion that 1976 was a good year economically for Canadians and his equally foolish view that we do not need a stimulus in the economy at this time to provide jobs for the more than one million unemployed Canadians?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): I have, of course, been in conversation this week with the governor of the Bank of Canada. The hon. gentleman finds himself in difficulty with the viewpoint he has been trying to sell to the Canadian public not according with that of the governor of the central bank. Between the two of them, I would have to take the governor's viewpoint.

POSSIBILITY OF TAX CUTS IN FORTHCOMING BUDGET

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Given the past performance of the governor, and indeed his predecessor, I would be very concerned if we had similar views. I would like to ask the Minister of Finance, who did such a superb job in managing the economy in 1976, if he would confirm for the House a newspaper report that when he was visiting the U.S. he informed the U.S. secretary of the treasury that he would not be bringing forward any tax cuts in his forthcoming budget to stimulate the economy.

● (1420)

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): No, Mr. Speaker, I did not indicate to the secretary of the treasury the direction of our budget at all.

FORECAST OF UNEMPLOYMENT RATE FOR COMING YEAR

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Can the minister inform the House whether his department received the latest forecast of the Conference Board of Canada which projects an 8.3 per cent unemployment rate for Canada for the coming year, and if so, would he confirm whether his own departmental estimates coincide with that very rosy picture?

[Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale).]

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the Conference Board of Canada, which is representative of many major foreign multinationals operating in Canada, does present a rather gloomy viewpoint of the economy. As the hon. gentleman may have noticed, that particular viewpoint which apparently he espouses is not espoused by some of the other private concerns.

Mr. Broadbent: Name one.

FISHERIES

MEASURES TO KEEP LARGE TRAWLERS OUT OF GULF OF ST. LAWRENCE

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Fisheries.

Since fishing operations in the Gulf of St. Lawrence will not begin before the end of April and that last year fishermen of the Gaspé Peninsula, the Magdalen Islands and northern New Brunswick faced serious problems caused by large trawlers from ports outside the gulf, could the minister tell the House what steps he has taken to ensure that the same conditions are not repeated so that fishermen will improve their catch and meet their needs?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, several members, especially the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Public Works, the hon. member for the Îles-de-la-Madeleine and others, have made representations to that effect. We have banned large trawlers from the gulf, except in the northern reaches where cod stocks are satisfactory.

Finally, for trawlers which cannot go elsewhere we have reserved the stocks of the gulf which unfortunately are not so abundant as we would like, especially Atlantic redfish.

MINISTER'S VIEW OF NEED FOR NATIONAL FOOD POLICY

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Grafftey: —my question with regard to the need for a national food policy is directed to the Minister of Agriculture. Responding to a question in this House on Friday the Minister of Finance said that this government sees a need for a new national food policy. Many weeks earlier the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs said we do not have a national food policy, that we need one and that the government is studying it. On many occasions the Minister of Agriculture has said we need no new national food policy because we already have one. I would like to ask the Minister of Agriculture who is speaking for this government, the Minister of Agriculture, the Minister of Finance or the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has said something I did not say. He said that I said we need no new food policy. I have never said that. I said we have a food policy, and I welcome any improvements to it.

AIRPORTS

PRINCE ALBERT—APPROVAL OF EXPENDITURES FOR IMPROVEMENTS

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. I endeavoured to find this out from the President of the Treasury Board on Friday. Has the Minister of Transport made any recommendations to the Treasury Board with regard to the expenditures necessary at the Prince Albert airport, to which reference was made during the recent by-election but which has apparently been forgotten by the minister ever since?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted that the right hon. gentleman at last asks the question when I am in the House after twice attempting to ask it when I was not here.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lang: That compliments exactly the deceit of the right hon. gentleman in appearing to imply here in the House that it was not completely clear in Prince Albert that the agreement signed was an operational agreement with regard to the airport. When I announced the plans for Prince Albert, I made it clear, in Prince Albert, that Treasury Board approval was being sought for those items. That approval is being sought. It was clear to the right hon. gentleman; he was in Prince Albert, and it was in the Prince Albert Herald. I think, therefore, that he owes an apology to me and the people of Prince Albert.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I raised this question in the absence of the minister. If I were to wait for when he returns from one of his many jet trips in Canada made for political purposes, I would never get the chance to ask him questions.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am delighted to hear he made the recommendation finally. Clearly, it was made as a result of pressure from the opposition.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, I have a question supplementary to the one raised by the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi, and I direct it—

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I meant to raise a question on the word "deceit" used by one who understands what it means.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

SUGGESTION SEMINAR ON FOOD POLICY BE OPEN TO PUBLIC—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Yesterday the minister sponsored a seminar in Ottawa on food policy, a seminar in which food industry people as well as the government participated. In view of what the Minister of Finance said on Friday about ongoing discussions for a national food policy, notwithstanding what the Minister of Agriculture said today, discussions which would take into account the interests of consumers and the viability of the agricultural industry in Canada—and I congratulate the minister on his initiative—is he prepared to re-open this seminar to the public so that the public which has a vested interest, obviously, in the food policy can provide some input? At the same time, if such a seminar were open to the public, perhaps the Minister of Agriculture could participate as well.

Hon. A. C. Abbott (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the research study which has been recently initiated by the Bureau of Competition Policy has to do with the effect of government regulation on competition in selected agricultural industries. The seminar was sponsored by the bureau to obtain working level input to this study from qualifed industry and academic representatives. The seminar is being carried on by the director of investigation and research under the Combines Investigation Act. However, the study is not part of my department's work on food policy.

Mr. McGrath: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I thank the minister for his answer. May I ask if we can conclude that the minister has now assumed, rightfully, responsibility for co-ordinating discussions within cabinet on food policy?

Mr. Abbott: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his confidence. The fact is food policy discussions are continuing. As I just said, a separate study is being carried on by a certain branch of the department. I hope it will produce some useful information.

Oral Questions

LAMBERT REPORT—POSSIBILITY OF ROYAL COMMISSION TO INQUIRE INTO SOME RECOMMENDATIONS CONCERNING PERFORMANCE OF PUBLIC SERVANTS

Mr. Walker Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, my question to the Prime Minister arises out of the Lambert report with respect to executive compensation in the public service, particularly from that part of the report which speaks of the advisory board wishing to emphasize the need for establishing principles of accountability which can be practically applicable for the measurement of executive performance on the one hand. On the other hand, that same report recommends the provision of better incentives for the efficient management of public funds, and that a system of rewards for such efforts should be established. These ideas have been around for some time, elaborated on and commented on in early reports produced by Mr. Lambert and his colleagues. In view of this repetition with respect to obviously necessary changes in terms of the performance of senior levels of the Public Service of Canada, will the Prime Minister do more than merely refer the report to his cabinet colleagues? Does he intend to appoint a royal commission to examine, in effect, a royal commission, or are we to see some progress on this matter, particularly with respect to incentives for maximizing the use of public funds by senior levels of the Public Service of Canada?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I point out to the hon. member that the government has taken action on the aspects recommended, in so far as we have assessments of performance in order to slot those in the executive branch of the civil service within certain ranges. Therefore, we have been doing exactly what the advisory board recommends. They are concerned with the area of the public service not falling under order in council appointments and, indeed, those observations are well taken. We are enjoining deputy ministers, within their jurisdiction as managers of departments, to show the same kind of exactness as cabinet has shown in classifying those order in council appointees within the ranges of their duties.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The Prime Minister spoke of performance ratings. Speaking of performance ratings, let me add that Mr. Lambert and his colleagues indicated that it was difficult to accept the results they found. In other words, there was a condemnation of what the Prime Minister says he introduced in the Public Service of Canada. Indeed, that condemnation of performance records in the public service has been felt by other levels in the public service—I have in mind the foreign service secretaries branch, a much lower level, and it indicates—

● (1430)

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the hon. member has a question, will he please put it?

[Mr. Abbott.]

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Would the Prime Minister re-examine his answer with respect to the first question that a system of performance ratings has been introduced, particularly with respect to its adequacy because this is important not just to senior public servants but to the morale of the whole of the public service?

Mr. Trudeau: I would prefer that the hon. gentleman re-examine my answer rather than I should do so. I can assure him that the public service compensation board is not criticizing the cabinet for the way in which it rates performance. We have done this in a way which meets their approval. Their criticism is directed to the level of those appointments which do not come under cabinet, those which are public service appointments. In this area, I agree with the hon. member that the deputy ministers will have to exercise a bit more vigilance to make sure that performance ratings are more close to a norm rather than having too many people bunched in the superior performance category. In this respect, I agree with the hon. member and I agree with the advisory board. More vigilance will have to be shown by the deputy ministers. But I cannot help repeating that as far as cabinet is concerned our order in council appointments have the type of performance ratings of which they approve.

HEALTH

SACCHARIN—SUGGESTED USE OF EDUCATIONAL PROGRAM AND WARNING LABEL

Mr. F. A. Philbrook (Halton): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. It has to do with the proposed ban on certain consumer products containing saccharin due to the discovery of a research link with cancer. Is the minister considering a general public educational program covering all sweeteners, including sugar, as well as a requirement that a prominent warning label be placed on both saccharin tablets and permitted saccharin-containing products?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): There are various techniques by which this subject may be approached. I made public recently a report on cardiovascular diseases in which there was some advice with regard to diet. I think the point raised by the hon. member is an important one since it deals not only with sweeteners but with all aspects of nutrition. This is part of a general strategy we have developed in terms of informing the public about nutrition. Various techniques are used for this purpose, such as inserts with family allowance and old age pension cheques. We hope to develop other techniques to improve this type of public education program as funds become available.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

CONFERENCE ON PROPOSED YOUNG OFFENDERS' ACT—POSSIBILITY OF REPRESENTATION BY NORTHERN TERRITORIES

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): A question for the Solicitor General, Mr. Speaker. Will there be a federal-provincial conference held to discuss the proposed amendments to the Young Offenders Act, a discussion paper concerning which was tabled by the minister yesterday? If so, when will that conference be held and will the two northern territories be represented by elected members of their assemblies?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): The documents tabled in the House yesterday will be the subject of discussion in Regina this week in the course of the continuing meeting of deputy ministers of the provinces responsible for correction services. Subsequently, it will be my intention to request a meeting with my provincial counterparts to consider this subject. I shall, of course, bear in mind the suggestion of the hon. member that the territories be represented at these meetings.

Mr. Nielsen: Might I ask the minister whether or not the territories are being represented by elected members of their respective legislatures or by bureaucrats from one or more of the government's departments in Ottawa?

Mr. Fox: As far as the meeting in Regina this week is concerned, I believe the representatives referred to have been designated by the commissioners of the territories. It is my intention to get in touch with the commissioners before extending invitations to the provincial ministers to attend the further conference which should follow shortly.

INDUSTRY

LEARSTAR PROGRAM—REASON FOR ALLEGED USE BY CANADAIR OF ITALIAN ENGINEERS

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. It concerns Canadair and the building of the Challenger Executive Jet aircraft, formerly called the LearStar 600. Can the minister inform the House why approximately 45 Italian engineers from the Air Italia Manufacturing Company of Italy are now in Canada? Are they here to cope with structural problems which Canadair is experiencing with the Challenger?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I cannot provide the hon. member with a definite answer just now. I am aware that the corporation is hiring more staff and it may have sought the services of experts from foreign countries. I shall try therefore to provide the hon. member with a more definite answer.

[English]

LEARSTAR PROGRAM—POSSIBILITY PARTS MANUFACTURED IN ITALY

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Will the minister find out whether parts of the plane are to be manufactured in Italy and whether these are parts which could be manufactured by Canadian firms? Further, has Italy placed any orders for the Challenger?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether some components are to be manufactured in Italy. I know, however, that this program provides for the creation of over 1,500 new jobs in the Montreal area and some 1,500 more elsewhere within the industry in Canada. Certain components may have to be imported. In the case of engines, for instance, we have negotiated a number of purchases to even off our balance of payments.

[English]

LEARSTAR PROGRAM—AVAILABILITY OF EXPORT DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION FINANCING

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Is Canadian Export Development Corporation financing in jeopardy, and are export orders in doubt because of lack of Canadian content in the manufacture of the Challenger? In other words, are most of the component parts being manufactured outside Canada, thereby restricting availability of CEDC financing for foreign buyers?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): That is not absolutely correct, Mr. Speaker. Most of the plane components will be built in Canada. Some components will certainly have to be imported, but I believe 70 per cent of them will be built in Canada.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

CHANGE IN PERIOD TO QUALIFY FOR BENEFITS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In view of the opposition from all quarters of the House to the minister's proposal in Bill C-27 to change the period allowed for qualifying for unemployment insurance benefits from eight weeks to 12 weeks, can the hon. gentleman inform the House whether he will consider amending that requirement in the legislation?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): I think this is a subject we shall be dealing with at the committee stage.

Mr. Orlikow: In view of the fact that changing the benefit requirements would have a catastrophic effect and increase substantially Canada's unemployment problem, and bearing in mind the statement of the former minister of manpower, Mr. Mackasey, that the proposed change "removes the whole spirit of human dignity—a man's right to be protected by the government when he wants to work but cannot", will the hon. gentleman consider amending the proposed requirement to which I have referred?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member surely realizes he is raising a matter of debate on an item which is before the House, anyway.

BILINGUALISM

STUDENT EXCHANGE PROGRAM—REQUEST FOR PARTICIPATION BY ALL PROVINCES

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State. The federal government has announced a bilingual program for student exchanges under which some 8,000 or 9,000 students from Ontario and Quebec will be exchanged. As there are eight other provinces and two territories whose young people would like to enjoy the benefits of such a bilingual exchange program, what are the eligibility proposals for young people from provinces other than the special status provinces of Ontario and Quebec who want to enjoy this program?

COMMISSION OF INQUIRY INTO PROBLEMS IN NEWFOUNDLAND—TERMS OF REFERENCE AND DATE OF COMMENCEMENT

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. The minister announced last December that the government was going to appoint a royal commission to examine all modes of transportation in Newfoundland and to report thereon, as had been suggested by the president of the CNR, before the end of 1977. Have the terms of reference now been put in final form; have they been agreed to by the government in Newfoundland; is it a three-man commission chaired by Dr. Arthur Sullivan, or by whom; and when will this announcement be made and the commission start to function?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, we have been discussing these questions with the government of Newfoundland and others. We are now nearly at the stage of having the matter in final form and I would expect an announcement within perhaps one week.

ATOMIC ENERGY OF CANADA LIMITED

SALE OF SECOND CANDU REACTOR TO ARGENTINA—INQUIRY AS TO USE OF AGENT

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of press reports this morning that Argentina is seeking a new construction partner, as is AECL, in regard to Argentina's desire to obtain a second CANDU reactor, I would ask the minister whether there is any agent—promotional agent, commercial agent, or any agent—involved in any way in the second CANDU reactor sale anticipated by Argentina?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): No, Mr. Speaker, because at the present time there is no negotiation for a second reactor sale. The hon. member is correct when he says that the Argentinian agency has expressed an interest in having a German firm join with AECL in providing a CANDU reactor. It is also true that the German firm has shown interest in such an arrangement, which is yet further testimony to the international reputation of the CANDU reactor.

Mr. Lawrence: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is the German firm to which the minister refers Kraftwerk Union A.G. of West Germany, and is any agent involved in any way in any past, present or future association between that firm and AECL?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I know of no past, present or future association between AECL and that corporation. I do know that that is one corporation that has been mentioned as a possible partner with AECL in providing a second reactor to Argentina, but I would emphasize that we have not offered to sell a second reactor to the Argentine.

Mr. Lawrence: A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Can the minister inform the House whether any agent is involved in any way in any future dealings with Italimpianti, whether in Argentina or anywhere else in the world?

Mr. Gillespie: I know of no ongoing relationship with Italimpianti anywhere else in the world.

HEALTH

BAN ON USE OF SACCHARIN BECAUSE OF LINK TO CANCER—REASON FOR FAILURE TO BAN USE OF TOBACCO

Hon. Herb. Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Recently the government announced that it is proceeding to ban the use of saccharin because of the results of a study indicating its danger to human health. Will the government be instituting a ban on the use of tobacco similar to that recently announced for saccharin and, if not, will the government explain why it is not taking such a step, even though there has existed for some time studies which indicate not only danger but in fact harm to human health caused by the use of tobacco?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, to the first part of the question the answer is no. To the second part of the question, I have already answered this question in the House and I will be quite happy further to elaborate on the matter when my main estimates are considered before a parliamentary committee this week.

INCOME TAX

MEAL ALLOWANCE FOR TRUCK DRIVERS—POSSIBILITY OF CHANGE

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Revenue and has to do with the problem faced by long distance truck drivers and their ongoing conflict with members of her department. As the minister is aware, many of these drivers spend up to 200 days a year in their cabs, which is not the most conducive place to conduct office procedure, yet they are allowed only $7.50 per day for meals without receipts, whereas members of her department receive an allowance of up to $15. Is there any plan in her department or on her part to change the present requirement for truck drivers and allow at least $12 per day?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, as far as I know the $3 per meal, which means $9 per day, deduction against expenses by truck drivers or similar employees is to help them administratively when they do not want to keep receipts for their expenses. Any charge for a meal backed by an actual receipt will, of course, be deducted in the full amount.

ALLEGED DISCRIMINATION IN MEAL ALLOWANCE FOR TRUCK DRIVERS

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): A supplementary question for the same minister, Mr. Speaker. Can the minister explain why truck drivers for oil companies who work 10 hour shifts are only entitled to one meal per day, and why is there a discrepancy across Canada regarding the amount per meal which the department is presently granting?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have serious reservations whether this precise kind of information ought not to be sought from the minister before the committee.

ENERGY

ALLEGED BREAKDOWN OF ARRANGEMENTS FOR SAFEGUARDS FOR NUCLEAR REACTORS

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I should like to refer to the report mentioned by the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham and to ask the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources about the statement in that report that talks between Argentina and Canada as well as between Argentina and West Germany regarding acceptable nuclear safeguard arrangements for other related nuclear projects recently broke down. What safeguards are referred to in this report, and how do they relate to the nuclear installation which is already being built by AECL in Argentina?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I believe that that part of the report is quite erroneous.

TRANSPORT

REASON FOR FAILURE OF RAIL WEST TO RECEIVE ORDERS FOR HOPPER CARS

Mr. John Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. According to press reports in the Vancouver papers last week the provincial economic development minister, Mr. Phillips, was to meet with the minister yesterday in connection with trying to obtain for Rail West, a British Columbia corporation, some orders for rail cars, especially in view of the fact that the 2,000 hopper cars which were contracted for and which this company bid on were not included in any contract with this company. Can the minister inform the House what happened at these discussions yesterday and whether there is any chance whatever of Rail West getting any orders or work through the federal government so that over 200 men will not be laid off?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, we have looked very sympathetically at the position of Rail West and had indeed invited them to participate in the construction of a limited number of the hopper cars in the previous order of 2,000. We were willing to make some quite significant sacrifice in terms of price per car, but they were unable to meet even that price for only a 100 car order. I did indeed meet Mr. Phillips and we did discuss the situation further. We will be looking at the question of car supply and such other matters as the cars which CN and CP may require, so as to determine whether we can find ways of offering additional employment to this plant.

Mr. Fraser: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Can the minister tell the House whether the difficulty that Rail West is having in meeting the unit cost of central Canadian and eastern manufacturers relates to the fact that Rail West must buy its steel from central Canadian or eastern Canadian producers and is unable to bring in steel at a cheaper rate from offshore?

Mr. Lang: Well, Mr. Speaker, even allowing for the steel cost differential between—

Mr. Fraser: Yes or no?

Mr. Lang: No, in the sense that, even allowing for the differential in steel costs in that region compared to other regions, the price quoted by Rail West was considerably higher than the prices of other plants. We offered something above the differential, but that was the price Rail West was unable to meet.

Mr. Fraser: Mr. Speaker, this is a matter of grave concern to a lot of people and I should like to ask this final supplementary question. Can the minister then confirm that there are discussions going on between the government of British Columbia and his own department to see whether this particular operation can put in bids and possibly get some work in the coming months? The matter is very crucial for well over 200 people.

● (1450)

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, it is very much appreciated by both ourselves in this government and the provincial government that it is crucial. As a result, as I have said, those discussions are going on. I did meet with Mr. Phillips yesterday. Rail West did bid in relation to this order so it should be clear to the hon. member what has already happened. The provincial government indicated its interest in terms of looking at the total price picture at the time of a subsequent tender. We will obviously be looking at that question.

HEALTH

POSSIBILITY OF BANNING PRODUCTS IN ADDITION TO SACCHARIN THAT MAY BE DANGEROUS TO HEALTH

Mrs. Simma Holt (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the fact that excessive amounts of saccharin have been found dangerous to rats and it is to be banned for human consumption, and it should be noted that humans have built-in protection in that they would drown before contacting cancer using comparable amounts, will the minister advise the House whether we can expect his medical researchers to push ahead to ban chocolate, ice cream, cheese, liver, milk, eggs, coconut, sugar, salt and all other products that induce high cholesterol and heart disease to humans, even though we are not sure if it is safe for rats?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Holt: Further, will he also consider banning cars, also dangerous to humans although we have no statistics on rat mortality.

[Mr. Fraser.]

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I want first to thank the hon. member for her useful contribution to this highly scientific debate. I invite her to look at the statements made by the officials of my department before the committee of the House considering the supplementary estimates of my department during the course of the last week. She will find a very worthwhile explanation of the whole study and will realize that, in particular, the World Health Organization put the safety level of one part per 5,000 as a minimum safety level while in this particular case we found cancer-producing agents at one part per 800. In that respect, the danger found in this case on the basis of those studies was indeed very real. I hope that consideration of this matter will be given in a scientific and responsible way and that people who are interested in further knowledge on the scientific aspects of this matter will come when my main estimates are considered next week, at which time my officials will be quite happy to provide further information on this subject to those who are interested.

PUBLIC SERVICE

SALARY INCREASES FOR SENIOR EXECUTIVES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the Prime Minister's concern that Canadians not live beyond their means and in view of the government's desire to dampen the rising expectations of Canadians, will he reconsider the position he has taken during the question period today with reference to recommendations for salary increases for deputy ministers and others in high positions. In particular, will he take into account that the recommendation is that there be two increases, one retroactive to last April and another effective this April, the two of which amount to a considerable sum for persons who, like myself, are not starving?

Mr. Alexander: I don't know about that, Stanley.

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): You sure look like it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I believe the hon. member is misreading the report. It is not recommending a retroactive increase, certainly not the way I read it. It is indicating a range and moving the range in two periods of one each year. It is not recommending that the salaries go up this year after having gone up last year. On the contrary, the report recognizes there has been a one-year freeze of senior executives. It takes that into account. As I told the Leader of the Opposition, not many people in this country, certainly not the labour movement which are supported by the hon. member's party, have accepted a one-year freeze as did we in this House and public servants at the senior level.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I recognize that the tables in the report are not recommendations as to salaries but recommendations as to ranges. But in view of the fact that two new ranges are being proposed, one for last year and one for this coming year, will the Prime Minister seriously consider the suggestion from this side of the House that increases actually granted within those ranges should be held down? I ask this in view of the concern of the Prime Minister that Canadians not live beyond their means and that something be done to prevent our people from getting expectations that are too high?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I told the Leader of the Opposition earlier that the report was just tabled yesterday and that it had not been considered by Cabinet. Cabinet will consider the report. I will look at the suggestion of the hon. member. I will not espouse his prejudices that we should show our courage by penalizing one particular group when the whole country would be permitted to go on without restraint.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

PARTICIPATION BY FEDERAL GOVERNMENT IN COST OF MODERNIZING SYDNEY STEEL PLANT

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. Since the management of the Sydney Steel Corporation is considering several options with reference to modernization of the present steel plant at Sydney, can the minister advise what part officials from his department are playing in these considerations?

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, there has been some consultation between Sysco and my department. However, I am not in a position at the moment to inform the hon. member as to the details of those consultations. We will undoubtedly have to wait a few more weeks before we can really address ourselves to what plan or strategy would be the best for Sysco and the department.

Mr. Muir: I thank the minister for his reply. In view of the fact that one of the options being considered is that, with an investment of $200 million to $250 million in the present plant, it could be modernized, diversification of products could take place and employment provided for over 3,000 workers, can the minister advise or give some encouragement as to whether his department or the government will assist the province of Nova Scotia in funding such a project?

Mr. Lessard: Mr. Speaker, if the project is as described by the hon. member, we will certainly look into it and evaluate the whole proposal. If in our view it is a good project, we will give sympathetic consideration to it.

PLANS FOR REPLACEMENT OF ICNAF—REQUEST FOR REPORT

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment and at the same time welcome him back from his discussions with Brigitte Bardot.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. McGrath: Romeo, Romeo, wherefore art thou Romeo?

Mr. Crouse: Discussions are being held in Ottawa until March 25 to consider the development of a framework for future multilateral co-operation which will replace ICNAF. Up to the present, ICNAF set the quotas inside and outside the 200-mile limit. What steps does the minister plan to take in 1978 and beyond for the international management of our fisheries, both within the 200-mile limit and the fisheries area immediately adjacent to it, and what steps will be taken to undertake scientific co-operation in the area as a whole?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, with regard to the first part of the hon. member's question, Madame Bardot did not come to Ottawa to get the full information which could have been made available to her if she had wanted to have that information.

● (1500)

On the other point the hon. member mentioned, the meetings on the future of ICNAF are going on at this time and I think it would be premature for me to offer the type of long-term answer that the member is requesting. When the meeting is over, I will make a point of briefing him either through the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry or in the House.

INCOME TAX

REQUEST FOR EQUAL TREATMENT OF DEDUCTIONS ALLOWED TRUCK DRIVERS

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a question to the Minister of National Revenue.

The minister certainly knows that truck drivers working for companies whose main activity is transportation can deduct for tax purposes a certain amount for meals and accommodation and that all other truck drivers working for companies whose main activity is not transportation do not enjoy the same privilege. In view of this flagrant injustice, does the minister intend to review her department's policy, thus allowing all truck drivers working more than 10 hours a day and driving more than 200 miles a day to benefit from this tax relief?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I regret but this question has already been put earlier today.

Can the minister tell the House whether he still intends to keep the promise he made a while ago to the gens de l'air, namely that he would present an amendment to the Public Service Staff Relations Act authorizing first, the disaffiliation and second, the accreditation of independent associations of air controllers from Quebec?

[English]

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): The actual wording of the understanding between us is different from the words used by the hon. member, and this would come forward not under my jurisdiction but under that of another minister. Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I have a question of privilege regarding the statement made by the Minister of Transport. I ask Your Honour to read the allegations in the statement of the Minister of Transport to the effect that it is not unparliamentary. If it is so, then I have been misled for 37 years.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The right hon. member for Prince Albert made a brief reference earlier to the answer of the Minister of Transport. I caught the word "deceit" in that answer. I was not able at that time to determine the manner in which the word was used and to know in that quick instant whether there was anything offensive or unparliamentary in the way in which it was used. Upon the invitation of the right hon. member I will examine the language used and endeavour to determine tomorrow whether I should invite further argument on whether a question of privilege exists.

Some hon. Members: Withdraw now.

[Translation]

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I am afraid my question was misunderstood. The question I put to the Minister of National Revenue during the oral question period was not the same as that of one of the former speakers. I was speaking of the people who, contrary to what the minister said, have already asked for income tax deductions and whose request was denied by the Department of National Revenue. I should like to have the privilege of bringing up the matter again since it was not in any way a repetition of a question asked previously.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I listened very closely to the details of the question put this afternoon by the hon. member for Lotbinière, with the intention of accepting it if at all possible, but felt it was exactly the same as the question put previously. If I am wrong, after having examined the specific terms of the question, I shall certainly give the floor to the hon. member for Lotbinière tomorrow so that he can put the question again.

OSHAWA HARBOUR COMMISSION

Question No. 1,054—Mr. Broadbent:

1. Has the Oshawa Harbour Commission (OHC) filed with the Department of Transport or Ports and Harbours an application for expansion of the Oshawa Harbour and, if so, on what date will the environmental studies be undertaken through EA, EPS, EARP, RSCC and what will be the cost?

2. Has the Department of Transport fully exercised a site-selection process to determine the best location for a harbour in Oshawa in view of the economic constraints and environmental considerations?

3. Has DOT given the OHC full authority to preside over marshlands and does this conform with the Harbour Commissions Act?

4. Is it accepted policy for harbour commissions under DOT to engage in land-banking, real estate, industrial planning for municipalities, lakefront planning for municipalities, etc. and, if DOT has given the OHC such authority (a) on what date was it given and by whom (b) what are the limits of the authority?

5. Did OHC have permission to construct an earthen dyke across the natural outlet of the marsh in the fall of 1974 and, if so (a) on what date was such permission given and by whom (b) for what purpose was permission granted (c) who was consulted before permission was granted (d) does such construction violate any sections of the Fisheries Act (e) was the opinion of the Department of Justice or the Department of the Environment sought and, if so, what were their recommendations (f) were any environmental studies done (i) prior to the construction of the dyke to determine the environmental change and/or damage that would occur (ii) after the construction to assess the damage and, if so, what were the results of these studies and will they be made public?

6. Does OHC forbid entry to the marshland to naturalists, the public and the provincial government and, if so, for what reason?

7. Will access to the marshlands be granted to (a) concerned conservationists so that nature studies and educational programmes may continue (b) Ontario Ministry of Natural Resources and Canadian Wildlife people to continue with the waterfowl banding under the Migratory Birds Act and, if so, on what date?

8. (a) Will the dyke be removed and the outlet restored to its natural condition and, if so, on what date (b) what was the agreement between federal and provincial personnel with OHC?

9. (a) Will the public have input into the decision-making process prior to any announcement about harbour expansion (b) can the public be assured that full environmental impact studies will be undertaken before any such decision is reached (c) will DOT make public its intentions for future harbour expansion, and will it justify the intentions with appropriate documentation (d) are studies and testings being conducted at other sites along the Oshawa lakefront, or has the decision been made to proceed with expansion into the second marsh (e) are there any studies that demonstrate a need for expansion of the present harbour into the second marsh?

10. Will DOT and OHC open their files on the issue so that the public will have full knowledge of all facts pertaining to OHC, the harbour expansion proposals and the future of the marshland?

11. Did DOT and DPW complete studies and testings in 1975 and, if so (a) what was their purpose (b) will the results be made public and, if so, on what date and in what form (c) will the results remain confidential and, if so, was this requested by OHC?

12. (a) Are DOT and OHC willing to accept full responsibility for any damages that have occurred as a result of the dyke construction (b) what action does DOT intend to take to correct such damage (c) what action will DOT take to insure that such things would not occur in the future?

13. (a) Does OHC have permission to divert the Oshawa Creek as it flows into the present harbour (b) is the Creek subject to provincial act and regulation (c) did the OHC allow dumping of waste materials into the harbour in 1975 after the federal government paid for dredging operations in Oshawa Harbour and, if so, for what reason and is this contrary to government policy and to NWPA?

14. Does the DOE intend to take action against DOT if any infractions of federal laws are indicated and, if so, on what date?

Order Paper Questions

15. Will DOT and/or DOE make the Johnston Report on the environmental importance of the Second Marsh public?

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Departments of Transport, Public Works and the Environment as follows: 1. No.

2. No.

3. Yes.

4. The Oshawa Harbour Commission is established under the Harbour Commission Act 1964 which authorizes the commission to acquire or sell land as required for harbour development purposes. A harbour commission does not however engage in industrial planning or lakefront planning etc. for municipalities.

5. No. (a) N/A; (b) N/A; (c) N/A; (d) N/A; (e) N/A; (f) (i) No. (ii) No.

6. Limited entry is now allowed to approved bird watchers on a permit basis.

7. Controlled access to the marsh has been extended.

8. (a) Department of the Environment has advised that the dyke is not causing the high water levels in the marsh. The marsh is being drained adequately by the present outlet, hence removal of the dyke would be an imprudent expenditure. (b) No agreement.

9. (a) and (b) The public can be assured that full environmental impact studies will be undertaken in conjunction with economic and engineering studies for development of the harbour and full opportunity will be given for public response. (c) Yes. (d) No. (e) Economic studies are being undertaken.

10. Any proposals for expansion of the harbour and the future of the marsh land will be fully documented in studies which will be made public before any action is taken.

11. Preliminary engineering studies remain incomplete. Soil tests were completed in 1975. (a) Oshawa Harbour Commission requested Department of Public Works to provide necessary engineering service to enable the commission to complete an overall long range plan for harbour expansion, including conceptual layouts with related costs. (b) As Department of Public Works was providing a consultant service to the Oshawa Harbour Commission, it will be the responsibility of the commission to make the results of the studies and tests public. (c) Further to (b), the Oshawa Harbour Commission formally asked Department of Public Works to refer any information requests from public or other government agencies to the commission, who would treat such requests on their individual merit.

12. (a) There is no indication that any damage has occurred. (b) No action is indicated. (c) No action required.

13. (a) There is no intention to divert the Oshawa Creek from the present harbour basin. (b) No. (c) In 1975 the Oshawa Harbour Commission used stone and concrete from local construction projects as shore protection against erosion in the northeast corner of the harbour. This did not affect any dredging operations and is simply good practice for shore protection. It was not contrary to policy nor to the Navigable Waters Protection Act.

14. It is not the practice of the Crown to initiate action against itself.

15. This report is available to interested parties from the Department of the Environment.

GRANTS TO READER'S CLUB OF CANADA

Question No. 1,494—Mr. McKenzie:

1. Did the Reader's Club of Canada, 35 Britain St., Toronto, Ontario receive a financial grant from the (a) Department of the Secretary of State (b) Canada Council in (i) 1975 (ii) 1976 and, if so, in what amount?

2. What were the conditions under which such grants were made?

3. Is it government policy to give financial aid to private organizations and what was the rationale in giving such aid to the Reader's Club of Canada?

4. What was the purpose and aim of giving financial aid to the Reader's Club of Canada?

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): Department of the Secretary of State: 1. (a) Nil.

2, 3 and 4. Not applicable.

Canada Council: 1. (b) (i) $75,000. (ii) $50,000.

2. The instalments were to be paid upon receipt of satisfactory financial and progress reports.

3. The majority of Canada Council programs exclude profit-making organizations. The Council however supports the translation and publication of Canadian books through grants to publishing houses. The Readers' Club of Canada was given aid under a new program, established in 1975 by the Secretary of State and administered by the Council, designed to encourage the promotion and distribution of Canadian books and periodicals. It is the only Canadian-owned general interest book club in the English-language community and its purpose is to make Canadian books available to readers who might not otherwise hear about them or be able to acquire them.

4. The grants were awarded to enable the Readers' Club to carry out a promotion campaign in Canadian periodicals.

CANADA COUNCIL—SUBSIDIZATION OF THE "LIVRE D'ICI" TEAM

Question No. 1,740—Mr. Laprise:

Is the Canada Council subsidizing the Livre d'ici team and, if so (a) in what amount (b) for what period of time?

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): I am informed by the Canada Council as follows: Yes, under a new program, established in 1975 by the Secretary of State and administered by the Council, designed to encourage the promotion and distribution of Canadian books and periodicals. (a) and (b) $88,000 to prepare and offer without charge, in 1975-76, to over one thousand newspapers a weekly information page on French language Canadian books; $96,000 to continue this press campaign in 1976-77 and $30,000 to prepare and distribute during this period a weekly radio information tape on French language Canadian books.

[Mr. Goodale.]

EMPLOYEE PENSION AND MEDICAL PLANS

Question No. 1,787—Mr. Herbert:

With reference to the answer to Question No. 1,083, what is the estimated amount of monies contributed by (a) employees under the Public Service Staff Relations Act (b) public service employees not under the Public Service Staff Relations Act (c) members of the defence forces (d) members of the RCMP?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board): In 1974-75 employees contributed the approximate amounts listed below to the various employee benefit plans, (a) Pension Plans (i) Employees under the Public Service Staff Relations Act, $170,000,000; (ii) Public service employees not under the Public Service Staff Relations Act, $11,900,000; (iii) Members of the defence forces, $56,700,000; (iv) Members of the RCMP, $11,900,000; Total, $250,500,000. (b) Death Benefit Plans: (i) Public Service Death Benefit Account, $15,200,000; (ii) Regular Forces Death Benefit Account, $2,800,000; Total $18,000,000. (c) Canada and Quebec Pension Plans (i) employees under the Public Service Staff Relations Act, $33,500,000; (ii) public service employees not under the Public Service Staff Relations Act, $2,500,000; (iii) members of the defence forces, $8,800,000; (iv) members of the RCMP, $1,500,000; Total $46,300,000. Public Service Insurance The totals of employee contributions to the various insurance plans are not identified on a separate basis, since by the very nature of such plans, the accumulation of those contributions on an individual employee or plan basis is neither required nor necessary. The premium rate structures vary within each plan, and although the total employer contributions are identifiable by virtue of the fact that such expenditures must be charged to Treasury Board Vote 20, the employee contributions are remitted direct to the insurers, or provincial authorities. Subject to the above qualification, however, public service employee contributions to those plans have been estimated in the undermentioned approximate amounts for the year 1974-75. (d) Surgical-Medical and other Insurance Plans: (i) Employees under the Public Service Staff Relations Act, $26,285,000; (ii) Public service employees not under the Public Service Staff Relations Act, $4,825,000; (iii) Members of the defence forces, $4,020,000; (iv) Members of the RCMP, $776,000; Total $35,906,000. (e) Unemployment Insurance (i) Employees under the Public Service Staff Relations Act, $22,766,000; (ii) Public service employees not under the Public Service Staff Relations Act, $4,303,000; (iii) Members of the defence forces, $4,862,000; (iv) Members of the RCMP, $972,000; Total $32,903,000. (f) Hospital Insurance (Outside Canada) Plan (i) Employees under the Public Service Staff Relations Act, $717,000: (ii) Public service employees not under the Public Service Staff Relations Act, $134,000: (iii) Members of the defence forces, $151,000: (iv) Members of the RCMP, $2,500: Total $1,004,500. (g) Health Insurance Plans for Employees Engaged Locally (Outside Canada), $16,000.

NEWFOUNDLAND—AID PROGRAMME TO STUDENT ATHLETES

Question No. 1,815—Mr. Marshall:

Have any applications been received from the Province of Newfoundland under the expanded aid programme to full and part-time student athletes, as announced in May 1975, for (a) student grant-in-aid (b) supplement to the grant-in-aid (c) training allowances?

Hon. Iona Campagnolo (Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport)): (a) Grants in aid

Academic year	Number of applications received	Number eligible for grants	Amounts awarded
1975-76	48	20	$18,800
1976-77	61	19	$16,200

(b) and (c) Supplements and training allowances are available only to game plan (Olympic sports) athletes, of which there are none from Newfoundland.

CBJET TV STATION AT CHICOUTIMI, QUEBEC

Question No. 1,925—Mr. McKenzie:

1. What is the total potential English viewing population of CBC television station CBJET of Chicoutimi, Quebec?

2. What is the viewing audience of CBJET in prime time and what is the lowest viewing audience?

3. What was the total cost for the establishment of CBJET?

4. What is the total annual salary of all employees at CBJET?

5. How many people are employed at CBJET?

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): I am informed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as follows: 1. According to the 1971 Census official language figures, there are 2,000 people who speak English only and 23,800 who are bilingual (English/French) for a total potential viewing audience of 25,800 within the A and B contours of the CBJET transmitter. In the Census, 4,800 people claimed English mother tongue.

2. First audience surveys have not yet been completed.

3. Capital costs $192,400.

4. Nil.

5. None. The transmitter is unattended.

DR. NOEL HALL—MEDIATOR OF DISPUTE BETWEEN TREASURY BOARD AND CANADIAN UNION OF POSTAL WORKERS

Question No. 2,011—Mr. Dinsdale:

1. With reference to the answer to Question No. 1,486, what amount was Dr. Noel Hall paid for his services and what were his terms of reference?

2. Was Dr. Hall presented with any papers of government origin?

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): For the Public Service Staff Relations Board: 1. Dr. Noel Hall was paid $9,900 as fees for his services as mediator. The terms of reference given to him by the Chairman of the Public Service Staff Relations Board were to confer with the parties and endeavour to assist them in reaching a settlement of their dispute.

2. Dr. Hall was not presented papers of government origin. However, a variety of information and papers were furnished to him on a confidential basis by officials of the bargaining agent and officials of the employer.

MRS. MARY ALICE MULLALLY

Question No. 2,063—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Is Mrs. Mary Alice Mullally employed at 24 Sussex Drive and, if so (a) in what position (b) at what annual salary (c) on what date was she hired?

2. Was Mrs. Mullally married at 24 Sussex Drive and, if so (a) what were all the costs to the taxpayer, if any (b) on what date did the wedding take place?

3. Was Mrs. Mullally employed in any capacity at 24 Sussex Drive at any time prior to her wedding and, if so (a) in what capacity (b) what were the duties of her employment?

4. Was Mr. Mullally appointed or employed by the government at any time and, if so (a) on what dates (b) in what positions (c) what were the duties of the positions (d) what was his annual salary?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): 1. Yes. (a) Household Co-ordinator; (b) $6.31 per hour, 40-hour week; (c) present duties commenced November 25, 1976 (see part 3).

2. No. (a) Reception was held at 24 Sussex Drive at no cost to the taxpayer. (b) Private (see Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, Fourth Edition, Citation 171 (dd).

3. Yes. (a) and (b) September 20, 1972 to July 12, 1974, Maid October 1, 1976 to November 24, 1976, Senior Maid (see part 1(c).

4. Government of Yukon Territory, September, 1974—September, 1976. Federal Government: (a) appointed on December 6, 1976 by Minister without Portfolio under section 37(1) of the Public Service Employment Act. Ceased employment March 15, 1977. (b) and (c) Special Assistant; (d) $19,542—$22,168.

[English]

Mr. Goodale: I ask, Mr. Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Mr. Brisco: Mr. Speaker, if there were some difficulty with question No. 506 which was placed on the order paper on October 14 last, I would understand the problem the government might have in responding to my question. However, in view of the fact that it is a straightforward and simple question I would think someone within the Post Office Department should be able to answer it, and I would like to register my concern.

Mr. Speaker: Before proceeding with orders of the day, may I say that hon. members are aware that yesterday a very important point of order was raised concerning the use of items in the estimates, particularly the supplementary estimates and particularly $1 items in supplementary estimates to achieve legislative purposes. I had hoped I would be in a position to make that ruling at three o'clock this afternoon, and I almost made it. I have some finishing touches to put on the ruling which, I expect, will take about one hour. I hope to return at about four o'clock this afternoon to make that ruling.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY S.O. 58—ONE DOLLAR ITEMS USED IN ESTIMATES

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville) moved:

That in the opinion of this House the government's use of dollar items further diminishes the proper control of the House of Commons over expenditure, and additionally, circumvents the right of the House to fully discuss the creation of new policies, programs and agencies.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this motion is to highlight what appears to be a deliberate, calculated subversion of the parlimentary process through the abusive use of $1 items in supplementary estimates, in this case supplementary estimates (D). I want to illustrate the inadequacy of the present form and content of the estimates and also to outline some of the questionable tactics which this government has seen fit to employ in the administration of public funds.

When we look at supplementary estimates (D) we find that these estimates expose a wide variety of practices which, when taken in totality, can only be seen as a systematic effort to obscur, to misrepresent and to hide the spending practices of this government. The information which is contained in the estimates—and this has been confirmed by known authorites, one being none other than the Auditor General—is quite inadequate, misleading and often contradictory of the data contained in the main estimates. Moreover, when we consider the constraints of the parliamentary process and the current parliamentary rules which govern the proceedings of this chamber and the proceedings of committees—the time limitation or the guillotine rule, so to speak—neither committees nor this House are given sufficient opportunity to question, to analyse thoroughly, to examine or, indeed, to challenge some of the spending practices of this government.

We are debating this issue at a time when it is, indeed, unfortunate that there prevails throughout the country some reservations about the institution of parliament and its ability to exercise control over the public purse. There is no question that there is in the country a serious decline of confidence in parliament, yet we have a government which contributes deliberately and in a dedicated way to usurping the role of parliament and chipping away its authority. Hon. members on this side of the House take very grave exception to that practice.

I believe that supplementary estimates D clearly demonstrate how and why it has become increasingly difficult for parliament to assert control over public expenditures. The President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras) has stated his concern about the lack of parliamentary control. Last week in the House he stated that he was not happy with the current use of $1 items and suggested that this was a matter which fell within the aegis of parliamentary procedure; that it was really a procedural matter rather than one about which the government should concern itself.

I find that very strange, because when we read the Auditor General's report we find that many improvements could be made in the form and content of the estimates. The government has only to act and accept some of the recommendations which have been advanced. I find it strange, also, that the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen), a very distinguished parliamentarian for whom we all have high regard, spoke the other day in eloquent terms about the deep concern he has about the importance of preserving and, indeed, enhancing parliament and making it relevant to today's needs. I wonder, then, why he is party to the tactics this government uses systematically to undermine the authority of this chamber and the fundamental purpose for which this institution was established, namely, to debate legislative proposals and amendments thereto.

Why does this government refuse to act? Why does it refuse to accept some of the major recommendations of the Auditor General? One can only suggest that there are probably two reasons. Perhaps it is because attempts to improve the form and content of the estimates and the manner in which they are presented would reveal a degree of incompetence in the government to effectively plan and to allocate funds. On the other hand, it could be that this practice is an effective device for hiding unpopular or questionable expenditures. Whatever the reason, the methods being used with regard to supplementary estimates, particularly the abuse of $1 items, to me highlights the fact that this government is interested in expediency and convenience and does not have much concern about the traditions and privileges of this institution.

We know that the Auditor General is very concerned and unhappy about the present set-up. He has made it very clear that he considers public funds to be, in effect, trust funds held on behalf of the people of Canada and that they should be treated as such. Until effective systems of budgetary control are introduced and followed, no one will know accurately whether funds are being spent for the purposes for which they were provided. Proper control over federal spending lies with the ability of parliament effectively to exercise that control, and parliament has not been able effectively to discharge that responsibility under the practices we currently employ—indeed, the practices we have employed since 1968. This cannot be achieved over-all without an informative plan for the accounting of funds entrusted to the government. The Auditor General stated in testimony before the Public Accounts Committee that accountability for expenditure of government funds starts with accountability to parliament. There is no question about that.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mazankowski: The Auditor General stated, further, that the instruments used to provide that accountability and to provide parliament with meaningful information with which they can control expenditures are the estimates. That is the essence of the debate under our motion today. The unfortunate fact is that there is ambiguity and lack of certainty. Financial disclosures, both in the estimates and in the public accounts, are now inadequate for parliament to establish the accountability of the government. We know, of course, that if there is a devious technique in the books to circumvent, evade, or subvert, this government will seize upon that technique without hesitation.

Mr. Baldwin: They wrote the book on deviousness.

Mr. Mazankowski: In our view, there is no question that the government is engaged in practices which are beyond the scope of being legal and proper as far as the parliamentary traditions of this institution are concerned. As I said earlier, it may be expeditious for the government to proceed this way, but it is not proper. It may be shrewd from a parliamentary point of view, but there is a fundamental principle involved here and we say this practice should not continue. As a matter of fact, we strongly urge the government to discontinue the practice in the name of preserving the supremacy of this institution.

Yesterday, during the debate on the point of order raised by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker), many items were singled out which we in the opposition consider to be clearly questionable. In our view, these items constitute an abuse of the use of $1 votes. I shall not recite once again the many items to which we take objection. I think the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton and, indeed, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), clearly outlined many of the areas about which we have serious reservations.

We hope the ruling of the Chair will uphold the previous ruling made by Mr. Speaker Lamoureux. He considered the abuse of amending legislation through $1 votes totally contrary to the privileges and traditions of this House. There are 52 $1 items in supplementary estimates D, but in reality we are being asked to approve a practice which $1 votes would authorize in 65 cases. Some are acceptable, some are not. Some, in our view, clearly constitute a subversion of parliamentary authority.

We feel very strongly that amendments to legislation should be dealt with in a proper manner, namely, by the introduction of a bill whereby they can properly be debated and considered by parliament, and not by such slick, devious methods as the employment of the $1 item. The expenditure of moneys, notwithstanding certain provisions of an enabling piece of legislation, is contrary to everything for which parliament stands. It should be considered in a manner other than that in which we approve estimates under existing rules. We will soon have another set of items in the supplementary estimates which will be classified as "notwithstanding" items.

Dollar Items

In the area of amendments to non-money legislation or regulations there are as many as 12 instances where supplementary estimates D use $1 votes in this manner. These $1 items are used to fill three main purposes: first, to change the legal status of a government entity; second, to exempt a government entity from the application of a law; and, third, to amend legislation without recourse to a bill. Each of these seeks to circumvent parliament. All these changes should be accomplished through amendments to appropriate legislation or regulations. Through the use of a $1 vote in place of a bill, this government is able to avoid Commons debate on a particular change. Because of current procedures which govern us in dealing with estimates, there may be no opportunity—or, at best, one opportunity in committee—to vote down a particular $1 vote. Thus, the government is able to remove at least two opportunities for members to vote on a change and it removes the opportunity to state reservations, objections and suggest amendments on the floor of the House. This is tantamount to administration by edict.

An hon. Member: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mazankowski: Turning to Crown corporations, we take very grave objection to the establishment of a Crown corporation under the use of the $1 item, as in the case of Via Rail Canada. Our concern is not with the substance, but with the method. While we may have some reservations about the principle of the establishment of Via Rail Canada, that is not what is in issue at this time. It is the method which the government has employed to bring about the establishment of Via Rail Canada. It authorizes the expenditures of up to $240 million under the provisions of vote 52d, which can be found at page 120 of supplementary estimates D. This, in our view, is a major transportation policy decision and should be considered in this House in the form of a bill, rather than by back-door coercion. This action constitutes a clear contempt of parliament which has to be of the most blatant degree. One might even question the politics of the establishment of Via Rail Canada at this time, since the CTC is still in the process of studying the rail passenger service in this country and has not yet brought down its recommendation.

An hon. Member: It is a clear fraud.

Mr. Mazankowski: When we consider the powers which are going to be delegated to the minister under the provisions of the new transportation bill, that constitutes ministerial overkill in the most unorthodox proportions. We see the minister taking advantage of the powers which have yet to be passed on to him through the very questionable use of the $1 vote in establishing a Crown corporation of this magnitude. Simply by the stroke of a pen, under vote 52d Via Rail Canada will be deemed to be a railway company incorporated pursuant to section 11 of the Railway Act.

This is not the first time this has occurred. The House will recall last year when the former president of Treasury Board, now the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Chrétien) established Loto Canada through supplementary estimates. On that occasion, sir, you found that the practice was procedurally acceptable. As far as we are concerned, to be procedurally acceptable, and to be proper and morally correct, are two different things. It is very interesting to note that in your decision, as reported at page 14795 of Hansard of June 22, you stated:

—it would have been preferable for such a matter as this, which involves not only money but a question of principle, to have been brought before the House in the form of a bill in order to allow hon. members to address themselves at one and the same time to the question of whether or not money should be voted to set up a lottery, and, further, to whether or not in principle the federal government should be involved in a scheme of this sort at the present time.

This is the salient point:

Nevertheless, what I have to decide is not whether it is a desirable course, but whether it is a legal course in terms of our procedures.

You, sir, have recognized the impropriety, perhaps not the illegality, of proceeding in that direction. The creation of Crown corporations by a $1 vote is exceptionally dangerous. We already have a proliferation of Crown corporations in this country. When we couple that with the ability to convert Crown corporation debts into equity, the present administration has obtained the power to create a corporation, grant it a loan and then write off the loan by converting it into equity, all without any legislation and without the matter ever coming before this House. Power of this extent is not only a licence for abuse: it is, indeed, an enticement to abuse.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Hear, hear!

Mr. Mazankowski: Is it any wonder that we are now in the process of reviewing very thoroughly the operations of Crown corporations? Some of them are, indeed, undergoing a penetrating examination. The Auditor General has stated that the control and managerial practices of some Crown corporations are weak and in many cases inadequate. The whole question of accountability comes to light. Is it any wonder, when we consider the attitude of this government in terms of its accountability to parliament? Is it any wonder that we have Crown corporations behaving in a less than acceptable fashion? What they are doing is following the standard that has been established by this government. How can we expect AECL, or Polysar, to behave any differently from the government of Canada?

I could go on and cite other areas of concern—the question of loans, loan authority, guarantees, and the treatment that is provided to Eldorado Nuclear, something tantamount to a blank cheque. There are many questions which come to light in connection with that particular vote, and my colleagues will be dealing with that. There is the question of write-offs and debt deletions, the question and the principle of employing $1 item to write off the massive debt of the St. Lawrence Seaway. We witness the creative use of the $1 vote. The government has, in effect, written off a $625 million debt by deeming, with the wave of an accountant's wand, the debt to be equity. The danger is that by allowing this kind of conversion it is conceivable that any government entity owing money to the consolidated revenue fund could arrange to have its debts cancelled in this same way.

At the outset I said that the estimates were misleading and in some cases constituted misrepresentation. When we look at the estimates, it is stated that the amount requested is $929,675,111. This does not reflect the potential cost to Canada of all items included in supplementary estimates D. When one considers all contingent liabilities which could be established under these estimates, clearly the total commitment will exceed $2 billion. For example, I think of contingent liabilities established in votes to do with the Eldorado Nuclear, to do with Industry, Trade and Commerce vote 1d, of subparagraphs (b) and (c) of the export development guarantee, and of the item governing Via Rail Canada.

We are concerned about this government's practices and the continuing erosion of parliamentary authority in voting funds for government expenditures. The increasing practice of avoiding parliamentary approval through misuse and abuse of the estimates has raised deep concern about parliament's ability to carry out its traditional function and remain an effective guardian of the public interest and controller of the public purse. As I said earlier, at this time in our history when public cynicism and mistrust for our institutions is growing, this government's actions in running roughshod over the principles of representative democracy shock most Canadians.

Unless there is an honest and open demonstration that parliament has the capacity to control and properly account for government spending, the cynicism will not decrease—it will grow. If the cynicism grows, it will foster unrest and discontent in this country, with devastating effects on our nation.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): It is already doing this.

Mr. Mazankowski: As my colleague says, it is already happening. Mr. Speaker, the institution of parliament and of government will no longer be able to command respect and attention in leading the fight for national unity and social and economic stability. Parliament should be the focal point of national unity.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mazankowski: Parliament should be the major device for controlling the public purse. It should be the key to the preservation of individual freedom and our democratic process. The systematic undermining of the roles, responsibilities and duties of parliament will ensure that the institution cannot perform those tasks so vital to our future. That is why we condemn the government and its actions with all our vigour. We condemn it for its deliberate misuse of the practices, prerogatives and traditions of this institution.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) rose on a point of order to protest the inclusion of $1 items in the estimates. As a former leader of the government, I understood this very well. I have had serious misgivings about the use of those items and was not at all surprised that again, on this occasion, the leader of the House for the Official Opposition raised the question. The point, Your Honour will recall, was debated in the House for some 2½ hours. A great many members took part in the debate.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): No, it was debated 1½ hours.

Mr. Sharp: It was debated 1½ hours, I am sorry.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): From 3.15 p.m. to 4.45 p.m.

Mr. Sharp: There was a long, detailed discussion on the point; some new points were raised, and some repeated which had been raised previously. I would have thought that for the opposition, having raised this question as a point of order yesterday, would be enough. As it is, we are in a peculiar position today. At the conclusion of yesterday's discussion on the point of order, Mr. Speaker reserved his judgment until today. Hon. members will recall that a few minutes ago Mr. Speaker said that he had not quite concluded writing his opinion and that it would be transmitted to the House perhaps this afternoon. Now, as a result of the action of the Official Opposition, we are discussing again the matter raised yesterday. I question the wisdom of doing this. Mr. Speaker made it clear that he considers the matter to be of some importance and intends to give his opinion, to which we look forward, if not with bated breath at least with interest, for this question has concerned us all for many years.

Today we are debating a motion on the same subject and I suggest that the opposition is not being fair to the House or to the Chair in raising the question again today. Certainly, it puts the Speaker in a peculiar position.

An hon. Member: Mr. Speaker doesn't think so.

Mr. Sharp: I am expressing an opinion. I am not saying Mr. Speaker considers that he is in that position; I am saying that we have put him in a peculiar position. He is to give an opinion on the propriety of $1 items in the estimates on the very day when the House is to be asked to vote on a motion the outcome of which might be inconsistent, if not contrary, to the view put forward by Mr. Speaker. This, I think, should have been avoided, and I seriously fault the opposition for having raised the question in this form while Mr. Speaker was in the midst of deciding on the propriety of including $1 items in the estimates.

The second question one must ask is perhaps even more serious: Why would the opposition choose, on one of its six days when it can ask the House to express an opinion, to debate $1 items in the estimates? When I think of the debates of this session and the questions the opposition claims it has not had any opportunity to debate, I ask myself "Why have they decided to select a question of form, not substance, essentially a question of what should be in the estimates, as the subject for the motion before the House at this time?"

Mr. Mazankowski: Because it is fundamental.

An hon. Member: Because of the state of the economy.

Mr. Sharp: Exactly: as the hon. gentleman opposite just said, because of the state of the economy. I would think that might have been a better subject for debate in the House, and I think all members, whether on the opposition or the government side, would have welcomed the opportunity to talk about the state of the economy.

Mr. Mazankowski: We did that on Thursday.

Mr. Sharp: There is a great deal of information available. There is no denial of information; hon. members have full access to it. Press reports are available, and Statistics Canada material is available. There is a great deal of material for debating some of the leading issues of the day. But what does the opposition decide to debate? It decides to debate $1 items in the estimates. I say to my friends opposite that the people in my constituency will not understand. They will want to know why the opposition did not raise matters that are on their minds, questions such as unemployment and national unity.

Mr. Mazankowski: They should know how the government absconds with their funds.

Mr. Sharp: The opposition has been clamouring for the opportunity to discuss these important issues and when they get the opportunity, what motion do they put down? They put down a motion which is superfluous and unnecessary, because they raised the question yesterday on a point of order. I know that the people in my constituency consider such a question as being rather esoteric, a question of form. I suggest that the opposition, in selecting this subject for debate today, have wasted the time of this House, time which might be used to discuss questions of national importance and concern for the whole country. There could be debate about the propriety of $1 items: I have initiated such debates. But they do not go to the heart of the matters which concern the people of this country.

An hon. Member: We want to know where the money is going.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order. The House listened courteously to the previous speaker, and I suggest we should extend the same courtesy to the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Sharp).

Mr. Sharp: The other day my former colleague, the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) referred in his speech to the malaise which pervades the House. As a backbencher now, I observe our proceedings with more objectivity, perhaps, than when I was sitting on the treasury benches, and I must say I find myself in agreement with the view of a great many people that our proceedings are too much concerned with trivialities. We have failed this session to come to grips with the great issues. We have spent far too much time on matters of secondary importance. Unless we get back to subjects which are of serious importance to the people, this institution and all its members will suffer in consequence.

I shall not try to attribute all the blame to the opposition. But when I see a day like this, a day which might have been devoted to subjects which are on the minds of the people, being devoted to the consideration of the propriety of $1 items in the estimates, I find myself questioning the judgment of the opposition.

Some of us heard John Drewery on the news the other evening when he was talking about what was going on in parliament. Perhaps I might read some of the things he said at that time. John Drewery is a senior member of the press gallery and he has reported the proceedings of the House over many years. He is a man who does not engage in extremism, a man of moderation and sound judgment. He said this:

> Politically related events outside Parliament Hill have been stealing the thunder of the Commons during recent months ... René Lévesque has not dropped the other shoe on the future of confederation ... Ministers of the Crown have been breaking tradition by announcing policies to newsmen rather than to parliament. Opposition leader Joe Clark fought and lost a partisan battle to grab a new riding from a colleague in Calgary. The popularity polls have been bouncing up and down. Meanwhile, activities of the MPs have been slipping into irrelevance.
> The parliamentary dedication to trivia, in the daily question periods, in the sparsely attended debates in the Commons, in committee, has never been more intense. Exercises in political gamesmanship seem to have become more important than producing public insights on the expenditure of tax dollars. Whatever the reason, MPs may find themselves answering questions about what they have done for the country lately when the spotlight returns to the activities of the House of Commons.

In this session, after over 90 sittings, only seven bills have been passed. More than 15 days were consumed by a bill implementing policies announced more than a year earlier. The bills emanating from last year's budget were passed barely in time for this year's. The government and opposition make arrangements for the conduct of business that never seem to work. Only last week, after an agreement was reached to finish the advance payments for crops bill on Friday, suddenly, when the time came, the Official Opposition refused consent to proceed with third reading because some of their members who wanted to speak were not here. Why not? The business was announced Thursday at three o'clock. Why did they leave on Thursday when business in which they claim to be interested was scheduled for Friday? Or if they were not here on Thursday—and one may well ask why they were not—why did their House leader or whip not recall them? This is typical of the total lack of responsibility on the part of the opposition—especially the Official Opposition—toward doing the business which their constituents sent them here to do. They will not plan, they will not organize, they will not discipline themselves, and when they get one of the rare opportunities to put forward a votable motion, rather than daring to deal with a matter of substance, a matter of relevance to the people, they want to talk about $1 items in the estimates. This is a subject which has been debated again and again in the House and with regard to which succeeding Speakers have given many rulings.

Mr. Crouse: We would like to know where you spent the money. That is what we want to find out. These $1 items hide billions.

[Mr. Sharp.]

Mr. Sharp: Perhaps I might go on to deal with the substance of the question, though I hesitate to do so since Mr. Speaker has already been asked to rule on it. We have been over this ground on so many occasions in the past.

One thing should be kept in mind: all estimates, whether for $1 or millions of dollars, are legislative in nature. When enacted in an Appropriation Act, an item in the estimates not only provides the amount of money, but also establishes precise purposes, terms, conditions and methods of spending the money. Under our constitution—we can find this in both the British North America Act, 1867, and in the Standing Orders of the House—such purposes, terms, etc., must be recommended by the Governor General to the House of Commons.

It is not unusual for a modern government to discover in the course of a year that, while it has had enough money voted to it, the terms of the appropriation are too narrow, or more money has been voted for one purpose and not enough for another. There are also financial actions that do not involve much more than paperwork, such as the writing off of debts or losses, the guarantee of loans or the capitalization arrangements of Crown agencies or companies. In order to meet these situations, an Appropriation Act must be amended. This is done through another Appropriation Act. All Appropriation Acts are based on estimates. Estimates must provide some sum of money. If no further expenditure is required, then rather than ask for more money than it needs, the government, for the sake of legal form, attaches the amount of $1.

In the process of legislating the amounts, purposes, terms, etc., of expenditures, it is not unusual for parliament to find that the provisions of an act other than an Appropriation Act conflict with the proposed expenditure. For example, there are many members of both Houses of Parliament who are farmers and who, as such, benefit in a direct financial manner from programs of Canada Agriculture established by items in the estimates. The Senate and House of Commons Act, however, prohibits members of either House from receiving payments from the Crown in right of Canada except their indemnities and allowances. In order to treat farmers who are members as fairly as those who are not, such items always contain verbiage suspending the relevant provisions of the Senate and House of Commons Act. This is, in effect, an amendment to that act. One can find many other similar examples where the verbiage of an item in the estimates avoids a conflict between the objects or terms of the expenditure and the provisions of statute law. This is a logical, legitimate and effective manner of keeping laws in harmony with each other while avoiding the trivialization of parliament. The government must, of course, proceed cautiously with regard to such items and the House must examine them with care. As a former government House leader, I have had the responsibility for seeing that any items with respect to which I had doubts of this character were not brought before the House.

Ample provision is made in the standing orders for the examination of estimates, whether of the $1 variety or not. All items are referred to standing committees where ministers and officials are interviewed about them. Any item or items may, under the rules, be brought before committee of the whole. Any item may be formally opposed and voted on separately from others. Nevertheless, the business of supply differs from other business in that supply bills are rarely debated and, even on those occasions when they are, under the rules they must be disposed of at a specified time. Therefore, a great deal of forbearance is required with regard to the wording of estimates or the use of $1 items.

This is not to say, however, that the use of $1 items in any way diminishes the control of the House over expenditure or deprives the House of its opportunity to debate the creation of new programs or agencies. One dollar items, like any other items, may be considered in standing committee or in committee of the whole. When standing committees report them, the reported items may be considered by the House. Motions by the opposition may be framed in such a manner as to deal with the subject matter of any item and, ultimately, any item may be voted on separately. The opposition has not taken advantage of any of these devices. They cannot complain of lost opportunities when they do not take the opportunities available to them already. If they want to deal with substance, they can. Indeed, it would not be unfair to suggest that they would serve this country better if they would deal with matters of substance rather than attempt to cloak their absence of ideas and unwillingness to work in righteous indignation about matters of form.

As I said at the beginning of my remarks, I could quite understand the opposition raising a point of order with respect to $1 items. I can understand them pressing their point very hard. That is what they should have done. But to spend a day like today, when they could have raised other issues, having already raised that particular one in an appropriate manner, amounts to no more than wasting the time of the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

● (1550)

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I go along with the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Sharp) in one respect, but in one respect only. Like him, I was a bit surprised when my hon. friends of the Official Opposition, after raising the point of order about $1 items yesterday, put down the same subject in a motion for debate and vote today. But at that point my going along with the hon. member for Eglinton ends.

I do not agree that this is an unimportant issue, that it is a waste of parliamentary time. Nor do I agree that it puts the Speaker in any kind of awkward position, whether he thinks so or not. In my view, the issue involved in this motion is an issue of decades, perhaps of centuries, namely, the whole question of the relationship between parliament and the executive. Even if some day we get this issue solved and put on a proper basis, I hope we will not forget to talk about it, because it is very important to the functioning of parliament that that relationship be on à proper basis. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, when the vote is called at 9.45 tonight we shall be voting for the motion.

I suppose that what I want to say now will lead to the charge that I am dealing in trivialities; but as one who is concerned about the fine points of parliamentary procedure and also about the fine points of the English language, I wish those in the Conservative party who draft these motions would not forever split their infinitives. But they have done it again today when they use the words "to fully discuss". Surely they could say "to discuss fully". This gives me the opportunity to say that I am delighted that my French speaking friends in the House do not split their infinitives, even if I have to say that it is because they cannot do so. That is why we have it in French in an unsplit infinitive, "discuter à fond". Despite this what some may regard as a triviality, but which I nevertheless think is important, my colleagues and I are going to support this motion.

The hon. member for Eglinton suggested that the Speaker is put in a difficult position of some kind. I deny that completely. What was raised yesterday was a specific point of order which was narrowed down precisely to eight or ten $1 items in the estimates. What the Speaker has to rule on today is whether any of those items are out of order and should not be allowed as items in the supplementary estimates to be voted on tonight. Whatever ruling he makes, there will still be $1 items which may not be illegal or improper but the use of which is an abuse of the relationship between parliament and the executive, and that is what we are talking about today.

I think we have both the right and the duty to keep this issue alive. What we are seeking to do is to maintain the control of parliament over the executive. I say to my hon. friend that even if his constituents in Eglinton and my constituents in Winnipeg North Centre are not waiting for news of this esoteric debate, it is important to them that this parliament be a place where the executive is responsible to parliament. When an executive can short-circuit and short-cut the parliamentary process by the use of $1 items, it is, in effect, downgrading parliament.

This is particularly true, and has been even more serious, since 1968 than prior thereto. I pick that date because it is the date when we made the rule changes which included the process we now follow in the passing of estimates. Prior to that date, a $1 item could be discussed in full on the floor of the House. Now, estimates are shipped off to standing committees and they come back to the House for a pro forma vote and we have no chance of discussing these items on the floor of the House. That means that when tucked in the estimates is a $1 item which amends a statute or brings in a new policy or agency which we ought to have the right to discuss in ordinary legislation, we not only do not have that right at all, but a form of closure is imposed upon us.

I suggest that all of the things that are said about the abuse which is involved in the use of $1 items will still stand even if the Speaker in his ruling today says that some of the $1 items in the current supplementary estimates have to be cut out of those estimates. However, I am not one to make the same speech day after day, and I certainly do not intend to stand here this afternoon and make the same speech that I made yesterday afternoon. I suppose I could just say to hon. members, or to readers of Hansard, that they should look at pages 4159 to 4163 of yesterday's Hansard and there they will find my speech. Having said that, I suppose I could now sit down.

Mr. Cafik: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I welcome the applause that greeted my suggestion, but I am sorry to disappoint my hon. friend because I do not intend to sit down just yet. Every time this kind of discussion takes place it inevitably raises questions about parliament itself. I was thinking about this earlier today and thinking about some things I have heard in this place in years gone by, and I said to myself that I would use some of those recollections this afternoon but that I could use them only if the same thing is said again today. Well, I thank my hon. friend for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski), and I thank my hon. friend for Eglinton: both said the sort of thing that I have been hearing in all the years that I have been in this parliament.

This leads me to what I now want to say. In the course of his remarks, the hon. member for Vegreville used words something like this, that if we continue to follow the line of the present government, the institution of parliament will no longer be able to command the respect of the country. Then the hon. member for Eglinton, who did not seem to realize that he had 30 minutes to speak or did not have enough to say to fill up his 30 minutes, fell back on what the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) said last Friday, namely, that there was a malaise, that members are bored, that this institution has lost its relevance. The hon. member for Eglinton then went on to quote what he heard John Drewery say on television the other night about parliament, that it deals in trivial things, that it is losing its importance and its relevance, and that its job is going to be taken away.

Mr. Crouse: You are quoting pretty weak authority.

● (1600)

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): What comes to my mind is that this sort of thing has been said for decades. In fact, it has been said for centuries. I tried to find a few quotations this morning, but I did not have time to find the ones I really wanted. However, I do know there have been statements in former centuries about the British parliament, that it was a place of all talk, of people who did not know what they were talking about, and that its usefulness to the country was just about nil. There are some choice quotations in Pepys diary about having gone into the House of Commons and wondering how in the world it could possibly survive. Gladstone, in his first speech as prime minister, cast some doubt on whether parliament could continue to exist. I did find this. In the year 1942, the year I first came here, a respected person, then the minister of finance, Hon. James L. Ilsley said this:

> In my judgment parliament is more and more on trial at the bar of public opinion. There is something wrong with this House of Commons. I am not reflecting on the House, and I do not know what is the cause. But there is something wrong with it.

On February 9, 1943, Mr. Brooke Claxton, who was still a private member representing the then constituency of St. Lawrence-St. George, made a speech. I remember it very well. He said he was going to do something unusual, that he was going to talk about ourselves. He quoted the complaints that are made all over the lot about how parliament is not relevant, how parliament is not doing its job. He joined in some of the complaints. He said, as reported at page 292 of Hansard for February 9, 1943, that too much was being done by order in council. That is not a new idea at all. Mr. Brooke Claxton, who was concerned about parliament, and who cited the things people were saying about it, came out with this paragraph that I read back to the hon. member for Eglinton and to the President of the Privy Council in response to what he said last Friday, and to John Drewery. As reported at page 291 of Hansard for February 9, 1943, Brooke Claxton, who sat in the back row over there and made the speech while I sat in the back row over here and heard it, said this:

> I would suggest—and here I think all hon. members will agree with me—that there is no more certain way of weakening parliament than to sneer at it and its workings. We can all try to improve it, but there is no point whatever in just saying, What is the good of it?

I say to the President of the Privy Council, to the hon. member for Eglinton, to the John Drewerys and all the rest of the media who try to downgrade this place, that from Pepys of centuries gone by, to others of note, the downgrading of parliament has not worked. The British parliament is still there doing its job for the people of that land, and the Canadian parliament is still here doing a job for the people of this country.

With the exception of one member of this House, the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), I have seen more of it than anyone else who is here. I have lived through its frustrations, and we on the opposition side face a good many frustrations. I have seen its ups and downs, its good moments and bad moments. I have experienced all of its moods. However, to me it is still the kind of institution that serves a country like Canada well.

I do not like it when members of the House stand up and try to say it is not relevant, that there is a malaise and that things are going to the dogs. That is not true. We have one of the best institutions we could have for the governing of a country. I admit that things are not bright, happy and glorious every day. There are days when nothing seems to get done, days when there seems to be a lot of talk and no action. If you get quite a few of such days, persons like the hon. member for Eglinton and John Drewery have a basis for saying that kind of thing, that it is irrelevant.

I want to say quite freely, as a member of the opposition, as one who does his share of talking here, that we have to consider continuously the place of debate on the floor of the House of Commons, the length of speeches, the times we spend on different subjects, and so on. I still contend that much more has to be dealt with in parliament today than was the case 109 years ago or even 34 or 35 years ago when I came here, and we have to modify our rules. But I do not think you solve anything by shortening speeches or arbitrarily, through government fiat, bringing in closure. You solve the problem by somehow coming together and making conscious decisions to debate on the floor of the House serious and important issues and not spending unlimited time on unimportant matters. The responsibility for that is just as much on our side as it is on the other side. Having said that, I want to say as strongly as I can that what is wrong with this parliament, why I think questions are being asked and all these comments are being made, is that the very thing the hon. member for Eglinton said we should be doing is not being made possible; it is not being put before us. The hon. member said we should be discussing important matters, not trivia. He called this motion today a matter that is trivial. I do not agree with him, because it involves the whole relationship between government and parliament.

However, I suggest to him that one of the outstanding questions facing the people of Canada today is unemployment. There are a million Canadians unemployed. Why does the government not bring something before us? There is nothing wrong with this parliament that would not be cured by the presenting to it of good legislation. That is where the trouble lies: we are not getting it.

What is being done about the gross inequalities that subsist among our people? Some of us have expressed the effort to minimize inequality by working very hard in the field of pensions, family allowances, and so on. I am proud of the part that my generation in this place has played in the last three or four decades in winning improvements in pensions, veterans pensions, family allowances and unemployment insurance so that we have a much better distribution of the wealth we produce than used to be the case. With all of that, however, the gap is still there. The poor may have more dollars, more goods and services than the poor had a generation or two ago, but the gap between them and those at the top is still very wide.

Dollar Items

The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark), the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) and I asked questions today of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) about the proposed salaries for top civil servants of up to $70,800 a year. We got back a laugh. And the hon. member for Eglinton wonders why there are questions about parliament! The issue of economic inequality, salaries, wages, pensions and all the rest is just as important a question today as it was when we were adopting the Old Age Security Act, the Family Allowances Act and unemployment insurance, and improving veterans pensions. A great gap in incomes is just a joke to the millionaires in the cabinet. It is really a tragedy that the Prime Minister is so insensitive to the basic needs of the people of this country.

I add to unemployment as a serious problem, and the economic inequalities that we face, the terrible question of regional inequalities in this country. It is a scandal that in a country which we want to be united there are such vast differences between our regions—three wealthy provinces, a few middle ones, and those that are terribly poor. Life in some parts of the country is five or six times better economically than in other parts of the country. Give us a government that will bring these things in here, and this parliament, without changing a single rule, will come to life.

Do not tell me parliament is irrelevant. Do not tell me it is dead. Do not tell me there is a malaise, that we are bored. Just bring the legislation before us that this country needs at present, and you will see that the parliamentary institutions which we inherited from Westminster and have built up here since 1867 are good.

I am not against some rule changes; I am not against some improvements. But I have been through too many committees trying to make those changes to think that that is the whole story. What is needed is a government that is relevant. Parliament will be relevant if the government is relevant to the issues that are before us. There is the question of national unity and all that is involved. What has been brought before us? Probably I have not named them all, but I have named the main concerns of Canadians today—unemployment, economic inequality, the suffering of our pensioners who do not have enough, regional inequalities, and the serious problems related to national unity.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but the time allotted to him has expired. He may continue with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I am grateful to the House for letting me carry on, but I will not abuse that courtesy. I appreciate the attention that has been given, and I should like to wind up by saying that I think Brooke Claxton was right, back in 1943, when he called on hon. members not to weaken parliament by sneering at it and its workings. I call on hon. members not to indulge in that sort of thing, and I also call on the media to cease its attempt to make this place a failure.

I repeat what I said a moment ago because I think it is the main thing I want to say. Parliament is not a failure; parliament is not irrelevant to the needs of Canada. What is wrong here is that the government is not sensitive to what we need; the government is not bringing in legislation to deal with the problems that face this country. If the government comes to its senses and brings in that kind of legislation, we will find that parliament is as great an institution as it has always been and as, I believe, it always will be.

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I would like to say, first of all, that I was surprised, quite frankly, by the opening remarks of the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Sharp) because, first, I believe that he has a feel for this place and that his true feelings for this place were not those which he expressed in his opening remarks; and, second, that a person who has had his years of experience in the government, his seniority in the public service, a person who unfortunately has never seen the other side of the coin from the point of view of the operations of the House of Commons—and it is his good fortune that he has always managed to sit on the government side—and a person who has dealt with estimates, should take the view that the matter of $1 items, whether as a point of order, as it was dealt with yesterday, to decide whether or not the matter can be allowed to stand within a bill because of the standing orders of the House or as a matter of principle is not substantive and does not go to the root of our parliamentary system.

I have not been here for a long time and I do not claim to have the parliamentary experience of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) or the hon. member for Eglinton, but all this motion says is that regardless of Mr. Speaker's ruling today, or whenever it should come, this practice of $1 items in principle is a tainted practice which should not be pursued by any government, even this government which is in itself a tainted government, except in an emergency when there is no other way in which this matter could be brought forward, and then only if it falls within the standing orders.

The fact is that for the former president of the privy council, former minister of finance and former deputy minister of industry, trade and commerce—

Mr. Sharp: And former minister of industry, trade and commerce.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): —and, as the hon. member says, former minister of industry, trade and commerce, to say that this is not a matter of substance for us to discuss is—I think that upon reflection he will agree—one of the most unwise remarks that he has ever made in an otherwise distinguished career. I regret that he said it. For the hon. member to say that the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski), as sponsor of the motion, and I, as opposition House leader and seconder of the motion, are embarrassing Mr. Speaker with this matter is quite beyond my comprehension.

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

I do not want this debate to become too partisan—I really do not—but if any group has embarrassed Mr. Speaker and has embarassed parliament as well as the traditions of this place, it is this government in doing what it did in terms of $1 items, because they did it in face of the precedents of 1971 and 1973 at which time it was clearly stated that this practice is at least questionable and that in those circumstances it should not have been adopted.

This debate is far from superfluous. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre paid an eloquent tribute to parliament which should have come from the mouth of the former government House leader—but it did not. He chose in this debate to join the ranks of those who for short-term partisan purposes would denigrate parliament. There is not one of us who believes his job is irrelevant, whether he backs the government or whether he sits in the opposition. The great question is: Where is parliament going? As I said, I have not been here as long as the hon. member for Eglington, but a long time ago I used to sit daily in the gallery as a student and watch the late Brooke Claxton, Jimmy Gardiner, C. D. Howe, Douglas Abbott and other members of the government come into the House and make themselves available to answer questions with respect to their estimates—which, after all, are the charts of government expenditures and programs—from ordinary members of parliament, not just members of the opposition.

Do we have an opportunity to do that now in this parliament? Does anyone honestly believe that in terms of the estimates, despite the blandishments set forth by the hon. member for Eglington, the former government House leader, the average backbencher or frontbencher who is not a member of the executive has an opportunity to examine estimates? Is that honestly believed? Of course not.

● (1620)

Does our committee system work, in terms of estimates? There have been chronicles written about it and many have spoken about it—and the answer is "no". That is a fact. Nobody denies the usefulness of our committees in terms of legislative items. The system has worked well, but anyone who has looked at this parliament objectively and who has written about it, and even those who have not looked at it objectively and have written and spoken about it, has said that in terms of the examination of estimates—the only thing by which we know what a government intends to do, how it intends to do it, why it intends to do it, how much it is going to cost, and what the effect of it will be—the use of the present standing committee system, coupled with the automatic end to the consideration of estimates, has effectively removed from backbenchers and frontbenchers who are not members of the government the right to know. That is a parliamentary fact which is unassailable and, equally, regrettable.

That process which has continued through successive rule changes in this House is not set aside, changed, watered-down or made less relevant because a government decides, in addition to the position which it holds under our standing orders, to go the second mile in deceiving parliament, withholding information from parliament and withholding the opportunity to debate by using $1 items. That has not helped, and if that is not substantive, then in terms of this institution I wonder what is.

If there is a danger of parliament not surviving, it is because of what has happened over the course of the last short while. If parliament has become a difficult place for hon. members—and it has certainly changed; it is certainly not what it was before for the private member who represents at least 125,000 constituents or so—then I cannot help but say that the reason for that is we have lost the right to question, we have lost the right to examine, and we have lost what was fundamental, to a large extent, in our parliament prior to the rule changes in 1968. In other words, because of the propensity of governments wanting to legislate, parliament has become a legislative grist-mill.

I would be the last to say that governments ought not to be strong in a parliamentary system, but I hope the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) will join me in being among the first to say that to counterbalance the weight of the executive on the parliamentary system as we are now established, there should be returned to parliament the right to make the examinations of which I have spoken. If I believed that $1 items could help, then I really ought not to be here because, in fact, $1 items further erode the process.

We have been given three secretaries each, we have research assistants, we have research offices and a host of things. Most of us are well attuned to the parliamentary system. All of us have attributes, but the question we must ask ourselves since 1968 or 1969 is, have we been better able, under our rules, to discharge our responsibilities and to counterbalance the executive? We do not want to overthrow the executive or undermine it; we do not want to stonewall the executive: but we want to deal with it in a responsible, parliamentary way. For all the facilities we have, we are not able to do so. For all the relative richness of our offices, the rights which are important to all of us who do not sit on the treasury benches but happen to sit on both sides of the House are diminished.

I think I understand the duty of a government in a parliamentary system. No rule change can be made to work if it is not recognized that the government should have sufficient authority to proceed with its program. I have never suggested otherwise. I believe the initial mistake in our parliament was made when all parties assumed that the legislative program was so important that all other business, especically the consideration of supply, should be relegated to committees.

When that happened, this parliament changed. The balance went in favour of the executive rather than in favour of parliament. The principal concern of my party—and this motion is part of it—is the fact that the House has lost control over supply. We have to give more significance to that problem in any rule changes we may deal with, and I think we also have to give more significance to the participation of private members in the House and in committee proceedings. I think it has become evident to all of us as we go along just how important is a freedom of information bill which would allow, by its terms, the knowledge which permits effective debate in this House. We should not pit, in parliamentary terms, a large bureaucracy against a small one.

We should have complete examination of the problems which affect us from day to day in terms of the knowledge which members of parliament should have available to them. We should not deal with these matters through instinctive reactions. Our reactions should be as a result of some knowledge. As the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Sharp) knows, I proposed to the committee that aside from the examination of supply perhaps it would be a good thing for us to consider bringing back certain departments—I have suggested six on some occasions, and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has expressed a view like this—into the House to test the necessity of examining and our ability to examine, in an unlimited way, certain government departments.

We ought to establish—and this was my proposal to the standing committee of which the hon. member for Eglinton is the chairman—an over-all expenditure committee which can deal with the programs, the policies and the expenditures of the government in an on-going way so that in the course of a four-year parliament each of the major departments of the government could be examined in depth. Under our present system that cannot happen unless the government wills it so. I think parliament should be able to will it so.

I think the attitudes expressed by the hon. member for Eglinton were surprising. I was surprised, especially, when he said we have never taken an opportunity to debate important things. As the hon. member knows, we have asked to have set aside an occasion to debate matters involving external affairs. We have asked for time to debate economic matters. There have been discussions about white papers, and on a pre-budget basis we have wanted to discuss economic questions. The answer we always receive is that we should use an opposition day. My respectful submission to the hon. member for Eglinton is that it is not just the responsibility of the opposition to deal with these matters: the choices of days available to the opposition are limited indeed.

There is an important principle at stake. That is the principle that parliament is the place to discuss and to debate important issues. The use of opposition days by opposition parties indicates that to the extent we can we have used them to discuss what we regard as important matters. The fact that the government has not set aside time is an indication that they look upon this place as a legislative mill rather than a forum for discussion. Parliament is certainly not the richer for that approach.

One of the things that the government complains of is long speeches on second reading. What they call unnecessary debate is, to us, a matter deserving discussion. The former government House leader must understand that time limits do not shorten debate too much—they help; but attitudes shorten debate. Opportunities to debate and discuss questions shorten debate.

What has happened in this parliament is that we have changed the rules one by one, undoing the balance in the parliamentary system and overweighing the system in favour of the legislative mill and in favour of the government. There is the burden of the executive on parliament. If we have allowed this, we have slowly whittled away legitimate weapons which parliament can use to examine the government on its performance, its expenditures and its policies. In the course of that whittling away, frustrations have developed and the only opportunity left now for a backbencher effectively to examine a policy as it may relate to him is in the course of second reading debate. I would like to see that change.

I suggest that this government ought to examine very closely the experience that has occurred in the legislature of the province of Manitoba, and should decide whether or not, in terms of recognizing the necessity of the government, on the one hand, to govern, and the importance of the balancing of that right of government by parliament on the other hand, is met. Not just the opposition but parliament as a whole should be adapted to meet this situation. There are no time limits in the question period in that place and there are no time limits on the speeches. There are no time limits on the examination of the estimates there. Yet that place manages to function, and it functions reasonably.

I have said what our concerns are and why we have brought this motion forward. It does not add to the dignity of a former government House leader to open his speech by attacking the good faith of the opposition in bringing to the attention of parliament its concerns for this place. All members of the government side who are not members of the cabinet must wonder from time to time when they are going to have an opportunity to debate an issue. The system which was operated before in this House, which I saw as a university student sitting in the gallery, did give that opportunity. When the rules were abused, the abusers were condemned. We do not have those opportunities today. It is in that direction that I believe this parliament ought to move. It was for that purpose we condemned, as a matter of principle, the usage of $1 items as part of the degradation of this place.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. As I indicated earlier, I had hoped to return to the Chair this afternoon in order to attempt to rule on the very interesting point of order raised yesterday by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) regarding the acceptability of certain items in the supplementary estimates, particularly those $1 items which are the subject matter of today's discussion.

In the discussion that followed, contributions were made by the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert), the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski), the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens), the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin), on the side of the opposition, and by the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Goodale), the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie), the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang), and the Postmaster General (Mr. Blais).

Ten specific items were placed under attack in those discussions. I will have occasion to refer to them later. Concern with the use of the $1 item in supplementary estimates is not a new problem. The very excellent ruling of my predecessor given on March 10, 1971, which was referred to so frequently yesterday, with obvious reason, because of rather clear pronouncements in this regard, begins by making reference to the history of the matter and going back to some arguments that were made many years previously. Since that time there have been three occasions when this matter has been the subject of a point of order—on December 10, 1973; on March 26, 1974; and, finally, on June 22, 1976 with respect to Loto Canada.

Much of the discussion yesterday centred around the $1 item as opposed to the regular, more substantial item. In my opinion, the distinction is unimportant. One of the most interesting precedents relates to Loto Canada, of very recent memory, in which the item was not for $1 but for $5 million, which does not, in my opinion, in any way alter the problem which is central to this argument; that is, whether or not supply items contain legislative content. The central question to this discussion is whether or not the government can obtain, through passage by parliament of a supply item in an appropriation bill, authority which it does not have under existing legislation.

In the arguments that were put forward, as I understood them yesterday, there were two central points: first, changes in legislation ought to be dealt with by legislation and not by supply items. The opportunity to debate, to consider and to discuss the two are totally different. Therefore, where changes to legislation are sought, they ought to be done in the proper way of all stages of a bill. The second point is that appropriation acts have temporary duration, being for the balance of the fiscal year. Therefore, they ought not to be used as a vehicle to finance or authorize on-going programs.

Those who supported the government indicated that what was involved was nothing more than regular and efficient administrative government practice and parliamentary practice. These items have taken on a rather special significance since 1968 because of the changes in procedure in that time. Even on a very cursory reading of the excellent ruling of Mr. Speaker Lamoureux, it elucidates that very clearly. I refer to some of his language, which reads:

> —opportunity is undoubtedly limited and depends very much on the number of allotted supply days which might still be available by virtue of Standing Order 58.

This opportunity is granted for consideration of these items. He continued:

> In other words, under the old rules there was unlimited time to consider supplementary estimates, including items intended to amend statutes. Under the new rules there may be only a limited time to consider supplementary estimates.

The ruling went on to ask if the difference between the two situations was so substantial as to warrant the disallowing of the past practice of including statutory $1 items in the supplementary estimates. He continued:

Should the very limited time allotted by Standing Order 58 be restricted to the consideration of what is strictly supply?

Standing Order 58, despite some changes, is substantially the same Standing Order. Mr. Speaker Lamoureux answered his own question later when he ruled that the items complained of were not properly before the House. He said:

—I must come to the inevitable conclusion that, in view of the situation created by the new rules, these items are not before the House in proper form.

On December 10, 1973, this ruling was upheld when he said:

—I think I have to reaffirm the principle at this time.

On March 26, 1974, he used similar language. Having been guided by those rulings, in June of 1976 I said, in commenting on the Loto Canada item:

—the desirability of this course is open to severe question, and it would certainly be hoped that where a question of principle is involved in an urgent situation, such as that which has given rise to this course and this particular situation, it would be considered an extremely singular situation, and will not be repeated in the future.

● (1640)

The last paragraph of that ruling reads as follows:

However, I do have to find and rule that in fact the legislative authority exists separate and independent from the estimates, and, therefore, what is sought in the estimates, the item before the House, is the money to support that legislative action which exists independent from it. In these circumstances I have to conclude that there is no legal bar to proceeding in that fashion.

On the other hand, Erskine May's eighteenth edition, at page 731, states that there is "no legal restraint on the discretion of the Crown in presenting an estimate" as "an adequate substitute for authorization by a specific bill." May points out simply that the Appropriation Act is not always adapted to defining the conditions, etc., of an expenditure—or is not always "appropriate for expenditure which is meant to continue for a period or indefinitely."

There is evident conflict between those two lines of reasoning, and the attempt to resolve this conflict leads to some consideration of the function of the Chair, which is not to dictate what parliament can or cannot do but, rather, to ensure that what parliament attempts to do is procedurally correct. It raises the additional matter of whether the Chair should act upon its own initiative in procedural questions or whether it should confine itself to the resolution of arguments presented.

This is a very pertinent question, in my opinion, in the present circumstances, because if the former course of action were recommended and were considered prudent it would have the Chair sorting through over 50 supply items of $1 and, indeed, if we are to be consistent with my earlier remarks, through all supply items every time they are presented in an effort to ensure their legislative foundation. I do not think any hon. member sees the Chair as under such a duty, particular since it might very well conflict with certain basic rights of parliament on occasion to alter its regular practice in order to achieve a given objective. I refer specifically to occasions in the past and, I suppose, to occasions in the future, when parliament because of some urgency has wanted to use or may well want to use some similar device or even a $1 item in supply, to do what essentially ought to be done by legislation.

Dollar Items

The point of order raised seeks the adjudication of the Chair in respect of a number of specific items, and I am prepared to see to that. However, I hope hon. members share my distress that our present procedures do not provide the kind of confrontation between the two sides which enables the Chair to make an intelligent decision after weighing prepared arguments on both sides. The nature of yesterday's discussion was very much related to the general concern about the growing use of the $1 item, and while specific references were made it seemed to me that they were made in support of the general argument rather than as attacks seeking to set aside the specific item referred to.

I will deal in a moment with those items, but first I want to stress the desirability—indeed, the necessity, if I am to be asked to set aside such items in future—that the House, first should be aware of my opinion on the general question; second, that we adopt an appropriate procedure for challenging specific items.

On the general question, it is my view that the government receives from parliament the authority to act through the passage of legislation and receives the money to finance such authorized action through the passage by parliament of an appropriation act. A supply item, in my opinion, ought not, therefore, to be used to obtain authority which is the proper subject of legislation. As an illustration of my reasoning on that subject I again refer hon. members to my language in respect of Loto Canada which I quoted some moments ago.

On the matter of a more appropriate procedure for challenging specific items, such procedure must, in my opinion, permit an adequate opposition attack and a properly prepared defence if the Chair is to hope to make an intelligent decision. Obviously, therefore, it cannot be expected that points of order would be raised at the time of tabling or referral of the supplementary estimates. Nor can it be left to the last moment of consideration of the supply bill itself, if the administration of the House is to be expected to produce for consideration by hon. members the actual supply bill before the votes are taken.

It would, therefore, appear to me that some time must be arranged, with some advance notice to ministers, when points of order can be argued. The Chair, of course, is always open to suggestions which may come forward for discussion among hon. members. But I wish to serve notice on the House that if no such suggestions are forthcoming for such arrangement or similar arrangement, it will be my intention to set such arrangements in motion with the co-operation of the House on the next occasion upon which supplementary estimates are tabled. They will be arrangements probably calling for such arguments upon the next to last allotted day in the trimester, upon some notice given to the ministers involved some time on the previous day.

Frankly, in the absence of such procedure I feel compelled to take a somewhat lenient view in respect of the specific items in issue at this time. Of those I propose to set aside only two which in their own language, in my view, admit of the necessity to amend an existing statute. These are paragraph (a), vote 1d, under Industry, Trade and Commerce, and vote 77d, also under Industry, Trade and Commerce. Paragraph (a) of vote 1d proposes to amend section 5 of the National Design Council Act by providing for the payment of remuneration to the members of the council. Vote 77d is equally unequivocal, in my opinion. It proposes to amend sections 26 and 28 of the Export Development Act by increasing the amounts permitted under those sections.

I confess that there are at least four other items which raise grave doubts in my mind. Those are Post Office vote 1d, Supply and Services vote 27d, Veterans Affairs vote 45d, and Public Works vote 10d. Those four raise grave doubts in my mind, and if the procedures I have suggested were in place at this time I certainly would look forward with some interest to the arguments that no new legislative authority was being sought by the presentation of those items.

The remaining items are less clear, but in any case, in the absence of a procedure which allows adequate confrontation and which would allow at least the hope for the making of an intelligent decision by the Chair, I caution hon. members not to take any of these decisions as a precedent, because I lean heavily on the absence of adequate procedures which can lead to a decision by the Chair which ought not in any way to be taken as a precedent binding in future situations.

I simply hope that by endeavouring to set out a procedure which would put us in the position of being able to listen to arguments directed against and in favour of specific items in estimates in the future, I have set before the House improved procedures for dealing with those arguments and also, at the same time, set before the House a basic principle which I will endeavour to apply in resolving these arguments when they occur.

Mr. John M. Reid (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, I think the decision you have handed down will help hon. members greatly in attempting to determine what is a $1 item and how this dilemma can be resolved. I recall reading the decisions of Mr. Speaker Lamoureux of 1971, reading them again and not being able to find sufficient precision to be able to resolve our difficulties in trying to cope with the form of the estimates. We were concerned about what could be and what could not be included in the estimates. Your Honour's decision will be most helpful. I think the procedure you have outlined will also be helfpul. I know that hon. members, myself included, will be happy to provide Your Honour with ideas as to how appropriate confrontation tactics can be evolved and how these questions can be properly decided.

The House now finds itself in a remarkably absurd position. A decision has now been handed down by Your Honour on the question which was raised yesterday, and this really ought to dispose of the matter. Yet at the same time Her Majety's Loyal Opposition has chosen to take this opportunity to hold a vote on the question of $1 items. I am not going to read the motion, but it does put the House in a rather odd situation of voting for the motion, perhaps voting against Your Honour's decision or voting against the motion and, again, voting against your decision. I think hon. members recognize that in terms of parliamentary procedure this is an important item.

Surely, every members of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition understood yesterday that Your Honour would be bringing down a decision today, and why they wanted to frame a motion in such a way as to put the House in possibility of being against any decision brought down is totally beyond my capacity to understand.

• (1650)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Reid: I want to make it clear, Mr. Speaker, that I take no objection to the right of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition to bring forward the motion, but I do question their intelligence in bringing it forth at this particular time. The opposition parties get two voting days in a term, and it seems absurd to me, when we listen to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), complaining that we are not debating the issues facing the country today, that the opposition should come up with such as absurd proposition.

Members opposite cannot have it both ways. We understand the concern they feel about the rules, because we share it on this side. We are extraordinarily frustrated. Take a look at what this House of Commons has done since it reassembled. We have passed the grand number of seven pieces of legislation since we came back here in the fall. Look at the progress which has been made with other legislation: we have got hardly any legislation into committee. If one really wants to know what the House of Commons has been doing, all one has to do is examine those motions we have passed under Standing Order 43 in which we have congratulated the winners of the Stanley Cup, congratulated the winners of the skating championships and congratulated Her Majesty on the twenty-fifth anniversary of her reign. But we have not been dealing with the problems which face Canada. It is absurdities like the motion before us now, after a day on which we have taken part in a procedural debate on $1 items, which bring the House of Commons and parliament in general into the rather low repute in which it is now held by the public at large.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre says he disagrees with the priorities set by the government in its program. That is his right. That is why he is on the other side. No government program will ever satisfy members on the other side of the House. Indeed, there is never going to be a government program which will satisfy all the members on this side of the House, either, no matter who forms the government. The fact is that we have limited resources. The fact is that the government must make decisions. The fact is that the government must bring down the program to present to parliament for action. But this parliament is unable to act.

I do not presume to know the reason for this. At one time I could say it was because the Conservatives were riding high in the Gallup poll and it was to their benefit to ensure that no decisions were taken in parliament. And one can argue, looking at what actually happened when the Conservatives were riding high in the poll, that very little did happen in the House of Commons. Now that they are not riding so high one might expect they would improve their performance to show that they do have some ability. But no: we find they are doing no better when they are down in the poll, either. So one can only assume that no matter whether they are high in the poll or low in the poll, they suffer from basic incompetence.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Reid: I have gone back over the ground to look at how Her Majesty's opposition have used supply days to present their alternative policies, their program to the House of Commons and to the country, to see how they choose to use their time. The hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) castigated me last Monday for being a supporter of the "parliamentary sausage machine" approach. I have never made such a statement and I do not believe it. I have always argued that we should organize our time so as to be able to debate things of importance. One of the frustrations I have always felt has arisen because of the lack of courage of the opposition when it come to debating the issues of the day, since they control the only free time in the House of Commons through supply days; and they have plenty of supply days, far more free days than the government has, with its legislative program, to get through.

Let us look at some of their motions. There was one by the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) in which he moved:

That the House urge the government to discontinue its propensity to act in secret and without respecting the generality of the foregoing condemns its failure to provide for an open, public discussion of future Canadian trade policy and to report to the Canadian people on its policy and progress respecting GATT negotiations.

Then there was another. The hon. member for Rocky Mountain (Mr. Clark) moved:

That this House vigorously protest the manner in which it has been deprived of a genuine role in the discussion of estimates, fiscal and monetary policy, objects to the secrecy of economic studies and projections—

An hon. Member: You could not appreciate how important that is.

Mr. Reid: Mr. Speaker, when one looks at what Her Majesty's Official Opposition has been doing, one must ask: Have they been dealing with matters of substance? Not on your life! They have preferred to deal with matters of procedure. They would prefer not to deal with matters of substance. They would prefer not to deal with the problems facing this country. Let us be fair while we are saying these things. I exempt the NDP from that remark because they at least have the courage of their convictions and are prepared to debate their policies and put forward alternatives. But that does not apply to the official opposition.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Utter bilge.

Mr. Reid: Mr. Speaker, the House leader for the Conservative party talked a great deal about how parliament ought to operate. I dare say that if the day should ever come—and I hope it will not—when he is the government House leader, he will make precisely the same kind of speeches that House leaders make from this side, mainly because the government does have the duty to put forward a legislative program.

