Mr. McCRANEY. There is no doubt that the farmers of the west were convinced that when this government came into power they were going to get government-owned elevators. They had a right to rely on the promises of the Prime Minister, and I hope they will not be disappointed. With government-owned elevators this question of the mixing of grain would not be important because the conditions under which mixing would be permitted would be the most favourable possible. As my hon. friend from Saltcoats has pointed out——

Mr. SPEAKER. I think the hon. gentleman is starting on an argument that would carry him a long way from the point. It would be arguing the question over again. I think it would be permissible to argue that on account of provisions with regard to the providing of cars or the mixing of grain being in the Bill, the six months' hoist should be moved, but that would not justify the hon. member in going over the arguments already placed before the House, and on which the House has already expressed its judgment more than once.

Mr. McCRANEY. I, of course, bow to your ruling. One of my reasons for wishing to vote for the six months' hoist is that there is no provision for government ownership, and there is a provision for the mixing of grain at the discretion of the board which is appointed under the Bill. There is also in this Bill no protection against the very point which has been prominent before the grain growers for so many years, namely the unity of interest on the part of those who are interested in line or interior elevators and in terminal elevators. Government ownership would dispose of that question which is a most important one, and I think the greatest danger in this Bill is the provision with regard to the distribution of cars. I have received a number of letters and resolutions from different portions of my riding none of them favouring such provisions as are in the Bill giving the board discretionary powers; they are all opposed to it. I think the farmers of the west believed that this question had been settled some years ago, and now they will be surprised to find that this parliament has practically revoked the protection which they formerly had and has given a discretion which may be very much abused by the board. I have letters from grain growers' associations in my riding at Hanley, Elbow, Aberdeen, Warman, Hawarden, Haleyonia, Ardath and Floral. I believe they represent the sentiments of the grain growers, and it would be their wish, as it is my judgment, that this Bill should be defeated rather than put into force, and that they rely on the provision of the Manitoba Grain Act as it now stands.

Mr. MARTIN (Regina). One thing occurs to me in connection with the matter. For the last two or three years, in the House of Commons and throughout western Canada we were promised by the Conservative party government ownership and operation of terminal elevators, and were also promised the control of our natural resources if the Conservative party got into power. In fact the only thing that saved the Conservative party in Saskatchewan and Alberta from complete extinction was the promise made to the electors of government ownership and the return of the natural resources to these provinces. The government has had an opportunity to restore the natural resources to one province, but they have not fulfilled this promise. They had an opportunity to-day when dealing with the Grain Act to give us government ownership and operation of terminal elevators, but we have now in this Bill absolutely nothing more than was in Bill (Q) of the Senate, which was before the House of Commons in 1910-11. When I look at the hon. members from Manitoba, the member for Macdonald (Mr. Staples), the member for Selkirk (Mr. Bradbury), the member for Souris (Mr. Schaffner), the member for Lisgar (Mr. Sharpe)—I do not think the hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Meighen) committed himself to government ownership and operation of terminal elevators—and read their speeches of last year I begin to wonder if they are the same men who were here last session. The resolution moved by the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Schaffner) on February 13, 1911, which has already been read to the House by the hon. member for Saltcoats (Mr. MacNutt) favoured government ownership and operation of terminal elevators. The hon. member for Souris said this was absolutely the only remedy. If I had time I could read quotations from the speeches of the hon. member for Macdonald last year in which he said he would not allow this Grain Bill to go through because it did not provide for government ownership and operation of terminal elevators. The hon. members for Selkirk and Lisgar said the same thing, yet what do we find to-day, every one of these gentlemen is supporting practically every clause of the Bill as brought forward by the hon. the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster) and not one provision beyond what was contained in Bill (Q) of last year, in favour of government ownership. How do they reconcile their position of to-day with that of the last few years?

Mr. MEIGHEN. Did the hon. member vote for or against that resolution himself?

Mr. MARTIN (Regina). The Secretary of State was in Regina last summer and addressing a meeting in the interest of the Conservative candidate said that I voted against government ownership and operation of terminal elevators. He knows, that if he made that statement it was absolutely untrue. I did not vote against government ownership and operation of terminal elevators in this House. My position was stated on a resolution moved by the hon. member for Souris in March or April, 1909. That resolution favoured government ownership. I said then, if I remember correctly, that legislation had been passed in 1908 which had not yet been given a fair trial, and I favoured giving it a fair trial until we could determine whether it was effective or not. In 1911 I took the position when I moved a resolution that that legislation had been given a fair trial and had proved a failure and that some other legislation was desirable. I expressed the opinion then as now that no system other than government ownership would eventually prove effective in handling the grain of the western producer.

Mr. MEIGHEN. But you voted against a resolution.

Mr. MARTIN (Regina). I did not vote against government ownership and operation of terminal elevators in this House.

Mr. MEIGHEN. Did not you vote against the resolution of the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Schaffner)?

Mr. MARTIN (Regina). The hon. member need not imagine that he is cross-questioning a witness. I told the hon. member I did not vote against the government ownership and operation of terminal elevators. If he wishes by means of quibbles, to say I did, he is quite welcome to his opinion; no one else will say it, except himself.

Mr. SPEAKER. It is permissible for the hon. member to give reasons why he is in favour of the six months' hoist, but it is not in order that he should branch off from the subject before the Chair as he is now doing.

Mr. MARTIN (Regina). The only reason I digressed was because the hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Meighen) asked me questions, and if I cannot answer them, then do not allow the hon. member to ask them. One of my reasons for voting for the six months' hoist is, that the Bill does not give what the farmers of western Canada want, with regard to government ownership of the terminal elevators.

Mr. SHARPE (Lisgar). Where do you stand on that now?

Mr. MARTIN (Regina). If the hon. member (Mr. Sharpe) has not grasped the situation, I cannot enlighten him. I would like to know where he and some hon. members opposite stand on that question now. When I was interrupted in such an unkind way, I was about to refer to what was said by the present leader of the government in respect to that matter, not longer ago than the month of May, 1911, as reported in Volume V. 'Hansard,' 1910-11, page 9515. I presume the right hon. gentleman spoke for the Conservative party, when he then said:

> The declaration of the Minister of the Interior is contained in a very long sentence which is accompanied with a great many qualifications. It does not seem to be very direct or to the point. He speaks of further information. Considering the extent to which these grievances have prevailed in the past and that the government has been informed of these grievances, not only through the public press, and through actions in court, but through inquiry after inquiry, and by delegation after delegation of these men from the west who have come here to press their claims—and I know that delegations were here four or five years ago urging exactly the same thing—it would seem quite reasonable, quite possible, quite necessary, that the government should have made itself acquainted with the facts and have come to its own conclusion upon these matters long ago. Why is it necessary, after all this investigation, after all these inquiries, after all these delegations, to appoint a board for the purpose of coming to a conclusion as to whether or not the facts are such that the government should embark on a certain policy.

In view of this language, will the hon. the Prime Minister tell me why it is necessary for him now to appoint a board in exactly the same way as the late government proposed to appoint a board in Bill letter Q of the Senate, to investigate whether it was necessary or not, in the interests of western Canada, to enter upon a system of government ownership and operation of terminal elevators. If the right hon. gentleman's argument was good then, it is much better now, because the government of this country have had a year longer to discover what the farmers in western Canada want. I wish to be guided by what the farmers in western Canada do want. I am not going to tell them, as the Minister of Trade and Commerce has told them, what kind of farming they should undertake, when they probably know better than the minister himself wherein their interests lie, and if they say they want the terminal elevators to be handled in a certain way, then, of course, they are the most deeply interested in the question, and we must be guided by the men who use these elevators, and who are producing from the soil of western Canada the millions of bushels of wheat that are exported every year.

I could refer also, to what was said last year when Bill letter Q of the Senate came before the House, by Mr. Haggart, then member for Winnipeg, by the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Schaffner) by the hon. member for Selkirk——

Mr. SPEAKER. I must again remind the hon. member that he is wandering from the question at issue and it is not permissible for him under the rules to do so. The hon. member is directing his remarks to the past utterances of hon. members instead of giving direct reasons why he proposes voting in favour of this Bill being read six months hence.

Mr. MARTIN (Regina). It seems to me that the reasons given by these hon. members in favour of government ownership should have some weight in considering this question now.

Mr. SPEAKER. The reasons which actuated hon. members last year, to a certain conclusion, have, in my opinion, nothing to do with the question now before the House.

Mr. MARTIN (Regina). I shall bow to your ruling, Mr. Speaker, and I shall not further dwell on the inconsistency of the conduct of these hon. members last year as compared with their conduct this year. I believe this Bill, as it at present stands, will deprive the farmers of western Canada of many of the provisions which were contained in the former Bill for their protection. I need only refer to the change in the car distribution system, and to the provision which renders entirely inoperative the prohibition to elevator men to engage in the buying and selling of grain. The object of clause 123 in Bill (Q) of the Senate, was to divorce the warehouse business from the business of buying and selling grain, so as to give the farmers a square deal. But section 123 as it stands now, will not have that effect and it is only a pretence, in so far as it is alleged to have such an effect. As that clause is worded now the prohibition is inoperative, and it defeats the purpose of the Bill. Then, the provision to mix grain is also considered very detrimental to the producers of western Canada. In conclusion, I wish to say that there is so much power given to the Grain Commission, that you might just as well do away with this Grain Act altogether and pass a statue creating the same commission and giving them full power to do anything they like with the grain of western Canada. For these reasons, I will vote for the six months' hoist.

Mr. OLIVER. There is no doubt as to the very great importance of the motion now before the House. It is a most serious matter to move against the passage of a Bill which is an amendment to an Act that has been on the statute-book for a number of years, an Act which relates to the operation of the grain trade, which grain trade amounts to tens of millions of dollars a year, and the increase of which trade is the true foundation of Canada's wealth and prosperity at the present time, and its absolute hope for the future. When a number of the members of this House propose to vote against the passage of this Bill, it is a serious position to take, and, for my own part, it is not taken without due and full consideration. When the Bill was first submitted to the House this session, it was practically the Bill that was passed by the Senate and brought down to this House last session.

That Bill as it came before the House embodied a certain principle. That principle was the protection given by legislative authority to the rights and interests of the grain producer. It is because that principle of the Bill has been reversed by the amendments which have been made to it during its passage through the committee, that it is desirable in the interest of the producers of grain, in the interest of those for whom the Act was framed, and for whom the Bill as it came before this House was framed, that this Bill should not now become law. It makes all the difference in the world which interest the Bill is intended to conserve. I listened with great attention to the lecture or sermon that was preached by my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce on the second reading of the Bill, or when it went into committee, when he told us of the desire which filled his bosom to have all classes of people who were interested in grain view each other's transactions with confidence, his idea being to promote harmony amongst all the different interests. Well, Mr. Speaker, we all like to see harmony; we all like to see everybody's interests protected; but, as I had occasion to say to him then, I take the liberty to repeat now, it has not yet been possible, in the history of this world, to protect at once the interest of the buyer and the interest of the seller, and it is simply a question of which side this legislation and this government are to be on. Are they going to protect the interest of the producer or the interest of the dealer in the product? That is the question, and it is the whole question; and the Bill as it is now before the House answers that question beyond any doubt. My hon. friend, by the amendments which he has introduced to this Bill in committee, has established the fact that from this time forward this Grain Act is to be in the interest of the grain dealer and in the interest of the grain transporter, and not in the interest of the grain producer. I wish to emphasize the shock and surprise that will be felt by the producers of the west when they realize the action which my hon. friend has seen fit to take. They have with great labour and pains, with the assistance of their representatives on both sides of the House, been successful in building up an Act which to them was satisfactory in large measure. Of course, there is nothing perfect in this world; there is nothing so good but it may be bettered; and in a country where conditions are changing from day to day, that which is perfect to-day may very easily be imperfect to-morrow. Therefore, the producers of grain in the west were asking from time to time for further amendments of the Grain Act and for further and further consideration of their interests, always believing that the mind of parliament on both sides was to give them adequate protection. But in the process of this Bill passing through committee, without due warning at the hands of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, the principle of the Bill has been reversed, and to-day the Bill, instead of standing in the interest of the producer, is standing distinctly in the interests of the grain dealer and the grain transporter. It is in the last degree regrettable that this should be the case. It is elementary that every cent that can be added in the value of the farmers' product to the farmer is a distinct gain to the business community of Canada in every line and in every section of the country. The same is not true in regard to the gain made out of the farmer's product by any of those who handle that product. The legislation that is to be placed on the statute book distinctly withdraws protection from the producer, distinctly and intentionally gives the advantage to the dealer.

Mr. SPEAKER. I must remind the hon. member that he is wandering from the question before the House. Abstract reasoning on economic principles I do not think, applies to the question before the House, which is whether this Bill shall be read to-night or six months hence.

Mr. OLIVER. I am, of course, willing, Mr. Speaker, to sit down, but I was desirous of putting as strongly as I could, the reasons for such an important vote being given, and it does seem to me that the fact that the principle of the Bill has been absolutely reversed in its progress through committee, is a reason sufficient to justify the vote that we propose to give. But I do not wish to trespass on the time of the House, and particularly I do not wish to do otherwise than submit to your ruling.

Mr. MEIGHEN. As the hon. member for Regina, not in the best of temper, referred to myself, when I asked him a question, I crave the indulgence of the House for a very few minutes, even at this late hour.

Mr. SPEAKER. I am afraid the hon. member is about to start a discussion on a subject which cannot be discussed on the motion. I think it would be better to keep strictly within the rule of order.

Mr. MEIGHEN. Mr. Speaker, I certainly will not criticise your ruling as applied to our hon. friends opposite, although I did not invoke it in any way; but inasmuch as a great degree of latitude, in the fact of your ruling, was accorded to them, it seems unfair that we are not to be allowed to reply to the extent to which we are attacked.

Mr. OLIVER. May I interrupt the hon. gentleman to say that he precipitated any attack made upon him by his question?

Mr. MARTIN (Regina). I made no attack on the hon. member at all.

Mr. SPEAKER. I have only to say that I called the hon. member to order two or three times during the debate, in the endeavour to bring him back to the subject, and I am only doing the same on both sides of the House.

Mr. MEIGHEN. Then perhaps I might ask the Chair to define the limits within which one may discuss the amendment of the hon. member for Mackenzie.

Mr. SPEAKER. In my judgment this Bill contains certain provisions, and there are other provisions which may not be in it but which it may be considered ought to have been there. The citation of provisions which some hon. gentlemen may think the Bill should have contained, but which are not embodied in it, would be a justifiable ground for speaking and voting against the Bill being read a third time now, or it would be in order giving reasons with respect to provisions which are in the Bill, but which do not fulfil the expectations that were entertained with regard, for instance, to the distribution of cars, the mixing of grain, or the ownership of terminal elevators. If it is considered that these are not proper provisions, that would be justifiable ground upon which to argue for voting for the six months' hoist, any remarks along the lines which I have mentioned would be quite in order and appropriate.

Mr. MEIGHEN. I appreciate the limits which you have laid down, Mr. Speaker, and I conceive them to be quite wide enough for my purpose. The Bill may be criticised and that criticism, I understand, may be made in respect to what the Bill contains and what it does not contain. I am sure no hon. member can complain of that latitude. Hon. gentlemen opposite ask that the Bill be not now read a third time, but that the third reading be given six months from now. They have advanced their reasons. They have been listened to by the hon. member for St. Lawrence division, by the hon. member from one of the constituencies of Quebec who is now asleep, and by the hon. member for Cape Breton, and I have wondered as I have sat and waited, what reason it was that most appealed to these hon. gentlemen from eastern Canada. It is criticised in the first place because it does not, to the satisfaction of hon. gentlemen opposite, provide for the total government operation of all the elevators at Fort William. Is that correct or is it not? It has been criticised by hon. gentlemen opposite from that point of view, and in support of their criticism they have referred to conduct in this House on the 13th of February last. The hon. gentlemen who now criticise this Bill because it does not go far enough to suit them, are the same hon. gentlemen who voted against the proposition which they are now advancing. I rise in my place to warn hon. members——

Mr. SPEAKER.

Mr. MARTIN (Regina). I rise to a point of order. Is the hon. gentleman within the rules of the House in making this reference, when I was ruled out of order for doing exactly the same a few minutes ago?

Mr. SPEAKER. I think the hon. gentleman's introductory remarks would naturally lead him too far. To present to the House discussions which took place last year is, I think, going too far, and the hon. member for Regina (Mr. Martin) was violating the rules along the same line.

Mr. MEIGHEN. I bow to your ruling again, Mr. Speaker, and while I do not criticise the hon. members so much for violating the rules of order of this House as I do for violating the terms of 'Hansard' on the 13th of February, I will abandon the issue on this question. The issue so far raised, then, is whether or not this government is fulfilling its pledges to the people of Canada, by moving fairly, and in justice and equity, toward their fulfilment, sufficiently to warrant us in passing this Bill. In the first place, coming from the source whence it does, I do not think that this criticism will carry much weight among our western people. I think the plain ordinary western farmer looking fairly at this issue, as he does at all issues, will come to the conclusion that he will trust its solution to the party that went substantially towards the fulfilment of its pledges, the first session, rather than to the party that for fifteen years never moved at all to fulfil its pledges. What is the situation at Fort William? The seconder of the amendment endeavoured to show that unless we absolutely take over and own and operate all the elevators at Fort William we were violating our pledge. Now to my mind a pledge is best fulfilled that is fulfilled sanely.

Mr. OLIVER. Was that an insane pledge that was made?

Mr. MEIGHEN. No. A sane pledge is fulfilled sanely; an insane pledge is better not fulfilled at all.

Mr. OLIVER. I ask again was that an insane pledge that was made?

Mr. MEIGHEN. No. If the hon. member has an insane pledge in his mind he must be endeavouring to write an autobiography.

Mr. OLIVER. If that was a sane pledge it should have been fulfilled. If it was an insane pledge its fulfilment was not necessary.

Mr. MEIGHEN. The pledge was a sane one, and will be fulfilled in a sane way. When Bill letter Q was before the House in the last session of the last parliament, on the very day before parliament dissolved, it was urged to be put through by the hon. member for Humboldt (Mr. Neely) who opposed——

Mr. OLIVER. My hon. friend will have to be veracious. It was not the day before parliament dissolved.

Mr. MEIGHEN. On the day before parliament dissolved——

Mr. OLIVER. No.

Mr. MEIGHEN. I understand it was.

Mr. LANCASTER. It was the very last day we sat in this House.

Mr. MEIGHEN. Yes, the very last day we sat in this House.

Mr. KNOWLES. I rise to a point of order. In the first place it was in the month of May, and parliament was not dissolved until July, but let that pass. The hon. gentleman is not in order in discussing a debate which occurred on that occasion on this matter according to your ruling, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. MEIGHEN. I maintain I am distinctly in order according to your ruling.

Mr. SPEAKER. I have just been listening to discover how far the hon. gentleman would continue on this line. I am very much afraid that if the hon. gentleman continues in his present course, he will be out of order.

Mr. MEIGHEN. Mr. Speaker, I meant to check myself before transgressing. The Bill is criticised because there is not in the minds of hon. gentlemen opposite, sufficient mandatory provision for government operation, but when a similar Bill was before this House, containing the same provision, it was asked to be rammed through on the last day that parliament sat before dissolution——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. MEIGHEN. By the same hon. gentleman. Now the hon. member who seconded the amendment read from the speech made at that time by the present hon. member from Edmonton, then the Minister of the Interior, in which that hon. gentleman distinctly refused to commit the then government to government operation on any scale whatever. In that speech in answer to the challenge of the hon. member from Souris, he stated that he had no authority to commit the government of the day to government operation on any scale at all, and yet notwithstanding that statement, he wanted the Bill rammed through this House. In contradistinction to this position is the one taken by the government of the day on this occasion. And the hon. member for Edmonton supported his position, by arguing strongly on the previous day against the resolution of the hon. member for Souris, and against government operation. The hon. member for Humboldt (Mr. Neely) did the same, and all asked that the House wait and not launch itself upon the principle so ably argued for by the hon. member for Souris.

Mr. OLIVER. Will the hon. gentleman be good enough to read an extract from what I said on that occasion which will substantiate his statement?

Mr. MEIGHEN. With the utmost pleasure; I was afraid I would be out of order.

In my opinion—— says the Hon. Frank Oliver, who was then the Minister of the Interior:

—the government would be ill advised to rush unwittingly and slightly into such a responsibility as this resolution demands.

The hon. gentleman did not want to rush into the responsibility that this resolution demanded. What did the resolution demand?

That in the opinion of this House the present system of operating terminal and transfer elevators is detrimental to the interests of the western grain producers, and that the government should take immediate steps to operate terminal elevators at Fort William Port Arthur, and the transfer elevators between those terminals and the Atlantic seaboard.

To operate terminal elevators is the principle against which the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) called upon this House to vote; and the hon. member for Regina (Mr. Martin) obediently stood and voted.

Mr. OLIVER. The quotation read by the hon. member (Mr. Meighen) does not bear out his statement.

Mr. MEIGHEN. The hon. gentleman went on to state—and this is an answer to his question:

It is already pointed out that the system of government which has been followed so far, had not proved a failure, but rather a success.

That is what he was in favour of.

The fact that improprieties have been located and those guilty punished, is evidence that inspection does inspect and that the law is being enforced; and I have no doubt that that inspection and enforcement of the law will have due effect in the future management of elevators. However, the government is fully aware of the importance of the question and of the necessity to deal with it thoroughly; and the fact that legislation is in the course of preparation which will embody, as far as possible, every means for settling this question, is surely evidence that the government is willing and able to deal with it to the satisfaction of all interests concerned. The government, therefore, ask the support of the House to the policy which is embodied in the measure brought down.

And a part of the policy was to deny to this House that there should be government operation on any scale whatever. In contradistinction to that position, this government comes forward, and through its Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster) declares for the government operation of terminal elevators in terms of the resolution of the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Schaffner), and states that in the first year, to the extent of one, two, or three elevators at Fort William or Port Arthur, the government will launch upon this principle and this practice. That is why I support the Bill and think that we had better vote for it now than six months hence as is proposed by hon. gentlemen opposite. I can understand these hon. gentlemen if they are true to the convictions expressed last session in this House, if they are true to their bitter antagonism to government elevators, would ask that this Bill be not read now, but that it be read six months or six years from now. That is because they have harked back to the first conviction of their souls; they want this defeated or want it delayed.

Mr. OLIVER. May I ask the hon. member a question? Will he read the section of the Bill that provides for government operation of elevators at Fort William?

Mr. MEIGHEN. I stated, in contradiction to the stand the hon. gentleman took last session, that the present Minister of Trade and Commerce announced as part of the government policy, government operation under the permissive provisions of the Bill. There is all the difference in the world.

Mr. MARTIN (Regina). Did not the hon. gentleman hear the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster) say to-night that the government expect to properly control the elevators without government ownership and operation?

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). No, Sir, he did not.

Mr. MEIGHEN. If hon. gentlemen opposite would listen better and read better, 'Hansard' included, than they do, it would save them from many blunders. What is the situation at Fort William and Port Arthur? There are five railway elevators, that is elevators owned by the railway companies. These elevators, as I understand it, have not been altogether operated by these railway companies, but have been leased on occasion. It is the policy of this government, as I understand it—and I would like to be contradicted if I am wrong—so far as is possible under existing circumstances to compel the railway companies to operate their own elevators. It is true that the company which is largely the creation of hon. gentlemen opposite, has bound itself by long-distance contracts in defiance of that; and it may be hard, therefore, to compel complete operation by railways of their own elevators; but, so far as practicable, it will be done. And there is no need under these circumstances, as I understand the farmers' demands, to ask that the government operate railway elevators.

Mr. OLIVER. Is that in the Bill?

Mr. MEIGHEN. Surely the hon. gentleman does not suggest that I am out of order.

Mr. OLIVER. Is it in the Bill?

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). Is the chicken in the egg?

Mr. OLIVER. Is the hon. member (Mr. Meighen) talking about the Bill, or is he talking about something else?

Mr. MEIGHEN. I am talking of the government policy to be applied by this Bill.

Mr. OLIVER. Has that anything to do with the third reading?

Mr. MEIGHEN. Of course it has. The hon. member (Mr. Oliver) is getting more nervous than he usually is at this stage of the night.

Mr. OLIVER. I was compelled to sit down when I had remarks to make as pertinent to the third reading, and more so, than those of the hon. gentleman's (Mr. Meighen).

Mr. SPEAKER. I think it scarcely proper to discuss the ruling of the Chair. The hon. member (Mr. Meighen) was going on a different line. I listened to several hon. members who gave as a reason why they proposed to vote for the six months hoist that the government would not control the elevators. But the hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Meighen) was endeavouring to prove that they would control the elevators, or attempt to.

Mr. OLIVER. Might I suggest that the hon. member has not undertaken to prove that out of the Bill; he was not touching the Bill, when he undertook to say that, but was dealing with what he thought was going to be the policy of the government.

Mr. MEIGHEN. Surely, the hon. member (Mr. Oliver) as an old parliamentarian would not controvert the proposition that in order to decide whether or not we will vote for a measure that covers a policy, we must get light from that policy. Surely, the principles of the policy are to be taken into consideration when we are asked to vote for or against the instrumentality by which that policy is to be carried into effect.

Mr. OLIVER. The ruling against me prevented me from making such statements.

Mr. MEIGHEN. I do not think the hon. gentleman is correct in that statement. There are at Fort William and Port Arthur, five private elevators. One of these is owned by the Ogilvie Milling company, and operated in connection with their flour mill; and to operate it without the flour mill would not be, to my mind, a business proposition; and I do not understand that hon. gentlemen opposite argue, or that it is argued, that elevators operated in connection with flour mills should be operated by the government. That would leave only four of the elevators at Fort William under private ownership. And this government is committed to purchase and operate in the first year one, two or three of these elevators. Surely, that is a fair and reasonable advance towards the application of this principle which the Conservative party adopted long previous to the election and which they are now proceeding to put into force and effect. It is argued by my hon. friend, who moved the amendment, and who asks us to wait for six months before passing the Bill, that it contains clauses which are hard to understand. I would like to know what those clauses are. They read to me quite clear, and I am sure that to the perspicuous mind of the hon. member, if he will read them, they will seem equally clear. Why does not he particularise and say what is obscure and ambiguous. He says that one clause conflicts with another. But he does not give instances, he does not give the House the benefit of the information in his mind as to what clause conflicts with some other clause. If he would do that, it is not too late even yet, for amendments. And he told the House, as a last resort, that there are too many clauses. But he did not take us into his confidence and say how many clauses he would permit in the Bill. If he would do that, we might undertake to boil it down to dimensions that, to his mind, would be ample. These are all the reasons advanced. We have sat here two hours and have been asked to defeat this great measure of reform for western Canada, to which these very gentlemen opposite committed themselves last parliament. Bill Q. which hon. gentlemen opposite brought in themselves last year, we are now asked to defeat, in defiance of a pledge of the government that they are going to put into operation the principle of government owned elevators. We are told that the Bill is not mandatory enough in the matter of government elevators, that it is too long, that the clauses are ambiguous and conflict with each other; but no instances are given. Now let us put this Bill into effect. As hon. gentlemen, the hon. gentlemen who moved the amendment said, while it may not be as welcome as many of the farmers would like, it might have some good points in it. I apprehend that after this Bill has been in operation two years it will be regarded by the western farmers as one of the most popular measures on the statute-book. It may be true that hon. gentlemen opposite are opposing it because it is a Conservative measure. I believe that is the secret of the whole thing, it is because it is not in the hands of their own friends that they are objecting to it. But the farmer of the west as he reads this Bill, and as he receives benefit from it, will give credit to this government who, true to its pledges, has put it into operation. I ask hon. gentlemen opposite to give the Bill a fair trial, knowing as they do that the government is responsible for the measure and for its effects.

Mr. KNOWLES. The hon. gentleman has dealt with certain alleged objections to the acceptance of the amendment of my hon. friend from Mackenzie (Mr. Cash), but he has not said a word about the forcible objections against it, which have been raised on this side of the House. The hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Meighen) showed great agility in avoiding the points brought before the House by my hon. friend from Mackenzie. Why did he not tell us that one of the main points was because it would interfere with that very precious thing in the hands of the farmer, namely, a square deal in the distribution of cars? I read this afternoon a telegram saying that the grain growers of Saskatchewan are afraid that the elevator interests and the transportation interests have got the ear of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and that he is turning a deaf ear to the interest of the farmers. We affirm that any grain legislation along the line of clause (E) of section 207 is made at the bidding of the interests, and is contrary to the desires and interests of hundreds of thousands of farmers. But the member for Portage la Prairie did not touch that point at all. Last session he brought forward a resolution to remove the duty on agricultural implements, but since this government came into power he has maintained an absolute silence on that subject. Why does he not have the fairness to his constituents that the member for Souris (Mr. Schaffner) and Lisgar (Mr. Sharpe) have shown? They are not afraid to get up and vote against the government, because they know that their constituents desire that clause (E) should not be in this Bill. All credit to them, and I hope the day will come when we will find them voting with us on every question when we are voicing the views of the farmers. The member for Portage la Prairie says that we voted against government elevators at a certain time, and we are complaining to-day because government elevators are not provided for in this Bill, as if we were inconsistent. Our protest is made against the men who govern this country making promises before election day and then turning their backs on them after election day. I take the stand that when a Prime Minister goes through the country and makes the promise he did, he is in duty bound to fulfil it. In making that promise he no doubt saved a few seats in the prairie provinces; if he had not made it there would be much fewer hon. gentlemen here from Manitoba sitting on the government side. If the Prime Minister had not promised control and operation of elevators at Fort William and Port Arthur in the event of his party attaining power—

Mr. BRADBURY. We will have government ownership and operation of elevators.

Mr. KNOWLES. The hon. gentleman means to say that he thinks we will have, because I do not think any one else in the House is so foolish as to believe we will have.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. KNOWLES. Well, I will say unwise. Let us speak of these elevators, one, two, or at most, three. Let me read what the Prime Minister said while speaking in the district represented by the hon. member who has just taken his seat:

> I have arrived at the conclusion that the result can only be attained by state control and operation of the terminal elevators. We propose to carry out that policy without delay if returned to power.

Will my hon. friend say that that promise is carried out by a statement from the Minister of Trade and Commerce that there will be a vote in the supplementary estimates, after the government has been in power since the 10th of October? Is that carrying out the promise?

> We propose to carry out that policy without delay if returned to power.

What does 'without delay' mean? It means no delay. But there has been delay already in carrying out that promise. We have the estimates down here, two sets of them, and a great many things have been done. They brought down their Tariff Commission without delay.

Mr. KNOWLES.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. KNOWLES. I am illustrating what 'without delay' means. It means in the most speedy manner possible, the speedy attainment of that which has been promised by the Prime Minister. We had some resolution in favour of the speedy establishment of a navy.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. KNOWLES. And that I am right in saying that the hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Meighen) can surely be scarcely sincere when he says that this same promise is being carried out sanely, when up to the present day we have nothing official from the government in the way of carrying out their promises. That is the quarrel I have with this government, that they have been elected and have got the support of many people in my riding, for instance, who would not have voted Conservative except for the promise of government ownership and operation of terminal elevators. Many people thus voted for hon. gentlemen opposite. Even the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Schaffner) cannot deny that he got many a vote because he was in a sense the father of this policy of government ownership and operation of terminal elevators, and because the Prime Minister made that promise. I submit that this has been a legitimate criticism of the government, that they have not fulfilled that promise. Hon. gentlemen opposite gibe at any one asking the right hon. gentleman and his government to keep their promises. Let us see what the right hon. gentleman said he would do if he did not keep his promise. Speaking at Battleford he said:

> If it should be the will of the people of Canada to impose upon me the great responsibility of being called upon to form a government in Canada, and after that government has been formed the policy I have outlined will be carried out by the government as I have stated, or one man of the government will go out of public life.

Whatever may be his view to-day with regard to the promises he made, I submit that he then felt his promises were such that the people of Canada had a right to expect their fulfilment. I submit to my hon. friend from Portage la Prairie that he has not touched the two objections we have to the third reading. That in the first place we oppose any change in the distribution of cars to the grain growers in the west, and in the second place that we enter our protest against the action of the Prime Minister who promised before the elections that we would have government ownership and operation of elevators, but up to the present we see nothing official in the way of carrying out that promise.

Amendment—(Mr. Cash)—negatived.

Mr. BOIVIN. The hon. member for North Lanark (Mr. Thoburn) and the hon. member for Nicolet (Mr. Lamarche) were not in the chamber when the amendment was read.

Mr. LAMARCHE. While, my hon. friend (Mr. Boivin) did not see me, I was on the stairs here and I heard everything of the amendment.

Mr. SPEAKER. Did the hon. member for North Lanark hear the question put?

Mr. THOBURN. I was coming in the door when you put the question.

Mr. BOIVIN. I understand the rule of the House to be that an hon. member should be in his seat when the question is put.

Mr. SPEAKER. It is the duty of the Speaker to inquire if an hon. member heard the question put. It is for the hon. member to say 'yes' or 'no'. If he says 'yes', he has the right to vote.

Mr. OLIVER. May I inquire if the vote of the hon. member for North Lanark (Mr. Thoburn) is to be counted.

Mr. SPEAKER. If I understood the hon. member correctly, he said he was within the precincts of the House and heard the question put.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. SPEAKER. Did the hon. member for North Lanark hear the question put?

Mr. THOBURN. Yes sir.

Motion agreed to and Bill read a third time and passed.

Mr. BORDEN moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. OLIVER. What business will be taken up to-morrow?

Mr. BORDEN. We will take any of the Bills and resolutions on the order paper that are ready and then Supply.

Mr. BELAND. Will the Manitoba Boundary Bill come up to-morrow?

Mr. BORDEN. Yes, I believe that is first for consideration to-morrow and then we will go on with the other Bills and afterwards Supply.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 12.40 a. m., Tuesday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, March 12, 1912.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

MEMBER INTRODUCED.

Hon. G. P. Graham, member elect for the electoral district of South Renfrew was introduced by the Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier and Mr. Duncan Ross.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 126) to incorporate the Universal Eyesight Insurance Company.—Mr. McLean (Queens).

Bill (No. 127) to incorporate the Canadian Public Health Association. — Mr. Schaffner.

Bill (No. 128) to incorporate the Montreal Transcontinental Railway Company.—Mr. Coderre.

Bill (No. 129) respecting the Alberta, Peace River and Eastern Railway Company.—Mr. Chabot.

Bill (No. 130) respecting the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada.—Mr. Currie.

Bill (No. 131) for the relief of Isobell Isaac.—Mr. MacNutt.

Bill (No. 132) respecting Mexican Interurban Electric Traction Company, Limited, and to change its name to 'Mexican Interurban Electric Railway Company, Limited.' —Mr. Macdonell.

INQUIRY FOR RETURNS.

Mr. MURPHY. Before the orders of the day are called I would like to direct the attention of the Secretary of State, and that of also the Postmaster General, to a number of returns that are in arrears. I would like particularly to have a return relating to the Post Office Department brought down, the order for which was passed on the 12th of February. It stood in the name of the hon. member for Missisquoi (Mr. Kay), relating to certain contracts and orders given out by the Post Office Department, and asked for the names of companies, firms and individuals to whom payments had been made.

Mr. PELLETIER. I will make a note of it.

EXTENSION OF BOUNDARIES—MANITOBA.

On the order: Third reading of Bill (No. 115) to provide for the extension of the boundaries of the province of Manitoba.—Mr. Borden.

Rt. Hon. R. L. BORDEN (Prime Minister). My hon. friend the member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley), when the Bill was in committee the other day, pointed out to me what he understood to be an uncertainty about the description of the boundaries in one respect. I brought the matter to the attention of the Dominion geographer and also to the attention of the Dominion astronomer. They looked into the matter very carefully, and while they are inclined to think that the description as at present contained in the Bill is free from ambiguity, they have nevertheless suggested an alteration which, I think, will remove any possible doubt. For that reason I propose to send the Bill back to the committee for the purpose of making that correction. I desire to have it sent back for the purpose also of striking out section 7, which, after looking at the matter somewhat carefully, I believe to be unnecessary I will explain my reasons when we are in committee. I move:

That the order for the third reading of Bill (No. 115) be discharged and that the said Bill be referred back to Committee of the Whole House with power to amend the description of the boundaries set forth in the third section and with power to strike out the seventh section.

Motion agreed to, and House went again into committee on the Bill.

Mr. BORDEN. If my hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Pugsley) will direct his attention to section 3 and lines 19 and 20, he will observe the words to which he alluded the other day 'to a certain monument thereon.' The hon. gentleman made the suggestion, to which I attached importance, that the monument was not in any way described. I find on consultation with the Dominion astronomer that the boundary at that point may be changed somewhat by the commission of which Dr. King is a member, to the advantage and convenience of both countries. My hon. friend will observe from the map I have sent him, that the boundary runs north, but it is not by any means in a straight line through the lake. I do not know for what reason that is, but I understand from the Dominion astronomer that the monument to which allusion has been made in the description may eventually, after the commission has reported, be placed at another point. Therefore, I move that the words 'to a certain monument thereon,' in the 19th and 20th lines be struck out and the words 'to the most northerly point thereof,' be substituted. With that amendment, according to the written report I have from the Dominion astronomer, the section will not be capable of misinterpretation.

Mr. PUGSLEY. If I understand the right hon. gentleman (Mr. Borden) this would make that point the most northerly point of the boundary line?

Mr. BORDEN. The international boundary—yes.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Yes, I think that will be sufficient.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. We all understand what is meant by the language of the Bill which is to make the international boundary line the boundary of Manitoba. After having conferred with my right hon. friend and reading the Bill, it seems to me that it would have been quite easy to fix the point by a certain monument placed by a certain authority. But we agree upon what is meant and I think the language is sufficient.

Mr. BORDEN. I think the words should disappear, because that monument may be changed and located in another place on account of the slight rectification of the boundary line which, if it is made, I understand, will be of advantage and convenience to both countries. The map I handed to my hon. friend from St. John, indicates how the international boundary line runs. The point referred to is the most northerly point on the international boundary line. It seems to me that by continuing the line due north—that is the western boundary of Ontario and the eastern boundary of Manitoba—we cannot possibly have any confusion or misinterpretation.

Motion agreed to.

On section 7:

7. Nothing in this Act shall in any way prejudice or affect the rights or properties of the Hudson's Bay Company as contained in the conditions under which that company surrendered Rupert's Land to the Crown.

Mr. BORDEN. I beg to move that section 7 be struck out. The reason is that there is already included in the Manitoba Act, section 34, exactly the same words. I have looked into the question very carefully, and I find that on the three occasions on which the boundaries of a province have been extended, this section has never been introduced. In the Manitoba Act of 1877, which slightly extended the boundaries of the province, in the Manitoba Act of 1881 which extended the boundaries of the province, and in the Act of 1898, which extended the boundaries of the province of Quebec, no such provision was introduced; doubtless for the reason that I have already alluded to. Therefore, I move that the section be struck out.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I think the amendment is well designed. There was no necessity to include that section at all, because, I believe the rights of the Hudson's Bay Company are reserved by Imperial statute. Therefore, this is surplusage. My right hon. friend (Mr. Borden) is not anxious to load his Bill with surplusage, and especially in view of certain other amendments to come later on.

Mr. BORDEN. Nothing unnecessary should be introduced in the Bill.

Amendment agreed to.

Bill as amended reported.

Mr. BORDEN moved third reading of the Bill.

Mr. HUGHES (Kings, Prince Edward Island). Some days ago, when we were in committee, I drew the attention of the government to the case of Prince Edward Island, as regards this Bill, and I did so, relying on the business judgment and good sense of the Minister of Finance (Mr. White) and I hope also of the Prime Minister, that my representations would be heeded. But I have not yet received any assurance to that effect, and therefore, I beg to present my case again. Manitoba, under this Bill, is getting a large sum of money in lieu of her public lands, because she has no public lands, that amount is based upon the population of Manitoba, and will be increased from time to time as her population increases. Now Prince Edward Island stands on exactly the same basis in regard to that matter. That province has no public lands, and never had. This statement can be proved by referring to the statutes of 1873, and to the agreement under which that province came into confederation. Because she had no public lands, she was given a subsidy of $45,000 a year, which is less than 50 cents per head of the population of that province, while Manitoba is to get about $1.25 per head of her population. Therefore, I say in all fairness, the province of Prince Edward Island should be treated in the same way as any other province in the Dominion of Canada, which has no public lands. She stands on exactly the same basis as the three prairie provinces. It seems to me the case is so clear that it only needs to be stated to receive the consideration of the government and of parliament. If Prince Edward Island were treated on the same basis as Manitoba, instead of $45,000, she should receive $120,000. And inasmuch as Manitoba's subsidy is dated back to 1908, I claim in all fairness that the same treatment should be accorded to Prince Edward Island, and that she be given a subsidy dating back to 1908, in which case she would receive in arrears about $300,000. Now I would like to ask the government if they will deal with the case of Prince Edward Island during the present session. There is no reason in the world why her case should be postponed, and why it should not be dealt with at the same time as that of Manitoba. The fact that Manitoba is some 3,000 miles distant affords no reason why she should be dealt with immediately, and the case of Prince Edward Island should be postponed. I should be pleased indeed if the Prime Minister would give me an assurance that he will deal with the case of Prince Edward Island this session, and give her the same treatment that he is giving to Manitoba. And if not, why not?

Mr. MONDOU. I beg to move the following amendment, of which notice has been given:

That Bill (No. 115) be not now read a third time, but be referred back to the Committee of the Whole House in order that the following clause be inserted therein, after clause 7 of the said Bill:—

7a. Section 22 of the Manitoba Act, 1870, 33 Vic., chapter 3, shall apply to the territory added to the province under the provisions of this Act, with the substitution for paragraph 1 of said section 22, of the following paragraph:—

1. Nothing in any such law shall prejudicially affect any right or privilege with respect to denominational or separate schools, which any class or persons have, at the date of the passing of this Act, by law or practice, in the territory added to the province under the provisions of this Act.

Mr. ETHIER. I ask that the amendment be read in French.

(The assistant clerk read the amendment in French).

Mr. HUGHES (Kings).

Mr. A. A. MONDOU (Yamaska). (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, in moving this amendment, I don't intend to address the House at any length. The other evening I had the occasion in Committee of the Whole to make such remarks as in my opinion would justify this amendment. I now deem it preferable to allow a free discussion and to await the verdict of the House upon the amendment which it is my privilege to offer, hoping that the hon. members will acknowledge its importance and give it their approval.

Mr. P. E. LAMARCHE (Nicolet). (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, there is a principle as to which I think every member of the House must agree; that is that we are in duty bound to see that the constitution of Manitoba shall apply not only to Manitoba as it is now, but to the whole province, including the new territory which is to be annexed.

The amendment which the hon. member from Yamaska has just moved proposes to render operative clause 22 of the constitution of Manitoba respecting the protection of educational rights.

The first objection in the part of some hon. members of this House will probably be that the constitution of Manitoba, as a whole, would be operative even in the absence of any clause to that effect.

As a principle, I grant that the very fact of annexing this new territory to Manitoba should put it under the constitution of 1870, and that all constitutional clauses applying to Manitoba should apply as well to the new territory to be added.

But, in this case, the operation of this principle becomes completely inefficient for the protection of educational rights, because subsection 1 of section 22 safeguarding the minority's rights acknowledges only those rights which existed at the time of confederation and within the proper limits of Manitoba. That section reads as follows:

Nothing in any such law shall prejudicially affect any right or privilege with respect to denominational schools which any class of persons have by law or practice in the province at the union.

Consequently, there is in that section two restrictions which render it impossible to enforce this statute in an efficient manner in the new territory which is to be added to the province.

The amendment offered by my hon. friend the member from Yamaska alters that section without changing its nature or meaning, so as to remedy those deficiencies, thus permitting the constitution of Manitoba to become operative in the new territory. Were it not for that necessary change, a resident of that part of Keewatin annexed to Manitoba would later on come here and ask for the schools of that district the protection afforded by subsection 1 of section 22, and we would answer him: Section 22 affords you protection, because you had no rights at the time of the union nor in the former territory of Manitoba.

I may be asked whether the government of Canada is authorized to change or alter the constitution of Manitoba. Section 6 of the British North America Act, 1871, reads as follows:

Except as provided by the third section of this Act, it shall not be competent for the parliament of Canada to alter the provisions of the last mentioned Act of the said parliament of Canada, in so far as it relates to the province of Manitoba, or of any other Act hereafter establishing new provinces in the said Dominion, subject always to the right of the legislature of the province of Manitoba to alter from time to time the provisions of any law respecting the qualification of electors and member of the Legislative Assembly, and to make laws respecting elections in the said province.

There is no doubt that by that section the federal government is debarred from altering in any way the constitution of Manitoba. However, there is a restriction provided by the words 'except as provided by the third section of this Act.' Now the third section exactly covers the case with which we are dealing to-day, that is the increase in the area of a province and the operation of any such increase. Section 3 reads as follows:

3. The parliament of Canada may from time to time, with the consent of the legislature of any province of the said Dominion, increase, diminish, or otherwise alter the limits of such province, upon such terms and conditions as may be agreed to by the said legislature, and may, with the like consent, make provision respecting the effect and operation of any such increase, diminution or alteration of territory in relation to any province affected thereby.

So we have, Mr. Speaker, in section 3 which restricts section 6, the authority residing in the federal government of adding such a saving clause as my hon. friend from Yamaska suggests in his amendment; subject, however to the subsequent acceptation of the whole thing by the legislature of Manitoba.

It may be said that such a provision would be inconsistent with section 92 of the British North America Act, whose purpose is to determine the exclusive powers of provincial legislatures.

That objection would be well founded if what the present motion proposes was inconsistent with any provision of section 92 of the British North America Act. But there is nothing inconsistent with the powers of the province of Manitoba in the amendment of my hon. friend from Yamaska. The amendment embodies no new legislation. It merely renders legally operative a section of the constitution of Manitoba safeguarding the right to separate schools. Moreover, the right is acknowledged in the same manner and to the same extent by section 10 of the Northwest Territories Act which is now in force in the district of Keewatin.

The Canadian constitution itself, the British North America Act, also acknowledges the same principle by section 93. Consequently, there is no invasion upon the powers of the province of Manitoba. The laws of Manitoba are merely made operative to the furthest limits of its new territory.

The amendment of my hon. friend from Yamaska is only the legal chain necessary in order that those who live in the present territory of Keewatin shall not, at the same moment, be deprived of the protection given in section 10 of the Northwest Territories Act, which will no more exist when the annexation takes place, and shall not be deprived either of the protection mentioned in section 22 of the Manitoba Act. We must not place the population of this new territory between two legislations, one which is disappearing and the other which, without this amendment will be absolutely ineffective and useless.

It is claimed also that the federal law which governs recently the territories, will exist up to the time when a provincial law will be enacted in its place, and then, if the legislature of Manitoba, in this new legislation, does not respect section 22 of the constitution of the province, recourse might be had to the remedial bill.

To begin with, I do not admit that the present laws of Keewatin could continue to exist after the annexation. This principle is true according to the international law, when we deal with a conquered country; then the existing laws remain in force up to the time the new legislator enacts a positive law. But in the present case we must look at the constitutional theory. The laws that we have just discussed, the Keewatin laws, just as the Manitoba laws, are all territorial laws; and if we annex a portion of one territory to another, we at the same time free that portion from the legislative authority under which it was before to put it, without reservation, under the laws of the territory to which we annex it and which becomes thus the competent authority 'ratione loci.'

If it is true that this annexed portion of territory should continue to have the same laws as before the annexation, there would be thus two legislations in force in the same country; it would be a legal anomaly.

But even supposing that this theory is true, and that provincial legislation would be necessary to change the existing law, this provincial legislation would not in any way permit the remedial bill to apply to the annexed portion, for the good reason that without the present amendment, the constitution of Manitoba does not protect any minority rights in the new country, as already mentioned; and the Manitoba government would not be bound to protect the educational rights of the minorities in the Keewatin, because they are not included in the rights mention in section 22, as we find it presently in the statute.

The principle which is contained in the amendment of my hon. friend is not a new one. It has always been respected and protected by restrictive enactments since the confederation inclusively, up to the present time, when new territories were created or annexed. Let us read the first subsection of section 93 of the British North America Act:

(I) Nothing in any such laws shall prejudicially effect any right or privilege with respect to denominational schools which any class of persons have by law in the province at the union.

We find the same principle in section 22 of the Manitoba Act, when this province was created. It reads thus:

(I) Nothing in any such laws shall prejudicially effect any right or privilege with respect to denominational schools which any class of persons have by law in the province at the union.

We find the same principle in section 17 of the constitution of Alberta:

(17) Nothing in any such law shall prejudicially effect any right or privilege with respect to separate schools which any class of persons have at the date of the passing of this Act, under the terms of chapters 29 and 30 of the Ordinances of the Northwest Territories, passed in the year 1901, or with respect to religious instruction in any public or separate school as provided for in the said ordinances.

The same enactment is found also in article 17 of the constitution of the Saskatchewan:

(17) Nothing in any such law shall prejudicially effect any right or privilege with respect to separate schools which any class of persons have at the date of the passing of this Act, under the terms of chapters 29 and 30 of the Ordinances of the Northwest Territories, passed in the year 1901, or with respect to religious instruction in any public or separate school as provided for in the said ordinances.

The same principle is also enacted, though the terms differ in section 14 of the Yukon Act:

The Commissioner in Council shall pass all necessary ordinances in respect to education; but it shall therein always be provided that a majority of the ratepayers of any district or portion of the territory or of any less portion of subdivision thereof, by whatever name the same is known, may establish such schools therein as they think fit, and make the necessary assessment and collection of rates therefor; and also that the minority of the ratepayers therein, whether Protestant or Roman Catholic, may establish separate schools therein, and in such case, the ratepayers establishing such Protestant or Roman Catholic separate schools shall be liable only to assessments of such rates as they impose upon themselves in respect thereof.

This principle, Mr. Speaker, is the principle of equity and justice; it has always been respected since confederation in all our federal laws. The application of this principle, specially in the present case, could hardly be called coercion to a province of the confederation. On the contrary it is the principle which is consecrated in the very constitution of that province, and also in the territorial laws of the country which we are about to annex. We ask only from this House to put the necessary hyphen so that these two similar legislations should be as soldered together in such a way that they would be applied completely and uniformly to all the territory without distinction whatever.

If this House rejects this amendment, which I believe absolutely necessary, if we want to extend to the new territory the constitutional principle of the Manitoba Act in matters of education, then let us at the same time deprive it of the rights enacted in the law on the territories, which will no more exist; then we will have sanctioned the principle that for the first time we will have isolated a part of our national domain, without granting to it the benefit of uniform legislation which has always been followed up to the present time, and which protects all the minorities, whether Catholic or Protestant.

Mr. MACDONALD. Mr. Speaker, I do not rise for the purpose of discussing in detail the amendment proposed by my hon. friend from Nicolet (Mr. Lamarche), but I would like to call the attention of the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) to a question that appears to me to require explanation in connection with this amendment. This Bill which has come out of committee does not contain any provision whatever with regard to the enactment of legislation which is to be in force in the province of Manitoba. I assume that the legislation in the greater Manitoba to be created under this Act will be made by the province under the powers which were conferred upon that province by the Act of 1870. That being so, the province of Manitoba had the power, under section 22, to deal with education in the way in which the Act of 1870 provides. It is perhaps as well I should read this section in order that we may understand its object and effect. Section 22 of the Manitoba Act is as follows:

In and for the province, the said legislature may exclusively make laws in relation to education, subject and according to the following provisions:—

1. Nothing in any such law shall prejudicially affect any right or privilege with respect to denominational schools which any class of persons have by law or practice in the province at the union.

This is the section which my hon. friend proposes to amend by substituting the words which appear in the Votes and Proceedings of to-day as well as in the motion in the hands of Mr. Speaker. subsection 2 is as follows:

An appeal shall lie to the Governor General in Council from any Act or decision of the legislature of the province, or of any provincial authority, affecting any right or privilege of the Protestant or Roman Catholic minority of the Queen's subjects in relation to education.

Subsection 3, I need not read in detail because it contains in terms the power which is reserved to the federal parliament to entertain an appeal from the minority in the province in case it appears that their rights are prejudically affected, the section so well known on account of the fact that it was interpreted by the Privy Council in what has long been known as the Manitoba school case. It would appear to me that the amendment of my hon. friend from Nicolet is one which is entirely superfluous because, if this section 22 of the original Manitoba Act is the law in the province to-day and will, as I assume, be the law of that province when Keewatin is added to it, then the proposal of my hon. friend that we should pass a resolution declaring that section 22 of the Manitoba Act should apply to the added territory is entirely unnecessary. That seems to me to be the view which ought to be entertained. I rise for the purpose of asking the Minister of Justice to discuss this question which I think is one of very great importance, and I think the House is entitled to know what the opinion of the government is upon this question as well as on the matter contained in the resolution.

Hon. C. J. DOHERTY (Minister of Justice). Mr. Speaker, replying first to the question put to me by the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald), I think I may say that I quite concur in his suggestion that the amendment moved is superfluous. Of course, if there do not to-day exist rights in the annexed territory susceptible of being protected by article 22 of the Manitoba Act, then the amendment can serve no practical purpose. If, on the other hand, there be rights in existence in the territory sought to be added to the province of Manitoba at the time of the coming into force of this Act, as described in article 22 of the Manitoba Act, for myself I would have no doubt that these rights would be protected by section 22 of the Manitoba Act. It is quite true that section 22 of the Manitoba Act, when it spoke of the time of the union, necessarily had in view the territory that constituted the province of Manitoba as then formed, and in speaking of the date of the union it was necessarily speaking of the day at which that new province of Manitoba as then formed became a member of the confederation. I do not think that it is susceptible of doubt that the Manitoba Act, the Act that creates and governs Manitoba to-day, will govern the Manitoba that shall be composed of the old territory, and of the added territory just as it governed the original territory. I do not think there can be any doubt that it will have application in the new territory as it had in the old and, that being so, you could only apply it, so far as the new territory is concerned, as the facts permit of its application. It manifestly is applied to this additional territory as from the passing of the Act for section 22 could have no possible application at the period of the original union, except to the originally constituted province to the territory comprised in it, at the original entry of the province into the Dominion. It, therefore, must either have no application throughout the territory of the extended province, the territory added to the province by its becoming extended, or it must apply to it as from the date when the extended or enlarged province comes into the union. The Bill which is submitted hereafter defining the limits of the extended territory of the province, adds:

All the land embraced by the said description not now within the province of Manitoba, shall, from and after the commencement of this Act, be added thereto and the whole shall, from and after the said commencement, form and be the province of Manitoba.

So that we have a starting point from which this increased territory embodied in the province of Manitoba first comes into the union, and, that being so, if there be rights in that portion of the territory such as are contemplated by section 22 of the statute—and it is only such rights that can be preserved as I understand it—those rights would be protected under section 22 just as fully and effectively as they possibly could be protected under the amendment which is proposed. I think this fully answers the question of the hon. member for Pictou. It, moreover, affords in my judgment sufficient reason why the amendment of the hon. member for Yamaska should be rejected.

It is perhaps, however, proper that I should deal more fully with the question which that amendment raises.

I shall not weary the House by going over statutes that have already been cited. After all the question that presents itself in connection with this amendment and with the measure as a whole, so far as the existence of school rights are concerned in it, is purely and simply a question of law. Personally, I am in full and entire sympathy with the sentiment that stands behind the action of the gentlemen who have felt it their duty to move this amendment and to express themselves in connection with the school matter as opposed to the action of the government. Rights are very sacred things; they are sacred things when they are the rights of a majority, they are sacred things when they are the rights of a minority, they are sacred things when they are the rights of an individual. My hon. friend from Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) the other evening in a more or less sneering way attributed the action of my hon. friend the member for Nicolet, to some extent to promises which he suggested I had made that gentleman. I have made no promises to that gentleman or to anybody else, but with or without promises I would feel it just as much my duty to stand up here to speak in defence of rights of any class, be it large or small, of the people of this country as if I had pledged myself in the most emphatic way. The action of the government in this matter is not taken because the government does not recognize as incumbent on it the duty of protecting the constitutional rights of every class of people in this country. It is not a wise policy on the part of any class of people to raise an outcry for the protection of rights which they represent to be attacked without first ascertaining whether there are such rights and whether in consequence it is possible that there be such an attack, to be repelled. I know that many men in dealing with this subject have not been chary of expressing their most unqualified judgments on the motives of other men by reason of the course they took with regard to this particular question. I do not judge the motives of any man, I recognize the absolute sincerity of men who take very strong ground that there is a duty upon this government in this regard. I recognize their absolute sincerity even when I cannot admire the violence of their language. My own experience is that strong cases do not need strong language to support them and that weak cases never gather strength from it.

I have said that it is not good policy for any class in the community to start an outcry against an alleged attack on rights without first verifying the existence of the rights and the fact of their being attacked and put in danger. I have said that whether there are or are not rights to be protected in this territory is a pure question of law, because I quite understand that nobody is contending that unless there be constitutional rights vested by law in some portion of these territories, there is anything to be discussed. We are not here to discuss what may be our respective views with regard to the rights of people as an abstract question concerning the education of their children. If we were, I have no disguise to make of what my views are. I believe it is the natural, absolute right of every man to have his children educated in the method his conscience prescribes to him as the right method, and I have no doubt in my mind that there is a violation of natural right every time any man is hindered in the exercise of that right. I entertain the very strongest belief that wherever a man is taxed to support schools which his conscience forbids him to use, a grave injustice is done. But I am not here to discuss that, I do not want to open any discussion as to whether I am right or wrong in that regard. I know there are people who entertain the opinion that it is better that the state itself should establish one system of schools and that all children should follow that system of instruction. But that question does not arise in this connection in the slightest degree. The question that does arise, which has been the source of a very great deal of strong feeling and which has given to many of us who have a sense of responsibility much matter for careful thought is the question whether in this territory that is going to be annexed to Manitoba there are existing rights established by law and which would require for their protection the inclusion of some special provision in this legislation. To my mind there is an absolute misapprehension on the part of those who censure the course that this government has taken because of its failure to act in connection with the alleged constitutional rights existing in that territory as to the real effect of the statute, upon the dispositions of which they base their claim. Now, when one feels called upon to do a duty to the whole people of this country, or a duty to any particular class of the people who may have special claims upon him for in connection with their rights—

EXTENSION OF BOUNDARIES—MANITOBA.

House resumed on motion for third reading of Bill (No. 115) to provide for the extension of the boundaries of the province of Manitoba.

Mr. DOHERTY. I was about to say when I was interrupted by the summons of a higher authority, that when one is called upon, or is expected and feels it his duty, to especially interest himself in the protection of the rights or the interests of any particular class of his fellow countrymen, or feels a special call to protect some special general interest possibly of all his countrymen, he owes to them more than zeal and more than readiness to devote himself to those rights or interests, and more than willingness to make sacrifices if it be necessary. He owes to those fellow countrymen also the exercise of his very best judgment as to what is the best course to be pursued for the protection of the rights or the interests that may have been entrusted or confided to him. He owes to them likewise—whenever it may have happened that his own particular training may have put him in a position where he ought at all events to be able to form a sound judgment upon any particular question, by reason of its nature being such as to make the training he has received of some use perhaps in aiding a man to arrive at a just conclusion—that he should not shirk his duty, and should not draw back in the face of the conclusions that the exercise of that best judgment of his, aided by the training I have referred to, may lead him to upon that particular question. And he is not doing his duty to those who look to him to specially protect their rights or interests, if he thinks first of saying the thing that will please them, of saying the thing that he would be glad and happy if he were able to truthfully say. He owes it to those people to honestly tell them the result of his inquiries as to the nature or existence of the rights to which they lay claim, and he owes it to them, whether it pleases them at the moment or not, to adopt the course that his judgment tells him, in view of the conclusions that he has so reached, is the best and the wisest for the ultimate protection of those rights. I have endeavoured, Mr. Speaker, to remember those things in my dealing with this particular question. As I have said this is a question of law: Whether there are, or are not, the rights that are claimed to exist. We have the answer to that question to seek, not in the inspiration of our sentiments, but in the pages of our statute-books, and we have got to guard ourselves, in interpreting what those statute-books tell us, against allowing the wish to be father to the thought. I am afraid there are too many men expounding the law in the newspapers, and upon the public platforms of this country, to whom I have no greater reproach to make than that they have allowed their wish to be father to their thought. I have said that I would not worry this House by quoting all the statutes that bear upon this question. Most of them have been already dealt with, and dealt with in a manner that I think, to any fair-minded person, would justify the conclusion that they do not establish the existence of the legal rights which are claimed to exist. I cannot, however, refrain from making some mention of them. I will ask this House, and I will ask those who may do me the honour of reading what I have to say, to trust me in that I am not going to misrepresent them, and I am quite willing that any one, who feels sufficient interest, should verify whether I have or have not done so. We are told that there are rights in this particular territory, because by a statute of 1875 in an Act regarding the Northwest Territories, it was provided that when a system of taxation should be established in the Territories as governed by that Act, that then an officer to whom the government of that territory was committed, could, acting with a council, which the Governor in Council here might give to him, and which council, it was provided, should gradually, as the country grew, come to be an elective legislative assembly, make laws regarding education, and that in all of those laws it should in substance be provided that there should be recognized to any religious minority the right to establish a system of schools of its own, and that when it did so it should not be liable to be taxed for any general system. I am not pretending to give the precise words of the statute—I have no hesitation in saying I am giving the sense—but we are told in the first place that because of that provision there are rights to-day to separate schools in the territory that is about to be annexed. With regard to that I have nothing to say except that as concerns by far the larger portion of the territory to be annexed—some 128,000 square miles, I think, out of a total of 178,000 square miles—that statute never had any application. I am speaking now of that statute as originally enacted. Before that statute came into force another Act was passed providing for and setting aside as a separate district what was called the District of Keewatin. This Act refrained from enacting, as regards that district, any of the provisions of the Act applicable to the Northwest Territories generally, the Act of 1875, which contemplated there ever coming into existence representative institutions or contained any enactment regarding schools. This second Act, so far as this large portion of the territory to be annexed is concerned, remained in force without doubt and without possible question until 1905. I have no doubt that it remained in force until the 1st January, 1907, but I do not want to enter into discussion about debatable things; it is not necessary. To my mind the conclusion which I have not sought to reach but which has been forced upon me, is too clear to make it worth while to stop for possible debatable points on the way—this Act so remaining in effect.

The statute of 1875, as I have said, never was in force in this portion of the territory. It certainly is not susceptible of being suggested that any portion of it had any force therein before the summer of 1905; and for my part, as I say, I have no doubt that no portion of it had any force therein at any time. I say that for this reason: That statute, save so much of it as was left in chap. 62 of the Revised Statutes of 1906, was repealed by the Act concerning the Revised Statutes of 1906, precisely in the same manner as stated by my hon. friend from Nicolet (Mr. Lamarche)—was repealed by the other Act I have mentioned, the Keewatin Act. He is quite right in that respect. That Act did repeal the Keewatin Act; and from the coming into force of the Revised Statutes in 1907, neither the Keewatin Act nor the Northwest Territories Act, as originally enacted in 1875, had the force of law anywhere.

But it is contended—and, I understand some weight ought to be attached to it as making some difference in the purpose of this amendment—that an order in council of July, 1905, annexed this territory of Keewatin to the Northwest Territories and thereby brought into force in Keewatin all the laws that were in force in the Northwest Territories at that time, this statute of 1875, so far as the law was concerned, and the ordinances enacted in the Northwest Territories under that law of 1875. Now, I quite agree with what was pointed out the other evening by the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Monk), that that order was on its face ultra vires. If you read it, you will see that it sets forth that whereas by a proviso in this Keewatin Act permission was given to the Governor in Council to detach a portion of Keewatin and annex it to the Northwest Territories, therefore the Governor in Council annexes the whole of Keewatin to the Northwest Territories. Now, I have seen it said since, as a triumphant answer on this point, that when the Governor in Council said he annexed the whole of Keewatin, it was entirely a mistake,—he was only annexing a portion of it. And the triumphant answer is this, —that the Governor in Council first, in 1886, under that power, did detach a portion of Keewatin and annexed it to the Northwest Territory; and therefore it is said, when he came in 1905 to annex—not to detach; you cannot detach a thing from itself—to annex the whole of Keewatin, he was only annexing a portion of Keewatin; it was annexed in two portions, and this was the second and remaining portion. So, we are told, the thing that the Governor in Council could not have done if he had done it at one stroke, was perfectly valid,—because he had made two bites of the cherry; he had annexed this territory bit by bit. To state that is a sufficient answer. But there is more. When this first portion was cut off the balance was the whole of Keewatin. In statutes afterwards enacted we have the Keewatin Act reproduced, still containing this proviso, that portions of the existing Keewatin might be cut off. But you will not find anywhere in any of these statutes authority by order in council to destroy Keewatin. So that, to my mind, it is perfectly clear that the only portion of this Northwest Territories Act which ever came into force in Keewatin, is the portion that remains to us in chapter 62 of the revised statutes of 1906. Because Keewatin, and what remained of the Northwest Territories were no doubt grouped together by that chapter, as constituting the Northwest Territories.

But by that time there had come a great change in this Act of 1875, a most noteworthy change, and particularly in this section about education. The original provision was that when there should be established a system of taxation in the Northwest Territories, then the Commissioner in Council, or the commissioner with the advice of the legislative assembly (when it grew to be a legislative assembly), might make these laws with regard to education, and these should be subject to the restriction provided. By 1880 that system of taxation had been established; and consequently, by the statute of 1885, parliament amended that section 11 by striking out the portion which said ' when a system of taxation shall be established,'—because that had been accomplished. And, because it had been accomplished already in 1880, parliament made that amendment take effect back in 1880. So that the law as it then stood was that the commissioner or the Lieutenant Governor, as it was then—the Lieutenant Governor in Council, or with the advice of the legislative assembly, could make these laws, or should make these laws, and they should be subject to the restriction I have referred to. That condition of affairs remained in the Northwest Territories practically until 1905, when out of the Northwest Territories were carved the two provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta. That left the residue of what had formerly been the territories and left standing Keewatin. In 1905, after the two new provinces had been carved out of the territory, then parliament did enact a law amending the Northwest Territories Act, and in that statute it altered the provisions with regard to education and altered them so as to limit the power of the commissioner to make laws about education at all to the case where he should be authorized to do it, that authorization to come from the Governor in Council here. That provision was reproduced in the Northwest Territories Act, as it was reproduced in the revised statutes of 1906. And in 1906 Keewatin was taken into what constituted, under the statute of 1906, the Northwest Territories and was subject to that law which contained that provision. And that is the whole law—subject to the amendment of 1907, which is not material to the purpose of this question,—that is the whole law in which one can find what is called the constitution of what is to-day the Northwest Territories, including Keewatin, and including the entire territory which is to be annexed to Manitoba.

Now what is that law? There is one substantive, operative clause in that law, and only one—I wish to be understood as regards the method of government of the Northwest Territories; there are other dispositions that produce their effect, but we are concerned with the method of government and the laws to be made in the Northwest Territories. This is found in section 4, and that was amended by the statute of 1907:

> The executive powers vested by the Northwest Territories Act and amendments thereto in the Lieutenant Governor of the Northwest Territories, or in the Lieutenant Governor of the Northwest Territories in Council, on the 31st day of August 1905, shall be exercised by the commisionser, and the commissioner shall administer the government of the territories under instructions from time to time given him by the Governor in Council, or by the minister.

There are a number of other provisions, among them the provision to which I have already referred. All those provisions deal with powers which may be exercised by this commissioner who is to be named, with his council, when the Governor in Council shall have deemed it advisable to give him a council. Those powers extend to legislation with regard to such matters, roughly speaking, as are covered by provincial powers, and as may be designated to him by the Governor in Council; and there is the power to deal with this question of education when authorized so to do by the Governor in Council. Now I do not think that it requires any elaboration of argument to show that until the Governor in Council exercised that power of giving a council to this commissioner and authorizing him to legislate, there was no governing body with legislative power in existence in the territories. The commissioner was there, and he is there still; he was there with the executive powers which the original Northwest Territories Act had vested in the Lieutenant Governor, and that power, if one goes back to the Northwest Territories Act, was practically to act under instructions of the Governor in Council. Now no council was ever given to this commissioner, no authority was ever given to him to legislate about education or about anything else; and where there was no legislative power to legislate about education, there could not be a restriction of that power. The amendment to be found in chapter 32 of the statutes of 1907, does not refer to any practical question here concerned. Now, there is the whole of the operative constitution of these territories. The Governor in Council could have created a constitution, not a constitution providing for representative institutions, but a constitution under which these territories would have been legislated for and governed. The Governor in Council at no time did it. I am not saying that as criticising the action of past governments. If parliament contented itself by giving power to the Governor in Council to do this, and did not do it directly, it must have been simply because parliament felt that the time had not come to put that into operation; or whatever its reason was, it judged it wise not to put it into operation itself but simply to create this power in the Governor in Council.

If one looks back to the things that were said at the very beginning when the Act of 1875 and the Act of 1876 were enacted, I think one finds the explanation. We were referred the other evening to some remarks of the Hon. Edward Blake explanatory of what this legislation of 1875 was going to do, for the purpose of basing a claim that this was legislation to be of a perpetual character, and once for all settled the school question. Now, if one goes back to the debates on the Act of 1875, and the debates on the Act of 1876, he will find, I think, the explanation why parliament, in 1906, acted the way it did. It is to be found in the reasons given for the enactment of the Keewatin Act. The Hon. Edward Blake, in dealing with that Act, and explaining the differences between it and the Northwest Territories Act, pointed out—and this is important—that this educational clause in the Northwest Territories Act never could be effective until there was a system of taxation established. He went on to say that that of course implies a system of representative institutions, and that, therefore, they had given to the Northwest Territories a rudimentary system of representative institutions. As explaining the Keewatin Act, he went on to say that for the few people outside of these territories they did not deem it necessary to provide a constitution at present; and he added that the purpose of this legislation with regard to Keewatin was to preserve the status quo till she should come to have provincial rights. Now, there is no doubt that at that time it was believed that in a very short time this very annexation would take place. That appears to be evident from the discussion which took place at that time. But I refer to that because I think there was the reason in 1905 or 1906, after the provinces had been carved out of the territories, not to consider that there was a necessity for putting into operation a system of government there, that is to say, for the few people that were living in this little section cut off from Saskatchewan and Alberta, and made one with Keewatin proper; there was no occasion to create a system of government or any legislative body. It remained simply with the commissioner, acting under the direction of the Governor in Council, or the Minister of the Interior.

Now, in that state of affairs this section about making laws with respect to education was not operative. If a constitution had ever been given to them, that would have been in it, but a constitution never was given to them. The time never came when the Governor in Council judged it necessary to give them a constitution—and as I said before, I am not criticising the actions of past governments in that respect. So far as I can ascertain, from the census of 1911, the actual total white population in the territory in question is in the neighbourhood of 600 people, scattered over this immense area.

I do not think that anybody could reasonably find fault with the government, because it did not consider it was desirable or necessary to establish a legislative body to make laws for a few people in that territory. The very same reasons that were given as regards Keewatin in 1876, existed equally for not putting into force and operation the provisions of this Act of 1906 and they never have been put into force. So that I can reach no other conclusion than that there is no constitution, no system of government in the Territories, except the government of the commissioner under instructions of the Governor in Council or of the Minister of the Interior. In so far as I have been able to find that statement seems to correspond with what has actually happened there. There are one or two orders in council, that I am not going to deal with at the present moment, but these do not deal with matters of this kind. So, I feel bound to say to people who, like myself, feel that, if there was a constitution in force in these Territories that gave a right to any minority for the establishment of a system of separate schools, that right ought to be protected. I have no recourse but to say that I, at all events, cannot find where that constitution exists. I have read much about a principle that was laid down. The principle that was laid down has my most hearty support. There is a principle involved in the section which provides for the making of laws as to education. But that section never came into operation, and the mere enunciation of a principle does not generate legal rights. If it were not for the very great respect I have for many, I may say all of the people who have fallen into this, in my judgment, error, I would say it is only living in a fool's paradise to flatter yourself with the contention that you can find in this Act the establishment of those rights.

Mr. PROULX. Is the minister aware of the opinion expressed by Mr. Cahan, the eminent lawyer of Montreal?

Mr. DOHERTY. I am very glad to join with my hon. friend (Mr. Proulx) in describing Mr. Cahan as an eminent lawyer of Montreal, but, lawyers' opinions, in the opinion of other lawyers, have been at times quite misaken. They say that doctors differ. The very condition of the existence of lawyers is that they should differ. Of course, I do not set myself up to be more competent to speak than another, but I do say that my duty is to act according to my judgment and with a realization of my share of the responsibility of those upon whom the people have laid the burden of governing this country. I shall not be frightened away from the doing of that duty even by the opinions of lawyers as eminent as my hon. friend recognizes Mr. Cahan to be, and still less shall I be frightened away from doing my duty by the lawyers who edit daily papers, the lawyers who write from the press gallery and the lawyers who talk from the public platform. Here, in this House, we should have, and I believe we all have, a realization of the fact that we are dealing with this question with the responsibility of the men who have to act and we are not afraid to live up to that responsibility. To my mind that is the common duty of this parliament. The governing system of those Territories was that they were governed by a commissioner under the direction of the Minister of the Interior. If a great many other things had happened there would have been a legislative power in these Territories, that legislative power could have made education laws and, if it had, these education laws would have had to contain the restriction I speak of.

Mr. CHISHOLM (Antigonish). Although separate schools have not been established in these territories, is it not a fact that they have the right to separate schools—call it an inchoate right, if you like?

Mr. DOHERTY. If there had ever come to be a body answering the description here of the Commissioner in Council, then it would have had the power of making laws in regard to education, and everybody within the territories would have had the right to have a law providing for separate schools. But, I cannot myself see that anybody in the territories has the right to compel the putting into operation of that constitution. In other words, in my judgment, all those provisions which are described as a constitution are an unrealized project. The Keewatin Act, I must say, gave no such power at all, and we were told that it was introduced for the purpose of maintaining the status quo until that territory should become entitled to provincial rights. The purpose was not the establishment of a school system before Keewatin went into the territories, and I think it is pretty fairly conceded that there never were, up to the time of the alleged annexation, any rights in existence. That leaves me to deal with the situation which was created by this annexation or the joining of Keewatin, and the balance of the Northwest Territories. Whether by order in council, or whether under the revised statutes, it is laid down as not admitting of doubt that the effect of the bringing together of Keewatin and the balance of the territories was to bring into effective operation throughout both those territories, not only this Act that I have just referred to, but the ordinances that had been enacted in those territories before the provinces were carved out of them. I would like to believe that if I could. I see it stated as a quotation from the statute, I see it stated that the statute of 1906 said that every ordinance that ever had been passed by the legislative power of the territories was in force in the new Northwest Territories. That is cited in big type as the text of the statute. Now, what was the text of the statute? Section 13 reads:

All laws and ordinances in force in the territories, and not inconsistent with this Act, or repealed by the operation of the Act passed in the third year of His Majesty's reign, chapter sixty-one, and intituled, An Act respecting the Revised Statutes of Canada, shall remain in force until it is otherwise provided or ordered by the parliament of Canada, or by the Governor in Council or the Commissioner in Council.

It is claimed that under that section the old ordinances in the Northwest Territories in regard to education remained in force in that portion of the territories that was cut off and, being so in force in that portion of those territories, came into force in Keewatin. In regard to the annexation of Keewatin, if you could say that the order in council was valid, then I would be disposed to admit that in so far as this ordinance was in force in the balance of the territories after 1905, it is now in force in Keewatin. But, I do not think that order in council was valid.

By the statue of 1906 all that is declared is that those ordinances which are in force in the territories remained in force. Where they were not in force they could not remain in force, so that to my mind it is absolutely unquestionable that the ordinances were never in force in the territory called Keewatin. But I do not want to insist on that overmuch, because under that section of the Act, the education ordinances were manifestly not in force in the balance of the territories and even if you say that Keewatin was under the same ordinances as the balance of the territory the educational ordinance was not in force. And why? The reason is on the face of it, it was not consistent with the Act. Those ordinances were enacted by a legislative council which subsequently became a legislative assembly. They were and could be enacted only when there came to be in force in the territories a system of taxation; and as Mr. Blake said: That cannot be, until you have a system of representative institutions.

The ordinances enacted by the legislative council or assembly could only be carried out by a regularly constituted government. The department of instruction was to be administered by one of the ministers of the Territories, and his consent and intervention was necessary for the carrying out of these education ordinances. Then too, funds for the upkeep of such schools could only be provided by taxation levied by a legislative assembly and council. The Act, to which I have referred, abolished the assembly and council, in the Territories, and provided for the appointment of an executive officer in the Territories to be under the instructions of the Governor General in Council. The Act contains a clause to the effect that ordinances not inconsistent with it, shall remain in force. How can it be said under the circumstances which I have just explained that the school ordinances are not inconsistent with that Act? I have seen some references to people who had distorted statutes in order that they might hold portfolios. I am afraid there are some people who utterly misapprehend statutes because they are bound to find in them what they are looking for; and I do not blame them over much, because I am going to be honest and say that I started to look into these statutes looking for what they were looking for, but I did not find it. So I say there is your constitution in these Territories, there are your laws in force in these Territories, there are your rights by not protecting which we are said to have failed in our duty. We have failed in no duty in not striving to safeguard what did not exist. All we have failed to do is to allow ourselves in a vain effort to protect what was not there to be protected, to be led to doing what it was a fact known to everybody would generate opposition and contention and strife. I am not afraid of opposition, contention or strife, when there is right at stake, which I can do something to protect. I shall be ready to take my share of it, but I am not of those who believe that, when your judgment tells you that you are asked to fight for something which has no real existence, you have the right to take the risk of creating turmoil and opposition and divergence of opinion among the people of this country. I say that from the point of view of the country as a whole, and from the point of view of the minority who are being persuaded that their rights are being taken from them under this legislation, and I say to them as one of them, as a man who sympathizes with their sentiments as profoundly as any man can: 'My friends, it is not wise to be crying wolf, wolf, all the time before you are sure the wolf is there. There is an old fable that tells the fate of the children who were given to that diversion. I would commend it to the consideration of those who, great as is my respect for their sincerity, I cannot help feeling have allowed themselves to be carried away by their sentiment, some of them perhaps, by if I would permit myself to say, an over-weening confidence in their own capacity to determine all questions that may affect the minority in this country. And to the gentlemen who sit in this House, and who share my feelings and share my sentiments I would appeal in the face of the possibility of their being called cowards and traitors to have the courage to stand up for the sake of the minority in this country, and not join in a movement that can only produce the result of placing that minority before their fellow countrymen in the position of having started a struggle and a contest and strife with no better basis than a mistaken notion of what the law of this country was.

I have said that if the view can be entertained that because there is a principle enacted in the provisions of that unrealized project of a constitution which recognizes the principle of the separate school, that constitutes a right in these territories, then I am prepared to say, and to say particularly to the mover and seconder of this resolution, and to all those with whom I stand in sympathy upon this question, that they have in the provision of the statutes of Manitoba, under whose control this new territory is going to pass, an absolute, an ample, a perfect protection for any right that actually exists within that territory, and I say that while we have a right to expect, and we do expect, from every man in this country that he shall recognize the constitutional rights of those from whom he differs, we have no right to ask, we have at least no right to demand more than recognition of our constitutional rights. And inasmuch as the constitution of Manitoba gives protection to such rights as may exist and are susceptible of constitutional protection I do not believe it is right that we should ask from those who differ from us with regard to what is desirable with reference to a system of schools, that they should join with us in adding something more than the constitution calls for. If, as I am convinced, the amendment sought to be made to this Bill means nothing more than the constitution of Manitoba means, then it is an absolutely useless procedure, and we all know that it is in human nature that every effort to impose express restrictions by one man on another is irritating, and provocative of discussion and retaliation and difficulties. That is not the way to induce a man to do the thing that you have no power to compel him to do, to make a vain effort to tell him that he must do it.

From that point of view I would ask my hon. friend who has proposed this amendment, and such hon. gentlemen as may feel disposed, because of their sharing the sentiments which I share, to support it, to withhold that support. And now I have nothing else to add. We who feel this way on this question may claim at all events that while we have striven to do and while we believe we have done our whole duty to those who share our feelings and our views on this educational question, we have also striven to make it clear to our friends in Manitoba that we have no desire to impose upon them any restriction that the constitution of this country does not impose upon them. I may perhaps venture to say to my friends from Manitoba that it would be a not unfitting recognition on their part if on some not distant day, giving thought to the situation in that province, they came to realize that those with whom those who have acted as we have acted especially sympathize, are not enjoying the full liberty which they are entitled to or to which they aspire, (not that we ask for any promise or any guarantee from them), they should, in dealing with that question, so act as to show themselves not less generous in recognizing the rights, or the claims, if you do not choose to call them rights, of the class of people with whom we are particularly in sympathy, than I think we may claim to have proved ourselves, in our present action in their regard.

Mr. D. O. LESPERANCE (Montmagny). Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to speak at length on the subject now before this House, but I feel it my duty to say a few words in explanation of the vote I am to give in favour of the adoption of the Bill providing for the extension of the boundaries of Manitoba.

I shall not dwell on the financial terms that have been agreed upon between the government of Manitoba and the federal government. These questions have been fully discussed by more experienced men than myself, on both sides of the House. I shall, therefore, confine my remarks to the clause, or rather, to the absence of the clause that, in the opinion of some of my esteemed colleagues on this side of the House, would safeguard the rights of the minority.

We have been told, Sir, because Manitoba had not lived up to the constitution granted to her in 1870 as regards the rights of the minority, in matters of education, that the time has come for us when we should be, in duty and honour bound to vote against the present Bill, unless some amendment is inserted therein, protecting these rights.

I wish to say right here, Sir, that if the province of Manitoba had at its head to-day the men who are responsible for the abolition of the separate schools in that province, I would hesitate to vote for the present Bill, if only as a protest, unless some guarantee were included therein providing for the future protection of the school rights of the minority in that territory to be annexed.

But what is the present situation? We have to-day in the men who govern Manitoba, and the men who form part of the federal administration, the very men, or the successors of them, who stood for the rights of the minority, who fought bravely and went down to defeat for those rights, while the hon. the leader of the opposition resorted to the famous tactics that gave him power, it is true, but at the expense of the rights and privileges of the minority in the province of Manitoba. In passing, I wish to say to the right hon. the leader of the opposition, with all due respect to his great personality, that history will pass a very different judgment on the result attained by the great English general and the result attained by the hon. the leader of the opposition. In fighting behind the lines of Torres Vedras the great Wellington was fighting for the very life of his country, while the right hon. gentleman was fighting to prevent the execution of a judgment rendered by the highest tribunal in the empire. Still 15 years after, we hear the hon. the leader of the opposition tell this House and the whole country, while the rights of minorities are being discussed in this parliament, that he is still sitting comfortably behind the lines of Torres Vedras. I wish to assure the right hon. gentleman that so far as we are concerned on this side of the House, he and his party may stay there for 15 years longer and more, if they so desire. But these tactics shall never again win them over the confidence of the people of Canada.

While voting with the government on this question, I do not wish my vote to be construed as a vote against the sacred rights of minorities in all that pertains to the education of the child. It is claimed by great constitutional lawyers that in the territory of Keewatin, now to be annexed to Manitoba, the minority has no established or vested rights. This may be true, from a legal standpoint. But, speaking here, as a British subject and a free citizen of this country, I trust, Sir, that I will be allowed to say that, text or no text, statutes or no statutes, there should not be in this broad Dominion of ours, where flies the flag of that empire we are so proud of, a single portion of territory, where the majority may justly ignore the fundamental spirit that prevailed in the building of this confederation. I shall never forget, Mr. Speaker, that the education I received was in one of these modest country separate schools, and, although unfortunate circumstances compelled me to enter this life's battle at the tender age of thirteen, the principles of honesty, integrity and honor which I was taught in that modest school, have been the chief instrument of whatever success I have since attained in business and politics.

I heard last week the very eloquent remarks of the right hon. the leader of the government, and the earnest appeal he made to all men of good will in this House and outside of this House, to live and let live. I wish to say here to the right hon. leader of the government that my mind was well made up even before I listened to his eloquent speech. But his utterances have further convinced me that my decision to vote in support of this Bill is in the best interest of every one concerned.

During the last election, pamphlets were issued by the anti-reciprocity league appealing to the citizens of Quebec to vote against reciprocity, not only on account of the pernicious effect such a measure would have had on the economical conditions of this country, but also pointing to the danger of annexation; in the advent of which, the pamphlet went on, the citizens of Quebec would lose the rights and privileges they were now enjoying under the British Crown. What effect, Mr. Speaker, would such appeals have, should the day ever come when the majority in this country would tread upon the rights and privileges of the minority? Let us not forget that we have to the south of us a very powerful and ambitious neighbour. The question of reciprocity may be dead for the time being; but some day in the future it will loom up again in some form or other. The greatest safeguard against annexation will always reside in the just treatment accorded to all the citizens of this country whatever may be their race or creed or whatever may be the province or territory they inhabit.

In conclusion, I wish to say that I share entirely the right hon. leader of the government's views that the Roman Catholics of Manitoba, who form a large proportion of the whole population of that province, have in their own hands the only constitutional remedy which can be exercised to-day for the redress of the grievances they may have. It is admitted on all sides that, so far as the old province of Manitoba is concerned, interference by the federal authorities is to-day out of the question. I said at the beginning of these remarks that I had entire confidence in the men who govern Manitoba to-day; and in the men who represent that province in the federal cabinet. Imbued as they are with the principles of the founders of this confederation, they will make it a point, I have no doubt, to settle satisfactorily the just grievances of the minority in their province. By so doing, they will not only have accomplished a great act of justice and fair play, but they will have put an end to an agitation that can do no good to Manitoba or to the country as a whole.

Mr. J. H. RAINVILLE (Chambly and Vercheres). In rising to say a few words on the amendment, I cannot forget that up to 1908 I was a good Liberal. I fought with the Liberals and enjoyed the fights in which I participated, and I have no apologies to offer for my course up to that time. Before I conclude these remarks I shall have something to say on really the only speech, on this subject, which has been contributed by our friends on the other side of the House, that of the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) who did touch somewhat, I must admit, on the school question. In the year 1896 the Conservative party introduced the Remedial Bill, dealing with the grievances of the minority as regards separate schools in Manitoba. I have no reason to believe that that party has to-day changed its mind on that question, or that they are not as ready to grant justice to the minority as Sir Charles Tupper was prepared to do in 1896. In the elections of that year that distinguished statesman was defeated, especially in the province of Quebec, yet upon taking his place in the new House as leader of the opposition, the right hon. gentleman magnanimously spoke as follows:

Now, Sir, I do not intend to say more upon that subject upon the present occasion, but I will say this: that in the future as in the past the cardinal principle with the great party to which I have the honour to belong will be equal justice to all without respect to race or creed. I am glad to know that the responsibility of this question—an important question, although not so gravely important as I had supposed—I am glad to know that the responsibility rests no longer upon my shoulders, but upon those of the hon. gentleman who is now the first Minister of the Crown. I can only say that I trust and sincerely hope, that he will be most successful in obtaining such a settlement of this question as will do justice and give satisfaction to all parties. I can assure the hon. gentleman not only that he has my most cordial wishes for a happy, and early, and fair settlement of this important question, but that anything that I can contribute to that end will be at all times most cheerfully done.

Another statesman, defeated in the way Sir Charles Tupper had been, would not have been prepared to pay such a tribute nor to vouchsafe such encouragement to his political opponents, as the right hon. leader of the opposition did on that occasion. He would have remained silent and refrained from proffering assistance to his victorious opponents, but he did not do so. Of Sir Charles Tupper, Victor Hugo might well have said:

'There are moments when the best way of loving humanity is for one to love one's country.'

The Bill which we are now discussing contains a business proposition, but some of the hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, doubtless very sincerely, find fault with it because it contains no mention of the school question. Let me endeavour briefly to deal with that question and for that purpose I find it necessary to refer to the legislation of the past. In that legislation the principle has been laid down, that the rights of minorities, whether they be Catholic or whether they be Protestant, shall be protected and safeguarded. I take first the Union Act of 1840, to go back no further, the Confederation Act of 1867, the Manitoba Act of 1870, and the Northwest Territories Act of 1875. The Union Act of 1840, of course, had to do with Upper and Lower Canada, although the principle to which I refer, and which is contained in all the other Acts referred to, is irrevocably set forth there. Now, Sir, is the district of Keewatin entitled to come under the terms of the British North America Act of 1867?

The statute bringing Keewatin into existence was passed only in 1875, and that district was organized in 1876. We must then look to some other legislation than the British North America Act of 1867 to apply to Keewatin. Does the legislation of 1875 relating to the Northwest Territories apply to Keewatin? Keewatin was formed as a separate district on the same day as that on which the law regarding the Northwest Territories came into effect. No provision whatever for schools was made in the law relating to Keewatin, but such a provision was made in the law relating to the Northwest Territories. If we consult the report of the discussion upon these laws as they were in course of enactment in this parliament, we find that the late Hon. Alexander Mackenzie himself admitted that the reason why no such reference was made in the law relating to Keewatin was that it was the intention to annex Keewatin to some other territory or even to the province of Manitoba, such territory or such province of Manitoba having its own constitution in which the provision for schools was clearly made. But, we could not say that the law of the Northwest Territories would apply to Keewatin until 1906 at any rate, but undoubtedly Keewatin automatically fell into the Northwest Territories, and I claim that since that date Keewatin was governed by the law of the Northwest Territories. And section 62 of the law of the Northwest Territories has already been so well explained in this House that I do not feel called upon to deal at any length with these two articles of the law. They are clear enough, because everybody admits that no step was taken either by the late government or by this government to put in force this law in the Northwest Territories as they are formed to-day. But we are called upon to-day to create a new province, as was the case in 1905 for Alberta and Saskatchewan, or to annex Keewatin to a province already organized and having a constitution of its own, the province of Manitoba, and what is the law in such a case?

I will give the two sections of the Imperial Act, 1871, under which this parliament is authorized to create new provinces or to extend the boundaries of a province:

2. The parliament of Canada may from time to time establish new provinces in any territories forming for the time being part of the Dominion of Canada, but not included in any province thereof, and may, at the time of such establishment, make provision for the constitution and admission of any such province and for the passing of laws for the peace, order and good government of such province, and for its representation in the said parliament.

3. The parliament of Canada may from time to time, with the consent of the legislature of any province of the said Dominion, increase, diminish or otherwise alter the limits of such province upon such terms and conditions as may be agreed to by the said legislature, and may, with the like consent, make provision respecting the effect and operation of any such increase or diminution or alteration of territory in relation to any province affected thereby.

It is very clear that we are dealing with this last paragraph of the law, and we have no constitution to give Manitoba, who has such constitution of her own under Imperial legislation and we have no power to place constitutional limitations upon Manitoba or any other province under section 3 of the law. But, Sir, if we do annex Keewatin to Manitoba what will be the law in reference to the schools? To understand this let us consult article 22 of the Manitoba Act. I will quote the first paragraph only, to show that the schools are well protected by the laws of Manitoba:

Nothing in such law shall prejudicially affect any right or privilege with respect to denominational schools which any class of persons have by law or practice in the province at the union.

What is the law of the British North America Act, article 93:

Nothing in any such law shall prejudicially affect any right or privilege with respect to denominational schools which any class of persons have by law in the province at the Union.

The two articles are practically the same, and what they mean is protection for minorities and protection for the schools. I do not see how even the amendment which has been put before the House will strengthen this law. It is contended that, without this amendment, Keewatin would be between the law of 1875 and the Manitoba Act, and none would apply to it. I do not think, for my part, that this would be the case; and I do not think that any of us in this House would try to apply the law in such a way. The expression 'at the union,' of which some complain, I am sure would not be held by any judge to mean that it applied only to schools that were in existence at the time of the union in 1840 and that none others would have rights under this section. This was a principle for the future, and not a principle for 1840. The Fathers of Confederation, as well as those who passed this law of 1875, never had such an idea, and no judge would uphold such an interpretation of the law.

Now, if that was the case when Ontario and Quebec were formed into provinces and were given a constitution, do we not find in it the same words 'as at the union?' And can it be pretended that an addition of territory to Quebec would not fall under the general constitution of Quebec, even if there is in the constitution of Quebec the words 'as at the union?' Now, that is considered all over the province of Quebec a well defined principle. For my part I do not feel compelled to vote for the amendment, because I am satisfied that the rights of the minority will be just as well protected under the law of Manitoba as they would be if that territory remained a part of the Dominion.

This also is to be remembered, that the last government had drafted a Bill for the annexation of Keewatin to Manitoba, and they drafted a Bill just like the Bill drafted by the present government. No one, I think, will contend that if the school question was not mentioned, and if the words 'at the union' had been fraught with danger to the future of any class of people in Keewatin, the right hon. leader of the opposition would not have taken care to safeguard the rights of the minority in Keewatin. But he knew as well as we know to-day that the Manitoba Act is going to remain in force in Keewatin, and that the settlement of 1897 is not changing the constitution of Manitoba. In my opinion it means simply this, that the Federal government says to Manitoba: We can resort to a remedial order, but if you pass provincial legislation of a certain character we will not intervene. This is the real meaning of the arrangement. Can it be pretended for a moment that, even with the authorization of the Privy Council to intervene, we could change the constitution of Manitoba in any way? No; it was a temporary arrangement, made I believe in the interest of peace in this country.

PRIVATE BILLS.

QUEEN'S UNIVERSITY OF KINGSTON.

Mr. NICKLE moved the third reading of Bill (No. 68) respecting the Queen's College at Kingston and to change its name to Queen's University at Kingston. He said: Mr. Speaker, I am instructed by those interested in these measures, namely, Bills (No. 68) and (No. 69), to say that they adopt the amendments of the House as passed yesterday.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the third time.

Mr. NICKLE moved that the Bill be now passed and that the title be Queen's University at Kingston.

Motion agreed to.

Bill (No. 69) to incorporate Queen's Theological College.—Mr. Nickle.

EXTENSION OF BOUNDARIES—MANITOBA.

House resumed the adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Borden for the second reading of Bill (No. 115) to provide for the extension of the boundaries of the province of Manitoba and the proposed motion of Mr. Mondou in amendment thereto.

Mr. RAINVILLE. Mr. Speaker, I believe that five years ago our friends the Liberals had no intention whatever of bringing in the school question in connection with the Bill that was presented by them to annex Keewatin to Manitoba. But Sir, in the legislation that I have cited, there is a principle which comes out very clearly and it is the principle of protection to minorities. I do not need to cite the Hon. Alexander Mackenzie or the Hon. George Brown who said very emphatically that if you establish separate schools in this country you establish them forever. Would it be of any use to look for an opinion on this subject from members of the Privy Council in England? I could quote the opinion, for instance, of Lord Carnarvon who, in proposing the second reading of the British North America Act on the 19th of February, 1867, and speaking with particular reference to section 93, of British North America Act, said:

> The object of the clause is to secure to the religious minority of one province the same rights, privileges and protection which the religious minority of another province may enjoy. The Roman Catholic minority of Upper Canada, the Protestant minority of Lower Canada and the Roman Catholic minority of the maritime provinces will thus stand on a footing of entire equality.

But is Manitoba in a similar law as the British North America Act and will Keewatin be deprived of any rights on being annexed to Manitoba? I do not think so because an interpretation of article 22 of the Manitoba Act was given by Lord Herschell, who gave an opinion similar to that given by Lord Carnarvon with regard to the British North America Act. Lord Herschell in answer to the Attorney General of Manitoba who wanted to plead a difference between the two laws in favour of Manitoba's autonomy said:

> Before leaving this part of the case it may be well to notice the arguments urged by the respondent, that the construction which their lordships have put upon the second and third subsections of section 22 of the Manitoba Act is inconsistent with the power conferred upon the legislature of the province to exclusively make laws in relation to education. The argument is fallacious. The power conferred is not absolute, but limited. It is exercisable only subject and according to the following provisions: The subsections which follow therefore, whatever be their true construction, define the conditions under which alone provincial legislatures may legislate in relation to education, and indicate the limitations imposed on, and the exceptions from, their power of exclusive legislation. Their right to legislate is not indeed, properly speaking, exclusive, for in the case specified in subsection 3 the parliament of Canada is authorized to legislate on the same subject. There is, therefore, no inconsistency as was suggested.

I could quote Lord Watson and Lord Morris on the very same subject, but the point is clear enough to me and it shows that the spirit of our laws is well understood and protected in England. What would the difference be, if we annex Keewatin to Manitoba with or without the clause proposed by my hon. friend from Nicolet? None at all in my humble opinion.

But from a legal point of view, Manitoba having been formed into a province on the 12th May, 1870, about one month before the Northwest Territories were acquired by Canada, the Act admitting Manitoba receiving the Imperial sanction on the 29th June, 1871, the Federal government were prevented from acting, and I really cannot see why the minority or the people in Keewatin about to be annexed to Manitoba, could not obtain justice according to article 22 of the Manitoba Act as already interpreted by the Lords of the Privy Council. For my part, convinced as I am that Manitoba deserves money and land, this territory having been kept for her for over 35 years, I would not propose to perpetrate another injustice because injustice was done to a part of the population by the right hon. the leader of the opposition. Sir, take the point of view of Manitoba. Would Ontario accept an addition to her territory if coupled to that addition were a restriction of her constitution? Would Quebec accept Ungava with a condition forbidding the use of the code Napoleon or that she must establish in it non-sectarian schools? My answer to those questions is no. We should treat Manitoba in the same way as we would treat Quebec and Ontario. As to the people of Keewatin and the minority of Manitoba I hope justice will soon be given to them as was guaranteed in the name of the Crown many years ago. I have all confidence in the Premier of Manitoba, Mr. Roblin, who has fought for separate schools during 25 years of his life.

Furthermore on my own behalf, as a Liberal until 1908, I will not say to the Conservative party: If you do not remedy the injustice of the alleged settlement made by the right hon. the leader of the opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux), myself and the whole Liberal party, I will attempt to bring about your downfall. Such a course would be an injustice to them, an injustice to the Conservative party of the past, an injustice to the old statesman, Sir Charles Tupper, an injustice to the victims of 1896, an injustice to the present Prime Minister (Mr. Borden) who had the true conception of the constitutional aspect of the school question in 1905. I am glad to give this testimony in the name of the province of Quebec because the province of Quebec realizes this to-day.

The hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) is not in his seat at the moment, but I have told him that I intended to speak and he should be present. That hon. member will allow me a few words in reply to the speech he made last Wednesday. I hope he will take my remarks in good part as coming from a friend. I know he is an admirer of Lacordaire, and I shall tell him with Lacordaire: We say the truth only to the ones we love. I will try to tell a few truths that will interest the House, the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux), and even Lacordaire. The hon. member talked of the school, not of Manitoba but of the school of Montalembert, and compared such a school with the English Liberal school to which he claims to belong. I want to tell him that I find a slight difference between, not the schools, but between his conduct and the conduct of Montalembert, because Montalembert, Liberal all his life, had principle all his life, and I find that the hon. member for Rouville has principle only when he is in opposition, where I hope he will long remain.

The hon. member for Rouville talked about the sincerity of my good friend the member for Nicolet, and I agree with him but I may not be able to return him the compliment, because on many occasions, and even to-day, it would need a strong magnifying glass to find an atom of sincerity in his utterances. He spoke pointedly of the 'young' member for Nicolet. Does the hon. member for Rouville want to say to all new members of the House that sincerity belongs only to young men, and that it is sacrificed later to political needs? Was he trying to defend his speeches and lectures on the independence of Canada not very long ago, because he was young at the time? He found fault with the consistency of the hon. Postmaster General (Mr. Pelletier) who, he said, had not always been a Tory and was with the Nationalists in 1885. Where was the hon. member for Rouville at that time and where was he a little later on? I can quote by heart one of his speeches in Quebec in favour of the leader of the Nationalist party at that time:

They will apply to him (Mercier) the poet's word about Papineau: 'He filled a whole epoch of our history and for a long time his voice was his people's only sword and his body their only armour.'

I think if the Postmaster General was associated at that time with a man who deserved such a eulogy from the hon. member for Rouville, he was not, after all, in such bad company. If it is so reprehensible to change in politics I am surprised that my hon. friend forgot to mention the hon. the Minister of Finance (Mr. White) who looks just as happy to-day as he looked when he was with the Liberals.

He has not referred to the member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lavallée), who cannot complain as yet, and for my part I think the country is safe enough with the present government. I think some examples could be cited under the Liberal regime. To mention only one, we all remember that the Hon. Mr. Tarte, Minister of Public Works in the Liberal government for whom I had great admiration, would not swear that he was anything else than a Tory. Now, Sir, the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) is scandalized because the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Monk), the Postmaster General (Mr. Pelletier), the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty), and the Minister of Inland Revenue (Mr. Nantel), do not give up their portfolios. My hon. friend will admit with me that with none of them is it a question of money, for they are all well off, and they do not need to think of their cheque at the end of each month. Of course, they have some bad examples before them, and I hope they will resist the temptation. They know that certain members of the last administration came into office poor and went out with the reputation of having many millions. I do not mean to accuse anyone in particular, but I can tell them that a great portion of the people of Canada thought that something was going wrong at the time and made it clear on the 21st of September last. The hon. member for Rouville paid a great compliment to the right hon. leader of the opposition in saying that in 1896 he had prevented a civil war; but to-day hon. gentlemen opposite do not seem to be afraid of war. This is why I suppose they are so quiet on the other side of the House on the school question. But, Sir, they have not always been as quiet as they are to-day. The hon. Postmaster General has accused the Liberal party of having played football with all the big questions that came before the parliament of Canada in order to obtain power. For my part, having known what was going on when I was with the Liberal party, I feel like pleading guilty. But what did the hon. member for Rouville answer? He read a letter from the Rev. Father Lacombe, and the answer of the right hon. leader of the opposition. The Massey hall speech of the right hon. leader of the opposition has already been referred to, so that I need not repeat it. But, Sir, how did my right hon. friend conduct himself in 1896? I was with him. Will you allow me to quote from 'Hansard' debates of the session of 1897, where I find that an hon. gentleman, before accepting the nomination for the county, I think, which the hon. Postmaster General represents, signed the following:—

Being sincerely disposed to put aside all party spirit and all questions of men, in order to secure the triumph of the Catholic cause in Manitoba, I, the undersigned, promise, if elected, to conform myself to the Bishops' mandement in all points and to vote for a measure according the Catholics of Manitoba that justice to which they have a right by virtue of the judgment of the Privy Council, provided that the measure be approved of by my bishop. If Mr. Laurier reaches power, and does not settle the question at the first session, in accordance with the terms of the mandement, I promise either to withdraw my support or resign.