I want to urge the House leader for the Conservative party to consider the operations of the legislature in Ontario. It is inconvenient for him because they do not sit as much as we do; they sit much less than we do but they pass twice as many pieces of legislation. I do not hear the Liberal or the NDP opposition there complaining about being gagged or about not being able to make their points, or complaining that the government will not allow them to speak. They have learned to live and to adapt. That is something which this House of Commons has not learned.

The House leader for the opposition was eloquent on the matter of the status of the Manitoba legislature. He does not seem to realize how things work in the west. I suppose that is not unusual, considering he is a good eastern Ontario lad. Salaries are limited. Members out there must make a living. They sit in the legislature on a part-time basis. For the same reason, sessions are very limited. The amount of legislation which is presented is limited. All these factors make discipline imperative.

But what do we see in the House of Commons? We have members who are paid full-time so they are here all the time, they do not have the discipline imposed on them of having to earn outside incomes. The sessions here are not limited; we sit for 180 days. We sit too long and we have an average legislative load of about 80 bills per year. We are not going to make it this session because we have not been able to perform. Maybe the hon. member is correct; perhaps we ought to go to the Manitoba system. Maybe we ought to slash the salaries of members of parliament and go back to the old system. If members had to earn their living outside, they would certainly pay a great deal of attention to the business which had to be done and would not waste time in the way time is wasted today both in the House and in committees.

I just want to raise one further point, Mr. Speaker. It has been said by almost every speaker that the House of Commons is under attack. I believe that institutions have to adapt to what is going on in the real world or they will be cast aside, left behind, and deservedly so. I feel that at the present time the House of Commons, with the kind of attitudes we have and the kind of approach that parties are taking, is an institution which is not capable of serving the Canadian people in the 1970s.

Since November 15 we have had a new situation in Canada; we have not had a debate in the House of Commons. The opposition parties have not been prepared to use one of their supply days; they have preferred to avoid the issue. I do not know why they have preferred to avoid it, but when some happening of that considerable magnitude does take place, one would expect there to be a debate in the House of Commons. We have not had that debate. The government says it cannot give the time because its legislative program is so far in arrears that it would never catch up.

Anyone who looks at the legislative programs of the past in terms of bills will find that the normal mixture has been placed before the House this session. The opposition parties have between them some 25 supply days. They have not had the courage to grasp this particular nettle. We could talk about the question of Uganda. We could talk about regional disparity. We could talk about almost any question that members wish to talk about. But during those 25 days we have not had any example forthcoming from the opposition. I would be the last to say that opposition members should debate questions of substance. Obviously, they are more at home with questions of procedure. Obviously, they are at home when they do not have to deal with issues as perceived by the Canadian people.

What that means, Mr. Speaker, is that the House of Commons is not focusing on the debates in this country. What it means is that we, as members of parliament, are writing ourselves out of national debates, that this chamber and this parliament is not participating as it ought. To me, Mr. Speaker, that is the greatest offence with which one can charge the House of Commons. We are the politicians. We are elected to participate in public debates. Yet because of the way we have lacked the courage to face up to our outmoded procedures we cannot find the time in this chamber to participate in public debates.

I have great sympathy for the proposition that has been put forward by Her Majesty's opposition in terms of $1 items. I feel that the time was not ripe for this particular debate, anticipating as it does the Speaker's ruling when it was well known to all hon. members that the ruling would come down today. It has put the House in a terribly embarrassing position, whether or not one is in support of the issue or opposed to it. It was, in short, a stupid motion.

I want to urge Her Majesty's opposition to do a great deal to bring about a better House of Commons. I do not want to personally blame the Leader of the Opposition or his House leader, but I have come to the conclusion that one of the reasons that this House of Commons is so weak is that, by and large, the parties in it are so weak. They do not have that much internal cohesion; they have little or no cohesion on issues.

I think if one is to be honest and face up to the reality that is facing the House leaders on the other side, they probably have more knife scars in their backs than any other members with the exception of the leaders of the their respective parties. I have considerable sympathy for them as they try to manoeuvre to cope in some way with the divided groups that they happen to lead. At the same time, because they are unable to impose any discipline upon themselves, I feel it is becoming necessary for the government to introduce measures which are going to provide for this necessity for discipline. I have come reluctantly to this position. It does not jell with what I have said in the past, but I invite the government to bring forth measures which will impose some form of discipline on this institution lest we wash it away with our own inability to control ourselves.

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, we have been treated to a most unusual performance on the part of government spokesmen this afternoon. One of the most interesting facets of this particular performance is that it seems to be a recycling of an old song-and-dance team. It passes my understanding why the government should feel it is in their interest to recycle the former House leader and the former parliamentary secretary to the House leader. One can only conclude that all the government ministers, including the present parliamentary secretaries, are so embarrassed by their own government's performance that they are unwilling to stand up and defend what has to be one of the shoddiest performances that we have witnessed in many a year, and that is saying something in view of the government that sits before us today.

When the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Reid) said at the outset of his remarks a few moments ago that the House is in a remarkably absurd position, the only thing that is really absurd is the performance of this government. If there was any necessity to make this point, I think the point was well and truly made by the Speaker a few moments ago when he made his ruling on the practice that we are currently debating this afternoon.

I thought, if I may say so, it was almost childish—I am sorry the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Sharp) is not here—that he should open his remarks by saying such things as that he had serious misgivings about raising this matter again this afternoon. He thought that surely an hour or two yesterday afternoon would be enough to dispense with the matter and that we could await the Speaker's ruling. I suppose the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River really had no better song to sing than that of his former mentor and was forced to pursue the same line of reasoning, which has to be one of the weakest in the books.

I do not know whether the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River heard the Speaker a few moments ago clearly distinguish between what parliament should be doing and the procedure under which it should do it. I heard no recognition at all in the comments of the former government House leader, the hon. member for Eglinton, or those of his former parliamentary secretary, with respect to distinguishing proper procedures and responsibilities. That is what this debate is all about.

I noticed that the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River neglected to read the motion, though I presume that at some time during this debate or later he will do so. The motion clearly states that it is the substantive approach by government with respect to these $1 items that is very much the preoccupation of this debate. I should like to read the motion again. The hon. member is still in the chamber, so perhaps he would listen to it if he has not already read it:

> That in the opinion of this House the government's use of dollar items further diminishes the proper control of the House of Commons over expenditure, and additionally, circumvents the right of the House to fully discuss the creation of new policies, programs and agencies.

It was quite obvious from the remarks of the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River that he in no way defended the practice of this government of bringing in $1 items, some of major proportion respecting new policies, new programs, shifts in priority. These are items that we have raised in a general way in this debate. It was really a question of government accountability, government performance, government responsibility with respect to the programs it is pursuing under a whole host of $1 items which it has been impossible to discuss in this House prior to today's debate, on which the guillotine will fall at 9.45 p.m. tonight.

It was a sign of weakness, I guess, on the part of the government that it had to put up this recycled team of Eglinton and Kenora-Rainy River. I am not going to comment on their efficiency or effectiveness when they served in this House in their previous posts, but if this is the best defence the government has to this monstrous use of $1 items, this absolutely irresponsible approach to the expenditure of public money in this place, the government has no defence whatever.

I do not want to construct here the kind of defence or presentation that the government should have made. However, I would have expected by this time of the day that we might have heard from some of the ministers who are here, such as the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald) who has a $1 item on this list, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford), or some others. They could have told us that there was such urgency or such an immediate requirement for these funds that they had to come to parliament, and sort of offer a bit of an apology because they knew this was not the best or most acceptable way. After all, we are not dealing here with the main estimates or the first supplementaries, second or third supplementaries, but the very last set that will be included in this fiscal year. I had expected them to say something like, "Look, fellows, we know you will understand. We have a responsibility in our department to provide a particular service or program, or change something we have discovered is no longer adequate. We know you are going to give this kind of approval to pursue this estimate because it is in the public interest." However, we have not had that defence.

In all of these 50 or so $1 items, not a single government spokesman, minister, parliamentary secretary or backbencher has stood up and said anything like that. What has been their argument? It has been the ridiculous one that because of a point of order yesterday, we raised the propriety under our rules of some specific ten items, not all, being pursued in this manner to see whether they were procedurally correct and should be pursued. Today we came in with a substantive approach to the indiscriminate use of $1 items. Therefore, we have this business between the hon. member for Eglinton and the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River, plus the hour or two yesterday, saying that we should not deal with this kind of frivolous issue and that we should get on to the main issues of the day. I hope that before this debate is over some minister will have enough sense and courage to give us positive justification for this extraordinary use.

Yesterday the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader used a number of precedents. He said there were something like 11 $1 items since 1971 which would establish some kind of a precedent of usage which would justify the $1 items being questioned particularly yesterday. We have before us, not 11, 22 or 33, but some 50 plus $1 items of varying shades of proportions with respect to the shift of government expenditure, the establishment of a new Crown corporation, a change in the nature of legislation with respect to tax exemptions, the lifting of guarantees in the billions of dollars to other Crown corporations, the changing of debt to equity of major proportions for the St. Lawrence Seaway, which has implications on much of the shipping in the eastern part of this country. There is no explanation from this government as to the justification for this kind of procedure.

What we have is one of two things: either the government is too embarrassed to feel that it can produce any possible explanation to justify this wholesale usage of $1 items, or—and this was not said by the hon. member for Eglinton or the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River—it does not really feel it important.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) talked about the danger of continually downgrading, throwing up one's hands and saying that parliament had lost its central role or its importance to the effective functioning of our democratic system. He defended the fact that parliament is still alive and well. I hope this debate will contribute to that general state of health.

The hon. member might have said one of the problems, surely, has been that it has been an increasing mark and characteristic of this government to downgrade, bypass, circumvent and substantially ignore the whole of the parliamentary process, all in the name of efficiency or in the government's own sense of "it knows best". If it has reached such a state of mental poverty that it is not able this afternon to give a proper defence or reasoned explanation to the people of this country for this kind of circumventing of the parliamentary process, then things are in an even more sorry state than we realize.

There was one point of debate today on which there has been agreement. The hon. member for Eglinton said he felt there must be more time to discuss the real issues of the day. He mentioned three in particular. He said there were obvious questions of major economic proportions. There is no question about that, certainly to a representative of a province like Prince Edward Island where official unemployment figures are somewhere between 12 per cent and 15 per cent and unofficial unemployment figures go anywhere up to 30 per cent.

The Minister of Veterans Affairs and I know that the 5,000 people that Statistics Canada reports are unemployed, plus the many who would be listed as receiving unemployment insurance benefits, are not enjoying the benefits of a healthy economy today. I refer to those people who live in Prince Edward Island. Similar situations prevail in too many areas of the five eastern provinces of this country. I have mentioned far too often in this chamber that members on all sides know how great a concern this is. We certainly know of the hardship it creates both in terms of individuals and their governments. There is a very major problem in the economy. The hon. member for Eglinton has already mentioned the situation of national unity. It was echoed by his alter ego from Kenora-Rainy River. There is a need to try and come to grips in a responsible fashion with that whole question.

Third, there is the subject of energy which, again, is a major concern and major problem for the people of my area, Prince Edward Island. This was picked up and echoed eloquently in the remarks of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre when he talked about the tremendous need there is for a government really to come to grips with these issues. The hon. member stated that the question is not really one of adjusting procedures or changing the rules of the House, but for the government to take initiatives on these major issues. I could not agree more. I was not at all surprised to hear the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre preaching this kind of call as eloquently as he did and has done throughout his years of service in this House. However, for the former cabinet minister, the hon. member for Eglinton, and a former parliamentary secretary, the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River, to take this tack seems to be committing some kind of public suicide.

When the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River was ending his remarks I thought the House of Commons was being turned into a public confessional. He seemed to be echoing more of his own problems with respect to his party than anything else. If both of these individuals, as spokesmen for the government this afternoon, suggest that this parliament is failing to come to grips with the essential issues that concern this country, I would point out to them that the primary responsibility for that failure has to rest with themselves. Where do they think legislation comes from?

I have not been here as long as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, but I have been here for close to a dozen years. I have learned that when it comes to taking action that requires the expenditure of one dollar in this House of Commons, it must be initiated by a member of the cabinet. If the hon. member for Eglinton or the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River feel that there has not been effective grappling with the issues that concern this country, either concerning the economy, national unity, energy or other essential problems, that surely lies with them and their colleagues for failing to initiate these matters in the House of Commons.

It is true that from time to time the length of debate on issues is controlled by the opposition. I agree there is need for change in our procedure with regard to the length of speeches. However, it is still true that the government has to initiate basic programs, basic policies and deal with these tremendous problems.

What we are faced with this afternoon, I believe, is two things. First of all, as Your Honour made it clear in your ruling a few moments ago, there must be adequate debate, particularly on major policy initiatives. When we sweep away all the verbiage with respect to whether or not $1 items can properly be used to deal with certain legislative measures, the real issue, as Your Honour recognized, is that if there is not an opportunity in the House of Commons fully to explore and probe and have the government defend its position with respect to major initiatives, then surely none of us is doing our job adequately, and that is what this debate is all about. There has not been an opportunity to debate this issue adequately, and the government has all too willingly used the device of supplementary estimates D to slough through a whole bunch of initiatives for which there will be no parliamentary accountability, and for that they should be held to account for a betrayal of responsibility as the government of the country.

The second thing that is clearly indicated in this wholesale use of $1 items is that the government is increasingly losing control even of its own responsibility and administration of expenditures. For a government to come in at this late date with the final list of supplementary estimates and ask, in the space of a couple of weeks, for a few committees to look at these items at random and in one day to jam the whole thing through parliament is, to my mind, a totally arrogant and offensive approach to the way in which our democratic system is meant to operate. Quite frankly, I am shocked that no government spokesman has given even a hint of a defence for this unwarranted and unacceptable procedure. That is what this debate is all about today. That is what we want to hear some representative of the government defend before the debate is concluded at 9.45 tonight.

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have an opportunity to put a few remarks on the record this afternoon with respect to the point raised in the motion put before the House by the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski). I think it might be useful to look back at the precedents of the House to see how this matter of $1 items has been handled in the past, and I intend to do that because I think it might be a useful exposition for members in any future analysis of this question.

I think Mr. Speaker was most helpful today in the judgment he delivered to the House a short while ago in analysing the present situation dealing with the estimates before us. I am sure the words of His Honour in specifying particularly how he would like to see these items handled will be very hepful for the government and, indeed, for all members of parliament in dealing with this question in future. I think his suggestion of a reasoned confrontation on the specific points that members might want to call into issue is very useful. I, for one, look forward to seeing that procedure adopted as one that would be useful to the House in determining specific instances—not in the generalities of a broadside attack which we have heard from hon. members oppositive today, but in specific cases—when members of the House take exception to a particular item appearing as a $1 item and the basis upon which that exception is taken. It is all very well to wax eloquent in general terms when you are not called upon to account or to be specific as to where your objections lie. Mr. Speaker has invited members of the House to be specific in future, and I hope members will accept his invitation and make use of the procedure which he has proposed.

I think the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Sharp) and the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Reid) in their remarks ealier today on this subject delivered excellent statements on the real and practical dilemma which is facing the House and, indeed, the country. The motion of the opposition and, more particularly, their activities over the course of the past several months, have clearly demonstrated one indisputable fact. The oppposition is not interested in conducting the business of the country, despite their protestations about procedure which we heard today and yesterday. I do not mean to minimize the procedural point in saying that. Indeed, the decision which was rendered by the Chair earlier today is an important one and is very significant for the future operations of the House of Commons. But to go beyond the specific procedural point, I think it is important to observe that the objective we have seen, and the real motive—not the protested motive of hon. gentlemen opposite, today, yesterday and in the weeks and months ahead of the present session is to obstruct, to delay, to stall and to prevent this House of Commons from doing its job.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Goodale: That is adequately demonstrated to the House and reflected in the inability of the opposition to prepare and plan their debates. We are told, as bills, motions and items of business come before the House, that the debate will take place in one, two or three days and that there will be two, three or four speakers. The list is given to us in good faith, I presume, and then the list of speakers is interminable and the time taken by members of the opposition is endless. In other words, they do not have a co-ordinated game plan in the House to deal with business in an expeditious way in order to let the House come to a decision and make a decision on a vote. Their objective is simply to take as much time as possible on every issue in order to prevent the House from doing any real work.

We have seen this attitude reflected in their inability to respect undertakings, such as happened last Friday with respect to the debate on Bill C-2. In that instance a gentlemens' understanding had been reached, but when the matter came to the floor of the House hon. members across the way apparently changed their minds.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Nonsense. That is false.

Mr. Goodale: The effective functioning of the House of Commons was once again stymied. It is a matter of common sense and common judgment that if this place is to function in a reasonable fashion, if there is some expectation that we will do our work effectively and efficiently—not as we have heard it described, as a "legislative grist-mill" but an effective and efficient and reasonable exercise of our responsibilities as members of parliament—then we must have understanding and negotiation across the floor of the House, and if that cannot be relied upon then the operations of the House become very difficult, if not impossible.

We have seen, as the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River and the hon. member for Eglinton said today, the determination of the opposition to obstruct the effective workings of the House in their refusal to address themselves to items of national concern. We see that reflected again today.

I emphasize once again the point that I am not minimizing the procedural issue which has been considered here, and I am not minimizing the decision rendered by Mr. Speaker earlier today. Indeed, I have already said that it is a matter of substantial importance in terms of the future procedures of the House. But there are issues of grave importance to the country in terms of a whole variety of national concerns that could, and should, be the topic of current and immediate debate in the House.

• (1730)

The best method of bringing an item before the House for immediate consideration lies in the hands of members of the opposition, that is, the allotted days. The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River demonstrated clearly that those allotted days have not been used effectively to discuss current, topical issues. They have been squandered by the opposition.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Goodale: The precedents of this House, which go back a number of years, reveal that the procedure in relation to $1 items has been used in a wide variety of cases in the past. Those cases have sometimes been the subject of debate and consideration here. On other occasions they have not been so debated. I do not know if there is any particular point at this stage in running through those precedents.

It might be very instructive just to point out to the House the general categories into which those matters in the past have fallen. I think of such matters as vote transfers where $1 items have been used. I think of items dealing with granting programs of the federal government; dealing with the deletion of debts and so on. I think of items such as amendments to previous appropriation acts where the procedure with respect to $1 items has been used in the past. I think also of the extension of other legislation to deal with special and urgent circumstances, and this has already been referred to today. In some cases there were changes in legislation other than the appropriation acts themselves.

It is interesting to note that in the discussions today, and in all the discussions of of which I am directly aware in the standing committees where these specifics items were dealt with in detail, hon. members of the opposition confined themselves to a complaint primarily about procedure. They have not directed themselves to any substantial extent to specific or reasoned arguments about the merits of otherwise of the substance contained in $1 votes. We have had procedural arguments.

We have not had substantive arguments, and it seems to me this was the point Mr. Speaker was getting at earlier today. In order for him to come to a reasoned and substantive conclusion with respect to any item which is in dispute with regard to $1 items, he would want to hear viewpoints from one side and from the other side of this House. He would want to hear from the opposition as to where they take specific exception to an item being dealt with as a dollar item, and he would want to hear the government's defence as to why that particular item should be dealt with as a $1 item. On the basis of those arguments, Mr. Speaker would be able to come to a conclusion as to whether this is a proper procedure. In his ruling today Mr. Speaker emphasized that he did not have the benefit of those kinds of arguments, and therefore he was limited or restricted in coming to the decision which he handed down. He suggested to us a procedure to follow in the future in order to avoid that dilemma. As I said, I think that instruction from the Chair will be very useful in guiding the House in the future.

I think the essence of what Mr. Speaker said in his ruling applies with equal force to what has gone on in this House today, but more particularly in the standing committees as the particular items which have been complained about today and yesterday have been before those committees for consideration. However, what have we heard in those committees, and what have we heard in the House? Have we heard specific complaints about what may be wrong with the Export Development Corporation, what may be wrong with the National Design Council, or what may be wrong in any of the other eight or nine points which have been complained about? No, we have not heard specific objections about the difficulty the opposition envisages with regard to any of these points.

We have merely heard a complaint about procedure, and as these items come before us on allotted days in the House, and as they come before us in the standing committees, there are times when the estimates are being considered when the substance of these issues could be debated and when arguments either for or against could be put on the record, but despite the indignation we have heard from hon. members across the way today and yesterday they have not, in any substantial way, availed themselves of the opportunities they have had to consider these items in the standing committees to the extent to which they say they need to do that. I think that is rather revealing in terms of getting at what is the real motivation or objective behind the motion we are dealing with today. I think the answer must be obvious.

The real motivation is not a concern about what may appear in these $1 items, because no member has directed himself to the substance of the $1 items. That seems to demonstrate quite clearly that the objective is to stall, to delay, and to prevent the House of Commons from doing the work of the country. Having said that, I hope in the future there will be a more expeditious and co-operative attitude on all sides of the House in our efforts to do the work of the country, for which we were elected.

I know that all of us want to be guided by the very learned remarks of Mr. Speaker as to how he would like to deal with the continuing discussion which we will, no doubt, always have about what is and what is not a proper item to be included in the so-called $1 items in the estimates. I hope that all hon. members will take the recommendations of Mr. Speaker to heart. I also hope that all hon. members from this day forward will conduct themselves in this place with a determination to do what we were elected to do, and that is to provide effective leadership for the country and to deal with the issues of Canada in a current and topical way.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I find it regrettable that the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Goodale), who has just terminated his speech, has shown such a lamentable lack of understanding of the rules of the House. The general thrust of his remarks also showed a total absence of knowledge of what our procedures have been since 1969 when the so-called new rules were imposed upon this House as a result of the use of closure by the administration opposite, which totally changed the concept of the examination of estimates, abolished the committee of supply, abolished supply motions, and substituted therefor allotted days. That is the hairshirt which was fashioned by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) when he was President of the Privy Council, in putting together the system which is now operating.

The hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Sharp) pathetically bemoaned the nature of the motion before the House today. I would have thought that everyone would recognize that what the government has been doing is illegal.

I want to draw to the attention of the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council, of the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Reid), of the hon. member for Eglinton, and of any other hon. member on the government side that in 1971 Mr. Speaker Lamoureux ruled that such actions and legislative items without the authority of this House were illegal. It was made very clear that there was no authority for them. But have we seen the government pay heed? Gracious me, almost every year we have seen the attempts to get by, to slide around the corner and to see if they could not hide it under the rug. I would have thought that any responsible member would find it reprehensible that the administration would defy the rulings of the Chair by trying to put across this same thing time and time again.

● (1740)

Yesterday in the arguments put forward by the Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council he said that there have been many attempts in the past that have been sanctioned by the House. Technically the practice is wrong. There may have been some precedents.

This administration requires to be hit between the eyes with an iron bar, much the same way as you have to hit an ox between the horns with a two by four to get its attention. This is not the first time that this administration has been hauled up short. Twice, if not three times, an attempt was made to introduce into appropriation bills handling supplementary estimates borrowing powers that were beyond the resolutions. I had to protest. Finally this administration learned its lesson when Mr. Speaker ruled those items out of the appropriation act.

If we want some historical precedent, these rules came into force in 1969. Final supplementary estimates came into being and were presented, as now, toward the end of the fiscal year. This is quite understandable because there are many items that are not identifiable until near the end of the fiscal year. We had a two week period of study in 1969, as we have now. For the benefit of those bodies over on the government side who are being critical of the opposition, most of these hon. members do not turn up in committee. They do not know what goes on in committee. Certainly the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council does not know what goes on in committee.

Mr. Goodale: You would be surprised.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): I will show him that supplementary estimates of close to $1 billion were made available to committees on March 8, and up to March 22 there were 14 calendar days, ten parliamentary sitting days. It is said that the opposition should have raised these $1 items somewhere sometime in the House before this date. I want to advise the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council, who has shown his abysmal ignorance of the rules, that while committees have assigned to them the estimates, it is impossible for the point to be raised in this House because the Chair will say that all arguments and objections must be put in committee. You cannot have it both ways in both places.

Technically by the rules, yesterday afternoon was the first time that those estimates were deemed to be before the House. They had to be reported within three calendar days before the last supply motion, or Friday noon last. That is why, at my request, the supply motion was advanced to the Tuesday rather than the Thursday of this week. Since the period of expiry for consideration in committee was Friday noon, therefore yesterday afternoon, on the opening of this House, the estimates were deemed to have been reported back within the competence of this House. The suggestion made by Mr. Speaker that questions of this nature shall be considered on the penultimate of the allotted days just cannot stand up to the rules, unless we change them.

An hon. Member: Change them.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Did someone say "change them"?

An hon. Member: Yes, change them.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): We made efforts to get fundamental changes in the rules last summer, but the government caucus bogged down and the government leader in the House refuses to bring forward, as I pointed out the other day, even a modified and limited reference to the committee on procedure in order to bring in some things about which we have some understanding.

An hon. Member: Almost nothing.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): It is not possible to raise the question of $1 items in the House while a committee has them under consideration. The parliamentary secretary had better look at his rules. It does not arise at all in the question of the main estimates since there are no $1 items in the main estimates. It arises in supplementary estimates, and particularly in final supplementary estimates.

If the parliamentary secretary will also do some reading and if he will look at the proceedings of the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates, on February 27, 1969, the report of the committee carried this resolution, which was my motion, which reads:

> Resolved—that the committee express its concern at the extensive use of $1.00 items for the purpose of statutory amendments particularly in final supplementary estimates which are under time limit as to examination in the standing committee and for debate in the House. Appropriate legislative amendments should be made in all but the most exceptional and urgent cases.

Based on that there was a debate. The then president of the treasury board said that there were a few points that had been made to which he wished to reply. He referred to the remarks of the committee which expressed its concern. He repeated most of what I have given to the House as the conclusion. He went on to say that the hon. member for Edmonton West drew attention to the fact that even Liberal members of the committee supported this expression of concern. That is a fact, and one of the members who supported me in that observation is the present Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie). I agree with those members and I share their concern. I think parliament should be concerned about the unwarranted extension of so-called legislation by $1 items. Their own minister, the minister responsible for the introduction of supplementary estimates, states that he was concerned.

The Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council said, "Why does not the opposition argue the substance of those particular items?" What? Items that are illegally before the House? They are not properly before the House. Mr. Speaker has ruled out of order. Why should we argue them?

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Hear, hear!

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): They are not before us. It is just like trying to argue a charge before a court with the court saying that there is no charge. The thing is not here. It is non-existent, illegal.

● (1750)

Mr. Goodale: You are missing the point.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Some items in the estimates have been before the House, or before the committee, less than two weeks. Let the parliamentary secretary note how much sitting time was available to each committee for the examination of these estimates. Were ministers available?

Somehow they feel they must travel the country, or be absent for other business. They are not present for the discussion of their supplementary estimates. It is the last thing in their minds. It is almost impossible to get a minister to attend committee sessions when supplementary estimates are discussed. I know. I participate on far more committees than any of those people on the government side do.

An hon. Member: And much more effectively.

An hon. Member: Yes, we know. But ministers must attend to all their responsibilities.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): I assure you that when I meet ministers, my relationship with them is most cordial and co-operative.

Now, at the end of this semester when the supplementary estimates are before the House, government backbenchers say that it is wrong for us to raise illegal items, that we should not say this use is wrong. I have before me an official list of $1 votes, as provided to members by the estimates division of Treasury Board.

I see the former deputy speaker opposite me; he has just arrived. He had had difficulties with the weather. He should know that our present difficulties have arisen because of the change of rules in 1969. Prior to that there were supply motions. He knows, when he came to this House in 1962 or 1963, that there supply days. We had two-day debates for the referral of estimates.

An hon. Member: And you were in the Chair at that time.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): All of these matters, in reviewing supplementary estimates, were open to full examination. There was no guillotine—oh, no! In 1962 the then Official Opposition took 27 days debating estimates in this House and did not pass one item. They did not pass one item of final supplementaries. And the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council talks of obstruction! Be that as it may, it was a wrong practice. But the suggested correction in the new rules does not stand up to scrutiny.

It is the duty of hon. members to draw to the attention of the House certain illegal procedures. It was done in 1971, and Mr. Speaker Lamoureux ruled the items out of order. He did it again in March, 1974, and it was done again as late as June 10, 1976. It is known that the practice is wrong. The practice should stop—or will it continue, in an attempt to wear somebody down?

Having said that, I direct the attention of the House to the $1 items. Altogether there are 52, of which 22 are unexceptionable as I said the other day. Authority is sought in 22 of those items to transfer moneys from one item to another. That was the accepted practice. Five votes authorize payments of grants. We do not quarrel with that. Then, nine votes authorize the deletion of debts, or the reimbursement of accounts for the value of obsolete stores, and the reimbursement of a revolving fund for an accumulated deficit. Those are perfectly correct. That is what one expects to see in final supplementaries. Those are quite all right. I must raise one point, however. Some departments, having pretended to the House that the most careful scrutiny has been given to the provision for credits in the main estimates, now come along and say, "We under-expended this account by some $3 million or $4 million; therefore we will use it as a milch cow for any number of other items." In cases when there are such surplus funds it can be said that the department has not shown the appropriate degree of care. I would much rather see the other departments come forward and say, "We need that additional money," and not have the government transfer money with $1 votes.

Then there are nine votes which authorize guarantees or affect existing legislation. That is the purpose of such supplementary estimates. If we must repeat our objections, we will again come to this House with the type of motion now being considered.

An hon. Member: Six o'clock.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): I know hon. members hate to think they have been deluded. They love to think that the government has acted properly, when in fact is has been totally wrong. May I call it six o'clock?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Before calling it six o'clock, may I draw to the hon. member's attention the fact that his allotted time expired at six o'clock?

It being six o'clock I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock p.m.

At 6 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the opposition motion today, on what should be a most important day in connection with the voting of supply, relates to a matter of procedure rather than to the substance of what is contained in the estimates before us. The Official Opposition members have chosen to ignore all the other subjects which are open to them, and to address themselves to a question of procedural principal. They persist in following this course even though they had raised this question of principle—

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): And won it, too!

Mr. Lang: —indeed, after it had been decided, in one sense, in their favour. So there was clearly no particular reason why they should continue to deal with the matter. But, of course, the opposition likes to stay away from substance. For the first time in 20 years the Tory party is showing a certain amount of loyalty. They are following their leader.

Today, as yesterday, the opposition argued the question of principle in relation to $1 items and in doing so they seem to be saying what the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre

(Mr. Knowles) put more frankly into words in his usual way—that it was not a matter of opposing the individual items under discussion but, rather, it was a question of principle—whether they should be there as $1 items or not.

An hon. Member: Does the minister have no principles, then?

Mr. Lang: They avoid the question of substance. At a time when the country expects parliament to be discussing issues of importance to the nation, as my hon. friend from Eglinton pointed out earlier in the debate, they prefer instead to deal with a question of principle—and one with respect to which a ruling has already been made. It would seem, therefore, as though they cannot find a matter of substances upon which to attack the government.

I should like you to understand, Mr. Speaker, that I do not suggest the opposition or their leader are completely beyond addressing themselves to matters of substance or making statements of policy. Only a week or ten days ago I heard the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) make two fairly clear statements of policy. The House will recall he was cross-examining the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan). While he did not say so plainly, it seemed to me rather clear that he came down in favour of rain.

However, having observed the Minister of Agriculture, who is a man who takes religion and matters of life and death seriously, having observed what man should do about the situation, and having observed that it was also right to pray, the Leader of the Opposition in his second policy pronouncement of the day, and so far as I know the second of his career as Leader of the Opposition, came clearly down against prayer. Rather, I should not say clearly because he would not like to be clear on any such matter.

The opposition did not single out items and say that they should not have been in the estimates because they had no merit. They were talking about the principle. For instance, the Seaway item was one which they opposed. I would ask you to consider, Mr. Speaker, how that item might have been treated by the the opposition if it were in fact legislation. When it was an item, as it was in this particular situation, they could not say flatly that they were against what the government was doing with this item in the estimates. But what would they have done if it had appeared as legislation? I ask Your Honour to consider that.

Some members opposite, such as the hon. member from Calgary, talked in this House about principle. It is worth noting that the way that the opposition has dealt with the rules and the conduct of business in this House is a tragedy and a serious question for the country. In the case of the Seaway, we have been indicating broad policy in relation to several steps that we believe we ought to take.

Mr. Lawrence: But what you are doing is wrong.

Mr. Lang: The hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence) says that what we are doing with the Seaway is wrong. He has colleagues around him who will agree that it is wrong. Some of them said they agreed it is wrong because we are doubling the tolls in our broad plan. He has another set of colleagues wo believe we are quadrupling those tolls. So he has good Tory company.

The important thing to note, Mr. Speaker, is that if this item contained in the estimates, simple but really making straightforward what has been done for years, had appeared in legislation, we would have had speech after speech after speech on the subject from the opposition members, all opposing what we were doing for both sets of reasons, and continuing week after week after week. We all know that.

Even today, Mr. Speaker, there are Tories who go to the Atlantic provinces and not only oppose what we are doing about the Seaway but actually raise issues having to do with our democratic processes and national unity by suggesting we are not being fair to the Atlantic region. They say that we are writing off the debt of the Seaway. It is an interesting debt, Mr. Speaker. It has been standing at $620 million odd all these years since 1959. There is now $217 million interest owing on that debt. Some debt!

What we are doing, Mr. Speaker, is plain, straightforward and honest. We are saying that the interest which has accumulated on goods which have passed through the Seaway cannot be charged against future goods. This interest was not paid because when the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) was prime minister he made arrangements regarding the Seaway such that it would never be in an economic position either to pay the interest or return any capital from its operations. So in one sense what we are doing is recognizing that in the future we will not charge the uncollected interest of the past against goods which pass through the Seaway in the future.

In addition, we thought it well to transfer that debt, so-called, with an apparent interest rate to what it should more accurately be seen to be in fact, namely, investment equity, on which some amount—and we are saying one per cent—should be charged, and that the tolls should be set accordingly.

What you must observe, Mr. Speaker, as rather strange conduct on the part of that party opposite is that in the Atlantic provinces its members are damning what we are doing by saying we are writing off the Seaway debt, that we are preferring the Seaway to alternative ways of transporting goods in this country. In the Atlantic area they are damning us for writing off this debt when the pattern for that action was set by the leader of their party when they were in power.

The Tories in the west and also in Ontario will be in agreement with the Tories in the Atlantic provinces. In the west the Tories are saying that we may be doing serious damage to the economy by this move we are making. I suggest that paying one per cent on equity investment and saying that operating and maintenance charges should be paid is a bit of sensible management, which clearly the opposition in the west would not recognize. They are arguing against an increase in tolls which, to use the logic of the Atlantic Tories, they would quadruple.

The tragedy of the procedures of this House is not only that members of the opposition, by conducting themselves in this way, can thereby demonstrate why they are all in agreement on voting against a particular measure. They have two reasons for voting against it; they have one set of members who say it is too good, another who say it is too had. They are always on both sides of every issue. It would be tragedy enough, Mr. Speaker, if they were just occupying the time of the House, but it is a double tragedy when they go into their own regions time after time and suggest that this is an example of democracy not working and of this government being unfair to their particular region. Not only do they take up hour after hour in this House, but they then agree to vote against a bill on second reading having in their own particular territory demonstated their reason for doing so.

I said in my argument yesterday in this House on the question of principle that when the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre put forward what he thought would be better rules he may have touched some rather good points. I hope those rules will see the day when we have so organized the House that the business which needs to be put before it can be so put, so the House can come in a deliberate way to a vote on all the business before it during the parliamentary year, instead of being prevented, by delay and dilatory tactics on the part of the opposition, from doing so.

The day when the rules of this House allow for expeditious disposition of business, a great deal of different approaches may be possible. However, that day will not come with any blessing from the opposition. They love delay. They will not ever sensibly agree to arrangements that move business through this House.

If the leader of the Tory party in the House, who is pointing his finger at me and objecting, could ever honestly say what time a bill would take, with any knowledge of what the members behind him were going to do about it, then we would make progress.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): We ran out of business on Friday because you were not ready.

Mr. Lang: They ran out of business on Friday. Look at the history of this House. Look at the history of the opposition. I ask any honest member of the public to read through opposition speeches where they can see irrelevancy after irrelevancy for the purpose of delaying legislation and stopping this House from coming to decisions upon matters.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lang: I have no doubt there are many times when it will be desirable for there to be a time interval between different phases and stages of House business so that there can be consideration, and indeed deliberation in the country in connection with it. However, there ought to be an orderly system so that the House time here is not taken up with members talking about anything and everything, but about nothing whatever to do with the substance of a bill before us, simply to get on the record whatever it might be that is on their minds anywhere in relation to the subject. That, of course, can be very broadly interpreted.

This motion by the opposition in simple terms has demonstrated the bankruptcy of their ideas, the absolute lack of substantial argument upon which they are willing to stand together as a party and come forward positively with proposals. This demonstrates it more than anything else.

If the leader of the Tory party in the House has indeed indicated that they are prepared to consider rule changes which will make effective the role of this parliament in passing legislation, instead of constantly allowing his backbenchers to continue wasting time and stopping matters coming to a decision, we will at least have come to something of substance and have accomplished something this day which this motion obviously could not, or never was intended to do.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Friesen: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Since the minister is used to speaking only within the forum of news conferences and making announcements outside this House, I want to express my utter relief that he can still be a coherent if not necessary logical speaker in this House.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member gave the Chair the impression he was seeking the floor for the purpose of debate. He has prevented one of his members from speaking. I will therefore recognize the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin).

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, on reading the motion presented today by the Official Opposition, I particularly like the last three lines which read:

> —and additionally, circumvents the right of the House to fully discuss the creation of new policies, programs and agencies.

I have heard no justification or argument against that today from any of the government spokesmen. I listened with particular care to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang). He made no mention whatever of the justification for the $1 items standing in the name of the Department of Transport in the supplementary estimates.

The hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Sharp), the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Reid), and the Minister of Transport have criticized and ridiculed the Official Opposition for their failure to present motions on their opposition days that deal with vital matters and issues that concern this country. Whether or not the government spokesmen are right, surely that is purely the business of the Official Opposition. Whatever motions they decide to move is entirely up to them.

I find it difficult to understand why the government would blame the opposition for not bringing forward these major issues on their opposition days when they have all the other days to bring forward legislation, budgets, or anything else on those same major issues. It is surely some kind of verbal chicanery when they blame the opposition, particularly the Official Opposition, for not bringing forward matters of major importance on their opposition days, when the government has the opportunity to present legislation every day to deal with unemployment, housing, pensions, and a host of other matters.

The Minister of Transport should have had the courage to bring forward legislation to deal with major items of policy change and direction. They are all major. However, he did not have that kind of courage. At least he did not have that kind of muscle in his own Cabinet and caucus. I call the activities and conduct of the Minister of Transport at best rude or insensitive to parliament and, at worst, sheer cowardice.

The minister at least could have made a statement on motions in this House as to what he wanted to do about the St. Lawrence Seaway, but no. He could have made a statement on motions about Via Rail, the rail passenger corporation, but no. In fact he had the discourtesy, to put it mildly, to make that announcement in Vancouver.

On the day of the announcement with regard to the St. Lawrence Seaway, the minister made that announcement across the street from this chamber at a press conference. Instead of making that announcement in this chamber, he went across the street to a press conference to make what in effect was a major announcement.

Those two announcements appear as $1 items in the supplementary estimates which Your Honour has ruled are not out of order legally. That is correct. There is legislation in the statutes which allows the minister to make significant changes in policy and direction vis-à-vis a rail passenger corporation or the St. Lawrence Seaway.

A week ago or so the minister made a statement to the effect that he made so many announcements he could not always be getting up to make statements on motions. He would have to do it every day on ongoing and continuing items. I should like to know, since when is a railway passenger corporation, a Crown corporation, a branch of another Crown corporation, an ongoing item? I know it has been ongoing in terms of Liberal promises for several years, but since when is that an ongoing item? Since when is it an insignificant, minor matter? The minister was not making an anouncement about outhouses behind the railway station in some little town. This has to do with a railway passenger corporation.

Since when is the transfer of $842 million of capital debt and interest debt on the St. Lawrence Seaway a minor ongoing item? I happen to agree, and so does my party, that that kind of debt should be a public debt and a public charge because it is a public work. We agree that that kind of debt should be transferred from the St. Lawrence Seaway books to the books of the Government and of the people of Canada. But you can hardly call that a minor ongoing item. Surely the minister will not make those kinds of transfers once a week, 52 weeks a year.

An hon. Member: Don't be surprised if he does.

Mr. Benjamin: It is only important enough in his terms to get a press conference across the street and to put it as a $1 item in supplementary estimates. He lacked the courage either to present legislation or at least make a statement on motions so that members of the other parties in the House could respond to that statement. I call that cowardice.

When the minister says that he will revitalize the rail passenger system in Canada, his version of revitalizing it is not only to set up a Crown corporation or a subsidiary of a Crown corporation or a rail passenger corporation which, by the way, I agree with as being second best—the entire railway system should be a Crown corporation, but this is second best, and I happen to agree that it should be a Crown owned passenger corporation—but the minister treats it as an insignificant item not worthy of presentation to parliament. It is only good for shooting off his mouth in Vancouver and for appearing as a $1 item in the supplementary estimates. Surely that is some kind of perversion of parliament.

Surely when the Minister of Transport complains, and the previous three Liberal speakers complain about the opposition delaying bills, they should not wonder about the intransigence of the opposition on a number of items before the House. They brought it on themselves. The government has the entire say as to what occurs in this House on each given day. If the Minister of Transport cannot persuade his colleagues to accept legislation—and I suspect he cannot get the agreement of his own caucus on some of the things he is trying to do—these back door methods he is using are as much due to difficulties within his caucus and the Liberal party in different parts of Canada as to any excuses he might have about trying to evade presenting his policies and his ideas to the House.

I think the minister and most government members do not realize how important parliament is. They complain that the Tories are dealing with minor legal items. The government and particularly the Minister of Transport, have ignored the important issues which they blame the Official Opposition for not bringing forward. It is they who have ignored them. They cannot get off the hook that easily. When the Minister of Transport wants to bring in a $1 item on supplementary estimates to establish a Crown corporation which will involve hundreds of millions of dollars, that does not tell parliament, let alone the people of Canada, how it will be constituted, who will direct it, how much money will have to be borrowed, whether or not CPR will be able to hold us up for a king's ransom for the use of equipment, and whether or not the railways will update the rail bed so that passenger trains can operate at high speeds. None of that can be debated in parliament. That is a $1 item on supplementary estimates, it is a minor detail, a sort of regular ongoing item, according to the Minister of Transport.

This was a major item in the 1974 election campaign. It was major enough to warrant an announcement by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) on the hustings. Now it is only worth $1. I suspect—I hope I am wrong and that subsequent events will prove me wrong—that that rail passenger corporation which is only worthy of a $1 item in the supplementary estimates, will only be worth $1 to the people of Canada.

The minister's version of revitalizing rail passenger services was reflected in an announcement from the Canadian Transport Commission abolishing a number of passenger train routes and reducing a number of others. The Minister of Transport calls that a revitalizing of the rail passenger transportation service. I agree in terms of what the minister had to say about the Official Opposition running on both sides of the street with regard to the St. Lawrence Seaway. There is nothing new about that. They have been doing that for years.

Mr. Baldwin: You are not even on the street.

Mr. Benjamin: But I want to remind the Minister of Transport that he and his party are running on both sides of the street. While he is yelling about the user pay concept, and trying to destroy the statutory grain rates, he does not have the courage to face the public and say, "We want to make you pay all of that". He is going to salvage his political neck by saying something that he has said many times, "Maybe the farmer should get that in some other way". It might be a $1 item in the next supplementary estimates.

How the Minister of Transport, who is in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board, can send out a cheque to every farmer to cover what is the cost which the nation pays for handling grain, I do not know. That would be great, especially before an election. It may be administratively stupid and totally inefficient, it may be the worst kind of political chicanery, but that will not matter to the minister nor to the Liberal party. They will try to have it both ways, just as they are accusing the Official Opposition of having it both ways, and yet they have been doing that and, I predict, they will continue to do it.

Let us look at the arrogance of the minister in putting forward $1 items in the supplementary estimates. His treatment of parliament is exemplified in a memorandum which came out from his department. You will recall that the minister tried to sneak into the government restraint bill the abolition of "at and east" freight rates which are meaningful to the Georgian Bay area, the ports of Halifax and Saint John. He was clobbered about that by the millers, the grain producers, and the port authorities, and he was clobbered by the three opposition parties as well as by his own colleagues. The government House leader announced the withdrawal of that clause. The Minister of Transport not only has a short attention span, he is a slow learner. A brick wall has to fall on him before he learns. I will be darned if he does not have the gall to bring in another bill to achieve the same purpose. That bill is not likely to be called, and if it is called, he will have a problem.

The minister has sent out a memorandum to all members of parliament and Senators about the Seaway tolls, and on page 7 of that memorandum, dated March 2, we find the following statement. I wish the minister would let people in his own department know what is happening in parliament. It reads:

However, with the recent elimination of this subsidy—

[Mr. Benjamin.]

Meaning the "at and east" freight rates subsidy.

● (2040)

—this combination has become uneconomical and as a result, direct rail movement to Saint-John Halifax is being considered as an alternative.

According to the minister's department, on March 2 the "at and east" rates had already been abolished. But the government had to withdraw that little item out of the restraint bill. The government has not even called the second bill the minister brought in, but his department sent a memorandum to all of us stating that that subsidy has already been eliminated. If that is not some kind of arrogance as well as insensitivity, rudeness, and a derogation from parliament, I do not know what is.

Let us look a little further into the matter of the Seaway. Apparently the Ministry of Transport does not believe members of parliament have any say in what is and what is not the law. The minister and his officials make the law outside parliament. The supply bill will provide funds for the operation of many public services in Canada for the year ending March 31, 1977. Vote L116d authorizes the minister from time to time to fix the amount which shall be paid by the Seaway authority annually out of its toll revenue as a return on capital. Surely that kind of authorization is out of place in the estimates.

Doubling the St. Lawrence Seaway tolls surely is not a small, common, or ongoing item, but to the minister it is only worth one dollar in the supplementary estimates. Obviously there should have been and must be some debate on those kinds of matters. They are matters of significance. Surely there should at least be a statement on motions, but preferably there should be legislation or amendments to existing legislation.

The users of the St. Lawrence Seaway should not have to carry the burden of capital costs. We agree that the transfer of the debt and the interest owing on it, to the public debt is a proper thing to do, but we oppose the provision which gives the Minister of Transport the right from time to time to fix the amount which will be paid as a return on capital. That in itself is worthy of some debate in this chamber. We insist that something like the St. Lawrence Seaway is a public work for the public good of the whole nation. It is not there to make a return on its investment. It is not there to provide a profit for anyone.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Not even the Canadian people?

Mr. Benjamin: It is there for the benefit of the people as a whole. The nation does not expect a profit from a public work which is for the public good, for the good of the nation as a whole.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Who says?

Mr. Benjamin: I remind the hon. yahoo across the way, who does not get to his feet when he speaks—

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): I will get up when you sit down.

Mr. Benjamin: —that if the public wanted a profit from public works operations like our streets, sidewalks, sewer and water systems, our post office and many other aspects of our society—

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): You are comparing apples and oranges.

Mr. Benjamin: I am not comparing apples and oranges. The hon. member would look better sitting there with an apple in his mouth and keeping his ears open.

Mr. Mazankowski: On a rotisserie.

Mr. Brisco: Where would you put the orange?

Mr. Benjamin: The Canadian Federation of Agriculture thinks that the actions of the minister are bad. That federation represents agricultural producers in every province. It disagrees with the Minister of Transport on tolls. This federation has not had an opportunity to discuss legislation with members of parliament. It submitted a brief many months ago. The minister and his predecessor have agonized over the St. Lawrence Seaway tolls, and the government has agonized over them for the last three or four years, but they have not had the courage to deal with them in parliament. The government chickened out with a $1 item in the supplementary estimates.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I have to interrupt the hon. member because the time allotted to him has expired.

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker,—

Mr. Epp: You smoked them out, Les.

Mr. Brisco: Take the apple out of your mouth.

Mr. Epp: And the orange off your head.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Hon. members opposite seem to be hung up on this business of the apple and the mouth. I am well aware of the animal to which they are alluding, but like that animal, they cast a longer shadow when they are sitting down than when they are standing up.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Friesen: You are a bore.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): I would prefer to be that than an old sow.

An hon. Member: Discrimination!

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): All afternoon we have been sitting here listening to hon. members opposite crying in their beer. They have presented a motion which reads as follows:

Dollar Items

That in the opinion of this House the government's use of dollar items further diminishes the proper control of the House of Commons over expenditure, and additionally, circumvents the right of the House to fully discuss the creation of new policies, programs and agencies.

Mr. Epp: He can read.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): It is an interesting motion, and I would have liked to have heard hon. members opposite discuss it. Instead, however, as the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) and other speakers before him have said, they got up and railed about matters of procedure. It is becoming painfully obvious that what they are doing is perpetrating a cover-up of their own lack of policy alternatives.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): They claim that this House is under attack, and I agree that it is. It is being attacked by the Canadian public because little is being accomplished in this House, because of the opposition tactics of filibuster and delay.

An hon. Member: Tell that to MacEachen.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): I have already told him, and he agrees that the opposition is out to frustrate the efforts of the government to fulfill the mandate it was given in the last election. The opposition has never accepted that mandate; hon. members think they know better than the Canadian public.

This is an opposition motion, but I wonder where the opposition is. Time and again on opposition days I have sat in this House and listened to debates on opposition motions, and time and time again I have wondered where the opposition was.

There are many important items of legislation on the order paper. There is one bill in particular which I personally would like to see back before the House for debate, and that is Bill C-27. We are talking about unemployment insurance and about alleviating the unemployment problems of this country. We are talking about paying benefits to those who are out of work. The opposition pays lip service to that, but talk is cheap. It takes money to buy jobs, and I would like to see the opposition put forward the proposals it has for dealing with this serious problem.

Mr. Goodale: They have none.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): They are interested in unemployment because they think they can make political hay out of it, but the fact is that the Canadian public is not interested in hearing that kind of rhetoric. If the opposition has proposals, it is strange that the latest Gallup poll turned out the way it did.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Harquail: They all stopped laughing when you mentioned the Gallup poll.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): There are other very important issues facing this nation. There is the issue of energy—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I invite hon. members to pay attention so that the hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi (Mr. Dionne) can make the point which he wants to communicate to this House.

Mr. Harquail: I hope the opposition heard that.

● (2050)

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, thank you very much. I would hope that the opposition members would take heed of your advice. I noticed the hon. member saying that I am not making any sense. I would expect that from him. One does not expect the senseless to make sense out of anything.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): That is the best self-destruction that I have heard for a long time.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): We have an energy problem in this country that the opposition has failed to discuss in any coherent fashion. We have the problem of regional disparity, which is an extremely important problem on which the opposition, as usual, is completely and totally divided. In the debate that is taking place in this House on Bill C-27, we have seen the opposition take every position in the political spectrum. The only consensus that they came up with was a silly amendment to put the onus on the cabinet or the governor in council to give them the power by order in council to decide the triggering time for qualifying periods and benefit periods in the country. That is a cop-out, sir. they will not say to the Canadian people whether or not they are in favour of the 12-week qualifying period. They will not say whether or not they are in favour of the benefit periods. They are cowards when it comes to policy in governing this nation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: Where do you stand on it?

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): When you people allow the bill to come back, I will tell you where I stand on it.

An hon. Member: Bring it tomorrow.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): We heard the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald), this afternoon, refer to the performance of the government as being absurd. That party must be the experts in absurdity in this country. There is nothing they have done in the time that I have been here that could not be considered absurd. Every position they take is absurd because of the fact that it ranges all the way from the far left to the far right. At least the NDP is consistent in being naive about governing the country. The Official Opposition is not even consistent.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Merci beaucoup.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Il n'y a pas de quoi, mon ami.

As the Minister of Transport has said, the opposition is not really interested in what goes through this House. It is interested only in delaying, on procedural points, the functioning of this House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): It is time to bring the functioning of this House into the twentieth century so that those of us who are elected to represent the people can do what we were elected to do, instead of spending month after tedious month in this House putting up with the delaying tactics of the opposition and not being able to make the essential representations of our people that we need to do. That is an unfortunate turn of events because there are very many serious, fine, conscientious members of parliament in the opposition.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Thank you.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): The problem is that they have no leadership.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): They have a leader who won his position by default but has not got used to the fact that he has won, who does not know where he stands within his own party, and his party could not care less. That is the farce they present to the Canadian public. How long do they think that the Canadian public is going to be fooled by that kind of double standard?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): How can they expect the Canadian public to take things seriously when they have an opposition day and they do not even bother to come to the House? The Official Opposition of this parliament consists of ad hoc opportunism. That is the only way I know to describe it.

Mr. Alexander: Shame!

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Shame for sure!

An hon. Member: You talk about your own minister; even Otto cannot take it.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I would hope that all hon. members would extend courtesy to the hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi (Mr. Dionne) so that he may continue with his remarks.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It is painfully obvious, of course, that the opposition cannot take the truth.

An hon. Member: They would not recognize it.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): We have heard a lot today in this House about the lack of opportunity by the opposition to discuss the supplementary estimates. They may have a point, sir. There may not be all of the time they would like. There may not be all the time some of us on the back benches on the government side would like, to discuss the supplementary estimates. Why do they not take advantage of the time they have? It is because they are incompetent. They do not know how.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): We saw a perfect example of it in question period this afternoon when the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) got up and completely blew it. He cannot even ask a question. If the opposition is provided with that kind of leadership, what can we expect from their own backbenchers?

Another perfect example of the way in which they fritter away the time of the House and the time of the members of this House is with Standing Order 43. Over the past several months I have paid careful attention to the substance—

Mr. Epp: You have never been here.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Oh, yes, I have been here. Come once in a while and you will see I am here.

An hon. Member: That is the only line he had.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): The substance of their motions on Standing Order 43 is absolutely ludricrous.

An hon. Member: That is your personal opinion.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Maybe one in 25 motions presented by the opposition under Standing Order 43 has any real substance to it. Then they tangle it up in so much political nonsense and rhetoric that there is no way any sensible, responsible government could accept it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): When the very experienced member, the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert), got up to speak this afternoon, he started his speech with the words, "I find it regrettable". Well, so do I find it regrettable that we have to suffer the kind of incompetence from the opposition that we witness in this House day after tedious day. There is no hope, obviously, that there is going to be any improvement. They rail against closure. They rail against use of Standing Order 75. Isn't that a shame? When there is no leadership and there is no control by the opposition House leader over the actions of his own party, what does he expect from the government?

• (2100)

This afternoon we heard opposition members refer to allotted days as a hairshirt. They consider the days allotted to them for the debate of serious subjects as a hairshirt they must wear. That really is a shame.

Mr. Halliday: Garbage!

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): If I were in the opposition—

An hon. Member: You will be soon.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): —I would not consider opposition days as a hairshirt. I would consider them an opportunity to put the government on the sport and make them answer questions.

Mr. Mazankowski: But the government doesn't answer our questions.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Unfortunately my friends opposite do not know how to do that.

Mr. McKenzie: We are no friends of yours.

An hon. Member: There speaks a redneck.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please, I remind hon. members to address their remarks to the Chair.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): I regret having offended the sensibilities of the hon. member. If he says he is no friend of mine, that is his problem, not mine. I come now to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). I think in my first speech in this House I expressed admiration for that hon. member. Certainly he has one thing going for him—longevity. This afternoon he said, substantially, that really there is nothing wrong with the functioning of parliament. All the government need do is bring in bills which please the hon. member's party, and there will be no difficulties in the House.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: Sixteen per cent, and still holding firm.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Seventeen per cent.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): I understood why the hon. member said that. Why did he not smile? Considering that his party's strength was exactly cut in half in the last federal election—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): It was not.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): —one wonders what the Canadian public must do to that party before it learns.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Is that the best you can do?

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): I now refer to something the Minister of Transport said.

Mr. Alexander: Oh, boy!

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): I shall quote him, with fidelity. He said, sir, that Tories are interested in principle, not substance. I am not sure I agree.

Mr. Epp: Other government supporters agree.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): If he means principle, per se, I must disagree.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): What does the hon. member know about principle? He wouldn't know how to spell it.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): If he means the principle of the double standard, or of the forked tongue, I would have to agree heartily with what he said.

I hope to see the day when we shall have a united, coherent opposition. I happen to believe this country can only be served by a viable party system. With all respect to my friends of the NDP and Social Credit Party, I look forward to the day when we shall have a two-party system.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): You will see it. It will come.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): I believe in the two-party system; I believe in one party being a responsible alternative to the party in power.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Hear, hear!

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Obviously, the Canadian public is of the opinion that there is no such responsible and viable alternative to the party in power. That explains why the Liberal Party, with a few short interruptions, has remained in power in Canada most of the 20th century.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Is that your best effort?

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): The Minister of Transport said the opposition go from irrelevancy to irrelevancy. They not only go from irrelevancy to irrelevancy, but from inconsistency to inconsistency. He asked, when are they going to stand together? I ask, when have they ever stood together?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, to inform him that his allotted time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Continue.

Some hon. Members: No.

[Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi).]

Mr. Mazankowski: Goodale said no.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. The Chair recognizes the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp).

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, this has been an interesting debate. It smoked out the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) and the hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi (Mr. Dionne). Hon. members may wonder why the Minister of Transport was present in the House earlier. I see he has left.

An hon. Member: He's at the airport.

Mr. Epp: No. He was here on account of bad weather. He was grounded.

Mr. Roy (Laval): Stick to the motion.

Mr. Epp: Hon. members may wonder why, all the time he was ranting and raving, the minister never once turned his back on his backbenchers. I will tell you. He did not dare turn his back. He is the only minister here from the west. That is not quite accurate.

Mr. McKenzie: No. There is also the minister of nothing.

Mr. Epp: Quite right. There is the minister of nothing, and the Minister of Transport, both western ministers. Do you know why he would not turn his back on his backbenchers? The Minister of Transport is the most detested member of parliament in the west.

Mr. Goodale: Nonsense! Why does he get re-elected?

Mr. Epp: He is detested by all, including Liberals.

Mr. Roy (Laval): Is that the best you can do?

Mr. Goodale: Tell the House what happened to the strength of your vote last time, Jake.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. The hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp) has the floor.

Mr. Goodale: Ask an Albertan about Joe Clark.

Mr. Epp: Mr. Speaker, the fishing season opened a little early. All the suckers are biting. And what is happening, out west? In the west, you see provincial Liberals divorcing themselves from the federal Liberals.

An hon. Member: Stick to the motion.

Mr. Epp: Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Transport tried to help his brother-in-law obtain the Liberal leadership in Saskatchewan, and he was defeated. Why? The Minister of Transport is the reason for his failure.

An hon. Member: What about Hatfield in New Brunswick?

Mr. Epp: I will get to you in a minute, friend. I come now to the hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi, one of the two members we smoked out. He said that the Conservative party does not stand together, but the Liberals do.

An hon. Member: Tell Jim Richardson that.

Mr. Epp: Let us talk about an article which appeared in a paper which is known for its Liberal leanings, the Toronto Star. Today, on the front page, appears an article under the heading: "Trudeau Faces Revolt by MPs over Jobs Bill". It states:

The Trudeau government faces a backbench rebellion if it insists on pushing through a bill to make it even tougher for jobless Canadians to get unemployment insurance benefits.

It goes on to say—

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, as usual, the opposition is taking its cues from the newspapers. I gave no interview to the Toronto Star and the hon. member had better not build his hopes up on what he sees in a newspaper column.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order. The Chair has difficulty in recognizing if that is or is not a point of order. I did not hear what the hon. member had to say.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It seems to me to be particularly difficult tonight to get the attention of the opposition. The hon. member who is in the process of making a speech is taking his cues with regard to the state of the Liberal party from what he reads in the press.

Some hon. Members: Oh!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): That is not a point of order. Order, please.

Mr. Epp: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I thought, on that point of order, that the hon. member tried surreptitiously to indicate to the House that he wanted me to read the motion. I did not have to prove that I can read, but he has to, and that is why he read it. I want to go on quoting this article, and it says this—

An hon. Member: What about the motion?

Mr. Epp: Well, that's part of the motion. It says this:

The government could fall if Newfoundland M.P. David Rooney gets the four other Atlantic Liberals he says are also opposed to the bill to join him in voting against it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I have difficulty in attaching the hon. member's remarks to the motion before the House. The Chair has difficulty reconciling them with $1 items.

Mr. Epp: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I am getting to the motion. I just wanted to point out to Your Honour that certain positions were taken with regard to the motion. I will respond to them and I shall be back on the motion in a minute. The point is that an allegation was made that the motion was not of consequence. Let me just finish, Mr. Speaker. It says:

The five, he says, have agreed that the bill is unacceptable to them in its present form.

Now, with regard to the motion, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member said we were not united. Well, when we get down to the bottom of this article we read:

Rooney says four other Liberal maritimers support him in opposing the bill. Liberal maritimer members include—

Some hon. Members: Order!

Mr. Epp: They include Rompkey, Breau, Corbin, and Maurice Dionne.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Epp: I wonder, Mr. Speaker, where is Maurice Dionne. Where is he?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Is the hon. member for Madawaska-Victoria (Mr. Corbin) seeking the floor on a question of privilege?

Mr. Corbin: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I won't make a question of privilege out of it and waste the time of the House. The hon. member has deliberately misled the House by misquoting that newspaper article, and I wish he would read it as written.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. The Chair informed the House a moment ago that it could not hear the remarks of hon. members. Therefore it is very difficult to judge whether the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp) was speaking on the motion. Most of his remarks I could not hear. I asked him to be clear and to relate his remarks to the motion before the House. I hope the House will concur with the feeling of the Chair and co-operate so we can hear the hon. member for Provencher.

Mr. Beatty: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, you heard the hon. member opposite say that my hon. friend from Provencher had deliberately misled the House. My understanding is—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. The hon. member for Provencher.

Some hon. Members: Withdraw!

Mr. Corbin: You lied!

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Mr. Muir: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, how long can he get away with that? He is saying my hon. friend here lied. He is setting a precedent. We could all use that language.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): The Chair did inform the House a moment ago that it cannot hear what hon. members are saying. There is too much noise. There is too much shouting across the aisle. I did not hear the remarks of the hon. member for Madawaska-Victoria.

Some hon. Members: Oh!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): The only thing the Chair did hear pertained to a remark that the hon. member was reading from or quoting from a newspaper. I thought that was not a point of order, and I stood up to recognize the hon. member for Provencher. If remarks were made which the Chair did not hear, I think we should wait until tomorrow and read what Hansard reports.

Mr. Epp: Before I go on, I want to enter a caveat on two counts. First, in his intervention the hon. member for Madawaska-Victoria (Mr. Corbin) said—and I believe I have his words correctly—that I had deliberately misled the House.

Mr. Corbin: That's right.

Mr. Muir: Did you hear that? He has just confirmed it.

Mr. Epp: I believe that Hansard will show tomorrow that the hon. member for Madawaska-Victoria has in fact confirmed that he said exactly that. Not only that, Mr. Speaker, I believe many members in the House clearly heard the hon. member as stating I had lied. I believe that is unparliamentary language. I believe both interventions are the subject of a legitimate question of privilege. I suggest that Hansard will show tomorrow what was said by the hon. member for Madawaska-Victoria, and I reserve the right to move a motion of personal privilege tomorrow.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): On the question of privilege which has just been reserved by the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp) and in connection with which Your Honour has indicated you will check Hansard tomorrow, unless, of course, there is an apology and immediate withdrawal tonight, when that will be unnecessary, the fact of the matter is that there has been a ruling here in the House in which I was involved with the Prime Minister not too long ago in which it was clearly held that the precedents go long beyond just a few months ago, and that such an allegation against an hon. member cannot be made. This affects not only the hon. member for Provencher but every member of the House of Commons.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Corbin: I will be a gentleman, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Mr. Corbin: It could well be that in the heat of debate I got carried away and I will withdraw, without any reservation whatever, words I used when I referred to the hon. member a second time, and I will go so far as to withdraw the statement that the hon. member is deliberately misleading the House. However, I do suggest to him that he look under his bed tonight and see if he would not agree with me that when he quoted from the news release he may have inadvertently misled the House, because I know that particular passage by heart, having checked it many times over the weekend.

[The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier).]

Mr. Epp: Well, Mr. Speaker, as a gentleman I accept what the hon. member says, but frankly I still reserve my position on the word he used. I want to see what Hansard says. I am not saying it was deliberately misleading but he did not withdraw the word that he used.

I should like to get back to the matter I was discussing before being so rudely interrupted. If hon. members opposite find the quotes I am making, which I am reading from the Toronto Star, too hot then they can take issue with the Toronto Star, but that paper says very clearly that there are specific members who are opposed to Bill C-27. They accused us of being divided on Bill C-27, but I simply tell the House that both the hon. member for Madawaska-Victoria and the hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi are listed as being opposed to the bill, which is a government bill. I think that is all that needs to be said.

The whole issue today, Mr. Speaker, is the manner in which the government tries to railroad legislation. The fact of the matter is the government has a majority, but it is telling the people of Canada and the members of this House that it cannot run the House. It is saying that the opposition is too effective, that it cannot get legislation through, to the point where on Friday the government ran out of business.

Hon. members opposite also accuse us of not bringing forward pertinent matters. What does the record show, Mr. Speaker? On March 17 the following motion was moved by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark):

> That this House condemns the government's failure to set or fulfil reasonable economic goals, and urges the Minister of Finance to be forthright with the people of Canada by revealing in the budget the specific goals he will be seeking to reach with regard to employment, inflation, Canada's trade balance, and the rate of economic growth.

On March 4 the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Whiteway) moved the following motion:

> That in view of the desirability of encouraging an integrated approach to urban planning and development, and of promoting energy conservation, industrial development and employment, this House condemns the Liberal government's deliberate and cynical repudiation of its 1974 election pledge to give comprehensive and extensive aid to municipalities for the improvement of urban transport systems.

On February 23 we moved a motion having to do with non-renewable energy resources. On February 10 we moved a motion on unemployment. And so it goes on, Mr. Speaker, but this government does not respond.

The most reprehensible point on which the government stands condemned is this: it is using $1 items to circumvent parliament. We have constantly to remind it that it wants to circumvent the will of parliament, Mr. Speaker. Whether it is in committee or in the House, ministers do not want an examination of the estimates. Not only that, but with a majority government they say they cannot get legislation through the House and they have to use closure. This is because they cannot handle the House.

Just to show how decrepit the government is, on Friday I asked whether the premier of Manitoba was going to join the federal cabinet.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Wishful thinking.

Mr. Epp: Maybe it is wishful thinking, but the point is that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) chose not to deny it. On Friday the premier of Manitoba refused to deny it too, so I can only draw one conclusion, and that is that the front bench is devoid of new ideas and that the backbenches are not even worthy of the front benches. This is why the Prime Minister now has to fish in NDP waters to see whether the Liberal party cannot get someone to bolster their sagging fortunes.

When will confidence come back to the govenment? Only when the government presents to parliament a clear picture of the situation, allows parliament to debate it, and the people's representatives to vote. This government has chosen not to do so and it stands condemned by its own actions.

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Drummond): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure for me to participate in this $1 debate today and to provoke the Official Opposition.

[Translation]

I am somewhat surprised to see that the opposition has preferred today to talk as usual about matters of form rather than matters of substance.

I would like to tell the House right now that I intend to be polite and concise so as to allow one member of the Official Opposition to say a few words before the end of this debate in the hope that the Official Opposition can finally say something significant today.

Consequently, Mr. Speaker, I want to take this opportunity, since we are talking about questions of form and since our rules have been blamed, to call the attention of the House to the need not only to amend certain aspects of our rules, but to review them in their entirety to make this parliament much more modern, effective, worthy and able. It is without any partisanship that I refer to parliamentary reform since, like the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert), I attended this summer, before the resumption of the sittings of the House, meetings of the Committee on Procedure and Organization, where we discussed amendments to parliamentary procedure.

This afternoon I heard the hon. member for Edmonton West say that he had, by himself or with his party, suggested some rules to our House leader and that unfortunately their suggestions had not yet been implemented. I would like to say, Mr. Speaker, that parliamentary reform should be made in consultation with all parties of the House and not by one party alone. What I deplore most is the fact that the hon. member for Edmonton West suggested that we were unwilling to accept change, when the opposite is true. We are quite open to change. We have been requesting some changes for years and we hope that these changes will be made by a consensus of the members of all parties of the House.

Mr. Cyr: Including Stanley Knowles.

Mr. Pinard: As a matter of fact, it would be very helpful, Mr. Speaker, to discuss the true problems of the day in this House. Today, the Official Opposition missed a splendid opportunity to study in depth a matter of current significance to deal with a mere technicality and generally complain about the rules, because they thought fit to complain about the rules, and because it is against their nature to go to the bottom of things.

Mr. Speaker, I submit that we should have every reason to improve the image of our institution, which is now seen as a true museum. We should be considering reforms in the area of speech time, so that speakers from every party express themselves in a clearer, more concise, less partisan and more direct way. Without denying the opposition the right to state fully their views, we could amend the rules to allow for efficient but unobstructing opposition, and the best way in my view would be to grant 20 or 15 minutes' time to every speaker.

It seems to me that in this day and age, it would be fair and normal to consider a parliamentary schedule under which we could plan our activities as elected representatives, as devoted MPs anxious to know the public's opinion through sensible stays in our constituencies and families. I believe that a positive formula that would be acceptable to all parties in this House —it was discussed last summer—would be to condense parliamentary work into four days rather than five. I am not referring here to a process of shortening our work hours, but rather to redistributing the same number of hours into a lesser number of days. This would leave three days a week during which we could look after our elected representatives business in our constituencies, and then report here on the public's views.

Mr. Speaker, I have very little time to go in depth into a reform proposal I put forward in a speech on the Address in reply to the Throne Speech. I simply wanted to deal with some general matters requiring immediate changes, especially in the current context where we are considering televising this House, as the principle has indeed been accepted. We are now considering the ways and means, the cost of facilities and so on. The principle has been accepted, but clearly there can be no question of televising our proceedings as they are now being conducted. It is urgently necessary to amend the procedure. The Official Opposition is now complaining about one aspect of the standing orders. It seems to me that several other beneficial changes could be made.

Mr. Speaker, during the past two years, we have had unduly extended debates and the opposition missed a fine opportunity on the allotted days to raise questions which concern us as Canadians and it would have been a good thing to discuss them here rather than let the press or commentators in general analyze them. We have thus lost some valuable time.

We have imposed upon the members by requiring their attendance in the House to witness meaningless debates which were meant to delay our proceedings or prevent the proper operation of the House. If such is the complaint of the Official Opposition, I agree, but I say that it is its fault if our debates are so fruitless and so unproductive.

Mr. Speaker, I am now almost through. I promised to leave enough time for the hon. member of the opposition to close debate. I shall do so to be courteous, but I absolutely did not want to miss the opportunity of pointing out to the House, on this an allotted day, the necessity and the urgency of considering amendments to our standing orders. Those changes should be made with the agreement of all hon. members of the House, and that, as soon as possible so that we can, once again, restore the value of our role in this House, really express the wishes of the people and use our influence in the shaping of political decisions being made at the present time.

• (2130)

[English]

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for giving way so that this debate can be completed. I say to him that I thoroughly agree with his sentiments with regard to essential changes that are needed in this House.

After having spent more than 19 years in this House, I can tell the hon. member that a great many members on this side, and I suspect on the other side, experience frustration. I hope that when the time comes to suggest that there be changes the voice of the hon. member will be raised as strongly then as now so that we in this House can bring to the attention of the people of Canada the current and controversial issues. We could then deal with them rather than be shackled as we are to the precedents of the eighteenth and nineteenth century which dominate this parliament. I hope when the time comes members on the other side will not be mice that roar but members who come to the assistance of this parliament.

Some hon. Members: hear, hear!

Mr. Baldwin: Some nine days from now the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) will be bringing down a budget, an exceedingly difficult task. I do not envy him his task. His task is increased in severity and size of the problems which await him because of the sorts of things which have been brought forward in the motion standing in the name of the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski).

No country can be properly governed unless there is a measure of co-operation, confidence, and understanding between the people who are governed and the government. That does not exist today. One reason is because of what we complain about in this motion. We have complained about these issues year in and year out for the past nine years. There has been deception, an attempt to hide the expenditures of this country so that we have no real opportunity to debate them. That situation has brought the estimates presented to this House from $14 billion in 1971-72 to $41 billion in 1977-78.

We have had no opportunity, either in this House or in committee, to examine with understanding, discernment, and a capacity to challenge, some of the estimates because of the very things the hon. member for Vegreville has included in his motion today. For that reason the public have lost confidence in this government. It has attempted to stifle the need to inquire into a number of things, particularly the manner and the method of expenditures of public money.

No government can deal with the complex problems of today without having at least a reasonable measure of support and confidence from the people of the country. That does not exist. That is why in nine days from now the Minister of Finance will be facing an almost impossible task.

Because the government has conducted itself in this and many related ways, the people are asking why they should have confidence in a government which brings in estimates that are almost indecipherable because of the language used. It brings in $1 items which give the governor in council the right to expend sometimes hundreds of millions of dollars without ever facing the challenge of members of this House to decide whether those expenditures have been properly made.

The people of this country and the government march to the beat of different drums. The government is moving sideways, engaging in deception. If this conduct was carried out by people in civilian life, it would be the subject of an action for obtaining money by false pretenses. But because it is the government, because it is the Liberal government which has learned over many years of experience the way to deceive and in effect to defraud the people of Canada, by taking their money by such methods—

• (2140)

Mr. MacEachen: Fraud, deception, what words!

Mr. Baldwin: That is right. These are the kinds of words that this government should hear and listen to more often.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: You might have to withdraw them tomorrow.

Mr. Baldwin: I am talking about fraud in a system which has been perpetrated by a government—

Mr. MacEachen: A shocking abuse of language.

Mr. Baldwin: I am sorry I missed the speech of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang).

Mr. Epp: You did not miss anything.

Mr. Baldwin: If I remember correctly, it was that minister who led a pack of ministers some years ago in breaking the law deliberately. We may recall the situation when we had legislation dealing with the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act, and despite the firm and specific provisions of that act, the Minister of Transport, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), the then minister of justice and one other minister conspired to break that law. I brought in a motion in an attempt to have the ministers impeached. I only regret that the former Speaker then in office said that although the right of impeachment exists, it has not been in use for so long that it presented some difficulties. I think we should bring it back.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baldwin: This country needs the law of impeachment again so that those in high places guilty of misdemeanours should be subject to the kind of proceedings which took one president out of office in the United States, a situation which could prevail here.

These dollar items do not give us the facts we are entitled to have. Members of the House on both sides are the trustees of the public of Canada. It is our responsibility to ensure that the moneys which are raised in the form of taxation are properly spent and accounted for. That right does not exist today, and I say that the hon. member for Vegreville is to be commended for bringing this issue to the attention of the House.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order. It being 9.45 p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 58(10) and order made on Monday, March 21, 1977, it is my duty to interrupt the proceedings and put forthwith every question necessary to dispose of the business of supply relating to Supplementary Estimates (D), and all stages of the bill based thereon, together with interim supply and first reading of the bill based thereon.

[English]

Is it the pleasure of House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Call in the members.

[After the taking of the Vote:]

Mr. Speaker: Let the record show that when Mr. Reid rose to vote he was identified as Mr. Watson.

I declare the motion lost.

MOTION FOR CONCURRENCE IN SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES

Hon. Ron Basford (for the President of Treasury Board) moved:

That supplementary estimates (D) 1976-77, laid upon the Table, Wednesday, March 2, 1977, except for Votes 1d(a) and 77d relating to the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, be concurred in.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: On division.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Basford (for the President of the Treasury Board) thereupon moved that Bill C-44, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1977, be read a first time and be printed.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 58(10) the question is upon the motion of Mr. Andras, seconded by Mr. MacEachen, that Bill C-44 be now read a second time and be referred to the committee of the whole.

Mr. Basford (for the President of the Treasury Board) thereupon moved that Bill C-44, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1977, be read a second time and referred to the committee of the whole.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Actually, I rise on two points of order but I think the first can be cleared up rather quickly. The President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras) is not here. I do not see, therefore, how a motion can be moved in his name.

My second point of order is this: can Your Honour assure the House that the bill which has now been printed has been checked to make sure that the items you ruled out of order this afternoon are not included in the bill which is before us?

Mr. Speaker: The points of order raised by the hon. member are well taken on both counts. The motion in the pro forma version is in the name of the President of the Treasury Board, and to make the record correct, where I have said "Mr. Andras" I ought to have said "Mr. Basford for Mr. Andras". Therefore where I have said "Mr. Andras" I ask that the record be corrected in that form.

[The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier).]

In respect of the form and substance of the bill, I am able to give the House the assurance which the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has sought. Therefore the question is on the motion of Mr. Basford (for Mr. Andras), seconded by Mr. MacEachen, that Bill C-44, an act for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1977, be now read a second time and referred to the committee of the whole.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Laniel in the chair.

The Chairman: Order, please. House in committee of the whole on Bill C-44, an act for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending March 31, 1977.

Clause 2 agreed to.

The Chairman: Shall clause 3 carry?

Some hon. Members: On division.

Clause 3 agreed to.

Clause 4 agreed to.

On clause 5—

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, perhaps I may raise a point of order. I do not believe the question was asked when Mr. Speaker was in the Chair whether the bill was in the traditional form. I thought that was a question that should be asked of the ministry with the Speaker in the Chair rather than when you, as chairman, are in committee of the whole. I do not think I should ask it of yourself but that it should be asked of the ministry. Can we have the assurance that this particular clause is in the form that has been traditionally presented to us?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Chairman, the form of this bill is the same as others passed in previous years, and it contains no additional borrowing authority.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 6 and 7 inclusive agreed to.

The Chairman: Shall the schedule carry?

Some hon. Members: On division.

Schedule agreed to.

The Chairman: Shall clause 1 carry?

Some hon. Members: On division.

Clause 1 agreed to.

The Chairman: Shall the preamble carry?

Some hon. Members: On division.

Preamble agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. Speaker: When shall the bill be read the third time? By leave, now?

Some hon. Members: By leave, now.

• (2220)

Mr. Basford (for Mr. Andras) moved the third reading of the bill.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

INTERIM SUPPLY

Hon. Ron Basford (for the President of the Treasury Board) moved:

That a sum not exceeding $5,113,286,796.42 being the aggregate of:

(a) three-twelfths of the total of the amounts of the items set forth in the Estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1978, laid before the House of Commons on February 16, 1977, $4,803,459,729.75;

(b) an additional eight-twelths of the total amount of Energy, Mines and Resources Vote L55, Regional Economic Expansion Vote 25, Transport Vote 90 (Schedule A) of the said Estimates, $4,857,333.33;

(c) an additional six-twelfths of the total amount of Treasury Board Vote 10 (Schedule B) of the said Estimates, $32,400,000.00;

(d) an additional four-twelfths of the total amount of Finance Vote 15 (Schedule C) of the said Estimates, $37,166,666.67;

(e) an additional three-twelfths of the total amount of Communications Vote 5, External Affairs Vote 5, Transport Vote 40, Treasury Board Vote 5 (Schedule D) of the said Estimates, $90,005,000.00;

(f) an additional two-twelfths of the total amount of Indian Affairs and Northern Development Vote L50, Transport Votes 65 and L75 (Schedule E) of the said Estimates, $13,357,666.67;

(g) an additional one-twelfth of the total amount of Energy, Mines and Resources Votes 1 and L50, Indian Affairs and Northern Development Votes 1 and 5, Manpower and Immigration Vote 10, National Health and Welfare Vote 40, Supply and Services Votes 1 and 15 and Transport Vote 50 (Schedule F) of the said Estimates, $132,040,400.00; be granted to Her Majesty on account of the fiscal year ending March 31, 1978.

Mr. Speaker: Before putting the question, I want to point out to hon. members that the printing of this form is unclear. On some occasions I hesitated to see whether the letter before a certain number was an "I" or an "L".

Some hon. Members: "L".

Mr. Speaker: I hope I will be permitted some editorial leverage with respect to this. It will be recorded accurately in Hansard.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, it was not clear from your reading that there were additional sums beyond the three-twelfths or expenditures across the board which were sought or that there were some additional amounts. You mentioned six-twelfths, two-twelfths. These would be in addition to the three-twelfths. Precisely just how much money is being sought in this interim supply bill?

Mr. Speaker: I can only indicate that the question which has been put to the House is in precisely the form of the notice on the notice paper. Any detailed information would, of course, have to come from the Crown.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on the same or on a related point of order. Can we have an assurance from the government that in no case do these fractions add up to twelve twelfths?

Mr. MacEachen: Yes, Mr. Speaker. In no case do the amounts sought in interim supply in this instance release the total amounts, and therefore the rights of hon. members to criticize the estimates in committee have been fully protected.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am of course prepared to entertain a point of order at any time. However, the motion must be put at this moment. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: On division.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Basford (for the President of the Treasury Board) moved that Bill C-44, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1978, be read a first time and be printed.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Speaker: It being after ten o'clock, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

At 10.28 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

APPROVAL OF MINISTER'S ACTIONS IN PROTECTING SEALS AND SEAL HUNTERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I am seeking the unanimous consent of the House under Standing Order 43. Yesterday in the United States House of Representatives a resolution was passed by a voice vote which, in the words of Dr. Arthur May, the Director General of Resource Services for Fisheries Environment Canada, had this to say: "The resolution was incredible and it was based on erroneous information supplied by anti-seal hunt protestors. I regret very much that the U.S. House did not see fit to advise itself on this issue. I would, therefore, move, with the unanimous consent of the House, seconded by the hon. member for Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine (Mr. Béchard):

That this House supports the right of Canadians to hunt seals off Canada's east coast and further supports the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment for the steps he has taken to ensure that the hunt is strictly supervised and conducted in a humane manner with quotas based on the best scientific data available to ensure proper management and conservation of the herd.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The presentation of such a motion for debate pursuant to Standing Order 43 can only be done with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

REQUEST FOR ACTION TO STOP CYPRUS ANVIL MINES RECRUITING MILLWRIGHTS IN UNITED STATES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have been informed that the Cyprus Anvil Mining Corporation in Faro, Yukon has been given approval by Canada Manpower to recruit millwrights in the United States. It has been given this approval in spite of the fact that the availability of such positions has not been advertised or posted in any form in Canada Manpower Centres in such obvious places as Sydney, Nova Scotia; Sudbury, Ontario; Hamilton, Ontario; and Sault Ste. Marie, Ontario.

Given the fact that more than a million Canadians are unemployed, and the related fact that these are jobs that should be available first to Canadians, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That the House demands that the Minister of Manpower and Immigration take action immediately to stop the Cyprus Anvil Mining Corporation in Faro, Yukon from recruiting millwrights in the United States until the availability of positions for people with this skill is posted in manpower centres across Canada.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Presentation of such a motion for debate pursuant to Standing Order 43 can only be done with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CANADA WORKS PROGRAM—CONDITIONS OF AGREEMENT WITH PROVINCES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion dealing with an important question of pressing necessity.

In view of the fact that the provincial governments have a right of veto on projects submitted to the federal government under the Canada Works program and the Young Canada Works program without any financial contribution from the provinces to those programs, and considering that some vetoed projects cannot be carried out, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin):

That the House ask the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) to reveal the conditions under which those agreements about those programs have been concluded between the federal and provincial governments.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Under the provisions of Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there such consent?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent; the motion therefore cannot be put.

POST OFFICE

SUGGESTED MEETING TO SETTLE LABOUR-MANAGEMENT IRRITANTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In recent days, members of the Canadian Union of Postal Workers have been engaging in work stoppages in various parts of the country, including St. John's, Newfoundland, yesterday, protesting various violations of the current contract. In view of the detrimental effects these stoppages are having on an already seriously depressed economy, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Darling):

That the Postmaster General take the initiative in calling a meeting of union officials, Post Office officials, representatives of the Treasury Board and the Department of Labour to settle the irritants in labour-management relations in the Post Office which are at the root of the continuing disruption of Canada's postal service.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion under Standing Order 43 can be presented only with unanimous consent. Is there such consent?

Some hon. Members: No!

ENERGY

CO-OPERATION OF FEDERAL GOVERNMENT WITH PROVINCES IN DEVELOPMENT OF HYDRO RESOURCES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I, too, rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity pursuant to Standing Order 43. As approximately four years have passed since the OPEC countries ended the era of cheap energy, and since the situation in some parts of Canada has reached crisis proportions in terms of energy costs both for industrial and home consumption, I move, seconded by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath):

That the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources bring forward new and definite development projects in conjunction with provinces such as Newfoundland which have great hydro resources so that those resources can be developed to the benefit of all Canadians and tied into a national power grid—measures which any far-sighted government would have long since completed.

Mr. Speaker: A motion under Standing Order 43 requires the unanimous consent of the House before it can be presented. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: No!

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

REQUEST FOR CO-OPERATION OF MINISTER IN MODERNIZATION OF SYDNEY STEEL PLANT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Andy Hogan (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that the premier of Nova Scotia yesterday announced that the plans for a new steel complex in Cape Breton would not be feasible under current economic circumstances, and in view of the fact that the official labour force survey for February puts the unemployment rate in Cape Breton at 16.9 per cent, which means that the real rate of unemployment is probably nearer 22 per cent, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Symes):

That this House urge the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion to press forward in co-operation with the Nova Scotia government to modernize the existing Sydney Steel Corporation, thus ensuring a stable work force.

Mr. Speaker: The motion put forward under Standing Order 43 requires the unanimous consent of the House before it can be presented. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: No!

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

MEASURES TO ESTABLISH PERMANENT MECHANISM FOR CONSULTATION WITH ECONOMIC DECISION-MAKING GROUPS

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. Given the encouraging news that representatives of business and labour are now making a start on the establishment of a spirit of co-operation and consensus on national economic policy, might I ask the Prime Minister whether he intends to make provision for further consultation by bringing in some more permanent kind of mechanism which more broadly represents economic groups in the country?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as we indicated last fall in the government publication called "The Way Ahead", we intend to continue and expand these consultations and reach an increasing number of spokesmen for the various aspects of the economic decision-making.

Mr. Clark: I take it from the Prime Minister's answer that there is no intention to establish any mechanism which will regularly and broadly represent the wide range of persons concerned about economic policy. Is that right?

Mr. Trudeau: At this stage we do not intend to establish a formal mechanism. We intend to proceed with the kind of consultations which have been going on and to expand them. Ultimately we will see whether these consultations can be formalized in a more precise way.

ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM

PLANS FOR TERMINATING CONTROLS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Finance. Could the minister tell the House whether, as a result of meetings which he called "an historic event", he will give the House of Commons now the assurance that was asked of him yesterday by representatives of business and labour that his budget proposals will not prevent the government from terminating controls at the earliest opportunity?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I was not able to give that assurance yesterday but I took account of that representation. As the hon. gentleman knows, many others in the country—including, I think it is fair to say, a majority of the provincial governments—have asked that the control program not be brought to an end at an early date. Naturally, I will have to weigh these two different representations and try to achieve some compromise between them. I think it is important in the course of the economic statement in the budget that we should give some indication of the timing on the control program, and we are now giving reflection to the ways in which we might meet the rather conflicting objectives stated by two different important groups in the community.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

POSSIBILITY BUSINESS AND LABOUR REQUEST RESTRAINT ON GOVERNMENT EXPENDITURES

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): My question is for the Prime Minister. Reports from yesterday's meeting indicate that business and labour representatives present there were willing to accept voluntary restraints on their own economic demands in the earnest hope that controls might end as soon as possible. Would the Prime Minister indicate whether business and labour in turn asked the government for similar restraint commitments, especially on a long-term basis and, if so, what assurances were given by the government that the government would take a smaller share of our gross national product?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, yesterday this subject was not raised, nor was it raised by the representatives of business and labour, but at previous meetings, particularly through the President of the Treasury Board, we have indicated the progress we have made in the past to limit expenditures. We would appreciate it if the opposition parties would themselves show restraint on the spending estimates of the government.

Mr. Stevens: My supplementary question is for the Prime Minister. Yesterday both the business and labour representatives informed the Prime Minister and other ministers present that in their view the marketplace works well. Does the Prime Minister agree with their assessment?

Mr. Trudeau: Relatively.

ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM

METHOD OF TERMINATING CONTROLS

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my final supplementary question is for the Minister of Finance. As controls could be dropped suddenly or by stages and as the Minister of Finance stated yesterday that he suspected that the preference of business and labour representatives was, to use his words, a "put out the lights" approach—something, I think, with which the government feels quite at home—can the minister say whether, as a result of this meeting, the government now favours a "one shot" end to controls rather than a decontrols period when controls would be phased down bit by bit?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): We will be dealing with that question among others in the course of the budgetary statement.

DELAY IN BUILDING NEW STEEL PLANT IN CAPE BRETON—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO DEAL WITH UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. Andy Hogan (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. In view of the fact that the premier of Nova Scotia last night announced from London, England, that there would be a delay in the construction of a new steel mill in Cape Breton until well into the future, would the minister tell the House, in view of the tremendous unemployment problem in the Cape Breton area, what special plans his department has to help the extremely serious situation now facing the Sydney steel plant?

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, as I said yesterday, it is obvious that since the project under study concerning the construction of a new steel plant has been delayed until much later, it will of course be necessary to consider more closely the proposals which will be put forward to maintain the operations of SYSCO and possibly to increase them. Of course, I will have to consult my officials and pursue our negotiations and discussions with the SYSCO officials. But I repeat that it will be necessary to wait for proposals and, as I said yesterday, we are prepared to consider them favourably.

● (1420)

[English]

Mr. Hogan: Mr. Speaker, I appeal to the minister to be more specific. He has been studying this thing for over a year and a half. Over the last two years I have been attending the meetings of the Standing Committee on Regional Development and bringing up this matter. What are the minister's suggestions? We are facing a situation in which we are having a—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. If the hon. member has a supplementary question, would he put it forthwith.

Mr. Hogan: Would the minister please give us something more specific regarding the government's plans for employment in the Sydney Steel industry? He has had lots of time to study it.

[Translation]

Mr. Lessard: Mr. Speaker, I would like to remind the hon. member that SYSCO is a corporation under the jurisdiction of the provincial government which is responsible for the administration. I will certainly have to wait for proposals from the directors of this corporation as well as from the provincial government before I can decide what kind of assistance my department and the federal government might offer.

STUDY OF USE OF Q-BOP TECHNOLOGY FOR RENOVATION OF SYDNEY STEEL PLANT—REQUEST FOR TABLING

Mr. Andy Hogan (Cape Breton-East Richmond): The minister's answer suggested that the province of Nova Scotia has made no suggestions to him as yet, and in turn, his department has made no suggestions on how to correct this situation. Will the minister please tell the House if the special study on the use of Q-BOP technology to help renovate the present Sydney plant, which was done by members of the United States Steel Corporation with the support of DREE funds, has been received by the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, and will he table it in the House?

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, this study is almost completed. We hope to get information on the proposed technology and when we know the real value and possibilities of the use of this technology I will probably be willing, with the usual authorization, to reveal the result of this study to the hon. member and to the House.

CANADA-QUEBEC AGREEMENT—CONSTRUCTION OF HIGHWAY FROM GROS-CACOUNA TO MONT-JOLI—PROGRESS OF NEGOTIATIONS

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion.

[Mr. Lessard.]

Could the minister advise the House of any new development in connection with the Canada-Quebec agreement for the completion of the highway from Gros-Cacouna to Mont-Joli?

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, I can advise the hon. member that I have received from Mr. Léonard, my Quebec counterpart, the proposals which he intends to discuss with me within the next few weeks or days. I received these proposals on Monday, Mr. Speaker.

ENERGY

REGULATIONS FOR OIL AND GAS EXPLORATION IN THE NORTH—DATE OF INTRODUCTION

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Last Thursday the minister tabled two studies on oil and natural gas resources of Canada—I am glad to see that the hon. gentleman has resumed his seat—and a summary of "An Energy Strategy for Canada". The conclusions were that the cost of energy is going to climb alarmingly in the future, that it is going to be very difficult and expensive for Canada to achieve energy self-sufficiency and that the bulk of our potential in Canada lies in three frontier regions where it is expensive and difficult to explore and develop.

It is a fact that exploration in these frontier areas north of the 60th parallel has declined at least 50 per cent since 1973 because of a lack of certainty regarding legislation and regulations. When will the minister introduce to parliament, as promised for six years, new legislation concerning oil and gas land regulations to reduce uncertainty by providing a stable fiscal and land tenure system, and will these regulations contain conditions aimed at accelerating exploration activity by giving incentives to the industry to pursue high-risk activity in those frontier areas?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I hope we will be introducing the legislation for those regulations in the very near future, but let me make it quite clear that if provinces such as the province of Newfoundland adopt measures which are more stringent than the regulations we have put forward and which would discourage a massive $60 million program planned for this year, that will have a serious affect on oil and natural gas exploration activities in Canada. I can understand why the hon. member who put that question to me might be sensitive on that issue because he was the author of the set of regulations which is very likely going to cut off $60 million worth of exploration this coming year.

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman's smart-ass answer—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order please, the hon. member for Central Nova.

FEDERAL PLANS FOR CO-OPERATION WITH PROVINCES IN DEVELOPMENT OF HYDRO RESOURCES

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I also have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Since some provinces such as Newfoundland have immense hydro resources which lie idle because these provinces cannot afford to fully develop them, and since the country desperately requires additional hydro development in order to alleviate an energy crisis and to facilitate the long-standing need for a national power grid, will the minister indicate briefly when he plans to bring forward a comprehensive program that would encourage these provincial resources to be developed for the benefit of all Canadians?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, that program has been brought forward and it has been discussed with the Premier of Newfoundland. It has been put to him that we are prepared to consider a number of new opportunities with respect to the financing of the generation, as well as the transmission, of that hydro development. Quite frankly, we cannot go any faster than we are going right now. We are waiting for him.

REASON FOR REDUCTION IN FEDERAL GOVERNMENT'S CONTRIBUTION TO COST OF TRANSMISSION LINES

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that ten years ago during the halcyon years when the government was preaching self-sufficiency it was their policy, for example, to pay 100 per cent of the cost of transmission facilities, will the minister now tell the House why this government in the midst of an energy crisis will finance only half the cost of new inter-connections which could encourage this country to increase its renewable energy supplies? Will he take steps to look into this type of project in conjunction with the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I would urge the hon. member who sits on the other side of the House as a Conservative to speak to the Premier of Newfoundland, who is also a Conservative, and urge him and his colleagues to move forward on this quickly. On the second point, it might be helpful if the hon. member were to convince his own leader that if it were not for Petro-Canada drilling off the Nova Scotia shelf, this year there would be no drilling activity at all.

An hon. Member: That is not true.

An hon. Member: That is nonsense.

Mr. MacKay: A final supplementary, Mr. Speaker. I simply ask the minister when we can expect on this side of the House and in the country to see some concrete plans? So far it has been all swank and no knickers as far as power development is concerned.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

PURPOSE OF ACQUIRING CRUISE SHIP "MERCATOR ONE"

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the genial Minister of Regional Economic Expansion and arises out of the odyssey of Mercator One, that curious cruise ship owned by the taxpayers of Canada and Nova Scotia through Metropolitan Area Growth Investments, a vessel registered in the Bahamas to avoid some Canadian taxation and now on a trans-Atlantic cruise from London to Bermuda for maintenance before sailing in Canadian waters, crewed by people from Thailand. Could the minister say whether the federally appointed directors of MAGI approve that its efforts so far have been devoted to the interests of keeping down unemployment in Thailand, keeping up the revenues in Bermuda and the Bahamas? Cannot this vessel ever really become Canadian?

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, first of all I want to say that I appreciate the good word of the hon. member. As to the content of his question, what I can say about the decision of the board of MAGI is, I suppose, that it has been based on good information, so they had to proceed with that proposal. What happened after that when some decision was made by the administrators of the Mercator company is something I cannot comment on at this point.

● (1430)

Mr. McCleave: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In the interests of my province, would the minister please make some effort to see that they at least serve Nova Scotia apple juice on the tables of this cruise ship?

COMMUNICATIONS

EFFECT ON NATIONAL POLICY OF PROPOSED NEW POWERS GIVEN TO MINISTER

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question for the Minister of Communications relates to Bill C-43 which was given first reading yesterday. Since all royal commissions on broadcasting, parliamentary committees and federal proposals contained in the green and grey papers on communications policy insist on the fundamental principle of a coherent and consistent communications policy, national in scope, can the minister please tell the House how the power given to her to make individual and possibly different agreements with the provinces can have this result?

[Translation]

Hon. Jeanne Sauvé (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member speaks as though we could not achieve coherence and consistency while ensuring a certain amount of diversity. The bill I introduced in the House yesterday takes precisely into account this great Canadian diversity, the various needs of some regions, and provides a certain amount of flexibility on the part of the federal government to meet and satisfy the needs and aspirations of the provinces.

[English]

Mr. Nowlan: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Since even the Prime Minister, in a letter to the chairman of the CRTC on the specific problem of reporting and balance in CBC programming asked the chairman to comment about the advisability of setting up a royal commission on broadcasting to look into this question, and how it is to be carried out, at this time when we are trying to pull this diverse country together, can the minister explain if the powers given to her to make independent and possibly different agreements with ten other provinces will emasculate the CRTC, the national authority which is supposed to define national service, or make the minister the czarina of communications? How can they hope to pull the country together?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That seems to me to touch on a rather general question of policy, the answer to which might be a bit lengthier than can be allowed in the question period.

MANPOWER

PERMISSION TO CYPRUS ANVIL MINE TO RECRUIT EMPLOYEES IN UNITED STATES—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Is the minister aware that at a time when literally hundreds of thousands of Canadians are unemployed his department has given the Cyprus Anvil Corporation in the Yukon permission to recruit employees in the United States?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I was not aware of that. The general policy of the department is to do a screening across Canada first, to determine if there are people in that category to take jobs in those areas. If Canadians do not move into that area, only in those circumstances would we employ people from outside the country. However, prior to any representation I will look into the matter, to see if the policy was violated in this instance.

Mr. Broadbent: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I thought the minister might say that, Mr. Speaker. I should like him to know that this department in Ottawa said yesterday that the decision was reached only after exhaustive steps were taken to find employees in Canada. Considering that these positions were not advertised or posted in any manpower centre in the following steel communities, Sydney, Sudbury, Hamilton and Sault Ste. Marie, where one might have found Canadians looking for such work, will the minister, given this information, take steps to bring this practice to a stop immediately?

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member did a little research and discovered that, seemingly, our research was not as exhaustive as it might have been, but I would rather check with my officials before commenting further.

Mr. Maurice Harquail (Restigouche): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Secretary of State about the CBC French and English programming in northern New Brunswick, especially in the area of Baie des Chaleurs.

[English]

In view of the many petitions, briefs and representations made by the citizens of that region over the years concerning the lack of CBC radio in French and English, can the minister give some assurance to the House as to what action he may take with CBC officials in order to bring about 100 per cent CBC radio programming to that part of Canada?

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have received the representation of the hon. member. I shall bring it to the attention of CBC officials.

AGRICULTURE

ALLEGED SALE OF MARGARINE AS BUTTER—REQUEST FOR REPORT ON GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, may I direct my question to the Minister of Agriculture? Since on February 18 alone 5,000 pounds of margarine, destined to be sold as butter, was intercepted and confiscated at Cornwall, Ontario, I ask if the minister is working directly with the ministry of agriculture in Ontario, and what progress has been made so far with regard to this interprovincial fraud whereby margarine is being sold as butter in the province of Ontario? Has the minister anything to report to the House on this matter?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I met the minister of agriculture of Ontario in my office in Ottawa last Monday morning. We discussed the problem with some of his officials. In the past they have prosecuted such offenders. We do not become involved in this area unless it is proven that the commodity crosses provincial borders. We are told that there is no federal involvement in the matter at this time, but if anybody has any idea who these people are, and how they are doing it, we should like to hear from him.

POSSIBILITY OF REGULATIONS TO PREVENT MANUFACTURERS OF MARGARINE FROM MAKING IT LOOK LIKE BUTTER

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, may I direct my supplementary question either to the Minister of Agriculture or to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs? I want to make it clear that in my questions of today and of last week I make no charges vis-à-vis butter producers in the province of Ontario.

An hon. Member: You can't have it both ways, Heward.

Mr. Grafftey: Are federal regulations presently being considered with regard to the production of margarine, in order to prevent unscrupulous manufacturers from making it look like butter?

Hon. A. C. Abbott (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am grateful to the hon. member for larding into his question my name. I think the Minister of Agriculture is competent in this area and I should leave the answer to him.

ENERGY

REQUEST FOR ADDITIONAL FUNDS FOR RESEARCH ON RENEWABLE SOURCES OF ENERGY

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Since this year the United States will spend approximately $1.60 per capita on renewable energy development, compared to a token .35 cents per capita in Canada, when will the government announce serious measures to either reduce or eliminate this disturbing research gap in such critical technology for the future? If the government is unable to do so at the present time, is it prepared to make sizable shifts in research funding away from nuclear development into renewable energy development?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I would think that the hon. member would realize the government is already moving in that direction. Indeed, if he were to work out the per capita investment in his province, he would find that it is far greater than that of the United States. The investment which the federal government is making in Prince Edward Island, for the benefit of Prince Edward Island, is also expected to be of great benefit to Canadians all across Canada.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, while we appreciate the concern of the department and its contribution to the development of renewable energy in Prince Edward Island, even I would not say that Prince Edward Island is the whole of Canada. Since the United States is committed to providing 7 per cent of its own energy requirements from solar energy by the year 2000, can the minister indicate in what way he is assisting Canadian industry generally, especially in the poorer regions, to take advantage of opportunities created by solar energy, to make certain that we do not lose the opportunity to make this development available to other countries and do not fall behind in our own technological development?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I just pointed out to the hon. member that the Canadian government's investment in Prince Edward Island works out to about $20 per capita in Prince Edward Island.

OIL—REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE DOMESTIC PRICE DOES NOT EXCEED UNITED STATES PRICE

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources concerns oil prices, which will be going up by as much as $2 per barrel, depending upon who wins the argument at the forthcoming energy ministers conference. Will the minister tell the House whether it is the policy of the government to ensure Canadian oil prices do not exceed the U.S. equivalent of $11.24 a barrel?

● (1440)

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, we have been very careful in approaching higher prices for Canada consistent with our policy of moving toward world prices to maintain a position where the Canadian well-head price, delivery price and transportation do not exceed that in the United States. At the present time, my estimate is that there would be room for better than a $2 increase in a barrel of oil effective July 1 and still keep Canadian oil prices below U.S. oil prices.

OIL—POSSIBILITY OF GREATER RETURNS TO INDUSTRY—MONITORING OF USE OF TAX INCENTIVES

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Will the minister tell the House whether, in light of the drilling fiasco in the north, he intends to increase the proportion of the increase netted back to the industry and, in addition, whether he has monitored the use by the industry of existing tax incentives.

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Yes, Mr. Speaker. We are monitoring the tax incentives, more particularly the cash flow generated from higher prices which is being used by the industry. I indicated in the House we expect to table information in the House on the matter in a few weeks' time.

Oral Questions

ALLEGATION RESOURCE QUESTION DELAYING SETTLEMENT OF BOUNDARY OF GEORGES BANK—REQUEST FOR REPORT ON PENOBSCOT B-41

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In light of the fact that the mineral, oil and gas potential in the gray area on Georges Bank off Nova Scotia is holding up the resolution of the boundary question between Canada and the United States, what steps is the minister taking to help resolve this matter? Second, can the minister bring the House up to date on the results of the well drilled 175 miles southeast of Halifax, named Penobscot B-41, which was reported as showing significant hydrocarbons which hopefully will be the first economic oil well on the east coast?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): On the first part of the question with respect to Georges Bank, Mr. Speaker, I do not believe that the hydrocarbons question is the problem interfering with a settlement time. The hon. member may want to address his further supplementaries on this question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

With regard to the Penobscot well and the potential of that, it is still too early to say. It is not down to full depth. Indications have been reported in the press that petroleum has been found. I checked yesterday. I was told that was a premature statement, that one would have to wait another week or so before there would be any firm information.

GASOLINE—SUGGESTED ELIMINATION OF SALES TAX IN NORTHERN REGIONS

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources as well. In view of the extraordinarily high price that consumers have to pay for gasoline in the northern portions of the western provinces, indeed across northern Canada, will the minister lend his support to the idea of dropping the 12 cent federal sales tax on gasoline in those regions of high cost?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the hon. member is quite aware that kind of question should be put to the Minister of Finance.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

REPORT OF ARCTIC WATERS OIL AND GAS ADVISORY COMMITTEE—DATE OF MINISTER'S DECISION

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Will the minister now tell the House if he has examined the report by the Arctic Waters Oil and Gas Advisory Committee and, if so, what conclusions he has drawn?

[Mr. Gillespie.]

Hon. Warren Allmand (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I have not seen this report.

Mr. Neil: In view of the lead-time necessary for Canmar to prepare for the summer drilling season, will the minister indicate whether he will be in a position to announce his decision on the matter by the end of this month?

Mr. Allmand: I would hope to, Mr. Speaker.

POST OFFICE

MEASURES TO IMPROVE SERVICE AND REDUCE COSTS

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Postmaster General. Since the annual report of Canada Post for the year ended March 31, 1976, received only today, shows that the post office spent $1.96 for every $1 it took in during that fiscal year compared to $1.52 for each $1 of revenue in the preceding fiscal year, largely because total revenues were off 8 per cent, indicating substantial loss of volume, which policies does the minister expect to implement to recover lost business, by improving services or to reduce costs in keeping with the reduced volume?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, the policy that we are adopting is to try to increase the volume and thereby increase revenue. One of the ways we are attempting to do that is by establishing labour peace within the post office.

HOUSING

QUEBEC—AGREEMENT ON URBAN RENOVATION—PROGRESS OF NEGOTIATIONS

Mr. Jacques Lavoie (Hochelaga): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs.

Since the former Quebec minister of municipal affairs never did sign the agreement concerning section 44(1)(b) of the National Housing Act which would have allowed non-profit organizations to provide low-cost housing and encourage the acceleration of urban renovation, especially in Hochelaga-Maisonneuve, can the Minister tell the House whether he had the opportunity to meet Mr. Guy Tardif, the new Minister of Municipal Affairs since the election of the new government in Quebec? If so, did he raise that question and what are the results? If not, when will he do so?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, first I should like to thank the hon. member for giving me notice of his question. Indeed I met briefly with Mr. Tardif soon after his appointment as Quebec minister of municipal affairs, but I hope I will soon have the pleasure to meet him more formally and for a longer period of time. I am quite prepared to work closely with him so as to come to grips with housing problems in Quebec. As suggested by the hon. member, I will not fail to raise the question of section 44(1)(b) designed particularly for that part of the population of Quebec which most needs decent housing.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

EFFECT ON COMPETITION OF PROPOSED TAKEOVER OF NATIONAL SEA PRODUCTS

Miss Coline Campbell (South Western Nova): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct my question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. In view of the government's concern over the potential elimination of competition arising from the merger of large interests and the possible effect of such mergers on the competitive position of small operators, as is evidenced by the establishment some years ago of the royal commission on corporate concentration and the minister's recent tabling of the new competition bill, will the minister undertake to look into the announcement last week of the takeover of National Sea Products and any other corporate relationships that may be significant to this merger from the point of view of the preservation of competition in the fishing industry?

Hon. A. C. Abbott (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for her very accurate reflection of my interest and that of the government in improving the competition policy, particularly as it affects mergers. I can say that under the possibly inadequate law that we labour under today, a merger of this dimension would automatically be reviewed by the Director of Investigation and Research under the Combines Investigation Act. If it were seen that the merger appeared to be in conflict with the provisions of that act, he would order an inquiry.

AGRICULTURE

REQUEST MINISTER DESIST FROM PROMOTING BEEF MARKETING BOARD

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Since the beef cattle marketing board has been soundly defeated in Manitoba with Manitoba cattle producers showing little interest in what for cattle producers would be economic nonsense, is the minister prepared to call off a so-called speaking tour to promote a national beef marketing plan and devote his time and the taxpayer's money to more pressing and important matters here in Ottawa?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, coming from good old Tory Ontario where they have the oldest and best marketing boards in Canada, I cannot help but be impressed with what they have done for agriculture. As far as the Manitoba beef plan is concerned, I did not have anything to do with that. They were proposing a plan and put it forward to their beef producers. I said I would never force in a marketing board for beef producers. Anyone who says that I would is not telling the truth. The farmers would have to express the opinion to me that they want a beef marketing plan and I would have to find out if there was one suitable for them. I would have it put to a vote only then. I said there must be a better marketing system for beef and I still say that.

Mr. Murta: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question, though it is rather like throwing water on an old hen. Does a 77 per cent rejection of a beef marketing plan in Manitoba now convince the Minister of Agriculture to stop this nonsense of calling for a national plan?

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, I can be a little more than impressed by the great Tory province of Alberta which as recently as last year voted for a poultry marketing plan to the tune of over 80 per cent and in Tory Ontario where they voted for it 89 per cent, whereas most provinces in Canada are asking me at the present time to set up a broiler marketing board.

EGGS—EFFECT ON SMALL PRODUCERS OF IMPORTS FROM UNITED STATES—EXTENSION OF TIME PERIOD FOR CEMA TO CONSIGN EGGS

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I wish now to switch to eggs and to ask the Minister of Agriculture whether he would investigate and take appropriate action on reports in Ontario that some large integrated companies are undercutting small producers by importing large amounts of eggs from the United States, which Ontario industry leaders fear will mean the domination of the Ontario market by two or three large producers within five years?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, this matter was reported to me and I had discussions about it on Monday again with the provincial minister of agriculture for Ontario who expressed deep concern. I maintain that at the present time this is mainly within the jurisdiction of the provincial marketing boards. It is a question of how they administer the provincial plan to let these large producers get control of the quotas in the various provinces, allowing them, as the hon. member has suggested, probably to get total control of egg production unless something is done about it.

Mr. Nystrom: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. One of the reasons large producers can get control of the market is that CEMA has only some 48 hours to locate and to consign eggs to companies. About six weeks ago CEMA asked for an extension of that 48 hour time period. I should like to ask the minister whether or not he is going to grant an extension of that period so that orderly marketing can work well, as it does in many other areas?

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, I think in many cases we are spending much too much money outside of Canada on a product that we can produce in Canada. We are looking at the exact demand for the product the hon. member is talking about.

MANPOWER

REQUEST FOR TABLING DEPARTMENT'S JOB VACANCY STATISTICS

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to my hon. friend, the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In view of the fact that the minister consistently denigrates the quality and the uses of job vacancy statistics published by Statistics Canada, would the minister tell the House whether his own department, the Department of Manpower and Immigration, has any statistics of its own which record the number of job vacancies registered with Canada Manpower Centres at a given point in time, and, if so, would the minister offer the House the latest figure available?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I do not denigrate the survey as such. I denigrate the use made of it. The job vacancy survey indicates the number of jobs that are available at any given point in time. They indicate a trend rather than the number of job vacancies that are available.

In reply to the second part of the hon. member's question, the Canada Manpower Centres place about a million people per year, participate in the filling of 25 to 35 per cent of all vacancies, and at the end of any given month some 100,000 job vacancies are available through CMC's. So we do have that kind of statistic, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the minister for his unusual frankness for a change. Would the minister undertake to table this week in the House, if at all possible, or as soon as he can—unless these data are secret, of course—the number of vacancies registered with Canada Manpower Centres at the end of the each of the last 24 months? I should like to add that personally I am looking forward to seeing these figures and the minister's face thereafter.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Lotbinière.

Mr. Alexander: Well, Mr. Speaker, I did ask the minister a question and would like an answer.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The information sought by the hon. member ought to be sought in another way. He is asking for information that extends back over 24 months.

Mr. Alexander: I would appreciate it if the minister would give me an answer.

[Mr. Nystrom.]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Lotbinière.

INCOME TAX

REQUEST THAT SAME DEDUCTIONS BE GRANTED TO ALL TRUCK DRIVERS

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Revenue.

My question relates to the one I asked yesterday. The minister, I believe, realizes its significance since it deals with truck drivers who are not working for a company whose main activity is transportation.

Is the minister prepared to extend the scope of information circular No. 7321R2 which deals only with truck drivers working for transportation companies, in order to allow all truck drivers having the same working conditions to enjoy the same advantages under the Income Tax Act?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I have read the question the hon. member asked yesterday and unfortunately I am obliged to answer that my department does not intend to change the provision of the law under which actual expenses incurred, or $3 a meal, may be deducted against their income by full time truck drivers. The hon. member is referring to employees who are occasionally driving trucks for their employer. They are then eligible for the $150 overall deduction for which receipts are not needed, or have to be covered by negotiations between themselves or their representatives and their employer directly.

Mr. Fortin: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Without prejudice to the minister, I think she has misunderstood my question. I am not referring to part time truckers but to those who are working full time for Golden Eagle in Quebec City or for Esso Imperial, for example, whose main activities are related to oil and which need full time truckers to ensure the transportation and distribution of their oil products. These truckers are victims of the discrimination I have been referring to and that is why I am asking the minister to extend the scope of circular 7321R2 so these people may benefit from that deduction.

Miss Bégin: Mr. Speaker, as defined in the circular of April 21, 1976 mentioned by the hon. member, these workers are allowed this deduction. Since the hon. member has mentioned the name of the company involved, I will investigate this case as soon as possible.

GRAIN

WHEAT—LACK OF SHIPMENTS FROM NORTHEASTERN SASKATCHEWAN—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the minister responsible for the Wheat Board. Since wheat prices have fallen dramatically and the final payment amounted only to about one cent a bushel in many cases for certain grades, many points in northeastern Saskatchewan have not shipped any grain at all since last October. How long do these farmers have to squirm before they get any boxcars?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows full well that while in one or two cases a final payment as low as two cents was the case, other payments as high as 22 cents and in some cases of barley over $1 were made. Prices have improved at the moment but that has nothing to do with the hon. member's question. Early movement of grain had to be arranged by the Canadian Wheat Board which was particularly heavy from southern areas where high protein grain was available. This year's crop was significantly lower in protein in many areas than had been ordinarily expected, and as a result heavy reliance on southern areas was required at the beginning. As for the rest of the prairie region they can expect rapid movement of grain as the situation there has now caught up as the lower protein values are required.

Mr. Korchinski: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Since many of these farmers have never been able to make use of the quota which was available on barley and this quota has now been terminated, and since many of these farmers cannot take advantage of the temporarily high prices for rapeseed, can these farmers be assured that they will get immediate attention and that a few of the 1,000 cars which are presently being shipped will be sent to that area immediately, prior to any large scale movement from that area?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Wheat Board—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: He is still suffering from jet lag.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): It is time Otto went to the Senate.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I trust that was parliamentary! The Wheat Board, of course, attempts to put the cars in the zones where there has been a small amount of movement. If the hon. member is suggesting that some farmers have had no delivery opportunity and had their quotas terminated in the usual way, I am sure that they and their elevator agents know that they simply have to contact the Canadian Wheat Board, and if that is the case special steps are taken.

Oral Questions

REASON FOR FAILURE TO CLEAR ELEVATORS IN SASKATCHEWAN AND ALBERTA PRIOR TO FREEZE UP OF GREAT LAKES

Mr. Arnold Malone (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the minister in charge of the Wheat Board. In view of the fact that there has been a policy decision change affecting Saskatchewan and east central Alberta to ship grain to the port of Thunder Bay, which is frozen up for a good part of the year, thus causing a great deal of congestion in that part of the prairies, could the minister give some justification for why those country elevators were not cleared out last fall, resulting in being solidly congested throughout all of the winter months and preventing farmers from moving their grain?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member should appreciate that until the crop is harvested the Wheat Board may not know exactly from what areas they have to draw particular kinds of grain, and therefore from time to time there will be temporary difficulty in regard to movement. No forward planning could have assured the Wheat Board that low protein wheat would be found in most regions of the prairie provinces, and accordingly different steps had to be taken as soon as that fact was known.

● (1500)

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) yesterday raised, by way of a point of order, a question concerning the language used during the question period by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) which was reported at page 4199 of Hansard, of March 22, 1977, as follows:

> That compliments exactly the deceit of the right hon. gentleman in appearing to imply here in the House . . .

The use of unparliamentary language is a practice that has long been held to be disorder in the House. The attitude of the Chair is that, when in doubt in terms of the interpretation of a term, it is always best to err on the side of asking an hon. member who has used language in the heat of the moment to withdraw it in order to uphold the dignity of the practices of the House.

In this particular case it may give the House some indication of the difficulty in these particular matters to say that in examining the precedents, in preparation for having to make a decision on this matter, it comes down to so fine a distinction as a situation in the past when the word "deception" was used, and was held and defended as not being an unparliamentary word. The question, therefore, becomes: is there sufficient distinction between the word "deception" and the word "deceit" to permit the one and disallow the other? In my considered opinion, upon examining dictionary definitions ordinarily attributed to the use of the word "deceit", that is so. The word "deception" does not have the same connotation as the word "deceit".

"Deceit" is ordinarily defined as follows:

> The action or practice of deceiving; concealment of the truth in order to mislead; deception, fraud, cheating.

All of those fall within the ambit of expressions ordinarily held to be out of order in the House. In the circumstances I would prefer to resolve the matter in favour of asking if the Minister of Transport, having used that term yesterday in the heat of the moment, might withdraw it.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I have looked at the words and have seen Your Honour's difficulty in view of the fact that the word "deceit" has also been used to mean trickery. I have noted that according to May the word "calumnious", which means full of tricks, has been held to be parliamentary. I see the great difficulties. I am not going to stand on any position, having regard to the suggestion from Your Honour, and I will withdraw the word. I did use the word earlier in relation to the right hon. gentlemen outside the House, and I suppose I need not withdraw that.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Not very gracious, Otto.

Mr. Lang: I will also find other ways to describe the right hon. gentleman's conduct.

[Translation]

Mr. Eymard Corbin (Madawaska-Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege concerning a verbal exchange which took place last night when the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp) was speaking to the opposition motion on supply. May I be allowed to relate the incident briefly, inasmuch as I am concerned in its real context.

As reported in the Commons Hansard on page 4239, the hon. member for Provencher quoted an article published in the Toronto Star for last Saturday and entitled "Trudeau Faces Revolt by MPs over Jobs Bill". Here is the first quotation of the hon. member for Provencher:

> The Trudeau government faces a backbench rebellion if it insists on pushing through a bill to make it even tougher . . .

[English]

Mr. Broadbent: I don't believe it!

[Translation]

Mr. Corbin:

> . . . make it even tougher for jobless Canadians to get unemployment insurance benefits.

At that point, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Provencher was interrupted by my colleague, the hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi (Mr. Dionne), as well as by a call to order by your distinguished representative, the Acting Speaker.

The hon. member for Provencher resumed his remarks quoting the second paragraph of the Star article, which was reproduced in yesterday's Hansard, and I quote:

> The government could fall if Newfoundland M.P. David Rooney gets the four other Atlantic Liberals he says are also opposed to the bill to join him in voting against it.
> [Mr. Speaker.]

After a second call to order by the Acting Speaker, the hon. member for Provencher went back to his quotation from the Star, as follows:

> . . . The five, he says . . .

—still according to Mr. Rooney—

> . . . have agreed that the bill is unacceptable to them in its present form.

The hon. member for Provencher then skipped four paragraphs in the article in question then quoted as follows:

> Rooney says four other Liberal maritimers support him in opposing the bill. Liberal maritimers include . . .
> SOME HON. MEMBERS: Order!
> MR. EPP: They include Rompkey, Breau, Corbin and Maurice Dionne.

At this time, I rose on a point of order to say:

> The hon. member has deliberately misled the House by misquoting that newspaper article, and I wish he would read it as written.

In fact, Mr. Speaker, when I read Hansard today, I discovered that the hon. member was not even quoting the article when he named me and three of my colleagues. As shown in Hansard, later in the evening I withdrew the statement in which I accused the hon. member for Provencher of having deliberately misled the House. I also withdrew without any reservation whatever my second statement that the hon. member had lied.

In order to remove any doubt from the hon. member's mind and from the mind of any hon. member in the House, I reiterate what I said yesterday evening and, once again, I make apologies to all hon. members for having been carried away at that time in the heat of the debate. I am the first to recognize that those kinds of interventions lead nowhere except to lessen the respect we should all have for this institution and particularly for the Chair.

However, Mr. Speaker, there still is a question pending for which I did not obtain any satisfaction whatsoever and since it could not come to a satisfying conclusion last night, I would want it to be debated now because I feel I have been unfairly named and attacked by the hon. member for Provencher who credited me with intentions by quoting ny name out of context. Two retractations on my part do not excuse his unjustified attack against my colleagues and me. I maintain that he has used at random a newspaper article to draw a conclusion out of context. In all fairness, it seems to me—and I may be mistaken—that he should have quoted the rest of the paragraph which was nothing else but a list of all Liberal backbenchers of the Atlantic area. To support my case, I quote the article:

[English]

> Liberal maritime members include William Rompkey of Labrador;

Apparently that is a new province, according to the Star.

> Herbert Breau, Eymard Corbin, Maurice Dionne, Maurice Harquail and Michael Landers of New Brunswick; Coline Campbell of Nova Scotia, and George Baker of Newfoundland.

[Translation]

The Toronto Star was only giving the list of all Liberal back-benchers from the Atlantic area: it is very clear! However the hon. member for Provencher who was standing yesterday evening with a photocopy of the Star article gave only four of those names, and out of context I quote Hansard, page 4239, right column:

MR. EPP: Now, with regard to the motion, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member said we were not united. Well, when we get down to the bottom of this article we read:

Then, the hon. member quoted the Star:

Rooney says four other Liberal maritimers support him in opposing the bill. Liberal maritimer members include—

And there was an interruption and Mr. Epp continued, and I quote:

They include Rompkey, Breau, Corbin, and Maurice Dionne.

This was the assertion of the hon. member for Provencher, and he resumed his seat.

Mr. Speaker, we can all judge from the facts. On one hand, we have the text of the newspaper that I quoted correctly and on the other hand, the assertion of the hon. member for Provencher, out of context, that seems to impute certain intentions to the hon. members mentioned by him. He has no right to impute intentions; that is our personal business. It seems that such assertions out of context are inflammatory and unworthy of the hon. member and absolutely unfair to my colleagues whose names have been mentioned. The Star did not go that far. It does not matter if I support or not the comments of the hon. member for Bonavista-Trinity-Conception (Mr. Rooney) and I urge hon. members to read the rest of that article. They might change their mind.

Yesterday evening I asked the hon. member for Provencher to reflect during the night on his comments and I ask him now in all friendliness to offer excuses to all my colleagues whom he mentioned and who had no connection at all with the article he had in hand. I was very frank with him and I wish he were the same with us.

● (1510)

[English]

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, in response to the question of privilege which the hon. member for Madawaska-Victoria (Mr. Corbin) raises today regarding the exchange which took place in the House last night—those of us who have checked Hansard will have noticed that it was a very lively debate, I imagine parliament lived last night—the hon. member indicated I had indulged in activities which were not parliamentary and that I should withdraw. After a number of exchanges, the hon. member, as reported on page 4240, at the bottom of the first column of that page, withdrew certain remarks—I will read his words so that there will be no question about them.

MR. CORBIN: It could well be that in the heat of debate I got carried away, and I will withdraw, without any reservation whatever, words I used when I referred to the hon. member a second time, and I will go so far as to withdraw the statement that the hon. member is deliberately misleading the House.

At that time, when I had my first opportunity to respond, I said:

Well, Mr. Speaker, as a gentleman I accept what the hon. member says, but frankly I still reserve my position on the word he used. I want to see what Hansard says. I am not saying it was deliberately misleading but he did not withdraw the word he used.

Having read Hansard this morning, on the first part of his argument I accept his withdrawal and his apology as a gentleman. I have discussed the matter with other members in my caucus. We felt the withdrawal yesterday was unequivocal so we accept it.

As to the second part, I do not see how it is a question of privilege at all. First of all, I was not quoting out of context, I was quoting out of the Toronto Star. Maybe it is the same thing.

An hon. Member: It is a Liberal paper.

Mr. Epp: What I was trying to point out yesterday, was simply this: that a number of members on the government side had said this party was divided, so I thought it was about time some of us showed that on the other side of the House there was division within their own ranks on legislation which has been tabled by their own government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Epp: It is quite evident that there is deep division on the bill in question. It was that division I was showing to the House, and it was their sensitivities that I was getting to.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): It was underscored today.

Mr. Epp: It was underscored today on a national television program by the hon. member for Bonavista-Trinity-Conception (Mr. Rooney), who indicated that not only was he opposed to the bill but that the bill should be torn up and thrown into the waste basket.

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Mr. Epp: I do not see how that is a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. I had no intention of misleading the House as to what the Star said, and if the hon. member and the other members I mentioned as being opposed to the bill are, in fact, not opposed to the bill, I would think they could rise in the House and say they will be supporting it.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Madawaska-Victoria (Mr. Corbin) has raised by way of a question of privilege what seems, on the face of it at least, to be essentially a disagreement between himself and the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp).

I received notice from the hon. member for Madawaska-Victoria prior to the sitting today. I have not had an opportunity to examine the specific language used. In any case, the question of privilege raised by the hon. member for Madawaska-Victoria does not have attached to it a motion which would require action by the Chair. It would seem to relate, if some imputations had been made, to a question of order which might have been taken up at the time. Certainly, the matter was raised at the time and the Chair directed its attention to it. If any disorder took place at that time, that is behind us, and it seems to me no remedial action can be taken now.

If a question of privilege did arise following inaccurate references on the part of the hon. member for Provencher, it is difficult for me to see how it would come within the ambit of our rules. In any case no motion is attached to the question and it seems to me the matter has been contributed to equally on both sides. No motion has been put to the Chair in the usual form, and therefore I really do not see I can enter now into a prolongation of the discussion by asking all hon. members who have been in some way involved to make their contributions to it. That would have to be done, in my opinion, in some other way.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, I find myself a little embarrassed to question you, Sir, after we have been getting on so very well since 1968, but having asked a supplementary question of the Minister of Manpower and Immigration, a question which, incidentally, is one of national importance and extreme urgency, because of the minister's attitude to statistics compiled by Statistics Canada relating to job vacancies, wherein he indicated that the same were misleading, useless, and should be regarded with a jaundiced eye, the minister responded to several questions of mine indicating that his department does have certain statistics in that regard. All I was attempting to do was to give the minister an opportunity to table such information within the next two or three days. As a matter of fact, I said: would the minister undertake to table in the House the number of vacancies registered with the Canada Manpower centres at a given point of time, and would he undertake to table in the House, unless, of course, these data are secret, the number of vacancies registered with the centres at the end of each of the last 24 months?

I have been here long enough to know that questions asking for detailed figures are normally placed on the order paper, but knowing how long it takes to get an answer to a question on the order paper I thought it only proper to attempt to get this information for the edification of all hon. members since the minister has indicated he has no confidence in Statistics Canada in terms of the information to which he has referred. I accept Your Honour's ruling, as I always do, being the gentleman I am.

The minister knows that I want information, and he knows I never ask questions just to ask them. He was prepared to answer the question which requires either a yes or no answer. In your wisdom, Mr. Speaker, you did not allow the minister the opportunity to give the yes or no answer, and I know the minister would like to give at least some indication as to his position in answer to the question I put to him.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am so happy that both the hon. member for Hamilton West and I agree that the question which I did not permit to be answered was not a proper question for the question period. Now that we are outside the question period, the minister may want to indicate that he is prepared to table the figures. So long as it is outside the question period, I will not stop him if he wants to do it.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, a few little things slipped into the premise of the hon. member's point of order, namely, that I had cast less than approval on some of the statistics that have come forward. I have indicated that the statistics were all right but I felt they were being used mischievously. I have indicated the answer to the hon. member. On the number of job vacancies, we have about 20 per cent or 30 per cent of the market. About three million or five million jobs change hands, and at the end of the month there are about 100,000 vacancies. I do not think that any more information than that is required.

An hon. Member: Oh yes it is.

Mr. Alexander: You are evading my point.

ORIGINATING MAIL PROCESSED BY CANADIAN POSTAL PLANTS

Question No. 1,652—Mr. Dinsdale:

How many pieces of originating mail of all categories were processed by Canadian postal plants during the month of December (a) 1974 (b) 1975 (c) 1976?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Postmaster General): December 1974, 567.293 million pieces. December 1975, 630.887 million pieces. December 1976,* 557.2 million pieces (estimated figure).

---

* Actual count not available before April 1, 1977.

CAPITAL GAINS TAX

Question No. 2,041—Mr. Howie:

1. Is capital gains tax applicable to sale by a farmer of capital assets if sale proceeds are re-invested in similar assets for improvement and nationalization of farm business?

2. Can such capital gains taxes be deferred?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Revenue): 1. Yes, if a capital gain is realized on the sale.

2. Yes. A reserve may be taken in respect of proceeds not received. Also, tax on such capital gains may be deferred by purchasing an income-averaging annuity contract.

ASSETS SUBJECT TO CAPITAL GAINS TAX

Question No. 2,042—Mr. Howie:

Is the base value of an asset subject to capital gains tax indexed to increase with the cost of living in order to prevent taxation of illusory capital gains?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Revenue): No.

[English]

Mr. Goodale: I ask, Mr. Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

IMMIGRATION ACT, 1976

AMENDMENTS TO IMPLEMENT CHANGES IN IMMIGRATION POLICY

The House resumed, from Monday, March 21, consideration of the motion of Mr. Cullen that Bill C-24, respecting immigration to Canada, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Pursuant to the order made Thursday, March 17, the House will now proceed to the taking of the deferred division on the motion standing in the name of the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) for second reading and reference to the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration Bill C-24, an act respecting immigration to Canada.

Hon. members will note that under the terms of the order the bells shall ring for 15 minutes.

Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion (Mr. Cullen) which was agreed to on the following division:

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL FISCAL ARRANGEMENTS AND ESTABLISHED PROGRAMS FINANCING ACT, 1977

MEASURE FOR MAKING CERTAIN FISCAL PAYMENTS AND OF ESTABLISHED PROGRAMS FINANCING CONTRIBUTIONS TO PROVINCES, ETC.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance) moved that Bill C-37, to provide for the making of certain fiscal payments and of established programs financing contributions to provinces, to provide for payments in respect of certain provincial taxes and fees, and to make consequential and related amendments, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, be concurred in.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Motion agreed to.

● (1550)

Mr. Speaker: When shall the bill be read the third time?

Some hon. Members: By leave, now.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale) moved that the bill be read the third time and do pass.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I should like at third reading to deal with a number of major themes which were raised in the debate on second reading, and which also ran through a number of questions raised during committee stage. First may I express my appreciation to the Chairman, the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Cafik), and members of the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs for the care and attention they devoted to the study of the bill and their promptness in reporting, which has made it easier to bring this bill forward in the tight time frame we face.

I suppose if one reads the reports of debates on the bill, and committee proceedings, one cannot help but be impressed by the quality of ambivalence in many of the statements made not only by the opposition but made by myself, as well, and others in the course of discussions. There is a quality of ambivalence because, on the one hand, there has been an effort on the part of those dealing with the bill to take a further step which would reinforce provincial autonomy, reinforce the autonomy of the provincial governments or, to use a current buzzword, further the cause of decentralization. But there has been, at the same time, support for the continuing role of the federal government in providing financial support for provincial governments in essential services, particularly for provincial governments with a smaller than average tax base. I do not think anyone needs to apologize for this ambivalence. They are both desirable and legitimate goals, and many of our federal-provincial relations in this area, those to do with this bill and those established over the years, have been attempts to arrive at some kind of balance between those two forces.

The bill, in my opinion, does that, I think quite successfully. That is not to say that it could not be improved upon in terms of balance or of division of responsibilities as between the two levels of government; but it does represent the result of a concerned and careful effort on all sides to arrive at an appropriate sharing of revenue and an appropriate sharing of responsibility, in order to make certain that these essential public services continue to be provided.

I have been interested in noting some foreign comments on the system of federal-provincial fiscal relations which we now have and have had for many years in Canada. In its study of related problems the United States Congress gave some attention to the kinds of problems we are addressing ourselves to today, and commissioned a private study of the Canadian system for the purposes of the Congressional consideration. That particular study commented very favourably on the kinds of arrangements which have been worked out between the two levels of government in Canada; it commented favourably on our kind of cost-sharing and on the assumption of responsibility in particular by the senior level of government for some of the very heavy costs which, in a modern society, must be borne by the more junior levels of government. I think Canadians can look at that analysis with interest, because it is a foreign observation that the methods we have evolved in this country have been successful for us and have potential application elsewhere.

I should like to deal with a number of the themes raised by various members in the course of the debate and committee discussions. First I deal with the rather difficult question raised initially, I think, by the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert), and echoed by others, namely, to put it in the bluntest terms, that the House was presented with a fait accompli, that the parliamentary process really could not operate because we had an agreement here already entered into by the federal and provincial governments.

I think it is fair to remind the House that during the long negotiations involved in these particular proceedings the House was kept aware not only of the principles upon which the federal government was approaching this renegotiation of federal-provincial arrangements, but of the many details involved in the choices being put to the provincial governments. The so-called "Lilac Book", the book entitled "The Financial Assessment of Established Programs Financing Proposal", was tabled in the House on December 7, and in response to questions in the House, and extensive discussions outside, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), I, and my colleagues have had an opportunity to elaborate on the principles being followed.

It was hardly a negotiation which was rushed through; nor was it one in which the participants were silent. The provincial premiers and ministers spoke at length about their positions, both at the time of the conferences and at in-between meetings, and, as I said, so did I and my colleagues, both inside and outside the House. The final question of course is, should these negotiations have been conducted, as the agreement of the two levels of government was conducted, in camera, or should this process have been carried on in public? I think I would have to fall back on the experience and common sense of the public sector and private sector in this regard. In these kinds of financial negotiations, if you carry them on in public you run the risk of turning them into mere posturing. To get results there has to be, finally, a meeting of minds of ministers meeting among themselves and dealing with the final issues laid on the table before them. Was parliament presented with a fait accompli?

Mr. Broadbent: Yes.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): To that question the answer is both yes and no.

Mr. Broadbent: A perfectly typical Liberal answer.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): It is a perfect answer because it takes in all the facts of the situation. I would say that it was not any more a fait accompli than any other piece of legislation, or any other proposal, be it either a treaty with international parties or any other kind of federal-provincial contract which is presented as a fait accompli. After all, to borrow a phrase from Jennings, under our system the government proposes, and parliament disposes. This assumes that the government will come forward with a highly definitive proposal and a particular policy; and nobody can accuse this proposal of not being highly definitive. That is exactly what has been done in this case.

We have put the matter before parliament. Having said that, I say that the ability of parliament to make changes was not limited. It would have been unwise to have upset the balance of so carefully balanced a package as this, particularly since the participant governments had been in favour of the package. However, I must say that if that right had been insisted upon and if parliament had acted, indeed the basic agreement could have been changed.

As to the comment made about the difficulty of the bill, I acknowledged that on second reading. I must say that, ultimately, it was the difficulty of the subject matter itself which created the difficulty of the legislative draft. With regard to equalization, for example, we were dealing with a very complex framework of provincial taxation and other revenue systems, and in order to create a system which would deal with the complex variety of tax laws in Canada we needed a carefully and precisely drafted text. The bill has to deal with the situation which exists; it would have been very nice if we had been dealing with a simpler subject matter. The fact is that the subject was difficult and, hence, was inevitably complex.

I shall deal with a number of specific points which were raised. It was often insisted throughout this discussion that the federal government had, on the question of the revenue guarantee, acted unilaterally. In literal truth, that is quite correct. The undertaking by the federal government in the first place to make the revenue guarantee payments was a unilateral undertaking by the Government of Canada. Indeed the subsequent undertakings of this government to extend the original promises with respect to the tax reform in 1971-72 and to extend those promises to the changes which occurred in the budgets of 1972, 1973, 1974, 1975 and 1976, were all unilateral extensions by the federal government of the protection which was offered originally in connection with the tax change. Unilateral, yes. It is fair to say that the further extension of the financial benefits to the provinces far outweighed any loss that the provinces may have suffered in relation to that original undertaking in tax reform because of shifting from the so-called macro-economic to the side-by-side formula.

● (1600)

One of the points that was raised from time to time was that the measures would discriminate against the less well-to-do provinces within Confederation. That is still alleged.

Mr. Orlikow: Hear, hear!

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): It is interesting to give some attention to the bill to show that that is not proposed. I take it the hon. member who says "hear, hear" would prefer to stick with the existing provision.

Mr. Orlikow: That is what the provinces want.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): No, the provinces agreed that the equalization formula should be changed, that formula B, which was the one adopted by them, was their preferred formula. Indeed they agreed with the figures in the Lilac Book which point out that over a period of time the disparities between provinces would disappear.

Let us look at this from the standpoint of the per capita entitlements under the established programs financing, comparing the current arrangements with regard to medical care, hospital care, and post-secondary education with what the provinces will be entitled to as a result of putting in EPF.

In the current year, 1977-78, if we had remained on the current arrangement, the difference between Prince Edward Island and Ontario, for example, to pick the smallest and largest of the provinces in population terms, the difference between the two provinces on a per capita basis would have been $40.95 in favour of Ontario. As a result of EPF, in the first year of this program, the current year, that disparity will be reduced to $30.75.

Carrying it through to the year 1981-82, if we had stayed on the current arrangements for these particular programs as the hon. member has suggested, the disparity between the two provinces would have risen to $57.23, rather than the circumstances that will occur as a result of EPF, namely, that the disparity will be reduced to $5.89, very substantially reduced from that which exists in the current year.

It has been said, and it may have been the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent) who said it, that the financial conditions in this bill were not agreeable to the provinces. That was not the case in December. As I said, the provinces agreed with formula B for equalization. They accepted the concept of established programs financing in principle, and there were substantial areas of agreement with respect to the details of the EPF proposal.

Mr. Broadbent: There were also substantial areas of disagreement.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): The hon. member says they were not agreeable. There was agreement with the 50/50 cash and tax transfer arrangement—

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The minister just said that what I cited in an earlier speech in this debate was inaccurate. He said it was not the fact. On this point of order I would like to quote to the minister from the official transcript of the first ministers' meeting, the proposal—

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Surely this is a question of debate. If the hon. member wants to participate in the debate, he can do so, but not under the guise of a point of order.

[Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale).]

Mr. Broadbent: On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, I was going to—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order. The hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent) has not indicated his point of order. Will he please do so?

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, the minister has said that something I had said earlier was not the fact, that it was not true. If the minister is going to make that allegation, he has to document it, and I in turn should have the opportunity to document the claim I made to which the minister is referring.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Which you can do when speaking in the debate.

Mr. Broadbent: That is an entirely different question. When the minister accuses someone on this side of the House, or anyone else, of misrepresenting the truth—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I suggest to the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby that this is a point of debate. The hon. member can participate after the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald).

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member insists on answering on a point of order before I finish my presentation. If he disagrees, that is a matter of debate. Surely it is not a point of order.

I was indicating that there was substantial provincial agreement with the 50/50 cash and tax transfer arrangement with EPF, agreement with the transfer of 12.5 personal income tax points and one corporate income tax point, and agreement with the GNP escalator. The provinces accepted the federal proposals for revenue stabilization, tax collections, and reciprocal taxation. At least six of the provinces have done so on the latter.

There is very substantial agreement on the part of the provincial governments, and was at the December meeting, to many parts of the package. There can be no doubt about the fact that there was a disagreement as to how much the federal government should pay as a final balancing payment for the purpose of arriving at this particular compromise.

We started off with the position from the revenue guarantee, which terminated as of the end of 1976, that there was no further obligation to pay. We met the provinces half way on that, split the difference, and settled the compromise. Even that was finally agreed to by the provinces. Sure they would have liked more. Sure, from the standpoint of our having to go to the federal taxpayer we would have liked to pay less. I think it was Premier Davis who said at the end of the meeting that it was as the result of a compromise between parties. The allegation was made that the final authority rested with the federal government and therefore they had to accept the fact. In a certain sense that is true, but it is also false.

For example, the arrangement with respect to the hospital program could not have been carried out by the federal government without the agreement of the provinces. This was their blocking point with respect to the established programs financing. As I said, they agreed with the principles and they are prepared to come up in this regard.

It is true that finally the money has to be appropriated by this parliament, and the responsibility rests here. If it had been as was suggested at various points, that this was on a take it or leave it basis, it would not have taken 18 months to have arrived at the kind of agreement in specific terms which all of the provinces accepted.

The hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby has set a lot of store in the fact that the provinces with the larger tax base will get, to use his term, a financial bonanza out of this particular measure. It is true that the provinces with a larger tax base will get a substantially greater return than will the provinces with a smaller tax base. The critical element that has to be emphasized is that the bill also provides for the equalization of tax bases up to a national average so that all of the provinces are brought up to a national average.

Mr. Broadbent: Not the top one.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): The hon. member says he is in favour of the top one and in effect that there should be transfer payments to British Columbia and Alberta by the federal government, in terms of their revenue. Does that make sense? It did not make sense for the provinces around that table. It hardly makes sense to a province like Alberta, with its heritage fund and substantial oil revenues at this time to have a transfer payment to bring it up to the top province, Ontario.

The essence of the equalization payment, the essence of the established programs financing, is that there are disparities between the provinces of Canada. The federal government moves are to make certain all provinces are brought up to a national average in this regard. We do not take the position, which apparently is the position of the leader of the NDP, that the other provinces should be brought down in some way from a peak of revenue advantage. There will be varying advantages within Confederation.

The province of Saskatchewan, with a substantial mineral potential will, if it is managed in the right way, in due course be the beneficiary of substantial royalties from that revenue potential, perhaps even comparable to those of Alberta. Would the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby suggest to the people of Saskatchewan, and to the Saskatchewan government, that in due course they should not enjoy the full benefit of that mineral endowment, that in some way they should be equalized down rather than bringing the less wealthy provinces up to a national average, which has been the approach of this government and, I suggest, of the provincial governments as well, to these fiscal arrangements?

The fact of the matter is that in absolute dollar terms all provinces are projected to benefit from EPF, compared to current arrangements extended. For instance, in 1981-82 the dollar gain for the province of Newfoundland, for example, will be $50.3 million; for New Brunswick $72 million; Quebec $363 million; a substantial gain for Ontario, of course, $567.2 million; and for Saskatchewan $96.8 million. All provinces stand to gain. The estimated aggregate gain for all provinces in the year 1981-82 is $1,718 million, so there is indeed a substantial gain from EPF on the part of all provinces, and that is why they accepted the formula.

Some important and serious questions have been raised by a number of members who are here this afternoon, Mr. Speaker—the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald) and the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Fairweather) being two—in regard to the problems of program conditions. I should like to make essentially two points. First of all, with regard to the health program conditions the bill does assure that there will be a continuing, more generalized surveillance by the Government of Canada in meeting health program conditions. It is quite true that we will no longer be engaged in the detailed auditing which was necessary when there was a 50 per cent cost-sharing formula. Nevertheless, there will continue to be monitoring by the Government of Canada of the basic program conditions, which in the health area are comprehensiveness, universality, portability, accessibility, and public administration. The provinces will be required to furnish information which will permit the federal government to determine whether or not the basic program conditions are being met.

Apart from stipulations in this particular law and the conditions for transfer payments, my view has always been that the provinces will continue to provide this level of services, not so much because of the legal obligations but because of the political reality that their populations have come to expect that quality or level of service, and that the conditions will continue to be adhered to. But if my practical approach to it does not turn out to be justified in fact, there is still the legal restraint upon the provinces as to the extent to which the cash transfer payment can be dealt with. I have to acknowledge, of course, that that part of the compensation which is represented by tax-points goes into the provincial revenue and is administered by the individual province as it chooses.

On the question of post-secondary education a number of serious and difficult questions have been raised in this debate which brought out, perhaps to a greater degree than in others, that kind of ambivalence which I referred to at the start—the importance of recognizing provincial autonomy in certain areas, but at the same time the wish that the federal government maintain a broader national role.

Particular concerns have been expressed regarding the continued assurance of free interprovincial mobility of students, and the danger of restriction on that mobility whether by higher out-of-province tuition fees or in some way by the use of quotas.

One of the elements of importance in our Canadian educational system has been the ability of students to pick their university of choice. In particular the native province of the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands and the province of the hon. member for Fundy-Royal have, over the years, provided educational opportunities for many students from Ontario, and obviously if this were upset advantage would be lost of what has been a beneficial arrangement for all parts of the country.

This government agrees entirely with that particular proposition, a proposition that will continue to be put before the education ministers' meeting by the Secretary of State (Mr. Roberts). Obviously, for constitutional reasons, we are not in a position to impose conditions on the provinces in the field of post-secondary education, but that viewpoint will continue to be expressed. At the moment the universities do not impose higher out-of-province tuition fees, and apparently they do not have any serious inclination to do so. Nevertheless, it is one of the matters of mutual concern which the Secretary of State will have to represent in his discussions with ministers of education.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, may I go back to my initial theme that this is an area of very considerable difficulty of negotiation, but of very fundamental importance in our confederation. I think in general terms one can disagree on the saw-off which I referred to earlier—the disposition of the provincial claims for some continuation of the revenue guarantee. Indeed one can argue one side or the other—whether it was too generous or not generous enough. However, I do not think one should let oneself be swayed by that particular debate and overlook the fact that in this regard there has been a substantial national compromise on the financing of important programs as well as the basic public services provided through this bill.

Despite all the criticisms that one hears about the Canadian federal system, this is a good example of the way in which our constitutional arrangements have evolved. This kind of negotiation and this kind of federal-provincial arrangement have, in many ways, brought about a far more effective evolution than perhaps could have been obtained by a more formal amending arrangement within the constitution. For these reasons, Mr. Speaker, I think the bill represents a substantial framework for the continued development of basic services by the provinces, a substantial contribution to Confederation, and on that basis I hope I will have the support of hon. members for it at third reading.

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): The minister can count on the support of this party at third reading, Mr. Speaker, but I do want to take a minute or two to raise again some of the issues that seem to us to be of concern as we look ahead. If I had the time and the inclination to go into a dissertation on language—in this case the English language—I might be tempted to discuss the phenomenon of good words, bad words and buzzwords, and so on. One of the current buzzwords, it seems to me, is decentralization. It is a pity that many people who use words like decentralization do not spell out the elements of the word.

I prefer to think of Confederation in this way, that it is something of a constructive tension but that we should not be disturbed about that tension. I do not mean the graver aspects of tension and those who wish to separate; I mean that there will always be reconciliation going on in Confederation. As a matter of fact one of the essential components of Confederation is surely reconciliation. It is the absence of this concept in recent times which has caused many of us to be dismayed by the direction that this country may take.

[Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale).]

The minister said—and I want to allude to this later in my speech—that the House had been made aware of the "lilac paper." I rather like lilac in New Brunswick in June, but I had not thought of lilac as being a particularly dramatic description of the government's forecast of fiscal arrangements. In any event the paper was lilac. The minister used the term. Unhappily, however, lilac or no lilac, there were gaps in the information supplied by the government. It was not until the committee got under way, after second reading, that the tables were presented. We, at that stage, thanked the officials who made the presentation, but that was rather late in the discussion of this issue.

• (1620)

I have one or two other specific points to mention. With the greatest of respect to the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent), who seems to be huffing and puffing a little bit today—I do not usually comment on huffing and puffing because I might get into trouble myself—

An hon. Member: Go ahead!

Mr. Fairweather: —we had three or four very interesting committee meeting discussions on this bill with three ministers of the Crown, and I have to point out that in only one instance was the party he leads represented during what was a rather crucial discussion stage of this bill. I suppose this is being a little self-righteous on my part, and the hon. member may wish to comment. Anyway, we missed his party, those of us who were serving on the committee.

There is one other point I would like to make which carries on the debate with the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald). He mentioned the hospital problem. As a matter of fact the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) did not accept my use of the word ultimatum. That is the word I will use even if ultimatum is too strong for the Minister of Finance. It is a fact that the Government of Canada presented the provinces with the deadline of February 15. By that time the provinces either would have to accept or reject the block funding, or else there would be no funding. If that is not accurate, I wish the minister would tell me that I am inaccurate. I will continue to use the word ultimatum. That was the decision of the government, and in a minute or two I am going to comment about how this affects one of the poor provinces.

One other point I would like to make about the Minister of Finance's speech is to draw attention to what all of us—huffers and puffers, or just ordinary debaters—will agree is the omission of any built-in mechanism in the established program financing after a trial period. I think the government is going to regret this. I do not know what my future will be in this House, but I would like to be here when a new bill provides some sort of review mechanism. It is a grave omission that this bill does not have such a thing.

At an earlier stage we agreed that, if we were debating this issue and using the plainest of plain language, this bill's rather formidable title could have been renamed "a dividing up of pie" statute. Whether we talk of constructive federalism or constructive tension, it is really the nation dividing up the pie. The pie is for the nation to divide because of its resources and basically because of what people have to do around April 30 each year when they send the nation small particles of the pie, or elements of the pie, so that the division can take place.

There are some constraints, and the minister alluded to them when he wound up second reading. He alluded to this issue again today when he mentioned that the bill is founded upon an agreement that has been made between the two levels of government. As he says, he is not sure how the dilemma that we face as parliamentarians can be resolved, although he was a bit forthcoming a minute ago when he said that if we had some amendments they could have been made, and perhaps accepted. I think the minister was being overly generous to us. What we were doing was ratifying an agreement made by the various provinces and the Government of Canada. The minister was a bit less candid about this in his closing speech on second reading. Today he was talking about "yes" and "no". The other day he said that he was not sure this could be resolved. That is evidence of the minister's candour. I am going to try to be equally candid. The implications of these confessions on the part of the minister have to be addressed by parliament.

I admit that the third reading stage of this bill is not the time to discuss the future of Confederation. Perhaps it is time we did it in another debate. The third reading stage is not a time to discuss the relevance of parliament. A good deal was said about that yesterday. In a rather interesting exchange the other day some of the frustrations felt by hon. members were put on the record.

Members of parliament cannot be counterweights to the executive or to the bureaucrats if their ideas are short circuited by a fait accompli or by an agreement. I said "counterweights". I did not say adversaries. I get tired of people who want to take on the Public Service in an adversary position. That is not it, at all. I happen to believe there are people within the Public Service who might benefit from the advice, comment, and the addition of facts that come from members because they are representatives. In other words, although we tend to be generalists, in many cases that is forced upon us.

I am not saying that civil servants have not got antennae, but members of parliament through their antennae find out facts. We have to get around the country and get about our constituencies, and bring information to the Public Service. This is a rather extraordinary concept, but by utilizing parliament, bills might be improved once in a while. The frustrations of members of parliament are understandable. The impotence of MPs in policy and control is profoundly depressing and has been spoken of more and more often in recent years. I want to draw an analogy to this frustration by reminding hon. members of another bill which is equally frustrating to the system.

Parliament is being asked to ratify the agreement made between two levels of government, Quebec and Canada, having to do with the peoples of the James Bay watershed. I happen to believe profoundly that it is quite unfair of governments to ask MPs of the government party, and of any other party, to rubberstamp and ratify an agreement that has been drawn in very legal terms and make it a statute of parliament. I am not trying to be partisan at all. I happen to think that the James Bay agreement is profoundly wrong in its concept of carrying out its responsibilities.

Mr. Buchanan: Oh, oh!

Mr. Fairweather: It is all right. I will be through in a moment. The Minister of Public Works (Mr. Buchanan) is frustrated, and well he might be about the James Bay agreement.

Mr. Buchanan: I am not frustrated. You are frustrated.

Mr. Fairweather: Indeed I am frustrated by being asked to ratify an agreement that has been drawn up by two levels of government before there is any input by the members of the parliament of this country. That is not a very radical reason for my frustration. There is an obligation, if we believe in this institution in the 1970's and 1980's. Members of parliament have to take their responsibilities. If that agreement is unfair and unjust, as I believe it is, then it should be our responsibility to amend it. If this agreement, made by the provincial governments and Canada, works an injustice—

Mr. Buchanan: What about the native people? Don't mislead the House.

Mr. Fairweather: I mentioned the native people. The minister was reading Penthouse the last time I saw him.

● (1630)

Mr. Buchanan: No!

Mr. Fairweather: Well, I was surprised, but some of my constituents were in the gallery and wondered about the reading matter of ministers of the Crown. If the minister is sensitive about this, it is bill No. 9.

Mr. Buchanan: On a point of order, I am not certain what in the Sam Hill the hon. member is chattering about, Mr. Speaker, but I was not reading Penthouse, and if he suggests that I am he is incorrect.

Mr. Fairweather: I think the frustration is on the minister's part—

Mr. Buchanan: Come on, Gordon. Don't be foolish!

Mr. Fairweather: The minister had better consider what he is saying. I do not wish to pursue this matter any further. The minister had better consider what he is saying, and I want to go on with my speech.

Mr. Buchanan: Absolute nonsense!

Mr. Fairweather: I propose to go on with my speech and let the minister think through the implications of what he is asking me to do.

What I was saying is that it is most unfair and unjust to expect the Parliament of Canada to ratify a bill which affects native peoples or anybody else, without having the opportunity to make any input into the measure. That is what I was saying.

I recognize it is an extremely difficult situation. What I was trying to discuss, if the minister were not so impatient, is the difficulty parliament experiences when it is faced with a bill the parameters of which are already drawn. That is all.

Without being overly immodest, I believe some people in this House do possess a degree of insight into at least two or three of the concerns dealt with in this bill. I said earlier that these insights come to us because of the manner in which we carry out our responsibilities as members. I happen to have made it my business to understand the issues surrounding post-secondary education, and I will come to that aspect later, but first I should like to talk about health care because the people and the government of New Brunswick are anxious about health care.

It is a fact that by November, 1976, the proposal for the funding of extended health care service had become, from Canada's point of view, an appendage to the established program financing proposal rather than a separate cost-sharing issue in the health field. This, as the minister of health said, amounted to a fundamental change of direction which took place between April, 1976, and November, 1976, I think it was. I am not criticizing this. I am saying that in the long discussions which went on it was not until November that the change took place. The November date was the climax of meetings between ministers of health, meetings with officials, and then the meeting of first ministers beginning in April, 1976. All this culminated in a revised plan for health care offered by Canada on the basis that a decision had to be made by February 15, 1977, or, as the minister's statement went, block funding would lapse. Those were the terms of the deadline.

I do not wish to appear to be confining this appeal solely to the concern of one province, but the anxiety of New Brunswick is symptomatic of something larger than the preoccupation of one particular province. In fact it goes to the core of the federal government's perception of its role in the partnership. New Brunswick shares the objective of controlling the rate of cost increase for existing programs and of developing lower cost alternative programs which are more humane in their application to the people who need them.

My province believes that the application of block funding to extended health care programs is not appropriate at this time because of the nature of the services covered by the block funding concept. The concept itself is good and logical when applied to mature services, but it is inconsistent with the encouragement of basic health services which are similar throughout Canada because New Brunswick has not reached a sufficiently advanced stage in health service development. This is a perfect illustration of the dilemma in which one finds oneself when trying to develop programs which are strictly the same from one part of the country to another, that is, the same in terms of money.

Hospital insurance and medical care are reasonably consistent across Canada. I believe the government is to be congratulated upon this, as are the provincial governments. There is consistency across the country. So block funding in itself is not the problem. The rub comes in the field of extended health care. There is a very great variety in the quality and kinds of services available in hospitals across the country. I have to say that in New Brunswick the system is, at this stage, immature. Growth is under way, but time is needed until the services are fully developed.

The province of New Brunswick had asked for a very modest concession during a transitional period so that hardship might be avoided. The minister turned down that request. When I last spoke to him about it in committee he said to me that he had not even responded to a letter from the province, stating reasons for declining the suggestion. The request by the province was a modest one seeking a transitional amount of $6 million in descending sums over the next three years. This is what was proposed to the minister of health. The province would accept the block funding concept but would prefer a phase-out period of three years.

The minister told us in committee that this was impossible. He spoke of federal funds as being gravy—that was the word he used—and said the provinces should not expect "more gravy". I should like the minister to name any one of the four Atlantic provinces which is on some sort of "gravy train" as far as health care programs or any other of these services are concerned. I suggest such an attitude makes "co-operative federalism" sound hollow and that the newest cliché which is being trotted out, flexible federalism, will prove no better if, when there is an opportunity to bring some flexibility to the concept, the government turns it down the first time it is tested.

I have two compliments to pay. One is to my colleague, the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald) who really did a superior job in analysing this bill and studying it through the committee stage. She warned us of some of the dangers, one or two of which I have noted. One is the lack of any review mechanism, and also the danger inherent if we are not perfectly sure that there will be some sort of equality across the country in the service area.

It is interesting and very positive that one of the other women in public life is Judith Maxwell. I suppose "public life" is not the phrase to use about Judith Maxwell, but surely outside parliament Judith Maxwell must be one of the most interesting women commenting on Canada today. In "Policy Review and Outlook, 1977" she discusses an agenda for change. In a small paragraph on page 8 of that booklet she suggests:

> The structural questions outlined here are an agenda for personal reflection as much as they are for government action, for the individual will be facing two challenges in the next few years. First, it is important for individual Canadians to understand that there are powerful forces at work which will inevitably alter the status quo.

Of course the status quo is being altered, I think for the best in general terms, by the bill which we are now debating at third reading stage. But I do worry about the health care provisions, I do worry about the lack of mechanisms, and I worry particularly about the whole aspect of post-secondary education. The minister did refer to this concern in his speech a minute or two ago.

Claude Bissell, the former president of the University of Toronto, wrote a lively book called "Half-way up Parnassus". When this bill was being debated I could not help but think that this minister—or perhaps this is being unfair to him and I should confine this to the Secretary of State (Mr. Roberts) under whose aegis post-secondary education comes—could write a book called "Descending Parnassus" because there is no doubt that under the provisions of this bill the Government of Canada, not in dollar terms but in terms of its concern for its undoubted obligation, role, and responsibility in post-secondary education, is changing direction, is, as I say, descending Parnassus.

The bill has a political element in the funding arrangements. The government, as a matter of fact, in another area has said that it has reduced over-all spending by 2.4 per cent, thereby gaining, I presume, some political brownie points. But in an article in the April edition of University Affairs which, by happy coincidence came just yesterday, in a feature article by Lynda Woodcock, concern was expressed about increasing provincial control. It reads:

> Increasing provincial control over all aspects of post-secondary education was a major topic of discussion at a recent conference on higher education held at the university of Manitoba.
> The conference was sponsored by Manitoba's education faculty as a contribution to the university's celebration of its centennial.
> Two other important topics considered at length were university-government relations and university governance—

Then there follows a discussion by Dr. Claude Thibault, who is the executive director of the Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada. The article reads:

> Dr. Thibault noted that the federal government's attempt to have some influence on post-secondary policies had failed.
> Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau had recommended that a permanent policy forum for the federal and provincial governments be set up for discussion on post-secondary matters. This idea was rejected by the provinces.

Surely that is not good enough. If the idea was rejected by the provinces, the leadership of this government was at stake. I have no doubt in the world that there is a constitutional imperative for the federal government in post-secondary education to continue to play its national role, and it concerns me deeply that by changing some of the financial formulas we could be in danger of increasing provincial control. I think that is a matter that should concern all of us in the Parliament of Canada who are federalists.

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, before I get to the substance of my comments in third reading debate I would like to raise and dispose of some misinformation provided by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) in the House, and deal with the opening comments of the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Fairweather).

In his comments this afternoon the minister said that I had misinformed the House when I said that the provinces were not happy with this agreement, that they did not accept it. I would like to refer the minister to the transcript. It was a closed session but I obtained copies of the transcript of the first ministers' meeting of December 14, 1976, when premier Lougheed replied to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) on behalf of all the provinces in response to the specific set of proposals that we are debating in the House this afternoon. Here is what premier Lougheed said on behalf of the provinces:

> . . . all the provinces are of the view that the proposal . . . is inadequate, but a number of provinces felt they were left with no alternative but to accept it.

It was inadequate, but they had to accept it. Why did they accept it? They accepted it for the obvious reason that, as the Minister of Finance in his quiet and reasonable way indicated, the ultimate authority rests with the Parliament of Canada. The existing agreements were due to be terminated on March 31 of this year and the provinces had to take what they could get. They had to like it or lump it. When they got this set of inequitable proposals put before them—of course they contained some crumbs, particularly for the poorer provinces, with which they were pleased in the short run—rather than being left with nothing at all after March 31 they accepted the package. But to imply, as the minister did, that this is something they all entered into voluntarily, that there was a happy round of cheers on the part of the premiers, is just absurd. It was forced upon them. It was federal legislation. They had no alternative. So I stand by what I said in the House when we debated second reading on February 18. This was not an agreement reached on a voluntary basis by the provinces.

The second point I would like to make before getting on to the substance of my comments is that the hon. member for Fundy-Royal said that I seemed to be huffing and puffing a bit today, and he could not quite understand it. My own view is that when you have something to huff and puff about, if you are prepared to take a stand on an issue which you think is important and relevant, then it is appropriate to show that with a little emotional concern as well as with arguments to support your position.

Mr. Fairweather: You might have been at the committee. Huff and puff in both places.

Mr. Broadbent: The hon. member says that it would have been better if we could have been in the committee during the committee stage of the debate. He suggested that our member was at one meeting but missed a couple of others. I say in reply to him that the hon. member who will speak after me in this debate today, the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow), was in fact our member on the committee. He had a conflict in terms of another committee that was sitting at the time, and he decided that since all the Conservative members on the committee were supporting the government on this legislation anyway, there was not much useful time that could be spent on the bill. I say in all seriousness to the hon. member for Fundy-Royal that perhaps his party did not huff and puff about the bill because it is voting for it, in spite of what the hon. member has just said.

He has made a case for New Brunswick not being happy with it. He has suggested he is unhappy about the implications of inequality in the financing of medicare. He suggested a deep concern about the financing of post-secondary education, if we accept this bill. Those are precisely the reasons the New Democratic Party gave for voting against the bill. In our view this is one of the most retrograde pieces of legislation brought before this parliament in the last decade. I say that with care, and I mean it.

What we have in this bill is a virtual turning upside down of the spirit of co-operative federalism which was brought into this parliament by a former prime minister, Mr. Lester Pearson, who in the mid-1960's took the view that what was needed in Canada was national involvement in the areas of medicare, hospitalization, and the financing of post-secondary education. At that time the New Democratic Party argued for precisely that course of action, and we argued that the serious inequalities that existed between our provinces had to be removed. We argued that all the provinces east of the Ottawa River had a very real difficulty ensuring that kids growing up in that part of Canada—in half the provinces of Canada—had the same opportunities and expectations as kids growing up elsewhere in this country.

What was embarked upon in the 1960's is now being systematically destroyed by the Prime Minister of Canada, with the total support of the Conservative party. The leader of the Conservative party (Mr. Clark) at second reading supported the principle of this legislation. What is at stake is the abolition of national programs, the justification for which was to equalize conditions across the country.

The Minister of Finance is scoffing again. I noted that neither at second reading nor at third reading today did the minister produce the figure of $1.3 billion which is found in tables possessed by his officials. This $1.3 billion figure is what Ontario is going to gain as compared with the gain of other provinces—

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I produced other figures.

Mr. Broadbent: —as a result of this set of agreements. The Minister of Finance knows as well as the rest of us and, indeed, better than most of us—because that is his area of concentration and responsibility—that a tax point transfer to the province of Prince Edward Island is worth $4 per capita, but a tax point transfer to Ontario is worth $10 per capita.

What is involved here is a very retrograde step. We are saying we are going to turn over 13 and a half tax points to the provinces, plus some modicum of equalization as part of the package which, I repeat, was rejected by the provinces, as if they really had an alternative. We are transferring 13 and a half tax points—

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): That was not rejected.

Mr. Broadbent: The package was rejected.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): That point was not rejected; it was accepted.

Mr. Broadbent: Which one?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): The transfer of tax points was accepted.

Mr. Broadbent: It was accepted because they had no alternative.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): It was accepted before the final agreement.

Mr. Broadbent: The minister says it was accepted before the final agreement, but he knows it was accepted on the condition that other parts of the package be acceptable to them.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North is going to speak later in this debate, and he is going to present to the House the considered reaction of two provincial governments to the implications of this bill. These reactions were presented in the sessions with the federal government before the agreement was reached in mid-December.

The point I am making is that when we are in the process of transferring tax points to the provinces and saying to the provinces that in the long run they will have to finance hospitals, medical services, and university educations for their kids, that is exactly like saying that under Canadian law rich men and poor men all have the same right to buy a Cadillac. That is exactly what is involved, and it is no coincidence that in the real world the keys for the Cadillac always end up in the pockets of the rich.

As I said earlier, in this process there is an abandonment of the program which was established by the former prime minister of this country, Lester Pearson. I made the point in the second reading debate that this bill is harmful to Canada because a person growing up on Cape Breton Island ought to have the same opportunities in basic aspects of existence not only as another person growing up in Halifax, in that same province, but the same opportunity as a cousin who may live in Calgary or someone who may live in downtown Toronto.

If a common sense of nationhood means anything, we must establish basic common conditions all across this land. That was what was involved in the 1960's when we were developing important national programs, but we are now destroying that structure. That is harmful in terms of equality, and particularly at this particular time in our history it is harmful in terms of national unity. The two go together because in order for men, women and children in one part of Canada—whether it is in the Gaspé region of Quebec or in the province of Newfoundland, which is one vast area of unemployment, or in Victoria or in Moose Jaw—to develop a sense of commonality and identification with the national government, they have to sense that there is now in existence either a basic state of equality in Canada, or at least that government programs are moving toward the establishment of a state of equality in certain basic respects.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): We are moving away from that.

Mr. Broadbent: We are now moving in precisely the opposite direction. We are now saying that people who grow up in Alberta, British Columbia, and Ontario are going to have greater opportunities—even greater than they now have—and greater expectations in life for themselves and their families than people growing up in other parts of the country. That is not only wrong from the point of view of equality, but it is also fundamentally wrong at this point in our history on the part of a government which ought to be concerned about the question of national unity.

I predict that—not next year or the year after, perhaps in the third year, but certainly by the fifth year—this program will bring about a worsening of the economic position of Atlantic Canada and of the province of Quebec compared with the rest of Canada. What that means is that there will be more resentment. The east and the west will be in greater conflict. English Canadians will be less prepared than they are now to accept the aspirations of the people of the province of Quebec. In short, with this technical legislation we are sowing the seeds of grievous discontent.

My party believes that the issues at stake are very serious. The right alternative to some provincial dissatisfaction with existing federal-provincial agreements in post-secondary education, in medicare, and in hospitalization is not to move toward the shifting of tax point power to the provinces which, as I said, favours the rich over the poor, nor is to be found in a similar proposal which is discussed these days by the Conservative party of Canada and in some Liberal circles, which is to transfer constitutional power more specifically and clearly back to the provinces and to make sure that the provinces stay narrowly within those rigid confines. Neither of those approaches is favoured by my party.

What the New Democratic Party says is required at this time is the maintenance of effective national programs. This will ensure a basic state of equality in the health and education fields across the country. We need programs for medical care, health, and education, programs that will ensure a state of equity across Canada, but programs that will be flexible in terms of administrative decentralization. There is no reason why we cannot take the rhetoric of decentralization seriously and apply it within the framework of national programs.

We could have a department of national housing, which we should have, to allocate substantial amounts of money for housing to the provinces on an equalized basis. That would not mean we would need a body such as Central Mortgage and Housing to lay down rigorous standards for housing in British Columbia, for instance, where requirements are different from those in Ontario, or different from the architectural and traditional requirements of Quebec. We could have a national program on housing which would say to the provinces, "Here is the money which we raised on a national basis because that removes some of the inequities that exist between the provinces. All you have to do is spend so much of it within a broad income category to make sure it goes to low and medium income Canadians first." There could perhaps be ceilings on the prices of houses, but that is all. The provinces would meet their own architectural traditions and geographic circumstances. Taking the decentralization rhetoric seriously, this would allow the provinces to do a good job on housing.

A similar proposition could be put in the medical care and hospitalization fields. The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde), backed by the Prime Minister, insisted that all provinces in order to get money for hospitalization had to build acute care hospitals that just did not make either medical or economic sense. Instead of abolishing the program, and instead of the federal government getting out entirely, all that was needed was for the government to lay down broad guidelines for the provinces, saying in effect that it is important for money to be spent on hospitalization from British Columbia to New Brunswick but that the provinces should decide whether it should go, say, for nursing homes or acute care hospitals. The federal government does not know the details of provincial requirements, but the provincial governments do, and they should be allowed to decide the appropriate priorities for spending in such fields.

I could select other examples, Mr. Speaker, but those two will suffice. We need national programs in these areas now as never before in our history because of the value of equality in itself but in particular because of the need to generate support from one coast to the other for the national government—the need to show Canadians, wherever they live, that there is a national government that cares what happens to them. We are not getting such an indication from this government. The road we are embarked upon with this legislation indicates just the opposite; we are going to see the rich provinces getting richer and more powerful, and the poor provinces getting poorer and less powerful. That leads to less of a sense of Canadian identity and less sense of commitment to the national government, but to a greater sense of regional identification and more regional antagonism. We believe that is the wrong direction.

This bill ought to be opposed, Mr. Speaker. It ought not to have been introduced. All of us in this House who believe in national unity, who believe in equality of opportunity, ought to vote against it.

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words on this bill, and particularly on the aspect of returning more control over health and welfare programs to the provinces. The Leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent), who just spoke, laid great emphasis on national programs and national unity, but we have never had greater national disunity than since these programs were introduced. I have long maintained that one cause of dissatisfaction among Canadians has been the fact that the federal government has undertaken responsibility for programs of health and welfare, and also of education. The object was to promote national unity, but in fact the opposite has been the case.

Up until 20 or so years ago most communities looked after their own medical care, hospital care, and education up to university level, and they did not do too badly. There is no evidence that in different parts of Canada the incidence of death was higher, the incidence of disease was greater, or that the incidence of morbidity was any greater in one area than in another. There is no evidence of that in the United States either where the social structure is somewhat similar.

In the 1960's the Pearson government decided that the federal government should oversee the health of the citizens of Canada; that provincial governments were not to be trusted to look after their citizens. That was a great mistake, Mr. Speaker. Unfortunately most of the extra money allocated for the purpose vanished into brick and concrete, or costly administration.

I think it is important that the provinces have the right to administer their own health and welfare programs and, even more important, that the municipal governments should share in the administration. I think it behooves us to look at the possibility of such things as property tax deductions for residential areas. This would encourage local governments to assume some responsibility for health costs in the form of hospitals, diagnostic clinics, and so on.

I think it is significant that the greatest trend toward national disunity has occurred since the federal government has assumed control of collecting the vast amounts of money needed to run the three programs. That is now being returned to the provinces to be spent on programs that are rather restrictive and often unsuitable for the particular province involved.

I think the federal government, in essence, bypassed the provinces by assuming the problems of health, welfare and education. It raised the money through the tax system, and so effectively bypassed the provinces and prevented them from meeting their obligations.

The provinces should have the right to decide whether their money is invested in hospitals, medical care, and post-secondary educational institutions, and they should have some leeway in this. Obviously there would be a difference in standards between provinces and we would have to make allowances for that.

In spite of all this, Mr. Speaker, I think this legislation is a step along the way. I think it will increase our national well-being in the long run even though its application may at times create some inequities.

● (1710)

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I shall comment briefly on the remarks of the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Ritchie) and of the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Fairweather).

It seems to me that when the hon. member for Dauphin said we should go back to the good old days when hospital care was a matter for local communities, he forgot that, in those days, many small communities were without doctors and many Canadians could not pay their doctors' bills. Often people could not enter hospital, or, if they did, could not pay the hospital bill and saw liens placed against their houses.

The hon. member forgets that a Conservative government, led by the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), put into effect a hospital insurance plan when it participated with one province in the cost-sharing of hospitalization. That led to all provinces joining the hospitalization plan. The royal commission appointed by that right hon. gentleman produced a report which led to the establishment in all provinces of a health insurance plan jointly funded by the federal and provincial governments.

Why was I not in attendance in the committee when it dealt with this bill? As my leader has already said, the answer partly is that at the same time I was serving on another committee. But the other reason is that I had participated in the debate on the bill. We had made our position clear, indicated that in our opinion the bill would have disastrous effects on national unity and on standards of service provided from one end of the country to the other.

We heard that the Conservative party intends to support the bill. I am not surprised that Conservative members from Ontario or Alberta support this bill. Those provinces stand to gain. They will get more dollars under this bill than under the old arrangement. As well, those two provinces are best able to carry the burden once the federal government withdraws from shared cost programs. The other provinces, New Brunswick, the province of the hon. member for Fundy-Royal, Newfoundland, Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island, and Manitoba will find it much more difficult to bear the heavier costs once the federal government's plan either to withdraw from or reduce its share of shared-cost programs comes into effect.

The hon. member for Fundy-Royal told the House this bill will have adverse effects in New Brunswick. Having said that, he turned around and said he would vote for the bill. I knew the Conservatives would not oppose the bill, and because I knew the bill would come back from committee virtually unchanged, or as it had been sent to committee, I decided to attend another meeting.

What will happen as a result of changes to the Medical Care Act, and the federal government's announcement that as soon as it legally can it will cut back its 50 per cent contribution under hospital insurance? The result will be obvious. As the government reduces spending on health, medical insurance, hospital insurance, and post-secondary education, the have-not provinces will be forced to pay the extra cost. They already have the highest tax rates in the country and, some of them, the highest sales tax rates in the country. They will be forced to increase taxes, to introduce fees as a deterrent, to increase university enrollment and tuition fees, or reduce services.

For many years we thought that one of the benefits of being a Canadian was that, no matter if one lived in Newfoundland or Vancouver Island, one was entitled to the same basic services. That meant Canadians did not have to worry about paying hospital bills, among other things. I am sure hon. members have heard of Canadian citizens unfortunate enough to be sick in the United States and forced to pay hospital bills in the United States. Those bills can run to several thousand dollars for two or three weeks of hospital care. Even Canadians not in lower income brackets would find it difficult to pay such bills. The experience of Canadians forced to see doctors in the United States is similar. The United States, the wealthiest country in the world, is the only industrialized country without a hospital insurance plan and without a medical insurance plan. Is there a member here who thinks we should do without these plans?

An hon. Member: Yes.

Mr. Orlikow: I do not say our plans are perfect. Partly, we oppose this bill because several provinces, Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Prince Edward Island and Quebec, think certain services can be provided more cheaply and efficiently outside intensive care hospitals which are jointly funded by the federal government. Unfortunately those outside services are not funded by the federal government. The bill makes no provision in this regard, and that is partly why we think it is wrong. It will reduce minimum health service standards and the availability of post-secondary education which, so far, we have been able to provide to Canadians in all parts of Canada.

This year, pretty well every university raised its student enrollment fees. Now, since Ottawa is to cut back the proportion of money it makes available for university education, our universities must increase fees once more. As well, most provinces will face severe financial constraints. For those reasons we oppose the bill, as we opposed the change in the Medical Care Act. We shall oppose any changes to the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act. We oppose this kind of whittling away of basic and fundamental rights all Canadians have enjoyed for a quarter of a century. This whittling away can only aid the cause of separatists in all parts of the country, Quebec, Alberta or British Columbia.

If you cut back services, how can you make people believe it is great to be Canadian? Why should people in New Brunswick enjoy a lower level of service than people in Ontario and British Columbia? Because the people of Ontario or British Columbia live in provinces with resources fetching high prices now, surely that does not entitle them to infinitely better services than are available to people in Newfoundland or New Brunswick? That, fundamentally, is why we oppose this bill.

I do not want to repeat what I said at the second reading stage of the bill. However, I want to dispute vigorously the statement made today by the Minister of Finance, as well as the statements made by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) when we were debating this bill on second reading, that the provinces voluntarily accepted this bill, that they welcomed this bill, and that they will be better off as a result of it. The facts are, as our leader put on the record, that the premier of Alberta, speaking on behalf of all the provinces, made it clear to the federal government that all ten provincial governments, regardless of party, were opposed to the provisions of this bill.

The minister said that the provinces have accepted the bill. He implies that we are not telling the truth. Of course they accepted the bill. They knew that if they did not accept it, the funding which they have been getting for these programs under the old legislation would end. It had a time limit. They would not be entitled to any funding when the legislation would end this month. They had a choice between accepting this bill or getting nothing, because there would be no legislation in effect. They would have to depend on the charity and good will of the federal government. And they had sufficient experience with this federal government to realize that they did not want to be put in that position.

Let me point out what will happen to the provinces as a result of the passage of this bill. The province of Ontario will get $50 million in the next fiscal year, British Columbia will get $23 million, and Alberta $90 million. The poorer provinces stand to lose. Prince Edward Island will lose $2 million. Saskatchewan will lose up to $3 million. Manitoba will gain $800,000 the first year, but will lose money in subsequent years. That is only with respect to alternate care for adults who can be placed in institutions other than intensive care hospital beds.

The minister must not be permitted to get away with his statement that the provincial governments not only accepted this bill but will in fact be better off than they would have been had the bill not been passed. I want to put on the record the views of the two provincial governments with which we are in closest contact. I am sure that if the hon. member for Fundy-Royal had asked the government of New Brunswick for its analysis, he would have received approximately the same information as we got from Saskatchewan and Manitoba.

I would like to quote what the minister of finance in Manitoba said at the meeting of ministers of finance held February 1 and 2, 1977. With regard to this whole question of the federal government's per capita offer for extended health care services he said, and I quote:

> Up to now, our assessment of the proposals in their ever-changing form is that they are not an adequate replacement for cost sharing commitments which had previously been made by the federal government. Our own calculations suggest that the per capita amounts offered so far would barely offset existing recoveries for Manitoba. And, they would not come close to matching the support levels that were anticipated under:
> The 1975 offer to extend hospital and medical care sharing to cover alternative services, and the mid-1976 version of the proposed social services act.

Let me stop quoting for a moment to say to the minister that that social services act was not proposed by some government that had no experience and did not know of the implications of the proposals. It was proposed by this federal Liberal government less than a year ago.

According to the Manitoba minister of finance, they have gone back on their proposal of 1976 in a way which will cost the province of Manitoba and all have-not provinces a great deal of money as compared to the 1975 or 1976 offer. Let me continue with what the Manitoba minister of finance said:

We feel the new offer penalizes provinces such as ours which have pioneered developments in more efficient alternatives to more costly acute care services—alternatives, such as our home care program, which have not yet reached a "maturity" stage.

Since a number of provinces seem to share many of our concerns, and since the per capita offer has not been discussed by our colleagues, the ministers responsible for health and social development, I would hope that consideration will be given to putting off the unrealistic February 15 deadline for provincial decisions until after a full-scale conference can be held for both health and welfare ministers.

That full-scale conference was never held. What they received was a telegram from the Minister of National Health and Welfare to all the provinces saying that "we now have 50 per cent of the provinces with more than 50 per cent of the population which are prepared to accept our offer." Therefore, he said, they were going ahead, and the provinces which had not agreed and which would lose money, some of which had better services than the provinces which accepted, would have to lump it.

The Manitoba minister further said:

While I can appreciate that timing is a problem, I think it would be very unwise to proceed precipitously with detailed new legislation at a stage when so many important questions remain unresolved . . .

It would be very difficult for Manitoba, and probably for a number of other provinces, to give up our formal guarantee of hospital insurance cost sharing—as was discussed by the first ministers in December—without a reasonably clear understanding that our major concerns—especially those related to the established programs "package"—will be settled in an equitable way—

They were not settled by discussion. They were not settled in an equitable way, at least as far as the provinces are concerned. Ottawa has also given notice that it will get out of the 50/50 cost-sharing basis for hospital insurance and will in fact put a cap on the hospital insurance funding in which it has been involved, and they will have to find the money in the provinces.

The minister says that all the provinces agreed. I have here a statement by the minister of finance of the province of Saskatchewan, Mr. Smishek. It is headed "Federal Cost Sharing of "Lower Cost" Health Services." The statement is dated February 21, 1977. I quote:

We have just been informed by the federal Minister of Health and Welfare that the federal government intends to reduce the amount of cost-sharing available to Saskatchewan to help finance special care homes, home care and other lower cost health services . . .

The original intention of the federal proposal was to provide financial assistance to help provinces develop "lower-cost" health alternatives which would help to reduce the pressure on high-cost acute care facilities. With the implementation of the established program financing proposal, the financing of hospital insurance, medicare and post-secondary education will be converted to a block funding basis, an equal per capita grant and a transfer of tax room. The new federal proposal is to fund these "lower cost" services as part of these arrangements by adding an additional $20 per capita to the cash grant.

● (1730)

We have objected to this financing mechanism as a matter of principle. While a block funding arrangement may be appropriate to finance services whose costs are well known, it is entirely inappropriate for new programs, such as home care, whose costs have yet to be accurately determined. A funding arrangement where federal contributions are related to actual costs would be far more effective, and far more equitable.

[Mr. Orlikow.]

He ends by saying:

This is a very regrettable step the federal government has chosen to take. It is entirely perverse that they should be providing significantly more money to the richer provinces while most of the poorer provinces will break even at best while some provinces, like Saskatchewan, actually end up with less.

The Saskatchewan government has provided background information and has exchanged correspondence with the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Let me quote a letter which the Saskatchewan minister of public health wrote to the Minister of National Health and Welfare on February 15 last, in which he said, among other things:

The government of Saskatchewan feels particularly strongly that, in principle, extended health benefits should not be financed on a per capita basis as if these programs were fully developed in all the provinces of Canada. In search for financial arrangements which are acceptable both provincially and federally it is our contention that we should resist rather than encourage the discontinuation of the cost sharing instruments which have enabled the development of our national health programs. We object in principle to the block funding of programs in the development stage. More importantly, however, we regard your attempts to limit the growth of these programs to the rate of growth in gross national expenditure as a totally inappropriate response to the increasing needs of the elderly, the handicapped, and the chronically ill throughout Canada.

I think I have put on the record enough of the views of the governments of Manitoba and Saskatchewan clearly to demonstrate to anyone who wants to look at the facts that the provinces have not agreed voluntarily to this agreement which we are being asked to endorse by voting for the bill. As I said earlier, I am sure that members from at least three of the other provinces could get similar information from their provinces.

We say that this bill received the approval of the provinces because the provinces were blackmailed into agreeing to it. Despite the assurance given in the House and in committee by the representative of the federal government that the provinces will in fact get more money, the provinces themselves have made calculations which indicate they will get substantially less money in the coming years than they would had they continued under the old arrangement.

It ought to be obvious to any member of the House that in regard to the basic services of hospital insurance, health insurance and post-secondary education which have been financed up to now on a 50-50 basis between the federal government and the provincial governments, with the federal government putting up more than 50 per cent in have-not provinces, as it should, as the federal government opts out of its commitment and puts a cap on such costs unilaterally, without discussing with the provinces how annual cost increases can be slowed down, the burden on the provinces will become ever greater.

It is because we believe that this strikes a very serious blow at the basic rights of people living in Canada, who should have certain minimum standards in these fields and be treated equally, we declare that this bill and other bills that the government has introduced, or intends to introduce, strike a very basic blow at the spirit of unity, and we propose to vote against this bill.

Mr. Fairweather: Mr. Speaker, may I rise on a question of privilege? In a speech earlier today I inaccurately suggested that the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Buchanan) had been reading a magazine called Penthouse. This was not correct and I want spontaneously—and this is spontaneous—to correct the record. I do so very gladly because I know that the minister is not the kind of minister who needs to get his kicks out of a jock magazine. He was reading Quest. I do not know what it is.

Miss Bégin: It is Canadian.

Mr. Fairweather: I am told it is a Canadian magazine, so that is fine.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion (Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale)) which was agreed to on the following division:

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. With respect to the business of the House tomorrow, which is Bill C-45, the interim supply bill, we have a House order providing that the debate will conclude tomorrow evening. If there are any divisions, it has been agreed through the normal channels that they be deferred until Monday next, and I would like to have that made a House order.

Mr. Fairweather: That is agreed.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Agreed.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): D'accord.

Mr. Speaker: It is so ordered. It being after six p.m. this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

At 6.07 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

PROPOSAL TO PROHIBIT IMPORTATION OF ELECTRONIC GAME—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stan Schellenberger (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to move a motion of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the objection of the Canada Safety Council to the presence of a new electronic game destined for arcades and fairgrounds wherein the object is to drive a simulated vehicle so as to kill as many pedestrians as possible in a 60 second period, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Towers):

That in the name of family safety the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce immediately ban this game from entering Canada.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have some concern about the jurisdictional aspect of the motion, but in any case, the motion can be presented for debate only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ENERGY

USE OF OIL IMPORT SUBSIDY FUNDS FOR NATIONAL HOME INSULATION PROGRAM—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I too rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of internal documents that I have received from the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources showing another whopping surplus of at least $237 million on the government's oil import subsidy program for 1977, this following a $300 million surplus for 1976, and in view of the fact that only two provinces—the only two provinces with Liberal governments—have received the benefits of the federal government's residential insulation program, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House instructs the government to use the surplus funds related to the oil import subsidy program for a national program of insulating residences, which action would not only conserve energy but also stimulate the creation of jobs in the economy.

Mr. Speaker: The presentation of such a motion for debate pursuant to Standing Order 43 can be done only with unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

FISHERIES

APPROVAL OF MINISTER'S ACTIONS IN PROTECTING SEALS AND SEAL HUNTERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to move a motion under Standing Order 43. It is the same motion that I put to the House yesterday. I have had some discussions and I understand there might be a disposition to accept this motion without debate. I think it is most appropriate that the motion be moved today because there are lobbyists in Washington at present who are providing misleading information to U.S. Senators with a view to having a resolution passed in that body similar to that passed by the House of Representatives. I would remind hon. members that Canada's integrity is at stake, and I urge them to support this motion because the resolution passed by the U.S. Congress did not include the killing of seals in Alaska by American sealers performed in the same way. With the unanimous consent of the House and seconded by the hon. member for Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine (Mr. Béchard), I move:

That this House supports the right of Canadians to hunt seals off Canada's east coast and further supports the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment for the steps he has taken to ensure that the hunt is strictly supervised and conducted in a humane manner with quotas based on the best scientific data available to ensure proper management and conservation of the herd.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: The presentation of such a motion, pursuant to Standing Order 43 can be done only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

SUGGESTION GRANTS TO CANADA AND YOUNG CANADA WORKS PROGRAM BE DOUBLED—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a motion dealing with an urgent matter of pressing necessity and I hope that I will be as successful as my colleague.

Since unemployment is disastrously high in Canada, since supplementary estimates should be allotted to meet those alarming conditions, since the Canada Works Program and the Young Canada Works Program can partly alleviate that national calamity, and finally since the estimates already earmarked for those programs are clearly insufficient to comply with a decent minimum number of requests made under those programs, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Churchill (Mr. Smith):

That the House unanimously ask the minister responsible to double immediately the estimates already announced for the Canada Works Program and the Young Canada Works Program.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Under the provisions of Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there such consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent; the motion therefore cannot be put.

PROPOSAL THAT GOVERNMENT ESTABLISH BALANCE SHEET OF EXPENDITURES IN AND INCOME FROM EACH PROVINCE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the terms of Standing Order 43, I request the unanimous consent of the House to present a motion dealing with an important and urgent matter.

In view of the inalienable right of all Canadian taxpayers to know exactly what is done with the money they pay in taxes of all sorts, in view of the responsibility all hon. members have to give an account to their electors of the use that is made of their contributions to the federal government, and in view of the fact that the government is duty-bound to be responsible for the expenditures incurred in each of the Canadian provinces, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert):

That this House order the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) to draw up a statement of receipts and expenditures, both direct and indirect, for each of the provinces.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Under the terms of Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

PROPOSED REVIEW OF PROVISION WHICH PREVENTS DISCLOSURE OF GROUNDS FOR FIRING PERSON AS SECURITY RISK—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Superior Court Chief Justice Jules Deschenes recently ruled that the RCMP does not have to reveal the reasons which lead to the firing of two young Montreai women from their olympic jobs on the ground of national security and on the recommendation of the RCMP. The Chief Justice based this ruling upon a 1970 amendment to the law of the federal court which sanctioned in five specific cases the principle of absolute executive immunity, but he pointed out that a different rule prevailed in the United States, England, Australia and New Zealand.

Inasmuch as this Canadian rule is inconsistent with the Canadian Bill of Rights, which entitles any person to a fair hearing, and in view of the importance of secrecy of official documents being confined to a minimum I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That the Solicitor General be instructed to review the law in this regard and introduce legislation which would change the principle of absolute executive immunity in such cases to one of relative immunity, subject to review by the courts.

Mr. Speaker: The presentation of such a motion for debate pursuant to the standing order can be done only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

MANPOWER

NUMBER OF JOB VACANCIES—COMPARISON OF DEPARTMENTAL STATISTICS WITH THOSE OF STATISTICS CANADA

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration about a very serious point relating to job vacancies. I would like to remind the minister of his statement in the House on March 21, recorded at page 4149 of Hansard, when he said, and I quote:

At the end of any given month some 100,000 vacant jobs are available, just through CMCs.

I want to ask the minister if it is not a fact that the last time there were 100,000 vacant jobs available on the basis that he suggested was September 1974 and that at the present time there are less than half that number of jobs available on that basis?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, in the light of representations made by the hon. member yesterday I asked if statistics could be made available. I understand they can and I shall be tabling them, at the request of the hon. member.

Mr. Alexander: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In light of the minister's obvious reluctance to supply the House and the country, including the unemployed, with a comparison between the statistics put out by his department as opposed to the job vacancy survey data of Statistics Canada, which data the minister has disputed, I want to challenge the minister to refute the data I have which indicates a pretty consistent relationship between the two sets of statistics. For example, for January of this year his department's statistics indicated job vacancies of 39,000 while Statistics Canada had a figure of 38,000.

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, once again, I have indicated that the job vacancy survey put out by Statistics Canada measures trends in the level of job vacancies as opposed to the total stock of vacancies that are available.

STATISTICS CANADA

ALLEGATION JOB VACANCY STATISTICS NOT VALID—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, may I put a supplementary question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce in light of the fact that Statistics Canada is under his jurisdiction. Keeping in mind that his colleague the Minister of Manpower and Immigration has indicated that the job vacancy statistics as issued by Statistics Canada are misleading, useless, and have to be looked at with a jaundiced eye, and given the fact that we must have some form of statistics in which the country can have faith, would the minister look into the allegations made by the Minister of Manpower and Immigration in order that we can come up with statistics that are acceptable not only to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration but to the minister himself, so that this whole matter can be cleared up once and for all?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member ought to know that I do not meddle with statistics, a subject which is the responsibility of experts within this department. This is a very precise subject and there is no instruction I can give these officials. They must carry out their duties according to the standards of their profession. I have certainly asked questions about these statistics, for these data are quite precise and could serve all sorts of purposes. If the hon. member wants to know why these statistical reports are prepared, he should contact the director general of Statistics Canada, who will certainly be happy to provide him with all necessary information.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for South Shore.

Mr. Alexander: That answer is a complete abdication of the minister's responsibility. Does he not realize that these statistics as issued by his department are relied upon by the unemployed and by concerned people throughout this country. How can he stand there—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order please. The hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby.

Mr. Chrétien: I think the hon. member knows that he should not intervene, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for South Shore, one supplementary question.

EFFECT OF DECLINE IN PRODUCTIVITY ON JOB OPPORTUNITIES—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): One supplementary question Mr. Speaker, for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In light of the figures released by Statistics Canada for the last three months of 1976 which indicate that Canadian manufacturing industries are operating at only 81 per cent of capacity as compared with 90 per cent in 1973, will the minister indicate how much this decline in productivity affects job opportunities or are these statistics incorrect? What steps does he propose to improve productivity and provide more jobs for Canadians?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I can hardly give a statistical response but obviously if a plant operates with a certain degree of efficiency for one month or one period of time and a lesser degree at another time, then it does have an impact on jobs but so far as exact numbers are concerned, I would not have that figure.

ENERGY

USE OF OIL IMPORT SUBSIDY FUNDS FOR NATIONAL HOME INSULATION PROGRAM—REQUEST FOR TABLING DOCUMENTS SHOWING AMOUNT OF FUND

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources based on internal papers prepared by his department for a deputy ministers' meeting held in Ottawa last week. These documents forecast another huge profit for the federal government related to the oil import subsidy program of approximately $237 million for 1977. I should like to ask the minister if he will confirm these figures and if he would be prepared to apply this surplus to a national program of home insulation which would not only conserve energy but provide badly needed jobs?

● (1420)

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I think the number the hon. member mentioned is about right although I cannot confirm it, not having seen the document. But I think it is of that order. I will certainly make the representations he has suggested to my colleagues. Let me say that there is no such thing as a fund with respect to the compensation account. Strictly, it is a notational account, one accumulating over a long period of time which must provide for the possibility of future increases charged by OPEC nations.

Mr. Broadbent: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The minister is technically correct. It is not a fund. But as I said, a surplus is building up. There was $300 million for the immediate past year, and another $237 million is forecast for this year. I should like to know, in order to make clear his interesting answer, if the minister is saying to the House that he is prepared to recommend to cabinet this: that the kind of conservation and insulation program which has been applied in two provinces on the east coast ought now to be applied to all provinces?

Mr. Gillespie: No, Mr. Speaker, I did not say that although I have much sympathy for that particular position.

Mr. Broadbent: A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I should like to know why the minister will not say that now. Will he not give us the commitment that he will take that serious and entirely desirable proposition before Cabinet? And, related to that, will he table in the House that whole set of documents to which I referred, which were presented by his own officials or which they had with them at the meetings last week with the minister's provincial equivalents.

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, the documents to which the hon. member refers are internal documents. They are not documents I am prepared to table.

FINANCE

INQUIRY IF STUDIES MADE ON DISTRIBUTION OF FISCAL INCOME

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance.

Even though the right hon. Prime Minister answered me recently that it was too theoretical an approach to make an evaluation of the funds collected and spent by the federal government in every province, would the minister tell the House whether he has nevertheless undertaken such a study within his department so that all Canadians, particularly Quebecers, could know for sure how tax revenues are shared in this country?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have already had the opportunity to answer such a question. I said it was possible, with tax figures, to make such an evaluation for the whole country and for each province. But in a broader sense, the benefits derived from Confederation involve some rather arbitrary judgments on the sharing of government's expenses and goods between the various provinces of Canada and in that sense such an evaluation has necessarily to be interpreted as arbitrary. However, I can confirm that with the tax statistics produced by Statistics Canada, we have figures which can be prepared to meet these needs.

POSSIBLE LACK OF FINANCIAL ARGUMENTS ON QUEBEC SEPARATION REFERENDUM

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, my question is supplementary to that of my colleague. Does the minister mean that if a referendum were to take place, as announced in Quebec, the federal government would have nothing but emotional arguments to put forward for stressing the value of Canada?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I already pointed out that to me, and I think to my colleagues, Confederation represents more than a simple question of money.

COMMUNICATIONS

EFFECT OF PROPOSED NEW POWERS FOR MINISTER ON INDEPENDENCE OF CRTC—REQUEST FOR PUBLIC MEETINGS OF REGULATORY BODIES

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Communications. Since clause 9 of Bill C-43 will clearly make the minister the policy maker in communications and thus effectively destroy the independence of the CRTC, can the minister tell the House how in these circumstances the CRTC can effectively carry out its independent inquiry into the CBC and the alleged bias in the balance of programming?

[Translation]

Hon. Jeanne Sauvé (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, the bill I introduced in the House a few days ago alters in no way the independence of the CRTC, although it empowers the government to give general guidelines to the CRTC as far as the telecommunications policy is concerned. The quasi-judicial function of the CRTC is not at all amended and, as was the case before, the government will not be able to intervene in its functions relating to the allocation of licenses or permits, the content, the quality of the content and the freedom of expression. Moreover, if the CRTC accepted the Prime Minister's invitation to make an investigation into criticisms against Radio-Canada, it did so freely and its independence is not at issue.

[English]

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, I thank the minister for that answer. In view of the fact that the bill authorizes the minister to delegate power to provincial regulatory authorities, and since the minister is going to meet next week with the responsible communications ministers who are in charge of those regulatory authorities, can she tell the House just what she is going to discuss with those provincial ministers, in particular the types of delegation that she intends to give? Can she assure the House that regardless of what type of delegation there is that open public meetings will be maintained at whatever level the responsibility for communications is carried out?

Mrs. Sauvé: Mr. Speaker, there is in this legislation, as the hon. member rightly says, an enabling clause which will allow the government, if and when it reaches agreement or negotiates certain aspects of telecommunications with the provinces, to delegate powers to these provinces. At the coming meeting which will take place in Edmonton, I have an idea of the general things the provinces might be interested in sharing because we have been discussing these matters for a number of years. However, the demands will obviously come from the provinces. I will be able to enlighten the hon. member when I return from that conference.

Mr. Nowlan: Can the minister assure the House that regardless of what is finally decided and resolved in terms of delegation that if the provincial regulatory body takes the delegated power, it will ensure that the discharge of that power will be by the open public meeting process that is now followed by CRTC?

Mrs. Sauvé: Mr. Speaker, any agreement that I have made or might make in the future will of course be announced. These agreements are always announced publicly, either in the House or outside the House. There are no dealings under the table when a federal minister meets provincial ministers to discuss the sharing of responsibilities or aspirations of those provinces with regard to telecommunications.

NAMES OF PROVINCES WITH WHICH AGREEMENTS HAVE BEEN SIGNED—REASON CONFERENCE WITH PROVINCES CLOSED TO PUBLIC

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Communications. In her answer to the hon. member for Annapolis Valley, the minister said she has been able to conclude some agreements with some provinces. With what provinces has she made agreements and what other provinces have indicated they plan to sign agreements with the minister?

Hon. Jeanne Sauvé (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, I have made an agreement, as I have said very often in this House, with the province of Manitoba. If the hon. member had been present in the House, he would have heard about it.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Friesen: If that is a final agreement with the province of Manitoba, why is there to be another conference in June? If the minister has these agreements with the provinces, why is the conference on communications not open to the public?

Mrs. Sauvé: Mr. Speaker, it is not for me to decide whether the conference will be open. I suppose that will be one of the first items on the agenda, whether the conference will be open or not. All the ministers present, including myself, will take a collective decision about the openness of that conference. What is certain is that there will be a full report of that conference as well as press releases and press conference after the conference. That has already been agreed upon. The fact that I have already concluded an agreement with the province of Manitoba surely does not mean I should not have a conference with the ministers of communications to discuss in an ongoing way the matter of telecommunications between the provincial governments and the federal government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

ALLEGATION CATHY CURTIN AND SYLVIA ROCHE TREATED UNFAIRLY AS RESULT OF PROVISION IN FEDERAL COURT ACT

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice. It relates to the recently decided case involving Quebec's human rights commission in the matter of the discharging of Cathy Curtin and Sylvia Roche from their employment in connection with the Olympics, which has already received wide prominence including an editorial in today's Le Devoir. Is the minister prepared to concede that the plaintiffs in this case would have had their rights far better protected under the Quebec rules of civil procedure than was the case in this instance because they were victimized by Section 41(2) of the Federal Court Act which removes judicial discretion in the question of production of certain evidence? If the minister does concede that this is the case, what is he prepared to do about it?