I withhold the name of this gentleman, for particular reasons. But there were some others who did the same thing whose names I can give. What did the hon. member for Rouville sign in 1896 on accepting the nomination for Gaspé?

I, the undersigned candidate in the county of Gaspé solemnly promise to vote in parliament in conformity with the desires of the Right Reverend Bishops as expressed in their last pastoral letter.

Many other candidates signed this in order to beat the Hon. Mr. Angers and others; and this is why the Conservatives were beaten in 1896.

A settlement was made, but there were a great many people who were not satisfied with that settlement. The right hon. leader of the opposition has been pleased to say on many occasions that Canada is a nation. What steps has the right hon. gentleman taken to give effect to that statement? Immediately after 1896 he organized a system of diplomacy which was intended to extend as far as Rome, to prevent those who were not satisfied with the settlement of 1897 from expressing their views freely on that important question. Here again we see the game of football. But that is not all. In 1905 the leader of the opposition came forward with the famous clause 16, but on the second reading of the Autonomy Bills for Alberta and Saskatchewan, that clause was withdrawn. When that took place we heard talk of possible resignations, by members of the cabinet. Sir, I ask those hon. gentlemen on the other side who were members of the ministry at that time, did any one of the French Canadian ministers resign? That question must be answered most emphatically in the negative. In 1910, what happened? We saw another football game played. A navy was created to please the Imperialists, and a policy of reciprocity with the United States adopted to please the west, where a good many immigrants had been introduced at $5 per head, and who are now ready to fight against the east, if we are to judge by the speeches of the ex-Minister of the Interior. But, Sir, what is transpiring to-day? Another game of football, this time with the Manitoba question as its object. Why, Mr. Speaker, there are some hon. gentlemen on the other side who are preparing to go to the province of Quebec and say, that if they vote against the amendment of my hon. friend from Nicolet, it is because the subject is already covered by the amendment of the right hon. leader of the opposition. That, Sir, is an actual fact, a statement to that effect has been made to me in the corridors of this House. Are we not justified therefore, in the conclusion that this is another game of football? I am perhaps too young to tell hon. gentlemen on that side to be on their guard, but I do warn them to maintain a strict lookout, because if you leave two open doors, one for the east and the other for the west, one for the Protestants, and the other for the Catholics, one for the Imperialists and the other for the Autonomists, it is going to be bad for somebody. The gale will pass, but it may hurt the young chickens and the old cocks too. Before I take my seat, I want to make it clear to my compatriots and to my province, that I am not voting as I do through any influence whatever, or through any promise of any kind.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. RAINVILLE. But because I am convinced that the people of Keewatin, whether it be the majority or whether it be the minority will be protected to the fullest extent under article 22 of the present constitution of Manitoba.

Mr. LOUIS CODERRE (Hochelaga). I would like, Mr. Speaker, to say a few words in explanation of the vote I am about to give, not only on the amendment of my hon. friend from Nicolet (Mr. Lamarche), but also on the motion for the third reading of this Bill. My remarks will only bear upon one feature of this measure, that is on the omission by the government of a clause that will protect the rights and privileges in educational matters of the Roman Catholic population of Keewatin. My vote to-night will not differ from the one I have already given on the motion for the second reading of this Bill. It will not differ, Mr. Speaker, from the vote I would have given on Tuesday afternoon on the amendment of the right hon. leader of the opposition had I been here. Sir, I will vote with the government. As my absence from the Capital when the question was put to the House may be misrepresented later on, and in hostile quarters, I beg of you, though it be a personal matter, to allow me to explain. When I left Ottawa for Montreal on Friday afternoon on the first day of this month, I could not even suspect that the House would reach that phase in the progress of this Bill before Thursday last. As a matter of fact, we all know that was the general belief; and confident that I would be here in time to take, by my vote, my full share of responsibility in the rejection of the amendment of the right hon. leader of the opposition, I spent four or five days of this month in Montreal, where my presence was called for by very urgent private and legal business. Needless to say, Mr. Speaker, I was very disagreeably surprised when I reached Ottawa on Tuesday evening to hear that the vote had been taken. If anything could have alleviated my disappointment, it would have been that my determination to vote against the amendment of the leader of the opposition was very generally known. I approached this very important and troublesome problem with the earnest purpose that it should be solved in what I honestly believe to be the very best interests of all concerned. Sir, I have studied it with the greatest care in all its various aspects, taking into consideration all the circumstances and trying, as far as humanly possible, to put aside all influences of any kind whatever that could bias my judgment; and to-day, Sir, I have pleasure in realizing that I am in the best frame of mind and state of heart when I declare that I will stand by the government of the right hon. Mr. Borden. I truly believe this Bill to be the best measure that could be introduced here, under the actual circumstances, whether we look at it generally or from the special point of view of which I have mentioned. Though the question be much controverted as to whether the minority, in that part of Keewatin to be added to Manitoba, enjoys special rights and privileges in respect to educational matters, it seems to me to be now generally admitted that the provisions which apply are those of the Northwest Territories Act, chapter 62 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1906, which came into force on the 31st of July, 1907. The article X of chapter 62 of the above-mentioned statutes, reads as follows:

X. The Commissioner in Council, if authorized to make ordinances respecting education, shall pass all necessary ordinances in respect thereto; but in the laws or ordinances relating to education it shall always be provided that a majority of the ratepayers of any district or portion or subdivision thereof, by whatever name the same is known, may establish such schools therein as they think fit and make the necessary assessment and collection of rates therefor; and also that the minority of ratepayers therein, whether Protestant or Roman Catholics, may establish separate schools therein, and in such case the ratepayers establishing such Protestant or Roman Catholic separate schools shall be liable only to assessment of such rates as they impose upon themselves in respect thereof.

Before that legislation could become operative, three conditions had to be reckoned with:

1st—That the government of this country should appoint a council of four members to assist the commissioner of the Territories.

2nd—That this Commissioner in Council should be authorized to make ordinances respecting education.

3rd—That this Commissioner in Council should make such ordinances.

Sir, we all know that up to the 10th of October, 1911, the very day this government came into power, none of these three conditions had been complied with. We all know that, as far as this government is concerned, the only demand ever received from the interested parties that the two first conditions above mentioned should materialize, reached the Governor in Council only on or about the 1st of December, 1911. In that respect, I fully concur with the right hon. leader of the government (Mr. Borden):

I ask any honourable gentleman in this House whether or not it would have been a reasonable thing for that government, after that matter had stood for nearly four years without the appointment of any council, without the authority of the commissioner to put into force these provisions respecting education. I would ask whether or not it would have been a reasonable thing for us to undertake to do that without which these Northwest Territories had got on very well for three and a half years at least. And, to do that, remember, on the very eve of carrying out a proposal to which parliament had given its unanimous acceptance on the 13th of July, 1908. Why, Mr. Speaker, I think it would have been the very worst thing we could do in the interests of all concerned if the government had seen fit on the eve of enlarging the boundaries of Manitoba, to take any such step as that which has been suggested.

But in view of the stand I am taking in this matter, the question whether or not separate schools are now in operation in Keewatin, according to article X of said chapter 62, has no importance whatever. I will even go farther and I will admit, for argument's sake, that these separate schools do exist to-day in Keewatin, according to that law. Have we the constitutional authority to force them to-day upon Manitoba? This question, Sir, has already been according to me, victoriously answered in the negative, by the right hon. leader of the government, one of the greatest legal minds we have to-day in Canada, and I do not know that this opinion of his has been yet contradicted, whether inside or outside of this House. I beg of you, Mr. Speaker, that I should be allowed to quote the right hon. gentleman's own words in that respect, as I humbly submit that I could not do as well as he has done himself:

I do not think it is constitutionally possible. I would like to point out to hon. members, to whose attention this may not have been brought, that the provisions of the British North America Act of 1871, with regard to the constitution of the province in the first instance, are very different from those contained in the clause of the same Act, providing for the alteration of the boundaries of a province. Section 2 of that Act—the one which provided for the constitution of a province, carved out of the Northwest Territories, for instance, Alberta—reads as follows:—

The parliament of Canada may from time to time establish new provinces in any territories forming for the time being part of the Dominion of Canada, but not included in any province thereof, and may, at the time of such establishment, make provision for the constitution and administration of any such province, and for the passing of laws for the peace, order and good government of such province and for its representation in the said parliament.

But when we come to the third section of that statute—the one in virtue of which this Bill is brought before this House—we find that the language with regard to increasing the area of a province is in very different terms. It is as follows:

The parliament of Canada may from time to time, with the consent of the legislature of any province of the said Dominion, increase, diminish, or otherwise alter the limits of such province, upon such terms and conditions as may be agreed to by the said legislature, and may, with the like consent, make provision respecting the effect and operation of any such increase or diminution or alteration of territory in relation to any province affected thereby.

We have in the one section the direct authority of this parliament to deal with the constitution of a province. In the other section we have not any such thing, and it seemed to me absolutely impossible to conceive that you can have a province in Canada, such as Manitoba would be after this Bill had passed, which would be governed as to one part of it by one constitutional provision in respect of education, and in another part of it, by another constitutional provision in respect of education. I do not believe that the British North America Act of 1871 contemplated any such thing. To my mind it is inconceivable, and I do not find warrant for it in the statute. It is inconceivable that you could have one constitutional limitation in Manitoba and another constitutional limitation in the part of Manitoba which we now propose to add.

Now, the right hon. leader of the government says that 'a proposal to place any such restriction upon Manitoba is politically impossible because,' he does 'believe that Manitoba would not accept the extension of her boundaries coupled with any such restrictions.'

And later on the right hon. the Prime Minister adds that he is 'absolutely certain that it is politically impracticable.'

Well, Sir, I do not know of any other means by which this Bill could be amended so as to embody in it a clause safeguarding the rights and privileges mentioned in said clause X, whether this clause has been or not, to-day, taken advantage of. We have not the constitutional authority to insert that clause in this Bill without Manitoba's consent. And that consent, Manitoba is unwilling to give. We have the word of the right hon. gentleman to this effect. I am proud to say that I rely with the greatest confidence upon that affirmation. The right hon. gentleman who makes it is the man who, whilst he was touring the western provinces on the eve of the last federal election, said to the farmers who wanted him, as the leader of a great political party, to promise them reciprocity with the United States in natural products:

Gentlemen, I am against the reciprocity, and I would not make the promise you ask for, even if I knew that by doing it I would become the Prime Minister of this Dominion of ours.

Sir, the man who has the moral courage to speak in that way, in such circumstances, is not a Talleyrand, of such a man one cannot say that language has been given to him so that he might hide his thought.

And this is the reason why I say to-day that I believe the right hon. the Prime Minister, when he says that Manitoba is unwilling to 'accept the extension of her boundaries coupled with any such restrictions.' What are we to do then, Sir? Are we to say to Manitoba: All right, we shall keep Keewatin?

Where is the man that would dare to give such an advice to this government? We must not forget Mr. Speaker, that the honour of this House has been pledged to 'a proposal to which parliament has given its unanimous acceptance on the 13th of July, 1908. We all know Sir, that, on the 12th of April, 1876, the district of Keewatin was made a distinct and separate district by chapter 21 of the statute of 1876, which statute came into force by proclamation of the Governor in Council on the 7th of October, 1876, and the reason given for that legislation by the legislator at the time was that Keewatin was to be made part of the province of Manitoba.

Mr. CODERRE

Perusing lately the debates on this question in this House, I could not help noticing that a certain member took exception to that law being passed without a clause similar to clause X of chapter 49 of the Statutes of 1875, which chapter 49 is in force yet to-day, and gives a constitution to the Northwest Territories. That clause X of said chapter 49 of the law of 1875 is almost identically in the same terms as clause X of chapter 62 of the revised statutes of Canada, 1906, which gives to the population of Keewatin the right to separate schools. I found then in the debates that the predecessors of the right hon. leader of the opposition, Hon. Alexander Mackenzie, and the Hon. Edward Blake, then at the head of the Liberal party of the time and sitting in this House on the Treasury benches met that objection by saying that that omission of said clause X in the law of 1876 had been made purposely because in the course of time Keewatin or at least part of it, was to be added to Manitoba, and that the annexation would naturally and legally bring Keewatin in respect to educational matters, under the law of the province of Manitoba.

What is the law one can find to-day in the province of Manitoba?

The law of 1890, passed by a Liberal government, and against the passing of which all the Conservative members of the legislative assembly, Protestants as well as Catholics, fought to the bitter end, a law which has deprived the minority in Manitoba of certain rights and privileges in respect to education according to a judgment of the highest tribunal of the empire. We know that that law of 1890 has been amended by the legislative assembly after the general election of 1896, which brought to power the right hon. the leader of the opposition; but we know too, Sir, that this amendment, accepted by the right hon. leader of the opposition of to-day, then Prime Minister, does not give to the minority the full plenitude of their rights and privileges as admitted by that judgment of the Judicial Privy Council of the King. As a matter of fact, it is generally conceded, by all men of good faith at least, that was it not for the very generous and liberal interpretation given to that law of 1890 and its amendment by the Hon. Mr. Roblin, Conservative Premier of Manitoba, the position of the Roman Catholic minority in Manitoba to-day, though far from being what it should be, would be simply outrageous in the estimation of all broad-minded and law-abiding men. What is the population in Keewatin to-day, Sir? In the territory there are at the present time not more than 165 white people 400 or 500 half-breeds, and the balance of the population are Indians. The Roman Catholics, we are told, are in the minority. All rights and privileges are sacred to me,

Sir, but the rights and privileges of the few weak should be considered more sacred yet.

But, Sir, if by adopting that very dangerous and unwise device suggested to us that we should refuse to consent to the annexation of Keewatin to the province of Manitoba unless the representatives of that province accept the incorporation in this Bill of a clause apt to safeguard and protect the rights and privileges of the few Roman Catholics of Keewatin, is it not to be feared that without bettering at all the actual position in educational matters of those Keewatin people, we would hurt the interests in that respect of the 250,000 Roman Catholics of Manitoba? What more human, Sir? The political agitation that would manifestly follow such a course in Manitoba in the whole of this Dominion, agitation influenced by the religious passion, the most dangerous of all in a mixed population like ours, would very naturally bring the people of Manitoba, who have been described to us by the right hon. leader of the government as 'imbued with a big, broad, generous spirit, as inclined to deal with their fellow-countrymen who may be of a different faith in the same broad-minded and generous spirit as that which has been evinced in other provinces of Canada where no constitutional provisions of this kind exist,' such an agitation, I say, would very naturally bring them to retaliate on our Roman Catholic brothers in Manitoba, whose hopes for betterment in a near future and gain made in the past in respect to education, would then be lost.

Sir, this is my conviction, and that conviction is founded not only on human nature, but also on the experience gained during the years 1890 to 1897, on the very same matter, in the very same province. A great Canadian has said once: 'Let the country perish rather than a principle.' Sir, I do not belong to that school, and I refuse to-day to be coerced in saying: 'Let the 250,000 Roman Catholics in Manitoba perish if, to avoid that calamity it is necessary that the few hundreds of Roman Catholics in Keewatin should be placed not under the law passed in respect to education by the Liberal party of Manitoba in 1890, as amended in 1897 according to the poor settlement made that year by Messrs. Laurier and Greenway, a settlement which has been approved in this House by the hon. the member for Rouville to-day, then member for Gaspé, and by Mr. Henri Bourassa, then member for Labelle; no, sir, not under that law so miserably amended, but, Sir, under that law and its amendment as interpreted by the 'big, broad, generous spirit' of the Hon. Mr. Roblin.

There is an agitation in my own native province, says the right hon. leader of the opposition. We know it, Sir, and we know too that the right hon. gentleman in this House, is folding his arms, and is refusing to take any positive stand one way or the other in respect to this matter of school rights. He keeps cool and quiet, and he contents himself with putting before the House a double-faced amendment which will permit, on account of its vagueness and ambiguity, his political friends in the province of Quebec to say: We are against that Bill because there cannot be found in it a clause protecting the rights and privileges of the minority in Keewatin in respect of education and which will allow his partisan followers in the other provinces to say: We are against that Bill because some friends of the government wanted to coerce the province of Manitoba. We know too that the political organs of the right hon. gentleman in the province of Quebec are doing their best to bring that agitation to its greatest intensity. With respect to the agitation which is threatened to-day I would say to my hon. friends: Remember what we lost in 1896 in Manitoba through the agitation which was aroused as far back as 1890, especially by the Liberal press and the Liberal politicians of that day; bear in mind what we have gained in the same province since the agitation has cooled down; do not forget what the right hon. leader of the government said lately as to the very refreshing state of things which exists in the province of Nova Scotia to-day because our Roman Catholic brethren there have never used that very dangerous weapon. See what the hon. member for Kent, N.B., (Mr. Robidoux) said yesterday to a reporter of the 'Gazette,' a well known newspaper in Montreal, in respect to the happy lot in education matters of the Roman Catholics of New Brunswick who have always been careful not to agitate. Mr. Speaker, I might as well read this interview to the House:

NEW BRUNSWICK SCHOOLS.

Conditions are Satisfactory, Says Mr. Robidoux, M.P.

Mr. Robidoux, M.P. for the county of Kent, N. B., who was in the city on Saturday, made the statement that the general policy of the Borden government was giving satisfaction in the maritime provinces, and to the Acadian population in particular.

Mr. Robidoux is particularly well pleased with the immigration policy of the present government, as far as the province of New Brunswick is concerned. The hon. Mr. Rogers, he says, has just appointed Rev. Father Legace, of Legaceville, N.B., as immigration and repatriment agent for the county of Northumberland, where a goodly number of Acadians are located and a good many more are expected to return from the States and other countries, having left New Brunswick in past years in the hope of bettering their condition.

Three years ago Father Legace founded Legaceville, and today there are a hundred families residing there, and with the help the Department of the Interior is giving them, the movement from the United States and other places to get back on the land will result in the addition, so Mr. Robidoux hopes, of three hundred families during next year.

Speaking of the school question in New Brunswick, Mr. Robidoux, after referring to the troubles some years ago when Mgr. Sweeny was bishop of St. John, stated that the compromise arrived at between the then head of the church in New Brunswick and the Hon. John Boyd, an eminent citizen of that city, and a strong friend of the late Sir Leonard Tilley, resulted in making peace between the warring factions of that province.

Resolutions in parliament year after year had been unavailing, but goodwill did the work, and although Mr. Robidoux declares that the system is not perfect from a Catholic point of view, he has reason to be pleased with the situation, as it now exists. In virtue of this compromise religious instruction is permitted in the schools under certain conditions. In the Acadian centres the teaching of French prevails, although the compromise made no mention of the fact.

'We have a series of French books,' he added, 'prepared by a commission composed of Father Bourgeois, of St. Joseph's College, Memramcook; Abbé Dagnaud, at one time superior of St. Ann's College, Nova Scotia, and Mr. Charles Hebert, one of the New Brunswick school inspectors, and others. Thanks to the intelligent co-operation of our friends, we now have a French department at the Normal school in New Brunswick, which is under the direction of Professor Beliveau, of that province also. Under the administration of the Hon. Mr. Hazen, now Minister of Marine and Fisheries, we had adopted by the Council of Public Instruction, a history of Canada, written in French by Father Bourgeois, and destined for the French schools of the province of New Brunswick, which will permit the young Acadian children to learn in their own tongue the history of this country. In several centres, like Moncton, Buctouche, Memramcook, Shediac and elsewhere, nuns who hold provincial licenses to teach in the schools, and although we do not have separate schools in name, we have them in practice. Obligatory instruction is discretional according to the will of the ratepayers, and only exists in populous centres, such as St. John, Fredericton and other places, while the price of school books was diminished by half, a year following the advent of the hon. Mr. Hazen to power.

Sir, the hon. member for Kent, N.B., a Canadian of French extraction and a Catholic, has added, whilst speaking to us on the same lines since the beginning of that agitation in Quebec:

Friends of Quebec, we belong to your race and creed; you are the strongest member of the French family on this continent; we certainly need your help and your sympathies, but do not proceed by means of violent agitation, have rather recourse to quiet ways and sunny smiles. In the past, according to my own experience, instead of helping us out of our difficulties by agitating, you have added to those difficulties.

This is and has been my policy. This is the policy of my church, as enunciated in an encyclical of the Holy Father, Pope Leo XIII, addressed on the 8th September, 1897, to the archbishops, bishops and other ordinaries of the Dominion of Canada, in relation to the settlement of the Manitoba school question made that year by the right hon. the leader of the opposition of to-day, then Prime Minister of Canada, and the Hon. Mr. Greenway, then Premier of Manitoba. This document can be found in 'Hansard' of 1898, vol. 2, page 5338:

We are not unaware that something has been done to amend that law. The men who are at the head of the Federal government, and of the province of Manitoba, have already taken certain measures with a view to decreasing the difficulties of which the Catholics of Manitoba complain, and against which they rightly continue to protest. We have no reason to doubt that these measures were taken from a love of justice and from a laudable motive. We cannot, however dissimulate the truth, the law which they had passed to repair the injury is defective, unsuitable, insufficient. The Catholics ask, and no one can deny that they justly ask, for much more. Moreover, in the remedial measures that have been proposed there is this defect, that by reason of changed local circumstances they may easily become valueless. In a word, the rights of Catholics and the education of their children have not been sufficiently provided for in Manitoba. Everything in this question demands—and it is conformable to justice—that they should be thoroughly provided for, that is, by placing in security and surrounding with due safeguards those unchangeable and sacred principles of which we have spoken above. This should be the aim, this the end to be zealously and prudently sought for. Nothing can be more injurious to the attainment of this end than discord. Unity of spirit and harmony of action are most necessary. Nevertheless, since, as frequently happens in things of this nature, there is not one fixed and determined, but various ways of arriving at the end which is proposed and which should be obtained, it follows that there may be various opinions equally good and advantageous. Therefore, let each and all be mindful of the rules of moderation, gentleness and mutual charity, let no one fail in the respect that is due to another, but let all resolve in fraternal unanimity, and not without your advice, to do that which the circumstances require, and which appears best to be done.

In a pastoral of His Grace, the Archbishop of Quebec, of that time, Mgr. Taschereau, 'To the clergy and Catholic people of Canada,' commenting upon the above-quoted encyclical, we read, page 5342, of 'Hansard' of 1898, volume II:

Nothing remains to us now but to appeal to that spirit of faith and submission with which we know you to be animated towards the Holy See. We are desirous to proclaim it aloud. We are above all political parties. We have no intention to be bound to any. What we desire is the triumph of a sacred cause and not the triumph of a party. And this triumph, we hope that all men of heart, all friends of justice and liberty will help us to obtain it. There is no question of coming back upon an unfortunate fact; this is the hour for a complete, entire reparation that we expect, and that hour, all sympathies, every noble courage, every generous kindness must strive to hasten. Let public men, therefore, unite together and have recourse to the means that wisdom and patriotism shall inspire them with to put an end to the violent state of things we are all enduring. p. 5343. In the name of justice, in the name of that harmony that should reign among all the citizens of the same country, we invite Protestants—whom this diversity of belief does not prevent from being our brothers—to give us their help and to work with us.

This was also the policy of Mr. Henri Bourassa, then member for Labelle. In a speech he made in relation to the said settlement of the Manitoba School Question. 'Hansard' of 1898, volume II, page 5437, we find:

I do not want to enter again upon the quarrels of the past. I think we have already had too many divisions between the two parties on this question.

Mr. Bourassa at page 5431, says:

I believe firmly that this school question will be settled, and settled on account of the position taken by this government, a position which has been met by the goodwill of the Greenway government, which has given more since this government come into power than during the whole time when hon. gentlemen opposite were in office. I hope this is the last we shall hear of this question, not because we are afraid of it or afraid of the position that we and this government have taken.

All I can add is this: By advocating the policy adhered to in 1897 and since, a policy which commends itself to-day even more than in 1897 to all wise and patriotic men, I sincerely believe I am doing my duty, all my duty, to the Roman Catholic population.

If I err in that respect,—and I do not think I do,—I err in very good company, with men who have never for a moment believed that they acted as traitors in 1896 and after.

Sir, before resuming my chair, though I am still a young member in this House, without much experience, I shall take the liberty of expressing to the right hon. leader of the opposition what I think of his attitude on this question. It is the duty of any member in this House, who does not approve of this Bill, to say so. This duty cannot be deemed to have been fulfilled by criticising the provisions which the Bill embodies. A Bill may be defective, not only by what it contains, but also by what it does not contain. In this case, some members have protested that the Bill does not embody a clause safeguarding and protecting the rights and principles of the minority in respect to education. When the right hon. leader of the opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) spoke on his amendment, he alluded very vaguely to that question by affirming that a certain agitation was going on in the province of Quebec on account of that omission, but he personally took no stand whatever on that matter; he contented himself by saying that he would wait until some member on this side of the House had given his own view on the point at issue. The right hon. gentleman said, to use his own words, he was waiting within 'the lines of Torres Vedras.' What do we know of Torres Vedras?

Torres Vedras, a town of Portugal, in the district of Lisbon. Here were the noted fortifications known as the 'lines of Torres Vedras,' constructed by Wellington in 1810, during the Peninsular war.

These elaborate works, history tells us, had been constructed in the course of a year by thousands of Portuguese labourers, directed by Colonel Fletcher, of the Royal Engineers, upon a plan carefully thought out and laid down by Wellington himself.

When Masséna had carefully inspected the stupendous barrier reared in front of him, his well-trained eye recognized it as impregnable; he paused for some weeks under semblance of blockading the British forces, while he was really scouring the country for the means of feeding his own; but in November he began to retreat upon Santarem, Almeida and Ciudad Rodrigo, with a half-starved and dispirited army, greatly reduced in numbers during the campaign.

I would humbly beg the right hon. gentleman not to desecrate the glorious souvenir which has come to us through those words, 'the lines of Torres Vedras.' Do you believe, Sir, that the brave French general Masséna did not know whom he would encounter by attacking this 'stupendous barrier.' He knew, Sir, that Wellington and his valiant troops were behind these lines; he knew that those British soldiers had an ideal: the defence of the freedom of the Spanish and Portugese peoples, which freedom the ambitious Napoleon the First was willing to take away from them; he knew that they would fight for that principle till death. And, Sir, that knowledge had much to do towards the decision of Masséna to pass by without attacking. There was, Sir, on that 'stupendous barrier,' a glorious flag, the Union Jack, the symbol of liberty the world over, within and without the empire, with one exception, however, as far as the province of Manitoba is concerned: the liberty of the Roman Catholic population in respect to education.

But what do we see here? The spectacle we have before us does not justify at all the right hon. genleman in comparing his own attitude and the attitude of his party, on this very important question with the attitude of Wellington and his soldiers at Torres Vedras in 1810. That great political party has no policy to offer the House; if these politicians, Sir, have such a policy, they have not the courage to stand openly by it. We see no flag, Sir, flying bravely on top of their lines of battle. I know they have two, though; but their political cunning advises them that those flags should remain in the dark till the day of the election comes. And then, Sir, those who do not know the hon. gentleman will be surprised to find one of those two flags in the province of Quebec, bearing the motto, 'Separate schools for Keewatin,' and the other one flying in the other province with in its folds the slogan, 'Hands off Manitoba.'

Sir, if there were lions within the lines of Torres Vedras, there are political foxes on those opposition seats. These tactics have succeeded once in 1896; but I really believe that this country will not consent to be deceived once more.

Sir, I really hope that this message of good-will, of harmony and of concord, that we, on this side of the House, are just sending to the people of Manitoba, will bring them to give, in their plenitude, to my Roman Catholic compatriots in Manitoba the rights and privileges in respect to education which a judgment of the highest tribunal of the empire in the Brophy case has decided that they were entitled to. Knowing the past of the Conservative party in Manitoba, that the Hon. Mr. Roblin had been defending, against Greenway, Martin and Sifton, the separate schools attacked by the law of 1890, that he was by the side of Sir Charles Tupper in 1896 to obtain that the rights and privileges of the minority, as embodied in a remedial law, presented in compliance with the judgment rendered in the Brophy case, and which gave complete satisfaction to the interested parties, should become the law of the province of Manitoba;—knowing moreover that since he has obtained power —and, Sir, history will tell us that the Conservatives could not get into power in Manitoba, only after the great agitation raised by the Liberals against them on that school question had cooled down—he did all that he could to alleviate the harm the law of 1890 and its amendment have done to the cause of the Roman Catholics of Manitoba, I really believe that the Hon. Mr. Roblin, whose already very high reputation as a statesman will be greatly increased by this success of his policy, will take advantage of the feelings of joy and enthusiasm brought to his own people by the passing of this measure, to at last give fair justice to my compatriots of Manitoba. Sir, I have the greatest and sincerest admiration and love for the British flag. It is on account of that admiration and that love that I most deeply desire that that dark spot put on that flag by the Liberal Chieftain Greenway in 1890 would at last disappear. We are told that the Hon. Mr. Roblin has had the very patriotic idea to order that the Union Jack should fly over and above each and every public school in Manitoba. It will be a day of universal contentment and joy, all over the land, when the Roman Catholic children, frequenting these schools, will feel that that great flag shelters and protects all their rights, privileges and liberty, and that they are on a footing of equality with their young comrades of other extraction. Sir, thanks to the policy of the present government, I feel that we will soon see that day.

I feel confident, Sir, that taking the course I am taking, I have done my duty, not only to the Roman Catholic population of Manitoba and Keewatin, but to the whole population of our country.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Mr. Speaker, much as I believe that the province of Manitoba is entitled to the extension of boundaries which it is to receive under the Bill which we are now considering, I have felt it my duty to oppose the passage of this Bill for reasons which I have already stated to the House, and which were set forth in the amendment which I proposed, namely, that the terms granted to Manitoba were at once unfair to that province and to the rest of the Dominion as well. My right hon. friend opposite, speaking some time afterwards, characterized that amendment as a piece of political strategy to avoid an impending political difficulty in connection with this Bill. Let me say to my right hon. friend that if I thought it advisable in this matter to resort to political strategy, I would think it best to play the game as well as I could. But there are occasions when it is not advisable to resort to political strategy, when the question before the House has to be squarely met, and this is the position I intend to take now. There are two considerations which, for me, dominate the present situation. Manitoba is entitled to an extension of its boundaries, not only for the welfare of Manitoba itself, but for the welfare of the whole Dominion. The territory which it is now proposed to give to Manitoba has been, up to the present time, a sealed book as far as the white man is concerned. The white man has never penetrated into this territory except as a hunter. He is now going in as a permanent settler. A railway is actually in course of construction from the wheat fields of the western provinces to the waters of Hudson bay, and, therefore, it follows as a necessity that this territory must be given provincial organization. Municipal institutions have to be established, civil institutions have to be established likewise, towns will grow, and all the other accompaniments of civilized life will have to be attended to. Therefore, as a matter of necessity, this territory must be either organized as a province or annexed to another province. Nobody can contend that it would be advisable, opportune, or politic, for reasons well known to everybody, that a new province should be constituted out of that territory. It must be annexed to another province, and the only province to which it can be annexed is the province of Manitoba. Then, Manitoba, from the fact of this annexation, is entitled to receive, for the purpose of revenue, either the lands of the territory or an equivalent in money. Beyond this, everything that is contained in this Bill, and there is much contained in it, is in violation of the rights of the other provinces.

Mr. MACDONALD. Hear, hear.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Manitoba has been for forty years in this Dominion. It has been on a footing of equality, in so far as provincial subsidies are concerned, with the other provinces, and now you take it from that condition of equality and give it favoured treatment. It seems to me that my hon. friend opposite has not measured the length to which this concession is going to lead him. He has raised problems which, evidently, he never dreamed of in his philosophy. But already, from all sides, troubles have arisen for him and for the country. I can say fairly that the troubles which will face him do not disturb me very much—that is his own concern—but I cannot be indifferent to the condition of the country; and it does seem to me manifest that the other provinces will not be satisfied unless there is a reorganization of the whole of the provincial subsidies which we thought we had secured for all time in the amendment to the constitution, which was passed by the Imperial parliament in 1907. Now, whilst Manitoba is given extravagant terms, for which there can be no justification whatever, on the other hand that province is treated in a manner which cannot be defended by any man who values the rights of the province. Manitoba had the right to expect from the men who form the present government, when they were in opposition, that she would receive her lands, but instead of her being given her lands, a portion of her lands have been given to another province. Here again the government is introducing a new principle which is fraught with dire consequences. My hon. friend the Minister of the Interior, stated some days ago in this debate, that if Manitoba was not given the extension of her territory during the regime of the preceding administration, it was because I wanted to penalize that province the government of which was not composed of friends of my own.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Nobody at this moment, or indeed at any moment, can quote a word or a syllable of mine which could justify such an imputation. I would like to ask anybody who has seen me in opposition or in office for more than thirty years in this House, if any imputation of that kind could be based on anything I ever said or anything I ever did. Sir, it is useless to refute such a statement as that. When Manitoba came to ask for the extension of her boundaries, I thought it advisable before considering her application, that her neighbour to the east and her neighbour to the west should be consulted. Can anybody in this Hause say that it was not the first of all things to be done? I had a conference summoned, composed of members representing Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Ontario. Manitoba was not represented by friends of mine, Ontario was not represented by friends of mine, but Saskatchewan was represented by friends of mine. Saskatchewan made application there and then for the territory which is now given to Manitoba, and I said to my friend from Saskatchewan, Mr. Walter Scott, the premier of the province, that in my humble judgment, in all fairness and equity that territory should go to Manitoba, and I reported accordingly to my colleagues and to the House. Now the province of Saskatchewan is coming forward with a new request. It is asking that since it could not have the territory, it should have access to the waters of Hudson bay in the same manner that Ontario has access to that bay. If, Sir, it is right to give to Ontario 800,000 acres, or thereabouts of the lands of Manitoba, together with access to Hudson bay, is there any reason in the world, why the same measure of treatment should not be given to Saskatchewan as well?

Mr. SPEAKER. I am sorry to interrupt the right hon. gentleman, but with reference to a Bill which was before the House last night motions were made to refer it back to the Committee of the Whole, and I was obliged to rule that those who were speaking should confine themselves to the amendments that were proposed to the Bill, as I regarded that to be the proper ruling of the Chair. To-night the amendment has been moved that this Bill be referred back to the Committee of the Whole House with instructions that they have power to amend the measure by inserting a clause in reference to the educational rights of the minority. Following the same rule, I would be obliged, of course, to decide that the right hon. gentleman is not speaking strictly to the question. But if it is the desire of the House that the debate should be of an unrestricted character, covering the whole scope of the Bill, I certainly have no objection; but I do not wish it to be understood that I desire to rule one way one night and rule to give a reverse ruling another.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I would bow most respectfully to your ruling, Mr. Speaker, and I am all the more grateful to you since I was not in order that you did not interrupt me sooner because I have about finished what I have to say on that particular point. I might perhaps be allowed, without trespassing on the time of the House, and on your ruling, Sir, to finish what I intended to say. In my humble judgment Saskatchewan had as much claim as Ontario to the same treatment, and with that statement I will close this part of my argument. I now come, Sir, to another matter, the matter which is involved in the amendment that is now before the House. My young and hon. friend who has just addressed the House and also the hon. member from Vercheres (Mr. Rainville), I understand, though I was not here at the time, commented somewhat adversely upon the fact that I had stated at a former stage of the debate that I was within the lines of Torres Vedras.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. If I was within the lines of Torres Vedras it was not with any intention of remaining there permanently. My hon. friend who has just addressed the House stated that the Duke of Wellington was within the lines of Torres Vedras. That is true, but as everybody knows the Duke of Wellington came out from the lines of Torres Vedras, and came out with some effect upon the army of the enemy. If I have taken that position, Sir, it was with no intention whatever of shirking an expression of my opinion, in which I am very proud to see hon. gentlemen on the other side seem to take some interest, but it was because I did not think that it was advisable for me to enter so early in the debate when so far, the debate was not within the two sides of the House, but altogether within the government side of the House.

If the question has been brought before the House—this family question—in connection with the boundaries of Manitoba, the debate was not raised from this side but from the other side of the House. I think it would have been rather imprudent in me to interfere in that family quarrel. I think it was my part to keep out of it and see what position was taken by hon. gentlemen opposite. I have a word to say to hon. gentlemen on the other side. But before I proceed further, I must say that, for my part, I approach this question at the moment, not in my capacity as leader of a party, but as an individual, I do not want to bind anybody to my own opinion on a question of this kind; I leave it to the judgment and conscience of every one of those who have honoured me in the past, or to-day honour me, with their confidence. But I never meant anybody to be in doubt as to what my attitude would be on this question. My attitude upon this question is well known; it has been well known for the last sixteen years. I stand, in this year 1912 on the same platform on which I stood in 1896. I would not then interfere with the autonomy of Manitoba; I will not now when in opposition interfere with the autonomy of Manitoba.

As regards this amendment proposed by my hon. friend from Yamaska (Mr. Mondou), to my mind, it is beyond doubt, and I think ought to be beyond doubt to himself, that if his object was to maintain in the new territory of Manitoba the legislation upon which he has based his amendment, the legislation of 1875, he could not have taken—I hope he will allow me to say so without offense—a more ineffective way of doing it. I think it has been demonstrated to him that the amendment which he has proposed even if it had been adopted by this House, would not in any way add to the rights or privileges of the minority in the new territory accorded to them in the Manitoba Act. My hon. friend the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty), has argued, and my hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Macdonald), also has argued, that this whole question is a question of law. My hon. friend the Minister of Justice has been particularly emphatic upon that point. This is indeed a question of law, and, so far as this amendment is concerned, it is nothing but a question of law. But, though this is a question of law, my hon. friend the Minister of Justice, who comes from the province of Quebec, is well aware that it is as a political question that we must look at it at this moment. My hon. friend is well aware that for the last fifteen years it has been stated by all the forces of the party to which he belongs in that province that the settlement we made of the actual question in 1896, was no settlement at all, and that if the party to which he belongs were returned to office, the first thing they would do would be to tear that settlement to pieces and restore to the minority in Manitoba the full system of separate schools they had prior to 1890. That is the battle we have had to fight at every election since 1896. In 1900, in 1904, in 1908, the same question was always discussed. It was declared that I, in particular, as leader of the party then in office, had betrayed my fellow-religionists, that the settlement we had made was in violation of the clear injunction of the Privy Council, that we were in default, that the settlement was invalid, and that as soon as the Conservative administration was returned to office, all this would be set aside, and the minority in Manitoba would be put back into the position they held in 1890. Everybody within the sound of my voice who comes from the province of Quebec knows that I am not in any way exaggerating the case, but that I have stated it as it was stated over and over again by the party to which my hon. friend belongs, in every election we have had since 1896.

Let us look at this question. I agree with something that was said by my hon. friend the Minister of Justice this afternoon. We are a people of many origins and many creeds; but there is no class in this country which, by reason of creed, race or any other consideration, can claim to have rights indefeasible and superior to the rights of any other class. All the classes have rights, and all these rights are limited by the rights of the other classes. And whenever there is a clash of interests, as unfortunately there have been too many in the past, it behooves the minority to be moderate in its claims, it behooves the majority to be generous in its treatment of the minority. But, if any class in this community insists upon its pound of flesh according as it may be written in the bond, and if all the other classes meet such pretensions in a similar manner, the result must be a condition of affairs not far removed from anarchy. The policy I have advocated ever since I have entered public life, the policy upon which I fought the elections of 1896, is that all such clashing of interests, whenever and wherever they occur, must be settled and can be settled only through compromise, through conciliation, and through appeal to all interested parties to make some sacrifices of opinion, and even pretensions, yes, and even of rights, in order to come to an understanding of peace, wood-will and harmony in this land. I was elected on that platform, and upon that platform I stood so long as I was in office, not only upon this question of education, which came to the front on more than one occasion, during the term of office of the late administration, but even on all similar matters in which their was a clashing of interests. May I recall to the recollection of the House, for instance, our method of dealing with the problem which has been agitating the province of British Columbia for many years, the problem of Asiatic immigration.

There is in British Columbia constant cause of trouble arising out of Asiatic immigration. This is not due to any prejudice of colour, this is not due to any ill-will, but it is the result of economic conditions which prevail in British Columbia. It has been shown that whenever 'Asiatic labour' comes into competition in the labour market with white labour, there is an immediate cause of disturbance. The reason is obvious, it is that the standard of Oriental civilization as compared with our own civilization is very different, and the Asiatic labourer is able, on a lower wage than the white man, to live in comparative comfort, whereas it is not possible for a white man to accept such a wage. The consequence is that we had in British Columbia a constant source of trouble. When we came into office in 1896 we were approached by a majority of the members of the government of British Columbia, who were then in sympathy with the government, with a request to increase the capitalization tax upon Chinese immigrants which had been put on the statute-book by Sir John A. Macdonald in 1885, and to which we had no objection. We were asked at the same time to impose a similar tax upon the subjects of His Majesty the Japanese Emperor. To that we would not agree, and why? Why did we think it advisable to put a capitation tax upon Chinamen and not upon Japanese? The reason was that there had been recently signed between the King of England and the Emperor of Japan a treaty of alliance, to a large extent offensive and defensive, and it would have been an indignity to put such a stigma upon the subjects of our ally. So, instead of putting that indignity upon the subjects of the Emperor of Japan, we sent to Japan one of our colleagues, the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) to settle that question; and by pursuing a policy of conciliation between the two countries we were able to obtain from the Japanese Emperor an engament that he himself would restrict Japanese immigration within a certain limit, and the result has been that since then we have had peace in British Columbia. True it is that the course then followed was not satisfactory to the people of British Columbia; but I believe that I am within the judgment of the House in saying that the policy was not only a strong one, but was eminently wise.

In the same manner we settled the school question that had been a source of trouble in Manitoba previous to 1896; in the same manner we settled the school question in Saskatchewan and Alberta by the Autonomy Bills of 1905. All these questions, burning as they were, we settled by a policy of compromise, of conciliation, by an appeal to the good sense, and better judgment, and better heart of all the parties interested. But Sir, that policy of conciliation and of compromise was denounced with the greatest possible severity in the province of Quebec, by all the forces of the Conservative party, and by none with greater bitterness and severity than the hon. gentlemen whom I now see before me on the treasury benches, my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Monk) my hon. friend the Postmaster General (Mr. Pelletier) and my hon. friend the Minister of Inland Revenue (Mr. Nantel). These hon. gentlemen and their friends, in the press and on the platform, denounced compromise as humiliating, denounced conciliation as weak, and this they preached in season and out of season, in public prints, in the press, and everywhere they could get a hearing. Wherever they could find a stump for their two feet they preached the policy of no concession. Their plea was: We want the plentitude of the rights of the minority in the province of Manitoba restored to them, and if the Conservative party is returned to power we will give them that plenitude of rights. Now Sir, am I exaggerating? Everybody knows that this has been the policy of hon. gentlemen on the opposite side of the House. Everybody knows that they have maintained that policy from 1895-6 up to the 5th of March. 1912, when, within our hearing, and to the dismay of their followers, they declared that the settlement which was made in 1897, whether good or bad, was binding, and that there was nothing more to be done for the minority in the province of Manitoba. Sir, there is no doubt whatever that if the speeches that we heard on the 5th of March, a week ago, to-morrow, from the mouth of the Minister of Public Works, and from the mouth of the Postmaster General, had been heard during the last election in the province of Quebec, the result would have been somewhat different from what it was. The general result would have been different, as to the individual result, I daresay the Minister of Public Works might have squeezed into his seat by the skin of his teeth, but even of that I am not very sure. But as to my hon. friend the Postmaster General, he would never have come within 1,000 votes of obtaining the seat of the county of Quebec.

Heaven, Sir, is my witness, that so far as I am personally concerned, the defeat of the 21st September last never caused me a moment of pain, I certainly regretted it for the party, and I still more regretted it for the country. But I repeat, that it never affected me personally in the least. I do not know but that I am rather glad than otherwise, for this reason, that the defeat of the Liberal party gives us the measure of the men who have replaced us, and the people of Quebec will understand now that all these loud professions and promises of restoring the rights of the minority in Manitoba were simply snares and shams made to reach office, and to be disavowed as soon as office was reached. The people of Quebec will now understand that I and my friends did not deceive them when we told them that the school question had been settled in 1897, and that these gentlemen who boasted that they would re-open it, never could re-open it at all, because it was settled for all time. The country has gained this much, that we shall have no more agitation upon this subject; the country has gained this much, that we shall know where we are, and that forever this question is removed from the field of agitation.

My hon. friend the Postmaster General and my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works, in order to cover their retreat, went very far back upon the record and threshed the old straw over and over again threshed before. They said, in order to cover their retreat, that the settlement which I made with the government of Manitoba of the school question in 1897, had gone behind the judgment of the Privy Council, and had been at variance with its dispositions. I have to take issue with my hon. friends upon that point. I say that the settlement which we made in 1897 in no way contravened the dispositions of the judgment of the Privy Council. I say that the Privy Council never ordered the restoration of separate schools in Manitoba.

I say more; I say that the minority in Manitoba, before the Privy Council, never asked for a complete restoration of separate schools as they existed before 1890. This is a broad statement on my part. I say that the minority in Manitoba, before the Privy Council, never asked for the full restoration of the school system which existed prior to the legislation of 1890. For what I say now I will give book and verse. I will quote from the argument of the counsel of the minority, Mr. Ewart. This is the thoughtful argument with which he summed up the case. I beg hon. gentlemen to give me their attention while I read the argument presented then by Mr. Ewart as to what were the conditions of the minority in Manitoba. This is the language that was used by Mr. Ewart:

> Before closing I would like to say a word or two as to what we are seeking. As it has been already remarked, we are not asking for any declaration as to the extent of the relief to be given by the Governor General. We merely ask that it should be held that he has jurisdiction to hear our prayer, and to grant us some relief if he thinks proper to do so. It may be that the Dominion authorities may not choose to re-establish us in all the rights and privileges which we enjoyed prior to this Act of 1890, although that was acquiesced in by everybody, and it remained as a good working Act for a period of nineteen years, and although I may say also that that is the system, or almost the system, which has existed in the province of Quebec for more than a quarter of a century, it may be that the Dominion authorities may prefer the Ontario system, under which there is a closer governmental control—a system under which government control is very complete, under which books are chosen by the government inspectors appointed by government, and all school regulations are made by government. Or it may be that some other system may be devised which will enable the Roman Catholics to teach in schools to which no Protestant child now goes, the religion of its parents under limited circumstances, without thereby being penalized by ostracism from the public school provisions. We cannot tell, nor have I come here instructed to state what the measure of relief will be which will be asked if it be held that the Governor General has jurisdiction to deal with this matter, but this much I think I may properly say that we have no desire to withdraw from the operation of state statutory control. That position we never did possess under the Manitoba statutes, and we do not see—nor, indeed, can we ask—to be placed in any better position than the position which we occupied prior to the Act of 1890.

Is there in these words of the counsel of the minority any statement that they asked for the full restoration of the system which was abolished in 1890? They simply asked that it be decided that the Governor in Council had the right to hear their request, that he had power to interfere, leaving it to the Governor in Council to provide such relief as he might think proper after having looked into the circumstances. That judgment, so clear in itself, has been represented for fifteen years by the gentlemen who now sit on the treasury benches as an order from the Privy Council to the government of Canada, to the government of Manitoba and to every person else concerned, to restore Catholic schools as they existed prior to 1890. All they asked was in the very words of counsel, some relief, leaving it to the discretion of the government according to the circumstances, to give it in larger or smaller measure, as it might be decided. This is the order which was made by the lords of the Privy Council. I would also ask the indulgence of the House if I cite at some length from the judgment of the Privy Council. Their lordships say:

As a matter of fact the objection of Roman Catholics to schools such as alone receive state aid under the Act of 1890 is conscientious and deeply rooted. If this had not been so, if there had been a system of public education acceptable to Catholics and Protestants alike, the elaborate enactments which have been the subject of so much controversy and consideration would have been unnecessary.

And then it goes on to the concluding part:

For the reasons which have been given, their lordships are of opinion that the 2nd subsection of section 22 of 'The Manitoba Act' is the governing enactment and that appeal to the Governor General in Council was admissible by virtue of that enactment, on the grounds set forth in the memorials and petitions, inasmuch as the Acts of 1890 affected rights and privileges of the Roman Catholic minority in relation to education within the meaning of that subsection. The further question is submitted whether the Governor in Council has power to make the declarations or remedial orders asked for in the memorials or petitions or has any other jurisdiction in the premises. Their lordships have decided that the Governor General in Council has jurisdiction and that the appeal is well founded, but the particular course to be pursued must be determined by the authorities to whom it has been committed by the statute. It is not for this tribunal to intimate the precise steps to be taken. Their general character is sufficiently defined by the 3rd subsection of section 22 of 'The Manitoba Act.'

It is certainly not essential that the statutes repealed by the Act of 1890 should be re-enacted or that the precise provisions of these statutes should again be made law. The system of education embodied in the Acts of 1890 no doubt commends itself to and adequately supplies the wants of the great majority of the inhabitants of the province. All legitimate ground of complaint would be removed if that system were supplemented by provisions which would remove the grievance upon which the appeal is founded and were modified as far as might be necessary to give effect to these provisions.

Mark my words. No order here to restore the Catholic schools as they existed previous to 1890! Their lordships on the contrary are clear to state that there would be no necessity of repealing the Act of 1890 which was satisfactory to the majority but in order to remove the grievance of the minority they suggested that it should be supplemented by some such legislation or some such mode as would allow them to bring up their children in their own faith in so far as the schools were concerned. Upon this there was a remedial order issued, an order which was issued certainly very imprudently, without sufficient information, without taking into consideration what clashing of interests there might be in Manitoba and that order simply instructed the province of Manitoba to restore effectively and actually the system of separate schools which had been in existence prior to 1890. Three things are necessary to constitute separate schools; first of all separate organization; second, exemption from taxation for public schools, and in the third place an adequate share of the provincial funds allotted to education.

These things were ordered in the Remedial Order of the previous government. The government of Manitoba was ordered to enact a law which would give back to the minority

(a) The right to build, maintain, equip, manage conduct and support Roman Catholic schools in the manner provided by the said statutes which were repealed by the two Acts of 1890 aforesaid.

(b) The right to share proportionately in any grant made out of the public funds for the purposes of education.

(c) The right of exemption of such Roman Catholics as contribute to Roman Catholic schools from all payment or contribution to the support of any other schools.

The great mistake which was made by the government of Sir Mackenzie Bowell in that Remedial Order was that they were ordering the province of Manitboa to do more than they who had passed the Order could enforce. If the province of Manitoba refused to comply with the Order, they could very well have passed a Bill which would exempt the minority from paying taxes to the public schools, they could very well have passed an Act giving the right to the minority to organize their own schools, but they could not by any Act of legislation or by order in council, or in any manner whatever, give away the funds of the province of Manitoba to the separate schools. And in this they made a fatal mistake; they introduced a Bill and, just as we had anticipated, while the Bill authorized the legislature to pass a Separate School Act, to exempt from taxation the supporters of separate schools, they could not give to the schools any share in the public moneys and therefore, if the Remedial Bill had become law, the schools which might have been organized could not have received any funds out of the public treasury; they would have been at once placed in a position of inferiority and therefore the settlement could not be satisfactory to the minority.

We came into office upon that issue. We made a settlement with the province of Manitoba. I do not pretend that the settlement we made with Manitoba was perfect, but I affirm it was the best thing that could be done for the minority in Manitoba; I never pretended that it was, but I say, without any hesitation, that it was far better than the provisions which were made in the Remedial Bill. It was as good as could be obtained under existing circumstances, after this question had been for six years the battleground of factions in Manitoba. My hon. friend the Postmaster General, in his speech the other day, said that the settlement which had been made had not been efficient. I take complete issue with him upon that point, and I think I might call witnesses to this, but it will be sufficient if I state here what the settlement was and how it was worked. The settlement that we made with the government of Mr. Greenway at that time was that wherever in any school in a town or city there was an average attendance of 40 children of the Roman Catholic faith, they would have a right to have a teacher of their own persuasion. In rural districts where there was an average attendance of 25 children, they would have the right to obtain from the trustees a teacher of their own persuasion, and a right, at certain times and under certain conditions to be determined by the trustees, to have religious education in the schools. Children speaking the French language would have the right to receive their instruction in French. That was the tenor of the settlement we made with Manitoba.

My hon. friend tells me, and told the House the other day, that that settlement was inefficient. I tell him, and I think I will not be contradicted by anybody here, that that agreement has been put into operation in at least 200 schools in the province of Manitoba, and it has given complete satisfaction. The only places in which it has not given any satisfaction are Brandon and Winnipeg, and the reason for that, as I understand, and I speak subject to correction, is that the settlement was not put in operation in these cities. For reasons which I do not know, or rather which I know too well, this settlement was not put in operation in those cities, but everywhere else it was put in operation, and I repeat that wherever it has been put in operation outside of these two cities it has given fairly general satisfaction. That is the position to-day, that is the position which was denounced in the province of Quebec for no other reason that I can see except the desire of obtaining power at all costs.

I now come to the question of the existing condition of things in the territory to be annexed under this Bill to Manitoba. There is no doubt whatever that the law of 1875 is in operation to-day in those territories, and were that territory organized to-day, as was stated by the Minister of Justice this afternoon, the minority would have the right to all its provisions. But that is not a constitutional right, it is simply a legislative enactment of this parliament under the control of this parliament so long as that territory remains under its jurisdiction, but no further than that. If this were a constitutional agreement or right, there would be no necessity to put it in any law, because it would carry itself as a constitutional right wherever the territories might be placed. But there is this objection. The young members who have followed their leaders so far now believe that the grievances of Manitoba would be relieved as they want them to be relieved. There is this objection to the incorporation of the law of 1875 in the present Bill, which would give full separate school rights to that part of the country, that such an enactment would not be worth the paper on which it was printed because we cannot impose it on Manitoba. Unless Manitoba agrees to this law this parliament has no authority to force it upon Manitoba. This would have been a case for compromise, a case for conciliation, but my hon. friends who sit on the treasury benches from the province of Quebec despise conciliation, and have contempt for compromise. Their policy was everything or nothing, and the result is nothing.

My hon. friend, the Postmaster General, the other day stated three or four times that he was fully assured that Mr. Roblin was well disposed towards the minority, that he was disposed to give to the minority as much as or more than was given in the law of 1875. If, Sir, Mr. Roblin is so well disposed, it would have been an excellent occasion to make the compromise or settlement proposed. Indeed there might have been no necessity for a compromise.

If Mr. Roblin is so well disposed, perhaps he would have given everything on the asking. My hon. friend told us with great positiveness that he was assured of the disposition of Mr Roblin. We could not understand where his assurance came from, because he told us that he had no understanding with Mr. Roblin. But he was sure of his facts. How did he know? Was it a case of telepathy, or did a little bird come from Winnipeg and whisper in his ear that it would be all right? I have to point out to my hon. friend that if the law of 1875, giving the full right to separate schools to the minority, has not been incorporated in this Bill, it is because there are men beside him and men behind him who would not have this disposition incorporated in this Bill. I have no doubt that my hon. friend the Postmaster General, and also my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works, made a pretty ardent request to their colleagues to save them from the humiliating position in which they would be placed, if the school rights were not restored to the minority. At least, I give them that credit. I suppose my hon. friend the Postmaster General, made the request to his colleagues, not from the love he may bear to the minority, but for the good name he wants to give to the Postmaster General. But he could not obtain his request. Mr. Roblin, I am prepared to believe, is well disposed, but Mr. Roblin has some men behind him also, who may not allow that fair disposition to materialize, as my hon. friend expects it to materialize. Sir, the public opinion which in 1890 forced the legislature of Manitoba to remove the separate schools as they existed then, was the result of conflicts and passions which I have reason to believe are now passed away. But, Sir, as it happens, very often, those passions have left behind them an aftermath which has not yet passed away, which has still a good deal of force and potentiality. It is with the human race as it is with the elements. When the elements are thrown out of gear by some cataclysm, it takes a long time before they are restored to their normal condition. When the storms have been raging on the ocean, when the waves have been roused to fury, if all of a sudden the winds ceased to blow, the clouds vanish from the horizon, and the sun shines again warm and bright. But though peace now reigns above, peace is not yet restored to the waters below. For a long time the billows continue to be tossed by the internal fury imparted to them by the storm. Though the storm itself has abated, it is a long time before the serenity of the heavens is reflected on the placid bosom of the deep.

Sir, we know only too well from the teaching of history, and from our own experience in this new country, that the passions which rage in the human heart far exceed the violence of winds and waves and storms. We know from our own experience, as well as from the experience of other countries, and from the whole teaching of history, that when in any community popular passions have been driven to wrath, even though the causes of their anger may be removed, still for a long time the community continues to be torn by their violence, and it is only by slow degrees, by mutual forbearance, that peace and harmony again recover their blessed sway. It is in the light of this experience that I have endeavoured to guide the destinies of the party to which I belong since that party entrusted me with its fortunes. I have learned from history, especially from the history of this country, that the best method of vindicating even the most sacred causes, is by moderation and the respect of others as well as the respect of ourselves. I have learned to apply this doctrine even to the settlement of the school question of Manitoba. On that occasion I appealed to the best elements of all parties, of all creeds, of all races, and I think I have succeeded fairly well except with one class the class now sitting on the treasury benches. Whatever may have been the reward of my efforts in that direction, the policy which I maintained in office I shall maintain in opposition. Never shall I raise my hand in any way so that discord shall come in this land, and for these considerations I shall vote against the amendment.

Hon. F. D. MONK (Minister of Public Works). Mr. Speaker, I have no desire to detain the House at this late hour; and indeed, it seemed to me, after the full expression of my views which I gave the other day, that I would not be called upon to speak again on this subject. But, Mr. Speaker, I cannot allow the statement of my right hon. friend this evening to go unchallenged. I knew, when my right hon. friend stated the other day, with studied caution, that he had retired within the lines of Torres Vedras, that he would be chased out of those lines. I must confess that I was somewhat curious to see how he would manœuvre. I did not for a single moment doubt that he would not, as the hon. member for Hochelaga (Mr. Coderre) has so eloquently portrayed, follow the example of the noble duke whose name is associated with Torres Vedras, but that his issuing from those lines would be coupled with a great deal of gliding and sliding. My right hon. friend, he will pardon me for saying, is getting old; we are all getting old; and he has acquired the habit of self-laudation coupled with the laudation of past times. For quite a while I have noticed that my right hon. friend, with whom my relations have always been most cordial, has been given to self-laudation. He is a 'laudator temporis acti.' He has been singularly faithful to that motto. But 'pride goeth before destruction and haughty spirit before a fall,' and he has fallen into the pit this evening.

I remember that my right hon. friend boasted from his place in the House that he would have a transcontinental line that would cost some $13,000,000 or $15,000,000, and that——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. MONK—he said it would be paid out of the surplus of one year. We know what came of that assertion.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. MONK. That was one of those occasions. Another occasion arose when my right hon. friend, at the time which he referred to a moment ago, when we were discussing the Autonomy Bills, said that he stood upon the rock of the constitution, and invited us to come up there with him. Some one on this side of the House beckoned to him, and with the alacrity of a panther he jumped down from the rock, and he bears us illwill because we would not follow him upon that occasion. Let me point out to my right hon. friend that he has either not followed my humble and modest career during the past 15 years, or else I must accuse him of having intentionally deceived both the House and the country upon the real attitude which I, and those around me, from 1896 took upon this very question which we are discussing this evening. A few days ago I mentioned in this very debate that before the settlement —in which my right hon. friend appears to be so proud, but to which I will refer in a moment—where he sacrificed shamelessly the rights of those he was bound to protect, I declared that with respect to remedial legislation, the verdict of the people in 1896 was conclusive, that that mode of remedying the grievances of the minority in Manitoba was vetoed by the people. And when my right hon. friend, without even consulting the complainants—the minority interested—concluded with the government of Manitoba, which had deprived them of their rights, and alone and ex parte made that settlement; when he brought down Mr. Greenway to Montreal, gave him a triumph, tendered him a banquet, and invited all his friends to celebrate that settlement; when we knew the terms of that settlement; when my right hon. friend brought it down and laid it on the table of the House, but was so much ashamed of himself that he failed to put upon the agreement his signature, and that of the man who had concluded it with him—I found, Sir, that that agreement was not a fair one, and that after all his boasts, after all his representations, after all his conciliation, he had finally sacrificed the very people whom it was his duty to protect. That was what we found, that was what I declared, and on no occasion since 1897 have I discussed that question in our province. I have never discussed it, never raised it, never made it an issue——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. MONK. And on every occasion when it has been discussed before me in public, I have declared that the time for our interference was past. The right hon. gentleman brought that agreement down and placed it upon the table of the House bearing no signature. The duplicate of it was brought before the House in Manitoba and upon that document the signatures can be found. I will not comment upon it at length but I will say this as a man who represents and believes in British institutions, after all the boasts of my right hon. friend it results in this: That the minority at the present moment in the province of Manitoba who have their voluntary schools and for conscientious reasons cannot attend the public schools, are obliged to pay taxes for the support of the schools to which they cannot send their children, and at the same time to support their own voluntary schools, I say if you call that a fair agreement and the result of conciliation, the right hon. gentleman had a very good reason not to place his signature upon the agreement when he brought it down to the House. I have never discussed that question in public. It is not reopened here, and I do not intend to discuss it this evening beyond this point: That when my right hon. friend on the road of self-laudation points out this agreement, and what led up to it, as an example of his own famous achievements under the theory of conciliation, I say that it is proper to point out that we know this laudation is at fault. My right hon. friend passed on to what he did in Japan as an example of his powers of conciliation and of their marvellous results, to the sending over there my hon. friend the Postmaster General (Mr. Lemieux),whose conciliation went so far that he came back looking for retaliation. The hon. member for Rouville has been to France since and when he came back I mistook him for a Frenchman, no offence intended. But this argument is neither more nor less than childish. Why hon. gentlemen from British Columbia, who know what happened in our negotiations with Japan, will have been most stupefied I am sure to hear the self-laudation of my right hon. friend this evening in connection with that matter.

What are the facts? They are familiar to every one of us. When we were called upon to give our adhesion to that treaty, on two—yes, I believe, on three—different occasions, the Imperial authorities called the attention of my right hon. friend to defects in that treaty, apparent, glaring defects. Our American neighbours had, a short time before, or at that very time, concluded a treaty with Japan, in which they carefully guarded against the carelessness which characterized my right hon. friend. In treating with Japan, they carefully guarded against excessive immigration from that country. All this was pointed out lengthily here in the discussion which took place in reference to Japanese immigration. My right hon. friend and his colleagues swept aside the advice of the more experienced statesmen of the mother country and of the Imperial government on that point, and rushed headlong into a treaty the full effects of which weigh upon us to-day;—they hang over our heads like the sword of Damocles. The result of all this conciliation is simply this—that as everybody knows, we are in debt to the good-will of Japan and are not in the enjoyment of the plentitude of our rights.

Well, my right hon. friend then referred to the conciliatory process he had adopted in 1905 at the time of the foundation of the two new provinces. I know my right hon. friend upon that occasion, with the Minister of Finance of that day, sitting here in the very place which I occupy, and another gentleman who had got him down on the rock of the constitution, on the other side, had to do a great deal of conciliation; but I am not aware that there is anything in that particularly to boast of. On more than one occasion I stated in the province of Quebec that all that my right hon. friend did on that occasion was not conciliation, but a backdown by which he expected to save his position in the government.

Mr. Speaker, I must apologize to the House for taking even the short time I have taken. I merely wished to correct some of the impressions sought to be given to the House. And perhaps I might venture to suggest, very humbly, to my right hon. friend that he must really put some check upon what I cannot call anything else but the senile habit of lauding himself and speaking of the past.

An hon. MEMBER. What about yourself?

Mr. MONK. I have no apology to make for myself. Now, in closing, I wish to say this: My right hon. friend has imagined a picture, in comical vein, of my colleagues from the province of Quebec and myself as endeavouring to obtain, by entreaty and prayer and persuasion, from our colleagues in the government, the introduction of some guarantee clause in this Bill. Well, that may have been the mode of proceeding at the time when my right hon. friend was the leader of the government; we have not that habit as yet. I know that there has been—I myself have been the object of considerable obloquy in reference to our position in this matter. It has not put me in a resigning mood.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. MONK. I am very glad to keep the House in good humour. I must say that to me it is absolutely inconceivable—and I think the same remark no doubt applies to my colleagues from the province of Quebec who are very much in the same position as myself—it is absolutely inconceivable, I say, that a man who has the cares and labours and responsibility of the office which I have the honour to hold, should have, past a certain age, any real desire to keep that office if he could decently get out of it. But the obloquy to which I have referred, has not, as I have said, brought me into a resigning mood. On the contrary, I must say that I feel riveted, bolted and barred to the office more than ever before. I should have to borrow from the language that I learned at my good mother's knee, expressions strong enough to convey how little these insults and invectives have led me in the direction of resignation.

My hon. friend the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) went deeply into the legal question this afternoon. I cannot claim to have his competency, but I may say that I have looked as deeply as time allowed into what has been called, and is still called among certain people, the vested rights existing in these territories. I find none,—could not find any of any kind. There was a restriction placed upon an administrative officer in case he was surrounded by a clause, in case he was authorized to legislate. He never had the clause without which he could not legislate; he never was authorized to legislate; he never did legislate. Laws were not passed; schools were not established. I cannot anywhere find the slightest trace of vested rights. Then you fall, as I said previously in this debate, into the region of policy. There are no vested rights. But, as was said this evening by speakers —and, I believe, very properly said—what rights there may be, are protected by the constitution of the province. I say you fall into the region of policy. And, as a Roman Catholic, as one who has had some experience of public life and knows something of this country, I say that, as a matter of policy at the present juncture I cannot conceive of anything more unwise, more unpatriotic, more calculated to injure the very interests we are called upon to protect here than to insist upon impossible conditions. Summum jus, summa injuria: to exact things impossible is to prejudice the very interests which it is our duty to protect. There has been upon the point under discussion, no divergence, no suing, no praying, but absolute accord amongst all the members of this cabinet. And I trust we shall soon see the end of this controversy.

Mr. E. B. DEVLIN (Wright). I had hoped to be able to approach this subject with all the dignity that a question affecting the position of religious colleagues of the minority in this country should demand.

But after hearing the remarks of the hon. the Minister of Public Works, after hearing the profession of the hon. Minister of Public Works, I think, Mr. Speaker, you will pardon me if I say to that hon. gentleman that any dispassionate listener this evening to this debate, hearing the language used by the right hon. leader of the opposition and the language used by the Minister of Public Works, will ask himself where the senility rests. I am surprised that the Minister of Public Works, who generally uses polite language in debate, who is a professor of constitutional law in one of the great universities of this country, and is charged to instruct the youth of our land, should so far debase the language of debate, in order to bolster up what he would like to make out as an argument, by insulting the man who is recognized on both sides of this House, and by all classes of our community, as the greatest citizen of Canada. In listening to such language as that, I, as a young man, having up to the present moment the greatest possible respect for the Minister of Public Works, in listening to the words used by him to-night when he says that since 1897 he and his colleagues, and his followers, from the province of Quebec, have not used the Manitoba school question against the leader of the opposition, am reminded of the words of Shakespeare: 'You make such a sinner of your memory as to believe your own lie.' Mr. Speaker, I have under my hand the political programme of a gentleman occupying the high post in this country of Minister of Public Works. At the time this programme was written he was plain Mr. F. D. Monk, and I find in this programme the following language:—

> Respecting the federal pact of 1867, as regards the protection of all minorities, in order to ensure contentment amongst all classes, a policy of protection which will ensure the full development of Canadian resources——

I ask you, Mr. Speaker, what was the Minister of Public Works referring to then if he was not trying to make an appeal against the right hon. the leader of the opposition because of his treatment of minorities in this country. We who come from the province of Quebec, who have had to do with elections during the last fifteen years or more, have heard the Minister of Public Works upon public platforms, as I myself have heard him at St. Eustache and other places, making appeals against the right hon. the leader of the opposition, putting up candidates, publishing newspapers such as the one I have in my hand, called 'L'Ami du Peuple,' in the interest of the hon. gentlemen who were denouncing the leader of the opposition. Will the Minister of Public Works deny that he supported the Conservative-Nationalist or Independent, candidate in the county of Wright at the last election? Will he deny that, in the interest of that candidate, there was a paper published, either by the Conservative or by the Nationalist party, called 'L'Ami du Peuple,' in which I find these words, and which, knowing, Mr. Speaker, that you now possess a considerable knowledge of the French language, I will read as I find them written:

> The misdeeds of the 1896 regime caused us to league against him. We agreed with them at that time. With Laurier we used to say: 'Down with the culprits!' Heaven knows whether Laurier was sincere or not; but we know that we were sincere. Shall we prove less honest to-day, or have we been so corrupted by Laurier that we have come to the point of tamely submitting to the rule of fraud and robbery.

Why should one vote against Laurier?

Why, because he has proven false to the constitution and to the traditions of all political parties.

Because, when imparting constitutional life to western Canada, he should have protected all such rights as were guaranteed by the constitution; because, although his prestige and his majority would have enabled him to do so, he did shrink from duty; because, having to choose between right and fanaticism, he did place his power at the disposal of sectarian hatred against right and justice.

Mr. Speaker, you understand these words, you understand why they were directed against the Liberal party, and more especially against the right hon. the leader of the opposition. But when you hear men who professed Nationalist principles in 1897 and since, who to-day, like the Minister of Inland Revenue (Mr. Nantel), whom I also heard in the good old county of Terrebonne denouncing the right hon. the leader of the opposition, and denouncing the sacrifice of the rights of the minority, you must indeed blush for the language that has been used by these same gentlemen to-night, who are ready to sacrifice every right that the minority in Manitoba ever had—according to the arguments that were used by them prior to 1912. But, Sir, you have heard that we have in the province of Quebec a very able gentleman, a splendid speaker, in the person of Mr Henri Bourassa.

Mr. Henri Bourassa, whom I always refused to follow, and whose principles I always refused to adopt, was, up to within the last two days, the leader of the hon. gentlemen who form the Nationalist wing of the Cabinet, and of the hon. gentlemen behind who followed, up to within the last few days, the Nationalist wing of the Cabinet. Mr. Bourassa, addressing a very large audience in the city of Montreal the other day, insinuated, if he did not say, that the right hon. leader of the opposition had betrayed the rights of the minority in Manitoba. Mr. Bourassa was right then when he said that, and was wrong when he spoke in 1898, or he was right in 1898, and he was wrong the other night. I will leave you to judge of the matter. In 1898 Mr. Bourassa, speaking upon the Manitoba school question, said this—his words will be found in 'Hansard' of 1898, vol. 2, page 5426:

When we consider that such a question as the Manitoba school question had been treated on most unsound principles for five years, had been so handled as to develop racial and religious passions, we could not expect it to be settled altogether satisfactorily in the first instance. The government coming into power had to settle the question as to do substantial justice to everybody, and not deceive anybody, and this has been achieved.

Again, speaking on the same subject, he went on to say—I am sorry to weary the House by quoting his words, but in view of the circumstances surrounding this question I believe it is well to refresh even Mr. Bourassa's memory:

I do not wish to boast about my religious principles or my national attachment in this House or on the platform, but I say to the hon. member for Beauharnois that when the Roman Catholic Church is not satisfied with what has been given to her, she will be able to speak for herself and be heard as well as that hon. member. I am a firm believer in the Catholic church and in the destiny of my race, because I know that in America under our British rule there is freedom for every creed and freedom for every race. I am a believer in the rule of my church, and if I am a firm believer in the future of my race it is because the politics and policy affirmed by the hon. member for Beauharnois and the hon. member for West York are not the policies and politics that are going to prevail in this country. I believe firmly that this school question will be settled, and settled on account of the position taken by this government, a position which has been met by the goodwill of the Greenway government, which has given more since this government came into power than during the whole time when hon. gentlemen opposite were in office. I hope this is the last we shall hear of this question, not because we are afraid of it or afraid of the position that we and this government have taken. I trust that so long as this party is in power questions of this kind will be met in the same way.

With that language I am heartily in accord and the position I am going to take to-night is the position which has been taken in this House and in this country ever since my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), has led the Liberal party, and I believe it to be the only wise policy that could be followed by any government in this country. The hon. member for Yamaska wants to insert in the Bill a clause which will in a measure, according to his own reasoning, protect the rights of the minority. I am not particularly concerned for the purposes of the argument that I make whether by statute or not there are rights belonging to the minority in Keewatin. I believe there may be certain legislative rights given to them. I believe that it was the intention of the legislators in 1875, that the minority should have certain rights, and that they intended that these rights should be lived up to. I am also of the opinion after studying the statutes, after reading the law of 1875, the law of 1876, and the law of 1906, which have been cited in this House, and which it would be useless for me at this late hour to repeat, that the particular laws guaranteeing to the minority in Keewatin these rights, have been embodied in subsequent statutes. But, whether they have rights or whether they have not rights, would the amendment of the hon. member for Yamaska, protect those rights? I do not believe that it would. I believe that the only policy to be followed in controversial questions, in religious questions, is the policy which has been adopted by my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition, and that is the policy of conciliation, the policy of meeting the majority in goodwill, representing to them the rights which the minority have, and asking them to give the minority the rights which have originally been guaranteed to them or which, in accordance with the spirit of the constitution of our country, they should have. I want to make my position perfectly clear, and if for one moment I thought that the amendment of the hon. member for Yamaska would give to the minority in the province of Manitoba greater rights than they have to-day, then, Sir, I would be ready to support that amendment because I believe in the system of separate schools. I have had occasion to go to separate schools. I do not want to have any class of people in Canada believe that I would be opposed to the system of separate schools. I have had occasion to go to denominational schools, and also to non-denominational schools. I believe in religious liberty for all classes of our citizens. I believe that we should not differentiate against any class of citizens or against any religious sect, or against any religious persuasion, but between believing that, and trying to coerce a province into giving rights which they have refused to adopt in the Bill which is now before the House there is a large difference. It seems to me that it would be ridiculous to imagine for one moment that we could put a clause in that Bill against the present constitution of the old province of Manitoba, and go before the people of that province, and ask them to adopt it. Let me refer for one moment to section 3, of 34-35 Victoria, chapter 28, which has already been read to this House, but which I make the base of my argument this evening. What does it say?

> The parliament of Canada may from time to time, with the consent of the legislature of any province of the said Dominion, increase, diminish or otherwise alter the limits of such province, upon such terms and conditions as may be agreed to by the said legislature, and may, with the like consent, make provision respecting the effect and operation of any such increase or diminution or alteration of territory in relation to any province affected thereby.

Do you suppose in virtue of that clause, that we can go to the province of Manitoba and say: Here are a few miles of territory that we want to give you to annex to your province, but before you annex it you must obey a condition which we lay down. That would be taking Manitoba by the throat and Manitoba would say: We will not accept your territory, or else: We will not accept the condition which is tantamount to saying that we will not accept your territory. If we were creating out of Keewatin a new province and annexing Manitoba to Keewatin, I can readily understand it would be reasonable for us to include a clause in the Bill which would guarantee separate schools; but we are not doing that, we are annexing new territory to an old province, with a set system of school law, with a set form of government. I for one, no matter what may be the consequence of the vote which I give to-night, no matter how my views may be received in the constituency which I have the honour to represent, believe that when questions such as this one come up it is by approaching the majority in a spirit of conciliation, as the right hon. the leader of the opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) has done, that Catholics, if they are in the minority, or Protestants, if they are in the minority, will obtain from the majority the rights to which they are entitled. In this, I thoroughly agree with the arguments of the Minister of Justice this afternoon. I might cite the clauses of the different statutes which he cited, but I think when he represented the law, he represented it as it stands to-day, and while there may be a divergence of opinion, while there may be references to the courts, I agree that the law that was laid down to-day by the Minister of Justice, is the real law on the subject and that if we approached the question of rights in Keewatin in any other spirit, we would be doing graver injustice to the Catholics of Keewatin and Manitoba than we could in any other way.

In concluding, I simply want to say that I shall vote against the amendment. I would vote for any amendment which would tend to approach the majority in Manitoba in a spirit of conciliation, but to approach them in the spirit in which the hon. member for Yamaska (Mr. Mondou) asks us to approach them, is unsound in law and unwise in fact and, therefore, I shall have no hesitation in voting against the amendment.

Mr. L. J. GAUTHIER (St. Hyacinthe): (translation). Mr. Speaker, in order to obey the decision which you have just rendered, that to be in order we must only discuss the amendment of the hon. member from Yamaska, I shall presently come to the remarks which I intended to make and which will be very short on account of the late stage of this debate.

The hon. members sitting at your left being driven into a corner because they remember their past promises and they must face the present conditions turn towards the hon. members of the opposition and say: 'Tell us what is your policy.' They forget, Mr. Speaker, that the Opposition is not bound to manage the affairs of the country, but to criticise the measures submitted to us by that government. And I state that as long as we are within the legitimate bounds of reasonable criticism, we fulfill our duties and the government can expect nothing more from us.

When the government, in submitting their measures and their reasons so as to enlighten their followers, shall have utterly failed in the accomplishment of the task which it is incumbent upon them to accomplish of demonstrating to the hon. members around them the fairness of the proposed measure; when within the ministerial ranks those who remember their promises and their pledges shall have exhausted all the available means in order to find a way out, to seek an amendment which will satisfy their conscience and their constituents, and shall also have failed, then it will be time for the Opposition to come forward and to move an amendment which will prove once more to the whole population of this country that the management of public affairs in Canada is only possible by following the policy of the Liberal party and by observing the principles which we have always recommended. We shall prove, Mr Speaker, that this country cannot be governed by coercion, intimidation nor threats, but that upon every troublesome question the government in power must have recourse to conciliation in order to have friendship between all nationalities and to maintain everlasting peace throughout this country.

As a member of His Majesty's loyal Opposition I am in duty bound to take a definite stand upon the question which is submitted to us and I have deemed it preferable, Mr. Speaker, to use my mother tongue so as to state exactly what I intend to do. When I remember that last week the hon. member from Yamaska made use of the English language, that at half past five in the afternoon he stated that he was not ready to vote and that at midnight that very evening, having heard the remarks of the hon. Minister of Public Works, his former professor of constitutional law at the Laval University, he declared, being cheered by the hon. members on the other side that he had formed his opinion and that he would vote in favour of the Bill, and specially, Mr. Speaker, when one remembers that two days later the hon. member complained that the English reporters had misunderstood him and that himself had not understood what he said because he had spoken English, it is the part of wisdom upon such a solemn occasion as this to use the language which is more familiar to us, and it is why I speak my mother tongue.

Now coming directly to the question, I declare, Mr. Speaker, that I am opposed to the Bill because it is incomplete, unfair, and that far from solving the question presented to us it tends to future litigation which is only liable to throw this country into a useless and even harmful agitation.

The amendment offered by the hon. member from Yamaska is nothing but a bluff resorted to by the government members in order to make the population of Quebec believe that some French Canadian members propose to keep their pledges and to fulfill the promises they made to the electorate. According to me, Mr. Speaker, the amendment is but a useless duplicate in so far as it puts into the Manitoba Boundaries Act a section which is already found in our statutes and which shall govern the annexed territory as soon as it will be part of the province of Manitoba. No rights are given to the minority; no rights of the minority are sanctioned and I say that such an amendment cannot have the assent nor the approval of a member wishing to do complete and integral justice to all the interested parties.

Mr. LAMARCHE. Has the hon. member himself a better amendment to offer?

Mr. GAUTHIER. Before he left the Chair, the Speaker of the House—probably on account of his perfect knowledge of the French language—has settled a point of order; he has stated that in this debate we must not wander away from the amendment offered by my hon. friend from Yamaska and if I understand the rules, the hon. member from Nicolet is not in order. We are now discussing the motion of the hon. member from Nicolet and as soon as the House will have settled the question, we shall be at liberty to submit a new one and I may be able then to enlighten my hon. friend from Nicolet.

When the hon. Minister of Public Works did reply to the right hon. leader of the Opposition, he spoke quite forcibly; he even addressed bitter words to my right hon. friend. I would like to remind the House and the country that the hon. Minister of Public Works, although he tried to belittle his opponent hoping no doubt to raise himself, has forgotten to tell us whether he was or not in favour of the amendment which we are now discussing.

Mr. Speaker, if I intended to be malicious I would say that it is strange that the hon. Minister of Public Works has not been called to order.

The remarks of the hon. Minister of Public Works, if they were not in order, were nevertheless intended to justify his present stand in the opinion of his new friend, who is now his protector and who may be his tormentor to-morrow. The hon. minister knew quite well that in order to justify himself in the opinion of his nationalist leader he had to heap abuse upon the right hon. leader of the Opposition, being sure that if he abused Laurier, the hatred of Bourassa would be so well served that he would absolve the hon. Minister of Public Works of the surrender of his opinions which he had lately made.

For the last sixteen years, Mr. Speaker, it was my privilege to meet the hon. Minister of Public Works upon the hustings; I have crossed swords with him in over fifty meetings. When I remember his impassioned appeals for the defence of the rights of the minority, his burning sentences against the then prime minister who had betrayed the confidence of his fellow-countrymen and surrendered the rights of the minority in Canada and when I hear him to-night state upon the floor of the House that he never was guilty of what we charge him with, I am at a loss to understand how the hon. minister can have forgotten so soon his speeches, his promises and his pledges.

I understand that hon. minister of Public Works does not care much about the opinion I may entertain about him from a political point of view. But I was surprised to hear his statement as to the Catholic point of view. This defensor of the altar, this protector of the hierarchy, this uncompromised champion of the Catholic religion said, last week, in his speech, that the Greenway-Sifton settlement, in 1897, was a final settlement. Has not Mr. Speaker, the Encyclical "affarivos" declared that the question of the Manitoba schools was not finally settled. That it would be settled only when the Catholic minority would have received their integral rights? Now the hon. minister of Public Works, contrary to the dictations of the Church, asserts that this question has been settled fifteen years ago. If the hon. Minister of Public Works is not excommunicated by the young men of the "Association de la Jeunesse Catholique," and in every conclave of the Sacred Heart League he will be lucky.

Before explaining the vote I will give in a moment, I would like to allude to some statements made by the hon. member for Chambly-Vercheres. The hon. member stated that he was now a faithful follower of the government, and he speaks with disdain of his whole political acquaintances. I would like the hon. members to know that during the last electoral campaign, which was closed on the 21st of september last, the hon. member for Chambly-Vercheres paid me a visit in the parish of Ste. Madeleine and in the middle of the meeting, when he was speaking, he declared emphatically that he had kept in their integrity the true principles of the liberal party. Any one who heard the honourable member would have thought that he was really liberal, but that we of the liberal party had abandoned all the principles of our party. We were nothing else but ministerialists and were fattened at the party manger.

Mr. MONK. Have I well understood the hon. member when he said that he was a liberal? This surprises me, because I think I met him at the Club Lafontaine.

Mr. LEMIEUX. It was after a good supper, I suppose.

Mr. GAUTHIER. It was perhaps before going to bed.

When the hon. member for Chambly-Vercheres who is a ministerialist asserts, as he did to-night, that he has remained honest and that he has kept all his political virtue of the old times I feel it necessary, Mr. Speaker, to bow very low before him and tell him that I do not need myself his declaration (I know him too well), but he would do well to repeat it often, if he wants the public to believe it. If the hon. member desires to know all my mind, I will tell him that I doubt very much if he can keep his virtue in the surroundings in which he lives now.

The hon. member for Chambly-Vercheres has declared that on the ramparts of the opposition there was no flag. The hon. member, since he has gone to the ministerial ranks, seems to have lost the sense of sight. Let him look to this side of the House and he will see that on our ramparts, to-day as yesterday and to-morrow as to-day flies and will fly the two flags of liberty and justice. Equal justice for all the classes, equal justice for all races and religions, liberty for every one; equal rights for all the provinces that is the programme of the Liberal party, that is the platform of our party. Following the prescriptions of my political leaders, and remaining faithful to the doctrine which I have always defended, I will vote against the bill and against the amendment.

Mr. H. BOULAY (Rimouski) (translation.) Mr. Speaker, the county which I have the honour to represent has a population of 52,000 souls, of which 90 per cent are French-Canadians. Born and raised in a parish of the county of Rimouski, I need not say that I am truly Catholic and French. I came to this House to take part in the general business of my country, and also to vindicate the rights of the oppressed, and claimed justice for whom justice is due. I came here to tell to my compatriots of another origin that the fact of being French does not deprive us of the sense of justice and prevent us to resent injustice and insult from what ever side it comes. My first act in this House was to put right in the teeth of the hon. member for Westmorland (Mr. Emmerson) a flagrant injustice which he had made me in 1904 when he occupied a seat in this House as Minister of Railways and Canals, and I think I nobly fulfil my duty.

The French are polite, said to me yesterday in very good French the hon. member from Red Deer (Mr. Clark). Yes Frenchmen are polite but just as much as they are polite, just as much they resent deeply any insult or injustice, and we consider that it is a crying injustice on the part of the province of Manitoba to try to oppress the Catholics and the French of that province because they are the minority.

We have a minority in the county of Rimouski, a Protestant and English minority who support two dissentient schools. We would never think of molesting them. On the contrary if any one would ever make that suggestion, 95 per cent of the French Canadian would rise to a man to protect them. Why would we not find the same spirit of equity amongst our English compatriots? Let us better know and respect each other. Let the English provinces do for the study of the French language what we have been doing for the study of the English language in the province of Quebec, and we will very soon know and appreciate each other better. Let all men of good will put their efforts together to bring to an end this useless and nefarious campaign against French schools and French teaching in certain parts of this country, and you will see very soon the most perfect harmony established between the different races which compose our population.

Is there any reason in this war against the French language in Canada, when the sons of the mother country themselves, who desire to become business men and distinguished men, take pride and glory to learn French? For the last twenty years and more, our compatriots of Manitoba suffer from unjust laws, and their sufferings seem to be felt more by the province of Quebec than by those living in Manitoba. But I stop on these considerations.

I do not intend to waste the time of the House; but as the agitation upon this question is somewhat strong, I think I should explain the vote which I have given. First, if we vote with the hon. gentlemen opposite, will we have a better guarantee that the minority rights will be protected than if we vote with this side of the House? Secondly, will any amendment made to this Bill have any practical effect? That is the question which I will explain in a few words. If I look back in the history of this country, if I read all the debates of the House of Commons in March and April, 1896, I find previous information as to the feelings of both parties engaged at that time in the discussion of the famous Manitoba question, this province having been always like a cannon ball tied to the Confederation car.

What a delight to read the speeches of the valiant and generous heroes, such as Sir Hibbert Tupper who, on the 17th March, 1896, made in this House this memourable speech in which he shows Sir Wilfrid Laurier and the grand master of the Orange Order at that time, joining hands with this man of evil omen, Dalton McCarthy, in the unjust spoilation of the Catholic rights in Manitoba. Lashing in a masterly way the infamous conduct of these two fire brands, he said:

It is not, as has been truly remarked, a question of government and opposition, nor of Protestant or Catholic. It is one of constitutional action and equal rights. But members of the government and their supporters in this country claim great credit for the government's action in passing the order in council. The governments have, however, done only what they were bound to do under the constitution, and in obedience to the command of the highest judicial authority in the realm.

It is not, as has been rightly remarked, a question which interests more the government than the opposition, or the Protestant more than the Catholic, it is a question of constitutional law, and of general interest. That was the opinion of Sir Wilfrid Laurier before he let himself to be fooled and seduced by the thirst of power, because I find the following words in a speech which he made in Winnipeg in 1894:

'Give me the proof that the grievances of the Roman Catholic minority are well founded, that their rights are violated; that instead of being able to send their children to schools where no religious teaching is given, they are forced to attend a school where the religious teaching is contrary to their beliefs, and I will be ready to go before the people of Manitoba to tell them that a school law which authorizes that state of things should not be kept on the statute-book.' And continuing his speech in quoting the words used by Herschell in his judgment he said:

Let us compare the position which the Roman Catholic minority occupied before 1890, with the one they occupied since that act to which appeal is taken.

In making that comparison it does not seem possible to contend that the rights and privileges of the Catholic minority as to education, which existed before 1890, have not been affected.

As a matter of fact, the objections of the Roman Catholic minority to the schools which are alone aided by the state, in conformity with the law of 1890, lies in their conscience and are deep rooted. It is well known that before 1870, acute differences of opinion about education existed between Catholic and Protestant. This fact is admitted in almost every line of the school laws enacted at that time. There is no doubt either about the nature of these opposed views, and it is in that light that section 22 of the Manitoba Act of 1870, which was in reality a parliamentary pact must be interpreted.

As showing that the right hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition held at the time the same views as the government in 1896, I may quote an affidavit embodying an extract from a speech he delivered at Grande Rivière, county of Gaspé, on August 24, 1895:

Canada,
Province of Quebec,
County and district of Gaspé.

We, the undersigned, citizens and electors for the Dominion Parliament, residing in the county of Gaspé aforesaid, solemnly declare :

That we were present at the meeting held by the electors of Gaspé at Grand River, on August 24, 1895, at which meeting the hon. Wilfrid Laurier, M.P., delivered a speech on the political issues of the day.

That such meeting comprised four or five hundred people, 90 per cent of whom were Roman Catholics, and among them a large number of Roman Catholic priest who were on a visit to Grand River. That in the course of his speech the hon. Mr. Laurier said among other things, why his hearers should not have faith in the then Dominion Government. He claimed that the government would never submit to parliament a bill for the relief of the Catholic minority of Manitoba.

That the hon. Mr. Laurier in support of his plea for an enquiry into the facts connected with the Manitoba school difficulty, stated that as regards himself he did not need an enquiry, being satisfied in advance that the demands of the Catholic minority were legitimate and fair; but that such an enquiry would induce others who were not as yet so convinced that, in the school act of 1890 and amendments thereto, an injustice had been committed in regard to the Catholic minority of Manitoba.

Following on so many statements of his views, how comes it that Sir Wilfrid Laurier so suddenly changed his mind? He gave in that instance the greatest exhibition of political inconsistency that ever was given by any man, and Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper brought it home to him in the following terms:

How could I expect—even if my experience of public life had been unexceptional—that a Roman Catholic leader would to-day be found lagging behind a Protestant leader in this House when it come to vindicating the rights of a minority and of a race which this Catholic leader had formerly defended, as I stated previously.

A little further on, speaking of the French Canadian race in this land of Canada, he exclaimed: 'I would be happy, he said, to see that million and a half of French Canadians increase three-fold. I would be happy to see them increase to any extent, for I know what they are worth to the country. What I now say, I say it as a Protestant and a Canadian.' Such utterances are very different from those which were dealt out by the McCarthys and the O'Briens and the Sproules, utterances which were assented to by the hon. leader of the opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) and confirmed subsequently many a time by his own statements and dealings in 1905. It is only in the Conservative party that there is to be found feelings of loyalty, a spirit of toleration and fairness, noble sentiments, which Sir Wilfrid Laurier endeavoured so strenuously to defeat, and which he succeeded in defeating through the sinister obstruction he led against the carrying of the remedial bill, together with his allies, a number of Orangemen. However, it is after listening to these fine sentiments uttered by a Protestant that twenty-five of our compatriots of the province of Quebec, among whom I notice the name of Bourassa, had the heart to approve the Laurier amendment for the hoisting of the remedial bill on March 20, 1896. At that same sitting of March 17, McCarthy exclaimed,—repeating the words of Sifton, another persecutor of separate schools, another close friend of our great fellow-citizen, whom he will seek later on and make a cabinet minister as a reward for having inflicted such ill-treatment on our compatroits,—McCarthy exclaimed that separate schools managed as they were in 1890 were utterly indefensible as regards the instruction they imparted, an unjustifiable reflection, for our schools compare advantageously with any others. And farther on, referring to the stand taken by the province of Quebec in regard to Protestant schools, he added:

The non-Catholics of Quebec have nothing to fear for themselves, in case Manitoba should maintain its stand in favour of public schools, for to speak of reprisals on the part of the majority is absurd.

We are requested from every quarter to protect the rights of the minority in connection with the annexation of the territory of Keewatin. We are told that we should not follow in the footsteps of the traitors and wretches who did away with these rights in 1896 and 1905. It is all very well to lay down principles; it is all very well to vindicate these courageously, vigorously, and better still to reap encomiums after falling on the battlefield, in the midst of the fray. But to distinguish one's self by such brilliant achievements, by such heroic deeds which lead to immortality, one must at least have the hope that they will ensure some practical result which will be of actual advantage if not to the hero who sacrifices himself, at any rate to those who will come afterwards. Leonidas defending with his stalwarts the Thermopylae knew that he was courting certain death; but his country would be delivered thereby. Salaberry and his men at Châteauguay were fighting under great disadvantages, and might well have been crushed by a much larger force, however, they retained some hope of winning the day. Cambronne at Waterloo answered back to the general who called on him to surrender, those historic words which are characteristic of that chivalrous French race of old, whose spirit still animates us, we the proud descendants of that gallant stock: 'Guardsmen may die, but surrender never.' Why should the French guardsmen who occupy seats in this House, why should that small phalanx of twenty Canadians be expected to accomplish what another French Canadian, with the support of fifty others, refused to do when the time had come to play the hero, and make sacrifices, and assert existing rights which had been confirmed by the highest court in the empire? Why should we be expected to do what a great Canadian supported by fifty others refused to do in 1905, while fortune was smiling upon him, and glory followed his flag and made the earth quake wherever it passed? Why should we be called upon to make such a sacrifice, when for fifteen consecutive years in the province of Quebec there has been a continuous round of applause for the great hero who was digging the grave wherein were buried all our fellow countrymen's rights to separate schools, and to the use of that French language which we learnt on our mother's lap and which has produced the finest literature known to the world?

Why should we be expected to protect rights which legal authorities declare to be non-existent, and which in any case are not interfered with by this Bill of they do exist?

In 1890, while Laurier was working hand in hand with McCarthy and other fanatics of the same stripe, on this side of the House the Tuppers, the Northrups, the Hazens, the Fosters, the Haggarts and many others were defending the rights which it was still time to defend and safeguard.

But no, the French race will survive in spite of its oppressors; it has successfully pulled through the disasters of 1760 and the persecutions which have been its lot in the meantime, and the miserable dealings of Greenway will come to an end.

In 1896, I had faith in Laurier, a French Canadian and Catholic; I was confident at any rate that he would support by his vote and his eloquence the rights defended even by Protestants.

But no, his mongrel alliance with the twenty-four fanatics who still formed part of the conservative party, resulted in miserable obstructive tactics which prevented sanction being given to the remedial Bill, in spite of a message from His Grace Archbishop Langevin which read as follows: Bill workable, effective and satisfactory; I approve of it. All bishops and true Catholics should do the same. It means salvation. (Signed) Archbishop Langevin.

I shall now quote the following from the letter written by Rev. Father Lacombe to Sir Wilfrid Laurier:

> At this critical period in connection with the Manitoba school question, allow an aged missionary, representing to-day the bishops of our country in this cause which interests all of us, to appeal to your faith, to your patriotism and to your spirit of fairness and to beg of you to comply with our request. It is in the name of our bishops, of the hierarchy and of the French Canadian Catholics, that we beg of your party, whose worthy leader you are, to help us in obtaining a settlement of this vexed question, and to settle it by voting with the government in favour of the remedial Bill. We are not asking you to vote for the government, but in favour of the measure which will restore to us our rights, and which will be submitted to the House in a few days, etc.
> (Signed): A. LACOMBE, O.M.I.

What shall we say of the stand taken by the leader of the opposition who refused to comply, who continued his agitation, the outcome of which was the defeat of the conservatives in 1896, but also the wiping out of the rights of our compatriots in the province of Manitoba?

With a political record such as the one I have described, should any reliance be put in the promises and policy of the liberal party? And are they making any promises? No, their party organs are making an onslaught, that is all. That is why I have not supported the Laurier amendment, and rightly so, as it was not serious.

Times have changed since the days when the two governments who are responsible for the passing and sanctioning of that unjust legislation of 1890 were holding the reins of power; both of them are now in their political grave. The distinguished gentleman who is now at the head of the Manitoba government is very well disposed, and we have every reason to depend on his faithfulness for which his record is sufficient pledge, while Sir Wilfrid Laurier had to deal with a fanatical government made up of his allies, and very badly inspired. Under such conditions failure was inevitable. Today, having dealt justly with Manitoba, having enlarged its frontiers, having granted the amounts requested as subsidies, we expect from that province, not favours, but full and entire justice for our compatriots, and we shall be greatly disappointed if we fail in obtaining that.

I lay down as a principle that it is but fair that we should add that territory to this little province. After all, Keewatin is made a part of Manitoba with all her rights to the very act by which this province has been constituted, rights which have been trodden upon by Greenway's liberal government, but which still exist, having been ratified by the judgment of the Privy Council, and shall not cease to be claimed until they have been acknowledged. Those same rights exist for Keewatin and nothing but a new and nefarious legislation such as was adopted in 1890, could paralyse them if not absorb them and make them disappear. If this should happen, the same recourse to the federal parliament still exists as in 1896, for this territory, as it did exist for Manitoba, and were we even to add clauses after clauses in order to guarantee the rights to separate schools we would be doing no more than to pour ink upon paper, than to deliver a great many useless speeches if we are dealing with intransigent and unjust people.

But no. We expect something better on the part of Manitoba. The wave of intolerance that has dashed upon that province in 1890, stirred up as it was by the friends of the leader of the opposition, is lulling from day to day. The example of justice and equity which is set constantly by the province of Quebec impassible though she has to face this profligacy of fanatism shall, at last, make our compatriots of a different language and creed understand that the time of moral and religious slavery must be over; that the Catholics and the French must be granted the full measure of liberty to which they are entitled in this land of Canada. Shall we, the sons of those valiant knights who have discovered the plains of the West; shall we, the brothers of those missionaries who have shed their blood on this territory of Canada, keep waiting in vain for a glimpse of liberty? Loudly do we beseech the province of Manitoba to open her doors wide open and make us breathe, at last, that liberty, a glorious attribute of the British flag.

From that day only shall we have peace in our country. One may check, one may restrain the exercise of a right for a time, for a long time even, but one cannot make it perish when it rests upon the solid basis of justice and of equity. I would ask my English-speaking compatriots who represent all parts of Canada, to repeat these words to their electors: The day when the French language would cease to be written and spoken in this part of America which is called Canada, that day would mark the destruction and the ruin of the British flag, for, as somebody has so well said it before me, the last shot that shall be fired for the preservation of this country in behalf of the British crown shall be fired by a French Canadian.

House divided on amendment of Mr. Mondou.

Amendment (Mr. Mondou) negatived.

Hon. H. S. BELAND (Beauce). (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, the question of extending the Manitoba boundaries is a very important one, and there is nothing strange in the fact that the measure now under consideration has given rise to a most interesting debate.

There could be and there is, in fact, no serious objection to extending the territory of Manitoba itself as far as the shores of Hudson bay. It is admitted by the whole population of this country that it is only fair and just that the territory of Manitoba should be extended; both political parties have given their entire adhesion to this project.

Of course, the building of a railway up to Hudson's Bay, which has been resorted to as a new element for the solution of the transportation problem shall be of great help towards developing that region through industrial, agricultural and commercial channels. But while the proposition itself of annexing Keewatin to Manitoba meets with no opposition, quite the reverse can be said of the conditions attached to the cession. Protests have been made in all parts of the country against the exorbitant advantages which Manitoba was granted from a financial point of view. The people of this country will hardly understand and will surely blame the decision arrived at by the cabinet as regards the payment of certain arrears. In fact, how is it possible to explain that a certain sum of $2,178,000 is paid to Manitoba as arrears? True it is that negotiations have been carried on more or less assiduously for a few years past, but they have been pushed to an end only of late, when Mr. Roblin, after a conference with his friends of the Borden government, left again for Winnipeg, crying out victory. And he had good reasons for crying out victory, owing to the guilty compliance and to the excessive generosity of the government, he had just been granted, besides Keewatin, a yearly increase of subsidy of about $516,000. Nay more—and this seems to be beyond all limits—the federal ministers count that subsidy from four years back, and at once, they pay over to Manitoba $2,178,000. Is it strange that protests are made and they grow louder everywhere?

We claim that such preference, if it brings Mr. Roblin super-abundant joy, is unjust towards all the other provinces of the Dominion and that they will soon ask to share in that god-send with the Manitoba lion.

On the other hand, astonishment and then indignation have seized upon groups which, up to this day had shown themselves in close sympathy with the cabinet, and particularly with the French Canadian ministers. In the province of Quebec a good many spheres of society are pervaded with astonishment and indignation. It is found strange that there is not in the Bill before the House about the Manitoba boundaries a clause regulating education in the territory which is being annexed. They feel indignant when thinking that the so-called knights without fear or reproach who they were formerly, even up to yesterday, the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Monk), the hon. Postmaster General (Mr. Pelletier), the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue (Mr. Nantel), would have flinched, would have failed to their word, would have been so weak, in short, as to violate their solemn pledges of last election.

For my part, having been for fifteen years the constant witness of all the plots and denunciations of those ministers, I readily understand if I do not share entirely the indignation of the sincere and honest people who, in certain quarters, raised their admiration to the point of adulation. Yes, I understand it especially well when I consider the admission of importance which they have just made to the House with so oratorical precautions and endless quotations of statutes more or less contradictory. I understand it and I explain it to myself when I remember the appeals made to prejudice by the Conservative party, especially at the time the Manitoba school question was settled, in 1896. We remember that in 1896 and in 1898, the party under the direction of the right. hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) who leads the opposition to-day was exposed to the attacks of those who, to-day hold portfolios in the Borden administration, and of Mr. Bergeron who, at that time, occupied an eminent position in his party.

What did those devoted champions of integral right in educational matters then pretend? They said that the rights of Catholics in school matters had been sacrificed by the Laurier government in the Manitoba school settlement. It was then that Mr. Bergeron discovered that sir Wilfrid Laurier was not Catholic enough and that there had been no Manitoba school settlement. Strange to say, Mr. Bourassa, far from approving of the stand thus taken, thought that Mr. Bergeron was too Catholic and when naming Mr. Bergeron, I also include those who were then his followers in the federal arena, Messrs. Monk, Pelletier and Nantel.

Would the House kindly accompany me for a moment while I go through the parliamentary debates of 1908? At a certain moment, Mr. Bergeron and Mr. Bourassa join issue on the school settlement and in order not to trespass upon the indulgence of this House by dwelling too long on a worn out topic, let me quote the very words uttered by the member for Labelle, such as reported in 'Hansard' of that year. About the Laurier-Greenway school settlement, Mr. Bourassa said:

'When they came into power, the Laurier government had to deal with that ticklish question so as to give substantial justice to all parties, without deceiving anybody, and that is what they did. I do not wish to stir up past quarrels.'

Let me tell you here, Mr. Speaker, how all friends of peace and harmony in this country admired those words in 1898. Mr. Bourassa was brought to book by the very men who now seem to be slumbering in the delights of power. The hon. the Postmaster General above all, then stormed in the Province of Quebec against what he called Sir Wilfrid's shameful capitulation.