● (1430)

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): No, I do not concede that that is the case, Mr. Speaker.

POSSIBILITY OF AMENDING SECTION 41(2) OF FEDERAL COURT ACT

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): The minister will recall our conversation of a few days ago when the human rights legislation was before the House, at which time he said he would consider the appropriateness of amending section 41(2) of the Federal Court Act. I should like to know whether he has come to any decision on this question and, if not, whether he will make a decision shortly and refer it to the House at his earliest convenience so that conditions which Chief Justice Deschene described so vividly can be remedied.

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): I indicated to the provincial attorneys general at a conference in Halifax 18 months ago that I hoped to introduce amendments to the Federal Court Act which were desired by many of them. This has also been a subject of discussion by the Canadian Bar Association in the context of the jurisdiction of the federal government. I have been working on amendments to the act but at this time, because of the pressure of other legislation and other factors, I am unable to say when we shall be introducing any amendments.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

RESULTS OF MEETING BETWEEN MARITIME EMPLOYERS ASSOCIATION AND MINISTER

Mr. Raymond Dupont (Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Labour.

Further to the appointment of Mr. Guy de Merlis last week as mediator in the staff relations at the port of Montreal between the longshoremen and the Maritime Employers Association, can the minister report to the House on any new development as regards this mediation?

[English]

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I am happy to report that considerable progress was made during the talks in Montreal. I believe that some of the outstanding issues which were contributing to a deteriorating situation in the port have been turned around. I might mention particularly that the outstanding provision with regard to the so-called "slavery clause" has been removed to the satisfaction of both parties.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

STEPS TO PROVIDE UNITED STATES LEGISLATORS WITH CORRECT INFORMATION ON CANADIAN SEAL HUNT

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I have a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the resolution which was passed by the United States House of Representatives the other day on the basis of false and misleading information provided to United States legislators, and in view of the fact that a similar resolution is about to be presented to the United States Senate, may I ask the minister what steps he is taking through the Canadian ambassador in Washington to provide United States legislators with correct information to offset the false and misleading information provided to them by those who in their zeal seem to show a complete and utter disregard of the facts?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): For once in my life I fully agree with the preamble to the hon. member's question. Perhaps I should have said this is one of the many times I agree with him. At any event, in this case I have made every effort to ensure that legislators in Washington are advised of the facts, including the gentlemen who were the initiators of the unfortunately intemporate and inaccurate resolution which was passed by Congress a few days ago. In addition, I have asked our ambassador in Washington whether there are any further steps which could be taken to ensure that correct information is placed before the legislators. I may have something further to report at a later stage but I can assure the hon. member that all necessary steps are being taken in co-operation with my colleague, the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment.

Mr. McGrath: Would the minister be prepared to consider making an appearance before one of the two committees of the two Houses on foreign affairs to present them with the facts—or perhaps the hon. gentleman could designate someone else to do this, his parliamentary secretary, or even myself?

Mr. Jamieson: I would be delighted, as I know he is a strong advocate, to have the hon. member for St. John's East go to Washington to any committee he wishes. However, it might not be entirely appropriate at the moment. I will certainly investigate and see whether there is a forum before which the facts can be placed.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

SUGGESTED AMENDMENT OF SECTION 41(2) OF FEDERAL COURT ACT TO PROVIDE FOR REVIEW OF REASONS FOR FIRING PERSON AS SECURITY RISK

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, my question is related to the question asked by the hon. member for Central Nova of the Minister of Justice. In view of his luck in that direction I will direct it to the Solicitor General. I assume he is familiar with the facts of the case and the finding that the RCMP are not obliged to reveal the sources which led to the firing of these young women and that the sweeping clauses of section 41(2) of the federal act applied. In view of the judge's statement that this absolute immunity of the executive is based upon an amendment to the Federal Court Act, would the hon. gentleman confer with his colleagues, particularly, perhaps, with the Minister of Justice, to cause an inquiry to be made and to seek to persuade him of the need for action being taken to bring about legislation to confine this immunity to cases where it is absolutely essential and, furthermore, to provide that a judicial review be made available without the disclosure of confidential sources in cases of injustice in the firing of employees on certificates of the RCMP?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I should like to point out that the procedure which was followed in the courts of Montreal was consequent upon the provisions of an act which was passed by parliament in 1970. As far as revisions to the Federal Court Act are concerned, I shall be pleased to discuss possible alternatives to present provisions with the Minister of Justice.

Mr. Brewin: Is the minister aware that even in the middle of the last war when people were interned for security reasons, this parliament under the guidance of the then minister of justice, Mr. St. Laurent, provided for a judicial hearing in security cases where the source of information was not disclosed; a right of hearing was given so that the persons concerned—in this case it would be the persons fired—would be able to object?

Mr. Fox: I can only repeat that at the moment I am acting under legislation which was passed by a previous parliament in 1970. But, of course, I am more than willing to discuss possible alternative solutions with the Minister of Justice.

SMALL BUSINESS

REQUEST FOR DEFINITION OF SMALL BUSINESS ADOPTED BY DEPARTMENT AND STATEMENT OF POLICY

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State responsible for small business. In view of the fact that there continues to exist an area of confusion within the small business community with respect to the government's definition, or lack of definition, of that sector, would the minister define small business as it relates to his portfolio? Can it be assumed that the definition will be the one adopted by the government in its policy making and that it will be the working definition adopted by the various other government departments involved?

Hon. Len Marchand (Minister of State (Small Business)): The matter of a definition is a very difficult kind of question and we have been examining it since I obtained the portfolio. There are some studies going on right now about this very question as it relates to other countries and I expect to have more to say about this in the very near future.

Mr. Jelinek: I appreciate that the minister is attempting to act in good faith within his jurisdiction but I must say it is surprising to find that the government has a ministry of small business but no definition of what small business is. Some four months ago the hon. gentleman said he would outline a government policy on small business as soon as possible—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. If the hon. member has a question to ask would he put it now?

Mr. Jelinek: Since he has promised that such a policy will be forthcoming, can he undertake to outline a much needed small business policy before the summer?

• (1440)

Mr. Marchand: Mr. Speaker, I will not make a commitment to outline the policy before summer. I am not sure how long it will take to complete the kind of examination that I want to have. We are working at it very diligently. It is a very important subject and this is a very important group of people to the economy of this country, so I do not want to commit myself to saying I am going to do it before summer.

HISTORIC SITES

REQUEST FOR PRESERVATION OF BIRTHPLACE OF MEMBER FOR PRINCE ALBERT

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, my question for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, of which I have given him notice, is particularly timely because tomorrow the right hon. gentleman from Prince Albert is celebrating his thirty-seventh anniversary as a member of parliament.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Beatty: Mr. Speaker, in view of the desire of the people of our constituency that the birthplace of the right hon. gentleman from Prince Albert, which is located in Neustadt, Ontario, be preserved for all Canadians as a national historic site, in view of the fact that officials within the minister's department say that no action will be taken by them with regard to this house as long as the right hon. gentleman is still alive because departmental policy forbids commemorating living Canadians, and in view of the fact that many members on this side of this House, in fact all of us, wish the right hon. gentleman many more happy years—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Beatty: —can the minister assure the House that he is prepared to waive this foolish policy so that the birthplace of this distinguished former prime minister will not be lost to future generations of Canadians?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, it is customary for the government to recognize and preserve historic sites on the recommendation of the National Historic Sites and Monuments Board. This is an independent board and we deal with their recommendations. I suggest that the hon. member approach the board to see whether they want to recognize this particular site.

WEIGHTS AND MEASURES

USE OF TELEVISION PROGRAM TO PROMOTE METRIC CONVERSION

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In view of reports that the Metric Commission is now using a television show to promote metric conversion, can the minister state how the government can expect Canadian taxpayers to have confidence in its so-called restraint program when the Metric Commission spends $60,000 to have a comedian try to put the metric system across on television as a joke, further adding insult to injury?

Hon. Len Marchand (Acting Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I have not seen these particular ads but I will have a look at the matter. We are using all kinds of means to make certain that the Canadian public knows about metric conversion and that it is a good program for us to follow for the future.

Mr. Towers: A supplementary question to the same minister, Mr. Speaker. Has opposition to certain parts of the metric system backed the commission into a corner which is causing it to resort to metric funnies as a last stand?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Grenville-Carleton.

Mr. Marchand: Mr. Speaker, I did not hear the first part of the question.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The first question was argumentative enough. The hon. member for Grenville-Carleton.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

PROTEST AGAINST APPRAISAL PROMOTION SYSTEM BY FOREIGN SERVICE SECRETARIES

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. It has to do with the petition to the Undersecretary of State for External Affairs signed by 127 foreign service secretaries in Ottawa who are protesting the appraisal promotion system being used in the department. Has this matter been brought to the attention of the minister, and is he looking into it?

[Mr. Allmand.]

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, it has been brought to my attention in an informal way. The Undersecretary has been absent from Ottawa for the last 10 days. I have not seen him since his return but I am sure that I will be doing so very shortly and undoubtedly this will be one of the matters we will discuss. I must confess that beyond that I do not have any personal response which I can give to the hon. member at this time.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): One brief supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The brief—and perhaps the minister might direct his attention to it—condemns the appraisal system in the sense that it acts contrary to the guidelines set out in the departmental policy paper on equal opportunities for women. When the minister is looking at it I wonder whether he would have particular reference to the applicability of the guidelines and how they may be offended by present departmental policies?

Mr. Jamieson: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I will certainly be glad to do that.

SUGGESTED DELEGATION TO WASHINGTON TO EXPLAIN SEAL HUNT CONDITIONS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Albert Béchard (Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs and is supplementary to that of the hon. member for St. John's East. It is rather a representation.

If the minister were to send a delegation to Washington to explain to the Senate and to the members of the U.S. Congress the very humane nature of the seal hunt in Canada, particularly in eastern Canada, at the Magdalen Islands and in Newfoundland, could he include in this delegation the chairman of the Committee on Fisheries and Forestry who is also the member for Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine so that he can give more details to the senators and members of congress?

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

SUGGESTED ABANDONMENT OF APPEAL OF AWARD TO MRS. STELLA BLISS AND AMENDMENT OF PROVISIONS DISCRIMINATING AGAINST WOMEN

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration responsible for the Unemployment Insurance Commission.

An hon. Member: Where have you been?

Mr. Rodriguez: Just be quiet.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): He has been having speech lessons.

Mr. Rodriguez: I have been talking to the unemployed.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Nickel Belt has the floor.

Mr. Rodriguez: I am now talking to the insensitive. In view of the fact that a recent judgment was made by an umpire of the Unemployment Insurance Commission, Federal Court Judge Frank Collier, who ruled that section 46 of the Unemployment Insurance Commission Act contravenes the Canadian Bill of Rights, in view of the fact that Justice Collier awarded benefits to Mrs. Stella Bliss who had appealed her disentitlement under sections 46 and 30 of the Unemployment Insurance Commission Act, and in view of the fact that the commission is appealing this decision to the Federal Court of Appeal, is the minister prepared to instruct the commission to withdraw the appeal?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Rodriguez: One supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that there is a Supreme Court of Canada ruling that discrimination between members of the same class is illegal under the Bill of Rights, is the minister responsible for the Unemployment Insurance Commission prepared to introduce the necessary amendments to sections 30 and 46 so that women will be entitled to receive all benefits to which other members of the work force are entitled, plus special benefits to cover the period immediately surrounding the birth of a child?

Mr. Cullen: I have received the hon member's representation, Mr. Speaker.

FINANCE

DATE OF TABLING DOCUMENTS RELATING TO ECONOMIC REVIEW

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I ask the Minister of Finance whether he would advise the House if, in conformity with customary practice, he is intending to table the economic reports and surveys that the Department of Finance makes prior to delivery of a budget. If so, when does he expect to make these available prior to March 31?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the budget date this year is a little in advance of the time when the economic review, as it is described, is normally available. Therefore, I am not in a position to do that. In lieu of that I hope to accompany the budget statement with a document which would cover much of the same ground that the economic review will do a little later.

● (1450)

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): In view of the fact that it is almost inevitable that the budget debate may be split into two periods, does the minister envisage that he will be able to table those documents for at least part of the budget debate?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I will have to check on the time table, and I will be glad to do that.

HEALTH

POSSIBILITY OF STUDIES ON EFFECTS OF SACCHARIN ON HUMANS—REASON FOR FAILURE TO CONSULT MEDICAL ASSOCIATIONS PRIOR TO IMPOSING BAN

Mr. Bruce Halliday (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I would like to welcome the Minister of National Health and Welfare back to the House and say that we thought he might have been in Toronto today with his colleague, Senator Lamontagne, helping to sell Conservative principles to the meeting there.

I should like to put a question to the minister regarding saccharin. Having banned saccharin in a rather precipitous fashion to the extent that three of his own Liberal colleagues questioned him in the House the other day, would the minister try to regain his credibility with the public, the health professions, the industry and his own colleagues, by indicating to the House what retrospective and prospective studies he has authorized or has done on the effects of saccharin on humans?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, decisions have been made in that field following studies which have been confirmed by international and American authorities. I would suggest to the hon. member that he not be overly impressed by a decidedly American lobbying organization which has more than $1 million at its disposal to rally public opinion against this decision.

[English]

Mr. Halliday: I thank the minister for his answer. We had hoped he would have started some studies on human beings.

In view of the seriousness of the possible dangers of saccharin for humans and the equally potential danger of side effects from increased use of sugar, can the minister indicate why he chose to implement the ban without having obtained well in advance official opinions from the governing and elected bodies or organizations such as the Canadian Medical Association, the Canadian Dental Association and the Canadian Diabetic Association?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, consultations have been held with each one of the associations mentioned by the hon. member but decisions in that area come under government authorities and I did take it as Minister of National Health and Welfare upon advise from experts in my department and from outside experts who have been consulted. About that matter, the hon. member should read over closely the testimony that Dr. Morrison gave this morning before the Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs which the hon. member attended and where arguments advocated against this decision were, I believe, refuted with great competence and in a very explicit way.

[English]

Mr. Halliday: Ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

SACCHARIN—STUDY TO DETERMINE SAFE MAXIMUM LEVEL OF CONSUMPTION FOR HUMANS

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): In view of the fact that a large number of Canadians will probably continue to use saccharin added to food, would the minister indicate whether he has instructed his department or ordered any further studies to be carried out to determine whether there is a safe maximum level of saccharin consumption, considering that his research project has been criticized on the basis of the fact that very high doses had been administered to rats?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the head of the Health Protection Branch gave very clear evidence on this subject this morning. According to the World Health Organization, a security level could be one part per 5,000 in such tests. As a matter of fact, we reduced the ratio to one part per 800, and at this level we still noticed some cancer. Therefore there is no doubt now in the minds of experts that the decision arrived at was largely justified.

IMMIGRATION

BORIS DOMAZET—REQUEST FOR DETAILS OF SUSPENSION

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. It relates to Boris Domazet, an employee of the Department of Manpower and Immigration who first came to that department in May of 1973. During his time of employment with that department he has exposed a number of irregular practices within the department. I should like to ask the minister whether Mr. Domazet has been suspended as of today, and if that is the case, what were the reasons for that suspension?

An hon. Member: Was he on the black list like Rudnicki?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker,—

An hon. Member: Why are you laughing?

Mr. Cullen: The joke that came from over there was pretty funny. As of March 24, 1977 Mr. Domazet has been suspended without pay pending an investigation of his alleged public criticism of the department and the release of confidential information to unauthorized persons in contravention of the code of conduct guidelines for the public service.

Mr. Epp: I should like to ask the minister whether he can confirm details of that suspension today, namely, that Mr. Domazet had granted an interview to a press man who had declared himself to security at the Department of Immigration and that a security officer of the department not only ended that interview but also raided personal possessions including the briefcase of Mr. Domazet. If this is not in violation of privacy, can the minister explain whether those activities are in keeping with human rights and departmental practices?

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, of course I am not familiar with those particular details.

Mr. Alexander: Nor with certain deportation orders.

AIR TRANSPORT

REASON AIR CANADA FAVOURED OVER CP AIR IN ALLOCATION OF ROUTES

Mr. Ron Huntington (Capilano): Mr. Speaker, I should like to refer the Minister of Transport to his reply to my question concerning government pressure on CPA, as reported in Hansard of March 21. Assuming the sincerity of the minister's reply, which reads:

> Mr. Speaker, most certainly the government has no intention of taking any action to interfere with that or other private airlines. Indeed, our action has consistently been to try to improve the atmosphere in which the airlines function, and I wish the hon. member would appreciate that fact.

Will the minister tell the House why the government negotiated Air Canada into 14 of the 17 U.S. routes in the U.S.-Canada bilateral agreement by trading off the traditional prairie and trans-Pacific traffic of Canadian Pacific Airlines to U.S. airlines?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): In view of the long time which has elapsed since all that happened, I would be delighted to answer that question in another forum.

Mr. Huntington: I am wondering if the minister would also give consideration to why Air Canada, an eastern based airline, got the Calgary-San Francisco run starting in 1978 instead of Canadian Pacific Airlines, a western based airline, and is the minister prepared to review the whole matter of the U.S.-Canada bilateral air agreement in a constructive atmosphere?

Mr. Lang: I will certainly not treat any airline as being a western or an eastern airline but rather as being good Canadian companies.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lang: Of course, when routes were being examined and allocated consideration was given to the balance position of various airlines and the question of the broad policy between the two airlines did arise. As I said to the hon. member a moment ago, all this happened rather long ago and I wonder if the hon. member has nothing more recent to worry about.

GOVERNMENT ADMINISTRATION

ALLEGED SURPLUS OF OFFICE SPACE—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO SLOW DOWN NEW CONSTRUCTION

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board. It is with respect to the very serious imbalance in the inventory of available office space on government property, particularly in the Ottawa-Hull region. Can the minister tell the House whether it is the intention of the government to address itself to this serious problem and divest itself of surplus office space? Is it the intention of the government also to check the balance in the new construction of office space particularly in line with the policy of decentralization and restraint?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board): Yes, Mr. Speaker, in co-operation with the Minister of Public Works.

Mr. Oberle: Since the Minister of Public Works does not have a system of control of vacant office space but is merely acting as a real estate agent, could the President of the Treasury Board assure us, in view of the fact that it is five years ago that the government made the decision to build all these new buildings and that since that time it has embarked on several programs, particularly the programs of decentralization and restraint, it is his intention to slow down any new construction and divest the government of available surplus office space?

● (1500)

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, I think I have already answered that.

HEALTH

REASON FOR BANNING USE OF SACCHARIN WHEN NO ACTION TAKEN ON OTHER TOXIC AGENTS

Mr. J. R. Holmes (Lambton-Kent): Mr. Speaker, my question is supplementary to earlier questions to the Minister of National Health and Welfare about the banning of saccharin. In view of the fact that we have a very serious problem related to mercury to which, I remind the minister, we devoted an opposition day, a serious problem with respect to arsenic, about which the minister attempted to defend government inaction in an article in the Globe and Mail by indicating there was no evidence of humans being affected in Yellowknife and problems with respect to asbestos, lead and numerous other chemicals which are known to impair health and to have caused deaths, I would like to ask the minister how he justifies his action to ban saccharin based on rat studies with no evidence of human involvement and yet refuses to take action on mercury, arsenic, asbestos and other toxic agents which are known to cause human illness and death.

An hon. Member: You are basing your policy on rats.

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, my answer to the hon. member will be very short. He clearly did not even bother to read the numerous press releases which I have issued. Specific action has been taken and well documented over the last two years.

With regard to the first question raised by the hon. member I can only recommend that he read the transcript of the testimony before the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs this morning. If he would do so, he would get a full answer to his question.

Mr. Holmes: If the minister really believes that answer, he is either living in a land of make believe or refusing to address himself to the facts.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Holmes: In view of the obvious inconsistency of ministerial decisions regarding environmental health matters in which the minister ignores problems affecting health and yet takes precipitous action which will affect thousands of Canadian consumers who use saccharin, can the minister outline the criteria or the guidelines used by the government which gave rise to this incredible policy which has destroyed the minister's credibility, but more importantly which reveals the need for a responsible environmental health program?

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, I do not know how the hon. member can expect me to give a full answer in the question period to the question he has raised. The main estimates of my department are presently before the committee. Just this morning I was before the parliamentary committee, and I will be there again on Tuesday next. We can debate this matter as long as the hon. member wants to, but I do not think he is helping his case or the health of the people of this country by making statements like the one he just made.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PRESENCE IN SPEAKER'S GALLERY OF DIRECTOR-GENERAL OF THE FOOD AND AGRICULTURE ORGANIZATION

Mr. Speaker: I know that all hon. members will want to join with me in signalling the presence in our gallery of a very distinguished visitor, that distinguished visitor being the Lebanese parliamentarian who at the beginning of 1976 was elected Director-General of the Food and Agriculture Organization, Mr. Edouard Saouma.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I might ask the government House leader the usual question about the business of the House.

Mr. MacEachen: At the outset I would like to ask Your Honour to designate, in accordance with Standing Order 60, an order of the day for the purpose of enabling the Minister of Finance to make a budget presentation at 8 p.m. on Thursday, March 31, 1977.

The business for today is known to hon. members. It is the interim supply bill. Tomorrow we will deal with the report stage of the bill on metric conversion, and on Monday we will deal with the motion in the name of the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants.

Mr. McCleave: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: The hon. member has waited very patiently and has co-operated very well in this respect.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: Following Monday we shall deal with the metric conversion bill and the unemployment insurance bill. I should like to mention that with respect to tomorrow's business, namely, the report stage of the metric conversion bill, in the unlikely event that divisions may be called, there has been consultation with the understanding that any such division would be deferred until Monday of next week. Therefore, it would be useful to have an order to that effect.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the suggestion of the President of the Privy Council with respect to deferred divisions. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: It is so ordered.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, we have agreed to defer certain votes if they are called, because such a request was made by the government in view of the fact that a Liberal conference is being held in Toronto today and tomorrow. In view of the report over CBC last night to the effect that this is a "think" conference, the first in 17 years—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): It's about time they started to think.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): —I wonder if the minister plans to bring in a bill to require that any party which is in government ought to do some thinking at least once every five years.

Mr. Friesen: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Two days ago the Minister of Communications tabled Bill C-43. Since then we have been attempting to get extra copies of the bill so we could study it. But they are as hard to find as hen's teeth. I think even the Minister of Agriculture has trouble finding hen's teeth. It is ironic that someone who specializes in communications cannot produce enough copies of the bill for us to study it. I would like to register a complaint about that.

Mrs. Sauvé: Mr. Speaker, to my knowledge copies are available to hon. members. I will check into this. I certainly want hon. members to have copies of the bill.

YOUTH

ANNOUNCEMENT OF STUDENT TRAVEL EXCHANGE PROGRAM

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be able to announce today a federal government initiative for the young people of our country in the form of a year-round travel exchange program developed in the Department of the Secretary of State. The program will be based on the principle of twinning and, when fully operational, will involve between 20,000 and 30,000 young people per year.

Hon. members will recall that in the last Speech from the Throne on October 12, 1976, the government committed itself to federal initiatives designed specifically for youth. My department's new travel exchange program, to be known as "Open House Canada/Hospitalité Canada", is one component of these initiatives. Information on other projects will be available within the coming month. Our new program will enable young people, both individually and in groups, to participate in exchange visits with others across the country. In taking this initiative, the government is responding directly to the young people of Canada. We have all seen examples of youth taking such initiatives on their own, assuming the burden of the cost of these initiatives, and in so doing demonstrating to the rest of us how much they care about their country and that they would like to get to know it better.

I am also aware of the valuable contributions made for many years in the area of youth exchanges by voluntary organizations. It is our intention to continue to work closely with them to achieve our common goals.

[Translation]

I have also noted a kind of tacit agreement in the press and in the House to the effect that some people would like us to promote further visits and exchanges among Canadians. The Commissioner of Official Languages has often complained about the fact that many Canadians know the United States and Europe better than some parts of their own country, especially the areas where another language is spoken.

● (1510)

"Open House Canada/Hospitalité Canada" is designed for the generation that will produce our leaders in the decades to come. Those participating as individuals will be from 16 to 22 years of age and those participating in groups will be from 14 to 22 years of age. Their transportation costs will be paid by the federal government but each traveller will be expected to pay a small participation fee.

The mechanics of the program, although not yet worked out in fine detail, will proceed along the following lines: young Canadians interested in participating will apply to a central bureau where they will be matched with an individual or group from another province. Once the twinning is established, the participants will be encouraged to have exploratory correspondence and other types of exchanges with each other in order to establish rapport and then eventually to visit each other in their homes. Further details will be available in a month, and application forms for those who wish to participate will be ready in June.

[Translation]

While we put the emphasis on mutual exchanges among participants, the program does provide allowances for individuals or groups who would take part only as visitors or as hosts.

[English]

The aim of the program, then, is to create an encouraging environment for what we look upon as an extremely desirable national purpose: the year around discovery of Canada by the young people of our country. By removing the cost barriers involved in travel, we feel we shall not only be encouraging, but also challenging young Canadians to do something for the unity of their country.

[Translation]

Through that program we hope to encourage a dialogue and a closer understanding among Canadians, especially among those who speak English or French, as well as between the regions and provinces giving an opportunity to the young people to get acquainted with a new style of living and environment.

[English]

In concluding, may I say that I am convinced Canada's reputation around the world for openness and hospitality is deserved. We are now offering an opportunity for Canadians to be open and hospitable to each other.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, I should like to thank the minister personally, and on behalf of this party, for his courtesy in sending us the statement earlier. I should also like to thank him, on behalf of parliament, for making the announcement in this chamber.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Fairweather: If I could editorialize—and I will, even if I should not—it is an all too rare quality in ministers and obviously shows that he has been one of us in the not too distant past.

Mr. Friesen: He is still a beginner.

Mr. Fairweather: He is enough of a beginner to know that when he has important things to say, he says them here and not in Vancouver or somewhere else.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Fairweather: I am also very glad that the statement has come within a day or two of a rather extraordinary statement about a bilingual program which affected only two of the ten provinces and two territories—a program of Ontario-Quebec travel. Obviously, the minister has recognized, a day or two late, that there is more to Canada than his province of Ontario or the great province of Quebec. I am glad this program has been redressed.

A few years ago there was an anguished cry in the United States—"What have they done to our children?" It was made in times of frustration in American national life. I am anxious that such an anguished cry will never be heard in this country, because we will have done something for our young people. Unhappily, though, the rather interesting initiatives and travel plans are not matched—and I mean this as a positive criticism—with initiatives by the Department of Manpower and Immigration for the 350,000 Canadians under 25 years of age who have nothing to do, who are out of work. What I am really saying is that if the Secretary of State (Mr. Roberts) has an initiative for the young, the Department of Manpower and Immigration must gear up and pay particular attention to Canadians under 25 years of age who are seeking work.

This particular week is a rather opportune time for the minister to make his statement. The galleries are often filled, because of school breaks in various provinces and because of a rather imaginative program run by a volunteer organization which brings young people from the high schools of Canada into the capital. I do not want to be preachy or self-righteous, but I think the fact that we have visitors this week, and the fact that the minister has said there will be other visitors all through the year puts a special onus on us as members of parliament. In a way, we are on exhibit here: the way we respond, our sensitivities, and so on, will be marked and carefully analysed, I hope, by those who do us the honour of sitting in the galleries this week and in years to come.

The young Canadians who are travelling may well be our sons and daughters. They will not be mine, because mine have travelled and are now young men and women. I cannot help but say that I hope, as we extend hospitality, we will not shut doors to people because their costumes may not be the same as we would travel in, or their hair might be a different length. In other words, if young people travelling wear jeans and have a pack on their backs, the hospitality program should be aware that this is the dress and mode of the young today.

I have never got over the fact that somebody told me once that when they saw someone on the road hitchhiking who wore blue jeans, they called the RCMP. My horrified response was that the person in jeans who was hitchhiking might be my son or daughter. I know the minister wants to think that in a hospitality program we welcome the young in their various modes of dress and with their various concerns, which I very much hope will not be identical to those of us who are part of this "splendid" status quo.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I, too, would like to thank the minister for sending an advance copy of the statement. We in the New Democratic Party welcome this initiative by the minister to assist young people in exchanging visits in all parts of the country. I think we should have had more of this in the past than has been our experience. I think, too, that with the high rate of unemployment among young people—about double the national rate—a lot of young people will have plenty of time on their hands this summer to take advantage of the program. As the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Fairweather) noted, it is unfortunate that we can find initiatives in the Department of the Secretary of State to meet the needs of young people but cannot find the same degree of commitment in the Department of Manpower and Immigration. I think the federal initiative should be looked at carefully by all the provinces, and I hope we will see some initiatives at the provincial level as well in terms of exchanges between the regions of Canada.

The minister's statement is not precise in some details, and I should like to raise some questions. I am concerned about the selection process, and just who will be chosen. I should like to make sure there is a built-in mechanism to guarantee as broad a representation as possible. Not only should we have people participating from large and small urban centres, but they should be from the rural areas as well. There should also be some guarantee that it will not be just one particular income group that will receive the benefit. I hope there will be some form of proportional representation in that regard.

I hope that one of the conditions of eligibility will be a guarantee by the young people involved that they will take part in follow-up programs, so to speak, after their visits are over. In this way they could share their experiences and knowledge. Perhaps they could report to fellow students in schools, seek out the local media in their communities and ask them to report and appear before service clubs and other interested groups.

In conclusion, I welcome the initiative. We want to know more of the details. Let me echo the sentiments of the late Governor General, Georges Vanier who in his 1967 New Year's message said that one of the strengths of this country was its diversity; that we should open the doors and windows of the provinces so that we could see one another, meet one another, share our experiences and so promote understanding and unity. I hope this program will in some small way fulfil the wish of our late and distinguished Governor General, Georges Vanier.

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, today the Secretary of State is launching a program of a permanent nature through which young Canadians of 14 to 22 are being invited, individually or in groups, to take part in exchange visits throughout Canada. It will be remembered that a similar program of exchanges already exists between Quebec and Ontario. I am of course very happy with the praiseworthy initiative of extending the program throughout Canada. I feel that it is even desirable. As a youth, I myself was able to take part in a similar program, though its purposes were different. The young people in eastern Canada were encouraged to go and help bring in the crops out west; all they had to reimburse was $10 for their travelling expenses.

We were paid to harvest the crops. Of course we were working but for myself and the other young people of my age it was a very enriching experience. It is essential for each young Canadian to get a better knowledge of his country and of the desires, the problems and the views of others in all provinces. We never know enough about our own country. So I wish to thank the minister for having given such importance to the commitment made in the last Speech from the Throne last October 12. However, I have some reservations based on our experience with similar programs. An excellent program is often smothered and thwarted by a heavy, slow and inefficient bureaucracy which ignores the wishes clearly expressed by the citizen, young or not so young, who wants to benefit from a government program.

As usual, hon. members are informed of the major aspects of a government project which seems excellent in principle, but what will happen in practice? Civil servants are the only ones who know, for instance the members of the future secretariate announced today by the minister. The population must realize the fact that when members of parliament vote for a program generally proposed by a minister, they do not vote on rules, requirements or selection criteria. The whole implementation of a program is the sole responsibility of bureaucracy. Members of parliament have nothing to say on that matter.

This is why we can say today that the intention seems excellent. The objective is supported by every member of the Social Credit Party. Our party believes that Canada should be better understood and we must encourage any program that will allow our fellow citizens, particularly young Canadians, to gain a better insight of the real dimensions of their country. In doing this we might have fewer extremists on one side or the other or in one province or the other. Through a better knowledge of Canada by future generations, politicians in general might stop trying to benefit from divisions among us in Canada, owing to the vigilance of those future Canadian adults.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order please. The rules with respect to ministerial statements under which we operate give the Chair a great deal of discretion with respect to questions following a statement. It is apparent that the minister's statement, the details of which are to follow later, has aroused no disagreement. Hon. members, obviously, do not disagree with it. Therefore, I do not propose to allow a great deal of questioning. However, I note that the hon. members for Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton (Mr. Dick), for Battle River (Mr. Malone), for York-Scarborough (Mr. Stanbury), and for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas) are interested in putting questions. I ask them to be brief.

Mr. Paul Dick (Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I shall ask my questions slowly in order to allow the minister to make notes. He indicated that the applications will be ready in June. Is it intended, after these applications have been processed, to let the exchanges take place in July and August this year when students will be out of school and our youth unemployment is the highest in our history. For how long will the exchange students be away? Will their visits last a week, two weeks, one month, or perhaps even two months? Could the minister be more specific? Also, can he say how many young people he hopes will be involved. He is under a budgetary limitation, I am sure—I do not know if it is $1,000, $3,000 or even $10,000 per student. Does the minister at present expect the program to continue each year, say for the next five years, or will it be in place only this year and perhaps next year?

Mr. Roberts: Mr. Speaker, I can reply briefly to the perceptive questions of the hon. member for Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton (Mr. Dick). I mentioned June as the month when applications will be available, and we hope strongly that the exchange will begin in the summer, in July and August. Perhaps the initial exchanges will involve groups rather than individuals because of the longer lead time we may need to establish procedures for the placing of individuals who may wish to make visits back and forth from one part of the country to another.

To answer the hon. member's second question, the program is designed to support travel costs. Its purpose is not to assist tourism—let me put it that way. It is designed to establish an exchange of views and contacts between individuals in different parts of the country. We shall be considering some requirement for a minimum length of stay which could be perhaps a week. If individuals wish to stay longer—for two or three weeks or one month—that would not affect the travel cost portion of the government's participation. The travel costs will remain the same, no matter how long people stay. There would need to be a minimum time requirement, but the length of the visit can be extended for a considerable period since that would not affect the cost of the government's participation.

I cannot say how many people will be involved in the program. We shall be able to assess numbers in the light of demand, But we believe, initially, that when the program becomes fully operational it will involve between 20,000 and 30,000 young people a year.

It is intended to continue the program indefinitely although, of course, in light of our experience we may refine, alter or change it. Experience may indicate some better ways of meeting our objectives. In initial terms, we are not thinking so much of a dollar figure as of the participation of between 20,000 and 30,000 young people between the ages of 14 and 22.

Hon. Robert Stanbury (York-Scarborough): Mr. Speaker, we welcome the return of the spirit of centennial year in the form of some of the programs initiated for that year—after an unfortunate lapse. Can the minister tell us if other programs of this kind will be announced in time for older people to be involved in interprovincial exchanges this summer? Too many good things in life have been reserved for the young. Under the former exchange programs there were opportunities for adult groups and families to get to know their fellow Canadians in other provinces. I wonder if there soon will be an announcement to extend the scope of this program to people other than the young, even though I think the minister has started in the right place.

● (1530)

In addition to organized programs, is the minister considering, as well, less structured schemes whereby families can travel the country? Particularly at a time when we are trying to encourage rail traffic, perhaps once a year each family in Canada might have the privilege of travelling to another province by rail at no cost. It would simply reduce the subsidies that this government will have to pay to the new Via Rail system. Why not a Via Rail visa for every family in Canada?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Hear, hear!

Mr. Roberts: Mr. Speaker, I see my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) applauding. He, obviously, would like to take advantage of extending the program to those other than the young. He is youthful in spirit but would not, under the present age limits of this program, be eligible for a twinning arrangement. The hon. member for York-Scarborough (Mr. Stanbury) really anticipated in his second question my response to his first. The orientation of this program is specifically, as I indicated, for young people between the ages of 14 and 22 or 16 and 22 on individual exchanges.

We did consider the possibilities of finding some means of assisting with the transportation costs of young people and their families, or within the context of their families, in an exchange or twinning arrangement. That is, indeed, an intriguing and interesting idea. We felt that at the present time there were certain administrative difficulties to such a plan. We felt we could not wait until we had ironed out all those difficulties before proceeding with the steps I described in the House today. This is a matter upon which we will continue to reflect.

Without in any way making a commitment, I would say that this is a subject we will consider, in light of our experience with the program, to see whether some extension toward families may be contemplated some time later, probably in subsequent years rather than this year.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I, too, want to congratulate the minister on initiating this program. I want to ask two brief questions. The first is whether this will be a continuing program. We had an excellent exchange program. I know that groups of high school students from my province visited the province of Quebec, and students from the province of Quebec came to stay in the homes and visit the communities from which I come. There has been an ongoing correspondence ever since, which is of great benefit. Unfortunately, the program was stopped. Is this likely to be an ongoing program, or a one-shot deal? Second, will groups, particularly groups of students who make application, be able to arrange exchange programs so that the young people they visit will make reciprocal visits in order to see each other in their home territory?

Mr. Roberts: Mr. Speaker, the answer to both questions is "yes". The program is envisaged as a continuing one. It is not intended that it should expire after one year, or be, as the hon. member terms it, a one-shot program. We are looking at a continuing program of government. Yes, indeed, groups of students will be eligible. The essence of the program is to adopt the idea the hon. member expressed in his question, that is to say, there should be an exchange.

One's ability to take advantage of the program and visit a student, or a particular group of students to visit another group of students, will depend upon willingness to accept, in return, a visit from that individual or group. There may be a few exceptions to that principle in the application of the program. There may be some people who will be hosts and who will not feel they are able to go on a subsequent visit. But the general theme of the program will be on the basis of twinning; that is to say, that people will be accepted as eligible under the program to visit another part of the country if they will in turn accept a reciprocal visit.

While I am on my feet, I should indicate to the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Symes) that I welcome his support. Indeed, I welcome the support indicated by all parties in the House. This is not a partisan or party measure. It is one which responds to the wishes of all parties and all members of the House. I welcome the support for the program. I hope hon. members will do what they can to make the program effective and tell young people about it.

I should say that the concerns which the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie raised about how people will be chosen, and whether this will be a program which will meet only the needs of a narrow segment of the population, are concerns we had. We are determined to ensure that it covers a broad range of social and economic status, geographical representation, and so on. There should be a continual method of follow-up.

It is not, as I said earlier, a tourism program. It is designed to share human contact, exchange and understanding on a continuing basis.

Mr. Arnold Malone (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, at the outset I would like to pay tribute to the minister for introducing this legislation. I find it noteworthy for a country as diverse as Canada. While I very much appreciate the spirit of what the minister is attempting to do, there is a bit of conflict in relation to something that is already going on. The minister mentioned the value of the cultural exchange, something none of us would deny. However, at the present time there is an international exchange going on in Alberta, particularly with Scandinavian families and their host families back home. It has been going on for about a decade. I would point out that an airplane of Scandinavian people landing in this country at the international airport in Edmonton were unable to get off the airplane because the federal government had not completed its paperwork. About a year ago they were about to get on an airplane in a Scandinavian country—I believe in Oslo—but the paperwork was not done.

In talking to the people who have been putting these exchanges together, each successive one has been a series of continuing roadblocks. I will supply the minister with further information because I know he needs greater detail with regard to this. First, will the minister review the whole matter of this international exchange of people going to work in other countries? Second, will he bypass the representation he is getting directly, and talk to the families who have been hosting these exchanges for a long period of time about the value they think the program has, so that he can have direct input and representation from them on what they consider to be an extremely important international exchange?

Mr. Roberts: Mr. Speaker, I am grateful to the hon. member for raising the point. I will await the information which he is sending to me. I am not aware, specifically, of the program he has mentioned, nor am I aware of the difficulties which have been encountered in relation to it. From his description, I am not sure whether those difficulties really relate to my jurisdiction. They may relate to external affairs or immigration. When the hon. member sends me details of the problem which these families have faced, I will ensure they are brought to the attention of the proper minister to be looked into and, I hope, settled.

I must say, with frankness, to the hon. member that the purpose of this exchange is not set within the international context. It is to encourage young Canadians to get to know one another better and to get to know parts of Canada better. I have often been disturbed to find that Canadians know other countries better than their own. For example, people in my city of Toronto often find it easier to take holidays in Florida, or Europe, than to take holidays in Canada in areas such as that represented by the hon. member. A way should be found to get them to know one another as well, and to know other parts of the country.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. In addition to the hon. members I said I would recognize, I see three hon. members who seek the floor. In fairness, and to be consistent with previous practices and in keeping with my previous arrangement, I will have to stop the questioning. This is a rather important supply day and a special procedure for going to committee of the whole.

● (1540)

It is a rather important point, because I indicated earlier that I have to exercise discretion with respect to these questions. Other questions, for information purposes, could be brought to the attention of the minister directly. I really think we ought to get on with orders of the day.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: 1,060, 1,331, 1,696 1,780, 1,804, 1,863, 1,864, 1,885, 1,886, 1,911, 1,943, 1,952 and 1,977.

DEPARTMENT OF MANPOWER AND IMMIGRATION—MAINTENANCE OF BUILDINGS OR OTHER EQUIPMENT

Question No. 1,060—Mr. Mazankowski:

1. What items, buildings or other equipment were repaired or maintained by the Department of Manpower and Immigration in the fiscal year (a) 1974-75 (b) 1975-76?

2. In each case, what was the nature of the breakdown, malfunction or condition of the item and what were the repairs or maintenance?

3. In each case, what was the original value of the item?

4. In each case, what was the expected life span of the item before the repairs or maintenance and what is the expected life of the item subsequent to the repairs or maintenance?

5. For what reason was the repair or maintenance not foreseen at the time of the presentation of the 1975-76 main estimates, resulting in an expenditure of 11,666.7% over the estimates and also the previous year?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): 1 to 4. To obtain the requested detailed information would entail a very costly procedure in terms of man-hours and research required.

5. The government policy on cost of office accommodation for the year 1975/76 has been changed to be reflected in the department's main estimates instead of the Department of Public Works' main estimates. The change in policy was made after the deadline date to submit main estimates. Consequently, this amount of money had to be requested through supplementary estimates.

LOTO CANADA

Question No. 1,331—Mr. Jones:

Is Quebec getting the largest share of the Loto Canada money and, if so, for what reason?

Mr. Hugh Poulin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): The government of Quebec receives its province's share of Loto Canada's net revenues as stipulated by the passage of Bill C-94 on June 22, 1976: "an amount not to exceed 12.5 percent of the credit of the National Lottery Account, to the government of each province, in proportion to the number of tickets sold by Loto Canada Inc. in each province. . ." As the province with the largest number of ticket sales, Quebec, therefore, receives the largest share of these net revenues. The Régie des Installations Olympiques receives its share of Loto Canada's net revenues as stipulated by the passage of Bill C-94: "an amount not to exceed 82.5 percent of the amount to the credit of the National Lottery Account, subject to any directions that are from time to time given by order of the Governor in Council, to (a) the Régie des Installations Olympiques to assist in the financing of the deficit of the 1976 Olympic Games; and (b) the XI Commonwealth Games Canada (1978) Foundation to assist in the financing of the 1978 Commonwealth Games."

POST OFFICE CALENDARS

Question No. 1,696—Mr. Howie:

1. What was the total cost of the 1977 Post Office Calendar?

2. Was the job put out for tender and, if so, who was awarded the job?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Postmaster General): 1. Total cost of the 1977 Post Office calendar is $112,000. Earlier figures released (No. 1,296 answered on February 2, 1977) indicated the cost as just under $117,000; however, certain austerity moves managed to reduce costs.

2. Yes, the job was put out for tender through Department of Supply and Services. It was awarded to Lawson Graphics Ltd., Toronto.

PROJECTED IMMIGRATION STATISTICS UNDER THE PROPOSED IMMIGRATION BILL

Question No. 1,780—Mr. Wenman:

1. What are the projected immigration statistics for (a) 1977 (b) 1978 (c) 1979 (d) 1980 (e) 1981 under the proposed Immigration Bill and the Minister's new regulations and what is a breakdown of the total by country of origin or geographic area?

2. What are the projected immigration statistics for the Greater Vancouver Regional District for (a) 1977 (b) 1978 (c) 1979 (d) 1980 (e) 1981 by country of origin or geographic area?

Order Paper Questions

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): 1. (a) For 1977, the level of interest abroad combined with labour market factors in Canada tends to indicate that total immigration for the year may be a little lower than it was in 1976, when 149,249 immigrants were landed in Canada. (b), (c), (d), (e) Under the proposed Immigration Bill currently before Parliament, Section 7 states "The Minister, after consultation with the provinces concerning regional demographic needs and labour market considerations and after consultation with such other persons, organizations and institutions as he deems appropriate, shall announce annually the number of immigrants that the Government of Canada deems it appropriate to admit during any specified period of time". The consultations process referred to in Section 7 will not take place until such time as the Bill receives Royal Assent. As a result, there are no estimates or projections available regarding the volume, source or distribution of immigrants that will arrive in Canada in the years 1978 onward.

2. (a) There have been no projections regarding immigration by source region or destination in Canada for the year 1977. (b), (c), (d), (e) Please see answer to 1 (b), (c), (d), (e).

LIP—FINAL ALLOCATION BY PROVINCE OF FUNDS

Question No. 1,804—Mr. Korchinski:

1. What was the amount of money (a) initially allocated (b) made available under the second allocation to each province under the LIP Programme?

2. What was the amount finally approved for each province?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration):

Province	1. (a) Initial Allocation	1. (b) Supplementary Allocation	Increase or Decrease after Redistribution	2. Final Allocation
Newfoundland	$ 7,718,000	$10,097,000	$3,296,900	$ 21,111,900

JURISDICTION OF NEW ISLANDS ARISING AS RESULT OF ISOSTATIC REBOUND

Question No. 1,863—Mr. Yewchuk:

When new islands arise in (a) Hudson Bay (b) Ungava Bay (c) the Labrador Sea, as a result of isostatic rebound, under whose jurisdiction do they come, Canada or the nearest province?

Mr. Maurice Dupras (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): The Department of Energy, Mines and Resources reports as follows: No islands have arisen in (a) Hudson Bay, (b) Ungava Bay, (c) the Labrador Sea, as a result of isostatic rebound. Therefore, no information on jurisdiction is available at this time.

TEMPERATURE COMFORT LEVELS

Question No. 1,864—Mr. Herbert:

1. With reference to the answer to Question No. 1,605, does the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources promote the concept that temperature comfort levels depend on a combination of the heat levels and humidity levels?

2. Does the Minister believe that economies can be affected in winter by increasing humidity levels with corresponding reductions in the setting of the thermostat?

3. Does the Department intend to promote the use of dehumidification systems in summer as a means of reducing the consumption of fuel for air cooling purposes?

[Mr. Wenman.]

Mr. Maurice Dupras (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): The Department of Energy, Mines and Resources reports as follows: 1. The effectiveness of humidity in allowing lower temperature settings is uncertain. The equipment guide (1972) of the American society of heating refrigeration and air conditioning engineers states the following: Human Comfort. The effect of relative humidity on all aspects of human comfort has not as yet been completely established. From the standpoint of thermal comfort, it has usually been assumed that higher temperatures are required to offset the effect of decreased relative humidity. This is exemplified by the effective temperature lines of the basic ASHRAE Comfort Chart, which was developed through studies of the immediate reaction of people entering a conditioned space. More recent studies based on the reactions of subjects after several hours' exposure to the controlled environment have suggested that relative humidity has a negligible or much smaller effect on the sensation of warmth. These results apply to lightly clothed subjects engaged in light activities. The effects of relative humidity on the comfort of people engaged in moderate to high levels of activity have not been carefully re-examined, but it may be assumed that relative humidity will have a marked influence under conditions of sweating. Low relative humidity may well be undesirable for reasons other than those based on thermal comfort. Low levels will no doubt lead to increased evaporation from the membranes of the nose and throat, and to drying of the skin and hair. Some medical opinion attributes the increased incidence of respiratory complaints to drying out of the mucous membranes due to low humidities indoors in winter. However, no well documented evidence appears to have been presented which would indicate a serious hazard to health resulting from exposure of people to low humidity conditions. In spite of lack of complete information, it seems logical to assume that extremes of humidity are undesirable and that, for human comfort, relative humidities should be kept within a broad range of 30 to 60 percent."

2. The benefits of humidification are not fully documented. Note response to first question.

3. No.

ESTIMATED ANNUAL QUANTITY OF IMPORTED OIL USED FOR ELECTRICAL GENERATION

Question No. 1,865—Mr. Herbert:

1. What is the total estimated annual quantity of imported oil used for electrical generation and what is the estimated quantity of electricity generated by this means?

2. What was the total quantity of electricity exported in the last year for which figures are available?

3. Is any tariff applied to exported electricity?

Mr. Maurice Dupras (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): The Department of Energy, Mines and Resources reports as follows: 1. In 1975, electric utilities in Quebec and the Atlantic provinces generated 5,948 GWH of electricity from 12,328 thousand barrels of imported oil. In addition, there was a further 5,214 thousand barrels of oil used by industry to generate electricity in 1974, the latest available data.

2. In 1975, Canada exported 11,425 GWH of electricity.

3. Electricity exports are licenced by the National Energy Board but there is no tariff applied.

VETERANS AFFAIRS—QUEEN MARY VETERANS HOSPITAL UNILINGUAL ENGLISH EMPLOYEES

Question No. 1,884—Mr. Herbert:

1. In the discussions concerning the transfer of the Queen Mary Veterans Hospital to the provincial government, what agreements have been sought to guarantee the continuing employment of unilingual English employees?

2. How many unilingual English employees are presently employed by the Department of Veterans Affairs at this hospital?

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): 1. The question of continuing employment for unilingual English employees following the transfer of Queen Mary Veterans Hospital has not been discussed with provincial authorities other than to have it included as an agenda item for a future meeting.

2. Approximately 50 continuing employees are unilingual English.

QUEEN MARY VETERANS HOSPITAL—BENEFITS TO TRANSFERRED EMPLOYEES

Question No. 1,885—Mr. Herbert:

Is it the intention, in the agreement of transfer to the provincial government of the Queen Mary Veterans Hospital, to include a guarantee that the terms and conditions of employment of transferred federal employees be no less favourable than those enjoyed while the public servants were in the federal service and, if so, how will it apply to the benefits of the Public Service Superannuation Act?

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): It is the intention, in the agreement of transfer, to ensure that terms and conditions of employment of transferred staff are globally the same before and after transfer. Discussions respecting a superannuation plan are under way; no conclusions have been reached.

QUEEN MARY VETERANS HOSPITAL—OUT-PATIENT SERVICE

Question No. 1,886—Mr. Herbert:

Under the agreement of transfer to the provincial government of the Queen Mary Veterans Hospital in Montreal, will there be continuing provision of out-patient service to veterans and, if not, will the Department of Veterans Affairs be providing this service elsewhere and, if so, what are the details?

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): The terms of an agreement to transfer Queen Mary Veterans Hospital have not been finalized. Appropriate arrangements for out-patient services will be a subject for discussion with the Provincial Authorities.

CANADA WORKS PROGRAM—OKANAGAN CONSTITUENCY

Question No. 1,911—Mr. Johnston:

What was the total amount spent on advertising for phase one of Canada Works in the Constituency of Okanagan—Kootenay, including newspapers, radio and any other medium?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Radio, $9,072; Dailies, 7,427; Weeklies, 3,288; Total, $19,787.

TELECOMMUNICATIONS—COSTS FOR EQUIPMENT AND SERVICES

Question No. 1,943—Mr. O'Sullivan:

1. What were the total costs included in the 1975-76 estimates of the Department of Manpower and Immigration for telephone equipment and services and other related communications devices?

2. How are such costs divided between (a) equipment rentals (b) professional and special services (c) purchased repair and upkeep of equipment (d) charges on other than local communications (e) materials and supplies (f) other costs?

3. What is the total forecasted expenditure for 1976-77?

4. How are such forecast expenditures divided between (a) equipment rentals (b) professional and special services (c) purchased repair and upkeep of equipment (d) charges on other than local communications (e) materials and supplies (f) other costs?

5. What amount of damages were sustained to telephone equipment and other related communications devices in the Department in 1975-76?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): 1. $6,719,888.

Order Paper Questions

2. (a) $4,412,836; (b) nil; (c) equipment is on rental; (d) $2,307,052 (e) information not available; (f) nil.

3. $6,245,386.

4. (a) $4,153,189; (b) nil; (c) equipment is on rental; (d) $2,092,197; (e) information not available; (f) nil.

5. Nil.

GOLF PROFESSIONALS REGISTERED WITH CANADA MANPOWER CENTRES

Question No. 1,952—Mr. Herbert:

1. How many golf professionals are presently registered with the Department of Manpower and Immigration as seeking employment?

2. How many are presently drawing unemployment insurance benefits?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): In so far as the Department of Manpower and Immigration is concerned the answer is: 1. Although there may be golf professionals registered with the Department of Manpower and Immigration as seeking employment, they form only a small part of a larger group defined as coaches, trainers, instructors and managers, sport and recreation. Present statistics gathering processes do not lend themselves to the disaggregation of data to pinpoint golf professionals.

2. The commission does not maintain the statistical information requested.

LIP—ADMINISTRATION OF JOB CREATION BRANCH IN BRITISH COLUMBIA

Question No. 1,977—Mr. Whittaker:

1. (a) What was the total amount allocated under the Local Initiatives Programme to British Columbia constituencies in 1975-76 (b) what were the individual allocations for each constituency?

2. (a) How many job creation offices, additional to Vancouver, have been set up or are being planned for the Province and, in which constituencies (b) how many persons will be required to staff each such office and from what locations will they be drawn (c) what will be the salary of each officer?

3. How many jobs were created by the LIP Programme in (a) British Columbia (b) each B.C. constituency in 1975-76?

4. What percentage of the LIP Programme allocations in British Columbia constituencies covered administrative costs for 1975-76?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): 1. (a) $18,128,000; (b) See statement "A" following.

2. (a), (b) and (c) See statement "B" following.

*AIB—STUDY KITS ON INFLATION

Question No. 1,836—Mr. Diefenbaker:

1. Is the Anti-Inflation Board distributing free study kits on inflation across Canada?

2. Do the kits include an "Inflation Debater" and the text of the Prime Minister's address to the Nation in October 1975?

3. How many pages are there in this kit and what is the total number of pages of printed matter setting out the government's anti-inflation policy?

4. What is the estimated total cost of the kit?

[English]

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): 1. Yes. The study kits were offered to high schools across Canada. These kits consisted of the items listed in Part 2 for use in discussion by the teachers and an additional 40 copies of the Inflation Debator are included for distribution to the students. To date 427,600 copies of the Inflation Debator have been distributed through 4,360 class sets and 160,000 copies were carried as a feature section in the teenage publication Todays Generation—January, 1977 edition.

2. Yes. The complete kit is composed of: Glossary of Terms, Anti-Inflation Program; Year One; A Guide to Your Personal Fight Against Inflation; Inflation and the AIB; Attack on Inflation—A Program of National Action; Text of the Prime Minister's Message on National Television and Radio, October 13, 1975; Labour's Manifesto for Canada; Inflation Debator and The Way Ahead: Framework for Discussion.

3. There are 160 pages in the complete kit. The total number of pages setting out the government's anti-inflation policy—106.

4. $91,000 approximately. Total number of kits in both official languages, 5,920; Total number of Inflation Debator in both official languages, 489,000.

INTERIM SUPPLY

ESTIMATES FOR FINANCIAL YEAR ENDING MARCH 31, 1978

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board) moved that Bill C-45, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending March 31, 1978, be read the second time and referred to committee of the whole.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): He is here today.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, while the greater part of the substance of the bill relates to the responsibility of my colleague, the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras), clause 5, which has to do with the borrowing authority, comes under my responsibility. I should, therefore, like to make a report to the House on the exercise of borrowing authority in the fiscal year now ending and in the coming year.

In clause 5 of the interim supply bill now before the House the government is seeking a new statutory borrowing authority of $7 billion and to cancel all outstanding and unused borrowing authority. As hon. members are aware, the Financial Administration Act, part IV, section 36, requires that "no money shall be borrowed or security issued by or on behalf of Her Majesty without the authority of Parliament". This refers to "new" money only because there is a continuing authority in the act for the government to borrow funds to repay maturing debt. Authority to borrow sufficient new money to cover estimated financial requirements together with a margin for contingencies is normally sought and granted in one of the first appropriation acts of a new fiscal year.

The long-established procedure for seeking new borrowing powers had been to attach a clause to supply bills brought before the House. This provided no opportunity to debate the borrowing authority being sought under this procedure because the clause is not part of the estimates discussed in standing committees and the supply bill is normally passed without debate.

Mr. Speaker, it was agreed last year that there should be an opportunity for debate on this topic and, indeed, the procedures now being followed reflect a recommendation by the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization and agreements among the House leaders.

Hon. members may find it helpful if I begin by reviewing the situation in fiscal 1976-77 which will shortly come to an end. It will be recalled that a borrowing authority of $6 billion was provided in Appropriation Act No. 2, 1976. Under this total authority of $6 billion, we have obtained net new money of $4.85 billion this fiscal year and a further $275 million will be obtained from the April 1 bond issue. Thus, the unused authority which will be cancelled by the passage of this bill will amount to about $875 million. By March 31, 1977, the increases in debt issues will be as follows: treasury bills, $1,760 million; Canada savings bonds, $800 million; marketable bonds, $2,290 million. The total is $4,850 million.

The amounts offered at the 90-day and 180-day treasury bill auctions were $30 million above the amounts maturing each week of the fiscal year. The one-year bills were auctioned four times during the year with increments totalling $200 million over the period. In fiscal 1976-77, $1,960 million marketable bonds matured and $4,250 million new bonds were sold. In order to both broaden the market for our marketable bonds and to lengthen the average term to maturity of our debt, emphasis was placed, during the year, on raising money in the longer term bond market. About 38 per cent of the bonds sold during this period had a maturity in excess of ten years and, as a result, the average term of the federal debt was lengthened from three years eight months to four years six months.

The 1976-77 Canada savings bond program was most successful in terms of meeting our objectives. Gross sales of about $2,100 million were achieved while redemptions during the fiscal year totalled about $1,300 million. Reflecting our efforts to de-emphasize Canada savings bonds as a source of new funds, Canada savings bonds now represent approximately 38 per cent of the total government debt, as compared with 41 per cent a year ago.

The ownership of the government's debt changed quite significantly during fiscal 1976-77. Chartered banks increased their holdings of marketable securities by about $700 million, or 8.6 per cent, while the Bank of Canada has increased its holdings by about $1,000 million, or 12.5 per cent. The general public, however, increased holdings of government of Canada marketable securities by about $2.3 billion, or 36.8 per cent, as well as increasing holdings of Canada savings bonds by $800 million, or 5.1 per cent.

By March 31, 1977 our cash balances are expected to be standing at a level somewhat higher than the $3.1 billion level recorded at the end of the previous fiscal year. The difference reflects exchange transactions with the Bank of Canada and in the foreign exchange markets. These elements of our balances are extremely volatile and cannot be counted on to provide a permanent contribution toward meeting our cash requirements.

Since the books will remain open for a period of time after the close of the fiscal year, it will be some time before more detailed accounts can be prepared showing the breakdown between budgetary and non-budgetary transactions. I shall be providing the House with some preliminary estimates, however, in my budget. The new statutory borrowing authority of $7 billion will provide a margin for contingencies. In the coming fiscal year, as in most previous years, the full amount of this borrowing authority may not be required. It is important, however, that we have the flexibility properly to plan and implement our debt management operations.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Thank you!

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): For example, it is our practice to provide a margin of unused borrowing authority against which we can charge new Canada savings bond sales in the event that an unexpected high level of sales is achieved in the campaign period. We also have to take into account any unpredictable requirements caused by exchange fund account transactions.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the official opposition I welcome this opportunity to debate the appropriation bill for interim supply. I am very pleased that we have the opportunity of showing the government how displeased we are when they try to circumvent the rules by including borrowing authority in supplementary appropriation bills the authority for which has not been provided for in the estimates. This may be a concrete example of why it was necessary to have the motion we had on Tuesday with regard to $1 items. We have to come back to this from time to time in order to teach hon. members that they have to conform with the practices and rules of parliament. Today is a concrete example.

I shall comment at length on the statistical information that the minister gave us. I am sure my colleagues and others in the House will avail themselves of this information in preparation for the budget debate which starts in about ten days' time. It is a matter of record.

I do not intend to speak very long this afternoon because it is generally agreed that other than a short speech of commentary on second reading the House will by agreement move to committee of the whole, on clause 2, it will be open to hon. members to choose any estimates of any department which they see fit.

We clearly indicated to the government House leader yesterday that we wish to discuss in particular detail the estimates of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) and the Postmaster General (Mr. Blais). As far as we are concerned, these shall be given an even break between now and 9.20 p.m. tonight, although I must say the introduction of a ministerial statement with comments did knock off half an hour of our timetable.

I would hope that as part of this experiment we could introduce later a grievance session where members who may have objections can catch Mr. Speaker's eye for maybe three or four minutes so there can be as wide as possible participation until 9.45.

Mr. McCleave: Going back to the old days!

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): As my colleague from Halifax-East Hants (Mr. McCleave) says, it is going back to the old days. The older practices in this House with regard to estimates permitted members to express themselves on the question of supply. That is part and parcel of the task and the role of parliament, regardless of what some pundits say. They say that this shall be a legislative grist-mill and shall be something new and bold. I do not know what they are talking about, because they have not expressed a new idea in years. Be that as it may, I hope that today will provide us with a blue-print for good practice and that in consequence thereof we may bring about some changes in the rules in order to have this better participation.

The minister said he was asking for an increase in the statutory borrowing authority to $7 billion. That is up from $6 billion this year. I think the margin he has provided is good fiscal management, because on a previous occasion it was found that the government, by selling its Canada savings bonds in a good year exceeded the statutory borrowing authority and had to come in by the back door to legitimize its actions.

The latest Bank of Canada statistics, of January 12, 1977, indicate that $41,138 million is the debt of Canada. Of this, there was $16,577 million in Canada savings bonds and $24,279 million in various types of papers, bonds, treasury bills, and so on. With particular reference to our estimates, what is of more concern to me is the increase in the size of the estimates to deal with the national debt. In 1966, $1,110 million was required. In 1974 it was $2,608.9 million. In 1975 it had gone to $3,208.4 million. In 1976, up to supplementary estimates A, it was $3,775 million. This year, as it appears at page 82 of the "blue book", we see that the total program for public debt shall cost $5,350 million. This is not an inconsiderable sum of money. One will appreciate these astronomical figures. In other words, I would say that 96 per cent to 97 per cent of the interest that the government of Canada paid on its national debt is payable in Canada. To that extent, it is money that stays at home.

I do not think this could be said entirely with respect to some of the provinces and the provincial Crown agencies which have to pay a great deal of interest abroad. This is not entirely a matter of accident, because I think, because of the annual sales of Canada savings bonds and certain other features of federal bonds, that some of the provincial authorities find themselves entirely crowded out of the Canadian money market. Canadians, under our tax system, have precious little money to invest in Canada savings bonds, RRSPs, life insurance and other forms of investment. Up to 43 per cent of our gross national product is paid directly into public treasuries. This affords very little leeway for savings. Government of Canada bonds are not bought by provincial governments and municipalities: they are competing for money.

Since the so-called 1971 tax reforms the government of Canada, as well as the provinces, has certainly been slicing into the GNP, leaving precious little to the Canadian bond market. It is no wonder that Canadian Crown agencies, governments, the provinces, municipalities, school boards and businesses have to go abroad to tap savings. Our tax system in Canada confiscates earnings to a degree that should be unacceptable to the Canadian public.

One can only do certain things with one's dollars. Either the Canadian government takes them in the form of tax, which naturally is of no benefit to the taxpayer, or the taxpayer is given an opportunity of saving some money and investing it at his own choice either in Canadian bonds or some other form of Canadian investment. Until we learn our lesson we will be forever bleating that there is too much demand on foreign capital to serve legitimate Canadian interests. Frankly, we as Canadians are the authors of our own misfortune because governments both at this level and the provincial level are going in with both hands and ladling up all they can of the Canadian economic pie.

On that count, Mr. Speaker, I hope we will be able in due course to move into committee of the whole, where my colleagues and others in the House will then turn their attention to particular estimates. I commend this practice to the House and we should see whether we can repeat it and come up with something better than we have had in the past.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise at this second reading stage of the bill mainly to say that we do not intend to make any speeches on second reading. We agree with and accept the idea put forward by the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) that we should use this day primarily in committee of the whole. We have at least three of our members who hope to get on before we reach the time tonight when there might be shorter statements on grievances. Those members include the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond (Mr. Hogan), the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin) and the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Gilbert). If it is of any value to the government to have some warning, the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond is concerned about unemployment in his part of his country as well as throughout Canada. He will be addressing himself to the failure of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion and related matters. The hon. member for Greenwood will be dealing with defence. The hon. member for Broadview will be dealing with housing. Because we want to spend the day on these matters of substance we are quite prepared not to debate second reading of the bill but to let it carry so we can get right into committee of the whole.

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I would like to say only a few words at this stage of the debate on Bill C-45 because I have had the opportunity to examine several bills of this kind since I have been sitting in this House and I note that this one does not differ much from the others.

I would have also liked to make several comments on clause 5 of this bill, but since the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) more or less bombarded us with a number of figures that we found very hard to stomach, I for one—and I do think that most of my colleagues will have to do the same thing—will have to wait until tomorrow to consider a rather comprehensive set of figures that we were given.

In any event, I note the procedure used by the minister and the government, namely the power to borrow $7 billion not only to meet public works but mainly to pay back loans coming due, and I note that the greater part of that $7 billion is going to be used to pay back amounts that are already due, and that sort of leads me to say that there are holes to be filled and that further holes are going to be dug to fill them. The problem will not be solved like that. We will have to pay this year over $5 billion interest on our public debt, nearly the whole amount that is to be borrowed.

Mr. Speaker, I think that until the government decides to take the necessary steps to administer this country the way private industry is administered, we cannot expect to have bills different from this kind.

[Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West).]

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Goodale: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. There were discussions earlier today, and yesterday, with respect to our proceedings later this afternoon in relation to private members' hour. I believe the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) has a suggestion to make respecting that matter.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, in reply to the point of order may I say it would have been my hope that at the appropriate time at five o'clock, when the Chair has to intervene for private members' hour, the House would agree to waive the hour for today in view of the fact that the sponsor of the private bill with first priority is not here today. I suggest we defer it until next week. I have had assurances from the various party House leaders that this is acceptable.

Mr. Goodale: Mr. Speaker, I simply raised the point at this stage because it would cause us some procedural difficulty to attempt to take a decision of the House to deal with private members' hour in other than the usual way if we were in committee at that point in time. I thought it might be easier to deal with the matter now, rather than requiring the committee to rise, report progress and go through that more complicated procedure.

Mr. O'Connell: Mr. Speaker, I certainly intend to support the suggestion of the parliamentary secretary, but I am one of those who is interested in private members' hour on Thursdays, having sponsored private Bill S-2 which, presumably, would have been the bill which would have come into the House if the other private bill was not ready. I am really saying that I regret I have not been consulted about this. I think it would have been more appropriate to consult those who have an interest in private members' hour before making this kind of suggestion. However, I do understand the urgency or importance of this move, and I will support it.

Mr. Goodale: Mr. Speaker, let me just say I regret the oversight in not raising the matter with the hon. member who has just spoken, and I appreciate his courtesy in co-operating with the suggestion that we are making.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, as hon. members will realize, it took a little arm-twisting to get us to accept this proposition, but we do agree to it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. There seems to be general agreement that we waive private members' hour. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): It is so ordered. Accordingly, this bill stands referred to committee of the whole. With the indulgence of the House I will now refer to the adjournment motion.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to committee of the whole.

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock (Mr. Friesen)—Anti-Inflation Board—Suggested instructions to Hostess Foods on refunding excess profits; the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez)—External Affairs—Proposed loan to Chile by Canadian banks—Government position; the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. McGrath)—Transport—Commission of inquiry into problems in Newfoundland—Terms of reference and date of commencement.

Pursuant to Standing Order 54, I do now leave the chair for the House to go into committee of the whole.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

INTERIM SUPPLY

ESTIMATES FOR FINANCIAL YEAR ENDING MARCH 31, 1978

House in committee on Bill C-45, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending March 31, 1978—Mr. Ethier in the chair.

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Chairman, at this stage I want to discuss some questions in connection with the energy estimates, but before going into that I would like to record my surprise at parliament's lack of control in these matters, something which I have observed in the brief time I have been here since last November. At least today we have an opportunity to discuss these matters, but I have found that the time we spend in committees on estimates is misspent so far as obtaining answers from ministers is concerned. I have made many attempts to get some information in various committees but I have found my attempts to be futile.

Not only am I surprised at the fact that billions of dollars go through parliament on deadlines without an opportunity being afforded to the opposition to pressure the government in connection with the estimates and supplementary supply, but the new rule changes brought in by the government have choked off discussion and limited control by the House in these matters. Also, when questions are asked during the question period they are treated very lightly.

I consider that when Canada faces a grave energy situation—and presumably the government and the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources feel the same way in this matter—the question must be treated seriously. Heaven only knows that we have had a sufficient number of energy studies, energy strategies, energy policies and initiatives, as well as technical studies in the last three or four years since the energy crisis arose in the fall of 1973. We have had every kind of strategy, initiatives and report that one could expect from the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources. What we want now is some kind of action from the department in these areas.

Studies were tabled in the House last week which show that energy self-sufficiency in Canada is very unlikely to be achieved. The situation is very serious indeed. Energy costs will escalate. They will certainly double within the next five years or less. Yet when we ask questions in the House regarding these matters we are treated with buffoonery. Hon. members opposite act as if they were gargoyles when they answer questions in the way mine was answered yesterday on this matter. We consider this to be a very serious issue.

An hon. Member: Shame.

Mr. Crosbie: In 1973 the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources initiated all these studies and strategies, and yet they are not being carried out. Only lip service is given to them. Let us consider some of these studies. Let us take a look, first, at a study entitled, "An Energy Strategy for Canada (Summary)" tabled in the House last Thursday. At page 3 it is stated that these are energy-related targets. These days it is always a target, a policy, an initiative or a strategy. The study reads, at page 3:

> The major energy-related targets adopted by the government of Canada are . . . to reduce Canadian net dependence on imported oil in 1985 to one-third of our total oil demands.

That will never be achieved under the present initiatives. It goes on to read:

> —to double, at a minimum, exploration and development in the frontier areas of Canada over the next three years—

This goes back to 1976 when the study was published. It goes on to read:

> —under acceptable social and environmental conditions.

What is happening? The other study tabled last week shows that if Canada is even to attempt to be self-sufficient in oil and gas, and I refer to page 4 of the study entitled "Oil and Natural Gas Resources of Canada, 1976" which reads:

> The bulk of the hydrocarbon potential (mainly gas) lies in the three frontier regions, the Mackenzie Delta-Beaufort Sea, Arctic Islands and Labrador Shelf regions which are expensive and difficult to explore.

The other two areas where we have a chance to be self-sufficient are in heavy oils and in the tar sands, both of which will be very expensive to develop. I attempted to ask a question yesterday about what the minister is doing to expedite frontier exploration. It is stated in the energy strategy study that he will double it over the next three years, but two years have already gone by and we find that not only has the exploration not doubled but it has been decreased by in excess of 50 per cent. In the Arctic Islands the number of oil wells drilled plummetted to 12 last year from the 1973 and 1974 high figures of 23 each year, and the forecast is that there will be a 50 per cent drop in 1977 from last year. In the Mackenzie Delta there is a dramatic drop of 70 per cent from the 1973 peak season of 60 wells, and this year there will be much the same number as in 1976. In other words, the rate has not doubled since the statement was made; it has declined in excess of 50 per cent. Why is that? I will not give you my own opinion as to why. I will give you the opinion from Oil Week in their issue of February 28, a knowledgeable magazine of the industry:

> The decline in exploration in the northern frontiers is due to two reasons. In the southern basin, established transportation facilities, good potential . . . have caused exploration companies to redirect this money to the more favourable areas, and secondly, government waffling, fence-sitting, inaction and indecision on pipelines and land regulations has led to the conclusion that eventual cash flow from Arctic regions may be small.

As the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources has been waffling, sitting on the fence, not acting and indecisive on these questions, we would like some answers from him. Six years ago the oil and gas regulations then in effect were removed and the whole subject was opened up for further exploration. I believe it was on April 27, 1976, that the energy strategy for Canada was made public. It was on May 19, 1976, that the proposed petroleum and natural gas act and the proposed Canadian oil and gas regulations were tabled by the minister, but we are still waiting for the legislation and the regulations to be made public and introduced into the House. That is despite the fact that in the study, "Energy Strategy for Canada", at page 38 it is stated that these regulations would be introduced that year. The following is stated:

> Federal legislation concerning Canadian oil and gas land regulations, to be introduced to parliament shortly—

It was practically a year ago that the document was published. Further on in the same document, at page 127, the following statement is made:

> —the legislation concerning Canadian oil and gas land regulations that will be presented to parliament this year and that will govern exploration and development activity in areas falling within federal jurisdiction, will impose only a nominal royalty and provide a substantial degree of flexibility.

They have not yet been introduced. Yesterday the minister said "soon", and in the committee last week he also said "soon". People who know something about this say that unless speculation is ended about the terms that will apply, there will be very little exploration in these frontier areas. The fall in exploration levels is not so much due to exploration results as to the result of government inaction. There is no foreseeable production time-frame. That is what has happened. Yesterday, when I attempted to ask a question about whether the government is going to provide an incentive so that these frontier areas can be explored more quickly in order to achieve the government's targets, the minister brushed off my question with what I described as a "smart-ass" answer. I made the mistake of using the word "smart".

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order, please. The Chair does not think that is parliamentary language.

Mr. Crosbie: If the Chairman considers those words to be unparliamentary, I withdraw them. In any event, it was a Smart Alec answer which had nothing to do with what I was asking. If I wanted to ask about the oil and gas regulations of the government of Newfoundland, I would ask the government of Newfoundland; I would not ask the federal Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. We are not here in this House for jokes and byplay—and it is not true to say that I have any connection with anything the government of Newfoundland is doing. I left there seven months ago. I am quite prepared to defend whatever that government did when I was there, but I do not even know what its proposed regime is with regard to these oil and gas regulations. They were set out in the last couple of months.

In any event, that is irrelevant. The minister is in a jurisdictional dispute with the government of Newfoundland as to who has control of these matters, but there is no jurisdictional dispute about frontier areas north of the 60th parallel. That is what I was asking about. The minister should get on with the job of seeing that every action necessary to develop the frontier areas is taken if it is his desire that we be self-sufficient.

Our energy future is grim indeed from the point of view of our being self-sufficient and from the point of view of costs; but all we have are these studies and some very tentative steps. What we need now is action. There have been enough studies. There has been enough ministerial mug-wumping. It is time for the minister to outline what he is going to do, how he is going to do it, what it is going to cost, and what the price of oil and gas will be. His studies show that even when oil and gas prices in Canada rise to the world level, that will not be enough to make new tar sands plants and new heavy oil plants economic, certainly not with the present royalty and taxation regime. What is the minister doing about that?

There is supposed to be a meeting of federal and provincial officials to try to settle the terms of the development of another tar sands project. When will there be a progress report on that? What is happening with regard to heavy oil? What is happening to oil prices? In his studies the minister says that within two to four years those prices will rise to the world level. They have to rise to the world level. The other day, in committee, the minister asked what the policy of the Progressive Conservative party is on that. If he does not already know, I will reassure him that our policy is that the prices for oil and gas have to rise to world level, but that in doing this over a period of time we have to keep prices in the United States as a major factor since we cannot allow our prices to climb higher than theirs for competitive reasons.

However, bearing that in mind, we have to go to world prices for oil and gas for conservation reasons and so that we can develop our frontier resources, our tar sands and our heavy oil. But what is the program for that? There is to be a meeting of ministers on April 6. What will be the minister's strategy there? What is holding up the legislation on oil and gas regulations? A year ago the government said the legislation would be introduced in parliament very shortly. What is happening? Nero fiddled while Rome burned, and the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources is giggling, but all our gigawatt hours are being used up and our reserves are burning away.

The minister is not taking our questions seriously. Alberta, British Columbia and, now, even Saskatchewan have changed their revenue regimes. Saskatchewan says it is now going to change its regime to encourage more exploration and development because its past regimes have been too restrictive. That is how the industry has found them to be. What is the government of Canada doing to encourage more exploration in this area? I sometimes think that the minister must be a foreign agent. He should be listed as a lobbyist for East-Can. He keeps referring to East-Can in irrelevant references to the Labrador situation and the dispute with the Newfoundland government.

I have yet to see an oil or gas company which is satisfied with even the regulations proposed by the federal government, much less the regulations of the other government. However, there is no doubt—and experience shows—that if we are going to get under way development in the frontier regions and on the Arctic Islands, and if we are going to do very much with regard to tar sands and heavy oil, there has to be a considerable number of government initiatives.

When the minister speaks I would like him to touch on these energy strategies. They pay lip service to the development of hydro power and renewable energy resources, but lip service only. Each of these documents has the same kind of thing to say about hydro energy and about how it must be encouraged, yet the government of Canada has gone backward in the last six or eight years by not encouraging the development of hydro resources in Canada. I am not just referring to Labrador, although in Labrador alone, if our hydro resources were developed and if they were used in Newfoundland and Canada generally, there would be a tremendous saving: there would be 44.3 million barrels of electricity generating oil saved if Gull Island, Muskrat Falls, the Eagle and several other rivers were developed, and another 38 million barrels of oil would be saved if the hydro potential of five rivers running from Labrador through Quebec to the gulf were developed.

I am not talking just about Labrador. Hydro energy can be found in many remote locations, but it is expensive. There are many other areas throughout Canada where hydro can still be developed, although they are remote northern areas. That potential can be found in the Yukon and in British Columbia. In northwestern Ontario there are rivers which flow to James Bay and to Hudson Bay. There is the Mackenzie River, and rivers running to Ungava Bay. There is the Great Bear River near Norman Wells, the Rat River near the Mackenzie Delta, the Liard River, the Yukon River in the Yukon and in northern British Columbia, and so forth. There are other potential sites in British Columbia. Hydro sites are not just to be found in Labrador, but the hydro potential which is available is remote and expensive and it will not be developed unless the government of Canada is forthcoming with a more generous policy of financial assistance.

Six or seven years ago, in Manitoba, the policy was that the government would lend 100 per cent of the cost of transmission lines from the Nelson River development, but the policy today is to lend a provincial utility engaged in a project involving interregional or interprovincial connections 50 per cent of the money at Crown corporation interest rates. The policy has gone backwards, even though the need is now much greater. The policy of helping nuclear developments is much more generous. The policy is to provide a 50 per cent loan for the first plant in a province, but the government is heavily subsidizing heavy water, Atomic Energy of Canada Limited and the development of nuclear energy in every direction. Meanwhile, hydro energy, which is renewable, clean and which has no dangers associated with it, receives this half-hearted federal support which is nothing but lip service.

What is the matter with the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources? Is the minister blind to the use and the virtues of hydro development? Has it something to do with the fact that the only river he is familiar with is the Humber River which flows through Toronto? Why cannot a real policy of hydro development be initiated by the government of Canada?

In reply to a question asked yesterday by the hon. member for Central Nova, the minister said that he is taking a new initiative with the province of Newfoundland for Labrador. If that is so, it is a very low-key initiative. There have been no substantive new offers from the federal government with regard to hydroelectric development in Newfoundland for Gull Island. There should be. It is criminal that development is not under way there now, but as yet there has not been developed—and there should be—a general hydro assistance policy with much more generous terms than the present one. If Canada is going to get anywhere, we need a new hydro assistance policy.

Lip service has also been paid to the matter of energy conservation. All the strategies and documents suggest that the government hopes to reduce growth to 3.5 per cent per year. As long as politics intervene there is no chance of that, because any genuine conservation assistance will go only to certain selected provinces, depending on what governments those provinces have and depending upon political factors, but not on reason or logic at all.

There are a lot of questions that should be asked in this area and I suggest to the minister that he should deal with some of the major issues today. The documents he has tabled are a major indictment of his inaction. The ordinary people do not understand what they are going to be hit with in the next five to ten years or that what they are going to pay for energy will be stupendous. They do not even know whether their needs can be met. They will not be met if we drift along as we are drifting today and if when questions are asked in this House they are not treated seriously but used as a means to score political points. The minister's energy program requires action. It requires movement in order to meet these problems. I want to end with a short poem, Mr. Speaker.

While energy costs climb and supplies dwindle
Mr. Gillespie engages in the energy swindle
The impression he hopes—

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order, please. The hon. member's time has expired.

Mr. Crosbie: Just two lines, Mr. Chairman.

The impression he hopes is that Canada wins—

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order, please. When hon. members refer to any member of the House it must be by riding, or as "the hon. minister."

Mr. Crosbie:

While energy costs climb and supplies dwindle,
The minister engages in the energy swindle,
The impression he hopes is that Canada wins,
But he answers our questions with inane grins.

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Chairman, I should like to make a few general remarks by way of introduction and then permit members to put specific questions. I think all hon. members have been entertained by the rhetoric of the hon. member opposite. When I made the charge yesterday that he was the author of the Newfoundland regulations, I did not realize that I had hit home so accurately. I can place no other interpretation upon the very substantial part of his remarks this evening which have been directed to defence of the position of Newfoundland and the freedom of Newfoundland to impose its own set of regulations regardless of the price to Newfoundland and regardless of the price to Canadians.

That was the most disappointing part of his remarks. Newfoundland is often regarded—and I think is probably claimed by the hon. member—as one of the poorer regions of the country. It is also a province that has on its offshore some of the richest potential oil and natural gas resources in the country. Six wells have been drilled in some of the toughest water anywhere in the world, and indications of petroleum and natural gas have been found in three of those six wells. That must be regarded as unique in this country and in the northern regions of the offshore. It is very encouraging, and any oilman will endorse that. It is also a fact that drilling in this area has only a three-month season because the icebergs move down and the rigs have to move off. It is dangerous to the drillers and dangerous environmentally, to extend the season. It is also in deep water.

Mr. Baldwin: Like you are.

Mr. Gillespie: In other words, the cost of drilling is probably higher there than almost anywhere in the country, perhaps almost anywhere else in the world. It is also likely to be the most high-cost energy to move to shore once it is found in commercial quantities. That is why the régime in respect of the regulations is so important. That is why the East-Can consortium, which has already invested $100 million in the prospects of this region, has said it is not prepared to go ahead unless they receive assurance from the Newfoundland government—

An hon. Member: That is not true.

Mr. Gillespie: The hon. member says that is not true. I will leave it to him to state his proof. I think the burden of proof is on him.

Mr. Bawden: Tell us about the things you are in charge of.

Mr. Gillespie: I am concerned about the future oil and gas situation, the energy situation in Canada. I think we must take every opportunity to explore where we can, to locate where we can the resources we are going to need in the future. Quite clearly, the frontier is going to be important. The arrogant attitude the hon. member displayed this afternoon is not going to encourage the oil industry to pursue the kind of activity needed in this country. It will be a loss to Canada and Canadians, and very particularly to the people of Newfoundland and Labrador. It will delay the time when we will become self-sufficient. I ask the hon. member to reconsider what can only be called a very defensive and transparent argument in support of his actions and the actions of the government of which he was previously a member.

The hon. member also referred to frontier exploration in other frontiers of Canada and indicated that we were not going to meet the target which our energy strategy set out as double-exploration on the offshore in the next three years. He suggested we only had one year to go. I am not surprised that he might drop a year. What is a 33 per cent error for someone who can make the wild statement he made this evening? The fact of the matter is that one year has gone by and there are two to go. It is also a fact that one of the reasons the industry is standing back at present is that a decision has not been taken on a pipeline by the federal government which would bring the natural gas resources of the Mackenzie Valley to Canada. The hon. member quoted from "Oil Week" and said the minister is waffling on the pipeline decision; I think that was his phrase, that the minister, and perhaps the government as well, are fence-sitting on the pipeline decision. I can only assume the hon. member has made up his mind with respect to the pipeline and has decided it should be built. I can only assume he would tell us which pipeline he would support.

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Chairman, I rise a point of order. The hon. minister has misquoted me. I referred to a decision on pipelines and land regulations.

Mr. Gillespie: The hon. member has clarified his position. He mentioned pipelines and he has confirmed that part, but he has added "land regulations". I will deal with that in later remarks. Let it be clear that he was saying to us that the government has been waffling on a pipeline decision. I should not think it necessary to tell him that the National Energy Board was created by an act of this House for purposes of examining the public interest and determining whether a certificate should issue with respect to public convenience and necessity.

That act was introduced in the 1950s by the government of the right hon. member for Prince Albert. Through that act the National Energy Board was given authority to examine the merits of various pipeline proposals. The hon. member suggests that we should have ignored all that and should have made up our minds in any event; that we should not have waited for the facts. I think that is more than arrogant; I think it is just plain irresponsible.

Mr. Oberle: That is not what he said.

Mr. Gillespie: I challenge him, if he has already made up his mind, to tell us what his decision would have been in these circumstances. I think he should be prepared to back up his charge by following through. Perhaps other members of his party share this view, although I doubt it. He seems to have ignored the fact that the Berger commission was created to examine the social and environmental impact of a pipeline in the Mackenzie Valley. He criticized the government for not having taken a decision at this time. He ought to know that we will not take any decision until the Berger commission report has been tabled, until there has been public discussion, and until we receive the report of the National Energy Board. How else can I possibly interpret his remarks when he says that the government has been waffling on the pipeline?

Mr. Oberle: No, you are twisting; you are stretching.

Mr. Gillespie: As I said, I think the hon. member was more interested in rhetoric, in covering up his own inadequacies, his own decisions of perhaps one year ago, than he was in seeking a real explanation for certain important strategic decisions which have been taken by people in this country. There are other reasons why the exploration in the north, when measured in feet drilled this year, has not been as extensive this past year as it has been in other years. One of those reasons is that the new drilling is largely taking place offshore and is, therefore, very much more expensive. It is much more expensive to drill a well some miles offshore.

I hope hon. members remember the decision the government took one year ago with respect to deep Beaufort Sea drilling. I think hon. members know that it costs in the order of $30 million to drill such a well. It is much more costly to drill wells at sea than it is to drill a well in the shallow gas fields of southern Saskatchewan or Alberta.

The hon. member referred to the oil and gas regulations and asked if I could clarify when the government would place those oil and gas regulations before the House. He would be one of the first to argue that it is important, since the field is technical, since regulations could affect the decisions of the industry and will be considered by the House, that there should be consultation with the industry as to the impact of those regulations.

One year ago we submitted a proposal with respect to the principle of the new regulations, and since then there have been large numbers of discussions between my department and the industry and myself and the industry. The hon. member also recognizes that such regulations are technically difficult to draft and that they must be drafted with great care and skill.

Mr. Bawden: And how many more years will they take?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Chairman, this process has been going on. I hope it is close to final conclusion. I can tell the committee that the legislation dealing with the new land regime and tax regime is being considered by the Department of Justice. I hope to present it to the House shortly. Lastly, the hon. member referred to Gull Island.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order, please. I see the hon. member for Calgary South rising. Does he wish to raise a question of privilege.

Mr. Bawden: No, Mr. Chairman. I wonder if the minister would permit a question?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member will have plenty of time to ask his question when I have concluded my general comments in reply to the questions raised by the hon. member for St. John's West. The hon. member for St. John's West referred to the Gull Island development and its potential. He knows perfectly well that I regard that development, as he does, as most important to Newfoundland and Labrador, indeed to all Canada. I think it is likely to be most important to people in the maritimes. He ought to know that initiatives I have taken are moving forward significantly. I hope he will be prepared to admit that I cannot say more at present because I am awaiting a response from the Premier of Newfoundland. I called the premier some weeks ago and told him of the proposal which would, in effect, not only resurrect the discussion with respect to the transmission system from the lower Churchill to Newfoundland but provide, also, a basis upon which the federal government could discuss with him a financing arrangement involving, possibly, equity financing of the generation facility itself.

The premier responded positively, and I think has indicated publicly his interest in pursuing this question. The ball is now in Newfoundland's court; we are awaiting an update on the engineering study and the cost study to allow us to pursue that particular project in an intelligent and informed way. We will not advance the cause of Gull Island with the wild sort of statements which the hon. member opposite has been making.

Let me make another comment. The hon. member seemed to imply that we were much more generous in supporting the financing of new nuclear facilities than in supporting the financing of transmission systems and hydro systems. I remind him that the offer to Newfoundland with respect to transmission systems is still on the table. The amount of $343 million offered with respect to transmission lines compares favourably with the assistance we have offered New Brunswick for the Point Lepreau nuclear station. When you consider that we are prepared to discuss financing arrangements for generation as well as transmission, you can see that the federal government's offer with respect to that significant hydro facility is greater than any outstanding offer made with respect to any nuclear facility.

I think, in general, those remarks cover what the hon. member said in his introductory statement. I regret that it was not a more constructive statement, although I compliment him on one point: he said his party has now adopted a policy position, which has been a long time coming forward. At least it has adopted a policy position with respect to the pricing of oil. He suggested this afternoon that his party now supports the government's policy of moving oil prices up to the world price. I congratulate him on that, because he should take some of the credit. The Conservative party had not made a policy statement before he joined it. Now, a short time after joining the ranks of those hon. members in this House, he has been able to secure such a policy statement.

Perhaps he will be able to persuade his colleagues to recognize the importance of Petro-Canada. The hon. member comes from the east coast and should recognize the important role Petro-Canada plays in the development of east coast resources. Surely he will be among the first to recognize the potential benefit of Petro-Canada. I regret that he did not mention Petro-Canada when he spoke. There may be some reason for the omission. Perhaps his colleagues recognize his sympathies for Petro-Canada and have sworn him to secrecy. I suggest to the hon. member that if he keeps working away in this manner he may influence the Conservative party to take yet another positive position.

Mr. Hogan: Mr. Chairman, the estimates of the Department of Regional Economic Expension for this year, like the last two years, scarcely keep up with the inflation factor in this country. In my opinion, the Department of Regional Economic Expansion is largely a failure in terms of its stated goal to eliminate the disparity in income gaps as between the Atlantic provinces and central Canada or the Canadian average income. So much of the DREE funds each year, including this year, are allocated to the provinces of Quebec and Ontario that DREE has become a sort of farce in so far as closing the income gap between the Atlantic region and central Canada is concerned.

DREE in the modern period had its genesis with the study that was done by Walter Gordon in 1957 in which he advocated for the Atlantic provinces that a capital projects commission be established. This was shortly to be followed by the Atlantic Development Board which consisted largely of infrastructure expenditures in the Atlantic provinces in the nature of power and highways. It was supposed to come up with a plan for development of the Atlantic provinces that would gradually, over a period of years, close the interim gap that is so old and so consistent within Canadian confederation. The Atlantic Development Board folded before it came up with a plan. It was rapidly followed by another alphabetical agency, the Area Development Agency. It, too, folded after a few years.

In 1969 we got the Department of Regional Economic Expansion. The Department of Regional Economic Expansion has followed a policy of developing the larger or metropolitan areas of Atlantic provinces, practically ignoring the smaller ones. There are gaps between the regions within a province; for example, between metropolitan Saint John, New Brunswick, and northern New Brunswick, between St. John's, Newfoundland, and all the outer regions of Newfoundland, between Charlottetown and the rest of the province of Prince Edward Island, and between the Halifax-Dartmouth area and the rest of the province of Nova Scotia.

What we have is a policy that is based upon the notion that where there is already a government apparatus in the form of an existing government, for example in Nova Scotia which is highly supplemented by the defence sector, the policy is to push large funds in infrastructure into these areas while at the same time allowing the outer areas to go down relative to these central areas. The result is that only recently, with the advent of the Anti-Inflation Board and the cutting down of federal expenditures in areas such as Halifax-Dartmouth, has the gap been somewhat closed between the Atlantic provinces and the central Canadian average. However, this was at the cost of the outer areas. What DREE has done is look after three-quarters of a million of the people in the Atlantic provinces while completely neglecting the other 1¼ million who live there. I suggest that this is a stupid policy.

If I were a Liberal member from the Atlantic provinces I would ask the cabinet to reconsider whether what they are doing in the Department of Regional Economic Expansion is largely a waste of time except for image building. They can say they have a Department of Regional Economic Expansion. When Premier Regan took over in the province of Nova Scotia, rather than completely throwing out the voluntary economic planning board that had been set up by a previous Conservative government, he left it in order to show that they had the image of a planning power. Something much more decisive is needed. I do not have time to go into detail. However, in my opinion one of the great failures of DREE as far as the Atlantic provinces are concerned is related to the general fiscal and monetary policies that have been followed by this government in recent years, especially the so-called Trudeau years.

Today there is a pessimistic feeling that we can never really get back to full employment in this country. Why? It is because of the monetary and fiscal policies that have been followed for so long. We have a classic example of that now with over one million Canadians unemployed. If you include the hidden unemployed, it would be no exaggeration to say that there are between 1,300,000 and 1,500,000. All of this has been done in order to control inflation. At the same time, we have had tight control over the private sector by means of the Anti-Inflation Board. In my opinion, there was no need for it. A correction was probably needed to balance off the public sector wages in the past five or eight years against the private sector. Rather than the government facing up to that responsibility—and this includes not only the federal government but provincial and municipal governments—they let the whole situation get out of line.

The failure of DREE is closely related to the failure of national policies. We will never get a successful Department of Regional Economic Expansion and a closing of the income gap between the Atlantic provinces and other poorer regions of Canada and the other regions that are well off until there is co-ordination between the fiscal and monetary macroeconomic policies and the policies co-ordinated with new development organizations at a regional level.

As I have pointed out, there are many today who are saying that we can never get back to full employment. With the proper policies we can get back to it within three or four years. There is a pessimistic feeling that we can never really get back to a full employment economy. I propose in this speech to show that it can, and must, be done in order to keep confederation going.

We are worried, now, about the cultural climate of Quebec because of the victory of the Parti Québécois which is connected with separatism. We know there are linguistic and cultural roots. The feeling of separatism and the kindling of that feeling in Quebec is largely tied to the fact that their economic resources have not been used well. Many of their people, both young and old, who should be working are not working. According to Statistics Canada, there is 10 per cent unemployment in that province, but in reality it is closer to 13 per cent. That, in itself, is enough to kindle the separatist feeling. All this has happened under a man well-intentioned in his bilingual policy, although it has been badly implemented, but who has completely neglected to manage our economy so well that these forces in Quebec could be squelched. I feel, coming from the Atlantic region, complete affinity for these people as far as this economic insecurity and this feeling of economic inferiority is concerned, because really what the government has failed to do in managing its over-all policy is to allow Quebec, the Atlantic regions and northern Ontario, and so on, to suffer in order that the large metropolitan areas would improve.

It is true that most people in this country live in the large metropolitan areas, and it is true that the government—and this bothers me very much—has a policy for the future based upon a policy that has been shown in the United States to be stupid, to build very large—huge—cities so that you never contain, for example, a population of the size of Toronto; you just let it go on and on, because you let market forces keep intervening because you cannot take the steps to halt them as a government; and provincial governments seem to agree. It is the same in Montreal, the same in Vancouver. So we are content to say, as Canadians, that within the next 20 or 25 years, three-quarters of our people will live in four or five cities.

No wonder there is a feeling of alienation. No wonder there is a feeling of separatism outside these areas, when most of the government's thinking is done this way and when you have a kind of a bone thrown to the dog in terms of something called DREE that does nothing except add to that type of thing by just improving the large metropolitan areas of the Atlantic region.

Again, if you look at the statistics, Mr. Chairman, you will find that outside Halifax and Dartmouth in Nova Scotia, outside Saint John and Fredericton in New Brunswick, outside St. John's in Newfoundland, outside Charlottetown in Prince Edward Island, the rest of the people in the Atlantic region get only 50 per cent—between 50 per cent and 55 per cent—of the average income of Canadians who live in the other metropolitan areas I have mentioned, especially here in central Canada, in Ontario, Alberta and British Columbia. I submit this is a disgrace and that we need policies of a national nature that will make regional organizations such as DREE meaningful only when they are co-ordinated so that they will have some kind of meaning for these outlying areas. Until this is done, until we get these policies, until we get a recommitment for full employment, there is no hope that what I am asking for will take place. In other words, we need the pursuit of equity in this country through guaranteed employment.

Everybody in Canada, left, right and centre, would probably say they are in favour of an equitable society. The difference arises as to what exactly is meant by equity and the divergent evaluation of the costs and benefits in conflicting ways of achieving equity. Since in our democratic country society's idea of fair distribution of economic resources depends upon bringing together our various individual ideas of equity, the first problem is to determine how each of us would specify an equitable society. Only then can we move on to determining and implementing our collective wisdom.

To aid in this process I invite hon. members to perform the following experiment called, in psychology, the Gedanken experiment. Imagine that all economic resources were to be awarded in a random lottery where none of us would know whether we were to gain the largest or the smallest prize. If this were the case, what distribution of prizes would we like our lottery to make? While we might agree on the amount of inequality we would be willing to generate, most of us would not advocate great inequalities, and all of us would be in favour of some minimum prize—our survival would depend on it. Those advocating inequality must prove that any decrease in inequality would reduce the size or rate of growth of the economic pie that is available for distribution.

Given this burden of proof, what does the evidence show? Fortunately, this is one of the few cases where in North America all the empirical evidence points in the same direction. Surveys of work behaviour, econometric studies of work decisions and negative income tax experiments all suggest that current inequalities are much larger than those necessary to produce and expand the gross national product. The tax system, positive and negative, could be made more progressive and, if anything, work efforts would increase rather than diminish.

Just how thorough is the inequality in the distribution of the national economic pie? In 1965, as far as family units were concerned, the bottom 20 per cent were getting 4.4 per cent of that pie while the top 20 per cent were getting 41.4 per cent. The family unit is defined here as including both families and unattached individuals. In 1974, the bottom 20 per cent were getting 4 per cent of the national pie and the top 20 per cent were getting 42.5 per cent. The sad part of the matter is that both in Canada and the United States the relative position of these groups has been the same since 1957, despite all the individual components which go to make up the welfare state in a mixed capitalistic system.

When you look at families, and that includes the unattached individual, you find that in 1965 the bottom 20 per cent were getting 6.2 per cent of the pie and the top 20 per cent were getting 39 per cent. In 1974 it was 6.3 per cent for the bottom 20 per cent and 38.8 per cent for the top 20 per cent. In 1974, there were 5.5 million families in Canada. We dismiss this fact and try to hide behind the statistics. But they are Canadian citizens and families.

There were, in 1974, 93,500 families who received less than $3,000 a year in this country. There are some, of course, who are quick to point out that these statistics need to be qualified. For example, it is pointed out that the lowest income group, who get such a miserable morsel of our economic pie, are not a permanent group but change from generation to generation. In the economists' parlance, they are a flow and not a stock. This argument seems to me to take nothing away from the argument that the lowest 20 per cent, so heavily made up of senior citizens and women who are heads of households, are suffering very badly under our economic system.

The Chairman: Order, please. I have to inform the hon. member that his allotted time has expired. The hon. member for Madawaska-Victoria.