Is it to be wondered at if the hon. the Minister of Public Works, the Postmaster General and the Minister of Inland Revenue should reap the storm in the very province where they have sown the wind of prejudices and passions?

I do not want to take up to no purpose the time of this House by going into all the details of the charges and accusations and denunciations piled up on the head of the venerable leader of the Liberal party during the elections of 1900 and 1904, in connection with this same Manitoba school question.

But it was in 1905; when the two provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta were created that the rage of the gentlemen who now occupy the treasury branches reached its paroxysm. Language, creed, race, everything was offered up in sacrifice to the ogre of Orangeism. The hon. gentlemen who then occupied seats in this House still have a vivid recollection of the phillipics delivered by the conservative members as well as of the nebulous harangue of the hon. member for Jacques-Cartier (Mr. Monk). What is most to be wondered at is that the hon. gentleman denounced the government because they had yielded on clause 16 No. 1, and yet, he confessed, during the debate, that the text substituted to that clause was clearer more explicit and therefore more favourable to the minority.

On the 23rd March, 1905, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Monk) is reported (page 3193 'Hansard') as follows:

> So, I do not see in the last enactment that there is any concession—very far from it. I think the last amendment goes perhaps a little farther than the original enactment which caused so much excitement, because it defines more clearly what the privileges of the separate schools are. They were not defined at all in the original enactment. It defines them by the reference to the chapters of the Northwest Ordinances where they are fully explained, so that it defines more clearly these privileges, and it may be argued that it secures to the separate schools the right of religious instruction.

Here we have the hon. gentleman (Mr. Monk) giving the preference to the substituted text over the former clause. And yet he contrives to denounce the Laurier government, because the measure of school privileges dealt out to the two new provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan was not deemed adequate. As a result there was a wide-spread agitation throughout the province of Quebec and Mr. Monk was everywhere acclaimed as the champion of Catholic rights. Let us pass over the elections of 1908 in order to reach those of 1910 and 1911.

Twice in 1910 and quite recently in 1911; at the beginning of this session, did the hon. the Minister of Public Works charge the right hon. the leader of the opposition with having sacrificed the rights of his co-religionists during the last fifteen years. He has upon each occasion, maintained that on account of his so-called weaknesses, Sir Wilfrid Laurier had forfeited the confidence of his co-religionists.

Now what is the present situation?

Hardly have six months elapsed and events have just sided with the right hon. gentleman so bitterly denounced by the hon. minister. The system of compromise and conciliation so bitterly denounced has become the watch-word of the new minister.

Formerly, in imitation of the American patriot, Patrick Henry, the hon. gentleman and his French Canadian colleagues used to exclaim while appealing to us:

'You may accept fetters, if you like, as for us, we say: Freedom or Death!' But they have somewhat altered the libretto; and now they sing in chorus, 'dolcissimo'; 'O school freedom, thou art but a name!' Let us confine ourselves to the sweets of office".

If that is what the ministers say 'sotto voce', in a whisper, what do they say, when speaking aloud before parliament?

As a matter of fact, the question before the House provides for the annexation of Keewatin to Manitoba and in that Bill you cannot find a single clause defining the privileges of the minority in educational matters. Every one is wondering and asking how the hon. the Minister of Public Works and his three Catholic colleagues in the Borden cabinet could explain away the absence of that clause.

However amazing it may appear, the hon. the Minister of Public Works, says that there is no school rights in Keewatin and I shall by and by give a few extracts from his speech.

As to the hon. the Postmaster General, in a great display of oratory, he has found out that practically there are no Catholics in Keewatin, a handful at most; that, should there happen to be any Catholics there, they have no vested educational rights, and finally supposing that they had rights they have never asserted those rights.

As will be seen, he dismisses quite uncermoniously the claims of their friends who so faithfully supported them at the last election.

The hon. the Minister of Justice thinks that he would be very foolish, were he to jeopardize the fat important portfolio which he is now holding, and the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue, (Mr. Nantel), not unlike the fourth officer in the famous burial of Malborough, simply keeps mum.

Would you like to know what has resulted from the painful partition of the hon. Minister of Public Works, in connection with school matters, on this Manitoba Boundaries Extension Act?

In the first place, a denial of all the rights of the minority.

Let us listen to the Minister of Public Works, (page 4630, unrevised 'Hansard'):

The provision is reproduced in the statutes of 1896, but it never was in any way enforced in the district of Keewatin. This Act of 1875 never applied to the district of Keewatin in any way.

And further on (page 4638)

I have said to the House that in my estimation there are, in this territory, no vested rights, no substantial rights acquired under any legislation.

And further on again, page 4641, answering a question which he had been asked by the hon. gentleman from Two-Mountains (Mr. Ethier), with regard to the vested rights——

The difference is this, that the rights of the Hudson Bay Company are purely proprietary rights, as to which there is no doubt whatever, and in transferring this territory, we are obliged to provide for those proprietary rights. I do not think there are any vested educational rights, but if there were any, the only way in which they could be protected, if the transfer is to take place, is under the educational clause 22 of the Manitoba Act, which we cannot change or vary in any way.

Again, page 4632 replying to this question of the right hon. the leader of the opposition(Sir Wilfrid Laurier): Do I understand the hon. gentleman to say that there are no such rights?"

Mr. MONK. I am certainly of opinion, and have endeavoured to show, that there are no rights of any kind existing.

At last, page 4637:

Then, there were no vested rights of any kind in Keewatin territory, and there are at present no vested rights, nothing substantial in the way of legal or acquired rights in the territory with which we are dealing.

At all events, in the course of his remarks, the hon. Minister of Public Works intimates that the minority would have a shadow of vested rights had ordinances been passed with respect to education. It is true that no ordinance was passed by the commissioner in council, and on the ground that if there is a commissioner, there is no council.

But the hon. minister informs us that an application from a Catholic bishop had been forwarded to this government with a view to obtaining the appointment of a council which would be authorized, with the commissioner, to pass the ordinances asked for by that bishop and his flock. That demand was not granted and the consequence was that, in the opinion of the hon. minister, the minority has no vested rights.

But who is responsible for this application being denied? The hon. Minister of Public Works, the hon. Postmaster General and the government. It would be of no avail to plead extenuating circumstances.

In this connection the hon. Postmaster General has taken a stand for which he will be severely blamed. He said :

As far as we are concerned I may say that we received a similar request sometime in December last. Those who made that demand were not desirous enough that it should be granted to take the trouble of speaking about it for even five minutes with any of the four Catholic members of this government.

Now, Mr. Speaker, how can the hon. the Postmaster General reasonably expect that Mgr. Charlebois or the petitioners will travel 1,600 miles to confer with him? The venerable bishop sent in his petition or that of his flock and I am convinced that he did not consider it necessary to undertake a 1,600 mile journey to make the acquaintance of the Postmaster General (Mr. Pelletier) however interesting he may be.

The main point is that the Catholics' petition was ignored.

Whatever may be the opinion expressed by Catholic ministers in the cabinet, whether or not a study of the statutes reveals the clear and undeniable rights of minorities in Keewatin to separate schools, whether or not ordinances were enacted, it none the less remains to be considered whether or not it is opportunte to insert in this Bill a clause defining the status of minorities in annexed territories in educational matters.

In my humble opinion, any provision of that nature, if not accepted beforehand by the government of Manitoba, will be of no effect.

We would probably in any case obtain no better result than that of 1896, at which time the minority obtained recognition of their grievances as against the spoliation measure of 1890, at which time Sir Wilfrid Laurier solved the Manitoba schools difficulty in the only possible and reasonable manner, as admitted by Mr. Bourassa himself.

Have we not in this incident of 1870 the absolute proof that a federal statute however clear may be set at nought by a province? The Manitoba Act (art. 22) secured to Catholics the right to separate schools. The provincial government utterly neglecting this explicit provision, enacted legislation abolishing the separate school system in Manitoba and that law was declared to be constitutional by the highest court of the empire.

Of what value, therefore, is the contention that the only way of securing the school privileges of the minority is to insert in the Bill an imperative provision to that effect. For my part, I can perceive but one way of meeting the difficulty now facing us. That means is entirely at the disposal of the government.

Let us first of all take up the British North America Act of 1871, section 3, and then place face to face the two governments concerned in the annexation of Keewatin to Manitoba, and it will be possible to settle the difficulty without firing the train. Let us first of all read clause 3 of the Constitutional Act of 1871:

3. The parliament of Canada may from time to time, with the consent of the legislature of any province of the said Dominion, increase, diminish, or otherwise alter the limits of such province, upon such terms and conditions as may be agreed to by the said legislature, and may, with the like consent, make provision respecting the effect and operation of any such increase or diminution or alteration of territory in relation to any province affected thereby.

The annexation of any territory to a province is the result of an agreement between the federal government and that of the province interested.

In that agreement are to be found the terms and conditions as finally accepted and stipulated by both parties.

On examining the conditions of the agreement between the governments of Canada and Manitoba with respect to the annexation of Keewatin, I find that the limits of the territory have been defined and that this definition has apparently been accepted by both parties.

It has, I see, been stipulated that certain sums of money shall be paid as arrears and afterwards annually by the federal government to Manitoba, which arrangement also seems to have been agreeable to both parties.

I note also that the vested rights of the Hudson's Bay Company are to be respected, and many other things besides. All of these matters have been arranged by means of conferences.

The Roblin government is friendly towards the Borden government. Would it not have been possible had they taken the trouble for the Catholic ministers in the cabinet to obtain by agreement and with the consent of both parties, the insertion of a clause securing the privileges required by the minority?

This has been done, and I submit to the House that it is the great mistake made by the government. Every attempt to insert any such clause against the will of Manitoba must fail.

The other day my hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) put the following question to the Minister of Public Works: 'Has the hon. Minister (Mr. Monk) any assurance or promise that anything will be done?'

This was with reference to school privileges.

And the minister answered: 'Absolutely none.'

It was clearly the duty of the ministers to insist upon the acceptance of such conditions as appeared essential to the protection of minorities. It is not yet too late to do so. Delay the third reading of the Bill and re-open negotiations with Manitoba. You will secure these conditions, you will insert them in the Bill and we shall enact the law containing them. This difficult question can be settled by conciliation only. It may be settled in a satisfactory manner if the Catholic ministers will but display the courage, energy and determination which the people have a right to expect from them.

The Liberal party has always favoured methods of conciliation. Liberals have always refused to resort to coercion measures, because although these may appear more brilliant and in some cases appeal to certain classes, they cannot fail in the end to lead to serious difficulties and even to disastrous results.

But extremists of all shades, who in the absence of a text in support of their contentions, never fail to appeal to the constitution; what are these men doing with the constitution to-day?

They set it aside and they remain in hiding behind a rampart of some twenty statutes; a very fragile one for all are more or less contradictory, and the fabric, therefore, may easily be overthrown by the slightest wind of public indignation.

In the name of the Catholic population of Keewatin, of Manitoba, and of other provinces of the Canadian confederation; in the interest of peace and harmony between the citizens of this country, I call upon the government not to insist to-day upon the third reading of the Bill. I call upon them to delay it for some time, for one month perhaps, to take up once more negotiations with the government of Manitoba for the purpose of prevailing upon that province to accept of their own volition, as a condition of the annexation of Keewatin, such educational privileges as shall be acceptable to the minorities and concerning which the effect of existing laws may be doubtful.

I have no doubt whatever that such a move would give excellent results, nay I will go further and say that by a step of this kind alone can minority privileges be recognized and protected, because their recognition will be based upon conciliation and an agreement freely consented to by both parties.

Should the government refuse to meet this just demand, should they persist in using their majority to force through the third reading, then they implicitly admit that they hold as of no account the wishes of the majority of citizens in this great country and that they are ready to trample under foot the solemn promises made before the electoral body.

I have the honour to propose that this Bill be not now read a third time, but that it be resolved:

'That this House is of opinion that negotiations should be re-opened with the government of Manitoba in order to define by amicable conferences the status of minorities, either Protestant or Catholic, with regard to education in the light of existing laws in the annexed territory.'

Hon. ROBERT ROGERS (Minister of the Interior). I could well understand my hon. friend from Yamaska (Mr. Mondou) and my hon. friend from Nicolet (Mr. Lamarche) approaching the discussion of this delicate question from the point of view of their own conscientious conviction and therefore I am only too pleased to consider the views of those hon. gentlemen with feelings of the most profound respect and consideration. But, Mr. Speaker, when my hon. friend (Mr. Beland) moves that the Bill be not now read a third time, but that it be referred back to committee, and that we hold a further conference with the government of Manitoba, I say that we cannot even consider the acceptance of this amendment, and I am surprised that my hon. friend who was a member of the late administration during its last days should suggest any such course. The late government on the 22nd of February, 1909, transmitted for the consideration of the government of Manitoba a Bill by which the right hon. gentleman proposed to settle the question which this parliament is now being asked to settle, by giving the present Bill a third reading to-night. In connection with the measure presented to the government of Manitoba, the leader of the opposition did not invite then, and I do not believe he will invite now, any such conference as that proposed by the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat. Let me read the Bill to which I refer and the letter from the right hon. gentleman which accompanied it. The letter is as follows:

Ottawa, 26th Feb., 1909.

Dear Mr. Roblin,—

I have the honour to enclose the draft of a Bill for the extension of the boundaries of the province of Manitoba. This Bill is on the line of the resolutions adopted by the House of Commons at its last session. The amount of the allowance to be paid to the province in lieu of lands, has been left in blank. According to the aforesaid resolution of the House of Commons, this amount should be fixed by negotiation between the Dominion government and the government of the province.

We will be happy to confer with you at any time that may be convenient to yourself and your government.

Yours respectfully,
(Sgd.) WILFRID LAURIER,

Now I will read the draft of the Bill referred to:

An Act to provide for an increase of the limits of the province of Manitoba.

Whereas a petition has been presented to the House of Commons on behalf of the Legislative Assembly of the province of Manitoba praying, amongst other things for an extension of the boundaries of that province northward and eastward and for an additional subsidy to the province in lieu of the ownership of the public lands in the territory to be added to the province by such extension, and it is expedient to grant the prayer of such petition to the extent and in the manner provided in the enactments hereinafter contained; therefore His Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada, enacts as follows:

1. Upon the legislature of the province of Manitoba consenting thereto, the limits of the said province shall be increased so that the northern boundary of the province shall be the sixtieth parallel of north latitude; the western boundary shall be the present eastern boundary of the province of Saskatchewan; the eastern boundary shall be the present eastern boundary of the province to the northeast corner thereof, thence in a straight line to the most easterly point of Island lake and thence in a straight line to the point where the eighty-ninth meridian of west longitude intersects the shore line of Hudson bay, thence following the said shore line to its intersection with the sixtieth parallel;

2. And whereas in accordance, with the provisions of the Act establishing the province of Manitoba the ungranted lands of the Crown in the territory so to be added to the said province will continue to be administered by the government of Canada for the purposes of Canada and the province will not have such lands as a source of revenue, it is further enacted that there shall be paid by Canada to the province an increased allowance by money payment to an amount of

3. This Act shall come into force upon a date to be fixed by proclamation of the Governor in Council.

Now, Mr. Speaker, let me ask the hon. mover of the amendment if he can find one syllable in this Bill that would justify this amendment. Not only was this Bill forwarded to the Premier of Manitoba, but immediately on its receipt a delegation was appointed by the government of the province to come to Ottawa and take up the question of the conference as suggested in the letter of the leader of the opposition, and I was honoured by being invited to become one of that delegation. We came to Ottawa and sat in conference for several hours, upon the second and third of the following month, I think, and we discussed everything connected with the settlement of this question, save and except the matter which my hon. friend (Mr. Beland) has brought to the attention of the House to-night. If hon. gentlemen opposite had any idea of asking Manitoba to take any such action as they are suggesting to-night by this amendment, that was the time and that was the place to have made the re-request. But they did not do so, and therefore, I claim they have no right to urge any such proposition now, because the record of the government of Manitoba does not warrant that course. The government and the people of Manitoba are naturally very sensitive with respect to their position upon this question, because for many long years, they have suffered, as no province in Canada has suffered, owing to outside interference, and especially the interference of the right hon. gentleman, who leads the opposition. That hon. gentleman told us to-night that he had undertaken to effect a settlement with Manitoba in the year 1907 of which he was proud and satisfied. I want to tell him that that settlement has not satisfied any citizen within the borders of Manitoba, be he Protestant or be he Roman Catholic. That settlement has kept this question as a live and a burning issue before the people of the province. Is the Manitoba government which came into power two years after the so-called settlement had been enacted, entitled to be asked to come down and confer upon the question as suggested in this amendment? I say that the actions of that government have not been such as would justify this House in passing this amendment. I will say further, that during the ten or eleven years that I occupied a position in the Manitoba government we never failed in our duty to endeavour to carry out in the most generous, the most fair, and the most liberal manner, the Act complained of, which was placed on our statute book through the interference of the leader of the opposition, and which is doing an injustice to the people of Manitoba.

During the last eight or nine years, the leader of the government in Manitoba and the members of that administration have been accused time and time again by their opponents of being too generous in their interpretation of the law in regard to the minority of that province. And never upon any occasion, to my knowledge, did that government apologize for that generosity or for the broad spirit in which they administered that law to the advantage and comfort, so far as they possibly could, of the minority of the province of Manitoba. And, so long as I occupy a position in the public life of this country, I do not propose to be either afraid or ashamed to acknowledge my spirit of fairness and justice in all respects to the minority. And in making this statement I feel I represent the views, the broad spirit and generosity, which exists in the province of Manitoba alike with Roman Catholics and Protestants of all classes. My right hon. friend the leader of the government (Mr. Borden) the other night, told us about the splendid spirit that existed in the province of Nova Scotia. I wish to tell my right hon. friend and the members of this House that in no province of Canada can you find a better spirit existing as between the two great races of our country than exists to-day in the province of Manitoba. And I say that it would be a sad day when that good feeling now existing there should be interfered with by such an amendment as the one proposed by my hon. friend (Mr. Beland). In that province the people are desirous of going on as they have gone on in the past, in harmony and good fellowship one with the other. And if this parliament takes no action such as that suggested by my hon. friend, I have every confidence in the generosity and in the fair-mindedness of the people in that province, irrespective of race, creed or nationality, and I am sure that they will do everything in their power to settle the affairs of their province on the lines best calculated to promote good feeling. They will follow a course that will be acceptable to all. And I am sure that if Manitoba is left free to take its own course, the result will be just, fair and reasonable, and will carry satisfaction to all who are interested in the maintenance of harmony and in the settlement of this great question.

Mr. J. A. C. ETHIER (Two Mountains). (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, we are witnessing the final act of the farce which the government has just played, and having for its subject the Manitoba boundaries question.

Before it is all over, before the voice of the Ontario Tories has drowned the protests of the minority, sacrificed by those who had sworn to protect it, before the French-speaking ministers have been for the last time sat upon by their Ontario colleagues, before the Nationalist majority in this House repudiate once more their leaders, Armand Lavergne and Henri Bourassa, I deem it my duty to define the stand which I propose to take on this question and to give my opinion regarding the men who were entrusted with the duty of defending the minority previously referred to by me.

I wish to point out the manner in which they have deported themselves in regard to this question. I shall not discuss the principle of the Bill, which I approve as regards the location of the proposed boundaries. The financial question in connection with the money grants has been discussed by hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, and particularly in the shape of amendments which have been negatived by the government supporters.

I cannot imagine what has induced the government to increase the grant to the province of Manitoba, contrarily to the principles embodied in the constitution, thereby ignoring the just claims of the maritime provinces, particularly of the provinces of Prince Edward Island, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, in respect to the Dominion subsidies. Why grant to Manitoba an amount of subsidies out of proportion with her population, as compared wtih the other provinces of the Dominion? Moreover, why grant over two millions to Manitoba in the shape of so-called arrears dating back to 1908, though in the meantime the province of Manitoba did not spend a single cent of her own moneys in the interest of the district of Keewatin and for its benefit, said district having always been up to this day administered at the expense of the Dominion parliament?

Should we consider it as a gift which this government is making to Mr. Roblin, in view of the Manitoba local elections which, it is rumoured, are to take place shortly? Or should we consider it as a leaven to entice the electors into voting for the Roblin government, in the hope that thereby the minority might be granted some special favours in connection with the school difficulties, as suggested by the Postmaster General in his last speech?

But enough has been said in regard to this financial question which, to my mind, is of secondary importance; I wish to deal more particularly with that aspect of the question in which we are most interested, not only we of the province of Quebec, but all members of the minority in this great Dominion, I mean the school question in the territory of Keewatin, which is to be annexed to the old province of Manitoba.

After listening to the explanations given by the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Monk) and the hon. Postmaster General (Mr. Pelletier), and even the hon. Minister of Justice, all representing the rights of the minority, I had reason to believe that the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue (Mr. Nantel) would rise in his seat to protest against the stand taken by his colleagues, comparing his present stand with his past utterances. I was anxious to know what his views were since he accepted the portfolio of Minister of Inland Revenue. But I see that he has not as yet opened his mouth, and will not do so, to express the feelings of indignation which should fill his heart under these circumstances. His views remain 'inland' in the same way as his portfolio. Silence characterises him since he has become a minister. However, he was able to speak out previous to September 21, previous to his having a taste of office, of its delights and advantages.

He was still able to speak out when, at St. Scholastique, on June 24 last (1911), in company with the leader of the hon. Postmaster General and his own Mr. Armand Lavergne, together with Jules Fournier and Jean Prévost, he applauded Mr. Lavergne's spech, and especially the following words uttered before the electors of Two Mountains and Terrebonne: 'See what is going on in our midst, in Manitoba, in Alberta, in Saskatchewan, our religious and national franchises have been sacrificed while we were dozing.'—I imagine it was the hon. Minister of Public Works who was dozing—and, allowing the Lauriers and the Brodeurs to secure honours while losing honour. On this feast of St. John Baptist, reflect that we have been guilty of such remissness.

On that occasion he applauded the above statements made by Mr. Lavergne, his leader, adding that, if he was elected, and the Conservative party returned to power, he would restore the Separate schools as they were previous to 1890. I know it for a fact, being present at the meeting. The same statement was made at St. Thérèse de Blainville, in the county of Terrebonne, on September 18th last, three days before polling day. Mr. Nantel applauded at the time and opened his mouth to exclaim: 'Shame, shame on these traitors!' But since September 21, he as well as his colleagues, and his colleagues as well as himself, even the hon. Minister of Justice—who, between us, is not content with his salary of Minister of Justice, but retains his pension as former judge—suddenly changed their minds, and like the hon. Minister of Public Works, they said to themselves: 'We are here and you are there,' which means: 'We are in the manger, let us gorge ourselves.'

Subsequent to 1896, the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue stated in the county of Terrebonne and throughout the district, on every public platform, that the Manitoba school question was not settled. In this regard, he is contradicted by the hon. Minister of Public Works, who has just stated, what he had already stated in his former speech, that he had never raised the Manitoba question in public or in this House, in the course of the last fifteen years, as he considered it finally disposed of. At the public meeting of St. Eustache, on July 17, 1910, the Minister of Public Works, while denouncing what he thought fit to designate as the damnable Navy Act, pledged himself at the same time to restore the Manitoba schools, and that, with the support of his colleague the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue and of the Nationalist candidate in Two Mountains, Mr. André Fauteaux. Such are the pledges given in the province of Quebec.

The hon. Minister of Public Works has certainly not forgotten the statements he made in this House on March 29, 1897, when giving his appreciation of the then Laurier-Greenway agreement, he said: 'I contend that the so-called concessions referred to are worthless.' I consider that the concessions made by the Manitoba government to the Dominion government are paltry and stingy. They are far from being generous. That settlement is a bluff, a gold brick, which will not satisfy any one.

And I affirm that from that date up to the 21st of last September, the hon. Minister of Public Works had the same language during the elections of 1900, 1903, during the by-elections that took place in Two Mountains and Terrebonne; in 1904, 1908 and 1911. He has changed his opinion, but from the day he has become the holder of a minister's portfolio. In order to please the Tory majority of Ontario he has disavowed his past and his programme, he was ashamed of them. And he comes and tells us, with a shocking impudence: The settlement of the school question I have condemned, blamed and censured for fifteen years, but I now approve of it and it is the most effective which could be thought of, under the circumstances.

Those good, faithful and patriotic ministers think of nothing else but drawing their salary, and I have no doubt that the first people to put up an appearance at the accountant's office and to ask for their cheque every month must be those ministers, those three hirelings who follow in the wake of the Ontario Tory tribe.

The hon. Minister of Public Works has told us that he had not the mania of resignation. That is obvious. He prefers to cling to power in spite of all justice, even in spite of all political decorum.

But let us walk into the Post Office Department. Who is the leader of that department? The hon. L. P. Pelletier. The position he has taken in this debate could be no surprise to any one who knows him; it does not astonish those who have followed his political career for the last twenty-five years. The hon. member for Rouville has portrayed the hon. minister by quoting an extract of his biography which appeared in 'La Croix,' a Catholic newspaper of Montreal and a Conservative newspaper at the same time. What did that paper say about the ministers coming from the province of Quebec, in its edition of the second day of last March? I quote textually. Speaking of the Keewatin schools and of the Bill now before us, 'La Croix' said:

As to the rights of the Catholics of that territory to their schools, not a word, not even an allusion.

The Borden government ignores them. To his mind they amount to nothing, they do not exist. However, he did not forget to consecrate by a special clause all the privileges now enjoyed by the Hudson's Bay Company.

If this is not an iniquity perpetrated intentionally, there is no such thing as iniquity.

Mr. Speaker, allow me to interrupt my quotation at this point and to make a digression about the clause benefiting the Hudson's Bay Company in this Bill. If you remember, Mr. Speaker, upon the second reading of the Bill enacting by clause 7 that the rights of the Hudson's Bay Company should be protected, I asked the hon. Minister of Public Works why the government protected especially the rights of the company and ignored those of the minority, and the hon. Minister of Public Works answered me that clause 7 protected the proprietary rights only and those rights must be mentioned in the Bill. Now, from the very opening of the present sitting, the right hon. Prime Minister has given notice and has had the said clause 7 crossed out, alleging that it was useless, and this, notwithstanding the opinion of a professor of constitutional law at a certain university of Montreal, the Hon. Mr. Monk, who, in answer to my question, had said the contrary.

In face of this official denial by the Prime Minister as to the opinion of his colleague the Minister of Public Works on a legal question like this, I am not surprised to see that his pupil, the hon. member for Yamaska (Mr. Mondou), has changed his own opinion of the value and merit of the hon. minister's knowledge as far as constitutional law is concerned.

And if his opinion as to the existence of the rights of the minority in the Keewatin district is as doubtful as that which he expressed with respect to the rights of the Hudson's Bay Company and to the necessity of protecting them in this Bill, it is not worth more in the one case than in the other, and I am surprised that his own pupils, even the member for Yamaska, do desert him.

But I shall leave this aside, and come back to the hon. Postmaster General, and I shall go on making the House acquainted with the sayings of 'La Croix,' which I was quoting.

Speaking of the present government, this newspaper says further:

They are in power, they have authority, they also have strength; nothing prevents them from acting, their is no obstacle in their way, and still what are they doing?

Impassive like a hangman who has lost all human sentiments, they abandon the Catholics of Keewatin to the torture of neutral schools.

What shall the ministers: Mr. Monk, Mr. Pelletier and Mr. Nantel do?

Shall they throw their portfolios on the table of their chief if he persists in leaving out of this Bill a clause to the effect of acknowledging the rights of the Catholics of Keewatin to their schools? Have they even insisted on that point, so far? We know nothing of it as yet. The events which are going to occur at the Commons will tell us.

But from a Pelletier especially, we expect nothing good, nothing manly.

That soul of a politician bent under the yoke of personal interest is nothing good in our estimation.

To resist the craft and the hatred of the lodges, one must not be but a cunning lawyer, he must have a will inclined to do good, a soul which has stood the test of sacrifice, a generous heart, fixed principles; and Mr. Pelletier is devoid of all that.

Oh, I know that the Postmaster General has declared this newspaper to be unworthy of respect. However, when it sang the praises of these gentlemen previous to the 21st day of last September, and when it abused the right hon. leader of the opposition, it was read with satisfaction. But if this newspaper has ever struck the right note it has certainly done so when speaking of the Postmaster General as it did.

I say that the French ministers follow in the wake of the Tory majority of Ontario; that it is the voice of Ontario which commands, and I shall quote as ground for such assertion, an impudent article of the 'Citizen,' a government organ published in this city. That article appeared this morning, March 12, and here is an extract of it which is very expressive:

Hon. Mr. Borden's government was not affected either by Quebec as a province or by Mr. Bourassa, and possibly the sooner this basic fact is emphasized, the sooner the people of Canada will cease to have their parliamentary business unnecessarily meddled with. In the days of the Laurier government, which lived and moved and had its being by leave of Quebec province, as that province was then represented in parliament, necessarily everything that Quebec thought or felt or said had to receive that attention which is due to a force which can make or unmake a premier. Times have changed. The people of Canada, as a whole, have elected the Borden government with a working majority quite irrespective of the province of Quebec.

And the French ministers keep silent, they swallow this insult without wincing. Did not the Prime Minister himself say at Toronto, the day after the election which took place on the 21st of September last, that Ontario had made her powerful voice heard? The rights of the minority are being trodden upon, and the hon. Minister of Public Works comes and tells us that this minority has no rights. It is not strange.

for the hon. Prime Minister himself stated on the very first reading of the Bill, that there were doubts as to the existence or the non-existence of rights in behalf of the minority in Keewatin. If there is a doubt, why then refuse the benefit of it to the minority? Twenty-four members have declared, by their vote, that they claimed the benefit of that doubt in favour of the minority by means of an amendment which was proposed and rejected.

But I bow down to this denial on the part of the majority, because it consecrates for ever the legal right of such majority. They have taken away from us the right which we believed, in good faith, we should claim.

Why now does the House refuse to hold out to the minority a sheet-anchor, the last of all, in order to protect their rights, or at least a scrap of those rights, by rejecting the amendment which has been proposed by the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Béland)?

Why is it that the government and the Prime Minister, who has some doubts, should not agree to submit this question to some expert and disinterested parties, to some distinguished lawyers, to the Supreme Court, for instance, and to the Privy Council if need be?

By the amendment which the hon. member for Beauce has proposed, the government could secure an honourable arrangement with respect to this question. But no, an important question like this breeds hesitation. If some poor employees must be beheaded though not guilty of anything else than being Liberals, then there is no hesitation and the guillotine works regularly.

Now, let us proceed by an analogy. Has the government shown any energy at all in the case of the Bill which was introduced by the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Lancaster) concerning the Ne Temere decree on marriages in the province of Quebec? If the government has deemed it proper to refer this question to the Supreme Court and even to the Privy Council if need be and this notwithstanding the opinion of the honourable Minister of Justice and of the Prime Minister himself—which opinion has been corroborated by the ex-Minister of Justice and by Sir Wilfrid—why, on such an important question as the rights of the minority of Keewatin, why not accede to a request of that kind and submit the question to the same judicial authorities, so as to make it a test case? No, Mr. Speaker, the voice of Quebec rules no more, the Tory voice of Ontario is the one which now rules, and as Mr. Bourassa, their past chief, would say, our ministers from Quebec follow those who take them to pasture like sheep. I believe that this latter is sincere because he maintains the position he has taken with the five other Nationalists whom he got elected, and who have voted in favour of the amendment proposed by the hon. leader of the opposition on the second reading of the Bill.

I shall not address the House any longer on that question. May I be permitted, however, to add that, in my humble opinion, the idea which has always prevailed with the fathers of confederation from the first, and with the Canadian statesmen who have succeeded one another from Sir John Macdonald up to the present time was: Protection to the minority and equal justice to all minorities in the different provinces which compose this vast Dominion? One has only to study the British North America Act of 1867, the laws concerning the admission of the Northwest Territories and of Rupert's Land into confederation, the Territories Act of 1875, the Keewatin Act of 1876, and last, chapter 62 of the Revised Statutes of Canada (1906), to convince one's self that my pretension is well founded in law, whatever the hon. Minister of Public Works may say or think contrarywise.

It is the same as to the Acts concerning Alberta and Saskatchewan and has induced me to vote for the amendment submitted by the hon. member for Yamaska.

It may be pointed out that this is in contradiction with my vote on the settlement of the Manitoba school question in 1897, but the situation to-day is very different. What I did in 1897, I should do again under the same circumstances, even as I would be ready to renew my vote in favour of the Mondou resolution without feeling that I had in any way contradicted my past record.

The difference is that in 1897 the question had been pending since six years, going from court to court and from jurisdiction to jurisdiction. When we were returned to power in 1896 the question was exhausted, the life had been taken out of it by the contradictions of the Conservative party who, to use the expression employed by the hon. the Post Master General, had played football with it.

It was the Conservative party who, from 1890 to 1896, fostering race and religious prejudice carried us to the verge of civil war. This was by good luck avoided thanks to the diplomacy and the energy of the then Prime Minister, to his policy of peace and conciliation. This indeed was the only practical manner of settling the question, as only later admitted by the hon. the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Monk), and in 1897 by Mr. Bourassa, as stated by him in reply to the hon. member for Beauharnois, Mr. Bergeron.

To-day the situation is not the same; the matter is just beginning. The opposition are not responsible for the deeds of the government who act as they deem expedient. Shall this farce which lasted from 1890 to 1896 be repeated?

In a word, and on account of the considerations I have just recalled, I will vote for the amendment of the hon. member for Beauce, because, wanting a better, it is the last and supreme chance offered to the Keewatin minority.

By following the policy of concilation, concord and peace inaugurated by the hon. leader of the opposition the question may be disposed of for ever and I hope that the five Nationalists who have shown their sincerity so far will vote in favour of the amendment now submitted.

Mr. SEVIGNY. (Dorchester). (Translation). Will the hon. member allow me to put a question?

Mr. ETHIER. (Translation.) Certainly.

Mr. SEVIGNY. (Translation.) If no amendment is added to the Bill as brought down, is the hon. member of opinion that the Keewatin minority will be subject to the conditions of the Laurier-Greenway settlement?

Mr. ETHIER. (Translation.) I am not in a position to answer that positively and the conference suggested by the amendment might throw light upon the matter.

Mr. SEVIGNY. (Translation.) Has the hon. member voted for the Laurier-Greenway settlement?

Mr. ETHIER. (Translation.) I certainly did, and I do not regret having done so. The interruption by my hon friend the member for Dorchester reminds me of a fact which I might have forgotten to communicate to the House concerning the confidence expressed by the hon. the Minister of Public Works, and the hon. the Postmaster General in Mr. Roblin, when those two hon. gentlemen declared that they had Mr. Roblin's assurance that the situation of the Manitoba Catholics would be improved. I have just read in 'Le Devoir' of March 12, 1912, the following article:

POSITIVE DECLARATIONS OF 'LES CLOCHES' OF ST. BONIFACE.

The organ of His Grace Mgr Langevin says that the Manitoba school question was never settled, that the rights recognized by the Privy Council were never re-establish and that the double tax has not been accepted by the Catholics of Winnipeg and Brandon. A worse proposal from hon. Mr. Caldwell.

Winnipeg, 12.—'Les Cloches de St. Boniface," organ of the archbishop of St. Boniface, in the number of March 15 now under press declares notwithstanding the statements of the hon. Mr. Monk, that the Manitoba school question was never finally settled; that the constitutional rights recognized by the Privy Council were never re-establish by the so-called final Laurier-Greenway settlement and that the suffering minority has never accepted the arrangement obliging the Catholics of Winnipeg and Brandon to pay double taxes.

The organ of His Grace Archbishop Langevin also says that he cannot accept the negation of the constitutional rights of Keewatin, and that he regrets that a new breach has been made in the wall of the constitution.

A bill submitted by Mr. Caldwell makes the situation worse.

The hon. Mr. Caldwell, Provincial Minister of Education, had introduced a seven page Bill amending the School Act. The amendments make the situation worse from the French and Catholic point of view.

The word 'school' is restricted to the meaning of 'class.' The parish priest will no longer be allowed to say a word in schools without the formal and express consent of the commissioners.

Two special articles are framed with a view to school concentration, &c. Nothing therein can justify the gleams of hope to be gathered from the ministerial speeches.

Mr. PELLETIER. (Translation.) Is that the organ of the hon. member?

Mr. ETHIER. (Translation.) It is the organ of Mgr. Langevin, your chief on the school question from 1896 to the 21st September last.

Mr. PELLETIER. (Translation.) What paper are you quoting from?

Mr. ETHIER. (Translation.) From "Les Cloches de St. Boniface," reproduced by 'Le Devoir.' You have already forgotten your 'devoir' (duty).

Mr. PELLETIER. (Translation.) The member from Two Mountains will never be able to teach anyone his duty.

Mr. ETHIER. (Translation.)No, I might not be able to teach some persons how to do their duty. Does that satisfy the hon. member for Dorchester in case the Keewatin minority should be governed by the Laurier-Greenway agreement? So much for the promises made by the Hon. Mr. Roblin to the hon. the Postmaster General.

Mr. PELLETIER (Translation.) That is not what I stated. I declared that I had no promises and the hon. member has no right to misquote me.

Mr. ETHIER. (Translation.) However, you have faith in those who come forward with a bill such as that submitted by Mr. Caldwell, provincial minister of education and Mr. Roblin's colleague. We may judge by that what your hopes are worth.

As for the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue, it would be difficult for him to make any statement; he is mute.

I will vote for the amendment brought down by the hon. member for Beauce.

Mr. MACLEAN (South York). The amendment of the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Beland) is based on the same capital error as all the other amendments are, it fails to recognize that this proposal, like the other proposals, is an interference with the sovereignty of the province of Manitoba. We have settled once for all that Manitoba is sovereign within her own territory, and any proposal in this House to enter into negotiations with Manitoba over this question would raise the issue that she was not sovereign over this question at the present time. No other province in this country would for a moment entertain a proposal to reconsider her constitutional rights.

Mr. BELAND. You can confer with a sovereign.

Mr. MACLEAN (South York). You may, but this proposed conference implies that Manitoba is called into court to have her rights readjusted. It is a proposal to reopen a question that has been settled for all time; and if it had not already been settled, I think we must admit that the majority in this House to-night of 136 against the amendment of the hon. member for Yamaska (Mr. Mondou) has effectually settled it. I remember fifteen years ago when I was in this House and this question first came up, there were eight men in the House who decided to take their political lives in their hands and to say that there should be no coercion of Manitoba, or any questioning of her rights. I think this majority of 136 votes to-night is a still clearer declaration that there must be no interference with the free action of Manitoba on matters falling within her jurisdiction, and no questioning even of her rights, no invitation to Manitoba to inquire into her rights. I say that the question has been settled once for all, and all we can do now is to write over it 'requiescat in pace.' If this amendment were adopted, some one would then get up in this House and ask Ontario to come into a conference. Would Quebec for one moment consider a proposal that she should go into a conference to have her constitutional rights made the subject of inquiry? Would Ontario do it? Would little Prince Edward Island do it? Certainly not. We must respect the rights of all the provinces in this House, we must leave off discussing them for no good can come of it. For sixteen years now we have had more or less discussion of this question in this House, and to no good purpose. There are other and more important questions before the people that ought to command our attention. If there is to be a conference where should that conference be held? That conference should be held in Manitoba, and it should be held between the minority in Manitoba and the provincial government. If such a conference were held now, and if there are any grievances, I believe they would be adjusted. But that is a matter with which we have nothing to do in this House. Every speaker on this question to-day has acknowledged that Manitoba is seized with jurisdiction in this matter, her sovereignty is acknowledged, and no good can come of prolonging this discussion any further. Therefore, I shall have to vote against the amendment of the hon. member for Beauce, because I hold that there should be no coercion of Manitoba, either under the guise of a conference, or by way of direct legislation.

Mr. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Kamouraska). (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, I thought that the remarks of my hon. friend the member for Two-Mountains (Mr. Ethier) would have brought the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue (Mr. Nantel) out of the trenches behind which he has prudently been keeping since the beginning of the session. I was mistaken. Times have changed!

I still remember the vehement and passionate discussions that took place within these walls in 1905. In public meetings, I have witnessed tumultuous scenes. I remember the stinging and insulting statements that our opponents hurled against us in respect to separate schools in the West. I have even heard violent denunciations against that faction of the ministerial party that the nationalist conservatives called the 'Ontario fanatics.'

And I am witnessing to-day their fraternal embrace under the folds of the old tory flag.

The fire which the government is to-day attempting to stifle, was kindled by their own friends and the agitation of which the hon. the Postmaster General complained in his speech is the result of the campaign they themselves conducted, in the course of which they condemned beforehand their conduct of to-day.

The hon. member for Rouville has given us some idea of those hon. gentlemen's electoral promises. Allow me to read to you there appreciation of the result of the last elections, the things that they then undertook to do and the hopes to which they gave utterance.

'L'Evenement' of the 22nd September published the following:

> The betrayal of the Catholics of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, and later on those of the unorganized territories of the Northwest was a three fold crime on the part of the government, and as governments are collectivities of an essentially temporal nature, we awaited with confidence the day when that of Sir Wilfrid Laurier would receive the just punishment of its odious actions.
> That day has dawned and we greet it for our part, as the marvellous rising of a new sun of justice.
> The heritage of the Macdonalds and the Tuppers is transmitted by the working of Providence, and the fate of arms to Mr. R. L. Borden. We know that he will prove in every way worthy of it, and our joy in greeting him is the more sincere that he has already given us proof that he understands the mentality and the aspirations of the French Canadian people.

We hail at the same time his most noble followers, Mr. F. D. Monk, the distinguished defender of our autonomy; Mr. L. P. Pelletier, the powerful fighter who has vanquished the enemy's hordes in one of their most ancient strongholds; Dr. Paquet, the soldier who is always ready to fight in a good cause, and last but not least the young knight 'sans peur et sans reproche,' Mr. P. E. Blondin, the terror of the scourge of public robbers.

The causes dear to us are in good hands, and the dawn of a glorious day is rising for Canada we love so well.

On the same day 'L'Evenement' rejoiced at the election of two of its directors, Messrs. L. P. Pelletier and Lespérance.

On the 2nd October the hon. member for Montmagny celebrated his victory and the hon. the Postmaster General attended the demonstration.

In the report of the event published by 'L'Evenement', October 3, we read this:

Mr. Pelletier assured the electors that French Canadian Conservative members, from the Province of Quebec, would be less the representatives of their constituencies than of their race. He proclaimed himself a Nationalist and proud of being one. The day will soon come when there will be Nationalist groups, but when the Nationalist spirit will pervade tre whole country. ('L'Evènement', October, 1911).

Let us now see what was said by the other faction of the conservative party in Quebec, the nationalist group.

On the 27th October 1911 the hon. Postmaster General after having been sworn in as a member of the present government, was re-elected in the county of Quebec. A large meeting was held at Lorette and the nationalist leader of the District of Quebec, Mr. Armand Lavergne, was one of the principal speakers. In the report of his speech published by 'L'Evenement,' (18th October) I find the following :

The seed we have sown has risen and ripened and already harvest time has come. I am glad that the harvester to-day should be the hon. Mr. Pelletier, who, as a minister has repeated to you the promises made before his election: that he would demand and insist upon a plebiscite on the naval question. I will go further and I state positively to you that we will obtain that plebiscite.

I went to Ottawa while the cabinet was being formed and I saw Mr. Borden from whom I expected neither honours nor portfolio. I said to him: 'I bring you the Province of Quebec regenerated; will you take it'? Mr. Borden extended to me a loyal hand. I can assure you that Mr. Borden is not the fanatic he has been painted, but one of the greatest living Canadians.

The English from the sister provinces have understood us, English Conservatives especially know that if we desire that this Confederation should live, there must no longer be any question of victors or vanquished, but complete equality between the two great races who divide our soil.

We can confidently confide the cause of the French Canadian Catholic minority to the present government; I know that our interests will be in good hands.

A little snow beginning to fall, my friend Armand Lavergne exclaimed in a moment of enthusiasm :

Fall, fall snow flakes! Cover with an immaculate pall the turpitudes of past governments. To-morrow the sun will shine upon an honest government which we hail with joy and gratitude. ('L'Evènement,' October 28, 1911.)

Mr. PELLETIER. They were fine and good words.

Mr. LAPOINTE. (Translation). Yes, they were fine words. I am convinced that today Mr. Lavergne would consider three feet of snow at least necessary to cover the mis-deeds of the government he hailed with such delight.

I do not desire to give any more quotations; I cannot however pass over the statement made a moment ago by the hon. Minister of Public Works that never since 1897, in this House or out of it, he spoke of the Manitoba school question. The hon. Minister went to the length of declaring that when speakers on the hustings had, in his presence, spoken of this question, he had blamed them for it, stating that as far as he was concerned the question was settled and outside the sphere of politics.

Mr. Speaker, on the 6th August last, in the city of Three Rivers, the hon. Minister of Public Works, in company with Mr. Henri Bourassa, opened the electoral campaign in the Province of Quebec.

I have here the report of that meeting as published in "Le Devoir", recognized organ of the minister.

This is what Mr. Normand, the conservative candidate said :

Mr. Bureau must render you an account of his conduct in the great questions touching our national life. He must account to you for the Manitoba school question which is not settled in spite of the statements of those who betrayed our brothers and which remains now as it was then, an iniquitous and monstrous violation of the natural law which permits every man to adore God in the language spoken by his father and mother.

The same day, on the same hustings, in the presence of the hon. Minister of Public Works, the hon. deputy Speaker of this House, the Knight (sans peur et sans reproche,) as described by 'L'Evenement,' made the following statement.

One day when a wave of fanaticism blew from the Orange lodges—

I beg, Mr. Speaker, that you will excuse these words spoken by your deputy in an electoral address.

—when the Quebec representatives were thinking deep of shame and fear rather than to make any sacrifice of personal interest, when iniquity led its forces against justice in order to do her violence and against liberty to strangle her, two men rose in parliament to defend justice and liberty in the Province of Quebec and on this land of America, and those two men are Bourassa and Lavergne.

The present government does not settle great questions they kill and bury them.

Their final method is to declare a question dead and buried.

Dead and buried they say is the Manitoba school question in spite of the eloquent voice exclaiming: 'I am the eternally wounded and my grave is a cradle.

Listen now to the words of the hon. Minister of Public Works, who declares that he protested every time that any of his friends dared to say that the school question was not settled:

In the moral order of things, we demand that the constitution, under whose shelter our Confederation has developed in the marvellous manner we are now witnessing, shall be as the ark of the covenant, securing to all minorities, Protestant or Catholic, the full recognition of dear and precious rights, and that no compromise, no refusal of justice shall cause the people to regret the political event of 1867.

Is that the protest which the hon. gentleman claims to have made on every one of those occasions?

Mr. Speaker, after having heard such speeches and declarations, after having witnessed all that has taken place in this House since the beginning of the session, the attitude of the ministers representing our promise and of the members supporting them, I ask you and all the members of this House, I ask the country whether it would not be proper to give to the 21st September 1911 the historical name of 'the day of dupes.'

What a number of dupes there were that day in our good old province! Too large a number of voters did not perceive that they were the instruments of bold and skilful agitators using them to break up and mutilate the Liberal party, and knowing well that after the battle all these contradictory forces, imperialists and autonomists, orangemen and stalwarts of all shades would unite to control the administration, and having attained their end would trample under foot their electoral doctrines.

You know, Mr. Speaker, what calumnies they spread and with what consummate skill they prepared and organized the elections which gave the country a majority composed of men having diametrically opposite ideas and among whom said union is possible without absolute violation on the part of several of their pledges and sacred promises.

It was really very skillful to state in Ontario that Borden was the champion of public schools and of provincial rights betrayed and abandoned by Laurier in 1905 and to proclaim in Quebec that Monk was the champion of separate schools and of the sacred rights of minorities also betrayed and abandoned by Laurier.

It was really artistically dishonest to cry throughout Ontario that the navy created by the Liberal government was a step towards independence and a Canadian organization of no use to the empire while repeating in Quebec that Laurier had sold his countrymen to England. It is in favour of this unfortunate coalition that ardent appeals were made to the Quebec electors who were beseeched to support it by their votes.

The present government was born of that conspiracy and duplicity. But we await them on the day of reckoning and retribution has already begun. After five months of power that government has already reached the lowest degree of unpopularity and impotence.

Already we see the dawn of the day when the unnatural coalition shall be dissolved and disappear as some chemical product unable to withstand the atmosphere in which it is placed.

The members of the cabinet are to-day obliged to face their solemn pledges and violent denunciations. What has become of their stern unyielding attitude? On the first occasion they have fled from the field to employ an expression they themselves have used, caring nothing for their allies of yesterday. The latter are no longer necessary, they can do without them. In a very short time they will lead them from the capitol to the Tarpecan rock.

Those we believed in their sincerity and good faith are now suffering from disillusion, disappointment and sorrow. We had predicted this.

To rally his Quebec partisans by vague declarations covering his reasons the hon. Postmaster General was fain to sound the onset against the Liberal party. It was a tactical move, but public opinion will not accept any such line of defence.

The denunciations of the hon. minister are only skirmishes where no honour can be gained; in all his declarations it is easy to detect an admission of incapacity.

The Liberal members of this House will easily sustain the untimely assault of the hon. minister. They are the only ones here who can declare that they have not violated their pledges nor torn up their electoral programmes.

They are the only ones who can appear before their constituents without fear or remorse, secure in the feeling that they will not be accused of deception.

The hon. minister has communicated his hopes to the House. He declared that he had faith, much faith, that faith which moves mountains. Has he forgotten that faith without works is but a dead faith?

It must not be forgotten that we are legislating to-day under a section of the British North America Act of 1871 which reads as follows:

3. The parliament of Canada may from time to time, with the consent of the legislature of any province and of the said Dominion, increase, diminish or otherwise alter the limits of such province, upon such terms and conditions as may be agreed to by the said legislature, and may, with the like consent, make provision respecting the effect and operation of any such increase, or diminution or alteration of territory in relation to any province affected thereby.

If it was the intention of the government to get certain concessions from Mr. Roblin, as the two representatives of the province of Quebec in the Cabinet would have us believe, why did they not ask for them before giving to Manitoba the numerous advantages which have been granted in this bill? If Mr. Roblin was so well disposed towards the Catholic minority, why should he object so strongly to the least little text in the law? No, Mr. Speaker, the electors of this country and specially of the province of Quebec, will not allow themselves to be deceived by the remote illusion of possible concessions on the part of Mr. Roblin.

The representatives of the minority in the government, in committing to the care of the Premier of Manitoba the interests of that minority, are in the position of the legendary Gribouille who stood in the water up to his neck so as not to get wet by the rain.

Their action could also be likened to that of the lamb who would go for assistance to his fierce enemy, the wolf, instead of staying within the fence that would protect him.

You are giving to the province of Manitoba an immense territory, you are loading it with favours, you are giving it two million dollars to which it is not entitled, you are creating a new province, why then do you not avail yourself of this exceptional occasion to exact the redress of the wrongs under which the Catholic minority is labouring?

Twist as much as you want the meaning of the statutes, oppose one to the other, as well as you can, the public opinion will never be satisfied and the government will be held responsible for this neglect and this omission.

The hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) told the House how the ministers have been denounced and repudiated by almost all the newspapers of the province of Quebec that helped the present government to carry the last elections.

Now, let us see the reverse side of the medal. Let us listen to the victorious clamours of the other wing of the ministerial party. Only this morning the "Ottawa Citizen" was writing rapturously that the conservative party have no need of the province of Quebec to govern this country, that under the Laurier administration everything was done at the bidding of Quebec, but that happily that time is past.

With the permission of the House I will quote from a newspaper which is the official organ of a society closely allied to the Conservative party, I mean "The Orange Sentinel". This article published on the 7th March, will show the people of the province of Quebec what masters they gave themselves to on the 21st September last. The title of the article is "A Fine Exhibition" and it says :

A FINE EXHIBITION.

'The resolutions will go this afternoon if the government is defeated before six o'clock,'

These are the words of hon. Robert Rogers in reply to the Nationalist demands for delay in the introduction of the Bill to extend the boundaries of Manitoba.

English-speaking Canada has been waiting many years for this straight talk to Quebec clericals. It stirs the British spirit of Canadians to read such a declaration. We have been accustomed for so long to see our representatives at Ottawa grovelling before the black robes of Quebec, that it seems like the beginning of a new era to have a responsible Minister declare the intention of the government to do right regardless of the threats of bishops, priests, or their Nationalist infantry.

It is the voice of a full grown man, in whom courage is the dominant characteristic, not the expression of a politician who listens to the timid council of the place-hunters.

Hon. Robert Rogers has placed himself on the level taken by Sir John Macdonald when he was urged to pardon Louis Riel the second time. Then as now, the black frocked priests and bishops of Quebec invaded Ottawa to save the neck of a twice convicted murderer. The old chieftain, who had gone much too far when he pardoned Riel the first time, made up his mind that the death penalty should be inflicted. From within his cabinet, from the floor of the House, from the episcopal palaces of Quebec, they came pleading and threatening to save the French rebel. It was all useless. The old man, driven into the corner by the fierce attacks, gave his head a characteristic shake as he said:

'Riel shall die, if every dog in Quebec barks at my heels.'

From that day until last week when hon. Robert Rogers spoke, there has not been such a display of strength and courage among the ministers at Ottawa. We hope that this determination to resist Quebec will be maintained. Ontario and the other provinces will do justice to the French. But the time has come when they will no longer allow Quebec to ride rough shod over their constitutional rights.

I will not stoop to disprove the malignant charges of that paper against the clergy of the province of Quebec, passing over them in scorn is the best answer which can be given.

But are not the victorious clamours of the organ of this section, whose influence in the administration of the day cannot be denied, a most evident proof of the shameful retreat and the unconditional surrender of the representatives of the minority in the government?

The ministers are complaining bitterly of their Nationalist auxiliaries who to-day are up in arms against them. Their tranquility has been troubled. They lament over the obtrusive voices that disturb their sleep and dispel their dreams.

We can afford to look with indifference on this family quarrel. We have no sympathy for those by whom we have been slandered, hissed and insulted.

We cannot forget that we have been charged with cowardice and treason, when we had done our duty as loyal citizens and had taken our political lives in our hands to stand by a cause which we considered to be in the interest of the country.

Those men, our most violent enemies of yesterday, are to-day isolated, standing between two seats, denounced on the right, ignored on the left, in that position in a word, in which must inevitably sooner or later, find themselves all those who play such a game.

In concluding, I will say that the stand of the government on this question is the same that they have taken on all the problems they had to solve. They are satisfied with having the agitation kept up and they carefully avoid taking action.

What did we see three or four weeks ago? The ministers from the province of Quebec, the so-called champions of orthodoxy, those lofty sponsors of our religion, in order to please their allies of Ontario who have made a political machine of the 'Ne temere decree,' asking the Privy council in England if they can refrain the province of Quebec from giving effect to the rules of the Catholic church for the celebration of marriages between members of that faith, instead of voting down at once the arbitrary Bill which had been submitted to the House.

And what about the naval question? It has been solemnly declared in front of every chuch in the province of Quebec that the naval law would be repealed at the first session of Parllament, after the election.

But to-day, the government are waiting to consult with the admiralty and we can easily forecast what the answer will be.

In the meantime we have entered the fight and we will keep it up to the end.

Public opinion is better enlightened, better informed and conscious of the grave error committed in a moment of weakness is already beginning to regain its foothold. When the occasion will come, the people will take revenge on those by whom they have been so outrageously misled.

I will have great pleasure in voting for the amendment of the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Beland).

Mr. A. SEVIGNY (Dorchester). (Translation). Mr. Speaker, at this late hour of the night and at this phase of the debate, it is not my intention to detain the House by a long speech, but I think it is my duty to give some explanation before casting my vote for the amendment of the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Beland).

It has been my privilege for several years past to be acquainted with the ex Postmaster General. I am quite ready to concede here, as I have done more than once outside of this House, that my hon. friend is a talented French-Canadian; nevertheless, I hold together with several members to whom I have spoken about it, that the hon. gentleman, besides being a clever young man is also an excellent comedian. I followed him in that memorable campaign of Drummond-Arthabaska, in the fall of 1909; I followed him during the last electoral fight that was ended by the great victory of the 21st September. On all occasions it was made apparent to me. . .

Mr. LEMIEUX. (Translation). Is my hon. friend alluding to me?

Mr. A. SEVIGNY. (Translation). No. I am alluding to the ex-Postmaster General (Mr. Beland); if I mistake not, my hon. friend must be styled the ex-minister of Marine and Fisheries.

I have always found my hon. friend—he has been a Minister for thirty days—to be very clever when meeting his opponents and discussing the naval question. I was honoured by his presence in my county and I listened to him on numerous other occasions. When he was addressing French Canadian electors in the province of Quebec, he used to say: Our opponents are trying to work you up about that navy, a small little navy that will serve only to protect your butter and your cheese; you are not going to vote for the large navy that Borden wants, and don't forget that Borden wants to give, besides, 25 million dollars to assist England in the wars of the empire. He invariably concluded in appealing thus to his fellow citizens: If you vote for Laurier, you are voting for a small navy; if you vote for Borden you are voting for a large navy. For him the whole question was between a small and a large navy. That tactic was clever enough and was fairly successful in several places; it succeeded even in my county, but not sufficiently to prevent my being elected.

To-night, after the vote, I listened with great pleasure, as I always do to, the speech of the hon. member for Beauce, who is one of the best speakers of the province of Quebec.

For more than a week now, we are discussing this question of the Manitoba boundaries. For my part, I took on that question a stand which is absolutely sincere and definite, and that stand I have taken at a considerable sacrifice. For the last ten years, unfortunately, I have been mixed up in politics and I have always fought for the Conservative party in the province of Quebec, in its darkest days, and a few months after taking my seat in this House, I came to the conclusion that I was in duty bound to vote against the party for which I have always fought.

I say that it was a great sacrifice. I did it in order to harmonize my vote with my past record and in justice to those whom my conscience called upon me to support under the circumstances.

The hon. member for Beauce has followed the whole debate; he did not however take any part in the discussion upon the amendment submitted by the hon. member for Yamaska. He proposed nothing himself as a measure of justice to the Catholic minority of Keewatin. He now comes forward with a motion having no bearing whatever on the question and which, as he says, would place the rights of that minority in the hands of a few persons who would confer with the government of Manitoba. What would take place at such a conference? Would the hon. member be there? Would I or other members of this House be there to offer suggestions? Certainly not. I say therefore that it is here in this House where the members from the province of Quebec and for all Canada are present that suggestions should be made. If the hon. member will submit a measure calculated to protect all the rights of the Keewatin minority, I will undertake to vote with him and once more against my party. But I will have none of the measure he now suggests, because I do not believe in its efficacy and past events strengthen me in that connection.

In 1905, the parliament of Canada had to debate a question concerning which public opinion was roused as it is to-day. The Liberal government having decided to create two new provinces in the west, Alberta and Saskatchewan, there arose the questions of separate schools and of the preservation of the rights of the French language in those provinces. What took place then? Mr. Bergeron, then member for Beauharnois, submitted an amendment which reads as follows at page 9046 of the Debates of that year:

That all the words after 'be' at the end of the question be left out and the words: 'Recommitted to a community of the whole House with instruction that they have power to amend the same by striking out all the words of clause 16 and to substitute therefor the following:

16. Section 93 of the B.N.A., Act of 1867 shall apply to the said province as if at the date fixed for the coming into force of this Act, the territory included in the said province were already a province, the word 'union' in the section meaning the same date.

2. The legislature shall have the right to pass laws with reference to education, but it shall always provide for (a) the existence of separate schools and their enjoyment by the minority, Protestant or Catholic, who may claim them. (b) The effective control of said school in matters of teaching by the said minority, (c) the full liberty for the majority in any school district to have such schools as they may desire, (d) the equitable and proportionate distribution between the majority and the minority of all monies appropriated for education by the legislature of the province and of all monies arising from the school fund established by the Dominion Lands Act.

Such is Mr. Bergeron's amendment, it is clear and precise and if the member for Beauce will prepare a similar one to secure the complete protection of the rights of the minority in Keewatin, I solemnly promise to vote for such an amendment.

What took place in 1905? When the division took place on Mr. Bergeron's amendment, the hon. member for Two-Mountains (Mr. Ethier), the hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. Lapointe), the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Béland), and all the French Canadian Liberals from the province of Quebec voted against it. Such is the measure of their sincerity in the protection of the minority and of Catholics in the new provinces. Am I not right in saying that they stand condemned by their past record and they will remain so condemned in the province of Quebec? At the same period and during the same debate, Mr. Bourassa presented an amendment concerning education in the new provinces. What did these members do about it? Consult the debates and you will find that they voted against the Catholic minority sacrificing all that they lay claim to to-day in the name of Catholics of the province of Quebec.

Did not the hon. member for Beauce who a moment ago,took upon himself to speak in the name of 42 per cent of the population, vote with his colleagues on your left against the use and maintenance of the French language in the new provinces?

Mr. Speaker, as I have already stated, I have come here resolved to do my duty. I remember the declaration I have made in the province of Quebec since I am in political life. At the beginning of the present session, the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux), a talented French Canadian, an honour to his nationality and whom I much admire—quoted certain words he said were uttered by the member for Dorchester, concerning the navy and which appeared to be an attack against the English of Ontario. I deny absolutely having ever uttered the words attributed to me by the member for Rouville. What I said outside of this Chamber I am ready to repeat here. Some days ago, I gave notice of a motion concerning the navy; I knew what I was doing on that occasion. Somebody had to bell the cat and I did so without hesitation.

I am quite satisfied with the government's attitude on this question, but here again as on the school question, my conduct was entirely sincere, I had no other object but to do my duty to the best of my knowledge and ability, and notwithstanding the deep regret that I felt and expressed, I did not hesitate to differ from my party, nor shall I hesitate to do in future if I consider it necessary. Let the hon. members for Beauce, Two-Mountains and Kamouraska submit an amendment securing the rights of the minority in Keewatin and I shall be very happy to separate once more from my party and to do my duty. But I refuse to be duped by such people who are not sincere, as I have proved, and for that reason I shall vote against the amendment presented by the member for Beauce.

Hon. W. B. NANTEL (Minister of Inland Revenue). (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, at this advanced hour of the night, I have no intention of making a long speech. Other occasions will offer when I will be able to discuss the question before the people.

I simply desire to call attention to a statement made by the hon. member for Two-Mountains, my neighbour, who said that I had promised to settled the Manitoba school question if the Conservative party was returned.

This statement was quite unfounded and I protest strongly against it.

It is true that I have undertaken campaigns on that question, especially in 1896, when I supported in the county of Terrebonne Mr. Chauvin, a devoted partisan of the Manitoban minority. I discovered then to my regret that the electors of the province of Quebec declared themselves favourable to Mr. Laurier against the Remedial Bill. I discovered since that this feeling in favour of the present leader of the opposition did not cease to grow. So much so that approval came to him from quarters whence we had at first been encouraged to fight against him. I remember that my friend Mr. Chauvin was twitted with being more Catholic than the Pope. This was said by Liberal speakers throughout the province of Quebec. I might quote many speeches and newspaper articles in support of what I have said. I will quote only one. It shows clearly that the feeling in favour of Mr. Laurier's school policy had gathered strength and that starting from the deepest strata of the popular conscience it had reached the highest sphere of the religious world.

Allow me to read a despatch published by "Le Soleil" and reproduced by "Le Canada" on the 5th July 1907; it shows that the Laurier-Greenway settlement was then accepted as an accomplished fact.

'Le Canada,' a daily newspaper of Montreal, Sir Wilfrid's organ, reproduced to-day, (July 5, page 8), under the heading 'Sir Wilfrid at Rome,' the following from 'Le Soleil,' organ of Sir Wilfrid, at Quebec:

(Special correspondence.)

Sir Wilfrid, as the despatches have already informed you, spent a few days at Rome, coming from Marseilles by way of Cannes and Genoa.

He was received most courteously by His Holiness Pius X in a private audience.

He was given a reception at the Canadian college, at which were present a number of bishops and prelates.

The speech of His Eminence Cardinal (Vincent) Vanutelli was much remarked. His Eminence complimented Sir Wilfrid on his brilliant qualities as a stateman, and warmly thanked him for the services he had rendered to the church.

He spoke of the good example given by Sir Wilfrid Laurier to his fellow citizens in his private life.

The church, he added, is proud of this son of hers who has become, without betraying his convictions or principles the chief magistrate of a great country in which the majority of citizens are Protestants.

I send you without comment these declarations of Cardinal Vanutelli which received prolonged applause from the distinguished audience.

An event such as this taking place after the lame settlement of the school question in the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan at length convinced me that the struggle was useless.

Moreover I had still present in my mind the manner in which the champions of the minority had been treated by the electorate of the province of Quebec. The defeat of the Tupper Government, that of our fellow countrymen Messrs. Taillon, Desjardins, Angers and several others proved to me that popular feeling was swayed by principles different from those we defended.

We might thenceforth say to our compatriots : "Since you allow yourselves to be blinded in his manner, I do not see why we should insist upon defending principles which you have rejected notwithstanding our efforts." And when I speak of blindness, I am using a very mild expression as some others more appropriate might not be parliamentary.

Thenceforth my mind was made up. I ceased to pay any attention to the Manitoba school question and from that date I have never made any statement of a nature to justify the words which the hon. member for Two-Mountains has just uttered.

I have been called to task for my silence in the course of this debate, but I had an excellent reason for remaining so. On this point I had taken the lead of my colleagues. Before the Bill now being considered was submitted to the House, I had taken a well defined attitude with respect to the rights of minorities in the West. At a banquet given to the hon. Postmaster General at Quebec, some days before the cabinet was formed, I had expressed my views.

I have nothing to add or to withdraw of what I said on that occasion. Nothing since then has altered my views and I stand ready to answer for them before my constituents. I take my full share of ministerial responsibility as to the Manitoba Boundries Bill.

As to the Keewatin question, it would be useless for me to go into it at any length; it is exhausted. The House has heard all the arguments for and against the adoption of the Bill and the position taken by the government needs no further support.

I will merely call attention to the fact that there would be no justice in imposing upon Manitoba for the annexation of Keewatin restrictions which nobody dreams of putting upon Quebec for the annexation of Ungava or upon Ontario for the annexation of another portion of Keewatin. Everybody admits that by the fact of this annexation the laws of Quebec, be they school laws or otherwise, become those of Ungava.

In the case of Manitoba objection is taken to the school laws of that province under the Laurier-Greenway settlement. But this settlement is after all but an accident to which the people of Manitoba may themselves apply a remedy. In fact, the Laurier-Greenway settlement cannot be altered by federal legislation. It is unjust in respect to the Catholic minority, but may be corrected by an act of the Manitoba legislature. From this source alone can the remedy come and from the past conduct of the Roblin government there is a moral guarantee that all hope is not at an end and that the province of Manitoba is gradually reverting to a sounder interpretation of the constitution. Besides to whom are due these school difficulties of which we are to-day feeling the full weight?

To such men as Messrs. Greenway and Sifton who were rewarded by Mr. Laurier after having cooperated with him in perpetrating the injustice from which the Catholics of Manitoba have suffered so long.

That the system of toleration that now obtains in the province should be maintained that it gives us hope of a measure of complete justice is established from the declarations just now made by the hon. Mr. Rogers.

I will say no more; I merely wished to deny the statements made by the hon. member for Two-Mountains. I deny once more and in the most positive manner that I said anything like what he attributed to me. I stand by what I declared at Quebec. I assume entire responsibility for the attitude I have taken to-night and I have no fear of meeting my constituents on this question. For my part, I have received no petitions from my county and I do not consider that in acting as I do, I am abusing of the freedom of action thus left in my hands.

I shall vote against the amendment submitted by the hon. member for Beauce and in favour of the bill which I consider to be an act of justice towards Manitoba, granting as it does all proper security to minorities and tending to promote a proper understanding, peace and union between the different races and creeds, whose every right the government is anxious to recognize in an equal measure.

Mr. DEMERS (St. Johns and Iberville). (Translation.) At this advanced hour Mr. Speaker, I will only say a few words upon the question now before us, which is the annexation of the territory of Keewatin to Manitoba at the latter's request. Although I have no intention to consider the Bill from its financial aspect, I must say that from what I have heard of the debate on that point, I must come to the conclusion that Manitoba has been treated like a favoured child by this present government; Canada's other children, will after this, it seems to me, have much difficulty in believing that parental affection is equally distributed throughout the family. The consequence of the government's action, in my opinion, will be that other provinces will be coming to us for better terms which we will be obliged to grant them if we would wish to preserve that peace and harmony so necessary to progress and to the development of the country. Such a policy does not tend towards the unification of the different portions of the Dominion. On the contrary it cannot fail to strengthen the secession movement already becoming apparent.

My intention in rising this evening is more especially to touch upon another aspect of the question; the attitude of the Catholic Conservative members from the province of Quebec.

We have here a Bill for the annexation of territory to one of the provinces of the Dominion. It appears to me perfectly clear that this territory is at present governed by laws providing for the establishment of separate schools. Four members of the government are Catholics from the province of Quebec. Those ministers have proclaimed themselves or have been proclaimed the only true defenders of the rights of minorities. They have abused the Liberal ministers and members, or allowed them to be abused by their stumpers and newspapers, accusing them of being sold, cowards and traitors to their race and religion, in consequence of the attitude of the Liberal party on the question of schools in Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba. Nay more, one of these ministers the hon. Ministers of Public Works, carried his zeal in the cause of minorities to the extent of demanding the use of the French language in Alberta and Saskatchewan, although no statute could be found to support his contention.

All or nearly all the French-Canadian members sitting on the Speaker's right and supporting the present government were elected as Nationalists, that is to say as champions of the rights of minorities, having specially promised the people that the greivances of our fellow countrymen in Manitoba would be remedied, declaring everywhere that the school question was not settled and was not as they said dead and buried, that Laurier had nobody left to betray, having betrayed his brothers from the west and Manitoba. 'Elect us,' they said, 'and you will find that all this injustice will disappear.' 'Alas! what a cruel awakening for the trusting souls who believed them.

In vain had we repeated that such declarations were not sincere and that demagogism in its worst form was being used to attain power; in vain did we explain that the government had done the best it could under the circumstances and that no other government could have done as well. The people are now in a position to judge between us. The Bill is before us, but in what manner are the rights of minorities secured? Where are the defenders of Catholic rights in the west? Have they withdrawn from the government? Will those who may have done so at one stage cease to support an administration unfaithful to its promises and which refuses to accept their views on a question that should be for them primordial and vital, being the fundamental principle of their policy, as explained to the electorate of Quebec. Are they trying or will they try to defeat the government? No, they will continue to support the present government; we are safe in predicting that, knowing them as we do. But the day of reckoning will come, and we await it eagerly and confidently.

What has been done to-day by those men who, as the hon. Minister of Public Works, said at Nicolet, (I quote from the report of 'Le Devoir', June 16, 1911):

Parliament has reached such a state of degradation and servility, as everybody knows, that the deliberative character of the House is a thing of the past. No deliberation is possible without freedom of opinion. But such freedom may be said to be non-existent, especially among members of the majority. They are held fast by the chains of party discipline. When the will of the government has been made known, woe betide any partisan who attempts to disobey the orders of the whip. There remains to him no alternative but to commit 'hari-kari,' as the Japanese say, he must commit suicide publicly. (We may be quite sure that the hon. Minister will never commit 'hari-kari'). This party rule is at the present moment one of the most formidable menaces to our liberty and that of the country, other people are aware of it. And I hope that you will elect, at least with our help, only such men as are resolved to throw off that yoke which has become a serious danger to our country and to vote under every circumstance according to their conscience and regardless of that discipline which is admittedly shameful, reducing as it does to impotence the assembly which governs our distinies. When the common good requires it, we must be able to sacrifice personal interests and forget party divisions in deference to the supreme interests of the nation.

What have such men as the hon. the Postmaster General done? I quote from 'L'Action Sociale' of the 11th September, 1911.

'I am old enough to use my own judgment and I stand by the policy of Monk, Bourassa and Lavergne.' and added 'L'Action Sociale,' 'that answer was applauded.'

Where are the men, such as an hon. French Canadian Conservative member whom I cannot name under the circumstances and on account of the rules of the House who said, I quote from 'Le Devoir,' 19th June, 1911, report of the Sorel meeting:

On the other hand, while Mr. Lemieux said that the rights of the French language in the West must be abandoned, Mr. Monk stood for the complete exercice of those rights, and Mr. Borden, convinced that the French language was not guaranteed by the constitution, refusing to listen to the claims set forth by his colleague, Mr. Monk broke away from his party; and thus meeting from the extremities of partisanship Mr. Monk and Mr. Bourassa clasped hands. That alliance will certainly some day bear fruit, and today, says Mr....., we are definitely seperated from the parties.....

It will be asked: who shall lead this free and independent movement. It matters little, says Mr.....Give us independent members in the House, give us good soldiers and leader will appear..... Of course, these also will follow political leaders, but on condition that they shall defend the rights of the Catholic religion and of the French language.

And what does the hon. member for L'Islet think of all this? Will he continue to support the present government, and the Minister of Public Works, he who stated at the Fraserville meeting (I quote from 'Le Devoir's' report of that meeting):

He recalled the memorable days of 1905, when being then a new member of the House, the first voice he heard raised in favour of our brothers in the West, was that of Mr. Bourassa, who, with his friend, Mr. Lavergne, extended his hand over party barriers to Mr. Monk and his few disciples in order to defend those whose rights were denied.

And to-day, once more, we inscribe upon our programme: Justice to the French language.

And what does the hon. member for Joliette think of 'his chief Mr. Monk' as he said, with emphasis, no doubt, on the 26th August, 1911 ('Le Devoir', 29th August, 1911)? Will he continue to support the present government which has been found wanting upon what he declared to be the only, the great question?

What do the electors of the province of Quebec think to-day when they remember having read and heard the words uttered by Mr. Normand, Conservative-Nationalist-opposition candidate in Three-Rivers (Report by 'Le Devoir', 7th August 1911 of the meeting held at Three-Rivers the 6th)?

You have come, he said, to call Mr. Bureau to account for his stand on those great questions touching our national life.

You have come to ask him to render an account of the Manitoba school question which is not settled, notwithstanding the statements of those who betrayed our brethren. (Mr. Normand had certainly not conferred with the hon. Minister of Public Works on the subject) and which remains to-day as it was then a glaring and monstrous violation of the natural right possessed by every man to adore God in the language spoken by his father and mother.

You will require from Mr. Laurier and Mr. Bureau an account of their conduct at the time when contingents were sent to Africa.

How shall the hon. member whose name I cannot now mention suit to his vote on the present bill, his words as reported in 'Le Devoir' of the 6th August, 1911?

The present government (the Laurier government) do not settle great questions, they kill and bury them. (Cries of shame).

Their final method is to say of any such question that it is dead and buried.

Dead and buried indeed the Manitoba schools question notwithstanding the eloquent voice exclaiming: I am the eternally wounded and my grave is a cradle!

What does 'L'Evenement' think, or rather what should it think, being the chief organ of the conservative party in Quebec and the personal organ, as I think, of the hon. the Postmaster General, and having printed in heavy letters on the eve of the election, sentences such as this:

Let us avenge the Catholic and our fellow-countrymen of the West.

Mr. Speaker, we have witnessed and are still witnessing an ignoble comedy, a demoralizing spectacle especially when the actors are men whose first duty should be the moral and intellectual uplifting of the people; I have no doubt that the day of reckoning will come soon for those who have contributed to the gigantic farce of which we have been the unfortunate witnesses.

I do not desire to close my remarks without referring to certain statements made by the hon. member for Dorchester (Mr. Sevigny). He told us in substance that he would not vote for the amendment submitted by the hon. member for Beauce because he had no confidence in him. His scruples should not be a matter for surprise as he has spoken to us of his conscience. But what must he think of those amongst us who supported the amendment of the hon. member for Yamaska? Does he suppose that we so voted because we had confidence in the mover, especially after the contradictory speeches delivered at two days interval by the hon. member for Yamaska? In the first he stated that after due consideration and after the dissertation of his former professor of constitutional law, he had reached the conclusion that the minority had no vested rights in Keewatin. In the second, he discovered that the minority had vested rights. The duty of the hon. member for Dorchester is clear, there is only one matter for him to consider that is whether the amendment submitted by the hon. member for Beauce is conformable to his principles.

The hon. member for Dorchester expresed a regret that the hon. member for Beauce had not spoken sooner. But had he himself spoken on the question before the speech he has just delivered? As a government member his duty was to give the example. All that the hon. member for Dorchester had done before his speech delivered to-night, was to vote, as we did, for the amendment of the hon. member for Yamaska. The hon. member for Beauce, according to the logic of my friend the hon. member for Dorchester, would thus be at some advantage having spoken first.

Mr. Speaker, I shall say no more and I think that the House has already understood that I will vote in favour of the amendment of the hon. member for Beauce.

Mr. E. PAQUET (L'Islet). (Translation) Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for St. John and Iberville has asked me if I should continue to support the government on other political questions. I may say to him in reply that I shall always be ready to rise superior to considerations of party politics to defend leaders who best represent my views. In 1905, I defended the rights of minorities and of the French language. I desire to do the same in regard to this Keewatin question. In 1905, when the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan were being created, I joined hands notwithstanding political lines with Mr. Henri Bourassa and Mr. Armand Lavergne, in order to defend the right of minorities and of the French language in those vast prairie lands opened to civilization by our forefathers. To-day as before, in order to defend the minority rights, I am leaving for the moment those men whom I must approve and admire. My friend from Beauce comes at the last moment, comes with an amendment, asking us to vote for a conference between the government of Canada and that of Manitoba. That amendment should have come sooner. When Sir Wilfrid Laurier prepared this Bill last year he thought of no such thing. I will therefore vote with the government for the reasons given by my friend from Dorchester.

My friend from St. John has treated hon. Mr. Monk with severity. Does he not know of the patriotic spirit of the Minister of Public Works and of the efforts made by him to secure the rights of the minority? I have the greatest confidence in Mr. Monk. Never shall I forget the memorable sitting of the 3rd of February, 1910, when the hon. member for Jacques Cartier, his voice trembling from physical anguish, rose to enter his energitic protest against those who violated the rigths of minorities. I can have no confidence in the men of the Libal party, who endeavour to defend, when in opposition, the sacred rights of minorities betrayed by them in the past.

I left my party on this occasion in order to remain faithful to my past record; but in voting for the government against the motion of my friend from Beauce, I desire simply to show that I have no confidence in the leaders of the Liberal party. The leaders of the Conservative party, Hon. F. D. Monk, Minister of Public Works, Hon. L. P. Pelletier and Hon. B. Nantel will know how to defend in future the true interests of Canada. I made the greatest sacrifice of my political career by voting against the government on the Keewatin schools question. Our ministers are looking towards Manitoba. I hope that they will insist upon our rights in a patriotic manner. I am sure that they will defend the true interests of the country. In so doing they deserve and will deserve my entire gratitude and confidence.

Mr. E. PROULX (Prescott). Mr. Speaker, when Manitoba was admitted into confederation there was a statutory limitation imposed with regard to education and it is the same limitation which I wanted to impose on this new territory now being added to the province. Some hon. members on the other side of the House have made a distinction between creating a new province and adding territory to a province already formed. The only difference is that we must obtain the consent of the legislature of the province to the conditions or terms that we want to impose. We are treating Manitoba very generously. I think we are treating her too generously. We are giving her too much. We are in a position to impose terms and terms should be imposed. The hon. Postmaster General (Mr. Pelletier) is willing to trust to the mercy of Mr. Roblin and his government. Well, I am not too confident in the government of Manitoba, considering the declarations of an ex-colleague of Mr. Roblin who now sits in this House as Minister of the Interior (Mr. Rogers). I have here the report of a speech made by the Minister of the Interior at Virden on January 6, 1909, and it reads as follows:

TWISTS TO COMPULSORY EDUCATION ISSUE.

Mr. Rogers. in his speech here last night, tried hard to twist the compulsory education policy which has been advocated in the legislature by the Liberals, into a sinister attack upon the educational liberties of the province made in accordance with deep-laid plans to re-establish separate schools. He declared that certain Liberals had entered into a conspiracy with Sir Wilfrid Laurier to force the issue of compulsory education, the idea being that when it reached a certain point the Dominion government would cut in and give the province the option of re-establishing separate schools in this province or foregoing the enlargement of its boundaries. Mr. Rogers then proceeded to deliver his time-honoured harangue upon the boundary question, displaying, as usual, a series of maps. He represented the province as being persecuted for its devotion to the national school system; and represented Sir Wilfrid Laurier and the Manitoba Liberals as engaged in a nefarious plot to compel the restoration of separate schools to the minority. This portion of Mr. Rogers' speech was a skilful and audacious appeal to feelings which are strong in this constituency; and he closed with a fervent appeal to the electors of Virden to rally to the support of the government as defenders of the liberties of the province.

I think that the Postmaster General, when he reposes such high hopes in the Manitoba government, is living in a fool's paradise, and I think it would have been more in conformity with his duty and especially with his previous pledges and promises to his compatriots of the province of Quebec to have voted for the amendment of the hon. member for Yamaska (Mr. Lamarche) and to have thus safeguarded now and forever, the rights of the minority, either Catholic or Protestant, in regard to separate schools in this new territory. I submit that the Act of 1875 has applied to the Keewatin district since the 31st January, 1907, and, moreover, I think that the ordinances 29 and 30, passed by the Northwest Territories legislature and council and which are found in the consolidated ordinances of 1901 apply to the district of Keewatin. Some hon. members on the other side of the House have maintained that the Catholics have no rights, and the Postmaster General is one of them, because there have been no separate schools in the district of Keewatin. It is true that separate schools have not been in operation, but still the right exists and they could have been organized under ordinances 29 and 30, which were in force before 1907. When the district of Keewatin became part of the Northwest Territories, those ordinances and the laws in force in the Northwest Territories became applicable and in force in the district of Keewatin. I do not intend to speak at any length at this hour, but I was anxious to explain my reasons for voting for the amendment of my hon. friend from Yamaska. I am sorry it did not carry. I would have preferred that it should have carried, but since it could not carry, since a large majority in this House was against it, I think that the best thing we can do now, is to adopt the amendment proposed by my hon. friend from Beauce (Mr. Beland) and not pass this Bill before negotiations have been entered into between the province of Manitoba and the representatives of the minority in that province. The Roman Catholics of Manitoba are to meet to-morrow night. There has been a meeting called of the Roman Catholics from the different parts of the province. This Bill should not pass before they are heard, and before they have had an opportunity of making their representations. The law at present in force in Manitoba is not satisfactory to the Catholics. We heard the other night the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Molloy), who must know the condition of his co-religionists in that province, say that at Winnipeg and Brandon they had to pay double taxes, that they had to pay their taxes to the public schools and at the same time, they had to maintain their own schools. I do not think that the Postmaster General himself thinks that is a satisfactory condition for the Catholics of Manitoba. I think it is his duty and that of the government to leave the Bill in abeyance until a satisfactory understanding has been come to between the government of Manitoba and the Catholics of that province. I shall have very much pleasure in voting for the amendment of my hon. friend from Beauce.

Mr. GEO. H. BOIVIN (Shefford). Mr. Speaker, I have only one word to say upon this question which has taken up so much of the time of the House. I want to give to you, Sir, and to hon. members here present, my reasons for voting against the amendment which was proposed by the hon. member for Yamaska (Mr. Mondou) and in favour of the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Beauce (Mr Beland).

I voted a few moments ago against the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Yamaska (Mr. Mondou), because I considered that this amendment was of a nature which rendered it either ultra vires or useless. Many legal minds have given opinions upon this school question, many eminent lawyers throughout the country have decided that it is impossible for the federal government to coerce Manitoba by the inclusion of any amendment or additional clause in this Bill without the consent of the legislature of Manitoba. I agree with these gentlemen, I agree with the opinion which was given in this House by the hon. the Minister of Justice, and that is one of the reasons which led me to vote against this amendment. It is true that it has also been stated in the course of this debate that the amendment did not have any great effect and that the principal reason why it was proposed was in order to place the new territory added to Manitoba under the same school system as the old territory. If that is the case the amendment is utterly useless because there is no doubt in my mind that the school system which exists in Manitoba at present will be extended to the new part of that province. But is that all? I claim that the hon. members who form the present government, the right hon. the Prime Minister and his colleagues in this House, promised the people of Canada more than to give to this new territory the same school system which exists in old Manitoba. I claim that the Prime Minister indirectly and many of his ministers directly promised the people of this country and especially of the province of Quebec that they would give separate schools to old Manitoba, and that is what they are not doing when they present this Bill. It is very true that the Prime Minister very carefully refrained during the course of the last campaign from going into those counties in which the candidates were supposed to be of the Nationalist school and to have as their leaders Messrs. Monk and Bourassa. But he did come into Shefford and in Shefford the Prime Minister had as candidate Mr. James Davidson of Montreal who, on August 17, 1911, published a manifesto signed by his own hand which cannot be denied. In that manifesto he writes among other things:

If I am elected I will endeavour to have the rights and prerogatives of the Catholic French Canadians of all provinces respected and recognized as are the rights of the English Protestants of the province of Quebec with recognition of their schools, and of the French language, etc., etc.

And on August 30, or 31, the present right hon. Prime Minister addressed a meeting in Granby in favour of Mr. Davidson. Mr. Davidson was unquestionably his candidate and to-day he brings before the House a Bill in which he says not a word about separate schools. I did not vote against the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Yamaska because I am against separate schools. I am in favour of separate schools. I think that separate schools should exist throughout the Dominion, both Catholic and Protestant; but they can only be established in Manitoba by the government of Manitoba, they cannot be forced upon that province by this government. Conferences and conciliation, the policy of the Liberal party for the past thirty years, are the only way that improved conditions can be obtained for the minorities of Manitoba. The hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Beland), asks that a further conference be held and I believe that if ever there was a time in the history of Canada when separate schools could be obtained from the Manitoba government, it is precisely now, when we are passing a Bill to increase the territory of Manitoba giving them thousands and thousands of square miles of territory and millions of dollars. Now is the time to have a conference with the Prime Minister of Manitoba and to obtain from him the passage of some law in the province which would improve upon the Laurier-Greenway agreement of 1897.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Good, good!

Mr. BOIVIN. I say improve upon the Laurier-Greenway agreement of 1897 and I say that because to-night in this House the Minister of the Interior said that agreement gave satisfaction to nobody throughout Manitoba; because it has been heralded throughout Quebec for years that that agreement did not give satisfaction. I say that if the people of Manitoba are not satisfied with that agreement, now is the time to change it. The gentlemen on the government benches are those who should see that the changes are made. Can they do it by coercion, by inserting a clause in this Bill? I say not and that is why I voted against the amendment of the hon. member for Yamaska. But what they can do is to have further consultation and further conferences with the premier and government of Manitoba and obtain from them the passage of some Act by that legislature which will give greater rights to the Catholics in that province. It may be all very well for the Postmaster General and for the Minister of Public Works to say that they have confidence in Mr. Roblin, that they feel sure that after getting all these good things from the people of Canada he will do something for the Catholic minority in that province. But what is their assurance, where do they get it? Do they get it from the interview which Mr. Roblin himself gave to the Montreal 'Star' away back in 1903 when, during a visit to Montreal, he was consulted by a reporter of the 'Star' about the school question. What was the language of his interview? So far as the government of Manitoba is concerned the Manitoba question is closed and neither at the present nor at any future date will it be reopened. He is the man upon whom the Postmaster General and the Minister of Public Works depend to give better and greater justice to the Catholics of Manitoba. I claim that an agreement should be made now before this Bill is passed and that now is the time, before all these things are given to Mr. Roblin, to ascertain what he will do for the Catholic minority. It is for that reason I have much pleasure in voting for the amendment proposed by my hon. friend the member for Beauce (Mr. Beland).

House divided on amendment of Mr. Beland.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, March 13, 1912.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

MESSAGE FROM THE GOVERNOR GENERAL—SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES.

Hon. W. T. WHITE presented the following message from His Royal Highness the Governor General as follows:

The Governor General transmits to the House of Commons Supplementary Estimates of sums required for the service of the Dominion for the year ending on the 31st of March, 1912, and, in accordance with the provisions of the British North America Act, 1867, the Governor General recommends these estimates to the House of Commons.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds) moved that His Royal Highness' message together with the estimates be referred to the Committee of Supply.

Motion agreed to.

VOLUNTEER BOUNTY ACT, 1908, AMENDMENT.

Hon. ROBERT ROGERS (Minister of the Interior) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 137) to amend the Volunteer Bounty Act, 1908. He said: When the original Volunteer Bounty Act was passed in the month of July, 1908, the limit of time within which to locate land certificates issued thereunder was fixed as the 31st December, 1910. This was considered amply sufficient as it gave the claimants a period of eighteen months within which to exercise their rights of location. A very large number of the claimants complied with the requirements of the law in this regard, but in the spring of 1910 it was felt that those who had not been able to make proper selections should be given a further opportunity to do so, and with that end in view the Act 9-10 Edward VII., chapter 60, was passed, extending to the 31st December, 1911, the time within which certificates could be located. Evidently, most of the claimants realized that they had thus been liberally treated by the government, because it is found now that when the time expired on the 31st December last, 250 certificates only, out of a total of 7,258, had not been redeemed by the department in exchange for land. Of these 250 certificates 188 are held presumably by the original volunteers themselves, the remaining 62 having been transferred to substitutes prior to the 31st December last.

The object of the present Bill is to afford an opportunity, until the 31st day of December next, to the original volunteers to exercise their right of location, provided they are willing to remain on the land themselves and earn title thereto. The right of appointing a substitute, as provided under the original Act, will not apply to these volunteers, because it is considered that it would not be fair to the rest of the claimants who have made their selections within the required time, if the government were to extend more favourable treatment to those who have been dilatory in this regard.

The Act further provides that as regards the outstanding certificates, whether held by the original volunteers themselves, or by their substitutes, the government will undertake to redeem the same by a cash payment of $500 in each case. While it is quite true that in the case of scrip issued to the volunteers of the Rebellion of 1885 extensions for location were granted by parliament from time to time till the year 1908, such a policy would not appear to be in the public interest, as instead of protecting the interests of the volunteers originally concerned the action of the government has rather been to stimulate speculation in favour of persons who had no direct interest in the settlement of the public domain. It is true that the redemption of the outstanding certificates may involve an expenditure of perhaps $125,000, if all these certificates are exchanged in this way, but the lands that will thus remain vested in the government will more than compensate for the expenditure.

Mr. MACLEAN (South York). Is provision made in this Bill for the recognition of the services of the volunteers who served in repelling the Fenian Raid of 1866?

Mr. ROGERS. The Bill does not contain anything in that regard.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—MORNING SITTINGS.

Rt. hon. R. L. BORDEN (Prime Minister) moved:

That on and from Thursday, the 14th instant, and until the end of the session, the House shall meet at 11 o'clock in the morning, and that in addition to the usual intermission at 6 o'clock, p.m., there shall also be an intermission every day from one to three o'clock, p.m.; and that the House shall meet on Saturdays, on and after the 16th instant to the end of the session, subject to the same rules; and that the order of business on Saturdays shall be the same as on Thursday.

He said: I propose to amend this motion by striking out all the words after 'Three o'clock p.m.' It is found that there might be some inconvenience from taking next Saturday.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Mr. Speaker, I would suggest to my right hon. friend (Mr. Borden) that it would perhaps be inconvenient to many members if morning sittings were commenced to-morrow. Generally, there is more notice given to members so that those who leave for their homes on Saturday may make their preparations accordingly. If my right hon. friend would agree to it I would suggest that the morning sittings commence only on Monday. Before we pass the motion, if it suits the view of my right hon. friend, I would ask him if we have now before the House all the measures which are to be brought down by the government. I understand that there is, on the part of the government, a desire to prorogue at an early date and we have no desire at all on our side to interfere with that laudable intention. At the same time, it would be more satisfactory to all on both sides of the House if we knew whether the government had anything more to bring down. I understand that supplementary estimates for this year are to be brought down. I would ask my right hon. friend if there are to be supplementary estimates for the coming year ?

Mr. BORDEN. There will be supplementary estimates for the coming year and they will be brought down as soon as possible. It is for that reason I am proposing not to take Saturday for the present.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. That is the coming Saturday ?

Mr. BORDEN. Yes, we are omitting that. I would have liked to commence the forenoon sittings to-morrow, if it had been convenient. However, if my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) is really anxious that they shall not begin to-morrow, I will acquiesce in his proposal to postpone them until Monday. As far as measures are concerned, I think it is probable that one or two other measures will be introduced, but I do not think there will be anything of an important character. I hope to give my right hon. friend full information in regard to them not later than Monday. I beg to move the motion which may be amended by substituting 'Monday, the 18th' for 'Thursday, the 14th.'

Motion as amended agreed to.

INQUIRY FOR RETURN.

On the orders of the day being called.

Mr. KNOWLES. Mr. Speaker, I wish to draw the attention of the hon. Postmaster General (Mr. Pelletier) to a certain return in connection with papers, etc., that have reference to the filling of the vacant post office inspectorate at Moosejaw. The House ordered this return on the 22nd of January last, almost two months ago now. A week ago last Monday, nine days ago, I called the attention of the minister to the return and he said he would try to expedite it. There was no word of it to-day, and I asked by telephone of the minister's private secretary at the minister's office about it, and that gentleman, after consultation with the Postmaster General, said that all that was left for me to do was to bring it up in the House again. That is all I do now, but if it is not brought down very soon I shall speak about it at greater length and in a more effective manner.

An hon. MEMBER. Oh, don't.

Mr. KNOWLES. That is a promise, not a threat.

Mr. PELLETIER. The papers will be brought down as soon as they are ready.

Mr. KNOWLES. The Postmaster General was courteous enough to answer my question by saying that the papers would be brought down when they are ready; a kind of answer that, speaking from an experience of a good many years in this House, I have never yet heard given by a minister to a member.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. KNOWLES. I have a question to ask; am I out of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. PELLETIER. The hon. gentleman is not putting a question; he is commenting on an answer which has just been given.

Mr. KNOWLES. And I am not done commenting on it yet; some other day I will comment further on it. I want to ask the Postmaster General if he can give me any information as to when the papers will be ready to be brought down?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. SPEAKER. All that the rule provides is that it is the duty and the right of a minister of the Crown, or of a private member, to answer a question in his own way and according to his own judgment.

Mr. KNOWLES. I have asked the Postmaster General a question now, Mr. Speaker, and if he has no wisdom and no judgment in the matter, he need not answer.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. SPEAKER. That statement is a reflection on a member of the House and is scarcely permissible. I think the hon. member (Mr. Knowles) ought to retract.

Mr. KNOWLES. Of course I bow to your ruling, Mr. Speaker. However, I do not understand the ruling; if I did understand it I would be——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. SPEAKER. The rule is that no member can reflect upon any act of the House, nor can he attribute improper motives to any member of the House in regard to what he does.

Mr. KNOWLES. Very good then, Mr. Speaker, I would ask permission to say that I did not make a reflection. I understood you to say that a minister of the Crown might answer according to his judgment and wisdom a question asked. I asked the Postmaster General a certain question, which was not answered, and I say if he answers that in his wisdom and judgment well and good; and if he has no wisdom and judgment on it, well and good also.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member (Mr. Knowles) is not a young member of the House and he ought to know that he cannot evade the plain rules of the House in an indirect way, when he cannot do so in a direct way. It is not in accordance with the rules that an hon. member should take an indirect method of reflecting on the conduct of another member of the House.

CENSUS RETURNS FOR PROVINCE OF SASKATCHEWAN.

Mr. MARTIN (Regina). I would like to ask the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Burrell), if the census returns for Saskatchewan have yet been fully completed, and if so, has any detailed or official information been given to any one in that province?

Mr. BURRELL. I will look into that question. I would like the hon. gentleman to have put it in the form of a question on the order paper, as I do not quite gather the drift of it. We have had some correspondence, but I believe it has all been finished, and that the returns giving every detail have been compiled up to date. I am not aware of any subsequent alterations, but if the hon. gentleman will ask me for it I will get all the information from the department.

Mr. SPEAKER. I would draw the attention of the House to the fact that I have noticed during the present session a tendency to ask a great many questions which can only properly be asked, according to our rules, and the English rules, after they have been put on the notice paper. It is scarcely fair to expect that ministers of the Crown shall be prepared on the spur of the moment, without previous notice, to answer any question that may be asked. Therefore, I think it would be advisable if hon. members on both sides would observe that good rule as far as possible.

OFFICIAL REPORT OF DEBATES.

Mr. ETHIER. Mr. Speaker, I think it is only right that I should call your attention to the record contained in 'Hansard' of last night's vote. I see by the official report of the debates that the hon. member for Montreal, St. James (Mr. Lapointe), voted 'yea' on the amendment moved by the hon. member for Yamaska (Mr. Lamarche), while on the same page—5038—he is set down as being paired. In the list of pairs the name of Mr. Lapointe appears opposite that of Mr. Carrick. It is apparent that there is a mistake. I do not intend to blame anybody, but if the hon. member for Montreal, St. James, voted 'yea' he could not be paired with the hon. member for Rainy River and Thunder Bay (Mr. Carrick), so, I think, in the absence of my hon. friend from Montreal, St. James, that I should ask to have this corrected. There is another question. On the same page I see:

Amendment negatived, and Bill read the third time and passed.

For myself, I understood—and I think a great many other hon. members on this side of the House, perhaps not on the other side, also understood—that the third reading of the Bill concerning the Keewatin boundary was passed on the same division as that of the amendment. Yet it appears in the 'Hansard' that the Bill was read a third time and passed. I understood it was passed on the same division as that of the amendment. I wished to record my vote, and had I understood the contrary I would have asked that the division be taken in order that hon. members who voted on the Bill might have had an opportunity of recording their votes, and thus showing their own ideas on the question.

Mr. SPEAKER. In reference to that, I think the question was asked whether it was the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion, and I did not hear any one request that it be adopted on the same division reversed. Therefore, I declared the motion carried.

Mr. BELAND. I made that request.

Mr. SPEAKER. It may have been made but in the confusion and excitement which usually prevail after the taking of a vote sometimes the Speaker cannot hear what is said, and I presume that this has been an example of it.

Mr. BELAND. Well, it ought to be corrected, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SPEAKER. I do not think it can be corrected now, unless by moving a formal motion.

Mr. ETHIER. I hope that the record of the vote of my hon. friend from Montreal, St. James, will be corrected.

Mr. SPEAKER. I understand that the House takes no cognizance of pairs. That should be arranged between the whips and the 'Hansard' reporters.

Mr. MACLEAN (South York). The hon. gentleman (Mr. Ethier), will get satisfaction by the statement which he makes today.

CATTLE QUARANTINE AT BEAUCEVILLE.

Mr. BELAND. Mr. Speaker, I would like to inquire from the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Burrell), if he has received a copy of a resolution adopted by the Chamber of Commerce of Beauceville, in the district of Quebec, for the establishment of a quarantine for animals at that place. The reason I make the inquiry is that the letter which transmitted to me this resolution states that it was addressed to the Minister of Customs, and as it was addressed the day before yesterday perhaps the minister has not yet received the copy.

Mr. BURRELL. I cannot recall the receiving of such a letter, but I will make inquiry in the department.

Mr. BELAND. I have a copy of it, and if the minister does not receive it to-day or to-morrow I shall be very glad to send it to him.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE BUDGET.

Hon. W. T. WHITE (Minister of Finance) moved that the House go into Committee of Ways and Means. He said: Mr. Speaker, for the first time it becomes my privilege to present the annual statement of the financial affairs of the Dominion commonly known as the budget speech, and I trust, Sir, that standing as I do in the place of so many distinguished and experienced predecesors, myself a new member of the House and with but a limited experience in office, it may not de deemed unfitting if I request a reasonable degree of indulgence in the discharge of the important and responsible duty which now devolves upon me. And, at the outset, I desire to congratulate the House and the country upon the abundant prosperity, which, under Providence, this great Dominion continues to enjoy in ever-increasing measure. In these congratulations, I am sure that all the members of this House, irrespective of party affiliations, will heartily join as loyal and patriotic Canadians rejoicing in the welfare of our common country. Under the circumstances of the present session, it is necessary in considering the finances of the Dominion, to cover three periods, namely, the fiscal year 1910-11, the fiscal year 1911-12 and the fiscal year 1912-13. As the accounts for the year 1910-11 were not finally closed when the budget speech of 1911 was delivered by my predecessor on April 4 last, an estimate of the result was placed before the House. Since then the accounts have been completed and issued and have been made public for some time, so that a review need not be of an extensive character. The fiscal year 1911-12 nominally closes on the 31st of March, but an extension of at least a month is necessary to complete the payments for the services of that year. It will be some time after that before the accounts are finally closed, and the ultimate outcome is a matter of estimate, based upon experience and a knowledge of the characteristics of the various services for the period yet to elapse. The estimates for the fiscal year 1912-13 have been placed before the House and supplementary estimates have yet to be brought down. It will be obvious that with regard to a year not yet begun there can be no such reasonable certainty of approximate calculation as exists in the case of the current year. Reviewing now more particularly the several periods under consideration, and beginning with the year 1910-11, it will be found that the general financial results for that year did not materially differ from the anticipations of the last budget speech. Dealing, in the first place with what is known as Consolidated Fund, or what might be regarded as the ordinary revenue and ordinary expenditure of the country, it will be found that the actual revenue for 1910-11 amounted to $177,780,409.78 against an estimate of $117,500,000 and the expenditure to $87,774,198.32 against an estimate of $87,000,500. The follcwing tabulated statement shows the result :

REVENUE AND EXPENDITURE—CONSOLIDATED FUND, 1910-11.

	Actual.	Estimated.	Greater than Estimated.	Less than Estimated.
Revenue	$117,780,409 78	$117,500,000	$280,409 78
Expenditure	87,774,198 32	87,000,000	774,198 32
Surplus	30,006,211 46	30,500,000	.....	$493,788 54

I should like to point out to the House that the revenue for the year 1910-11 was a record figure, and it may assist us to some extent to appreciate the increase in the revenue in recent years to say that this revenue of $117,780,409.78 is more than double the revenue received in 1901-02.

The difference between the ordinary revenue and ordinary expenditure—$30,006,211.46 was available for what have been known as Capital and Special charges.