[Translation]

Mr. Corbin: Mr. Chairman, I will speak briefly, but I did not want to miss the opportunity of mentioning that I agree with a number of things stated by the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond (Mr. Hogan) this afternoon when he referred among others to the effects of our DREE program. His comments were particularly relevant when he said that since the establishment of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion some really serious inequalities have appeared within regions and I entirely agree with his statements. He is absolutely right and it is a matter which concerns me also very much but I feel that he has failed to point out the role or responsibility of provincial governments in the development of a policy to deal squarely with regional inequalities. I think in all fairness that we must recognize and respect provincial jurisdictions. I would have preferred that the hon. member speak in a non-partisan way. The question is not whether Nova Scotia's provincial administration is Liberal or not, or whether New Brunswick's is Progressive Conservative or not. The basic question is far too serious to stop at partisan considerations. Be that as it may, it is apparent that since the Department of Regional Economic Expansion was established by Parliament in July 1969, disparities have been getting worse in New Brunswick, between the richer areas in the south, including the cities of St. John, Moncton and Fredericton for instance, and the northern areas including to all practical purposes the rest of the province. The average income of people in the northern part of the province has been on a constant decline relative to people in the south. This is why I am very much concerned, as is the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond (Mr. Hogan). Certainly he can speak with much eloquence and conviction for his province of Nova Scotia, and I commend him for that. But I feel we must not enter into partisan considerations.

This leads me to suggest it is more urgent than ever that provincial governments in the Atlantic area and the national government here in Ottawa, and especially the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Lessard) sit down and develop together a plan to tackle regional disparities effectively and efficiently, taking into account the needs of all parts of the area, and putting and end once and for all to the injection of millions and hundreds of millions of dollars into the already thriving centres he referred to, as Halifax, St. John, N.B., St. John's, and Charlottetown. This is urgently needed. I have been urging this for a long time. I do it now publicly in this House. I do not mind stating I have already urged this a number of times in writing. I called attention to this problem a number of times during meetings in my province, in my constituency, in the House of Commons standing committees. But people have always been turning a deaf ear. I gladly recognize that I am not the only one to share these views.

[English]

Mr. Hogan: Mr. Chairman, may I ask the hon. member a question?

The Chairman: The hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond, for the purpose of asking a question.

Mr. Hogan: Mr. Chairman, in no way was my speech a partisan speech except in passing.

[Translation]

Mr. Corbin: It is possible, Mr. Speaker, that my colleague from the Maritimes misunderstood my meaning. I certainly do not wish to accuse him of partisanship. I could perhaps clarify my meaning by saying more precisely that I have mentioned this as an obstacle to avoid and not as an actual fact. I wish we could stretch out our hands in friendship across this aisle and work together for the full economic development of the Atlantic region. I do not know his region well, just as I suspect he does not know mine very well but I think it could be possible to transfer the problems of his area to mine even though there are great differences between both. We do not have his coal mines, his steel mills but we do have other problems with regards to forest industry, agriculture and means of communication. But the basic point is that we understand each other. We talk of the inherent wish of the people living in these areas to work together, to see their two levels of government and even their three levels of government—if we include the municipalities—work together without partisanship to solve these problems.

In New Brunswick, either the required skills are lacking or people work with blinders, but it is an unmistakable fact that since DREE was created the Northumberland-Miramichi area, the northwestern region including Madawaska-Victoria and another area in the south of the province have not, for all practical purposes, derived any benefits from the hundreds of millions of dollars made available to the province, because those amounts were spent on urban centres whose situation was not that bad after all.

And when in the House we want to voice all kinds of reservations regarding bills or amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act, we sometimes get the feeling that we are just speaking in a vacuum, that our colleagues from other parts of Canada do not or simply will not understand what we are speaking about.

As long as people in the Atlantic region are denied other means of earning a decent living without having to expatriate themselves, social assistance programs, such as the unemployment insurance plan, will have to be kept in place until governments actually get together and bring about in Canada the industrial development required to adequately meet people's claims for jobs and a decent living.

That is all I will say for today. I think the basic arguments have been made and forcefully so. I simply wish to echo these comments and I hope we can work together towards the solution of this problem.

[English]

Mr. Oberle: Mr. Chairman, may I take this opportunity in the time allotted to me to return to the energy situation. I wish to express to the minister our appreciation for accommodating members on this side of the House by being here and having his officials present to listen to our side of the story and possibly answer what we think are some very pressing questions. I intend to indulge in a short discussion this afternoon which will add an entirely new dimension to the energy question, new at least to the minister and his department though certainly not new to those of us who have always been looking at energy policies which are designed for the future, having looked back to the past and evaluated what has been happening in the field of energy production and consumption.

I look on the government and this particular department as a group of crisis managers. I call them crisis reactors. "An Energy Strategy for Canada" was, of course, the result of the energy crisis of 1973, when we woke up one morning and found that our fossil energy reserves were not at all what the government and most of us, including industry, had perceived them to be. It is obvious to me, as it is to most people, that the need is for a long-term energy policy. By that I mean that we have to plan 25 years ahead. In order to do that, we must also look back 25 years to get a realistic picture not only of where we will stand 25 years hence but what type of energy we will be using at that time, and beyond, and the price we will be paying for that commodity.

In order to put that picture into focus, Mr. Chairman, one would have to take account of the total global community. I would be naive in the extreme to think that over that period of time Canada could plan its own energy strategy in total isolation and be able jealously to guard its reserve in isolation. One would have to take into account the present rate of growth in the world. There are presently four billion people in the global community; 25 years from now or by the turn of the next century there will be roughly 6.5 billion people.

It is only reasonable to assume that all these people will have achieved a much better standard of living, much closer to that of our own, and that to achieve any kind of breakthrough in the development of the third world and improve the standard of living in some of the underdeveloped countries massive amounts of energy will be required. It seems that the kind of lifestyle which we enjoy depends on gadgetry and the energy required for same. Canadians today are second only to the United States in the consumption of energy. Each family in Canada consumes roughly 55 barrels of oil every year. In projecting 25 years ahead we must take account of the fact that over the past 25 years consumption of energy by Canadians has tripled. Oil and gas 25 years ago met one-quarter of our total energy needs. Today they fill two-thirds of our requirements.

One of the first stages of a long-term energy policy would have to be a policy of conservation. I compliment the minister and his officials for at least recognizing that terminology. I am not at all enthusiastic about the early signs of his conservation policy. I do not believe that these primitivists in our society today are really serious when it comes to turning off the lights and turning down the thermostat. They let their hair grow and say that we have to return to a more primitive lifestyle, but if they were really put to the test I do not think they would be serious.

Furthermore, I do not think we would be as aggressive as the minister likes to tell us to be in turning off our lights at home and turning down our thermostats. Domestic requirements for energy are not really all that great. What we need to be doing, and what the essence of a conservation policy must be, is that our industries and our cities have to learn to convert some of the industrial and solid wastes. It is estimated by the minister's officials that every year we are wasting roughly as much energy as we consume. If trends which have been set over the past 25 years continue, and there is no reason to believe they will not—the trends I am talking about are the increase in our population and our treatment of energy reserves—25 years from now we will be consuming four times as much energy as we do today.

I think that puts into focus the kind of picture I am hoping to portray, namely, that in terms of the global community—our own energy requirements and the requirements of North America 25 years from now—it should be quite obvious to anyone, and it is no great challenge to the imagination, to come to the conclusion that this globe and its fossil reserves will not be sustaining the demand on its inventory past the year 2000.

The obvious questions are: Where will we go, and what will we do? This government will likely wait until the crisis becomes real and more people indulge in deeper examination of the whole question. Then we will react to a crisis situation and implement all kinds of programs which not only will be very costly in human terms but in most cases will be irreversible in terms of the environmental and ecological penalties which we will have to pay.

I have a 14 year-old son, Mr. Chairman, who the other day wrote an essay in school. I suppose he got his information from an encyclopedia that one could go to, but the theme of his essay was that the sun, solar energy, would likely be the answer. As I say, he is only 14 years old and he says this in his essay, which I think is quite a compliment to him:

> The most colossal dynamo of all is the sun, an unimaginably vast source of power which directly or indirectly affects everything on earth. If all the world's fuels were gathered in one place and burned at a rate to match the sun, they would be consumed in four days.
> Although the sun is overcoming a distance of 93 million miles, if trapped, would be enough power to sufficiently supply the earth for over a year, in only two minutes! Considering the amount of energy available from the sun, man has been surprisingly unsuccessful in obtaining it.

What I am getting at, Mr. Chairman, is that this government has done nothing at all, or very little, to look ahead and examine some of the options that we will have to consider in the year 2000 and beyond.

A joint conference in which 13 countries took part was held in Winnipeg last year. The conference looked at solar energy in particular. Our scientists and officials attended. The American contribution to the conference was well founded and well documented, and their solar energy program was well planned. By the year 2000 they plan to draw from the sun 70 per cent of their needs. Over the next two years they have committed $260 million to solar energy development. If they were to make a firm commitment of the type they made to send a man to the moon, I say that in the next ten years there will be no energy shortage because between us we will have developed the technology to harness energy from the sea of energy in which we bathe every day.

One of our leading scientists at the conference showed a blank slide on the projection screen to portray the total amount of our research in the coming year in the field of solar energy. If we continue this approach to renewable resources, we will have to continue to rely on other countries, as we do in other fields of scientific endeavour, to produce the technology that is required to harness these new modes of energy. Also we will have to rely on these countries to produce the technology required to convert energy.

[Mr. Oberle.]

The conference concerned itself also with cost comparisons. We all know what it will cost to bring to market the conventional reserves on which we rely under this government's long range energy policy. In comparison with the cost of renewable resources, the cost of conventional reserves will skyrocket every year as we push farther back to the frontiers, to the Mackenzie Valley and the Beaufort Sea. It will cost more and more every year as we convert heavy oil and tar sands, and there will be a steady increase to our consumers as our prices reach the level of world prices. In contrast with that, the kind of technology that is now being developed to harness solar energy will cost the most at first, but as it is used and refined, and as we convert our homes to the use of this kind of energy, the price will drop. There are no penalties to pay in environmental or ecological terms for the use of the energy which nature provides for us, and there is no limit to that resource in terms of renewable energy reserves.

The minister's officials estimate that capital requirements for the remainder of the 1970's will be $40 billion to $68 billion. Of course this will have to be recovered with the marketing of our oil. If we close our borders to foreign countries, Canadians will have to pay back the $40 billion to $68 billion. The energy policy for Canada indicates the spread in these huge amounts. In the $40 billion component, if we were actually to achieve a conservation program, we would be using less energy in the next two years. Then in the $50 billion program we would use about equal amounts to those we have been using recently. In the $68 billion program we would build the Mackenzie Valley pipeline and several of the infrastructures which will be required to bring the frontier reserves to market.

I would like to hear the minister's response to my remarks when I conclude them. In view of the fact that he is such a proponent of Petro-Canada and of public involvement in the field of energy, I would like him to tell us whether he has asked his officials to estimate how much of the $68 billion will have to come from the public purse to be channeled into this field. Our forecasters estimate that from 1975 to 1990 we will have to come up with $31,000 per family to satisfy our energy requirements. Even solar energy is cheaper today. Surely solar energy, wind energy, and energy from the sea have been intended for man to use, but we have always taken the easy way out.

The minister made a critical comment about my colleague who said that the National Energy Board and the government are procrastinating in making decisions. Let me point out that it was a Tory government which had the first energy policy that ever existed. It was a Tory government which created the National Energy Board. It was Tory policy that established a two-price system—the first policy ever in existence in Canada so far as energy is concerned. It has allowed us to bring oil from the Middle East and Venezuela to our eastern shores, and has allowed us at the same time to harvest and develop our reserves in Canada and to protect our markets. The two-price system was certainly acceptable to eastern Canadians so long as the western price was higher than off-shore prices. But as soon as these prices reached the same level, we soon found the means to equalize oil prices in Canada, and this government has learned to concern itself with energy matters.

Against the background of a long range energy policy, which takes into account that after the year 2,000 we can no longer rely on conventional reserves and will have to develop a new technology that will give us access to the renewable resources around us, we need to catalogue the remaining reserves we have. We need to know every cubic foot of gas and every barrel of oil that are in the ground, and how expensive it will be to market them. In the short term we must be very aggressive in defining our policies with regard to cataloguing our reserves. But then we must learn to plan the period of transition because it will take us 25 years to change our lifestyle and the economic and industrial strategies which we now have.

The most significant segment of our economy is related to the energy field, to the automotive industry, the gasoline marketing industry, and so on, and it will take at least 25 years to plan an orderly transition to allow different economic and demographic strategies to evolve. What is our government doing? It has not even recognized the fact that this kind of thing is necessary, never mind getting to work on it and doing something about it. When can we expect the minister to address himself to this very serious problem?

The problem is that all the policy announcements which come from the government are based on statistical information which is four or five years old; for example, the statistical information we have with regard to the government's intention to channel certain percentages of the available moneys to research. Phase one of "An Energy Policy for Canada" states that we intend to spend 70.6 per cent of our research dollars in the nuclear field and 13.4 per cent on coal. I assume that has to do with some type of coal-gasification or liquefaction for quicker conversion to energy. Oil and gas are to receive 10.6 per cent, and electrical 4.2 per cent. There will be 1 per cent spent on the tar sands, and the others will receive 1 per cent.

I see that my time has elapsed, Mr. Chairman, but I hope you will allow me to make a final comment. The initial priorities for energy research and development must be addressed to fossil fuels. These are the resources which Canada will rely upon to carry it through this century and into the age of nuclear fusion and other advanced technologies. If that is the case, what will we do when we need nuclear fusion and other advanced technology, and who will do the research, if not ourselves? Surely to God we cannot rely on Third World countries, and forever be parasites on the scientific community of the rest of the world.

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Chairman, perhaps I can deal quickly with the remarks of the hon. member because I know that other hon. members are anxious to enter the debate, and some want to put questions.

I commend the hon. member for his emphasis on the need for Canadian policy makers to keep their eyes on the long term, the year 2000 and beyond. As the hon. member knows, we have a report which takes us up to 2020. It is that kind of time frame we will be looking at, and we will be publishing a summary of a report this summer dealing with some of the longer term implications for Canada of the energy supply demand and the opportunities in renewable energies and other forms of energy. Our membership in the IEA is very helpful because other countries are doing the same thing, and we benefit from their work, as they do from ours.

I also commend the hon. member for his emphasis on solar energy. That is clearly one of the most important long term energy sources for the world, and I consider it very important for Canada. That does not mean that in the short term it is going to replace our dependency on oil, foreign or otherwise, or on any fossil fuels for that matter but it can play an important part in our future, and I think that the greater the emphasis on looking at solar energy potential, the greater will be the emphasis on the part of the public on conservation attitudes. I think that renewable energy and conservation go hand in hand. They reinforce each other because they get people thinking. They are self reinforcing.

The hon. member asked a question about investment, and he used the figure of $68 billion. I am not just sure where he got that figure. I am dealing with "An Energy Strategy for Canada". I think he was looking at an earlier report, "An Energy Policy for Canada, Phase One", which was, interestingly enough, an analysis. It is properly described as an analysis as it came out just before the energy crisis itself. The energy crisis came a few months after it had been prepared and published, so that not surprisingly some of the figures in that report have now been superseded by events.

"An Energy Strategy for Canada", which was published last year, under "policies for self-reliance" on page 108 provides a fairly detailed schedule of the investments we estimate will be needed. This refers to capital requirements both in the private sector and in government in five-year time frames up to 1990, and there are two schedules. One deals with what is described as a high price scenario where conservation is likely to be more effective and the attitude toward conservation is likely to be more positive. Another deals with a low price scenario. Roughly one half of the capital expenditures in the high price scenario are expected to be for electric power. That would be for both generation and transmission. Clearly an overwhelming proportion of that would be federal and provincial government expenditure.

As I indicated earlier to the hon. member for St. John's West, there may be a need for federal government participation and assistance, particularly in areas like the maritimes and especially in Newfoundland, where the resources of Newfoundland will be needed for more than just Newfoundland—they will be needed for the maritime region as a whole—where the output of any one particular generating facility will be greater than the needs of the province in which it is located and where the cost of that generation will be beyond the capacity of that province to finance.

On the question of renewable energy research and development, increasingly the government has been placing greater emphasis on the renewable side and the conservation side. In these main estimates there is a provision for an additional $10 million for energy research and development expenditures. The highest priority has been accorded to the renewable side, roughly doubling the investment in energy research and development over the previous year.

Mr. Oberle: How much for solar?

Mr. Gillespie: The next largest amount is for conservation. The hon. member asks specifically what the proportion for solar will be. I will have to find out that amount and give it to him in committee. Last year some 15 separate demonstration projects were funded across the country, but I will get the hon. member the figure on that.

The hon. member also referred to fusion. I am not sure Canada would benefit from fusion. I think we should take a very close look at the potential of our unique CANDU system. There is a strong possibility that a second generation CANDU, using thorium, for example, might well replace any need to consider fusion, which is still a long way off, and certainly any need to consider the fast breeder approach which some European countries are looking at and which the United States is still looking at.

However, the United States has scaled down the fast breeder approach in terms of its order of priority, according to the allocation of research funds this past year. I think we have in the CANDU a remarkable and unique national asset with an enormous potential, because I am told that the thorium cycle, for example, could be used in our existing reactors without any significant re-design of those reactors.

Mr. Martin: Mr. Chairman, I would like to probe one aspect of the energy question a little further with the minister before we move to the next topic, and that is the conservation aspect.

First I should like to take the opportunity to place on the record the extremely important contribution that parliamentarians can and hopefully will make to discussions on energy through the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works, which I have the honour and pleasure of chairing. I might say that the hon. member for St. John's West, who spoke this afternoon, has made a substantial contribution to the work of that committee since he joined it as a relatively new member of the House. We have also the distinguished hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands, who has participated very actively over the last year or so as the representative of his party. There are also members on this side, such as the hon. member for Algoma, the hon. member for Wellington, and the vice-chairman, who is the hon. member for Renfrew North-Nipissing East, and others. It seems to me there is an excellent opportunity through the work of this committee for members on all sides of the House to discuss the vital issues which affect Canadians in the field of energy.

We sought and obtained very general terms of reference that relate to the entire energy strategy report tabled in this House last spring by the minister. We have held two or three meetings in connection with that report but have had to leave it in order to deal with the matter of the estimates. Meetings are planned for the months ahead, and I hope we will be able to formalize these and get into areas of real interest and concern to Canadians.

I will mention a few of these areas, Mr. Speaker. We hope, subject to discussion within the steering committee in the near future, to deal with the question of energy conservation which is probably the single most important area of our entire energy strategy. No matter what we do about future development, figures reported to us recently indicate that by the year 1990 world-wide we will be consuming as much oil in one year as the entire production of the North Sea area. It is extremely important that we bear this in mind.

People are concerned about whether we are actually facing energy shortages or not. Various figures are produced from time to time, but we have to deal with the information at hand, so at the present time it would seem to be the case that by 1990, unless conservation measures are brought in and made an important issue throughout the world, the world will be consuming something in the order of 27 billion barrels of oil. That is a little more than the entire discovery of the North Sea area over a 15-year period. In four months we will be consuming the entire production of the northern slope of Alaska, which is about 10 billion barrels. The problem is there, and our committee intends to deal with energy conservation in a very serious way.

We also want to deal with the subject of nuclear power. Hon. members opposite have raised questions about this recently. It has been suggested there should be special committees, but our committee can deal with it. It is clearly a matter of increasing concern to Canadians, so it is difficult to imagine that our committee would not look into it. It will not be possible to consider all aspects of nuclear power development in a matter of several weeks, but we will endeavour to select the most important issues in the field.

Another area the committee intends to explore is energy transmission systems. The committee had the opportunity to do considerable background work during last year in another general reference dealing with oil and gas supplies in frontier areas and related pipelines. In fact the committee had the unique opportunity of travelling to some of the frontier areas and observing first-hand the difficulties involved in trying to get energy out of some of these fields. There is nothing like going to the tar sands site to see the difference between mining oil, which is done at the tar sands, and obtaining it through drilling operations. The former method is heavily labour intensive and costly, and very different from that to which people have been accustomed.

We went into northern frontier areas such as Rea Point, which is in darkness for a good part of the year. From there crews move into remote areas of the island for 60 to 90 days at a time. They are completely self-sufficient when they go out to try to find new sources of energy.

We had an opportunity to view the Alyeska project in Alaska, and see some of the difficulties in the construction phase and its aftermath. The problems of bringing in new sources of energy are tremendous and far reaching, so the matter of conserving energy and reducing the demand for new resources is very, very important.

The hon. member for Prince George-Peace River asked questions about conservation a moment ago. He is a valued member of the committee, but unfortunately was unable to be present at a meeting on February 22 when an official from the department made a very substantial presentation of some of the plans the department has in the area of conservation.

The Chairman: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member. It being six o'clock I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock tonight.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Martin: Mr. Chairman, I should like to conclude what I was saying about energy matters before the committee rose for supper. Since I understand there is general agreement to consider the Post Office this evening, perhaps I can address a question to the Postmaster General.

I wish to make two comments in connection with energy. First, I raise the general terms of reference the committee has been given to achieve its objectives. I suggest that at the outset it will be necessary for us to divide the energy problems of the country into long-term and short-term ones. This afternoon I was speaking of some of our longer-term problems. Although the committee will agree they are serious, I think it will be appreciated that this country and other countries will face a more immediate crunch, so to speak, around 1985 or 1990. Therefore it is important for the committee to address itself to the short-term aspects of Canada's energy difficulties.

I encourage hon. members to participate actively in the work of the committee, in work which will be done in accordance with its terms of reference. Those interested in the subject should make it a point to attend our meetings and participate fully in our deliberations. There will be ample opportunity to question expert witnesses, hold general discussions and, it is to be hoped, make field trips.

Since it has been agreed that we are to consider the Post Office, I wish to raise with the Postmaster General a matter I have raised several times previously in the House. I raised it in questions during the question period twice, in two consecutive years, and also more extensively in a supply debate one year ago. I refer to the possibility of having some quasi-independent agency undertake the Post Office operation. I hesitate to use the term Crown corporation in view of some of the difficulties some of us have recently encountered in connection with the operation of Crown corporations in one of our standing committees. All the same, I suggest that a strong argument could be made for a study of this alternative. Perhaps the proposal could even be referred to an appropriate standing committee for consideration and debate. I say this because it seems to me that a separate agency, perhaps organized as a corporate structure, could handle Canada's mail delivery and perhaps resolve some of the complex problems we presently face in the area of mail delivery.

I have used the analogy before; I use it once again. I refer to the manner in which the production and distribution of electricity have been handled in my province of Ontario over the past 50 or 60 years. Had that whole area been left in the hands of a department of the government of Ontario, in my view we would probably not only still have the problem of our lights blinking, but the quality of the service would not be near the high degree that most people in this province have come to accept today through the medium of Ontario Hydro.

This does not mean to say that the creation of an agency, a quasi-independent body, is going to offer any magic solution to the very serious problems that face the Postmaster General in endeavouring to give Canadians the kind of service they want. However, it might be a step in the right direction.

If authority and responsibility could be exercised appropriately within a corporate structure of some form, there would be one place in which management-employee problems could be sorted out, and in which new post office locations and equipment could be decided upon and bought. I understand these are all things which are handled by different departments at present, and by the time you come back to the Postmaster General his responsibility in the over-all operation tends to represent only one segment of that operation as most Canadians understand it.

For whatever reason, we have to accept the fact today that there is a general lack or gap in the satisfaction level of many Canadians regarding the efficacy of our mail service, yet we are facing rates that are 50 per cent higher than they were this time last year when we were debating the same issue. It has been my observation, and the observation of others, that very often mail to and from overseas points can be despatched and received in a more efficient way than mail to and from points within our own country.

I appreciate the types of problems being faced by the Postmaster General. I know he is attacking these in the competent manner he has displayed since being appointed to this position. I know he is confident he will be able to overcome many of the problems facing the Post Office at the present time. I would appreciate his comments as to whether, in his view, adequate consideration has been given to the alternative of placing the entire responsibility for the mail operation outside the departmental structure as we know it within the public service and into, I hesitate to use the term, completely independent, but some sort of quasi-independent agency such as was discussed by his predecessor in office during this debate a year ago.

Mr. Blais: Mr. Chairman, first let me extend to the hon. member for Scarborough West my thanks for the kind remarks he has addressed to me. I trust he has set the tone for this evening's discourse and that I can expect from all sides of the House that sort of implied approval of the way the operation is being carried on.

I would also like to indicate to the hon. member that I listened with a considerable amount of interest this afternoon when he was discussing the question of our joint foray into the Mackenzie Valley in October, 1975, under a different responsibility. It was a tremendous experience in terms of Canada's breadth and scope. Indeed, I am very much encouraged by the recognition of Canada's potential, not only in terms of Canada's resources, but in terms of the talent manifested on this side of the House by people of the calibre of the hon. member for Scarborough West.

I will now address myself to the question that is relevant at this particular time and to which an answer is required. The Post Office has for some time now been involved in studying the question of an alternative to the present structure and its particular relationship to the government as a government institution. As the hon. member for Scarborough West has so well indicated, the Post Office as a government department is dependent on other departments in order to achieve certain of its responsibilities. I draw the attention of the House to the fact that the buildings we occupy are either leased or built by the Department of Public Works. We purchase a large portion of the equipment and supplies for our department through DSS. In our negotiations through collective agreements with our unions we have to receive the authorization, really the delegated authority, from Treasury Board. We are dealt with as a government department. That is the way it has been for some time.

Post Office departments in other jurisdictions have attempted to remove themselves from the grip of government bureaucracy. To date the experience in other areas has not been that encouraging. Those difficulties that the Post Office in Canada has had, and there have been some, have also been those of other jurisdictions. I call the hon. member's attention to decentralization in Great Britain and Germany, as well as in the United States.

In the United States, and I owe this information to the hon. member for Brandon-Souris, notwithstanding the attempt to remove the Post Office from the political arena, the impression that one is left with in the United States is that the Post Office is still part and parcel of the government institution. So long has the tradition been in Canada of having the Post Office responsible to the political process that it would take more than one generation, even if a decision were made to have a Crown corporation, for the public to be persuaded that the political process was not somehow involved in the postal service.

The situation is such that in our present economic context, as hon. members know from the estimates that have been tabled in the House, we are facing a deficit of somewhere in the vicinity of $671 million, more than 50 per cent of the total cost of operation of the Post Office. Having that sort of deficit, it would be very difficult to persuade the Canadian taxpayer that the political process and the post office, which is supported to such a large degree by the public treasury, ought not to be responsible through this particular institution.

I want to assure the hon. member for Scarborough West that decisions are being made now to intergrate the Post Office fully into the market place. Some six years ago we created a director of marketing, customer relations.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): How many years ago?

Mr. Blais: Six years ago. It has really assisted the Post Office in adopting a more aggressive stance in the market place. It has resulted in large measure in the introduction of the mechanization process on which we are presently nearing completion.

In effect, what has happened is that we recognize the limits that we face as a government institution as well as the responsibility we face as that same government institution. We have tried to supplement the responsibility that we have toward the taxpayer of Canada, not only to justify the expenditure of public funds but to provide a service to the Canadian public by trying to integrate to a greater extent the commercial establishment, the commercial market place of Canada, and trying to play a bigger role in that area. This brings me in a very roundabout way to the issue of third class mail. It is an example of the way we are attempting to increase the volume that comes into the Post Office, and thereby increase our revenue.

Third class mail has received a very poor misnomer. It is referred to generally by the Canadian people as junk mail. I have given an example of how great that misnomer may be by using the example of—

An hon. Member: A junk speech!

Mr. Blais: —by using the example of the mailing received by the Prime Minister shortly after the selection of the Leader of the Opposition last February. Members may recall that at that time the president of the Conservative Party, in attempting to solicit funds, sent to the Prime Minister, and to myself as well, a letter soliciting moneys, a letter soliciting funds, and also to the hon. member for Moncton—a letter which was received in the mails by all true Grits. That is truly junk mail!

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member for Moncton on a point of order.

Mr. Jones: I want to ask the minister a question. Was he referring to everyone who received that letter as Grits, or just to himself?

Mr. Blais: I was pointing to the hon. gentleman to my right, but if the hon. member for Moncton wants to be included in that category I have no objection. I am told that some others might have.

What I want to say is that what is, or what is not, unacceptable mail is really a matter to be determined by the recipient.

I want to put on record that third class mail, mail which is used by the manufacturing and retail industries in order to reach potential customers, is mail which not only brings additional revenue to the Post Office but is mail which serves the interest of the public. It provides information which is very helpful to the Canadian public. I would simply launch this plea to hon. members generally: discourage the use of that abhorrent term, and encourage constituents to use the mail and to accept the material which comes in the mail and from which they can glean information relating to products they may wish to purchase. As to that information which is not welcome in their own homes, and which is unsolicited, what they can do with it, very simply, is fire their own hearths. They can put it in the fireplace. It burns well, and it will encourage those who do market their goods via direct mail to make sure that the material they do send is in a form acceptable to householders.

I know I have not satisfied the hon. member for Scarborough West by providing him with the type of answer which is positive in content or which, perhaps, he was expecting. But I wanted to indicate to him that the Post Office, is becoming a brand new outfit, a brand new institution. We are experiencing slight difficulties for a short period of time because we are being modernized, we are mechanizing the whole process, but we recognize the obligation to service the public by delivering personal mail. We also recognize that we are an institution which is central to the market place, an institution of communication which has to be used by the Canadian public to the profit not only of the market place but also of the recipient, so that everyone will benefit from this institution which is marching along with the times.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Chairman, I trust the Postmaster General does not intend to make a speech after every contribution to this debate tonight because what we are engaged in is the traditional custom of dealing with grievances, which used to be one of the sacred rights of parliament before the government was granted supply. We shall be bringing up certain specific grievances and I trust that the Postmaster General will try to come to grips with those problems, just as the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources did this afternoon.

I think the Postmaster General is labouring under self-delusion when he says the Post Office is an efficient organization. Obviously he is not reading the press, he is not listening to the dialogue which takes place here, and he is not reading the mail.

An hon. Member: He doesn't get any.

Mr. Dinsdale: It is agreed by most people who are in a position to judge that the postal service in Canada is a pale shadow of what it used to be. Nine years ago Canada had an efficient, reliable, postal service. Today it is the butt of snide jokes. For example, when the further postage increases were made on March 1, two cents on top of the two cents added last September, the comment that rippled across the country, in the light of the poor service given by the Post Office, was that it must represent an additional charge for storage. We can all find examples of mail taking weeks to move across the country. Even the Prime Minister has been quoted as saying, "Everyone knows that the postal service is lousy".

The President of the Treasury Board, who is here tonight, is having great difficulty in bringing Post Office expenditures under control. The Post Office has been a special target of the Auditor General, as well. For example, in an article which appeared in Macleans in June 1976, there is a reference to departmental increases which are well beyond those permissible under Anti-Inflation Board rules. For 1976-77 the figure is $1,122,706,000, which is an increase of 25 per cent over the expenditure for 1975-76. Actually it went higher than that because there were supplementary estimates that added to the total. Of course this will be the case with estimates that are before us this year. There is plenty to grieve about. Some of my colleagues will also be grieving as the evening progresses. I do not want to deprive them of that opportunity.

● (2030)

The previous postmaster general began his career optimistically, and he was the fifth postmaster general since 1970. It is a short and vigorous life. Most postmasters general have talked themselves out of the job very early and suffered a very early demise.

An hon. Member: Just one last round.

Mr. Dinsdale: I was just thinking that when I heard that comment by the hon. member for Scarborough West. I have before me a series of dissertations published by the Post Office Department. I think they cost some $25,000.

Mr. Blais: No, they did not.

Mr. Dinsdale: Perhaps the Postmaster General can correct me on that figure. "What is Behind the Lemming Urge?" is the title. These are speeches that were made by the former postmaster general, Bryce Mackasey. I think we should read, at this time, the last sentence of the last speech in the collection so that the Postmaster General might get the proper perspective of the responsibility that is now his. It reads:

> We are moving beyond ideology. We are responding to necessity. Our choice, as Buckminster Fuller said, is between Utopia and oblivion.

As I listened to the Postmaster General tonight, he was talking about Utopia. I am afraid he is going to fall between two stools and he might wind up in early oblivion unless he comes to grips with some of the problems we shall be bringing forward tonight.

Necessity is the mother of invention. Certainly there must be many inventive skills to come to grips with the many Post Office problems. The practice of the Post Office, in the past few years, has been to launch a study. We have had some 15 studies that have been completed. Most of them are gathering dust on the shelves of the Postmaster General. I have a question on the order paper asking for a reply in specific terms for information on each of the studies. They include the famous blueprint for change which was launched by the former postmaster general of 1968 to 1970, the hon. Eric Kierans, who is not with us. He started this dynamic process of change. The Postmaster General has referred to this. But the postal service has been going downward since that time. Prices have been going upward as well. The latest report is that compiled by Hayes Consultants in co-operation with officials from the Treasury Board. I trust that that report is going to be made available to all members of the House. It seems to me it could be a good basis for dialogue, and we all might work together to improve the postal service.

What we need now is not studies or words, but action. We have a new minister. He already has that feeling of being submerged by the very magnitude of the problem. He made a speech to the Postal Users' Conference in Toronto last November.

Mr. Blais: That is four months ago.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Plus ça change mais c'est la même chose!

Mr. Chrétien: Qui a dit ça?

Mr. Dinsdale: "The public thinks that our people—employees and managers both—exemplify the best way not to run a Post Office." That was the minister's observations.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): He said that?

Mr. Blais: I never said that. I do not know where you got that speech from.

Mr. Dinsdale: Yes, he said that last November. I am quoting from the speech.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Who is the guy who wrote the text?

Mr. Dinsdale: The minister's speechwriter wrote it.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

The Deputy Chairman: Order. The hon. member for Brandon-Souris has the floor.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Chairman, I am reminded of an occasion when I was teaching Sunday school. I had a bright scholar, and we were talking about the children of Israel approaching the Red Sea. The children of Israel stopped at the Red Sea to pray. This young, bright student of mine was very impressed by the fact that the Bible said stop praying and get moving. I think that is an admonition we might give to the Postmaster General at this time because what is needed is action and not studies, and certainly not the verbosity that we have heard here tonight.

I have been encouraged by the start the Postmaster General has made in carrying out his responsibilities. Almost every day complaints come to my office and I send them to the Postmaster General's office. I have been impressed by the fact that he was willing to deal with them. He has shown considerable insight in dealing with them. I hope he will continue to operate on that basis. Also in that speech last November, the Postmaster General—

Mr. Blais: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman—

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. Postmaster General on a point of order.

Mr. Blais: I just want to indicate to the hon. gentleman that that speech was not delivered. If he wishes to quote from that speech, I want to point out that it was a speech that was written but it was a speech that was not delivered.

Mr. Friesen: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman—

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member for Surrey-White Rock on a point of order.

Mr. Friesen: Mr. Chairman, if the Postmaster General says that that speech was not delivered, did he send it through the mail?

The Deputy Chairman: I must point out to the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock that that is not a point of order. That is a point of debate.

Mr. Dinsdale: I am sorry to hear the Postmaster General disavow the speech. Actually it was a pretty good speech. It was a much better speech than he made tonight.

An hon. Member: He is not the writer.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Did he have a speechwriter?

Mr. Dinsdale: He said that the Post Office has the finest postal equipment in the world.

Mr. Chrétien: The speechwriter said that.

Mr. Dinsdale: He said that the Post Office has the unhappiest workers. Grievances are piling up, a backlog of 1,200 at that time. The turnover rate among employees is running at 40 per cent. The work force is plagued by absenteeism, slowdowns, walkouts and strikes. This exists even though, as the hon. gentleman said, wages are the same as for firemen and policemen.

Mr. Blais: I never said that.

Mr. Dinsdale: The Postmaster General keeps denying that, but the publication of the Canadian Union of Postal Workers quoted the same speech.

An hon. Member: You must have given it to them.

Mr. Dinsdale: I did not give it to them.

An hon. Member: You did. It went via junk mail.

Mr. Dinsdale: "P.M. Blames 3,000 Officials" is the headline in volume 6, No. 7, of "CUPW", the official publication of the Canadian Union of Postal Workers, dated Nov.-Dec. of 1976.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Transport is in a mess. The Post Office is in a mess.

Mr. Dinsdale: There were news stories carried about this speech. I am amazed that the Postmaster General disavows it at this time. I do not want to get bogged down placing responsibility for the problems of the Post Office only in one area, that is, in the area of unhappy labour relations, because it is more than a labour problem. As he said, we have gone through a revolutionary period of change in the Post Office.

Mr. Blais: I didn't say that, either.

Mr. Dinsdale: This period of radical change has been carried forward without a sense of direction and proper planning. There have been no clear policy guidelines. The Postmaster General has not helped us in this regard tonight.

There is a lack of ministerial responsibility. The hon. member for Scarborough West raised this point. It has also been raised by successive postmasters generals. The Postmaster General does not really have responsibility for running his department. I do not want him to repeat what he has already said because he seems to have grasped that point. He is subject to Treasury Board, to the Department of Labour for labour relations, to Supply and Services for purchases, to Public Works for buildings, and so forth. This is why, in a question I asked the other afternoon, I urged the Postmaster General to seize the initiative and to get all these groups together, because after all it is his ultimate responsibility to come to grips with these matters.

There has been a process of managerial decentralization carried out. It has not been decentralization in the real sense of the word but merely a process of adding yet another tier of executive responsibility. There is no consultation, there is no delegation of authority, and there is no real communication between the regional offices and the national office.

I was talking about rotation of postmasters general in the past few years. Unfortunately, Mr. Chairman, the same process seems to be going on with deputy postmasters general because Mr. John MacKay, who was deputy postmaster general from 1969 until recently, has now moved on to the Department of Public Works. I had the privilege of attending a farewell reception for Mr. MacKay, and judging from the tributes which were paid he had done an outstanding job and just seemed to be getting his teeth into some of the major areas of concern, such as the labour problem with which it had taken so long to come to grips.

I have visited some post office plants in company with a few of my colleagues across Canada and been impressed with the quality of the labour force in the Post Office. Some 50 per cent of them are women and, as they say, our best men are women. Having talked to the employees on the floor, I discovered that the cause of this backlog of 1,200 grievances to which I referred is the little things, such as failure to deal with personal, human problems; failure on the part of supervisors and shop stewards to consult and deal with a difficulty when it arises on the floor of the plant.

What is needed in the Post Office is a wailing wall where people can get things off their chests. Perhaps we need what many modern industries have these days, a chaplain where personal problems can be dealt with. What is needed is a facility to meet human relations.

The mechanization and automation program has been carried on with unwise haste. This has resulted in delays in the opening of some of the major plants, particularly the bulk mailing plant at Mississauga. It has also produced unnecessary labour difficulties, particularly in the Toronto area. The Post Office has a major problem on its plate at the present time with respect to the long delay of up to two years in the opening of the bulk mailing plant in Mississauga because its chosen company to produce the computers to operate the bulk mailing plant, Computing Devices, has not been able to deliver.

I should like the Postmaster General to comment on how he is going to get around this difficulty. Our opposition post office committee was in the Mississauga plant just before Christmas, and it was a crying shame to see a vast area which should have been humming with activity, having been mechanized and automated, occupied by manual sorters who were attempting to cope with the accumulation of mail during the pre-Christmas rush period. The delay must have been costly, and perhaps it is one of the major reasons why the President of the Treasury Board is not able to bring Post Office costs under control. This is another indication that action is urgently needed, and I trust the Postmaster General will come to grips with that specific problem.

Reference has been made to the Post Office service in the United States. I was there last week and I was pleased to see that they are gradually solving some of their difficulties.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Are they ahead of us?

Mr. Dinsdale: Yes, they are ahead of us in many respects. They have their bulk mailing facility functioning. The one I saw in Washington—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I regret to inform the hon. member that his allotted time has expired. The hon. member for Greenwood.

Mr. Blais: Mr. Chairman, may I simply reply briefly to a few points which have been made by the hon. member for Brandon-Souris before the hon. member for Greenwood speaks. First of all, may I indicate to the hon. gentleman that I did not agree that the control that the Postmaster General had over the Post Office in terms of quality was not adequate. The difficulty is having to act, often having made decisions through agents.

As it stands now, the Postmaster General is responsible for negotiations with the five unions. The hon. member for Brandon-Souris knows that. We are also responsible for the decision regarding what type of building should be built and where it is to be located. We have to act through DPW as a client of DPW, but the decision-making process is ours. We select through S-S the type of goods, supplies and equipment that we need, and they are purchased through the S-S purchasing facilities. So it is not the decision-making process that is hampered; it is simply a question of administrative convenience.

With regard to Mississauga, the hon. gentleman knows that the delay at Mississauga was not the result of labour difficulties or labour strife. As a matter of information—information the hon. member ought to have—the Toronto labour scene in the Post Office has been relatively quiet.

Mr. Dinsdale: It is due to the failure of mechanization.

Mr. Blais: No. So far as mechanization in Toronto is concerned, we have three plants in operation. The mechanized plants are in operation save and except the bulk facility in Mississauga. That has nothing to do with labour relations; that delay was caused by one contractor in that particular plant. I would invite the hon. gentleman to visit that plant. The Mississauga plant is really the most sophisticated postal plant. The difficulty is that there is some slight delay owing to a decision made to centralize the computer activity for the whole plant in one central computer. This had not been done before and there are difficulties in this regard. To obviate these difficulties we have decided to use the more orthodox process of using varius computers for various procedures, and in this way we have now completely transferred operations from terminal A to the three mechanized postal plants in Toronto. Within six weeks I am sure the hon. gentleman will join me in congratulating the Post Office staff on having transferred with as little inconvenience as possible under the circumstances.

Having said that, Mr. Chairman, perhaps in my initial remarks I did use too much levity. We are not here to joke about the Post Office but to talk about an essential service in Canada. It is a federal institution which serves every Canadian citizen on a regular basis. It is true that it has been the butt end of a number of jokes, but I think this is completely unjustified. The hon. member for Brandon-Souris will agree with me that a great part of the criticism which has befallen the Post Office is unjustified.

In the early days, as the hon. member knows, the Post Office was the only mode of communication in Canada. In those days we had to traverse the country by railway, ox cart, or whatever means of transportation was available. There was no expectation of next day delivery. Today the Post Office is competing with modern communications technology, technology which produces instantaneous results. It is evident that within that particular context the Post Office will fare badly in comparison. But in terms of the Post Office which the hon. member knew in his early years, today's Post Office is a most efficient and modern institution. As a matter of fact, by 1978, after our mechanization process is completed, we in Canada will have the most sophisticated and reliable postal service in any place in the world.

When the hon. gentleman tells me that the American system is better than ours, I say to him, fie, because that is completely inaccurate. I have visited postal installations in the United States and so has the hon. member, and they do not compare in any way with the sophisticated institutions that the Canadians have developed here. Surely the hon. gentleman should at least admit to his own pride in the high technology involved in our postal code system.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Does that account for the delays?

Mr. Blais: The hon. member is complaining about delays. He has complained about delays before because he says that mail coming in from Great Britain is late. It is not late in Canada, it is late getting from Great Britain to Canada. I am not responsible for that service, but when it comes within our boundaries it is dispatched with all due haste in the way Canadians can expect their mail to be dispatched.

As everybody will agree, Canada is a leader in communications. One of the pearls in our communications system is the Post Office Department.

An hon. Member: It is still in the oyster.

Mr. Blais: We are having some temporary difficulties because of the immense transformation within the institution. But the transformation is nearly completed. I just wish hon. gentlemen opposite, as well as members on this side, who criticize the service would consider the fact that the Post Office is still engaged in the delivery of hard mail, mail that we cannot stick on microwave or insert through wires which traverse the country, and that we still have to deposit it in a mail box on a street to be picked up by a truck and thereafter to be carried through a system which cannot compare favourably with the telephone and the telegram.

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Chairman, I regret that the Minister of National Defence is not here—I believe he is attending NATO meetings—but having listened to the Postmaster General, I am quite sure he would be capable of answering my questions as well as any other minister.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Blais: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order. If I had known the hon. member for Greenwood was not going to speak on the Post Office I would have taken some more time to make my comments because there are a number of other topics that are pressing and have to be discussed. I had hoped he would introduce those topics through the questions he would ask.

Having said that, and you, Mr. Chairman, having recognized the hon. member for Greenwood, let me say that if he wishes me to reply to his questions on national defence, I will be pleased to do that to the best of my ability.

Some hon. Members: Oh, no!

Mr. Brewin: I am glad that my hope that the minister would answer my questions was justified. I want to assure him that it was with a sense of relief that I thought he would get off the question of the Post Office in a short time.

The subject I intend to raise is not a light one; it is rather serious. I regard it as being of some importance to the Canadian taxpayer.

An hon. Member: And the Post Office is not?

Mr. Brewin: There are other things even more important than the Post Office. We are in danger of imposing a grievous burden on future generations. I refer to the question of the proposed purchase of fighter aircraft at a price estimated at present of $2 billion. Their design, I take it, is for double duty purposes. First of all, in North America we are told we will have a long range interceptor aircraft, and also we will use them in Europe in various roles that I do not need to go into now. I do want to talk about the question of whether these fighter aircraft are needed or are not needed to defend North America. When I questioned the Minister of National Defence about this, he said with a kindly smile that they were designed to protect Canadian security. But I am afraid he is getting into bad habits from the company he is keeping. He did not begin to answer the question which I put to him, which was: how is Canadian security affected by this particular purchase?

I urge that we take a long and careful look at the military needs before we launch on an expensive venture such as the spending of $2 billion, which is the initial figure. We know from long experience that such figures usually multiply. At least that amount of money is supposed to be spent, and I suggest that we take a long and careful look at our military needs. I appreciate that this is a capital expenditure which will be spread over a number of years, but I also recall that it comes on top of $1 billion spent on long range patrol aircraft which were sold to us by Lockheed.

What is the purpose of a fighter aircraft so far as north America is concerned? These new aircraft are to replace the Voodoos which were designed to shoot down manned bombers which would attack Canada, presumably from a source in Europe such as the U.S.S.R. We all agree now that the Voodoos are obsolete, but I suggest that the substitute in defence, the new proposal, is equally obsolete because it is aimed at a non-existent threat. The fact of the matter is that any attack by manned bombers—and this includes the new proposed Backfire which is a medium range bomber which can be refueled to be a long range bomber—on Canada or North America would telegraph its punch, would give advance knowledge of the proposed attack, two or three hours before the weapons arrived, and we have on this continent the power to retaliate massively long before the bombers reached our shores. Indeed, most of the targets would disappear long before, and a massive retaliation could be launched and would be available which would completely and utterly destroy the U.S.S.R. as a society.

We live in a missile age, and some people have not caught up with that. They have an idea that a group of bombers coming over from one side can be shot down on the other side, which makes no sense at all in a missile age. We have to assume the sanity of those who might become military opponents, and who amongst the people in those countries would contemplate making an attack on North Amercia or, indeed, on Canada, which would invite their own annihilation?

We are told that this is necessary for deterrence. How much deterrence do we need? The world has surplus deterrents, enough to wipe out the people in both the super powers over and over again, and yet we are supposed to add this extra deterrent of being able to strike down a bomber which might come over to this country, in the face of the fact that we could create a situation in which the use of nuclear retaliation would be almost completely inevitable.

It is sometimes said, as I have mentioned, that this is for deterrence. To my mind that is an argument which makes no sense whatever. We must determine what is the most effective deterrent, whether we have it and whether anything we do or spend is adding one iota to the strength of our deterrents, and I suggest that the constant building up of the ability to respond to a manned bomber attack, which will probably never happen, is a form of deterrence which is an utter and complete waste of money.

I would like to examine what we could do if we could save a large part of this $2 billion. I do not deny that there is some use for interceptors. We have to defend our sovereignty against casual intervention either in our air space or over our territorial waters, but we certainly do not need 120 or 160 up-to-date fighter aircraft to perform that particular function. The purpose of this large number of fighter aircraft, as I said, is to repel a large scale attack by manned bombers on North America or Canada. When we are talking about how much we could save if we scaled down this colossal sum, I suggest that we always underestimate the total amount required to carry out this kind of plan. My argument is that we should adjust the purchase to the actual need. That indeed is the essence of sound planning of defence policy.

It has been suggested that there is a counter attraction in the possibility of procurement in Canada. Of the six suppliers with whom we are supposed to be dealing four are American, one, I believe, is British, and the other is French. We have absolutely no arrangement, and may never have any arrangement, for procurement in Canada. Indeed when the matter came up before the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence this morning, I asked some of our senior officials, and they said there was no assurance, no knowledge or even a tentative assessment or estimate of the amount of procurement in Canada which will result from expenditure of this sum of about $2 billion.

I would like us to consider—because this is not an impractical subject—what we could do if we did not spend that amount of money on this kind of expenditure. We could use $2 billion in a number of areas. I am not suggesting we could use it for all of them. One area is direct job creation. Capital works, both federal and provincial, are needed in such areas as urban transit, which has been promised, schools, hospitals, nursing homes, and parks. We need money for housing for low income Canadians, and we need it to buy insulation to save energy. We could use it—and we would use it—to increase pensions for senior citizens and to reduce the age eligibility to below 65. We could use it—and we need to use it—to cut personal income tax.

We cannot have it both ways. We cannot spend our money on useless hardware and at the same time spend it on the social needs of the people of Canada. There are specific items. During the last election the Prime Minister promised an urban transit subsidy of $290 million. That is part of it, but I think the major area is direct job creation. It is estimated that we could create 200,000 to 250,000 jobs and reduce the unemployment rate from 7.9 per cent, seasonally adjusted, to about 5 per cent.

It is highly practical to suggest that we spend our money on things which are needed. We do not have infinite options. We cannot go on spending money which is wasted and at the same time do the things we need to do.

I do not blame Canadians or particularly the Canadian government. This form of insanity is pervading the whole world. Humanity as a whole is travelling down the road to disaster. We have distorted priorities. We spend $300 billion per year on armaments and other military expenses of that sort. The developing countries, as well as the great powers, spend money in this way. We spend a fraction of that amount dealing with starvation and abject poverty throughout the world. As human beings we are totally misusing the resources we have. We have the ability to deal with human poverty, but we use available money to pile up absolutely fantastic powers of destruction of humanity as a whole.

I am afraid that we in Canada too are in the process of having our attitude softened up by what General Eisenhower described as a military-industrial complex. We are told what we must restrain ourselves, but we are not supposed to restrain ourselves when it comes to extra defence capital expenditures. We in this House do not even go into them. The Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence does not go into them. The Department of National Defence does not really tell us how necessary those expenditures are and what purpose they serve. We are supposed to take that on faith.

I started by saying—and I will now repeat in closing—that in accepting this $2 billion proposal we in Canada are putting a burden on the necks of our children and grandchildren. We are acting as if we are not entirely capable of understanding the realities of life.

[Mr. Brewin.]

Mr. Douglas (Bruce-Grey): Mr. Chairman, I was not going to take part in this debate until this point. I certainly do not want to speak for the Minister of National Defence because he is well able to speak for himself when it comes to matters of security concerning our country.

Before I start I would like to inform hon. members that today is a very special day for at least one hon. member. Today is the birthday of the Deputy Chairman of Committees of the Whole House, who is in the chair at the present time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

• (2110)

Mr. Douglas (Bruce-Grey): I should like to express to him, on behalf of hon. members of this House, our congratulations on this auspicious day and wish him many, many years of happiness and health in this place.

The hon. member for Greenwood made some very pertinent points about the defence of the nation. I have every respect for the hon. member but I must take issue with his comments about so-called senseless expenditures on defence. I think that concern has been exhibited by members of the New Democratic Party time and time again. The hon. member talked about the lack of restraint in capital expenditures proposed for the Canadian defence forces. I would point out that it was the restraint in the past that was imposed on capital expenditures for defence forces that brought us to the state we are in today where we must invest in capital works in order to bring our forces to the point where they are capable of maintaining their role in the defence of our nation.

This makes me think of the years between 1918 and 1939 when the United Kingdom found itself in a poor economic condition and had to suffer restraint and cutback. The history of the Royal Air Force shows that it almost ceased to exist because at that time there were some in the country who thought it could be done without. It was only through the efforts of a strong Conservative member between 1935 and 1939 that the Royal Air Force was able to maintain its place in the British military picture. It was Winston Churchill who assured the future of the Royal Air Force for Great Britain. As we know, it turned out to be the saviour of that country in the second world war.

The hon. member for Greenwood suggested that we do not really need a strong defence capability because our good friends to the south have plenty of aircraft and all the things he says we do not need. I would point out to the hon. member that when people become your protectors they cease to be allies. A country must be able to provide some protection for itself; some of the interest in the country's safety must be shown by Canadians.

It seems to me that as elected representatives we cannot allow our defence forces to deteriorate any further. I certainly endorse the move of the minister in upgrading the fighter capability of the Canadian Armed Forces. I back him in the upgrading of the long-range patrol aircraft. Certainly, as the hon. member for Greenwood said, our friends to the south have the capability to protect us, if that is what we want, but I am not sure that this country wants to be protected by the army of another country.

I believe we also have to look to our commitments in Europe, in the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. Our commitments there will provide us with our first line of defence should an agreement be broken between ourselves and the Soviet Union or the Warsaw Pact nations. I think we owe it to our partners in that organization to provide the young men and women whom we send to represent us in NATO with the best equipment possible. We can send the best troops. We have the best technological people, but without the equipment we might as well keep them at home—which is what our friends in the New Democratic Party would probably have us do—and forsake our commitments to other countries.

The hon. member for Greenwood also said there is no threat to security in the world today that is not nuclear or a missile force. The build-up of Soviet forces within the NATO bloc nations is at the highest point in its history. Since 1945 they have been spending at least 25 per cent of their gross national product on defence and a build-up of their armed forces.

Mr. Darling: Don't forget their navy.

Mr. Douglas (Bruce-Grey): And, as the hon. member says, their navy. The Kiev has been introduced to the Mediterranean and the Atlantic. This is a new picture that has been painted for the defence forces of the allies, if we may use that expression. It is the first time an aircraft carrier has been put into operation by the Soviet Union. We can call it what we want. They called it an armed missile cruiser in order to get it into the Mediterranean and they have violated a couple of international agreements in doing so. A picture of it shows that it is an aircraft carrier, no matter what they call it. It is the first instrusion. We cannot look upon it as a missile; we cannot look on it as anything but a conventional type of warship sent by the Soviets to do conventional warfare.

We cannot look ahead and say everything will be taken care of by missiles and nuclear warheads. This is the type of thinking that would get us into difficulty with the Soviet Union.

We must look at how the Soviet Union and its allies have approached their confrontation with our allies up to this point. We must look at the Cuban crisis, at Korea and other areas in which Canadians have been involved. They have used conventional forces to push as far as they possibly can. It is only when they meet determined resistance at the conventional level that they take the stance that they are not interested in overpowering any nation but are interested only in co-existence. If we, or the United States, or any of the free nations of the world want to take the stance that the Soviet Union and the Warsaw Pact nations are not to be reckoned with in this particular fashion, then we have another think coming, Mr. Chairman. History will prove that.

It seems to me that the New Democratic Party has put forth the idea that we do not have to defend ourselves; that big brother to the south will protect us. At the recent meeting of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization in the United States this idea was put forth by many of the socialist members of NATO. Word came out from a meeting of the military committee that some were saying, "When you think of it, I would much rather be red than dead." Canada put its position. One of our delegates, an hon. member of the other place, put my sentiments and I hope the sentiments of all Canadians on the record at this meeting. He used the words of Patrick Henry, a famous American, and I echo those words. I think they should be used by all free men wherever they live. He said: "Give me liberty, or give me death." I would never say I would rather be red than dead.

I said this because I think someone must put that side of the story before this committee. I, for one, back the program of the Minister of National Defence for spending $2 billion, or whatever the sum may be, in order to provide our young men and women with the best possible machines. They need those machines, not only to do their job in Canada but to do that job around the world which Canadians over the years have done so well.

[Translation]

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, as the various parties of the opposition agreed, for Bill C-45, to limit their remarks so that it might be passed as quickly as possible, so that the government might administer Canada's business as effeciently as possible, I should like to say that my own observations will be very brief, but to the point, and will bring elements of solution so that we can quit going around in circles without finding practical means of breaking away from the financial dependence that prevents us from being ourselves.

Mr. Speaker, I believe I am the only member of my party to participate in the debate, and I would not want tomorrow's newpapers to accuse the Social Credit Party of Canada of killing time and preventing the government—

An hon. Member: Oh, no, no; they won't say that.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): —from getting bills passed to ensure Canada better administration. Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) had me among others as a guest for dinner tonight. It was not a patronage dinner but a dinner for reflection where we were honoured by the presence of an FAO representative who reported on the efforts made by Canada to help reduce poverty in the world, to enable human beings like us to meet their own needs.

Mr. Chairman, if we could have practical and in-depth discussions in the House, just as those we had during this dinner, I think we would have a better mutual understanding and that we would not have to expand on the financial needs of the country to provide for services for the Canadian people. Mr. Chairman, during this dinner, I was proud to hear the Minister of Agriculture, speaking on behalf of Canada, describe the efforts made by our country to help mankind.

Mr. Chairman, those people in misery have the same God as we have in this country. We Canadians should draw inspiration from the same feelings we have when it comes to help others. I suggest that we should take the opportunity offered to us tonight in the debate on Bill C-45 to try fraternally together to find ways of preventing those who control credit in our country from selecting our standard of living and deciding who should work and who should not.

I see the Minister of Manpower and Immigration in his seat. I congratulate him for the efforts he has made through programs in which I have enormous confidence, and I have already said so in the House. I am talking of Canada Works and Young Canada Works. I am pleased with those programs because I have deep convictions about the virtues of work. I believe it is a valuable tool which allows each and every individual to achieve something to meet his own needs.

Mr. Chairman, I was disappointed, but I do not want to offend the Minister of Manpower and Immigration, when I learned what estimates were available for such a satisfactory program throughout Canada. It is not the responsibility of the minister but of those who control the credit of the country as well as the program—

An hon. Member: The LIP program!

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Yes, the LIP program which I have often mentioned and I say so in reply to the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Marceau). I have often mentioned it in the House and said that I approved the improvements to the program which, when well managed and enforced, has created jobs in underprivileged areas and guaranteed a purchasing power enabling the under privileged to get the necessaries of life.

Mr. Chairman, my comments are not to be considered as those of a member who objects to everything and does not acknowledge the good points of the government. Absolutely not! However I should like to do my share so that we may understand more all together. Why, when dealing with hard working and dedicated people, are we always paralysed because of the absence of the almighty dollar sign?

● (2130)

Mr. Chairman, I should like hon. members to stop and think about this damn dollar sign—I apologize for the expression—which rules the world, the government and the parliament of Canada. How is it that our efforts are paralyzed by a dollar sign, while claiming that we are Christians and as such, willing to live under the sign of God. The sign of God, what is it?

An hon. Member: He is the one who gave us the dollar!

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Absolutely not! It is a sign of distribution and friendship among the people of the world.

Mr. Chairman, through Bill C-45 the government is asking parliament permission to borrow $7 billion; what for? To be able to administer the various departments in this country. But no one among us asks, but how is it that there are so many Canadians who want to continue to work, to produce, to make the necessary efforts to allow this country to develop, and that we should be paralyzed because of that mystery that is money? That is not new, Mr. Chairman.

In 1939, for older people and for the information of younger people who need to be informed, the hon. member for Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine (Mr. Béchard)—I should watch how I call his riding because he once reprimanded me on that but in any case, he is a friend of mine and he understands quite well that I always consider him as one of those members who made his contribution in this House to ensure a better administration of this country and when he teases me, it is because he loves me.

An hon. Member: Spare the rod and spoil the child.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Absolutely, spare the rod and spoil the child, but he is not punishing me because I do not consider that to be a punishment but rather an invitation to express myself more clearly.

Well, Mr. Chairman, in 1939, we were going through the same times as now, a period of unprecedented unemployment. It was terrible then and when people asked the federal and provincial governments for moneys to carry out public works in such or such a place, the answer given by governments was always the same—we do not have any money.

At that time, Mr. Chairman, a fantastic man by the name of Dr. Louis-Philippe Roy, who was the editor in chief of L'Action Catholique in Quebec City wrote an editorial that should be meditated on today because the problem has remained unsolved and is the same today. I am not accusing anyone but there are indeed over one million people unemployed out of 23 million in Canada. It is not normal to have so many able-bodied people doing nothing—something must be done. And at that time, Dr. Louis-Phillipe Roy asked the following question: Mystery to be solved? It is a mystery that we have to solve tonight with Bill C-45. How to get the money needed to maintain the administration. A mystery to be solved in 1939. A mystery to be solved in 1977. This is what he said: The years go by and the crisis still exists. This was called an economic crisis. Today we also have an economic crisis and it still goes on. He went on by saying:

It was supposed to last three years, five at the very most. It has been going on for 10 years—

Since 1929. The market crash of 1929 of which I am a victim, like all those of my generation. I remember it.

And no sign of real prosperity is looming on the horizon. September 1939. Why is the crisis lasting this long? Why do we have this unemployment in 1939? Why do we have this unemployment in 1977? Why this famine in a period of abundance?

Mr. Chairman, I think that the time has come seriously to ask ourselves one question. Who governs the country? Mr. Chairman, is it not time to have courageous men? The party has no importance for me, courage is the most important thing. Courageous men, leaders who are able to face up to the financial dictatorship of private banks. I know that some people, some reporters will say: Bah! The hon. member for Bellechasse is attacking the banks! I am not attacking the men who manage the banks, but the system, the privilege they have been given to control the money supply of our country for their own benefit, their own advantage, without thought of the common good.

I know, Mr. Chairman, that the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), before becoming prime minister, said something very similar to what I am now saying, and that it is not because of ignorance that he refuses to act. It is because he is not sufficiently supported by all of Parliament. We should unite, whoever the prime minister may be and whatever his party; he is the head of state in canada. We should have the courage to tell him frankly that we want financial reform in our country so that the masters of finance, the masters of the dollar bill may be submitted to the same legislation as the weakest and the most humble people in our country, because we cannot tolerate a legislation of exceptions. Mr. Chairman, since I have promised the hon. member for Rivière-du-Loup-Témiscouata (Mr. Gendron) not to speak too long, and even though I could go on logically for two hours, I shall stop here to allow him to express his opinions.

I hope very much that in his statement he will support the comments I just made in order that those who control the dollar sign will know what is going on. This has nothing to do with the Bank of Canada, so let us forget it for now. I wish it were the Bank of Canada but it is not. I would like him to support my remarks in order that the Canadian government, the cabinet and the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras)—who is now listening with angelic attention—might understand the sincerity and the fairness of my comments which some have already made inside and outside the House.

Mr. Chairman, I am prepared with all my colleagues to approve all monies required in Bill C-45, but I hope that between now and the next session they will seriously consider the possibility of making better use of the Bank of Canada, the bank of all Canadians. That is a name we should be proud of because that bank should have total control over the money supply in this country. Other institutions should be subject to its instructions. That is what the hon. member for Bellechasse is proposing tonight along with all his colleagues and I hope that in the coming weeks we will spend part of our time trying to clear that mystery: where does our money come from? Mr. Chairman, I conclude here, thanking you and all my colleagues for having listened so carefully.

[English]

Mr. Andras: Mr. Chairman, as we approach the hour of the arrangement to deal with the bill before us, there are one or two comments I want to make. I want to begin by giving the usual assurances as to the form of the bill, that is, that the proportions requested in this bill are intended to provide for all necessary requirements of the public service up to June 30, 1977. In no instance is the total amount of an estimate being realized, the form is the usual one for interim supply bills, and passage of the bill will not prejudice the rights and privileges of members to criticize any item of the estimates when it comes up for debate.

• (2140)

We did get notice from one party, well in advance, that they wanted to concentrate on the Post Office Department and on the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources. If we repeat this arrangement in the future it will, I am sure, prove to be a most useful one and enable us to ensure that the minister and, where necessary, the officials, are available for a concentrated discussion of these issues. I regret we were not able to arrange for the minister to reply to the concerns felt by the New Democratic Party. I think it is understood that the Minister of National Defence is away at NATO, but later, perhaps, notice can be given in advance and it will be possible to get the minister here.

In general the questions asked have been well dealt with. I should like to react to one comment which was made in the course of the eloquent plea from the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond. He made one comment which puzzled me—I shall check it in Hansard tomorrow. It was the suggestion that the Department of Regional Economic Expansion is somehow biased against the Atlantic provinces, more particularly against Cape Breton—Cape Breton Island. I think he said too large a proportion of the funds had gone to the central provinces of Quebec and Ontario. Mr. Speaker, the facts do not bear this out.

The misunderstanding might have stemmed from an article which appeared in the Halifax Chronicle-Herald which unfortunately dealt in a selective way with only one or two of the aspects of the work of DREE. I am sure the hon. member would prefer to have the facts rather than the distortion of facts as they appeared in the Chronicle-Herald. The facts are that RDIA spending in the fiscal years between 1970 and 1976 amounted, in Nova Scotia, to $38.65 per capita; in the Atlantic provinces generally it amounted to $36.89 per capita; in Quebec, to $24.39; and in Ontario, to $4.93.

The Chairman: Order. Might I bring it to the minister's attention that if I abide by the order which was previously adopted unanimously by the House on March 21, I would be obliged at this time to proceed with the putting of every question necessary to dispose of the different stages of this bill. However, there seems to be an agreement that I should not see the clock in order to allow the minister to complete his remarks and perhaps to allow one or two other members to intervene in the debate, and then I would put the question as we got close to ten o'clock. Is that agreed?

[Translation]

Mr. Corbin: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order.

The Chairman: The hon. member for Madawaska-Victoria.

Mr. Corbin: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order concerning what the minister just said—

The Chairman: Order, please. I am trying to get unanimous consent and I should like to deal with one question at a time.

[English]

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): We are happy to agree with the suggestion. It cannot be an order, but I hope that those who do take part in the next 15 minutes will make their contributions brief so that three or four might have an opportunity of saying a word.

[Translation]

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Chairman, I agree with the proposal you just made and, as I said in my speech, I wish to let my colleague from Rivière-du-Loup-Témiscouata (Mr. Gendron) express his views on that matter. I wish to make it clear. I do not want to prevent him from participating in the debate.

The Chairman: I point out to the hon. member that it is not the Chair that takes most of the time.

Mr. Corbin: Mr. Chairman, I might—

The Chairman: I agree to give the hon. member for Madawaska-Victoria a chance to rise on a point of order but he takes the time available for other members. The hon. member for Madawaska-Victoria.

Mr. Corbin: Mr. Chairman, my point of order concerns the fact that the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras) said he might have very well understood the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond (Mr. Hogan) this afternoon; I agreed with what the hon. member had stressed. He might have said what the minister reports, but, in fact, he said that in the Atlantic area the gap is even wider between large centres and rural areas. He insisted on this fact.

[English]

Mr. Andras: I take that last comment very seriously. However, so that we can deal with this matter in proper perspective I propose to place the true picture on the record. Total DREE spending for the period from 1969 to 1976 came up as an annual per capita expenditure in Nova Scotia of $50, in Prince Edward Island, $173, in New Brunswick, $80, in Newfoundland, $94.50, in Quebec of $17, and in Ontario of $2.50. I question very much whether these figures would lead to the conclusion that, on a per capita basis, the money is going to the central provinces of Quebec and Ontario.

Let me give the committee some figures in relation to DREE commitments under the general development agreements and the Prince Edward Island comprehensive development plan, phase two, by province from 1974 to date. Nova Scotia is getting $194 per capita—this does not include Devco; the Atlantic provinces will receive $362; Quebec, $40, and Ontario $6.50. Again this demonstrates there is no bias in favour of Quebec, Ontario or the central provinces. Dealing with Nova Scotia, precisely in terms of the understandable comments made by the hon. member about his own area, let me point out that Devco expenditures, which are 100 per cent federal dollars, amount to $377 per capita, or, divided among the Nova Scotia population as a whole, some $81. I thought the committee would like to have these figures on record as opposed to information which appeared in a spurious article in a newspaper which had not taken the trouble to do its research properly.

There are distinctions here, too. For instance, there is the fact that in the area of cost-sharing the general development agreement system allows great flexibility, which unquestionably favours the Atlantic region. All of our agreements with Quebec except one are shared on the basis of 60-40, that is, 60 per cent federal, 40 per cent provincial. The other agreement, the one I excluded, is a 50-50 package. All our Ontario agreements are cost-shared on a 50-50 basis. In Nova Scotia the agricultural, mineral development, and industrial development agreements are cost-shared on an 80-20 basis. Cost-sharing arrangements in the strait area, and in connection with the Halifax-Dartmouth agreements vary with different projects and programs but average between 70 and 80 per cent federal. Of course, as I said, Devco funding is 100 per cent federal. I just wanted to get that on the record, Mr. Chairman, so that we may move forward to a position of factual understanding rather than distortion. The hon. member's comment that this does not in any way solve the problem is very definitely true. But at least if we move to a position of understanding what is actually happening, rather than taking another approach to it, we are in a better position to respond to the policy.

Mr. Darling: Mr. Chairman, it is a pleasure finally to be able to say a few words this particular evening with respect to the Post Office estimates. I am delighted to see my colleague and neighbour from Nipissing, the Postmaster General, here. I listened with interest to his two speeches on the great Canadian Post Office. I know the Postmaster General and I have had many visits back and forth regarding the time some of the mail takes.

When I see in the Toronto Star, that great Liberal daily, a letter headed "Canadian Mail Worst In The World", I am just wondering what the Postmaster General says to that. The next one underneath that reads "Postal Service is 'Disgusting' ". Another says "We Deserve Hearing on Postal Coding", and a fourth is headed "Post Office Wastes Public's Efforts". That certainly surprised me because the Postmaster General probably is not aware of this, and neither are any of his officials. This particular case outlines that one of our citizens noticed one of the mailmen in Toronto picking up mail at one of the local mail boxes. There are two of them. One is for local mail and one for is for out of town fast mail, and he dumps them both in the same bag and throws them in his truck. I guess that would provide more work when they get back to the central office.

We know that things can be improved with the Post Office Department and with a lot of post offices. As far as the rural post offices and the post offices in the small towns and villages are concerned, I feel they are especially dedicated people and they are the ones who get the mail out. If it comes in there on a certain day, it is delivered on a certain day, and vice-versa. It is when it gets into some of the monstrosities in Toronto, that super wonderful Mississauga baseball field, when it does eventually get going, that the trouble really starts.

I have mentioned newspaper mailing service before to the previous postmaster general. I want to get an up-date on the service at the present time. That is the service with respect to our very important weekly newspapers and how they are being routed. Write this down, J.J. It is very, very important. I called four or five of the newspapers in my own riding today. Pay particular attention to this quote, Mr. Postmaster General, because it comes from a very eminent weekly newspaper, the Herald Gazette, which reads:

> We would have to give a great deal of credit to the Bracebridge postmaster for his assistance in making certain we were able to route copies of the paper that go to distant points so that they will travel directly to those places, avoiding Toronto, and he has been very helpful in that and the result is that they are getting prompter delivery.

First class mail going to Toronto, especially in the last month, has been delayed unconscionably. Mr. Bob Boyer can quote any number of instances. A letter containing an order that was mailed on March 13 was delivered in Toronto on March 22 and the business that received it telephoned to say how it had been delayed and they were experiencing similar delays every day in their incoming mail.

He goes on to say:

> Because of the terrible tie-up in mail in Toronto, the new Postmaster General should be on the job trying to improve the situation instead of going around the country making partisan speeches trying to blame everybody else but his own party for national disunity.

I raised my eyebrows and thought that that would be absolutely impossible. However, I picked up the Parry Sound North Star, a very eminent paper, which read: "Postmaster General says Tories are not helping national unity".

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Darling: As far as national unity is concerned, here are some figures: our Prime Minister, when he was the minister of justice in 1966, said 2 per cent of the Quebec population were separatists. When he became Prime Minister in 1968, 10 per cent were separatists, and in 1976, 41 per cent were separatists.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Darling: To go on to another newspaper, the Gravenhurst News, the editor, Lou Specht, said:

> I could take an hour to tell you about that. It is too terrible. It has gotten to the point now where I no longer have the time to write our subscribers personally trying to explain that we are doing everything that we can. People in Toronto, for instance, who perhaps don't get their copy of their paper at all or else they get it two or three weeks late and things of that nature. So I finally did a form letter that I thought would apply to almost every situation, and run it off on the copying machine and just fill in the person's name and send that off to them.

The great North Star that my friend, the Postmaster General knows about, says:

> We don't seem to have had as much problem with distribution or with subscribers as we had, partly because we are making more effort ourselves. We put postal code on everything. It is certainly very good in our area.

The Almaguin News, another newspaper, said that they were having serious problems. I also contacted another paper, the Huntsville Forester. The editor, Peter Rice said:

> We get flack every week. Usually a trace is put on at the post office and the problem corrects itself. People receive newspapers which are 10 to 14 days old. This is in the Toronto area. This month Toronto is the worst area. Just before Christmas they were having problems with the western papers and Weston in particular in the Toronto area. Poor delivery in the States but it is probably due to the American system.

I am sure the Postmaster General would want to echo that.

The Chairman: Order, please. It being after 9.45 o'clock p.m. it is my duty, pursuant to the order made on Monday, March 21, 1977, to put forthwith every question necessary to dispose of the committee of the whole stage of the bill.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a question at this point?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to the order that has been adopted, all of the questions are to be put at this time. The hon. member has only the privilege of voting for or against the question.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: If the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) has a point of order or a question related to the business of the House, not to the bill just passed, he can raise at this time before we proceed with the adjournment debate.

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, there is an emergency situation in my riding so I rise on a point of order and would ask Mr. Speaker to consider the matter that I would have raised had I not been ruled out of order. There is a strike in the post office in St. John's, Newfoundland, and there are $2 million worth of unemployment insurance cheques caught up in that strike.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. This is not really a point of order which is related to the business of the House. The hon. member will have an opportunity tomorrow, if he desires, to raise the matter at the earliest opportunity after eleven o'clock.

ANTI-INFLATION BOARD—SUGGESTED INSTRUCTIONS TO HOSTESS FOODS ON REFUNDING EXCESS PROFITS

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, on March 17, as reported at page 4064 of Hansard, I asked the following question of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald):

[The Chairman.]

Recently the Anti-Inflation Board ruled that Hostess Foods had made considerable excess profits on the marketing of their potato chips, all in eastern Canada, and to refund this excess profit to the consumer the company plans to issue 20 cent coupons, price reductions and free goods in certain sizes of packages, but all in British Columbia where they have never been in the market. Will the minister give an undertaking that he will instruct Hostess Foods or the Anti-Inflation Board officials to instruct Hostess Foods to restrict the distribution of this cut rate product to the market where they made the excess profit?

Since I asked that question of the Minister of Finance, I have found out that the situation is even worse than I thought. It has now been confirmed that local processors could easily be driven out of business because of this impending action by Hostess Foods. It appears that the firm has elected to break into new western markets, and it is reported that they have bought four vans and hired driver-salesmen to peddle Hostess products around Vancouver and offer the items I have already mentioned. None of this apparently is being passed on to that section of the public that was originally overcharged.

In addition to that, apparently the ruling of the Anti-Inflation Board was made recently and it is now reported that this excess profit was somewhere in the neighbourhood of $1.3 million. That is not chicken feed, Mr. Speaker. All of this profit was made in eastern Canada—Ontario, Quebec, and possibly the maritimes. It has since come to my attention that General Foods may be in violation of section 31(1)(3) of the Combines Investigation Act because they are allegedly planning to engage in the practice of selling a product at a price which is unreasonably low, which will have the effect of substantially eliminating competitors, or which is designed to have that effect.

In addition to that, I find that as early as January, two or three months ago, the management of General Foods was in Las Vegas and there met with the management of some of the local processors and are alleged to have threatened to move in and put them out of business.

There are several issues here. First of all, there is the problem with the Combines Investigation Act and the fact that Hostess Foods could well be in violation of that act. I charge the minister to investigate that and to do it quickly and thoroughly.

Second, it would appear that the company is trying to break into a market by having its excess profits act as a subsidy in breaking into that new market. It seems to me that that is entirely in contravention of the spirit of AIB. Surely the Anti-Inflation Board regulations and legislation were not designed to help a company move into a new market and find ways of getting around the regulations, thereby defeating the local companies. Under the restraint program and the AIB regulations, the market place is a fragile enough institution and we do not need a subsidy of this kind to break companies that are supposed to be well established, or at least have done their own work to establish their market.

In addition to that, one of the local co-operatives is still liable for 1,400 tons of potatoes contracted to local firms. With that kind of contract still having to be fulfilled and an eastern company coming to the market place, what will happen to the local processors?

It is also reported that the company plans to build a factory, some kind of processing plant, in Lethbridge, 800 miles away. Presumably it will do so with the funds it will have to refund as a result of the AIB decision. What will that do to the local farmers who are depending on a market they have established through much blood, sweat and tears over the years? Now we have the unconscionable decision on the part of what is a multinational corporation coming in from the U.S., forming a Canadian company in Canada, and then helping to break the Canadian market. It is incumbent on the Minister of Finance to provide an answer for these people to preserve the competitive society that has made our country what it is today and not allow the regulations of the AIB to frustrate the local market and destroy the competition upon which our system is based.

I call upon the minister to correct that situation and ensure that the officials of his department will investigate Hostess Foods, either through the Combines Investigation Act or through the regulations of the AIB. I might add that AIB officials have already conceded the fact that they have made this ruling on Hostess Foods, and I hope the Minister of Finance will press the officials of AIB to make sure that federal laws are not being violated. I hope he will bring Hostess Foods to task and will preserve the market place in an undisturbed fashion in British Columbia, the way it should be protected by a government.

Mr. Fernand E. Leblanc (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, in answer to the question put by the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock (Mr. Friesen) which was addressed to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) on March 17, we think that the question contains a number of assumptions. On behalf of the minister responsible for the Anti-Inflation Board I should like to clarify the situation as it relates to the obligations of Hostess Foods under the Anti-Inflation Act.

The hon. member stated in his question that the AIB had ruled that Hostess Foods had made excess profits. Under the Anti-Inflation Act regulations, the firm files quarterly reports, and the last report signalled a possibility of excess revenue. According to the guidelines, excess revenue is not identified until the close of the firm's fiscal year. Thus Hostess Foods did not have excess revenue, nor did the Anti-Inflation Board rule that the company had excess revenue. However, the company of its own accord is currently taking action to eliminate the possibility of excess revenue by forms of price reduction both in the east and, more extensively, in the west. Since the firm has not yet had excess revenue, it can take any action in any region it chooses.

Under the rules of the anti-inflation program relating to prices and profits, when a firm is identified as having excess revenue that is beyond the level permitted under the program, it must file what is known as a compliance plan to show how it will divest itself of the excess revenue within the following six months. It is this plan which must be approved by the Anti-Inflation Board, if the need arises.

Nonetheless, I am sure the hon. member from British Columbia will be pleased to report to his constituents that they are able to buy reasonably priced potato chips.

[Translation]

The minister had this to say in answer to a question put by the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock (Mr. Friesen), and I quote from page 4064 of Hansard for March 17, 1977:

> I have to point out to the hon. member that in a law passed by this parliament the Anti-Inflation Board has been given the responsibility of making this kind of judgment and, indeed, making appropriate arrangements with the particular firm found in an excess revenue position as to how this is to be returned to the public. In that sense, his suggestion that I might direct the board to do this is counselling an illegality.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS—PROPOSED LOAN TO CHILE BY CANADIAN BANKS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, on November 18, 1976, I asked the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Jamieson) the following question:

> —is the Canadian government prepared to convey to the banks Canada's position on the Chilean junta's disrespect for human and civil rights in that unfortunate country and ask them to respect both the moral position of the Canadian government and the technical and economic unacceptability of the loan?

The government well knows the atrocities and abuse of human dignity perpetrated by the vicious Pinochet regime in Chile. It knows full well because Canada voted condemnation of the junta's tactics at the United Nations based on reports by United Nations agencies.

Indeed in its first three years of rule, according to estimates of the United Nations Commission on Human Rights, the military dictatorship has killed 30,000 people and imprisoned another 100,000, many of whom were horribly tortured. Hundreds of thousands were expelled from the country, or have themselves sought exile. The junta has suspended congress, outlawed the activities of all political parties, closed down the central workers' federations, many unions and community organizations, censored education, and stifled public freedom of expression, including the press.

Condemnations of the régime have been issued by such international organizations as the United Nations, Amnesty International, the International Labour Organization, and the World Council of Churches.

Pinochet is adamant. He insists that he will never return the country to democratic rule. He is quoted as having said, "I am going to die and the person who succeeds me will also die, but there will be no elections."

Here at home national organizations have expressed their opposition to Canadian participation in helping to bail out the facist régime in power in Chile. For example, the Canadian Labour Congress passed a resolution at its annual convention in May, 1976, which stated that "any corporate investment in Chile at this time oppresses the Chilean people and disgusts their Canadian friends."

Policy statements have been formally adopted by the Anglican and United churches of Canada urging a halt to all investments and loans to Chile until fundamental human rights are restored. Similar positions were expressed by the Canadian Catholic Conference of Bishops and by the Lutheran church in Canada. Not content with issuing statements, the churches have taken their protests to annual meetings of corporations involved, but were disregarded despite well documented information of human rights violations in Chile.

In spite of this, Mr. Speaker, three Canadian banks—the Royal Bank and the Bank of Nova Scotia are each putting up $8.2 million, and the Toronto-Dominion Bank is putting up $4.2 million—formed part of a United States led consortium to lend $125 million so that the Chilean junta could roll over its debts to European creditors who have been critical of it and unwilling to extend further financing due to human rights violations.

These same banks at home cannot find the money to lend to low-income borrowers because the banks say they are poor risks, but they can find it to lend to the poorest risk in the western hemisphere, the Chilean junta.

In the last days of the Allende government, unemployment stood at a record low of 3 per cent. It has now rocketed to 20 per cent, by official estimates. Outsiders say one out of every four members of the Chilean work force is unemployed; 70 per cent of the workers earn less than $50 per month; a quarter of the population, 2.5 million people, had no income at all by mid-1976 and had to depend on handouts from churches and other humanitarian organizations.

The military has dismantled state involvement in social development and public services. Prices have been allowed to rise astronomically, with inflation running at 340 per cent in 1975 and 174 per cent in 1976, by official figures. The share of national income going to wages and salaries dropped from 63 per cent to 38 per cent in only three years.

The minister's response to me that day was most revealing. He said:

—I would say the banks are already aware of the Canadian government's position with regard to Chile. In so far as exerting any influence, however, this is a private banking transaction and I see no reason why we as a government should interfere in any way.

That argument does not wash, Mr. Speaker. Did the government think it was a private banking transaction when the banks agreed to observe the Arab boycott of companies doing business with Israel? No, the government did not. The government very quickly issued a policy position denouncing the practice. Yet with respect to Chile, where human dignity is involved, they cast a blind eye. I dare say if these were the days of fascist Germany the minister would be saying the same thing. Have we learned nothing from Hitler? Obviously the banks are prepared to do business with Satan himself as long as there is a buck to be made.

I call on the government to put its muscle where its mouth is with respect to moral responsibility for Canadian investment abroad. I ask it to declare unequivocally that it disapproves of any Canadian investment in Chile, that its agencies will finance none, and that it discourages any Canadian investment in Chile until human and civil liberties are restored. Anything less is breaking faith with the thousands of murdered Chileans whose only crime was to exercise the rights of their constitution to belong to a political party and trade union of their choice.

[Translation]

Mr. Fernand E. Leblanc (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, when he put his question on November 18, 1976, the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez) also had a supplementary for the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald), asking whether the latter intended to bring forward a legislation to control the export of capital from Canada. The answer was that:

—such legislation in effect would impose exchange control and would not be in the best interest of the Canadian economy.

And the Minister of Finance went on to say:

—I have no such proposal to put forward.

The question was put to the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Jamieson) and dealt with loans to Chile by Canadian banks.

[English]

It is not the policy of the government to interfere in transactions by Canadian firms or individuals abroad except in compliance with U.N. Security Council decisions. In the instance of the Canadian banks' loan to Chile, I am informed this was a rescheduling of existing debts in which banks from both Canada and the United States participated. The purpose of the loan was to facilitate the eventual repayment of Chilean debts. This was a private loan and there was no basis for Canadian government involvement.

As for our position on human rights violations, the government has made its concern very plain in a variety of international forums and we plan the continue to speak out on these matters.

● (2220)

The minister added, and I quote:

—the banks are already aware of the Canadian government's position with regard to Chile. In so far as exerting an influence, however, this is a private banking transaction and I see no reason why we as a government should interfere in any way.

TRANSPORT—COMMISSION OF INQUIRY INTO PROBLEMS IN NEWFOUNDLAND—TERMS OF REFERENCE AND DATE OF COMMENCEMENT

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, when I asked the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) what action he was taking in connection with a royal commission to investigate modes of transportation into, from, and across Newfoundland, he replied that I could expect an answer on the appointment perhaps within one week. This royal commission was suggested on December 1, 1976, by Mr. Bandeen of the CNR.

This suggestion was accepted by the Newfoundland government and the railway union, so long as, first, CN maintained the present level of services and employment while the investigation was under way, and second, so long as federal obligations with respect to transportation matters generally, such as further assistance for repairs and extensions of the trans-Canada highway, DREE roads and the like were continued.

The minister said he was going to appoint this commission. Mr. Bandeen said that it should not take it longer than six months to do its work. The minister said it should report this year's, 1977. Well, 112 days later the royal commission is still not appointed. Why the delay, Mr. Speaker? The minister does not delay when he goes travelling; he goes pretty quickly. Why did he delay 112 days in appointing the royal commission which is urgently needed.

I know that Dr. Arthur Sullivan of Memorial University, St. John's, is supposed to be the chairman. This has been widely known for between four and six weeks. I know that Mr. Esau Thomas of Placentia, the railway union leader, is to be one of the members. I know those hon. gentlemen are looking for a third member to represent the user or business community. Surely we do not have to wait 112 days to find members of a royal commission on such an important matter as this. Surely other Newfoundlanders must be willing to serve, although perhaps an appointment to a Liberal royal commission now is not too desirable.

Since this suggestion was made by Dr. Bandeen and accepted, the Minister of Transport has abandoned the user-pay concept. He has beaten a hasty retreat from the user-pay; of course he was headed off in that direction by his colleagues who informed him that he would be grounded unless he abandoned the user-pay concept.

There are important transportation problems in Newfoundland which must be solved. Just last summer the minister snatched the buses from the control of the board of commissioners of public utilities of Newfoundland, and put them under the Canadian Transport Commission. We learned a few days ago why he did that when the Canadian Transport Commission brought down a decision allowing the CN buses to charge another 8 per cent increase in Newfoundland, in addition to the 30 per cent increase they had taken in June, in defiance of the public utilities commission of Newfoundland.

The Canadian Transport Commission, in my opinion, should have a sign over its door reading, "Abandon hope all ye who oppose rate increases and appear here." The hearing is only a formality. The Canadian Transport Commission has neither the time nor the interest to be concerned about bus transportation and the general transport situation in Newfoundland. That should be regulated at the local level. The hearing before the CTC was unsatisfactory and perfunctory. Adjournments were not allowed to interested parties. The rates have increased 8 per cent, and we hear promises that there will be further applications for more increases.

We have many problems. The trans-Canada highway on which most of our freight now moves into and out of Newfoundland is deteriorating before our very eyes. The minister of highways of Newfoundland says that he hopes the government of Canada is going to provide financial assistance to improve and upgrade that highway. I hope he is not being over-optimistic. I see no sign of his hopes being fulfilled, although there may be some chance if an election is to take place in the next six months or one year. That problem is very serious.

What is to happen with regard to the losses of the CN in Newfoundland? I say the main problem is that the Government of Canada is not accepting its financial obligations. I do not blame the CN. It is losing $23 million a year. If that railway service must operate at a loss, the Government of Canada is under the constitutional and legal obligation to meet that loss. If the CN drydock, for which the government has an obligation, operates at a loss, I say that the government is under an obligation to overcome that situation. The Government of Canada should help it meet its losses and expand its facilities. I hope to go into greater detail on this topic in another debate. That is another transportation associated problem in Newfoundland.

This royal commission will have to look at the shipping service in Newfoundland. I just received notification that the Clarke Transportation Service, which operates a shipping service from Montreal to St. John's and Corner Brook, and is subsidized by the Government of Canada, recently increased its rates for pool car shipments by 10 per cent, its highest increase for any Canadian service, from Montreal to Newfoundland. Has the Canadian government agreed to this increase? If the Canadian government subsidizes the service, it must surely have the right to say what increases are going to occur.

There are many, many problems of transportation service in Newfoundland that require action, not further study. However, if there is to be further study, every day counts before the chaos in the transportation system in Newfoundland causes complete collapse.

I received a letter from a railway employee a few days ago. There are some 3,500 people who still work for CN in Newfoundland. These people are very concerned. They see the service deteriorating before their eyes. This gentleman told me that in Clarenville alone there are five diesel locomotive engines lying idle, and that train service to Bonavista is down to one a week. The railway will not accept freight unless it is in pool car loads. Any freight that will not fill a pool car is sent by its truck service. CN has its own truck service. It competes with its own rail service by using its own trucks. The service is losing money. It is mostly subsidized.

I call on the minister to meet his obligations when he is in Newfoundland next week, appoint this royal commission, get on with this job, get this report, and take some action to help Newfoundland in its transportation needs.

Mr. Marcel Roy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member directed a question to the minister on March 22. I quote the minister's reply at that time. He said:

Mr. Speaker, we have been discussing these questions with the government of Newfoundland and others. We are now nearly at the stage of having the matter in final form and I would expect an announcement within perhaps one week.

Discussions have been ongoing between Transport Canada and the government of Newfoundland concerning a commission of inquiry to investigate all aspects of transportation for Newfoundland, and have resulted in agreement that such a commission is appropriate.

It is intended that a commission would be guided in its endeavours by terms of reference sufficiently broad in scope that transportation related questions can be examined with a perspective capable of recognizing social and economic objectives of the two governments. A commission would be asked to articulate clearly the real wishes and needs of Newfoundland, based on contributions received from all interested parties through the public hearing process. It will carefully weigh all factors in arriving at a clear statement of priorities and plans for improving the transportation system.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker I would like to say the minister hopes to be in a position within the next week to make a detailed announcement on the commission.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at eleven o'clock a.m.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10:31 p.m.

REQUEST FOR ACTION TO SETTLE STRIKE AT ST. JOHN'S AND MOUNT PEARL, NEWFOUNDLAND—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I rise to move a motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43 for which I ask the unanimous consent of the House. My motion is in connection with a serious situation at St. John's and Mount Pearl post offices in Newfoundland where members of the Canadian Union of Postal Workers went on strike last Monday afternoon at 3.20 p.m. and are continuing their strike despite the fact that a collective agreement is in force and the law prohibits such a strike during the term of an agreement. There are now some 12,000 unemployment insurance cheques totalling $2 million caught in the mail. Old age pensions, veterans cheques and social assistance cheques are scheduled to be delivered Monday but will be delayed if this strike continues. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Darling):

That this House urge the Postmaster General to use every possible means to bring this illegal work stoppage to a halt immediately by way of obtaining a court injunction or otherwise and urge the postal clerks involved to return to work so that the severe hardship caused members of the general public, including those dependent upon unemployment insurance cheques, old age security, veterans cheques and other social assistance cheques through the mails, will cease.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 43 the presentation for debate of such a motion can only be done with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

MANPOWER

ADDITIONAL FUNDS FOR VOCATIONAL TRAINING PROGRAMS IN NOVA SCOTIA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity affecting instructors and students in adult vocational training programs in Nova Scotia. In view of the recently announced cutbacks in instructors and training by the Nova Scotia Labour Minister which, because of the severe unemployment program, particularly on Cape Breton Island, will create even greater hardship, and in light of the conflicting and contradictory statements on the amounts allocated for training by provincial officials, federal manpower officials and, indeed, by the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) here in this Chamber, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield):

That more money be allocated for training in the province of Nova Scotia, or alternatively, the Minister of Manpower and Immigration investigate the situation and clarify the matter to determine who is passing the buck.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion for debate pursuant to Standing Order 43 can be done only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

AIRPORTS

QUEBEC—REQUEST FOR NAVIGATIONAL INSTRUMENTS FOR GASPÉ AND ÎLES-DE-LA-MADELEINE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43, I seek the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the fact that there are no all weather air navigation facilities at the Gaspé and Magdalen Islands airports, that airplanes are the only means of travelling in and out of the Magdalen Islands during the winter months, and that it is high time the Department of Transport's report following the studies initiated in 1968 bring about concrete results, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Matte):

That the House urge the Department of Transport to act with all expediency and provide for fiscal year 1977-78 the necessary credits for carrying out long overdue improvements at the Gaspé and Magdalen Islands, thereby providing the public with more adequate and safer air services.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The House has heard the hon. member's motion. Pursuant to Standing Order 43, such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR AGREEMENT WITH PROVINCES ON POLLUTION STANDARDS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, before I put my motion, it seems to me I did not hear anyone say "No" following the motion presented by my colleague from Rimouski.

Pursuant to Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the importance of sound action against pollution and also the necessity of adequately protecting our environment, and since numerous companies do not look overly preoccupied by these problems, I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Rimouski (Mr. Allard):

That the government get together with the provinces in establishing minimum standards to protect the environment and fight pollution.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Pursuant to Standing Order 43, such a motion can only be presented with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

TRIBUTE TO MEMBER FOR PRINCE ALBERT ON ANNIVERSARY OF THIRTY-SEVENTH YEAR OF ELECTION TO PARLIAMENT

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Before proceeding with the oral question period I know all hon. members would want to join with me in paying tribute to a significant event, it being the anniversary today of the 37th year of the election to parliament of the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker).

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I deeply thank you for those words and my colleagues for the reception. To me it is something beyond belief that anyone should, in this day and generation, have been in this chamber for that length of time. I should add that having regard to the newly-elected prime minister of India, Mr. Desai, who is 81, gives hope for the future.

If I may be permitted I should like to express my deep appreciation to you, Sir, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) and leaders of the other parties and members in all parts of the House for the sympathy extended at the passing of my beloved Olive. Those messages have given me a greater knowledge and greater appreciation of this House. I hope I have not transgressed the rules, but must say how deeply touching it was to have those messages. They meant so much to me.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

UNEMPLOYMENT—GOVERNMENT'S VIEW OF EMPLOYMENT OPPORTUNITIES FOR UNIVERSITY GRADUATES

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question for the Acting Prime Minister has to do with the shocking underutilization of this country's resources as a result of unemployment. I ask whether the statement of the Prime Minister in Toronto, yesterday, that university graduates who feel their opportunities in this country are not outstanding should leave Canada is government policy?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I—

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I was shocked too, Allan.

Mr. MacEachen: I was not shocked at all—I am replying to the comment made by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton. I am sure the hon. member for Don Valley understands the context in which the statement was made by the Prime Minister. It was made before a group of students, in an atmosphere of cordial provocation.

Mr. Gillies: Mr. Speaker, I take it from the Acting Prime Minister's answer that it is government policy to have those students leave the country if they do not feel there is any future for them in this country.

My supplementary question is specific. Does the minister feel that the forthcoming budget and forthcoming policies which may be brought down with respect to the elimination of unemployment are such that there is really not much hope that in the foreseeable future there will be sufficient growth in the Canadian economy to absorb the current graduates of Canadian universities?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, that is not the view of the government at all. I am sure, when the budget address is given by the Minister of Finance next Thursday, the hon. member will realize that very serious new attempts will have been made—

An hon. Member: New?

Mr. MacEachen: —that very serious further and new attempts have been made to accelerate the growth of the economy and to help to reduce unemployment levels, in the context of the government's striving to restrain the growth of inflation.

Mr. Gillies: A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is one reason for the federal government's allocating smaller resources for the support of higher education, or post-secondary education, the government's belief that it is impossible for the economy or the labour force to absorb as high a proportion of people with higher education as we are producing at present?

Mr. MacEachen: No, Mr. Speaker, that is not the view of the government. It is obvious, as a result of recent arrangements, that the government is providing more resources than ever to the field of post-secondary education. I am sure the hon. member would not want to attribute more to the comments of the Prime Minister than are justified, because in that context I am sure what the Prime Minister had in mind was a challenge to the students, to go out and contribute to the Canadian economy. Probably, the most stark way to present the challenge was to suggest that the alternative might be to leave the country. I do not think any would regard that as a viable alternative at the present time.

GOVERNMENT ADVICE TO UNEMPLOYED TO LEAVE COUNTRY TO FIND EMPLOYMENT

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, my question is also directed to the Acting Prime Minister. In view of the Prime Minister's statement that if university students are dissatisfied with job opportunities in Canada they should go to another country, and that if it is just a job they want the Prime Minister's heart would not bleed for them—that is if he has a heart—can the minister advise whether it is the policy of the government now, to advise the 932,000 unemployed Canadians that if they do not like it here without jobs they should also find another country where they may obtain jobs. To what country would the Acting Prime Minister advise them to go, in their search for work?

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): To a country which will give them refugee status.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the hon. member is seriously interested in unemployment and does not regard that as a serious question. It was really an argument raised, as I said, upon an occasion of cordial provocation in Toronto.

● (1120)

POSSIBILITY OF DENYING UNIVERSITY GRADUATES ENTRY TO CANADA

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): In view of the attitude of the Prime Minister toward unemployed university graduates and his advice to them about where they can go to look for work, can the Acting Prime Minister advise the House whether the Department of Manpower and Immigration are being issued instructions by the government to change immigration levels and to advise educated university graduates from abroad they are no longer admissible into Canada if our graduates cannot find jobs. Obviously, the government does not want university graduates coming to Canada. Has any instruction like that been issued?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Acting Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker.

MANPOWER

INQUIRY WHETHER GOVERNMENT HAS NEW POLICY OF EXPORTING UNEMPLOYED UNIVERSITY GRADUATES

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Recognizing that thinking is a decennial practice among Liberals and in view of the Prime Minister's thinking out loud yesterday when he said to the students of the University of Toronto that if they are dissatisfied with job opportunities in Canada, they should go to another country, does the minister agree with the thinking of the Prime Minister or is this a new manpower policy being undertaken by the government, that of exporting unemployed Canadian youth?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, it is a sad commentary when the opposition picks up a statement like that when the Prime Minister, in an exchange with students, offers to them the many challenges that are available throughout this country and throughout the world. The hon. member himself saw fit when he could not get a job in his country to come to this land of opportunity. Does he feel someone is doing a disservice to these students by recommending that they try something else and that if they do not like it they can come back to see what a great country this really is?

ADDITIONAL MEASURES TO PROVIDE EMPLOYMENT FOR YOUNG CANADIANS

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): In relation to the minister's last comment, I was a victim of imperialism where I was. The Prime Minister must have been potty when he said yesterday in Toronto "We are not going to put millions into subsidization of university graduates because they have a bleak view of their future." It is a well known fact that many young people stay in the school system because jobs are unavailable or because they must build up credentials which are used to ration the limited number of jobs. Is the minister going to put millions into creating opportunities for employment for Canadian youth apart from Young Canada Works?

An hon. Member: You even made the baby cry.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: Out of the mouths of babes.

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, we are in fact putting pots of money into youth training projects. We are also participating in the financing of post-secondary education. I would think it an insult to the students of this country to suggest that they want to be constantly spoonfed. They want to be helped, but they do not want to be spoonfed as the hon. member is suggesting.

Mr. Rodriguez: In response to the comment before the minister started to speak, out of the mouths of babes and infants will come words of wisdom. In view of a recent report by the Canadian Council on Social Development that Canada will be faced with a politically and economically explosive situation if nothing is done to ease the severe unemployment among young people, and in view of the report by Statistics Canada that the unemployment rate among women age 15 to 25 is 14.2 per cent and among men age 15 to 25 it is 14.5 per cent, will the minister tell the House what new programs other than Canada Works he is prepared to initiate immediately to deal with this very serious problem?