The expenditure of $87,774,198.32 is more than double that of the year 1899-1900. The sources from which the revenue of the year was derived and the amount from each respectively, and their comparison with the preceding year were as follows :

	1909-10.	1910-11.	Increase.
Customs	$ 60,156,133 98	$ 72,965,394 46	$12,809,260 48
Excise	15,253,352 65	16,869,837 36	1,616,484 71
Post Office	7,958,547 72	9,146,952 47	1,188,404 75
Railways	9,647,550 69	10,249,391 94	601,841 25
Miscellaneous	8,488,125 89	8,548,833 55	60,707 66
Total	$101,503,710 93	$117,780,409 78	$16,276,698 85

It will appear from this that of the total consolidated revenue fund 62 per cent was derived from customs and 14 per cent from excise, that is to say these two services accounted for over three-fourths of the revenue. In the case of customs the increase over the previous year was at the rate of over 21½ per cent. Excise and post-office revenue increased at the rate of 10½ per cent and 15 per cent respectively. On the total revenue the rate of increase was 16 per cent. The increase in the customs revenue of course arose from the increased importations for the year.

The total imports entered for consumption in 1910-11 were $461,951,318. The amount of increase over the previous year was $86,118,302. The average rate of duty on these imports, both dutiable and free, was 16·145 per cent. The average rate of duty on dutiable goods entered for consumption in 1910-11 was 25·797 per cent. I may say that very little change has taken place in these average rates in recent years.

The revenues from excise are mainly derived from spirits, tobacco and malt. In the case of each of these there was an appreciable increase over the revenues derived in 1909-10. Although the total consumption has increased to some extent it does not appear that the per capita consumption has increased materially.

With regard to post-office and railways the revenue shows a substantial increase due, to the general increase in business throughout the country.

We turn now to the expenditure for the year. On account of consolidated fund it reached the sum of $87,774,198.32. That was an increase of $8,362,451.20 over the expenditure for the previous fiscal year. This is a fairly large increase but I think it only fair to say that in 1910-11 there were included in consolidated fund expenditure certain items which in preceding years had been made a charge against capital. These items were: militia, $1,372,405.09; Dominion lands, $976,024.94. To these may be added expenditure upon naval service, which was of a new character, and amounted to $1,790,017.16. In addition to the expenditures which I have mentioned and which are called consolidated fund expenditures, that is the ordinary running expenditures of the country, there were very large and substantial outlays charged to capital and special accounts. In detail these were as follows:

National Transcontinental Ry. ..	$23,487,986 19
Other railways, canals and public works..	7,364,977 19
Railway subsidies..	1,284,892 04
Bounties..	1,597,663 48
Various miscellaneous items, including cost of loans..	1,286,911 39
Total..	$35,022,430 29

I do not propose to criticise any of these amounts that have been charged to special account, but I wish to make the observation—and I am glad to learn that my predecessor was finally led to come to the same conclusion—that bounties in my judgment should have been charged to consolidated fund expenditure.

There is another item to which exception might be taken, but I do not take exception to it now because, to be frank, I am not quite clear in my own mind with regard to it, that is the item of railway subsidies. I am aware that not only with the late government, but with preceding governments, there has been a practice of charging to special accounts, in the nature of capital accounts, railway subsidies, I suppose upon the theory that these subsidies are a benefit to railways and railways benefit the country for years to come, and that consequently railway subsidies might be looked upon as, in a sense, a contribution to what might be deemed national assets. There is very much to be said for that view and there is a clear distinction not only in private but in company and, I believe, in national finance between capital expenditure and ordinary expenditure. I believe that sometimes that has been disputed, but I think it can hardly be seriously disputed. In national finance we have to expend very large sums of money upon great undertakings, such as government railways, canals and terminals, public buildings of a costly character for national use which may be truly designated and described as permanent assets, and which will remain for the benefit of the nation practically for all time, or at all events for a great number of years. Now it would seem to me very unreasonable that out of the revenues for the year we should expect to meet the expenditures upon national undertakings such as I have described. and, therefore, so far as my judgment goes it is proper that there should be a distinction observed between capital expenditure and consolidated fund expenditure. That distinction has been observed, I think, not only by the late government, but by practically every government since confederation. Coming back to the fiscal year under consideration it will be necessary in order to arrive at the net result of its operations to set off against the capital and special expenditures which I have mentioned amounting to $35,022,430.29, the excess of revenue over running expenses, commonly called surplus, amounting as above stated to $30,006,211.46, also the expenditure on account of the investments for sinking funds which represents an outlay for the purchase of securities to be retained practically in our own hands. The expenditures for sinking fund are made from the consolidated fund account, and amount to the sum of $1,203,416.40. Then there were sundry refunds to the amount of $39,296.73, making a total of $31,248,924.59. Now deducting this amount from the total capital and special expenditures, which I have given of $35,022,430.29, it will be found that the net debt of the Dominion was increased as the result of the year's operations, that is to say the operations of the year 1910-11, by the sum of $3,773,505.70. I must say that I regard that from the financial standpoint as a satisfactory condition: it shows how the very large capital and special expenditures were substantially met by the revenues of the year. The increase of debt, namely, $3,773,505.70 is certainly not large. It may be properly described, I think, as comparatively small. I come now to the revenues for the year 1911-12. Nominally the year will end on the 31st March current, but under the provisions of the law a period of three months is allowed for finally closing up the year's business, which period, I understand, has been gradually cut down in practice to about a month, so that it will be over two months before the books are finally closed. I will, however, endeavour to give an estimate, or to indicate my anticipations, with regard to the outcome of the year. Up to the end of February we received by way of revenue the sum of $120,645,616.85. To this must be added the revenues of the current month, and also the revenues attributable to the current year, which will be received after the 31st March and during the period which I have mentioned, because it takes some time to finally close the accounts in a country of such large distances as we have. Now basing my estimate upon what was received for the corresponding period of last year, with a proportionate increase in keeping with the increases of the past few months, I anticipate that for the current fiscal year, when the books are finally closed, the revenue will reach a total of $136,000,000.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds). I am very glad indeed to hear hon. gentlemen on both sides express their appreciation of this estimate of $136,000,000. If the estimate is correct, and I believe it will be found to be substantially so, it is a matter of congratulation to both sides of this House and to the public, that the abounding revenues of this country have kept up as they have. As I say, we must drop party affiliations in connection with the budget and rejoice in the welfare of our common country. Up to the end of February 1912, there has been an expenditure of $77,145,824.97, an increase of $6,557,953.20 over the corresponding expenditure at the end of February of last year. The supplementary estimates have been laid to-day on the table of the House, and taking them into account, and the requirements for the balance of the fiscal year, I think it will be found when the books are closed that the payments on account of the consolidated fund will approximate the sum of $97,000,000. The estimated revenue for the current year, with which I am now dealing, being $136,000,000, there will therefore be a surplus of consolidated fund revenue over consolidated fund expendture of $39,000,000 available for capital and special outlays; I am sure I can congratulate both the House and the country upon what is undoubtedly a record year for the Dominion. I do not know how to quite share that congratulation up, but as my right hon. friend (Mr. Borden) came into power on the 6th of October, and my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition was in power prior to that date, there is probably glory enough to go round, and it would be the judgment of Solomon that each be entitled to one-half, at all events to a part of the credit for the return which I am now presenting to the House.

Mr. BELAND. Let us say one-tenth.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds). Of course we must not forget that we must give due credit to Providence, to our great natural resources, to the rich fertility of this wonderful country, to our vast stretches of agricultural land, to our mines, our forests and our fisheries, and we must not overlook the people of this country and their character and energy, and enterprise and ability. Having done that, whatever glory may be left, whatever credit may be attributable in any measure to legislative agency, let us apportion, as I have suggested, let us divide it up half and half. The capital outlay for 1911-12 have been extensive on account of the large undertakings now being carried on. It is estimated that the capital and special outlays for the Transcontinental railway for the different railways, canals, and public works, for railway subsidies and for the various other items in this category will total $34,000,000.

To this must be added whatever is paid to the credit of the Receiver General on trust account by way of implementing in cash the guarantees under the terms of the National Transcontinental Railway Act and the Act of this session in this regard. Assuming that amount to be in round figures $5,000,000, the total will be increased to $39,000,000.

Now let me say with regard to this large amount of $5,000,000 which, as I say, will be paid into the credit of the Receiver

General in trust, that I considered very carefully whether we would be justified in deducting that from the consolidated revenue fund, that is to say, in paying it out from the running expenses of the year as distinguished from capital and special charges, and I came to the conclusion that it would not be quite fair to do so. True, it is in the nature of a loss, a loss that the country must pay; on the other hand, it may be regarded as analogous in some measure to a railway subsidy; and as I desire to be absolutely fair in the presentation of the budget, I came to the conclusion that it would be better to treat the $5,000,000 as a special account, as if it were analogous, so to speak, to a railway subsidy. Therefore, I add the $5,000,000 which will be paid to the credit of the Receiver General in trust, to the $34,000,000 of capital and special expenditure which I have mentioned, and I reach a total of $39,000,000. Now, taking the revenue of the year, which I have mentioned, and taking this capital and special expenditure of $39,000,000 into consideration, on this basis the net outcome of the year would be a reduction of the debt by $1,150,000, on the following computation:

Revenue		$136,000,000
Add sinking fund		1,150,000
		$137,150,000
Consolidated Fund expenditure	$97,000,000
Capital and special expenditure	39,000,000
		136,000,000
Reduction of debt		$ 1,150,000

Now, Mr. Speaker, what does this mean? It means that out of the abounding revenues of this country, we shall provide for the ordinary current expenditures of the Dominion, for all those large capital outlays which I have mentioned, and which this growing country has required during the year for services of every kind, and at the same time that we shall be able to make a reduction of the public debt to the extent of $1,150,000. That means, we have more than paid our way, and our surplus has been such that all capital and special charges have been extinguished. Now I am aware that exception may be taken to a statement of that kind. It may be said that the surplus is too large, that it is not proper that we should be able to pay off all the current expenses of the year, and at the same time take care of such a large capital expenditure as has been made during the past year. Personally I am in favour of a substantial surplus, and I give the House my reasons.

In the first place, we are not certain that we shall always have the present prosperity. I trust we shall, and every hon. gentleman in the House trusts we shall; and I see no reason whatever to suppose that there will be any change in the immediate future, or even for some years ahead, so far as I can foresee. I see no reason for believing that the present prosperity will not continue. But at the same time there is always the possibility, and, therefore, I think it well that the country should have such a revenue in excess of the current expenditure that we may take care to some extent, and even in large measure, of the capital expenditures which are necessary in the constructive period of a country such as this. Now if we had to borrow for all such capital expenditures the national debt of this country would be greatly increased, and if the national debt were greatly increased it would follow, it seems to me, that our national credit might be to some extent impaired. None of us, I am sure, would like to see that. Not only so, but if there should come, by any chance, in the distant future an adverse period, when times are not as prosperous as they are at present, it would be well indeed if we should have the credit of the country at the highest possible standard in order that we then might be able to borrow. Because I believe in national finance, that we should provide for capital expenditures in times not only of prosperity, but in times that are not prosperous, when money is cheap, when great national undertakings may be carried on by the use of the credit of the country, because that helps us to tide over a period of depression; and if the money is widely expended you have national assets, you have the national undertakings from the money obtained upon the strength of the credit.

Now coming to the fiscal year 1912-13, which begins on the 1st day of April next, at this date, of course, it is impossible to do more than state in general terms the prospects as to the revenues on the one hand and the expenditures on the other. With regard to the former, there appears to be every hope that during the fiscal year 1912-13 they will show an appreciable advance over the estimated amount of $136,000,000, for the current fiscal year. As to the expenditures, the main estimates for 1912-13 have been before the House for some time. They amount to $149,789,677.68, composed of $104,119,304.86 for consolidated fund service and $44,870,372.82 for capital outlay.

These expenditures will be increased, of course, by the supplementary estimates to be brought down. I expect to bring these down probably in the course of a couple of weeks. It is possible also, on the experience of the past, that further supplementary estimates may be brought down later in the year when parliament again meets, but, of course, I have no certainty as to that. Between the total estimates for all services for 1912-13, therefore, and the anticipated revenue of the same year, there would be an appreciable, even a large, deficiency to be provided for. But it must be borne in mind there is a difference between estimated and actual expenditure. That is well illustrated in the case of the last fiscal year. Experience shows that of the total amount estimated, very considerable sums lapse. That is the experience of every year. In some years, of course there are more lapses than in others; variation takes place according to the closeness of the estimates and the ability to expend in the respective cases. For example, take the year 1911-12. The estimates already voted amount to $156,079,538.73. These were the estimates of the late government partially adopted by this government last fall. If we add the supplementary estimates which I have to-day laid on the table amounting to $2,600,000, we find the total—the appropriations for 1911-12—to amount to $158,679,538.73. The anticipated expenditure for consolidated fund services and all capital and special outlays, is as I estimated, $131,000,000, showing the very large amount of upwards of $27,000,000 which will remain unexpended, and will lapse. Therefore, notwithstanding that the total amount of the main estimates for 1912-13 is $149,789,688.68—which, I may say, is less by $8,000,000 than the total appropriation for the present fiscal year and which we shall have to supplement by estimates this session and by further estimates, as I have said, in the coming fall—I feel confident that at the end of the present fiscal year the revenues of the country will have proven sufficient to meet not only the current expenditures, but to provide at least a part, and, I believe, a substantial part of that class of expenditures which have been known as capital or special expenditures and for which, so far as the capital expenditures at least are concerned, the government would be justified in borrowing.

It will be observed in connection with the estimates for the coming fiscal year that very liberal expenditures have been provided for. We are in the growing period of the nation and the government must do its part. The increase of our transportation facilities, improvements of and extensions to our canal and railway systems, the deepening of our harbours and waterways, the continuation of adequate terminals at our great ports—all these with other necessary minor public works are the proper subject of public expenditure; and I believe that for these purposes generous appropriations will be approved by the people of Canada. The greatest problem we have to-day, in my judgment, is the problem of transportation—to give our people access to the markets of the world. We have to-day a congested situation in the west. There was a late harvest. The railways have been overtaxed. Hon. gentlemen representing the west and indeed hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House are anxious that we should provide more railway accommodation for the west, more spouts—to use a common expression—for the western traffic. The government is committed to the project of building the Hudson Bay railway. The Canadian Northern Railway Company is extending its transcontinental line to Vancouver. The Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company, part of the National Transcontinental system, is pushing on to Prince Rupert. In time, we shall have the opening of the Panama canal. Questions will arise as to moving the wheat to the west and providing terminal facilities for that traffic. Great capital expenditures will be required to provide facilities both on the Atlantic and on the Pacific. We must provide adequate expenditures for all these purposes. And if, as I have said, the money is expended wisely and economically, I believe that any government of Canada at this stage of the country's development will have the hearty support of the people in making those expenditures.

Now, I have dealt with the three fiscal years with which it was necessary I should deal in presenting to the House the financial affairs of the Dominion. I come now to the question of the Dominion debt. The net debt of Canada, as at 31st of March, 1911, was $340,042,052.03. This figure is arrived at by taking the gross debt which amounts to $474,941,487.42 and deducting therefrom the assets amounting to $134,899,435.39. These assets are as follows:

Sinking funds	$ 11,196,825 90
Sundry investments	27,501,851 20
Province accounts	2,296,429 12
Miscellaneous and banking accounts	16,940,258 65

The estimated population of Canada on the 31st March, 1911, as revised by the census office was 7,158,000, that the debt per head at that date amounted to $47.51.

The sinking funds in this list represent, of course, purchases made of our own securities in the market in connection with the sinking fund attached to the several loans. They are held by trustees for the Dominion. Personally, I believe not only in connection with municipal or provincial finance, but also in connection with national finance, that a sinking fund should be attached to every loan. I know it may be said that the credit of the Dominion is high, the resources of the Dominion are so great, that we do not need a sinking fund. But my judgment, is that it would be an unwise policy not to attach a sinking fund to every loan. I believe my predecessor took the same view—I am not quite certain as to that—but if he did, I am glad to agree with him; for a sinking fund puts in process the liquidation, to a certain extent at all events, of every loan; the financial position is improving continually by reason of the sinking fund.

Just a word as to our specie reserve. The House will observe from this statement that on the 31st March, 1911, we held the large sum of $74,472,977.17 in gold. That gold is held at the several offices of the Receiver General throughout Canada. In connection with our savings bank and our Post Office savings department, we are obliged by law to keep a reserve of 10 per cent. In connection with the note circulation of the Dominion—that is Dominion ones, twos, fours, and soon to be, five dollar bills and notes of the larger denominations we require by our legislation to keep gold reserves, not to the entire amount, however, outstanding, but for the first thirty million dollars of note circulation we require to keep 25 per cent in gold or in securities of the Dominion guaranteed as to principal and interest by the Imperial government. As a matter of fact that 25 per cent is held in gold. So that, we have $22,500,000 of free money for which there is as security the credit of the Dominion. But against the $7,500,000 which is not free money, which forms part of the $30,000,000 and is all the outstanding circulation in excess of the $30,000,000, we hold dollar for dollar in gold. The basis, therefore, substantially, of the Dominion note circulation is gold and in so far as the banks of Canada hold Dominion notes as part of their assets, the basis is also gold. It is just as if they had the gold instead of the Dominion notes. Under the Bank Act, we are required to keep at the several offices of the Receiver General notes for gold and gold for notes. The process is continually going on of exchanging gold which we receive from the banks for notes going out into circulation among the public and for what are known as 'legals' as between the banks in making their clearances. That process is going on all the time and the only reason I have adverted to it is not because I am not aware that most of the members of the House are entirely familiar with the facts, but that some may not have turned their minds upon it, may not have obtained the information, and they may be interested to know that the basis of our calculation, in so far as the Dominion is concerned, is not to its credit, although its credit is high, but substantially gold.

Now, I come to the question of loans. It is probably within the knowledge of most members of the House that for some years past Canada has been passing through a period in which her loans, contracted at earlier dates, have been maturing and provision has had to be made from time to time for their renewal, or to meet the maturities. Under normal conditions this would not be a difficult task for a country with the high standing and credit in the markets of the world of Canada. A loan to which I desire briefly to refer was placed upon the market by my predecessor in November, 1908. The year 1908, succeeding as it did, the very trying year of 1907, was, I understand, a rather difficult year in which to finance, and instead of issuing the standard security of the Dominion, my predecessor, in November 1908, when a loan fell due issued, in order to meet this and some other obligations, a short date loan of £5,000,000. The rate of interest was 3¾ per cent. It was effected in June, 1908, and was repayable on the 1st of May, 1912. In connection with that loan, an offer was made to the holders of conversion into 3 per cent inscribed stock due in 1938 and a portion amounting to £120,850 was so converted. A portion held in the sinking fund of another loan was cancelled and there remains a total of £4,681,870 12s. 4d., to be provided for on the 1st of May. For some time past, or ever since last fall, although it is usual to make provision not more than two or three months beforehand, we have been closely watching the London money market, expecting a favourable opportunity of making a flotation. The conditions at the end of 1911 were decidedly adverse. International complications were thought to be threatening last fall, and in consequence, there began a withdrawal of gold. In order to meet the situation, the Bank of England, following the practice adopted in cases of the kind, advanced the bank rate to 4 per cent. At the close of the year we had the Bank of England rate at 4 per cent, while the European situation was anything but reassuring. The market improved somewhat for a portion of the year, but the outlook was still unfavourable. We were in constant touch with our financial agents, the Bank of Montreal, and as soon as the Bank of England rate dropped, as it did recently to 3½ per cent, and especially in view of the fact that labour conditions looked rather threatening, we decided to make an issue for the purpose of refunding and taking up that £5,000,000 short loan, to which I have referred, upon maturity. Accordingly, we issued on the 24th of February last upon the London market, a prospectus. We had underwritten this loan at 98, that also being the issue price. I cannot help but congratulate the government and the country, especially in view of recent occurences and their probable effect, at all events, upon the immediate future, that wewere able to obtain under such unfavourable conditions such a good price, as 98 for our 3½ per cent standard security. This security, as I have indicated to the House, is what we call the 1930-50 security; that is, it matures in 1950, with the privilege reserved to the government to redeem it at any time after 1930.

Shortly after the loan had been underwritten and offered to the public, the strike of the miners broke out in Great Britain, and that strike, is still hanging gloomily over the entire economic and financial situation. My own opinion is (it is only an opinion) that it must be speedily adjusted, but nevertheless it will be some time before its effects disappear, so far as the financial world is concerned. Therefore, I feel particularly fortunate—although I claim no merit except in acting promptly upon the advice of our fiscal agents—I feel that we are particularly fortunate in having placed our loan at the time we did. So far as the market reception of the loan is concerned, the public took thirty-five per cent, and sixty-five per cent remained in the hands of the underwriters. Now, it is possible to draw an altogether improper conclusion from the amount of securities which are left in the hands of the underwriters. Of late years there has rather grown up a habit in Great Britain on the part of the public, of waiting, in some cases, at all events, until after the public issue, in the hope that a comparatively large amount may be left in the hands of the underwriters and with the expectation in consequence of obtaining the securities offered at a somewhat lower rate. I believe, in connection with the last six million pounds sterling loan of the Dominion (a very large loan issued some two or three years ago) forty-three per cent was taken by the public and the balance left with the underwriters, although shortly afterwards this security went to a premium. In this case, I believe our loan is at a slight discount to-day, which means, of course, that the price, having regard to conditions, was all that we could have hoped to obtain.

Mr. NESBITT. Will the minister state whether that 98 was net or not?

Mr. WHITE (Leeds). 98 was the price at which the securities were underwritten and offered to the public. From that 98 must be deducted, as has been the case in connection with all our loans, the expenses of underwriting and all the other expenses connected with the issue which will, without doubt, be considerable. The question is often raised as to whether loans should be underwritten at all, and I have heard the query on more than one occasion as to whether undue commissions are not paid in connection with underwriting. Let me say to the House, as most hon. members know, underwriting is simply insurance. It is absolutely necessary that loans should be met when they become due, and as we must have the money for this maturity on May 1st, if we had to rely only on public subscription for this loan we could never be certain that the money would be available at that date. No man, I do not care who he is, can foretell the market. One man's opinion may be a little more valuable than that of another. but nobody can foretell whether the public will or will not take an issue of securities. Not only that, but conditions may intervene which may change the whole financial situation almost over night, and have a profound bearing upon the question of whether or not a loan will be taken by the public.

Mr. NESBITT. I do not at all question the action of the Finance Minister in that respect.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds). I am very glad to have the assurance of my hon. friend on that point. My own view is that underwriting—and I am glad my hon. friend (Mr. Nesbitt), agrees—is absolutely necessary in order that the money will be available at the time it is required. Now, it is no doubt within the knowledge and observation of the House, that high grade, low interest bearing securities are not in the favour they once were. A few years ago only, the standard security of the Dominion was a three per cent security, but now it is a three and a half per cent security. Hon. gentlemen know what a great fall has taken place in the price of English consols, which are certainly among the best, if not the very best, securities in the world. What has been the cause? Is it that the credit of Great Britain is less high than it was; is it that the credit of the Dominion of Canada is less high than it was a few years ago? What is the cause for the increase in interest which nations must now pay in order to obtain the money required by them? My own opinion is that good times have a great deal to do with it.

Mr. MACLEAN (South York). What about bonused stock?

Mr. WHITE (Leeds). We will come to that in a minute. Good times, the demand for money all over the world, the more general investment in industrial enterprises; these are the chief factors, I believe, in the increase in the rate of interest and in the fall that has taken place in the price of high-grade low interest bearing securities. Then, in addition to that, there is the matter referred to by my hon. friend from South York (Mr. Maclean), there are the opportunities for investment in many other fields, and notably, let us say, tramway companies, railway companies, electrical companies of various kinds, the bonds of which seem to, and as a matter of fact do, give first-class security at a higher rate of interest than can be obtained by investment in municipal, provincial, or government securities, while, at the same time, they afford a greater prospect for appreciation. I think too, that with the increase of wealth, people not only desire to obtain a higher rate of interest, but they are willing to take a little more risk. At all events, many factors enter into the situation; the demand for money, investment in railway and tramway and electrical companies, and other industrial companies; all these various undertakings and enterprises have entered into competition with the high-class securities of the world, and the result is that these high-class securities have fallen to a certain extent in price.

I shall deal now with one other matter, which has been frequently talked about, and which it is in the interest of the Dominion, should be discussed. It has been pointed out that the guaranteed securities; the securities of railway companies guaranteed by the Dominion, do not stand at as high a figure on the London market as they should, having regard to the price at which the Dominion's own securities stand. As I pointed out recently to the House, a guaranteed security never sells at quite as high a rate as a security which is a direct liability of the guarantor, and, notwithstanding that the guarantee of the Dominion in connection with these securities is unconditional and absolute, it cannot be expected that they will sell at as high a price as the securities of the Dominion which constitute a direct obligation. In addition to that the Dominion securities are trustee investments, and the securities of a railway company guaranteed by the Dominion are not trustee investments. The result is that the securities of the Dominion are in demand by trustees, who control immense sums of money in the old world, whereas the same conditions do not apply with regard to the loans of railway companies guaranteed by the Dominion.

Mr. MACLEAN (South York). What is about the net difference in price?

Mr. WHITE (Leeds). Take, for example, the case of the Grand Trunk Pacific, because it was with special regard to the Grand Trunk Pacific that I brought the matter to the attention of the House. The Grand Trunk Pacific securities are 3 per cents, and they are selling at, I think, from 80 to 82. That of course seems a very large discount from par. Our own securities which we have sold on the market at 98 are 3½ per cents. In order to make the comparison, therefore, we must put the Grand Trunk Pacifics on a 3½ per cent basis. For my own satisfaction, I had this calculation worked out, and I found that a rate of 82 on a 3 per cent security 50 years maturity, is about the equivalent of 94 on a 3½ per cent basis.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax). What is the rate of the Canadian Northern Ontario loan?

Mr. WHITE (Leeds). The Canadian Northern Ontario guaranteed by the Dominion, was issued at 93 on the London market, at a time when the Canadian Northern Alberta, which was guaranteed by the Dominion government, was quoted at 93½ to 94½, and there was in that amount, I should think, about one point of accrued interest so that the issue of Canadian Northern Ontario guaranteed by the Dominion was just about on a parity with the Canadian Northern Alberta guaranteed by the Dominion. If you have a quotation on the London market, we will say, of 93 or 94, for a guaranteed security, and if you have a quotation of, we will say, 100 for a Dominion security, if you offer to the public any considerable amount such as £5,000,000 or £7,000,000, you must reduce from the nominal quotation one or two points, that is obvious. With a nominal quotation at par, we will say 100 or 100½ or 101, there is usually a narrow market, but when you come to put on a large amount offered to the public you must reduce that quotation by one or two points. The Canadian Northern Ontario was put on to the public at about 93 and having regard to the quotation of the Canadian Northern Alberta guaranteed by the Dominion at the time, it seems to me that the figure, so far as the offer was concerned, was fair and reasonable.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax). Was the government guarantee of the Canadian Northern Ontario railway issue all made at one and the same time, that is the whole $35,000,000?

Mr. WHITE (Leeds). Under the legislation of last year, the securities of the Canadian Northern Ontario Railway Company for the line of railway between Port Arthur and Montreal a total of 1,016 miles, securities to the amount of £7,000,000 were authorized to be issued by the railway company bearing the guarantee of the Dominion government. The legislation provided for the execution of a trust mortgage in the usual form providing for the issue of the securities. It is usual in connection with a trust mortgage such as that to provide that the securities may be sold and the money paid in to the credit of the Receiver General of Canada to be paid out from time to time as progress certificates are presented, approved of the Railway Department for the purpose of meeting the expenditures on the line. Therefore, so far as the legislation is concerned, the Dominion's guarantee attached to the entire issue of £7,000,000.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax). My question was whether the government were justified in attaching their guarantee to the whole issue at one time and giving that large amount to the public. There was possibly a danger that that $35,000,000 issue of bonds of one railway company guaranteed by Canada might hurt the general credit of the country for general purposes. I want to know if the minister does not think this should be done at different times?

Mr. WHITE (Leeds). My hon. friend does not quite understand the situation. The £7,000,000 bonds guaranteed loan of the Canadian Northern Ontario Railway Company was not placed upon the market by the Canadian Northern Railway Company. It was sold to a London house for a net figure of 90¾. I need not now delay to show that if the amount of commission which usually runs from 2 per cent to 2½ per cent is added to the 90¾ an issue price of 93 is reached.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax). I am not objecting to the amount realized. I think I am correct in stating that under the statute authorizing this guarantee, authority was given to the Minister of Finance to use his discretion as to whether or not he should attach the guarantee for the whole amount at one time or to different amounts at different times. There was, of course, a possibility of danger to other Canadian borrowers, in placing the whole amount on the market at one time.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds). My hon. friend, I think, has not read the trust mortgage as carefully as he should have done. If he will read the trust mortgage he will find, that the securities belong to the railway company, and are to be sold in such amounts at such a premium or at such a discount and to such persons as the railway company may determine, subject only to the approval of the minister or the government. Bear in mind that these are the securities of the Canadian Northern Ontario Railway Company and that the Dominion is guaranteed as against its guarantee also of the Canadian Northern Railway Company which is a different corporation. Now what is the position? Is it in the interest of the Canadian Northern Ontario Railway Company, to get the highest possible figure for their securities; the direct liability of the Canadian Northern Railway Company and the contingent liability is the liability of the Dominion.

Now, the negotiation for the sale of the securities is not with the Finance Minister but with the railway company, and without going into all the papers which have been asked for by my hon friend, and which will be brought down, let me say that the Canadian Northern Ontario Railway Company, desirous of having funds in hand to carry out without delay this great enterprise so much needed, especially by the west, of constructing a through line of 1,016 miles from Point Arthur to Montreal, in view of the international situation existing last fall which I have mentioned, and in view of the fact that they have borrowed large sums for construction already entered upon and other expenditures to a large amount in connection therewith, came to the conclusion that it was in their interest, in order to ensure that the money would be available for the construction of the line, to accept the offer which was made to them by a prominent and strong house in Great Britain to purchase the entire £7,000,000 of their securities guaranteed by the government, with payments to come in over a period of two years as they might be required for the construction of the line. Now, my hon. friend (Mr. Maclean) has called attention to the large amounts; let me point this out to him: If he had looked at the legislation under which this trust mortgage was executed he would have ascertained that the rate of issue is about $35,000 per mile. Now, what does that mean? It means a very expensive, a very costly, construction. It means an expensive right of way, and expensive construction along the north shore. The Dominion guarantee on the prairie section of the Grand Trunk Pacific is $13,000 per mile.

Mr. NESBITT. I am not objecting to that.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds). What I want to point out to my hon. friend is this: That for every mile of Canadian Northern Ontario railway line of construction, almost three times the amount would be required, as far as the government's guarantee securities are secured, as for one mile of the prairie section of the Grand Trunk Pacific. Now, the Canadian Northern Ontario Railway Company estimate that this year probably in the next few months, they will spend from $15,000,000 to $20,000,000 upon this line, working at it at various points acquiring their right of way, and constructing their line. Let me ask my hon. friend if the judgment of the president of that company in selling his securities at the time he did has not been abundantly justified in view of the economic and financial situation as we see it in Great Britain to-day? It is of the utmost importance to this country that this line should be built. If that issue had not been made, if these securities had not been sold, the Canadian Northern Ontario Railway Company would have been delayed and hampered in its operations in building its line of 1,016 miles from Port Arthur to Montreal. It is in the interest not only of the province of Ontario, but of the Dominion of Canada as a whole, west and east, that this line should be built without any delay whatsoever. As a result of the sale of the securities by the president of the Canadian Northern Railway Company at the figure mentioned and on the terms which I have indicated, the money for the construction of this line is available from month to month as construction proceeds so that there will be no delay whatsoever; and I am sure from information in my office, which I am sure will satisfy my hon. friend, this line will in all probability be completed some time next year at the latest

Mr. LALOR. Does the government retain any control in the amount actually expended per mile?

Mr. WHITE (Leeds). Let me explain that to my hon. friend. A contract is entered into for a certain standard of construction in connection with these lines, and when the guaranteed securities are sold, the money is paid into the credit of the Receiver General with certain banks. As construction proceeds, accounts are paid out not exceeding $35,000 per mile, in this particular case from those proceeds upon certificates of expenditure approved by the Railway Department, through its engineers, so that in that sense the government does retain control. In other words it retains control of the funds until satisfied that the money has been expended for the purposes for which it was authorized.

I have gone quite a distance afield, and I must return to the question of our loans. On 1st October next there falls due a sum of £1,235,000 of the 4 per cent loan issued in December, 1907, for which care will be taken to provide on the date of maturity. It may be of interest to this House to know that only two loans will then remain to be provided for until 1930, or during the next 18 years. Of these two loans, one is a 4 per cent loan of 1878, guaranteed by the imperial government for £1,700,000, and a 3¾ per cent loan of 1914-19, so called, of £6,000,000. The former is due on the 1st October, 1913, and the latter between 1914 and 1919, on the government giving three month's notice. I have thus indicated to the House the financial position of the Dominion so far as the maturing of loans is concerned and I must say it appears to me, as I am sure it does to the House, having regard to these maturities, to be satisfactory.

Now I come to another matter in which I bespeak the attention of the House as it deals with the Transcontinental railway, or at least the eastern division of that line, and I have thought it well when dealing with the liabilities of the Dominion and our future maturities, to advert briefly to this portion of the Transcontinental which is our chief national undertaking at the present time. The heavy cost of the eastern section of that railway, so greatly in excess of the estimate of the late government might prove, and I know it has proved to a certain extent, somewhat disturbing to the House and to the public. Up to the 31st March, 1911, there had been expended in cash upon this undertaking the sum of $95,422,533.44. For the current year it is estimated that the outlay will amount to about $22,500,000, so that at the end of the present fiscal year the Dominion will have expended nearly $118,000,000. Now, in view of this large outlay, and I think probably that at least $100,000,000 additional will be expended before completion, I have thought it advisable in the financial interest of the Dominion to present a statement of capital and special expenditures from 1904 onward, that being the first year of the expenditure on Transcontinental railway account, dividing them into outlays on the railway on the one hand and on the other the capital and special outlays for other purposes. Against these I have set the increase and decrease of debt for the respective years, and from the statement it will be found that from the year 1904 to the 31st March, 1911, Canada expended $95,422,533.44 on National Transcontinental railway account. On other capital and special expenditures the outlay amounted to $123,362,714.56, or a total capital and special expenditure of $218,785,248. I am giving this statement not from any partisan standpoint, but in the interest of the Dominion, because I do not desire that there should be any disturbance or misgiving with regard to the very large amount of capital expended upon this road.

I have said that during these years, the total capital and special expenditure was $218,785,248. During that period the increase of debt was $78,435,063.16. If to these figures we add the estimated results of the operations of the year 1911-12, we have the following:

Estimated outlay for Transcontinental Railway to 31st March, 1912	$117,922,533 44
Other capital and special expenditures	134,862,714 56
Total estimated expenditure	$252,785,248 00
Total estimated increased debt during the period from 1904 to 31st March, 1912	$ 77,285,063 16

I desire to say, both to those of our own Dominion, and to those in Great Britain, if there be any, who have felt misgivings as to the very large amount of estimated expenditure upon the eastern section of the National Transcontinental and the burden entailed upon the country in consequence, that I think it will be reassuring, completely reassuring, to know that, great as the cost has been, and will be, a large proportion of that cost for the past, has been and for the future, (if conditions continue as I believe may very well be expected), will be liquidated from the surpluses of consolidated revenue account and will not become a charge upon the future. I think we are all glad that we are able to make that statement. The following is the summary of the capital and special expenditure, to which I have referred:

I come now to the consideration of the trade of the Dominion. And I am sorry that I have occupied so long a time in this speech. But I must leave a part of the blame at least, with my hon. friend, the junior member for Halifax (Mr. Maclean) for introducing matters which, if not irrelevant, at least are of a kind that I would rather have dealt with some other day.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax). The hon. member for South York (Mr. Maclean) is the man to blame for that.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds). But the hon. gentleman (Mr. Maclean, Halifax), is such a genial member that I bear him no illwill, by reason of the interruption, especially as it is possible that the information I gave, may have been of service and of interest to the House. Now, as to the trade of the Dominion: According to the statistics our trade continues to show substantial increase. For the first ten months of the present fiscal year, our total trade was $711,199,802 as against $634,431,075 for the corresponding period of the last fiscal year. The comparative figures for the past three years are as follows:

Year.	Total Imports into Canada.	Total Exports from Canada	Total Trade.
1909	309,756,608	261,512,159	571,268,767
1910	391,852,692	301,358,529	693,211,221
1911	472,247,540	297,196,365	769,443,905

It is interesting to note that the volume of our trade has just about doubled since 1900. A noticeable feature in connection with this expansion is that, while the imports have increased in that time by almost 150 per cent. the exports have increased by only about 55 per cent. In all the main lines of produce the exports have increased except in the one principal item, 'animals and their products' which shows a decline, due, I have no doubt in large measure to the greatly increased demand of the home market. The following comparative figures will be of interest as showing the increase of our trade with the mother country in the last five years:

TRADE WITH GREAT BRITAIN—MERCHANDISE ONLY.

Fiscal Year.	Imports for consumption from Great Britain.	Exports to Great Britain.	Aggregate Trade.

1908	94,417,314	134,477,124	228,894,438

Now, I wish to touch very briefly on the question of immigration.

Mr. LEMIEUX. May I ask if the hon. gentleman has the figures of trade with the United States. I do not wish to interrupt the hon. minister. If he will merely place the figures on 'Hansard,' that will be all I desire.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds). I have the figures here. They are as follows:

TRADE WITH THE UNITED STATES—MERCHANDISE ONLY.

Fiscal Year.	Imports for consumption from United States.	Exports to United States.	Aggregate Trade.
1908	204,648,885	96,920,138	301,569,023

9 mos. ending Dec. 31, 1911.	244,190,508	83,495,234	327,685,742

I was about to deal with immigration. The figures of immigration for the past three years are as follows:

Year.	Great Britain and Ireland.	Other countries except United States.	United States.	Total.
	$	$	$	$
1908-09.	52,901	34,175	59,832	146,908
1909-10.	59,790	45,206	103,798	208,794
1910-11.	123,013	66,620	121,451	311,084
Total ..	235,704	146,001	285,081	666,786

I am sure it will be gratifying to us all to have this stream of immigration flowing into this country. I think we depend for our continued prosperity in this country upon continuous immigration of the right sort and upon a continuous flow of British money. Therefore, we should use every effort, as we do now, to promote the flow of immigration into Canada, and also to enhance the credit of this country in the money markets of the world, that these two great forces, joined with the enterprise, energy and character of the Canadian people, may develop the great natural resources of this country.

Now, it will also be gratifying to observe that of this immigration 235,000 are of our own kinsmen from Great Britain and Ireland. I have no doubt that the immigration from other countries is, much of it, desirable; it comes of the hardy races, they are men who will take hold here and become part of our Canadian citizenship, and assist in our development. I believe myself in the absorptive and assimilating power of a country such as Canada, and I have no fear that these men, coming as they do from hardy races—though I believe in a selected immigration—will make good citizens and good Canadians. In regard to the United States, 285,081 immigrants came in during the last three years from the republic to the south, and 111,706 came in during the ten months of the present fiscal year. In my belief these are most excellent settlers. They are intelligent men, they are experienced farmers, they have capital, they have enterprise, they have character. They know what to do, they go at once to work, and they are good farmers, and add greatly to the productivity of our country. It is gratifying to me that we have such a stream of these settlers coming from the great republic to the south. They are men who have sold their higher priced farms in that country, and have come here to acquire lower priced lands, though equally good, if not better, and who will do their part in the development of our great west.

Now in connection with immigration, let me say that while in the west the land has been the lure, and of course is the great attraction to the home seeker, at the same time I am glad to say that it is the policy of this government to encourage immigration to the other provinces of Canada. My hon. friend the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Rogers), has been taking the matter up with the several provincial governments with a view of bringing in desirable immigrants suited to the purposes of each province. There is much to be done in the way of intensive farming in the eastern provinces, much to be done in the way of dairy farming, much to be done in the way of fruit farming. In addition to all that, one of the great needs of the farmers of this country is intelligent help on the farms of the east, because we know that the east has been drained to a large extent to build up the west. An intelligent immigration policy directed to supplying as far as possible the great needs of eastern farmers, to procure for them the help which they require on their farms, will be a great boon to them, and I think will be much appreciated.

Now, I have some statistics here as to railway mileage, as to our chartered banks, their deposits and discounts, as indicating the prosperity and advance of the country during the past two years:

RAILWAY MILEAGE.

The railway mileage reported in operation on the 30th June, 1911, was 25,400, or about double what it was in 1889, and an increase of 669 miles over the previous year. The statistics of the Railway Department indicate further nearly 1,600 miles of railway in actual operation on the 30th June, but officially regarded as still under construction. In addition, the department says it may be fairly assumed that 2,500 miles were surveyed and located, or in process of being surveyed, on the 30th June last.

For the year ended 30th June, 1911, the volume of freight traffic showed an increase of 7·2 per cent over the previous year.

BANK STATISTICS.

As evidencing the remarkable progress of the country over decades the following statistics with regard to chartered banks may be of interest to the House and the country.

Now I come to the question of the tariff. In view of the legislation of this session providing for the creation of a Tariff Commission, whose duties it will be to obtain and submit for the information of the government evidence and data from which the question of customs duties may be considered with greater certainty of knowledge than has been possible in the past, we have no tariff changes to propose at the present session.

There have been, of course, many requests for such changes and much could doubtless be said in favour of legislation with regard to certain articles and commodities either by way of reduction or increase in tariff rates, but in our judgment there is no case of such urgency as may not without hardship await the consideration of the commission. The inadvisability, also, of lightly interfering with the tariff in times of such prosperity as we now enjoy must be patent to all.

Mr. MACDONALD. Do I understand that my hon. friend does not mean to propose any resolutions in regard to the tariff bounties on iron and steel?

Mr. WHITE (Leeds). My hon. friend understands correctly that it is not my intention to propose any resolutions in regard to the tariff or bounties. Now I shall advert briefly to the matter of the reciprocity proposals. The economic and political feature of the past year was the rejection by the Canadian people of the reciprocity agreement negotiated with the United States by the late government. This subject has been so fully discussed, not only in Canada, but in Great Britain, and the United States, that I shall content myself by saying that the causes for rejection were both economic and national. In a period of the greatest prosperity our people were naturally loth to enter upon an experiment the alleged advantages of which appeared to them to say the least dubious. With the great growth and development of Canada under the policy of protection to the farmer as well as the manufacturer, the people came to fully realize the advantages of their home market and of our interprovincial trade built up at enormous cost of energy and capital on lines rendered necessary by the economic conditions under which the country has developed during so many years of growth and progress. That they also feared the loss of their fiscal independence was clearly apparent. The rejection implied no hostility on their part to the great republic to the south. On the contrary I believe the relations between the two countries will continue in the future as in the past to be of the most friendly and neighbourly character.

It will, as I have said before, be gratifying to all that the material prosperity with which we have been so highly favoured still continues to be our portion. Despite the serious vicissitudes through which the western wheat crop has passed and the unusual heat experienced in the province of Ontario during the past summer, the field crops of Canada show a bountiful yield and with the high prices prevailing for practically all its products the great basic industry of agriculture continues in a flourishing condition. Almost every department of trade and commerce shows expansion. Our mines are wonderfully productive. Our coast fisheries, notably the Atlantic, have enjoyed a good catch and high prices. Our manufacturers are thriving and new industries are springing up throughout the whole Dominion. Railway construction, especially in the west, proceeds apace, preparing a way for settlement in districts not yet opened up and for trade with other markets than we now enjoy. Our increased bank deposits, clearings and circulation, the amount of public and private building evidenced in municipal and business structures, extensions to manufacturing plants and residences in almost every part of the country, all attest that the general prosperity of Canada at the present time is very great.

Our Dominion continues to be the land of hope and promise to the home seeker. During the last year, as before shown, our immigration from Europe and the United States reached an average of nearly a thousand a day, bringing their capital, their intelligence and their energy to assist in the great task of developing the resources of Canada and building up her nationality. Much has been said in the past with which I am in accord as to the selection of immigration as far as possible with an eye to the quality and character of our future citizenship. Notwithstanding the large stream of immigration, labour conditions are good and extreme poverty, from any reason other than incapacity or direct misfortune, is hardly known.

Under the favourable conditions which I have described, and with every prospect for their continuance, the future of Canada looks bright indeed. In the enjoyment of peace, plenty and prosperity her energetic, loyal and patriotic people look forward with hope and expectation to an ever great and greater future.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN (Halifax). Mr. Speaker, it was but natural of course, though perhaps unnecessary, that my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. White), should beg the indulgence of the House and of his fellow members in submitting for the first time his budget to parliament, a task performed for years by a long line of eminent predecessors. Notwithstanding the many hurricanes which the heat of political discussion sometimes generates, there is always an agreeable measure of political comradeship in this House which generously recognizes an honest effort on the part of a public man to perform a public duty devolving upon him. I am sure, therefore, that hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, as well as hon. gentlemen opposite, will join with me in congratulating the Minister of Finance upon the lucidity, moderation and fairness with which he has presented the budget this afternoon. We, on this side of the House, proffer these congratulations most sincerely and cordially, although it has happened, and will happen in the future, that upon many subjects which come before this House for consideration we cannot see eye to eye with the Minister of Finance.

The remarks delivered this afternoon by the hon. gentleman did not contain very much of a controversial nature, relating largely, as they did, to a presentment of financial and fiscal data for which, to a large degree if not wholly the hon. Minister is not responsible. It was only natural that we, on this side of the House, should heartily join with the Minister of Finance in congratulating ourselves and Canada upon the prosperous condition of the country and its finances. The delivery of the budget this afternoon was rendered comparatively easy, I venture to say, by reason of the splendid financial statement that the Minister was able to present to the House. He was but, after all, describing the harvest planted by others. The statistics furnished this afternoon regarding our revenue particularly are most satisfactory. One of the primary functions of a government is to find ways and means whereby to procure revenue to carry on the many public services of the state in the least burdensome manner possible. In this country since confederation we have obtained our revenue by excise taxation and by import duty exactions, and, judging from the results during the past fifteen years at least, it has been entirely successful. The fiscal policy of the late government has been very severely criticised in the past by hon. gentlemen opposite, but I submit to them, that, judging from the results from the standpoint of revenue, its value is indisputable and perhaps indicates that we have reached a point when with profit to the country and its people there might come a diminution in taxation.

It is hardly necessary, Sir, that I should devote any considerable time to the financial statements of the three fiscal periods referred to by the hon. gentleman this afternoon; at least it is hardly necessary that I should devote much time to the financial statement of the year ending March 31, 1911. When Mr. Fielding presented his budget for that fiscal year on the 4th April, he was able only to estimate the expenditure and revenue. He did estimate the revenue at $117,500,000 and the expenditure on consolidated fund account at $87,000,000, leaving an estimated surplus for the year of $30,500,000. As the Minister of Finance intimated to us this afternoon, and which knowledge came previously to us from the public accounts, the revenue appears to be $117,780,000, a slight increase over the estimate of Mr. Fielding, while the expenditure was slightly over the estimate, amounting to $87,774,198.32 and leaving a surplus for the fiscal year 1910-11, as stated by the Minister of Finance, of $30,006,211.46. This is gratifying to the country and to those of us at least upon this side of the House. The Minister of Finance also congratulated the country upon the financial statement for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1912. The late Minister of Finance, in his last budget, while not estimating in figures the probable revenue and expenditure, predicted such a substantial revenue as would meet all income and capital expenditures. His estimate for that period has been verified in the statement which has been given us by the Minister of Finance this afternoon, and we find that the revenue has been sufficient for the year 1911-12 to meet all expenditures chargeable to consolidated fund account, to meet every dollar expended on capital account representing over $25,000,000, I think, and to provide for a reduction of debt to the extent of $1,150,000.

It was with pleasure that we on this side of the House heard the announcement this afternoon, from the Finance Minister, of a magnificent surplus of thirty-nine million dollars on the financial operations for the year 1912. It is further gratifying to us on this side of the House to know that the last year of the administration of the financial affairs of this country by the Hon. Mr. Fielding, ended with such success as did every other fiscal year while he occupied the office of Finance Minister. I trust I do not offend the susceptibilities of the Minister of Finance when I say that in all fairness the Liberal party may claim credit for the major portion if not the whole of the success of the financial operations for the year ending 31st of March, 1912. There is also this to be observed, that during the fiscal year now about ending, there were unusual expenditures in connection with consolidated fund account. In the first place there was a very considerable expenditure in connection with the decennial census, while other payments were made out of the consolidated fund on account of bounties, Dominion lands, militia and other items, which in years past, were charged to capital account. In order to impress upon the House and the country the splendid record of the late government, so far as surpluses are concerned, I shall give in the following tabulated statement, the surpluses for each financial year since 1897, they are as follows:

ANNUAL SURPLUS UNDER THE LIBERAL GOVERNMENT.

1898-99	4,837,749.00
1899-00	8,054,714.51
1900-01	5,648,333.29
1901-02	7,291,398.06
1902-03	14,345,166.17
1903-04	15,056,984.12
1905-06 (9 months)	12,898,719.12
1906-07	16,427,167.20
1907-08	19,413,054.22
1908-09	1,029,131.81
1909-10	22,091,963.81
1910-11	30,006,211.46
1911-12 (Estimated)	39,000,000.00

Altogether, the surpluses from 1897 down to the end of the fiscal year 1911-12 aggregate nearly $200,000,000. Thus, it will be seen that the Finance Minister of the late government was ever since 1897, able to show a gradually increasing annual surplus, ranging from one and three-quarter millions to thirty-nine million dollars for the present year. This two hundred million dollars of surplus, was available for the reduction of additions to the public debt on capital expenditure. To put it in another way, from 1907 to 1912 capital expenditures were made to the extent of $250,000,000, while the net debt of Canada increased by seventy-nine million dollars to the end of 1911. Were it not for these successive large surpluses contained in the budgets of Mr. Fielding, together with the surplus for this year, the increase of the public debt would have been about $270,000,000 instead of seventy-seven millions as it now is. I would also remind the House of the fact that only on six occasions in the financial history of this country, have there been actual reductions of the debt, namely, in 1871 when Sir Francis Hincks was the Minister of Finance, and when the reduction was $503,000; in 1872, when Sir Leonard Tilley was Minister of Finance, when the reduction was $1,734,129. These were the two occasions in which there was reduction of debt, under Conservative administration, but in the years 1900, 1903, 1904 and 1907 under a Liberal administration, there were reductions of the debt amounting to $15,112,128.

If to this the reduction for this year is added, then we find that under the administration of the Minister of Finance in the late government, there was a total debt reduction of approximately sixteen and a half million dollars which is another fact of which hon. gentlemen on this side of the House naturally feel proud. It might possibly be of interest, were I to give some facts in connection with the financial and material development of the country during the time the late government were charged with the responsibility of administering our public affairs, and I may say that I shall quote from the latest available statistics for the year 1911, the statistics for the present financial year not being yet available. The population of Canada has grown from 5,141,508 in 1897, to 7,207,122 in 1911, due largely to the vigorous immigration policy of the Liberal Government which was so severely criticised by the Conservatives when they were in opposition but which was so highly approved by the Minister of Finance this afternoon, and which we were delighted to hear it was the intention of the government to continue in the future. In 1897 our revenue was $40,555,000 and in 1911 it was $117,780,000.

This increase of revenue was obtainable without any increase in the rate of taxation, but rather after a slight reduction.

In 1897 our net debt was $261,538,000. In 1911, it was $340,143,000. While the debt per capita in 1897 was $50.87, in 1911 it was only $47.21, and in the financial year ending March 31, 1912, there will be a further diminution in the net debt per capita of this country.

Our import trade grew from $137,950,000 in 1897 to $290,000,000 in 1911, and our total trade expanded from $257,168,000 in 1897 to $769,440,000 in 1911. For the year ending November, 1911, it amounted to $817,000,000. It will be of interest also to notice that our total export trade to the United Kingdom in 1911 was $136,000,000. In the United Kingdom our products meet with world-wide competition and our export trade to the United Kingdom alone last year was practically equal to our total export trade in 1897, which was, in round figures, $137,000,000.

Inasmuch as our export trade is an accurate barometer of our real productive and industrial strength, because it is in that trade that we meet the world's competition, it would perhaps be not uninteresting to give to the House a summary of the development of the increase of our chief items of export trade. The comparison is graphically shown in the following table:—

Fiscal Year.	Great Britain.	United States.	Other Countries.	Total.
	$	$	$	$
Exports of Agricultural Produce—
1897	13,507,342	2,419,814	2,055,490	17,982,646

1911	6,726,015	33,129,505	2,932,041	42,787,561

1897	14,059,585	15,435,759	1,643,385	31,258,729

1897	33,600,891	5,081,811	562,550	39,245,252
1911	40,636,575	10,063,544	1,544,055	52,244,174

I wish to point out to hon. gentlemen this further fact that of our total export trade of $290,000,000 in 1911, $238,000,000 was the products of the farm, the mine, the forest and the sea. It will thus be seen how essential it is to our material development to have a sufficient market for the expanding natural markets of this country.

Hon. gentlemen on this side of the House review with gratification these facts which record the development of Canada during that period of time when they were charged with the responsibility of administering the affairs of the country. I submit that it discloses a record which, when viewed dispassionately and without prejudice, is one of which we on this side of the House may and do feel justly proud, and one which the country, I believe, will also regard as commendable. It may become more impressive when reviewed in the future comparatively with the financial and national development which will take place in this country under the ægis of the present government.

At six o'clock, House took recess.

After Recess

House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax). At six o'clock I was observing that the record of the late government, during the period of fifteen years in which they were charged with the responsibility of administering the affairs of this country, was one of which Liberals justly and properly felt proud, and one which would be considered by the country generally as commendable. The advent of the Liberal party into power in 1896 was the occasion for dismal, doleful prophecies of chapters of financial and industrial stagnation in this country, and the arrest of the national development. History and experience, I submit, have disproven these prophecies of hon. gentlemen opposite and I would like to remind hon. gentlemen that although the electorate of this country have dismissed the late government and placed upon the treasury benches hon. gentlemen opposite, yet that in an important and critical period of the country's history, the late ministry did much for everything of national interest, and during its régime of power inaugurated and carried out well measured and courageous policies and calculated to accelerate the development of Canada and to help her to achieve that which is her manifest destiny.

I now wish briefly to refer to matters which relate strictly to the fiscal period of 1912-13. In common with other hon. gentlemen, I was pleased to note that the Minister of Finance anticipates being able to announce at the end of that period, or when he delivers his next budget, a very satisfactory year financially, that he expects sufficient revenue to at least meet all charges upon the consolidated fund. I was rather inclined to think that the Minister of Finance did not speak too hopefully of the financial results of 1912-13. However, I trust for the good of the country that the financial results to be announced by him when delivering his next budget, will be such as we can congratulate him and the country upon. The main estimates presented to parliament for the next fiscal year contemplate an expenditure of $104,919,000 on consolidated fund account, and $44,789,000 upon capital expenditure, to which there must be added the amount to be contained in the supplementary estimates which have not yet been presented to parliament. I regret very much that the Minister of Finance was unable this afternoon to announce, even approximately, what would be the amount of those estimates for the next fiscal year. I am not in a position, nor do I imagine is any other hon. gentleman, but the Minister of Finance himself and possibly the members of the government, to say what are likely to be the sums contained in the supplementary estimates. I would not be surprised if they total at least $20,000,000 or $25,000,000, and if they do, that will bring the total contemplated expenditure for the next fiscal year up to the sum of $170,000,000 or $175,000,000, which will be considerably in excess of the approximate expenditures of this year, which in round figures amounted to nearly $100,000,000. I would submit that for a new and young ministry who a few months ago pretended bewilderment at the late government's expenditures, the proposed expenditures for the coming year invite surprise, if not astonishment. To use words which the Minister of Trade and Commerce frequently used when criticising the predecessor of the present Minister of Finance: 'That is going some.' I must admit that a large proportion of the expenditures contemplated for 1912-13 contain financial commitments of the late government, and accordingly it would be unfair to charge them wholly upon the present government. However, I wish to remind the Minister of Finance of some things, and to warn him of other things in connection with public expenditures. It is true that the public expenditures under the late government increased very considerably, and to such I do not think the country will, or did object. The Liberal party will not object to any liberal expenditure made by the present government, nor in fact to any expenditure, calculated to develop the country and improve the condition of our people. But, the Conservative party when in opposition protested in parliament and out of parliament against the rising expenditure. The Minister of Trade and Commerce, I remember particularly, fulminated against the growing expenditures which were made by the late government, and he often told parliament many dismal stories of what was going to happen in this country by reason of such increased expenditures. I might paraphrase some of the criticisms which he made of our expenditures. He often told the late government that they were marching to financial disaster by reason of their increased expenditure, that he trembled at the thought of the weight and magnitude of our obligations, that we were not making provision for the days when 'men's souls would be tried,' that we were heaping up ordinary and capital expenditures and making no provision for the days of stress which he always saw falling upon us, and that we ought to set our sails against the breakers which were looming ahead. In all of these criticisms he had the endorsement of his party, and I wonder this evening if the Minister of Trade and Commerce is dreaming such dreams now. Is he seeing such visions at the present time when he contemplates the increased expenditure proposed by the government for the next fiscal year, or does it happen that place and power give a different colouring to his outlook? I would like to place on record some statements by the Minister of Trade and Commerce condemnatory of our expenditures in the past, and I do submit, that if hon. gentlemen opposite were sincere in their protests against the expenditures made by the late government, surely they should implement the position they then took and make some reduction in those expenditures, or at least give parliament and the country reasons for their not doing it. If the present Minister of Finance wishes to carry out the policy and the promises of his present colleagues in connection with public expenditures, he must pay some heed to the criticisms which were made against the expenditures of the late government in the past. Now will the Minister of Finance kindly listen to this statement by his present colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who was the severest critic of the Minister of Finance in the last parliament? In 1909-10 that hon. gentleman spoke as follows:

> The expenditure of this country in 1896 for all purposes was $41,000,000; in 1897 the expenditure was $43,000,000, a very slight addition; but in 1909 the expenditure has gone up to the enormous sum of $133,000,000, a little more than three times the expenditure of 1896. It is altogether easy and just as futile as easy, to say that the expenditure increased because the country has grown. The country is growing and the country's expenditure must grow. But here is a growth in expenditure which exceeds all corresponding growth in population, or in any other way that you may mention. It is an inordinate increase in expenditure.

I wonder what the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster) would say this evening, were he speaking here, when he considers the fact that next year the Minister of Finance (Mr. White) proposes to make expenditures of from $170,000,000 to $175,000,000. Again, the Minister of Trade and Commerce said, in speaking of the amount of money expended by the Dominion from confederation up to 1897:

> Four and a half million people in twelve and three-quarters years has handed over to this government 828 million dollars, or an average of 65 millions per year. Now, the Minister of Finance may make his divisions and calculations with regard to the net debt, and set forth how much it is per head. That proves nothing. The point is: 'What are you taking out of the taxpayer of the country? What are you taking out to-day?' $11 to $12 per head, whereas in 1896 we took out a little less than $5.50 per head. This money you took out is money that comes from the man's earnings, it is so much abstracted from his capital. There ought to be no reason in the world for taking it, except that it is absolutely necessary that the aggregate of the people of the country should be governed, and that they should pay for it. Yet you have taken this immense amount of money, $65,000,000 per year during the last twelve and three-quarter years, or a total of $922,000,000, and in addition to that are the borrowings you have provided for.

I wonder what the Minister of Finance (Mr. White) would say to the Minister of Trade and Commerce if that hon. gentleman were to confront him with the criticism he levelled at the Minister of Finance in 1910. The hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. White) this afternoon takes a contrary position. He asserted that it was proper to take from the people more revenue than was required for consolidated fund expenditure, to take sufficient, not only to meet these expenditures, but also such expenditures as are made on capital account. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster) persistently and insistently made this criticism of the late government, as did his friends throughout the country, and to some degree, I have no doubt, they made an impression upon the country. And I say that the Minister of Finance, in taking the position he took this afternoon, takes a view which is directly the opposite of that which the party with which he is associated to-day, took when in opposition. Let me quote again from the Minister of Trade and Commerce. In 1906 he spoke as follows:

> Do gentlemen opposite ever stop to think of the years into which they are heading; of the tremendous responsibilities which they are soon to take up, and for ten years to continuously carry, whether this country be prosperous financially or whether it be in depression —do they know that they are marching into the teeth of a financial problem which should make every staid and shrewd financier almost tremble at the thought of the weight and magnitude of the obligations? But these gentleman are perfectly lighthearted. They are making no preparation for the coming day which may try men's souls in the Dominion.

Again the Minister of Trade and Commerce, in 1905, speaking on the subject of taxation, said:

> You can go up to a certain point with the taxation of your country, but when you go beyond that, you overburden the country. When you exceed that, you are spending the people's money unprofitably, and you are actually taking from their earnings capital which, if not taken out, would be liable to produce itself ten, twenty, thirty—a hundredfold. The axiom is as true as the gospel that every dollar of unnecessary expenditure you take from the people is so much extracted from their remuneration and productive capital, which otherwise they would employ in the constant processes of production and reproduction.

Such were the protests of the Minister of Trade and Commerce against taxation which then probably amounted to $60,000,000 or $70,000,000 per annum. What would the hon. gentleman say if he were criticising the present Minister of Finance regarding the taxtion this year amounting to practically $100,000,000? I wonder what he would say of the taxation next year, which I estimate will amount to probably $120,000,000 from customs and excise.

Now, in order to show that the Conservative party, when in opposition, took a firm and pronounced stand against the increased expenditure of the government of that day and the amount of taxation taken from the people will hon. members opposite, and especially the Minister of Finance, listen to me while I read a portion of a campaign document which was widely circulated in this country in 1908? Possibly the Minister of Finance (Mr. White, Leeds) did not quite see eye to eye with that party in that year, but I am sure he will not object to my giving it to the House, and possibly it may convey to the hon. Minister a lesson respecting expenditure and taxation. This part of the document was headed 'Time for a Change.' A portion of it read as follows:—

TIME FOR A CHANGE.

Liberal-Conservatives do not claim that Canada can be administered without a reasonable increase in expenditures. As this country expands and develops, the demands for works and improvements multiply and must be reasonably met.

But with an increase of some 13 per cent in population, and granting a generous response to the call for improvement, no sane man can justify the headlong reckless rush of the past 12 years.

The immense taxation has been extracted from the earnings and savings of the toilers in such sums as stagger the thoughtful elector—27 millions in 1896 and 73 millions in 1908, and in these eleven years and nine months $229,000,000 more than would have been taken on the basis of 1896.

And still both taxation and expenditure go up by leaps of millions yearly.

Is it not time to turn over a new leaf? Mr. Borden and the Liberal-Conservative party stand for moderate taxation—reasonable expenditure.

That was the policy of the Conservative party in the campaign of 1908. Year after year until their accession to power they repeated this portion of their political gospel. I say that the country today might reasonably have expected an announcement from the Finance Minister something concerning a reduction in taxation and a reduction, or at least a halt, in expenditure. However, there was no such announcement; on the contrary there is information of increased expenditure if not increased taxation. In 1907, our customs and excise taxation amounted to $73,000,000; in 1908, it was $62,000,000; in 1909-10, it grew to $91,075,000, in 1911 to $89,000,000, and for 1912, I estimate it at $100,000,000, and I should not be surprised if it reached the sum of $120,000,000 next year. And still hon. gentlemen opposite seem to accept the situation quite contentedly, and we shall probably find no opposition on the part of the Minister of Trade and Commerce or any other gentleman opposite.

When I considers the high cost of living in this country, when one considers that it has increased so rapidly during the past few years, increasing even since the beginning of this year, I say we might have expected some intimation from the Minister of Finance that he proposed shortly to do something in the way of a diminution of taxation, in order if possible to bring about a reduction in the cost of living. Now I ask hon. gentlemen, were all their criticisms about expenses but partisan frothings, after all, and are they going to do that which they condemned in opposition? It looks that way. Everything indicates that. A bad start has been made. Let me issue to the Minister of Finance a warning that the party to which he belongs has a marvellous capacity for making large financial requests, that some of his colleagues are very expensive gentlemen indeed. They may have come in by the front door like the Minister of Finance, but while they had favours to seek, they apparently had requests to make. At least it looks that way to me, and I would like to give the minister some of the reasons which appear to me to support my fears.

Now the present government think it their duty to be interested in provincial affairs to an amazing degree, at least in those provinces having Conservative governments. Let us see how this has worked out up to date. It happened late last year that the general elections in the province of Prince Edward Island took place, and the Conservative party there looked to Ottawa for assistance for telegrams, for letters, for expenditures or promises of expenditures. The request was made for the establishment of a car-ferry service across the Northumberland Straits, a request was made that the Prince Edward Island Railway should be made as wide as the Canadian Pacific railway or other roads, in other words standardized, and the Prime Minister promised the same. I am not protesting against the expenditure, but what amazes me is the shocking wickedness of the Prime Minister of this country in making this promise at a time when the Prince Edward Island provincial elections were about to be held, and what is more shocking still to me, he made this promise, not to the government of Prince Edward Island, not to the Premier of Prince Edward Island, but to a member of this House supporting his government. Now who would have believed this of the Prime Minister of Canada, he who, in the past, was always so correct, so circumspect, and so proper in such things.

But more shocking still, this telegram was made public. I can hardly believe that the Prime Minister intended that this telegram should be kept secret, and its contents locked in the bosom of the recipient. I do really think that the Prime Minister thought that this would be made public, and it was. Now, I submit to the Finance Minister that this will cost the country something. It is not the proposed expenditure that I object to so much, as it is the intent to encourage requests for expenditure. I submit that the Minister of Finance hearafter, will do well to keep watch upon his leader in matters of expenditure.

Then last fall Sir James Whitney thought the time opportune to ask the people of Ontario to renew its confidence in his government. In his manifesto, he told the people of Ontario that, a Conservative party being in power at Ottawa, the provincial government would receive more generous financial aid for the many public services of that province. I think it was said, if not by Sir James Whitney, then by some friend of his government, that the Ontario government contemplated asking the federal government for the ordinary railway subsidy for the Ontario government railway. I dare say this will come. It will cost something to have my hon. friend the Minister of Railway and Canals, the old colleague of Sir James Whitney, in this government. The Minister of Railways will remember his provincial leader. I have no means of computing what it is going to cost this country to have the Minister of Railways here, but I have not the slightest hesitancy in saying that it will cost something at least.

But it is when we come to the province of Manitoba that we find political friendships do cost something. When the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Rogers) forsook his political fireside at Winnipeg, everybody in this country knew that it would cost Canada something. We know it now. We have an idea of what it has cost up to date. In round figures it is about $2,175,000. That is what it has cost Canada to get the Minister of the Interior, and that is what Mr. Roblin gets by losing the Minister of the Interior. A pure gift, a gratuity, with absolutely no consideration whatever, is about to be awarded to the province of Manitoba. And worse still, it does not perturb the Minister of the Interior in the slightest degree. He was as calm, and placid and cool when he was assisting the other day in transferring this $2,100,000 from Ottawa to Winnipeg, as he is when he places a contribution upon the offering plate in the sanctuary upon the first day of the week. He was so unperturbed, that I fear he is probably meditating another attack upon the treasury. It may be true that the government of Manitoba needed the money, perhaps they need more. But it is the costly colleagues of the Minister of Finance against which I wish to warn him. There is evident everywhere an intent to make financial attacks upon the federal treasury by the provincial governments favourable to the present ministry.

But a still greater danger is looming up before the Minister of Finance of which I wish now to give him warning. When that young, debonair statesman, Mr. McBride, leaves his capital on the Pacific coast, and crosses the mountains and prairies and comes to Ottawa to make his demand upon the Dominion treasury, he will prove a very costly political ally.

He was promised arbitration some years ago. He will insist on a substantial amount. If Manitoba, which elected a few Liberals, cost this country $2,100,000, what will British Columbia be entitled to which did not elect a single Liberal member? That is a political and mathematical problem. I cannot figure it out. I do not know what the end will be.

Why, Mr. McBride, will say to the Minister of the Interior: My mountains are greater than yours, my coast line is greater than yours and the Minister of the Interior will say: Aye, aye. I say that he will cost the treasury of this country a great deal and if the Minister of Finance had been listening to me very carefully as I pointed out to him the costly colleagues and friends by whom he is surrounded he would have been thinking, when figuring in his own mind the possible cost of the friendship of the British Columbia government, of a few lines of the famous hymn of Cardinal Newman:

> I do not wish to see the distant scene,
> One step enough for me.

The hon. Minister of Labour (Mr. Crothers) was 'in extremis' during the last election, or at least some of his friends were. In his county or some near-by constituency some friends of the Conservative party felt that the Dominion government should reimburse to them the losses that they suffered by reason of the failure of the Farmers' Bank. Immediately the Minister of Labour proceeds to make such people feel that they have a legitimate claim upon the treasury of the country for reimbursement of their losses. He promised them a commission of investigation. A commission has been appointed and I am sure that hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, and I think people generally in the country, will agree with me when I say that the appointment of such commission will be both useless, and mischievous and that it is to be regetted that the government ever appointed such a commission for such a purpose. The commission will cost something and, therefore, I say that the Minister of Labour is another expensive colleague. The hon. Minister of Militia and Defence (Mr. Hughes) is engaging in extraordinary expenditures in his department. He is arming the youth of the land. He has recently made the purchase, I believe, of twenty-four automobiles for the general staff and I suppose that next year he will be purchasing automobiles for the boy scouts and air ships for the generals. I warn the Minister of Finance that he must keep an eye on the Minister of Militia as well as his other colleagues.

There are one or two other instances which I might give to the Minister of Finance to indicate the marvellous capacity of his political friends to make requests for expenditures.

His leader, the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Borden) during the last election, made it one of the planks of his platform, that the government would liquidate the medical charges and the cost of medicine required by the shore fishermen of this country, and, by the way, that is one of the promises that we have not heard anything about being implemented by the government. The Prime Minister evidently has a capacity to promise, and I warn the Minister of Finance that his capacity of promising will yet prove costly. Again, the governments of Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick sent a delegation here approaching the government with the request to refund to such provinces a portion of the award to the Canadian government under the Washington Treaty amounting I think to about $5,000,000. I do not know what portion these two provinces claim. I only mention this, as I do these other matters to indicate that the Minister of Finance is in company with political friends who are very free to promise and who will make serious inroads into the revenue of this country if permitted so to do. I do not wonder that the Minister of Finance this afternoon was unable to speak glowingly in his estimates of revenues and expenditures for the fiscal year 1912-13.

I cannot help but say that I regret the statement made by the Minister of Finance this afternoon respecting the National Transcontinental railway. I do not propose to discuss the cost of this railway. The Minister, however, spoke as if the late government were guilty of expenditures of money in this connection, which were decidedly open to criticism, and he apparently wished to reassure the public abroad that this expenditure, though improvident and unnecessarily excessive need cause no concern. I deny the right of any man in this country to say that the cost of the eastern section of the National Transcontinental railway from Winnipeg to Moncton is unnecessarily excessive. I say that no man who wishes to debate this matter fairly and honestly can make such a statement. The statement submitted to parliament by the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Cochrane) some few weeks ago, was a very unfair one, and when I mention to the House the fact that in that cost was included the first seven years' interest, I point out how manifestly unfair the statement was. The country expected that possibly and probably the National Transcontinental railway would be unable to earn interest during the first seven years, and believing it to be a work of great necessity, they were willing to pledge the additional credit of the country to the extent of paying the first seven years' interest.

It is absurd for any one to urge that the first seven years interest is a part of the cost of that railway. I challenge any hon. gentleman in this House to name a railway that originally was constructed up to the standard of the National Transcontinental railway and that was built for less money, bearing in mind the nature of the country traversed, labour conditions, and costs generally. The average capitalization of American railways to-day is about $60,000 per mile which merely represents the present outstanding securities, but the history of seventy-five per cent of American railways is that they have passed through the receiver's hands not once but several times, and in many instances many series of securities were wiped out. Then again, it is worthy of note that the average capitalization of European railways is from $175,000 to $250,000 per mile. I resent the imputation frequently made by hon gentlemen opposite that the cost of this railway has been unduly and improperly augmented. No railway that I know of was ever in its original construction up to the high standard of the Transcontinental, and when it is once completed it will require very little indeed for betterments. I was speaking the other day to a railway man of experience concerning that portion of the Transcontinental railway located in New Brunswick, the value of which the hon gentlemen opposite have cast doubt upon, and he assured me that he would be willing to take that section of the road over tomorrow and to pay interest upon the cost of construction.

I wish now to refer to a matter which, on the 21st day of September last carried joy to the hearts of hon. gentlemen opposite. For what reason I cannot understand, whenever the subject of the late election is mentioned in this House hon. gentlemen opposite are fond of saying: drop your talk about reciprocity, whereas one would assume that if in their judgment it was extremely unpopular in the country they would be very much interested in having us talk of it. The late election, in an unusual degree engaged the interest of the public and it terminated in a change of ministry.

The real issue involved in that campaign was one of taxation and markets and was concreted in the form of a tariff convention made with the United States, subject to change by either party to the agreement at any time, and, that agreement related almost entirely to the interchange of natural products. The government of the day unable to secure parliamentary ratification of this agreement, and upon challenge from the opposition, submitted the issue to the people. Whether, in the election it was, or was not possible to avoid the intrusion of other issues, it is difficult to determine, but it is undeniably true that the introduction of other issues in the different provinces militated against a mature, thoughtful, and fair consideration of the issue, which both parties agreed for submission to the people. To that extent the result was indeterminative and unsatisfactory. Further, this tariff agreement with the United States, lent itself to the invocation of passions and prejudices, and influences which were not calculated to secure a reasoned judgment upon an international agreement. Interests in the United States, hostile to the competition of their Canadian neighbours in their own markets, transferred to this country their opposition, and by a strange irony of fate, on the other hand, ambiguous utterances by many prominent men in the United States, friendly to the agreement, also brought about consternation. Further when one considers how keenly and aggressively a new party in the province of Quebec, (then recently affianced to the Conservative party, but now about to be divorced) captured the popular imagination in that province upon other issues; when one considers that undeniably racial and religious prejudices were raised in another great province, and that other extraneous issues in other provinces precluded in varying degrees a fair expression of public opinion, I say notwithstanding all these considerations, the Canadian people by a small vote, defeated the issue. However, the result of the election is, that the people of Canada are taken to have declared against this international agreement to revise concurrently with the United States the tariff of both countries. I do not take it that the people of Canada have pronounced against wider markets for the purchaser, and consumer alike in certain commodities. I take it that the people of Canada have not pronounced against economic conditions which would ensure wider opportunities for certain classes of producers to sell, and wider opportunities for certain classes of consumers to buy. The desire of men, as well as of nations, is to produce and to interchange trade, in order primarily to satisfy human necessities, and, in the second place, to accummulate national and individual reserves of wealth, which is the natural ambition of all peoples and countries.

Hon. gentlemen opposite are correct in saying that this agreement is dead because it was defeated, fairly or unfairly, but I say most sincerely that that agreement was at least pregnant with tremendous advantages to Canada and her people, and its essential features will be and are to-day a living issue in this country. The agreement was negatived, it is true; one political party was disappointed, another was made happy, but I do say that if that agreement had been defeated by a more sober, fair, truthful and intelligent campaign directed against it, the verdict would have been received with more acceptance by a large section of the Canadian people who believed in it.

It was not an unnatural thing in the past to find Canadians seeking better and wider trade relations with the United States, a nearby country. The government of to-day when in opposition continuously taunted the then government with not obtaining reciprocity, particularly in natural products. I remember that when the French treaty was under discussion in 1909, almost every gentleman of prominence in the then opposition ranks, from you, Mr. Speaker, down, protested that it might be dangerous to put into force this French treaty as it might eventually prove an impediment in obtaining reciprocity with the United States.

I remember also that in 1910 when there was under discussion in this House the question of a revision of our tariff in order to render it possible for the president of the United States to declare that the maximum features of the Payne-Aldrich tariff should not be imposed against this country, hon. gentlemen opposite, then in opposition, declared most stoutly that some form of reciprocal trade with the United States, in natural products especially, was absolutely essential to the development of Canada. It was secured, and our friends opposite said the measure was dangerous. The House will remember that Canada was the only country that was to receive any benefits under that particular trade agreement, at least it did not apply to any other country. I ask hon. gentlemen opposite was it all bad, or was it bad in parts? Will they undertake to eliminate or separate the good features from the bad, and obtain such an agreement from the United States, if it is obtainable, in any part? They object to formal trade agreements or conventions with countries, but I say there is a large section of the Canadian people to-day who desire larger markets than we now possess, and I ask hon. gentlemen opposite will they obtain for our people these wider markets, and if so, from whom will they get them? The Liberal party, I take it, believe in increasing as much as possible the markets for our productions, particularly our natural productions which must increase in tremendous proportions. It believed that by reciprocity we could obtain this without doing any violence to any interest in this country. We did not believe that it was dangerous to the national existence or the hegemony of the race to increase our trade with a country with whom we do one half of our total trade. I say that such ideas, with all due respect to the judgment rendered by the electorate, were but the figments of the feverish fancy of those who seek political power or those who seek restriction in trade for their own good alone. In the very nature of things trade north and south on this continent is inevitable. That is the case to-day but of course it will be limited for many years to come to certain classes of production. Communication between nations is as valuable and as desirable as communication between men. It is unfortunate that old and historical misunderstandings create in Canada and the United States an instinctive inclination towards separation or hostility, but is it wise? Will this view stand the test of time? What will be the judgment of the people of this country in years to come? In Canada, our fiscal policy is founded upon tariffs. It was but natural that in this country the tariff should be made the means of raising revenue. Any other form of taxation was almost impossible, at least it would not be popular. According to the view of many, it is the most costly form of taxation, but after all I think I can fairly say that it was the most available and the most popular. That being our fiscal system in Canada it was only natural that into the tariff should creep the element that we denominate as protection, particularly in manufactured products. The Liberal party was not hostile to the industrial development of this country. There is no evidence to be found of that attitude in the fifteen years of administration given to this country by the Liberal party. The development of industries in Canada during the period of their administration is proof of this. True, some reductions were made in the tariff, reductions perhaps very much more substantial than most people recognize. There was a gradual diminution of, ending in the cessation of some bounties, as well as tariff reduction, but when these reductions were made there were compensations in the way of reductions of duty on raw material or otherwise. A revision of a tariff does not mean necessarily the extinction of a tariff. I repeat that there was no evidence of hostility against the industrial interests of this country in that agreement which was submitted to the electorate last year, but rather, on the contrary, there were tokens of carefulness to abstain from the inclusion of the products of manufacturers lest any danger by competition might befall our industrial life in competition with a much larger, stronger and older country. The offer of inclusion, I understand was made by the United States, but was refused on the grounds I have stated, and I deny what was apparently the conclusion of many manufacturing interests in this country, that in the recent election, restricted reciprocal trade mostly in the natural products with the United States meant danger to the industrial life of this country.

On the contrary Liberals believed it meant greater contentment among the producers of exportable surpluses of natural products, which include a majority of our population. They believed it meant the enhancement of the producing and purchasing power of that class, thus automatically working towards the development of our industrial life, and thus increasing the producing and purchasing power of the community. The government say that freer trade relations with the United States of any kind is impossible. There was not a single article mentioned in any one of the schedules which they did not object to, and I suppose, speaking frankly, that any form of reciprocity of tariff or trade arrangements which might be made with the United States would be objectionable to hon. gentlemen opposite. But I say the problem to-day confronts them of finding for the producers of this country a market for their surplus products which are growing rapidly and for which a market must be found somewhere. The Minister of Finance said this afternoon that this agreement was defeated on national and economic grounds. I do not quite understand what he means by national grounds, but at any rate I do not propose discussing the point. It might be well, however, to inquire briefly if the economic reasons advanced by some people in Canada for opposing this agreement at the last election, obtain and find favour in all parts of the Dominion to-day. I wish to deal briefly with the question of markets prospectively for our surplus products, particularly in the western portion of Canada, and I want to inquire how far the interests present and future, of that section of Canada have been affected by the judgment expressed by the electorate of Canada last September. I suppose I might discuss some matters which relate chiefly to my own province. It would be a very easy matter for instance, to discuss the matter of our fish production in the maritime provinces, and as to how they might be affected by placing those products upon the free list in Canada and the United States. In my province the Conservative party stated that reciprocity in fish would be a bad thing for Nova Scotia. I deny the ability of any man to present a single intelligent argument in support of that contention. I deny even that it is arguable.

Mr. CURRIE. Does the hon. gentleman think that free coal would be a good thing for Nova Scotia?

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax). That is another matter altogether. Free coal did not figure in any of the schedules to which I refer. Let me put to you in two or three words the position of the maritime provinces in so far as fish is concerned. I will take my own province as an illustration, a province which produces and exports several million dollars worth of fish products, and which does not import any. Then consider the condition of affairs in Canada and the United States generally. The United States imports about $14,000,000 worth of fish annually, and exports about $7,000 chiefly composed of canned salmon, and which come from the Pacific coast. She imported $5,000,000 worth of fish from Canada, a great portion of which comes from the maritime provinces. Now can any hon. gentleman suggest to me the possibility that the removal of the tariff upon fish products in the United States and Canada could adversely affect the fishing interests of the province of Nova Scotia? Let no hon. gentleman believe that any section, or any county, in the province of Nova Scotia declared against reciprocity on account of the belief that it would be disastrous to these interests. Hon. gentlemen opposite could not argue against it; they did not pretend to do so. They resorted to misrepresentation of the issue. They said: 'Reciprocity in fish was all right, but many things would happen.' They said for one thing, that the Island of Porto Rico was not a part of the United States, which was an obvious untruth. They said that the agreement surrendered our territorial waters to the American fishermen, which was absolutely incorrect. They said the agreement imperilled the fishing bounties granted to the Canadian fishermen, which was absolutely absurd. They said the agreement would result in the colony of Newfoundland, by legislation, preventing our fishermen from obtaining bait in the waters of that colony, which was absolutely impossible. And, upon these several false positions it is true, they caused a considerable portion of the electors of the province of Nova Scotia to believe that possibly the agreement in so far as fish was concerned was not in their interest. I wish now to discuss this matter from the view point of the western portion of Canada, and particularly the three prairie provinces. I would ask hon. gentlemen if they believe that everything is well in the provinces of Manitoba, Alberta, and Saskatchewan. A few evenings ago, the Minister of Finance said that the west was the commercial hope of Canada. The unusual prosperity we have enjoyed in Canada in recent years has been largely, if not wholly, due to the development of the three prairie provinces. The story of the west in the last few years shortly told, is simply two words: 'Immigration' and 'production.' The west grew and the industries of the east grew as a consequence. The western country produced at a low cost and with little capital, grain, the surplus of which, was exported out of the country, and thus helped to meet our indebtedness to other countries from whom we purchased. We have been inducing into that western country immigrants by the thousands, and the Minister of Finance this afternoon, said he hoped they would continue to come in the same numbers in the future. I want to present to the House some evidence of the growth and development which has occurred in these three provinces of recent years, and later to inquire how that future may be affected by the want of markets for their surplus production. That is only a fair question for me to put to the hon. gentlemen opposite, because only a few months ago, they were arguing that it was absolutely unsound to send our surplus natural products, into the United States. In order to lay down certain premises, from which I may later draw a conclusion, respecting the development of the country, let me give the House a few figures respecting the population of the prairie provinces to show how it has grown, how its productions have grown, and to impress upon the government if I can, the serious problem of markets which confronts them in the three provinces referred to. The following is the population of the three prairie provinces in the years 1901, 1906 and 1911, which I give to the House for the purpose of indicating the great increase of the farming population in these provinces. Just what proportion is rural I cannot tell. It will indicate however a great increase in the number of producers :

1. POPULATION.

June 1, 1911	374,663	456,614	492,432	1,322,709

Now, I wish to give some figures respecting the increase in production and acreage of production in these provinces, not only as a matter of interest to hon. members, but that it may be of record:

ACREAGE AND PRODUCTION OF WHEAT IN MANITOBA, SASKATCHEWAN AND ALBERTA.

Since 1906 there has been an average annual increase of 20 per cent in the total wheat yield of Manitoba. Saskatchewan and Alberta. In the same period there has been an average annual increase of 16 per cent in the acreage under wheat cultivation. Providing that this rate of increase is continued, the yield for 1915 will be in the neighbourhood of 403,383,628 bushels, and the acreage under cultivation 16,841,283 acres.

Now, hon. gentlemen opposite, I say, are confronted with this condition of affairs—that by 1915 or 1916, if the percentages of past years continue, that country will be producing 400,000,000 bushels of wheat. I dare say that this will be accomplished or nearly so. It must be remembered that conditions in the west to-day compare more favourably, than in the western states of the United States in their earlier days, for rapid increase of production. Transportation is much more accessible for intending immigrants, and improved agricultural machinery enable the farmers to reclaim a greater acreage than was possible in any one season years ago. What will become of this surplus production of wheat, is the question I submit to hon. gentlemen opposite? They talk as if Canada was about the only country in the world which produces a surplus of wheat and that the question of markets for Canadian grain was a trivial matter. Let me read to the House the names of countries which produce wheat, and oats and barley as well, in excess of their own needs, and some of which produce for export far more than Canada:

Hon. gentlemen opposite argued during the last campaign that the object of the western farmer should be to sell more in the British market, they seemed to argue that the people of the United Kingdom could and would consume the total surplus wheat production of Canada. Let us see what that market consumes. The United Kingdom consumes about 200,000,000 or 210,000,000 bushels of wheat annually. For the eleven months of the year ending November, 1911, its imports of wheat from the leading countries of the world were as follows: From India, 28,000,000 bushels; from Russia, 27,000,000 bushels; from Argentina, 25,000,000 bushels; from Australia, 22,000,000 bushels; from Canada, 22,000,000 bushels, and from the United States 18,000,000 bushels. It is quite evident that Great Britain will in the future purchase wheat from all the countries from which she buys to-day so long as they have any to sell. For instance, it is an improbable thing that the United Kingdom will not import from Argentina, a country in which she enjoys a great volume of trade and in whose development she is financially interested to a very great extent. Considering the United Kingdom's consumption of wheat to-day, is limited and not likely to increase, I ask hon. gentlemen opposite, what will become of the surplus production of wheat in this country when it reaches, say three or four hundred million bushels? The Englishman is rather a determined character, and I do not think it possible that the Conservative party of Canada can force him to eat 400,000,000 bushels of wheat when he only requires 200,000,000. 'What we have we'll hold,' is one of the mottoes of the Britisher; but while he insists upon holding what he has, he will be just as strong in refusing to take what he does not want. It is impossible to expect that the United Kingdom can consume or will purchase any large proportion of the surplus wheat that this country will have in a few years. Our population, no matter how rapidly it grows, can consume only a small portion of our total production. Hon. gentlemen opposite said during the last election that our wheat must not be exported to the United States, and that it was a bad thing to have wheat trade run in that direction. If that were true, the United States could injure Canada instantly, simply by removing their duty upon Canadian wheat, thus allowing our wheat to flow into that country as demanded. According to hon. gentlemen opposite that would be disastrous to this country. How helpless we are to prevent this event if the United States simply removed the duty upon wheat. Now, what has happened since September last? Do hon. gentlemen opposite entertain the same views that they did a few months ago?

I do not think so. It is only a few weeks ago now, that the Minister of Trade and Commerce, was compelled to ask the Inter-State Commerce Commission of the United States to fix a freight rate for wheat for export, later to fix a traffic rate for wheat for milling in bond, and later to fix a traffic rate for wheat exported to the United States for consumption. That hardly agrees with the position which hon. gentlemen opposite took a few months ago. If that direction of wheat trade is a necessity and is proper to-day, why was it so objectionable a few months ago? Hon. gentlemen opposite attribute this circumstance to what they call unusual conditions. Well, there were some unusual conditions. The harvest was late, it is true; and the railways were unable to handle the whole quantity of wheat available for export. It is true, the conditions are unusual. But the unusual conditions are, that western Canada is producing grain and other products at a rate which no other country in the world has done, and these unusual conditions I submit, will prevail in the future. I say it is an improbable thing that the Canadian railways for a great number of years to come, will be able to handle the surplus productions of the west, which will be available for export.

Now, hon. gentlemen opposite in the past taunted the Liberal party for not securing markets for the surplus productions of this western country. As I have said, the opportunity came and they attempted to secure the same. The west, the commercial hope of Canada, needed additional markets for its surplus productions, and the late government sought a remedy for this condition of affairs. Hon. gentlemen opposite opposed their efforts, with the result that this possible remedy has passed away from the Canadian west. I would like hon. gentlemen opposite to tell this House and this country how they are going to meet the necessities of the three western provinces for a market for their surplus productions, which are very great this year, and which will rapidly grow from year to year. Is it to be wondered that there is unrest in the west to-day? Can you expect them to be satisfied with a restricted purchasing market after refusing them the right to extend their selling markets? Is it any wonder they are restive under our tariff exactions? I think they have a substantial grievance. It calls for a remedy. Now, Sir, in the year 1910, the present Prime Minister, while speaking upon the address at the opening of parliament, discussed the similarity between the conditions in western Canada and the conditions in the western States. He was referring to the matter of the recent visit of the present leader of the opposition to that western country, and was commenting upon the addresses which were made to him. The present Prime Minister said:

> So I come for a moment to the visit of my right hon. friend the Prime Minister to the west. I observed that he was met in western Canada by some of these very problems to which I have alluded. One of the very first questions which he encountered in meeting various delegations and assemblages of the people in that country was that of the tariff, and I am bound to say that in some of the addresses which were presented to him, and in some of the speeches which were made to him by the spokesman of these various delegations, the Prime Minister found as I have no doubt, a very close and perhaps very interesting reminiscence of some speeches which he delivered in that great western country in the year 1894.

He continues:

> Well, the farmers of the west were so much bewildered by what my right hon. friend said out there that they are coming down here 500 strong on the 16th of December to find out what it all means. When they arrive, I hope he will have something a little more definite to tell them than what he told them in his speech to which I have just alluded.
> Speaking of his policy, he said at Saskatoon:
> It will aim, having in view the commonweal of our common country, to go as far as may be justifiable towards the trade policy of England.
> That is exactly what the west complains of. It complains that his policy has only been aiming for the past 15 years and up to the present has not hit anything—certainly not hit anything in the shape of what the right hon. gentleman submitted as his policy in 1894.

Well, I submit Sir, that under that agreement, which was the issue in the recent election, the then Prime Minister and his government did make an honest endeavour to obtain some additional markets and to meet the claims of these western provinces in some degree in the way of tariff concessions. The present Prime Minister will hear the western farmers. Again the Prime Minister says:

> But the farmers of the west say something more. They say there ought to be lower duties on agricultural implements, that they are paying higher prices for Canadian implements than these implements are sold for abroad. I say the government is derelict in its duty in not having brought down to parliament direct and positive information on this subject, and I say that if the claims that are made are true there ought to be a remedy. And I want to know from the government whether they believe them to be true or not. If they say that they do not know, I ask why they have not taken means to know; if they say that these claims are not true, I ask upon what evidence they base that assertion and what they propose to do in the premises.

Well, now, one would expect that the present Prime Minister after taunting the present leader of the opposition, and his party, thus, for not having obtained that which the west was then demanding, namely, markets, taunting the then government for not having something to say respecting the wishes of the farmer, respecting the cost of agricultural implements, one would expect, I say, from the Minister of Finance, speaking on the behalf of the government, to hear something on the matter of markets and tariffs, both of which are of such interest to the prairie provinces. One might have expected to hear from the government a statement to the effect that they had made some investigation as to whether agricultural implements manufactured in Canada were selling at higher rates in the Canadian west than in the American west, and if they found that to be the case that they were providing a remedy such as they said the present leader of the opposition should have found.

Hon. gentlemen, when they were in opposition, promised this country time and time again that they could find ample markets somewhere for our surplus products. They condemned the late government for not doing so. I have in my hand a campaign document of the Conservative party. I would just like to refer to it and when I have finished it I will conclude my remarks. This political document is entitled 'Where are the new markets'? That is a question that is quite apropos to be asked of the government to-day. That is a question that a great number of people in this country, and particularly in the west, are asking themselves:

> The Liberals were to open up markets for farm produce in the United States and other countries. Have they done so?

Well, we tried to but failed. The government party opposed our efforts. Hon. gentlemen opposite now have their opportunity. Will they obtain markets in the United States or in any other country?

> The British market is free as before, but no more so. The embargo against Canadian cattle remains, and will be harder to remove because of our freer quarantine relations with the United States.

Hon. gentlemen promised this country to obtain preferential rates in the British market. Will they do so? Will they undertake to obtain the removal of the embargo against Canadian cattle? A preference in the British market upon food products is a thing that I do not anticipate can be brought about by the present government nor do I believe it is likely ever to happen. As my hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. Clark) remarked the other night, at the opening of the British House of Commons a few days ago the Prime Minister asked the leader of the opposition, Mr. Bonar Law, what had become of the usual amendment to the address respecting tariff reform. He asked him if tariff reform had gone on a long journey or if it was taking the rest cure. However, hon. gentlemen opposite have been promising this country for many years that they could obtain preferential treatment for Canadian products in the United Kingdom. It is up to these hon. gentlemen now to implement their promise and they boast constantly of their ability and intention to implement their promises. This pamphlet goes on to say:

> The United States duty on our farm products is still prohibitive.

Are hon. gentlemen opposite going to obtain a reduction? Are they going to diminish the prohibition or will they remove the prohibition altogether? Then it says further:

> The German market, which will take millions of our farm products, has been absolutely closed to Canada by the surtax added to the high tariff.

That difficulty has been removed. We will not trouble hon. gentlemen with that task. The statement goes on:

> The West Indies have raised their duties against us in spite of our preferenec to them.

Within a few days there will meet in conference in Ottawa with members of the Canadian government delegates from the West Indies, and one of the purposes of that conference is the discussion of a preference tariff rate on Canadian exports in the British West Indies. I trust the conference will be successful and that when it has concluded they will be able to announce an arrangement by which Canada may export her products to the British West Indies under a preference tariff rate. But, I doubt very much whether it is possible of accomplishment. There are one or two matters which will develop Canadian trade with the British West Indies to a very much greater degree possibly than a tariff preference; I refer particularly to the improvement of transportation and reduction of cable rates. But, if we were to obtain increased markets in Australia and the British West Indies, as the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster) desires and hopes, it means ultimately very little, and by no means will it satisfy the demands of the Canadian people for increased markets.

I am sure that the country will be much disappointed to-day that in the first budget presented by the government to parliament and the country, there was not some intimation from the government or from the Minister of Finance that they were about to implement their promise to reduce public expenditures, and to reduce the rate of taxation. There will be great disappointment in the country that they did not announce what is to be the tariff policy of the government in the future.

Mr. EMMERSON. What is the date of the document from which the hon. gentleman quoted?

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax). 1908. We shall soon learn, I assume, whether the government will practise in the future what they preached in the past, and we will soon be in a position to determine whether they can give to this country the many things they promised.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN (South York). Mr. Speaker, I have listened with a good deal of interest to the new Minister of Finance (Mr. White) making his first deliverance in this House, and I have also listened with interest to the first deliverance of the new financial critic of the opposition (Mr. A. K. Maclean). I intend to take little notice of what either of them said, other than to compliment them on the way they presented their cases. But, I wish to say that while I agree largely with what has been said by the new Minister of Finance in regard to the financial condition of Canada, I was disappointed on account of the absence of any reference to a matter of the greatest importance.

In that speech there was no reference to the question of Canada's participation in Imperial defence, and that is a question which to my mind stands out away and beyond and above any question which has come before us for discussion this session. For some years past the British Empire has been in jeopardy; her supremacy has been threatened, and the British people are concerned as to the fate of that glorious empire in the great war which seems to be impending. That is the one and supreme question of the day for loyal Canadians as well as for all other British subjects, and hence it is that I regret a reference to it found no part in the speech of the Minister of Finance. The hon. gentleman told us that the progress of Canada depended on the rush of immigration and on the rush of money from Britain for purposes of development. England is the fountain-head of our money supply, and unless England is maintained supreme in her political power and in her commercial wealth, then England cannot supply the money for the development of the resources of the associated states of the empire. The financial requirements of Canada to-day are not millions but billions. Millions are required to complete our railway systems, to increase railway accommodation in the Canadian west, to establish the great steamship lines that have become absolutely necessary in the interests of our trade, to build our ocean terminals, to develop our natural resources and to increase our expanding industrial enterprises. From the motherland alone can we obtain that money, and should that threatened war come to-day or to-morrow, and should Great Britain be compelled to spend vast sums for her defence, then will the supplies of money from the motherland to Canada be cut off and consequent disaster overtake our enterprises. The Grand Trunk Pacific, the Canadian Northern, the Canadian Pacific railway, our great steamship companies, our municipalities, our provinces, the Dominion itself, have to go to the London market to secure the money they need, and for our own self-preservation, if not in furtherance of the higher Imperial ideas which ought to actuate all British subjects, it is necessary for us to join in the maintenance of the supremacy of the British Empire. We were told to-day in the budget speech that for three successive years, we have had a surplus of $30,000,000 a year, and would it be too much to ask of the people of Canada that they should donate five million or ten million dollars a year of that surplus for Imperial defence at this time of momentous crisis in the history of the empire? Would it be too much to ask Canada that she should vote ten million dollars a year to help maintain the supremacy of the British fleet, and also to maintain what I believe in, a Canadian navy in this country. If we borrowed five hundred million dollars from the old land (and we will have to borrow it within the next year or two) we could get that money at say, four per cent, and at four per cent the interest on five hundred million dollars would be twenty million dollars annually. Would it not be a wise step if we gave an additional two per cent., or say six per cent in all, on five hundred million dollars and contributed the extra two per cent. of $10,000,000 a year in the shape of an insurance fund, to secure the maintenance of the British navy. I say that the best investment this country could enter on, would be to join in sharing the cost of maintaining the British navy, and by thus securing the supremacy of England, ensure for ourselves that supply of capital which is so essential to our national development. The disaster which might result from a great war in Europe, would stop that settlement which is now proceeding apace in the west; the market for grain might or might not be improved, but the lack of those supplies of money which we now get from England would cause a tie-up from one end of Canada to the other.

Bad times would be created in the United States, there would be bad times all the world over and if that is so if we have such a full treasury now, is it not on the line of good judgment and of prudence that we at least ought to come forward and contribute something towards the maintenance and security of the empire, and so help to maintain the security of our own country? If we are to remain on this continent and be a power we must have something in the way of sea power. We cannot be on the continent of North America unless we have sea power like every country in the past that has amounted to anything. The problems that are ahead of us are such that we ought to have sea power in order to maintain our position. All countries in the past that ever amounted to anything, that ever made a name in history, developed at some time a sea power and set aside large sums of their revenue for the maintenance of a navy as well as of an army. We in Canada have a magnificent sea position. We have a magnificent opportunity for sea power on the Atlantic, and we must be equal to it. We must protect it if we wish to enjoy it. We are also developing now a great sea outlook on the Pacific ocean, and if we are to realize the future we predict, we must do something in the way of establishing a sea power on the Pacific. We have been talking for years about our being descended from the French and English races and about the approach to America by way of the St. Lawrence and through the deeds of Englishmen and of Frenchmen. We have come to think a great deal of our history in connection with the Atlantic ocean and what might be called the Atlantic outlook. But there was a greater approach to America than either the English or the French and that was the Spanish approach by Mexico across the Isthmus, through South America and by the Pacific. The Spaniards went up the Pacific coast and got as far as California and British Columbia, and eventually we have inherited in British Columbia what they had. What is the prospect there? The outlook on the Pacific is the greatest that any country ever had before it and that outlook is now open to Canada. We are on the Pacific, we are on the Atlantic. We look at Europe on the Atlantic and at an older and greater continent, Asia, on the Pacific. A great maritime future is about to be created in connection with the Pacific. The Panama canal is almost completed and a great maritime development will occur in connection with the Pacific. What is to be our attitude in connection with that? Are we to sit idle? Are we to do nothing in the way of developing sea power, of helping to defend our Atlantic and Pacific coasts. and doing our share in maintaining a navy competent to defend the trade of the whole empire including Canada? People in England are losing confidence in us and even now the taunt is being passed that Canada is sponging on the empire for her defence. The very country that is supplying us with these millions and millions of money for the development of our country is also supplying the money, the navy and the ships of war to defend our country. That should not be allowed to continue any longer. We should do something not only in the way of contributing towards the maintenance of the British navy, but in the way of maintaining a Canadian navy in this country. I know there has been objection in certain portions of this country to having a Canadian navy with the expense it would entail, but if we are to play the part that we ought to play on this continent. we ought to have a navy of our own, we ought to have naval schools, we ought to have naval colleges, and we ought to train our young men to man our own ships. If Canada is to become what she ought to be she ought to start a great ship-building industry on the Atlantic coast. We have the iron and the coal, and we require these great ships. To-day Canada could use three or four lines of the highest class of ship ever built for the conveyance of her commerce across the Atlantic, and a greater commerce is coming on the Pacific, a commerce of which Canada ought to be the centre. Every ship required in that trade, ought to be built in Canada out of Canadian iron by Canadian workmen and as a school for the creation of a Canadian commercial marine and of a great Canadian navy for defence purposes in association with the mother country.

Mr. BELAND. That is besides the money voted for a contribution?

Mr. MACLEAN (South York). Besides the money in the way of contribution. That contribution ought to have started a year ago; it should start this year, and it should be an effective contribution.

People say that a navy is not required by a farming community like Canada. Any one who studies history will be convinced that the best security a nation can have is some kind of sea power or at least association with a country that has a great navy. That opportunity is open to us. England has a navy that defends everybody all the world over.

The time has come when we ought to contribute something and we ought to contribute it liberally. Trouble may come any day, trouble that may end in England losing her supremacy, and if she should lose her supremacy, what would come to us in this country? We might lose all our connection with the mother country, we might have to go in with the United States, which I would not like to see, or we might have some European power assuming a supremacy over us—and we might have a foreign master. As to what Canadians hope for their country, that is not the thing they have been dreaming about, but in some way they have been allowed to go to sleep on this question, they have ignored the question and have declined to face it. They must face it, and must elect what they are going to do in the way of maintaining the British navy and of establishing some kind of navy of our own.

There is something else. We are connected with England in the matter of trade and of interests. She gives us all the money we require at present for our development, but we are connected with England in upholding her institutions as the best political institutions that are in the world to-day.

If England were losing her political supremacy, her political institutions would be in danger, and they would be in danger here in Canada; and, as I said before, the outcome might be, that our neighbours to the south might think that the best thing they could do would be to incorporate Canada. Now our institutions are very superior to theirs. The institutions in the United States to-day are on trial. They have not got the constitution that we have. They cannot deal with their political problems in the way that we can deal with them; and we would find ourselves losing our powers of self-government, losing the splendid system that we have, and in danger of having to adopt another system that was not suited to our country. So that I say from the monetary point of view, from the point of view of getting all the money that we require in this country from England, we ought to contribute liberally to the maintenance of the British navy, and we ought to do something in the way of creating a Canadian navy. We ought to do it now, and do it liberally; and if the word went out that Canada was behind the motherland and was prepared to contribute liberally for the defence of the empire, the peace of the world would be assured. Advantage is being taken of the fact that Canada has failed in doing her duty. If the declaration went out now that Canada was prepared to do her duty, and that a feature of the budget speech every year in this country was a contribution of, to my mind, of at least $10,000,000 a year, there would be very little talk of war in the old land, the other sister states would be encouraged to do the same thing, and those powers that now think of putting an end to England's supremacy in trade and on the ocean, would reconsider their position, and would be prepared to admit that they could not interfere with that supremacy. Mr. Winston Churchill made a most excellent remark the other day, when he was dealing with the British navy. He said: To England a navy is a necessity; to Germany it was a luxury. The same thing is true of Canada. We want some kind of sea power in this country, some kind of navy, if we are to maintain our position on the two oceans, and to build up that great trade that I hope is in store for us. There is a great land trade being developed in this country; we already see the first signs of it; it is overwhelming our railways, and they are not able to provide the needed accommodation. A greater trade on the ocean between Europe and Canada, and between Canada and Asia, is in sight, but our participation in that trade to the hoped for extent, will depend on the fact that we have maritime institutions, and that we develop and cultivate these institutions just as the motherland has developed them. I regard a navy and a contribution to the naval defence fund, as a necessity to Canada. Therefore, it is to me, a matter of regret that the budget statement made here to-day, contains no provision for dealing with these questions, more especially after the incidents of the last two or three years, after the statement that has been made in the Imperial House time after time, where the one question to-day is, how to settle the social problems that are pressing for consideration and how to maintain a navy in such a position so that England will not lose her supremacy and her leadership in trade. It is the question that presents itself every day in England, and every morning when they open the papers, the people there do not know the moment they will read that a great war has been precipitated. England to-day, while she has confidence in her ability to maintain her own defence, sees how serious the situation is, and the question presents itself every day to the people of the old land: 'Is a great war to break out, and is England to lose her supremacy? Is she to fight for her trade and for her life, and even for her colonies?' They do not come to us every day, and say: 'We are in trouble.' They never have yet come to us in that way; but we know that the navy of England is behind Canada. It is the British navy to-day that maintains the Dominion of Canada, and to that is due the fact that we are not under the jurisdiction of what is called the Monroe doctrine. If that is the case, and I say it is so, and if the people of the motherland do feel that their country is in jeopardy, that a great war threatens them, and threatens all Europe, I say that we are unworthy of calling ourselves British subjects, and unworthy of daily putting up a prayer in this House for the maintenance of the King's supremacy, if Canada does not come forward boldly and make a permanent and a large contribution toward the British navy, and does not come forward and begin to develop a navy in this country. We have made a start towards a navy in this country, and when the right hon. gentleman who leads the opposition introduced a measure for that purpose I supported the proposal. A great many people in this country have not supported that policy, we have been divided about it, but we were divided in Canada on the National Policy for a good many years. Nevertheless once the two parties came to see that the National Policy was essential to the country that division of feeling disappeared. And once the two parties in this country came to see that the naval supremacy of England was as essential to us as to the empire there would be unanimity of sentiment in Canada in favour of maintaining a navy here, and in making a large and regular contribution towards the maintenance of the British navy. Speaking for the province from which I come I can only say there is a widespread feeling in favour of such an expenditure. We are not afraid of it, and we are not afraid of doing our share toward the maintenance of a navy. I believe the feeling in British Columbia is altogether in favour of a strong naval policy, and in favour of the creation of a navy by Canada not only for the protection of trade and the maintenance of naval defence, but as the beginning of a real fighting navy of our own. The people of the maritime provinces are in favour of such a policy; and I believe the people of the province of Quebec if the question were fairly put before them, would be in favour of doing their share in maintaining the British navy, and doing something themselves in the way of establishing a Canadian navy. They come of a maritime people like the rest of the population of this country. They are largely descended from the people of Brittany , they are seafaring folk like the people of our maritime provinces. They would not like to see their sons drafted off to the navy, but I say they are all prepared to share in contributions of men and of money in the direction of maintaining a navy in Canada and doing something for the defence of the empire. It is said, by way of criticism, that Canada would have no voice in the direction of an Imperial navy if she contributed toward it. There is something in that, but the situation will gradually adjust itself. We have this to begin with: That an alliance is made between the daughter states and the motherland for defence purposes, and we, at least, would have as much say in that alliance as Japan and England had when the former country made an arrangement with Great Britain for the purposes of joint defence. We at least are a party to this joint arrangement, and out of that will gradually come some kind of unity, some kind of joint voice, some kind of say in connection with any great war that might arise in the future. The people of Canada are ready to-day to take part in maintaining the defence of this country. All they want is intelligent leadership on that policy, and I am not much in favour of the proposition that a question of that kind should be remitted to the people on a referendum. What is wanted on such a question is intelligent leadership by the leaders of the country and leadership in its parliament. Never will I be a party to a proposition that the question of the defence of this country, and our relations to the empire should be settled by a referendum to the people. That is a question of British responsible government which must be settled in parliament.

I trust this parliament will immediately take up this question of a contribution to the Imperial navy and of doing something to strengthening the navy that we have and make it a force able to assist in the defence of our own country and to join with the British navy in a great war if anything of that kind should come about. I am not speaking here, as I said, in favour of war, or of navies, but in favour of peace. And the thing that will assure the maintenance of peace is giving the nations of the world to know that not only has England the navy that she has and the money she is able to contribute for defence, but that she can command the money of the associated states Canada included, and the men of Canada, and the navy of Canada for her defence. If that goes abroad there will be no fear of war; on the contrary it will help to head off war. That being the case, the best investment this country could go into would be to make a regular and sufficient contribution for the Imperial navy out of these magnificent surpluses we have.

Mr. BELAND. Is the hon. gentleman (Mr. Maclean) conversant with the scheme proposed by the Montreal 'Star.'?

Mr. MACLEAN (South York). I have seen something of it. I have read portions of it at times. But I am speaking for myself and declaring a conviction that has been steadily growing upon me. We all know what patriotism is, it is some kind of devotion to your own country. There may be a certain selfishness in that, and sometimes in patriotism there is something that you cannot always justify. But a new thing is coming to the British people all over the world and the only way in which I can express it is to speak of it as the Imperial Conscience. And the Imperial Conscience has in it not only the idea of patriotism but the idea of humanity and brotherhood. And in it there is the belief that the greatest thing that can be done for humanity, brotherhood and progress is to keep a strong British navy which will be devoted not only to the defence of the empire but to the uplift of humanity at large. British institutions to-day, as I have said on the floor of this House, promise more for humanity than any other institutions on earth. And you cannot maintain these institutions and these ideas of brotherhood and humanity unless you have the big policeman and the big ship behind them. I am in favour of the big ship and the big policeman to maintain the peace of the world. That has been proven sound doctrine time and again. But we have not recognized it thus far; we have put it off, we have dallied with it. It was trifled with even in the last election; it is hardly being dealt with even now, though it is the question of supreme moment. And I have risen in my place to-night to direct the attention of this House to this question as one of the greatest before the Canadian people to-day. It transcends all other questions. If you consider the development of our country, I say it is a matter of money, and you must get that money from the people who are willing to lend it to us and who are lending it to us now. But if they lose their supremacy, their control of the sea, they can no longer assist us. Why, we should be financially bankrupt. There would be financial stringency throughout America. It is in the interests of the United States that a great war should be avoided, and the only way to avoid it, I say, is for Canada to let the mother country know that we are behind them and are willing to pay our share. We are a people now of seven millions, we shall soon be a people of ten millions, and, as I said, we look out on two oceans; we look out upon Europe and upon Asia, and we propose to trade with both. And it is my belief—it may be only a vision, but I believe it—that the centre of the great British empire will eventually be in North America. Then, if we have our navy, and if sea power does some day pass from the motherland, it can pass from the motherland to her greater daughter, this Canada which looks out on both the Atlantic and the Pacific. I say that is not a dream. Why, it is coming so fast that we can hardly follow it. The seat of the empire is coming to this northern half of the continent, and this northern half of the continent is qualified to be the seat of the empire. I read a most remarkable article in the 'Fortnightly Review,' not long ago. It described how North Western Europe had controlled the whole destinies of the world for the last 1,500 years—that little corner of Europe, including Great Britain, France, Germany and the Scandinavian countries. And the writer showed that this was the result of geographic and cosmic reasons. One reason was that in that little corner of Europe, where political and commercial power is centred to-day, a man can work for his livelihood every day in the year, and not succumb, but can keep his vigour and energy; a man can work every day in the field in France, Germany or Great Britain, and so he builds up his country. In Spain, for instance, this was impossible; there was indolence there, and enervation, for climatic reasons. But the still greater reason was, that that corner of Europe commanded the seas of the world. The writer made this further remarkable generalization—that there was a similar north western corner in America that would occupy the same position in regard to the Pacific, and that was composed of British Columbia and the states of the American union, immediately to the south. This region, he said, would be the seat of a greater maritime power than even the one that exists to-day in northwestern Europe. Well, if that is our destiny, if we have on our Atlantic seaboard the hardy seafaring people that are there to-day, and if we develop the same kind of people on the Pacific, then as surely as the sun shall rise to-morrow morning, the supremacy of the sea will ultimately have its seat in Canada, on our two seaboards, if we are but true to ourselves, if we realise the importance of sea power and do something to maintain it. It is a destiny for Canada that few of us dream of. Yet, to my mind, it seems near at hand. And it would come rapidly, and we should help to assure its realisation if we but begin the good work that is waiting to be done. It will not do to put it off. That war may come in Europe any day; England may be jeopardized any day; her country may be invaded and even her navy be beaten at sea. She may not be able to fight at sea two great powers combined against her. She is trying to-day to maintain the two-power standard under the idea that some day she may be attacked.

Will we as Canadians, now a people of 7,000,000, soon to be 10,000,000, and with a future that no man can state in figures, are we to continue in this disgraceful position of refusing to do anything, the position of a poor relation towards a richer friend? It is discreditable to us, it must come to an end. A Canadian cannot hold up his head in England to-day, and say that he is justified in availing himself of all the privileges that the empire gives him. I saw a report of a conversation the other night, a Scotchman was coming down to Ottawa on the train, and he fell in with three or four men from Toronto, some of them were army officers. These men were talking about what they had done in South Africa, but the Scotchman shut them right up by saying, 'We paid for it all.' That is not quite correct, but it comes near the truth. People in England who are poorer than we are, even those poor colliers who are on strike to-day, men who are not getting a dollar a day, some of them in wages, are helping their richer neighbours to pay for the defence of the Canadian people. I say that we Canadians cannot hold up our heads and talk of being loyal subjects of the Crown and of the empire. It is unworthy of us to continue in this position, it is a discreditable position to occupy; and I hope before this session closes we will have some kind of a declaration of policy, other than a suggestion that the matter will be referred to the people by a referendum. I say that out of that $30,000,000 of surplus we have in our treasury to-day we should make a contribution of $10,000,000 towards the defence of the empire, either by building a Dreadnought or by direct contribution. I would like to see a statement that the Canadian navy, such as it is, is to be strengthened, that we are to build ships in our own shipyards out of our own iron, ships of commerce and ships of war. I would like to see a statement go out that the finest naval schools in the world are to be established, one on the Atlantic and one on the Pacific. I read the other day in an American magazine that the greatest university in the United States to-day is their naval university for the training of their young men. There are more good men being trained in the naval college of the United States to-day, competent not only for defence but for useful citizenship, than in all their other colleges. I want naval colleges like that for this country, one on the Atlantic and one on the Pacific. I want to see the young men of the maritime provinces, on both sides of the Dominion, trained in naval schools, that they may be able to serve their country and serve the empire in time of need, trained to serve both in our commercial marine and on our warships, such as we have. I think there will be no difficulty in persuading the Canadian people to do this as a part of their duty to the empire, from this time onward. I wish to see that stigma now resting upon the Canadian people removed, I do not want to see the Canadian people depending for their defence any longer upon the workers of the old country. Our country could not stand for six months unless we had a fighting force ourselves, and had the ships and the weight of the empire behind us. They are talking now in the United States about raiding Mexico. Some day the talk will be about raiding Canada. But they will not talk of raiding us if we are prepared to do something to defend ourselves. The way to ensure our future and develop our country along the lines of safety is to ally ourselves with the old land for the purposes of naval defence. When we are in alliance with the old land, and when we contribute our share towards the creation of the British navy, we contribute something towards the creation of a navy of our own.

Now I leave this question before the House. I have no motion to present in the matter. But I do think that we ought to bring this question up now, in view of the great surplus we have this year, and the still greater surplus that we are likely to have next year, and from now onward. If we have got the money, and if the duty is upon us, I think the time has arrived when we should act the manly part, the patriotic part, and make a contribution that will raise us in the estimation of all mankind. If we refuse to do our duty we will no longer be able to boast of our national manhood, nor of our individual manhood. We will remain in the degrading position of being dependent on somebody else for our defence. For my part I am willing to contribute, and I know the people I represent in this House are willing to contribute their part. I believe my province is willing to contribute its part, and I have confidence that every other province will be willing to contribute its part toward the maintenance of the defence of the empire, towards the creating of some kind of a navy of our own, towards the establishment of naval colleges on our two ocean coasts. I am also in favour of spending liberally in creating a shipbuilding industry. It will be an easy matter to arrange for the transfer of some of the great shipyards of the mother country over to Canada. We have got the iron, and we have got the mechanics, and we have got the money to pay for the development of such a shipbuilding industry. All it wants is a determination of the people to do something, and all the people want is leadership, and an assertion of our manhood.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, March 14, 1912.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

FISHERIES ACT AMENDMENT.

Hon. J. D. HAZEN (Minister of Marine and Fisheries) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 140) to amend the Fisheries Act. He said: This Bill has reference to the oyster fisheries of the lower provinces. Hon. gentlemen, I think, are aware that in late years these fisheries, which were at one time very valuable, have now become, owing to poor fishing, largely depleted, and the result has been that the fisheries show a falling off in the output year by year. For some years past the Commissioner of Fisheries in my department has been endeavouring to come to some arrangement with the governments of the provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island, with a view to the improvement of these fisheries. The matter was taken up by my predecessor in the department with the governments of those three provinces, and a proposal was made that fishing leases should be granted by the Dominion Government. Unfortunately that proposition has not been accepted by all the provincial governments, for, while Nova Scotia and New Brunswick have signified their willingness to sign an agreement, the province of Prince Edward Island refused to do so. Some objection seems to have arisen of late also in New Brunswick. The result is that the government is face to face with this condition of affairs, that unless something is done, within a few years time that industry, which was at one time so flourishing and valuable, will be largely depleted, and is in great danger of disappearing altogether. Perhaps the best way to explain the Bill would be to read it:

1. The Fisheries Act, chapter 45 of the Revised Statutes, 1906, is amended by inserting the following section immediately after section 67:

67a. The Governor in Council may, upon such terms and conditions as are agreed upon, authorize the government of any province to grant leases of such areas of the sea coast, bays, inlets, harbours, creeks, rivers and estuaries of such province as the government of such province considers suitable for the cultivation and production of oysters, and any person to whom such leases are granted by such province shall, subject to the Fishery regulations of Canada, have the exclusive right to the oysters produced or found on the beds within the limits of their respective leases; provided that, in the event of such areas, or any part thereof, being in a public harbour, nothing in this section shall prejudice the right or title of the Dominion to the enjoyment and use of such harbour for every purpose other than the cultivation and production of oysters.

In other words, it is proposed that an order should be given to the Governor in Council to authorize the different provincial governments to grant leases of those oyster beds, subject to regulations to be approved by the Governor in Council, and subject to regulations prescribed by order in council under the Fisheries Act of the Dominion of Canada. The view the department takes is that something has to be done to prevent the destruction of those fisheries, and if the provinces themselves will take over those beds, subject to the approval of the Governor in Council, and sublet them to individuals, the effect, it is hoped and expected, will be the restoring and replenishing of those oyster beds. I may say that before taking this course I took the precaution to get the opinion of the Department of Justice as to the effect this legislation might have on any litigation that is now pending regarding fishery rights as between the Dominion and the provinces; and the deputy minister of the Department of Justice has given the opinion that no rights of the Dominion will be prejudiced.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE BUDGET.

House resumed the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. White (Leeds) for the House to go into Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. ALPHONSE VERVILLE (Maisonneuve). Mr. Speaker, I want to congratulate the hon. Finance Minister (Mr. White) on the impartial manner in which he has presented the budget to the House. It is the first time in the history of Canada, as I understand, that we have had the announcement of a surplus of $39,000,000. I observe that my hon. friend from South York (Mr. Maclean) last night expressed himself as being very anxious to have $10,000,000 expended on the defence of the empire. I hope before I get through my remarks to be able to convince the Minister of Finance that there are many other places to put that $39,000,000 instead of contributing it to the defence of the empire; I mean by a lowering of taxation as much as possible. We have heard during this present session many arguments on protection pro and con, and from many of the remarks made I for one have come to the conclusion that self-interest seems to have priority over the interest of the masses of the community. A well-read man might believe that we have gone back to ancient history, as some of the arguments used during this debate were put forward almost in the same form as far back as the fifth century.

The protection of Trusts, which is the furnishing to the few the means of getting rich at the expense of the community at large, is nothing new and will continue I suppose as long as the masses which compose this nation allow themselves to be misled into the belief that their interests rest on such a policy.

It is a well-known fact among those who are accustomed to gauge public opinion that this so-called protection as presented is not so popular amongst the masses as it appears to be. The foremost answer to this is, of course, that the people of the country have emphatically pronounced in favour of the same and that it so appears by the last election returns. This, however, is far from conclusive.

Let a policy similar to that presented at the last election, go fairly and squarely before the people; let all the politicians, trusts and manufacturers be honest enough not to mix up things and cloud the issue by screaming treason, waving the flag and appealing to every shade of prejudice, and I am confident that an enormous majority of the people would pronounce in favour of such a policy.

What is this treason of which we hear so much? If any treason exist, it is the conspiracy of the Trusts to compass the ruin of the masses of the people of Canada. Is it really treason of that nature that we hear so much about? I will leave the answer to those interested in combines. Where political parties enter into a fight it should be on a policy; it should be with some higher aim than simply to obtain power, and which ever party follows this doctrine will command more respect in the future.

Kings and Emperors in past centuries had more energy than our much prized popular governments have to-day, for as far back as the year 483 of this era, Emperor Zeno, after contemplating the effects of combinations in restraint of trade and loyal competition, had a proclamation issued to the effect that any one found guilty of preventing such loyal competition on food stuffs or other necessaries of life would be condemned to perpetual exile, whilst on the other hand any one guilty of the same offence in respect to articles of luxury was fined. It is plain to see that even in the 5th century there existed conditions and methods similar to those we have at present, and we find it also demonstrable that this Roman Emperor 1,439 years ago made an enormous distinction, by banishing the criminals for ever in the first instance so as to be sure that they would never return to elude the law.

We are not nearly so enlightened to-day, for the protective policy now in the ascendant seems to favour the very ones who should be severely punished because their only possible ultimate aim must be the accumulation of millions by the impoverishment of the people at large. Shall we allow this? Another glance at history shows us that similar conditions existed in France prior to 1789 and any one who wants to read history will admit that the effects of those conditions were not strange to the revolution of that year. It may be said with some appearance of truth that conditions in our country are not nearly so bad as any of those I have alluded to. I am not sure of that. In all communities it is considered good policy to cover over running sores and all things not pleasant to look upon, and we all know, at all events, that abuses of any nature are bound to bring about sooner or later the same results.

In an article on industrial and commercial conditions in Germany by Consul-General Frank H. Mason, prepared for the forthcoming 'Volume of Relations of the United States.' Mr. Mason said:

> In the report of this series for 1897 the remark was made that as an incident and condition of Germany's perfect organization and industrial growth, its leading productive industries had been syndicated to an extent probably unknown in any other country.
> What was true then is still more true to-day. The two hundred Trusts and Syndicates which are in existence in Germany at the beginning of 1899 are increasing in number day by day, until there is scarcely a single important product of manufacture of which the output, prices and conditions of sale are not governed by a combination or understanding between producers. One can scarcely open a German newspaper without finding a paragraph announcing a new combination of this kind or an article pointing to the recent notable multiplication of syndicated industries in England and in the United States as an example of what Germany should do for self protection.

Such is the condition in the great German Empire which on the floor of this House is offered as an example of good administration, and of the benefits of protection.

Speaking on the address in reply to the speech from the Throne at the beginning of the present session, I said, if my memory is correct, that if we kept on looking at Germany until the 12th day of January, we would probably see what the masses thought of this so called model government. Well, the 12th of January has passed, and newspapers have given the results, and some have also commented, but in a very moderate way and why? Because they anticipate in the near future that social conditions in that country may be easily applied to our own.

Oppression of the people by over taxation whether it be by tariff or otherwise, has the same effect in any civilized country in the world. We may succeed in hampering the movement towards emancipation and freedom for a certain period, but water will find its level and any one who has at heart the wellbeing of his country, and of his fellow men should be in favour of less taxation, less scandalous profits by the mergers and trusts. In any case we no longer live in a time when the people were unorganized masses dependent for their very existence, upon the will of an absolute ruler. Thank God the army of labour is organized and able to defend its rights. The people are awakening to their strength and power and will use it if necessary. They are commencing to understand that protection is a one sided affair as they have no protection for the energy they have to sell: labour.

What is a Trust? The courts of the United States have, in many cases rendered important decisions on this point. In the case of Richardson vs. Buhl, the Supreme Court of Michigan said:

> All combinations among persons or corporations for the purpose of raising or controlling the prices of merchandise or any of the necessities of life are monopolies and intolerable, and ought to receive condemnation of all courts.

Chief Justice Fuller in delivering the opinion of the Supreme Court in the Sugar case (known as the Knight case) said:

> All authorities agreed that in order to vitiate a contract or combination, it is not essential that it shall be a complete monopoly; it is sufficient if it really tends to that end, and to deprive the public of the advantages which follow free competition.

It may be interesting to explain the mode of procedure adopted in the formation of these trusts which are a mere conspiracy to rob the public. We have a good example of these methods in the formation of the Whisky Trust in the United States on July 1, 1898. First of all it is essential to find a promoter whose mission is to carry the operation to a successful end. This promoter must possess two essential qualifications; first, he must be bold and unscrupulous, and second he must have neither conscience nor sense of honour.

To induce a number of industries to amalgamate is sometimes a difficult task; prudence must be exercised. So our promoter will first proceed by persuasion, always exposing the large amount of profits the special industry can realize, and also offering the manufacturer a good price for his co-operation. If he does not succeed he will offer a price far above the value, as is done in almost all cases, and also a special interest in the circulation. If the objections are too great he will spare no promises. If he is unsuccessful he will resort to threats, always arguing that it is of the greatest interest for the manufacturer to join, otherwise the Trust will be formed without him and he will have then to stand the consequences. If not successful with this method he will employ the last means at his disposal which so far have never failed. War will be declared upon the recalcitrant manufacturer, a commercial war to the death. The Trust will sell to his customers the same goods at lower prices and in some cases at cost price, knowing full well that they will be in a position to recompense themselves for whatever loss they may have sustained in the operation. They will go so far as to boycott merchants who will buy from that manufacturer. They will refuse him certain patented goods which he cannot purchase elsewhere and cripple him badly. They will then trace a circle around him and the pressure upon him will become so great that he will fall in the clutches of the Trust in a short space of time. An evident proof of this operation has been given by Mr. Clark who fought for a certain time the Whisky Trust in the United States and this is what he said:

> I entered the first Trust because I was facinated by the gigantic benefits laid before me by the trust, and also by the intolerable persecution to which I was subjected by the organization. It was rather against my principles to deprive myself of my liberty. I was then a young man and well able to look after my own business. At last I decided to join and I felt remorse the very same day, although I gathered in great profits for a long time.

What Mr. Clark tells us, many others could corroborate if they dared, but the power of such organization to control the market and even the transportation in many cases prevents them from doing so. Such is the modus operandi in the formation of a trust.

Let us now examine the financial aspect in the formation of Trusts. We may cite as an example the Whisky Trust that Mr. Clark speaks about, and see how easy it is for them to realize dividends on non-existing stock better known as watered stock. On July the first, 1898, was formed the Whisky Trust. The full value of different individual industries absorbed (allowing a margin for overvaluation) was four million dollars. A corporation was then established with an authorized capital of 24 million dollars. 16 millions dollars in common stock and 8 million dollars in preferred stock. Then the following combination intervened.

A financial syndicate was formed in view of facilitating the operation of the Trust. Each of the owners of the absorbed concerns received in kind full value of their individual enterprises, $4,000,000. They received over and above $4,000,000 in common stock, thus obtaining a net benefit of 100 per cent. In order to receipt itself the financial syndicate received $4,000,000 of preferred stock plus $6,000,000 of common stock, net benefits 150 per cent.

The promoter for his services of very doubtful value to the consumers, received $6,000,000 in common stock. The formation of some of our Trusts in this country must surely be financed in a similar manner. Indeed we have absolute proof that such is the case. While we profess to be afraid of our next-door neighbours, from the commercial standpoint, it would seem that our great financiers are only too willing to copy in every detail their nefarious system of operations in respect to the formation of Trusts.

It is said that imitation is the sincerest flattery, but I doubt whether the people at large will appreciate such flattery when it is given at their expense, and at that of their feeling and educating their children.

I will now attempt to make a slight analysis of our good kind of Trusts in Canada, and if possible give some slight idea of the burden that the masses have to bear. I would also desire to suggest some material remedy, of course I cannot expect that my suggestions will immediately appeal to all the members of this House. But such as it is, the remedy I outline appears to me the only one available, and as to its urgency, I think that no one will express any doubt on the subject.

After carefully weighing the significance of the following data, still imperfect although collected at considerable pains, the members of the House will see. I hope that some drastic measures must be taken, not only to prevent the formation of new Trusts, but also to prevent the operation of those now in existence.

The 'Monetary Times' of January 6th, 1912, published a list of about 40 mergers, giving in one column the capitalization of the merger and in another the capital of the individual companies absorbed, including bonds. The aggregate capitalization of thirty eight of these mergers, according to figures given by the 'Monetary Times,' stands as follows:

Capitalization of mergers ..	$336,938,266
Aggregate capital of individual companies absorbed, including bonds	123,166,588
We can then conclude that the watered stock is ..	213,771,686

The population of Canada being 7,081,869, according to the last census returns, these thirty-eight mergers represent a mortgage of $47.50 on every man, woman and child in the country, or $250 on every family, of which mortgage more than two-thirds represent fictitious or watered stock. What is more important is that every workman's family has to pay about $23 of interest yearly upon the same. This is a heavy tax; yet it does not begin to show the situation of the Canadian public with respect to Trusts, for it does not include the Ice Trust recently formed, nor the Steel Trust whose capital, according to the 'Monetary Times,' aggregates nearly $100,000,000; nor the Sugar Trusts nor the beef, pork, milk, fruits, cereals, brewing or other food Trusts so detrimental in their present form to the well-being of the people; neither will the Oil Trust be found in the list, nor many of the Trusts on clothing. One that stands prominent is the United Shoe Machinery Company of Canada, with a capitalization of over $45,000,000, and with an annual dividend amounting to $6,117,264, nearly one dollar per head on our population. From all the information to hand, Trusts in Canada as at present constituted already represent an annual average tax of nearly $100 on each family, and this tends constantly to increase.

A glance at the business of the stock exchange of Toronto and Montreal will show this very clearly. McQuaig Bros., of the Montreal Stock Exchange, publish a list of 31 companies and mergers, of which 25 are Canadian, with a total authorized capital of $666,656,975, and a total issue of $932,712,775 which would appear to be beyond the law to the extent of $266,005,300.

Among those will be found the British Columbia Packers' Association, whose net book assets amount to $3,344.871, and whose profits in six years amount to $1,646,422, an average of 20 per cent on their total capital.

The Canada Cement merger is of great importance, as cement is being used more and more in building. If there were no merger, it would be more extensively used by workmen in building their own homes. This merger comprises no less than 10 companies, and appears to be capitalized as follows: Merger capital, $29,000,000; companies' capital, $17,000,000; watered stock, $12,000,000; net profits of merger (1910), $1,177,698.

The Canadian Locomotive Company is capitalized at $5,000,000. For a few years back their average net profits have been about 5 per cent, after payment of interest on their bonds at 7¾ per cent, and other charges. This year it is foreseen that their net earnings, after payment of bonds, will be about 18 per cent.

I need not speak of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. We all know what their capital is, and that a large portion of it came originally from government grants, although their earnings aggregate 17·26 per cent, and they are issuing more stock.

The Canadian Car Foundry Company is capitalized at some $14,000,000. Their profits, after deducting interest on bonds, amounted last year to over 14 per cent.

The Dominion Iron and Steel Company, and the Dominion Coal Company, who are now clamoring for bounties, are rather a poor-paying concern as mergers go. Just fancy only 4·28 per cent on $35,000,000 of stock, after payment of all interest on bonds and expenses. They, of course, also are issuing new stock. The bounties they are now endeavouring to obtain would mean more than $550,000 annually, and bring their percentage of net profits to about 7 per cent on their present stock. In this connection I wish to state the real labour conditions that exist in the Dominion iron and steel industry, as given by Professor McGill, who made an investigation of them a couple of years ago. In his report he says:

The coke ovens.—These are kept going night and day, the men attending them are mostly foreigners—228 come from Europe, 15 from the United Kingdom, 61 from Newfoundland, and 58 are Canadians. Most of the work is such that Canadians do not apply for it. They are divided into shifts. Taking the total, 272 work ten hours and 63 work twelve hours per shift.

The coke ovens have been greatly extended since this report. I am told that 800 men are employed in this department, 90 per cent of whom are foreigners and receive $1.40 per day. Continuous operation, 7 days per week, 365 days in the year.

Open hearth furnaces.—These are kept going night and day, and the men attending them work in two shifts. Taking the totals of the shifts, 306 men work twelve hours each, 7 work eleven hours, and 82 work ten hours. Of the total force about 36 per cent are Canadians, 29 per cent are Europeans, 19 per cent are Newfoundlanders, 8 per cent are British, and the remainder are Americans or West Indians.

In his department I am told the force employed is about 600. Melters, about 20, receive from $4.50 to $5 per day, and helpers $2.50, third helpers, $1.80, general labourers $1.40, the latter class constituting the majority.

The blast furnaces.—These also operate continuously, and the men are divided into two shifts. Taking the totals, 226 work twelve hours, 13 work eleven hours, and 64 work ten hours.

In this department blowers and heaters get $3.50 per day, second helpers $2.50, third helpers $1.80, and about 120 general labourers $1.40.

The mills.—There are about 430 men at work in the blooming, rail and rod mills. Of these, over 350 work in twelve-hour shifts, and the remainder work ten hours. The day force is larger than the night force. About fifty per cent of the men are Canadians, and about twenty-four per cent are from Newfoundland, so that the percentage of European labour is small. The mills are kept going continuously. There is some time lost.

In this department the pay is about the same as the above. There are a few well-paid rollers and heaters, but the majority receive a bare existence, or, to be concise, 14 cents per hour. A new feature has been introduced in the shape of a staff beginning work at nine o'clock Sunday evening, truly a remarkable state of things in a Christian country.

Speaking of the Transportation Department, the professor says:

There are about sixty-four men engaged at the piers loading and unloading vessels. This work lasts only during the summer months. The men are employed only during the summer, differing in this respect from the dock and wharf labourers in Halifax. When there are no vessels at the piers, the men are paid time wages, and the work is cleaning, &c. When the vessels are in, they work two twelve hour shifts, and are paid tonnage rates. It would be impossible for them to do as much in eight hours as in twelve. An eight hour law would mean the employment of three eight hour shifts. This would mean an increase in the force, and if the system and rates of wages remained the same, a decrease in individual earnings. The work, while the vessels are in, is steady, but when there are no ships in, it is light.

There are from 80 to 100 men running the engines, &c., on the company's tracks. These work in two twelve hour shifts.

Regarding work on the piers, it is true the work is seasonal, it is worse, cases have been known of men working 48 hours continuously in loading the vessels.

In the case of the locomotive men, please note that it calls for seven days per week with a 24 hour shift every two weeks.

Yards.—(350 men at $1.40 per day). In the yards, and stables about 200 men are employed. A few of these work twelve hours, and the majority ten per day. Much of the work requires no skill, and a considerable percentage of the labour is foreign. An eight hour day would lead to the employment of a larger number of men, but it is impossible to say what increase would be necessary.

Other Employees.—There are about two dozen gateman, watchmen and janitors, and about the same number of timekeepers and scalemen. All these 'work' twelve hours. An eight hour law would necessarily mean three eight hour shifts.

I am informed that the general labourers in the yards are ordered out on Sundays, on the one hand necessity is the whip and failure to turn out means the 'sack.'

The other employees not mentioned are the innovation of General Manager Butler, to wit: The spies and blue coated gentlemen under the charge of one Noble by name, but otherwise by occupation.

The employees have asked for an investigation by the Labour Department about two years ago, on the grounds that the fair wages resolution applied to the steel company, as receiving grants from public funds. They claim that the company were not paying current wages in the case of bricklayers, carpenters and others as labourers. Mr. Dubreuil, fair wages officer of the Labour Department, went to investigate; he sought an interview with General Manager Butler, who politely told him and the government he represented that they could go to a warmer place than in the ovens of the company, that they would not stand for any interference with their business.

Foreign Labour.—A little over 40 per cent of the employees are Canadians, 28 per cent are from the continent of Europe, 20 per cent are from Newfoundland, 7 per cent from the United Kingdom, and the remainder from the United States and the West Indies. The European labour comes mainly from Poland, Hungary, Italy and France, though almost every European nation is represented. The European labour is found chiefly in the yards, coke ovens and among the helpers at the open hearth furnaces. The Newfoundland labour is found also in these departments, and to a greater extent at the blast furnaces and in the mills. All told nearly 60 per cent of the labour is imported.

Wages.—The majority of the men are paid by the hour. A system of payment by tonnage or bonus has been introduced and is being extended. Between 500 and 600 men were affected by this system during the year 1908.

An anaylsis of the labour cost taken from their own figures of 1908 as being 2.03 which includes superintendence, will show the $1.40 men to be the major portion of the employees of this corporation.

The Mechanical Department.—About 400 men are engaged in this department. Of these 70 work twelve, and the remainder ten hours per shift, the day shift being much larger than the night shift. About 70 per cent of these men are Canadians, and nearly all the others are from Newfoundland and the United Kingdom. The men are machinists, foundry men, boiler makers, blacksmiths, pipe fitters, carpenters, pattern makers, &c.

Regarding the machinists, half of the staff are ordered out each Sunday.

Another incident worth noticing is the percentage of Canadians, which is dwindling, their places being taken by 'British born.'

The schedule for the trades is as follows:

TRADE AND SLIDING SCALE.

Machinist, from 30 cts. to 17½ cts.
Moulders, from 30 cts. to 17½ cts.
Pattern makers, from 27½ cts. to 22½ cts.
Carpenters, from 22½ cts to 20 cts.
Bricklayers, from 40 cts. to 36 cts.
Blacksmiths, from 27½ cts. to 17½ cts.
Boiler makers, from 27½ cts. to 17½ cts.
Pipe fitters, from 25 cts. to 17½ cts.

The policy of the company is to pay perhaps half a dozen in each department the maximum, the remainder having the incentive of the higher pay to lure them into all the pathways of envy, hatred, and uncharitableness. That is how they keep men divided.

The Nova Scotia Steel and Coal Company, however, has done better than this. The percentage earned on common stock, in 1910, was 10.97 per cent, and if they ever received bounties, this company will be placed on a really handsome basis as to profits.

The Dominion Textile Company, who have been clamouring that it was impossible to pay reasonable wages to men, women and children in their employ, and have tried to convince the Department of Labour that their employers had to submit for the present at least to starvation wages, are capitalized at about $14,000,000, and after payment of all charges the company nets annually some $990,000 to be divided amongst the shareholders, leaving besides a substantial surplus. Last year the holders of their preferred stock received the equivalent of 22.4 per cent on their holdings. In the last few days this company have had remorse and have decided to increase the wages of those poor people who have been clamouring for an increase for so long. I suppose when they are in a position to pay 22 per cent on their stock, which will probably run to 35 per cent or 40 per cent, they feel that they can give a slice of their vast earnings to those who have placed them in a position to earn that money.

The Montreal Cotton Company, Limited, on the other hand, with a capital of about $7,000,000, only shows an average earning of about 10 per cent on all stock.

Let us take the mergers of tramways and see the profits realized by them:

	Per cent.
Halifax	14·32
Montreal (preferred stock)	39·85
Toronto	15·14
Ottawa	15·38
Winnipeg	10

The Quebec Tramway Company is so overcapitalized that they were ashamed to publish their figures.

The holders of preferred stock in the Lake of the Woods Milling Company in 1907 earned 28.53 per cent on preferred stock, but having increased the latter by $1,250,000 in 1908 the dividends fell to 18.81 and 9.45 respectively, but this is far below the average and a mere accident.

As for the Montreal Light Heat and Power Company that very modest company only earned 12.38 per cent last year on a capital of $27,000,000, but they expect to do much better and pay an average semi-annual dividend of 10 per cent on all stock, which would mean more than 20 per cent.

The William A. Rogers, Ltd., Co., silver plating, capitalization $2,000,000, pay 36.50 per cent on preferred stock although this company is not only operating in Canada but in the United States.

These are a few of the mergers offered for sale by one member of the Montreal Stock Exchange. As will be seen the interest paid to these concerns represents an average of over 18 per cent which is enormous when we consider that the over-capitalization in the aggregate amounts to nearly ⅔ of the total sum. This represents an interest of nearly 54 per cent on the real capital invested.

The number is still increasing, and from an issue of the Dominion Bond Company we see that during the year 1911 nineteen new companies have been formed with a total capital of $23,125,000. It is also remarkable that companies that operate in necessaries of life are consolidating in a scandalous way, and amongst them we see the following:

Ames-Holden-McCready, Ltd ..	$1,000,000
Belding Paul Corticelli, Ltd.....	750,000
Canadian Cotton, Ltd..	1,250,000
Wm. Davies Co., Ltd..	1,850,000
International Milling Co..	1,250,000
Steel Radiator Co..	2,450,000
Sherwin-Williams Co..	525,000
Western Canada Flour Mills....	750,000
Matthews-Laing, Ltd..	1,200,000
Making a total of..	$11,025,000

One half the capitalization in the past year has been for consolidation of interests dealing in food stuffs.

I will now endeavour to expose to the House the capitalization of some of the mergers which it is important for the public to know. The Navigation merger is composed of the Richelieu Navigation Company and other companies with a capital of $10,000,000. The Paper merger is composed of the following companies: Montreal Paper Company, Canada Paper Company, Kinleth Paper Company, Barber Brothers, Toronto Paper Company, St. Lawrence Paper Company, Rolland Paper Company, Northern Paper Company—the capital stock to be $5,000,000.

The Laurentian Paper Company has issued bonds to the amount of $3,800,000.

Another merger which is of the greatest importance for the public to know something about is the bread merger. It is composed of the Breden Bread Company, Stuarts Limited, Geo. Weston, W. J. Boyd, H. C. Tomlon and other companies, with a capacity of 100,000,000 loaves per annum. These companies represent an aggregate value of $575,000, including good will. It is true that we hear of $1,000,000 in cash being put into the enterprise by the promoter. This unusual generosity has been made up to him, however, for he has capitalized other concerns at $5,000,000, thus reaping five hundred per cent.

The flour mills merger is organized under the name of Canadian Flour Mills, and is composed of the following companies: McLeod Milling Company, Canada Flour Mills Company, Campbell Company, Goldie & Company, Rutherford Milling Company, Carter & Company, and others. The united capacity of these mills is 4,500 barrels per day, but we cannot ascertain the amount of their capital which we are told is enormous. The earnings of the International Milling Company, with which this merger is connected, last year were nearly four times the amount required to pay the interest at 6 per cent upon the bonds issued. We can see the details in the 'Monetary Times' of July 1, 1911, page 121; July 15, 1911, pages 321 and 322; July 22, 1911, page 419.

The United Shoe Machinery Company of Canada is not a strange thing for any one, as it has been, and is now being, investigated by a special committee. The report of the 'Monetary Times' of July the 29th, 1911, page 47, gives us some details of the capitalization of the company.

Common stock..	$24,635,586	$28,599,434
Preferred stock..	9,490,059	9,515,400
Reserved..	1,500,000
Surplus..	6,124,756	5,787,107
Total capital..	$41,750,392	$43,901,941
Total dividends..	5,180,690	6,117,264

Number of shareholders, 7,106.

A glance at the number of manufacturing establishments will show the constant increase in capitalization of industries, the majority of which are engaged in preparing or handling necessaries of life. The capital of those establishments was, in 1900, $2,446,916,487, which was increased to $833,916,155 in 1905. This shows clearly the increased tendency toward combinations and mergers, although if we could have the latest facts, it would show a greater increase to 1910

The danger of increasing centralization of industrial interests is proven also by the number of employers' associations formed with similar ends in view:

Trade.	Number of Associations.
Building..	57
Metal..	52
Lumbering..	9
Printing..	8
Clothing..	6
Leather..	1
Paper..	1
Food and tobacco..	18
Licensed victuallers and brewers..	9

Trade.	Number of Associations.
Barbers	5
Agriculturists	14
Transport	5
General employers	20
Wholesale and retail merchants	45
Total	220

This number is now increased to 240.

Among the 39 mergers I have previously mentioned on the authority of the 'Monetary Times,' perhaps one of the most remarkable is The Canada Bread Co., Ltd. of Toronto. This merger is capitalized at $5,000,000. The companies absorbed are the following: Breden Bread Co., Geo. Weston & Co., H. C. Tomlon, Stuarts Ltd., W. J. Boyd. The total capital of these companies was $575,000. The public in the region where this Trust operates will therefore have to pay not only the interest and profits on the real capital invested, but also on about four and one half millions of more or less fictitious capital. At 6 per cent this would represent an annual tax of nearly one dollar per head on the population of Toronto. If we add to the Bread Trust and Milk Trust capitalized at $1,265,000 by the City Dairy Co., Ltd., Toronto, the real capital of which amounts to $175,000, including good will, we have $1,000,000 fictitious capital, or $60,000 per annum more that the citizens of Toronto have to pay without getting value.

This, however, is a mere bagatelle comparatively with the Canning Trust, the Dominion Canners, Ltd., of Hamilton, Ont., with a capitalization of $12,500,000. No less than 45 individual companies are included in this trust, and for the edification of the members of this House and the country, I will read the names of the companies involved. There may be amongst them names well known to the members of this House:—Aylmer Canning Co., Kent Canning Co., Dresden Canning Co., Grimsby Canning Co., Imperial Canning Co., Warehouse Canning Co., W. Boulter & Son, Ontario Pure Food Co., Lowery Bros., Bowlly Bros., L. N. Scherick & Co., Wellington Packing Co., Leamington Canning Co., Aylmer Condensed Milk Co. Ltd., Farmers' Canning Co., Hillier Preserving Co., Napanee Canning Co., Old Homestead Canning Co., St. Thomas Canning Co., Lakeside Canning Co. Ltd., Brighton Canning Co., Delhi Canning Co., F. R. Lalor Canning Co., Simcoe Canning Co., Lakeport Canning Co.. A. C. Miller Canning Co., Port Hope Preserving and Canning Co., Strathroy Canning Co., Miller & Co., Belle River Canning Co., A. B. Taylor Canning Co., West Lorne Canning Co., Amherst Canning Co., Bloomfield Packing Co., Burlington Canning Co., Jordon Station Canning & Preserving Co., Niagara Falls Canning Co., J. H. Wethey Ltd., Tilbury Canning Co.

Their total aggregate capital according to the 'Monetary Times' does not exceed $1,574,000, this would mean $10,000,000 more of fictitious capitalization, a sum of about $600,000 annual tax without value on people buying Canadian goods.

Mr. LALOR. Is the hon. gentleman sure of his figures as to the capitalization, when he says $12,000,000 and some odd hundred thousands? I can tell the hon. gentleman that he is positively wrong.

Mr. VERVILLE. My hon friend will have to blame the official journal from which I have taken the figures. I have taken from the 'Monetary Times.'

Mr. LALOR. As an officer of that company, I may tell the hon. gentleman that the capital is $2,200,000 preferred stock, and the same amount of common. I am glad to correct him in his figures.

Mr. VERVILLE. As I have already said, I am always citing from the 'Monetary Times', which is an official journal, and which has a pretty good standing. Of course I am willing to accept any correction the hon. gentleman may make; but at the same time it would be proper to have the correction made in the 'Monetary Times' likewise, which is a journal scattered over the country. Now if we are well informed a great many of these small institutions have since the formation of the Trust been closed, the consideration of small towns or villages has had no consideration, the consumers have felt to a large extent the formation of the Trust also the producer who has now only one buyer. The Trust I am informed goes further by setting the retail price to the corner grocery store. Here I wish to cite some paragraphs of the agreement which I have taken from the 'Grain Growers' Guide,' not a bad authority. The agreement has already been cited in the House more than once, but there are some things in it which I wish to put on the 'Hansard' in this connection.

I am quoting from the selling contract between the Dominion Canners Limited, and the wholesalers.

In consideration of the terms and conditions hereinafter contained, the wholesaler agrees to purchase exclusively from the company for a period of one year from date, all domestic canned fruits and vegetables which the wholesaler may require in their business of all kinds manufactured by the company and will also purchase at least 50 per cent of their total year's requirements of any other goods of a kind manufactured by the company, such as baked beans, jams, jellies, preserved fruits, condensed milk and evaporated cream, and further agrees not to contract for season 1911-12 or later until after July 1st, 1911.

1. The canned fruits and vegetables shall be sold under two groups known as 'A' and 'B', a list of which shall be published and sent to the wholesaler by the company, such list price to show the prices at which the goods will be sold in the different territories. The difference in prices between group 'A' and group 'B' being 2½ cents per dozen.

2. All private brands or labels shall be listed in group 'A'. The opening standard brands for groups 'A' and 'B' goods shall be lowest of the season for those brands.

3. On or before December 1st in each year, the prices of all canned fruits and vegetables sold under the brands comprised in groups 'A' and 'B' shall be advanced at least 2½ cents per dozen and may be advanced at other times as the company see fit.

4. The price of said goods shall be payable sixty days after the shipment without discount, or if paid within 20 days after shipment, a discount of 1½ per cent will be allowed. The company have the option as to the terms on which the goods shall be sold.

5. The company will assemble goods for assorted cars where inter-factory shipments are necessary at an extra cost of one cent per case on the whole car. Cars will be loaded at the nearest factory at which the goods can be most conveniently assembled.

6. The wholesaler hereby agrees not to sell or to allow any one in their employ to sell directly or indirectly to any person, who has not executed a similar contract and has not violated the same, either wholesaler or retailer by agent or otherwise, any of the products of the company whether now in stock or owned by them or to be acquired after the date hereof wheresoever or howsoever obtained, at less than the stipulated selling prices and terms in force from time to time as per lists to be issued by the company, a copy of the current selling price lists to be mailed to the wholesaler as soon as issued.

7. The wholesaler also agrees that they shall not give cash or credit notes, discounts, rebates or other benefits upon sales made or to be made of such products, nor shall they give or sell at a reduction or at an advance, other goods in consideration of sales of the products aforesaid which would in any way violate or reduce the selling price.

8. The wholesaler also agrees not to buy domestic canned fruit or vegetables manufactured by any other manufacturer nor shall they sell either on their own account or as agent or otherwise, the product of any other Canadian manufacturer of canned fruit or vegetables.

9. The wholesaler also covenants that they have not contracted for or bought any canned fruits or vegetables of the pack of 1910, put up by any other Canadian manufacturer, and any canned goods which they have in stock at the present time of other brands not listed in groups 'A' and 'B' shall be sold by them at not less than the prices fixed by the company for the sale of said 'B' group of canned fruits and vegetables.

10. The purchase and selling price lists in force from time to time during the continuance of this contract may be changed and other prices established, by mailing them, or otherwise notifying them to the wholesaler; opening prices to be named as late as possible in the season.

Mr. VERVILLE.

11. The wholesaler agrees not to sell or otherwise supply the products of the company to any person or company who have violated their contract with the company, after having received notice from the company that such violation has taken place. The company consents to the wholesaler selling to any other wholesaler who shall have executed a similar agreement hereto at the wholesale price, provided permission is first obtained from the company. The wholesaler also agrees to advise their salesmen of the terms of this contract, and the company also reserves the right to cancel the order for goods or any part thereof remaining unshipped in the event of the wholesaler committing a breach of any of the terms of this contract.

12. The wholesaler further agrees that when called upon, and in any event before payment of the discount hereinafter mentioned, they shall give unconditionally to the company a declaration sworn to by the wholesaler or by any member of the wholesale firm or by any traveller or any one in their employ designated by the company, showing that this contract has been carried out in all its terms. The wholesaler shall not be entitled to the discount until such declaration has been given and all invoices for goods sold have been paid. Said discount shall be forfeited as liquidated damages for failure to comply with all the terms of this contract. The said discount cannot be anticipated by deducting the same from the invoices.

13. In consideration of the wholesaler purchasing exclusively from the company, as hereinbefore set forth and complying with all the terms of the contract, the company agrees to pay and allow them a trade discount of ten per cent upon f.o.b. factory price of all canned vegetables so purchased, such discount to be paid half yearly on the first day of February in each year.

14. All canned fruits and vegetables sold to the wholesaler are hereby guaranteed as to quality.

15. Travellers' order books in quadruplicate will be provided by the company if required.

16. In case the wholesaler shall sell goods outside the province in which their head office is situated, upon request the company will supply them with price lists of the prices ruling in any other province in which they may solicit business, and they agree that in all cases they shall observe the price, terms and conditions ruling in such province.

17. The company reserves the right to introduce a special group at somewhat reduced prices, terms and discounts in order to meet special conditions in any locality or localities, if considered necessary.

18. In the event of a short pack caused by frost, drought or other unexpected causes, and consequent inability to put up a full pack, the company will make to full extent of their pack a pro rata delivery to all buyers whose orders are accepted prior to July 15. On any undelivered portion of 60 per cent of such booked orders the company will pay wholesalers 15 cents per case of two dozen tins. Subsequent orders to be booked subject to pack.

19. The company cannot guarantee delivery of any particular brands from any special factory, but they will give early orders and shipping instructions the preference.

20. The company agrees to ship the canned fruit and vegetables when ready. Payment shall be made by the wholesaler for goods ordered but not shipped on 1st December, and they will be held by the company for reasonable length of time thereafter, the wholesaler to pay storage at rate of ½ cent per case per month and insurance after that date.

21. The wholesaler agrees that all goods sold prior to December 1, 1910, shall be charged and dated from time of shipment, and that any unshipped portion or order so taken shall be charged up not later than December 1, 1910. The wholesaler also agrees that in the event of an advance being advised by the Dominion Canners or or before December 1, 1910, that all goods sold and unshipped at that time shall be charged immediately upon receiving notice of such advance. On all canned goods sold after the 1st December the wholesaler agrees to charge up to date of shipment at the prices ruling at the time of this shipment. Dated this.....day of .....1910.

An analysis of the business of the Montreal fish corporation will give us another million of watered stock, and $60,000 annual taxation.

Another food trust worth mentioning is the Matthews-Laing Ltd., operating in Montreal and Ottawa. It appears to be over-capitalized to the extent of $5,000,000, the merger capital being $7,000,000 and the three concerns included, namely, Geo. Matthews & Co. Ltd., Park Blackburn Co. Ltd., Laing Packing & Provision Co. Ltd., These aggregate only $2,000,000, which it is said is itself an over-capitalization. In any case this would prove an additional annual charge of $300,000.

These five food trusts which are but a trifling portion of the combining actually accomplished in food, therefore represent $22,500,000 of fictitious values, upon which the people pay without receiving any benefits whatever. Therefore an annual tax of $1,290,000.

There are still a large number of other combinations which could be exposed, but I will leave for other members of the House the task of bringing to light some of their operations.

William Miller Collier, in his book on Trusts, tells us some of the effects of the Trusts on wages, and this is what he says:

> The effects of excessive capitalization, and the attempt to pay dividends upon such capitalization, are a tendency to create artificial earnings upon an artificial capital both by artificially raising the price of the article produced, and by the depreciation of the wages paid. The result to the public from an economical standpoint is objectionable.

The question has more than once been asked: What remedy should be applied to such a state of things, and what action, legislative or otherwise, can be devised in order to prevent this undue development of mergers, every time the answer has been legislation. In my opinion this is a mistake, we have too much legislation on the statute-books at present, and it would take up all the time at the disposal of our courts of justice to enforce the laws already made. Let me mention them:

1. By the British Wages Act, section 91, subsection 2, in the parliament of Canada is vested of legislation in matter of trade and commerce.

2. The Trade Union Act of 1872, re-enacting in substance the British Trade Union Act of 1872, forecasts legislation against combinations in restraint of trade by exempting before hand trade unions from the operation of any such laws. Embodied in the Revised Statutes.

3. In 1889, subsequent to the findings of the committee of the House of Commons and of the Labour Commission of 1888, parliament enacts a law for the suppression of combinations in restraint of trade. Embodied in the Criminal Code, sections 496-498 (Revised Statutes, 1906).

4. The usefulness of the above provisions was materially increased by parliament in 1900, by an amendment omitting the word 'unlawful' in the definition of a conspiracy in restraint of trade, thus shifting the burden of proof upon the accused.

5. In 1895, and again in 1898, the Hon. Dr. Sproule introduced Bills to regulate Trusts, but they are not carried through.

6. The Customs Tariff Act of 1897, section 18, provides that when it shall be established that there exists any trust or combination with regard to any article of commerce, the Governor in Council shall place such article upon the free list, or so reduce the duty as to give the public the benefit of reasonable competition.

7. By an amendment to the Inland Revenue Act (chapter 17, 1904) the minister is empowered to cancel the manufacturing license of any company selling goods under restrictive conditions.

8. Parliament adopted in 1910, 9 and 10 Edward VII, chapter 9, an Act to provide for the investigation of combines, monopolies, trusts and mergers, the object of which is to make the operation of such concerns public through the action of the courts.

Reference can be made to the 'Labour Gazette,' and to some cases of great importance. In Vol. XI, pages 1024, 1028, in the case of the sugar trust, also on pages 1170, 1408, will be found valuable information in that respect. Also a good account of the first attempts at litigation against trusts in Canada is given by Mr. W. W. Edgar in the 'Journal of Political Economy,' 1906, page 427. In 1901, action was taken against the Canadian Paper Manufacturers under the Customs Tariff Act, 1897, an account of which can be seen in the same journal, 1906, page 431. In 1904, action was taken with reference to the American Tobacco Company and the Empire Tobacco Company under the Inland Revenue Act, as amended in 1904, an account of which can also be found in the 'Journal of Political Economy. In 1907 action was taken, through the Royal Commission appointed to inquire into the conditions of the grain trade, with reference to the Winnipeg Grain and Produce Exchange. Explanations can be found in the 'Labour Gazette,' vol. VIII, page 708. We have also the famous case of the United Shoe Machinery Company of Canada, reference to which can also be found in the 'Labour Gazette,' vol. XI, pages 969, 1260, 1272.

Such is the present condition of Trusts in Canada, so far as I have been able to discover it up to the present time. Of course, those who have studied these questions seriously are well aware that the only real and permanent protection that the people can find against such vampires is organization and co-operation. By such means they will paralyze the Trusts. But they must never cease watching. 'Eternal vigilance is the price of liberty'—and of life. However, apart from this permanent and radical remedy which can only be slowly and gradually applied, there are others of a temporary nature, yet efficacious in their way, provided by legislation. The Customs Tariff Act of 1897, section 18, provides, as we have seen, that when it is established that there exists any Trusts or Combines on any article of commerce, that article shall be placed in the free list. This is supplemented by the Combines Investigation Act, and I call upon the government to apply the law to the glaring cases that I have just described. I have reason to believe also, that the workingmen of Montreal and elsewhere will soon be in a position to test the efficacy of the Combines Investigation Act and that full light will be shed upon these conspiracies.

If we stop to consider and compare the actions of the Trusts on the other side of the line, we can conclude why these very same institutions are moving heaven and earth to effect a speedy organization.

The Industrial Commission of the United States, whose report fills some 1,300 pages with valuable information on this subject, shows that one combination is selling 90 per cent of the sugar output; another more than 90 per cent of the tin plate product; that a third controls at times as high as 95 per cent of the production of spirits; that a fourth is selling from 75 to 80 per cent of the total output of steel rods and smooth wire and from 65 to 95 per cent of wire nails; that the same company by its patents has a practical monopoly on barbed wire and woven wire fencing; that another company produces from 90 to 95 per cent of the refined petroleum and all of these monopolies fix their own price.

I believe that I am justified at this present moment in expressing my views and impressions as to the waving of the flag and as to the cry of 'Canada for Canadians.' So much has been said on this subject and with so great an appearance of sincerity that some people might at first sight be impressed by these expressions and actions, but a closer investigation and inquiry will reveal the utter uncertainty of the politicians and others who indulge in them.

Any one who follows the financial transactions of the country would be led to believe that we are selling a good part of the natural resources of Canada, and if there is to be any waving of the flag it should also be waved in such instances. The amount of foreign capital invested in Canada is enormous; still we have not heard any alarming utterances from the so-called champions of the principle of 'Canada for Canadians.'

If we take the last report, we find that we have invested in the country:

From United States	$417,143,220
France	70,750,000
Germany	30,725,000
Belgium	11,675,000
Holland	11,000,000
Turkey	3,000,000
Russia	1,500,000
	$595,893,226
We have then foreign capital.	$ 139,589,650
American	417,143,221
British	1,860,000,000
Grand Total	$2,416,732,871

If this total amount of capital is divided by the total population of the country, we have an indebtedness on every man, woman and child of $341, or in other words, the interest at 6 per cent would mean $20 on every head, an annual charge of over $100 per average family.

American capital seems to dominate in British Columbia. We have 209 branch companies with an average capital of $600,000 or a total of $125,400,000.

Investment in mills and timber	$65,000,000
Investment in mines	60,000,000
Land deals	8,500,000
Packing mostly in British Columbia	6,000,000

According to this statement the Americans would own about 75 per cent of the timber industries in British Columbia; 50 per cent of mining industries are also the property of Americans. We conclude that about one-half of American capital is invested in British Columbia out of the total amount invested in the Dominion. We find that about 25 millions of dollars are invested in land deals in the prairie provinces and 10 millions in lumber and mines in the same provinces. We also find insurance companies with a capital of 43 millions and we know that those companies possess very little real estate.

If we take the report of our Canadian Superintendent of Insurance, we find that for the year ending 31st of March, 1911, the total assets of American life and fire insurances in Canada, was $55,456,527 the two principal items being bonds and debentures. Their assets represented by debentures and stocks are as follows:

Debentures..	$43,293,221
Stock..	162,141
	$43,455,362

Yet from all appearances the country has not been in danger. The prairie provinces, which have less American capital, have clamoured less about being thorough Britishers than British Columbia, where more than half of all capital invested is American. If Trusts are increasing in capital and in numbers also, industries are diminishing in number, which fact shows clearly that with the present system we may anticipate having some day only one Trust; then the whole population of our Dominion will be the subject of that Trust.

At present we have a system of cold storage in the country, which, from its origin, has done more harm than good. At its inception, the cold storage system was built up and subsidized from a humanitarian standpoint, but the invention has been abused, and the cold storage warehouses have furnished the means to overtax our population and to starve them to a certain extent. If it were possible to obtain the number of pounds of food stuffs in cold storage warehouses, the price paid for merchandise stored in the months of November, December and January, and also the retail price paid by the consumers, we would understand the enormous profits made by these institutions.

We are told that millions of pounds of butter and cheese are now in storage in our large cities. Butter that was bought for 24 cents per pound is now being sold for 45 cents. Eggs are being imported, though there is a good quantity now in storage, and they were sold lately for 50 cents a dozen, and they were far from being fresh. Cheese is now being sold at 20 cents a pound. though it was stored at less than 13 cents a pound. Quantities of cereals, fowls and fish have been stored for more than two years. Instead of putting fresh produce on the market, in many instances, it is two years old or more, and then we are wondering why we don't get good food.

If any legislation is to be enacted on this subject, a law should be passed that will prevent any storage company from keeping foodstuffs longer than is absolutely necessary, and for a specific time, as they have in the state of New York They should also be compelled to make a weekly report to the government.

The cost of living is increasing, the purchasing power of money is diminishing, and we are wondering why the masses are not satisfied. Let good enough alone, we say, except when the interests of Trusts and of certain manufacturers are at stake. Well, the time has come when the people will not and cannot stand this any longer. The full weight of the protectionist tax upon the workingman was placed in evidence before the Tariff Commission in 1905, and with the permission of the House I will put on 'Hansard' these facts, which strikingly illustrate the manner in which the workingmen are protected:

The workingman, sleeping peacefully upon a 30 p.c. mattress covered with a 30 p.c. quilt and a 35 p.c. comforter, awakes to gaze upon a 20 p.c. chromo hanging on the wall, covered with a 35 p.c. wall paper, Lifting his head from a 30 p c. pillow, he steps upon a 25 p.c. carpet, where he alights upon a 30 p.c. tack. He lifts a 35 p.c. window blind, removes a 35 p.c. flannel nightgown, slips into a 35 p.c. shirt and 35 p.c. trousers, 35 p.c. socks and 25 p.c. shoes, ties the shoes with 35 p.c. laces and washes himself with 35 p.c. soap. The drying operation is performed with a 30 p.c. towel, and the combing of his hair with a 35 p.c. comb. He adjusts a 35 p.c. collar, after hunting for a 35 p.c. collar button, and probably finds a 25 p.c. pantaloon button missing, necessitating the tightening of his 35 p.c. suspenders The request for the replacing of the button in the proper place is met by his wife in a 35 p.c. corset and other highly protected clothing. She does the necessary stitching on a 30 p.c. sewing machine, with 25 p.c. thread, the final act being performed with a 30 p.c. needle, assisted by a 30 p.c. thimble. Before leaving for downstairs he adjusts his 10 per cent artificial teeth, and then descends to light a fire in a 25 per cent stove with 25 per cent charcoal which he carries in a 25 per cent pail. He may perhaps use some of Rockefeller's 30 per cent coal oil to assist matters. He then sits down on a 30 per cent chair at a 30 per cent table covered with a 30 per cent table cloth, his knees being protected by a 30 per cent table napkin. In due season he has his choice of the following articles of food: apples, 40 cents a barrel; bacon and ham, 2 cents a pound; cheese, 3 cents a pound; butter, 4 cents a pound; coffee, 10 cents a pound; potatoes, 15 cents a bushel. He assists himself with a 35 per cent knife and a 30 per cent fork, likely soiling his 35 per cent cuffs in the operation. Before he leaves for work he arranges for his children to regale themselves with 35 per cent sugar candy during the day, with 35 per cent dolls; that they shall go to school with 30 per cent school bags and 35 per cent copybooks, decked with 35 per cent ribbons. These things arranged, he daily takes his 30 per cent tool bag filled with 30 per cent nails, 30 per cent tools, 25 per cent axe, carries a 30 per cent crowbar, lights his 35 per cent pipe with his 50 cents a pound tobacco, fixes his 30 per cent hat firmly on his head and hustles off through the dark of the morning guided by the light from 30 per cent gas lamps. His daily routine of work may mean shoving a 30 per cent wheelbarrow and wielding a 30 per cent pick, but he works his nine or ten hours as the case may be, and returns at night to his well protected home. His wife smiles at him through a 15 per cent window, probably thinking of the new 30 per cent bonnet which she has purchased and glad of the fact that her day, too, is over, with freedom from 35 per cent clothes wringers, 35 per cent curtains, 20 per cent brooms, 25 per cent brushes, 35 per cent baby carriages. After a protected supper he adjusts his 30 per cent spectacles, lights the 30 per cent gas, coming through a 39 per cent gas meter, listens to his wife playing a few hymns on a 30 per cent organ, and is warned by a 25 per cent clock that the retiring hour has come. Tired and protected to death he seeks his bed chamber thinking of the struggle of the morrow and succeeding days. After a few years he dies, 20 per cent crape appears on his door, and he is finally buried in a 25 per cent coffin. He is protected from the cradle to the grave. This statement may seem ridiculous, but nevertheless it exposes clearly the well protected workman.

I will now endeavour to expose to the House the cost of living, and also compare it with other cities.

At present the cost of living is higher in Canada than in the United States, while the scale of wages is lower. I am in a position to speak with some knowledge of the cost of living, especially in Montreal, which city can be compared with some American cities of similar population, and I have prepared from data at my command certain statements on the subject which I will communicate to the House. They confirm to a great extent the findings of the Massachussets Commission on the cost of living which reported in 1910. The consumer gets on the average fully as much value, more variety, and in some cases a better article for his money in the United States than in Canada. (Page 355 of the report). I have not found as stated in that report that meats are 10 per cent higher in Boston than in Montreal, but it is quite true that groceries are at least 4 per cent lower in Boston. Bread, the staff of life, was last year 13 per cent higher in Montreal than in Chicago. Eggs are also higher in Canada, millions of dozens being imported from the United States.

United States consular reports confirm this view as to the cost of living in both countries. Prices no doubt vary greatly in different localities, but it will be found that United States export prices for food stuffs are almost invariably lower than Canadian wholesale prices for the same articles. Here are some examples. Quotation from 1911 prices, which have increased since:

	Canadian Wholesale.	U. S. Export.
Boneless bacon	$0 15·4	$0 10·9
Dressed beef	0 10·5	0 10·4
Fowls	0 13·1	0 13·2
Hogs (cwt)	7 29	5 79
Lard	0 13·8	0 10·7
Butter (creamery)	0 28·2	0 29·5
Cheese	0 12·7	0 13·1
Flour (per barrel)	5 00	5 81

It will be seen that prices as a rule are higher in Canada.

This will appear more clearly if we enter into the details of expenditures of a workingman's family. I have prepared such a statement for Montreal, carefully excluding every item not absolutely necessary to prevent weakening and degeneracy. Let us take a family of five living under the very cheapest conditions:

	Per annum.
Rent, $9 per month	$108 00
Water rates, 5 per cent	5 28

Cheese, ½ lb. per week at 16c	4 0
Fruits, 20c. per week	10 40
Total		$352 58

Let us now compare this with the report of the Massachusetts Commission (page 72), on the cost of living in Boston and Montreal respectively;

	Boston.	Montreal.
Rent and water rates	$ 126.59	$ 113.28
Fuel	32.72	29.00
Lighting	7.52	5.73
Clothing	94.31	149.30
Sundries	130.45	96.25
Food	345.71	352.58
	$ 737.28	$ 746.13

Making a difference of $8.85 in favour of Boston. It therefore seems that according to the strictest calculation the cost of living for a workman's family is more in Montreal than in Boston, while the scale of wages is lower, as will be seen by the following statement. I am giving in this statement some figures that can be compared, so as to show the difference of wages per hour paid in some trades, in Montreal, Toronto, and Boston. If I were to take the larger cities in the United States the difference would be more; but I have taken Boston because of its population comparing with that of Montreal:

	Boston.	Toronto.	Montreal.
Bricklayers	60	50	50
Carpenters	50	35	35
Plasters	60	50	40
Plumbers	50	42½	35
Stone cutters	60	50	43½
Builders labourers.	35	25	25
Common labourers.	30	20	20
Iron workers	50	45	35
Electricians	45	35	27½
Sheet Metal workers	45	35	30
Painters	45	32½	30
	530	420	368

According to those figures we can see that there is quite a percentage in favour of Boston in the earning power of the workman. He earns, in Boston, 17 per cent. more than in Toronto and 40 per cent. more than in Montreal.

I would like also to give to the House the average earning power of different trades in Montreal, and the figures I am now quoting are still above the average.

Bricklayers	$650
Carpenters	550
Plumbers	650
Structural iron workers	550
Building labourers	450
Sheet metal workers	600
Moulders	750
Stereotypers	500
Printing pressmen	750
Cigar makers	700
Bookbinders	500
Boot and shoe workers	600
Tailors	550
Painters	650
Ship liners	450
Textile workers	450
Granite cutters	750
Laundry workers	400
Masons	550
Plasterers	650
Electricians	600
Common labourers	400
Lathers	350
Machinists	750
Printers	750
Garment workers	500
Upholsterers	500
Blacksmiths	650
Butchers	600
Brass workers	700
Musicians	750
Barbers	600
Longshoremen	400
Stone cutters	750

This statement shows plainly that the earning power of workmen is not sufficient to give them a respectable existence. Now to prove the correctness of the figures I have given on the allowance of food for the family of a workman, I will quote, by way of example, the ration allowed to each soldier in the army. It is as follows:

Bread, 1½ lbs. per day, 547 lbs. per year at 5c.	$27.35
Sugar, 2 oz. per day, 45 lbs. per year at 7c.	3.15
Chocolate, 1 oz. per day, 22 lbs. per year at 25c..	5.50
Tea, ½ oz. per day, 5 lbs per year at 25c.	1.25
Fresh meat, 1 lb. per day, 365 lbs. per year at 14c.	51.10
Fresh vegetables, ½ lb. per day, 182 lbs. per year at 1c.	1.82
Flour, 9 oz. per day, 205 per year, at 5c.	10.25
Currants and raisins, 1½ oz. per day, 34 per year at 10c.	3.40
Total per man per year ..	103.82

These figures, as we can see, do not cover all the items of everyday life, far from it; so they can reasonably be multiplied by four for a family of five. This would give us $415.28. This shows plainly that my calculations were not exaggerated.

Labour demands justice and equality, though not in the sense in which those words are often used. Labour men do not wish to go beyond reason. But they recognize that the law of itself is not powerful enough to prevent vast combinations representing millions of dollars of capital from organizing to oppress labour, to control and monoplize production and prices, and to carry into effect the purpose of such combinations.

Statesmen of to-day should read the prophetic words written by the great American statesman, Abraham Lincoln, in 1865:

> I see in the near future a crisis approaching that enerves me and causes me to tremble for the safety of my country.
> As a result of the war corporations have been enthroned and an era of corruption in high places will follow and the money power of the country will endeavour to prolong its reign upon the prejudices of the people until all the wealth is aggregated into a few hands and the republic is destroyed. I feel at this moment more anxiety for the safety of the country than ever before even in the midst of war.

The crisis feared by Mr. Lincoln is upon us, and it is the duty of every member of this House, regardless of political allegiance to prevent it.

Mr. ANDREW BRODER (Dundas). Mr. Speaker, I listened with great interest to the hon. member for Maisonneuve who has just addressed the House, but I could not but think that if he had had the moral courage to have made that speech on the budget a year ago, it would have come with better grace from him. He has been denouncing a legacy that we have received from that outgoing government, and his speech is a terrible arraignment of his friends whom he has supported for the last eight years. I cannot understand a gentleman having such knowledge of the evils that existed in this country sitting quietly behind his friends all these years and saying nothing about it, consistently supporting them and saying that everything was right. He gives us to understand that this condition of things has been brought about since September 21 last. I suppose the tariff has not been changed since September 21. I suppose that these Trusts have not all grown up since September 21. Have they? He says there are 39 combinations and Trusts in this country. They must all have grown up, of course, since last December, because the hon. gentleman did not say a word against them during the last eight years.

Mr. VERVILLE. I know my hon. friend does not desire to misquote me. I did not say that they were formed since September 21.

Mr. BRODER. But you did not find fault with them in all that time. As shrewd and observing a gentleman as he is would surely have said something about these Trusts before that time if they existed, but he did not want to worry his friends. The hon. gentleman has been talking about the tariff. The Cobdenites have been in power for 15 years and we have a tariff with an average of 27 per cent, or nearly so, on dutiable goods and on dutiable and free goods of 16 per cent—after 15 years of free trade rule. I do not think much of the men who stand on the doorstep of Cobden and shout free trade principles to the present generation. I think a tariff of 26 per cent on an average is a protective tariff, that it has the principle of protection as much imbedded in it as any tariff we have ever had in this country. And now our friends waken up the moment they are out of power to the realization that there is something wrong in this country. If there is something wrong in this country it is a legacy left by hon. gentlemen opposite, and we are going to probate the will, and we will probate it in the interests of the people, not in the interest of a party. Combinations have grown up, yes, and what do you think of hon. gentlemen who were willing to carry this country over into the arms of the greatest Trust company in the world, the United States? That was their effort, to put us at the mercy of the greatest combinations in the world, where we could not deal with them, and they had not the courage to deal with the Trusts at home.

Insincerity can be charged against hon. gentlemen opposite. There are 39 combinations found in this country after 15 years of their being in power, and these combinations have a combined capital of $575,000,000. Now, these gentlemen wake up to the fact that there is something wrong. They did not kick from under the blanket while their friends were in power, they were as quiet as mice in their nest in the winter. Now they are up in arms, there is something wrong in this country. Yes, there is something wrong in this country, it is well it is not worse after hon. gentlemen have ruled it for so long. It will have to be dealt with. I have no quarrel with capital. What we want in this country is capital properly invested. The hon. gentleman speaks of meeting these difficulties with a combination, but the combination that he suggests may be as arbitrary as the combinations we are attempting to meet. What we must realize in this country is that we want a reasonable tariff, and a stable tariff, that capital will know that it is safe to invest in Canada and that it will be secure, and not at the caprice of any sect of men. Hon. gentlemen may shout now from the house tops about their free trade principles, but the country has had an experience of these gentlemen and will question their sincerity in the future. There is only one Cobden medal in this country and that is enough because it is not worn as it ought to be worn, because the man does not deserve it who has it; he has never been a free trader since he came into power. We may talk as we like about free trade, but why are hon. gentlemen opposite anxious to go to a country where the tariff is higher than it is here for the blessings they are seeking?

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer). Does the hon. gentleman desire me to reply; he is looking directly at me? When I came to Canada—this question applies personally to me—I came to seek free land not restricted trade. I believe in freedom all the time.

Mr. BRODER. We will let you be free if you behave yourself. There is nothing wrong, we are glad to see you on the land, but I want to say that we do not want to see the labour conditions of Europe transferred into this country, and I question whether the hon. gentleman does. A gentleman met me in the west and said they had a poor man's tariff in England. I said: They must have because they have a million paupers there whom the people have to take care of; it must be a poor man's tariff. My hon. friend who just sat down said that the labouring man got more wages in the United States and a less cost of living. How does he find that in a country where they have about 40 per cent of a protective tariff when he cannot find it in this country where we have a 26 per cent tariff. Why does he go to a high protective country to find his blessing? Why does he not go to a free trade country?

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer). The tariff does not make the land.

Mr. BRODER. I am not speaking of land. If 40 per cent protection makes prices cheap in the United States, I do not see how 26 per cent can make them dear here. There is a lack of consistency in the argument.

My hon. friend referred to some mergers and indicated some of the men in them. He might have referred to a cement merger in which he would have found a prominent gentleman pretty closely allied to hon. gentlemen opposite, but he did not see fit to refer to it.

Mr. CARVELL. Yes, he did.

Mr. BRODER. He did not refer to any names. It is a very significant fact that during all these years these combinations have been doing their mischievous work in this country, very few of them were prosecuted. Why were they not prosecuted by hon. gentlemen opposite? We had the Paper Trust. Who prosecuted the paper combination?

The press of this country agitated against it, and the Canadian Press Association prosecuted it, and at very large expense to themselves, and proved their case. But the government refused to pay the expense; so that the newspaper men had to pay it out of their own pockets. Then, when the grocery combination was prosecuted publicly, the case was not proven; and it cost them $10,000 to defend themselves. A prosecution is going on now against the United Shoe Machinery Company. Why were not these combinations prosecuted by hon. gentlemen opposite? Why, they did not wish to touch a hair of their heads. But now they are beginning to shout about it all over the country—somebody else is in power. But what about the sincerity of hon. gentlemen opposite? These mischievous organizations can grow up and do their evil work, but those interested must prosecute them or there will be no prosecution, and they have to pay the expense themselves even if they prove their case. So, it ill becomes any one on that side of the House to criticise the present condition of things, for the present condition of things is the outgrowth of their rule in this country for fifteen years.

The hon. gentleman went on to tell about the duty on clothing, on the towel, on the dishes, on the nightshirt, on the blanket, and on shoes. But all these duties were put there with his friend's consent, and his own. So, it ill becomes him to raise his voice so hurriedly about the evils that exist. If there is an evil existing in reference to any of these combinations it should be dealt with. But hon. gentlemen opposite did not deal with any of them. These combinations grew up under their rule, and attained their great proportions. A combination need not be an evil; it may be used to get rid of overhead charges and so to cheapen production. If it does this, and gives the public a better deal, the combination is not an evil. Combination may be a blessing, as capital is a blessing. These things have to be taken cognizance of, and dealt with in the interest of the public generally.

I do not pretend to say that it is a wise thing for any public man to arouse a suspicion against any class of people; on the contrary it is a misfortune. The callings of people in this country are largely a matter of their own selection. A man chooses to be an agriculturist, or a merchant, or a mechanic, or a professional man, and the door is open to him, he can reach the position he desires, no matter what his birth may be. It is largely a matter of choice. But when he makes his choice, it is not right for him to question the sincerity of another man who makes a different choice; they follow different lines to success. Now I do not follow with prejudice or hatred the man who leaves the log-house and makes his way up through the battle of life to a palace. I follow that man with pride in his success.

There are problems before this country; hon. gentleman opposite have left many problems unsolved that they have at least attempted to solve in the interest of the people. These problems to-day are at the threshold of the Conservative party; and I hope that party will have the genius, the sincerity and the ability to deal with these problems and solve them in the interest of the people of Canada. Why should this country, a great agricultural country, after fifteen years of Liberal rule, and with a practical farmer as Minister of Agriculture, be importing four or five of the most important agricultural products for table use? Why should we be importing butter from New Zealand, and potatoes, meat and eggs from other countries? And this after fifteen years of Liberal rule. Have these hon. gentlemen done their duty to the agriculturists? They tell us that this importation is due to increased consumption. Well, should not an agricultural country keep pace with the consumption of its own people? Have these hon. gentlemen solved the problem of the agriculturist or assisted him to cope with the difficulties that confront him? I say, no. There is one way to feed the people more cheaply and at the same time to assist the agriculturist; and that way is to get down to the man in the furrow, if you will, make him understand the possibilities of his soil; show him that to double the product of each acre will mean more money from his farm. While the artisans and people generally will be more cheaply fed, the farmer will be better off. That is the solution of this problem, but it is a solution that hon. gentlemen opposite never attempted to make. And this is within our reach. Why should we be decreasing in the output of our butter and of other products? It is because of the serious shrinkage in farm labour. Has there been a serious attempt on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite to bring to the oldest province of this country from the old country the necessary help that would go on the farm and become a fixture in the social life of this country? No successful attempt, no serious attempt in this direction was made by hon. gentlemen opposite. I say to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Burrell), who sits here as Minister of Agriculture, that one of the serious problems before him is in this question. Let the farmer build a house for his hired man, if you will, let the man marry and raise his family, and you have gone a long way towards solving the problem of domestic help. These are questions that the government ought to take cognizance of, and deal with, and solve. But hon. gentlemen opposite did not deal with them. I have in mind an instance in an adjoining county of what one man could do towards solving this question. He told me only the other day that he, through his personal efforts in bringing immigrants from the ships at Montreal, had brought five hundred men into the county of Russell. The government did not do that. That man had several cheese factories. He found that the farmers were keeping fewer milch cows, and on inquiring the reason he found that it was because of lack of help. So he commenced to solve that problem by bringing suitable agricultural immigrants into that county. And what is the outcome? The outcome is that only five out of that five hundred have proven unsatisfactory. That is what is possible and if the government of this country take that matter up and deal with it along those lines, it will go far to do away with the complaint of the hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Verville)—increase the produce of the country, increase the fertility of the acre, improve the conditions of the agriculturist and keep him on the soil, that is what is necessary for the future welfare of this great country.

Now, here is an instance of a man who came up through the influence of this gentleman into that county. He came here with six or eight children, he had about $1,200 to the good after paying expenses. There was a farm offered for sale for $8,500, along with the stock and implements. This individual encouraged that stranger to buy that farm. He bought it, and he has paid interest and $1,000 a year since; he has also bought the hundred acres next to him for $6,000, and he will pay for that. That is what is possible, that is part of the solution of our difficulties in this country. Now, this is a matter of history that might well be repeated in every county in the province of Ontario, and in a good many counties in the province of Quebec.

Mr. NESBITT. How long was that gentleman in bringing in the 500 people?

Mr. BRODER. Only about four years since he commenced.

Mr. NESBITT. Did this man buy this second farm within the four years?

Mr. BRODER. Yes, of course he has the debt, but he has 40 milch cows on his farm to-day. That is the kind of men we want brought into this country. An agriculturist with $3,000 to $5,000, with his economy, and with his industry, will make a success in any part of Ontario or Quebec. Surely it is in the interest of this whole country that that should be done. Many of our people are going west. You cannot proscribe any one of our people from going west. Now, we must, in order to maintain our social conditions, our schools, our churches, and all those things that pertain to a good neighbourhood, we must do something to maintain them in their strength, and in their usefulness, and to my mind that is a solution of many of the difficulties that we have just heard mentioned.

But what has been done by hon. gentlemen opposite to bring to the notice of that class of people in Europe the older provinces of this Dominion, within the last ten years? Do they know much about Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island, Quebec, Ontario? I fancy that our hon. friends opposite have not done their duty in that respect. The opportunities in the older provinces are equal, are as good, are as permanent, as they are in any other part of Canada. For my part, I hope the present government will take up those matters and solve them along these practical lines, upon which they can be solved. We must keep the people on the land, and in order to keep them there we must improve conditions, and that is possible. Take up a list of the people that are going out of the older provinces into our western country—and it is a good thing to have them go there, I am not finding fault with that, it is a good thing to have our eastern people go into that western country. But we must do something to fill up the gap that is created by their departure, we have got to make an effort to do it. I fancy hon. gentlemen opposite did not make an effective effort, if they made any at all, to solve that problem, and that is one of the difficulties that lie at our door pressing for solution. I believe it is now possible to solve them. I think it is one of the first duties of the government to attempt to solve them. Why, Sir, what do we find? We find this agricultural country, with all its splendid possibilities, buying its butter, its meat, its eggs, and some other produce from other countries. I can't understand it. That is where we find ourselves, after fifteen years of this progressive government that has gone out of power. But some hon. gentlemen say that condition of things is caused because we cannot get reciprocity. Well, I am not going to talk much about reciprocity. The jury has pronounced upon that, and they say they don't want it, and I give them credit for being an honest jury and for having good common sense. We have heard a good deal about the possibilities of marketing our 200 million bushels of grain. But hon. gentlemen, with amazing inconsistency, say: We will drop our present market and go where they are exporting grain now. I cannot understand it. For every bushel you send into the American west, you have to send a bushel out of Boston or New York. I say, find your market, suit your market, keep your market. That is what you have got to do, and that can be done. But the difficulty is that some hon. gentlemen seem more anxious to keep up the discontent in the west than to allay it. I believe that is not fair-play. The people of that country have got to help solve their own problems. The conditions are abnormal, and these conditions will be best solved, not by fanning the discontent, but by showing that you are making an honest effort to remove the difficulties. That is the position I think we ought to take as public men, interested not only in the west, but in the east.

My hon. friend (Mr. Verville) thinks that this surplus should be expended in lessening taxation. Well, there is another legacy that has been left us by hon. gentlemen opposite, the enormous expenditure on the Transcontinental railway, an expenditure double or treble their own estimate. That is a legacy we have received, and that we must carry. We have got to meet that responsibility. We are proposing to meet these responsibilities that are thrown upon us, I say largely by mismanagement, if not by mismanagement, then by miscalculation. Take their revised estimates, and where are we to-day? I say that no set of men governing this country should have launched out into an undertaking of that magnitude without knowing more about it. They should have known approximately, at least, what it was going to cost before they undertook it. They said they had mountains of information Yes, and they have had mountains of difficulties, but they did not have the information. No man can justify the action of hon. gentlemen opposite in that respect. Now that responsibility is thrown upon this country, that responsibility must be met. It is an obligation, and the honour of the country is bound to carry out its obligations. For that reason it is necessary that the revenues of this country should be large, so far as is consistent with the welfare of the people. All these obligations must be met, but they cannot be met without a revenue, and you cannot have a revenue without a tariff.

I do not say that we should have a high tariff in this country, but I venture to say that, while it may not be much higher than hon. gentlemen left it, it will be more consistently adjusted and will not be hugger-mugger until you do not know where the tariff is. There is nothing in heaven above or in earth beneath like it. There is nothing in any country in the world like the tariff which these hon. gentlemen left on the statute-books. They have a preference, a maximum, a minimum, and dear knows what. They go to the farmer and they say: We have lowered the duty on carriages; under the British preference the duty is lowered on carriages from England. But, it was raised on carriages coming from the United States and that is where people buy their carriages. They fixed the tariff so that they could go to this man and say: We have lowered the tariff, and so that they could go to the other man and say: We have raised the tariff. They could go to the carriage maker in Ontario and say: We have raised the tariff, and they could go to the man using a carriage and say: We have lowered the tariff. That would be the truth, but it would be only part of the truth and that is equivalent to something I am not going to say anything about. That is the condition of the present tariff. How many mowing machines or carriages do we buy in England? The articles on which the duty has been lowered under the British preference to the farmer are the articles that he does not get from Great Britain at all. He gets them from the United States against which you have raised the tariff barrier. You claim that you have lowered the tariff under the British preference. That is scarcely fair-play to the innocent man, yet, that is the fact. I say that the tariff in this country should be a tariff that would be understood. It requires an expert every day in the year, except Sunday, and he has to think of it then if he is honest in his endeavour to act in the public interest, to tell what the tariff means as applied to different goods that are coming into this country. He has got to sit up nights in order to apply it, and then he makes mistakes. That is the tariff that has been left on the statute-book by the free traders who have gone out of power. They are getting back to the old platform. The right hon. leader of the opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) said away back in 1893 when they were making their platform, that he did not intend to skin the bear till he killed it. Oh, no, he killed the bear but he never skinned it. It is there with its skin on as much as it ever was.

Mr. BURNHAM. That is a skin game.

Mr. BRODER. Yes, he said that in that 1893 convention right here in this town. Yet, these hon. gentlemen opposite did not do what they promised. It was free trade that they promised then.

Mr. LALOR. Blue ruin is their platform now.

Mr. BRODER. We are in power to-day and they are driven back in desperation to the idols of old. I do not blame them for that. This recalls to my mind a story, and it is a lawyer's story, that I am going to tell to these free traders across the way. There was a man in Ireland who wandered into a grave-yard to amuse himself. You can amuse yourself in a grave-yard in Ireland. He came to a grave-stone on which was the inscription: Sacred to the memory of Mr. So-and-So, an eminent lawyer and a Christian. He said: This is a strange country; I see they bury two men in one grave. That is the kind of graves we will have all over this country when these men die. They will be putting two men in one grave. I do not see how you could bury them in any other way, because you will have to bury the free trader and protectionist in one grave. They were all buried on the 21st of September, and all we have to do now is to put the inscription on the tombstone. I am suggesting that we will have to bury two men in one grave. That is the kind of country we are living in.

Mr. McKENZIE. Leave well enough alone.

Mr. BRODER. Yes, we are going to continue as we are. Do you want things left as they are? Do you want the principle of protection to be continued in the tariff?

Mr. McKENZIE. I said: Leave well enough alone.

Mr. BRODER. I want to know if you want the tariff left as it is to-day. If the hon. gentleman said that he did, for the next ten years he could not say a word.

They do not want to leave things as they are. They expect them to be improved and they will not be disappointed. The people of this country expect practical, common sense in the government. They do not want a lot of rhetoric; they want something that is tangible, and they want an improvement in the present conditions. I believe that they can be improved and that the government who are in power to-day have opportunities that perhaps no government that ever came into power, in this great country, with its possibilities, have had. The public men of the country must use the common sense they have, get down close to the people and help them solve those serious problems which must be solved not only in the interest of the country at the present time, but with a view to its future welfare.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. Speaker, the address we have just heard is the most ample justification for the choice of the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Borden) in filling the position of Minister of Agriculture in his Cabinet. However good the stories of my hon. friend (Mr. Broder) are, I think all will agree that his political arguments are hardly worthy of this place and the subject matter that is under discussion.

Mr. BRODER. I was dealing with the arguments from your side of the House.

Mr. OLIVER. I do not remember any argument on this side of the House with regard to that man who made $6,000 farming in three years after starting with $1,000.

Mr. BRODER. I do not wonder the hon. gentleman does not like that argument.

Mr. OLIVER. If a man got along as fast as that in the cattle country in the west the police would be after him, because they would expect that he had lived on his neighbours. I would like, however, to point out to my hon. friend the case of this particular gentleman who made so great a success——

Mr. BRODER. I want to ask——

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. Speaker, may I please point out——

Mr. BRODER. Do you dispute my statement?

Mr. OLIVER. I am not disputing my hon. friend's statement for a moment. I hope he does not dispute mine. What I wanted to point out to my hon. friend was that this remarkable success of this gentleman was achieved under the administration of the Liberal government.

Mr. BRODER. Will my hon. friend allow me to say that it was not under his department; it was the case of a private individual relying on himself.

Mr. OLIVER. My hon. friend should keep his seat when he has nothing to say. I repeat that if this statement is correct—and we are bound to accept his statement—that certainly the conditions in this country making for agricultural success, under the policy and administration of the late government, were all that any reasonable man could desire. That my hon. friend (Mr. Broder) was not suited with these conditions is the evidence I have to offer to the House as to his not being a reasonable man.

The hon. gentleman (Mr. Broder) criticised the condition of this country under the tariff policy of the late government. My hon. friend's friends have been in power for five months and they have come down to this House with a budget which absolutely confirms the tariff of the late government; not changed in one line, in one word; not changed by the dotting of an 'i' or the crossing of a 't.' It was good enough apparently for the last fifteen years, and it is going to be good enough at any rate for another year under the administration of these gentlemen. May I say just this word with reference to the tariff policy under which this country achieved the magnificent success it did achieve commercially, industrially, financially, as a people, and as a country, during those fifteen years; that any government would be wise in exercising due caution in making changes in that tariff that my hon. friend said was not like anything in the heavens above, or the earth beneath, or the waters under the earth. The slogan of the party he supported in the late election was: leave well enough alone, and I say that certainly in my judgment the Conservative party is well advised that yesterday, after five months in power, when it was for them to do as they saw fit in the interests of the country, when it was in their hands to change that tariff, they did not change it by one jot or by one tittle.

Mr. BRODER. How long were your friends in power before you made any changes in the tariff; it was nearly a year, my dear man.

Mr. OLIVER. Possibly it was. Again let me draw attention to the argument as to the condition of this country in regard to mergers. My hon. friend from Maisonneuve (Mr. Verville) read to the House a state of facts that certainly cannot be considered by any man responsible in any degree for the welfare of this country, and having knowledge of it, without recognizing its gravity, without recognizing that a condition exists that calls for the most careful attention of any government that may be in power. The only criticism my hon. friend (Mr. Broder) had to offer was that this condition had grown up under the administration of the late government. That is true. It is a condition that grew naturally out of the prosperity of the country, but it is a condition with which the late government was dealing in the arrangement they placed before the electors last September, and upon which issue they were defeated. The late government went to the country on an anti-combine policy, and they were met by a party absolutely in alliance with—and may I suggest the possibility of it being subject to—the combines, and, the combines won. My hon. friend said the reciprocity policy of the late government was going to throw this country into the hands of the United States, a country of greater combines. Well, my hon. friend (Mr. Broder), is excellent at telling stories, but he is not so good at making political arguments. By the reduction of the tariff as between this country and the United States, there was to that extent competition promoted between the combines on that side of the line and the combines on this side of the line, and the proposal was fought by the combines on each side of the line. There is no use of my hon. friend (Mr. Broder), trying to becloud the issue. The issue was decided between the combines and the people, and the combines won. And my hon. friend (Mr. Broder), sits in this House supporting a government which holds its place, because of the support received from the combine interests of this country. Now, it may be that the government will not realize for their friends the expectations that have been entertained; I do not know as to that. Certain members of the government have certainly failed to realize the expectations of those who elected them, within the last few days. I do not know, but the rest of the government may also fail to realize the expectations of those who elected them.

Mr. BRODER. That is on that side of the House.

Mr. OLIVER. Not at all my hon. friend; the condition I speak of exists on your side of the House, and on that side alone and I say that when the government of the day at a future session of parliament frames a tariff for this country, it may be that it will not realize the expectations of those who were chiefly instrumental in putting it in power. But, if it does not realize these expectations, there certainly will be very much the same sort of denunciation—it may not be as public—proceeding from the merger interests, as is to-day proceeding from the interests which elected my hon. friends the Postmaster General, the Minister of Public Works, and the Minister of Inland Revenue. I do not suggest, and I shall not suggest, that the present leader of the government or his colleagues are going to be false to their friends. I do not think for a moment that they will be. The evidence we have had so far as this session has proceeded is that they will stand by their friends, and that the tariff legislation of this country, when the government comes to the point of framing it, will be framed in the interests of the combines, will be framed for the purpose, and with the intention of creating values for those enormous numbers of millions of fictitious capital that have become associated with our industrial enterprises in this country.

Our hon. friends have made many campaigns upon their assertions of insincerity on the part of the party on this side of the House in regard to tariff matters. They have been able from time to time to becloud the issue, and they have won their seats as a result; but from this time forward, as the result of the elections of the 21st of September, there will be no beclouding of the issue. It is straight and square: it is for the combines or for the people. Now, I do not want to be understood as declaring that the membership of a combine is not just as legitimate a business proposition as the ownership of a farm. I do not wish to be misunderstood on this point. I want it to be understood that capital has a perfect right to be invested in any enterprise and under any reasonable circumstances; but when combinations of capital are made with a view of securing an undue profit from the people at large, it is the business of the people at large to protect themselves as well as they may against the consequences of that act. It is not that the man who is concerned in a merger is not as good a citizen as my hon. friend who has just spoken or as myself. No question needs to be raised on that point. But the point is that he is able,—or if he gets the legislation that he hopes to get from this government he will be able,—to make my friend and myself contribute an undue share of his wealth and success. That is what we object to; that is the point on which the camps are divided.

Mr. LALOR. Hadn't you better wait till it happens?

Mr. OLIVER. I think it is evident, from what has been read by my hon. friend from Maisonneuve, that it has been happening.

Mr. LALOR. For fifteen years.

Mr. OLIVER. Precisely, for fifteen years, in a greater or less degree. As the prosperity of the country increased, as capital was more and more available, as the financial magnates got the habit, the number of these mergers and combines increased, so that the condition in the latter years of the period referred to has been immensely accentuated as compared with the condition in the beginning of that period. Who would have thought of forming an industrial merger or combine in 1896? The suggestion is absurd on the face of it; and should there arise in this country another condition of depression such as that which existed in 1896, there would be no more forming of mergers and combines. If our hon. friends are as successful as my hon. friend from Dundas (Mr. Broder) hopes they will be, in preventing the formation of combines, I can only say that if they achieve that result by bringing about a condition of depression such as existed in this country in 1896, then I think we had better have the combines than have that condition. but it is not to that condition that we look for relief. All that we ask is that there shall be a fair consideration of the needs of the revenue in the framing of the tariff, and any industrial enterprise that is able to flourish under that condition is welcome to flourish; everybody will wish to see it flourish. But the industrial enterprise that must secure an unjust toll from the consumers, that must be protected in order to flourish, occupies a position that cannot receive the support of the majority of the people—cannot at any rate receive the support of those who are on this side of the House. Let there be no misunderstanding of the question. As my hon. friend has said, there is nothing wrong about the formation of a combine. A combine that decreases the cost of production and tends to improve the methods of distribution is not injurious. It only becomes injurious when means are taken to secure an unfair return on the capital invested, and the government has partly to do with that matter in the framing of the tariff. If the tariff is framed with a view to securing to this enterprise a return upon the capital invested and the stock issued, instead of being based upon the needs of the revenue, then we say that such a tariff is unjust to the people.

I was struck by some of the remarks made by the Minister of Finance yesterday, and they were in line with utterances of the Premier and the Minister of Trade and Commerce, made in the early part of the session. He spoke of the bounties of Providence, the success and development of this country due to its natural advantages and to the energy of its people. The inference which I think he desired to convey, and which the Premier and the Minister of Trade and Commerce certainly desired to convey, was that the administration and policy of the late government had practically nothing to do with the desirable financial conditions that prevail in the country at the present time, when its revenues are higher than ever before, when it has a greater surplus than has ever before existed, when immigrants are coming in greater volume than ever before, when its prosperity is increasing at a greater ratio than ever before. I have heard the Minister of Trade and Commerce in previous sessions make the same suggestion from this side of the House. Now, there cannot be success without the foundations of success. A country cannot succeed and be prosperous unless it has the material means whereby success may be achieved. But if a country, no matter how advantageously situated, can succeed without capable and competent direction, then a country is the only institution or organization in the known world that can succeed on these terms.

Inasmuch as the government of a country is the most complex piece of machinery that exists in connection with any human enterprise, I submit that in the very nature of things the policy of the government must to a stupendous degree be given credit or blame for the result that is achieved in the well-being of that country. I say this not because I wish to claim any credit on behalf of the late government, but to point out to the friends of the present government and to the people of Canada that if our friends undertake to conduct the government of this country on the principle that it does not make very much difference to the welfare or prosperity of the country whether the government has a forward or a backward policy, whether it has a developing or a restrictive policy, they will find, and the country will find, that they have made a great mistake. The policy of a government, in the nature of things, must have a great effect upon the well-being of the country, and if our friends have not yet realized that fact then I hope they soon will realize it, because we are all anxious to see development and progress in Canada.

If it is thought that the progress and prosperity that has been achieved has come simply because the sun has shone and the soil is fertile, and our people are energetic and industrious, I would ask, was it the fertile soil or the industry of the people, or the act of Providence, or the shining of the sun that entered upon the undertaking of the National Transcontinental Railway? Was it Providence that deepened the canals? Is it Providence that is building the port of Montreal? Is it not the aggressive and intelligent action of a progressive government having a progressive policy that has absolutely and directly brought into being this condition of affairs?

A word with regard to this eastern section of the National Tarnscontinental railway. My hon. friend from Dundas (Mr. Broder), as his friends have always done, decried the building of that section of the railway, and yet the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Trade and Commerce on former occasions in this House tried to discredit the late government because that railway was not completed before to-day. Did you ever hear of men taking such an attitude? These gentlemen exhausted every effort that could be put forth to prevent the construction of that great public enterprise, and when they could not prevent its construction, no later than some two or three weeks ago in this House, on their responsibility as ministers of the Crown, they attempted to discredit it as a profitable enterprise, after attacking the government because it was not completed more quickly.

I said that the government was not changing the tariff. They are entitled to credit for that, and I am sure that this country breathed a sigh of relief when the announcement was made yesterday that there would be neither changes in the tariff nor the establishment of bounties. We really got off better than we expected, but we were not less gratified to hear that the policy of constructive development which had been entered upon by the late government, and which had been carried so far towards completion, is to be still continued by our friends on the other side of the House. The two Transcontinental railways and the Hudson Bay railway are all to be completed, and the ports are to be equipped. All that the late government undertook to do or had in progress of doing is to be carried on without change by our friends the new government. For this again, the country is thankful.

At six o'clock, House took recess.

After Recess

House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. OLIVER. Shortly before the House rose at six o'clock, I had alluded to the fact that the budget recently presented to the House offered no variation from the tariff prevailing when the late government went out of power. That, however, is hardly a complete statement of the situation. The position of the late government in regard to tariffs is set out, not in the schedules on the statute-book, but in the proposition placed before the country, generally known as the reciprocity arrangement. This arrangement was the policy of the late government in regard to tariff readjustment, and was their policy also in dealing with the questions that were then up for immediate consideration in the interest of the people. The tariff as represented in the reciprocity arrangement involved a policy of reduction of taxation and expansion of trade. The reduction of taxation was the means taken by the late government to deal with the question of combines, the question of the high cost of living and also the question of the readjustment of the burden of taxation. It is futile to say that the late government did not move as it should have moved in the direction of lower tariffs. The tariff as it was proposed under the reciprocity arrangement was especially a reduction in regard to food products; it was essentially aimed at the high cost of living. It was believed that by taking the duty entirely off the more important food stuffs and reducing the duty in regard to practically all others, the cost of living to the people of Canada would be reduced. This could not be done without, in some degree and to some extent, affecting the profits of the combines and mergers which had been formed during the preceding years. And, as soon as it was announced that the policy of the government was to reduce the cost of the food of the people, at once these combines, trusts and mergers, whose organization was entered upon for the express purpose of levying an unjust toll upon the food of the people, rallied in antagonism to the late government and its policy. And the result of that rally is the success of our hon. friends on the other side. It has been said frequently that the late government was not true to low tariff principles because for so many years of its term in office no serious reductions had been made in the tariff. Let me point out that, situated as we are alongside of the United States, the half of our total trade being done with the United States and that country being a food-producing country like our own, if at any time during their fifteen years of power the late government had removed the duty on food stuffs, those who to-day criticise, and on all previous occasions have criticised, the late government because it did not move more rapidly towards reductions of the tariff, would have been the loudest in their declarations against its attitude and action. It was not practicable, in the ordinary sense of the word, for Canada to abolish the duty on foodstuffs unless our neighbours on the other side of the line did the same. But, when the government of the United States saw fit to reverse the policy it had followed for forty years of maintaining a high tariff on foodstuffs, the Liberal government, the government of low tariffs and fair-play to the individual citizen, did not lose one moment in closing with the proposition and staking its existence as a government upon the acceptance of the proposition by the people. Whatever allegations may be made against the late government, the allegation of bad faith toward the principle of low tariff can never, in fairness, be made in view of their record on that occasion. It is a surprising fact that, in face of the high cost of living prevailing in Canada and of the complaints that have continually been made in regard to that condition, such a proposition did not receive the approval of the majority of the electors. That it did not receive their approval is only another tribute to the strength, and vigour the energy, and, may I venture to say, the unscrupulousness, of those interests that, on the sound of alarm on the declaration that the government was for lowering the tariff, rallied their forces in opposition, stopping at no consideration of honesty or fair-play, or loyalty to either Canada or the empire, in order to secure the defeat of the government.