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, any time we have an ongoing program and it is working, we always find a question coming from the hon. member indicating "in view of the", "notwithstanding this" and so on, what additional things are being done? We have come up with all these new and imaginative projects and a lot of them are in fact working. The hon. member seems to think that by shouting he wins his argument, but he really loses it. He feels he has to keep jumping up and down like a yo-yo over there. The government does have an obligation to do what it can within the limits of the funds that are available to create and set modes and attitudes about the hiring of the young and of the women in this country but by and large, the major number of jobs in the country has to be created by private enterprise, and they are the people who should be encouraged.

COMMUNICATIONS

REASON BILL ON COMMUNICATIONS INTRODUCED PRIOR TO PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Communications.

Can the minister tell us what impelled her to introduce her bill on communications before the conference with her provincial counterpart?

Hon. Jeanne Sauvé (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, several reasons compelled me to do so, one of which is the need to consolidate and update the statutory powers of the government in the field of communications. One of the reasons for introducing it before the conference was that I wanted to give the provincial ministers who will attend that conference a chance to discuss the text of the bill, the main themes of which they already know.

ATTITUDE OF MINISTER TOWARDS ABSENCE OF QUEBEC MINISTER FROM CONFERENCE

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, as the minister already knew that her Quebec counterpart had refused to attend the meeting, can she tell us what attitude she intends to adopt to mitigate that absence which could lead to serious consequences under the circumstances?

Hon. Jeanne Sauvé (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, I cannot mitigate the absence of Mr. O'Neil in any other way than by attempting, on my own, and setting aside the extreme position adopted by Mr. O'Neil, to interpret what the people of the province of Quebec might think of the bill. Mr. O'Neil is wrong in refusing to attend the meeting because this bill allows the governor in council to delegate powers in the field of telecommunications. He would be well advised, if he wants to fill the mandate entrusted to him by the people of Quebec, to attend the federal-provincial meetings which give us the opportunity to discuss the means through which a powerful, coherent and national telecommunications system can be set up while attempting to meet the interests and aspirations of the provinces.

PUBLIC SERVICE

APPLICATION TO SPLIT AIR CONTROLLERS' UNION—GOVERNMENT POSITION—POSSIBILITY OF INTERVENTION BY TRANSPORT DEPARTMENT

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the President of the Treasury Board—the Minister of Transport might be interested in it as well, but the President of the Treasury Board has a large responsibility for the collective bargaining process in the public service. Can the minister tell us whether any representations have been made to him with respect to an application by a part of a union seeking separate accreditation to represent one of the public service unions and what attitude the government would take toward such an application?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board): I believe that question would be more properly addressed to the Minister of Transport: I am aware of what the general situation is, but I think my colleague could be more specific.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Unless the Minister of Transport is prepared to answer, my supplementary question is this: In view of the threat that such an application presents to nationwide unions in general in the public or the private sector, does the Department of Transport intend to intervene one way or another, and, if so, in what way?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): The matter is, of course, before the board and it would be better if comments were made there. It is not our intention to take a positive position on the specific issue. We have taken positions in regard to a variety of the circumstances which lie behind the difficulties experienced by this union and we may make some comments about that aspect, but basically we shall be awaiting a decision of the board.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): In view of the experiment the department is conducting in this area and the undertaking he has given to the present accredited bargaining agent for this group of public servants, I should like to ask the hon. gentleman this question: Does the minister feel under no obligation whatever to these employees or to the Canadian public respecting this matter in order to preserve the integrity of a very important sector of the public service?

● (1130)

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I do not relate at all the one issue to the other. I do not see any conflict in our present position on that agreement or on other promises or undertakings.

POSSIBILITY OF MANY APPLICATIONS TO SPLIT UNIONS

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, may I put a supplementary question to the President of the Treasury Board arising out of the series of questions put by the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich relating to air traffic control matters. There are other employee agents and unions bargaining in the public service of Canada. Are there other questions in other unions to which the President of the Treasury Board must address himself from time to time having to do with requesting a split in jurisdiction of such unions, so that the government might find itself dealing with perhaps two separate and distinct organizations involving the same governmental discipline, such as the post office, on the one hand, or other public service unions?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I have some difficulty answering that question. If the hon. member would give specific examples of such a trend then I think I could deal with it in that way. I cannot comment from knowledge of any general or specific trend in that direction.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): That answers the question.

CRIMINAL CODE

CONSULTATION WITH HUNTING AND FISHING CLUBS ON CONTROL OF FIREARMS

Mr. Gilles Marceau (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Solicitor General.

I would like to ask him whether the government will take into account the representations received from hunting and fishing clubs as well as shooting clubs when drafting the future legislation on the control of firearms?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, the legislation on the control of firearms comes under my colleague the Minister of Justice, but in his absence, since I have been closely involved in any legislative action in that respect, I would like to assure the hon. member that in our proceedings we have carefully examined every report which we received and all representations made by hunting and fishing clubs as well as shooting clubs. We hope to introduce a bill which will meet the basic objectives of the government while respecting the authentic rights of people who are members of hunting, fishing and shooting clubs.

TRANSPORT

PROVISION OF BOXCARS FOR SHIPMENT OF POTATOES—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport and has to do with the continuing concern about the supply of insulated boxcars for the eastern potato growers. In light of the upcoming meeting between himself and the minister from Prince Edward Island, has the minister seen the report prepared by the P.E.I. potato marketing board which was presented to the provincial government, which indicates the predicted crisis in the availability of rail cars if immediate action is not taken on the provision of rolling stock within the next period? At the same time, would the minister answer whether his own studies, which he mentioned some time ago, have been completed and whether he is prepared to give some answer to the provincial minister when he meets with him shortly?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I may be able to report some progress. We have been keeping in touch with the situation. My colleague the Minister of Agriculture has been paying particular attention to the question of adequate supplies, and I may be able to discuss further the question of what equipment is available and additional efforts which can be made to ensure that there will be equipment.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Can the minister indicate whether or not his own studies have been completed and whether there will be any kind of specific answer given when the provincial minister is here, inasmuch as it is reported today that there is a very serious decline in rail car manufacture in Canada generally? Apart from the order of 2,000 grain cars which the minister placed earlier, partially to ease that situation and also to provide further rolling stock for the grain producers of western Canada who have now something like 8,000 grain cars available provided by the federal government, as yet not one single car has either been built or purchased by the federal government for the potato growers of Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick. Can the minister indicate whether some answer will be given the provincial minister so that we can alleviate what appears to be an upcoming crisis situation?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, the hopper cars were purchased because of the very special situation obtaining in relation to grain. The railways have a frozen rate for the carriage of grain and therefore need additional cash infusions in the system. In general terms the railways are expected to supply adequate equipment, and to do so by charging appropriate rates. Steps have been taken by the railways to identify the kind of equipment which is available and that will be one of the questions which will be discussed, that is to say, the use of some existing equipment which is available but has not hitherto been used in that particular service. The problem with taking any positive position on manufacturing new equipment is that we must first determine the best manner of carrying potatoes in the future.

SUGGESTION BRITISH COLUMBIA COMPANY BE GIVEN OPPORTUNITY TO MANUFACTURE RAILWAY CARS

Mr. G. H. Whittaker (Okanagan Boundary): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the very recent representations made by the province of new British Columbia to the Minister of Transport, is the Minister of Transport considering giving them some contracts to make this kind of car to transport produce in Canada, since they have been denied the right to have any of the contract for the hopper cars?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, obviously I am not considering simply the question of where the business should go. The point I was making to the hon. member for Egmont was that we have not reached any conclusion on what type of equipment to order. Rail West in British Columbia were given a full opportunity to bid on the order of 2,000 hopper cars, and as I told the House earlier it was only because their price was very much higher than that of other suppliers that no contract was offered to them.

PROPOSED USE OF UNITED STATES' EXPERTISE TO DECIDE TYPE OF RAILWAY CAR FOR SHIPPING PRODUCE

Mr. G. H. Whittaker (Okanagan Boundary): A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that the American railways have no problem supplying cars for Canadian produce, and in view of the statement that the minister made that we do not seem to know what rolling stock to use in Canada, I would ask the Minister of Transport why he does not use the expertise already known in North America for moving this type of produce?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member may not be aware of the fact that an intermodal study is being conducted into the movement of Prince Edward Island potatoes. To suggest that the railways should move from one type of equipment to another before that question is finally settled is missing the point entirely in regard to what is involved in the movement of potatoes.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

PROGRESS IN NEGOTIATING NUCLEAR SAFEGUARDS AGREEMENTS WITH JAPAN AND EUROPEAN COUNTRIES

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the hundreds of millions of dollars worth of sales of Canadian uranium and thousands of miners' jobs which are dependent on nuclear safeguards agreements being reached with the governments of purchasing countries, can the minister say what progress has been made in the negotiations with the European Economic Community countries and with Japan concerning safeguards for uranium fuel?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the degree of progress varies from one country to another. Without going into a very lengthy explanation, I think Canada and Japan are quite close to a final agreement. In terms of the European community, the Euratom organization of the community is still talking with the Canadian negotiators. We are also holding bilateral talks with the European countries concerned, and here once again substantial progress is being made. But, of course, our policy is not to reintroduce exports until such time as our safeguards standards have been met fully.

GRAIN

POSSIBILITY DISCUSSIONS ON INTERNATIONAL WHEAT AGREEMENT MIGHT INCLUDE OTHER GRAINS—DATE OF COMPLETION

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board. The minister has been talking a lot about a new international wheat agreement and has spoken with officials in the United States and Australia. Is the minister giving any consideration to extending these talks to include grains other than wheat and, if so, can he tell the House which grains he might consider?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, that topic may certainly include other grains. At the moment we are talking principally about wheat. We are, of course, at the preliminary stage, and we will see what the wishes of particular participants are as we proceed.

Mr. Nystrom: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the minister tell us a bit about his timetable for achieving an international wheat agreement or hopefully an international grains agreement, and at the same time would he tell us whether he is willing to take the initiative in convening a meeting or conference of all grain producing and grain consuming nations of the world so as to expedite an agreement of this sort?

● (1140)

Mr. Lang: I have taken the initiative to bring the discussions into being and thereafter we will jointly proceed as agreed upon by those who are now participating in the talks. I do not have a specific timetable which I can lay out before hon. members because of the need to get agreement and concurrence on the part of the people.

POST OFFICE

REASON FOR REFUSAL OF OFFICES TO ACCEPT FIFTY DOLLAR BILLS

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Postmaster General. Does he consider it appropriate that when one goes into a post office in Halifax to buy, say, an $80 money order and then tenders a $50 Canadian bill as partial payment, acceptance of that $50 bill is refused unless the customer is prepared to sign his name and give his address? In other words, does the Post Office regard a $50 bill as legal tender or does it not?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I can assure the hon. gentleman that it is not the practice to refuse any form of Canadian legal tender, but I will be pleased to receive particulars of this incident from the hon. member, look into it and offer him an explanation that is due.

Mr. Stanfield: While the minister is looking into the question, would he inquire as to why the employee in question offered the explanation that he was instructed by his superiors to do this?

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

SUGGESTED ADJOURNMENT OF LIBERAL CONFERENCE IN VIEW OF ATTITUDE TOWARD UNEMPLOYED UNIVERSITY GRADUATES

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): With your indulgence, Mr. Speaker, I would like to return to an earlier line of questioning and ask the President of the Privy Council the following question. In 1972 the Prime Minister's advice to the unemployed in Quebec was that the Quebec unemployed could find new jobs in Ontario. Now, the Prime Minister has moved to the international field as an answer to the problems that face this country. If it is to be the policy initiative of the Liberal thinkers conference that we use international travel agents to solve these serious problems, perhaps the President of the Privy Council might consider adjourning this thinkers conference.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): No, Mr. Speaker, I intend to join the thinkers later today.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Fairweather: When the President of the Privy Council goes to the thinkers conference, would he remind that group that the last suggestion for solving unemployment by taking one-way tickets was Walter Gordon's who made it in Cape Breton Island, as I remember, so it should be a fruitful afternoon and evening?

SPORTS

AVAILABILITY OF FUNDS FOR CONSTRUCTING STADIA FOR PROFESSIONAL SPORTS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister responsible for Fitness and Amateur Sport. Can the minister say whether some Canadian football league teams have approached her asking for funds towards upgrading or constructing sports stadia, and, if so, what was her response? Second, can she tell the House whether it is within the authority of her department to grant funds for the upgrading of stadia used by professional teams of one kind or another?

Hon. Iona Campagnolo (Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport)): Mr. Speaker, the answer to the first part of the question is no, and the answer to the second part is also no.

Mr. Rodriguez: That's a no-no.

Mr. Yewchuk: Can the minister give the House the assurance that she would not grant such funds, and secondly, does she agree that professional sport is deleterious to the health of Canadians? If so, what action does she plan to take in that regard?

Mrs. Campagnolo: Mr. Speaker, I do not regard professional sport as being deleterious to the health of Canadians. It serves as an example to many of us sitting in the spectators position. However, I cannot say to what consideration will be given in the future following our present Loto Canada commitments. At this time I cannot say unequivocally that no consideration would be given to this. It may be, but not in the foreseeable future.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

DATE OF SETTLEMENT OF TURTIN PENN LEASE

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have had a question for a day or so for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, and again he seems to have disappeared today. So I should like to direct my question to the President of the Treasury Board with regard to the request of the Department of Indian Affairs to the Treasury Board to further contribute to the settlement of the Turtin Penn lease in the Shannonville area near the Tyendenaga Mohawk reserve which has been there for some time. Can the minister indicate when we might have a settlement of this particular request?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I will have to inquire to see where that matter stands.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

REQUEST FOR CLARIFICATION OF STATEMENT CONCERNING FRAUD IN MARITIMES

Mr. Leonard C. Jones (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration and it is with respect to a letter which was addressed to all hon. members dated March 23, 1977. I would like an explanation with respect to part of the letter which reads:

> . . . in areas of continuing high unemployment such as the Atlantic provinces, efforts have been directed to the detection of fraud, misrepresentation and unreported earnings.

I know of no case in the maritimes of any person on unemployment insurance being found in Florida.

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for bringing this to my attention yesterday. I did read the letter over and I wished I had not written it because it gives an unfortunate inference. What we are endeavouring to indicate is that there are two areas of service to the community, one wanting the placing of individuals and the other a control mechanism. There was a wastage of personnel sometimes trying to find jobs where jobs do not exist. So I was indicating the two services in the department. But it was an unfortunate inference, and I apologize for it.

MANPOWER

MEASURES TO ALLEVIATE UNEMPLOYMENT IN MARITIMES

Mr. Leonard C. Jones (Moncton): I would like to ask the same minister another question. He used the phrase "continuing high unemployment". What is he going to do now to stop this continuing high unemployment?

Mr. Rodriguez: Nothing.

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): I am dealing with that in large measure in my estimates. Unfortunately, the hon. member for Nickel Belt does not show up at meetings so that we can have an appropriate exchange there.

INCOME TAX

PROPOSED INVESTIGATION OF FUND RAISING BY INTERNATIONAL FUND FOR ANIMAL WELFARE

Mr. William Rompkey (Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Revenue and it arises out of an article in the Toronto Star yesterday. In view of the fact that the International Fund for Animal Welfare last year was a non-profit organization and yet had a surplus of almost half a million dollars and in view of the fact that responsible persons, such as Mr. Tom Hughes, executive vice president of the Ontario Humane Society, have called for an inquiry to investigate all aspects of fund raising by the funds executive director, Brian Davies, will the minister cause such an inquiry to be initiated to see how this man obtained the money that he uses to smear the names of honest, God-fearing Newfoundlanders?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, unfortunately I can only provide a very partial answer to this question, considering the strict confidentiality rules which we must respect.

Any organization requesting a tax relief for charity purposes must meet such purposes. When we have grounds to suspect the contrary, from newspaper articles which describe lobbying activities considered political or otherwise, or when the annual reports we request do not satisfy us, we make an inquiry into that specific matter. In this case concerning the International Fund for Animal Welfare, we came to the conclusion that they could not get relief because there were no such charity purposes. After discussions, the organization asked to be decertified as from last December 31.

I can make no further comment. In the future, after the recent passage of Bill C-22 by Parliament, any organization enjoying a tax relief will be required to make a public report.

POST OFFICE

REQUEST FOR ACTION TO SETTLE STRIKE AT ST. JOHN'S, NEWFOUNDLAND

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Postmaster General. As the minister is aware, there has been a serious postal strike at the St. John's post office for the past five days. Will the minister use every possible means to bring this illegal work stoppage to a halt immediately by means of obtaining a court injunction or otherwise, and will he urge the postal clerks involved to return to work so that the severe hardship caused members of the general public, including those dependent on receiving unemployment insurance cheques, old age security and veterans cheques and other social assistance cheques through the mails, will cease?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, with the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka and the hon. member for St. John's West, I am very much concerned about this work stoppage. I have been informed that the cheques are presently in the mail. We are using all the means available to us—although I must indicate they are limited under the present legislation—to get this illegal work stoppage to cease. I trust that by the weekend the matter will be resolved.

TRANSPORT

SUBSIDIZATION OF QUEBEC FERRY SERVICE AS JUSTIFICATION FOR SHARING LOSSES ON B.C. FERRY SERVICE

Mr. Ron Huntington (Capilano): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. Given the fact that the CNR, a Crown corporation receiving subsidies from the federal government, is committed to a $90 million capital expenditure for a ferry service between Baie Comeau, Matane and Quebec City, a service which will require a continuing annual operating subsidy, will the minister accept the fact that this is a federal subsidy for an intra-provincial ferry service which is justification for a formula which will allow a federal sharing of the operating losses of the B.C. ferry system?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): No, Mr. Speaker. I think the hon. member has the facts wrong in relation to the financial arrangements involved. I would be glad to obtain complete details and let the hon. member have them.

Mr. Huntington: In light of the fact that the essential revenue aspects of this St. Lawrence crossing were to be put in place by the CPR at a $10 million cost and at no cost to the treasury, can the minister give the rationale behind this heavy involvement on the part of CNR, particularly in light of his concern about frugality in placing railroad hopper car orders?

Mr. Lang: As the facts, when the hon. member has them, will show, this is not a matter of subsidy but a commercial intervention on the part of CN.

AGRICULTURE

DATE OF ANNOUNCEMENT OF MILK POLICY

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture.

Considering that the dairy industry is essential to a good nutrition of mankind and that primary producers should have a fair return for their work and be able to live decently, is the Minister of Agriculture in a position to tell the House whether the dairy policy coming into force on April 1, 1977 will be announced in the very near future and whether milk producers should expect a better year than in 1976-77?

[English]

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I said I hoped that we would be able to announce this several days or weeks before the first of April. In the middle of January the Canadian Dairy Commission made some submissions to the provincial milk marketing boards, which make up the advisory group to the Canadian Dairy Commission. They have not come to a solid, 100 per cent conclusion on all the suggestions and offers we made to them. I will be going ahead with a recommendation to my colleagues in cabinet, I hope, the first of the week. I hope we can still meet the deadline of April 1 even without the full co-operation and endorsement of the provincial milk marketing boards. I still believe we will have a very good dairy policy for the dairy year 1977-78.

INQUIRY WHETHER QUOTAS DISTRIBUTED BY MARKETING BOARDS

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary.

First of all, I thank the minister for his excellent answer, and I would like to know if he could possibly tell the House whether a specific study has been made on the quota policy throughout Canada, whether changes have been made in this area and whether the quotas will be distributed at the producer level through marketing boards, as in the past, once the future discussions on this subject are completed?

[English]

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the hon. member knows that the national quota for industrial milk is decided by the Canadian Dairy Commission after consultation with provincial marketing boards and the dairy farmers of Canada. I have very little to say to individual farmers about the quotas. They are administered by milk marketing boards within the provinces.

In his earlier question the hon. member asked if the quota will be made public. It will be made public at the time of announcement, and I hope information sheets will be made available to hon. members at that time.

MEASURES TO PROTECT CANADIAN PRODUCERS AGAINST EFFECTS OF IMPORTED PRODUCTS

Mr. Robert Wise (Elgin): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture, and it relates to tariff inequities. In view of the declaration of the Canadian Horticultural Council that producers of horticultural crops in Canada continue to suffer economically because of the inflow of competing products at prices below the cost of production, and in view of similar views being expressed by the Canadian Fruit and Vegetable Processors' Association, what action will the government take to assist and protect our Canadian horticultural producers and our fruit and vegetable producers?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I would like to remind the hon. member that at the recent annual meeting of the Canadian Horticultural Council in Ottawa a unanimous motion of commendation of the government and of the Minister of Agriculture was moved. This was because of all the things we were doing for those producers. I am sure the hon. member knows that we have done those things for them, and I am sure he also knows that the Tariff Board report is to be tabled or made public, I am told, on April 1 or shortly thereafter.

Mr. Wise: Mr. Speaker, I am aware of the fact that the Canadian Horticultural Council passed one resolution congratulating the government. I am also aware that there were 49 other resolutions which did not support government action.

Mr. Stanfield: That is one out of 50.

ALLEGED LACK OF INSTRUCTION TO GATT NEGOTIATORS ON AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS

Mr. Robert Wise (Elgin): In view of the comment of a provincial minister of agriculture that he was shocked to learn of the lack of instruction our GATT negotiators were receiving from Ottawa, and in view of the fact that one negotiator told the provincial minister, and I quote, "We are here to play the piano, but somebody has to compose the music", when does the government expect to have its music ready, and is the government at least going to change the basis of Canadian tariffs from the present fixed cost basis to a per cent ad valorem?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, all I can say is that practically every producer of horticultural crops I have had anything to do with has played a very pleasant tune because those producers are able to pay their bills as a result of the program we have initiated for them. I am shocked that the Ontario minister of agriculture would say that publicly because that is not what he said to me privately.

POTATOES—WAREHOUSE AND SHIPPING FACILITIES IN SAINT JOHN, N.B.—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO IMPROVE

Mr. Eymard Corbin (Madawaska-Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Minister of Agriculture, and it relates to earlier questions asked by the hon. member for Egmont. Following the minister's inspection of the warehousing and loading facilities at the Port of Saint John last weekend, has he had an opportunity to determine how best to respond to the present inadequacies, hopefully in time for the next shipping season this coming fall?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I did visit those facilities with representatives of the potato growing industry from New Brunswick and with the organization which represents all potato growers in the maritimes. We visited the wharves in the Saint John harbour area. Actually, it was a week ago this morning. We were making that visit about this time last week. I was appalled to see the facilities which were being used. They were not exaggerating about how bad they were. An inter-departmental committee will be putting together a report. The Department of Transport and the Department of Agriculture are working together on this. We hope we will have something for the next crop season which will be much more practical than what we have at the present time.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

POSSIBILITY OF LEGISLATION TO EXTEND PRISONER OF WAR COMPENSATION TO VETERANS OF WORLD WAR I AND ESCAPERS AND EVADERS OF WORLD WAR II

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Veterans Affairs. In view of the very real sympathy that the minister expressed in committee the other day for the 200 or so living veterans of World War I who were prisoners of war and also the interest he expressed in the Canadian veterans who were evaders or escapers in World War II, can he tell the House whether the chances are good that there will be legislation during this session to extend the prisoner of war compensation to these two groups of Canadian veterans?

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): In answer to the hon. member's question, Mr. Speaker, as I informed him before, this is under study by my department but as to making any commitment for this session, I prefer not to at this time.

STUDY OF PENSIONS FOR WIDOWS OF VETERANS WHOSE DISABILITY PENSION LESS THAN FORTY-EIGHT PER CENT

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Can the minister say whether he and his department are also giving serious study to the problem which arises from the fact that there is no pension for a veteran's widow where the veteran's disability pension was less than 48 per cent?

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Yes, Mr. Speaker, this is also under study by the department at the present time.

IMMIGRATION

POSSIBILITY OF DENYING ENTRY TO UNIVERSITY GRADUATES IN VIEW OF ATTITUDE TOWARD CANADIAN UNIVERSITY GRADUATES

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration arising out of the question originally asked by the hon. member for Don Valley. First, I should like to ask whether his department is doing anything to prevent immigration into Canada of university students from any part of the world or in the alternative if it is not, does he agree that such a policy as was enunciated yesterday by the Prime Minister, which is not only defeatist but disgraceful, should not apply in this country at a time when we are so anxious to have the best trained technological people that can be produced in this land?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, first of all, I always consider it an honour to have a question from the right hon. gentleman. This is the first one he has put to me in either portfolio, so it is great that in his 37th year here he has finally come around to me. In dealing with foreign students, we have a policy whereby they would secure their visa abroad and would be expected to take care of themselves when they get here. I think we have a pretty commendable record in Canada for opportunities, as some other countries have for Canadian students who are given opportunities to train abroad.

In so far as the exchange that the Prime Minister had yesterday with students, I think what he was doing was probably what many people have done to young people, in effect saying that the fact that they have a degree is not an automatic guarantee of a job. On the aspect of what the government is doing about it, he lined up the options for the students and one of them happened to grab the headlines.

Mr. Diefenbaker: A supplementary question. In view of the statement of the Prime Minister, is the minister giving consideration to having a subdepartment of immigration on emigration from Canada?

ELECTORAL BOUNDARIES READJUSTMENT ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND NAME OF CONSTITUENCY OF "TÉMISCAMINGUE" TO "RÉAL CAOUETTE"

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo-Cambridge) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-409, respecting the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act (Réal Caouette).

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Saltsman: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill to change the name of the riding of "Témiscamingue" to that of "Réal Caouette" is to honour the memory of a great federalist member of this House of Commons. There are names throughout Canada honouring distinguished politicians, members of this House and of the provincial House of Quebec. In view of the high regard in which this House held the late hon. member for Témiscamingue, I think that riding should be renamed in his honour.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT AND BANK ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING DEFINITIONS IN LEGISLATION

On the order:

March 16, 1977—Second reading and reference to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs of Bill C-42, an act to amend the Combines Investigation Act and to amend the Bank Act and other acts in relation thereto or in consequence thereof.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council) moved:

That the subject matter of Bill C-42, an act to amend the Combines Investigation Act, and to amend the Bank Act and other acts in relation thereto or in consequence thereof, be referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The House has heard the motion put forward by the President of the Privy Council. Does the minister have leave to introduce the motion at this time?

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, there have been discussions with respect to the matter, and the motion is quite in order. There has been some understanding that the work of the committee that will follow from the budget will not be interfered with. I understand arrangements have been made with other members and the minister in whose name the bill stands so that this matter can go forward with consent. We agree to the motion.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, we also agree to the proposal made by the President of the Privy Council, but there is just one point about which I should like to be sure. Maybe it is automatic, but the minister did not include in his motion any reference to the removal of item No. 42 from the order paper. I do not think we should have it in both places. I am suggesting the motion should include the discharge of the item from the order paper and the reference of the subject matter to the standing committee, or an understanding that the order will be discharged.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, it was my understanding that the table would take the necessary steps following the adoption of this motion.

Mr. Speaker: That was also the understanding of the table officers. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Is the House agreed to the putting of the motion at this time?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Mr. Huntington: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I might put a question to the minister responsible for this bill. In the discussions that led to this motion there was some comment to the effect that the steering committee to which the bill is being referred would draw up an invitation list for briefs. As this is an extremely important bill affecting the industrial organizations and structure of Canada, I would not want that steering committee to understand they would be too limited in invitations to the Canadian community to participate in the committee stage of the subject matter of the bill. I realize there has to be a balance, but if it became too restrictive I think we would be doing a great disservice to the Canadian industrial community.

Mr. Speaker: The procedure is a little extraordinary, but if it is simply to allay a concern of the hon. member perhaps the minister might answer.

Mr. Abbott: Mr. Speaker, I welcome a chance to allay that particular apprehension. In the discussions I indicated we would provide a list of persons and organizations who in the past years have expressed interest, but I think the committee would probably want to issue a more general invitation.

Mr. Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion (Mr. MacEachen) agreed to and order discharged.

RCMP INVESTIGATION—MR. GORDON GUNN

Question No. 99—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Have any charges been laid against former UIC employee Mr. Gordon Gunn of Ottawa and, if so (a) what are they (b) on what dates were such charges laid (c) how many times did Mr. Gunn appear in court and what was the result in each case (d) what is the exact date that (i) UIC (ii) RCMP began investigating this matter and on what date was the investigation completed?

2. What is a full description and detail of all infractions committed by Mr. Gunn?

3. (a) What are the names of all others associated with him in such activities (b) have any charges been laid against any of them and, if so, what are the names and addresses of any such persons charged along with a list of charges made in each case?

4. How much money did Mr. Gunn personally defraud or assist others in defrauding from UIC?

5. On what date was the answer to this question prepared?

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Department of the Solicitor General and the Unemployment Insurance Commission as follows: 1. Yes (a) One charge of fraud, Section 338(1) C.C. (b) May 14, 1976. (c) May 14, 1976, adjournment; May 21, 1976, adjournment; May 28, 1976, adjournment; June 4, 1976, adjournment; June 11, 1976, plea of not guilty; Oct. 7, 1976, Preliminary Hearing commenced. (d) (i) The investigation commenced on April 10, 1976 and was finalized on June 11, 1976. (ii) The R.C.M.P. began their investigation on February 19, 1976 and the substance of the specific charge was completed on May 3, 1976. Other aspects of the investigation are continuing.

2. Answered in No. 1 above.

3. (a) It would be prejudicial to the ongoing criminal investigation if this question was answered at this time. (b) No.

4. The information alleges an amount in excess of $200.

5. The government takes responsibility for the answers it provides to questions and for the process involved in replying to such questions. It is not appropriate therefore to provide information about internal administrative arrangements.

PRIME MINISTER USE OF PUBLIC FUNDS FOR PERSONAL PURPOSES

Question No. 114—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Does the Prime Minister use public funds for personal purposes of any kind, including holidays for himself and his family, purchasing of food, etc., considered by the Department of National Revenue as taxable benefits received from his employer and, if so, has he been required to pay income tax?

2. If he does not pay income tax, for what reasons are such benefits not considered taxable and what is the legal authority to justify such a situation?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): 1 and 2. Public funds are not used for personal holidays (see subsection 6 (1) of the Income Tax Act and Section 5.1 of the Official Residences Act).

EXPENDITURES TO MUNICIPAL UNITS ON CAPE BRETON ISLAND BY DEVCO

Question No. 738—Mr. Muir:

1. What monies have been made available to municipal units on Cape Breton Island by the Cape Breton Development Corporation for assistance in any aspect of their operations and, in each case (a) what was the municipal unit (b) what assistance was provided and for what reason?

Municipal Unit	Grant	Loan	Reasons for Assistance
County of Cape Breton	$248,743	$252,515	Regional sewer and water program
County of Inverness	75,948		Water project
County of Inverness	39,920		Paving Margaree Airport
County of Inverness	83,400		For use by the Counties on projects related to development
County of Victoria	160,000		For use by the Counties on projects related to development
County of Richmond	200,000		For use by the Counties on projects related to development
City of Sydney	7,295		Donation of land and materials
City of Sydney	35,984		Regional sewer and water program
Town of Glace Bay	162,587	83,522	Regional sewer and water program
Town of Dominion	26,730		For beach improvement
Town of Dominion	19,340	19,340	Regional sewer and water program

Town of North Sydney	16,755		Regional sewer and water program
Town of Louisbourg	21,755	21,755	Regional sewer and water program
Town of Louisbourg	26,490		Towards renovation of Town Hall and clean-up
Metro Planning Commission	32,129		Contribution towards municipal area share of the budget
Sydney Harbour ports Regional Development Board	30,000		Share in the cost of the promotion and development of the port

2. An uncounted number of discussions of this matter have taken place over several years with all the municipalities of Cape Breton County. The position of the corporation is that major financing from senior governments could not realistically be expected for isolated projects. There would have to be a comprehensive regional plan. To this end, the corporation has helped to finance the metropolitan planning commission, representing the municipalities. When that did not produce a plan, the corporation provided a full time member of its staff to act as Manager in the development of a plan for the provincial department of municipal affairs. This work has been proceeding for over twelve months and is now almost complete. When it is, the corporation will work with other agencies to secure implementation of an agreed plan.

2. What action has been taken by the Cape Breton Development Corporation in co-operation with the (a) City of Sydney (b) Town of North Sydney to assist in the construction of a new water system and, if a decision has not been rendered to date, have meetings been held and, if so, what and how many and when is a final decision to be reached as to such assistance?

Mr. Ed. Lumley (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): The reply for the Cape Breton Development Corporation is as follows: 1.

STATISTICS CANADA—NUMBER OF INDIVIDUALS EMPLOYED ON CAPE BRETON ISLAND

Question No. 740—Mr. Muir:

1. How many individuals are employed or under contract on Cape Breton Island, Nova Scotia, by Statistics Canada and how many are involved in field work?

2. What are the names of those who are involved in (a) field work (b) contract work and, in each case, what is the (i) salary of those who are employees (ii) amount received by those under contract in fees and expenses for the fiscal year 1975-76 and the estimated cost for 1976-77?

Mr. Hugh Poulin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): In so far as Statistics Canada is concerned: 1. As of November 1, 1976, 15 individuals hired under the authority of the Statistics Act were employed on Cape Breton Island as part-time interviewers on the various field surveys conducted by Statistics Canada.

2. The 15 part-time employees working on Cape Breton Island for Statistics Canada as at November 1, 1976 were all involved on field work, and their fees and travel expenses for 1976-77, estimated, and for 1975-76, where applicable, are as follows:

PROJECTS UNDERTAKEN BY DEVCO SINCE ITS INCEPTION

Question No. 741—Mr. Muir:

1. Since its inception, has the Cape Breton Development Corporation undertaken on its own any projects and, if so (a) what is a description of each (b) what (i) was the objective of each (ii) was the cost of each (iii) were the results?

2. What has been the long-term employment produced from each project as of this date?

Mr. Ed. Lumley (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): The reply for the Cape Breton Development Corporation is as follows: 1. See following schedule.

2. For most projects the objective is to increase the market for other Cape Breton production rather than the direct employment. For the direct employment alone in the order of projects, refer to the following schedule.

1. Project Name	(a) Description	(b)(i) Objective	(ii) Capital Cost	(iii) Results	2. Employment

GRANT—WEST ROYALTY HYDRAULICS LTD., PEI

Question No. 1,393—Mr. Halliday:

Has any department provided a grant or loan, or other form of financial assistance, to West Royalty Hydraulics Ltd., or a company with a similar name in Prince Edward Island and which is owned or controlled by Mr. Bill Valavaara and, if so, what was the amount and nature of such assistance?

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): In so far as the Department of Regional Economic Expansion is concerned: Yes. West Royalty Hydraulics Ltd., of West Royalty, Prince Edward Island accepted an offer of a development incentive grant under RDIA of $54,324 on May 28, 1976 to establish a new facility in West Royalty, Prince Edward Island.

In so far as the Department of Manpower and Immigration is concerned, two contracts have been signed with West Royalty Hydraulics Ltd. under the Canada Manpower Industrial Training Program. Assistance is in the form of reimbursement of a share of the costs incurred for employee training. The details of the contracts are as follows: Contract No. 1: Date of Contract: November 15, 1976; Occupation Trained: Hydraulics Technician (1); Maximum Cost to Canada: $2,280; Course Duration: 20 weeks. Contract No. 2: Date of Contract: February 14, 1977; Occupation Trained: Machinist Apprentice (1); Maximum Cost to Canada: $1,560; Course Duration: 20 weeks.

POSTAL COSTS

Question No. 1,567—Mr. Herbert:

For each five year period since 1960, what percentage of all postal costs is labour, including fringe benefits?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Postmaster General): Period: 1960-61 to 1964-65, 57.1 percent; 1965-66 to 1969-70, 71.1 percent; 1970-71 to 1974-75, 69.4 percent.

PUBLIC WORKS—HUMIDITY CONDITIONS IN GOVERNMENT BUILDINGS

Question No. 1,569—Mr. Herbert:

1. Does the Department of Public Works keep any record of humidity conditions in buildings used by the government?

2. What monies have been spent in the past five years to improve humidity conditions in existing buildings?

Mr. Alexandre Cyr (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works): 1. No, not as a matter of routine.

2. Projects for the exclusive purpose of improving humidity conditions in existing buildings are seldom undertaken. Normally, the requirement for humidity control contributes to the scope of a project undertaken to air-condition existing office space. However, the Department of Public Works accounting system does not provide for the extraction of that portion of the total project cost which could be exclusively attributed to the improvement of humidity control.

The following reply is also in response to questions Nos. 1,654, 1,655, 1,656, 1,657, 1,658, 1,659, 1,660, 1,661, 1,662, 1,663, 1,664, 1,665, 1,666, 1,667, 1,668, 1,669, 1,670, 1,671, 1,672, 1,673, 1,674, 1,675, 1,676, 1,677, 1,678, 1,679, 1,680 and 1,681.

EASTCAN EXPLORATION LIMITED—EXPLORATION OFF COAST OF LABRADOR

Question No. 1,793—Mr. Crosbie:

1. Did the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources state on February 1, 1977 that Eastcan Exploration Limited of Calgary is not prepared to go ahead with an exploration programme off the coast of Labrador during the summer of 1977 unless a dispute over regulations proposed by Newfoundland is settled and, if so, on what date was a meeting held between the Minister and Eastcan Exploration Limited when these matters were discussed?

2. Was the Minister authorized by Eastcan Exploration Limited or any officer or director thereof to make public statements in connection with any conversations the Minister held with the company concerning its position on exploration off Labrador during 1977 and, if so, on what date and by whom was the Minister authorized to make such a statement?

3. Has Eastcan Exploration Limited or any of the members thereof indicated to the Minister or the Department that it supports and is satisfied with the Arctic and Offshore Regulations proposed by the government and, if so, what is his name?

4. Did the Minister state that he intends to intervene in an attempt to settle a dispute alleged between Newfoundland and Eastcan Exploration Limited and, if so (a) how does he intend to intervene (b) what methods of persuasion or pressure does the Minister intend to use if the Province of Newfoundland rejects his intervention?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources reports as follows: 1. In December Eastcan indicated to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources that it would be unable to continue drilling operations on its federal permits offshore from Labrador unless it received assurances from the Newfoundland Government that its interests offshore from Labrador would not be nullified or expropriated in the event that the province was successful in acquiring jurisdiction over the offshore areas involved as a result of the forthcoming agreed joint Reference to the Supreme Court of Canada. On Janaury 31 of this year the company advised the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources that it was now in receipt of draft regulations prepared by the Newfoundland Government and, while the company could not discuss their content, it was of the view it could not proceed with this year's drilling program on the basis of those regulations.

2. A Minister of the Federal Crown requires no authorization from the private sector to make public satements.

3. The group of companies of which Total Eastcan Exploration Ltd. is a partner in respect of federal oil and gas rights offshore from Newfoundland and Labrador has indicated in discussions with federal authorities that it would be prepared to continue drilling operations on these rights if the Newfoundland Government provided the assurances referred to in the response to Question 1. This would indicate that the group considers that the provisions of the proposed federal regulations that have been made public are not such as to inhibit the companies involved from undertaking the heavy investments necessary to conduct oil and gas drilling operations offshore from Labrador.

4. Yes. (a) The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources has spoken with Premier Moores and also sent him a telex to endeavour to initiate discussions leading to a resolution of the problem. (b) Not applicable, pending results of discussions referred to in (a).

BIDS FOR THE EXTENSION TO FROBISHER BAY GENERAL HOSPITAL

Question No. 1,891—Mr. Herbert:

1. What were the names of the contractors that submitted bids for the extension to the Frobisher Bay General Hospital and what were the amounts in each case?

2. What was the departmental estimate of the cost of the work?

3. Is it intended to recall tenders?

4. Will there be changes to the scope of the construction?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): 1. Name of Contractor: Ron Engineering Construction (Eastern Limited). Bid, $4,780,000. Tower Company (1961). Bid, $5,188,866.

2. The Department of Public Works' cost estimate for the work was $4,000,000.

3. Yes.

4. Yes. A complete redesign is planned in order to effect a general cost reduction in all areas.

GOVERNMENT POSITION ON UNIFIED FAMILY COURT PROJECT IN NEWFOUNDLAND AND PAST AGREEMENTS

Question No. 1,897—Mr. Crosbie:

1. Has the Government of Newfoundland informed the government that it wishes to establish a unified family court having jurisdiction over all matrimonial and family proceedings, including divorce, legal separation, alimony and maintenance of children and matrimonial property and, if so, does the government support such a request and will it enter into an agreement with Newfoundland for the establishment of such a court as a pilot project?

2. Is the government prepared to cost-share in the establishment and operation of such a court and, if so, what part of the costs is the government prepared to pay?

3. Has the government entered into an agreement with any other province dealing with such a court and, if so (a) which province and on what date (b) what are the main conditions of any such agreement?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): 1. The Minister of Justice met with the Attorney General for Newfoundland, in St. John's Newfoundland, March 4, 1977. Following their meeting the ministers issued a joint announcement that they had agreed to the establishing of an experimental Unified Family court project for the St. John's area. The ministers noted in their announcement that the establishment of the experimental Unified Family Court project is contingent upon agreement between the federal and provincial governments on certain specific details.

2. While specific details as to the distribution of costs have yet to be decided upon, it was agreed that the costs of the experiment are to be shared by both governments. Vote number 10 of the Department of Justice set out in the estimates for the fiscal period ending March 31, 1978 provides for contributions for pilot projects relating to family courts throughout Canada in the total amount of $350,000.

3. At present the government has entered into negotiations for Unified Family Courts in the provinces of Ontario, Manitoba and Saskatchewan. While agreement in principle has been reached in Manitoba and Ontario, no formal agreement for joint funding of a Unified Family Court pilot project has yet been entered into by the Minister of Justice and the Attorney General of a province. Some funds have been expended, however, to pay for the joint funding of the evaluation of the unified family court pilot project commenced by British Columbia in 1974.

OLD AGE SECURITY—SPOUSE'S ALLOWANCE

Question No. 1,975—Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre):

1. In the month of (a) July (b) August (c) September (d) October (e) November (f) December 1976, how many persons were in receipt of the Spouse's Allowance provided under the Old Age Security Act and how many were (i) male (ii) female?

2. In the same months, how many persons who had been receiving the Spouse's Allowance had it discontinued because of the death of the older spouse and how many were (a) male (b) female?

Order Paper Questions

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): 1.

Month	Number of Spouse's Allowance Recipients
(a) July, 1976	62,508
(b) August, 1976	63,695
(c) September, 1976	66,002
(d) October, 1976	67,590
(e) November, 1976	69,169
(f) December, 1976	70,029

2.

Month	Number of Spouse's Allowance recipients who had their benefit discontinued due to death of the pensioner spouse
(a) July, 1976	194
(b) August, 1976	185
(c) September, 1976	193
(d) October, 1976	215
(e) November, 1976	205
(f) December, 1976	202

NOTE: Statistics differentiating the sex of benefit recipients are not maintained.

VETERANS AFFAIRS—NUMBER OF VETERANS WORKING IN DEPARTMENT

Question No. 2,151—Mr. Herbert:

Is any record kept of the number of veterans presently working for the Department of Veterans Affairs and, if so, what is the percentage in each section?

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): No.

[English]

Mr. Herbert: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I wish to draw to the attention of the parliamentary secretary, as I have privately drawn to the attention of the parliamentary secretary responsible for the answering of these questions, a series of 26 questions, Nos. 1,424 to 1,429 inclusive, which were placed on the order paper on December 21 and ask of the various departments the names of the deputy ministers of the last nine years and the date of their appointments.

I find it inconceivable that departments do not keep employment records concerning deputy ministers. Those questions were placed on the order paper following the statement made in this House by the President of the Treasury Board establishing the royal commission on financial management and accountability. Included in the terms of reference of that royal commission was evaluation of the administrative performance of deputy ministers and heads of Crown agencies. It would be extremely helpful if we could know who the deputy ministers are, how long they have been in their jobs, their experience and the date of appointment to their positions.

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, I note my colleague's presentation and I will pursue the matter and report to him.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

STATUTE LAW (METRIC CONVERSION) AMENDMENT ACT, 1976

AMENDMENTS TO WHEAT BOARD ACT TO FACILITATE CONVERSION TO METRIC SYSTEM

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-23, to facilitate conversion to the metric system of measurement, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. At this stage of the metric conversion bill there are for consideration at the report stage eight motions, seven of which stand in the name of the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Neil). Of those, six—in the opinion of the Chair—have basically the same intent and, therefore, subject to any suggestions to the contrary, could be grouped together both for discussion and vote. I refer to motions 1, 2, 4, 5, 7 and 8 standing in the name of the hon. member for Moose Jaw. Unless it is otherwise suggested, they could be grouped together for discussion. I might be persuaded, if there is some necessity to split them for the purpose of voting, so to do. If that seems necessary, or if that necessity develops during the course of discussion, then certainly representations could be entertained about splitting them if the House is of such disposition.

Motion No. 3, in the name of the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton) should be debated and voted on separately. Motion No. 6, in the name of the hon. member for Moose Jaw, has a different intent and ought to be discussed and voted on separately. Unless during the course of discussion some indication to the contrary develops, perhaps the House is prepard to proceed with the discussion and disposition of the motions as I have proposed. If so, I would now call for consideration the six motions previously referred to standing in the name of the hon. member for Moose Jaw.

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw) moved:

Motion No. 1.

That Bill C-23, an act to facilitate conversion to the metric system of measurement, be amended in clause 2 by striking out line 11 at page 1 and substituting the following therefor:

"in those definitions, the words "acres and hectares"."

Motion No. 2.

That Bill C-23, an act to facilitate conversion to the metric system of measurement, be amended in clause 2 by striking out line 22 at page 1 and substituting the following therefor:

"sions, the words "bushel and tonne"."

Motion No. 4.

That Bill C-23, an act to facilitate conversion to the metric system of measurement, be amended in clause 6 by striking out line 26 at page 4 and substituting the following therefor:

"provisions, the words "acreage and hectare"."

Motion No. 5.

That Bill C-23, an act to facilitate conversion to the metric system of measurement, be amended in clause 6 by striking out line 35 at page 4 and substituting the following therefor:

"sions, the words "bushel and tonne"."

Motion No. 7.

That Bill C-23, an act to facilitate conversion to the metric system of measurement, be amended in clause 8 by striking out line 8 at page 6 and substituting the following therefor:

"sions, the words "bushel and tonne"."

Motion No. 8.

That Bill C-23, an act to facilitate conversion to the metric system of measurement, be amended in clause 10 by striking out line 32 at page 8 and substituting the following therefor:

" "bushel and tonne" and "acre and hectare", respectively."

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have this opportunity to speak on the motions I have placed before the House. There is deep concern among western farmers about conversion to the metric system. Frankly, I sympathize with the minister because I think he has been mesmerized, and possibly misled, by the Metric Commission which led him to believe that western producers and farmers unanimously favoured the metric system. Even a member from western Canada, the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Goodale) was of the same conviction. On second reading, he said in this House on January 26, as reported on page 2422 of Hansard:

I want to deal with a few of the aspects of metric conversion affecting grain which may not be fully appreciated but upon the basis of which I believe this measure is not only supportable but is also in the best long-run interests of all segments of the grains industry, including producers in the prairie region. First, it should be noted that this change has a broad and virtually unanimous base of support in the farm community.

That is just not so. Western farmers are almost unanimously opposed to the metric system. How did the minister come to that conclusion? The Metric Commission, a group of bureaucrats, set up what they called a subcommittee, the Canadian bulk grain handling committee. Who was on that committee? It is interesting to read the organizations represented on that commission. We start off with a representative from the Canadian Grain Commission, the Canadian Feed Manufacturers' Association, the Canada Grains Council, the Pioneer Grain Company Limited, the Alberta Wheat Pool, the United Grain Growers, the Canadian Wheat Board, the Ontario Grain and Feed Dealers Association, the Alberta Wheat Pool, again, the Canadian Grain Commission, again, the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool, the Anglo-Canadian Grain Company, the Department of Agriculture for the province of Saskatchewan and a co-ordinator from the Metric Commission.

Almost without exception each and every one of the organizations represented on that commission has a vested interest. Those people represent organizations which are in the grain handling industry. If you examine the list you will see there is not one producer represented on the committee, a committee presumably set up to advise the Metric Commission, which in turn will advise the minister. The minister was not at the committee hearings, but possibly he read the reports of the standing committee. If so, he will recall that the committee had representatives appear from various organizations. I will list them. They are the Canadian Wheat Board, the Farm Grain Services Union, Unifarm, the Manitoba Farm Bureau, SARM, the Saskatchewan Urban Municipalities Association, and the NFU.

It is interesting to note that the representatives who appeared on behalf of the National Farmers Union did not come from western Canada, despite the fact there were some in this part of the country at the time. They sent the vice-president, who comes from Prince Edward Island, and a representative from the province of Ontario.

This bill has to do with producers in the Canadian Wheat Board area which, as hon. members know, is western Canada. It takes in Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta, and part of the Peace River. The representatives of all the organizations which appeared, with the exception of the Saskatchewan Association of Rural Municipalities and the Saskatchewan Association of Urban Municipalities, led the committee to believe that they represented the majority of the farmers in the west and that those whom they represented were in favour of metrication.

The representative of SARM was a farmer. He represents the Association of Rural Municipalities. There is no one who is closer to the farmer than the representatives of the rural municipalities. He stated that, as far as he could determine, farmers were not in favour of metrication. The representative from the Urban Municipalities Association lives in the small city of Estevan, with a population of about 5,000.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Nine thousand.

Mr. Neil: The hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton) says it is 9,000. That city has dealings all the time with the farm population. It is dependent upon the farm economy. The representative said he had talked to many farmers and as far as he could determine no farmer was in favour of metrication.

The representatives of all the other farm organizations who appeared at the committee hearings said that their people were in favour. However, on being questioned by members of the committee they admitted they had not made any attempt to determine the feelings of their memberships. All they could tell us in committee was that they had not received a motion from any of their locals, districts or individual members opposing metrication. Because they had not received any representations or motions they assumed that their memberships were unanimously in favour of the bill. Under questioning they also indicated that they had taken no active steps after the bill was debated on second reading to determine the feelings of their memberships.

Prior to, during and after the committee hearings some of us contacted the minister. We sent copies of resolutions indicating the feelings of the farm organizations and individuals. I am sure that many other letters were sent to him directly. I go to my constituency almost every weekend. I have occasion to travel in the constituency and talk to farmers. I have yet to find one farmer who is in favour of the metric bill.

Mr. Nystrom: You are wrong—Ralph Goodale is.

Mr. Neil: Ralph is not a farmer. As a matter of fact, I was in the constituency of the hon. member for Assiniboia. A few minutes ago I quoted from his speech as reported in Hansard where he said that as far as he could see the farmers in his area were unanimously in favour of metric conversion. I spoke to a group of about 150 people in the hon. member's constituency. I commented on the metric system, what we were trying to do and how we were trying to bring in amendments to have a dual system. There was not one person in that crowd who was not opposed to the metric system. I think some members opposite should go back to their constituencies and talk to the farmers they represent.

In addition to talking to farmers and farm organizations, I have received a large number of letters. I do not have the time to quote them all. One letter I received was from the Moose Jaw agricultural society. They sent me a copy of a resolution passed at a meeting held on February 11, 1977. Their resolution, which appears on the letterhead of the association, reads as follows:

> The association does not concur with the total conversion of the metric system on bushels to tonnes and acres to hectares and that it be a dual system.

● (1230)

A few days ago I received a letter from one of the local pool committees. It is dated March 9.

An hon. Member: You are lucky to have received it so soon.

Mr. Neil: That is correct, the mail system being the way it is. This letter reads:

> At a meeting of the Boharm wheat pool committee held March 7, 1977, a motion was unanimously passed that we are not in favour of acres being converted to hectares at the farm level.

It is interesting to note, also, that at a recent meeting of the Federal Co-operatives in Regina the delegates opposed conversion, according to a report which appeared in the Co-operative Consumer of March 15. The news report reads in part:

> A majority of the delegates to the Federated Co-operatives annual meeting want the federal government to reconsider the metrication of land measurement and they strongly oppose any further conversion to metric in the lumber industry.

This is an organization in which there is a great deal of farm representation. While the standing committee was considering this bill, the Canadian Federation of Agriculture was holding its annual meeting in Ottawa. It is my understanding, after talking to some of the people who were there and reading newspaper reports, that a motion was put forward at the meeting opposing the metric system. I understand there was considerable debate on the subject, at the end of which it was decided to table the motion. So there can be no doubt that the majority of farmers are opposed to the metric system. I think it is safe to say that between 95 per cent and 100 per cent of the farmers in western Canada are opposed to metrification. But I would add this: farmers understand that the world is gradually converting to the metric system and that eventually we shall end up using a complete metric system in this country. However, they also know that such a decision has not yet been taken in the United States, and they feel that because of our close trade relationship with the United States any action we take should be in step with that taken by the Americans.

My amendments simply call upon the government, under the wheat stabilization legislation, under the program for cash advances for crops, under the two-price system for wheat, and so on, to use a dual system, a system which shows bushels, acres, tonnes and hectares. The farmer would then be able to choose the system he preferred. It would not be compulsory. It is likely that the majority of the older farmers in the west, who have been accustomed to using bushels and acres all their lives, will continue to do so. But the younger people who have studied the metric system in school and who are still close enough to their school days to be able to work out complicated calculations will likely use the metric system, and eventually we will end up with a situation in which all the farmers of western Canada will be using the metric system. All we are asking in these amendments is that the government give farmers in western Canada the opportunity of using either system.

I realize that the grain trade has told the minister that if the bill fails to go through, all the money spent on this scheme will have been lost. I suggest that this is a pack of nonsense. The grain trade has been selling grain on the international market, using the metric system, for many years. It does not require any law of this parliament for the grain companies, after they have accepted delivery of grain from the farmers, to use the metric system from that point through the elevator and on to export positions. How can the grain trade say to the minister that they cannot do without this legislation? It is nonsense. They can go ahead and use whatever system they wish.

The government is supposed to respect the wishes of the majority of the people. The majority of the people in western Canada who are farmers and producers are happy with acres and bushels. But, as I say, they realize we have to progress and they say, "We shall progress; but take it in stages. Give us the opportunity to convert over the years by letting us have a dual system." This is all that we on this side of the House are asking for, and that is the purpose of our amendments. I would ask the minister and members on the other side seriously to consider the representations which have been made on this subject both directly and through hon. members speaking from the opposition benches. Let these hon. gentlemen accept the fact that this is what the majority wants.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, it is probably appropriate for me to rise at this point since a good deal of the change involved in the bill before us affects the grain industry in western Canada. I might begin by saying, in response to the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Neil), that we have indeed given very serious consideration to the attitudes of farmers and producers throughout the Wheat Board region. We did, indeed, make quite clear that we would be asking the various institutions and organizations affected by these amendments to continue using the familiar measurement in terms of bushels and acres wherever feasible, which is practically everywhere so far as the farmers are concerned, as well as the measurement of hectares and tonnes in the metric system.

We did give serious consideration, as well, to the amendments which the hon. member has put on the order paper, because since we are proposing this practice it might have seemed that we could accept his amendments as well. However, there is a good and valid reason why there should be one basic, over-all legal practice for technical purposes, and that those measurements should be known and be certain so that we do not have a hodge-podge of some people using entirely "acres" and some using entirely "hectares" in our system. Therefore, we do not agree to the amendments proposed by the hon. member for Moose Jaw.

In view of the commitment to attempt to use this second measurement, I hope we will meet the feelings of the farmers. We recognize that they are concerned about the change-over from familiar measurements to others which are not familiar. However, it should be clear that in no case have we purported hereby to affect land measurement or similar questions. When the hon. member refers to those issues he is talking about matters largely within provincial jurisdiction, areas in which the provinces will also be proceeding. What we are proposing to do is to deal with the way in which the Wheat Board, the grain commission and like institutions will operate and to have a legal basis for the use of hectares, tonnes and kilograms in view of the move by Canada to the metric system.

I take it that the hon. member did not oppose the basic proposition that Canada move to the metric system. Indeed, I see he nods his head in the affirmative. I find it somewhat strange that we have had raised in this debate the question of the attitude of farmers to this over-all issue. In a way, Mr. Speaker, it is obvious that changing measurements is difficult in terms of the transition period. Nevertheless, I believe most members of the House agree that this is a transitional period that we must go through and which we must try to make as free of pain as possible. This is why I have indicated that I will be asking the Canadian Wheat Board, if we take other steps in relation to other institutions, to maintain the familiar measurement alongside the hectare and kilogram measurements so that farmers will have it before them. Going straightforwardly into the metric system and eliminating the other measurements would have been too harsh and difficult for the broad section of the public to accept, the public in this case being the farmers particularly throughout the prairie region. With this assurance we really meet the need which the hon. member cites for having those farmers who will not want to learn the new system continue with their old calculations, using the system with which they are familiar.

It is a little ironic, I think, that we are having this debate regarding the concern of "going metric" in Canada. I think when we found it desirable to move in that direction we came to a rather non-partisan conclusion. I believe that whatever the political party, the government would have come to the same conclusion at that particular time and proceeded roughly along the lines of our own program.

What we have done with the Metric Commission is to seek the co-operation of the various people involved in dealing with goods and products moving into the metric system. In this particular case the various organizations to which the hon. member referred co-operated very well—and they do represent a great spectrum of opinion. I am astonished that the hon. member did not recognize that with the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool and other wheat pools represented at a gathering there is representation of the views of farmers even if the actual individuals who speak are not farmers themselves. The pools throughout the prairies and the United Grain Growers are among the most useful and representative groups of grain farmers in the prairie provinces. They reached the conclusion that they could, and should, go to the metric system on February 1, 1977, a date which we now, regrettably, have passed. They have suffered some inconvenience with the passing of that date, and therefore I hope we can end their period of uncertainty as quickly as possible by allowing this bill to move to the Senate and become law. In this way we will allow the change-over to the new system to occur. Everyone is geared up for that in terms of materials and the like, and therefore we should now go forward rapidly. As I say, any party in government would likely have reached the same decision.

The hon. member said that farmers in a gathering he witnessed expressed their unhappiness with metric conversion, or at least with the steps we were taking. I think it is incumbent upon us, as politicians, of whatever party to continue in these circumstances the difficult job of explaining the reason Canada is going metric, a move which I understand is embraced by all sides and which assuredly we are trying to make as painless as possible. I do not think we should leave at large the feeling that somehow we could have avoided this change.

Indeed, Mr. Speaker, the United States is also going metric. It is doing so in a different way, without as much coherent action, as it were; but more and more industry by industry is going metric. Therefore, it is merely a matter of time before the conversion is complete. In this particular case there is no reason for us to wait for the United States. The dealings we have with the United States on these particular matters, at least so far as grain is concerned, are largely already in metric measurement on an international basis where volumes are large.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I hope the farmers will see the availability of these two measures as something which will allow them, without fear of the metric system, to become familiar with these new terms over a period of time. I think it is a good thing that it is the grain industry, particularly the western Canadian grain industry, which has been able to come to this kind of agreement to go metric and to pick a date and agree to work toward it. I think we should now co-operate by allowing this matter to come to a vote.

The hon. member for Moose Jaw referred to a variety of motions. I think he even said that in one public debate he had on land measurement, after a long discussion a motion was tabled. He seemed to take that as some sort of approval, though it seemed to me to be a sign of increased understanding of the complexity of the issue involved. I hope that with the assurance that we will continue to use familiar measurements as well as the new ones, the hon. member will agree that we really ought to have the one technical legal standard in our law, and therefore that we should pass the bill as it is. But, in any case, I hope he will agree that we move rapidly to a decision so that the period of uncertainty about when the changeover will occur will come to an end.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I wish to speak very briefly on this matter. Perhaps I might open by asking a few questions of the minister which he could respond to at some other time. First of all, I welcome what he said about retaining some of the aspects of the old system; I know the farmers will appreciate that. Perhaps he could elaborate on what he means by retaining parts of the old system so the farmers will not be confused. Does this mean that the farmers would still have five or ten bushel quotas, for example, instead of moving on to the metric measurement? What sectors of the grain trade will still use the old system of measurement? Perhaps the minister would respond to that general question now before I make a few remarks, if I have your permission, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, the plan is that the Wheat Board will call quotas in metric terms, such as kilograms per hectare, but there will be an accompanying translation in terms of bushels per acre so that the farmers will have both measurements. However, for operational purposes kilograms per hectare will be the term used by elevator managers.

Mr. Neil: For how many years?

Mr. Lang: As far as I am concerned, that should go on for as long as it is seen to be needed by the farmers. If it comes to the time when the farmers agree that it is no longer necessary, then it should be terminated.

● (1250)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom).

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, the minister recognizes that farmers were quite concerned about conversion to the metric system. I am not sure why the minister will not accept some of these amendments. It may be a technical debate at this point, and not an important one. The arguments made by the minister in charge of the Wheat Board (Mr. Lang) are going in the right direction, and I appreciate that. The hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Neil) pretty well summarized the point of view I am hearing from farmers in my riding. That is pretty well an accurate reflection; it is the universal view. I do not think it is a political question; it is a genuine concern of ordinary farmers who are out there.

An hon. Member: Absolutely.

Mr. Nystrom: Whenever something like this comes up in the future, a bill that affects ordinary people in such a genuine way in their everyday lives, we, as parliamentarians, should make sure that we are out there with the ordinary people letting them offer us their point of view. There is a genuine feeling by farmers that they were not consulted; they were not consulted thoroughly enough by some of the farm organizations; they were not consulted thoroughly enough by parliament; they were not consulted thoroughly enough by the government or by the minister involved. The minister may argue that point. Perhaps there is some merit in arguing it, but that is the feeling of the farmers to whom I have spoken. I have spoken to enough of them to reflect their general opinion.

It is not one political party versus another. The feeling in the farm communities is probably summarized best by SUMA and the Saskatchewan Association of Rural Municipalities when they appeared before the committee. Those two organizations are, like the wheat pools, and so on, very much in touch with and very much plugged into the reality of life on the prairies.

If there were more consultation with ordinary people, when we bring in something which affects them in a genuine way you would have less cynicism of ordinary people toward governments, toward parliament and toward politicians in general. Hopefully, we can learn from this. The next time the government brings in a bill that affects people in such a genuine, basic way, I hope we can make sure there is more consultation. The hon. member for Moose Jaw hit the nail on the head when he said that people are concerned about it. I have spoken to very few farmers who are not concerned about it.

As the hon. member for Moose Jaw also said, most farmers, particularly the younger ones, realize that the metric system, in principle, is the best system. It is the simplest system in principle. It will become, very shortly, an even more international system of measurement. The minister in charge of the Wheat Board is right when he says the United States is also moving in the same direction. The day will come when they will "go metric" as well. It is obvious that we in this country should be part of that international metric system, where we have a universal system around the world that is used by all cultures, societies and the like. I think farmers recognize that. Farmers want the chance to convert to the system slowly over the years where you use the dual system. That is only right. That is the only natural thing to do. Certainly, that is the type of representation I have been getting as I travel frequently throughout the rural parts of my riding.

Farmers do not see any direct financial benefit by converting to the metric system. They do not see the need of it now, because of the position the United States is taking. I support the principle and the direction of these amendments. I appreciate the instructions the minister in charge of the Wheat Board has sent out to the Wheat Board. I think farmers will appreciate that. The farm community is pretty well unanimous on this point. Hopefully, we can agree to support the amendments that are before the House. If we do that farmers will benefit more than from what the minister said.

[Translation]

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, at this stage of the debate on Bill C-23 to facilitate conversion to the metric system of measurement, I should like to make one comment on that change in the calculation system imposed on our country. I am not against that change since Canada is simply falling in line with most countries in the world. However, that change is a hindrance to many people who have to go along with it. One could think that the change is long overdue. It would indeed have cost less, because that new way of calculating, so necessary to the development of our science, economy and international trade, comes at a time when it is most expensive.

So far, our political system found it difficult to consider any change in that area. We were afraid to damage our national heritage, while China has been using that system for decades, and so have the U.S.S.R., Latin America and eastern Europe countries. We in Canada kept that system and in spite of the intervention of scientific circles advocating that change, we persisted in hanging on to what we want to get rid of today. It is only after numerous interventions and a more realistic view taken by the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce and thousands of employees that the government has deemed it necessary to act. We can only agree with that but we find it is a little late. The consequence of that late gesture is costlier.

In that sense, the government carries a responsibility which should not be unloaded on farmers and workers who must purchase new parts to meet the new standard. Besides, technicians such as Nestlé (Canada) Ltd. Projects Division Director Dick Cannon felt thirty years ago that conversion to the metric system was an excellent idea. Already in 1945 some businessmen realized that there were some benefits to that conversion.

The delay of the government in switching to the metric system was in many respects prejudicial to the Canadian people. I understand the concern of the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Neil) when it comes to measurements and hectares. I think that his amendment is confusing and would somehow perpetuate the former policy—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock later this day.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

Mr. Allard: Mr. Speaker, before recess at one o'clock, I was saying that the amendment moved by my hon. friend from Moose Jaw (Mr. Neil) would be confusing, that it would have the effect of perpetuating to a certain extent the practice of the old system. Therefore I think that the government of Canada should normally take over part of the cost. Of course, it is difficult to ask the government to grant subsidies to help the citizens obtain new tools with international markings.

I feel, however, that it would be legitimate for the government to provide benefits to specialists who must purchase new pieces of equipment. Why not allow the people who must incur these expenses to list them as deductible expenses for income tax purposes, provided they can file acceptable evidence that they were for replacement only? The government would thereby demonstrate not only its good will towards Canadian workers and farmers who must abide by these new standards which this government has set on its own, but would also facilitate the desirable change. Someone may argue that the government does not have to get involved, but it is nevertheless the government which has ordered this change, a necessary one indeed if we are to adhere to the world standards but for which the government has the moral obligation to assume the costs.

[English]

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, in nearly 20 years of being around the House I have never witnessed a more alarming and shocking thing than I have witnessed here today. The issue is very simple. It is no longer a matter of conversion to the metric system; it is a matter of how, in a democratic system, we represent our people. We are dealing today with a series of amendments to Bill C-23. I have nothing against the metric system, but I suggest a more humane method of putting it into effect in order to allow the people to adjust without too much hardship in terms of time or money; that is all.

• (1410)

Evidence was given to us in the committee by representatives of grain companies, the National Farmers Union, union spokesmen for elevator men in the west, consumers, and so on. We heard from those who have a vested interest, and by that I mean those who will lose or make money out of the idea. The government says it wants metric conversion as it is laid down in this bill, and the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Neil) said flatly this morning—and there has been no contradiction of his statement—that the great majority of the people affected by this legislation have expressed opposition to it. We in this House are saying that since the metric system is a better system than the imperial system, parliament arbitrarily should ram it down the throats of our people without even listening to their protests and arguments.

I do not use that expression very often. In all the years I have been here it has never been clearer to me than it is now that on the very fundamentals of how we serve our people we are alienating them from the institution of parliament. All we hear in the media today is that Quebec has a problem, or that western Canada has a problem, but we know that in every part of Canada and in every segment of our population people are showing signs of distress—"alienation" is the big word for it—over how their institutions are looking after them. They feel they no longer have any say.

I have always supported the concept that sooner or later we should change to the metric system because it is more convenient and better arithmetically, but never have I advocated something which, even though better for us in the long run, would do harm to our people now without making that suggestion as humanely as possible.

The amendments moved by the hon. member for Moose Jaw simply provide a method of moving less quickly into the metric system. We are trying to rush conversion through without the consent of the people, and arousing their animosities because of the cost and inconvenience of adopting a new system. We are arousing their deeper instinct that they are being overrun by their own legislators. That latter fear is a deep great one in Canada. We are going against all the rules of democratic procedures, because the evidence is very clear that 95 per cent to 97 per cent of the rank and file of farm organizations are against what is happening here. But the minister states that we have to accept the word of the executives of grain companies. That is the issue.

I do not believe we have to call a referendum on this subject, although that is proposed in many letters which I have. I think that the common sense of hon. members in this chamber should be such that we should do what is most acceptable. It is very clear to every hon. member of this House, whether on the government side or on this side, that the people directly affected—in this case, mostly the farmers of western Canada but also the consumers of Canada—have expressed in the only way they know, by official resolutions passed by their organizations and letters to their members of parliament, that they are opposed. I do not think the members of this chamber should say "To heck with them. We are going to ram it through". That is the essence of the reason I am supporting the amendments moved by the hon. member for Moose Jaw which simply propose that we use both measurements.

The Canadian Wheat Board, always aware of the fact that it is held responsible for its behaviour by farmers, recognized this immediately and accepted the proposal. The minister has expressed in the House that the Canadian Wheat Board is going to use both systems on its forms. So here we have one so-called institution of this parliament saying that in spite of this legislation it is going to allow all wheat farmers to use both systems on their forms. When we pass this legislation, as the government wishes us to do, I question whether the Canadian Wheat Board will be acting within the law because the law will provide that only one system be used. However, because the Canadian Wheat Board is an independent board I suppose it will ignore the law because it has the support of the minister.

Under this legislation, only the metric system is to be used. The minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board argued today that this does not affect land measurement. Such errant nonsense as that statement rarely comes into this House. The federal Metric Commission went to the provinces and said that this is the law at the federal level and the provinces should harmonize their legislation with that law. The provinces were conned into believing that this was the law and that this parliament had passed it. But that was not the case. Before metric conversion is complete, 90 statutes of this parliament will have to be amended. The bill before us proposes amending nine of those 90, so I suggest the statement that the provincial governments have responsibility for land measurement begs the question. If the Metric Commission told the provincial governments that that was the law, and that the provinces would have to pass laws to harmonize with it, the federal government would have to accept responsibility for that.

Metric conversion, as it applies to land measurement, will have serious repercussions. When people in the cities of Saskatchewan have their lots measured, they will have to get them accurately surveyed in the metric system before they can be registered at the land titles office. That means money for lawyers and money for surveyors. As everyone knows, our roads system is based on the mile; our land measurements are based on the mile. The British democracy allows its people to keep the mile, but apparently in Canada we are not going to have that right because the public service bureaucracy has decided to confuse us.

The federal bureaucracy, working in harmony with the bureaucracies of the provinces, has decided that the metric system must be rammed down our throats immediately. The essence of the issue is bringing the metric system to North America and Australia which are the only remaining parts of the world which do not use the metric system. It can be done quickly, as it was done in Australia, or it can be done gradually as it is being done in Great Britain and in the United States.

I would like to bring to the attention of this House the comparison which exists between the democractic country of the United States and the once democractic country of Canada.

● (1420)

I have here a letter from the Committee on Science and Technology of the United States House of Representatives describing how metric conversion will work in that country. The hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski), to whom the letter is addressed, has referred to it already in this House so I will just read the relevant paragraph. The letter is signed by a member of the Congress, Don Fuqua, and the relevant paragraph reads as follows:

> The first and perhaps most important aspect of the American law is that no one will be asked to change to the metric system unless it is done voluntarily. The Act specifically provides that the United States Metric Board "shall have no compulsory powers."
> The matter of land measurements was specifically discussed in our committee hearings. Land measurement was frequently given as an example where there would be very little advantage to be gained from making the changeover and where the costs of doing so would be entirely out of proportion to any possible gains. It was also noted that in the State of Louisiana land measurements continue to be made in the old French measurements, a leftover from the days when France colonized that part of the continent. The same applies to Spanish land measurements in California. In neither of these cases has it been found advantageous to switch to the English system in the past, and there are not now any plans to switch those measurements or any land measurements elsewhere in the United States to metric measurements.

If, in changing over to the metric system, the United States wants to do it slowly and on a voluntary basis, and if Australia wants to ram it through, then which example should Canada follow? I contend we should support the amendments before us as moderate, positive proposals put forward by the official opposition. In a democratic country where the people have made it clear where they stand, these things should be done in the way that would cause least hardship. These amendments simply call for a permissive or dual system. The minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board should speak for the farmers of the west and support our proposals instead of saying what he did this morning. The minister knows that he has not been correctly informed, either by his officials or by the people who gave evidence before the standing committee. I know the seriousness of the charge I now make, Mr. Speaker.

It is disgraceful that organizations such as the Saskatchewan Pool and the Manitoba Pool, which call themselves democratic, should be pressuring the government to pass a law at this time which is to their financial advantage and is not in the interests of their members. The membership has never been given a chance to express its views on this subject.

At meetings at the local committee level, the subdistrict level and district level, resolutions have been passed and sent to the head office. Having these in his possession the secretary of the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool had the colossal effrontery to write to the minister saying that in the years 1974, 1975 and 1976 no resolutions were passed by any of the 800 committees in Saskatchewan. This left the impression that all committees were in favour of the pool's stand when at that time he had in his possession official, signed resolutions from six separate areas in Saskatchewan, which represents a large proportion of the people in the province, to the contrary. We cannot do anything about this sort of thing here in parliament; it is up to members of the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool to deal with the people they elect, and it is up to the elected officials to deal with those they appoint and pay. I think it is a shame that in a so-called democratic system like Saskatchewan this type of thing is going on.

I have many letters here, Mr. Speaker, but one really hits me hard. It is on the stationery of the Manitoba Pool Elevators, signed by the general manager, and addressed to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). It urges the government to bring metric conversion into effect rapidly. One paragraph reads as follows:

If the conversion to metric tonnes does not take place quickly we fear it will be impossible to generate any enthusiasm for implementation at a later date because there will always be a danger that instructions will again be changed.

What does that mean, Mr. Speaker? They realize that once the farmers know they will be given a chance to decide this thing, they will not accept it. This type of attitude toward their own members is something that the Manitoba Pool organization and the Saskatchewan Pool organization will have to settle. It is not our task to interfere. We can point out, as we have done, that it is almost a question of privilege for this House when this type of information is sent to a minister and a Prime Minister. As a member from Saskatchewan I am quite willing to fight this issue throughout the province. I know how it will go because members of all organizations in Saskatchewan hate to be pushed around, by their own organization or by this parliament.

In these amendments we are specifically concerned with five bills that deal with the handling of grain in the west. I appeal to members of all political persuasions in this House to put democracy in the forefront of their decision-making. If civil servants are trying to push something through just because Australia has done it that way, they should be fired and told who is boss. If farm organizations and grain companies apply political pressure, they should be told that it is the rank and file who have the power and they will be listened to. I urge members to speak as parliamentarians. This is not a question of conscience; it is a question of moral judgment. Is it right to ignore the expressed wishes of the rank and file affected by this legislation? I am talking now about the western farmer who is the person concerned in the amendment before us.

I appeal also to my friends from Quebec. The land system in Quebec is not measured in acres, it is in arpents. When the time comes when they try to force farmers to change from arpents to hectares, there will be a battle. The whole trouble started in Ottawa when they tried to persuade Quebec to adopt metric conversion on a crash basis.

The question is simply whether we crash this thing through without any regard for the people affected, or whether we give them an alternative system to follow until they get used to the new system.

At the beginning of second reading debate I suggested that if the word "hectares" were removed from the bill we would pass it that afternoon and help persuade farmers that, if they accepted tonnes, we would protect them against change in land measurements. I thought the government had reacted favourably to that, and that is why we let the debate drop and the bill go to committee. But the minister came to committee and repudiated what I thought was an understanding. Apparently the civil servants felt that it would confuse Canadians to have two systems simultaneously. They have two systems in the United States; they have them in Great Britain. Are we stupid? Can we not get along with two systems?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but I must inform him that his allotted time has expired. He may continue with the unanimous consent of the House. Does the hon. member have unanimous consent to continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to abuse the privilege extended to me by hon. members. They know of my deep feelings on the subject. I believe the metric system is good, but I have in my possession documents which demonstrate the truth of what I said about the views of farmers and consumers. Later I shall move an amendment which will ensure some protection for consumers.

I hope my words carry weight. I say, for heaven's sake let your vote be in the interest of running this country democratically. I say to hon. members, do not let the bureaucracy push parliament around. Do not let people with vested interests claim to be the spokesmen of the people, when they are not. Let us accept the hon. member's amendments, so that we may be in harmony with what the British and American peoples have done. And, Mr. Speaker, let us do this democratically. Let there be no force or compulsion in this matter. Some people apparently think force and compulsion are necessary.

Mr. Frank Hamilton (Swift Current-Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, I cannot understand why the minister in charge of the Wheat Board, after giving assurance that we can use the dual system, that is, retain bushels and acres in the grain industry, still refuses to support the amendments before the House.

It has been argued that metric conversion has grass roots support in the agricultural industry of western Canada. With respect, it never did have such grass roots support. On February 1, 1976, more than a year ago, I sent out a questionnaire which asked one simple question: are you in favour of metric conversion? Sixty-five per cent of the replies said no. I therefore say that there has never been grass roots support in the western provinces for metric conversion.

Further, some grain companies have indicated to the government that they speak for the rank and file. I say this is just not so, and will quote two letters to back my statement. The first letter dated February 9, 1977, reads:

Dear Sir,

At a recent meeting of Saskatchewan Wheat Pool delegates the discussion of metric conversion involving the grain industry, particularly land measurement, arose.

Whereas we understand that there is a possibility that the acre could be changed to hectares, we are opposed. We feel that it would be impractical to change the acre, as land is surveyed in acres and does not coincide or convert equally into any metric form. We also feel that there would be no useful purpose in changing as grain could still be sold in tonnes or kilos per acre rather than per hectare.

Therefore, be it resolved that the land area measurement be kept as acres. A reply would be appreciated.

It is signed by the secretary of the District 3 delegates of the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool.

May I also quote the letter of the Robsart Wheat Pool Committee of Saskatchewan, dated February 9, 1977. It reads:

. . . The Robsart Wheat Pool Committee held a committee meeting in the elevator office on the evening of February 8, with our delegates . . .

A good discussion was had in regards to the metric system and the conversion consequences. It was generally agreed that the metric conversion is not going to be readily accepted by farmers and that the measurements by bushels and acres should be retained. The committee felt that it was absolutely absurd to resurvey the land for hectares. After all, that would not change the actual quarters or sections and it would certainly cost the country millions of dollars. That isn't necessary.

[Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain).]

Resolution—Moved . . . seconded . . . that the metric system does not convert to tonnes or hectares in the agricultural sector for the many reasons as stated above. Carried.

The letter is signed by Howard Olson, secretary of the Robsart Wheat Pool Committee.

For all these and other reasons, I intend to support the amendment moved by the hon. member for Moose Jaw.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The question, first, is on motion No. 1. I understand that when the Chair puts the question on motion No. 1, it will at the same time be putting the question on motions Nos. 2, 4, 5, 7 and 8. Is that understood and agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Hon. members have heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): All those in favour will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order please. Pursuant to the order made Thursday, March 24, 1977, the recorded division on the proposed motions stands deferred until Monday next.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain) moved motion No. 3:

That Bill C-23, an act to facilitate conversion to the metric system of measurement, be amended in clause 3 at page 2 by adding immediately after line 12 the following new subclause:

"(3) This section shall come into force on the first day of March 1980."

He said: Mr. Speaker, the motion just moved in my name was proposed in the standing committee by the hon. member for Halton-Wentworth (Mr. Kempling). I point out that motion No. 3 has little to do with the Wheat Board. If passed it would affect all consumers across Canada. It seeks to amend clause 3, which mentions the Packaging and Labelling Act, and the Weights and Measures Act. Clearly this matter is of concern to all consumers in Canada.

At present it is legal and proper to print on a package or label both the imperial and the metric measure of the contents of the package. For example, almost every person in every household in Canada has been to a store to buy a half gallon carboard carton of milk. The language on two sides is French, and on two sides English. At the bottom of the carton you see the expression, "one half gallon", and beside it the figure of "2.27 litres". If people prefer their measurements in litres they know exactly how much they are getting, 2.27 litres. Similarly those used to the imperial measurement know they are getting a half gallon. But the legislation now before the House would make it illegal to measure milk by the half gallon. You will be able to use only the 2.27 litres measurement. Manufacturers will be able to round off the numbers, to make the measurement either 2 litres or 4 litres.

You will never again see units of imperial measurement on any package in Canada. That is what clause 3 will do. Some of us do not like that kind of doctrinaire, dictatorial approach. We think that people used to the half gallon measurement will be confused. Why should that volume be measured only as 2.27 litres? You can bet your bottom dollar that no manufacturer who has millions of dollars worth of these little cardboard cartons stacked up in his warehouse will burn them and put out a new carton for two litres. He will use the old cartons. When you get a new carton, it will be 2.27 litres.

I am simply putting forward in a very simple way what this clause does. A farmer buying feed for his chickens used to buy it in 50 pound containers. Now it will be in some other measure, 25 kilograms I think it is. The equivalent is not the same, so it will lead to confusion. For years turkey and chicken farmers have bought feed in 50 pound bags. Now they will see pasted over the side a great strip which states so many kilograms.

One farmer who was always a bit cautious picked up a bag. He had been picking up bags for years. He put it on the scale because it looked the same as the old size bag he had always bought. Instead of having a 50 pound figure on it, it indicated so many kilograms. He weighed the bag and what did he find? Did he find 56 pounds which should be in there because that is equal to the number of kilograms and he has learned to multiply by 2.2? He finds the same 50 pounds of chicken feed but he is charged for 55 or 56 pounds. This is what happens during the switchover.

No manufacturer of bags for chicken feed will change the size of the bag because some government comes along and says he must use only the metric system. He just pastes a little strip on the outside and puts on it the metric measurement. However, he does not change the quantity in the bag.

The merchant in the store tells the farmer that he has so many kilograms. If it turns out to be 25 kilograms or something like that and the farmer protests he is not getting the right amount, the only thing I can do when I receive a letter from him is to turn that over to the Department of Consumer Affairs and ask that it be checked out. They will have to hire an army of inspectors as big as the civil service in order to track down all these complaints across the country.

In essence, what the amendment says is that you wait a little while before you enforce this amendment. The date suggested is 1980. It states that clause 3 on page 2 be amended by adding thereto the following subsection:

(3) This section shall come into force on the first day of March 1980.

Why 1980? If you look through all this literature, that is about the date the Americans and their industry will be moving in that direction. You give the consumer, every store and every plant in Canada three years to get used to the new terms such as kilograms, grams and so on.

This is a moderate constructive amendment. It was asked for by the Consumers Association of Canada. I cannot say they asked all of their people where they stand on this so I do not know how the consumers do stand. However, the association which made this presentation to the committee said this is what they would like, that it would give some time to get used to it. It fits in with the philosophy I mentioned on second reading debate.

Please, as we bring this metric system in, make it as humane as possible. There are those whose eyesight is not good enough to read what is on a package, but they are used to a size. Even though their eyes are not good, they can recognize a half gallon container. However, if they have to read 2.27 litres, they may not be able to make that out. I simply say on behalf of those who have poor eyesight, be humane and let them have a familiar size package, which will be continued anyway. Do not force them to accept the newer size package too quickly.

Second, there are those who have difficulty in translating from one type of system to another. I know that for the smart guys of the world, when they see a package of 400 grams, it is easy for them. They know that 400 grams is four tenths of a kilogram and a kilogram is 2.2 pounds so four tenths of 2.2 pounds is .88 of a pound, something less than a pound. With this skill to translate, you know that when you see 400 grams, it is something less than a pound. However, there may be a few people in Canada who will have trouble with that conversion.

All this amendment asks is to please let the thing go as it is now with both on the package. I do not buy small things which are packaged in millilitres or smaller units than the gram, but I suggest this type of amendment would not hurt the conversion to the metric system one bit. Simply let the packaging continue as it is today with both measurements. We insist that French and English be on the package. Why not let the imperial system stay there along with the metric system for three years? That is the heart and gist of this amendment.

I do not know how many consumers there are in Canada. There are 23 million people and they are probably all consumers. I suppose about one quarter of them do the shopping. On behalf of the five million people who do the shopping, whether they are male or female, I ask the House to accept this amendment which in no way interferes with conversion to the metric system. Let us have the two units on the package until the year 1980. Is that too much to ask on behalf of all the consumers? I do not think so.

I suspect, however, that the government whip has been laid on. These members have been told that if they accept this amendment, they will be in trouble with civil servants who do not like any deviation from the norm. I ask hon. members once again, stand up as individuals representing the people of your constituencies and express your will. I want to see the names in the recorded votes of Hansard so that people will know how they vote on this issue on behalf of the consumers of Canada.

I want to know whether the people who call themselves the members of the government, living in a free society, are prepared to go back in and say they do not give a hoot what you think, it is what we think that counts. I want to know because this whole issue has not developed as a debate on whether to convert to the metric system. It has developed into a clear cut example of the bureaucracy running governments at both the federal and provincial levels and members not being man enough or woman enough to stand up against it.

I would like to see this amendment accepted with good heart. All it asks is that we give the consumer three years to adjust as a measure of humanity toward our fellow man.

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a few brief remarks with respect to this amendment. In committee we had the privilege of hearing representations from the Consumers Association of Canada. Their presentation was very straightforward. Part of it was an audio-visual presentation. They brought with them packages of certain goods and pointed out the problems that will occur if this piece of legislation passes. Just as an example they showed three packages, one of four ounces, one of eight ounces and one of 16 ounces and they showed that until such time as there was a standardization of containers or packaging, these particular packages would read 114 millilitres, 227 millilitres and 455 millilitres, or 113 grams, 227 grams and 454 grams. They were pointing out to the committee that it would be very difficult for a consumer going into a store where there was labelling only under the metric system and where there were not any even numbers, to do the necessary calculations. As they said, when you have four ounce, eight ounce and 16 ounce packages it is only a matter of doubling the price to see which is the best bargain, but when dealing with millilitres or grams it is almost impossible to make the calculation unless you have a pencil and paper or a pocket calculator. I would suspect that if and when this bill becomes law in its present form the calculator industry is really going to boom. Indeed, it might be advisable to buy shares in some of the companies which produce calculators because every farmer and every consumer will have to carry a calculator around in his pocket to do the necessary calculations. Something of that sort will be needed in order to determine the relationship between prices of goods and quantity he is buying, or the quantity of chemicals he must put on his land.

[Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain).]

It is interesting to note what the Consumers Association of Canada have been saying on this subject. I would like to read a couple of paragraphs from the Association's presentation. Let me make it clear that the Consumers Association is not opposed to metrication but it is opposed to this particular clause which will, overnight, require labelling under the metric system only. This is what the Association said in committee:

> CAC is entirely in favour of single metric labelling of grocery products but only when the industry has adopted a rationalized series of hard metric sizes . . . We feel very strongly that metric-only should occur when a product has moved into a standard metric size. It has been proven in other countries that the consumer relies on the old size and does not look at the new, if the change has been made, so there is no learning process. But we are against having the single metric-only for products which have not experienced conversion to metric.

Then they go on to say:

> It is the position of the Association that removal of dual labelling requirements from the Consumer Packaging and Labelling Act, as envisaged in clause three of this bill, with the result that any manufacturer will be able to label any size of grocery product in metric only, is premature and can only lead to confusion and consumer abuses in the marketplace.

Representatives of the Consumers Association were in attendance before the committee when the hon. member for Halton-Wentworth (Mr. Kempling) presented this amendment which has the effect of requiring dual labelling until 1980. They agreed with the amendment. They said it was the type of amendment they wanted, because by 1980 packages would have been standardized. It was interesting to observe what happened in that committee. Government members sat back while the witnesses were in attendance and when the amendment was discussed. What did they say? They said, when it came to the amendment which dealt with acres and hectares, that they could not accept it because the farm organizations had come before the committee, stating that they represented the farmers of Western Canada, and that those farmers wanted to go metric. On that basis they turned down our amendment. The suggestion was that we, in the opposition, did not understand what the people of Western Canada wanted.

What happened when the representatives of the Consumers Association came before the committee? In the same way, they said they represented consumers—I think they said they represented 100,000 consumers across Canada. That is a large number. But what was the reaction of hon. members on the government side? They said, in effect: We are not going to believe the representatives of the consumers of Canada and we shall not accept the amendment. So on one hand there is a situation in which government members believed members of associations, which said they represented farmers and on the other hand a situation where apparently they did not believe an association which represents a very large number of Canadian consumers.

An hon. Member: That is not what happened at all.

Mr. Neil: It seems to me that this amendment, which has the effect of delaying the institution of the metric system as far as the labelling of goods is concerned until 1980, is what the Consumers Association wants and that it is what the majority of Canadians want. Otherwise, there is going to be confusion. In effect, it will be necessary for people to use a pencil and paper or a calculator, and if that situation develops there is something wrong with our legislation, something wrong with our government.

I have nothing more to say except to urge the minister to give consideration to this amendment and to the other amendments which have been presented, between now and the time they come up to be voted on on Monday. He will have the weekend in which to do so. He will have an opportunity to talk to some of his own members, in particular, perhaps, to members from Western Canada. He will be able to make a few telephone calls. Possibly he will telephone some of the farm organizations, the Consumers organization and other bodies to see what their attitude is. I am sure the minister wants to do an honest and sincere job for the people of Canada whether they are consumers or men and women engaged in the farm area and I hope that when it comes to the vote on Monday he will have persuaded members on the government side to vote in favour of this amendment.

Mr. Cecil Smith (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, it certainly gives me pleasure to speak on this motion for the simple reason that I represent an area of Canada where there is very little newspaper coverage, very little television coverage, very little radio coverage, and the people of this area have really not been kept up to date as to what is happening with metric conversion.

With regard to weather conditions, people seemed to manage quite well over the past hundred years or so, being able to determine the temperature or the weather by using the Fahrenheit system. But now that we have gone to the metric system and all the reports are given in that system no one knows what the weather is going to be like.

● (1500)

With regard to labelling produce in a certain type of container with both metric and conventional measurement, this will be confusing to people in the north. This is particularly so when the price of articles in expensive; people will not know whether they are being ripped off by the merchant. I think the people in the north are just not ready for this. Not enough education has been given these people on this measure, and it will only confuse them. Therefore when we vote on this motion on Monday I hope it will be carried. We must think of those who are not exposed to the media in the same way as those who live in the great corridor between Montreal and Windsor.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I have no hesitation whatever in supporting this motion to delay this move until 1980.

Mr. G. H. Whittaker (Okanagan Boundary): Mr. Speaker, on rising to speak to this motion on metric conversion may I say at the outset that I do so more from confusion than anything else. Metric conversion is new to many people in Canada, and I am not ashamed or afraid to say that I will experience a totally new learning process myself. I am not alone in this; I believe a large percentage of the population are in the same position.

Clause 3 provides for metric labelling, and our party has moved a motion to provide that we go slow on this until 1980. In other words, we will then have some length of time to undergo the learning process which many of us will have to go through.

I am sure most members of the House know that we have a lot in common with the United States so far as imports and exports are concerned. However, it appears to me that the situation concerning metric labelling will be similar to that of bilingual labelling. We do not know exactly when the act is going to be proclaimed, or whether only certain sections at a time will be proclaimed. The United States has not yet seen fit to convert to the metric system but has adopted a go slow attitude. The Americans have moved much more slowly than we have in Canada.

Mr. Breau: Should we tell them what to do?

Mr. Whittaker: I hear an intervention from my hon. friend, who asks whether we should tell the United States what to do. He knows that we have a great amount of trade with the United States, and I am not sure whether the section of the bilingual labelling act having to do with the labelling of imports into Canada has yet been proclaimed. I know that companies in Canada, at great cost to many, have been badgered into putting bilingual labels on their products. If products are being imported into Canada with unilingual labels on them, this means the exporter has not been put to the same cost, so this provision is an unnatural tariff which gives a trade advantage to American companies.

Mr. Breau: One hundred per cent?

Mr. Whittaker: Would the hon. member like to listen for a moment? We are having a hard enough time in Canada today, what with unemployment, and with helping businesses in Canada get started. There are all kinds of trade barriers. There is no free trade or fair trade; instead we have unfair trade barriers between our two countries. This government does not hesitate and never has hesitated to put this type of barrier in the way of Canadian producers, businesses, and enterprises, giving trade advantages to competitors of Canadian companies abroad.

The same thing happens to our exporters. So far as the lumber industry in British Columbia is concerned, 62 per cent of our exports go to the United States. The lumber mills are not going to be able to put metric labels on their exports to the United States; they must label the product using the measurements used in the United States. Nevertheless, many companies in Canada will be required to put a dual label on their exports. One of the organizations I was very close to or was part of—indeed I still am—is the fruit industry of British Columbia. We sell a lot of our produce in the United States, and I think it is in the best interests of Canada that we continue to export our produce. The same is true of the lumber industry in British Columbia. This generates export dollars for Canada.

We import enough produce from the United States as it is now. The balance of trade in fruit and farm produce is almost equal; we maintain an equal balance over-all mainly because of our wheat exports. I did not think we will have to label every kernel of grain or boxcar of wheat, but owing to their size the containers in which produce is exported from Canada will have to be labelled.

Imports are still coming into Canada without a bilingual label. As I have said, businesses in Canada have been badgered, bullied, or whatever you want to call it, into putting bilingual labels on their products, in many instances at high cost. This puts them at a trade disadvantage compared with other imports which are not labelled bilingually. I can see metric labelling going down the same path. There will be all kinds of confusion as to how you label your product according to where it is going to or coming from. The whole thing will be confused. It will be a dog's breakfast. That is exactly what it will be.

We are offering an amendment to postpone this until 1980. No wonder the Consumers Association of Canada has taken a hard look at this. No wonder many of the manufacturers and business interests and producers in Canada have taken a hard look at this and have said they are against this sort of thing happening at a great cost to the people of Canada and at a disadvantage to them as far as trading is concerned.

Mr. J. Robert Howie (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, I do not want to delay the proceedings on this very much. I would like to speak for about two minutes. The rapid march to the metric system appears to me to be out of step, unless it coincides with changes contemplated by our largest trading partner and our greatest supplier of imports, the United States of America. I suggest the hon. member's amendment will go a long way in assisting us in this regard. I want to speak just for a moment in support of it.

I am concerned about the great cooking recipes of all times. I am referring to the ones that came down to us from our grandmothers. There are very few among us who can translate them from ounces, cups, pinches and tablespoons to such enlightening things as litres, millilitres, and cubic centimetres. The result will not be as tasty. A cherry nut bread, a banana bread, or an apple pan dowdy will never be the same. One lady whom I have respected all my life said to me, "Why can't the government just leave us alone? They have changed our old traditions. They have watched our work ethic erode. Now they are imposing chaos for seniors in the market place."

I am not sure that it should happen, but if it must happen I strongly urge the House to do it in step with our American neighbours. I am very much concerned about the great seafood dishes from down east where I come from in Atlantic Canada. What will the metric system do to them? Who can translate those recipes into metric terms? I suggest that it is darn near impossible. I would like to see us move as slowly as we possibly can on this piece of legislation.

[Mr. Whittaker.]

I have been concerned, as I am sure all members have, with the customs and the traditions of our law-shaping forces. As time moves on and our legislation becomes more mature and our system becomes more mature, the basic law-shaping forces are much more removed from their former functions. We have witnessed the rise of bureaucracy and the fact that bureaucracy is the principal law-shaping force in our land. I have found that the Canadian people I have talked to do not want this system. I do not think they understand it. I do not think enough has been done of an explanatory nature, although a great deal of money has been spent in this field. I find people asking themselves, "How do we participate in this democracy now?" Members of parliament are in Ottawa for nine months of the year. How do the average Canadians let us know they do not like this, and what they would like instead of it?

We should address ourselves to this question of participation. This is a darn good example. The people do not want this legislation. However, we are here and seem prepared to pass it. We are, in effect, saying to the Canadian people, "This is good for you and you darn well better have it." I am afraid if we keep on in this direction much longer that the Canadian people are going to tell us what is good for us. Some members who vote for this and ram it down their throats are going to regret it very much.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The question is on motion No. 3 (Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain)).

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Pursuant to the order made Thursday, March 24, 1977, the recorded division on the proposed motion stands deferred until Monday, March 28, 1977.

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw) moved motion No. 6:

That Bill C-23, an act to facilitate conversion to the metric system of measurement, be amended in clause 6 by striking out lines 36 to 44 at page 4 and lines 1 to 25 at page 5.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a few brief comments in connection with this amendment. Basically it is part and parcel of the previous amendments on which we have spoken. It pertains to the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act and has to do with the calculations made thereunder. Basically the remarks that I made on the motions that were grouped together apply to this particular amendment.

I would like to make a comment with respect to a remark made by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang). He seemed to indicate that I was suggesting that this particular bill would change the land title systems in the provinces of western Canada. I, at no time, ever made such a remark. I realize that the land title systems in our country are within the jurisdiction of the provincial governments. What I have said in the past, and will repeat again, is that because of this legislation which, in effect, requires the farmer to make use of hectares and tonnes, it will create a pressure and has created a pressure on the provincial governments to make changes in their land title systems. For example, in the province of Saskatchewan they made changes in April or May of last year. It is interesting to note that these changes were not made by the legislature of that province. The members of the legislative assembly in Saskatchewan did not have a chance to debate any bill. The people in the province of Saskatchewan did not have the opportunity of any input into the change.

An hon. Member: It is the new democracy.

Mr. Neil: My colleague to my right says, "It is the new democracy". It appears that is the way we are moving. The changes in the province of Saskatchewan were all made by order in council. Most people are familiar with an order in council. It is a series of regulations made either by the cabinet, or by a cabinet minister and approved by the other members of cabinet, promulgated, put in the Gazette, and it becomes law. That is an example of what happened in the province of Saskatchewan. The reason it happened was because the legislators in that province did not understand or did not know what was happening. There were some communications from the bureaucrats in Ottawa to the bureaucrats in Regina. The bureaucrats in Regina came to the conclusion that the change to the metric system was law, so they went ahead and they passed the regulations.

● (1520)

I am quite satisfied that if such a change in our land title system had been put before the legislature in any province, and the people in the province had the opportunity to learn what was going on, they would make their wishes known loud and clear because the people on the prairies have grown up under a system which uses acres. The west was surveyed about 100 years ago using statute miles. We have townships, we have ranges, we have sections, half sections, and quarter sections, all based on the mile. All the roads in the west that run north and south are one mile apart, and the ones that run east and west are two miles apart.

Every farmer knows what an acre of land is. He can walk out into a field and say, "That piece of land contains X number of acres". He can tell by looking at it. He knows, when he takes his combine or his seed drill out into the field which is measured in feet, and he goes down the side of that field or makes a round around the field, how many acres he has covered. But the government, in its wisdom, will change all that. It is saying to the farmer, "From now on you will record everything in hectares and use tonnes per acre. But it will not be any problem; it is just a matter of calculation." The farmer knows how complicated the calculation will be; he knows the problems with which he will be faced. That is why he has expressed his opinion loud and clear to members of parliament. That is why local community committees of some of the farm organizations have passed resolutions saying they do not wish to convert to the metric system.

I think the farm organizations now have the message, but unfortunately that message did not get through to the government, and I do not know why because it is a simple matter to go out west, walk down the street of any town, and ask a farmer what he thinks about the metric system. He will tell you. I suggest that you can walk down the streets in any towns on the prairies, and you can spend the day talking to farmers, and I doubt if you would find one individual who is in favour of the change to the metric system, because the change is unnecessary. We do not sell land on the international markets. It will not add $1 to the farmer's income. All it will do is to create problems for him; it is a nuisance. It can create more than problems; it can cost him money because if he makes a mistake in some of his calculations when he is working with herbicides, pesticides, or even seeds, it can damage his crop.