Mr. BURNHAM. May I ask the hon. gentleman if he will be good enough to say how he thinks this lowering of the tariff on foodstuffs would affect the prices paid to the farmer?

Mr. OLIVER. I should be very glad to be permitted to proceed with my argument without interruption——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. OLIVER. But, inasmuch as my hon. friend (Mr. Burnham) has asked a question —certainly a fair question—I hope the House will bear with me if I digress for some little time from the line of my argument in order to deal with the point he has raised. My hon. friend asked how I expected to secure a higher price to the farmer for his products and a lower price to the consumer.

Mr. BURNHAM. No, what I asked was: How does the hon. gentleman (Mr. Oliver) think the reduction of the tariff on the foodstuffs would affect the prices paid to the farmer?

Mr. OLIVER. On such foodstuffs as are produced in Canada, not for export, I should take for granted that the abolition of the duty upon these food products, eliminating the question of the cost of distribution, would tend distinctly to the benefit of the consumer, and to that extent would be to the prejudice of the farmer. I think there is no question about that.

But let me point out that the cost of transportation comes into this question of the price of the food product to the farmer and to the consumer respectively; and not only the cost of transportation, but the exactions of the middleman.

An hon. MEMBER. He is always there.

Mr. OLIVER. He is always there, and when he has a hard and fast combine such as the Canners' Combine, he is able, Mr. Speaker——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. OLIVER. We in the west feel the Canner's Combine very severely, and the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Bradbury) knows as well as I do, that when a combine has control of a certain food product the price which the farmer receives bears no necessary relation to the price the consumer has to pay; that is a well known fact. Take the article of canned goods; it is a matter of absolute record that the producer on the south side of the line gets a better price for his product, and the consumer on the south side pays a lower price for that manufactured product.

Mr. MARSHALL. I would ask the hon. member why canned goods are higher on the other side of the line than they are here? I can quote the prices. The hon. gentleman is entirely mistaken.

Mr. OLIVER. Well, it is not necessary for my hon. friend and myself to enter into an argument on this subject.

Mr. CURRIE. Of course, because you would get the worst of it. He knows his business and you do not.

Mr. OLIVER. That is where the hon. member for Elgin (Mr. Marshall) has the advantage entirely over the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. Currie). I say there is no need of the hon. member for Elgin and myself getting into an argument on this question. The matter has been before the public continuously, and whatever my hon. friend may say—I do not question his word at all, I do not question his knowledge of the subject, but I repeat that my information is, and I have the fullest confidence in it, that the price in the United States to the producer is higher and the price to the consumer is lower on the very goods that his combine puts on the Canadian market.

Mr. LALOR. Does the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) state that the producer is paid less in Canada?

Mr. OLIVER. Yes.

Mr. LALOR. That is absolutely incorrect.

Mr. OLIVER. Very well, Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend, of course, has full knowledge of the facts so far as the Canadian end of it is concerned. But my hon. friend does not know any more about the conditions on the other side of the line than I do, or any one else, and I am responsible for the statement I make to the House, there is no question about it. So far as my information goes, the facts are as I have stated. There is no question that since the formation of the Canners' Combine the price of canned goods in Canada has been increased very considerably, I suppose my hon. friends will not deny that. Now, let them tell this House, and they know this of their own knowledge, will they say that the price to the farmer for his product has been increased in the same proportion?

Mr. MARSHALL. Yes, Mr. Speaker, it has increased.

Mr. OLIVER. Has it been increased in the same proportion?

Mr. MARSHALL. Yes, and I will tell you why. Eight years ago we paid the farmer $20 a ton for peas, to-day we are offering him $34 a ton for peas. Eight years ago we paid him 18 cents for tomatoes, to-day we are paying him 30 cents. Eight years ago we paid him $5 a ton for corn, to-day we are paying him $8.

Mr. OLIVER. How many cans of tomatoes will a bushel make?

Mr. MARSHALL. I suppose I am interrupting the hon. gentleman, and I do not want to do it.

Mr. OLIVER. All right, this is important.

Mr. MARSHALL. We are paying for our labour twenty to thirty per cent higher than we did eight years ago. Our teams cost us more. Everything we use in our business costs from twenty-five to thirty-five per cent more than it did eight years ago. Now, Mr. Speaker, I have here both the American prices and the Canadian prices, and I want to tell the hon. gentleman, or any other gentleman in this House, that when he makes these quotations he is altogether wrong. I have the prices and I can give them to the House any time.

Mr. CARVELL. Let the hon. member make his speech later on.

Mr. MARSHALL. I say I do not want to interrupt the hon. gentleman. I am sure that he is not familiar with the facts, or he would not make that statement. I have that confidence in the hon. gentleman.

Mr. BROWN. Does the hon. member for Elgin (Mr. Marshall) mean to say——

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) has the floor.

Mr. OLIVER. I will be glad to have this matter cleared up.

Mr. BROWN. Does the hon. member for Elgin state that tomatoes were higher in the United States during the month of July last than they were in the city of Montreal, that is, a three-pound tin?

Mr. MARSHALL. I could answer that in this way. The canner's price was less than $1 per case. After the case leaves our hands we have nothing whatever to do with the price. There is no doubt the wholesaler has raised the price, I am speaking particularly of our own business. Every case of tomatoes which the Dominion Canners Company put up was sold at less than a dollar.

Mr. LALOR. 95 cents.

Mr. BROWN. Is the hon. member for Elgin aware that the combine went to the wholesale trade in the city of Montreal and other cities, and contracted with them for a certain quantity of cases, and after that they would shrink down the quantity they were to deliver so as to enhance the price?

Mr. LALOR. It is easy to answer that question. We did not deliver the quantity because we did not pack them. We only packed according to order.

Mr. MARSHALL. I may just add that it cost our company $40,000 last year to buy up our shortage. We guarantee a percentage. The shortage on our pack was so great that it cost the company some $40,000 to buy up their orders.

Mr. OLIVER. I asked the hon. member for Elgin a question which he has not answered. I asked him how many cans of tomatoes a bushel would make?

Mr. MARSHALL. That is a fair question, and I am ready to answer it. That depends on the quality of the tomatoes. We get from 10 to 12 cans from the bushel.

Mr. OLIVER. What is the size of the cans?

Mr. MARSHALL. Three pounds.

Mr. OLIVER. My hon. friend gets from 10 to 12 cans from a bushel and he raised the price to the farmer a matter of 12 cents? Is that right? That is a cent a can. Now how much does the consumer pay to-day as compared with what he did before the Canners' Combine was formed?

Mr. MARSHALL. Now the hon. gentleman knows that is not a fair question.

Mr. OLIVER. I consider that is a fair question.

Mr. MARSHALL. It does not stop at that. We are paying men to-day $2 where we used to pay them $1 a day. We are paying more for the cans.

Mr. OLIVER. Just stick to the point. I want to know from the hon. gentleman what his tomatoes cost the consumer before the combine was formed, and what they cost the consumer now.

Mr. MARSHALL. It shows that the hon. gentleman is not posted in the line. Before the amalgamation we sold tomatoes at $1.40 a dozen, and peas at $1.60 a dozen. We sold the same goods last year at 85 cents.

Mr. LALOR. And we sold them three years ago at 70 cents.

Mr. OLIVER. That does not make any difference. I did not say that the canners have raised the prices; I said that the prices had been raised to the consumer. As a matter of fact, beyond any question, the consumer pays that price and all that the farmer gets more is 12 cents a bushel on the statement of my hon. friend. Every man who buys tomatoes knows that he pays more than a cent a can more for them to-day than he did five years ago.

Mr. BRADBURY. Would the hon. gentleman tell me how he proposes to remedy the evil of the middleman?

Mr. OLIVER. What I propose to do is to reduce the duty on canned goods and allow the combine on the south side of the line to compete with the combine on the north side of the line. That was our proposal.

Mr. LALOR. Why did you not do that during the last fifteen years?

Mr. OLIVER. We did it just as soon as the United States could give us fair terms for doing it.

Mr. LALOR. I want to correct the hon. gentleman. You did not do anything of the kind; reciprocity did not affect canned goods at all.

Mr. OLIVER. I have a statement here of the tariff relations between the United States and the Dominion of Canada, the correspondence and statements, a government paper, a blue-book purporting to set forth the reciprocal tariff agreement between the United States and Canada. Let us come down to the question of fact, in regard to a matter that my hon. friend claims to have absolute information on. He has evoked a great deal of applause from his friends by his statement that the reciprocal agreement did not affect canned goods——

Mr. SHARPE (North Ontario). They were on the free list.

Mr. OLIVER—did not affect canned goods. My hon. friend is in error. Has he anything more to that effect to say?

Mr. LALOR. Tell us how much it affected them.

Mr. OLIVER. It did not affect them much.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. OLIVER. I am dealing with a question asked by the hon. member for Peterborough (Mr. Burnham). The hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Lalor), interrupted and as a canner and a member of this House he should have known whether the statement he made was correct or not. He was given the applause of his friends on the other side of the House as having made a sucessful contradiction of a statement which I had made.

Mr. LALOR. You did not know it yourself until your friend behind you told you.

Mr. OLIVER. It does not make any difference what I knew. The question is what my hon. friend knew. I did not make the statement; he made it. Let us have a thorough understanding, and let us have fair-play.

Mr. MACDONALD. It is quite evident that the hon. member for Haldimand did not know.

Mr. OLIVER. I am afraid that the hon. member for Haldimand must have known, and that he presumed upon this House when he said there was no——

Mr. LALOR. Tell us what it is.

Mr. OLIVER. I will tell the hon. gentleman what it is. I am at some disadvantage in discussing questions of fact in regard to trade matters when hon. members of this house will make statements upon which they must have knowledge, on which the House knows that they must have knowledge and when they make misstatements in regard to these matters. I hope that when I am contradicted again the House will be good enough to take account of the possibilities of the facts in regard to the matter.

Tomatoes and other vegetables, including corn and baked beans in cans or other air tight packages, including the weight of the package per lb., ¼ cent.

Mr. LALOR. If the hon. gentleman will look he will find that that is the treaty with France he is speaking about.

Mr. SPEAKER. It seems to me that the hon. member who has the floor ought to be allowed courteously to continue his speech and that such unseemly interruptions are not becoming to the dignity of the House of Commons or in keeping with fair debate.

Mr. OLIVER. The United States tariff is 2 1-2 cents to 40 per cent. and the rate now proposed for both the United States and Canada is a cent and a quarter. The reduction by the United States is 1¼ to 2 cents per pound and the reduction by Canada a quarter of a cent. I think I have established the point that the reciprocity arrangement, the proposal to reduce the duties on food products in Canada and thereby reduce the cost of living, did not necessarily affect to the extent of that reduction the price received by the farmer when there was a combine standing between the producer and the consumer and that in so far as the reciprocity arrangement brought competition into the distribution of such food products, to that extent, the consumer gained and the producer did not lose. I have been delayed somewhat in the course of my argument by the question—the very proper question — of the hon. member for Peterborough and I hope that I will be excused for now continuing.

I say that it was absolutely established as the policy of the late government to reduce the cost of living by reducing the taxation on food products and that that policy was entered upon at the very first moment when it could reasonably be entered upon and expect the endorsation of the people, all things being considered. Just as soon as it became possible for Canada to secure entry to the United States market for food products on fair terms, just at that moment, the government of Canada was prepared to make corresponding reductions in the tariff on such products coming into Canada and thereby benefit the consumers and reduce the cost of living to the people of Canada. The late government undertook to answer the question as to what should be done in regard to the high cost of living and in regard to the exactions of combines. The country is interested in knowing what they may expect at the hands of the present government in regard to the same matters. It is to be regretted that since the present government came into power the cost of living has not decreased. It has increased. The formation of combines has not ceased. There have been more rather than less.

The country is interested in knowing what attitude this government will take now that it is in power, in regard to these pressing and important matters. Whatever the late government may have been or done is not the question to-day, although the late government is quite prepared to stand on its record. But the question is: What is this government going to do; and we can judge of what it is going to do by what it has done. I took the liberty of suggesting earlier in the discussion that the present government, when it comes to frame a tariff, will frame that tariff in the interests of the combines, not in the interest of reducing the cost of living, not in the interest of reducing taxation. I say that if the government is true to the policy and the principles upon which it attained office, it will be a government of increased taxation and restricted trade. And, Mr. Speaker, in my humble judgment, such a policy cannot tend to the well-being, or the progress, or the prosperity of this country. We have had some experience of the actions of this government, although they have not introduced changes in the tariff. They have been in power for five months, and in a country like this a great deal happens in five months. I submit that it is no answer for their failure to deal in the public interest with great questions as they arise, to say that they have not been long in office. It is not necessary to tell us that. They have been so busy removing officials appointed by the late government, so busy appointing commissions to find places for their friends, in parliament and out of parliament, that they have not had time to pay attention to those matters of first importance in which all the people of the whole country are interested. There have been matters brought to the attention of this government, not only by those on this side of the House, but by their own friends as well. The member for Calgary (Mr. Bennett) has taken the country into his confidence—I do not know whether he has taken the government into his confidence or not—he has told the country that there is a condition of affairs west of Lake Superior that demands the instant and urgent attention of the government. I think my hon. friend the member for St. Antoine (Mr. Ames) is imbued with the same idea, so that if our friends opposite are not aware of the existing conditions, and if they have not taken any action in regard to these conditions, it is not for lack of knowledge. I submit it is not for lack of time, because, if they were spending their time in that which was of greater importance to the country and not in that which was of greater importance to their party and their friends, they would have had plenty of time. It has been said in the House, it has been repeated in the press, and it is well known throughout all Canada to-day, that to that part of Canada which chiefly produces food products for export, access to the markets of the United States was an important feature of the then government's proposal last spring. In some parts of the country access to the producing areas of the United States so as to reduce the cost of living was desirable; in other parts of the country access to the consuming markets of the United States was desirable in order to secure greater benefit to our people. Our friends in the government are proposing to extend Canada's trade by a treaty with the West Indies, and I think I have read in some place that the Minister of Trade and Commerce is going to visit Australia with a view to our increasing our trade with that country. But, there are the trade possibilities which were open to Canada by the lowering of the duty on food products going into the United States, an opportunity which would add to the value of every bushel of the farmers' products in all the three prairie provinces. That proposal was as available to this government as it was to the late government, and if to-day the farmers of the western prairies are selling their wheat at an average of ten cents a bushel less than they could have obtained for it, the fault lies not with the late government but with this government, and to this government the loss must be charged. It is true that this is not in line with the policy of trade restriction upon which the government were elected, and I think it cannot be emphasized too strongly in the minds of the people, just exactly what loss is being suffered by reason of that restrictive policy.

Mr. BURNHAM. If we had, say for purposes of illustration, a dozen transcontinental lines, so that there would be no congestion of traffic, would the hon. gentleman not then say that that was quite equal to what he proposes in the way of a reciprocal market?

Mr. OLIVER. Not at all The suggestion of my hon. friend (Mr. Burnham) does not touch the point. I will deal with the point he has raised later on. But for the moment I am dealing simply with the question of the advantage to the western producer of access to the markets of the United States for his products, and I say that the market reports show that the advantage in the United States markets on the 2nd of March averages about ten cents a bushel on wheat, fourteen cents a bushel on white oats, and from twenty-four to sixty-four cents a bushel on barley.

Mr. SHARPE (Lisgar). Is it not a fact that the price of wheat was higher in Manitoba on the 20th of September last, the day before the election, than it was in North Dakota?

Mr. OLIVER. I do not know, and I do not know what difference that makes. The question is, what is the price of wheat now and what has it been ever since? If my hon. friend is going to put before this country the idea that because his friends have been returned to power the price of wheat in Canada has gone down, he is welcome to that contention; but I would think he would be the last man to make such a proposition, and I want him to be my witness that I have not made that suggestion.

Mr. SHARPE (Lisgar). The hon. gentleman knows as well as any man in this House that a premium is paid for hard wheat in North Dakota at the present time. He knows that the millers at Minneapolis thought that reciprocity was going to carry in Canada, and for that reason the price of hard wheat went down in North Dakota, and the price in Manitoba on the 20th of September last was higher than in North Dakota, showing conclusively that reciprocity would have been no good for western Canada.

Mr. OLIVER. The only flaw in my hon. friend's argument is that the difference in price is greater on damaged wheat than it is on sound wheat, greater on soft wheat than on hard wheat, greater on barley than on wheat, greater on flax than on wheat and greater on oats than on wheat. So that my hon. friend has no ground whatever for his suggestion unless he contends that because of the return of this government to power the price of wheat in Canada has gone down.

Mr. SHARPE (Lisgar). I never said that. I said that the price in North Dakota went down. I did not say the price in Canada went down.

Mr. OLIVER. The price in North Dakota to-day is an average of ten cents a bushel higher than in Manitoba. Therefore the price in North Dakota must have gone up, or the price in Manitoba must have gone down.

Mr. SHARPE (Lisgar). Does the hon. gentleman as a western representative think that we would get the prices quoted in the United States to-day if we had reciprocity with the United States?

Mr. OLIVER. There comes to my mind the case of a rich man who was dying and whose pastor suggested that he might leave his money to the church. The dying man wanted to know what effect that would be likely to have upon his future condition. The minister said that he could not tell, but suggested that there would be no harm in trying. There would be no harm in our trying the effect of access to a market where the price has been persistently for four months ten cents a bushel higher than it has been on our market, and has been persistently year after year in that condition. Not every day, I will admit; but as a rule the Dakota price has been better than the Manitoba price, and my hon. friend is my authority for this statement, in a speech which he delivered in this House in 1909.

Mr. SHARPE (Lisgar). Would that condition continue under reciprocity?

Mr. OLIVER. My opinion is: yes, undoubtedly. But it is not a question of opinion; it is a question of fact. I say that, with a population of ninety millions of people consuming wheat, and wanting the best, there is a sufficient demand in the United States for our special quality of wheat to keep the price at a premium for home consumption in the United States. That is my belief, and I think nobody will contradict it.

Mr. LALOR. They wanted it for export.

Mr. OLIVER. They are not exporting a bushel of that kind of wheat, and if my hon. friend does not know it, my hon. friend behind him (Mr. Sharpe, Lisgar) will tell him. I think I have established thoroughly that the policy of this government has cost the prairie country, on a fair estimate, not less than $12,000,000 during the current year. Is that a loss only to the prairie country? Is not that a loss that will affect every interest in Canada, and particularly the manufacturing interests of eastern Canada?

Mr. BURNHAM. Do I understand you to say that they offered reciprocal trade without a quid pro quo?

Mr. OLIVER. They offered it for a consideration.

Mr. BURNHAM. How do you claim, then, that it would be a benefit to the whole of Canada?

Mr. OLIVER. I am saying that the loss of $12,000,000 of newly-created wealth to the western farmer is a loss to the whole Dominion of Canada. I hope my hon. friend understands that.

Mr. BURNHAM. I do not.

Mr. OLIVER. Then I am sorry. There has been a great deal of talk about a division between the east and the west. Let me say that the eastern manufacturer is directly interested in the loss of that amount of money to the western farmer —that the eastern commercial house, the eastern financial interest, every interest, even the canners' combine, is interested.

Mr. LALOR. What about the eastern farmer, who turned your party out of office?

Mr. OLIVER. That is his privilege. I am not arguing with my hon. friend on that point at all. May I be allowed to continue my address, unless my hon. friend has some light to throw on the subject? I want to emphasize the point that every interest in eastern Canada is interested in the western farmer and in his getting every cent of value that can be got for his crop; and when the eastern manufacturer lined up his men before the 21st of September and told them that if reciprocity carried, the factory would have to be shut up and they would be out of employment, he told them what was not the fact. He urged them to vote against what was in their best interest and in his best interest, as well as in the best interest of this country as a whole.

Mr. LALOR. How about the member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie)?

Mr. OLIVER. The member for South Wellington can answer for himself, and I think he is quite competent to answer any of my friends on the other side of the House who may wish to ask him any questions. I have estimated the loss to the western farmer and to all Canada by reason of failure to secure access to the United States markets for the western products at $12,000,000 in this current year. But our hon. friends will say that it is contrary to their policy to allow the western farmer to sell his products on the other side of the line. I think my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. White) suggested that we ought to build up a milling industry in Canada and build up our railway system by defeating reciprocity. That is to say while we have a tariff that compels the producer to buy in a protected market we are also going to reject an arrangement that would enable him to sell otherwise than in a restricted market.

But there is another condition in the country in regard to which relief might be given in a manner less directly contrary to the policy of our government, I speak of the condition of traffic congestion or grain blockade. That matter has been brought to the attention of the House and the government have given their answer in regard to it, they have told us we must not complain of the dispensations of Providence, that they have not been in office very long and have been very busy, they have had something else to do than to take care of the conditions as they exist. Let me emphasize those conditions. It has been stated here and elsewhere that by reason of the lower prices resulting from the grain blockade the western farmer loses on this year's operations not less than $10,000,000, and he stands to lose $6,000,000 more by reason of the total destruction of damaged grain. That is to say he stands to lose $16,000,000 as a result of the inadequacy of the transportation facilities in that country in regard to this year's crop. But our friends say that this is a condition that cannot be avoided. They say that in one breath and in the next breath they say: We have taken measures to avoid it. They have succeeded in making arrangements with the railway companies so that this grain can be delivered by a short haul to St. Paul and Duluth instead of being taken to St. John—and if they had made those arrangements so that they would have come into effect on November 10 instead of on March 7, there would not have been any grain blockage, there would not have been any loss to the farmer either in depressed prices or in loss of damaged grain. This government has been convicted by its own action of having stood silent and quiet and careless while this country has lost $10,000,000 and stands to lose $6,000,000 more when it need not have lost one cent had an aggressive and energetic government, one that was paying attention to the needs of the country, been in office. If they take refuge in the statement that their policy is averse to sending Canada's trade across the line, then I ask, why did they make arrangements to have it go south of the line? If they say it is not contrary to their policy then they stand convicted of having lost to the western farmer and to this country the stupendous sum of from $10,000,000 to $16,000,000 without the slightest justification on earth. There are times when a policy may very well be abandoned.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. OLIVER. There are times when a policy may very well be abandoned, and this was certainly one of those times. Yet when I had the honour to place before the House a resolution approving of the action of the government, desiring to confirm them in the policy which they ultimately adopted, they rejected the resolution, and their followers voted against it to a man, declared absolutely against a policy that would have relieved the situation of this year; and in all human probability such action will be just or almost as necessary next year. We have on record the votes of the members of the government and their followers in the House declaring absolutely against the very policy that they themselves were compelled to undertake, only at too late a date in this year. I do not know just how far the excuse of lack of time should prevail. When a government is charged with the responsibility of office, when they have assumed with all readiness that responsibility, I am not sure just how far lack of time is an excuse for lack of action.

Another matter that has been discussed in the west for some time and brought to the attention of this House by formal resolution, is the question of the equalization of local railway rates. Surely there could be nothing more fair, more reasonable, more right than that the railway companies should not be allowed to charge more on the western prairies for like services under like conditions, than they are allowed to charge in eastern Canada. That principle has been applied to the carrying of passengers, but it has not been applied to the carrying of freight. The proposal that it should apply to the carrying of freight was rejected by the government; it was declared that the Railway Commission must deal with this matter, that the responsibility was with the Railway Commission and not with the government or with parliament. Now, on behalf of the western country, I want to say that what is important to them is that they shall have a square and even deal; they ask for no advantage, but they do ask that in a question of railway transportation, which is more important to them even than the question of tariff, they shall not be discriminated against by the railway companies. And they look to parliament, which charters the railways and grants them bonuses and assistance of various kinds, and they look to the government, to see that justice is done in that particular. But the government does not want to take the responsibility. It has a Railway Commission that takes that responsibility off its shoulders. This is a form of government by commission, of which, it seems to me, it is quite possible to have a little too much. When a great injustice exists—or I will not say injustice, but when a great and manifest inequality exists—as between the east and the west, and the government refuses to take cognizance of that condition, it is no wonder that my hon. friend from Calgary (Mr. Bennett), my hon. friend from St. Antoine, Montreal (Mr. Ames), my hon friend from Brandon (Mr. Aikins), and some other members of the House supporting the government go out through the country and make what I must characterize as very wild statements in regard to the condition of public feeling in that country. But the government surely will recognize that when their supporters are so fully impressed with the conditions as to cause them to make these statements, it is surely time for the government to take a day off from slaughtering Grit officials and pay a little atention to the necessities of the country, even though it be the western country.

While the government did not have time to deal with the grain blockade, and did not have the inclination to exercise its responsibility in dealing with the freight rates, there was one matter that they did not lose any time in dealing with. I refer to the duties on lumber. I have not the calendar at hand, but I do not think the government had been in office more than a few days when their friends of the lumber combine in British Columbia came down and, at their demand, the lumber duties were practically readjusted so as to lay a heavier burden upon the western settler than he had borne up to that time. It was not enough that he had a bad season; it was not enough that he was compelled to accept panic prices for his grain owing to the grain blockade; it was not enough that he should have to pay excessive local rates in securing a local market for his damaged grain, but our friends opposite had plenty of time to make a little adjustment of the lumber duties so as to take I should fancy not less than a quarter of a million dollars out of his pocket in this particular season, at the command of the British Columbia lumber combine.

Did I say the government did not have time? Well, in some things they had time. The government brought in, early in the session, a Bill to deal with the grain trade. This Bill represented the mind of the people of the west, of the producers of the west, in regard to the handling of their product. It was the result of years and years of consideration, possibly of agitation and demonstration. They came to parliament last year—came, may I say, to a friendly government—and asked that the conditions surrounding the grain trade be further improved in their interest. The Bill was prepared and was brought before parliament, but it failed to become law owing to the dissolution. It was brought forward again at this session, practically identically the same Bill. But our friends opposite had time to amend it in such shape that even my hon. friends from Lisgar (Mr. Sharpe) and Souris (Mr. Schaffner) could not, or dared not vote for its provisions. Now, Mr. Speaker, this is probably the most serious matter that has touched the west at the hands of this government since they took office. In one particular, in the matter of car distribution—and I do not intend to trouble the House with details—the Bill as it had been presented meant an average of from 2 cents to 6 cents a bushel to the western farmer selling his grain at country points. By reason of that car distribution clause, he was able to sell his grain at the terminal, and so he could benefit by the buying competition in Winnipeg while otherwise he would have had to take the competition at the local point. And any man who knows anything of the grain trade will realize that the difference between the competition in price at country points and at the central or terminal point would mean anywhere from 2 cents to 6 cents per bushel. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster) has seen fit to amend that Act. That Act, affecting a right established by the efforts of so many years and which was of such benefit to the producer, has been framed in such a way, that, as I have said, two of the hon. gentleman's own supporters would not or could not vote for it. And there is another amendment dealing with the mixing of grain. If there is one thing more than another that the farmer has insisted upon it is that the grain shall go forward to its ultimate destination under the government certificate that is given at the inspection. Again it is not necessary to deal in detail with this matter; but it is a fact that the prevention of the mixing of grain offers a premium to the good farmer and that to permit the mixing of grain destroys the good farmer's premium on the market.

My hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster) did not hesitate at short notice to push his amendment through which legalizes the mixing of western grades on their way to market, provides means and machinery and legalizes the degrading of the quality of western wheat as it goes to the ultimate market.

Sir, is it any wonder that our friends behind the ministry have taken alarm? Is it any wonder that they have become afraid of the consequences, first of ignoring, and then of attacking the interests of the producers of the west? I am at a loss to know on what principle this government proposes to govern this country, if it is to ignore the welfare and progress of that vast western country, if it is to ignore the importance to the whole Dominion of providing that the western farmer shall get the last cent of value of his bushel of wheat. Unless the government acts on the principle that it is necessary to recognize that right of the farmer, I am doubtful of the progress of this country in the future. It is not a question as between the east and the west, it is a question as to the whole country. If this country has progressed, if manufactures have increased in Montreal, Toronto, Hamilton and Brantford, if the price of real estate in Montreal and Toronto is high, and soaring, everybody knows that it is not because of the increase of production on the farms of Ontario and Quebec, but it is because of the increase of production in the prairie west, and that increase of production depends upon the price the farmer can get for his product. But instead of recognizing that fact, instead of bending their energies to some policy or principle that would improve the conditions of the farmer there, they come here and preach us sermons on the necessity and desirability of the farmer being on good terms with the elevator men, and not finding fault with the railroad company. They tell us that the farmer must go into mixed farming, that they are going to build the Hudson Bay railway, and that the farmer ought to be optimistic. They tell him anything and everything except what will be to the point and will do him some good. Now let me say that it is no business of the government whether the farmer raises ducks or raises wheat. It is his business what he raises, and they can depend upon it that he is going to raise that which is within his means and to the best advantage. It is the business of the government to see that the best possible opportunity is given to the farmer to get the best price for what he raises. It is not a question of the railroad companies, nobody is attacking the railroad companies because they did not haul more grain than they did. The railroad companies no doubt hauled all the grain they were able to haul, along the routes that this government have allowed them to haul it. The railroad companies apparently were deprived of the advantage of taking the shorter haul, and to-day are doing the best they can to catch up with the conditions which, I am sorry to say, have been allowed to remain so long that there is no possibility now of relieving them to the full extent.

Now Sir, we are dealing with the presentation by the government of its financial propositions for the year. We are glad that they have decided to continue the tariff that has been in force for some years past. We are glad that they have declared they are going to continue the policy of constructive development that has been the policy of the late government during past years. But if they are going to take the position that because the country is prosperous that all they have to do is to shake the plum tree vigorously, then I want to assure them that they are under a wrong impression. This condition of prosperity that we enjoy to-day did not come about only as an act of Providence. It was necessary to give direction and inspiration to the energy and industry of our people, and because that direction was given in due course and at proper times by the late government, under its well defined policy of lower taxes and freer trade, it has been possible for this country to achieve in the current year its greatest revenue, its greatest surplus, and the greatest measure of prosperity that it has ever enjoyed. If our hon. friends are able to keep that record, if they are able to increase still further the prosperity of the country and its development, it matters not, I am free to admit, whether it is their policy or ours, whether it is high taxation or low taxation, whether it is restrictive trade or expanded trade. If they can secure that continued increase of prosperity with a policy of high taxation and restricted trade, we will be glad to enjoy the prosperity and to share it with them, and we will give them the credit of their policy being better than we expected. But our belief is that this country needs a policy of lower taxes and expansion of trade, in order to secure its continued development and prosperity.

Mr. W. F. COCKSHUTT (Brantford). Coming as I do from an industrial city in the province of Ontario, I think it is proper that I should say a few words on the issues raised by the budget speech presented yesterday by my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. White). At the outset I desire to compliment that hon. gentleman on the exceedingly straightforward manner in which he presented the condition of the finances of this country, indicating a grasp of the financial arrangements, a grasp of expenditures and receipts, and the management of sinking funds, loan accounts, and all other subjects dealt with in the budget, which showed him to possess a master hand.

I desire, therefore, to compliment him in that way. Having said that much I must add that I have one or two regrets in regard to the budget speech; not for any thing that it did contain, but for one or two items of considerable importance that it did not contain. I may probably be standing in a somewhat isolated position with regard to what I have in my mind, but, being a man of business and always having been accustomed to say exactly what I mean on any given question, I propose to name the subject on which I regret that the Minister of Finance, and those who are associated with him, did not see fit to speak. The omission I desire to mention is the non-introduction of the iron and steel bounties. I think that the 'Citizen' this morning indicates very largely what the country thinks, that is, that the chief point that was expected was missed, because the first head line contained these words: 'No iron or steel bounties.'

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. COCKSHUTT. Hon. gentlemen seem to say 'all right,' but we are in this anomalous position, Mr. Speaker, that the iron and steel trade for the past 15 years have received more from a so-called free trade government than they are going to receive this year, and next from a so-called protectionist government. That is an anomaly that is worthy of being pointed out, and I regret that in this respect I do not agree with the budget speech that has been delivered. When a man is drowning is not the time to investigate; it is the time to save, and after that, if you wish to find out how he got there, make inquiry. Do not wait while he drowns, but lend him a helping hand. If the iron and steel trade require reasonable bounties, as I believe they do, in my judgment they should be granted now, and after the Tariff Commission have made their inquiry, if it is found that they do not need this assistance, they can be taken away. How much would it have taken? According to the 'Monetary Times,' it would have taken about $2,000,000 a year. That is a very small matter, and it may be said that it means very little to the industries of the country. But I would point out that it is an indication, to a certain extent, of the forces that are in control at the present time of the trade of Canada, and I quite agree that the present government were elected very largely because they were supposed to be a protectionist government.

That is my view, that is the doctrine that I preached on the hustings, and that is what I say here. I am not ashamed to own that I am a protectionist, and that I have been consistently a protectionist for thirty years past. I was brought up as a business man, I have made a special study of tariffs and business matters, and when I speak to you, Mr. Speaker, and the members of this House, I speak as a business man not desiring particularly to make any political capital at the expense of any one else, but with a true desire to look at what I believe to be the best interests of Canada in all respects, and to all classes. Remember, I am not a protectionist for the manufacturer any more than I am for the agriculturist. I know that an hon. gentleman across the way will say that you cannot protect the agriculturist, but if he comes down to our town, or to our part of the province of Ontario, I can show him that the farmer is protected there. I can show him that the farmer of Ontario is protected to-day. He knows it and, further, he appreciates it. The farmers of Ontario at the last general election voted in very large measure for the return of this government to power, because they realised that the home market was their best market, and that it was for their welfare that it should be retained.

I also desire to call the attention of my hon. friend the Minister of Finance to the very large excess of imports over exports at the present time. I look upon that as a danger point. No less a financial authority than Sir B. E. Walker of Toronto, drew attention to it in his recent report to the shareholders of the Bank of Commerce. He says that is a danger point, and I think that in a country such as Canada, with natural resources such as she has, it requires no explanation to show that when you import, as you did last year, $472,000,000, and only export $297,000,000, there is something wrong. That is a difference of $175,000,000 between imports and exports, and that balance, for the most part, has to be settled by cash. Last year, in the trade between Canada and the United States, it took $165,000,000 in cash to settle the balance of trade. The hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver), who has just spoken, told us that it is broader markets that we are perishing for, that it is wider markets that we are suffering for, and he goes on to figure out that the western country has lost $10,000,000 by reason of reciprocity not being put into force as it would have been, according to the hon. gentleman, by the late government. I want him to make all fair deductions from that, and if he does he will find that he has a large balance on the other side, and I can show it. That reciprocity agreement did not cover grain only; it covered animals and their products, vegetables and fruits and almost every conceivable product of the farm. The hon. member for Edmonton figures out that we lost about $10,000,000 this year because we did not adopt reciprocity in so far as western grain is concerned. Let me tell him what would have happened in Ontario, Quebec and the maritime provinces. You have in these provinces one and a half million cattle, and the figures produced during the discussion of the subject proved that on cattle alone you would have had a loss of $10 a head, as compared with the value in the United States. It was figured that there would be a loss of $10 per head on milch cows, $5 to $10 per head on young cattle, and $2 to $3 per head on sheep. On cattle and sheep, Ontario, Quebec and the maritime provinces would have lost double the $10,000,000 if reciprocity had been adopted, that the hon. gentleman estimates was lost by the people of the western country on account of the refusal to adopt reciprocity. Has he no sympathy with the farmers of the east? Ontario is doing a little farming still, Ontario contains as many farmers yet as the whole of the three new provinces of the west, and Ontario for the past three years has grown more products upon its farms than have been grown in the three great western provinces. I am saying that with no disrespect to the west, but I want the hon. member for Edmonton to have a little more desire to equalize things than he appears to have, and not be ready to sacrifice the farmers of the east for the sake of the farmers of the west.

There must be give and take in this matter, and I say to the hon. member that we saved the farmers of Canada when we turned down reciprocity. If there ever was a gold brick that came down the pike, it was that reciprocity gold brick that my hon. friend (Mr. Oliver) has advocated. Reciprocity was discussed in this House of Commons for six months, and I read the speeches, and high prices for the farmer was the cry that rang from one end of the Liberal benches to the other. But, when these gentlemen got out on the hustings of Ontario, their crop was: Cheap food for the workingman. Oh, what a fall was there, from high prices for the farmer to cheap food for the working man, and so to-day we have in this House the hon. member from Edmonton (Mr. Oliver), and the labour member from Montreal (Mr. Verville) both on the same side of the House and each advocating, an entirely different policy. But, from this side of the House, comes a policy which benefits all classes in this country; protection for both these great interests, protection for the agricultural industry and protection for manufacturing enterprises. That is the policy that has built up Canada in the past, and that is the policy that will make Canada great in the future. Reciprocity with the United States was turned down because it was a gold brick and everybody in our district knew it, and we discussed it fairly and squarely. We showed the people exactly where they would be at if they voted for reciprocity, and the farmers from one end of Ontario to the other said: We don't want any of your reciprocity; we appreciate our home markets. We were told to-night by one hon. gentleman of the opposition that it is the middleman that is causing all the trouble and that he steps in between the farmer and the consumer of the farm produce, and keeps the farmer from getting the high prices he otherwise would. Well, let me tell that hon. member what happens in my own town. I live in the city of Brantford, which has a population of about twenty-five thousand, and which, I think, is about equal to the population of the city of Edmonton. We don't make quite as much blow, and you don't hear as much about us, but we are there all the same, and I think we are producing more than does the city whence the hon. member (Mr. Oliver) comes. I may claim at all events that the city of Brantford is at least the equal of the city of Edmonton, although it is true we are content with a hundred dollars a foot for our real estate, while the hon. gentleman (Mr. Oliver) would ask a thousand dollars a foot for real estate in his city. At all events, we have built up in the city of Brantford with great trouble and care a body of skilled labour, represented by six thousand five hundred workingmen who have been trained in their business. And with great capital and with skilled labour a great manufacturing industry has been established in the heart of an agricultural district such as Brant county is. Let me tell the hon. member how we do business in Brantford, and then he will see that the farmer gets full price for his products and that no middleman intervenes. We have a market square occupying about two acres in the centre of the city, and on Saturday morning there are from three hundred to five hundred farmers with their wagons around that square, and these wagons are filled with the products of the farm. The workingman from the factory marches up to the farmer's wagon, laden with eggs, butter, meats of all kinds, poultry, vegetables and fruit, and he buys direct from the farmer who produces, and the money that is paid goes directly into the farmer's pocket. Is not that the right system; is not that co-operation between the country and the city? And let me tell the hon. member further, some of the prices that have obtained right in the city of Brantford under these conditions this winter: eggs have brought for the last two months from forty cents to fifty cents a dozen direct from the farmer; butter has brought from thirty cents to forty cents a pound; potatoes have brought from one dollar and fifty to two dollars a bag and so on with the other products of the farm sold direct from the farmer to the workingman, and no middleman about it. And, Mr. Speaker, what is the result: The farmer is prosperous and the workingman is happy and living well and enjoying himself and getting good wages in an occupation that suits him well. The workingman is saving money and the farmer is saving money, and these conditions prevailed last summer during the election campaign and, therefore, the farmers of Brant county and the workingmen in Brantford decided to let well enough alone, and they did let it alone with a vengeance; and a city that has been usually Liberal gave me almost one thousand majority, a thing I never dreamed of and never expected to see. These were the conditions that prevailed not only in Brant county but throughout the province of Ontario, and instead of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Oliver) wondering how it was all done, if he had kept up another month or two with the style of argument he has put up to-night and which was put up during the campaign, there would not have been even thirteen members from the province of Ontario. What a tumble it was from high prices for the farmer to cheap food for the workingman. The first man to make the leap from the high prices for the farmer to cheap food for the workingman was the late member the hon. Mackenzie King, who prepared the figures for the government to prove that the American market was going to be a bonanza, but as soon as he saw the figures he flopped over and he took every one with him who could be stampeded, and the 'Expositor,' the Liberal newspaper, and the 'Expositor' man who was the candidate against me went with him in the jump. Then, instead of talking high prices for the farmer as they had done for six months previously, they began to talk cheap food for the workingman to catch his vote. We asked one of the prominent Liberal workers how he took such a jump, and he answered: I have talked high prices for the farmer for six months; we have got the farmer loaded up with high prices, and having got the farmer we are going after the workingman with a cry of cheap food. Well, that is exactly what was done by the Liberal party and between the two stools they fell to the ground, and, as I said, the Hon. Mackenzie King was the first man to take the jump, because he saw that the plea of the government was completely frustrated by the figures which he himself had prepared with great care to prove that prices in the United States were better than in Canada. And, Mr. Speaker, it is a fact that these prices in the United States throughout that campaign, and for the most part up to the present time, on all agricultural products, barring perhaps No. 1 wheat and one or two things of that kind, are higher in Canada than they are in the United States to-day, and they have been right along. Will the hon. gentleman (Mr. Oliver) tell me if he can—and I will give him a chance to answer—will he tell me of one single product of the farm that the United States does not produce in greater quantities than it requires for its own people? Can he name one? As far as I know there is not a single agricultural product raised in the United States that there is not an excess of. On nearly all classes of food products which they raise, their yearly exports run up to the hundreds of millions of dollars.

An hon. MEMBER. What about barley?

Mr. COCKSHUTT. They export barley. They may not export No. 1 malting barley, but they export barley. They export potatoes, they export wheat, they export oats, they export cattle, sheep, horses, butter, cheese and all the products of the dairy. Probably, I might include flax as an export from the United States, but that may be questionable as it depends on their requirements at home, and some years they export it and some years they do not. But, take almost every product of the farm and you will find that the American is an exporter.

An hon. MEMBER. Including hay.

Mr. COCKSHUTT. Yes, including hay. The Americans export every class of vegetables, and in the city of Brantford, which is in the heart of an agricultural district, we are eating products of the American farms that have paid 30 per cent duty. Irish potatoes, I understand, have reached Ottawa, paying 30 per cent. Butter has reached here from the Antipodes; mutton has come from the Antipodes; eggs have come from Russia, China and Japan. And yet these gentlemen are telling us that we are pining and dying for broader markets, when they cannot look after the markets right here at our own doors.

Mr. OLIVER. Will the hon. gentleman tell the House, if the agreement had been passed and the duties on the articles he has mentioned had been taken off, would that have increased or decreased the cost of living in Canada?

Mr. THOBURN. Would it have increased the price to the farmer?

Mr. COCKSHUTT. I think that in some lines it would have decreased the cost of living at certain times of the year; but I want to say further that we in the city, realizing the climatic conditions in this country, knowing the difficulties that our farmers have in producing their stuff in the cold weather, are ready to pay a fair price so as to give them a profit in order to remain on the land. My hon. friend will see eggs coming from the United States, where the chickens run free all winter, and compete with eggs laid by hens in a pen artificially heated and where every bit of food has to be provided. Is that a fair proposition? My hon. friend would admit the vegetables grown by negro labour in the southern states at this time of the year when our vegetables have to be grown under glass. He would have our vegetable producer, who has to heat his hothouse with coal at $7 or $8 a ton, compete with southern labour, which can grow vegetables in the open air. I would be prepared to meet my hon. friend before any audience of farmers, and I would make him take back many of the arguments he has put forward to-night.

Mr. OLIVER. If my hon. friend will permit me, I want to say most distinctly that my policy is free food, so long as we can get free markets for the food we export.

Mr. COCKSHUTT. My policy in opposition to that is to give every man a chance to live, and live well. I know that in Canada industry cannot thrive without protection, that the Ontario farmer cannot thrive as he is thriving without protection; and if my hon. friend does not know that, he ought to know it before he undertakes to speak for the farmers of Canada. What does the proposition of my hon. friend mean? It means that not only the products of the United States, of which there are hundreds of millions in excess every year, but the products of Russia, of China, of Japan, of Norway, of Sweden, of Denmark, of Australia, of New Zealand, Argentina, and other parts of the world, would be dumped in Canada to compete against those of our farmers, and without a single concession from those countries. If there ever was a jug-handled proposition if there ever was a policy propounded by men whom Providence led on to destruction, it was the policy propounded by the Laurier government. We are sorry for the two old gentlemen who went to Washington and came back with that gold brick, and we are sorry for the men who sent them; but if they were foolish enough to take so foolish a course, we say now gentlemen take your medicine, and the longer you hammer away at reciprocity, the longer you will stay on that side of the House. We are glad to have you talk reciprocity, and we will meet you all along the line on every argument you can make. There is not a single argument in the whole list with regard to which we cannot justify a protective policy for Canada. The hon. gentleman's party were in the government for 15 years, during which they came very near to practising the National Policy, and wherever they deflected from that policy they made a mistake. Now, I am not speaking at random. Let me give two instances. When the hon. gentleman's party came into power there were flourishing in Canada twelve barbed-wire factories. They had not been in office two years before they removed the duty on barbed-wire, and since then for years there has not been one pound of barbed-wire manufactured in Canada. Take binder twine, of which there are two industries struggling in Brantford at present. The hon. gentleman's party took the duty off binder twine. I am not discussing whether or not that was an act of wisdom; but I am showing how reciprocity of that kind works. The price of binder twine went up, and all the twelve factories but three are now gone. Of these three factories, one that had $3,000,000 capital has cut it down to $1,000,000, and the other two are struggling for life, and may not last until the Tariff Commission comes to their relief.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. COCKSHUTT. Hon. gentlemen laugh. They have laughed before it was time to laugh. They are a good deal in the position of the Irishman who was handed a shillelah. He asked, 'What shall I do with this? This man who gave it to him said, 'Wherever you see a head, hit it.' That is what hon. gentlemen opposite would like to do: wherever they see a struggling industry, they want to hit it on the head—why should it flourish? If it loses money, they do not say anything, but let it go; but if it is making money, it is a mark for the shillelah of our hon. friends. The hon. member for Edmonton since last September has repeated at least a thousand times some of the expressions he has given utterance to to-night. I am within the mark when I say that he has repeated the words 'mergers. combines and trusts,' at least a thousand times. Has he destroyed one of them? No, but he is doing his best to destroy his party. He is doing his utmost to raise the west against the east. He is telling us in the east that we have no problems that should have attention. The hon. gentleman forgets that Canada is more than a mere province or a city like Edmonton. We wish Edmonton every success; we are proud of it. I visit it with great satisfaction. I do not know whether or not my hon. friend has spent in the west more than I have if he has, I would be surprised to hear it. My interests are bound up in the west as much as those of my hon. friend, and I would not lift my finger to injure any western interest. I trust that I am too broad a man to endeavour to have a policy which would be good only for my town or my riding, and would let the rest of the country go to the dogs. I hope, as the years go by, that my hon. friend will take a broader view of this country, that he will consider what it is from the Atlantic to the Pacific, that he will not forget our brethren down by the sea, who are men of the right stock, and who, if they have done nothing else, have given to the west some of the very best blood that it has to-day. A country that can raise such men is worth keeping. We have not been inimical to the interests of the maritime provinces. We have scarcely had an opportunity to get a man to settle in the eastern provinces.

Mr. OLIVER. To what industry was the hon. gentleman referring in the maritime provinces?

Mr. COCKSHUTT. Agriculture particularly. I think my hon. friend is rejoicing in the disappearance of the iron and steel bounties. He certainly approved of that course, and this emphasizes my fear with regard to it, because I always shun anything that my hon. friend endorses. I am sure I am on the right track if I am opposed to the hon. gentleman. That is the reason I feel so sure. The iron and steel bounties are of great importance to Nova Scotia, I think even some of his own political friends will endorse that. For 15 years the hon. gentlemen himself endorsed these bounties when his government gave them. Now he congratulates the country because these bounties have disappeared as soon as the late government are out of power, and he is willing to sacrifice Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, and Quebec, because he thinks this little $2,000,000 that is going to be saved to the pockets of Canada is far more important than that these industries should go on and flourish. He is not so slow to commit us to large expenditures when he thinks they will be of any advantage to himself or his part of the country. I understand he has both hands up for the Hudson Bay railway. We certainly have an overflowing treasury, and I think that this is a time for expansion, but there are many of us in the east who have our misgivings as to the propriety of rushing ahead with that road.

Mr. OLIVER. The west is going to pay for that road, and is not asking the east for any money for it.

Mr. COCKSHUTT. I had not heard of that. How is the west proposing to pay for it?

Mr. OLIVER. By the sale of land.

Mr. COCKSHUTT. The hon. gentleman says the people of the west are proposing to take all the risk with regard to it. Of course if they are building the road with their own money all well and good. I thought it was to be for the general advantage of Canada, and that the expense would come out of the general funds of the country. The hon. gentleman admits that he asks the government to assume the control and operation of terminal elevators, which would involve an enormous expenditure. I hold up both hands for all matters of that kind that will help the west, but if $2,000,000 is going to save industries in the east, and my hon. friend wants $20,000,000 or $30,000,000 or $50,000,000 for the west, does he not think it would be rather kind of him to allow us to spend a million or two in the east if we spend $10,000,000 or $20,000,000 at his behest for the benefit of the west? I do not know if the hon. gentleman would go that far with me or not, but I trust he will, and I trust he will admit that these things which affect the east should be encouraged as well as those things which affect the west. But I shall not pursue the hon. gentleman in that course any further.

I have talked on reciprocity. I have shown you the reasons we turned it down, and turned it down hard, and we showed the people of the province of Ontario a more excellent way. My hon. friend may say what do you mean, you denied us access to the markets of the United States which were already overflowing with all the products of all kinds that Canada could possibly send to them. We have had something else in mind besides that when we turned down reciprocity. We said to our friends in Ontario that we believed reciprocity was dangerous from a material, a National and an Imperial standpoint. In a material sense we proved our case up to the hilt to the satisfaction of the farmer and the working man. Then we took the national view, and we said that reciprocity would strike a staggering blow at confederation, because when the Dominion was formed one of the conditions of the union was the construction of railways to run east and west in order to bring the provinces into touch, and to secure the flowing of trade east and west between them. My hon. friend wants to stop all that, to take the wheels off those railways running east and west, and to run his into the United States which is already flooded with these products. What would that have meant? The diversion of the carrying trade of the great west into New York, Boston and Portland. These ports would handle the traffic that should have gone from our own Atlantic and Pacific ports.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer). Would my hon. friend tell me how he can possibly make out that the railways running north and south would have taken our products to a place which is already flooded with them?

Mr. COCKSHUTT. I think the proposition is dead easy and I am sorry my hon. friend has not been able to see it. He comes from a country where they do not see things quite as quickly as we do in Canada. The products of the northwest would flow in at say North Portal into Illinois, Dakota and Minnesota, and the same products would flow out over the American roads through Boston, Portland, and New York. The hon. gentleman may ask how I know that. The American statistics show that they are exporting from all these ports every item that we could send into the United States. They might eat a little Canadian grain but then they would have all the more American grain to export. Every bushel of wheat that entered the United States from the Northwest territories, would displace a bushel of American wheat to go to the markets of Europe to compete with us in the great British market which we at present enjoy. These hon. gentlemen have built up a beautiful theory. They say: Broader markets, what we want is beautiful broad markets.

Mr. OLIVER. My hon. friend says that because the United States exports wheat there is therefore no market in the United States for Canadian wheat. Does the hon. gentleman say the same thing in regard to ploughs?

Mr. COCKSHUTT. In regard to a certain kind of plough yes, if you make the best plough in the world you will get a few into the United States. Let me tell my hon. friend that this is a free country and if he thinks there is money in making ploughs I invite him to go into the business. I think he will soon conclude that

No. 1 Hard wheat is a better proposition than plough making. He will be quite welcome. We have no monopoly, it is an open free market for everyone who wants to come in, and if my hon. friend says he wants to enter the competition, all right. I say that if the United States has a surplus of produce, then for every bushel of Canadian wheat that is sent in there and consumed by the American people there is a bushel more of American grain to export. A blind man can see that proposition. A market which is full cannot be more than full, and the United States is replete with every class of foodstuffs produced at first hand, in many cases cheaper than we can produce them. Why? Climatic conditions are at the root of the situation and I say that the farmer who with great difficulty raises early lambs in this country in artificially heated barns is entitled to receive for those lambs a higher price than the man who raises lambs in Alabama or Texas where they can run out in grass all the year round and require no hand feeding.

And you ask the farmers of Canada to compete with such a country as that. We are willing that the farmer shall get high prices. How high? As high as will pay him to stay upon the farm. And the workingmen of Canada are willing to pay it. Why? Because the manufacturers have been prosperous and have paid their workingmen accordingly. When the National Policy was introduced in 1878 men were getting from 85 cents to $1 a day. They are now getting $1.75 to $2 for even the cheapest labour in Canada, while artisans are making from $3 to $4 and even $5 a day throughout this country. And the workingman knows, if my hon. friend does not, that protection has a lot to do with it.

Now the hon. gentleman disturbed me in my argument and I wish to go on as rapidly as possible, because I have a big subject to deal with and do not wish to weary the House. I say that we turned down reciprocity, and in doing so we showed to Canada a yet more excellent way. And what is that way? Trade with the mother country on preferential rates and advantageous terms. That is what we said, and that is the secret that more than anything else destroyed the late government. We got the people of Canada to see it; even though my hon. friend does not see it yet. The former Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) came down to Simcoe, the county town adjoining my native county of Norfolk—and that was the only win he made in Ontario and he did it this way. He said to the people: They say that this reciprocity arrangement will injure the preference; don't you believe it; we are the men who gave the preference and we stand by it, and the preference cannot be hurt by this arrangement. Never was a more fallacious statement set before any audience than that if made to men who know what trade preference means. The policy of a British preference was not inaugurated by hon. gentlemen opposite as they have always claimed. I make that statement advisedly. The first preference proposed ever laid before the empire in a public way was made by the great statesman who has been lying almost at death's door this winter, Sir Charles Tupper, whose name has been a household word for so long in Canada. He was the first man to introduce the doctrine of preference and not the jughandled variety of preference adopted by hon. gentlemen opposite. The preference that Sir Charles Tupper and those who followed him advocated was a give and take policy, and to this I invite especially the attention of my hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. Clark). I say that the preference we advocate and we ask the people of Canada to turn to was not the jug-handled preference now in force, but a preference in which we would receive something for something given. What would this reciprocity have done had it been endorsed? It would have destroyed the possibility forever of having a preference arranged with the mother country such as is proposed. Everybody can see that; it is plain on the face of it—there could have been no mutual preferential arrangement with the old country if reciprocity had come into force. Why, reciprocity was aimed at that. J. J. Hill made no secret of it. He said: Gentlemen, there is a move on foot in Canada, Australia, New Zealand and South Africa, along with Great Britain, to make a great trade compact whereby the mother country will receive from the colonies a preferential rate on the foodstuffs they have to send. Reciprocity, on the other hand, would have permitted the American wheat to come into the Canadian market free of duty. Now, can my hon. friends opposite tell me how Canadian wheat could get preferential treatment in the British market where the American wheat was coming in free, without giving the same treatment to the United States? And to give it to the United States would be to destroy the inter-Imperial preference. They are looking to the idea that Canadian wheat will receive preference in the British market. And I take issue with the hon. junior member for Halifax (Mr. Maclean) in what he said on the subject in this debate. I tell that hon. gentleman, and I tell any other hon. member on that side that the tariff reform movement, the empire preferential movement, is yet going to be the winning card—and under a Canadian Premier, too, Mr. Bonar Law. I believe that will be the fixed policy. I believe it to be a 'comer' and that it will afford to Britain and the empire a bond such as we have never seen in the history of the world. That is the more excellent way pointed out to our northwest friends—not to trade less with the United States, but to trade more with the mother country. The mother country requires over 180,000,000 bushels of imported wheat—more than the northwest is yet able to supply. And the United States is getting more of that market to-day than we are. These gentlemen in England tell us that they are prepared, as soon as they get into power, to arrange a preferential agreement with Canada, New Zealand and South Africa by which the products of the farms of this country will be received into Great Britain at preferential rates. That is not an impossibility; that was practised sixty years ago. And it was a success then and will be a success in the future. I see that my hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. Clark) does not appreciate that statement. But I think he will realise, if he consults the history of that period that it is quite true that there was prosperity of the empire before the Cobden days—which were intended to smash the empire; Richard Cobden made no bones about it, he said, free trade will ultimately cause a disunion of the empire; that is the doctrine he preached when he introduced free trade and broke the preference to do it. Canada had a preference in Great Britain in timber, raw products and foodstuffs. That is a well known fact of history; and before Richard Cobden appeared on the scene the empire was thriving better than it has ever done since. Let us look at the picture there to-day, and I say this with the deepest sympathy. Every man in this House regrets from the bottom of his heart the affliction that has fallen upon the mother country during the last two weeks, where upwards of a million miners are on strike and most of the industrial concerns of the country are closing down. I say our hearts go out in sympathy to them in their affliction; we realize that Great Britain is in the throes of great trouble. But we are ready to stand by the same policy that we have proposed for twenty-five years past if I understand aright. I understand that this government is recognized as a government that has an Imperial policy, and I say that now is the time to bring that policy to the front. And that is the reason, more particularly, why I speak to-night. I say, I pin my faith to the union of the British Empire—union in trade and union in defence. And we cannot bring that about too soon. That is the reason why the United States was so anxious to detach Canada from the Imperial orbit. For, detach Canada and you break the chain. That was the idea, and J. J. Hill knew it and preached it. He said: Now is the accepted time, now is the time to break the chain—now, or never. But we got the people of Canada to see it; and the people of Canada did see it and said: Whether the bargain with the United States is good or not, our duty is to the mother country first and to the dominions overseas. They said that and they voted that, and the result is that hon. gentlemen then in power are on the opposition side of the House to-night. The policy announced by the Right Hon. Joseph Chamberlain about ten years ago is the endorsed policy of the business men of the empire. My hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. Maclean) says there is nothing to it. I am sorry he is not in the House to hear me read a resolution I have here, but he can see it in 'Hansard.' This is the businessmen's views as expressed on three different occasions in the greatest trade gatherings that have ever taken place in the British Empire. This gathering took place in Montreal, the convention of the Chambers of the Empire in 1903. And I now read the resolution that was passed at that time:

> It is resolved that in the opinion of this Congress the bonds of the British Empire would be materially strengthened, and the union of the various parts of His Majesty's Dominions greatly consolidated by the adoption of a commercial policy based upon the principles of mutual benefits, whereby each component part of the empire, would receive a substantial advantage in trade as a result of its national relationship, due consideration being given to the fiscal needs of the component parts of the Empire.
> That this Congress urges upon His Majesty's government the appointment by them of a special commission composed of representatives of Great Britain and her colonies and India to consider the possibilities of thus increasing and strengthening the trade relations between the different parts of the Empire and the trading facilities within the Empire, and with foreign countries.

Now, that resolution was passed by a very large vote of picked business men of the whole empire that went to London in 1906, where, convened with the majority of the British Chamber of Commerce, they passed a similar resolution in the heart of the empire. Three years ago they went to Australia, my hon. friend from Montreal (Mr. Ames) and myself being Canadian delegates, and in Sydney they again passed a similar resolution. So three times over a congress of the Chambers of Commerce of the empire has decided that an empire combination in behalf of trade is what is wanted. That is my policy. I have advocated that policy for 25 years, and I am advocating it here to-night. I say that is what will give a better price to our farmers and our workingmen. The United States wishes also to become a partaker in the benefits of that policy which will give the Northwest a great deal more money for its wheat. The British market is the market that pays the best, because Great Britain requires an immense amount of that kind of stuff from this side of the world. She is naturally inclined to trade with Canada to the best advantage, and it is natural that she would be more generous toward her own children than to strangers. That is a policy of empire preference. I believe that ere long we will see Great Britain and her colonies united in one confederation for the benefit of the whole empire, co-operating entirely in trade and defence. When that happy day comes I believe we will have accomplished the greatest work the world has ever known in empire building. We will never be united as we should be until that combination is complete. We wish to see the British workingman for his own sake receive the same benefit that the workingman in Canada receives. We are sorry to-day for these coal miners. I think if there is one class in the community with whom we should sympathize more than another, it is the coal miner who has to leave the world of light and go down in the bowels of the earth, and at the risk of his life delve and dig there in order that we might be kept warm through the winter. I say our hearts go out in sympathy to him, we think it is a pity he is not better paid in the mother country; we realize that they want something in the shape of protection, so that the employing classes may be able to pay better wages. In the words of a miner's song:

> Mammon is the master and man is the slave,
> Toiling for wealth on the brink of the grave
> Leaving the world of sunlight and sound
> For the darknes of night and a silence profound.

For the man that delves in the coal mines our hearts go out in sympathy. And if we could send a sympathetic message to Great Britain that we are prepared to stand by her, to make a bargain with her to lock our trade with her own, and our business interests with hers, we would be doing something great and grand that would redound to the credit of Canada, and I trust the time is not far distant when we shall take that step. I sympathised thoroughly last night with the member for South York (Mr. Maclean), who spoke on the naval question, I sympathise with him in that respect as well as on the trade question. I know that this is not the occasion to dwell on that subject, but I may say that if we are true Britishers we shall see to it that in trade and defence we will give the best we have, the best help, and the best consideration to the mother country, and to the sister colonies of Australia, New Zealand, and South Africa in every respect that we can.

Now, Sir, I have spoken longer than I intended. So far as I am concerned, I stand for a policy that will build up every interest and every part of Canada. I do not want to see the east built up at the expense of the west, nor the west built up at the expense of the east. I want to see the west and the east stand by one another like brothers, that is the way I feel, and if at any time anybody has ever drawn any other construction from my remarks he has done me an injustice. I stand as firmly in my desire for the welfare of the west as for the welfare of the east. I have a son of my own in the west, I have interests in the west, and I am just as heartily desirous of the success of the west as I am of the east. But I say we must have a give and take policy in this matter, we must stand together to develop the country. One part cannot grow without assisting the other. We must be united in a policy of development, in a policy that will be not a hindrance to any part, but a policy of co-operation, giving earnest heed for the welfare of every part of this vast country.

Mr. NESBITT. First of all I wish to congratulate the Minister of Finance on the very systematic and capable way in which he presented his budget speech. I would like to say first of all that I quite agree with him that railway subsidies should not be charged to capital account, but to consolidated fund account; I think the former Minister of Finance also expressed the same view. I remember that I had the privilege of saying so once before. I certainly congratulate the country that in 1910-11 we had a surplus of $30,000,000 in round figures, and an increase in the debt, after paying a large amount towards the Transcontinental, of only $3,773,000. I congratulate the country at large, and more especially I think the late government, on the surplus that is shown for the financial year of 1911-12, being sufficient not only to pay all the expenses under consolidated fund account, but also the large amount that had to be paid towards the Transcontinental railway, and in implementing the bonds of that railway in the west, leaving an amount to apply on public debt of $1,150,000. My hon. friend the Minister of Finance said that he thought, and I agree with him, that to the energy and perseverance of the Canadian people is due the splendid showing he was able to make. I quite agree with that. I do not agree that whatever credit may be due to the government in power should be equally divided with the late government, because my hon. friends who are now in power have done nothing whatever to increase that surplus. They have made no change so far as the tariff is concerned. In the supplementaries that were brought down last night they have done something to decrease the surplus by some expenses that I think were unnecessary since the 10th of October, 1910.

Anybody who will look at the supplementary estimates will see a charge upon the revenue in the form of increases of salaries to departmental men that were unnecessary. They were paid sufficiently before. In addition there were changes for the secretaries and one thing and another of that kind that, I suppose, are only natural with a new government coming into office. At the same time these are increases that have to come out of last year's income and they are, in my judgment, quite unnecessary. I would like to congratulate the country on being able to pay $120,000,000, estimated by the Minister of Finance on the National Transcontinental railway, and upon the fact that, with an expenditure on capital account since 1904 of $252,000,000, the net increase in the debt is only $77,000,000.

I desire to say just a word in reference to the cost of the National Transcontinental railway. I quite agree with my hon. friend the junior member for Halifax (Mr. Maclean) that a cost, even if we allow the statement brought down by the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Cochrane) the other day to be legitimate, of $130,000 per mile is not over and above what the cost of any first class railway in the United States, or even in Canada, has been. I understand this railway to be equal physically to the Grand Trunk between Toronto and Montreal and if that is the case I do not believe that there is a railway in America which has been finished up to that standard that has cost less than $130,000 per mile. In any event, if the railway has been so finished and if it has been left in first class physical condition, I am not the least bit disturbed by the cost. If, however, the railway is not finished in that condition perhaps the cost has been excessive. You must understand that the cost was natural on account of the almost impossibility of getting in supplies. The supplies to build the railway are naturally heavy and hard to transport and therefore it was absolutely necessary that the cost should be very high. We all know that a commission has been appointed by this government to investigate the cost and we will see what its report is. As far as I am personally concerned I am not a bit afraid of an investigation, nor am I disturbed by the cost of the railway. In the first place, it opens up a country, the development of which is necessary to the continued progress of this Canada of ours and a country which will contribute largely to our prosperity. At the same time it will enable transportation from the west to be carried on, I hope, at a cheaper rate than at the present day and if it does that it is all that we desire. But the main question is, no matter if the cost has been great, would anybody in this country vote to do away with the railway on that account? If the bulk of the people would then it has been an unnecessary cost.

Now then, I come to another question dealt with in the speech of the hon. Minister of Finance, and that is the question of the 3¾ per cent loan of £5,000,000 sterling due in November, 1909, and which, owing to the high price of money at the time, was renewed by the former Minister of Finance, Mr. Fielding, by a short date loan which falls due some time this spring. We were told by the Minister of Finance that he was able to renew that loan, I think, for forty years at 98. I asked him if that 98 was net, and he immediately defended underwriting. I raise no question with regard to the system or principle of underwriting, because we know that is a principle which is applied to all these large loans, but, I am sorry to say he did not tell us what the cost of the underwriting was. While I have no fault to find with the principle of underwriting, I do want to know what the cost is. Our hon. friends on the other side of the House, I remember, attacked Mr. Fielding on the occasion of his last budget speech, or the budget speech before that, very severely because he had paid some expenses of underwriting in the same manner. I remember their criticisms very clearly, and they were certainly anything but kind or necessary. I am not going to find fault with the Minister of Finance because they did that with our Minister of Finance. At the same time it is only fair that we should ascertain what the Minister of Finance realized for these securities. He told us that he realized 98. That was 98 gross. I think the Minister of Finance told us that he paid a commission of about 2½ per cent, so that the sale would realize to us 95½. Our 3½ per cents which are due in 1939—that is to say that we can pay them during that term—were sold in February last at from 99½ to 100½. Our 3 per cents were selling at from 91 to 92 at the same time. Canadian Pacific railway 3½ per cent bonds, with our own guarantee, due in 1938, were selling at 99 to 101. That was a guaranteed bond. It seems strange that the Grand Trunk Pacific fell so low as a guaranteed bond, when Canadian Pacific railway guaranteed bonds were selling practically at the same price as our own bonds. The question I would like to ask the Minister of Finance is not whether it was wise to sell these securities through the Bank of Montreal as our fiscal agents at 98, but whether he got what he should have got for these 40-year securities when he sold them at 98 gross, when the same security, or a worse security, because we had the option of paying it off at any time by giving a certain notice, was selling on the English money market, according to a statement of the 'Financial Review of Reviews' at from 99½ to 100½. It may be that there is some explanation for it, but without an explanation it would look to me at least as if the Finance Minister had not realized for these securities as much as he should have realized. I quite understand that we must have fiscal agents in England while we are borrowing large sums of money, but if the Bank of Montreal are charging too much, there is no reason why we should not get some English fiscal agent. There is no reason why the Minister of Finance should not change his fiscal agents if the Bank of Montreal are charging him the difference between 95½ net and the market price, 99½ to 100½, or say, par.

The Minister of Finance issued the warning that nothing should be done in this country that would tend to stop the flow of British capital for investment, and in that I agree. But, I think something might be done by the government to help us in obtaining even more English capital than we have been receiving in the past. We all know that capital is shy and that no capital is more shy than English capital if it is once deceived, and in view of many of the wildcat investment schemes that are sent over from Canada to the English market there is great danger that British capitalists may be turned against us. In order to guard against such an occurrence, I would advocate that the government might establish some branch under the State Department or some other, which would carefully scrutinize every charter issued by the Dominion government. I have no fault to find with a merger or combine if that merger or combine is incorporated for the purpose of reducing the cost of production so as to supply goods to the consumer more cheaply, but over-capitalization of companies, whether they be combines or mergers or not, is a great danger to this country. There are very many enterprises being incorporated in these days with no other object in view that that of making money on their flotation, and to do that they have to be over-capitalized. There surely could be some organization under the government to scrutinize carefully what was intended to be done with the capital and to see that there was no over-capitalization beyond the necessary money required for the enterprise itself. A combine or a merger, even though it can be described as such, may be for the benefit of the consumer, and I know of combines and mergers that have resulted in that way, but, at the same time, they may be organized only for the purpose of benefiting the get-rich-quick promoters, and then these gentry come to us and ask for protection to enable them to make money on the extra capitalization. I care not whether it is a combination of companies already incorporated, or whether it is a new company, there should be government supervision of it to stop over-capitalization. I know that the provinces can charter companies without reference to us, but if we had such a Dominion institution as I advocate, which would, to a certain extent, guarantee to English investors the validity of the security, it would not be long before it became known in the financial world that Dominion chartered companies were most worthy of confidence.

There is another thing which I regret to find there was no reference to in the budget speech, and that is the fact that the time has come when Canada should take her part in the protection of the empire, and cease to longer sponge on the mother country for her defence. I regret to find the absence of any indication on the part of the present government that they will do what they should towards the protection of the empire, and which, in my opinion, England will insist on, if she is going to invest her money with us in such large measure as in the past. It is only because the people of the motherland had faith in Canada, that they have hitherto advanced their money so generously for our development; and, in order to retain that good feeling towards us in England, it becomes necessary for us to do our part in the defence of our common empire. Then again, on the question of immigration, I would suggest that track be kept of the emigration which leaves our shores as well as the immigration which comes to us. The result of the last census would seem to prove that if the immigration reported and the natural increase had remained in the country for the last 10 years, Canada to-day would have a larger population. My hon. friend the minister for Dundas (Mr. Broder)

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. NESBITT. Pardon me, the hon. member for Dundas (Mr. Broder) told the member for Edmonton to-night that our late Minister of Agriculture had not done his duty towards agriculture in the older provinces, in that he neglected to see that the farmers raised large families and kept them on the land. He told us also that houses should be built for the hired men on the farms, and he promised that the present Minister of Agriculture was going to see to it that the farmers of Ontario especially would raise large families, keep them on the land, and build houses for their working men.

Mr. BRODER. The hon. member (Mr. Nesbitt), has misstated my remarks.

Mr. NESBITT. I regret if that is so, but that is the way I understood my hon. friend (Mr. Broder).

Mr. BRODER. You are quite wrong.

Mr. NESBITT. Anyway, the suggestion is an excellent one.

Mr. BRODER. I simply referred to the fact that it would be wise to build houses for the hired men and let them raise their families, so as to solve the domestic help question.

Mr. NESBITT. I do not know that it would be wise for the government to undertake to build houses for the farm labourers of Ontario.

Mr. BRODER. You are misquoting me again; I said the farmers themselves should do that.

Mr. NESBITT. Well, I think that is a very good idea. For the last ten years I have been urging on our farmers at home that the best way to solve the hired man problem was to build houses for them, hire them by the whole year, and keep good men when they got them.

In my experience the farm hand that we get from the old country is not at all equal to our own native product. The native-born is the man for me every time, while I find no fault with the immigrants from the old land some of whom make excellent hands. The farmers themselves can remedy the trouble very materially by building houses on their farms and hiring their hands for the year instead of for eight months, and letting them for the rest of the time go idle or go to the towns to swell the ranks of the unemployed there. Agriculture, we are told, is flourishing. I am glad to say that it flourished throughout Ontario last year, though as a matter of fact the crop was not much more than half the usual crop.

I note from the minister's speech that there are to be no changes in the tariff. As my hon. friend from Edmonton points out, while our hon. friends have been finding fault with the late government for the last fifteen years, they have not seen fit this year to change the tariff in any way. They are going to wait for the report of that wonderful Tariff Commission that is going to do so much for the people of this country. I was surprised, however, that there were not some changes made. For instance, take the cement tariff. Cement is used by nearly every farmer and workingman in this country. An enormous quantity of cement is used by the farmers of Ontario. I understand that there is a Cement Combine. I am not complaining of that. I am complaining, however, that the duty on cement should be retained to the detriment of the farmer and the workingman. The workingman, if he has a home of his own, wants cement to build sidewalks to it. To the farmer cement is almost as much a necessity as food and clothing. I was surprised, therefore, that there was no intimation of an intention on the part of this government to reduce the duty on cement. Some people say that cement is no dearer in Canada than it is in the United States. As a matter of fact, it is selling at $1.20 in Buffalo and at $1.75 in Woodstock, Hamilton and Brantford. The cement business in this country is thoroughly established, it does not need protection as an infant industry, and therefore, there is no reason why the farmers of Canada should not have been given a reduction of the duty on cement. Then, take the item of potatoes. With the price at which potatoes have been for the last four months there is no reason why hon. gentlemen opposite should not have passed an order in council remitting the duty on potatoes for a period, as they did on coal going into the west last year. I think it has been a crime to charge the poor man, or even the rich or reasonably well-off man, the duty on potatoes during the last four months. There has been no object in doing so, because we have not had potatoes for sale; we have been importing them from Ireland, from the United States and from other countries.

Now, my hon. friend from Brantford was very enthusiastic over the bounties on steel and iron. He said the late government had continued those bounties for the last 15 years. As a matter of fact, I think they were originated by the friends of the present government before the late government came into power; but we continued them and perhaps increased them. As far as I am personally concerned, I do not think the late government should have given those bounties; but in their wisdom they gave them to the iron and steel industry while it was in its infancy, and as soon as they thought that industry had grown up and was able to support itself, they did away with the bounties. It was not the present government that did so. Everybody thought they were going to put on the bounties again, but apparently they dare not do so, and personally I am very pleased that this is the case. We heard a great deal from the hon. member for Brantford about the balance of trade, about our importing more than we export. I am not worrying about that; it shows the prosperous condition of the country. It is like a man starting in business. Before he can start he must necessarily put in a plant and equipment. The balance of trade is all against him at the start. We are only organizing this country. We have grown enormously in the last 15 years. The consequence is that we have been bringing from the United States and also from England, hundreds of millions of dollars worth of machinery to equip our factories; and we are bringing enormous quantities of supplies from the old country. This only shows that the country is prospering, and is preparing for still greater growth in the future, as we have to provide our equipment before we can be what we shall eventually become. The balance of trade is nearly all represented by the vast quantities of machinery that we are bringing in that we cannot make ourselves, to equip our factories. My hon. friend from Brantford told us in a very enthusiastic manner that his people went to the market to buy their vegetables, fruits, meats, &c. We all know that that is done all over Ontario; every town has its market. He asks, would you allow the cheap eggs and vegetables from the Southern States to come in and compete with our eggs and vegetables? I say yes, by all means. Would you deprive the ordinary man living in the city or the town from buying vegetables simply because he cannot pay the price for those grown under glass?

That is so far as vegetables are concerned, and as for eggs, what benefit do our farmers get from eggs being 40 cents a dozen. When eggs are at that price there is not one in a hundred who has any eggs for sale; but when eggs come down to 20 cents and 25 cents a dozen, as they are now and have been for the last two weeks, the farmers get some benefit because they have some for sale. If vegetables go up to a high price because they are grown under glass and the ordinary residents of our towns cannot afford to buy them, does that benefit the farmers? Is that not a great disadvantage to the workingman? Because a darkey grows them down in Georgia, should we deprive the workingman of the benefit of being able to get potatoes and fresh vegetables in our towns and cities? What harm would that do to the potatoes or the vegetables? Yet you deprive the workingman of them. My hon. friend says that we told the people that under reciprocity the farmer was going to be benefited and the workingman would get his goods cheaper. We heard that illustrated to-night. My hon. friend from Maisonneuve (Mr. Verville) showed you by figures that were undeniable that while the raw production was dearer, the food for the family was cheaper in the United States, the farmer there got more for it. Take the figures for any part of the United States, and you will find that the farmer does get more for his raw material and that the workingman gets his meat and his vegetables cheaper because the price to somebody is less. I have no fault to find with the middleman. We have got to have middlemen, but there is reason in all things, and there is no reason why eggs should be purchased for 30 cents from the farmer and sold at 50 cents to the consumer. At the same time, while there may have been a few eggs sold at Brantford for 40 and 50 cents a dozen, Brantford is too near Woodstock to have such a difference, as the farmers from near Woodstock would go to Brantford to get such prices, and there were no eggs sold in Woodstock this winter at over 35 cents a dozen. Even then, who got the benefit, how many were sold? One woman could carry them all on her arm, because how many people are there in Woodstock who could afford to pay 35 cents or 40 cents a dozen for eggs? My hon. friend may say that there were more people in his town than in some other town able to afford such prices, but I doubt it.

As my hon. friend from Edmonton says, we would have benefited the great west in allowing them to ship their grain. What nonsense to say that because the United States is an exporting country it could not absorb this western grain. He has told you that we built railways connecting the provinces, and that if we allowed that grain to go to the south it would have stopped shipments over these railways. As a matter of fact, when we have the three Transcontinental railways in operation we will be just as badly off or nearly so, so far as the west is concerned, as we are to-day with reference to shipping facilities. What assistance has the Intercolonial railway been to the people in the west? Is it any benefit to the people in the west to see their grain rotting in the fields or in the railway yards because we want to secure the shipment of that grain over the Intercolonial railway to the east? What harm would it have done us to have a free market? The hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver), is absolutely right when he tells you that the farmers of the west during the last 15 years have been of the greatest possible benefit to the manufacturers of the east, and I heard last week of one court in one city in the west that during one week recently had issued 600 writs on farmers because they could not pay for implements, etc., shipped out there. That is a serious state of affairs and that could have been helped last year as the hon. member for Edmonton claims it should have been helped. Would it not have been a grand thing for the people of the eastern country to have assisted them in this? It is quite true that the farmers of Ontario were not grumbling about the prices. It is not exactly correct to say that it was loyalty to Great Britain that defeated reciprocity among the farmers of Ontario. What tended to defeat reciprocity more than anything else in the world was the fear that as we were getting good prices a change might not be beneficial, the eternal call of the British-born in our towns and cities and the appeal against the American who was too smart for us. I told the electors on the platform and I repeat to-night, that any Canadian who has so little pride as to think that the American is more clever than the Canadian in a business transaction I do not want to have as a fellow-Canadian. I have never yet seen any reason why we as a people, individually or collectively, should be afraid to put our brains up against our friends on the other side of the line. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Cockshutt) says that so far as the farmers in his section of the country are concerned, they were united against reciprocity. So far as the farmers in my section are concerned, and I think they are as good as there are in the world, they were very strongly in favour of reciprocity and they did not care a snap of the fingers about protection. They do not ask for protection; they can farm, and sell goods against the world and they are not afriad to produce goods and sell them against the world. I, as a farmer standing here to-night, just as much interested in farming as any man in this country, according to my means, tell you that I do not want your protection. I can farm and raise produce, whether it is sheep, pigs, cattle or grain, and sell it against the world. Do not deceive yourselves into believing that the farmers of Ontario voted against reciprocity because they wanted protection. They voted against reciprocity becaues they were deceived by factional cries.

An hon. MEMBER. Not so.

Mr. NESBITT. I tell you it is so. I know what I am talking about when I talk of the farmers of Ontario. For there is nobody here who mixes with them more than I do, and nobody here who consults with them more than I do. And that is the way to find out. My hon. friend from Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt) told us that when we came into power we ruined I do not know how many factories that were in the business of making barbed wire. These factories got their wire from the United States—that country that we are told is so corrupt and bad—and they twisted the barbs into it in this country. No wire was made in this country; the barbed-wire was finished here, that is all. But who got the benefit of the change? The farmers got the benefit. Hon. gentlemen opposite know that. And I dare them to-night to put a duty on barbed wire. Let them do that, and they will see how long the farmers of Ontario favour such a policy. I do not wish to see any factory ruined. Everybody knows that I am in favour of reasonable protection. But there is reason in everything; and there are times when protected industries, even in their own interest, should consider the interest of the public at large. As I have said, I dare these hon. gentlemen to put a duty on barbed-wire, whether their Tariff Commission reports in favour of it or not. And the same with binder twine. We are told that the price went up after the duty was taken off. Everybody knows that the reason for that was not the taking off of the duty, but the higher price of the raw material. The binder twine factory in Brantford to which the hon. member (Mr. Cockshutt) referred, was started by the suscriptions of the farmers. It paid the farmers 80 per cent dividend the first year; the second year 40 per cent, nothing the next year, and nothing ever since. And why? Because they made money out of the rise of price of raw material and sold the raw material rather than make it into binder twine.

Mr. CLEMENTS. I believe the hon. gentleman (Mr. Nesbitt) has the Bain wagon factory in his constituency. Is he in favour of protection to that industry?

Mr. NESBITT. Certainly.

Mr. CLEMENTS. Then, why not to others?

Mr. NESBITT. I have just said I am in favour of that. I am in favour of reasonable protection on the Bain wagon product the same as on others. And if they cannot exist with a reasonable protection, I don't want them to exist at all. And I do not believe the Bain wagon people do either.

Mr. CLEMENTS. Is the hon. gentleman in favour of the present protection on wagons?

Mr. NESBITT. I voted for it. And the Bains voted for me and did everything in their power to elect me. And there was a reduction of the duty on wagons by the reciprocity agreement.

Mr. CLEMENTS. Is the hon. gentleman still in favour of reciprocity?

Mr. NESBITT. Certainly I am. There is no man in this House more willing than I am to let every class of people in this country have a living; nobody more willing that there should be reasonable protection to manufacturers so long as they require it, while industries are in their infancy. But let me tell hon. gentlemen opposite that the day is coming when this proposition will carry in this country.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. NESBITT. You may laugh; but it is coming. There has got to be a reduction of duties as was proposed under reciprocity. There are industries in this country that need protection, but there are other industries, and hon. gentlemen opposite know it, and none better than the Minister of Finance (Mr. White), that do not need the protection they now have. And the people pay for that protection. As I said a few minutes ago, why keep the duty on potatoes when the farmers of this country have none to sell? Why have a duty on any foodstuff? We the farmers of Ontario don't want it. We can compete; and you do not make the farmers more able to compete by a duty of 3 cents on eggs. How much barley do we in Ontario ship out except for malting purposes? We grow it only to ship out for malting purposes, because barley is not as good feed for our cattle and hogs as our other cereals that we can grow. And how much wheat do we want to sell? It has got to be in the neighbourhood of a dollar a bushel or the farmers of Ontario don't sell it; they feed it. Farming factories—that is what they are coming to be in this country. And I believe we shall see the day, when, as my hon. friend from Dundas (Mr. Broder) said, more intensive farming will be carried on in Ontario. But we do not want your protection; that is the excuse you have for the whole system of protection; though it is not the one I make. I am perfectly frank in declaring my belief that the infant industries of this country require a certain protection. But it should be reasonable; it should be only sufficient to allow them the difference between the cost of manufacturing in other countries and the cost of manufacturing here. And the rest should go to the consumer.

Now, I am sorry to have taken up so much time; but at least I can say that I do not often claim the attention of the House. Now, let me tell hon. gentlemen opposite once more that so far as the question that was defeated on the 21st of September is concerned, they need not hug themselves over that defeat—not a bit. That question will come again, perhaps in a new form, but it will come. There have got to be reductions of the duties on a great many things in this country, and that within a short time, or there will be trouble.

Mr. A. BELLEMARE (Maskinonge). (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, knowing the excellent disposition of the government towards the agricultural community of this country, and as a representative of a rural district, I might be allowed to make a few suggestions concerning the expansion of the agricultural industry with the hope that the representatives in this House of agricultural districts will avail themselves of the few remarks I intend to make.

I think it is high time that more effective means than those resorted to in the past should be adopted in order to improve the yield of the land under cultivation.

We are living at a time when it is on the shoulders of the farmer that fall ultimately the most onerous burdens. The task of the farmer is an arduous and difficult one. He discharges it manfully, but does he get from it the reward he is entitled to? Does he reap from his work as much as he could reasonably expect?

In almost every case, Mr. Speaker, the crop of the farmer is out of proportion with the work it has entailed. That is, Sir, the true reason, why so many Canadian families have deserted the native land and settled in a foreign clime. In a country boundless and rich as ours is, a country inhabited by a population which is sober, vigorous and hardworking, really it is a national crime to let the farmer desert the native land because he lacks the knowledge which he should have to make his farm more productive.

I shall add, Sir, that if the ignorance of certain farmers with respect to agriculture is guilty, the indifference of the rulers who, being aware of the fact, would let such an evil hold good, should be criminal. Would it be possible without incurring extraordinary expenses, to improve our agriculture and to make the position of our farmers more supportable? Why yes, by means of school farmers, and though somewhat costly, those schools would mean invaluable advantage to the farmer.

I have received, a few days ago, a booklet on agriculture; this work was written by one of our compatriots who has studied different systems of school farmers abroad, and especially in France and in Belgium. Here is what I find in it, among other things:

There is in operation, in the country districts of France and Belgium, an admirable 'instrument' of agricultural education and instruction. It is not too complicate and it is rather easy to copy. The representatives of the Department of Agriculture are directed to buy or to merely rent, in a commune, a farm intended to vulgarize such methods of farming as are most profitable to the district. That farm is known as the school farm or 'monitor.' The intendant or keeper is bound by his contract to have at the disposal of people such and such seed-grains, saplings, fertilizers, samples, tools, etc., etc.; to keep such and such breeding animals, to rear poultry, bees, &c., &c. He is bound to receive, every year, during a week or more, the farming engineer or government's lecturer who comes and gives the farmers, on the spot, a course of practical teaching. As a rule part of the course pertaining to theory is given in the forenoon. The balance of the day is spent outside, in lessons of things, in applying the notions taught during the morning. In a place well adapted for the growing of apples, for instance, the professor will teach all the operations connected with apple-growing from the burying of the pip in the soil to the packing of the ripe fruit ready to ship to the market, &c., &c.

All this is not only possible but even very easy as you see. The farm should not necessarily be an immense farm; a very small one would be very suitable. Supposing a farm like this is found in every farming county, do you not see what advantage the young men in the country districts would derive therefrom? They would study without much cost, what farming system should be the best for their district, owing to the climate and the soil. When those young men would be farmers in their turn, they would be in a position to do practical, rational and profitable farming. Of course, an account could be kept here of what proceeds those farms bring, and such earnings would reduce to a great extent the amount it might cost to keep them up.

I conclude by humbly making those suggestions to the House, and I hope that they shall be taken into serious consideration before long.

Mr. ROCH LANCTOT (Laprairie-Napierville). (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, I did not intend to take part in the debate at this late hour of the night, but the hon. member for Maskinongé (Mr. Bellemare) has just given me the opportunity of making a few remarks. He stated, first, that the present government is well disposed towards the farming community. I am glad of it, and I would like the government to show what they can do.

The hon. members who have preceded me addressing the House in English, have dealt practically but with our financial situation. I would like to say a few words about reciprocity. It has been said that reciprocity was now a dead issue. I assert the contrary. I maintain that reciprocity is a live question at least in the county of Laprairie-Napierville which I represent here.

In the last electoral contest the electors did not vote on reciprocity, but on the navy question which our opponents took advantage of everywhere. The electors would say: Well, we are in favour of reciprocity, but we must first decide this famous navy question.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, our opponents said that should the Laurier government be defeated the navy would be no more a question. But I see that it is a question to-day just as it was before, and I am very much afraid that it shall grow too big and that the electors of the province of Quebec shall find it more dreadful in the future than they did previous to the 21st of September.

It was evident that reciprocity would have been profitable to the farming community, and I say so without fear of being contradicted. In all the public meetings which were held during the last general elections our opponents said—in order to scare the people—that the farming community would have to compete on the local market against the natural products of twelve nations which were favoured by the treaties. And they added: you have the English market, then you have no need of the United States market, send the surplus of your products to England. We are perfectly aware of the fact that the natural products of all the countries in the world are admitted in England duty free. For my part, I fail to see why we should have dreaded the competition of those twelve favoured countries on our own market, since we would have had to compete with them on the English market.

As the hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt), has said, we are not afraid to compete with any other country or on any market in the world, with respect to our agricultural products. To my mind, all the difficulty arises from the fact that the foreign markets are difficult for us to reach owing to customs duties which, in many a case, are practically prohibitive. It is admitted that the farmer nearest to a market is the one who derives the most benefit from it, provided there is no such obstacle as customs duty. For instance, the United States government, by imposing $4 duty per ton on Canadian hay, keeps it away from the market of that country; and those $4 duty must be added to what it costs for carrying that hay to destination. All this contributes to keeping us away from that market.

During the last electoral campaign I happened to make a comparison which seemed very clear to me. I took, as an illustration, a Manitoba, a Saskatchewan or an Alberta farmer who shipped a car load of oats to the Montreal market, and I compared his case with the case of a farmer in any country who also shipped a carload of oats to Montreal. In the first instance the cost of transportation should be $150, whereas in the second instance it would amount to $12 only. Then I asked my auditors; is it not true that western farmers could not compete with the farmer in Laprarie? Therefore, the quality of the product being the same, the only question is the cost of transportation; the producer who is nearest to the market is the one who derives the most benefit from it.

The United States government, by imposing $4 duty on hay, keeps us away from the Boston and the New York markets and from the New England markets so as to favour the farmers of the Western States. That duty then, keeps us away from those markets, although we have the advantage of distance. I say, therefore, that this or any other government must, one day or other, make that reciprocity treaty which the farmers of my county, and I might say, of the whole country, are loudly asking for.

When the hon. member for North Toronto, now the Minister of Commerce (Mr. Foster), criticised the budget speech last year I listened to him with close attention. He said that it was almost a crime for the government of Canada to levy $72,000,000 as customs duties, which represented he said, $10 to $11 per head of the population. In fact, that was a good deal of money. And great was my surprise when I heard that same member declare later on, when he spoke against the reciprocity treaty in this House, that everything was satisfactory and that we should let well enough alone. If it was a crime to collect $72,000,000 as duties last year I say that the late government intended to remedy that evil by reducing the duties on our imports from other countries. In fact, is it not true that by a reciprocity treaty with the United States, the farmers of our country would have made a gain of about $5,000,000 which they pay over to the United States to-day as duties? The duties paid on goods imported into Canada or on those of our products which exported to the United States mean no profit for anybody except for the public chest of each of the two countries.

It is stated that the duties are paid by the consumer. Such is not always the case. In many instances, the vendor has to suffer because the price of the products that he ships is affected not only by the cost of transportation, but also in proportion of the duties imposed. Having done business with people in New York for the last twenty years as a dealer in hay, I have some notions on this subject. When I ship a carload of hay to New York I must calculate, first, the cost of transportation, then the customs duties and, finally, my agent's commission. I would be in a position to pay a higher price to the farmer had I no duty to pay, and that duty would exist no more if we had had reciprocity with the United States. Such is the case with all the ordinary business of this life. To reach Montreal the inhabitants of my county pass on the Victoria bridge. Formerly, they used to pay 80 cents for every carriage, to-day they only pay 25 cents for a two-horse carriage and 15 cents for a one-horse carriage. Shall a farmer who goes from my county to Montreal with a load of potatoes, of tomatoes or other vegetables, dispose of his products at a higher price because he paid to cross the river on the bridge or on a boat, while the farmer who lives on the Montreal Island—in Laval or in Jacques-Cartier, for instance—has paid nothing and will come and take a place right at his side at the market, with the same kind of products for sale? Certainly not. When he is back at home in the evening he calculates the result of his journey, deducting, of course, from the amount received, all he had to pay on the bridge or on the boat, and for his dinner, whereas the farmer from Laval will have to deduct nothing but what his dinner may have cost him.

In the last campaign, especially in Laprairie, the reciprocity question was not decided on its own merits. My opponent who called himself a Liberal, talked of the navy, but very little did he say about reciprocity. Since the elections people ask me every day: shall we have reciprocity? No, I reply, the party that was in power and that wanted reciprocity has been defeated.

Who Mr. Speaker, has fought reciprocity most vigorously? The great financiers, millionaries and important manufacturers, some of which opponents, I regret to say, are to be found in the ranks of the Liberal party. Why were manufacturers opposed to reciprocity, when we asked for a reduction of duties on natural products without touching manufactured articles? It was feared that the agricultural population, having tasted the sweets of reciprocity, would want unlimited reciprocity as devised by the Liberal party twenty-five years ago. The manufacturers decided that the idea must be nipped in the bud and in such a manner that it might never come up again. In my opinion the manufacturers were mistaken. The agricultural class representative of the population who have paid duty since 1878 on all they buy, is it not time that the burden of taxation should be reduced for them, especially as they are the majority. Is it necessary that the government should favour the manufacturers to the detriment of the masses and make them millionaires of whom it may be said after their death: so and so was worth so many millions? When men lived eight or nine hundred years as in the time of Methusalem, such fortunes might be useful, but to-day life is too short, and if a man accumulates millions in the short span alloted to him the people must suffer for it.

The day will come when the mistake committed on the 21st September last will be recognized, people's eyes will be opened and we will obtain the reciprocity we desire.

It is objected that reciprocity with the United States is a step towards annexation. For my part, I traded in hay with the United States since twenty years and that has not made an American of me. However a dollar is just as useful to me if it comes from New York as if it came from London or Liverpool. I may add that if we had access to the American market, we would have three markets instead of two and reap greater commercial benefit in consequence.

It is all very well to speak of the local market, but a large population is needed to consume all we produce and much time is required to increase that population. There is no race suicide amongst us, it is true, but the best each family can produce is one child a year and it required twenty years to make a man of him. I am of opinion that we should consider ourselves to some extent and not think exclusively of our children yet unborn.

I say that reciprocity must come, that the day of its coming is not far off and that when it does come it will benefit the agricultural population and the consumer.

Mr. PAQUET (L'Islet), Mr. Speaker, the hon. Finance Minister laid down very clearly yesterday the true principles of good financial administration.

The budget of 1913 comes to us as one of reform and progress, marking a new stage on the road to financial restoration.

Laisné once gave to Mr. Villèle some advice under a rough form:

A financial minister, he said should be a watch dog, lying on the national strong box.

The finance minister is following this advice and he will show us results worthy of the admirable vitality of the Canadian people.

On the evening of the 21st September some of our opponents felt anxious on account of Mr. Fielding's absence, but we know now that not only has the present finance minister (Mr. White), succeeded Mr. Fielding; he has replaced him.

Montesquieu once said: 'Certain things are accepted by the people only when unseen; as soon as they appear the people re ject them.'

During the last two sessions, on the questions of the navy and of reciprocity, the Liberal majority demonstrated the truth of the French philosopher's words. That majority, forgetful of the rights of the people, acted as if they had a general mandate and relied upon the acceptance by the public of the accomplished fact. Under Liberal rule, national representation had given way to uncontrolled dictatorship. The sovereignty of the people had become a farce. Our opponents thought that they had obscured the national conscience. But on the 21st September, militarism, imperialism and reciprocity went down before the rights of the people and the national policy. It was the awakening of the spirit of the nation to the necessity of protecting our national resources, our industries and our agriculture.

The lightening of the naval tax is deeply significant; the government was thus enabled to adopt manly resolutions, and to turn earnestly towards the improvement of agriculture and of our national highways.

The hon. member for Napierville (Mr. Lanctot) was bemoaning a moment ago the fate of the farmer. In reply to his observations I will remind him that the first words of the present right hon. Prime Minister were: 'Now it is the farmer's turn' whereas the former premier required fifteen years to say such great words.

The people require commercial and financial reforms adequate to the wants and aspirations of the different classes of society. Among the nations we perceive a progressive wealth of brilliant commercial institutions. In all those countries to which extend our industrial and commercial activities we require commercial agents properly trained and informed as to our resources and our economic situation. We have such agents in several countries, but progressive Canada should insist upon more complete commercial representation in this respect. Our universities and our great commercial schools, so interested in our material and intellectual development, might furnish proper agents for this commercial and consular service. They are in a position to accomplish this national work. The Department of Trade and Commerce, now administered by a distinguished man, should be in a position to collect all useful information for the development of our trade and manufactures.

This missi dominici would transmit to the central administration a mine of accurate information. In trade with the east, with France and South America, we have not obtained our full share. I cannot sufficiently impress upon our new government the importance of opening new markets to Canadian products, while preserving to the full our administrative autonomy.

Speaking of the commercial progress of Canada, I can never sufficiently insist upon the importance of the report of the United States immigration commission. During the fiscal year 1908-1909, 17,121 French Canadians emigrated to the United States. One cannot see without concern thousands of Canadian workers in the shops and factories of the United States. Their labour and their talents add to the wealth of our neighbours instead of enriching Canada.

In order to accomplish our mission in this Canadian land, to foster the strength, prestige and power of the ancient races who civilized Canada, we need to preserve all the members of our great family.

In the interest of Canada we should keep our people here and encourage the return of the French Canadian population so important on account of their traditions and its attachment to the faith of their ancestors.

Our new government will meet our wishes by the development of our industries fostered by a tariff policy framed to meet our needs, while favouring at the same time our agricultural progress. As a Canadian author has said: 'It is impossible to imagine a more favourable situation for the organization of a great industrial movement according to enlightened and scientific methods.'

I am gratified to find that the government has given its first thoughts to the farmers and the tillers of the soil, to those patriots who increase the national domain. Proper protection of the agricultural interest will diminish the exodus of farmers towards the United States and the cities.

As I said a moment ago, it was only after fifteen years of power that the liberal government adopted the slogan: It is now the farmers' turn.

The Conservative government seeing the depopulation of the rural districts and the deserted condition of many constituencies, desires to remedy the evil and render farming attractive. The joint action of federal, provincial and municipal authorities will secure, I hope, efficient agricultural reforms. By co-operating with the provinces in the promotion of agricultural progress, the government will accomplish a work of national importance.

The administration resulting from the vote of the 21st September 1911 will be doing national work by contributing to the building of roads, to the development of agriculture and also by extending to the older provinces the benefits of immigration.

Allow me to make a few observations concoming the requirements of the south-eastern region of the province of Quebec. During the two last years, work on the Transcontinental in our region has not been carried on with sufficient celerity. I call upon the government in the interests of colonization, of agriculture and of forest industries to hasten the termination of the construction work between Levis and Moncton.

Quebec is an agricultural market. On the prosperity of the city of Quebec depends in a great measure the prosperity of the Eastern portion of our provinces.

Under the active, skillful and prudent direction of the hon. Postmaster General, the interests of Quebec and of our District will be safe.

The government, I am sure, will hasten to provide some efficient mode of communication between Quebec and Levis in order not to parlayze the efficiency of the Transcontinental.

I thank the government for wishing to make of Quebec a really national port. In doing this the Conservative government responds to the wishes and requirements of the population of our district.

I have no intention to claim for Quebec anything detrimental to the other large cities of this country, but I want to see the city of Champlain compete with other Canadian cities in the commercial and industrial fields.

Mr. N. MARTIN (St. Mary's, Montreal). (Translation). Mr. Speaker, I did not intend to take part in the debate, especially at this late hour, but I think I would be failing in my duty as one of the representatives of Montreal—the commercial metropolis of Canada—if I did not say a few words on the subject.

This evening when I was in the cars coming from Montreal, I learned by the papers that the hon. Minister of Finance had stated to the House that he has a surplus of 39 millions. He has had better luck than his predecessor, who, when taking office in 1896, found only an empty coffer and even a deficit of $330,000.

In my division, I carried the last campaign almost exclusively on the question of reciprocity with occasionally some remarks on the naval policy.

In what condition was this country in 1896 and in what condition is it to-day? The country, and Montreal in particular, was in a lamentable state. The manufactories were closed, and the men were leaving for the United States. What was the cause of all those disasters? For my part, I say that the real cause was the policy of protection inaugurated by the Conservative party in 1878 and that policy was that the farmers of this country should not produce any more than was required for home consumption. A time came when the farmer having no market to which he could export his products, found himself with an over production that he was obliged to sell at any price. I remember the time when the farmer in the province of Quebec was obliged to exchange his products against the country merchant's goods and at the end of the year when the time came to settle accounts there was almost nothing coming to him, that is why the sons of our farmers were leaving for the United States, their fathers being unable to give them a start at home, as they are doing to-day. A great number of our farmers were compelled to leave their farm to find work in the American manufactories during the winter season to pay the mortgages on their property.

To prevent such a deplorable state of affairs the only remedy in my judgment was a policy of protection for the manufacturers and a policy of exportation for our natural products. Before 1896, the manufacturers had to curtail their output six months in the year, and to leave without employment a large number of men who had to leave the country.

That is why we had in the city of Montreal 27,000 untenanted dwellings. The building industry was paralyzed and all classes of the population suffered by it, from the lumberman in the woods to the banker in his office. Since the return of prosperity, that is to say since about fifteen years, the population of Montreal has increased by about three hundred thousand inhabitants.

What do we see to-day? The number of the manufactories are continually on the increase, the building industry is in full swing and we can see properous banks at the corner of nearly every street. Everybody seems to be in comfortable circumstances, the day labourer who earned from 80 to 90 cents a day receives to-day two dollars and $2.25 a day. The man with a good trade easy earns four and five dollars a day. I maintain that if the government persists in a policy of protection on natural products, before ten years we will return to the conditions we were in in 1896, and that will endure so long as the country produces enough to maintain a population of two or three hundred millions that we have not.

As I have said, we must have a policy tending to promote exportation of our over production in natural products, because we have not enough population to consume all that the farmers have to sell.

I do not intend to make a speech, but I can say with my hon. friend from Laprairie, that reciprocity is not buried, it is not even dead.

If the question had been judged on its merits by the electors, if men like Messrs. Bourassa and Lavergne and their Nationalist friends had not misled the people on the naval policy, the Liberal party would again be in power to-day, and reciprocity would have carried the day.

As to the naval question, I didn't speak much about it to the electors of St. Mary's division. I merely went to the trouble of explaining that all those clauses that Mr. Bourassa was giving as binding clauses, were only optional. I told the electors that if the Conservative party had been in earnest on the naval policy, they would have resorted to the same tactics as they resorted to on the reciprocity treaty, that is to say, they would have blocked the estimates and forced the government to go before the people on the naval policy.

To-day the electors of the province of Quebec must perceive that they have been duped. We had the proof of it when the Minister of Public Works himself told us that they had 'played the game.' I expect that before long, at the next election no doubt, the Liberal party will be returned to power. The stand taken by the government on the question of reciprocity, on the Manitoba school question, on the 'Ne Temere' decree, has been nothing but a sham, and the electors will soon discover that the Conservatives carried many counties by false representations.

Motion agreed to, and House went into Committee on Ways and Means.

Progress reported.

Mr. BORDEN moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. GRAHAM. What business will be taken up tomorrow?

Mr. BORDEN. Bills and resolutions on the order paper, afterwards Supply for the Department of Marine and Fisheries. Possibly before that, we may take the Northwest Mounted Police estimates.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 12.05 a.m., Friday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, March 15, 1912.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No 141) to incorporate The International Fire Insurance Company—Mr. Lesperance.

Bill (No. 142) for the relief of Alvena Bell Leaitch.—Mr. Macdonald.

CANADA SHIPPING ACT AMENDMENT.

Hon. J. D. HAZEN (Minister of Marine and Fisheries). moved that the House go into committee to consider the following resolution;

Resolved, that it is expedient to amend the Canada Shipping Act by providing (a) that certificates shall not be required for masters and mates upon sailing ships of not more than one hundred tons, registered tonnage, propelled by auxiliary power other than steam, employed partly in fishing and partly in the carriage of freight; and (b) that the Minister of Marine and Fisheries may fix the fee for replacing lost certificates.

He said; The principal necessity for this change in the shipping act arises out of the very great change which has taken place of late years with regard to the way in which the fishing industry is conducted. To-day nearly all the fishing vessels on the Atlantic coast and, to some extent, on the lakes and the Pacific coast as well, are propelled, not alone by sail, as was the case in days gone by, but by auxiliary power furnished by gasolene engines and nearly all of these vessels are being operated in violation of the present law because the law requires that vessels of over ten tons shall have properly certificated engineers. As the law stands it would be a very great hardship upon the fishermen, who find that the auxiliary power afforded to them by the gasolene engine, is of very great assistance enabling them to make their runs to and from the fishing grounds with a great deal more certainty and with a great deal less labour than was the case when they depended upon sails and upon the wind alone. In addition to that there is no such number of certificated engineers, even if the fishermen were able to pay them for their services, to be obtained as would be necessary for the purpose of serving as engineers on board these boats. The proposed amendment to sec. 100 of the Canada Shipping Act consists of the addition of the following words to the law as it exists to-day:

Or to sailing ships of not more than one hundred tons, registered tonnage, propelled by auxiliary power, other than steam, employed partly in fishing and partly in the carriage of freight.

The reason for the amendment is that many of these auxiliary propelled ships are not employed solely in fishing. If they were, they would be exempt under the present law from having to have a certificated master in charge. They engage in fishing for three, six, or nine months only, and after that they carry cargo between the small ports in the maritime provinces.

Without the installation of the gasolene engine, sailing boats are also exempt from the provisions requiring a certificated master to be in charge, if they are under 150 tons registered tonnage. (See section 5 of Chap. 65, Statutes 1903, raising such tonnage limit from 100 to 150 tons). But the usual custom to-day is to install a small gasolene engine in boats which are to all intents and purposes sailing boats so as to aid their movements in calm weather. As soon as a gasolene engine is put in they become steamships under the provisions of section 743 of the Imperial Merchant Shipping Act, which reads as follows:

743. Any provisions of this Act applying to steamers or steamships shall apply to ships propelled by electricity or other mechanical power with such modifications as the Board of Trade may prescribe for the purpose of adaptation.

The board of trade have advised the Department of Marine and Fisheries that it is their practice to classify gasolene propelled vessels as steamers. The reason why reference is made in this matter to the Imperial Merchant Shipping Act instead of to the Canada Shipping Act, is that the Canadian Act is silent in part 1, which relates to registration of shipping, as regards such ships. The department is advised that, in these circumstances, the provisions of the Imperial Act would govern. Unless, therefore, some provision is made to exempt these sailing vessels with their small gasolene engines on board from the operation of Part II of the Canada Shipping Act, every one of them will require, under section 96 of the Canada Shipping Act to have a certified master in charge. There were 4,588 boats with gasolene engines engaged in the fisheries of Canada in 1910-11, (See answer in 'Hansard,' February 8, 1912, page 2722).

Unless some relief such as is proposed is given, these boats must either lay up when not employed in fishing, or if they engage in the cargo carrying business they must obtain a certified master. It is unnecessary to say that there is no such number of certified masters in the maritime provinces waiting employment. It is bad in principle to keep a provision in the law which it is out of the power of the people to comply with. The owners of these auxiliary sailing vessels could, of course, take out the gasolene engines and so bring themselves under the provisions of section 96 of the Canada Shipping Act which entitles sailing ships up to 150 tons registered tonnage to ply in Canadian waters or to 80 tons on a coasting voyage, (which voyage is defined in section 72 of the Act—and extends south as far as five degrees north latitude), without a certified master. But to remove these gasolene engines would be a retrograde movement, and the shipowners would naturally be opposed to any such step.

The department has been asked to amend the law so as to meet the present day conditions. There is on file in the department a petition for such legislation. It is very numerously signed. It reads as follows:

To the Honourable the Minister of Marine and Fisheries:

The petition of the undersigned owners of sailing vessels equipped with gasolene auxiliary power respectfully represents—

(1) The tonnage of the vessels in which we are interested, and the horse-power of the engines and speed developed by same is set opposite our respective names signed hereto.

(2) Said vessels are equipped with auxiliary power for the following reasons: (a) To enable those operating them to have them under better control when entering harbours during light airs; (b) To expedite movements from dock to dock when in harbour, and save cost of towing; (c) To keep vessels in motion, and under steerage way in calm weather when on voyage from port to port, and thereby shorten the duration of voyage when fares carried consist of perishable commodities such as fresh fish; and (d) to supply in some measure a port to port service to aid in marketing commodities largely owned by the operators of said vessels, rendered necessary owing to lack of other available means of transportation, thus enabling those engaged in the fresh fishing or carrying trade to market their fares in as prime condition as possible.

The regulations of the Department of Marine and Fisheries requiring the employment upon said auxiliary crafts of passed masters and engineers are burdensome and oppressive for the following reasons:—

(1) It would add seriously to the expense of operating, as they would have to be paid much higher wages than the ordinary men employed. (2) There are no such men available at present; and if there were any we would be unable to hire them, as we can make our vessels pay only by running them with ordinary men. (3) Men who have passed for steam engineers are not thereby qualified to run gasolene engines as they are so different. (4) Seventy-five per cent of the goods carried is owned by the parties operating said vessels, on which no insurance is carried, on either vessel or cargo. (5) The agents of insurance companies inform us that they will insure gasolene vessels for seven per cent, where without gasolene they charge thirteen per cent.

Therefore, your petitioners humbly pray that the Honourable Minister of Marine and Fsheries will favourably consider our request. And your petitioners as in duty bound will ever pray.

Those members of the House who last year were members of the Committee on Marine and Fisheries will recollect that when the Bill to amend the Canada Shipping Act was before that committee that this question of gasolene propelled sailing vessels came up for discussion. The members from the maritime provinces took very strong ground that something should be done at once to meet the requirements of the case. So firmly convinced was the committee of the justice of this claim that section 100 of the Act was recommended for amendment as follows:

100. The foregoing provisions as to masters and mates shall not apply to sailing ships of not more than one hundred tons gross tonnage having motive power of not more than eight nominal horse-power and employed solely in the carriage of freight; or to any ship of less than fifty tons gross tonnage propelled by motive power and employed as a tug-boat or in the carriage of freight; or to pleasure yachts not carrying passengers or goods for hire; or to steamships carrying passengers not having a whole or fixed deck and of not more than twenty-nine feet in length at the light water line; or to ships employed solely in fishing; or to barges or other vessels having neither masts, sails or rigging and not being steamships.

Explanatory Note.—Sailing vessels with auxiliary engines and certain ships under 50 tons gross tonnage, are added to the list of exempted vessels.

Owing to the dissolution of parliament the Bill was never reported back to the House. It may be asked why not adhere to the amendment of last session? The reason is that many changes were to be made in the Act last session and this section was amended in line with others in other parts of the Act. As it is not now proposed to deal with the Act generally, it is thought better to amend this section with the main view of affording relief during the present season to the class of shipowners referred to. Any elaborate amendment of the Act would make its consideration and enactment this session practically impossible. The proposed exemption appears to cover the case fully, and if after it has been in operation for a season or two it is found to be faulty in any respect the matter can be gone into again.

Clause 2 of the Bill is designed to remove what is felt to be a just grievance of the holders of certificates issued by the department. If a man loses his certificate he is called upon to pay one-half the fee that the original certificate cost. No matter how meritorious his claim to exemption from the payment of such fee may be, there is no power to grant it. Besides, the payment of six or seven dollars is often a serious tax on a master or mate who have, as a class, no reserve fund out of which to pay these extra expenses. The government does not want the money, and the certain knowledge that if a certificate is lost the owner of it will have to pay for a duplicate will not prevent its loss nor tend to make the holder more careful. Section 93 of the Act lays down the scale of fees as follows:—Master, competency, $15; mate, competency, seagoing, $8; mate, competency, inland, etc., $6; master, service, $8; mate, service, seagoing, $5; mate, service, inland, etc., $4.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax). Will the first part of this Bill apply merely to the coasting trade or to foreign trade as well?

Mr. HAZEN. It will apply to all vessels of less than 100 tons engaged partly in fishing and partly in other business. If the vessels are engaged partly in fishing and partly in the carriage of freight, it is immaterial whether they carry the freight in the coastwise trade or otherwise.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax). I think the Minister will have to designate in the Bill whether the sections apply to the coasting trade or the foreign trade.

Mr. HAZEN. I shall consider that point when the Bill is under consideration.

Motion agreed to, and House went into committee on the resolution.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou). Where has the petition which the Minister has read come from?

Mr. HAZEN. I have not the signatures here, but they come from different points in the maritime provinces. I shall be glad to let my hon. friend see them.

Mr. MACDONALD. Are there any provisions of the law which require certificated engineers for these motor boats, or is any amendment necessary to remove the difficulty?

Mr. HAZEN. They do not require certificated engineers when engaged in fishing. But the fishing does not last during the whole year. At other times these boats are engaged in carrying products from one port to another; and at such times, if they were required to have certificated engineers they would be laid up, and would be of no use to their owners as earners of money.

Mr. HENDERSON. Will the Bill in any way affect fishermen using gasoline boats on the inland lakes?

Mr. HAZEN. The Bill, of course, is not restricted to any particular part of Canada. It will not in any way restrict the fishermen, but rather extend their rights to use these boats.

Resolution reported, read the first and the second time, and agreed to.

Mr. HAZEN moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 143) to amend the Canada Shipping Act.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

INQUIRY FOR RETURN.

Mr. KAY. I beg leave to draw the attention of the hon. Postmaster General to the fact that a return ordered by this House on the 26th of February, relating to the dismissal of the postmaster of Bedford, in the county of Missisquoi, has not yet been brought down.

Mr. PELLETIER. I intent to spend most of my spare time on Saturday and up to the hours of Sunday in trying to put in shape the various papers asked for. I have really been too much overworked to get them attended to. But I hope to be able to bring most of them down on Monday.

VACANCIES IN THE SENATE.

Mr. MACDONALD. I would like to call the attention of the Prime Minister to the fact that there are at present three senatorships from the province of Nova Scotia vacant. One of them has been vacant since before the opening of this parliament, and one for some months and the third for some weeks. All indications point to parliament rising within a short time. Does the right hon. gentleman intend to fill these vacancies before parliament rises?

Mr. BORDEN. There are not only the three to which my hon. friend has directed attention, but there is one from the province of New Brunswick. We will give the best consideration possible to these matters at the earliest opportunity.

Mr. EMMERSON. It has been announced apparently with authority that the vacancy in the Senate caused by the resignation of the present lieutenant governor of New Brunswick has been filled by the appointment of Mr. Daniel of St. John. Am I to understand that that was not a correct statement?

Mr. BORDEN. I have not observed any report such as my hon. friend has indicated. As a matter of fact, no appointment has yet been made.

THE OFFICE OF SOLICITOR GENERAL.

Mr. MACDONALD. I would also call the attention of my right hon. friend to the fact that one of the important public offices connected with the government of the country, that of Solicitor General, has been vacant since the resignation of the late government. Does my right hon. friend intend to appoint any one to that office, or how long does he intend to keep it vacant?

Mr. BORDEN. I will give careful consideration to any claims which my hon. friend desires to put forward to fill that position. I really do not know that I have any announcement to make with regard to it beyond that which I think has already been made on more than one occasion in this House.

CANADIAN NORTHERN ALBERTA RAILWAY.

House went into committee on the following resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to provide that the aid and assistance which, under the Canadian Alberta Act, 1910, the Governor in Council was authorized to give to the Canadian Northern Alberta Railway Company in respect of the construction of the one hundred and fifty miles of railway therein described may, notwithstanding anything in the said Act, be applied to the first one hundred and fifty miles of the said company's railway at present constructed or located from St. Albert, in the province of Alberta, in a generally westerly direction toward the Yellowhead Pass.—Mr. White (Leeds).

Mr. WHITE (Leeds). In the session of 1910 an Act was passed incorporating the Canadian Northern Alberta Railway Company, and providing for aid by the government in the construction of its line from a point at or near Edmonton, or Strathcona, in the province of Alberta, in a generally westerly direction to the coal areas situate at or near the Brazeau river and the head waters of the McLeod river, for a distance not exceeding 150 miles, by guaranteeing the principal and interest of the bonds, debentures, debenture stock, or other securities of the company, to the extent of $13,000 per mile for the first 50 miles of the line so treated, and for the remainder of the line to the amount of $25,000 per mile, not exceeding in all 150 miles. In March, 1911, those securities of the Canadian Northern Alberta Railway Company guaranteed by the Dominion, were sold on the London market, the issue amounting to £647,260 sterling. It was the intention of the Canadian Northern Alberta Railway Company to route its line to Wolfe creek, that is a point 116 miles west of Edmonton, and then to divert the line in a south-westerly direction 34 miles, making up the total of 150 miles mentioned in the Act towards the Brazeau coal areas. The company afterwards changed its plan, and instead of carrying the last 34 miles towards the Brazeau coal areas, it decided to carry that part of its line from Wolfe creek in a generally westerly direction towards the Yellow Head Pass. In other words the 150 miles has become part of the main line of the Canadian Northern Alberta railway from Edmonton through to Vancouver. Afterwards a trust mortgage pursuant to the Act was executed giving a first charge upon the 150 miles of line which I have mentioned, and providing, as is usual in such trust mortgages, that the proceeds of the bonds should be paid out from time to time as the construction of the line proceeded. Application has been made to the department for some time past for payments out of the proceeds of these securities, amounting as I have said to £647,260 sterling; but by reason of the fact that the trust mortgage purported to cover 150 miles of line running to the Brazean coal areas, and by reason of the fact that the company subsequently changed its plan as to the last 34 miles of the 150 miles, the department took the position that further legislation would be necessary, and that the consent of the debenture holders should be obtained to the change. So far as the debenture holders are concerned the change is not an important one for two reasons: In the first place the 150 miles of the company's main line is, I think, quite as valuable as the 150 miles which it was proposed to construct towards the Brazeau coal areas. In the second place the securities are guaranteed as to principal and interest by the Dominion, so that the debenture holders, if these resolutions are adopted and the Bill founded upon them becomes law, will have in lieu of the security which they now have under the present Trust mortgage, 150 miles on the main line of the Canadian Northern Alberta railway, of which 116 miles are common to both, that is to the security which they now hold, and to the security which they will hold under the new Trust mortgage which it is proposed to execute. In addition to that, they will have the guarantee of the Dominion of Canada as to both principal and interest upon these securities. Now so far as security is concerned there was no reason, therefore, why the debenture holders should have been consulted, but, as it is, I think it desirable that we should be exceedingly careful with regard to legislation which might seem to infringe, even in the slightest degree, the rights of the debenture holders, I conceive it to be my duty—and I believe the same course would have been adopted by my predecessor from what I can learn in the department—to have the debenture holders notified, that is those who now hold the debentures of the Canadian Northern Alberta Railway Company, to the amount of £647,260 sterling. Notices were sent out by one of the trustees under the mortgage, the British Empire Trust Company, of London, to all the debenture holders. Consents have been received from about 92 per cent of those debenture holders to the proposed change in the security, and we have received no notification of any dissent on the part of any debenture holder. Under these circumstances there would appear, therefore, no reason why this Bill should not be adopted by the House. The Trust mortgage which will be executed in substitution of the existing mortgage, will, of course, contain the usual provisions under the authority of the Act for the payment out of the moneys upon proper certificates from time to time. The Bill which I shall ask leave to introduce, if these resolutions are adopted, will provide that the consent of the two Trust companies representing the bondholders, will be obtained to the change in security, and that they will execute the new Trust mortgage. I may say that my predecessor, the Hon. Mr. Fielding, in July last, on the last day of the session, I believe, placed upon the order paper, resolutions similar to those which are now under consideration by the committee. I think, Mr. Chairman, that that is a sufficiently full explanation for the present.

Mr. GRAHAM. This is a matter which was before the late government on several occasions, and the explanation given by the Minister of Finance is practically the explanation given to us. As I understand it the guarantee as proposed originally could not be accepted by the Edmonton and Yukon Pacific on account of the conditions existing. Consequently, in 1910, the company applied to the Railway Department asking to have a Bill passed not only to incorporate the Canadian Northern Alberta, but with that incorporation to transfer from the Edmonton and Yukon Pacific the guarantee that had been given to that company. That guarantee must be all right, as I signed the document myself and no person in this House took objection to it. I think the reason for the change was in connection with the amount of underlying security on one or other of the roads which was not compatible with the security going to the Edmonton and Yukon Pacific. That road was to start at or near Edmonton, and was to go to a point at Wolf Creek, and then down to the Brazeau coal mines, thirty-four miles. This Bill proposes that the road shall start from St. Albert, north of Edmonton, which is on the line of the Canadian Northern railway, and it runs through the same territory to Wolf Creek, but it will not interfere with the thirty-four miles branch line to the coal fields owing to the physical difficulties, but will continue along the main line towards the Yellowhead Pass. The meat of the objection, if objection there should be, in changing this, is that the line will parallel the Grand Trunk Pacific very closely for that distance. I studied that question somewhat, and I know it is a difficult matter in the case of through lines to avoid paralleling, particularly when you are approaching the crossing of a river or a mountain pass where there is only one practical place to go through. In order to get the best results for a through line the companies have to be allowed to build as nearly to an air line as possible. If it were a local road for local purposes only, there would be strong objection to allowing the road to be removed from one point to another, thus getting away from serving one class of people perhaps to go to another point that would help the railway, but injure the people. In the present instance this is to become part of their through transcontinental line. For my part, I see no way to avoid what might be considered the difficulty of allowing the Canadian Northern to parallel approximately closely the Grand Trunk Pacific. The Canadian Northern people in discussing this matter with me on several occasions, rather chided the government in this respect—and I give it to the House for what it is worth—that they always maintained that they were first on the ground from Edmonton to the Yellowhead Pass, and instead of them encroaching on the Grand Trunk Pacific, that it was the Grand Trunk Pacific that was encroaching on what they thought were their prior rights. Be that as it may, I cannot see any objection to the transfer of this guarantee, because if this government or the late government had been asked to guarantee the bonds of the Canadian Northern in the first place along this direct line, I think there would have been no objection. As I understand the situation they require legislation passed because under the guarantee of 1910, in which a special Act was passed also incorporating the Canadian Northern Alberta, bonds were practically sold or subscriptions received, and in order to protect those bondholders a trust deed had to be executed. Now, the route is to be changed, and although it might possibly have been all right if the transaction had been between private individuals to not introduce special legislation for the transferring of this road from one place to another, yet I think under the circumstances, not only to protect the bondholder—perhaps that is the smallest part of it because they would have been protected anyway—but in order that there may be no clashing of legislation, and that in the future there may be no opportunity at all for any person to raise the question that the Dominion of Canada was lax in protecting the capital that was sent into this country for the benefit of our railways. I am delighted to hear the Minister of Finance take the ground that the present government, and parliament, I believe as well, will not be a party to any legislation, no matter what others may do, which will seem in any way to mar in any degree the securities held by capitalists on Dominion projects. We cannot afford to do that under any circumstances. I acquiesce cheerfully in this Bill, and I believe it is the only thing that can wisely and properly be done under the circumstances.

Resolution reported, read the second time and agreed to.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 144) respecting aid towards the construction of the Canadian Northern Alberta railway.

Motion agreed to and Bill read the first time.

SUPPLY—POLLUTION OF THE RED RIVER.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds) moved that the House go into Committee of Supply.

Mr. G. H. BRADBURY. (Selkirk). Before you leave the Chair, Mr. Speaker, I must crave the indulgence of the House for a few moments while I call the attention of the government to a condition of things existing on the Red river north of the city of Winnipeg, that is fast becoming intolerable. Previous to some four years ago the river was open. At that time the government constructed what is known as the St. Andrew's dam across the St. Andrew's rapids, and by so doing all current in that river was practically stopped and there has been created what might be called a large basin of dead water. That basin extends from the dam south to the city of Winnipeg some twelve miles. When the dam was built it raised the water some seventeen feet at the dam and about two feet at the city of Winnipeg. Previous to the construction of this dam the sewage from the great city of Winnipeg and the other cities south of the dam had been deposited in the river, but there was current enough to carry this sewage past the town of Selkirk towards the lake, and it was deposited in Lake Winnipeg. Although at that time we complained bitterly on account of the pollution of the Red river which made it impossible for the water to be used at Selkirk, or by any of the settlers along the river, we failed to obtain any redress from the city of Winnipeg, and up to the present time there has been no legislation placed on the statute-book to make it impossible for this great city to pollute the river. And owing to the construction of this dam the conditions have become intolerable, and as I said a moment ago, property all along that river has been depreciated, and the health and the lives of tens of thousands of citizens of Manitoba are menaced by the conditions that exist in this basin of water. The construction of this dam stopped the current, as I stated a moment ago, and the city of Brandon, the city of Portage la Prairie, and all the municipalities down the Assiniboine river, and the great city of Winnipeg, with its 150,000 or nearly 200,000 people, with all its great stockyards, abattoirs and manufactories, have been pouring their sewage into this basin during the last four years, with the result that the lives and health of the people are seriously menaced. I hold in my hand a letter from the secretary of the Board of Trade of the town of Selkirk, enclosing a small clipping which I desire to place on record. It is dated Selkirk, March 3:

Selkirk, Man., March 3.—Three cases of typhoid fever are reported at Lockport among the crew from the Dominion government public works department engaged in blasting out a new ship channel at St. Andrew's locks. The men are working in bulkheads driven through the ice and their illness is said to be due to the bad condition of the river water under the ice. All winter difficulty has been experienced on account of the odours arising from the sewage-laden water.

The letter written to me indicates that the conditions are very bad at this place, and asks me to call the attention of parliament to it. I have a Bill on the order paper which I moved with the object of trying to get the sanction of this House, but I only succeeded in securing its first reading. The purpose of the Bill was to make it an offence to deposit sewage or poisonous waste in the river. There was another Bill which passed the Senate and came to this House, very similar to my own, and owing to the emergency of the case I would have been very glad indeed to assist in passing that Bill into law. The town of Selkirk has from time to time petitioned the government asking that some legislation be passed. I hold in my hand several petitions that have been filed, asking that some action be taken to prevent the city of Winnipeg from using the Red river as an outlet for its sewage. I wish to place on record one of these resolutions. The memorandum reads:

The placing of the dam in the Red River at St. Andrew's causing the waters for a long distance above the dam to be raised has necessarily robbed the river of its current to such an extent that it does not carry away the dirt and waste being thrown into it. This waste falls to the bottom and remains.

The system of running the sewage into the river was objectionable before the construction of the locks, but under the present conditions it is a serious menace to the public health, and it becomes a vital necessity that a more sanitary method be found for the disposal of the Winnipeg sewage without any delay.

Then the Board of Trade passed the following resolution which was filed with the government:

Partial copy of resolution of the Board of Trade passed at Selkirk, November 8, 1911:

Be it resolved that this board do emphatically and most strenuously protest against the disposal of the sewage of the great and growing city of Winnipeg without the interposal of a proper septic system for the purification of all sewage before it be discharged into the river.

That this board express it as their opinion that such procedure will cause the accumulation of practically all of the impurities of sewage for a greater portion of the year between the point of discharge and the St. Andrew's lock dam; and that the discharge of all this sediment 'en masse' at certain seasons of the year will have the effect of largely increasing the menace to health that is presented by the sewage itself. That such action will be inimical to the lives of sixty million white fish which are annually descharged from the fish hatchery at Selkirk, and upon which the fishing industry of Lake Winnipeg and the perpetuity of the species in Lake Winnipeg is largely dependent.

That this board is deeply interested in the development, as an agricultural and residential district, of the lower Red River valley, and depreciates any action which will have the effect of arresting that development. . . That where the sewage of the city of Winnipeg, with the enormous increase to be expected from it, must depend upon so slow and shallow a discharging stream as is afforded by the Red River, the adoption of any permanent sewage disposal without purification would be suicidal in its tendencies, and work instant and incalculable harm upon this section of the province of Manitoba.

Now, there are several resolutions along the same line. The town of Selkirk, and the residents north of Winnipeg have been worked up over this matter for some time, and something ought to be done by this parliament. We had an example in the city of Ottawa only one year ago, of the fatal effects on health arising from the pollution of a navigable stream, we had an epidemic raging through this city which filled all our hospitals, and an emergency hospital had to be equipped in order to take care of the sick. Hundreds of people were ill in their own homes. We had over a thousand cases of typhoid fever in this city last year, and it cost the city the awful toll of 83 lives, owing to the criminal neglect of the city of Ottawa to take proper care of its sewage. I do not think this House and parliament can escape some of the responsibilities that rest upon us. This is the only body apparently that can intervene with the necessary legislation. While we have been sitting in this chamber during the last two or three months, working on financial and economic matters, and other public questions in which the people are interested, we have entirely neglected this extremely important matter which affects the health and lives of the people of this country. The prosperity of this country depends largely on the health of its people, it is one of the greatest assets we have got, and still we allow this system of poisoning the source of our water supply to go on year after year, and apparently nothing is done to prevent it. I have just mentioned that the typhoid fever epidemic in this city resulted in 83 deaths. According to Dr. Wylie, one of the best authorities I believe on the American continent on sanitation, the average human life is worth $50,000 to the state. If that be the case, from an economic standpoint the city of Ottawa last year lost through that epidemic over $4,000,000. Less than $1,000,000, we are told, would provide a proper septic tank for the treatment of the sewage.

In the city of Winnipeg we have had the same experience. We have had epidemics there of the most serious nature and I have no hesitation in saying that, if some drastic measures are not taken to remove the source of danger, the great city of Winnipeg will yet pay an awful price in the loss of hundreds and perhaps thousands of the lives of its citizens for its neglect to provide modern methods for caring for its sewage. But, I am more interested in the residents of my own constituency. The property of these people is being depreciated in value, and the lives and health of hundreds of the residents along the river are endangered by the impure state of affairs existing on the river. I was told by a gentleman living on the banks of the Red river south of the dam that when the water was gradually let out last fall the deposit of sewage opposite his own door was over three feet deep, and the odour arising from it was simply intolerable. The condition calls upon the government to take some drastic measure and I would ask the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Monk) now to see that there is a thorough investigation made of the conditions of the river especially where men are working under his department. If we had that investigation made this coming spring perhaps we would be in a better position to deal with this matter effectively when the House meets again. I would urge the government in the meantime to take up one of the Bills that is on the order paper, make it a law of this country, and thus prevent the pollution of our rivers. I have a record here that is appalling, showing exactly what has taken place from the pollution of rivers in Canada and giving the death rate. Thousands of our citizens have been stricken by typhoid fever all traceable to polluted waters and I think the time has come when this parliament should act in an effective manner in order to make it impossible for the great sources of our water supply to be polluted. The city of Winnipeg is surrounded by rivers. The Assiniboine comes from the west and discharges into the Red river. The Assiniboine carries along the sewage of Brandon, Portage la Prairie and all the adjoining municipalities and, since the water has been raised in the Red river, the Assiniboine, during the summer, is practically without any current, it is practically an open sewer and it is a menace not alone to the people of the city of Winnipeg but to the people living along that river. This great basin of water that has been created between Winnipeg and the dam is fast becoming in the same condition. In my own town of Selkirk the residents dare not touch the water in the river. They cannot even give it to their stock with safety. The polluting of the water in the river has resulted in the pollution of Lake Winnipeg also. For ten or fifteen miles out from the mouth of the river a whitefish cannot live on account of the polluted condition of the water. I would ask the government to give this matter their earnest consideration and have an immediate investigation made into the condition of the river north of Winnipeg, and take action at once to protect the health and lives of the people living north of Winnipeg on the Red river. We in Selkirk are determined to have this matter settled in the interest of the health of all concerned.

Mr. BORDEN. Mr. Speaker, the subject which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bradbury) has brought to the attentioin of the government is undoubtedly a very important one. There has not been an opportunity during the present session to give consideration to the Bill which was introduced in the Senate by hon. Mr. Belcourt last session and again this session and which passed the Senate this session. My hon. friend (Mr. Bradbury) also introduced a Bill during the present session which deals, I think, somewhat along the same lines, with the subject to which he has just now called attention. There is no doubt whatever that this is a subject to which parliament must give its attention in the early future. It is impossible to have present conditions continue under the system which has been adopted. I have never looked into the question of law which would arise in connection with the dicharge by these various cities of their sewage into rivers, and I do not know whether the question has ever been tested in the courts. One would think that there might be a great deal of doubt, apart from any legislation of this parliament or of a provincial legislature, as to the right of a city to pollute the water that passes to those entitled to use the river below in such a manner as has been the case in different parts of the country. I can only say to my hon. friend at the present moment that we do thoroughly realize the importance of the matter which he has brought to the attention of the House. I would not like to say that there would be an opportunity at the present session to take up one or other of these Bills, because I am not sure that the form in which they have been presented, in one case in the Senate and in the other case in this House, would be regarded as precisely the best form in which the subject could be presented to parliament. There has not been an opportunity to give sufficient consideration to that question. It will, however, be taken into consideration, and in that connection the observations of my hon. friend as to the conditions, which he has so forcibly portrayed as prevailing on the Assiniboine and Red rivers, will have our most careful and earnest attention.

BETTER TERMS FOR PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND.

Mr. J. HUGHES (Kings, P.E.I.). Mr. Speaker, I wish to call your attention to a grievance that affects my constituency, and I do so with the hope that it may be remedied at an early date. By the passage of Bill (No. 115), under which largely increased subsidies will be paid to the province of Manitoba, the financial conditions of the other provinces will be somewhat affected, those of Prince Edward Island with the others. But in so far as the financial conditions relate to all the provinces, I presume that an adjustment will take place at some time, and when that adjustment takes place, I presume that Prince Edward Island will receive the same consideration as may be given to the other provinces. By some of the provisions of this Bill an injustice is done to Prince Edward Island which I think should be——

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman cannot refer to a previous debate in the House.

Mr. HUGHES (Kings, P.E.I.)—removed without delay. When this Bill was in committee I called the attention of the government to this matter, and I really thought I was making some impression, but I am afraid I was too hopeful. On the third reading of the Bill, I again called the attention of the government to it, and I asked the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Borden), for an answer as to whether or not the special case of Prince Edward Island would be considered and dealt with during this session. I was a little surprised to find that the Prime Minister gave me no answer. I do not think it is usual to do that. When a member of this House, in the discharge of his duty, puts to the Prime Minister of the country a proper and pertinent question on a public matter, I think an answer is usually given. I do not know whether the Prime Minister wished to be discourteous to me or not—I hope not. However, it would not prevent me from doing what I believe to be my duty, and I will therefore have to ask the question again. Possibly, I did not make my position clear when I was speaking in committee or when I was speaking to the House on the third reading of the Bill. In order that there may be no doubt about that, I will refer to the clause of the Bill which makes special provision for a large subsidy to the province of Manitoba in lieu of her public lands.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member (Mr. Hughes) is clearly speaking in violation of the rules of the House now by referring to a previous debate, and cannot be permitted to continue, unless the House is willing to ignore the rules which govern its debates.

Mr. HUGHES (Prince Edward Island). I am not referring to a former debate.

Mr. SPEAKER. My understanding of the rule is that the hon. member cannot refer to a former debate or discuss a Bill which has already been disposed of by the House.

Mr. HUGHES (Prince Edward Island). In order to make myself perfectly clear I wish to read the provisions of Bill (No. 115) concerning the boundaries of Manitoba, which give to Manitoba a large subsidy in lieu of her public lands, and I want to refer also to the clause in the statute of 1873, under which Prince Edward Island came into confederation, and which is very brief.

Mr. SPEAKER. Of course it is quite permissible for the hon. member to read a clause from a statute, but he cannot discuss Bills which have already been dealt with during the present session.

Mr. HUGHES (Prince Edward Island). Well, the House is quite familiar with the provisions of Bill (No. 115) respecting the Manitoba boundaries, and I need not refer to that. This statute of 1893 contains the terms under which Prince Edward Island came into confederation, and the clause which deals with the subject in hand is as follows:

That as the government of Prince Edward Island holds no lands from the Crown and consequently enjoys no revenue from that source for the construction and maintenance of local works, the Dominion government shall pay by half-yearly installments in advance to the government of Prince Edward Island $45,000 per annum, less interest at five per cent per annum upon any sum not exceeding $800,000 which the Dominion government may advance to the Prince Edward Island government for the purchase of lands now held by large proprietors.

That $45,000 is something less than 50 cents per head of the population of Prince Edward Island, and under the Manitoba Boundary Bill, passed this session, Manitoba will receive $1.25 per head of her population for precisely the same reasons as Prince Edward Island receives only 50 cents per head, and the amount of $1.25 to Manitoba will be increased as the population of that province increases. Now, Sir, I think this is a special discrimination against Prince Edward Island. Of course I do not think it was intended that injustice should be done Prince Edward Island in this matter, but justice can now be done to my province by treating it in the same way as Manitoba is treated. Then, as it is the only other province in the Dominion that stands in the same position, I believe that something should be done this session to remedy the injustice, and I would ask the Prime Minister if he will take it up and see that it is dealt with during the present session.

Right Hon. R. L. BORDEN (Prime Minister). I have already informed the right hon. leader of the opposition that an announcement would be made early next week, probably on Monday or Tuesday, as to all the legislation that the government proposes to bring down during the present session. I do not feel myself called upon to make an announcement to my hon. friend (Mr. Hughes) in advance of that statement which I have promised. I trust his feelings will not be at all wounded by my inability to take the course he suggests. No discourtesy is intended to him, but these matters have to be done in a certain way and after certain consideration. It is not possible always to answer in a definite way matters of the character which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Hughes) has directed attention to. I would like to say to him that the Premier of Prince Edward Island and his colleagues called our attention months ago, in a very effective, forcible, clear and lucid manner, not only to the matter to which the hon. gentleman has directed attention, but to other matters affecting the position of Prince Edward Island in its financial relations to the Dominion. The matter has had, upon these representations of the government of Prince Edward Island, very serious consideration by the present administration, but I am unable to make any announcement to my hon. friend to-day.

Mr. HUGHES (Prince Edward Island). I am afraid there is a mistake of some kind because I find that when the Premier of Prince Edward Island and his colleagues returned to that province they gave to the newspapers a list of the subjects they had brought to the attention of this government, and this particular subject was not in that list. The two subjects which they stated they brought to the attention of the government and forcibly pressed upon the government were, first, the payment to Prince Edward Island for the nonfulfilment of the terms of union in regard to winter communication from the year 1900 to the present time, and, second, for consideration in consequence of the extension of the boundaries of the provinces of Ontario and Quebec.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member has already spoken.

Mr. HUGHES (Prince Edward Island). If there is any mistake in the matter I wish to have it corrected now.

Mr. SPEAKER. It appears to me the hon. gentleman is out of order.

Mr. HUGHES (Prince Edward Island). Will you permit me to say there appears to be an error somewhere because I am sure that this being the strongest and the best claim Prince Edward Island has, that the Premier would not have missed it in the list which he announced he had discussed with the Dominion authorities. I do not know where the mistake occurred, but there appears to be one because there is a marked discrepancy between the statement of the right hon. the Prime Minister and that of the Premier of Prince Edward Island.

Mr. BORDEN. There is no mistake at all.

Motion agreed to, and House went into Supply.

SUPPLY.

Royal Northwest Mounted Police—Northwest Territories, Yukon Territory, provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan—Pay of force, $340,000; subsistenc, forage, fuel and light, clothing, buildings, repairs and renewals, horses, dogs, arms and ammunition, medical stores, billeting, transport, water service, stationery and contingencies, $410,000; to compensate members of the Royal Northwest Mounted Police for injuries received while in the discharge of duty, $3,000; total, $753,000.

Mr. BORDEN. The main estimates for this year are exactly the same as those for last year, but there was a supplementary estimate for that year. The estimates are for the pay and maintenance of seven hundred officers and men and five hundred men in Alberta and Saskatchewan at $900 each, amounting to $450,000 and 200 men in the Yukon and remote portions of the Northwest at $1,500 a year each, amounting to $300,000. The item of subsistence, $109,508, is based on 500 men in the headquarters district and subdistricts at thirty cents a day and on 200 men in the Yukon at seventy-five cents per day.

The item of forage, $55,000, is based on 400 horses at 25 cents per day, 80 at 40 cents per day, and 30 at 60 cents per day, according to the districts where they are employed. I have particulars also with regard to fuel and light, which are not different from those in previous years. So far as the pay of the force is concerned, I have already laid on the table of the House, at the request of the right hon. leader of the opposition, the order in council, which was issued after conference with the Commissioner and the Acting Commissioner of the Northwest Mounted Police, and upon their recommendation that it was necessary to make this increase in the pay of the force in order to maintain the force at the desired standard. During the first six years the pay is to increase by an average of fifteen cents per day for each constable. The amount of the increased pay is not included in this estimate. It will have to be provided for in the supplementary estimates for next year.

Mr. HUGHES (Kings, P.E.I.)

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax). I desire to ask the attention of the committee for a moment or two, in connection with a very sad and distressing incident which occurred in the early part of the year 1911, and which resulted in the death of four persons belonging to the Northwest Mounted Police. In the month of December, 1910, Inspector Fitzgerald, of the Northwest Mounted Police, in company with three other constables whose names were respectively, Carter, Taylor and Kinney, left Fort McPherson to patrol the route to Dawson. These members of the force endured great hardships and sufferings from the outset of their journey, and in the end lost their lives. I desire to read to the committee a portion of the official report of Commissioner Perry on this sad incident:

Inspector Fitzgerald in his diary gives some inkling as to what was affecting his mind; it seems to have been the anxiety to perform the patrol and not return to Fort McPherson defeated. His expression, 'My last hope is gone and the only thing I can do is to return,' seems to indicate this. Had he been a less experienced traveller than he was, he would surely have turned back sooner.

The cause of the disaster may be summed up as follows:

1. The small quantity of provisions taken.
2. Want of an efficient guide.
3. Delay in searching for the lost trail.

The heroic efforts to return to Fort McPherson have not been exceeded in the annals of Arctic travel.

Corporal Dempster's reports show that the unfortunate men had wasted to shadows. All were strong, powerful young men, and in the best of health and condition when they left on their ill-fated journey. That they should have lost their lives is greatly to be deplored. It is the greatest tragedy which has occurred in this force during its existence of thirty-seven years.

Their loss has been felt most keenly by every member of the force, but we cannot but feel a thrill of pride at the endeavour they made to carry out their duty, and their gallant struggle for their lives.

I cannot express it better than in the following extract from a letter addressed to me by His Honour the Lieutenant Governor of Saskatchewan :

While the event brings deepest sadness to all, we feel that it is only an event such as this which can give greatest lustre and enduring remembrance to the splendid Force.

My purpose in mentioning this sad event to the committee is to suggest the desirability of voting an annuity to the mother and sisters of the late Inspector Fitzgerald, who now live in Halifax, and who were dependent upon the deceased son and brother. The last thoughts of Inspector Fitzgerald were for his mother, as shown in the brief and pathetic will written just previous to his death, and which was discovered in his pockets. It was, I am informed, the intention of Inspector Fitzgerald to retire from the force during the present year, when he would have been, I believe, entitled to a superannuation of $1,000 per year. In the Halifax Public Garden, one of the most beautiful spots in all America, the citizens of Halifax have erected what is called the 'Fitzgerald Bridge,' as a mark of the esteem and high regard of the people of that city for Inspector Fitzgerald. I venture to make this suggestion to the committee, because the Prime Minister, representing as he does with myself, Halifax county, and which was the home of Inspector Fitzgerald, while no doubt very sympathetic in the matter, might feel reluctant on that account to establish a precedent and meet the suggestion I make to the committee. I think however, that this is a case in which parliament would be justified in voting a specific sum or an annuity to be paid to the mother of Inspector Fitzgerald during her lifetime, and I feel sure that, if the government can see their way clear to do so, it will meet with the support and commendation of the House. What I say respecting Inspector Fitzgerald is, of course, intended to apply to his companions in death.

Mr. THOMPSON (Yukon). I rise to express my sympathy with the hon. junior member for Halifax, who has just so well expressed his sentiments with regard to this tragedy of the north which resulted in the death of Inspector Fitzgerald and his party. It strikes me that it would be a most fitting thing for this parliament to recognise the services rendered to Canada, and the empire by Inspector Fitzgerald, who laid down his life in those northern wilds in the discharge of what he considered to be his simple duty. The North-west Mounted Police have done a great deal in conquering the wilds of the north and the west, and in giving to the people of those sections of our country peace, law and order. I have lived in the Yukon for some twelve years, and I can testify, as I do most enthusiastically, to the splendid work they have done, and are doing on our frontiers. Our boundary marches with that of the United States on the 141st meridian west from Mount St. Elias to the Arctic ocean, and the United States and Canada have settlements on either side of that boundary line, and also on the littoral of the Arctic ocean. It became necessary some years ago, in the opinion of those belonging to the Northwest Mounted Police, to establish a patrol annually from Dawson to Herschell Island.

This patrol leaves Dawson in December or January of each year usually. In the year in which Inspector Fitzgerald met his death that patrol left Herschell Island, or Fort McPherson, for Dawson. Inspector Fitzgerald was accompanied by three other men. It seems that on this particular patrol, the inspector neglected to take a proper guide. He had a guide with him whom he thought could guide him through that labyrinth of streams, mountains and passes which exist on that trail, but his guide failed him. He continued his route thinking he could, with the knowledge he had of the trail, succeed in making Dawson, but we know now that he could not under the circumstances, have done so. His diary is a pathetic document in view of the events which finally cost him his life. Here is an entry dated 17th January:

> Twenty-three below. Fine in a.m. with strong S.W. wind which turned to a gale in evening.

He goes on to explain what he did that day and continues:

> I left at eight a.m. and followed a river running south, but could not see any cuttings on it.

That is he could see no marks.

> Carter is completely lost and does not know one river from another. We have now only ten pounds of flour, and eight pounds of bacon and some dried fish. My last hope is gone, and the only thing I can do is to return, and kill some of the dogs to feed the others and ourselves, unless we can meet some Indians.

Unfortunately the party never met any Indians, and in eating the dogs they were taken down by a peculiar disease which sometimes comes to men who have to live on dog flesh as these poor fellows had to. Inspector Fitzgerald carried with him despatches from the police post on the Arctic Ocean, and customs revenues for our government. These were found intact in one of the last camps which he made. There is little more to add, Mr. Chairman, except on my part to say, that I think it would be a most fitting thing for this parliament to recognize in some measure the services which Inspector Fitzgerald performed. An hon. gentleman asks me what about the other three members of the party. They met their deaths a little earlier than Inspector Fitzgerald. The guide who went out to examine the trail, and if possible discover the bodies of the members of the patrol, found two of Inspector Fitzgerald's policemen dead and, cared for them as best could be done. Next they found another policeman, and finally Inspector Fitzgerald himself who was the last to die. I think that some fitting recognition should be made of the services of all four men, but particularly of Inspector Fitzgerald himself who died in doing his duty.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. With regard to the estimates which are now asked for by my right hon. friend (Mr. Borden) there are no comments to be made at all. The money will be cheerfully voted, it is well deserved by the force. I have read with some care the report of the Mounted Police which was brought down some time ago by the Prime Minister. In connection with that report two things struck me. One was the advisability of increasing the pay of the men. The commissioner of the force states how difficult it is to maintain the required quota of men on account of the inducements which are offered in the Northwest provinces to young men in good health and brains. It is natural to suppose that members of the Mounted Police, whose pay is rather scanty may be induced to leave the force on account of the greater attractions other occupations offer, and of the even probability of their making a good deal more for themselves than they could if they were to remain in the force. I am very glad that the leader of the government, who has charge of the Mounted Police Department has already brought in a resolution to increase the pay of the Mounted Police which will give them more inducement to remain in the service, and when these resolutions are brought down the money called for will also be cheerfully voted. There is another thing which has struck me, as to the advisability, or otherwise, of extending the posts of the Mounted Police northward. Settlement is moving northward all the time. It has now reached the Athabasca river. It will reach by and by the Peace river district, and no doubt will extend, more or less, from that region up to the Arctic ocean. My hon. friend, I believe, will be compelled, as time goes on, to extend the police posts further north. Whether he can do that without increasing the force is a matter as to which I offer no opinion; but probably he will find it possible to decrease the number of posts in the well settled portions of the district of Athabasca and the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta, and extend them farther northward. With regard to the tragedy which has just been referred to by my hon. friend from Halifax, and my hon. friend from the Yukon, for my part I will say, if my opinion counts for anything in the matter at all, that I will be very glad to see recognition given to the families of Inspector Fitzgerald and his companions. This is perhaps a little irregular, but the tragedy is one that is not likely to occur anywhere else. The patrolling done by the force in this northern region, from the Yukon to the mouth of the Mackenzie river and to the Hudson's Bay Company posts, is a work which requires not only courage, ability and moral force, but all the qualities which may characterize the human mind and human intellect. In looking over the report of the tragedy as it occurred, it seems to me that Inspector Fitzgerald was imprudent in starting with so little provisions as he did, but this does not detract at all from his merit in responding to the call of duty. Inspector Fitzgerald and his party should have had another team of dogs, and carried more provisions, and had they done so they probably would have escaped the calamity which befell them. But this in no wise detracts from the heroism he displayed, and if the right hon. gentleman who is in charge of the force should ask for some testimonial to be given to his family, for my part I shall cheerfully support it.

Mr. WHITE (Victoria, Alberta). I would like to add a few words in support of what has been already so well said by the junior member for Halifax with regard to the tragic death of Inspector Fitzgerald. It was my privilege to know Inspector Fitzgerald personally, being an old member of the Northwest Mounted Police—though before the time that Inspector Fitzgerald entered the force—and I have some knowledge of the duties which members of the Northwest Mounted Police are called upon to perform. There is an opinion in the western country, and particularly at the post at Fort Saskatchewan to which the late Inspector Fitzgerald belonged, that he was called upon to perform an unnecessary duty. It is believed at least, that he was called upon, on account of his remarkable and distinguished record, to perform something that was altogether out of the ordinary, something beyond what is expected of the Northwest Mounted Police. It is believed in the district I have referred to by old associates and friends of Inspector Fitzgerald that it was perhaps to make a nice report that the police had such a complete system of patrol from the international boundary to the Arctic circle, that he was called upon to undertake that duty.

It is well known that they were not going out for duty in the way of looking after criminals or to relieve settlers in distress because this is an uninhabited region, and I hope that the request of the hon. the junior member for Halifax (Mr. Maclean) will receive the consideration of the right hon. the Prime Minister. I do not know why it is but we have always found it very difficult to have anything done for the Northwest Mounted Police, one of the best military or semi-military organizations in the world. We read a great deal about the great things they have done, but members of that force who have been unfortunate enough to meet with accidents in the discharge of their duty have found since the organization of the police that they have received very little attention from the heads of the department in the east. The government has always been willing to recognize and reward members of other military corps for any service done. When the Royal Northwest Mounted Police were organized in 1874, they received 75c. a day, and at the end of their service they were given a free grant of land of 160 acres. In 1879, the Conservative party came into power, their pay was reduced to 50c. per day and their scrip was cut off, they lost the grant of land although at that time land was of no value whatever. During the rebellion of 1885 they were asked to do the hardest duties on the field, they did the scout duty, and as they had knowledge of the country the most dangerous work fell to them. But when it came to the rewards after the rebellion, although some corps that were under orders in the east received their scrip, the Northwest Mounted Police received no bounty at all. A great many companies that went to the west were sent to police posts and did garrison duty while the police went out to do the fighting; the eastern corps that did garrison duty at the posts received their scrip, while the police received no consideration at all.

I mention these facts simply to point out that for some reason or another the police have not been getting a square deal. They perform duties not performed by any other organization of the kind in the world. During the six years I served in the police force I was called on to act as sheriff for some months. I have acted as collector of customs, and the man who relieved me received $1,800 a year. There is a feeling among the mounted police that they are not receiving what they should receive, and I am glad to notice that a small increase of pay has been made, but, it is very small. There is an increase of only 15 cents a day, but that is not at all equal to the increase in wages in other walks of life and in the cost of living. Wages of other men have nearly doubled since the police were first organized, and yet the police to-day receive only 75 cents a day for performing their difficult duties. A policeman when sent out on any particular duty has no option, he is not able to refuse the duty if he does not like it. I have known a man to receive a year in the cells for simply refusing to obey an order. When they are ordered to do any work they have to do it, and I think they are entitled to a greater increase than is proposed.

It would be a shame to see the mother of such a man as Inspector Fitzgerald have to suffer want because her means of livelihood are taken away owing to the death of her son. The government might well give her the pension that was earned by Inspector Fitzgerald for the 20 years he served, as a bounty as long as she may live, and, while I do not know the others, I think they also are entitled to some consideration. I hope the Prime Minister will look into this whole question, not only with reference to Inspector Fitzgerald, but to the police generally. It looks as if the deputy head of the department is anxious to demonstrate to the people of Canada how cheaply an organization of that kind can be kept up. The initial pay might well be increased to a dollar a day, and I do not think any one would think these men were even then being fairly paid.

Mr. BORDEN. I appreciate all that has been said in commendation of the force, in which I have always taken a very great deal of interest. I can assure my hon. friend who has just taken his seat, and who, I understand, was a member of the force for some years, that so far as I am concerned the Northwest Mounted Police will always get fair-play and a square deal as far as I am able to give it to them. The statute fixes $1 as the maximum pay for constables. We are increasing the pay in the first year by the order in council lately passed to the extent of 25 per cent; it was 60 cents, it is now 75 cents per diem, and in the sixth year it reaches the maximum of $1. Formerly the constable did not reach the maximum until the ninth year . I am perfectly well aware that, compared with the rewards that come to men engaged in other vocations, this is not much, but still the pay now provided is larger than ever before, and I think it is practically the same as the pay in the permanent force

My right hon. friend has alluded to the probability that posts still further north will require to be established. I think that is very likely to be brought about. In the brief experience I have had, a great many applications have come to the department at Ottawa from time to time for the presence of a constable in new communities which are springing up so continuously and so rapidly in the great prairie provinces. We are endeavouring to supply these demands as rapidly as possible. I have heard it suggested in this House on more than one occasion that the force might advantageously be reduced. Up to the present time I can see nothing that would lead me to such a conclusion. While I have not been able to give to that question the consideration which it would demand before taking action, the inclination in my mind at the present time, without speaking in a definite and conclusive way, would point to the opposite direction. I think, if any change is likely to be made in the constitution of the force, it would be in the direction of increasing it rather than diminishing it.

Now, with respect to the very regrettable accident and loss of life which occurred two years ago on the Dawson and Macpherson patrol. This patrol, I understand was established about ten years ago, and the accident which took place a year ago was the first serious accident that has ever occurred in connection with the patrol. This patrol has been made in the winter for several years past, with the object of keeping communication open with Fort Macpherson and the Mackenzie river, and carrying the mail between those places. Without it nothing could be heard from the Mackenzie river from the close of navigation of one season to the opening of the next—a matter of seven or eight months. The distance in direct line is 275 miles. Distance as travelled by patrol, 470 miles. The time usually taken is about 30 days each way. This year the patrol left Dawson on the 6th of January and returned on the 10th of March, making the round trip in 69 days.

Here are the details of the party who were frozen to death on this patrol in the winter of 1910-11:

Inspector F. J. Fitzgerald; age 42 years; 22 years' service.
Constable R. O. Taylor; age, 28 years; 5 years' service.
Constable G. F. Kinney; age, 28 years; 4 years' service.
Special Constable Sam. Carter; age, 42 years; pensioner after 20 years' service.

The above party left McPherson on the 21st of December, 1910. The bodies were found on the 21st and 22nd of March, 1911—Inspector Fitzgerald and Special Constable Carter, 25 miles from McPherson, and those of Constables Kinney and Taylor about 35 miles from McPherson. The party had travelled 264 miles from McPherson when they turned back. The cause of the disaster has been attributed to lack of a competent guide and an insufficient supply of provisions. During the present year two relief stations have been built at the following places: Martin's Cabin. about 250 miles from Dawson, and Trail Creek, about 130 miles from McPherson, each stocked with ten days' rations for five men and ten days dog feed for 15 dogs. So that whatever precautions seemed desirable, were taken to prevent any recurrence of the unfortunate fate of these men.

I concur with what has been said by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Maclean) and by other members of the House with regard to this subject. One feels specially touched by the entry in the diary of Inspector Fitzgerald, and especially by his will, which was found in one of his pockets, and which evidently had been written with a piece of charred wood. Here is how it read:

All money in despatch bag, and bank, clothes, &c., I leave to my dearly beloved mother, Mrs. John Fitzgerald, Halifax. God bless all.

F. J. FITZGERALD, R.N.W.M.P.

It may be said of Inspector Fitzgerald that whatever error of judgment there may have been in respect of guides and supply of provisions, he bore his part in that journey to the grave in a way that will inspire the respect and admiration of every man in Canada. I feel especially proud because he was born and brought up in the constituency which my hon. friend and myself have the honour to represent in this House. It is impossible for me at the moment to make any definite announcement with regard to the subject my hon. friend from Halifax has brought to my attention to-day, and of which he has spoken to me in private. But I may say to him and to my right hon. friend, that I feel very earnestly the desirability of making some recognition to the families of these men who lost their lives under the circumstances I have mentioned. It is a matter to which I hope to give attention before the end of the present session.

So far as the members of this force are concerned, my hon. friend from Victoria will remember that there is a provision made by way of pension which inures to these men after a certain service in the force. However, I want him to understand that as to giving these men every consideration possible, having regard to the usual practice in such cases, I am disposed to agree very much with what he has suggested. Let me say to him, however, that so far as the permanent officials of the Department of the Northwest Mounted Police are concerned, I do not think there is any room for the criticism that they are not inspired by a very sincere sympathy with the force. The Controller of the Northwest Mounted Police, Colonel White, is disposed, so far as I know his character and disposition—and I think I know him pretty well, to give every possible consideration, under the law by which he is guided to the officers and men of the Royal Northwest Mounted Police. I know there is no man in Canada who has that force in higher regard than Colonel White, there is no man in Canada who is inspired by a more sincere sympathy with the officers and men of the force than the gentleman who is at the head of it at the present time. I think, therefore, there need be no idea in the mind of any hon. member of this House that, whether from the permanent head of the department or from myself, that force will not receive the utmost possible consideration and sympathy.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I do not think that the numbers of the force ought to be reduced. There has been an impression in the east that, as the new provinces are getting more populated and civil government is becoming better organized, the force might be dispensed with in those provinces. Anybody who takes the trouble to read the report which has been placed on the table of the House will come to the conclusion that it would be a misfortune if the protection which is given to the settlers should be withdrawn. Any man who reads this report will realise the protection, security and encouragement which are given to the settlers when they see the uniforms of the mounted police around them. If the settler has trouble of any kind he goes to the mounted police, and he is sure to have redress. In a multitude of circumstances the presence of the police gives to him a security which he could not have in any other way. The patrolling of the different sections which has been carried on by the police for many years has given to the country a security that otherwise it could not have had. In regard to the patrolling of the north, to which some exception, I understand, has been taken by my hon. friend from Victoria, Alberta (Mr. White), I think that, on the contrary, it has been of eminent service to the country. This service was organized some ten years ago, when I had the honour to have the police under my charge, and the chief reason which led the government to take that course was the desirability of asserting the authority of Canada in these northern regions. At the present time the mouth of the Mackenzie river is used by American whalers as the base of their operations in summer time. They are in contact with the settler. They took pelts away without any regard to law and it was advisable that we should have a force there, not only for the purpose of asserting our own authority, but also for the protection of the natives against the too close proximity of the American whalers. The force has done eminently good service in that respect. We have asserted that authority in these districts and that alone would be sufficient to warrant these yearly expeditions which have taken place from the Yukon to the mouth of the Mackenzie river. In summer it is quite easy to communicate from Athabasca Landing with the mouth of the Mackenzie river, but in the winter it could not be done in any other way than that in which it has been done, and in this respect the service is performing an important duty.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria,Ont.) I desire to say a word in reference to one of the remarks made by the hon. member for Victoria, Alberta (Mr. White). The mounted police is not a military force, and at the time of the Northwest rebellion, and also previously, it had to perform the service of the regular troops. Immediately afterwards the volunteers received their land grants and recognition in the way of a medal. The mounted police never received any land grant, and yet all governments in Canada have refused to recognize them as a military body.

Mr. WHITE (Victoria, Alberta). Although they were not a militia corps they were attached to and under militia officers, and performed military service.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria, Ont.) Yes, that is the point I am making. Regular soldiers did the same thing. They were treated as regular soldiers and not as volunteers. The regular soldier got no land grant; all he got was a medal, and the mounted police were treated as regular soldiers. Supposing one of the officers of the mounted police happens to join the militia service of the country, all his service in the police counts for nothing, although in the past it was much more developing service than the militia service as the mounted policeman in the old days, acted as sheriff, commissioner, inspector, and almost in every capacity from that of a judge down. This service is not counted at all in the militia service. I have always felt that the police have been rather hardly dealt with in not having any credit given to them for their service in 1885.

Ocean and river service—maintenance and repairs to government steamer and ice-breakers, $1,000,000.

Mr. McKENZIE. Would the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries inform me how many ice-breakers he has now on the Atlantic?

Mr. HAZEN. We have three ice-breakers. The 'Montcalm' and the 'Lady Grey' are used for the purpose of breaking ice on the St. Lawrence river and the 'Earl Grey' is engaged with the 'Minto' in keeping open communication between Prince Edward Island and the mainland.

Mr. McKENZIE. Are the boats engaged in the service between Pictou and Prince Edward Island?

Mr. HAZEN. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. Is one of them exclusively an ice-breaker or does she carry passengers and freight and mail as well?

Mr. HAZEN. She does.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax). What would be the policy of the minister respecting repairs to government steamers? Will he ask for tenders or will such work be assigned to persons whom his department may select?

Mr. HAZEN. I am informed that in many cases the work of repairing steamers cannot satisfactorily be done by tender. We have now at Halifax quite an extensive plant in connection with the naval yard there and a very considerable number of the vessels are now, I understand, being repaired at Halifax by the department. There are cases where it would be in the public interest to ask for tenders; there are other cases where it is inadvisable to do so, and there are other cases where it is much more in the public interest that we should have the repairs done by our own department at Halifax. I will always consult the officials of the department, who are better informed on the subject than I, and I shall endeavour in every case to do what is best in the public interest.

Mr. LAW. Is it the policy of the present government to continue the system in force under the old government with regard to provisioning the government steamers?

Mr. HAZEN. I intend to continue the system now in force which is, that instead of the government purchasing the supplies itself, it makes a contract with the steward or some officer of the vessel under which he has a certain allowance for each officer and man to provide the meals on board the government steamers. I am told by the officers of the department that this has proven much more satisfactory than the system in vogue some years ago under which the department employed a steward who purchased supplies for the department and fed the men. I am told that under the old system the meals were not as good and the cost much greater than under the present system. It is intended to continue the present system.

Mr. LAW. I am glad the minister has made that statement because I think the system in vogue for the last few years has been very satisfactory. Will the steward or the captain who has the contract to supply the meals to the officers and crew, be subject to the patronage committee, or will he have the privilege of buying his stores wherever he can buy them cheapest?

Mr. HAZEN. He is not subject in the slightest degree to any patronage committee. A contract is entered into with him and he is free to buy the supplies where he can do so to the best advantage.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Have any steps been taken to get over the difficulty which occurred in St. John, where different people supplied goods to the steward of one of these steamers and have not been paid? The steward left the country without paying these merchants, and it has been asserted by quite a number of them that they thought when they were furnishing these goods they were furnishing them to the government and not to the steward personally.

Mr. HAZEN. I am sorry I cannot tell my hon. friend that that matter is finally disposed of. Mr. Doutre has been instructed by me to make a very careful investigation into the facts, and I expect to have a report from him in a short time. A man named Cogswell contracted to supply meals on one of the steamers under contract, and he ran up bills in different parts of the country where the steamer called, to the extent of over three thousand dollars, which have not been paid. The claim is made that those who supplied the goods to Cogswell believed that he was an official of the department, and that when they were supplying the goods they were really supplying them to the government. Of course, even though we are not liable legally, we may be liable in equity. There are instances in which it is hard to believe that those who supplied Cogswell thought they were supplying the government, because they went on month after month rendering bills to Cogswell himself, and not to the department. They contended that as Cogswell went to their places of business in the uniform of the service, that they got the idea they were selling direct to the government. We have taken means in the future to guard agains the recurrence of such a thing. We are insisting that every steward with whom a contract is made in the future will have to give the bonds of a surety company for the faithful performance of his contract, and also to indemnify against loss those who furnish him with goods. The Department of Justice has not yet approved of the form of bond submitted.

Mr. PUGSLEY. It would be a very natural thing for these people to render bills to the steward, and that point ought not to be strongly insisted upon in their case. Prima facie it might be assumed that the suppliers thought they were dealing with the government through the stewards. Of course, it may be that some of them had knowledge, and I am very glad the minister is looking into the matter, and I am sure he will deal with it from an equitable standpoint. Of course, if they had a legal claim, I would not be making this appeal, because they could go to the Exchequer Court.

Mr. HAZEN. I do not feel justified in asking parliament to vote money for this purpose in the absence of a report of one of the responsible officials of the department, and I expect to have that report soon. For instance, one of the banks claims $800 on the ground that it discounted notes which Cogswell had given to some of these merchants for supplies. It is rather difficult to believe that the bank and the merchants who took Cogswell's personal notes believed they were dealing with the government.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Suppose Cogswell had said that parliament had not yet voted the money, as is often the case.

Mr. HAZEN. There might be something in that.

Mr. LAW. I am glad to hear the hon. minister is giving the matter consideration. I know that people in Yarmouth supposed at the time that the department would be liable for the Bill. Of course, there was no necessity for Mr. Sanders or any one else making a claim on the department until the steward defaulted. I hope the minister will see his way clear to pay the bill.

Mr. HAZEN. My disposition is to pay it if I can justly and fairly do so, guarding the future by requiring bonds to be given.

Mr. MACDONALD. As a matter of fact, in the ordinary course of business, do any of the accounts for supplies that have been obtained by the stewards reach the department?

Mr. HAZEN. No. A contract is made with the steward, under which he supplies each officer and man on the ship at so much a meal. The number of meals, I presume, is certified to by the purser, and the department pays the steward on that basis.

Mr. MACDONALD. As a matter of common knowledge, parties who would supply goods under the circumstances mentioned in this case would do so under the idea that the steward was only a medium between the government and them for the purpose of purchasing. The fact that the stewards made those contracts has not been specially understood by the general public unless it was drawn to their attention. I wish to refer to another matter, to which I called the attention of the minister in the early part of the session, namely, that a man had been employed as pilot on one of the winter boats plying between Pictou and Georgetown who held no certificate as pilot. The answer given to me by the minister was that he was only employed temporarily. I am informed that this man Boute is a man who had no qualifications whatever. I do not think he was a certificated master. He had only been floating about on sailing vessels in the Gulf of St. Lawrence, and he was appointed pilot on this government steamer. Of course, the law is very clear that to be employed on any other kind of steamer he would have to be a regularly licensed pilot. I know that down to the early part of February this man, who had no right to be there at all, was still acting as pilot on this steamer. If the steamer had gone ashore or there had been any other difficulty, the minister would have been in an unfortunate position before the House.

Mr. HAZEN. I asked my deputy to look into the law on the subject after my hon. friend had called my attention to the matter, and I was informed by the deputy that there was no law whatever making it necessary that the pilot should have a certificate or a license, but that all that was necessary was to appoint a man who was qualified for the position. This man, I may say, was recommended as being highly and thoroughly qualified for the position before he was appointed by the department. After the hon. gentleman called attention to the matter in the House, further inquiry was made, and the department was satisfied that the man was qualified to discharge the duties he was called upon to discharge. It may be that my hon. friend is right that there was an omission in the law, and that it might be desirable that a man should be required to have a certificate for the discharge of the ordinary duties of a pilot. But a man who has been in the habit of going to and fro between the same ports every day as an officer on a ship could perhaps be as safely trusted to guide the ship in case of a storm or fog as any pilot.

Mr. MACDONALD. I think the Minister is stronger in the first part of his answer than in the last. If he believes his conclusion, there is no need of any vessel being piloted. The great difficulty of handling these steamers in wintertime is that they may run aground; and while a man may know the headlands and the lighthouses from going around in a schooner in the summer-time, it cannot be argued that such a person would have the accurate knowledge that a pilot would have who was specially examined for the purpose and with long experience of taking vessels through harbour entrances. It may be that government steamers have hitherto been exempted from the provisions of the pilotage law, and I am aware that in summer time they do not employ pilots; but in the winter season, when they are navigating waters which are not free from danger, in regard to the depth, and where there are three pilotage districts running upon one another, it seems to me that the Minister is running a great risk in taking the recommendation of his political friends in Prince Edward Island, who said, we will not give you a pilot, but we will give you one who suits us politically. In Captain Brown of the 'Minto' the Minister has an officer of long experience, who knows the conditions there; but instead of promoting to the place of Captain Finlayson, as he should have done, the first mate, who had experience there for a great number of years, who knew the conditions that have obtained in later years, and who had the advantage of close communication with Captain Finlayson, the Minister again listened to the voice of the tempters from Charlottetown, and sent to British Columbia for a man who had been employed on those steamers 15 or 16 years ago, but had nothing to do with winter navigation in the meantime, and practically tells the thoroughly competent and well-trained men on the vessel that he will not have them at all. There was a rule that obtained in the Marine and Fisheries Department, which I am sorry to see the Minister breaking, that was, that in regard to all officials in this branch of the service, promotion should be based upon seniority.

A man who entered the service of the government in any one of these steamers in any responsible capacity connected with sailing the vessel, or in the engineering department, was promoted according to seniority. My hon. friend (Mr. Hazen) due, I take it, to the great pressure that was exerted upon him at the inception of his career in the department, broke through that rule. He accepted the recommendation of the two members for Queens county, sent to British Columbia and brought down a man who had not been near the Gulf of St. Lawrence for the last 15 years. I hope the Minister will not violate the rule as to promotion by seniority again in regard to these matters. This year the department has been very fortunate, although my information is that a few weeks ago Captain Murchison, the man who was brought from British Columbia was on the point of leaving the vessel, she being in such great peril. The conditions were such that he made all preparations for leaving the ship, and had not the wind fortunately changed and the ice begun to move the other way, this vessel commanded by the man just mentioned would have been a complete loss. I refer to these matters because I want to urge upon the minister the continuance of the prudent policy that was adopted by the late administration of making promotion by seniority, and of voicing the complaint, which I think I have a right to make, as being in the public interest, that the minister did net retain Mr. McPherson. I do not know what answer the Minister would have been able to make to the country if this vessel had been lost in consequence of his disregarding a well understood rule, and appointing to the command a man who had been absent from the service for ten or fifteen years.

Mr. HAZEN. I may say to my hon. friend that from my observation, and from what I can learn, if there ever was such a rule as he speaks of with regard to promotions, it was quite as much honoured in the breach as in the observance.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou). Oh no, not at all.

Mr. HAZEN. That is my information, and I think it is quite correct. With regard to Captain Murchison, I received the information that he was in every way qualified for the position to which he was appointed. He held the necessary certificates of qualification, he had had very large experience, and his whole record was that of a man who was thoroughly competent to discharge the duties of the position to which he was appointed. I do not think it was a matter of luck on my part, but because we had a very careful and competent navigator in the person of Captain Murchison, that the service has been as successful this year as it has been in the past. My information further is that Captain Murchison was previously in the service of the government, but that a number of years ago he felt that he was being very unfairly treated, and he was forced practically to resign his position. Restoring him to the service and giving him command was, I think, a mere act of justice and the righting of an injustice which he had suffered in the past. That would not have been sufficient reason for making the appointment, had he not been well qualified for the position not only by possessing the necessary certificates, but by his standing as a navigator and as an experienced man.

Mr. HUGHES (Kings, P.E.I.) Has the first officer on the 'Minto' resigned his position?

Mr. HAZEN. What is his name?

Mr. HUGHES (Kings, P. E. I.), McPherson, I think, and I am told that he resigned in consequence of being passed over. I would like also to know who has been appointed in his place.

Mr. HAZEN. I understand that Mr. McPherson, who is the man referred to by my hon. friend, practically resigned. He asked for a very long leave of absence, suggesting, I believe, that it was not his intention to return to the ship.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou). Because of another man being appointed ?

Mr. HAZEN. No, I am told he gave no reason. There is nothing on the files of the department to show that he received other than fair treatment.

Mr. HUGHES (Kings, P. E. I.). I endorse to a large extent, the remarks made by the member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald), that having in mind the success of this service nothing will take the place of experience; and while Captain Murchison may be a very good man, yet it must be understood he has been out of the service for quite a number of years. Whether or not he has had as large experience as the man who was in charge of the vessel, is just a question. The principle of promoting men in the service—that service at all events—is certainly a sound one, and it should be kept in view in the appointment of the junior officers. In the event of the sickness of the captain or his absence through any cause, or his removal by death, the next officer ought to be qualified to take his place and thus the principle of promotion should go into effect. The officers, in order to get the best service from them, should be given to understand that promotion will come by seniority. Now, I understand that the steamer 'Minto' was in a very precarious position at one time during the winter season although it may have been through no fault of the captain. I would ask the minister if the vessel at that time sustained any particular damage, and if it will be necessary to send her to Great Britain to receive the necessary repairs?

Mr. HAZEN. The 'Minto' has sustained no special damage at all.

Mr. HUGHES (Kings, P.E.I.). But some repairs will be necessary ?

Mr. HAZEN. I think every season repairs are necessary to every boat in the service.

Mr. HUGHES (Kings, P. E. I.). Will there be any more repairs required during the coming season than are ordinarily called for ?

Mr. HAZEN. No.

Mr. HUGHES (Kings, P. E. I.). And the repairs can be made on this side of the Atlantic ?

Mr. HAZEN. Yes.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax). Was any change made in the departmental regulations last year respecting the uniform to be worn by seamen on the government steamers employed in the fisheries protection service ?

Mr. HAZEN. I do not think so. Certainly I never heard of it. No change has been made in that regard since I have been at the head of the department.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax). There were no regulations to the effect that when on shore, or off duty, the men were prohibited from wearing the ship's uniform?

Mr. HAZEN. Not in any of the ships that are under the control of the Marine Department.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax). Perhaps I am mistaken.

Mr. HAZEN. In saying this I am speaking of the Marine and Fisheries Department, not of the Naval Service.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou). Has the minister been making any inquiries regarding the points between which the car ferry service is to run ?

Mr. HAZEN. I may say to my hon. friend, that matter is being dealt with by the Railway Department, not by the Marine Department. I can tell him, however, that full inquiry will be made as to what is the most desirable location for the car ferry before a decision is come to.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou). Perhaps the minister can tell me who the marine expert of the Railway Department is ?

Mr. HAZEN. I am afraid I shall have to refer the hon. gentleman to the Minister of Railways for an answer. I do not know of any marine expert in the Railway Department.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou). It is rather anomalous that when this government is starting upon a proposition to run a car ferry across the straits of Northumberland involving such a large expenditure, they are doing so without having any information whatever as to the conditions, or any information from the proper source from which we should have it.

The Minister of Marine and Fisheries knows that no one in the Railway Department has had anything to do with this question of a winter service. The question of obstruction to navigation here can only arise with reference to the winter months. One would suppose that the government before undertaking this expenditure would have taken steps to obtain all the information procurable and I am surprised that the officials of the Marine Department have not been called upon to deal with it.

Mr. HAZEN. It does not seem important which department deals with this question so long as it is dealt with intelligently and thoroughly. As this car ferry will be simply a part of the government railway system, connecting the railway on the island with the Intercolonial railway on the main land, it is right that it should be managed by the Railway Department. While the inquiry is not being made by my department all sources of information possessed by the Marine Department are being placed at the disposal of the Railway Department. A former professor at Queen's University, Professor Kirkpatrick, has been appointed to gather all information with reference to the selection of a route for the proposed car ferry. Professor Kirkpatrick is thoroughly qualified and has no local feeling. He is in touch now with the captains of the government boats running between Prince Edward Island and the mainland and other navigators with experience in those waters, and I am sure that he will submit to Council information upon which Council can come to a correct and sane conclusion.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou). The government decided to undertake this project without getting information even from the hon. gentleman's own department. I do not hesitate, with full responsibility, to make the prediction that the car ferry in winter time will be a lamentable failure and the government will have to take the full responsibility of it. They should have looked into the question before deciding to commit the country to this expenditure.

Mr. McLEAN (Queens, P.E.I.). Does the hon. member object to the car ferry?

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou). I say that the expenditure of the money of this country for the construction of a car ferry in winter is one of the grossest errors this country ever made, and I predict it will be a failure and that the government will repent it. My complaint is that the government put the cart before the horse, they decided to spend the money and then to find out whether it could be spent. I had the papers showing the information the government had before them when they reached their decision and if these papers are accurate the government went blindly into this project.

Mr. HAZEN. My hon. friend is entirely in error. It is admitted that the car ferry would be of great value to Prince Edward Island. The information which the government is obtaining now is information to decide as to the proper route on which to establish a car ferry in order to make the connection between the railway and the island and the mainland.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou). Does the minister undertake the responsibility of stating as a minister that he or his government had anything before them that would show that they had the slightest ground for believing that the operation of a winter car ferry there would be a feasible proposition in January, February and March?

Mr. HAZEN. I am surprised to hear my hon. friend opposing this proposition.

Mr. MACDONALD. Time will vindicate me.

Mr. HAZEN. My hon. friend has before indulged in the pastime of putting on the veil of prophecy. That is not a safe occupation for a public man. No great public work has yet been undertaken in Canada without some member in this House prophesying that it would be an utter failure, yet all our public works have turned out to the benefit of the country. I do not want my hon. friend to be placed in that class of false political prophets by any rash utterances he may make on this question. However, that has little to do with the estimates before the House.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou). It has something to do with them, we are voting money for winter communication. My hon. friend is quite welcome to the feeling that it is a very dangerous thing for an hon. member to make a prophecy in regard to a question of this kind. It is one proposition to make a prophecy as to whether a great public enterprise can be constructed over land and what it will cost, and another as to a question of this kind. I have lived all my life alongside the Straits of Northumberland, and I have seen the conditions there for the last 45 years. It would have been prudent and wise for this government not to have put the cart before the horse, but to have made some inquiry as to the possibility of operating a car ferry in the Straits of Northumberland in the winter months before committing this country to that expenditure.

Mr. HAZEN. Does my hon. friend not think it would be an enormous advantage to the island to have a car ferry if only in the season of the year during which there is no danger of the interruption of communication so as to avoid the three breakings of bulk in the shipment of the products of the island?

Mr. MACDONALD. My hon. friend is running away from the point, as he very well knows. The question as to whether a car ferry would be a good thing in summer is an entirely different thing from the question as to whether it could be operated in winter. I venture to say that he cannot find among his friends who live along the shores of the Straits of Northumberland, not even in the province of Prince Edward Island, who will tell him that a car ferry is possible in those straits in the winter months. The correspondence shows that the Department of Railways had nothing whatever before them.

Mr. McLEAN (Queens, Prince Edward Island). Why is the hon. gentleman opposed to it?

Mr. MACDONALD. My hon. friend (Mr. McLean) knows that the reason why this proposal is being imposed upon the people of this country was in order to influence the elections in the province of Prince Edward Island. The correspondence shows that the Department of Railways had nothing whatever before them which would lead any one to believe that it was feasible. I say again that the government should be condemned, because they are committing the country to a great expense for what is supposed to be a substitute for this vote, this vote for maintaining winter communication with Prince Edward Island by the steamers 'Earl Grey'and the 'Minto' which have, within the last few years, performed that service as well as it could possibly be performed. The time lost and the inconvenience have been of the smallest possible character, having regard to the conditions that exist and will exist as long as nature creates them. I say we have here evidence that the government is proposing to make a substitution for this vote without having taken the opinion of any man, of any one in the Marine and Fisheries Department, or any one of those who have had to do with the navigation of these straits during the last twenty-five years. But after having decided to embark upon this enterprise, after they have initiated this thing, then they say, we will look around and see whether it is possible to do this business, and although it is assigned to the Minister of Railways to deal with the question the Minister of Railways has no marine experts in his department. Professor Kirkpatrick of Kingston may be a very good civil engineer, but civil engineers are not people you would think of consulting whether a car ferry can cross the straits of Northumberland in the winter months. I say that professor Kirkpatrick, who has lived in Kingston all his life, and who has not been accustomed to ice navigation, would not be a man who is equipped in the slightest degree with the knowledge to state as to whether any kind of a steamer could operate in the Straits of Northumberland during the winter months. I say before the government decided anything they should have sent for Captain Brown, for Captain Murchison, for Captain Finlayson, men who know the conditions, and if they had sent for them and got their opinion before the government had started upon this enterprise, they would have told him that such a thing as a car ferry carrying freight and passengers crossing that tide during the winter months is simply absurd and grotesque. I am astounded that the minister should have told us that the matter was in this position, that not a single one of his officials were ever asked their opinion as to whether this thing is possible. They tell us that there is a ferry running on the straits of Mackinaw, which are not comparable at all to these straits, the conditions are entirely different. When the correspondence moved for by my hon. friend from Westmorland (Mr. Emmerson) the other day was brought down, it appeared that outside some representations made by my hon. friend from Queens, Prince Edward Island (Mr. McLean) to the Prime Minister, it was because some statement had been made at a meeting at the market hall before the election last year, that this whole problem of winter navigation could be solved by the operation of a car ferry in the winter months, that the government proceeded to commit the country to the expense and solution of the problem in that way without having asked the opinion of a single man who knew anything about the subject whatever.

At six o'clock, House took recess.

After Recess

House resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS.

RAINY RIVER RADIAL RAILWAY COMPANY.

House in committee on Bill (No. 121), respecting the Rainy River Radial Railway Company—Mr. Beattie.

On section 1,

Mr. OLIVER. Is the hon. member in charge of the Bill present?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Goodeve). No.

Mr. HAZEN. There are no amendments to this Bill.

Mr. BOYCE. This is just granting the ordinary extension of time to construct.

Mr. OLIVER. It would be in order to have somebody acquainted with its contents to say what the purport of the Bill is.

Bill reported, read the third time, and passed.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY COMPANY.

House in committee on Bill (No. 98), respecting the Canadian Pacific Railway Company—Mr. McCraney.

Mr. OLIVER. Would the hon. member in charge of the Bill give a few words as to its purport?

An hon. MEMBER. He is not here.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Goodeve). I will read the clauses if the hon. member (Mr. Oliver) desires.

Mr. OLIVER. I would like to know what the Bill is about. I think it is only fair and courteous to the House that when a Bill is presented for consideration there should be a statement as to the purport of the Bill.

Mr. BOYCE. In the absence of the promoter of the Bill, who is one of the hon. gentleman's own supporters, I can give the hon. gentleman some information in regard to this Bill. The Bill provides for an extension of the time for the construction of certain lines. It went through the committee with certain amendments. This Bill occasioned some difficulty in the Railway Committee and necessitated further advertisement with regard to additional powers that were required. The additional advertisement passed the Standing Orders Committee and came back to the Railway Committee, and in order that all matters might receive special consideration it appeared to be necessary to relegate the Bill to a special committee for report. That special committee inserted paragraphs 8 (a), 8 (b), 8 (c), and 8 (d), after hearing the parties and giving due consideration to the situation. Many of the privileges that were asked were not allowed by the special committee, but the Bill comes to us after consideration by this special committee, and after the report of that special committee had been adopted by the Railway Committee.

Mr. OLIVER. I am aware that the hon. member (Mr. Boyce), is not responsible for the Bill, and it would be an occasion for the hon. Minister of Railways, or the chairman of the committee, to be present in order to attend to this feature of the case. If my hon. friend is acquainted with the purport of the Bill he might state shortly what the Bill proposes to do. He has given an account of the procedure whereby the Bill arrives at its present position, but he has not told us the purport of the Bill.

Mr. MACDONALD. I quite agree with my hon. friend on my right (Mr. Oliver), that the good practice which has always prevailed in the House of the Minister of Railways being here when Bills of this character are before the House, should obtain. As regards the Bill there is nothing in it which is contentious. It gives power to the Canadian Pacific railway to construct certain new lines in the west, all of which were supported by the people in the districts interested, and it also contains a provision of a special character enabling the company to deal with some situation that has arisen in Montreal in connection with the extension which they are making in that city, and as to which this special committee was appointed. The clause which came from that committee is the one which was adopted by the full committee.

Mr. BOYCE. Adopted in part.

Mr. MACDONALD. Yes. But the practice of the Minister of Railways and the Chairman of the Railway Committee being present when Bills of this kind are under consideration, is one that has always been followed in the past and should be followed now because the House is entitled to their presence in order that they may explain all these things.

Mr. BOYCE. I made the explanation that I have just given at the special request of the Chairman of the Railway Committee who is unable to be here to-night. I would again remind my hon. friend that it is one of his own supporters who has charge of this Bill.

Mr. MACDONALD. I am entirely in favour of, and in sympathy with, the Bill, but I do not blame my hon. friend on my right (Mr. Oliver), who was not at the Railway Committee and who, I think, is not a member of the committee, for asking that the Minister of Railways should be here when railway legislation is up. He has always been here in previous parliaments and why he is not here now no one can tell.

Mr. NESBITT. The Bill was thoroughly considered before the Railway Committee and as the promoter wants it put through, I would like to see it passed. I do not think there is any reason why it should not pass.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Goodeve). If it is satisfactory to the committee, I will read it clause by clause.

Mr. OLIVER. It is not necessary at all, but what I say is that, to the members of this House who are not members of the Railway Committee, or who were not present at the Railway Committee, it is the most ordinary courtesy that they should be informed as to the purport of a Bill before they agree to it. That is all I am asking for with regard to the present Bill.

Mr. STEVENS. There are a number of members of the Railway Committee present who are prepared to discuss the matter when the Bill is read.

Mr. HAZEN. There is no objection to it.

Mr. OLIVER. None whatever if it will be stated by somebody what it is intended to do. I think the House is entitled to that statement.

Mr. BOYCE. My hon. friend's contention seems to be a reasonable one, and I shall endeavour in the shortest manner possible, at the request of the Chairman of the Railway Committee, to give him the information. I may have given it very shortly and very inadequately, but I shall do the best I can, and if he wants a further explanation I will endeavour to give it.

Mr. OLIVER. My hon. friend gave an explanation showing the steps whereby the Bill arrived at the present position, but he did not give the purport of the Bill. That is what I was asking for. However, my hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) has given a statement of the purport of the Bill.

Mr. BOYCE. I think my hon. friend will find if he reads 'Hansard' to-morrow that I did mention the general purport of the Bill.

On section 8,

Mr. NESBITT. This Bill was referred to a subcommittee of the Railway Committee, and as this was a special clause for a special purpose concerning expropriations, the subcommittee sent word to all the proprietors of land interested and asked them to come before the committee and give evidence if they thought fit to do so. As they did not appear, the subcommittee reported that clause back to the committee.

Bill reported, read the third time, and passed.

CANADIAN NORTHERN RAILWAY COMPANY.

House in committee on Bill (No. 38), respecting the Canadian Northern Railway Company.—Mr. Staples.

On section 1,

Mr. BOYCE. This is a Bill authorizing an extension of time for the construction of certain branch lines of the Canadian Northern railway in the west. The Bill was fully discussed before the committee, and the local governments affected were communicated with. A good deal of time was spent upon the Bill, and the amendments that have been inserted by the committee were inserted after consultation and agreement with the provincial governments. The Bill also provides in other respects for the construction of other lines of railway which are mentioned in it.

On section 4,

Mr. OLIVER. Do I understand that the lines which this parliament is granting authority for, are identical with the lines which the provincial legislature has authorized?

Mr. BOYCE. I understand that that was the point on which all the discussion ensued in the Railway Committee; and in order to make it absolutely certain that that was the case, the provincial authorities were communicated with, and the insertion of these amendments is the result of that correspondence.

Bill reported, read the third time, and passed.

REVILLON FRERES TRADING COMPANY.

House in committee on Bill (No. 114), to incorporate Révillon Frères Trading Company.—Mr. Barker.

Mr. BARKER. Révillon Frères is a great French trading company, having very large interests in the wilds of northern Canada, where hunting has been carried on, for the purpose of fur trading. They have had a large establishment for years in Montreal, they nave another in Paris, France, and I believe they have a branch in the United States. They got a charter here some ten years ago through the office of the Secretary of State, and carried on business under the impression that they were a duly authorized corporation. Later they found it necessary to get an Act passed. But the banks through which they carried on their business in looking into the authority of the directors, discovered that in the original charter no provision had been made for first or subsequent directors, and that there was really no person to represent the company. Last session a Bill was introduced to incorporate Révillon Fères, it went before the committee of the House, and was then referred to a special committee to look into all the facts. The Bill was reported to the House and passed by the House. It then went to the Senate; but unfortunately, owing to the sudden termination of the session, it did not pass. So once again this company found itself without any legal authority. They introduced their Bill again this session, this time in the Senate. It has now passed the Senate practically as it passed this House last year, with the exception of a word or two of a merely formal character in section 5 and a new clause, section 11, which was introduced in the Senate committee to provide for the method by which this company shall have representation of the board in Paris as well as here. The section as introduced was accepted by the company, but the law clerks of the two Houses thought that the words now added to section 11 are more appropriate and more fitly express what was intended. With that exception, the Bill is as it was passed by this House last year. The story of the company is simply that years ago Révillon Frères, large furriers in Paris, obtained large properties in our north in carrying on their fur business, and as the game disappears, they propose to colonize and sell their properties to settlers. That is the whole object of the Bill. The company has four directors, of whom two live in Paris and two in Montreal, and the clause added by the Senate provides that the company may by by-law settle what are the particular functions of the section of the board in Paris and what are the particular functions of the section in Montreal, and where there should be representation of both sections.

Mr. McKENZIE. How does it come that a trading company of this kind has a Dominion charter?

Mr. BARKER. I understand that it occurred in this way. Révillon Frères were enterprising French furriers, and looking abroad, they concluded that the northern wilds of Canada would furnish them with a supply of furs, and they started a company. They are now a very wealthy concern, owning large districts, and they desire that these shall be held in the name of a company properly organized.

On section 11,

Mr. McKENZIE. I notice that this company have the power to make by-laws. Will those by-laws have the force of law, or have they to be sanctioned by the Governor in Council? My reason for asking the question is, that I understand the practice to be that by-laws made by companies or corporations require the sanction of the Governor in Council. That is the practice of the provincial legislature.

Mr. HAZEN. It is not the practice in all the provincial legislatures.

Mr. BARKER. The practice is not invariable. There are certain by-laws made expressly subject to the Governor in Council for a particular reason. I would not object in the least to putting such a provision in the Bill, but all this proposes to do is to divide the work of the board; that certain work must be done by the whole board, and certain other work may be divided between the Montreal section and the Paris section. This is a trading corporation that has been in existence for 10 or 12 years, and it is not desirable to put in any restrictions that are not absolutely necessary.

Mr. McKENZIE. It is not unusual to do this in the part of the country that I come from. In this case the company is a trading corporation, and any by-law they pass may be binding upon the people that deal with them and have the force of law. It is not right that the company, or their directors, should be able to make laws binding upon the world that deals with them on their own motion without any restriction whatever.

Mr. BARKER. These people have been trying for ten years to get incorporated and will agree to almost anything. At the same time, I may point out to the hon. gentleman, who is a lawyer himself and therefore knows the custom, that whenever a bank or business body wants to deal with this company they will inquire as to what their powers are under their by-laws. That is the ordinary routine in the case of all these legal questions. It is very undesirable, I should say, that a trading corporation like this should be hampered in any way.

Mr. McKENZIE. If it is not customary, I do not want to press any objection.

Mr. BARKER. It is certainly not customary in Ontario, except where a by-law may be for the purpose of altering the capitalization of the company. There is nothing of that kind in this Bill at all.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

CONTINENTAL CAN COMPANY.

House in committee on Bill (No. 119), respecting certain patents of the Continental Can Company.—Mr. Fripp.

Mr. NESBITT. This Bill renews a patent, and therefore I would like to have it explained.

Mr. FRIPP. The object of the Bill is to remove the patent from the operation of section 38 of the Patent Act to section 44, a very simple matter. Under section 38 of the Act a patent that is not manufactured continuously expires. Section 44 gives the patentee the opportunity to appear before the commissioner and revive the patent, or have a chance to hold it at all events. There is nothing unusual about the purpose of the Bill.

Mr. MACDONALD. My hon. friend is mistaken in the theory that this proposition is not an unusual one. It is a case in which a foreigner obtained a patent in this country and did not carry out the conditions of the patent. He did not begin to manufacture in Canada within the time limit. After he has failed to comply with these conditions, which are only reasonable, I fail to see any reason why we in Canada should give any special treatment to an outside patentee who does not observe the provisions of the law. It is not the usual practice by legislation to permit the patentee to come in and claim rights and privileges under another section of the law. In previous parliaments Bills of this kind have always been viewed with the greatest possible suspicion, and some evidence had to be presented that there had at least been some effort on the part of the patentee to comply with the provisions of the law before he received consideration. There have been cases where men had initiated arrangements that would ensure the manufacture of the article patented, but difficulties have intervened. This fact parliament has taken into consideration, and some leniency has been shown to the patentees and their rights have been preserved, but it is not such a matter-of-course proposition as the hon. member for Ottawa suggests. I think the case he has made out is no case at all. We ought to have more facts in regard to the Bill before we pass it.

Mr. FRIPP. My hon. friend is mistaken. The facts were all laid before the committee, all possible objections were considered and the committee decided to report the Bill without amendment.

Mr. MACDONALD. When the Bill was read a second time the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell) and I both refused to be bound by the report of the committee.

Mr. FRIPP. My instructions from the solicitor in charge of the Bill are that they have manufactured in Canada but have not manufactured continuously in Canada as the Act requires.

Mr. NESBITT. I am opposed to the renewing of patents unless some very good reason is given. We should certainly have some better explanation than the hon. member (Mr. Fripp) has given.

Mr. FRIPP. This is not a case of renewal. It seems that this patent was issued under section 26 of the Patent Act and the patentee desires to come under section 44 of the Patent Act where he thinks his patent should have come originally.

Mr. OLIVER. Then there must have been an error in the Patent Office and we should hear from the Minister of Agriculture. It is not desirable that a practice should be established that patentees who have forfeited their rights may come to this House for relief.

Mr. FRIPP. The statute expressly provides by section 44 for such a case as this, where an article has not been continuously manufactured. Then the Commissioners shall have an opportunity to hear both the patentee and any person desiring to use the patent under license, and after hearing both sides, he may decide whether the patent is forfeited or is to continue.

Mr. MACDONALD. But this man did not come within the time prescribed by the statute and now comes to parliament for a restoration of his rights.

Mr. FRIPP. No, I think not. But he does not want to have his patent declared null and void, he wants section 44 invoked in his favour.

Mr. McKENZIE. I do not understand what is wanted, we have had no clear explanation of what has happened. If the patentee has complied with the law there is nothing necessary now. I know the department are not in favour of this tinkering with the law. It is the policy of the department to make them comply with the statutes unless there is strong reason to the contrary.

Mr. BURRELL. The hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) thought they should have a statement from the Minister of Agriculture. The Minister of Agriculture, of course, does not profess to be an expert on patents. I frankly say that I do not know all the details of this Bill. But I point out to my hon. friends opposite that they are exercising, I think, a certain amount of virtuous indignation on patent Bills of this kind, and within my knowledge of this House it has been the practice to put through a larger number of these Bills when my hon. friends were in power than it is during the present session. I do not say that I am in favour of it, as hon. gentlemen opposite know perfectly well the stand of the department is generally against special Bills, and I think rightly. If there were too wide a gate left open it would mean that everybody would get careless about their patents, knowing they could come here and get a Bill shoved through without any bother. For that reason, I think the policy generally should be not to put through Bills of this kind without valid reason. I will say this, that it is a customary thing, after a reference of all these Bills to the Private Bills Committee, to have the Deputy Commissioner of Patents there, or one of the officials, who generally takes a stand against the Bill. It has also always been customary, when there are special reasons or special hardships involved in a particular case, to deal with it on its merits, and it is usual, I think, to get the judgment of that committee to say whether these reasons are sufficiently strong, and if that is the case, to waive the general procedure of the committee. I am not aware of any cases, certainly not any that I can recall, of a Bill of that kind passing the Private Bills Committee being turned down by the House. Unless it is pointed out to me that this is a particularly weak case, I do not know that it should be turned down. I would point out, however, that in nearly all these cases reported from the committee to the whole House, the report is almost always formal, and I think I only recall one instance during my experience of four sessions when the report of the committee on a Bill has been rejected or turned down, and there has been a report throwing it back on the committee again. I think the leader of the opposition, when he was the leader of the government, enunciated as a general principle that Bills which have passed a committee of this House, without some extraordinary reason, should be allowed to pass the House.

Mr. MACDONALD. But the committee has been reduced in the meantime.

Mr. BURRELL. Still, it appears to work fairly satisfactorily. The attendance at all of these committees is sometimes slim. But I think he will acknowledge that if there are strong objections they are generally put up in that committee before the Bill comes to the House. However, I have no strong feeling in the matter, and I am willing to let it stand if the committee desires it.

Mr. NESBITT. I am sure we are obliged to the minister for his explanation that because certain patents were renewed under the old government, that is reason why this patent should be renewed.

Mr BURRELL. I do not think that is a fair interpretation of my argument. I simply pointed out that it was a usual thing to accept the report of commissions. This is not a party question at all. I have stated my position on the general policy, and I do not think my hon. friend should just take that passing remark as the body of my argument.

Mr. AMES. We have already passed three Bills of this kind during the present session.

Mr. NESBITT. There was a Bill brought in the other day by the hon. member for St. Antoine (Mr. Ames) that was amended in committee. So the reference of the Standing Committee is not always taken by the House Committee. I do not suppose there would have been any trouble about this Bill had the hon. gentleman explained to us why he wanted to get it. I do not know myself why he should apply under section 44.

The hour for Private Bills having expired, House resumed in Committee of Supply.

SUPPLY.

MAINTENANCE AND REPAIRS TO GOVERNMENT STEAMERS AND ICE-BREAKERS.

Mr. McLEAN (Queens, P.E.I.). Before recess the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) made the broad statement that a car-ferry across the Straits of Northumberland was not feasible in the winter time. I do not know where he gets his information. I suppose, if he has been observing the ice in Pictou harbour or along the southern coast of Nova Scotia, he has come to the conclusion that a car-ferry would not be possible in that part of the Straits of Northumberland. But surely other people besides the hon. gentleman have been observing conditions there. For over thirty years the captains of the ice-boat at Cape Tormentine and Cape Travers, and the captains of the government ice-breaking steamers, have sent daily reports of the condition of the straits to Ottawa, and that information is to-day in the possession of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries.

If the hon. gentleman will take the trouble of going over to the Department of Marine and Fisheries he will find there a daily report of the conditions in the Straits of Northumberland from the year, I think, 1881, or previous to that. The conditions are not as he has stated them to this House. We have had, for many years, ice-breaking steamers. Those steamers have very fairly conducted the business between Prince Edward Island and Pictou, and between Charlottetown and Pictou. There have been this year very few stoppages. But, those steamers have not the power or the strength that we say they should have, and they do not constitute a fulfilment of the terms of confederation between Prince Edward Island and the Dominion that we should have continuous steam communication between the railway on Prince Edward Island and the railway on the mainland. My right hon. friend the leader of the government (Mr. Borden), speaking in Charlottetown on the 8th of September last, made the statement that if he were returned to power he would fulfil to the letter the terms which were entered into between the Dominion and the province in 1873. I will read for the information of the committee the language which was used by the right hon. gentleman on that occasion:

> And now, Mr. Chairman, Ladies and Gentlemen, I come to a question of vital importance to your prosperity. I refer to the transportation question. You can never fully enjoy the benefits of the market of Canada and the outside world under your present dislocated traffic arrangement. I believe the conditions at the present existing are not such as you anticipated when you gave up your status as an independent colony and became part of the Dominion. A solemn compact was then entered into, binding as well on the government of Canada as on you as a province, and the hardship is manifest that whilst the Dominion have exacted a strict performance on your part they have not in my judgment used reasonable diligence to obviate your insular disadvantages in this regard. I believed that instead of this subject being controlled by different departments it should be under the supervision of one department only, and your steam communication with the mainland should be arranged in conjunction with the island railway and the Intercolonial railway thus doing away with the exasperation of the three short hauls.

Now, the only way that this can be effected is by having a car-ferry or by the construction of a tunnel. We found when we came up here and were in conference with eminent engineers that it would take something like twelve years to construct the tunnel. We thought that was too long to wait, a third of a lifetime, and we asked the government to give, in fulfilment of this promise made by the right hon. Prime Minister, a car-ferry. The government immediately acceded to our request. I was in this House between 1904 and 1908, and on many occasions during that time I and my colleague (Mr. Martin), brought this question before the consideration of the House. The right hon. leader of the opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), had made a promise to the people of Prince Edward Island in 1891, that if he should be elected at the election which was then ensuing he would see that our transportation problem would be solved. Although he sat in this House from 1891 and was leader of the government for fifteen years, he never raised his voice to say anything for the people of Prince Edward Island. But, when my right hon. friend the leader of the government (Mr. Borden), came into power, although he had made this promise exactly in the same words, that the right hon. leader of the opposition had made it, he immediately fulfilled his promise, and the people of Prince Edward Island are getting the justice now that they ought to have got thirty years ago. It is only fair that this government should fulfil the promise made by the Prime Minister to the people of Prince Edward Island especially when they know now that it is a feasible matter provided the government give us a car-ferry of sufficient power. If we have a boat of 10,000 horse-power strongly enough constructed to force its way through the ice, our transportation problem will be solved whether the boat is run to Pictou or not. The question has been raised as to where this ferry will be run to. I have no doubt that my hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) would like to see it run to Pictou, because I suppose if it does not run there Pictou will be a dead issue in so far as anything material coming out of the traffic between that point and Prince Edward Island is concerned. To-day the business in Pictou practically all comes from Prince Edward Island, and if this car ferry is put in operation within the next two years possibly it may run between Charlottetown and Tatamagouche or between Cape Traverse and Cape Tormentine, and that is why the hon. member for Pictou denounces the government for giving the people of Prince Edward Island the justice they should have had years and years ago.

Mr. MACDONALD. I do not propose to continue this discussion very much longer at this stage because, while this matter is perfectly in order in regard to this item, it being to provide for the boat which is being constructed in connection with winter navigation, I shall discuss it at greater length when the estimates of the Minister of Railways come before the House. My only reason for introducing this matter at this stage was to ascertain from the Minister of Marine and Fisheries whether any of his officials, or anybody connected with his department, had ever made any report to the government previously to the government deciding upon a policy in this regard so as to find out whether or not the government had any information before them when they decided upon their policy. I have learned to-night that, in so far as the people who ought to know anything about this matter are concerned, the government had no report from them and, against the enthusiasm of the hon. member for Queens, P.E.I. (Mr. McLean) and those who say that my opinion about this matter is not worth anything, I might tell them that I have before me all the papers connected with it which have been brought down, and I may say that I cannot find from any engineer, or any public official, responsible or otherwise, in any department of the government, any report that would justify the theory that a car-ferry can be operated in the Straits of Northumberland in the winter-time. Indeed, in the discussion that went on before six o'clock, I felt that perhaps I was unfair to the minister in discussing the question at this stage, and I went and looked through all the papers carefully to see whether it was really proposed that the car-ferry should be operated in the winter-time. If the proposition involved simply the operating of a car-ferry during certain months of the summer that was one thing, but if the government, in asking this vote for winter steamers, intended to substitute other means of communication during a part of the year, that was another matter. I took the responsibility of saying before dinner that the proposition to operate a car ferry during the winter-time would result in absolute failure. I am supported in that view by the only official of any department of the government that ever looked at the question and took the responsibility of making any report upon it. I have in my hand this letter from the former Deputy Minister of Railways, Mr. M. J. Butler, who writes on the subject as follows:—

Your letter of the 16th instant addressed to the hon. the minister, re proposition to put on a modern and powerful icebreaker and car carrying system steamer, across the strait of Northumberland, has been referred by him to me for reply.

I am of the opinion that no such steamer can be designed, at any reasonable cost, to do the service during the winter months, nor do I think it possible to make such a project pay its way.

That is the only opinion of any official in regard to this matter that is before the government, and when the Prime Minister wired my hon. friend (Mr. McLean, Queens, P.E.I.) on the eve of a provincial election, that they proposed to inaugurate this car-ferry scheme, the Prime Minister wired without any report from anybody who knew anything on the subject which enabled him to justify any such policy. We have here a report from Mr. Bowden, chief engineer, who tells us that he had not time to look into the matter. When we look into the statements of my hon. friend we find that his estimates are based upon the assumption that one ferry steamer will be sufficient for the purpose. The hon. gentleman has given up the tunnel, he has given up the winter steamer proposed to be built in addition to the 'Earl Grey' and 'Minto,' which would give the people of Prince Edward a complete winter service, and he is willing to have one ferry steamer as an experiment—and which he will be bound to admit is an experiment of the first order—when he has not a single person on record in this government or in the departments of the government to say whether this scheme will be in any degree adequate. I should apologize to the Minister for going into this discussion on his estimates when this question is perhaps more germane to the Railway Department which is supposed to deal with it.

Will the minister be good enough to get me a statement of the number of passengers carried by the winter boats during the season of 1910-11?

Mr. HAZEN. Does the hon. member mean the boats that run to Pictou, or does he include the passengers on the ice-boats?

Mr. MACDONALD. I would like to have the total number of passengers that crossed at both places; the quantity of freight that was carried in the winter months and the cost per ton for carrying that freight. Will the minister be also good enough to get me the same information for the months of January and February of this year?