I am pleased that a vote on these amendments will not take place until Monday, and I hope that the minister who is piloting this bill through the House—as a matter of fact it is his first bill—will sit back over the weekend and give serious thought to it. Perhaps he will talk to some of his colleagues and make a few phone calls to some of the farm organizations. If he wants to call some individuals, I can give him some telephone numbers, not necessarily of people of my political faith but of farmers who know what is happening in a community. Then he would understand what the feeling is among the farmers in western Canada. I can only hope that he will undertake to do that, and that when he comes back on Monday he will give instructions to his colleagues to support not only the amendments with respect to the western farmer, but the amendment with respect to dual labelling.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, we have tried this afternoon as clearly and as emphatically as we can to impress government members with the importance of ignoring their own whip and their own civil servants and doing what is right. We are considering an amendment which, as the preceding speaker, the hon. member for Moose Jaw, has said, is part of a package. We are now dealing with western farmers. I think I can put this into a very simple phrase again.

I want to remind the committee that 200 years ago last year the Americans had a rebellion against their lawful ruler, the king and emperor of the United Kingdom. Last year in 1976 they celebrated the 200th anniversary of that rebellion against their king. The issue on which they fought at that time, if I remember it correctly, was: no taxation without representation. What we are witnessing here today is metrification without representation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): If hon. members on the government side think really hard, as the thinkers' conference in Toronto is supposed to be doing today, they will realize it is not only the farmers in the west who will be in a state of alienation and rebellion, but also consumers from one end of the country to the other.

To make certain there is no misunderstanding about what the hon. member for Moose Jaw said, and what I tried to say earlier in the debate about the feeling of the farmers, this can all be verified. There was a meeting in Lethbridge, Alberta, two weeks ago called by the Canadian Wheat Board to discuss the pricing of wheat. The minister knows what I am talking about. Farmers are concerned that mistakes are being made in the pricing policy of the Wheat Board. Questions were asked about the metric system. At that meeting 1,100 to 1,200 farmers tried to get into the hall. There is interest out there. Only 800 were allowed in because the fire marshal said that that was all the hall could accommodate safely. When the chairman asked how many of those present were in favour of the metric system, out of the 800 farmers in that hall ten hands went up. When he asked how many were opposed, 790 farmers stood to their feet. If the farmers do not understand that type of arithmetic, the government should.

In the same province of Alberta at Indus, at a meeting of the Alberta pool, part of the agenda was that there was to be a film on the metric system. Delegates from every district of Alberta said, "Take that out of here", and they took it out, because when Alberta farmers say take something out, it is taken out.

Third, farm organizations and pools are generally associated with a great part of the area I represent. The towns of Indian Head, Sintaluta and Abernethy may not mean a thing to the generation which sits in this House now, but prairie farm organizations began in this area in the territorial days. This is the area which produced Motherwell and Jimmy Gardiner. Even I was asked to run. What do the people in this historic centre of farm revolt and fighting for farm freedom say? The telegram I have in my hand is dated February 10, and it says:

> We the following are members of Sask. Wheat Pool and are opposed to the metric system being brought into effect for grain and acres without farmers' agreement.

This telegram is signed by Don Woods, secretary of the wheat pool; Al Guest, Albert Gares, Gordon Barber, E. Smithson and Alf Goodwin. These people are all from Indian Head.

It is also signed by Dave Mercer from Lemberg, Jimmy Gardiner's old home town; G. R. Pollock, Sintaluta, the home of the United Grain Growers farm movement; Richard Barnsley of Abernethy, the home of Motherwell. In a postscript the telegram says the following:

> No mention was made at the pool's annual meeting regarding opposition or agreement to the metric system. I believe we have been misled in believing that it had already been made law.

I read those names because those names are known to every farmer in that big grain growing area in my constituency.

Fourth, I asked an old grain man from the southern part of my constituency along the American border to find out what the elevator men have to say. Are they all in favour of this? What did their representatives say in the committee? This is the gist of the message. This old grain man talked to the agents himself and found out that they were quite upset about executives in their organizations giving the word on what farmers should believe. The old grain man communicated the following:

> Metric meeting held among the pool agents and not with farmers . . .

It cannot be denied that Saskatchewan pool elevator men all along the line are against the metric system, and that someone has been misinforming the House.

A week ago I raised a question of privilege, and it was so close to privilege that the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool should have been brought before the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections. I have here some official resolutions which were passed. I will give the dates, the names which appear on them and so forth, and the House should bear in mind the time frame about which I am talking. The Secretary of the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool wrote a letter to the minister which I have here, and which says that during all that period no resolutions were received from the 800 active wheat pool committees, from annual meetings held, or from other membership meetings held throughout the province.

I have here these resolutions on Saskatchewan Wheat Pool stationery. The first one reads:

> Re: Federal Government
> District—Carrot River 14-8
> The following resolution was passed at the committee meeting held on February 15, 1977 . . .

That was ten days before the secretary wrote his letter to the minister.

> . . . and reported by the secretary of the committee, Mr. Peter Sirey, Box 175, Carrot River, Saskatchewan, and received in head office on February 21, 1977:

That was also before the secretary wrote his letter to the minister, and this is what the resolution says:

> Be it resolved that the Carrot River committee is opposed to converting the acre to the hectare.

Carrot River is located in the northeast part of Saskatchewan. This resolution was submitted to the board of directors of the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool on February 24, the day before the letter was written.

The following is on the same Saskatchewan Wheat Pool stationery. It is from district 13-2 at Burr, in the northwest part of Saskatchewan. It states:

> The following resolution was passed at the committee meeting held on February 10, 1977, and reported by the secretary of the committee, Mr. Art Klassen, Burr, Saskatchewan . . . and received in head office on February 15, 1977:

That was ten days before the secretary wrote to the minister. The resolution states the following:

> That we keep the present system of weights and measurements.

That resolution was submitted to the board of directors on February 17, before the letter was written.

Here is one from a whole district. As hon. members probably know, Saskatchewan is divided into 14 districts under the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool Organization. Each district represents thousands of wheat pool members. This communication reads as follows:

> The following resolution was passed at the delegates district meeting held on February 4 and 5, 1977, and was reported by the secretary of the district, Mr. Hugh McDonough, . . . Cadillac, Sask., and received in head office on February 14, 1977:

That was eleven days before the letter was sent. The hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Goodale), who is not here, knows where the town of Cadillac is. The people there will not be voting for him the next time around. This resolution reads as follows:

> Whereas we understand that there is a possibility that the acre could be changed to hectares we are opposed. We feel that it would be impractical to change the acre as the land is surveyed in acres, and does not coincide or convert equally into any metric form; we also feel that there would be no useful purpose in changing the acre as grain could still be sold in tonnes or kilos per acre rather than per hectare;
> Therefore be it resolved that the land area measurement be left as acres.

That was submitted to the board of directors of the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool of February 16, 1977, before the secretary wrote the letter.

Here is another one from my district, District 7, Sub-district 4, Grenfell, and it reads as follows:

> The following resolution was passed at the committee meeting held on February 24, 1977, and was reported by the secretary of the committee Mr. Donald Crawford, Grenfell, Saskatchewan . . . and was received in head office on March 2, 1977:
> Whereas there is some difficulty converting miles to kilometres, acres to hectares, and bushels to tonnes, be it resolved that the present acreage system with square miles and bushels be retained. That the railroads change to metric system at the same time as the rest of the grain trade.

This was submitted to J. O. Wright of the board on March 3. I will go on and read the one from Avonlea, which is right in the heart of the riding of Assiniboia. It says:

> Whereas the metric conversion program is being planned and whereas this program is causing hardship to those of us unfamiliar to the program,
> Therefore be it resolved that the program be slowed down until a more effective educational program can be made available.

The hon. member for Assiniboia stood up and said that the secretary of this farm organization is for it, so we all have to accept it. He would not even take the word of the farmers in his own district.

We ask that this conversion be slowed down a little bit. That would make it a little more humane.

Here is one from Plenty in west central Saskatchewan. It is dated February 21 and the resolution reads as follows:

> Whereas we are now surveyed in acres and miles, be it resolved that we stay with acres instead of hectares and miles instead of kilometres.

I could go on, but I think I have made my point. In 1970 the government appointed a metric commission to look at the whole thing and to make recommendations to this parliament for legislation. What did the commission do? It went out across the country and told provincial governments and farm organizations that this was the law, that they should get in step, and that the federal government would bring in a bill to be debated here, and in three provinces it became law on February 1, 1977.

The hon. member for Moose Jaw told us that the Metric Commission got the Saskatchewan government to put through an order in council. The Saskatchewan government did not even tell its legislature. Some Saskatchewan cabinet ministers did not even know about it. That order in council changed the whole survey system of Saskatchewan. I have the order in council here, and it says that all surveys, and I quote:

> . . . shall be drawn with metric measurements and shall be subject to the approval and inspection, as to their accuracy and the manner in which they are established on the ground, of the Chief Surveyor . . .

● (1540)

When a person dies and his estate tries to sell the land and register the title under a new name, there will not only be legal expenses involved but survey expenses as well. The quarter sections in Saskatchewan are not measured accurately. They were measured with a buggy wheel that had a rope tied around it, and that is why our titles say "160 acres more or less." An order in council in Saskatchewan now decrees that measurements must be accurate. That will involve great cost.

I opened my remarks by saying that we are now in the age of metrification without representation. I know what those Saskatchewan farmers will do at the next election. There will be a new government in Saskatchewan. There is going to be a new government here, too.

Ontario accepted the metric system by permissive legislation. Alberta has also passed legislation but has not proclaimed it. I am simply asking members of this government to act like members of parliament instead of allowing themselves to be pushed around by bureaucrats. Stand up and support your people, I say. All we want is that the dual system be left until the farmers accept the new system willingly. We already sell grain under the metric system and there is no quarrel with that. But why make changes that are not necessary? There is no necessity to change the land measurement system, yet the government has told the provinces that it must be done. Then it comes here and blames the whole thing on the provinces.

I ask members of the government to think about what I have been saying, over this weekend. And I suggest that if they do not think about it they will not be around many more months clouding the atmosphere with the kind of dictatorial nonsense that is contained in this bill.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The question is on Motion No. 6 (Mr. Neil).

All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): All those opposed to the motion will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Pursuant to order made Thursday, March 24, 1977 the recorded division on the proposed motion stands deferred until Monday next.

An hon. Member: Four o'clock.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Is it agreed we call it four o'clock? The hon. member for Lafontaine-Rosemont (Mr. Lachance).

[Translation]

Mr. Claude-André Lachance (Lafontaine-Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, since the government, through the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang), has announced its intention of undertaking a review of the financial structure of the St. Lawrence Seaway, motion No. 28 standing in my name is no longer relevant; therefore I would ask, in agreement with the seconder of the motion the hon. member for Saint-Jean (Mr. Smith), for the unanimous consent of the House to remove motion No. 28 from the order paper.

[English]

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member was kind enough to speak to me about that. On behalf of my party I should like to indicate our willingness. It is my understanding that there is no private members' business available for today and the parliamentary secretary has spoken to me about that. Having regard to the position of the hands on the clock I think it might be in order to call it five o'clock.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, we also agree to the request with regard to the hon. member's motion and I suspect all of us will agree to call it five o'clock. I wish there was some way we could have on the record the names of those faithful Liberals who stayed in parliament today instead of going off to that once-in-17-years thinkers' conference.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I should like to remind hon. members of the matter that was alluded to by Mr. Speaker this morning, the 37th anniversary of the election of the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) to this House. There is a reception in the Commonwealth Room to celebrate the occasion and I am sure the right hon. gentleman would be delighted to see all the members regardless of on what side of the House they sit.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): On the same point of order, Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the co-operation we have received this afternoon in disposing of the business of the House. I want to say to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) however, that I would rather be in the House with him than anywhere else.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Is it agreed that the hon. member for Lafontaine-Rosemont (Mr. Lachance) has unanimous consent to withdraw Private Member's Notice of Motion No. 28?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Order discharged and motion withdrawn.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. It being five o'clock this House stands adjourned until Monday next at 2 p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 2(1).

At 3.47 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON ANY AGREEMENTS MADE AT BUSINESS-LABOUR MEETING TO RESTRAIN DEMANDS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity arising from comments of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Munro) made outside this House that, and I quote:

> . . . there is a real desire growing and permeating through labour that it will exercise proper restraint in the post-control period . . . union leaders can persuade workers to exercise restraint.

Governor Bouey of the Bank of Canada said he would not lift controls before the end of 1978 because, and I quote:

> To the extent that groups in the economy are in fact looking to the ending of controls as the moment for a substantial upward push in their money incomes and prices . . .

Because there are open rumours that no agreement on restraint was made between business and labour at the meeting a week ago, which fact is reflected in recent editorials, and yet today's press quotes of the Minister of Labour would lead to the conclusion that labour is in fact committed to restraint, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro):

> That this House direct the Minister of Labour to make a statement forthwith in this House advising all hon. members and the public of Canada just exactly what was agreed to at the business-labour meeting and specifically whether the statements of the Minister of Labour that labour has a real desire to exercise proper restraint is an accurate reflection of any agreement made at the meeting or accurately reflects any commitment made directly to the government by the Canadian Labour Congress Leaders.

Mr. Speaker: The presentation for debate of such a motion pursuant to Standing Order 43 can only be done with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

INCOME TAX

SUGGESTION TRAVELLING EXPENSES OF WAGE EARNERS BE DEDUCTIBLE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a motion of pressing necessity.

Considering that, except for some allowances, the Income Tax Act does not entitle most wage earners to ask for a reduction of more than 3 per cent of employment income, up to a maximum of $150, while they have to pay from $300 to $600 yearly to travel to and from their place of employment; considering that there would be great opportunities to save a considerable amount of energy if most wage earners or workers generally were prompted to use public transport to go to work and that anyhow the various levels of government must pay subsidies worth several million dollars, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Abitibi (Mr. Laprise):

> That the House instruct the Minister of National Revenue (Miss Bégin) to bring in as soon as possible an amendment to section 8(I)(a) to the Income Tax Act to the effect that travelling expenses to and from the place of employment made by wage earners using public transportation be deductible from their income for income tax purposes upon the filing of receipts and records.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Under the provisions of Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there such consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

FISHERIES

PROPOSED DELAY IN IMPOSITION OF DOUBLE LICENSING ON WEST COAST FISHERMEN—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. The salmon fishing season off the west coast opens in about two weeks, and because the minister plans between now and then to impose a double licensing system to cover areas fished—inside and outside Vancouver Island—which would impose economic hardship on many fishermen, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Fraser):

● (1410)

That this House direct the minister to suspend the double licensing system this year and to refrain from bringing it into force until such time as the views of all members of the west coast fishing industry have been given more careful consideration.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such motion pursuant to the Standing Order requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

FINANCE

PROPOSAL GOVERNMENT ESTABLISH BALANCE SHEET OF EXPENDITURES IN AND INCOME FROM EACH PROVINCE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the terms of Standing Order 43, I request the unanimous consent of the House to present a motion dealing with an important and urgent matter.

As, to date, we have been denied in this House of Commons the financial statistics on federalism, and as the Quebec government published a major part of it on the day following my last request in this regard, may I be allowed, Mr. Speaker, to present again my motion of March 24 last.

In view of the inalienable right of all Canadian taxpayers to know exactly what is done with the money they pay in taxes of all sorts, in view of the responsibility all hon. members have to give an account to their electors of the use that is made of their contributions to the federal government, and in view of the fact that the government is duty-bound to be responsible for the expenditures incurred in each of the Canadian provinces, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Rimouski (Mr. Allard):

That this House order the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) to draw up a statement of receipts and expenditures, both direct and indirect, for each of the provinces.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Pursuant to the terms of Standing Order 43, the motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ELECTION EXPENSES

ALLEGED BREACH OF ACT BY LIBERAL PARTY IN CONNECTION WITH TORONTO CONVENTION—POSSIBILITY OF AMENDMENT

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, my question to the President of the Privy Council arises out of the continued breaching of the spirit, if not the letter, of the Election Expenses Act by the elite of the Liberal party in Toronto this weekend. I should like to know whether this public statute was used to pay personal convention expenses in view of the complaint by the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development that not all of the Canadian people were represented at the convention for which Canadians footed the bill. Would the minister undertake to refer this matter to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections to review this use of the Election Expenses Act which quite frankly borders on the tainted?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the use of the Election Expenses Act in these circumstances is quite in accordance with the law that was carefully studied by a standing committee of the House of Commons and later approved in the House of Commons after a number of amendments were introduced. This particular way of contributing to political parties is not different in substance from use that has been made by other political parties.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Oh, yes it is.

Mr. MacEachen: When the law was enacted it had been the intention that it would be possible to support legitimate political activities—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Legitimate?

Mr. MacEachen: —and certainly the meeting that was held in Toronto at the weekend was of great national interest and will have profound effect on the future of our country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, the Acting Prime Minister knows quite well that there is a considerable difference between paying personal expenses on the one hand and not paying personal expenses on the other but using the Election Expenses Act. In any event, I am sure the minister would not find himself in the position of taking the opportunity to breach the law. Would the minister tell the House whether he has or intends to consult with the Chief Electoral Officer to see whether the act could be amended to bring it into line with the intention of parliament at the time it was passed? It was certainly not the intention for which it was used last weekend.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, there is a disagreement between the hon. member and myself. It is my view that the use made of the Election Expenses Act was forecast and capable of being forecast when the law was passed. In replying directly to the hon. member, however, may I say that it is likely we will be bringing forward amendments this session to the Elections Act and to the Election Expenses Act. There have been discussions, as the hon. member knows, among representatives of the parties and I believe there is a desire that, in certain ways, both the Elections Act and the Election Expenses Act should be amended. That will be attempted this session.

Mr. Hees: Allan, you never sounded less convincing.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I hope this matter will be looked at, because with respect, it borders on the tainted. In view of the complaints at what I would term a publicly financed party conference which the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development said did not represent the native peoples of Canada, is the ministry considering any alternative which would allow the native people to discuss the future of the country and problems facing all Canadians. I ask this since they were ignored by this conference which was paid for by all Canadians and which, except for its views on the performance of this government, was unrepresentative of Canadians.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

REQUEST FOR BALANCE-SHEET SHOWING FINANCIAL RELATIONSHIP OF QUEBEC AND FEDERAL GOVERNMENTS

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question, directed to the Acting Prime Minister, has to do with the way in which Liberal ministers at this publicly financed conference ignored, in their discussions, an urgent aspect of confederation. My question is this: While it is generally agreed that the arguments in favour of confederation cannot be based solely on a financial balance sheet, nevertheless, now that the government of Quebec has released a report claiming that Quebec has been fiscally handicapped by confederation and as, at the same time, figures to the contrary have appeared in Maclean's magazine, will the Acting Prime Minister say when the government will release concise data giving the federal side of the argument. I ask this because I understand that Mr. Tellier has been working on this for some weeks.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I may respond to the question. I think I must make the observation with regard to the analysis tabled last Friday by the Quebec ministers that it involved conclusions which are hardly supported by the study which was tabled at the same time. For example, it was clear that the general costs of overhead of the government of Canada which include, of course, the benefits received by the people of Quebec were not included in the balance sheet which the Quebec ministers drew up. With regard to the figures of fiscal transfers, the revenue figures of the government of Canada from various elements of taxation and also with regard to their expenditures, let me say that these are now in the public accounts of Canada and can be examined by the Quebec members and indeed by other interested persons.

A far more difficult question and the one requiring far more analysis is the extent to which one can take, for example, the distribution of interest, of dividends, of public expenditures and facilities, and the various other distribution effects of the government of Canada and break them down on a province by province basis. These are expenditures and costs which are not normally kept on this basis and require very considerable judgment. Some attention is being given to that question, but it is not a question, as I think will become increasingly clear from a close analysis of taxation, with respect to which one could rush in and make hasty conclusions without careful analysis.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss MacDonald: Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance has chosen to ignore my question, as ministers meeting at the weekend chose to ignore other questions. He chose to ignore the question I addressed to him about the study being done by Mr. Tellier, a study which Mr. Tellier, according to press reports of Saturday, said he would be prepared to release when the government sees fit to do so. May I ask the Minister of Finance this question: Since the Prime Minister has asked Canadians to go out and sell confederation, is the minister telling the House that the material being prepared in the federal-provincial relations office, which will be or should be available to Canadians, will only be made available when and as the government sees fit to do so, and that, in the meantime, the figures released by the government of Quebec and widely circulated are to be allowed to go unchallenged by the government of Canada?

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Right on.

• (1420)

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. lady may have noticed in the course of this morning's press, they have already been substantially challenged by the press both in Ontario and Quebec.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

REQUEST FOR ACTION TO REDUCE DEBT OF STUDENTS RETURNING TO SCHOOL AFTER BEING UNEMPLOYED DURING SUMMER

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker—

An hon. Member: I hope the questions improve.

Mr. Broadbent: I hope the answers improve, too. I have a question for the well-informed Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In what the Acting Prime Minister quaintly described as a cordial provocation, the Prime Minister callously suggested last week to a group of university students that they ought to leave the country if they cannot find jobs. Is the minister aware that, unlike the Prime Minister, most students today do not come from families who are millionaires. In fact, most students entering the job market this summer are not likely to find employment. Will the government assure these students that it will take steps to substantially reduce the new debts the students are going to incur in their studies next year as a result of not being able to find jobs this summer?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I suggest to the leader of the NDP that he read the transcript of the exchange that took place at that particular time when the Prime Minister indicated several options that were available and that was the penultimate, if that was the route they felt they wanted to take.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Cullen: There are talents and abilities that are available both to Canada and the world that we are making available throughout Canada and throughout the north where we have had several requests. They commend the Prime Minister for indicating that the talent should not only be used in the urban centres in Canada but throughout the country to the betterment of Canada. To the extent that we are able through CIDA and other agencies of government, these talents are being made available throughout the world. I know that is foreign to the NDP and the Conservatives who want to spoonfeed our young people, but I do not think that is what they want.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I hope the minister will answer the question I asked him. I repeat it. Is the government prepared to put up money for those students who are in need and require jobs in the coming months in order to finance the continuation of their education at university and other post-secondary institutions in the fall? Is the government prepared to take some action to help these people reduce their debts? When answering the first question, I would like the minister to consider the second one. The Prime Minister unbelievably suggested that his real concern is with those women in Newfoundland who have difficulty obtaining the minimum eight-week work period requirement under existing legislation in order to entitle them to unemployment insurance. That is what he told the students. Will the government put its action where its mouth is and withdraw the legislation now going through parliament which will deny the possibility of claims to precisely that group of women the Prime Minister was talking about?

Mr. Cullen: Here again we have the NDP satisfied with a status quo that does a disservice to people in that particular category. Frankly, I cannot condone that type of approach. In so far as the approach is concerned, the hon. member is perpetrating a small fiction, indicating that the federal government is not doing anything to help post-secondary students. I invite him to look at the estimates and note the millions of dollars which are being spent on post-secondary education alone, aside from the Manpower Training Program, the Canada Works Program and a whole series of programs which are in place and available to young people.

[Mr. Broadbent.]

Mr. Broadbent: I come back for the third time to repeat the first question.

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Mr. Broadbent: It pertains to the debts of all those who have to work their way through university; it pertains to the debts of the students, not the universities. Will the minister take steps to ensure that all Canadians who are working their way through university and who will not be able to find jobs this summer will receive direct financial assistance from the federal government for the payment of their fees or contributions toward the cost of accommodation and food during next year's course of study?

An hon. Member: No answer!

HOUSING

REASON FOR DELAY IN INSPECTING HOUSES UNDER RRAP PROGRAM

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs.

Could the minister find out the reasons for the extensive delays in the inspection of private homes belonging to the people who have applied for grants under the RRAP program in the area under the control of the CMHC Val-d'Or district office and advise us of these reasons?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): I shall inquire and report my findings to the hon. member.

Mr. Laprise: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

While inquiring about these delays, could the minister find out also why the people who apply for guaranteed loans to build or purchase new homes must face delays, when there are approved lenders with several hundred thousands and even millions of dollars?

Mr. Ouellet: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

ENERGY

OIL—POSSIBILITY CANADIAN PRICE WILL EXCEED UNITED STATES PRICE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, on March 23, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, in answer to a question I put to him, stated that the government had been "very careful in approaching higher prices" consistent with a policy of keeping domestic oil prices at or below world level. He went on to say, as reported in Hansard at page 4253:

At the present time, my estimate is that there would be room for better than a two dollar increase in the price of a barrel of oil effective July 1 while still keeping Canadian oil prices below U.S. oil prices.

In fact, a two dollar price increase would put Canadian domestic prices 53 cents a barrel higher than the equivalent U.S. price. In our case, the reference average—

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the hon. member has a question, will he put it now?

Mr. Darling: Yes, Mr. Speaker. Is the minister prepared to retract his statement that he could increase oil prices by "better than two dollars" or is it the intention of the government to increase Canadian oil prices to a point at which they will exceed the U.S. equivalent?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): I am not prepared to retract my statement nor does my statement in any way mean that we are prepared to increase our price ahead of the United States average price.

Mr. Darling: Is the government aware of the negative impact this action would have on our already disastrous competitive position?

Mr. Gillespie: I should like to answer that question by saying to the hon. member that I do not think he is familiar with the relative prices of United States oil delivered in Chicago and Canadian oil delivered in Toronto. If he would look at those figures as at July 1 of this year and look at the built-in price escalation of the U.S. system, recognizing as well the difference in the exchange value of the Canadian dollar, he would find that as of July 1 this year the United States price will be more than two dollars more than the Canadian price and that in the months ahead it is likely that this margin will increase.

Mr. Darling: Will the minister give us an absolute assurance that Canadian oil prices will remain below their U.S. equivalent for the forseeable future?

Mr. Gillespie: That is one of the questions I want to discuss with the provincial ministers next week.

TAR SANDS—GOVERNMENT POSITION ON ALBERTA CONDITIONS FOR SUPPORTING DEVELOPMENT

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. The Globe and Mail of March 19 reported an interview with the minister of energy of Alberta in which the minister stated the conditions under which Alberta would support further tar sands development. There were three conditions—the partial upgrading of heavy oil in Alberta, the elimination as soon as possible of the differential between Canadian and world oil prices and the complete deductibility of provincial royalties from federal income tax. Would the minister advise the House what the response of the government of Canada is to these conditions of Alberta, whether they are acceptable to the government of Canada to ensure further tar sands development, or if any are not acceptable, which of these three conditions are not acceptable?

● (1430)

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I do not think it would be appropriate for me at this time to put myself in a position where I was conducting a negotiation in public between the federal government and the province of Alberta, on the one hand, and approaching the kinds of negotiations and discussions that I will be having with provincial ministers on April 6 in Ottawa.

Mr. Crosbie: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the minister tell the House what stage federal-provincial discussions have reached on possible tar sands development? There is a federal-provincial committee of officials; have they reported, has the minister received any recommendation in this important area, and when might some progress be announced?

Mr. Gillespie: I can just report progress, Mr. Speaker. I think the discussions have been progressing well. I am not in a position at the present time to indicate that a specific result will come from them, but I am encouraged by the way the discussions are going.

INCOME TAX

DEDUCTIBILITY OF COST OF LEARNING SECOND LANGUAGE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. As increased dialogue between French-speaking and English-speaking Canadians is necessary if mutual understanding is to be improved and this country held together, is the government considering allowing the cost to individuals of learning a second language to be written off as a tax deduction, as an incentive to help promote this very desirable process? If not, will the government do so?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. gentleman for giving me notice of his intention to ask the question. I can tell him that this has been one of the questions which has been submitted for consideration by the government in the context of the budget and has been considered.

FINANCE

DATE OF TABLING OF ECONOMIC REVIEWS

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. Would the minister clarify or expand on his reply to me last week about the tabling of the economic reviews which the government makes at about this time? Now that the dates of the budget debate have been set, will it be possible during the course of the budget debate to table these economic reviews?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, following the hon. gentleman's question last week I asked about the expected date of availability of the economic review and I regret to say that it will not be available till about the end of April, or after the time when the budget will be debated.

COMMUNICATIONS

POSSIBILITY OF DECENTRALIZING REGULATORY SERVICE GROUP—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Minister of Communications or the Acting Prime Minister. Does the government plan to decentralize or is the government in the process of considering decentralizing the telecommunications regulatory service group from Ottawa to a location east of Quebec City, and also considering placing the regulatory offices located in large cities across the country, such as in Vancouver, Winnipeg and so on, in smaller centres?

Mr. Ross Milne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, that matter is under consideration by the government at the present time but we would want to consider it further before making any statement. We would be pleased to do so when we come to a final answer.

Mr. MacKay: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I thank the hon. gentleman for his answer and I would ask him whether he has any reasonable estimate when a decision in this regard might be announced?

Mr. Milne: Mr. Speaker, I would hope it would be fairly soon.

SPORTS

POSSIBILITY OF STUDY OF EFFECT OF PROFESSIONAL SPORT ON HEALTH OF CITIZENS

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister responsible for fitness and amateur sport. On Friday last the minister told the House that professional sport serves as an example to many of us sitting in the spectator position. In view of the probability that one of the greatest contributors to obesity in Canadians is the habitual practice of sitting and watching professional sport on television or at a stadium while heavily smoking or consuming large quantities of high calorie junk foods and alcoholic beverages, would the minister say whether she has initiated any study into the ways in which professional sport is beneficial or harmful to the general health of Canadians?

[Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West).]

Hon. Iona Campagnolo (Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport)): Mr. Speaker, I have not initiated any such studies.

JUSTIFICATION FOR EXPENDITURES ON INTERNATIONAL COMPETITIONS AT EXPENSE OF LOCAL AMATEUR SPORTS

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that professional sport is almost exclusively the preserve of males, and in view of the fact that up to 78 per cent of Canadian girls may be obese by the time they reach grade 12 precisely because the exercise programs they are exposed to are geared to developing a few elite athletes, especially males athletes, rather than to teaching enjoyable means of keeping fit in adulthood, how can the minister justify the comparatively large sums of money which her subdepartment is spending on elite international sport competitions and elaborate coach training schemes at the expense of amateur sports of an outdoor nature in which a large segment of the public can participate?

Hon. Iona Campagnolo (Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport)): Mr. Speaker, without accepting the premise of the hon. member's question, I would invite him to join me in an anti-obesity campaign at some time in the future. Furthermore, I will say that in the realm of amateur sport assistance in this country we have provided equal assistance both in sport and in recreation. While my department is limited in the supply of assistance to physical recreation, there are no less than 25 departments here ranged before you which have some input and some moneys devoted to fitness in this nation.

ENERGY

OIL—PROPOSED USE OF INCREASED REVENUE FROM SALES TAX FOR HOME INSULATION PROGRAM

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of the fact that the 12 per cent federal sales tax will yield the government this year $200 million more than it netted in 1973 due to the increase in the price of crude oil, which on a gallonage basis means an increase from two cents per gallon in 1973 to 4.9 cents per gallon this year, and if the minister's forecast of an increase in price on July 1 goes through, 5.3 cents per gallon in fiscal year 1977-78, is the minister prepared to recommend to his colleague a fixed amount per gallon in the sales tax or the apportioning of this additional revenue which the federal government is receiving for the purpose of carrying on a program of home insulation for all Canadians, rather than just for the two Liberal provinces across Canada?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, a somewhat similar question was put to me last week by the hon. member's colleague. At that time I answered the question and if he has any further representations that he would like to make to the Minister of Finance perhaps this is the time to do it.

FINANCE

SUGGESTED CHANGE IN SALES TAX ON GASOLINE

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): A supplementary question. I was not referring to the matter which my colleague raised; however, I will direct my supplementary to the Minister of Finance. In view of the fact that the revenue from the export tax levy and the 10 cents per gallon excise tax exceeds the compensation payment by $300 million and the additional revenue from the 12 per cent sales tax on gasoline another $200 million, making a $500 million windfall, can the Minister of Finance tell the House whether it is correct that some three years ago when he was minister of energy, mines and resources he recommended to the then minister of finance changing the 12 per cent sales tax on gasoline to a fixed amount per gallon; and if that is true, is the minister prepared, now that he is in a position to do so, to implement his own recommendation?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, in reply to the hon. member's first point, it has never been the policy of the government of Canada to earmark receipts from any federal tax for a fund for any specific purpose. I would just remark to the hon. gentleman that while it is true that funds have been received from the special excise tax for a particular purpose—that is to say, compensation—there has also been an expansion in the government of Canada's liabilities for further energy assistance to the provinces of somewhere in the neighbourhood of $2 billion. So there are additional claims upon this source of revenue.

● (1440)

With regard to the second point, I can confirm that indeed it has been considered. With regard to the answer to the question, I would ask the hon. member to wait until the budget is presented.

SUGGESTION REVENUE FROM OIL AND GAS BE USED FOR HOME INSULATION PROGRAM

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the minister and his colleagues over the last four years have been seeking to justify the raising of the price of oil gradually toward the international level on the ground that this money was needed for the development of oil and gas resources, can the minister now justify taking an additional revenue of $500 million unless it is going to go toward meeting the energy crisis, and has consideration been given to using this money for oil and gas conservation programs, such as the insulation of Canadian homes?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): I would point out to the hon. member, as I just did, that the money is being used for meeting the energy crisis, for example, for expanding the electricity potential in several different provinces in Canada, and for expanding the exploration for oil and natural gas in the frontier areas by Petro Canada and PanArctic. Under the circumstances, with an additional $2 billion being put into place by the government of Canada for the purpose of expanding energy supply, this is very obviously a response to the energy crisis.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

SUGGESTED LEGALIZATION OF POSSESSION OF MARIJUANA—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Justice. It is with regard to the Prime Minister's views on marijuana. Last week the Prime Minister stated that if you have a joint and if you are smoking it for your private pleasure, you should not be hassled. Since under the Criminal Code of Canada possession of marijuana is an offence, can the minister say whether the government intends to legalize the possession of marijuana?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Broadbent: Does it intend to enforce the law?

Mr. McKenzie: Also the Prime Minister is quoted as saying that mere possession of marijuana would no longer be a criminal offence and that it would be placed under the Food and Drugs Act. I should like to ask the minister, now that he has appointed a federal-provincial committee to study the illicit use of drugs, whether he will await this committee's report, or will the government act on its own before the committee completes its study?

Mr. Basford: Parliament dealt some time ago with Bill S-19, which, among other things—

Miss MacDonald: It did not come to the House of Commons.

Mr. Basford: The parliament of Canada includes the Senate, whether or not the hon. member agrees.

Miss MacDonald: Of course it does, but why did you not bring it here?

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): That was some thinkers conference, wasn't it Ron?

Mr. Basford: If only the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands and the House leader of the opposition would remain quiet for a moment, they would get the answer they are looking for.

Some time ago one of the Houses of this parliament dealt with Bill S-19 which recommended the transfer of the offence of possession of marijuana from the Narcotics Control Act to the Food and Drugs Act. As I indicated in the House some time ago, my colleagues, the Minister of National Health and Welfare, the Solicitor General and I have been considering in what form Bill S-19 should be reintroduced into the House and what changes in the bill should be made. We are actively pursuing that. The task force to which the hon. member referred that my three colleagues and two ministers from British Columbia established last week is concerned with recommending to both governments policy initiatives that might be taken with regard to both the supply and demand side of illicit drugs, but its emphasis, at the moment at least, is clearly on heroin and hard drugs.

An hon. Member: And saccharin.

FISHERIES

REASON FOR DOUBLE LICENSING OF FISHERMEN ON WEST COAST

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment.

Is the minister prepared to make a statement in the House on the situation of fisheries on the Pacific coast, particularly with regard to double licencing for fishing, or prepared to appear before the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry to explain to the Canadian public and most of all to west coast fishermen the reason behind this new regulation?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I think that question has been discussed at length during two sittings of the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry, last Thursday afternoon and Friday morning, if my memory serves me right. The officials who appeared before the committee have explained the reasons which could warrant either position, that is to protect the owners of small trawlers which cannot go in the gulf outside zones and thus depend, for at least 95 per cent of their catches, on the health of stocks inside the gulf. Or to give access to bigger ships which get about 10 per cent of their catches inside the gulf for a few weeks and then go outside the gulf to get the bigger part of their catches for the season. Such is the dilemma we have to face, Mr. Speaker, and I am not yet prepared to tell the House whether we will proceed right away or have once again a discussion and consultation period. However, if I were sure that another consultation period would give considerably different results, I would have no objection.

REQUEST FOR PUBLICATION OF AGREEMENT WITH WASHINGTON ON PACIFIC FISHERY

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a supplementary question.

To make this additional consultation possible, is the minister prepared to make public the text of the agreement signed in Washington approximately one month ago, agreement concerning the distribution of fisheries along the Pacific coast, and to defer this agreement to the Standing Committee of Fisheries and Forestry for consideration?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I do not think the text itself concerned the distribution of fisheries. The problem of catching species of American or Canadian origins remains as complex and insolvable as it was. The agreement signed in Washington provides for a period of time during which we will be looking for a long term solution and tries to "disturb" as little as possible Canadian and American fishermen who have traditionally been fishing in any of those waters. But if I can get a text, I am willing to bring it to the committee for consideration.

ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM

POSSIBILITY OF AGREEMENT WITH LABOUR AND BUSINESS ON ENDING CONTROLS

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): My question is for the Minister of Finance. As reported in today's press, the Minister of Labour said that there is a broad measure of agreement among business and labour leaders on what action should be taken about the economy, including the removal of controls. Can the minister advise exactly what that broad measure of agreement is which his colleague spoke about, and whether it includes anything specific as to how and when controls should be ended? Is the government in agreement with labour and business on the timing and method of ending the controls?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Referring back to the discussion of last week, the recommendation of the two groups was that controls should be removed as soon as possible—and the words are theirs—and that we should be content to rely on the forces operating in the market for the purpose of avoiding any renewed spiral of inflation. As I mentioned to the House last week, I have some hesitation—and I know that the majority of provincial governments have somewhat more hesitation—about an early withdrawal of controls. I think it would obviously be important to bring together the exponents of that particular point of view that is business and labour, with the responsible governments in Canada to discuss the possible further assurances that might be obtained to make certain that the spiral of inflation did not start again once controls are taken off.

BASIS FOR LABOUR MINISTER'S STATEMENT LABOUR WILLING TO EXERCISE RESTRAINTS

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): In view of the fact that Mr. Morris, the president of the CLC, was quoted in the press on Thursday as having said:

No commitments were made and nobody came up with anything approaching a plan for voluntary restraints,

Can the minister advise the House whether the comments of his colleague, the Minister of Labour, as reported today that:

There is a real desire growing and permeating through labour that it will exercise proper restraint in the post-control period.

—is based on any agreement made at the business-labour meeting, or whether it accurately reflects any commitment made directly to the government by the Canadian Labour Congress?

● (1450)

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, in the latter respect I think the question would have to be directed to the Minister of Labour. As Mr. Morris said, there was no specific agreement with the business community at that meeting but there was a commitment on the part of representatives of the CLC to speak out in favour of restraint as, indeed, Mr. Mahoney, one of the vice-presidents of the CLC, did this past weekend.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): For further elaboration of that particular point I think the hon. member might like to direct his question to my colleague.

Mr. Fraser: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Acting Prime Minister or the Minister of Finance whether in the answer I have just been given there was a suggestion that perhaps the Minister of Labour is not speaking for the government.

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the hon. member would be kind enough to repeat his original question. A speech I was making ran a little late, and I regret not having been here sooner.

Mr. Fraser: Mr. Speaker, I am sorry but I did not see the Minister of Labour come in. He was not here when I started to ask my questions.

In view of the fact that Mr. Morris, president of the CLC, was quoted in the press on Thursday as saying that no commitments were made and nobody came up with anything approaching a plan for voluntary restraint, can the minister advise this House whether his comments as reported in the press today that there is a real desire growing and permeating through labour that it will exercise proper restraint in the post-control period were based on any agreement at the business-labour meeting or whether it accurately reflects any commitment made directly to the government by the Canadian Labour Congress?

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, this was my perception of what was evolving as a result of discussions based on comments, I believe—as my colleague the Minister of Finance indicated as I came in—by Mr. Mahoney and by others. As to what specific commitments were made by Joe Morris, I think the appropriate person to inquire of would be Joe Morris himself.

FINANCE

REASON FOR HESITATION TO PUBLISH STATEMENT OF INCOME AND EXPENSES BETWEEN FEDERAL AND PROVINCIAL GOVERNMENTS

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, I would like to put a question to the Minister of Finance.

Last Thursday, in answering a question concerning a balance sheet of incomes and expenditures of the federal government within each province, the minister put me off by saying that such a balance sheet was possible but he did not indicate if it had been undertaken within his department. Therefore, I would like to ask him first if he knew that a federal-provincial study had been conducted under Mr. Bourassa's government before 1973 and that even the federal government had accepted to participate in such a study as we have been told last Friday, and, secondly, why do the government and his department hesitate so much to lay before the House or to release those figures so we could have a better idea of the Canadian situation?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, such a study has been prepared by federal and provincial governments and it does not support the conclusions stated by Mr. Tremblay last Friday.

Mr. Matte: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question?

Is the minister saying that it would be even worse than the facts disclosed last Friday? Secondly, when does he intend to give a precise answer to the questions repeatedly asked to him in this House about the amount of money the federal government gets from each province and the amount spent in the same provinces by the government? When is he going to give us this information?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I have just answered such a question by pointing out that it is presently impossible to give an exact evaluation of the payments which are being made. Such an analysis is now in process but I must say that it presents serious difficulties. As I already said, the Baribeau report tabled last Friday was not meant to be a federal-provincial or inter-provincial balance sheet, but for other reasons, and the conclusions the Quebec minister has drawn from this report are unjustified.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

NEGOTIATIONS FOR TRANSFER OF QUEEN MARY AND STE. ANNE'S HOSPITALS—REQUEST FOR REPORT AND CONSULTATION WITH ORGANIZATIONS

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Veterans Affairs. I wonder if the minister can indicate to the House if negotiations with the province of Quebec with regard to the transfer of Queen Mary Hospital and Ste. Anne's Hospital have been concluded.

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, negotiations with regard to Queen Mary Hospital are being carried on at the present time. There are no negotiations going on with regard to Ste. Anne's Hospital.

Mr. Marshall: Mr. Speaker, in order to prevent repercussions like those which have occurred in the past as a result of transfers of hospitals, before any agreements are signed and in order to ensure care of veterans will the minister assure the House that all veterans organizations will be consulted and also that a statement on motions will be made in the House listing the details of the negotiations?

Mr. MacDonald (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, with regard to negotiations which are going on in the province of Quebec and in other provinces, they take place according to government policy. As negotiations proceed there is always contact with veterans organizations throughout Canada. When transfers take place we try to make sure that certain things are adhered to. One of those things is that veterans are cared for and that employees now employed by the federal government are protected.

CAMP HILL HOSPITAL, HALIFAX—CONSULTATION WITH LEGION ON PLANS FOR EXPANSION

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question to the Minister of Veterans Affairs arises out of the negotiations dealing with Camp Hill Hospital in Halifax. Apparently plans for expansion have been changed. Has the minister or his department had negotiations or consultations with the provincial command of the Royal Canadian Legion in my province.

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Yes, Mr. Speaker, we have had consultations and discussions with the Royal Canadian Legion in the hon. member's province.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Acting Prime Minister. It arises out of questions raised by the hon. member for Vancouver South regarding increased consultation with labour, which the government desires. I would like to ask the Acting Prime Minister whether Mr. Mahoney has been appointed to the Senate and whether he has accepted.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Victoria-Haliburton.

SMALL BUSINESSES LOANS ACT

POSSIBILITY OF AMENDMENTS TO IMPROVE ROLE OF SMALL BUSINESSES

Mr. W. C. Scott (Victoria-Haliburton): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State (Small Businesses). Right now small businesses are suffering as a result of our slack economy. What plans does the minister have to upgrade the role of small business throughout Canada?

Hon. Len Marchand (Minister of State (Small Businesses)): Mr. Speaker, the Small Businesses Loans Act has to be amended by the end of June. After consideration and considerable consultation with the small business community across the country I am proposing what I think are very substantial amendments to the Small Businesses Loans Act. I think those amendments will make that Act a much more effective piece of legislation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

YOUTH UNEMPLOYMENT—PROPOSED IMPLEMENTATION OF YOUTH EXCHANGE AND YOUTH CORPS PROGRAMS

Mr. Paul Dick (Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I would like to put a question to the Acting Prime Minister. In view of the fact that youth unemployment is at its highest level since we have been keeping records on youth unemployment, in view of the government's announced intention in the Speech from the Throne of October 12 to assist youth in this country, and in view of the fact that the government has now announced the youth exchange program and the youth corps and that it appears that both those programs will not be in operation by summer when youth unemployment will be its highest ever, can the Acting Prime Minister indicate whether he and his colleagues will take steps to bring those two programs forward so that they can be implemented this summer? In addition, is the government bringing forward any other programs which will be urgently needed to help reduce the youth unemployment rate this summer?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the suggestion made by the hon. member is a good one. We will certainly do everything possible to bring forward these programs as soon as possible in order to augment the other programs which will be in play this summer to assist youth. The Minister of Finance will obviously be covering the general group of employment in his speech so naturally we must wait till next Thursday for any further details.

● (1500)

Mr. Dick: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the fact that the Acting Prime Minister agrees that this would be a better move than shipping young people out of the country to find jobs.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

DATE OF ANNOUNCEMENT OF ESTABLISHMENT OF YOUTH CORPS

Mr. Paul Dick (Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, may I put a supplementary question to the Minister of National Defence. In view of the fact that the minister promised in February that he would be making an announcement within two weeks on the youth corps—and that is registered in Hansard—and the fact that in the first week of March he said he would be making an announcement on the youth corps at the end of March, may I ask if he intends to make the announcement regarding the youth corps by the end of March this year and will he be able to make an announcement that 10,000 young people will be involved in July and August of this year?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I am still hoping to meet that deadline, plus or minus a day but to make a guarantee about 10,000 youth—we will have to wait for the announcement.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

POSSIBILITY OF TRANSFERRING CONTROL OF MARIJUANA FROM CRIMINAL CODE TO FOOD AND DRUGS ACT—DELAY OF PENDING CHARGES

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, my question for the Minister of Justice relates to the other questions concerning canabis. In view of the strong views of the Prime Minister on the question of possession of marijuana, has the minister prepared the legislation transferring cannabis from the Criminal Code to the Food and Drugs Act? Has he had cabinet approval and will the legislation be introduced before the summer recess? More important, would the minister be prepared to recommend to provincial Attorneys General that pending charges of possession of marijuana be delayed until the proposed changes are introduced and the legislation passed?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, just a moment ago I indicated that my colleagues and I are considering Bill S-19 and what if any changes should be made to those proposals. I am unable to say at what point any legislation may be introduced. You are aware of course, Mr. Speaker, that the Prime Minister indicated the other day that he was not able to predict at what time and in what form any legislation would be introduced.

MANPOWER

TABLING OF "JOB VACANCIES REGISTERED AT END OF MONTH, CANADA, FEBRUARY, 1955-JANUARY, 1977"

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 41(2) I wish to table, in both official languages, "Job Vacancies Registered at end of month, Canada, February, 1955-January, 1977".

BILL C-27—NOTICE OF MOTION UNDER STANDING ORDER 75C

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I wish to inform the House that it has not been possible to reach agreement under the provisions of Standing Orders 75A and 75B in respect of the proceedings at second reading stage of Bill C-27, an act to establish the department of employment and immigration, the Canada employment and immigration commission and the Canada employment and immigration advisory council, to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971, and to amend certain other statutes in consequence thereof. I, therefore, give notice of my intention to propose at the next sitting of the House a motion, pursuant to Standing Order 75C, for the purpose of allocating five further hours for the consideration and disposal of the proceedings of that stage of this bill.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the Acting Prime Minister or government House leader will make sure that the plans are known for certain recorded votes today. They were postponed until Monday, but I do not think we publicly fixed the hour.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity given by the hon. member to establish, for the benefit of hon. members, the hour for the divisions, which I propose should take place at 9.30 p.m. today.

While I am on my feet, Mr. Speaker, I might mention that, as we know, we are dealing today with the motion for concurrence in the name of the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants, and tomorrow we will deal with the motion which will be put forward by the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. That will be followed by second reading of the bill respecting which the motion is to be made.

Mr. Speaker: The House having understood and agreed that the votes would be deferred until today, is it agreed and ordered that those deferred divisions will take place at 9.30 this evening?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to the Standing Order, the bell will ring for 15 minutes.

AIB PERSONNEL

Question No. 728—Mr. Coates:

1. What was the estimated total number of employees that would be involved in the operations of the Anti-Inflation Board at the time the Prime Minister announced the establishment of the Board?

2. What is the actual number of employees now associated with the AIB as either salaried employees or under contract by the Board as of this date?

3. What was the total cost of operations for the Board for September 1976, and what is the estimated cost of the total operation of the Board for the fiscal year 1976-77?

Mr. Bob Kaplan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): 1 and 2. Supplementary Estimates for the period from October, 1975 to March 31, 1976 estimated 200 man-years. The 1976-1977 Main Estimates showed 396 man-years. Supplementary Estimates "B" for 1976-1977 shows 680 man-years. As of October 1, 1976 the total number of personnel with the Board was 856. The difference between this number and the 680 man-years is 176 persons who are under contract; on secondment from government departments and agencies; executive interchange.

3. Total cost of the operation of the Board for September, 1976 was $1,734,000. The estimated cost for the fiscal year 1976-1977 is $22.187.000.

FINANCIAL ADMINISTRATION BRANCH OF TREASURY BOARD—PERSONNEL

Question No. 910—Mr. Mazankowski:

1. How many persons are currently employed by the new Financial Administration Branch of the Treasury Board?

2. How many are expected to be hired within the next year?

3. What are the job classifications in the Branch and how many employees are in each classification?

4. What are the terms of reference for the duties of the Branch?

5. Are all Branch reports, studies, observations and recommendations made available to the public?

6. Does the government plan to raise the status of the Deputy Secretary in charge of the Branch to that of Secretary as recommended by the Auditor General and, if not, for what reason?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board):

1. Thirty employees as at January 1, 1977.

2. Thirty-eight.

3.

	Numbers of Employees
Classifications	January 1, 1977	To be hired 1977	Planned end of 1977
SX 3	1	—	1
SX 2	2	—	2
SX 1	4	3	7
FI 7	13	19	32
FI 5	7	10	17
Administration Support	3	6	9
Total	30	38	68

4. The duties and responsibilities of the Financial Administration Branch of the Treasury Board Secretariat are, in summarized form: "To develop and ensure the effective application of financial administration legislation, policies, standards, systems and procedures in order to provide public assurance that the financial resources of the Government of Canada are properly managed, controlled and accounted for."

5. Reports, studies, observations and recommendations made by the Branch concerning government-wide financial administrative issues are made available to the public. (Study of the Accounts of Canada, Guide on Financial Administration.) Study reports and recommendations on specific issues are provided on request to both interested members of the public and counterparts of the Branch in other governments, both provincial and international. The Branch makes annual evaluations of selected financial administrative practices in government departments and agencies. The evaluation reports are made to the deputy heads of these departments and agencies and copies are supplied to the Auditor General of Canada.

6. The government is giving due and serious consideration to the Auditor General's recommendation to raise the status of the Deputy Secretary in charge of the Financial Administration Branch and the associated issues in the recommendation whose implementation would require a "fundamental restructuring of the Treasury Board Secretariat". The Auditor General has been extensively consulted in the government's detailed consideration of this recommendation. In view of the significance of the Treasury Board Secretariat's position in the machinery of government, no decision will be taken until the government is satisfied that it has carefully reviewed all the potential ramifications of such a radical organizational change.

DEPARTMENT OF SUPPLY AND SERVICES—MOVE TO MONCTON

Question No. 1,367—Mr. Jones:

1. (a) On what date is the Department of Supply and Services going to move a large section of its operations to the Greater Moncton area (b) what are the plans and schedule for the movement (c) how many persons will be employed (d) how many will be employed from the Moncton area (e) what is the estimated annual (i) payroll (ii) operating costs less payroll (iii) capital costs?

2. Have training programmes been provided for residents of the Greater Moncton area who wish to obtain employment with the Department of Supply and Services and, if so, what are they?

3. Does the government plan to decentralize other departments to Moncton, New Brunswick?

4. What regional offices does the government plan to centralize in Moncton, New Brunswick?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): 1. Supply and Services Canada is in the process of finalizing the proposed plans, schedules and budgets for the relocation of the Superannuation Division to the Moncton area. Further information will be made available following completion of this process. (a) In general, it is proposed that the relocation will be effected gradually over a period of three to five years as the availability of trained staff permits. In this respect, there is no specific date on which a large section of our operations will be relocated to the Moncton area. (b) Details of the relocation plans and schedules will be available shortly. Announcement of related details at this time would be premature. (c) The Superannuation Division currently has approximately 400 employees; this staff level will be maintained in the Moncton area. (d) Although some of the 400 Superannuation Division employees in the National Capital Region may wish to relocate, it is expected that most of the staff will be recruited in the Moncton area. (e) (i) The annual payroll of the Division currently totals approximately $4.5 million. (ii) The annual operating costs less payroll currently total approximately $0.4 million. (iii) A statement of Supply and Services, Canada accommodation requirements is being prepared for Public Works, Canada. This will provide the basis for the development of final facilities requirements and costs.

2. Training programs have not been provided to date as this area is still in the planning phase.

3. Not applicable.

4. Not applicable.

COST TO GOVERNMENT OF SUPREME COURT TRIAL ON CONSTITUTIONALITY OF AIB BOARD

Question No. 1,505—Mr. Mazankowski:

1. What was the total cost to the government of the Supreme Court trial on the constitutionality of the Anti-Inflation Board?

2. What process was used to select a legal counsel to act on behalf of the government in this trial?

3. What was the fee paid to Mr. Robinette for representing the government?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): 1. Salaried legal officers of the Department of Justice and officials of other departments of Government were involved in the preparation of the Government's case and its presentation without a dollar value being assigned to this contribution. Apart from that, travel and printing expenses incurred in connection with the preparation were $914.11. Disbursements of the agent of the Minister of Justice were $719.04.

2. Counsel was selected to act on behalf of the Government in this case based on the usual criteria of the competence and experience required to meet the nature and importance of the litigation.

3. The fee paid to Mr. John Robinette who acted as agent of the Minister of Justice of Canada, was $22,500.

VETERINARIANS EMPLOYED BY DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

Question No. 1,799—Mr. Mitges:

1. How many veterinarians are employed by the Health of Animals Branch in the Department of Agriculture?

2. How many veterinarians with the Health of Animals Branch are employed in the (a) Meat Inspection Section (b) Contagious Disease Section?

3. How many primary products inspectors with the Health of Animals Branch are employed in the (a) Meat Inspection Section (b) Contagious Disease Section ?

4. (a) What is the rate per hour paid for overtime to veterinarians with the Health of Animals Branch employed in the Meat Inspection Section (b) what was the total amount paid in overtime to this group in the fiscal year 1975-76?

5. What is the salary schedule now in effect for (a) veterinarians (b) primary products inspectors employed by the Health of Animals Branch and, in each case, how many are there in each salary category?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): 1. Five hundred and thirty seven.

2. (a) 265; (b) 233.

3. (a) 1,099; (b) 266.

4. (a) See Article 18 of the collective agreement for the Veterinary Science Group. (b) Financial expenditure records are not maintained in a manner to readily identify the total amount paid in overtime to veterinarians employed in the meat inspection division.

5. (a) Salary ranges are contained in the collective agreement for the Veterinary Science Group.

Category	Number by Level
Veterinary Science	1—177
Veterinary Science	2—279
Veterinary Science	3— 65
Veterinary Science	4— 16

(b) Salary ranges are contained in the Collective Agreement for the Primary Products Inspection Group.

Category	Number by Level
Primary Products Inspector	1— 33
Primary Products Inspector	2— 23
Primary Products Inspector	3—1086
Primary Products Inspector	4— 196
Primary Products Inspector	5— 22
Primary Products Inspector	6— 5

Order Paper Questions

AIR CANADA PENSIONS

Question No. 1,814—Mr. McKenzie:

What pension, gratuities and fringe benefits were granted by Air Canada to the former (a) Chairman of the Board, Mr. Yves Pratte (b) Vice-President, Mr. P. J. Chartrand?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): The Management of Air Canada advises as follows: Air Canada does not disclose information respecting pensions and other compensations received by executives.

ICEBREAKING SERVICES

Question No. 1,894—Mr. Forrestall:

1. In the best estimate of the government, what would be a reasonable period over which to amortize icebreaking vessels owned by the government?

2. With reference to the answer to Question No. 1,145, will the government immediately implement an assessment of $2.00 per ton on cargo moving to/from ports on the St. Lawrence River during winter months so as to partially cover the cost of icebreaking services provided the exclusive benefit of the St. Lawrence River ports and, if not, for what reason?

3. Alternatively, will the government pay shipping lines calling at Saint John and Halifax $2.00 per ton during the winter months so as to partly compensate for the icebreaking subsidy to lines serving the St. Lawrence River ports and, if not, for what reason?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): 1. Some icebreakers are kept in operation for up to forty years but the economic life of an icebreaker is probably in the order of 20 to 25 years. Beyond that, significant expenses would be required for refitting, repairing or modernizing.

2. No. Icebreakers in the St. Lawrence River perform various functions such as flood control and many of the same costs would be incurred whether or not commercial ships take advantage of their services during the winter months. Any assessment must consider these other functions. It is also noted that reinforced commercial vessels seldom require icebreaking assistance.

3. No. The question of the equity of transportation expenditures between regions has to be assessed in a more comprehensive framework and involves much more than icebreaking assistance.

JACQUES CARTIER TERMINAL—GANTRY CRANES

Question No. 1,895—Mr. Forrestall:

1. Has any decision been made by the government with respect to the ordering of gantry cranes for the Jacques Cartier Terminal and, if so, what was the decision and on what date was it made?

2. Are any shipping lines, considered as prospective users of the Terminal, unable to be accommodated by the use of mobile cranes rather than gantry cranes and (a) if so, which shipping lines (b) if not, for what reason are gantry cranes being considered?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): The National Harbours Board advises as follows: 1. No decision has been made at this time.

2. As the terminal is intended to be operated as a public facility, the use of mobile cranes versus gantry cranes is under consideration at the moment. (a) The question of which prospective shipping lines could not be accommodated by the use of mobile cranes has not yet been considered. (b) Gantry cranes are considered for their ability to handle containers on cellular vessels and their capability of loading and unloading vessels more quickly; they are also more costly.

DREDGING IN ST. LAWRENCE RIVER CHANNEL

Question No. 1,896—Mr. Forrestall:

1. With respect to dredging in the St. Lawrence River Channel between Quebec City and Ile D'Orleans (a) what was the (i) initial estimated cost of the project (ii) amount of the low tender (iii) amount actually paid by the government (b) what was the anticipated minimum drafts expected to be created in the Channel (c) what is the minimum draft in the Channel at present?

2. Is it anticipated that annual dredging in the Channel will be necessary and, if so, what is the government's best estimate of the cost?

3. What ports and/or port facilities will benefit directly from such dredging?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): 1. (a) (i) Initial estimated cost of project, $18,928,000; (ii) Amount of the lowest tender; $20,860,000; (iii) Amount actually paid to contractor, $19,330,000. (b) Anticipated minimum depth, 41 feet. (c) Latest known channel depth, based on soundings taken in the fall of 1976, is 38 feet with a limited channel width of 650 feet.

2. Yes. Cost of annual maintenance dredging is difficult to estimate but probably is in the region of $750,000 per annum, allowing for inflationary trends.

3. Port of Quebec, and particularly Golden Eagle refinery at St. Romuald.

TANKER TRAFFIC ALONG WESTERN COAST OF CANADA

Question No. 1,900—Mr. Leggatt:

What (a) installations (b) services to control tanker traffic along the western coast of Canada (i) exist (ii) are planned?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): (a) (i) Existing installations: The major facility for control of tanker traffic on the west coast of Canada comprises the vessel traffic management centre located in the Capilano 100 building, West Vancouver. This Centre is equipped with radar, closed-circuit television and extensive communications facilities including dedicated communications links for the exchange of information with the United States Coast Guard Centre at Seattle. (b) (i) Existing Services: The Centre previously described manages the Vancouver traffic zone which includes Canadian waters in the Strait of Juan de Fuca, Haro Strait and the area between Vancouver Island and the Canadian mainland. Participation is voluntary at present and operating procedures are fully described for the information of mariners in the "Annual Edition of Notices to Mariners". The zone is divided into four sectors, operated as follows: Sector One (Strait of Juan de Fuca): Ship shore communication facilities enable participating ships to communicate with Vancouver traffic centre, advising the centre of their locations and intended movements and receiving information concerning other traffic in the vicinity as well as weather and navigational hazards. A voluntary communications service, operated by the United States coast guard, is also available in this sector. Sector Two (Haro Strait and waters east of Vancouver Island): Service in this sector is identical to that provided in sector one, with the exception of the United States operated communications system. Sector Three (Vancouver Harbour and Approaches): Radar equipment, supplemented by closed circuit television, enables the centre to monitor traffic in English Bay, the approaches to Vancouver Harbour and the Harbour itself. Ship shore communication facilities are also provided, as in Sectors One and Two. Sector Four (Fraser River-South Arm): Commencing March 1, 1977, Vancouver traffic zone is extended into the south arm of the Fraser River. Facilities in this sector are limited to a system of bridge to bridge communication, with vessels advising each other of their presence when passing specified calling in points. Tofino Traffic Zone and Prince Rupert Traffic Zone provide an extension of vessel traffic management services into the western and northern waters of British Columbia respectively. Participation is voluntary at present and is based upon each ship transmitting a message giving certain basic navigation information at critical points during her passage to all other participating vessels in the immediate area. As a means of enhancing navigation safety in the Strait of Juan de Fuca and the Strait of Georgia, voluntary traffic routing systems have been established in these areas. If it is determined that the systems are effective in promoting navigation safety, they will be considered for mandatory use. A medium frequency radiotelephone ship to ship and ship shore traffic monitoring and regulating system operates in the Mackenzie river to prevent congestion in constricted and dangerous areas. It also provides navigation safety information and weather forecasts and is conducted through Canadian coast guard radio stations.

(a) (ii)Installations Planned: Facilities presently under construction, and expected to be in operation during 1977 include: Tofino Traffic Centre: By means of long-range radar and radio facilities, this centre will be able to monitor, and communicate with, traffic approaching and departing from the Strait of Juan de Fuca. Vancouver Traffic Centre: Remote controlled radar installations mounted at strategic locations will provide surveillance of traffic in Haro Strait and the southern part of the Strait of Georgia. A radio direction-finding system will enable the Vancouver Centre to make a positive identification of vessels in this area. (b) (ii) Services Planned: Coupled with the provision of extended surveillance and identification equipment, it is intended to make participation in the Vancouver and Tofino Traffic Zones compulsory, thus providing active control over marine traffic in these areas. Extension of the present service in the Prince Rupert zone is also anticipated, but details of the degree and type of service to be provided will not be decided until a decision has been reached on the proposed Kitimat project.

ACTING MINISTERS AND SECOND ACTING MINISTERS

Question No. 1,995—Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre):

What are the names of the (a) acting ministers (b) second acting ministers of each department of the government?

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): P.C. 1976-3081 Certified to be a true copy of a Minute of a Meeting of the Committee of the Privy Council, approved by His Excellency the Governor General on the 10 December, 1976. The Committee of the Privy Council, on the recommendation of the Prime Minister, advise: 1. that in the absence from Ottawa of the Prime Minister or in the event of his being unable to perform the functions of his Office, the next Senior Minister who is in Ottawa, and is able to perform the functions of the Office of Prime Minister, be authorized to act for the Prime Minister; 2. that in the absence from Ottawa of a Minister whose name is set out in Column II of an item of the Schedule to this Minute, or in the event of that Minister being unable to perform the functions of his Office, the Minister whose name is set out in Column III of the item be authorized to act for the Minister named in Column II in respect of the Office set out in Column I of the item; 3. that in the absence from Ottawa of the Ministers named in Columns II and III of an item of the Schedule to this Minute, or in the event of both of those Ministers being unable to perform the functions of their Office, the Minister whose name is set out in Column IV of the item be authorized to act for the Minister named in Column II in respect of the Office set out in Column I of the item; 4. that in the absence from Ottawa of the Ministers named in Columns II, III and IV of an item of the Schedule to this Minute,or in the event of all those Ministers being unable to perform the functions of their Office, the Prime Minister or, if the Prime Minister is absent from Ottawa or unable to perform the functions of his Office, the next Senior Minister who is in Ottawa be authorized to act for the Minister named in Column II in respect of the Office set out in Column I of the item; 5. that where an Office set out in Column I of an item of the Schedule to this Minute is vacant, the Minister whose name is set out in Column III of that item be authorized to act in the Office of the Minister whose Office is set out in Column I of that item; and 6. that where an Office set out in Column I of an item of the Schedule to this Minute is vacant, in the absence from Ottawa of the Minister whose name is set out in Column III of that item, or in the event of that Minister being unable to perform the functions of the Office set out in Column I of that item, the Minister whose name is set out in Column IV of that item be authorized to act in the Office of the Minister whose Office is set out in Column I of that item.

REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

CONCURRENCE IN SECOND REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants) moved that the Second Report of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments, presented to the House on Thursday, February 3, 1977 be concurred in.

He said: Mr. Speaker, most of the legislation that has cleared this chamber these days and in recent years has contained provisions whereby the governor in council, the minister or some agency may make regulations for carrying out of the purposes of the legislation that we pass. The question arises as to how this process is carried out; whether there is ever an attempt to see that the process is carried out in the spirit of the original legislation and, if not, what sort of remedies are available. It is to these three important questions that I address myself this afternoon.

The scrutiny of what one might call the delegated parliament, as opposed to the parliament in which we sit, owes its existence to several outstanding figures in this House. I think credit is due all around this chamber, but I would single out the hon. member for Peace River, who seconded my motion for concurrence, the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville, on the other side, who is chairman of the committee that brought in very important recommendations in this field, the hon. member for Greenwood, the hon. member for Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine, the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council, the hon. member for Regina East, and the deputy House leader of the Conservative party. These are several of the prominent figures, but there are more besides. When one mentions some names, the danger is that one does not mention nearly enough. In any event, people such as Senators Forsey, Godfrey, Lafond, Yuzyk and others made substantial contributions in this particular field. At the beginning of this parliament I had the honour to be chosen, with Senator Forsey, as joint chairman of the committee. I succeeded the hon. member for Fundy-Royal. That shows that my stricture about myself was worth-while, since I had neglected to mention his name. He was a tall figure in this field, both physically and otherwise.

From the beginning of this parliament the work of this committee has continued and has culminated in the report, concurrence in which I have now moved. It is one of the lengthiest reports ever presented by a joint parliamentary committee. It is presented in a specially printed form covering 57 pages of two columns each. It includes a large variety of points, some technical, others simplicity itself. I shall review the work of the committee and deal with some of the recommendations I consider as particularly important, and then listen to the hon. member for Peace River, the Minister of Justice, the hon. member for Greenwood, and perhaps the parliamentary secretary to the President of the Privy Council comment on the work of this committee.

Sometimes those of us working in special committees think our committee is a world of its own and we wonder how the work will fare when it is scrutinized by this House. This afternoon and this evening, no doubt, I shall have my share of elation when others review the work of the committee, and perhaps my share of regret that we did not do better in certain respects.

I now come to the report itself. It covers the work of the committee from January 1, 1974, until January 27, 1977. For those who are not familiar with the workings of the committee, let me say that its work is initiated—I think that is putting it correctly—by two counsel to the committee, Mr. E. G. Eglington and Miss Lise Mayrand, and their efficient secretary, Mrs. Helen Leroux. They look at all the regulations, statutory instruments, and the like, of the various ministries and Crown emanations. Then, having scrutinized this vast body of regulations, our counsel come before the committee and report whether they see any irregularities in them or any other points which ought to be followed up. Paragraph 3 of the report perhaps best describes the work of the committee. It reads in part:

> The committee's primary function is to maintain a watch on the subordinate law made by delegates of parliament. In the modern era parliament has been forced by considerations of time and lack of technical and scientific expertise to leave to subordinates the making of detailed rules and regulations and to confine itself increasingly to setting the main structures of legislative interventions in society. However, parliament retains responsibility for the law of the land and to the extent that those detailed rules and regulations are not subject to parliamentary scrutiny, parliament is forfeiting its effective right to settle the laws that must be obeyed by the people.

Later in my speech I shall draw an important distinction between the work of parliament and what parliament can do and the work of the committee and what the committee cannot do. I draw a tantalizing curtain over that part of my speech by simply saying that it is possible for one of those two bodies to order a cook to be boiled in oil. If hon. members listen, they will learn later in my speech whether parliament or the delegated authority is able to order such an awesome punishment. I mention some figures. I point out that we are a continuing committee. Every week we deal with several dozen regulations, orders in council, statutory instruments, and the like. Up to July 15 last year the committee dealt with 1,348 instruments, which represents a massive amount of work. About half those instruments passed the committee without commentary, but after having been scrutinized by our counsel. Questions arose about the other half. Many of those questions were minor, although some were of substantial nature.

In the report presented to the House we have drawn attention to what we regard as defects in particular instruments. It is not likely that the committee will again make such a lengthy report to the House. I think we will be more apt to look into particular instances which concern us. That is a fair summation of the committee's work. For example, we are currently looking at the method by which increases in first-class postage were brought about by the use of a section in the Financial Administration Act rather than by an amendment to the Post Office Act. No doubt in due course the House will discover our findings in that regard.

A couple of years ago, in 1974, both Houses adopted criteria for the examination of statutory instruments. Those criteria were really an elaboration on the smaller number of criteria set forth in our founding legislation, the Statutory Instruments Act. There are some 16 or 17 criteria about which we are concerned. Perhaps I may refer to four or five of those criteria to make my remarks clearer. The criteria are found in paragraph 10 of part B of the report. We look at a statutory instrument or regulation to determine if, in our judgment it, and I quote criterion (1)(b)— > does not clearly state therein the precise authority for the making of the instrument.

In one half of the committee's work, whether to do with the Privy Council office with which we were most directly dealing, or the various ministries, that criterion was referred to many times, for it is a generally accepted practice in the government that when statutory instruments are framed, the precise authority for the making of the instrument must be clearly stated. We found that the occasions for invoking criterion (1)(b) were few. In this regard, I think the committee would like to commend publicly—as I am doing in this debate—the ministry for its co-operation. The second criterion is number 4, that the regulation or other statutory instrument—makes some unusual or unexpected use of the powers conferred by the enabling statute or by the prerogative—

Here I will refer to what I call the Baby-face Nelson amendment. It was once put out under the Explosives Act. The problem and the reason for the objection by the committee is that section 108.1(2) of the regulations prohibits the sale of fireworks to a person who appears to be under the age of 18 years. In their wisdom, the committee considered that the subsection could be given effect to in this wise even if you are under the age of 18 years: if you appear to be under 18, you may not buy fireworks. This is not the most earthshaking problem that has ever been encountered. We took it up with the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources which agreed with the committee that the subsection should be replaced by better wording. I hope that the Baby-face Nelson amendment has now been put to rest, because the department came forth with these words:

No person shall sell any fireworks to a person who appears to be under the age of 18 years and does not produce evidence that he is of the age of 18 years or over.

The third criteria I go to is number 9, whether any regulation or other statutory instrument, and I quote—in the absence of express authority to that effect in the enabling statute or prerogative, appears to amount to the exercise of a substantive legislative power properly the subject of direct parliamentary enactment, and not merely to the formulation of subordinate provisions of a technical or administrative character properly the subject of delegated legislation—

Here one is in the very important field of the question of whether the delegated act or instrument, in effect, amounts to the making of policy rather than to carrying out the purposes of the legislation. This is something that strikes right home at ourselves as members of parliament because under the representational gifts remission order it states:

—"in recognition of international comity and practice that heads of state, heads of government, ministerial representatives of government and members of parliament exchange gifts during official visits" customs duty, sales tax and excise tax shall be remitted on gifts received by the prime minister, ministers, and members of parliament on official visits to other countries or presented by visiting foreign donors in Canada.

The committee considered these remission orders very carefully. It was of the opinion that they were not concerned with administrative detail but constituted a substantive departure from established taxation law, giving us, in effect, a special privilege. That is set forth in the report. This reminds me of the time I headed a delegation of parliamentarians to Finland. One of the more splendid gifts of the Finnish parliament was a 40-ounce bottle of Finnish vodka which found itself in my luggage when I arrived back at the Halifax international airport. I was able to persuade Customs that I had accepted this 40-ounce bottle in trust on behalf of the parliament of Canada and that I would be able to share my pleasure with my fellow parliamentarians. I take the opportunity now of saying it was a great pleasure indeed.

An hon. Member: Did you share it?

[Mr. McCleave.]

Mr. McCleave: The spirit of the pleasure I shared if not the spirit itself. In any event, if you look at the report and examine the front portion of it, you will find that the representational gifts remission order came under some consideration by the members of the committee. The fourth example, criterion number 10, provides that whether any regulation or statutory instrument, and I quote—without express provision to the effect having been made in the enabling statute or prerogative, imposes a fine, imprisonment or other penalty, or shifts the onus of proof of innocence to the person accused of an offence—

Members will be reassured to know that this criterion has never had to be invoked. We have never got into the field so far that fines, imprisonment or other penalties arose by administrative act rather than by the express provision in an enabling statute. Finally, in dealing with these 17 criteria may I point out criterion number 5, a very important one that we looked at on a very large number of occasions namely, whether any regulation or other statutory instrument—

—(a) tends directly or indirectly to exclude the jurisdiction of the courts without explicit authorization therefor in the enabling statute; or

(b) makes the rights and liberties of the subject dependent on administrative discretion rather than on the judicial process—

A sample that I will quote in this regard deals with the sale of postage stamps and their regulations. I quote from the report:

Section 14 of these regulations gives to any postmaster an unfettered power to cancel any licence at any time issued under the regulations.

A corner grocery store with a postage stamp vending machine may suddenly lose that if the local postmaster decides that it should. The committee was concerned by the fact that no grounds or criteria are spelled out as justifying cancellation. There is no provision for a hearing or any opportunity for the licensee to be heard, or any obligation to tell the licensee why he is losing that particular right. The Minister of Justice may argue, and perhaps will, that an action to review the decision to cancel a licence would exist under section 28 of the Federal Court Act in the event that the rules of natural justice are ignored. I am not saying it is certain, but it is possible. The committee felt that the subject should not necessarily be forced to litigation in order to establish his rights or to seek that sort of justice.

Another of the recommendations that we had regarding the carrying on of the work of this committee—really, the first recommendation—was that the criteria, of which I have only dealt with five out of some 17, for scrutiny be written into the Statutory Instruments Act so that they will not need to be adopted and incurred in anew by the two Houses at the commencement of every session of parliament. The committee also suggested that there be an additional criterion, namely, whether a statutory instrument trespasses unduly on the rights and liberties of the subject.

The last point is with regard to our relations with parliament. This answers the question of the cook who was ordered to be boiled in oil. Let it be noted that parliament can do what it wishes within its jurisdiction. It is said it can change a man into a woman, or a woman into a man. But delegated authority must always be subordinate.

● (1530)

"The power to legislate, when delegated by parliament, differs from parliament's own power to legislate. Parliament is supreme and its power to legislate is therefore unlimited. It can do the greatest things; it can do the smallest. It can make general laws . . . it can make a particular exception out of them in favour of a particular individual. It can provide . . . for the payment of old age pensions to all who fulfill the statutory conditions; it can also provide—and has in fact provided—for boiling the Bishop of Rochester's cook to death. But any power delegated by parliament is necessarily a subordinate power, because it is limited by the terms of the enactment whereby it is delegated."

This is a statement which is undoubtedly written large on the walls of the classrooms when students are dealing with the powers of parliament and delegated authority. It comes from the committee on ministers' powers, better known as the Donoughmore committee, in the United Kingdom in 1932. I think I have now given a satisfactory explanation about the boiling of the cook. Except that the other day there was a debate in this chamber—such debates take place almost every year, and I believe one will take place tonight in the Senate—in which great interest was shown in the subject of $1 items.

The co-chairman of my committee, Senator Forsey, has indicated that in a very rare meeting of committee of the whole of the other place the question of $1 items will be raised together with the propriety of some of the things those items set out to do. Perhaps this is the most important battle we shall get into in parliament for a long time, the question of what can be done with $1 items and what can be done with legislation which does not specifically set out the powers which can be used under that legislation. The subject is one which has been well ventilated in this place, and no doubt it will be well ventilated in the other place, so I shall not get into it now.

In the report to both chambers we have dealt with what we consider to be a defect in the method used by parliament to handle delegated legislation. More particularly, we turned to the Statutory Instruments Act. The first point which must be considered as being a defect in the act is the absence of any real system whereby orders which have legislative effect are tabled in the House, are automatically referred to the standing joint committee and are published so that the public may know what is being done. This concerned us because we do not know how many instruments are effectively being hidden from us. We do know, for example, about the guidelines used by the department of immigration. Some of us, more particularly the hon. member for Greenwood, have seen portions of these guidelines. He can advise the House that they do contain substantive rules. We are told, for instance, that they contain a definition of the crime of moral turpitude, the commission of which is a ground for exclusion from Canada. It is our opinion that such rules should not be contained in documents which in no way, shape or form come before a parliamentary committee for scrutiny. This matter is being considered now in connection with the new Immigration Act which is presently before parliament.

The second point with regard to the Statutory Instruments Act is that the definition of a statutory instrument is obscure. I suppose that if either Senator Forsey or myself operated as strictly as some chairmen are inclined to do, we would be bound to examine each piece of material which comes before us in light of the definition of a statutory instrument under the Statutory Instruments Act and make a ruling as to whether or not the committee was in order in even attempting to examine some of these sacred pronouncements. The fact is that in the end we simply threw up our hands, as did our counsel, in face of the definition set forth in the Statutory Instruments Act. We implore, beseech and beg that when parliament gets around to dealing with the act it gives us a better definition to deal with. The present definition of a regulation is equally obscure, in the opinion of the committee, and as we say in our report at paragraph 45:

There is no provision for a body to give a definitive ruling on whether or not a document is a statutory instrument. There is a procedure by which the Department of Justice can determine whether or not a statutory instrument is a regulation, but this is open to the objection that the parliamentary scrutiny committee is cut off from the decision.

The course which is recommended by the committee—and I must say it is a very non-partisan committee—is to proceed along the lines which were originally recommended by our "father committee", that is, the committee headed by the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville, namely, to have one class of document, broadly defined. This would remove the distinction between regulations and statutory instruments. It would subject all documents of the class to uniform procedures as to registration, publication and restriction as to retroactive effect.

The report of the committee headed by the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville with regard to what should be the regulation and classification of the documents proposed is set forth in paragraph 47 of the report by Senator Forsey and myself. I simply draw it to the attention of the powers that be in the hope that parliament will have some interest in the problem we are up against and try to help us in our work. We think we have important work to do and we believe, also, that we are hampered by the present unhelpful definition. If nothing else happens immediately, I do hope the Statutory Instruments Act can be implemented so as to include a sensible definition and incorporate criteria to guide us in the examination of these regulations, possibly by way of a schedule to the act.

I have dealt with the recommendations concerning the criteria. I have dealt with the need for a new definition. We also make reference to the enabling powers in the Appropriation Acts, including $1 items. That is paragraph 113 of our report in which we say:

● (1540)

The committee endorses the views of the Auditor General. If enabling powers to make statutory instruments are to continue to be granted in Appropriation Acts, the vote texts should be specific and unequivocal, and contain all the wording having legislative effect, with none being contained in the estimates. Legislating by means of dollar votes and altering the purpose of previous votes by a number of successive votes are practices with which the committee does not agree.

May I make a specific point about recommendations dealing with the powers of officers of agricultural agencies. This is a point which did not make much impact when the report was presented the other day, though it was the feeling of the committee that very large and substantial issues are involved here. I could have mentioned these earlier when we dealt with some of the criteria as examples, but I thought I would deal with this specifically at the tail end of my remarks.

It is our opinion that in the past the powers given under agricultural acts to marketing agencies and the like are too broad and sweeping. As a matter of fact, it was said in the committee that we thought ordinary farmers should be treated no worse than ordinary criminals, yet criminals have rights established under the common law and in the Criminal Code which ordinary farmers would probably give some of their eye-teeth to have. For example, here is something which came out in the Saskatchewan hog information, interprovincial and export, regulations. I do not mention this because it is the worst example, but because it was an ordinary example of what one finds under the Agricultural Products Marketing Act. This is one part of the regulations, which is set forth in paragraph 130 of our report:

5(1) Any member or authorized representative of the commission may, at any reasonable time, inspect any place or premises used for the marketing of hogs.

(2) Every person in possession or control of any place or premises referred to in subsection (1) shall

(a) permit any member or authorized representative of the Commission to inspect such place or premises; and

(b) furnish any member or authorized representative of the commission with such information in respect of the marketing of hogs as he may reasonably require.

What the regulations do in this case is to give powers of inspection without any requirement that the inspecting officer show his authority or establish his identity. There is no limitation on what is a "reasonable time". The requirement to produce information to an inspector is stronger than that which a peace officer can require of a person. For example, it could destroy, and it does destroy, the inspected person's basic right not to incriminate himself.

These problems have been taken up with the Department of Agriculture and that department is setting to work to remove the objectionable features of many of the regulations pertaining to agricultural marketing. The point should be made that over the years some bad practices had grown up as a result of the actions of people who drew up regulations without there apparently being the scrutiny that we in parliament would have given them had the regulations been presented to us in the first place in the form of legislation.

I think the committee can pat itself on the back for digging out some of these things and starting to effect cures, but it is a long and slow process and sometimes one does not get all the co-operation one would like. Departments, being composed of human beings, as is the committee, are apt to see things in a different light. While mentioning the co-operation of the Department of Agriculture, I am hoping for the co-operation of the Department of Fisheries since some four dozen queries have been directed to that department regarding which the committee has not yet received satisfaction. I should also mention the co-operation that we have enjoyed from both the Privy Council office and from the Minister and Department of Justice. So gradually I think battles are being won, though there is still an enornous number of battles to be fought.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, may I make four points of a general philosophic nature in concluding my contribution to this debate. The first is that parliament need not fear the delegation process. I say this because there have been some silly press reactions to the original report of the committee, as though all delegation in itself is necessarily evil. Parliament need not fear the delegation process any more than it need fear its own process of enacting legislation. What we have to fear here is whether the delegation process is properly used. We should also insist that the delegation process be scrutinized properly by the joint committee of which I have the honour to be a chairman. In other words, every member of parliament should take it upon himself to want to know that, when legislation leaves here and is subsequently carried on by a delegated process, that delegated process is exercised properly and examined properly.

Secondly, we must improve our method of dealing with the delegation process. From time to time the House and the other chamber must welcome members of the committee to come and relate our problems, just as I and others are doing. I think possibly there should be a debate at least once a year, or once a session, on the question of how we cope with the delegation process.

Thirdly—I have mentioned this before but it is worth mentioning again—the procedure committee should also take a look at the problem. Perhaps we should be establishing a process whereby all regulations go to the committee most directly affected. For example, regulations under the Agricultural Products Marketing Act should go to the agriculture committee at least once so the members of that committee have an opportunity to discuss them. After all, those members are the most concerned with agricultural matters, much more so than the members of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments. They can pronounce more directly on whether the regulations carry out the intention of the legislation and on what they understood to be the intention when that legislation went through.

We do have the advantage in the regulations committee that regulations and statutory instruments are automatically referred to us if passed, I think, since January 1, 1972. Once a regulation properly comes before us, as I understand that most generous reference in section 26 of the Statutory Instruments Act, then it is possible for us to again and again go to the same regulation if we feel it is offensive or should be examined for some reason or another. We never lose our power to examine that particular regulation. The fact is that some of us would feel comfortable if the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry would look at some of the regulations dealing with fisheries, in that they only do so once in a lifetime.

My fourth and final point is that more members and more people from the public should use the process of the committee to look at regulations. If those regulations bother them, they should at least write in and say, "Have you chaps taken a look at this? It seems to affect some of my basic rights. I wonder how you can allow that sort of thing to happen in any part of the parliamentary system."

The purpose of the speech I have just delivered, and the speeches the House has heard from other hon. members, no doubt will give some emphasis to the fact that we are trying to cope with the problems of the delegated process and the fact that we are trying to enlist as many people to this cause as we possibly can.

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Speaker, this second report of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments, as those who have read it will be able to testify, is a lengthy, complicated, legal document. It is none the worse for that. In effect, it has to be that sort of report dealing with that sort of subject matter. It is important that the salient features may not possibly be recognized because of the torrent of legalistic words. I will bring out some of those features which deserve special consideration.

The committee's primary function is to maintain a watch on the laws made by the delegates of parliament and to subject all rules and regulations to parliamentary scrutiny. I suggest that that delegation is necessary. This delegation is regarded as necessary, as evidenced by the well-known practice of almost all developed countries and their legislatures. There is no way we can rail against delegated legislation and say it should not be: it is here to stay; it is a natural result of the type of society in which we live.

The report which we are now discussing indicates that the intentions of parliament in respect of parliamentary scrutiny have been whittled down by a series of interpretations of the meaning of the expression "rules and statutory instruments" by legalistic refinements of the meaning of these terms. This exercise has apparently been promoted by the Department of Justice. It is not too much to say that the report indicates in great detail how the will of parliament has been frustrated by this process of interpretation by the bureaucracy within the Department of Justice. I am glad the Minister of Justice is going to speak after me. He will be able to correct me if I am wrong, or say wherein the report is wrong.

The interpretation given by the legal advisers of the Privy Council office removes from the class of instruments covered by the act a substantial number of subordinate laws. This is done by the application of what the committee called a magic formula. Unless an enabling power reads that the governor in council or minister may "by order, by rule, by regulation, by warrant, by tariff", and so on, there can be no statutory instruments.

This interpretation would remove, from the class of statutory instruments and the committee's scrutiny, instruments made under enabling powers in common use. For example, the phrase "terms and conditions as the governor in council may prescribe", or "as the board may regulate", do not, in the opinion of the Privy Council, constitute statutory instruments and therefore they are free of regulation.

In this connection I would remind the House that Bill C-24 on immigration which recently received second reading in this House contains much of such phraseology which would remove some of the rules passed by it from the scrutiny of the committee. For example, under section 14 of the new Immigration Act it is provided that where an immigration officer is satisfied that it would not be contrary to this act or the regulations to grant admission to an immigrant who has been authorized to come into Canada, he may, after such further examination as he deems necessary, grant landing to such person and impose terms and conditions of a prescribed nature. That is language which, according to the legal authorities of the Privy Council, means that the rules made in respect of providing or imposing terms and conditions are not to be scrutinized by any instrument of parliament. As far as I can make out, they do not even require publication. That is a secret form of legislating with respect to the rights of people.

The instrument or document describing these terms and conditions for admission would not be a statutory instrument, according to this interpretation, and would not require publication or scrutiny by the committee. To my way of thinking, the legal contortions used to arrive at this extraordinary conclusion are beyond comprehension. It is obvious that they deprive the Regulations and Statutory Instruments Act of the application parliament intended them to have; namely, the committee should have wide jurisdiction over all statutory instruments and legislation. There is no rhyme, no sense or no reason in saying that one parcel of documents should be subject to parliamentary scrutiny and others should not.

To put it another way, an ingenious formula has been found for substantially curtailing the purposes of parliament in passing the act. I know what the purposes were, because I was a member of the MacGuigan committee and I took part in all the debates which dealt with this subject. I believe it was the intention of parliament that this committee should have wide jurisdiction and should not be restricted by these legalistic interpretations which deprive it of much of its jurisdiction. To go into the legal merits of this matter would tax the patience of the House, and indeed I would not even have time to go into them.

The committee said, on page 19 of the report, that despite widespread belief to the contrary, there is no system whereby all orders which have legislative effect and are tabled in parliament are automatically referred to the standing joint committee and are published so that the public can know what is being done. That is the purpose of this, so that the public can know, through the filing and scrutiny of this Committee on Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments, what is being done to remove an atmosphere of secrecy about laws applicable to Canadian citizens and others in Canada. The committee report continues to read as follows:

There is a system only for regulations and not for all statutory instruments, many of which are effectively hidden, are unpublished or are unknown even to the parliamentary committee.

Because these documents are not said to be statutory instruments, they were not even reported to the committee and the committee did not know that many of them existed—and to this day the committee does not know how many of them exist. The committee recommended the adoption of the definition proposed by the so-called MacGuigan committee which would clear up this question of definition. We hope the government will afford an early opportunity to remedy this situation.

The committee report also refers to the sub-delegation of the rule-making power and suggests that this should be clarified and cut down, and that such delegation should only be allowed when clearly provided for in the legislation. The committee further dealt with the power of dispensing with regulations in favour of individuals and raised many examples where this is being done at present. It was through the exercise of dispensing this power that James II lost his throne and Charles I lost his head. It constitutes a vicious practice designed to ensure that we are governed not by a democratic parliamentary system but by a bureaucracy.

No one in the House does not appreciate the necessity of having a bureaucracy of officials to administer the law, and indeed I think many of us have a good deal of respect for our officials who are serving this country. But to apply a term which I think was originally used in respect of the army and its position vis-à-vis the civilian power, the bureaucracy should be on tap, not on top.

The committee took the view that the wording of the definition section of the act is obscure, and the Privy Council office's interpretation of it is, and I quote the language of the report, "Quixotic in operation and subversive to the committee's function so narrowly to confine the committee as to hamstring it". This parliament is now having a report prepared for it by the joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons saying that this provision has hamstrung the committee's functions. I think we should do something about that.

The committee refers to immigration guidelines which the House has been discussing recently in a different context. It says it is satisfied that these guidelines and manuals are in effect statutory instruments and should be disclosed. The committee reports that it has not been vouchsafed either a perusal of the guidelines or the detailed reasons for there not being statutory instruments, and is therefore unable to give an opinion as to whether the guidelines now in existence do, or do not, fall within section 58 of the Immigration Act, or do not lay down any rules applicable to subjects or immigrants.

I invite the House to consider how serious a statement that is. The committee of the House and of the Senate was not even allowed to look at the guidelines which I for one am able to assert dealt with the rules by which we admit people or refuse them admittance to Canada. We were not allowed to even see what these documents are. As they said, they could not judge whether the guidelines now in existence do, or do not, fall within the relevant section of the act.

While it is obvious that the committee cannot pronounce itself on documents it has not seen, these guidelines do contain matters of substance which guide immigration officers' decisions in the case of applicants for immigration into Canada. These documents have been kept rigidly secret, not only from the public or those directly concerned in the cases involved but from parliament as a whole. I hope parliament has enough self-respect to say that this must not continue. The total picture is one, therefore, of frustration and obstruction as well as one of secrecy.

The committee has had before it, as the House knows, another reference to inquire into the secrecy of public documents whose production has been sought in parliament. This committee has not yet reported. I am not quite sure whether it has up to date terms of reference now before it. This refers to a subject that is widely known under the heading of the freedom of information act. This is all part of the same picture in which some of us in the House are striving to bring about greater public participation in the decisions of government. The present report, however, lays the groundwork for some general observations, namely, that we are not governed by participatory democracy, which would require full disclosure of what the government is doing unless the matter falls within a special exemption as clearly set out in the statute.

It is imperative that we should change this situation. Democracy means government by the people. It is essential, for this to be effective, that the people and their representatives should have knowledge. Knowledge, in effect, is power. It can hardly be too much to say that those who have knowledge and power today are the bureaucracy who are supposed to be subordinate. Parliament should take this matter up with vigour and should insist that the definition of regulations and statutory instruments be made broad enough so the committee can function effectively and the Senate and the House of Commons are respected and recognized.

Perhaps we do not need a revolution such as occurred in the days of the Stuart kings of England. But what I think we need is a revolutionary change in attitude, and I hope that when the Minister of Justice speaks in this debate he will say what the government is planning to do to ensure that we move to that freer, more open society in which people have power and in which other instruments of government are in the subordinate position in which they should be.

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, I have listened with a great deal of interest to the chairman of the committee and the hon. member for Greenwood. As both of them indicated, the matter under discussion, namely, the work of the committee and the report of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments, is immensely complicated and complex, not only because of the legal technicalities—some of which have been raised this afternoon—but also by reason of the novelty of this area of parliamentary inquiry. Traditionally, in this country, questions as to the legality or not of legislative instruments were left, until the Statutory Instruments Act came into force, to the realm of the courts.

This is the first substantive report by the committee, and as such it merits very careful consideration, as suggested by the hon. co-chairman. I can assure him and the House that the report is receiving careful attention within my department and by the government and that it shall continue to do so.

Because of the importance of the subject I accept with readiness and support the suggestion of the co-chairman that some means be found by which this subject could be reviewed, analyzed and debated—if I recall the co-chairman's suggestion correctly—on an annual basis so that from time to time we can see the progress which is being made in the area of providing—and this is the desire of hon. members of this House and of the government—that delegated legislation is given proper scrutiny to ensure that this delegation is being done properly.

As the hon. co-chairman indicated, parliament need not fear the delegation process, and as both speakers before me have indicated, that delegation is not new to parliament. It is certainly something which in this complex society and in this complex day we are going to have to continue. And what we as a parliament, and obviously those on this side as members of the administration, must be concerned about is that this delegation is used properly and that we have—on a continuing basis—an adequate process to ensure that its exercise is scrutinized.

The government is as concerned about the scrutiny of subordinate legislation as much as any hon. member in the House and certainly as much as hon. members on the opposition side. I am glad that the hon. co-chairman pointed out the work which preceded the passage of the Statutory Instruments Act, namely, the work of the MacGuigan committee which lead to the passage of the present legislation and the work which hon. members on both sides of the House have done. The hon. co-chairman mentioned a group of people, and he indicated that in any list we invariably leave one out. I would like to add to his list. It was a matter of great interest and concern to the late prime minister Lester B. Pearson that we legislate a proper regime for inspection of statutory instruments. He took particular, personal and keen interest in the work of the MacGuigan committee and the legislation which flowed from it.

I think the process put in place by the Statutory Instruments Act and the standing committee is basically a good one. Our concern here, in what is a new function for parliament—at least, for the Canadian parliament—should be about continually reviewing how the system is working. We should continually be concerned about refining our system as time goes by and bettering the system of scrutiny as our insight and experience increases.

Before dealing with the report, I want to mention one specific matter. While it was not raised by the co-chairman, it was raised by the hon. member for Greenwood. He complained about the definition of statutory instrument—and I also wish to complain about it—but he said that the definition resulted in a whittling down of the matters which could be reviewed by the committee. He seemed to imply, as some of the speeches in the other place have implied, that there was almost a conspiracy on the part of officials of the Department of Justice to do that. I was pleased to note that later the hon. member indicated in his remarks that he had a very high regard for many of the public servants who serve our country. I am glad he said that, but because of what else has been said in connection with the drawing of regulations I would like to make one point very strongly. Simply stated, I am confident in asserting that the officers of the Privy Council office section of the Department of Justice bring a very high degree of competence and dedication to the very difficult job of examining the myriad of regulatory enactments which pass through their hands. In saying that, I in no way want to take away from the dedication and competence of those in the committee who do exactly the same job.

I would remind hon. members that under the terms of section 3 of the Statutory Instruments Act, all proposed regulations must be inspected by the Department of Justice to ensure that they are authorized by the statute pursuant to which they are made; that they do not constitute an unusual or unexpected use of the authority pursuant to which they are made; that they do not trespass unduly on existing rights and freedoms; and that they are not, in any case, inconsistent with the purposes and provisions of the Canadian Bill of Rights; and the form of draftmanship of the proposed regulations are in accordance with established standards. In carrying out their work as officers in those inspections or in those analyses of matters passed under the Statutory Instruments Act, they are performing duties specified under the Statutory Instruments Act and under section 4 of the Department of Justice Act which provides that the administration of public affairs must be in accordance with the law.

Because of some possible inference by the hon. member for Greenwood and some remarks made in the other place, I want to assure the House that, from my observation, the dedication of the officers of my department to the principle that the administration of public affairs is in accordance with the law, and their dedication to the rule of law, is as strong as that of any member of the committee or any hon. member of this House.

While, obviously, in any free, democratic and parliamentary society it is essential that there be constant vigilance against abuse of public power, in my view this country is undoubtedly fortunate in having law officers of the quality, competence and dedication that it has. While it is fashionable, and always worth a headline, to attack senior civil servants, it has been my experience in four different departments that as a country and as a parliament we are generally well served by this group of dedicated, hard-working and capable advisers.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Basford: I think from time to time that needs to be said, and I think these advisers are the first to recognize the point I have just made, namely, that in any free society there must be constant vigilance against abuse of public power by those holding public office, elected or otherwise.

As I said in the beginning, this is the first time a committee of parliament has reported on the operations of the Statutory Instruments Act. There is a need for fresh approaches to the problems raised in the report. I want to say that my department and the government as a whole has shown willingness to develop such new approaches.

● (1620)

I would illustrate that claim by example, Mr. Speaker. One problem—dealt with at considerable length in the report, as it should be, because it was a matter of very great concern to the committee—was how to provide the committee with adequate background information to the regulations it was examining while at the same time protecting the confidentiality of the advice provided by my department to its client departments and to the government generally. This protection is akin to that provided by the solicitor-client privilege at common law. The hon. member for Peace River might note—and I see him taking notes—that I believe even he recognizes the confidentiality of legal advice. I do not want to quote Hansard, but when he was a parliamentary secretary on another occasion he made a very long speech about it. He also included an exemption for legal advice covering this type of material in the right to information bill that he introduced in the last session of parliament.

On the one hand there is the question of protecting the legal advice given by my department to the government, and on the other the valid and legitimate need of the committee to have more information about the regulations they are scrutinizing. A solution was developed to this problem which hinges upon the distinction between legal advice and statements by the relevant departments as to their legal and policy position vis-à-vis the particular regulation in question. As a result of meeting with the committee and discussing this matter at length, I made a series of recommendations to my colleagues in cabinet who agreed—and the committee has been subsequently so informed—that henceforth each department shall have a senior adviser designated to provide these statements. My deputy minister has written to other deputies to inform them of this new arrangement. Each department will have a senior officer who will provide these legal and policy statements to the committee upon request.

I would hope that when the question of legal advice and the need of the committee for information arises the arrangement we have proposed will serve both those needs and interests. I am happy that the committee notes these new arrangements in its report and expresses the hope that they will serve the committee's purpose. I join in that hope.

It has been mentioned that this is a very legalistic and technical report. I should like to deal, in order, with some of the other sections of the report, and this discussion will as a result become somewhat complicated. I think it is necessary, however, that I put some observations on the record. This being an extensive report covering many areas of the subject, I would hope that members of the committee would not want me to respond today with a speech to cover every paragraph. Hon. members are having some difficulty keeping awake at the present time, and they certainly would be sound asleep if I dealt with every paragraph of the report, as it raises many, many issues.

I would like to begin with Sections D and F of the report which deal with the form and public availability of statutory instruments. With regard to the form of statutory instruments, the committee's basic concern relates to the citation of the statutory authority for each instrument, the citation of previously relevant amendments and the publication of explanatory notes. When they conduct their inspection of each statutory instrument, the Privy Council office section of the Department of Justice will normally see that the relevant statutory authority is not only legally valid but that it is also cited. Henceforth, this long-standing administrative practice will be refined to as great an extent as possible to ensure that the circumstances referred to by the committee will become even more rare. I think the co-chairman acknowledged that progress was already being made in this area.

The matter of providing appropriate footnote referencing to the latest relevant amendments to instruments is now being looked into by the Privy Council office, as is the matter of publication of explanatory notes. I can only state at the present time that the clerk of the Privy Council is considering the committee's recommendations very seriously, and I hope very shortly to be able to inform committee members of new developments in this regard.