Mr. HAZEN. I shall be glad to get the information for my hon. friend. Meantime I would call the attention of my hon. friend to the following which is to be found on page 19 of the last report of the Marine Department:

The Earl Grey made 44 round trips, carried 118,532 packages of freight, weighing 5,791 tons.

Her earnings were:—
Receipts from freight..		$ 8,497 38
" passengers		3,571 75
" berths, 977..		977 00
" meals, 1,404..		140 40
Total earnings..		$13,186 53

The Minto made three round trips, carried 77,196 packages of freight weighing 1,994 tons.

Her earnings were:—
Receipts from freight..	$ 2,575 82
" passengers..	1,809 25
" meals, 714..	71 40
" berths..	423 00
Total earnings..	$ 4,879 47

Mr. MACDONALD. I would like to know the cost per ton of loading and unloading that freight at Georgetown and Pictou last year and this year?

Mr. HAZEN. I will get that information. I do not feel that my hon. friend (Mr. Macdonald) has anything to apologize for in bringing this matter up, because it is an important question, and it has to be discussed some time during the session. But, I fear my hon. friend forgets that the people of Prince Edward Island not only want to get better communications during the winter, but they also have the very vital grievance that in shipping their products from the island at all times of year there are practically three different hauls: the haul over the island railway to the steamer, the steamer carriage to Pictou or Cape Tormentine or Shediac as the case may be, the haul on the Intercolonial railway through to destination and the loading and unloading at each transfer. That is a substantial grievance which the people of the island want to have remedied. It would be of enormous advantage to them if a train ferry were established so that they could put their freight and products on the car on the island and not have to break bulk until that car reaches its destination in Canada or in the United States. Such a system would of course enable them to have cars equipped with cold storage compartments so that their perishable products would be carried in good condition direct to the consuming markets. That is one great advantage which will be accomplished by the car-ferry. My hon. friend (Mr. Macdonald) says that the government acted in this matter without information, but I do not think it is open to the hon. member to say that. It is true the papers before the House are rather meagre in the information they contain, but there are reports in the Department of Marine and Fisheries showing day by day the condition for the last 30 years so far as navigation between Prince Edward Island and the mainland is concerned. I think my hon. friend (Mr. Macdonald) may fairly give the government credit for having some knowledge of these reports and he might also bear in mind that there are men around the Council Board who live close to the island and who have been for years interested in this very important question. Ice-breakers are not a new thing; every year there is more work done by them; they are making progress on the St. Lawrence river, where navigation is open earlier now than in the past owing to their operations between Montreal and Quebec. My hon. friend may be easily within the range of probability when he says that if an ice-breaker is constructed as a steam ferry, with proper power and proper weight, then during the greater part of the winter season that ferry can give continuous communication between the island and the mainland.

Mr. MACDONALD. What would you do when she cannot cross?

Mr. HAZEN. There may be times when she cannot cross, but of late years there are fewer occasions when the steamers cannot ply between the island and the mainland than there were formerly.

Mr. MACDONALD. Quite so.

Mr. HAZEN. The great trouble is that in having to break bulk three times the Prince Edward Island farmer shipping his products to the consuming markets is put at a great disadvantage compared with the farmer on the mainland, and that disadvantage not only extends to the time consumed in transit but to the cost of carrying the freight as well. The three different services now required to ship products from the island to the markets on the mainland mean of course higher freight rates than if there was a continuous haul as there will be when the car-ferry is established. I will have the information, perhaps on Monday, which my hon. friend has asked for.

Mr. HUGHES (Kings, P. E. I.). In the event of a car-ferry being established, is it the intention of the government to charge the same rates to and from Prince Edward Island as are charged now for similar distances on the mainland? I would gather so from the statement of the minister.

Mr. HAZEN. The matter has not been discussed. I am not familiar with the details but it seems to me that if a car-ferry is established the result must be to lessen all the freight rates.

Mr. HUGHES (Kings, Prince Edward Island). I presume that the reports which the department has with regard to the conditions of the ice in the Straits of Northumberland year after year have been prepared for the purpose of showing the practicability of a car-ferry, or are they just the ordinary reports on the ice conditions?

Mr. HAZEN. The reports were made, I suppose, before a car-ferry had been thought of; but they are reports for the purpose of giving the actual conditions of the water and the ice in the Straits from day to day; and with these reports one could form a fair idea of whether the conditions would be suitable for the operations of a car-ferry or not.

Mr. HUGHES (Kings, Prince Edward Island). Would these reports not have to be compared with the reports on other places where car-ferries are operated?

Mr. HAZEN. I have no doubt that is what the engineer would do.

Mr. HUGHES (Kings, Prince Edward Island). Can the minister tell me where the 'Minto' was, say between the 20th and the 30th of September last?

Mr. HAZEN. I have no doubt that could be told at once by reference to the files of the department. The deputy minister thinks it was at Halifax.

Mr. HUGHES (Kings, Prince Edward Island). My information is that she was in Hudson bay. The reason I ask is that I am informed that two of the men who were on board the steamer while she was there were removed from the service before the winter service commenced. I am informed that these men went on board the 'Minto' in the summer season when it is difficult to get men. One was the chief steward, named Noah Garnum, and the other the boatswain, Benjamin Graham.

Mr. HAZEN. The deputy minister informs me that the crew were engaged for the voyage to Hudson bay and back, and that after the voyage for which they were engaged ended, they were paid off. It was in October that they came back.

Mr. HUGHES (Kings, Prince Edward Island). Some years ago it was the rule that the men who went into the service at a season of the year when it was hard to get men, got the preference when the season arrived when it was easy to get men, and I think that would be fair, if their qualifications were satisfactory. These men could not by any possibility be charged with having taken any part in the elections, because at the time of the elections they were in Hudson bay. Therefore, it would seem to me to be a hardship to dispense with their services, or at least not to re-engage them.

Mr. HAZEN. Do they want to be re-engaged?

Mr. HUGHES (Kings, Prince Edward Island). That is my information. Men who are willing to go into the service in the summer season, when work is plentiful, are anxious to remain in the winter service, when work is hard to obtain. The minister will agree with me that it was a real hardship to these men to be used in that way. I do not happen to be personally acquainted with them, and consequently I imagine that they were not very active in politics. They were appointed just because they were good men and because others could not be obtained at the time.

Mr. HAZEN. I have personally no knowledge of the facts to which my hon. friend refers, but I am informed by the officials of my department that that there never has been the slightest difficulty in getting men either in the summer or the winter for service on these boats, and there has never been an understanding such as my hon. friend has described. The men were employed for a certain voyage to Hudson bay. When the contract was fulfilled and they returned home, they were paid off. There was no obligation on the department to hire the same men again. Whether the two men wanted to be engaged again or not I have no knowledge; but in any case there was no breach of contract or any fair ground of complaint even if they were not hired the second time.

Mr. HUGHES (Kings, Prince Edward Island). The officials of the department are not correct when they say that in no case has there been difficulty to get men in the summer season. To my personal knowledge there has been difficulty.

Mr. HAZEN. The Deputy Minister says that in his experience there has not been any difficulty, and I must naturally accept the statement of the official of the department.

Mr. HUGHES (Kings, Prince Edward Island). That may be, but the information is not correct. It has been difficult in past years to get men in the summer season, and it has been the practice to give the men who have been on the boats in the summer season the preference in the winter. I have personal knowledge of that. The practice followed in engaging men for the winter season has been for the members supporting the administration to meet the captains of the boats and the agent of the department in the agent's office at Charlottetown.

Mr HUGHES (Kings, P.E.I.)

Mr. HAZEN. That has been the practice, has it?

Mr. HUGHES (Kings, Prince Edward Island). Yes, and it is not a bad practice, and it would have been far better if that practice had been followed last winter. I do not think that the captains were consulted in the matter, and I have an idea that the agent was not very much consulted, either. But I say unhesitatingly that formerly the men who went into the service in the summer season, when it was difficult to get men, received the preference if they wished to remain in the service, and further, those men who were considered efficient and valuable by the captains were allowed to remain if they wished to do so. The practice was to consult the captains and the agent, but particularly the former, and it was not a bad practice, by any means. I do not think a good practice was followed when the winter crews were hired last fall.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax). Does the department propose to proceed with the construction of a lightship to be placed off the mouth of Halifax harbour as had been decided upon, I think, by his predecessor in office?

Mr. HAZEN. That has been recommended by the Lighthouse Board. Last year the lightship was brought from Anticosti and was anchored off Halifax harbour, and I believe there the results were good. But the opinion of the Lighthouse Board, which as my hon. friend knows is an advisory board concerning lighthhouses and aids to navigation, is, that it is running too much risk probably to depend upon the one lightship for both places, that if any disaster occurred to the lightship when it was at Halifax it would not be available for service at Anticosti the following year, and immediate steps will be taken for the construction of a lightship to be stationed off Halifax harbour.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax). And tenders will be asked for, I suppose?

Mr. HAZEN. Yes, there will be public competition.

Mr. McKENZIE The speech of the hon. member for Queens, P.E.I., renders it necessary to make a few observations in reply. I am sorry that the hon. gentleman, who is usually good-natured and affable, thought it necessary to drag in party politics in connection with the matter of an improved service between Prince Edward Island and the mainland.

Mr. HAZEN. Surely, I did not indulge in party politics.

Mr. McKENZIE. I referred to the hon. member for Queens, P.E.I., not to the minister. The minister is breaking away from his usual custom, he is free from party politics to-night, and I congratulate him upon it. It was not, I think, in the very best taste for the hon. member (Mr. McLean, Queen's, P.E.I.) to associate with this question the strongest terms that could be employed in connection with party politics. I think he can rest satisfied that from Scatarie to Amherst, in fact throughout the whole province of Nova Scotia, he will find the greatest possible sympathy for Prince Edward Island, and the greatest possible desire to give that province the very best accommodation that is available. But the hon. gentleman has made the statement that the leader of the opposition, although he had been 15 years in power, had never raised his little finger to improve the conditions in regard to the ferry service or the connection between Prince Edward Island and the mainland.

That leads me from a party standpoint to ask the minister to give a statement of the improvements that were made in the transportation service between Pictou and Charlottetown, and generally between the mainland and the Island, by the construction of boats, etc., during the régime of the late administration. It may be a little cumbersome and involve the giving of figures that would not be necessary, but the statement of he hon. member for Queens is of such a sweeping character and such an indictment against the late government, that it is only fair to the Liberal party that we should have some knowledge of what was done by the late government to improve the communication between Prince Edward Island and the mainland by means of new and powerful steamers.

Mr. McLEAN (Queens, P.E.I.). The statement which I made was that under the terms of confederation it was agreed that our system should be connected with the railway system of the main line, and that although Sir Wilfrid Laurier had promised the people of Prince Edward Island in 1891 that if he were returned to power he would fulfil the terms of confederation in that regard, he never raised his finger to remedy the conditions although he was in office for fifteen years subsequently.

Mr. McKENZIE. That is exactly what I said.

Mr. McLEAN (Queens, P.E.I.). I was not talking about the steamers at all, I was talking about a car-ferry by means of which the two railway systems could be connected. Of course we have had steamers on that route. We have got powerful steamers there now, but as they are not powerful enough to perform the work properly, the government are giving us one that will be powerful enough, and thus fulfil in my judgment the terms of the compact between us and the Dominion.

Mr. McKENZIE. The hon. gentleman and myself are not strangers to each other in this parliament. I remember well the first speech my hon. friend made in this parliament in 1904, and it was on the subject of the tunnel. That was his particular hobby, and he would have scouted at that time any such thing as a car-ferry. It is a new toy that he has secured this year and one that is absolutely brand-new.

Mr. McLEAN (Queens, P.E.I.). Are you in favour of the car-ferry service?

Mr. McKENZIE. We never heard of the car-ferry at that time, but now from the delight which the hon. gentleman manifests, it is quite evident that he has a new toy. Perhaps he will find that like most rubber toys its usefulness will disappear by and by, and it will not be as satisfactory a year from now as he deems it to be to-day. But the hon. gentleman made the emphatic statement that we did not improve the conditions in the matter of communication between the island and the mainland during the fifteen years that the Liberal government were in power. He has repeated the statement, and that is the reason why I think it is only fair to the late government, that we should have some knowledge of what was done for the betterment of the communication between Prince Edward Island and the mainland.

Mr. HUGHES (Kings, P.E.I.). I also want to make a few remarks that have been called for by the observations of the hon. member for Queens, P.E.I. The fact of the matter is that the car-ferry was first mooted, so far as I remember and so far as the papers show, by a gentleman named George E. Full, who came here on a delegation, I think in 1906 or 1907, and strongly advocated that project. The hon. member for Queens, P.E.I., was a member of the House at that time, and I am satisfied that the proposition was not treated seriously then by the great majority of the people of Prince Edward Island, and a great majority of the people interested in the subject; it was treated rather as a ridiculous proposition. I am inclined to think my hon. friend from Queens, P.E.I., likewise took that view of it at that time, because being a member of the House he would be alive to the importance of bringing forward any proposition of an advantageous character to the province and to the people whom he represented, and it would be his duty to do so. I am quite sure he would do his duty in that respect, and the fact that he did not bring the matter up tends to convince me that neither he nor anybody else thought this car-ferry service would be practicable between Prince Edward Island and the mainland. I hope that it will be practicable, and that it will be found to be of great advantage; and to a certain extent I am quite willing to give the government a good deal of credit for taking up any proposition that would remove the difficulties under which Prince Edward Island has laboured so long in regard to transportation. But I do not know that this car-ferry service will be a solution of the difficulty, in fact I may frankly state that I am afraid it will not. I hope that it will, but the conditions under which the project was taken up and the haste with which it was announced last fall tend to arouse suspicion.

Mr. HAZEN. Do you not think there has been delay enough?

Mr. HUGHES (Kings, P.E.I.) There was no great advantage, so far as the car-ferry was concerned, in taking the project up at that time. But there was a purpose which the car-ferry idea has served. It has largely contributed towards the election of a Conservative administration in the province of Prince Edward Island.

It has had that effect already. Whether it will have the effect of solving the transportation difficulties I am not sure. However, I shall give the government credit so far as it has gone of being willing to try it and to spend some money, but to say that the late government did not seriously and effectually contribute towards the improvement of the transportation service between the island and the mainland, is ridiculous. If my hon. friend from Queens (Mr. McLean) feels like condemning the late government for not taking up the car-ferry project he himself should bear part of the condemnation because the project was first brought forward by Mr. Full while my hon. friend was a member of the House, and if in the end this scheme becomes a success a large part of the credit should be given to that gentleman who first proposed it.

Mr. CARROLL. I do not know if information was given as to whether or not the government has had technical advice of experts as to the feasibility of this scheme. In answer to questions the other day the Minister of Railways made the astounding statement that this car ferry service was to be in operation in a couple of months.

Mr. COCHRANE. I never said anything of the kind.

Mr. CARROLL. To make sure of it I looked up 'Hansard' and found it there. I understood from the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) that an eminent expert Mr. Butler has said that this plan is not feasible, and it strikes one as surprising that the government expect to have this car-ferry service in operation so soon without having technical knowledge and advice as to its feasibility.

Mr. HAZEN. There is no question about the feasibility of a car-ferry as they are in successful operation in other places. The only question is as to what portion of the year you will be able to operate it and as to the proper place to make the connection between the mainland and the island. The matter is now being thoroughly inquired into by the officials of the Department of Railways and Canals, who are also acquiring information as to the style of boat required to overcome if possible the ice conditions in the straits in winter.

Mr. EMMERSON. This subject, which is not a new one, has claimed considerable attention at my hands and, early in December, I gave notice of a motion to the effect that in the judgment of the House it was desirable to establish a car service between the mainland and the island and at the same time to widen the gauge of the Prince Edward Island railway. I was unable to reach a discussion of that motion owing to delay in bringing down certain information for which I had moved. That information has since come down, but it was then too late to reach the motion on the paper and so I withdrew it in order that the matter might be discussed on some other occasion.

In 1905 a Bill was passed by this House having for its object the connection of the Prince Edward Island railway with the Intercolonial railway and the establishment of a car-ferry service between Tormentine and Carleton Head. That Bill, however, was killed in the Senate. The fact that a car-ferry service of this kind has not been established is largely attributable to the people of Prince Edward Island themselves. The Bill to which I have referred was strongly opposed by certain members from the island in this House and in the Senate it was killed largely through the influence of Prince Edward Island senators. The reasons are obvious. We must recognize the fact that there are sectional differences and jealousies on the island as in other provinces and Charlottetown and Summerside have vied with each other in an effort to secure every possible advantage in the way of communication with the mainland and because of the influences and prejudices of the eastern and western sections of the island against any means of communication being established in the centre of the island, as between Carleton Head and the mainland at Tormentine, the scheme fell through. I had a strong view with respect to the matter at the time that the government should acquire the railway which runs from Sackville to Cape Tormentine, known as the New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island railway, and should establish a car ferry service such as has been established at other points on this continent, and such as is now in operation on a smaller scale at the Strait of Canso, on the Intercolonial railway.

I think that eventually the government should acquire that road, and that they should establish a car-ferry service and operate it as part of the government system of railways. I believe that is the only solution of the difficulty. For many years the representatives of Prince Edward Island in this parliament have talked of a tunnel, they have brought it before the House time and again, but no one seemed to take them seriously, in fact sometimes it was thought they were not serious themselves; not that the proposition is not feasible from an engineering standpoint, but that the undertaking was too large to be considered seriously at the present time in our history. In June last I was in Prince Edward Island in connection with an election campaign, in a way, and I discussed with the people the matter of a car-ferry service. I strongly advocated it then, and I advocate it now. I think it is perfectly feasible, and that it will be a success if established. It may interfere with the constituency of my hon. friend from Pictou, it may interfere with some interests in my constituency; but what are these interests as compared with the greater interest of improved transportation facilities between Prince Edward Island and the rest of the Dominion?

My hon. friend says there are suspicious circumstances in the haste with which this matter has been taken up. This parliament met in November, but there was no mention of it in the speech from the Throne, although the leader of the government had discussed it in Prince Edward Island in September. There was no mention of it by representatives from the Island after the opening of parliament. It was brought to the notice of parliament on the 7th of December, when I took occasion to give a notice of motion with respect to it. I notice in a return which was laid upon the table of the House, that there was a communication addressed on the 22nd of November to the right hon. the Prime Minister, which was signed by the two representatives from Queens, P.E.I. The matter apparently did not claim much further consideration until the 23rd of December, on the eve of a local election in Prince Edward Island. On the 28th of December the Prime Minister and the Minister of Railways appear to have taken certain steps in the way of sending telegrams and writing letters to Prince Edward Island. The elections were held in the early days of January, I think these telegrams reached Prince Edward Island two days before the polling. Well, of course people are suspicious; sometimes those who are hit are supersensitive with respect to letters and telegrams on occasions of this kind. These letters and telegrams may not have been written with any idea of influencing the provincial elections, it may have been a mere coincidence that they were sent down to the Island at that particular moment. Of course, I do not mean to insinuate that there was any connection between the telegrams and the election, I am only mentioning the facts. It is no doubt unfair to impugn the motives of ministers of the Crown in such matters.

Now some reference has been made to the lack of estimates. I do not think the government at that time did have any estimates with respect to the matter, and I am bound to say that we could hardly expect them to have. I do not think they should be condemned because they did not have such estimates, although it might be a fair matter of comment that they should have made such positive declarations as to what should be done before they had any estimates of the probable cost. I favour the proposition, and I will support it. It is not only in the interest of Prince Edward Island and of the Prince Edward Island railway, but it is in the interest of the Intercolonial and of all Canada. The people of the maritime provinces as a whole are peculiarly interested in it, and the people of Quebec, Ontario and of the distant west are to a large degree interested in the proper solution of this question. In July last I told the people of Prince Edward Island that a tunnel might be feasible. In years to come conditions may prevail in Canada which will make the construction of a tunnel possible. But in the meantime what should be done? Try at least this experiment. I think it will be successful during the major portion of the year, even during the winter months. Between the nearest points, Cape Tormentine and Carleton Head, a distance of between six and seven miles, I am told by those who are familiar with the navigation of the straits, that during the winter months, once during every twenty-four hours in the day-time, there is practically a clear channel between those two points. It is caused by the tide bringing the ice together, and when the tide recedes one portion of the ice goes out on the eastern end of the island, and the other goes to the western end, the ice separates, leaving a channel. I am told this by people who have no object in misrepresenting the circumstances. I have not seen it myself, but the people in that section of New Brunswick who are familiar with the conditions prevailing there say that is the case.

There is a short period in which there is open and continuous communication between these two points. During the greater portion of the year you could have communication between the island and the mainland without extra cost six or seven times during the day. It would be possible to convey trains across. It could have been done last year at these points. It would obviate the three freight charges, it would place the people of Prince Edward Island on a parity with the people of Cape Breton in respect to transportation charges, there would be no break and there would be the continuous mileage haul from the point of embarkation to the point of destination. Under these circumstances I think it is commendable for the government to undertake this. I may say that in the past I have called the attention of the preceding government to this very matter. I have invited their consideration to it, and I invited their consideration to the subject not later than last July. Regardless of which government is in power, regardless of party affiliations, I believe that the representatives in this House whether they be from the east or from the west, should join hands in aiding to give the best possible communication between Prince Edward Island and the mainland. Perhaps the discussion of this matter is not relative to this particular item, other than that as references are made to winter communication between the island and the mainland, it may be relevant. But this is a subject that might more properly be discussed when the Minister of Railways has his estimates under consideration. It belongs to the government system of railways, and it is a part and parcel of the branch line proposition which has been before this House for many years. The branch line proposition could not be effectively carried out without the establishment of a steam-ferry service at these points—I do not say at these particular points because I am not sectional in regard to the matter. It has been said that a very good route might be established between the western end of Prince Edward Island and Richibucto, or some point in the county of Kent. Let it be determined wherever the best route is to be found, there place your ferry, there establish it in the interest, not of any particular locality, not of any particular province or county, but in the interest of the whole Dominion and bring the people of Prince Edward Island into touch with their fellow countrymen throughout the rest of Canada.

Mr. McKENZIE. I cannot allow this item to carry until I have had an opportunity of bringing to the notice of the minister what I regard as a matter of very great importance to the section of the country from which I come. This particular item gives me a legitimate opportunity of bringing up matters that I regard as important to the harbour of North Sydney and Sydney, and if I allowed it to pass without doing so I might not have the opportunity again. We all take more or less pride in the places from which we come and dwell with delight upon their advantages and beauties. I am sure that any person who has the good fortune of living on the shores of the harbour of Sydney or North Sydney, or, as my hon. friend says, the Bras d'Or lakes, can have nothing but pride in the great beauty and commercial advantages of these harbours. Without saying anything against any other harbour in the world, I do not think that Sydney harbour, particularly the harbour of North Sydney, is second to any. That is a big thing to say, but I think it is true. A harbour in Australia, Halifax harbour, and Sydney harbour are regarded as the three finest harbours in the world with the preference given to North Sydney and Sydney. There are a few things that should be done for the harbour of Sydney and North Sydney. When I tell the minister that there is in the neighbourhood of 2,000,000 or 3,000,000 of tonnage coming into that harbour every summer he will get some idea of the shipping that is frequenting it, and when I tell him that never a dollar in the world has been spent for the betterment of that harbour he will understand that we are not coming too often or asking too much. It is true that a few dollars may have been expended in building wharfs and breakwaters. While upon general harbour improvements millions are being spent in other parts of Canada, there never has been a dollar spent on this magnificent harbour of Sydney and North Sydney. The outgoing of iron and steel, the incoming of iron ore, and the shipping of 6,000,000 or 7,000,000 tons of coal out of this harbour every year will give the minister some idea of its importance. I take this opportunity of bringing to his notice this magnificent harbour and the splendid facilities which it offers for transportation. We hear a great deal about St. John. It seems to me that the Minister must have heard of the harbour of St. John, he has heard of Courtenay Bay, and he has heard of some $7,000,000, or $10,000,000, or $15,000,000 being spent in the woods at Courtenay Bay in order to make a harbour which when completed will be nothing like as magnificent a harbour as that at North Sydney. I am surprised when we are talking about the great points of transportation in this country where elevators are to be built, where millions of dollars are to be expended in the betterment of transportation for the future millions who are to inhabit this country, that we do not hear very much about the great harbour of Sydney and North Sydney. This little item that is now before this committee gives me an opportunity of presenting to the minister some of the advantages of this point which is the nearest point in Canada to the old country and which is a matter of great importance.

Mr. HAZEN. I would like to call my hon. friend's attention to the fact that this item is for the maintenance of steamers and icebreakers, and it is not for money to be spent on harbours.

Mr. McKENZIE. I am not at all losing sight of that, and we have the ruling of the Chair that when a man is coming to the point he is always permitted to take his own road.

Mr. HAZEN. Do not be too long.

Mr. McKENZIE. I will come to the point clean and straight, and the minister will be surprised that I have managed to get to it so quickly.

I shall read a statement made in this House the other night by the Minister of Trade and Commerce which shows the importance of the traffic carried, on the service between North Sydney and Newfoundland. The minister said:

> There is a continual growth in this trade. Last year there were carried 6,765 first-class passengers 11,178 second-class passengers, 15,538 tons of freight, 1,635 head of stock, with a very large quantity of mail, and if you take the trade for the previous three years, you will find there is a gratifying increase.

The steamer plying on this route usually makes her trips between Port aux Basques and North Sydney without interruption, but in a particularly severe season she meets with difficulty and it would be a great advantage for us to have an icebreaker at that port. I understand the minister has an ice-breaker that he sends on missions—I might say on useful missions—throughout the country. I saw her tracks in Sydney harbour last year, just enough to show us what she could do if she kept at the work. She came to Sydney harbour and without any difficulty made tracks in the ice but she went away and has never come back.

Mr. HAZEN. When was that?

Mr. McKENZIE. Last winter. I do not know what she came there for except it was to give an exhibition of her power, and then she fled and we never have seen her since. If the 'Stanley' were sent there in February and March, I believe she could do excellent service in keeping the channel open for this line of steamers between North Sydney and Newfoundland. Now, the service is three trips a week, but after the first of May there will be a daily boat and with this daily service established, we hope to make connection with the mail boats so that the maritime province mails can be caught up by the 'Bruce' from the steamers coming up the St. Lawrence and landed at North Sydney by which means the million people in the maritime provinces would get their mail much quicker than by the Rimouski route. I believe that at little expense the government could send us an icebreaker which would clear the entrance at North Sydney harbour and this I believe would be beneficial, not only to North Sydney, but to the Intercolonial railway and the country generally.

Mr. CARROLL. I endorse what my hon. friend (Mr. McKenzie) has said in reference to the necessity for having an icebreaker at certain times of the year in the harbour of North Sydney and Sydney, which after all is the one harbour. The hon. gentleman (Mr. McKenzie) has not exaggerated the importance of this matter. Unfortunately in some years, in January and February the harbour is frozen over, and I am sure it would not take a large expenditure to have an icebreaker there for a couple of months. This year the harbour froze over a good deal earlier than usual. I think it only justice to the county I represent that I should supplement what has been said by the hon. member for North Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie. When we are spending millions of dollars in making ports all over the country which are not natural harbours at all, I do not think it is too much to ask the government to assist in this small way the splendid natural harbour of Sydney so as to make it available for shipping at all times during the winter months. I trust that the minister will make inquiry as to the cost of keeping an ice-breaker there during a certain portion of the winter, and I am sure if he puts an ice-breaker there he will do good work not only for the port of Sydney but for the shipping interests of the Dominion generally.

Mr. HAZEN. I fear I will have to make a confession, which I regard as somewhat humiliating: that I never have had the great pleasure of visiting Sydney. But, after the description given of its beauties and potentialities by my hon. friend (Mr. McKenzie), I shall not delay that visit longer than I possibly can help. I may say, however, that although I have not visited Sydney I possibly have as good an idea of it as my hon. friend (Mr. McKenzie) seems to have of Courtney Bay which he speaks of as being situated in the woods. I would invite my hon. friend

(Mr. McKenzie) to drop off at St. John some time, and I would like to take him around to have a look at Courtenay Bay, and then I am sure he will come back next session and be ready to withdraw the disparaging things he said about it.

Mr. McKENZIE. I think it would be hopeless for me to find it without the guidance of my hon. friend the minister.

Mr. HAZEN. There are none so blind as those who will not see, but I am sure that with the beautifully clear air and exhilarating atmosphere of St. John my hon. friend (Mr. McKenzie) will be able to see further than when his vision is bounded by the four walls of this chamber. I may say that this year we sent the 'Stanley' to Sydney harbour at the request of some shipping interests with a view of opening the channel so that vessels could get out, and that experiment was very successful. Only last week we sent an ice-breaker there again for the purpose of making a channel up to the pier of the Dominion Coal Company, and as a result of our laudable efforts to assist the port of Sydney, the 'Stanley' is now firmly bound in the ice off Sydney harbour, and I am afraid it will be some days before we can get her released. The question of ice-breaking is every year becoming more and more important, and people are beginning to realize that it has the effect of helping shipping and trade. I shall be very glad to give my attention to the representations made by my hon. friends and to accede to them so far as it is possible for the department to do so with the steamers and plant now at its command.

Mr. MACDONALD. In connection with the vote for masters and mates, may I ask if Mr. Adams has resigned?

Mr. HAZEN. Very much to the regret of everybody in the department Mr. Adams feels the work is becoming too onerous for him, and he has applied for superannuation.

Mr. MACDONALD. Has any appointment been made?

Mr. HAZEN. No appointment has been made. His retirement is a matter of regret to every one in the department, where he has had a very long and honourable career.

Mr. McKENZIE. Are there any local examiners for masters and mates?

Mr. HAZEN. Yes, this includes the vote for local examiners.

Mr. McKENZIE. Is there a local examiner in the county of Great Breton?

Mr. HAZEN. Yes, James Sutherland of North Sydney is a local examiner.

Mr. HAZEN.

Rewards saving life, including life-saving stations, $96,000.

Mr. EMMERSON. I would like to ask my hon. friend if he has considered the question of establishing a life-saving station at Cape Jourmain in Westmorland county?

Mr. HAZEN. That is being considered now by the officials of the department, and reports are being prepared upon it.

Mr. CHISHOLM (Inverness). I would like to have some information in regard to the station at Cheticamp.

Mr. HAZEN. That station is under construction at the present time.

Mr. McKENZIE. It was decided last year to build a life-saving station at Cranberry Head. What position is that in now?

Mr. HAZEN. There is included in the present vote an appropriation of $2,500 for that work. It is situated at the mouth of North Sydney harbour.

Mr. LAW. Is it the intention of the department to establish a life-saving station at Mud Island in Yarmouth county?

Mr. HAZEN. I do not think so; but a life-saving station is being established on the south shore of Nova Scotia not far from Digby. This year, I may say, in consequence of representations made to me by the hon. member for Digby, I ordered the 'Stanley' to proceed to Digby and to remain there, as I was told that on several occasions fishermen had got into trouble, and the 'Stanley' had to be sent for from St. John for life-saving service. Therefore, it was thought advisable to have her stationed at Digby for that purpose. We are establishing a life-saving station, with a lifeboat, at Bay View, east of Digby.

Mr. LAW. I never heard of it. It cannot be south of Briar Island. It must be further up the bay.

Mr. HAZEN. Yes, it is further up the bay.

Mr. LAW. That would be no use for the southern coast of Nova Scotia. Mud Island is situated at the mouth of the Bay of Fundy, where all the boats going up and down the bay have to pass, and there have been many shipwrecks at that point, and I would like to see a life-saving station there.

Mr. HAZEN. There is one at Baker's Cove now. But I will consider what my hon. friend says. The appropriation for the station near Digby was voted in the estimates of the present year, but the money was not spent when I came into office, and I have given instructions to have the work proceeded with at once.

Mr. HUGHES (Kings, P.E.I.). Has the department information with regard to the utility of what is known as the rocket apparatus? It costs much less than life-saving stations, and can be moved quickly from place to place.

Mr. HAZEN. It is an auxiliary to life-saving stations.

Mr. HUGHES (Kings, P.E.I.). Yes, I have received information from captains familiar with conditions in Great Britain to the effect that more life is saved by the application of that machinery than by the regular lifeboats.

Investigation into wrecks, $18,400.

Mr. MACDONALD. Why is the increase?

Mr. HAZEN. It is due to the appointment of a wreck commissioner in British Columbia and to the fact that the shipping interests on the Great Lakes have ardently demanded that investigations be held into all cases of grounding which appear to be of a serious nature.

Expenses of schools of navigation, $8,000.

Mr. LAW. Where are these schools situated?

Mr. HAZEN. At Halifax, Yarmouth, St. John, North Sydney, Quebec, Montreal, Collingwood, Midland, Vancouver, Victoria and other places if necessary.

Registration of shipping, $1,500.

Mr. McKENZIE. I believe that the officer in the city of Sydney who used to make the measurements for the registration of shipping is dead. Has this fact been brought to the notice of the minister?

Mr. HAZEN. Yes. No appointment has yet been made.

Mr. McKENZIE. I think it would be well to consult the authorities and get an appointment made, because it might be required at any moment.

Inspection of live stock shipments, $5,000.

Mr. McKENZIE. Last year 1,635 head of stock were shipped from the port of North Sydney. I think if the Minister has anything to do with looking after these cattle, then he might see that provision be made for the cattle between the time of their leaving the car and getting on board the vessel. I wish to point out to him that the greatest possible cruelty is practised on these cattle. There is no place in which to put them, and in winter they are left outside exposed to very severe weather. That has been the subject of comment in that part of the country, where the opinion is entertained that accommodation should be provided for these cattle. I want particularly to point out to the minister that there is no officer resident at the port of North Sydney to carry out this inspection and certainly, I think, the officer should be on the spot where the work has to be done.

Mr. HAZEN. The officers of the Marine Department are not supposed to look after these cattle until they are on the ship, when I think their duty is to see that they are given proper accommodation. It would be the duty of the Railway Department to take care of these cattle until they are placed on board ship. But if the conditions are such as is described by my hon. friend, certainly representations should be made to the Railway Department.

Mr. McKENZIE. I hope that my representations will reach the Railway Department, because at present there is no provision made for these cattle although there were 1,625 of them last year, showing that it must be quite a profitable business for the railway and for the vessel as well.

Mr. HAZEN. As the hon. gentleman has brought this matter to the attention of the House when my estimates were under consideration, I will ask my officials to call the attention of the Railway Department to what he has said, undoubtedly this is a very important matter which should be remedied at once.

Mr. McKENZIE. Then I would point out to the minister that the Newfoundland government will not permit any of these cattle to land on the other side, unless they have a certificate from a veterinary officer of some department of the Canadian government.

Mr. HAZEN. That does not come under our control at all.

Mr. McKENZIE. What is this money for then?

Mr. HAZEN. The inspectors when we pay see that the cattle are properly cared for on board ship, that proper stalls are built so that they will have the proper amount of space that is requisite, and be looked after in other ways, during the voyage across the Atlantic. They have nothing to do with the question of health, or with the question of quarantine, but they are simply for the purpose stated.

Mr. McKENZIE. Perhaps the deputy minister will inform the minister to what department this official belongs.

Mr. HAZEN. That would be the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. McKENZIE. It is exceedingly important that the officer who has to examine this number of cattle should always be on the ground. I would like to call the attention of the department to that fact.

Mr. HAZEN. Perhaps it will do when the estimates of the Department of Agriculture are under consideration.

Mr. McKENZIE. I thought it came under the Marine Department.

To continue the subsidy for wrecking plants in Quebec, Maritime Provinces and British Columbia, $30,000.

Mr. CARROLL. What companies, if any, in the province of Nova Scotia have received subsidies?

Mr. HAZEN. Subsidies are paid to three companies: $10,000 to the Davey Company, Quebec; $10,000 to the Dominion Coal Company at Sydney, and $10,000 to the British Salvage Company.

Mr. CARROLL. Has there been an application for a subsidy from the city of Sydney?

Mr. HAZEN. No. Tenders are asked for this important service.

Mr. MACDONALD. Are tenders invited every year?

Mr. HAZEN. No for a period of five years.

Mr. MACDONALD. What about the Quebec tender?

Mr. HAZEN. The Quebec tender, I may say, is expiring this year, and as a matter of fact, Mr. Davey has informed the department that he will not carry it on any longer at that subsidy as he is losing money on it. He has to keep an expensive plant, and there have been so few wrecks that there is no income coming in, and he gave figures to show that actually there has been a loss. As far as I can find out Canada is the only country in the world where the government assist in maintaining these wrecking plants. In other countries this work is done by the shipping interests.

To provide for the maintenance of vessels employed in patrolling the waters in the northern portion of Canada, &c., $59,000.

Mr. MACDONALD. Is it the minister's intention to again send the 'Arctic' into those northern waters?

Mr. HAZEN. This vote will be available for sending the 'Arctic', or some other boat, to patrol the northern waters if it is decided to do so.

Mr. MACDONALD. I suppose tenders will be invited for the supplies?

Mr. HAZEN. I suppose something of that sort should be done.

River St. Lawrence ship channel, $841,000.

Mr. MACDONALD. I would ask that this item, as well as the next one, be allowed to stand because some hon. gentlemen on this side familiar with these matters are not here to-night.

Salaries and allowances to lightkeepers, $450,000.

Mr. McKENZIE. Has the minister dismissed any of these lightkeepers in my own county, North Cape Breton and Victoria?

Mr. HAZEN. I do not think so, I cannot recall them.

Mr. CARROLL. Is there any system of superannuation for these lightkeepers?

Mr. HAZEN. No.

Mr. CARROLL. It might perhaps be well for the department to consider some scheme of superannuation. There are men who are employed in this work for twenty and thirty years, and when they retire are not fit for anything else, having been in the government service for so long a time. I think it would be proper for the department to take this matter of superannuation into consideration.

Mr. HUGHES (Kings, P.E.I.). Have any charges been made against lightkeepers in Kings county, Prince Edward Island?

Mr. HAZEN. I could not answer that question offhand, but I would be very glad to get the information for the hon. gentleman. So many charges have been made that it would be quite impossible to carry them all in my memory.

Mr. HUGHES (Kings, Prince Edward Island). Has the minister appointed any one to investigate these charges?

Mr. HAZEN. Yes, a gentleman named Norman Campbell, I think.

Mr. HUGHES (Kings, Prince Edward Island). Is he a lawyer?

Mr. HAZEN. Yes, a lawyer is appointed to conduct the investigation in every case.

Mr. HUGHES (Kings, Prince Edward Island). I understand some charges have been preferred against a man named Luther Jordan, who has charge of Murray harbour light.

Mr. HAZEN. Those were not for partisanship.

Mr. HUGHES (Kings, Prince Edward Island). I do not know really.

Mr. HAZEN. The hon. member will understand that these commisisoners are only investigating charges of partisanship. Where there are charges of neglect of duty, or malfeasance in office, or something of that sort, they are investigated by the officials of the department. I think in this case, speaking subject to correction, the charge was for neglect of duty or something of that kind. In that case there will be an investigation by an officer of the department.

Mr. HUGHES (Kings, Prince Edward Island). Is there an age limit in the case of the appointment of lightkeepers?

Mr. HAZEN. There is an age limit, but in very many cases it is impossible to live up to that age limit. As the hon. gentleman knows, most of these smaller lights are situated in country districts, and it is necessary to get somebody who lives in the neighbourhood as keeper. The pay is so small in the case of most of these lights, that a person who lives at a distance cannot attend to the light for the remuneration that is given. In a great many instances it has been the case in the past, and I am afraid it will have to continue to be the case in the future, men are appointed to look after these lights who are bevond the age that is prescribed.

Mr. HUGHES (Kings, Prince Edward Island). What is the prescribed age?

Mr. HAZEN. The prescribed age is forty, and in many cases it is impossible to get men as young to do the work.

Mr. HUGHES (Kings, Prince Edward Island). I am informed that a man named Clark, who has been lightkeeper at New Georgetown, has been, or is likely to be, removed from office.

Mr. HAZEN. I cannot recall the case at the moment; I would be delighted to give my hon. friend all information at the office.

Mr. MACDONALD. I know of one lighthouse keeper being removed in my county. I understand that the investigator in regard to political charges is Mr. Duchemin, who is poorly qualified to give an independent judgment in any matter involving political partisanship. I have no objection to men being removed who have transgressed the well understood rule about interference in politics, but where a man says he is not guilty he is entitled to a hearing, and should have a fair hearing. I know of Mr. Duchemin going back seven years to find that a man had attended a political meeting in a local election. Then the investigator will not allow the person charged to ask any question of the witness except through him or to be represented by any one at the hearing. I would ask the minister to have this gentleman told the limits within which the investigation is to go. I am complaining of proceedings in other departments than the Marine Department.

Mr. HAZEN. I entirely agree that it there is to be a trial it should be a fair trial, otherwise there is no sense in having it. Some of the gentlemen who have been appointed to hold examinations are absolutely fair I know. Mr. Bergeron, a former member of the House, conducts them with the most absolute fairness.

Mr. MACDONALD. I am quite sure he would.

Mr. HAZEN. Of course in each case an abstract of the evidence comes before me, but I do not regard these reports as final, I consider the report in each case before acting and certainly a person accused should have every opportunity of cross-examining witnesses. If there are any investigations in my department I shall certainly prescribe the lines on which the investigation is to be held.

Mr. McKENZIE. I am told that this man was examining an excellent official at Glace Bay. Here are some of the questions asked him: Do you know Premier Murray? A. Yes. Q. Was Premier Murray in Glace Bay last June? A. Yes. Q. Did you shake hands with Premier Murray—and I think the man had to admit the enormous crime of having shaken hands with genial George Murray at Glace Bay. Another question asked was if it was true that Mrs. McKinnon attended a Liberal dance at Glace Bay?

Mr. HAZEN. I am not in a position to discuss the matter, but I think on investigation you will find that the hon. gentleman's statement is a little overdrawn.

Mr. CARROLL. I understand that the keeper of the fog alarm station at Louisburg has had pressure brought to bear on him and has been obliged to dismiss his former assistant, and that another has been forced on him, who is not qualified to operate the fog horn in the keeper's absence. The assistants are not under the jurisdiction of the Department of Marine and Fisheries, but are under the keepers. They should be under the department directly.

Mr. HAZEN. The system in regard to these stations is that the man appointed in charge of a station is paid a certain sum and he is responsible for his assistants whom he pays out of his salary. I understand there has not been much difficulty under the present system, as the man in charge is liable to dismissal if his assistant makes mistakes, as he is responsible.

Mr. CARROLL. I understand that the gentleman forced on him is not qualified.

Mr. HAZEN. Then he had no right to accept him. No lighthouse keeper who properly does his work need have any one forced on him.

Mr. MACDONALD. Last year several industries in that county along the East river, and the schooner people and owners of steamers going up and down that river, asked me to call the attention of the government to the necessity of some small lights along the river in order that it might be made navigable at night. I did so shortly after the late government went out of power, and the matter was to have been dealt with by the Lighthouse Board. The necessity for these lights is very great. There is a stretch of about seven miles where there are a tremendous lot of big steamers and vessels. The dredging is not yet completed. It would be a great public convenience, and I ask the minister to consider it favourably.

Mr. HAZEN. I understand this matter has been before the Lighthouse Board, but they have not come to a decision. They think they should wait until the dredging is completed before they determine what lights are necessary. The hon. gentleman knows the composition of the board. Since I have been minister I have always acted upon the advice of that board with regard to lights.

Mr. MACDONALD. I think that, pending the completion of the improvements, there is absolute necessity for the lights, and there is nothing in the improvements that would involve any change in their location. I will take the opportunity of addressing the board directly.

Mr. HAZEN. I would suggest that the hon. gentleman have a talk with Colonel Anderson.

Mr. McKENZIE. I wish to bring to the attention of the minister the position of the lighthouse keeper at St. Paul island. The light at this place was established long before confederation by the provincial government of Nova Scotia, when a gentleman named John Campbell was appointed. The same position has been held by his son, Samuel C. Campbell, and later by his grandson. At present Mr. John Campbell is in charge of the island. During the régime of Sir Hibbert Tupper charges were brought against Mr. Campbell of a most trivial character, and the gentleman who then represented the county of Victoria, for some personal reason, threatened to resign his seat unless Mr. Campbell was dismissed. Mr. Campbell was dismissed. When the Laurier government came into power there was some difficulty on the island, and the man who was in charge was found to be incompetent and was removed. Mr. Campbell was put back, and was left there for the rest of his life. His son is there now. I understand there was a rule that when it was found necessary to dismiss an officer by the late government, the man who was dismissed should be put back where he was before without making much inquiry. It would be a great hardship to apply this rule in the present case. Mr. Campbell was improperly dismissed, and was put back in his place when the late government came into power, not for partisan reasons, but because he had been found competent. The third generation of Campbells is now on the island, the position is a sort of an heirloom in the family. I take the opportunity of bringing this case to the notice of the minister so that, if anything is done toward replacing Mr. Campbell, the minister will know the history of the case, and I hope he will not interfere with such an excellent officer as John Campbell is.

Construction of lighthouses and aids to navigation, also for the improvement of the West Coast Trail, British Columbia, $1,000,000.

Mr. CHISHOLM (Inverness). Application was made last year for the construction of a lighthouse in Margaree harbour. Has anything been done?

Mr. HAZEN. The matter was never brought to my attention, and my deputy informs me that nothing has been done.

Mr. CHISHOLM (Inverness). Is it the intention of the department to improve the light conditions at that place?

Mr. HAZEN. The matter has been referred, I suppose, to the Lighthouse Board. There is an application, which has been approved by the Lighthouse Board, to improve the existing lights at Margaree harbour, and we will act on the recommendation.

Amount required to pay pensions at $300 each to certain pilots, $6,300.

Mr. MACDONALD. Some time ago a veteran pilot in the Northumberland Straits named William Cook, who does not happen to be a political friend of mine, appealed to the department for a pension. I believe there was some difficulty in regard to the law dealing with this case. The pilots that are pensioned all come from Quebec. But if it is possible under the law to deal with the case, every merit that entitles a man to consideration for a pension exists in the case of Mr. Cook. I think the papers are before the department.

Mr. HAZEN. There the law under which these pensions are voted applies to the pilots of Quebec only. The case my hon. friend refers to would not come under the statute under which this arrangement is carried into effect. Some gentlemen of Pictou have made representations to the department regarding the case of Mr. Cook, and from what I can learn from my deputy the difficulty is that there is no provision of the law to meet it. I will, however, look into the matter and see if it is possible that something can be done.

To provide for the purchase or construction of a lighthouse and buoy steamer for river St. Lawrence to replace the 'Shamrock' (Dollard), $80,000.

Mr. HAZEN. This is a revote. One hundred and seventy-five thousand dollars was voted last year, the boat is under construction and it is hoped that the balance over and above $80,000 will be paid out of the vote of the present year. That will leave $80,000 to pay next year and to complete the work.

To provide for the purchase or construction of a lighthouse and buoy steamer to replace the 'Scout,' $110,000.

Mr. HAZEN. The 'Scout,' the steamer that did lighthouse work between Kingston and Montreal on the St. Lawrence, has been condemned by the officials of the department and those who have made the inspection as being unfit for further service.

Mr. GRAHAM. Will this be a larger boat than the 'Scout'?

Mr. HAZEN. Yes, it is proposed to build a larger and more modern boat. The 'Scout' was not an old boat, but she seems to have gone to pieces quickly.

Mr. GRAHAM. It is high time that there was a new boat to replace the 'Scout.' I hope that this work will be put up to tender and that if possible it will be given to one of our own shipbuilders.

Mr. HAZEN. Yes, I fancy that we will only ask for tenders in Canada for it.

To provide for the expenses of delegates to the International Association of Navigation Congress to be held in Philadelphia in 1912, and the transportation and entertainment of the members of the congress while in Canada, including the cost of printing pamphlet, $20,000.

Mr. MACDONALD. Will the minister tell us about that?

Mr. HAZEN. This is the International Congress of Marine Engineers. The last meeting was held at Brussels two years ago, and an invitation was then extended to hold the next meeting in the United States. It is going to be held in Philadelphia and the representatives from Canada who were present two years ago extended an invitation to the delegates after their meeting in the United States to come to Canada so that they might have an opportunity of seeing our waterways and our transportation system. It is felt that as they are coming to Canada as the guests of the Canadian people it would be only proper that we should entertain them while they are here.

Mr. MACDONALD. Who will be the representatives of the department?

Mr. HAZEN. The representatives from our department will be Major Stephens, chairman of the Montreal Harbour Commission, Colonel Anderson, chief engineer of the department and the Deputy Minister reminds me that I am also to be one of the representatives.

Marine hospitals—care of sick seamen in marine hospitals, and repairs to marine hospitals, $70,000.

Mr. CARROLL. Am I right in saying that Dr. Sullivan, port physician at Glace bay, is getting $150 a year for his services?

Mr. HAZEN. Yes.

Mr. CARROLL. In the Auditor General's report of last year he is charged with having received something over $400 when, as a matter of fact his salary is $150. He is under considerable odium in that part of the country on account of the statement that he has received $150 or $200 more than he has actually been paid. Reports have been circulated against the doctor, who is a very honest man, and it has been alleged that he has received money in some underhand way, or by methods which are not honest.

Mr. HAZEN. I understand that the Auditor General, through some mistake in his department, charged up to this gentleman $300 for coal that was not for the doctor at all, but was used in the marine hosiptal at Louisburg. It certainly would be most unfair to Dr. Sullivan to make a charge against him such as has been suggested by my hon. friend.

Mr. CARROLL. I just wanted to have the matter cleared up.

Steamboat inspection, $57,000.

Mr. HAZEN. There is a $3,000 increase in this item to provide for an additional inspector at Toronto and for an office to be located at Port Arthur. This has been found necessary because of the increased business that is being carried on.

Mr. McKENZIE. I would ask the minister to permit me to go back for a moment to item 260.

Construction of lighthouses and aids to navigation, including apparatus, submarine signals and providing suitable boats for carrying on construction work; also for the improvement of the west coast trail, British Columbia, $1,000,000.

This refers to the construction of lighthouses and aids to navigation. The navigation of the Bras D'Or lakes is very difficult. There are a great many islands, coves, creeks and peninsulas running out into the lakes and on dark nights it is a very difficult proposition to navigate these lakes. The minister perhaps has not an intimate knowledge of the extent of these inland waters. They extend about 75 or 100 miles from the mouth of the Big Bras D'Or to the canal.

Going up the other way, towards Baddeck, would be a distance of about thirty miles above Bras d'Or, with various branches in different directions extending about twenty-five miles across in some places. There is a great deal of navigation in this inland sea, particularly in carrying pit-props to the mines in which small schooners engage. When a man builds a little schooner it is sometimes his all and it is unfortunate she should be wrecked through lack of aids to navigation. There are on the records of the department requests asking for a lighthouse to be placed at St. Patrick's channel in the County of Victoria. That has been turned down, I am sorry to say, by this Lighthouse Board, composed no doubt of very capable navigators, but none of whom perhaps ever saw Bras d'Or lakes, and none of whom know of the difficulties of sailing a schooner through this place on a dark night. At little expense there could be put here and there through the lakes small lighthouses to help these poor people and if that were done it would be money well spent. Although it does not appeal to the Lighthouse Board, such as do aids to navigation in the St. Lawrence or along the Atlantic and Pacific coasts, it is just as important to the man who in his small way is trying to make his living by navigating the Bras d'Or lakes. This point at St. Patrick's channel would be lighting a stretch of water between Little Narrows and Baddeck, a distance of twenty-five miles, in which whole distance there is no lighthouse from the time you leave Little Narrows until you get to Baddeck. I refer to what is called Eli Point, St. Patrick's channel, and we do not want a big lighthouse but something that would guide the mariner on his way. This board, I am sorry to say, has turned down my application on several occasions, but still I persist in coming until better light is given to the navigator there. I am encouraged by the affability and capability of the minister to come back to him on this occasion and put the case of the St. Patrick's channel navigators before him. Then, the minister will find a great many petitions on file in his department from Big Harbour on the Bras d'Or where, within the last three or four years several schooners have been piled on the rocks in trying to make the harbour on a dark night. These are the only two places in this tremendous inland sea for which I am asking any assistance, namely, Eli Point, St. Patrick's channel, and Big Harbour. Then, on the coast of Victoria county and North Cape Breton there is Cranberry Head without a lighthouse and it is strange to say that although that is a well-known dangerous point on the coast there never has been a light there. The fog alarm that is now on Low Point used to be on Cranberry Head, and for some reason some years ago that foghorn was taken from Cranberry Head and there is nothing there at all now to help navigation. There is a requisition, if I may call it so, from the Dominion Coal Company and the Nova Scotia Steel Company, both owning large steamers, on file in the department, asking for some navigation aid at Cranberry Head. I hope it will receive the attention of the minister. Ingonish Harbour has a lighthouse now, but within the last few years the Department of Public Works has deepened that harbour, and it is now much more important than it formerly was. I think there is something on record with the department showing that something must be done to place better aids to navigation than exist at the present time at Ingonish Harbour. The same thing is true of Bay St. Lawrence. The navigation generally is under the supervision of the Minister of Marine, and when there are obstructions to navigation in the shape of railway bridges, they must have been put there by the Railway Department with the consent of the Marine Department. I call attention to a bridge right across the Grand Narrows, which is a serious obstruction to navigation. The minister will find that a report was made by the Department of Public Works some years ago which shows that a large number of small ships were broken to pieces and the greatest possible destruction of property resulted by striking against this bridge. We have been for years trying to provide a remedy for that. Thousands of small vessels go from Prince Edward Island and other parts through this bridge every year, and many of them get damaged. The danger to the bridge itself is also serious. If these vessels coming along with the force of tide and wind strike against one of the piers serious damage will certainly result to the bridge. We wanted some kind of a tug put there which for a small fee might guide the vessels through.

Mr. HAZEN. Have any vessels run against the bridges?

Mr. McKENZIE. Oh, yes, several vessels from Prince Edward Island in the spring of the year have come in contact with that bridge, and if the Prince Edward Island members were here they could tell the minister that a great many disasters have occurred there.

Mr. HUGHES (Kings, P.E.I.). I am here.

Mr. McKENZIE. I meant members from Prince Edward Island on the other side of the House. My hon. friend (Mr. Hughes) can bear testimony that very often vessels are injured there. I seriously bring it to the notice of the minister, and I hope something will be done both for the sake of the bridge itself and for the vessels navigating there. Although not publicly, I have brought this matter to the attention of the Railway Department a dozen times, and they have this report to which I have referred which substantiates what I say, but still I could not get them to spend any money. As this obstruction to navigation must have been put there with the consent of the Marine Department, I would ask the minister to insist on the Railway Department taking proper precautions to safeguard public and private property there.

Mr. HUGHES (Kings, Prince Edward Island). I can support the statement made by the hon. member (Mr. McKenzie) in regard to the danger of navigation at that particular point. I have heard the captains say how very dangerous it is, and I have known of wrecks that have taken place there on account of striking against the bridge. If the department can do anything to remove the obstruction it would be money spent in the right direction.

Mr. HAZEN. It seems to me that the question of the danger of the bridge at Grand Narrows is more especially for the Railway Department, and if the bridge is causing all the danger that it is said it causes then it would be for the Railway Department to do something in the direction outlined by my hon. friend (Mr. McKenzie) to enable vessels to be taken through the bridge in safety.

If my hon. friend would see the Minister of Railways about the matter, perhaps he would find him less obdurate and hard-hearted than some of his predecessors, and he might be able to make some impression upon him. With regard to the necessity of lights in English Harbour, I have great pleasure in telling my hon. friend that it has been decided to have lights put there for the purpose of making the harbour safer. My hon. friend has referred to a number of other applications which he said he had made in the past for lighthouses, and which were turned down. Perhaps that turning down, in some cases at least, was not intended to be permanent, for I have found since I have been in the Department that the Lighthouse Board has refused applications that have merit for the simple reason that we have hardly organization enough to carry out the works for which parliament has provided the money, in the way of construction of lighthouses and aids to navigation, and the work has not proceeded as rapidly as it is evidently the desire of parliament from the liberality of its appropriation that it should proceed. I would request the Deputy Minister of Marine and Fisheries, who is here, and who is a member of the Lighthouse Board, to bring these matters to the attention of the board for consideration, and in view of the way the hon. gentleman has expedited the passage of my estimates, I would ask him to request the board to give special consideration to the request of my hon. friend.

Salaries and disbursement of fisheries inspectors, overseers and guardians, $200,000.

Mr. HUGHES (Kings, Prince Edward Island). The minister was good enough to say that if I called at the department the deputy minister would show me the papers with regard to charges made against the lighthouse keepers. Will he show me the papers with regard to some charges made against the fishery overseer of King's county, Mr. McCormick?

Mr. HAZEN. My hon. friend spoke to me about that, and I asked the deputy minister to furnish the information. I understand that the papers were sent to-day.

Mr. HUGHES (Kings, Prince Edward Island). No matter what the result is, he is a capital officer.

Mr. HAZEN. The charge made is that of wrong-doing in connection with the payment of the fishing bounties. It is not a new thing for officials to be so charged. We are having the charge in this case investigated.

Mr. HUGHES (Kings, Prince Edward Island). The payment of the fishing bounties is a very difficult thing to handle. Sometimes the fishermen are not at home when the officer goes to pay the claims.

Mr. MACDONALD. I want to take this opportunity of bringing to the attention of the minister a case which I think is well deserving of his personal attention. In my own county an enthusiastic political friend of his, a medical doctor named Murray, had been in the habit of poaching on the West river in company with some other men Liberals and Conservatives. It was well known that Dr. Murray was a poacher, along with some other men who did not regard it as a heinous offence. Wherever they could get a salmon, they took it, to the injury of the fishing. Dr. Murray was of course no more guilty than the men who participated with him in the amusement. But about the 8th or 9th of October, when this government was safely installed in power, he went up the river and announced to his fellow poachers that no more Grits were to be allowed to poach on the river, and that he and his friends were going to take all the fish that fall. Later on this new guardian of poachers, in company with some other men were setting nets on the river and he proceeded to telephone into town to Inspector Hockin, that men were poaching on the river, and that he should send out a policeman, which he did, another good Conservative; and he, along with Doctor Murray, took a net from a man who was not fishing, but who was on the road, and who happened to be a Grit, and brought it into town in triumph. As this man complained next day that there was going to be trouble about this thing, Charles E. Tanner, writes to the minister, and develops a new phrase of the matter, that employment was to be furnished to no less than three Conservative lawyers in the county. Mr. Tanner writes:

Inspector Hockin of this place has in hand important cases of salmon poaching on the West River. There has been a lot of poaching, but the law was never enforced against certain people. The catch the other night involves some people who ought to be severely punished. One of them is a special guardian DeWolf McLean. Other important people are named Porters.

It is very much in the interest of the public that the cases be thoroughly prosecuted. The example will have a most wholesome effect; and there is great need of an example. These people have been making a business of poaching.

Mr. Hockin tells me that heretofore the department would not let him retain legal assistance in prosecutions. It may be unnecessary in cases at times to have counsel; but in this instance, at this time, having regard to general conditions and the people involved, it is most desirable that special care should be taken to have the prosecutions conducted to a satisfactory conclusion.

I would therefore ask you to give Mr. Hockin authority to engage a solicitor to act with him. I will be glad to recommend a man to Mr. Hockin. I do not want the work myself.

The information will be laid at once before a stipendiary magistrate.

A man was waiting ready for the job whom Mr. Tanner was ready to recommend. The official in the department communicated with Mr. Hockin, and asked if it was so that counsel was required. Then Mr. Hockin telegraphed:

Four persons summoned, two have confessed, others retained E. M. Macdonald. Circumstances require assistance of counsel.

I was not acting for the others; and at the moment he wrote that letter he must have known that the two men who confessed were men that I advised to plead guilty. Hockin then proceeds to write a letter in which he tells his own story, after the officials of the department have written to him and called him to task for telling Mr. Tanner that the department had always refused to employ counsel.

I may add that it was represented to this department that you had stated that you are not allowed to employ legal assistance. I presume that the information that may have been given you in such connection was, that such was not permitted without the authority of the department having been first procured.

Mr. Tanner and Mr. Hockin were communing together presumably on this line: The Grits, when they were in power, would not allow anybody to retain counsel, but we will get somebody retained. now Mr. Hockin, after getting this letter, tells the story:

On Thursday evening about 9 o'clock, p.m. I received a telephone message from Duncan Murray, M.D., that he was at Loch Broom, about 7 miles from Pictou, and that if I would send a constable there he would show him where a number of nets were set. He said there were a number of persons fishing there and amongst them was a fishery guardian.

I engaged Mr. David Morrison who went to the place and in company with Dr. Murray lay in wait to take the poachers in the act.

Then the conclusion of the letter, which I am not going to read in full. he says:

John McCabe and Scott McCabe have also been summoned——

These men were not defended by me; I was retained by Mr. David Porter. Yet Mr. Hockin says:

David, Sr., and Benjamin Porter have confessed. The others have employed Mr. E. M. Macdonald, M.P., to defend them.

The men for whom I was acting are the men who confessed. I never appeared before the police magistrate in defence of any one connected with the poaching. Mr. Hockin ought to have known that because he knows I was appearing for the Porters. and had no right to assume that I was appearing for anybody else. Now, Mr. Hockin says that John McCabe and Scott McCabe were also summoned. These gentlemen were defended by another man, a political friend of my hon. friend (Mr. Hazen), and a friend of Mr. Tanner's, and to-day I understand that he asks that this gentleman be retained by the department in the case of McLean. He will have been the third lawyer who will have been connected with this case, as I will show you, and is being paid by the department as the result of the interference of Dr. Murray, who was a poacher himself and was not interested in enforcing the law but in getting the exclusive right to poach on the river for the Conservative party.

Mr. HAZEN. There is a saying that it is a good thing to set a thief to catch a thief.

Mr. MACDONALD. Certainly, but when you do that you should not provide him with counsel and go on and spend all kinds of money on his defence afterwards. That is what the government is doing now. Then Mr. Hockin, this innocent gentleman who is entirely non-partisan—writes at the end of the letter:

It is alleged that Dr. Murray himself has been fishing salmon there since October 1st. He also has been summoned and the day of trial has been set for October 31st.

Then comes a letter from Mr. Tanner. Mr. Tanner writes further in regard to this matter:

Dr. Murray's only connection with the matter was pure public spirited action as temporary officer of your department at request of inspector Morrison.

This patriotic individual, Dr. Murray, was being brought into the County court himself for trespass. He was fighting with the Grits up the river, and Mr. Tanner represents in his behalf:

Under the circumstances detailed it would appear to be the fair thing for the department to defend Dr. Murray, and I would ask your favourable consideration of that.

Now, here was the second lawyer. The first lawyer, Mr. Fitzpatrick, was employed to prosecute these men who confessed. He did not require any thing for that, because he took no part in the hearing, but I suppose has received payment. He prosecuted two other men, and let me say that he took very great care not to even cross-examine Dr. Murray at all when it came to the hearing. This gentleman appointed to carry out and vindicate the law and stop poaching, this adviser of the department, never cross-examined Dr. Murray, who was shown to have been on the river night after night. Dr. Murray said that he had occasion to go out there to attend a case of midwifery and took a walk down to the river. That is a new occupation for a medical men to be standing round on the river banks looking at nets and boats floating along. As the result of this representation on the part of Mr. Tanner in regard to this poor unselfish Dr. Murray, Mr. Tanner's partner, Mr. John McKay, was instructed to defend the suit brought in the county court against Dr. Murray at the expense of the department. Then here is the stranger thing in regard to Mr. Hockin, that in a long letter of explanation in defence of his political friend, Dr. Murray, he says:

In order to annoy and put to inconvenience Dr. Murray they have brought this action. I understand that when the nets were seized the persons were some few hundred yards from the river, but had been followed from the river and the only colourable reason for any action is that at the time they were taken they were not in actual use.

Now that is the issue that is being tried in the County Court, and Dr. Murray is being defended by the partner of Mr. Tanner, the local member for the county, and at the expense of the government.

Mr. CARVELL. Was Mr. Tanner prosecutor?

Mr. MACDONALD. No, Mr. Fitzpatrick prosecuted.

Mr. GRAHAM. Both prosecuted and defended.

Mr. MACDONALD. There was a prosecution against Dr. Murray in which the man acting for the department never cross-examined Dr. Murray when he went on the stand, and Mr. Hockin, the inspector, after detailing the story found on page 22 of the return says:

On information from Guardian Livingstone I had brought an action against Dr. Murray, whom the Porters alleged had been fishing himself, but he explained his presence there had been in connection with a midwife case, and having to visit had strolled down to the river.

Mr. GRAHAM. To watch the salmon spawn.

Mr. GRAHAM. To watch the salmon spawn. Mr. Hockin said further:

I think it is in the interest of the fisheries that Dr. Murray should not have to bear the cost of defending this suit, and further that the constable David Morrison should be reimbursed the expense he had been put to to defend himself in the purjury case.

Now the man who defended Dr. Murray in the proceedings in the first instance was a man who bears the same name as myself, but who is a political friend of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Hazen), Mr. William Macdonald, and in the case against fishery guardian McLean, who is a Liberal, it was dismissed by the magistrate before whom it had been laid by Mr. Hockin, a man who could not by any possible means be charged with having sympathy with Mr. McLean in any way. After the dismissal of that case, Dr. Murray comes along, through Mr. Tanner and these gentlemen come and get the department to appeal to the county court the case against Guardian McLean. I am told that the department have authorized this to be done and the result is that the man who defended Dr. Murray is now engaged by the department, and is representing them on the appeal of the case from the magistrate to the county court. So that to-day as the result of this interference on the part of Dr. Murray in the way I have stated—as the result of this doctor's action, the reason of which I have given to the committee on my responsibility as a member of parliament—the department have three pieces of litigation on hand in which they are represented by three Conservative lawyers. And the question is how is it going to contribute to the administration of the law?

Had Mr. Fitzpatrick, who had been retained in the first instance, carried out his business properly in regard to Dr. Murray, he would have been convicted, but when I tell the minister that the man who represented the department when the defendant went on and told the story about the midwife case did not ask him a question in cross-examination in regard to that story, it seems to me the department would have been better instructed if they had advised Mr. Fitzpatrick to go on and appeal the case against Dr. Murray. The result is that the gentleman who started all this furore, for no patriotic reasons or desire to enforce the law, but wishing to be politically officious and offensive, is sued in the county court and is being defended by the department. The department have paid Mr. Fitzpatrick for four cases, including the one in which he apparently did not try to convict Dr. Murray. I ask the minister if that is a proper way to carry out the law. I am not speaking as counsel for the men, because I told those who came to me that they must go and plead guilty. I am anxious to see the law enforced in my county properly, and Mr. Hockin will never enforce it properly if he is starting out on this basis.

Mr. MORPHY. Do I understand the hon. gentleman to say he was retained as counsel for the defence?

Mr. MACDONALD. I was retained by two of these men proceeded against at the time Dr. Murray was proceeded against. I took no part in the case other than to instruct them to plead guilty.

Mr. MORPHY. Does the hon. gentleman think it fair to produce in parliament ex parte matter which cannot be contradicted?

Mr. MACDONALD. I have quoted from the records which the minister has given me.

Mr. HAZEN. You have travelled very far outside the records.

Mr. MACDONALD. Not very far. The minister cannot deny that he is employing to-day three Conservative lawyers in that county as the result of a prosecution initiated.

Mr. MORPHY. The hon. gentleman has shown a choleric temper in the presentation of his case.

Mr. MACDONALD.

Mr. MACDONALD. My hon. friend does not know me very well when he makes such a statement. I may be emphatic in my statement, but it is justified by this record. The hon. member should learn something about the rules of the House before attempting to lecture anybody.

Mr. MORPHY. I do not think that because a member is an old member he has any authoritative right to lecture young members.

Mr. MACDONALD. I have as much right to lecture my hon. friend as he has to lecture me. The result of this peculiar position, so far as the department is concerned, is that Mr. Tanner's partner is employed in the county court defending in that case. It also appeared that Mr. Fitzpatrick was employed by the department to prosecute certain people including Dr. Murray. I would ask the minister to verify the statement that Mr. Fitzpatrick, in the course of that prosecution, did not cross-examine Dr. Murray.

Mr. HAZEN. The hon. gentleman says so and makes charges against the gentleman in his absence.

Mr. MACDONALD. I am representing to the minister that he did not cross-examine witness.

Mr. HAZEN. That is not evidence that he did not do his duty.

Mr. MACDONALD. I leave it to my hon. friend as a lawyer, that when the doctor stated that he had gone for a stroll by the river that night——

Mr. HAZEN. There was nothing wrong about that.

Mr. MACDONALD. Nothing wrong in October for a doctor to go to the riverside? Would that not be a good subject for cross-examination? It was his duty to cross-examine. Of course I am not blaming the minister, because I know that he cannot be acquainted with all these detailed cases. I say that Mr. Hockin is the man who led the department into this hole, and I would ask the minister to investigate, and see if I have not made out a proper case.

Mr. HAZEN. I think my hon. friend is making a mountain out of a very small mole hill, and has also travelled very far from the record before the House, and made all sorts of ex parte statements in the absence of people who are not here to contradict them. My hon. friend admits that there was wholesale poaching going on in the East river for a long time past. He says that while this Doctor Murray made the observation after the elections that no more Grits would be allowed to poach on the East river. I have no doubt that Doctor Murray would contradict that if he were here. My hon. friend is evidently repeating idle gossip. It is ridiculous to imagine that a man occupying the position of a leading physician in a community would make such an absurd statement as that no more Liberals would be allowed to poach.

Mr. MACDONALD. I can give the minister a declaration under oath from a man whose word would not be questioned.

Mr. HAZEN. I have no doubt that Doctor Murray's word would be accepted. It is an ex parte statement easily made by a member of parliament here when there is no one to contradict it. I say it is an unfair statement to make about Doctor Murray, who, I understand, is a man of respectability in his community, and a man of standing in his profession, to say that he made a statement of that sort, and that he himself had previously been poaching, and the inference of my hon. friend is that Doctor Murray took this course in order that he might have a better chance of poaching in the future. According to the records in the department we find that Doctor Murray was down there attending a professional case. Having to wait a little while, he took a stroll along the river bank, and finding that poaching was going on he telephoned the fact to Mr. Hockin, and told him that the poachers could be caught, and asked that somebody be sent down there. A constable was sent down, who made certain arrests. Now my hon. friend, not only reflects on Doctor Murray's character, but he reflects on Mr. Hockin.

Mr. MACDONALD. I say he is a political partisan.

Mr. HAZEN. All I can say to my hon. friend is that he will not get one official in the Department of Marine and Fisheries but will say that Mr. Hockin has been a most successful and excellent fishery officer and his record in the department is as high as that of any other official in Canada. That is the departmental record which Mr. Hockin has. He has been a fishery official I think for over a quarter of a century, he has been there under different governments, and his record as fishery officer is an excellent one in the department, so I am informed by the officials whom I find in the department. Now Mr. Hockin very properly reported to the department that men had been arrested charged with poaching, and surely it is a desirable thing that the fishery laws of the country should be enforced, and that poaching should be stopped. Mr. Hockin writes to the department, having been informed that my hon. friend is going to appear as counsel for the defence, and recommends that counsel be employed on the other side. The Department of Justice was asked to name counsel, and they named Mr. Fitzpatrick. Now my hon. friend, having reflected on Dr. Murray and having reflected on Mr. Hockin, now comes down and reflects on the professional conduct of Mr. Fitzpatrick, who is not here to-night to defend himself, either. My hon. friend seems to think that Mr. Fitzpatrick has shown himself to be a party to a conspiracy because he did not cross-examine Dr. Murray. I want to tell him that that fact indicated nothing of the sort. Time and again when I have been acting as counsel I have refrained from cross-examining witnesses where I believed it would do my case more harm than good. One cannot tell whether Mr. Fitzpatrick was acting well or not from the mere fact that he did not cross-examine witnesses. I do not think it is fair for my hon. friend, who is himself a member of the profession to reflect upon the professional conduct of a brother member of the profession merely because he did not judge it prudent to cross-examine a witness, who my hon. friend thinks he should have cross-examined. I have not seen the evidence in the case, therefore, I cannot give an opinion. All I say is that the fact that he did not cross-examine the witness would not, to my mind, be conclusive evidence or any evidence at all, that he had neglected the case. Then a prosecution is commenced against Dr. Murray in the county court. The opinion of the fishery inspector is that it originated in spite, because of Dr. Murray's action in laying the information against these people, and the fishery inspector advises that Dr. Murray should be defended by the department, and the department has acted upon his advice. Is there anything wrong or improper about that? Then we come down to the fact that an appeal is being taken, and counsel of course are necessary to argue that appeal. Now I would ask my hon. friend if he really thinks on reflection there is anything improper or wrong about it, and if he does not think that he is making a mountain out of a mole hill. I would not like to suggest anything improper, but it seems to me that my hon. friend is influenced by his political feeling against Dr. Murray and Mr. Hockin, and possibly against Mr. Fitzpatrick, in the charges he is making. Now it is incredible to me that in a county like the county of Pictou, you will find three men of such leading, standing, and repute——

Mr. MACDONALD. How do you know?

Mr. HAZEN. Because I am so informed. Mr. Fitzpatrick is a respectable member of the bar, and I am informed by the officers in my department that they have no more faithful and zealous fishery inspector than Mr. Hockin. Now I think my hon. friend, before making charges of this kind against these three gentlemen, who are not here to answer for themselves, should have hesitated, because the charges are of a much more serious character than probably my hon. friend realizes. It seems to me, as my hon. friend states that he does not wish to make any reflection upon my conduct, that he is desirous of getting a slap at men down in his own constituency because of what has taken place in politics and for party reasons only. I ask my hon. friend in all sincerity if he thinks he is justified in making the statement against these gentlemen?

Mr. MACDONALD. I am not one of those who make statements against people that I cannot justify. I want to say that the point of the complaint against Mr. Hockin is this, that he knows the circumstances in regard to poaching in that river. I say that Mr. Murray was poaching in the river, and everybody in that community knew it, and knew that he had poached in other years. I say that, I know the community in which I live, and I know the district. I do not mind my hon. friend's little lecture to me in regard to my action in the matter, but I want to say that when he undertakes to tell me what professional ethics are, I have as high an appreciation of professional ethics as the hon. gentleman. I say that Mr Fitzpatrick, when he accepts a retainer from the Crown to act in a case, becomes subject to criticism. I do not know why the fact that he and I happen to be members of the bar should debar me from criticising his conduct. Mr. McKay, of New Glasgow, was retained to act before the magistrate to proceed against Dr. Murray, but Mr. Fitzpatrick would not allow him to ask any questions or to take any part in the matter at all. If Mr. Fitzpatrick had been willing to allow this gentleman to assist him in the case, no one could find fault, but he would not recognize him. Therefore, I say I have a right to criticise his conduct. My hon. friend need not put before me Mr. Hockin as a paragon of excellence. I know Mr. Hockin since I was a boy, I have nothing to say about his private character. I do say however that he is a strong partisan. Still, we did not dismiss him when we were in power, but the moment Mr. Hockin's friends got back into power a different line of conduct is pursued.

I have brought this matter to the attention of the minister for the purpose of showing, on a statement of facts that is not open to question, that the department today are employing three counsel down there and that the employment of two additional counsel is not in the interest of the suppression of illegal fishing in the county. There has arisen a situation in which there has been hard feeling aroused, difficulties have occurred and political strife has been brought about and in which the hon. gentleman has found counsel at the public expense for men who happen to be Conservatives while other men have to find their own counsel. In the meantime there is very little regard for the enforcement of the law. I do not know how many counsel my hon. friend will provide.

Mr. HAZEN. I might retain the hon. gentleman.

Mr. MACDONALD. I do not know that my hon. friend would retain me, and I do not think I could take a retainer from him under the law. Therefore, I am entirely disinterested in bringing this up. But, I regret that the minister has assumed charge of the cases of men about whom he does not know anything. His eulogy of Mr. Murray is most surprising. How the officials in his department could have told him about his high standing as a physician and all that kind of thing is ludicrous to me and it will be ludicrous to the people in the county to whom I send 'Hansard.' Mr. Hockin is all right in a good many ways, but he made a sudden jump when his friends got into power and when Dr. Murray wanted to hire a lawyer he wrote to the department and suggested that they should undertake that duty, and that the employment of these counsel is uncalled for. I want the minister not to take all he hears about these people as gospel and at least look into the matter of the employment of counsel in this way, because if this goes on it will go on ad infinitum.

Mr. LAW. Would the minister inform me if Mr. Hatfield fishery officer in Yarmouth county, has been dismissed?

Mr. HAZEN. Yes, he has.

Mr. LAW. On whose recommendation was he dismissed?

Mr. HAZEN. On the recommendation of a number of gentlemen in Yarmouth.

Mr. LAW. Has he had any investigation?

Mr. HAZEN. No. The feeling in the department was that, as Mr. Hatfield was 83 years of age, he was too old to properly discharge the duties of the office.

Mr. LAW. Would it not have been fair to Mr. Hatfield, who had performed his duties so well during all these years, to have given him an opportunity of defending himself?

Mr. HAZEN. The man is 83 years of age.

Mr. LAW. There are men who are 80 years of age who are smarter than some men of 40. He belongs to a long-lived race and he has been a most capable officer.

Mr. HAZEN. Our information about this gentleman is that he is not only 83 years of age, but that he is quite crippled with rheumatism and was unable to attend to the duties of the position.

Mr. LAW. Who is his successor?

Mr. HAZEN. Mr. James G. Doutrement.

Mr. LAW. On whose recommendation was Mr. Doutrement appointed?

Mr. HAZEN. He was appointed on the recommendation of a number of gentlemen in Yarmouth county.

Mr. LAW. What qualification has Mr. Doutrement for the position?

Mr. HAZEN. He has only been appointed temporarily, and if he does not fill the position satisfactorily he will not be continued.

Mr. LAW. If I move for the papers in connection with it, I suppose they will give the names of the gentlemen who recommended him?

Mr. HAZEN. Certainly; if the hon. gentleman moves for the papers they will be brought down.

Mr. LAW. I presume Mr. Doutrement was not appointed particularly because he was the Conservative candidate in two elections?

Mr. HAZEN. If that was the case it would give him a claim upon the party in case a vacancy should occur.

Mr. LAW. Without any other qualifications, as I understand?

Mr. HAZEN. The hon. gentleman does not need to understand anything of the sort. We will not appoint a man unless he is qualified, but if he is qualified the fact that he was twice the candidate of his party is nothing against him.

Mr. LAW. It is nothing against him, but I think that in filling a position of that kind it should not be very much in his favour.

Mr. GRAHAM. I would like a statement as to the actual condition of the treaty which is supposed to really exist between Canada and the United States with reference to the fisheries.

Mr. HAZEN. Does my hon. friend refer to the treaty relating to fisheries in waters contiguous to the international boundary?

Mr. GRAHAM. Yes.

Mr. HAZEN. I can give him the information with regard to that at any time.

Mr. GRAHAM. There would be some discussion upon it.

Mr. HAZEN. Well, then, we will let the item stand until we come to that.

Mr. GRAHAM. Then, in reference to the first item, I presume it has to do with the dismissal of overseers and inspectors appointed by the late government. I am not going to defend the appointment of those officers or attack the dismissal of any gentleman, but I would like to point out that if it were possible for some understanding to be arrived at between the provinces and the Dominion by which this work and the regulations would be under the jurisdiction of one or the other, it would be greatly to the benefit of everybody. The minister may not be aware of it now, but if he happens to continue as minister, he will find out that political advantage is taken of the conditions as they at present exist. Fishermen on the lakes in Ontario especially will apply for an extension of the fishing season to the Dominion. The Dominion officers will be stiff and say: No, the request cannot be granted, while the provincial officers will go to the fishermen and say: We would be delighted to give you an extension but the Dominion will not allow us to do it. That leads to constant friction. That is one of the reasons why I presume the minister's predecessor found it necessary to have a staff of inspectors. He desired to get information as to whether these applications should be complied with and as to whether the regulations were properly enforced by the provincial governments. If some arrangement could be made by which the province, or the Dominion—I do not care which—would have absolute control of the regulations and their enforcement, it would relieve a very trying and irritating situation, and I have no doubt would be welcomed by both the Dominion and provincial authorities.

Mr. HAZEN. I think everybody who has given any thought to the question at all will agree with what my hon. friend (Mr. Graham) has said about the unsatisfactory condition of things as they at present exist. The authority apparently is divided between the two governments. If some arrangement could be made by which the control of the fisheries could be taken over by one government or the other, it would be very much in the interest of the fisheries, and it would promote the public interest generally.

Every one agrees about this, and it is not a party question by any means. But, in the past, it has been found impossible to work the matter out satisfactorily, and I am not prepared to say that even had I had the time to consider it carefully and thoroughly I would have been more successful than my predecessors have been. Certain questions with regard to the jurisdiction of the provinces and the Dominion at the fisheries are being submitted to the courts in a stated case, and it may be that the decision given by the Privy Council will clarify the situation.

Mr. GRAHAM. The last one muddled it.

Mr. HAZEN. My hon. friend smiles at my anticipation that the decision of the Privy Council may clarify the situation, and, as he has pointed out, the last decision probably made it more cloudy than before. There were about forty fishery overseers in Ontario and the feeling was that they were not doing any good from the Dominion standpoint, and were duplicating the work done by the Ontario government officials, and so it was thought better to drop them and not appoint anybody in their places. The hon. gentleman suggested that if you had a government in Ottawa of a different political stripe from the government of the provinces there would be more difficulty, but I may say that in my short experience with the government of the province of Quebec which is of a different political stripe from the government in power here, I have had no difficulty whatever. Trouble perhaps may come in the future, but it certainly has not come yet. I think every one will agree that if some arrangement can be made for the administration of the fisheries from the one central authority it would be much in the public interest.

Oyster culture, $10,000.

Mr. MACDONALD. What about this?

Mr. HAZEN. This vote is to keep the public oyster beds in good condition, and is the same amount as last year. I find a memorandum here from Mr. Found:

For more than a year past negotiations have been going on with the governments of the maritime provinces looking to a modus vivendi which will enable the issue by the federal government of satisfactory leases of areas in which to carry on oyster cultivation, pending the settlement of the outstanding question of the fishery reference. New Brunswick and Nova Scotia agreed to the modus vivendi and it is hoped that Prince Edward Island will also agree and that before another year is over a start will be made by private enterprises to cultivate oyster areas now almost barren.

That memorandum was prepared some time ago, and since then we have introduced a Bill dealing with the matter.

To assist in the establishment, maintenance and inspection of cold storage for bait, the conservation and development of the deep sea fisheries, and to provide for better transportation facilities for fresh fish, $50,000.

Mr. HAZEN. We find that the fishermen throughout the country are taking greater advantage every day of the provision under which one-third of the express charges on fresh fish is being paid from the lower provinces to places in Ontario and the west. In view of the rapid increase in this business, I would ask the committee to amend the item by making it $65,000 instead of $50,000. I am told that the intention was to make it $60,000, but by a misprint it was made $50,000 in the estimates. I now propose to have it made $65,000.

Mr. GRAHAM. I do not think you can increase the item in this way without the consent of His Royal Highness.

Mr. HAZEN. Is that the rule?

Mr. GRAHAM. Yes.

Mr. HAZEN. I am much obliged to my hon. friend for the suggestion.

Mr. GRAHAM. You can pass the $50,000 in this item and then bring in a supplementary item for the $15,000.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax). I would ask that this item stand, with the understanding that we may discuss on it any matter which we please appertaining to the fisheries.

Mr. HAZEN. Very well.

Mr. McKENZIE. The hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair) is interested in the question of the reduction works for dogfish, and I would ask that item to stand also.

Mr. GRAHAM. We are anxious to expedite the passage of these items, and I would ask that items 285 and 290 be allowed to stand with the understanding that there will be freedom of discussion.

Mr. HAZEN. That is satisfactory to me. I do not wish to have the discussion restricted especially to any particular item. I think there ought to be free and full discussion.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax). A property was purchased last summer at Spry Bay, Halifax County, for the establishment of a lobster hatchery and the building which was on the property was torn down. In what condition is that matter now?

Mr. HAZEN. That matter is still under consideration; nothing has been done with regard to it.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax). Does not the minister propose to proceed with the lobster hatchery there?

Mr. HAZEN. The matter has not been finally decided, but I think it is very doubtful if anything will be done this season.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax). Why?

Mr. HAZEN. It is felt that there are other places in which the hatchery would be of more general use to the fisheries.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax). Have you paid for this property?

Mr. HAZEN. The property was paid for some time in August last.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax). There does not seem to be any reason why you should not go on with it. However, I will inquire again about it. In connection with item 289 for the issuing of modus vivendi licenses, is it proposed to increase this license fee?

Mr. HAZEN. No.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax). During the last election it was stated by Conservative candidates throughout the maritime provinces generally that the fee was too small altogether, and that it would be increased in the event of the Conservative party coming to power. It was the subject of an attack against the late government that the American fishing vessels should have had such privileges as they obtained under these fishing licenses for such a small amount.

Some resolutions reported.

On motion of Mr. Hazen, House adjourned at 12.30 a.m., Saturday.

HARBOUR COMMISSIONERS OF MONTREAL.

Hon. J. D. HAZEN (Minister of Marine and Fisheries) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 150) respecting the Harbour Commissioners of Montreal.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Explain.

Mr. HAZEN. This Bill is for the purpose of correcting a typographical error in the Act of 1904 by changing the word 'southern' to the word 'eastern' in the definition of the limits of the harbour of Montreal.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

BIRD ROCKS LIGHTHOUSE.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I beg to call the attention of the Minister of Marine (Mr. Hazen) to a serious accident which occurred recently at Birds Rock Lighthouse in the Gulf of St. Lawrence when the lightkeeper was drowned. Bird Rocks is a very dangerous spot and many accidents have happened in years past, this being the third lightkeeper, in my recollection, who has met with a violent death there. The body of the lightkeeper has been found and is now on Bird Rocks where his wife and his assistant are living in the lighthouse. The father of the young man who is an old elector of mine has written me to ask the Minister of Marine to send one of the government steamers to bring the body to the Magdalen Islands. The father is an experienced navigator and he says that one of the government steamers, especially the 'Montcalm,' could reach Bird Rocks at this season of the year without any difficulty. It would be a humane act on the part of the Minister if he could comply with the desire of the father of the deceased.

Mr. HAZEN. On Friday evening or on Saturday morning a telegram addressed to me was received at the department from the agent at Quebec, conveying the same request that my hon. friend has now made. I had that telegram handed over to my deputy minister with the direction to reply that if possible one of the government steamers would be sent to Bird Rocks for the purpose of removing the body of this young man to the place of burial. I have no doubt the matter has been attended to. It seems to have been a very sad accident. I was not aware that several other accidents of a similar character had taken place.

Mr. LEMIEUX. There were three in all.

Mr. HAZEN. It seems to me that something ought to be done, if possible, to prevent such fatalities occurring. I think the matter referred to by my hon. friend has already been attended to, but I will communicate at once with the department and let him know.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Some years ago I wanted the Department of Public Works to re-establish a cable station at Bird Rocks to connect with the mainland and the Magdalen islands. It was found that the cable was always broken by the ice in winter. Then I changed my proposal and asked the government to establish a Marconi station at Bird Rocks. I understand there is a Marconi station at Grindstone island, but it has always been the opinion of the lighthouse keeper that it should be at Bird Rocks.

INQUIRIES FOR RETURNS.

Mr. TURGEON. I wish to call the attention of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries to an order of the House issued on the 22nd of January for papers relating to the dismissal of two fishery overseers in the county of Gloucester. Those papers have not yet reached me.

Mr. HAZEN. My attention was not called to the matter before, but I will make immediate inquiry, and if the return has not been brought down, I will see that it is brought down not later than to-morrow.

Mr. LEMIEUX. May I ask the Minister of Railways and Canals to bring down the papers concerning the dismissal of George Bourgoin, employed as statistician on the Lachine canal at Montreal. My motion for these papers in so far down on the order paper that it may be dropped, and I think a verbal request to my hon. friend will cause the papers to be brought down.

Mr. COCHRANE. I shall be very glad to bring them down.

QUESTIONS.

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterick.)

STE. ANNE DE BELLEVUE—DELIVERY OF LETTERS.

Mr. BOYER:

1. Did the Postmaster General receive, on February 2 last, a complaint from the firm of Daoust & Co., of Ste. Anne de Bellevue, informing him that two letters had been sent to them open, and that those letters, instead of being delivered in the evening had only been delivered the next morning?

2. If so, has the government special reasons for not replying to the complaint?

3. Is the government going to inquire into the state of the matter revealed, and will it provide a remedy?

4. Is the postmaster in this locality obliged to deliver postal matter on the same evening that he receives them, or is it allowable for him to deliver letters, &c., only on the next morning?

Mr. PELLETIER:

1. The complaint in question does not appear to have been received at the Post Office Department.

2 & 3.—Answered by No. 1.

4.—This would depend upon the hour at which the mails reach Ste. Anne de Bellevue post office in the evening.

CANADIAN AGENCIES—APPOINTMENTS.

Mr. CARVELL:

What are the names and salaries of the officials appointed since October 1, 1911, at the following Canadian agencies: Liverpool, Glasgow, Paris, Commissioner's Office, and Boston, Mass.?

Mr. FOSTER. So far as the Department of Trade and Commerce is concerned, none have been appointed. Probably the question had better be allowed to stand to have an answer from the Minister of the Interior.

CENSUS OF SASKATCHEWAN.

Mr. MARTIN (Regina):

1. Has the census of the province of Saskatchewan been fully completed?
2. Has any detailed official information of the census of Saskatchewan been sent to any one in that province? If so, to whom was it sent?

Mr. BURRELL:

1. Yes.
2. The special report, issued February 29, was sent to every person who made a request for it.

MR. R. S. FAULKNER, OF STELLARTON, CONTRACTOR.

Mr. DAVIDSON:

1. In respect of what public works was R. S. Faulkner, of Stellarton, Pictou County, N.S., the contractor?
2. What was the contract price or total expenditure in each case?
3. In respect of each work, at what date did the work begin, at what date was the work completed, and when there was a contract, at what date was it stipulated that the work should be completed?
4. In respect to such work, how much per day was R. S. Faulkner paid, for how many days was he paid, and what was the total amount paid to him?

Mr. COCHRANE:

1. Construction of station building and freight shed at Granton, N.S. Contractors R. S. Faulkner and Jas. F. Falconer.
2. $1,130.
3. Work started April 25, 1905. Work was completed on June 16, 1905. Stipulated time for completion March 15, 1905, but the time was extended to June 30, 1905, by order in council.
4. Was not paid for by the day.

C. N. Q. RAILWAY—ROAD ON L'ILE BOURDON.

Mr. SEGUIN:

1. Has the Railway Commission refused to intervene and compel the Canadian Northern Quebec Railway Company to make and maintain on l'Ile Bourdon, between the bridges of Bout de l'Ile and Charlemagne, a road fit for carriages and macadamized as required?
2. Is the honourable Minister of Railways and Canals of the opinion that by virtue of the bargain concluded between his department and the said company, the latter is bound to make the works in question?
3. If so, has the department given notice to the said company of an order to carry out these works and comply with the wishes of the public in the matter, or will measures be soon taken to compel the company to fulfill such obligations?

Mr. COCHRANE:

1. The matter referred to came before the Board of Railway Commissioners on February 22 last, and the application was refused on the ground that the Board had no jurisdiction to entertain the same.
2. In August, 1910, the Department of Justice advised that the construction of the highway across l'Ile Bourdon, between the bridges of Bout de l'Ile and Charlemagne was not contemplated by either contracting parties when the subsidy agreements were executed, therefore the company is not legally liable to build the high way referred to. There appears to be no grounds for adoption of any other opinion than that given by the Department of Justice.
3. Answered by No. 2.

C.P.R. IRRIGATION—SUPPLY OF WATER.

Mr. BUCHANAN:

1. Has the government received a communication from the United Farmers of Alberta in regard to the supply of water for the Canadian Pacific Railway Irrigation tract east of Calgary?
2. Has the government issued the following guarantee with reference to the delivery of water to the Canadian Pacific Railway Irrigation system east of Calgary: 'That the Canadian government stands behind the settler, and sees to it that he gets an efficient supply of water for live-stock raising and irrigation'?

Mr. ROCHE:

1. Yes.
2. No.

CANADA-FRANCE STEAMSHIP SERVICE.

Mr. LEMIEUX:

Has the contract for a steamship service between Canada and France been renewed with the Allan company? If so, for what term of years?

Mr. FOSTER (Toronto). The contract for a steamship service between Canada and France has been renewed with the Allan Company, for a term of five years.

ALLEGED USE OF GOVERNMENT STEAMERS FOR POLITICAL PURPOSES.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER:

1. Has the Minister of Marine and Fisheries been informed that the government steamers

'William Joliffe' and 'Falcon,' connected with the fisheries protection service on the coast of British Columbia, are being used, as alleged, by the Conservative candidates in the north of British Columbia, for political purposes?

2. If so, has he taken any action in the matter?

Mr. HAZEN:

1. General statements have been made that these government steamers are being used by Conservative candidates in British Columbia for political purposes.

2. The complainants have been informed that no one was authorized to use the departmental steamers for electioneering purposes. The agent of the Marine and Fisheries Department at Victoria, B.C., was advised to the same effect.

The general instructions to the captains and other government employees distinctly lay down that no part is to be taken in politics.

CIVIL SERVICE ACT AMENDMENT—POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT.

Mr. PELLETIER moved:

That the order for the third reading of Bill (No. 106,) an Act to amend the Civil Service Act be discharged and the Bill be referred back to the Committee of the Whole.

He said: When this Bill was in committee the other day we amended clause 4 by inserting the word 'preliminary.' The law clerk of the House has pointed out that in doing so we struck out the word 'qualifying' before examination, which was not the intention of the committee.

Motion agreed to, and House went again into committee on the Bill.

On section 4, qualifications of third-class clerks.

Mr. PELLETIER. I beg to move that the words 'preliminary or qualifying' be inserted before the word 'examination.'

Mr. BENNETT (Calgary). I certainly think that the provision of the section should be so extended as to provide for the case of graduates within the British Empire. As it now stands it merely allows advancement to those who are graduates of the Royal Military College or of any university in Canada. There are a large number of valuable civil servants that I know of in Canada who are graduates of English universities, some of Cambridge, some of Oxford, and from other leading universities of the world, and I think the privilege should be extended so as to cover the case of graduates in the Royal Military College or of any university in the British Empire. I cannot see why it should be otherwise.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax). Is there reciprocity in that?

Mr. BENNETT (Calgary). No, there is something better than reciprocity; there is something that concerns true imperialism.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax). What is it?

Mr. BENNETT (Calgary). Let those who are graduates of the universities of Oxford and Cambridge, who are already in the civil service, and who desire promotion, obtain that promotion by extending this privilege to them.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax). What I meant by reciprocity was whether the same privilege will be extended to graduates of Canadian universities in the English civil service.

Mr. BENNETT (Calgary). Practically it has been so. Members of our professions go over to England and all they have to do is to go through a very formal examination.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Does not my hon. friend (Mr. Bennett, Calgary) think that if our people have to go through a formal examination in England in law or in medicine the same thing should take place in Canada? I am not against giving the privilege to any graduate from Great Britain, or any other part of the British Empire, but even in this country the same rule exactly exists as between the different provinces. There are no reciprocity degrees. Some few years ago a Bill was passed with this object of bringing about reciprocity in this respect, but the principle involved in Dr. Roddick's Bill was not acceded to by some of the provinces. My hon. friend, I am afraid, is opening up a much wider issue than he thinks. We all stand for the British Empire, but our home is Canada and we want to give first chance to our own people in Canada. In England Donald MacMaster, K.C., one of the ablest lawyers in this country, had to undergo an examination.

Mr. BENNETT (Calgary). Purely formal.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Well, let the same formal examination be prescribed for those who come from England, South Africa, Australia or New Zealand. This is a very serious matter. If we extend this privilege to the graduates of any university in the empire the same privilege must be extended to our own people in any part of the empire.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer). I take exactly the view of this question that has been expressed by my hon. friend from Rouville (Mr. Lemieux). The first duty of this parliament, as I conceive, is towards Canada, and I think that in a matter of this kind we should not be called upon to give rights to Britain which Britain would not give to us. My hon. friend (Mr. Bennett, Calgary) is proposing, if I am not mistaken, what my hon. friend from Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt) would call a jack-handled preference. It is to reconcile myself with the hon. member for Brantford in this matter——

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). You are thinking of jack-rabbits.

Mr. BORDEN. I think he calls it a 'jug-handled' preference.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer). Well, I am not particular about the term; it means the same thing. I think the position of the hon. member for Rouville is sound with regard to this question.

Mr. PELLETIER. The question raised by my hon. friend from Calgary (Mr. Bennett) is one which deserves consideration, and it ought to be looked into, but I think my hon. friend will admit with me that we should not go into this matter on this section of the Civil Service Act. This Bill refers to the third class employees of the Post Office Department. The wording of the clause is that which is adopted by all the other departments If we were to adopt the principle which my hon. friend advocates, and advocates so well, we should make the change not only with reference to the third class employees of one department, but with reference to the employees of all the other departments. I think this will appeal to my hon. friend. For the moment, we are only passing a clause which says that no third class clerk shall be eligible for promotion for a higher class until he passes the qualifying examination, or unless he is a graduate of the Royal Military College, or of a university in Canada. Even if we were satisfied it is quite possible that he is right on the question—I would not like to make that provision in a clause which deals specially with one class in one department. Consequently, I would ask my hon. friend to allow this amendment to pass as it is. The question whether this ought or ought not to be put into the Civil Service Act is one well worthy of consideration, but we will have to consider it in connection with all the departments and not only in connection with one department.

Mr. LEMIEUX. This is a question which might well come before the next imperial conference, and I might say to my hon. friend (Mr Bennett, Calgary) that, sooner or later, he may have to exercise his faculties in the British House of Commons. There will be a good chance for him to advocate these imperial schemes which, for my part, I consider the nobler kind. He might at the same time, when he is in the British House of Commons, ask the British authorities of free trade doctrine to remove the cattle embargo and to amend the naturalization laws.

Mr. BENNETT (Calgary). Both the hon. members for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) and Red Deer (Mr. Clark) entirely misapprehend the point I make. The hon. member for Red Deer speaks of our first duty being to Canada, but allow me to remind him that the class of people who would be affected by this proposed change are those who are Canadians, because they are living in Canada and are British subjects by reason of their birth. My understanding is that when one comes and takes up his residence here and finds employment he is a Canadian. I would, therefore, ask the hon. member for Red Deer what he means when he refers to these gentlemen as not being Canadians. Perhaps he might be able, in his usual voluble style, to explain. This clause deals with those who are in the employ of the government of Canada already, and it merely provides for their promotion. To enter that employment they have to pass an examination. In the western provinces any person who desires to study law is allowed the status of a student if a graduate of the Royal Military College, or any university in the United Kingdom or Canada. We in the western provinces provide that any one may become an articled student at law without examination if he is a graduate of a university in the United Kingdom or of a Canadian university. This young man referred to in this section 3 is already in the employment of the government; the time comes for his promotion and he may be promoted by reason of passing an examination or by reason of his academic attainments, these attainments having been acquired before he became a citizen of Canada.

I submit that any one who has passed the examination and obtained the degree of B.A. in any of the universities of the United Kingdom may just as well be spared that examination as one who is a Canadian and obtains his education in the Royal Military College or in a university in Canada. They are both Canadians, but by an accident of circumstances one got his education in the United Kingdom and the other in Canada; one came to Canada in his youth or was born in Canada and obtained his education here; the other came after he obtained his education in the United Kingdom, and they should be on the same footing because they are both Canadians. The position taken by the hon. member from Rouville (Mr. Lemieux), and by the hon. member from Red Deer (Mr. Clark) was beside the question and had to deal with a case not now before the committee. As the Minister of Marine has suggested, a man born in Canada might have obtained his degree in Oxford or Cambridge, and I know of one particular case where under the Rhodes scholarship system a young man in western Canada so obtained his degree.

Mr. LEMIEUX. A young man who goes to Oxford as a Rhodes scholar must, before doing so, obtain his degree in Canada?

Mr. BENNETT (Calgary). That is not so. I know of two men personnally who did not obtain Canadian degrees. They got the Rhodes scholarship, one in the junior year and the other in the sophomore year.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I know three Rhodes scholars who went from Quebec and each had previously obtained his university degree.

Mr. BENNETT (Calgary). I know the rules very well and they do not have to obtain a degree here before getting the scholarship.

Mr. FOSTER (Toronto). As a matter of fact most of them do have their degrees before getting the Rhodes scholarship.

Mr. BENNETT (Calgary). Quite so, but it is not essential.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer). My hon. friend (Mr. Bennett) referred to me as having in my usual voluble style referred to someone as not being a Canadian. A compliment from my hon. friend (Mr. Bennett) on volubility of style, I rate extremely high, but my hon. friend seems not only to be voluble in his style of speech but defective in his style of hearing, because I never used the words he attributed to me. I never referred to any one not being a Canadian, as he will find when he reduces his volubility to reading in 'Hansard' what I actually said.

Mr. PELLETIER. I would ask my hon. friend from Red Deer not to forget my Bill.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer). There is no fear of any one in this House forgetting either the hon. Minister or his Bill. To come to the Bill, as I was doing, I do not think my hon. friend (Mr. Bennett) has touched the argument in this case. If I proceeded actually on his style of argument, I should think that a man who learned his economics in England should be allowed to introduce English goods free of duty because he was born in Canada. It is not the man we are dealing with in this case; it is the degree, it is the qualification. The question is as between a Canadian and an English qualification; the man is not in the question at all. I did not mention him; my hon. friend thought I did, but I did not say anything about the man.

Mr. BENNETT (Calgary). Did not the hon. gentleman say the first duty of this parliament was to legislate for Canadians?

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer). I said the first duty of this parliament was to Canada. There is a very great difference between a Canadian and Canada. There may be some Canadians who would not make the distinction, but there is a great distinction between any given minority of Canadians and 'Canada'. I repeat that the first duty of this parliament is to Canada, and I don't think my hon. friend will disagree with me in that.

Mr. BENNETT (Calgary). We agree.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer). The question is as between degrees and I think we are on safe ground in dealing out to a British degree exactly the consideration which Britain gives to a Canadian degree.

Amendment agreed to.

Bill reported as amended, read the third time, and passed.

QUEBEC BOUNDARIES EXTENSION.

House went into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to extend the limits of the province of Quebec so that the boundaries thereof shall include, in addition to the present territory of the said province, the territory bounded and described as follows:—Commencing at the point at the mouth of East Main river where it empties into James bay, the said point being the western termination of the northern boundary of the province of Quebec as established by virtue of chapter 3 of the statutes of 1898, intituled: 'An Act respecting the