I should like to turn now to section E of the report which concerns alleged defects in the Statutory Instruments Act and which has been the subject of comments by the hon. member for Greenwood. The co-chairman of the committee has also made a number of recommendations in this regard which principally, but not entirely, relate to the definition of "statutory instrument" in the act. The committee says it has found this definition incomprehensible and unworkable. In response to that, I say that basically I have sympathy with them on this point and, as I indicated when I appeared before the committee, my officials and I are prepared to consider any specific suggestions the committee might wish to make toward improving the definition. The committee has recommended the inclusion of certain departmental guidelines, directives and manuals—a recommendation which I have raised in correspondence with the committee and the relevant departments.

The committee also recommended that a new definition of a statutory instrument should be arrived at "by taking the sum of the law-making exercised by the Crown and its agencies and any other delegate or subdelegate of parliament and where made pursuant to or under a statute or to the prerogative and by declaring the whole to be subject to parliamentary scrutiny." This would, however, cause some problems of interpretation just as does the present definition. While I think the need for some exemption to this definition was dealt with in the committee's report, it would seem to me, touching only on certain matters, that such a general definition would, subject to whatever exemptions existed, include all bylaws made by private corporations established by an act of parliament, copies of every order made by a judicial or quasi-judicial body established by act of parliament, plus the ordinances of the Yukon and the Northwest Territories and any regulations or orders made thereunder.

The value or even the wisdom of having a committee of the federal parliament reviewing this kind of material seems somewhat questionable to me. There is a need for a better definition of statutory instrument and a need to avoid some of the problems created by the present definition. And, as was said, my officials and I are considering the observations made in the report. And, I say that to indicate that in the light of difficulties with regard to the definition, I would still consider any further observations emanating from members of the committee or the committee itself. These would help in the formulation of a precise definition which may be proposed as a change to the Statutory Instruments Act.

The hon. member for Greenwood said he hopes the government will provide an early opportunity for dealing with this question in parliament. I assure him that my officials and I are considering the observations of the committee in its report but, as the hon. member knows, the timing of the introduction of any amendments to the act is not in my hands. It is entirely out of my hands in that it is a matter for the President of the Privy Council and the government as a whole. One appreciates that the legislative list with which this parliament must deal is extensive.

The committee also recommends that the Statutory Instruments Act should be amended so that as a general rule no subordinate legislation should come into effect before it is published. The previous speaker also raised the problem of publication. The Statutory Instruments Act at present already effectively deals with this point in a slightly different manner. Subsection 11(2) provides that, with certain specific exceptions, no person shall be convicted of an offence consisting of a contravention of any regulation that at the time of the alleged contravention was not published in the Canada Gazette in both official languages.

The subsection makes a sensible exception in most cases where it is proved that at the date of the alleged contravention reasonable steps had been taken to bring the purport of the regulation to the notice of those persons likely to be affected by it. For example, there are occasions when it is necessary to act quickly, such as at the close of a fishing season for conservation purposes. This happens in my part of the country weekly, sometimes almost daily. In such cases signs are posted immediately near the river or lake affected, which would seem to be a better method of informing the concerned parties than publication in the Canada Gazette, which I do not think is a best-seller among fishermen. If the government waited for publication in the Gazette, the purpose of the closing would be lost.

The committee also recommends that all subordinate legislation, unless expressly excepted by the terms of the Statutory Instruments Act, should be registered, published and transmitted to the committee. The act, however, already requires all regulations to be transmitted to the clerk of the Privy Council for registration. Furthermore, it provides as a general rule that no regulation shall come into force before registration. It also requires publication in the Canada Gazette after registration.

Finally, with regard to transmission of regulations to the committee, my understanding is that directives already exist on this point. Steps will be taken to ensure that this is indeed the case already prior to the introduction of, say, amendments to the act. In effect, with respect to regulations the committee's recommendation is already being implemented. The further recommendation that these requirements should extend to all subordinate legislation as defined by the committee may cause severe difficulties. One need only again mention court orders and ordinances of the territorial councils to give hon. members some idea of these difficulties. This issue is one which will be receiving further attention from appropriate officials.

The committee also recommends that "the Statutory Instruments Act should provide for a statutory instruments reference committee having the authority to issue a conclusive determination for the purposes of parliamentary scrutiny as to whether any particular document is a statutory instrument or not." The effect of this recommendation would be to delegate to the proposed reference committee the determination of the term "statutory instrument", as I understand the recommendation, for all the purposes of the act and not just for the purpose of scrutiny by the standing joint committee.

Personally, I have some difficulty with assigning to a committee of the House the task of defining words in a statute. Hopefully, an improvement of the definition would make such a recommendation unnecessary. An improved definition could also handle one other recommendation of the committee, namely, that any departmental guidelines, directives or manuals which contain substantive rules not contained in statutes should be included in the definition of "statutory instruments" and subject to parliamentary scrutiny. It seems to me, unless I misread the report, that if these difficulties could be dealt with by way of definition, we should not need some of the other recommendations. I am glad to note that the co-chairman seems to indicate that I have read the report correctly.

I apologize for being so technical, Mr. Speaker, but I think the members of the committee would wish me to deal fully with their report. Recommendation 10 of the summary, in section E of the report, advocates that the committee should be provided with reasons wherever any statutory instrument is to come into force before registration and publication. This strikes me as an extremely reasonable proposal and I am pleased to announce that steps will be taken to implement it. The government agrees, as well, with the next recommendation of the committee, namely, that the words "regulation-making authority" should be redefined. The objective here is to make it clear that these words mean the department, ministry or other body which recommends the regulations to the governor in council.

The final recommendtion of the committee with respect to the Statutory Instruments Act is that section 32 should be amended to require the publication of regulations registered under that section. With few exceptions, the publication of these regulations has now been carried out. I think the committee in its report mentions, for example, among the remainder which have not been published, regulations which govern the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. With respect to all of these, the Department of Justice will publish this summer a complete consolidation including all regulations and other statutory instruments enacted since 1955. This consolidation would include all regulations registered under section 32, which will give effect in practice to the recommendation of the committee.

In section H of the report the committee recommends that any subdelegation of rule-making powers should be expressly spelled out in the establishing statute. This recommendation, like many of those in the report, raises what is essentially a fine question of law involving the extent of the authority granted by the general words which are traditionally employed when conferring regulation-making powers. After considerable research and consideration of the matter, Professor E. A. Driedger, Q.C., a well known Canadian authority on legislation, has concluded that the results of the court decisions to date "would appear to be that there is no rule or presumption for or against subdelegation and that in each case it is a question of interpretation of the language of the particular statute". The committee rejects this conclusion and I suggest one can only await the final decision of the courts on this matter.

With regard, however, to the general question of the desirability of subdelegation, it should be noted that the combination of the complexity of contemporary regulations and the need for flexibility in applying them in the field has created what is, indeed, an inescapable need for subdelegation as discussed in this section and sections I, J and K of the report. In my discussion of these sections I will attempt to demonstrate this necessity. In section I of the report the committee deals with the language of delegation. My officials are now studying, for future use, the general recommendations contained therein. Hopefully, hon. members will bear the committee's recommendations in mind in enacting forthcoming legislation. It should be noted, however, that it would not be desirable to impose a straitjacket on the words used in legislation by forbidding, as the committee recommends, the use of particular terms such as "respecting".

Section K of the report concerns enabling powers which are granted by the use of Appropriation Acts, the so-called "dollar items". This was a topic of considerable debate and a ruling by you, Mr. Speaker, last week. I do not intend to repeat all that was said at that time. I follow the example of the co-chairman who moved the motion before us today. One can understand the concern which was debated last week to which Your Honour's ruling adds a new perspective. I will leave it simply to the debate that was held last week and to the effect of the ruling of Your Honour with regard to that matter.

Section S of the report deals with the power of officers of agricultural agencies. In this regard I would like, first of all, to state that, as the committee itself points out, the regulations setting out the powers of officers of agricultural agencies are within the terms of the acts of parliament governing these matters. Second, I should point out that there does not seem to be evidence that agricultural agencies are presently trampling on the civil liberties of citizens. As the committee has recognized, the Department of Agriculture has co-operated willingly in removing objectionable features of regulations when these have been brought to its attention.

I would like now to turn to a section of the report which I understand has given rise to a fair amount of controversy amongst the members of the committee. It was touched upon by the hon. member for Greenwood. A good portion of the committee's report deals with regulations that exempt one or more individuals from the application of general regulations. Part J of the report gives examples of such regulations, and appendix III of the report sets out at considerable length why the committee considers such regulations to be illegal.

It is the committee's opinion that such regulations have been outlawed by the "revolutionary settlement" embodied in the English bill of rights of 1689. The report sets out the history surrounding the passage of the act in Britain and concludes, in essence, that the so-called "dispensing regulations" cannot validly be made unless each and every case is expressly authorized in the body of the statute itself. This particular matter was mentioned by the hon. member for Greenwood and my name has been linked with those who in times past have "lost their heads" over the issue. I have read speeches made in the other place by the co-chairman from that place wishing to give me the title "latter-day Stuart"—a title which I reject.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Maybe you are a Latter Day Saint.

Mr. Basford: This would seem to be an issue which, in the final instance, involves a subtle point of statutory interpretation. It is not extraordinary that there is disagreement between the lawyers on the committee and those of the Department of Justice as to the interpretation of the sections which provide for the creation of regulations. Justice's view is simply that all the regulation-making powers in question include the power to limit the application of the regulations. Since the regulation-making power is itself a parliamentary enactment, the "revolutionary settlement" principle is not infringed upon.

The report also indicates, in section N, the committee's disagreement with the practice of departing from the language of the statutes when the same idea is repeated in the instruments made thereunder. On the very few occasions where this has occurred, the responsible departments acknowledged that it was not a proper practice. Certainly, the officers in the Department of Justice will endeavour to assist the committee by ensuring that such instances do not occur, or are corrected if they do occur.

In section O of the report the committee indicates that the statutory conditions precedent to the making of published instruments should be recounted in the preamble as having been complied with. The committee has noted, however, that the legal advisers to the Privy Council office have co-operated with it in this regard and they, undoubtedly, will continue to do so in future. The report raises many other technical points which, as I said at the beginning of my remarks, are too numerous to cover here. In conclusion, I would simply like to state that the Department of Justice and the government will continue to examine the good work of the committee in what, as was also said before, is a new area of parliamentary activity, scrutiny and reporting.

It should be noted that there have been occasions where the legal views of the committee have been brought to the attention of justice officers who have agreed, and have subsequently recommended to the departments that the regulations in question be amended.

I agree with the comments of the co-chairman that we must always ensure that there is in place an effective means of scrutiny, and that we in parliament as much as within government itself, have two jobs, namely to ensure that our regulations are properly written and properly passed. We also have to ensure that the committee gets the kind of information, support and help it needs to do its job properly. We should not rely upon the courts to ensure that our regulations are properly passed. We should not rely upon the hope that if a regulation is not properly passed, some citizen will take it to court and challenge it. It is our responsibility to put into place both the proper governmental and parliamentary processes and procedures.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I must inform the hon. minister that his allotted time has expired. He may continue only with unanimous consent. Is there consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, I would indicate that I have about one minute left. I was making the point that while we have to ensure that we always have in place appropriate governmental processes and parliamentary procedures to ensure that our regulations are proper and that we should not rely upon citizens having to go to court to exercise their right and have the court declare regulations ultra vires. However, it is significant that almost every regulation passed by the government affects a citizen in some way, some corporation in some way, or some association in some way.

● (1650)

A search of the court proceedings of this country would indicate that though from time to time particular regulations are knocked out by the courts, these are very rare occasions indeed. I believe that on the whole we can take some comfort from the fact that the processes within government and within parliament have ensured that only very few regulations are challenged in the courts. This perspective is important when our attention turns, as it undoubtedly will from time to time, to cases where there has been a mistake.

Overall, the government is desirous of establishing a spirit of co-operation with the statutory instruments committee. The willingness to create new systems and adopt new procedures, as demonstrated in the initiatives I have described today—for example, the solution we have put forward with respect to the committee's information requirements—is significant, and we hope the committee will adopt the same posture in its future work and that our future relationship will continue to be one of co-operation, recognizing that there is good will and devotion to the rule of law and the public interest not only on the part of the committee but on the part of the government and of my own officials and advisers.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, later on I shall commend the minister for some of the things he has said, and criticize him for others, but at the moment I should like to comment on the last statement he made, that there are very few occasions upon which members of the public have successfully been able to challenge orders in council and regulations.

Of course that is true, but one of the main reasons is that most individuals affected feel that for one reason or another they cannot, as it were, fight "City Hall" with any chance of success. In other cases they do not know how to look for these regulations or go about having them altered. Many cases have come to my attention as a member of the bar and as a member of parliament in which citizens who have been adversely affected by orders in council and regulations of the federal government—and, I am sure, of provincial governments as well—lack the opportunity, the cash and the knowledge to take to court the body responsible for the unfair and improper regulations which have affected them. It is as well to bear in mind, in this regard, the somewhat technical language which has been used in this debate by my hon. friend the Minister of Justice and by the hon. member for Greenwood.

Effectively, there are two questions at issue here. First, there is the entire principle of the use of orders in council and regulations which affect the people in so many ways. Then there is the application of those orders in council. My learned friend from Halifax-East Hants, the co-chairman of the committee, has stated that parliament is supreme. Mr. Speaker, parliament was supreme. It is supreme no longer because of the very use of orders in council and regulations of the kind we are discussing. I am not blaming anyone in particular; I am sure we all have some share of the blame to assume. If this parliament is bleeding to death, as some say it is, much of it is from self-inflicted wounds. We sit back and allow these things to happen. Our inability to deal with this situation is illustrated by the history of this particular committee. I recall debating this subject back in 1965 with the then prime minister—I am glad the Minister of Justice raised the fact that the late Lester B. Pearson was instrumental in bringing about the course of events which ultimately led to a greater willingness to subject these matters to parliamentary scrutiny.

We were debating the need for an ombudsman, and at that time I told the prime minister that while I had no objection to this idea it was, in my view exceedingly important to establish, in the Canadian parliament, some kind of scrutiny committee such as that which already existed in the United Kingdom. Mr. Pearson agreed with me. I subsequently crossed the floor of the House and talked with him on several occasions, and it was following those discussions and the intervention of other members, that the MacGuigan committee was set up. That committee approached its work with persistence and a great deal of study. A very good report was produced. Unfortunately, its recommendations were not completely followed. But that was 12 years ago, Mr. Speaker. It has taken 12 years to get around to the report, to the presentation of a bill, a debate on the bill, the establishment of the present standing joint committee and here, for the first time since the matter was raised in the House, to taking action to come to grips with the problem which afflicts us. It is all very well for the Minister of Justice to say we are going to do this, or we are going to do that. If it takes another 12 years to come to grips with the problems our committee has raised, God help the country!

I see it is almost five p.m. On a point of order, this is a debate on a motion and I believe that, properly speaking, the debate should continue and that private members' business should not intervene. It is my recollection, however, that there has been some discussion on this matter and I am quite prepared, if it is the unanimous wish of the House, to see the debate adjourned so that private members' hour can proceed, in which case may I call it five o'clock?

Mr. Goodale: Yes, Mr. Speaker, there has been some discussion between representatives of the various parties and there is, I understand, consensus that we should proceed with private members' hour today and deal with notice of motion No. 15 in the name of the hon. member for High Park-Humber Valley.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): There have been such discussions, Mr. Speaker, and we agree.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): It is my understanding, then, that we will proceed to private members' business.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall)—Transport—Appointment and terms of reference of commission to study problems in Newfoundland; the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro)—National Defence—Policy of department with respect to uniforms for cadets.

It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, notices of motions and public bills.

Shall notice of motion No. 4, in the name of the hon. member for Ottawa-Vanier (Mr. Gauthier), stand?

Mr. Goodale: Stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Stand at the request of the government.

SUGGESTED IMPLEMENTATION OF PROGRAMS TO ASSIST SMALL BUSINESS

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of implementing programs to assist the development of small business in this country, consisting of such positive initiatives as (a) allowing tax credits for investment in small business (b) providing assistance in the formation of small business export consortia (c) changing government tender practices so that small business supplies a portion of government purchased goods and services (d) reducing the government paperwork burden imposed on small business.

● (1700)

He said: Mr. Speaker, I should like to begin by saying that in my mind there is no segment of our society which unites this country as much as the business world; that is to say, business in general, and small business in particular. I believe this is an important observation to keep in mind, especially during these troubled times when the threat of separation and the possibility of the ultimate break-up of Canada is hovering over every Canadian.

The fact is that business problems, concerns and potential solutions in Victoria are the same as in Regina, Toronto, Quebec City, Halifax and St. John's. Therefore, if we are to keep the remaining binding fibres of our society intact, we must all pool our efforts and resources in supporting and encouraging the growth and stability of the free market system and, therefore, the basis of this system which I believe to be small and medium-sized enterprises. Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, in most cases the government either ignores or overlooks this sector which forms the backbone of our economic way of life. It is true that from time to time, however, the government does throw the odd bone to the small business community, some of them quite worth while. Unfortunately, I believe that these few and far between moves are made primarily for pacifying reasons with no basic, over-all commitment in mind.

It is also true that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) almost a year ago appointed a minister responsible for small business who in my opinion is working in very good faith indeed within his jurisdiction and portfolio. However, Mr. Speaker, the minister in charge of small business cannot exist in a policy vaccum without succumbing to the same fate as his predecessor, the minister of multiculturalism. Hon. members will recall that a minister of multiculturalism was appointed prior to the 1974 election, only to disappear after the Liberals came back to Ottawa with a majority mandate. I hope that the Prime Minister's intentions regarding the small business ministry will not parallel the former ministry of multiculturalism.

The question, then, Mr. Speaker, is: What is needed in order to keep small business participation active and healthy in Canada? It is my strong belief that what has been lacking for far too long is a strong and innovative small business policy. It is sad that even after seven or more months of the existence of a minister responsible for small business the minister himself just last Thursday could not even define small business as it relates to his portfolio, let alone advise this House, and more importantly the tens of thousands of concerned small businessmen across this country, when, if ever, Canadians could at last expect to have before them a small business policy.

Instead of the ad hoc, band-aid approach that this government has taken in respect of small business, as indeed it has on a great number of other issues, a definite small business policy, or better still a small business act along the lines of that existing in the United States, Japan and elsewhere, must be established at the earliest possible date in order to replace the existing air of confusion with potentially long-range programs.

Obviously, the government cannot be considering seriously the problems and potential solutions of small business when the minister does not even know what specific segment of our economy he represents. This fact and this attitude, economically speaking, put us roughly 20 years behind other industrialized nations. This was confirmed to me through a series of meetings with government officials in Japan, including the director of the small and medium-sized enterprise agency, as well as at an earlier symposium on small business held in Washington, D. C., which I was fortunate enough to attend. Curiously enough, I missed the absence of the minister responsible for small business at the meetings in Washington and elsewhere. In any event, it is my understanding that since he became minister responsible for this sector the only trip he has taken abroad has been to the Soviet Union. We wonder at the reasoning behind that move.

Of course, one does not have to go to Tokyo or to Washington to find out about our dilemma. But what hit me most vividly, particularly in Japan, was the difference in priorities between the Japanese government and that of our own. In Japan, as in the United States, West Germany and elsewhere, governments have been catering to the well-being of the small business community over the past 20 years or so. As a result, their economies are far more advanced than ours, especially when it comes to unemployment where, for example, Japan has zero unemployment in a population of 110 million people while we have reached the frightening figure of one million unemployed in Canada.

One of the main reasons for this imbalance in statistics is that we are not taking advantage of the best and cheapest potential job employment opportunities in a mixed economy. I am, of course, referring to the small business sector. Unfortunately, the philosophies of our government as a whole in Canada over the past decade or so has had a tendency towards centralization, with bigger and costlier governments, stronger and more powerful unions and larger and fewer multinational corporations. It is my deep concern that unless this trend toward centralization does not reverse itself within the very near future, our system—the free market system which this country was built on—will slowly but surely disappear, only to be replaced with what I can describe as "corporate socialism".

The simple fact remains that our governments continue to consult with large business and unions only, and as a result most of the legislation is geared solely toward that sector. This leaves small business, which by the way is responsible for well over 50 per cent of the labour force, to accept the various laws which were not based on their problems in the first place.

There is no question that the small corporation has vastly different needs from the big multinationals. An example of such a big business policy is the imposition of quotas on textile imports. Naturally, these quotas are needed to protect the large Canadian textile manufacturers, but they should not apply to the thousands upon thousands of small specialty shops, importers, merchants, and so on, which import specialty items which Canadian manufacturers would not even think of making in Canada. As a result, further unemployment occurs as well as bankruptcies, which are already at their highest level in our history, all because of legislation which is geared to big business and does not take into account the small businessman who automatically falls under that legislation.

I realize that most politicians in the democracies of the west know that "small" is beautiful. However, the future role of small business is to convince the public and its political leaders that small, as it relates to the economy, in fact has been the pillar of free enterprise as we know it and must continue to form the basis of this freedom of the economy if we do not want to see the demise of that freedom. I do not believe that there is one individual in this House, with the exception of perhaps some NDP members, who would want to see the free enterprise system eroded any further.

As the current radio ads sponsored by the private insurance companies of Canada state, "A challenge has to remain, or else we all become vegetables". I would like to put on record my appreciation and, I know, the appreciation of millions of Canadians, for the initiative taken by these private insurance companies in promoting and sponsoring this current series of free enterprise advertisements. They, basically, sum up the heart of the fundamental political force of this decade, including the fight against bureaucracy.

No segment of society is more vulnerable to the mechanics of bureaucratic power than the small and medium-sized business sector. These companies by and large, because they are small entrepreneurial operations, do not have the manpower to handle the massive volume of government demands now made for paperwork of various descriptions. Too many small businessmen who are victims of an unco-ordinated leap-frogging by government departments in their demands for ever more statistics find the productive effort is increasingly swamped by form-filling.

● (1710)

Laws and regulations, often made by government to regulate the activities of large corporations, have often failed to take into account the small and medium-sized businesses which find themselves defenceless in a bizarre jungle of apparently conflicting regulations without the aid of the platoons of corporate lawyers, tax accountants and government relations men who serve larger firms. Even regulations which at first might seem fairly innocuous, such as the federal government's labelling act, can put many hitherto prosperous companies into bankruptcy.

The government does not appear to realize in any meaningful way that the survival of small business is inescapably linked to the survival of the mixed economy. Therefore, other than my insistence that it is imperative to reverse the generally existing philosophies of centralization in this country by all of our governments, I believe most strongly that the government must begin compiling a definitive policy on small business. When asked about a policy, the Minister of State (Small Business) (Mr. Marchand) stated four or five months ago that a policy would soon be forthcoming. When asked again just last week he indicated that he had no idea as to when a policy, if ever, would be forthcoming.

An hon. Member: He didn't say "if ever".

Mr. Jelinek: A policy must be forthcoming by this government, before it is too late. A step toward that direction would be for this House to accept some of the basic proposals listed in this motion. If I may, I will read them again. One is, "allowing tax credits for investment in small business". Everyone knows that we have a non-competitive banking system in Canada, unlike that of the United States, and unless you are a large, multinational corporation, and unless you have enough collateral to triple or quadruple the amount of money that is needed for your small business expansion, you are more often than not unable to get a loan. The biggest problem is raising funds.

This suggestion of allowing tax credits for investment would solve a two-purpose situation. First, we would create an opportunity for further investment by Canadians in Canada, rather than going south of the border, which is the case now. Second, we would be making funds available to the small business sector which does not now have the opportunity to deal with fund-raising.

Continuing the proposals: "providing assistance in the formation of small business export consortia". Japan is one of the best examples in this area. That is why their economy is flourishing. Their small businesses are flourishing because they are small, independently and privately owned businesses. Most of them fall under umbrella organizations which help export their needs to the rest of the world. Something along those lines should be considered in this country.

The proposals continue: "changing government tender practices so that small business supplies a portion of government purchased goods and services". That is better known as the "set aside" program. In the United States this has been in effect for some time. One of the main reasons is that that country considers it very important to act on behalf of the small businessman and has had for some time a small business act. I would like to quote from section 2 of the United States small business act in respect to the "set aside" program which reads as follows:

It is the declared policy of the Congress that the government should aid, counsel, assist, and protect, in so far as is possible, the interests of small business concerns in order to preserve free competitive enterprise, to ensure that a fair proportion of the total purchases and contracts or subcontracts for property and services for the government . . . be placed with small business enterprises—

That is a very simple solution, yet one that is not taking place in Canada and one that has not been considered to date. It hurts the small businessman as much as any other area that I have mentioned. The final proposal in this motion reads: "reducing the government paperwork burden imposed on small business". I realize the minister has already taken a move in this direction: he has taken the initiative to reduce the reporting of corporations to Statistics Canada. I compliment him on that move. It is something for which our party was pushing for years prior to the appointment of the minister responsible for this area. That is a move in the right direction.

I would hope the government would go much further than that, because there are countless government surveys, statistics and regulations within nearly every other department where curbs and waste are taking place. Curbs on this wastage must take place as soon as possible in order to assist the small business community. The provinces are to blame for this as well as the federal government.

To sum up, then, what must be done is, on one hand, reduce considerably the existing bureaucracy which is strangling the small business community, while on the other hand make available incentive programs which, by way of a tax system, would be based upon research and development, increased employment, productivity, export sales, expansion, secondary manufacturing, and so on.

In the few brief moments I have left, let us take, for instance, the secondary manufacturing. Canada is the richest nation, per capita, in natural resources, and look at the state of our economy! One of the reasons is because we do not have the incentive. We do not offer incentives to industry to develop our secondary manufacturing. We need the United States and other foreign concerns to develop some of our natural resources. Then we fight like hell to sell them to other countries—Japan being one of them—where we help their economy, where we help their employment, their unemployment being zero. Then we turn around and buy the finished product—very often at a much higher cost—made out of our own natural resources, in the first place, and dug up by the Americans. If we want the trend in our economy to reverse itself, then surely we must come up with incentive programs to assist this very vital sector which has not been established in our country.

To my mind, "incentive" is the key word and one that, unfortunately, is disappearing from the political vocabulary in Ottawa. Instead of incentive programs we are now in the midst of the greatest give-away era in our history. The higher the number of direct grants or give-aways, the less incentive for realistic productivity. Just as the higher the number of unemployment benefits, the less incentive for long-range employment.

My concern is so genuine regarding the problems of small business and the freedom of enterprise that I hope the seriousness of these problems can be dealt with on a non-partisan basis. We cannot wait any longer to move in a positive direction in this regard. I hope hon. members will realize the seriousness of this situation and accept some of the proposals which I have outlined today. Opportunities still exist in Canada, but they are diminishing very quickly. Let us not lose them completely.

Mr. Maurice Harquail (Restigouche): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for High Park-Humber Valley (Mr. Jelinek), while we do not always agree with some of the comments he makes in the House, has brought forward a worth-while motion. When one looks a little more closely at the recommendations that are contained in the motion, one can easily see that a good part of it has been taken from the Speech from the Throne. In it the government promised, first, measures to reduce the paperwork burden on small enterprises; second, to render government lending sources more accessible to small businesses; and third, to restructure major programs of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce in order to orient them more specifically to small and medium-sized businesses.

● (1720)

An hon. Member: Copycats.

Mr. Harquail: The hon. member is correct in that. In introducing his motion this afternoon the hon. member for High Park-Humber Valley (Mr. Jelinek) agreed that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) made a good choice in selecting the hon. member for Kamloops-Cariboo to be Minister of State for Small Business.

Mr. Huntington: Where is he?

Mr. Harquail: I hear comments from the other side. I am surprised that only three conservative members are sufficiently interested in the motion to be here to support the hon. member for High Park-Humber Valley this afternoon. I would have thought he would have been able to muster more support for Canadian small businessmen.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Harquail: I was delighted to hear that this new, young minister, the Minister of State for Small Business, has travelled across this country and went to western Canada in January and to Atlantic Canada in March to meet small businessmen in this country. He had very good reason to do so, because it is estimated that over 60 per cent of Canadians work in small businesses either as employers or as employees.

Let me quote a few figures, Mr. Speaker. There are an estimated 329,000 small businesses in Canada. Those 329,000 businesses are in the following sectors: retail, 137,000; wholesale, 32,000; construction, 46,000; manufacturing, 37,000; service, 56,000; transportation and warehousing, 13,000; owners of apartments and other buildings, 8,000—for an estimated total of 329,000, which is over 60 per cent of the work force. So I can confidently state that small businesses are the lifeblood of the economy in Canada.

Mr. Jelinek: Then do something about it.

Mr. Harquail: We are doing something about it. As a matter of fact, the Minister of State for Small Business, as he himself mentioned in the House this afternoon, will soon be bringing in a bill amending the Small Businesses Loans Act. He has been also working very diligently with the Canadian Federation of Independent Business and is developing an excellent rapport with this and other organizations which have felt for some time as though they were cut off and did not have a voice in government.

Mr. Jelinek: They still don't.

Mr. Harquail: Another example of positive action and good leadership by the government was indicated in the Speech from the Throne and in the appointment of the Minister of State for Small Business who travelled across the country to speak to this most important sector, namely, the entrepreneurs.

Another excellent move by the government to assist small business was through the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development which operates programs to encourage small business enterprises in northern Canada. They have programs to encourage and facilitate business development by native people throughout the country. These programs are the small business loans fund, which applies to the Northwest Territories and the Yukon, the Eskimo loan fund and the Indian economic development fund. As well, the Minister of State for Small Business is consulting with small businesses in every part of the country regarding the Small Businesses Loans Act which is administered by the Department of Finance. Through it, Canadian chartered banks and other lending institutions make loans to businesses. The loans are backed by government guarantees. At present the interest rate under the act is 9½ per cent. At the end of March, 1977, the interest will be recalculated. The rate of 9½ per cent is only three-quarters of 1 per cent above the bank's prime rate, the rate charged to the bank's best customers.

Another direction in which the government is moving is to provide, through the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, major support to small business in many regions of Canada under the Regional Development Incentives Act and also in the agricultural field through ARDA and special ARDA programs. Also, through the Canadian government office of tourism the government is providing a variety of programs in support of the tourist industry.

While I have this opportunity I should like to make a suggestion on behalf of Canadian small businesses that we bring some forceful recommendations to the House through the Minister of State for Small Business with regard to the competition act. All too often big businesses impinge on small businesses to the extent of, if not crippling them, putting them right out of business. Therefore, I would support any measure brought in by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald), the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Chrétien) or the Minister of State for Small Business to give greater protection to small businessmen in Canada. This is much needed, as I know from the representations I receive at my constituency office.

One of the very important and effective ways in which our government can give greater assistance to small businessmen is by improving and tightening up legislation dealing with unfair competition. I am one of those who would certainly encourage new legislation brought into the House on this subject so that we might do much more even than is contemplated and than is done by the Minister of State for Small Business as well as the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and the Minister of Finance on behalf of small businessmen in this country.

In summation, I should like to say that although the hon. member for High Park-Humber Valley, in our view, does not always speak words of great wisdom, he has brought out some excellent points in his motion and I think we should express our thanks to him for bringing it forward. I have no difficulty in agreeing with the majority of the recommendations contained in his motion. However, as I have said, most of his recommendations are already contained in the Speech from the Throne and are being acted upon by the Minister of State for Small Business.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Ron Huntington (Capilano): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure for me to take part in this debate on the motion of my colleague, the hon. member for High Park-Humber Valley (Mr. Jelinek).

To start with, I would like to correct the remark of the hon. member for Restigouche (Mr. Harquail) that the motion came from the speech from the throne. May I say for his benefit, through you, Mr. Speaker, that the recommendations contained in his motion have been the subject of frequent comments for many years from members on this side of the House, and it is on the basis of those remarks and speeches that mention of this subject was made in the Speech from the Throne.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Mr. Harquail.]

Mr. Huntington: I was also surprised the Minister of State for Small Business, who was present in the House until a few minutes after five o'clock, saw fit to leave when a motion which elicits elaborate comment and information is being debated.

Mr. Harquail: He had business with small businessmen.

Mr. Huntington: If that is the case, then I will forgive him.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Huntington: There are four parts to this motion. The first is to allow tax credits for investment in small business. I think that is an important suggestion which gives us in the House an opportunity to offer a few comments on it. The greatest need is for small businesses to improve balance-sheet and profit and loss ratios which will improve the borrowing powers of small business in dealing with chartered banks.

Small business loans legislation should be adjusted to serve the equity and working capital needs of small business so that they can increase the leverage they have in dealing with chartered banks. I would also like to see interest rates on loans under the Small Businesses Loans Act tied to a rate above the prime. I suggest that that rate above prime should be in the order of 1.25 per cent to 1.75 per cent so that we do not again get into the situation we have experienced whereby we have fixed the rate and removed the incentive from chartered banks to involve themselves in government guaranteed loans.

I also think that after having gone through an era of a very high rate of inflation the amount of the loan, $50,000, should be increased to at least $75,000 and perhaps even to $100,000. Perhaps also that should come up for annual review.

In view of the inflation we have been through, and if the Minister of State (Small Business) (Mr. Marchand) is recommending changes to the Small Businesses Loans Act, perhaps he should give consideration to increasing the gross volume of business for firms qualifying under that act. I suggest that we look at something in the order of $1.5 million.

I understand that the loss on these government guaranteed loans has been very small, and I would like to commend the officials in the Department of Finance for the performance they have achieved under this act to date. However, steps should be taken to make possible the use of this lending resource for equity and for working capital purposes. I think this would have a greater effect on the small business community than limiting it only to expenditure for capital use.

The government would also be well advised to study tax credit incentives which should be applicable to small businesses, that would give them the incentive to hire people. So far we have talked only about incentives to provide capital for fixed plant. I would like to see the loans re-arranged to provide assistance with regard to working capital areas and leverage areas, but one of the problems we have is that the activities of many small businesses are of a marginal and seasonal nature.

In many cases employees are laid off because of seasonal or peak demands, and these employees have to go on the UIC rolls. Then along come unforeseen windfalls or orders, and these small businesses go back to hire, but they cannot assure a period of employment which is long enough to cause people to come off UIC rolls and go back to work. That is quite understandable, and it is one of the faults in the design of the Unemployment Insurance Act.

We need a special study of cases like these so that UIC benefits can be interrupted without loss of sustaining benefits due or without people having to go through the earning and waiting period again. I urge the Minister of State (Small Business) to consider this because it is one of the serious employment problems in the small business sector. The UIC system should be molded to adapt to this variable which is so common among small businesses.

The government perhaps should also look at a tax credit for Canada Pension Plan and UIC costs to the small business owner as an incentive toward meeting the payroll taxes involved for small business employers when we are dealing with work which can employ those at the marginal perimeters of the Canadian work force.

On the matter of equity needs of small business, and the inherent risks for minority shareholders in small businesses, the government might also look at tax deduction features as it has done in the cases of film production and oil exploration. Surely the goal today is to generate economic activity, and what element of our industrial organization serves the marginal work force more than the small business component of our country?

I would now like to move to item (b) of the motion which would provide assistance in the formation of small business export consortia. I know of a person who went to Nigeria to attempt to sell Canadian assembled or manufactured generators. This person noticed that the fishing industry over there was short of the equipment we on the west coast take for granted. He travelled around and tried to put together a group of orders for equipment manufactured on the west coast. The federal government paid for this person's trip to Nigeria. He spent a great deal of his own time exploring the area of additional business for secondary manufacturers in Canada. I am speaking of drum gear and hydraulic gear which is very common to us on the west coast. We manufacture it there. This person just did not have enough cash flow in his own company to follow this through. If there had been some kind of aid from the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, or if that department had provided assistance in the form of an officer to study whether that type of trade consortia could have been developed for the benefit of small business in that particular region in Canada, it would have been a good thing.

I think the government should have some seminars on developing trade consortia for small businesses. Small businesses do not have the muscle of large institutions to take care of this need. We have a need for more of the community oriented trading type of consortia than the proposed government corporation which will be an international trading company trying to emulate Mitsubishi and some other large Asian firms. It is rumoured that Mr. Jean-Luc Pepin will be head of that corporation when he steps down from the Anti-Inflation Board.

CIDA and EDC seem oriented to serve Canadian businesses which have heavy and well organized lobby interests. Their work, and the work they create in Canada, just do not seem to benefit the small business community. The hon. member for High Park-Humber Valley read into the record the small business act of April, 1970, of the United States Congress. Perhaps the Minister of State (Small Business) should study that because it shows that the United States is very concerned about the viability of this aspect of its community. As a matter of fact, the United States protects a percentage of national defence contract orders—as much as one third—for the benefit of the small business community there. If we are to have anything like a free enterprise economy, an initiative like that should be taken by the Minister of State (Small Business).

More and more the trend in the world today is toward international business between governments. Surely the Minister of State (Small Business) can lobby his cabinet colleagues for a small business component in dealings with CIDA, EDC and CCC.

I would now like to move to item C of the motion, which would change government tender practices so that small business suppliers would provide a portion of government goods and services. I have already mentioned how some United States legislation has benefited the small business community.

I am concerned about the lack of fairness which is developing in the various regions of Canada in the inter-communication or business intercourse which goes on across provincial boundaries. I am sad to have to draw to the attention of the House the fact that drivers of trucks moving from Ontario into Quebec are now being harassed. Even passenger cars are being stopped for full inspections, and tickets are given to drivers not wearing seat belts. I understand that contractors from other parts of Canada cannot now participate in contracts which are for work within the province of Quebec.

In many cases western industries can no longer compete with industries in Montreal. In one case a uniform manufacturing industry in Vancouver can no longer compete with the bids tendered by Montreal firms. If Montreal firms are going to compete right across Canada, that principle has to apply in Quebec as well. If we are going to have international boundaries, God help us. In the city of Calgary companies were bidding for a contract to supply firemen's uniforms. The contract was given to a Montreal firm for $243,000. The Calgary firm bid $257,000, the Vancouver firm bid $257,000, and the Toronto firm bid $300,000. The western Canadian industries involved can no longer compete and are facing bankruptcy as a result of this type of competition. I call for fairness across all provincial boundaries.

Another example which troubles me in this matter of the regionalism that is developing is that in British Columbia, with the aid of programs of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce and of the National Research Council, there was a major breakthrough in high-intensity lighting. When the federal government, through the Transport Development Agency, was giving a contract for expansion of the use of high-intensity lighting, however, it was given to a Montreal firm that is a spin-off of a United States firm whose technology is completely obsolete in light of the technology developed in Vancouver. I do not know why the Transport Development Agency would not give full and due consideration to research and expertise that exist in other parts of Canada. Why can the Vancouver firm not have the lighting contract and give the time tests needed on the Centennial Pier project or some other project? When the patents are owned by Canadian Patents and Development Limited why can the Vancouver firm not get the same consideration as eastern firms? There seems to be a stigma because it is located in Vancouver.

Another firm in Vancouver just lost a bid on hollow tubing for the extension of the penitentiary at Agassiz. That firm, a subcontractor, produced the lowest bid in Canada, yet the major contractor who won the bid refuses to use their product. This does not sit well with the Vancouver firm. The product that will be used will be made in Montreal, shipped across Canada, put into an institution being built at Agassiz, and the west coast producer of the same product can apparently go to hell.

Another contract was available for curtain track for a hospital. We have a Canadian product—100 per cent designed, 100 per cent owned, and 100 per cent produced in Canada. The tooling is done in Canada as well. But a west coast firm lost out to an eastern firm, which used an American design, and was a subsidiary of an American company.

The Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs is stirring up an extremely biased reaction amongst retailers in Vancouver. Retailers in the prairies and Ontario are not being subjected to the same type of examination and scrutiny. This regional interference is causing rising tempers in the west, and I plead with the government to change its attitude. The provinces of British Columbia and Alberta need their fair share, and the small business sector of those provinces needs its fair share of the federal government's expenditures.

If the Minister of State (Small Business) wants to help small business he could consider helping a chocolate factory in Vancouver that has the knowledge and the people to make a go of the business. If the finished product were imported from England it would be subject to a 10 per cent tax. There would be no other tax or expense except the distribution costs and freight, and there would be a refund of the liqueur tax to the manufacturer. In other words, the offshore manufacturer would get a refund of tax paid on the liqueur. The offshore manufacturer can buy the liqueur at low rates. There is a 15 per cent import duty on milk chocolate imported in bulk to Canada. This factory employs 18 people and prints all the boxes and packaging supplies in Canada. They buy all their packaging material and formula material from Canadian suppliers. They must buy the liqueurs in the liquor stores at retail prices, however, and they must also pay the 7 per cent provincial sales tax. This is ridiculous, Mr. Speaker. How can you build an industry with any hope of exporting, say, to the United States, when there are these crazy and obsolete customs and excise laws? It is time we all worked toward creating something worth while in the small business sector.

There is another industry that bothers me, Mr. Speaker. In the cement business if you are a small operator and you put cement sand and gravel in a bag and keep it dry, you have to charge 5 per cent federal tax on the product. But if you are a big company, buying your sand, cement with $2.20/ton tax, and gravel on a tax-exempt basis, and if you mix them with water and sell the resultant product as ready-mix concrete, then it is exempt from federal sales tax. What is important enough about adding water to dry ingredients that gives one company an advantage over the other? In a small company the auditors can go in and do an audit in three or four hours so they get a bill for the sales tax. But a big company is so cumbersome that it is too much trouble for the government auditors, so that large company can sell the same dry mix and not pay the sales tax. In British Columbia we have the example of a manufacturing company that has been in existence for about 15 years. Its very survival is threatened by this type of taxation law. I plead with the government to do something about this. There are all kinds of employment opportunities in this country, but our laws suppress incentive and make it almost impossible for small firms to stay solvent.

I do not have time to go into matters in the textile industry, Mr. Speaker, but if ever a group of small businessmen got a shafting it was this group when the guillotine was brought down. That has turned out to be a very sad state of affairs. Instead of maintaining the level of low-cost garment imports for low-income workers, the guillotine was brought down. It disrupted the whole market and the trading pattern. I agree that a quota was necessary, but I think we moved too fast on that one. The retailer and small importer bringing specialty material into the country fell under the guillotine. Their livelihoods are in danger.

Why can we not give consideration to the small business component of the Canadian community, Mr. Speaker? Why do we not use the research and development facilities that are available and share them between the large industrial component and the small industrial component? We also need to pay attention to regional balance when issuing invitations to tender for government supplies. I plead with the government to give consideration in this matter to the small business and industrial component on the west coast.

Mr. Norman A. Cafik (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, in his motion the hon. member for High Park-Humber Valley (Mr. Jelinek) indicated a number of steps that the government ought to take to assist small business. I suppose it is understandable that he would avoid mentioning some of the very positive things already being done. I think it is also understandable that in the motion he would imply that things are not being done that are in fact being done.

First of all he talks about tax credits for investment in small business. Technically I think he is right; there is no tax credit system for such purpose at present. I think hon. members should realize, however, that in terms of incentive to small business through the tax structure there is a special small business tax rate of 25 per cent, excluding the manufacturing sector, and 20 per cent for small manufacturing industries, as opposed to 40 per cent for large manufacturing industries. This in itself is a significant tax advantage to the small businessmen of this country, and it is inappropriate to leave the impression that those kinds of steps have not already been taken.

Second, he asks us to provide assistance in the formulation of small business export consortia. May I draw to his attention and to that of all members the fact that the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, under certain of its programs, supports trade missions all over the world? Through those programs the department helps small businessmen to make arrangements with other small businesses in other countries, so that they may mutually handle each other's products, to the advantage of businessmen in both countries. I think that is moving precisely in the direction the hon. member for High Park-Humber Valley has in mind. I would not want to leave the impression there is no room for improvement in this area. I think there is and the government is moving in that direction, to the considerable benefit of the business community of this country.

Third, he talked about changing the government's tendering practices for small business. I do not know the hon. member's experience with the Department of Supply and Services, but I can tell him that there is no question in my mind, from my dealings with the Department of Supply and Services, that the department already provides considerable assistance to small business people. True, no special segment or percentage of total government business is earmarked for small business, as implied in the motion. I think that the question must be examined. The simple fact is that the Department of Supply and Services is already moving in that direction. It is decentralizing its operations across Canada to make sure that local business, mostly small, has a better opportunity to do business with the Government of Canada.

Fourth, the hon. member suggests that we should reduce the amount of government paper work being imposed on small business. That is an important suggestion. I have been making it since 1968. I say that we should arrange for a federal-provincial conference, in order to rationalize the paper work which emanates from federal, provincial and municipal governments. In other words, we should rationalize this entire process so that the small businessman need not hire an accountant to do the paper work the government requires him to do. That point is important. I understand that the minister of state responsible for small business will address his attention to this question in a federal-provincial conference, in order to minimize the amount of paper work we require small businessmen to perform. I note that Statistics Canada has already moved in that direction by eliminating the requirement for small business people to submit statistical reports. The agency has removed one of the great irritants.

It is also necessary for those in the House who want to assist small business to do more than speak about assistance. We must do practical things in our areas and ridings to help small business. I, for one, have done a great deal, in my view. Back in 1968 I pioneered what became the first industry seminar in this country. Finally, after we had worked on this matter for one year, the government agreed to send officials to my riding and expose the business community to what I call the other side of the coin. Many people think that government plays a negative role in our lives, but big business realizes it also plays a positive role. Because the small businessman does not have the necessary expertise and staff, and does not know of federal and provincial government programs designed to help small business, he is often left holding the bag, as it were.

There are many programs available for helping the business community and it is our responsibility, as members of parliament, to make sure they are aware of these programs. For example, do small businessmen know of the existence of the Federal Business Development Bank, which can give much help? Not many small businessmen know about it, and it is our responsibility to see that they do. The list of programs we should draw to their attention is long. How many small businessmen know about the Small Businesses Loans Act, the alphabet soup programs of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce for providing assistance for research and development, programs for assisting with exports abroad and the financing of exports abroad, and other programs to do with research? The range of such programs is broad indeed. By this I do not mean to imply that all is well with the business community or with federal programs.

I, for one, take exception to a point raised by the hon. member for Capilano (Mr. Huntington). I enjoyed his remarks. He said that he would prefer it if the Small Businesses Loans Act would allow the banks to charge higher interest rates. That may make sense at first, but does not make sense when one examines the idea in depth. I think there is a better way to provide assistance than that suggested by the hon. member. The government assumes the risk of those loans; therefore I do not see why a bank should be entitled to as much interest as when it assumes the risk itself. It makes no sense. Perhaps we need an increase in the interest rate, but we need a hooker in the legislation—

Mr. Huntington: No.

Mr. Cafik: —which requires banks—

An hon. Member: We already have plenty of hookers.

Mr. Cafik: Just one moment. You be quiet. I am speaking at the moment and I did not interrupt you.

As I say, the law should require the banks to devote a minimum percentage of loans to the small business community. And these loans should not be charged at rip-off interest rates, either, as implied in my hon. friend's suggestion.

I think also that we want to reduce the size of many give-away programs. On the other hand, we want to provide working and equity capital to the business community, capital of which our business community is desperately short.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Does the hon. member not believe in free enterprise?

Mr. Cafik: That would help, as I think hon. members opposite agree. I know that much remains to be done, but am convinced that the government has a greater commitment toward the small business community than the party opposite, whose big concern has primarily been the big business community. May I call it six o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): We are trying to figure out which is the Tory party in this House.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hour appointed for the consideration of private members' business having expired, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock p.m.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

CONCURRENCE IN SECOND REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. McCleave that the Second Report of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments, presented to the House on Thursday, February 3, 1977, be concurred in.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, just before five o'clock I had responded very briefly to what I consider to be a very smug and fatuous statement by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford). He said that this system of governing by order in council regulation cannot be too bad because nobody is suing the government, because no one is taking the time and the trouble to bring the government to court. What a stupid and fatuous thing to say.

As I pointed out, it is a pretty big job to take City Hall to court. First, you need to know that you have a right. Second, you need to have the determination and the money to go to trial. Third, you have to know on what your rights are based.

For over a year the standing joint committee has been frustrated and inhibited by the refusal of a number of departments of government to tell us what rights they are operating on, the basis of their declaring that certain orders in council have been passed and showing us the orders in council. If the co-chairman of the committee, the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. McCleave), and the co-chairman from the other place, were unable to find out what kind of orders in council and what documents the government was basing its operations on, what chance has the ordinary person on the street?

This was a good committee. My friend was a very good co-chairman, as was the co-chairman from the other place. They worked together. It was a committee where politics was hardly present. Shortly after its organization we had a tremendous task to undertake on behalf of the people of Canada. The committee members worked together very well. It was not a case of being frustrated because of politics in committee.

The committee was united in its determination to get to the bottom of this problem. If we could not do it, what chance has the ordinary individual, the farmer from my country, the fisherman from Newfoundland, the storekeeper, or the person in the factory?

In a great many instances it is not a case of being able to sue the government. It is not a case of the government acting illegally or in a way which is ultra vires. It is a case of a government having the power like a gigantic monstrous operation and using that power unjustly and inequitably. That is the kind of thing that affects people.

The woods are full of situations and cases. For example, people are to be deprived of saccharin. We will not know until the facts are disclosed whether there is a good case for it or not. However, thousands of people have been placed out of court. They have no opportunity to challenge this because the government has acted under statutory instruments, legally passed, properly enacted, and under regulations which have been dealt with under the enabling powers.

As I said before five o'clock, we all know of thousands of cases. There is not a member of this House who cannot put a finger on a dozen cases which come to his attention every time he returns home. What about the Indian people in Yellowknife who have probably been slowly poisoned by taking arsenic waters from the lake there? All this is controlled by regulations and statutory instruments. What of the AIB regulations? How we are controlled, as far as wages and prices are concerned, is all done under statutory regulation.

For the minister to make the absolutely stupid remark that what the government is doing must be all right because no one is suing the government, is not a defence that will not stand up for consideration.

The minister also said that this is a comparatively new problem. He said they are facing up to it, and doing what they can. I gave the minister credit, and I repeat it now. In his appearance before the committee the minister at least discussed with us some of the more minor problems that we have been having. But I put it to you, Mr. Speaker, that it was not until the committee got to the stage at which it was going to make its report and indicated that it would be debated in the House that we had a chance to get the minister before us. For far too many months we had been completely frustrated by our incapacity to get to grips with many of the issues to which reference is made in the report.

I said earlier that we had waited 12 years before reaching our present position. Are we to wait another 12 years before the government moves to deal with the difficulties which the committee has now outlined?

● (2010)

As my hon. friend mentioned, 40 years ago there was a committee set up in the United Kingdom, the Donoughmore Committee on Ministers Powers. On page five of that committee's report there is a reference to a report of another committee set up in 1931 and I will read this interesting statement into the record because it demonstrates the whole problem:

> The most distinctive indication of the change of outlook of the government of this country in recent years has been its growing preoccupation, irrespective of party, with the management of the life of the people. A study of the Statute Book will show how profoundly the conception of the function of government has altered. Parliament finds itself increasingly engaged in legislation which has for its conscious aim the regulation of the day-to-day affairs of the community, and now intervenes in matters formerly thought to be entirely outside its scope. This new orientation has its dangers as well as its merits. Between liberty and government there is an age-long conflict. It is of vital importance that the new policy while truly promoting liberty by securing better conditions of life for the people of this country, should not, in its zeal for interference, deprive them of their initiative and independence which are the nation's most valuable assets.

That was in the United Kingdom 40 years ago. In a short time I shall ask the House to consider some of the bills which the government has asked parliament to deal with in the present session to show to what extent it now proposes to intervene even more massively into the everyday affairs of the people. Consider the enormous growth and power of the civil service between 1931 and 1977. At the snap of his fingers, upon a mere whim, a civil servant can make decisions which affect the lives of thousands of people. This has become a disease, a disease which, in my opinion, is malignant, and I do not think parliament will survive much more of it.

Some of my hon. friends opposite were at a meeting in Toronto over the week end. I can understand that. I am not going to disparage it in any way. It was a thinkers' meeting. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) made one or two of his philosophical statements. It was not a successful meeting. Supporters of the government met people, thinkers, from all over Canada who came fresh to that meeting from contact with their fellow citizens, and I am sure they told the Prime Minister and the others they met that the mood of the country is not good. I suggest that members opposite should not take the Gallup Poll too seriously because it does not take that mood into question.

People are sick to death of being pushed around by bureaucrats on a day to day basis by means of regulations which they feel powerless to alter. It amounts to government, not by statute, but by order in council and by regulations about which even many of us in this Chamber know nothing. I believe that what happened in Quebec was this: the people took a look at a government which was behaving precisely in that way; they looked over the litany of scandal, secrecy and autocracy which characterized their government, and decided to throw it out. I believe the electorate will do the same to the Government of Canada, and for the same reason.

There is no doubt about it; unless the government straightens up and cleans up the mess it has created and which lies, now, at its own doorstep, the people will get rid of it. They are fed up with things being done in the name of democracy which constitute something entirely different. Parliamentary democracy has yielded to prime-ministerial dictatorship made possible because of the ability to govern through orders in council and regulations of the kind we are considering.

I told the House earlier I would refer to instances where this is happening during the present session. At the end of last week there was a debate on $1 items. A supply bill contained 52 $1 items which, in many instances, would permit government officials to state the terms under which uncounted millions of dollars are to be spent. By a very wise decision, Mr. Speaker reserved the right of the House to challenge these provisions from time to time. This was not the first time such a thing had happened. Our committee has demonstrated that between 1971 and 1976 104 similar items appeared of a similar nature. I do not believe the government has altered its ways. I think it will continue doing this kind of thing.

Then there was the telecommunications bill, Bill C-43. I do not intend to outline the enabling and regulation-granting clauses of that bill, but it is a measure which removes virtually all controlling power from the CRTC and places it in the hands of the minister and the government. This is a dangerous prospect, and I do not believe the people of Canada should look lightly on a bill which gives power of that kind to a political party forming the government.

Then there is Bill C-27, the bill dealing with unemployment insurance and the changes in the department. Again more power has been taken by the minister. Some illustrations have been given already. The co-chairman of the committee has given an indication of what the Unemployment Insurance Commission was doing. It was established to our satisfaction that applicants for benefits under the act were required to show, to the satisfaction of the officials, that they had made reasonable efforts to find "comparable employment". And we were told that there were in existence secret guidelines, in the hands of officials of the Commission, by which judgment was made as to whether or not an individual had indeed made the necessary effort to secure other employment. We ourselves were not able to see those guidelines. We know they exist, though, and I think it is a disgrace that people who may well be entitled to certain benefits should be deprived of the opportunity to find out precisely what criteria they have to meet in order to become qualified.

Not long ago the amendments to the Immigration Act were dealt with. There is no question that under the Immigration Act the minister can issue directives which do not need to be called regulations, and by virtue of which officials at the border have complete discretion as to methods of controlling the flow of immigrants to this country. The new act which is before us will go even further. It will place almost dictatorial power in the hands of the minister which, in practice, means in the hands of his senior officials, to direct the flow of immigrants to any part of the country without their decisions being in any way liable to challenge in the House.

Then there is the combines legislation which is going to committee shortly. Power is being taken away, in this case from the courts, and placed in the hands of a commission which will have tremendous authority to deal with the everyday economic affairs of a great many corporations and individuals.

Finally, there is the Transportation Act. I have left this until last for a definite reason. There is no question that the Transport Commission is to be divested of most of its authority and that this authority is to be placed in the hands of bureaucrats at the higher level in the department. I just so happens that there are comments on this by a man who is very well versed on questions of transportation and who also knows something about the bureaucracy. John R. Baldwin, under date of January, 1977, presented a seminar paper to the Canadian Transport Commission. Mr. Baldwin was for many years a very valued and respected civil servant. He was deputy minister of the Department of Transport and he ended his career in the public service as president of Air Canada. He has been a mandarin, but he has also been a working civil servant. He has been out of the political sphere for some time.

● (2020)

What does Mr. Baldwin say about the proposals contained in the new transport bill? On page 4 I read this:

> In spite of the long slow move to greater recognition of the importance of normal economic processes, recent trends to strengthen the role of the bureaucracy at the expense of the operator, of Parliament, of the regulatory agency and even of the cabinet cause concern.

That is the statement of a man who, as I say, has been a deputy minister and president of one of the great air carriers of Canada. He continues:

> The trend is typified by the increasing concentration of power, as defined by statute or regulation, in the hands of Governor in Council or the Minister. This means, more often than not, the advice of the bureaucracy and is leading to a bureaucratic discretionary authority that is some cases should belong to the legislator or, in other cases, to the regulatory agency rather than departmental officialdom. This, if unchecked, could lead to a greater interference with normal processes in transportation;

We then have the human rights bill. With all the exceptions and the rather vague definitions contained therein, human rights will, in effect, be what the minister declares them to be from time to time, almost on a day to day basis. By "the minister" we mean, of course, the officials who advise him.

I have given the House five items—the $1 items, the Immigration Act, the unemployment insurance changes, the National Transportation Act, and the human rights bill—which this year the government is demanding parliament pass and which will divest us of the opportunity to do the job we were sent here to do on behalf of the Canadian people. These items will pass unless some of my hon. friends opposite become alarmed at the kind of authority they are prepared to give to the government. I do not care whether the government be Liberal or Conservative; I would not give those powers to any government, though certainly not to a Liberal government which has had some 45 years' experience of misusing power. Unless my hon. friends opposite are prepared to challenge the government on those items, by the time this session passes into history the government will become one of the most powerful governments in terms of the bureaucracy and its capacity to intervene, without challenge by the House, in the affairs of the people of Canada.

It is this kind of thing which leads to the deterioration of the democratic process. People become cynical. They are cynical because of this kind of situation. They mistrust the government. Any one of us who goes home on a weekly basis and talks to his constituents hears about this sort of thing. Gallup polls show it. I suggest that the time has come for us to face this challenge and to do something about it.

I agree with what has been said by speakers heretofore. You cannot turn the clock back. For one reason or another, be it good or bad, we have permitted or encouraged government to engage in this sort of interference in our lives. What we have to do is to set up a means of making the government accountable. The government must be prepared, as one of my hon. friends has suggested, to set up a statutory committee, so that when we pass a bill giving these kinds of powers to the government that statutory committee will have authority to examine the basis upon which those powers are given, how they are exercised, and what effect they are having. We simply cannot afford to sit back idly any longer and allow the government to have this authority without compelling the government to come to a committee of the House, or to the House itself, and to answer for what it has done by producing an accounting of its stewardship and how the government has acted and conducted itself in connection with such powers.

I am going to conclude, Mr. Speaker, by making some suggestions. I think that in an issue of this kind it is not enough to scold the government. It does not take any great orator to show how many mistakes the government has made in this regard. I say to hon. members opposite that this is their parliament. This is their country. The people are theirs just as much as ours. Legislation should not be passed simply at the whim of senior bureaucrats, admirable people thought they may be. We have heard from one of the most senior bureaucrats of all in the person of Mr. John Baldwin about how he saw the dangers which are present in this situation. Therefore I would urge my hon. friends opposite to give serious thought to this question and to tell the government, either in caucus or in the House, that it cannot go this far; or that if the government does go this far, that it must somehow give to committees of the House, or to the House itself, the opportunity to challenge people who pass regulations. Then those people will know when they pass an order in council or a regulation that they have to account for the exercise of the power they have given themselves under regulation.

I do not think there is any magical cure for this. Government being what it is there will always be misuse of power. But as I said earlier, Mr. Speaker, there should be statutory committees. For example, I do not think we should pass the bill amending the Transportation Act without including a provision for the establishment of a committee which would ride herd on the extent to which the government makes use of the power to use the order in council procedure, what authority it gives, and how it has conducted itself in implementing the regulations.

The scrutiny committee—that is, the joint standing committee—must be strengthened. It is not for us just to bring in reports. I would go further than my hon. friend from Halifax-East Hants and say that it is not enough to bring in a report perhaps once a session. The authority should be granted, either by statute or amendment of Standing Orders, so that when our committee comes to a decision that the government has acted inequitably, that it has breached the rules of natural justice, that it has made unusual and unexpected use of some power, or whatever may be the case, that we should be entitled to bring into the House a petition seeking to have that order in council amended or set aside. I do not think there need be too many.

Some of my hon. friends in the government may say that this will take too long. It is my experience as a member of this House, having observed the machinery of government, that if the civil servants who draft these regulations and enforce them knew that the orders in council that they produced to their minister for signature by the governor in council could, in due course, be brought into the House after committee examination, and a thorough and detailed study made of the extent to which they had been used, this would be a very salutary brake. It would be a silent policeman on the inequitable abuses of the capacity of government to govern by order in council.

Committees should have the power to call witnesses, but under what is known as Crown privilege any minister can say that he will not allow a civil servant to be called. This is a power which has been exercised. He can say that he will not allow civil servants to produce documents if he does not want them to do so.

We had a situation a week ago when an agent of the Department of Justice appeared before a provincial tribunal and said "I want a blanket exemption and blanket immunity for every civil servant whom you have called as a witness before you." What gall, what a travesty of justice! The Department of Justice headed by a member of this House, a constitutional adviser to the government, says "I won't allow civil servants to be called to give evidence." What right have they to have immunity different than that open to the rest of us? That is the sort of thing governments claim as a right and that has to be taken away.

There must be much more care taken in the drafting of orders in council. They should be drafted by people who have a common experience. One only needs to look at the thousands of orders in council. My friend from Halifax-East Hants said that our committee had looked at a little over 1,000 of them. My understanding is that during the course of one year there are between 3,000 and 4,000 orders in council regulations passed, aside from countless directives which do not qualify under that title. I think there should be some common approach in the drafting of these so that people will know what they are up against. There should be notice published, not only in the Canada Gazette, but in newspapers in areas where people will be affected.

We all remember the story of the Roman emperor who was called upon by law to have his laws engraved on tablets of stone. He did so, but had them hung up so high that people could not see what was on them. This is the trouble today. There are very few people, even in government, who know how many order in council regulations are passed, where they are hidden away, and what effect they have. There must be publicity. There must be some changes on the question of judicial review. At the moment we can only have judicial review if there is a question of something being ultra vires. People will have more confidence if there is a simple, inexpensive method of challenging some of the regulations. People have more confidence in the courts than they do in some of the tribunals.

I have tried to keep this debate on a non-partisan level, just as it has been in the committee. I suggest to my hon. friends opposite that if they believe a parliamentary democracy is the least dangerous of all the systems of government which man has invented, then they have got to do something about it. We on this side have been doing the best we can. I am convinced that dozens of laws are passed every session which do not have the approval of the majority of the members of the House, but because the government side feels compelled to go along, they do so. Then we have a situation where provisions for orders in council are included in the enabling powers in those bills, and are entrusted to our public servants.

Public servants are not bad people. They are not dishonest people. But sometimes when they get into the highrise towers of power and get their hands on the levers of power, they run wild. If our system is to survive, is to flourish and is to have that capacity for creativity to make this House of Commons a place of light and learning, rather than what it is today, then a lot of the responsibility lies on the shoulders of hon. members opposite. They have a very considerable responsibility. If they fail in that responsibility, then the people of Canada will well and long remember it.

Mr. Goodale: Mr. Speaker, I consider it an honour to be able to participate this evening in a debate on this important subject, and particularly to have the opportunity to follow my learned friend from Peace River who has, in the course of the last few minutes, made a valuable contribution to this debate. I do not intend to take a long time this evening because I think there are other members of the House, particularly those who have participated in the work of the committee, who want to address a few remarks to Your Honour. However, there are just a few comments with respect to the work of the Standing Joint Committee of the House of Commons and the Senate on Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments which I would like to make.

My first words have to be ones of commendation for the work of the two co-chairmen of our committee, the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. McCleave) and the Honourable Senator Forsey. Indeed I would like to commend all the members of the committee who have worked so hard in the preparation of this report we are discussing today, and who have established a solid tradition of conscientious scrutiny of the subordinate legislation which emanates from the various departments and agencies of government.

The report is a major work. It represents months of detailed effort. It is breaking new ground in many respects. In regard to some of the criticisms which have been offered, and no doubt will be offered about the report, it is important to bear in mind that in many cases the report, in Canadian experience is plowing new ground. It covers an enormous amount of ground. It is difficult to deal with all of its aspects in one comprehensive debate, or perhaps in one all-encompassing vote on concurrence. There is just so much included here that it is impossible, really, to come down to a bottom-line single word yea or nay judgment call with respect to all of it.

In fact the voluminous nature of the report has been outlined by the co-chairman this afternoon. All of the work, the consideration and compromise of members and Senators, which went into its drafting reminds one of that old tongue in cheek definition of a camel, which is described as a horse but one designed by a committee. Perhaps that is a little bit of what we are dealing with this evening.

Mr. Baldwin: I would have thought designed by bureaucrats.

Mr. Goodale: I do not mean to be unkind in using that definition. That is part of our problem that we are dealing with in this report. Perhaps we are dealing with one of those proverbial Committee camels. This is an essential problem in trying to come down to a single conclusion about it.

As I mentioned repeatedly during the deliberations of the committee—and this is clearly included in the minutes of the committee—I for one do not agree entirely with some of the analysis, methodology, and conclusions of the committee as expressed in this report. I would like to take a few moments this evening to express a few of my reservations. In doing so I do not mean to deprecate the sincerity or the considerable good work of committee members. However, I believe the House should be aware of the defects which some of us believe exist in the criticisms in this report.

First of all, I would like to comment upon the over-all tenor and tone of the report, the general impression which is conveyed by some of the language which is used, and the peculiar emphasis it gives to the instances where the committee claims the regulatory system has broken down. In some serious respects the report is prone to overstatement. The language used, in some cases, is pretentious to the point of being incomprehensible in some sections. It almost borders upon the sarcastic. I want to emphasize that I am not making that as a blanket condemnation of all aspects of this report, but there are some sections which are impaired by that kind of language usage. It demonstrates a flair for a colourful or super emphatic turn of phrase, and that does not do anything particularly to enhance the credibility of the report. To support that contention I would make only one rather homely reference to statistical facts which are set out in the report itself. I would draw the attention of members to paragraph 6 which appears on page 2. It points out, at that point, that 1,348 cases have been reviewed in the committee's work since July 15, 1976. Of those cases, 689 have been objected to, queried, or found to be in need of further explanation. Of these, 487 have been answered by the government, and 202 were awaiting reply at the date of the reports. Of the responses which have been given, only 24 have finally been considered by the committee as defective.

Even if the committee's view is 100 per cent correct with respect to each of the perceived defects in those cases, even if the committee is absolutely infallible in its approach to the problems which it sees, that represents a failure rate of only 5 per cent of the instruments objected to and for which replies had been received. To look at it in another way, it amounts to a failure rate of less than 2 per cent of all the instruments that have been reviewed. Yet, despite that rather slim numerical basis, the report of the committee seems to me to be unfortunately couched in rather pompous language, as I have mentioned, which seeks to condemn government action in broad and sweeping terms. In places the language used would appear to seek to convey pretended importance far beyond any basis in fact. I admit that some of this may simply be explained away as a matter of style or writing. But to my mind it renders the report less readable and less comprehensible, and seriously detracts from the credibility that a work of this kind should certainly have.

Secondly, on a more important matter, I should like to mention a problem to which I referred during the course of the committee's deliberations, and this has to do with the preoccupation which the committee seems to have had with legalistic debates between the committee's counsel and rather junior legal or instruments officers in various departments of government. What we have seen in some of these cases is a failure or refusal of the committee to "go to the top", so to speak, to a senior departmental official or to the minister himself to pursue an objection and seek satisfaction.

If this matter, which we are discussing this evening and which the committee has discussed for so many months, is as important to parliament and to good government in Canada as we say it is, then we as a committee should be more diligent in prosecuting our various cases with senior people in responsible positions in the departments which concern us. If we are going to make sweeping denunciations of ministers, departments, and government practices generally, and that seems to be the tenor of much of the report, then before we make those denunciations we had better make sure that we as a committee have taken our complaints to the minister or his senior departmental people for redress and found them lacking. If that had happened in all the cases about which we have complained, I think the authority of the report would have been greatly enhanced. Instead, in many instances we seem to content ourselves with dealing at a rather junior level and getting involved in some legalistic debate between instruments officers. This may be explained by the fact that the approach of this committee is a new approach, that we are plowing new ground. But certainly that is a recommendation for the future which we should bear closely in mind.

It may well be that ministers in some of the departments which have been particularly criticized, or at least criticized by implication, are not at all aware of the legal battles going on at some lower level in their departments. Yet in this report, even though they may be unaware of what has transpired, we make them at a senior level "carry the can", so to speak. This is a serious flaw and it undermines the strength of the committee's complaints.

I have noticed, in reviewing some of the work of the committee, that this point was drawn to the attention of members on many occasions in the past. In fact my predecessor as parliamentary secretary to the president of the privy council, who has now joined the government in the capacity of Postmaster General (Mr. Blais), suggested a very useful procedure to committee members more than a year ago to avoid the criticism of our dealing at a lower level of authority, and refusing, or failing to go to senior officers in departments or to ministers to seek redress. Unfortunately his suggestion was not acted upon. I hope, as a result of the further work of the committee, and perhaps of some comments this evening, that in future that kind of recommendation will receive more attention, and that if we do have a serious complaint that is as important as we say it is in this report, then we should certainly pursue it with senior people.

Thirdly, as a point of concern about this report, for me at least, I regret the rather short shrift given in the report to the appearances before us during our committee proceedings of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) and to his recent letter to the committee, portions of which are quoted in the report. They are found in paragraph 80 on page 26. The minister spoke earlier today in this debate and gave an excellent and learned defence of his position. I do not intend to review all the ground that he covered in his speech. I think his letter and his evidence to the committee, as well as his speech today, deserve close attention by members of the committee. They hold out considerable hope that in future some of the problems which we have felt in the past will be alleviated.

In his letter, and again today, the minister outlined a new system for dealing with committee inquiries. He suggests that we deal at a more senior level than we have in the past, and proposes a procedure to be followed. He indicated that he has the approval of his colleagues in cabinet and their support for the position which he has taken, which is certainly one of co-operation and indeed, I suggest, supports the work of the committee. The impasse that we have complained about in the report appears to have been broken by what the Minister of Justice has said. But at the very least, I think, the positive, constructive and practical response we have had from the minister should offer the committee some hope and some reason for optimism. But again, despite the fact that the minister's letter was before us during our deliberations on the drafting of this report, as evidenced in some of the terminology used, there has been a tendency to "slough off" or at least to "downplay" what the minister has had to say. Again I would suggest that this tends to sap the committee's credibility and it impairs the impact of our work.

Mr. Ellis: You have said it three times already.

Mr. Goodale: I regret the sweeping cynicism that may have been evidenced in that last interjection, and which certainly seems to be apparent in some of the statements in the report which have been largely based on old business conducted at a junior level in the bureaucracy, and based upon experience which predated the minister's proposals for improved procedures.

I would also like to mention—I do not do so to raise a procedural problem and I do not propose to make a formal motion or take formal action as a result of mentioning these items—some procedural flaws of a technical, but important nature which may defeat some of the impact of our report. They may indicate that some of the things upon which we have pronounced ourselves were indeed not within our terms of reference.

We have a full mandate to peruse and criticize subordinate legislation, but I am not convinced that we have a mandate or jurisdiction to comment on the very method which parliament has chosen of delegating responsibility, nor do I believe we have been charged by parliament with the responsibility to challenge the Statutory Instruments Act itself. Our views may well be very helpful in future to the minister or to the government with respect to these items. Indeed, in a letter to the committee the Minister of Justice invited us to pass along any views we might have. But I do not think those views, and these opinions on matters upon which there is perhaps some doubt, would fall within our terms of reference. If we had advice and opinions to make known about those items, perhaps we should have chosen a different route in order to make them known to the government, to the responsible ministers, and indeed to the bureaucracy. By including them in our report, from a technical point of view perhaps we exceeded our jurisdiction and our mandate as given to us by parliament.

I would like to make one final point in closing, and that is a plea that in this debate tonight and, more important, in the future deliberations and work of the committee, we stress a practical and realistic approach to our problems and perhaps avoid some of the academic or theoretical debates which perhaps in the past have hung us up to a certain extent.

I think the committee has done good and valuable work, and what it has to say will no doubt lay a solid foundation for future contributions to our system of parliamentary democracy. As I have indicated, the beginning has not been perfect. I think I demonstrated that in my few comments this evening. As I said, my comments are offered as constructive criticism and advice. I hope they will help because this committee, in which I have enjoyed participating, has important work yet to do, and in order to do that work in the best way, and in order to discharge our mandate to parliament, and through parliament to the country, I think we should bear in mind the need to approach our task in a conscientious way and also in a practical way to ensure that in real terms we are discharging the mandate which has been given to us by the House of Commons and by the Senate.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I have listened to the debate today as a layman wondering what this committee has been doing for the last while. I listened to the legal, dry-as-dust presentations on this great study, and every moment I listened I became angrier and angrier because here we are witnessing an effort by a very sincere group of people from all parties to find out about the injustice in our system, and there is injustice. They presented, in what I thought to be a very moderate way, some proposals which I did not hear discussed on the government side. I heard some statements today which shocked me, in view of this study about how these instruments or regulations—or whatever we want to call them—are being used as a method of injustice in a so-called democratic society. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) stood up today and said he was here representing his clients, the people in his department. Why is he not here as an elected representative representing the people of Canada?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): The parliamentary secretary who just sat down sympathized with the ministers because officials at lower levels do things about which ministers do not know, and for which ministers are blamed. Why should they not be blamed? Ministers have the power to punish, dismiss, move sideways, upwards or downwards people who do harmful things, but the fact is that ministers, with the support of some spokesmen in the House today, are not doing anything to check and control the servants of the people. That is the essence of why it is important to look at these regulations to see if there is something we can do to take away the sting of their injustice and, when they are brought to light, to take countervailing action.

As this House knows, I have been in this fight for many years. I have fought as a minister and I have fought as a member of the opposition. In Canada in the last 40 years we have moved to the point where our so-called democratic institutions have turned over all effective power to civil servants who are not responsible to the people directly. If the Canadian people had been here last Friday when we were debating metric conversion, they would have realized that we were debating an issue which should not even be a matter of controversial debate. We were debating whether we should put the system in arbitrarily, knowing the opposition of the people, or put it in slowly. One would think that would be a matter of judgment, but it is an article of faith to hon. members opposite that because the Metric Commission has said that in Australia it was adopted rapidly, we have to do it rapidly here. It is this attitude on the part of hon. members opposite that is getting to us, and I hope getting to the people of Canada.

I am going to give just two illustrations of what has been happening in recent years. I have gone to ministers privately, I have gone to senior civil servants privately, I have asked questions on the order paper and questions in the House orally, and these two cases are not the dry-as-dust type of cases a legal man faces when he appears before a supreme court justice. These are cases that hit your very guts.

Some years ago this parliament passed legislation, which was supported by all parties, providing that children up to age 16 should have the right to family allowances. Parliament said that whether a child's father is a millionaire or his mother is a millionaire, or whether they are paupers, that child should receive $20 a month in family allowance, to ensure there was no injustice. Granted, in the case of those with wealthy fathers some of it would come back in taxes. As I say, this parliament, with all its majesty and power, passed a law providing that every child, regardless of the wealth of his parents, would get $20 a month in family allowance.

What did the civil servants in the Department of National Health and Welfare do without telling parliament? What did they do without even telling the minister? They quietly slipped through regulations which said that every child up to the age of 16 shall have family allowances except one class of children, and that one class of children is made up of orphans. If any child, or group of children, loses both parents, under the regulations as they exist, and as drafted by civil servants in a room by themselves, and promulgated by order in council, that child or group of children loses the right which parliament gave of having family allowances. That exists today in Canada. When I raised this matter with the minister, he was shocked, as he should have been shocked. He said he would take it up with his civil servants, but the answer came back that that could not be changed because it is a regulation. The minister took the matter up with his civil servants, but they said it was a rational regulation, that every day people are dying, that when they die they leave estates, that whether a child is three, two, five or eight he gets the estate of his parents and that he is then an adult.

The regulation says that if a parent has an estate of $1,600 or more, a child is no longer a child in this country; he is an adult as far as family allowances are concerned. That was not done by parliament; it was done by civil servants with a parliamentary secretary saying, "Yes, Sir; no, Sir; when shall I sit down, Sir; and how high shall I jump, Sir?" When I raised this matter with the minister and asked what the reward of the deputy minister involved would be, I learned that he was promoted. There is a place for the recommendations of a committee like this. These things could be put before this committee. It is a prestigious committee, and it should be given publicity. Have parents who have children who are alive and well ever been told that those children would lose the family allowance if both the father and mother die? No, no one tells them that. Grandparents do not want to die with the knowledge that if their grandchildren should be left without parents they would grow up with fewer advantages than other children. This is an example of the gut-wringing type of thing we hear about.

● (2100)

The hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) and the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. McCleave) speak in the dry terms of the legal profession; I speak in terms of the human suffering, misery, and injustice that this type of regulation causes.

As the hon. member for Peace River pointed out, every member of parliament knows of such cases. I for one cannot do as the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Goodale) suggested and just go to the minister and get the problems resolved. I have to deal with the civil servants who maintain that there is no way around the regulations.

Let me give another example that effects every member of this House and his family. There is a regulation in the Department of Transport to the effect that any company carrying passengers by air in Canada—whether it is Pacific Western, Air Canada, Canadian Pacific Airlines or any other—must carry passenger insurance. That is the will of the Canadian government, and it is a good regulation. If my memory is correct, the amount of insurance is $45,000. It is not really necessary to take extra insurance for air travel as it is already provided by this parliament. But what happens if there is a crash, such as there was on the Canary Islands yesterday, and parents are killed? This regulation is not enforced because the insurance companies will only pay when liability is established.

How many dependants of the more than 100 Canadians who died in a Toronto crash four years ago have been paid? Every member of parliament gets an airline pass to his constituency every week and is automatically insured for $45,000, but if he is killed the insurance is not automatically paid to his dependants unless the liability of the airline is established. In the case of Air Canada and the Department of Transport it would be necessary to bring suit in two courts because one of them is an agency of the Crown. It costs about $50,000 or $100,000 to bring a suit, so the ordinary person—or even the wealthy person—has no chance of claiming the insurance. The only thing they can do is combine to bring suit.

Even though the suggestions made by the hon. member for Peace River are not perfect, they are moderate, positive, and constructive, and this House should listen to them. I do not think his could be called a political speech.

On the basis of the two types of regulations that I have brought to light this evening I should like to see parliament do what other legislatures have done, and set up a statutory committee. That just means that the government cannot stop the committee from meeting; that the committee is set up by statute and not by the will of the government. The committee would have the power to look at all the regulations and, where there was injustice, make it known and let the pressure of public opinion have its effect.

To the layman listening to this debate today I think the matter of a committee looking into statutory instruments would be regarded not as a legal procedure but as something responding to deep human feelings. These deep human feelings come to the fore when particular cases are under scrutiny. I have given examples of two cases and I am certain that almost every member and every party could give others.

I think the government could accept this report without harm to its prestige. It could accept this report and not just say, "everything is going well." It could let us have a statutory committee. Australia has one—not on this subject but on another. The province of Saskatchewan has the device, along with a statutory committee, of saying the House cannot adjourn as long as there are any matters before the statutory committee, and that forces the civil servants to divulge information in order to get rid of the legislators. It takes someone with the technical mind of the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas) to think of an amendment like that. With the combination of the statutory committee and the practical idea of the New Democratic Party in Saskatchewan that the legislature cannot adjourn until the answers are forthcoming, members are able to get hold of the short hair of some of the civil servants and so get their answers.

This is not just a debate on a dry academic subject; it is the meat, and flesh, and blood, and guts of the human being. All we are asking is that we be given a chance to deal with these injustices in our regulations and other statutory instruments.

[Translation]

Mr. Albert Béchard (Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine): Mr. Speaker, in the last twenty-five years and particularly the last fifteen years, our society has developed as a result of technology which has tremendously progressed during the last World War. Since then it has made giant progress. I just have to mention, for instance, the advent of television and its introduction in almost every Canadian household, the development of communication satellites which allow Canadian people, and particularly those interested, to follow a surgical operation made in Newfoundland from Montreal, Quebec City, Sept-Îles, Gaspé or even Magdalen Islands. It is even possible to communicate with the surgeon and give him some advice. In Canada, development makes also possible a quasi-universal access to post-graduate studies and travelling abroad for more and more Canadians.

Students exchange travels are also encouraged not only between provinces but at the international level. Mr. Speaker, all this contributed to increase the demand for information among people. The Canadian citizen wants to know what happens and how and why his government, paid with his taxes, takes such and such action or how its public administration makes it act in such and such a way. The Canadian citizen wants to know, for instance, if the increase in postal rates proclaimed by order in council last year was made pursuant to legislation.

The fisherman from Gaspésie, Magdalen Islands, Mingan Island or Sable Island, from Burin-Burgeo, Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe, Lunenberg, wants to know what kind of boat, of which length, what kind of net he will use this year. He wants to know that before, not after the season starts. He also wants to know what quantity of fish, what quantity of cod, of seabast he will be allowed to land and what size lobsters he will take during the next season.

The fishermen who take part in the seal hunt, for example, are subject to a heated controversy. My colleagues will permit this digression because I cannot help talking about this seal hunt which gave rise to shattering and shocking lucubrations which compromise the reputation of Canada and which are made by people who do not even know what they are talking about. They, and incidentally she, had better keep their mouths shut instead of coming to Canada to publicize not only a man but also a European business.

Mr. Speaker, I see you are impatient and I come back to the subject of the debate. The seal hunters need to know beforehand, and not in January or February, what will be their quotas. Costal fishermen have a right to know how many seals they will be entitled to kill during the next season.

He is entitled to know what type of boat of what length he may use to go seal hunting. And as I said he is entitled to know not long before the beginning of the season, perhaps during the fall.

And in the midst of such an abundance of modern media, governments alone remain frozen in their self-centered and jealous tendency to hang on to their prerogatives. There is not one member here who is not aware of such government attitude, whether it be the present administration, the one before or any other administration we had in Canada. When we ask that some correspondence, some document, some report be published, the response is: "Sorry, the document requested by the hon. member is confidential because it is an interdepartemental, intergovernmental or interministry document, or because it involves national security or national defence. We ask the hon. member please to withdraw his motion."

In the face of such secretiveness, however, commendable in purpose although in many cases antiquated and anachronic beyond words, the 28th Parliament, inspired by a legislation or declaration by the late former Prime Minister the right hon. Lester B. Pearson, under the sponsorship of the then minister of justice the Hon. John Turner, decided to put forward a piece of legislation providing a large degree of openness to allow for better public information.

It was not the end of the world. However, with the establishment of the joint committee to study regulations, we can at least rely on an institution which, in spite of the deluge of new regulations enacted each year it has to scrutinize, is acting as a watchdog or some type of ombudsman with rather limited powers. In the scrutiny of these documents care must taken not to frighten the civil servants that are charged with the preparation of these regulations, or have them follow the legal process up to and including passing or proclamation of such documents, but rather to call their attention to certain unwanted anomalies that may creep in. They do creep in our debates, so therefore they can creep in the preparation of regulations, despite the best of intents. Let us keep in mind also that the purpose of this exercise is to protect the taxpayer whose freedom and rights are more often than not encroached upon and trampled on because of his more or less adequate knowledge or rather his outright ignorance of the legislation and the related regulations which are enforced generally without any consultation with the people involved.

The duties we have been carrying out since the committee was established have given us the opportunity to note a great many faults and discrepancies in the legislation, faults and discrepancies which prevent us from studying more effectively the documents which are put before us. As a matter of fact, other hon. members have already examined a number of them during this debate. But on many occcasions, the committee had to cope with the stubbornness of civil servants within the legal branches of other departments which refer their files to the Department of Justice.

Contrary to what the Minister of Justice tried to infer this afternoon, our aim is not to criticize to the point of destroying these officials whose competence and dedication I do appreciate, but neither is it to let ourselves and the people we represent be destroyed. Public servants are moving forward, following a policy established by the Department of Justice. I suggest that the only way to promote more liberalism in the disclosure of legal opinions would be for the Department of Justice to develop new and less obsolete guidelines, more in keeping with a 1977 style public information system. I am probably being credulous to expect such an extraordinary thriftlessness. It is a fact however that without more co-operation from all those who have at a given time something to do with drafting legislation or attendant regulations, the committee is seriously hampered in its work, I would even say it is threatened with being choked.

The lack of specific definitions in statutory instruments has also been emphasized. Mr. Speaker, the committee has been functioning for almost three years, maybe more. And as yet it has been impossible, unbelievable as it may seem, to get a clear definition of statutory instrument. I believe, Mr. Speaker, that with all the legal experts who are working within the Canadian public service, some of them holding PhD's, it must be possible to enlighten us—unless of course such information is classified.

Mr. Speaker, concurrence by the government and later by Parliament in the recommendations of the second report now under discussion is essential to the intelligent and effective carrying on of the committee's work. As we are very understanding and familiar with the delays of public administration, we do not want to delude ourselves but some of the remarks made by the minister during this debate are hopeful since they suggest to our satisfaction that our work was not worthless. We are unavoidably moving, in the interests of those governing as well as the governed, towards a more open information and a gradual unmasking, if I may use this term, a gradual unmasking of the whole myth surrounding government machinery. I am pleased to see at least one or two cabinet members who are listening at present, and they are most progressive. Secrecy is no longer in fashion, Mr. Speaker. It is more and more in governments' interest to act in the open. Of course I understand that some restrictions might exist in the area of national defence and security—and I am convinced of it—but they certainly do not apply in every single instance. Thus it is more and more in the interest of governments to act in the open. Injustices as well as so called scandals or even scandals and allegations of all kinds will be avoided in and out the House. Since the public foots the bill, it is entitled to that. It demands it. We must comply in as much as possible with this legitimate wish. And the sooner, the better.

[English]

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, it is rather singular to find that those on this side of the House who are most interested in the subject we are discussing should be members who were first elected in 1957, or thereabouts. My hon. friend from Halifax-East Hants was elected in the same year as I was, 1957. My hon. friend from Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain was elected in 1957, and the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) in 1958. And I know that others in the House, as their years of service in this Chamber lengthen, are becoming very uneasy about the implications of this debate.

In the other place Senator Forsey, when he was introducing this report, asked why members of the Commons and the Senate were only now bringing forward this material about orders in council. Mr. Speaker, it took a tremendously long time to convince the government that the committee should be set up. It took hammering after hammering. I was pressing the point in speech after speech, in committee of the whole and in debates in this House, objecting to the general powers we were giving to the government, in any and all bills. These representations have been taken up and emphasized in the findings of the committee. Also, on Tuesday of last week this party put forward a motion dealing with $1 items and condemning their use. In fact the Chair did find that two of these items were quite illegal. Another four of them, with a little more strictness, could have been thrown out, too.

But I should like to bring the attention of hon. members to section K of the report having to do with enabling powers under appropriation acts and, in particular, to paragraphs 104 to 113. Every one of them amounts to a ringing condemnation of the practice of the government in extending the use of $1 items. As has been pointed out, parliament is being asked, very often, under a $1 item, to give power to a subordinate official to do something, subject to the rules and regulations of that subordinate power, on the strength of a $1 item when there is not even the money there. I commend in particular the reading of paragraphs 112 and 113. As a matter of fact I shall read them into the record.

112. The Committee notes that power to make subordinate legislation is not granted in Votes in Appropriation Acts in the United Kingdom or in the Commonwealth of Australia and has concluded that it should place on record its opposition, as a matter of principle, to the making of delegated legislation under Votes in Appropriation Acts, whether under substantive or "dollar" Votes or under Votes used in conjunction with items listed in the Estimates. The Committee has made this position known to the Auditor General, the President of the Privy Council, the President of the Honourable the Treasury Board and the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and has invited each to place his observations on the problems and practices now reported before the Committee. The Auditor General has replied in terms which confirm the Committee in its disquiet.

113. The Committee endorses the views of the Auditor General. If enabling powers to make statutory instruments are to continue to be granted in Appropriation Acts, the vote texts should be specific and unequivocal, and contain all the wording having legislative effect, with none being contained in the Estimates. Legislating by means of dollar Votes and altering the purpose of previous Votes by a number of successive Votes are practices with which the Committee does not agree.

The other day the government repudiated its own members. It repudiated its own members on this committee. One cannot say this loudly enough. It should be said loudly enough for all to hear. For the benefit of the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment (Mr. LeBlanc) particularly, I shall repeat it. He must hear it loud and clear.

An hon. Member: He does.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): All that is contained in this report is for the benefit of the House and for the benefit of the government.

May I adjourn the debate?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is moved by Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West) that the debate be adjourned. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

STATUTE LAW (METRIC CONVERSION) AMENDMENT ACT, 1976

AMENDMENTS TO WHEAT BOARD ACT TO FACILITATE CONVERSION TO METRIC SYSTEM

The House resumed from Friday, March 25, consideration of Bill C-23 to facilitate conversion to the metric system of measurement, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

● (2130)

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being 9.30 p.m., pursuant to the order made earlier this day, it is my duty at this time to put forthwith all questions necessary to dispose of deferred divisions at the report stage of Bill C-23.

Call in the members.

[And the division bells having been rung.]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. As indicated at the beginning of the consideration of report stage, there are eight report stage motions. All but motion No. 3 stand in the name of the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Neil). At the outset of report stage consideration I indicated it would be appropriate to group motions Nos. 1, 2, 4, 5, 7, and 8 for discussion and for one vote. This afternoon the hon. member for Moose Jaw indicated to me that it is agreeable to him that his motion No. 6, which is similar in principle to the other motions, also be grouped, and therefore a third vote would not be necessary. Therefore I will put the question on motion No. 1 and that result will be entered for motions Nos. 2, 4, 5, 6, 7 and 8.

The question then is on motion No. 1 in the name of the hon. member for Moose Jaw.

The House divided on motion No. 1 (Mr. Neil) which was negatived on the following division:

Mr. Speaker: I therefore declare motion No. 3 lost.

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce) moved that Bill C-23, to faciliate conversion to the metric system of measurement, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee of Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, be concurred in.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: On division.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Speaker: When shall the bill be read a third time? At the next sitting of the House?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

TRANSPORT—APPOINTMENT AND TERMS OF REFERENCE OF COMMISSION TO STUDY PROBLEMS IN NEWFOUNDLAND

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, unfortunately the question I wanted to discuss tonight is a bit superfluous because the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) announced today the appointment of a commission to look into the transportation problems of Newfoundland. I did try, however, to find something to discuss and I think I was able to come up with an answer.

The commission which has been appointed is another commission to study a transportation problem which has been studied so many times before that everybody in Newfoundland certainly knows the answers—with the exception of both levels of government which asked that yet another study take place. I have said many times before that there was no need of another study after the findings of the Trans-Newfoundland Corridor Transportation Study. Its many volumes discuss the needs of Newfoundland with regard to an intermodal transportation system, including the demand characteristics and user opinion of passenger transportation, air transportation, the trucking industry, inter-city bus service, the change from narrow gauge railway to standard gauge and vice versa, but we are to have still another study of transportation problems when the answers are already obvious.

The minister indicated that the present commission would look at particular Newfoundland needs and that all the studies I have mentioned, and others, would be considered, and that recommendations would be forthcoming to establish a system for the province in line with economic and social factors.

While I am not aware of the terms of reference of the commission I hope that the minister will take my advice. He told me he would include in those terms of reference not only the intermodal base but the relationship to the industries that provide the livelihood of many Newfoundlanders.

My knowledge of those industries is confined more to the western end of the province and I hope the commission will consider the following factors.

First and most important is support for the pulp and paper and linerboard industry in western Newfoundland. I regret to say that due to all the long-shot gambles and political stupidity in the past to create industry for the sake of expediency, that all the millions of dollars put in by the federal and provincial governments went down the drain of expensive dreams. After some 27 years of confederation we still depend on the Bowater pulp and paper industry as the main source of economic stability. That industry was established before Confederation by free enterprise. It took advantage of the resources available and made a go of it. Unfortunately, however, the mill has reached the point where, as a result of its isolated position and distance from the United States and other offshore markets and the resultant cost of transportation, it is becoming more and more difficult for it to compete with new mills coming on-stream in other market areas in the United States and offshore.

This, coupled with the burden of an infestation of the forests which seems to be beyond the capability of anyone to control, means this resource based industry could collapse. Every effort must be made to recommend, in consultation with knowledgeable Bowater officials, the transportation means necessary to lend stability to its continuance for the economic benefit of Newfoundland.

The same problem holds true, only more so, in relation to the Labrador linerboard mill, which is a $200 million concern subsidized by the government of Newfoundland at some $25 million per year. One of the many problems confronting the mill is due to the lack of common sense planning for transportation to provide cost effectiveness in delivering the resource to the mill from the woods, let alone competition as a result of high transportation costs to reach offshore markets and compete with mills in the United States and Europe.

While time does not permit me to go into the many other factors relating to transportation support, I hope the terms of reference will include the basic demand that railway workers in the area will be allowed to provide an input into problems of rail freight service which has been neglected for so many years by the CNR.

● (2210)

I hope that the Corner Brook Development Association and councils and chambers of commerce which have just completed a massive transportation study on the Corner Brook harbour will be included in the deliberations by the committee. I hope that the transportation base which exists in Newfoundland between Deer Lake, Corner Brook and Stephenville connecting the northern and the great northern peninsula as well as the western corridor, which consists of Bay St. George and Port au Port, will become part of the study that will finally make a realization that in order to produce and take advantage of the rich resources of Newfoundland, we must have a transportation system.

I trust that the parliamentary secretary will relate this to the minister and that I will get an answer that he is indeed thinking along the same lines.

[Translation]

Mr. Marcel Roy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, to confirm the extent to which communications are efficient between the province of Newfoundland and Labrador, the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) and the Newfoundland Minister for Intergovernmental Affairs, Mr. Alex Hickman, announced today the setting up of a commission of inquiry into transportation services in Newfoundland and Labrador. The Minister of Transport stated that the commission will look into existing services with a view to determining whether they meet generally accepted standards in Canada and will recommend, if indicated, such changes as will meet present and future needs. It will also give its conclusions and recommendations in a report to be presented to the Minister of Transport before December 31, 1977.

The Minister of Transport pointed out, as mentioned by the hon. member, that the active participation of the public will constitute one of the essential elements of that inquiry, and that the commission will hold public hearings in various centres across Newfoundland. The minister also added that he had asked the CN to suspend any changes of structural or technological nature which might lead to the lay-off of permanent employees during the inquiry. The number of seasonal employees will continue to fluctuate according to the volume of traffic.

The federal government consulted the Newfoundland government with regard to the mandate and membership of the commission which was set up under Part I of the Inquiries Act.

[English]

I suggest that with regard to the terms of reference of this commission of inquiry into transportation services into Newfoundland and Labrador, the hon. member examined the press release of the terms of reference that was distributed to all members of parliament this afternoon. If the hon. member wants, we can table that documentation. I have all the terms of reference in my hand tonight.

NATIONAL DEFENCE—POLICY OF DEPARTMENT WITH RESPECT TO UNIFORMS FOR CADETS

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I regret to report that once again the Canadian people have been let down by the government. What is more, Canadian youth has been grossly deceived by the government. It is a dangerous procedure for this country in its present delicate balance hovering between hope and cynicism, fear and misgiving, unity and disintegration. Credibility in government is more essential today than it ever was.

On April 13, 1976, in answer to a question from me in the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence, the then Minister of National Defence gave this undertaking:

> We have listened to the representations of the naval cadets, and the Chief of Staff and I have agreed to defer any change in the naval cadet uniform for at least 18 months to two years to enable full discussion with personnel interested in the naval cadets, to have them come to us and make their case on cost and any other factors you have mentioned, the design, cut and so on.

There was the undertaking of 18 months to two years to enable full discussion. On January 13, barely seven months later, the present Minister of National Defence (Mr. Danson) made this statement to the Conference of Defence Associations, speaking about the same matter. I quote:

> We need to encourage greater service identification and greater unit identification . . . After all, if a man joins up to be a sailor, he wants to be identified as a sailor.

There are two undertakings, two expressions of opinion that looked as though the naval cadets were going to be allowed to continue to wear their naval uniforms.

Barely a week later the Navy League had a meeting with the Minister of National Defence. They were listend to perfunctorily when they presented their case, but the decision was taken on January 20 of this year, nine months after "consultation" had taken place, that a safari-type uniform would be issued to all naval cadets. This is what I mean when I say Canadian youth have been deceived. They had been led to believe they could continue wearing their traditional uniforms.

There are some 14,000 young Canadians in nautically oriented programs. The basic aim of the cadet movement is to give young people the advantage of training, to get them to understand the principles of discipline and responsibility. There should be means of attracting young people to this service, particularly in the light of the extensive maritime concerns of the country. There should be means of developing a nautically-oriented cadet movement, rather than driving possible members away. Samplings indicate that the sea cadets wish to stay with their traditional uniforms and not be put in safari uniforms. As I say, undertakings were given on April 13, 1976, and those concerned were later encouraged to believe those undertakings were still valid. But on January 20, 1977, it was all over.

It is important that the youth of the country and the direction of this movement should feel a sense of satisfaction with an effort well directed, undertaken by a group of people toward a single goal. The object of it all is to inculcate strong community values and make good civic training available. The effort is not necessarily directed toward supplying recruits for any branch of the Canadian Armed Forces. It is directed toward turning out young men and women with high national and community motivation. The cadet movement is to be commended on doing this, and the services are to be commended for encouraging them. But the youth of the country should be encouraged to join the movement, not discouraged from doing so.

The Department of National Defence has no claim on these cadets, though the facilities of the department are used, admittedly. Some of the cadets go to the coastguard service. Others go to college, or to the police force, or to private life. Some go to the Armed Forces. But they all finish their cadet training as better citizens. It would be a tragedy to turn youth away by refusing them permission to wear the traditional uniform of their choice.

On the cost side, it has been demonstrated to my satisfaction that the differential could be as little as $1.19 per uniform, and this does not take into account the difference in the price of the proposed uniform of some $4.50 more for a raincoat. This is additional to what is now being paid. An extra $50,000 spent on raincoats alone is hardly justifiable.

[Translation]

Mr. Marcel Roy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of National Defence and his parliamentary secretary, I shall answer the hon. member's question.

I said from the outset that I worked myself with the cadet corps in the riding of Laval and I am completely opposed to what the hon. member mentioned, namely that national unity could be related to the colour or the cut of the cadet corps uniforms. I think that national unity should rather be related to discipline and to some basic principles on which I cannot expand this evening. However, I think that discipline and training are much more essential to the unity of the country than the colour of the uniforms.

[English]

Under the authority of the National Defence Act, the Department of National Defence has the responsibility for the training of cadets and for the provision of the material such as clothing and equipment, training aids, etc., to support the training.

In 1972, after a careful review of several factors, the department decided to provide a common green uniform for the navy, army and air cadets. However, procurement action was not initiated until after the ninth meeting of the national cadet advisory group held on December 6, 1974, when the presidents of the navy, army and air cadet leagues all agreed to the adoption of the new green uniforms.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): They did not agree at all.

Mr. Roy (Laval): On January 21, 1977—

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): They were told.

Mr. Roy (Laval): Mr. Speaker, my time is limited and I would ask the hon. member to give me the chance to give some information. On January 21, 1977, after discussing the new uniform with cadet league officials, the Minister of National Defence announced that the sea, army and air cadets would receive green uniforms similar in colour to those worn by the Canadian forces. In his announcement the minister said that the leaders of the cadet leagues and senior forces' officers would select distinctive badges and colour combinations for the sweater and headdress of each cadet service.

The foregoing is the policy of National Defence with respect to uniforms for cadets, and I might add that as recently as last Thursday the hon. member was advised of the policy personally by the Chief of the Defence Staff at a meeting of the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.25 p.m.
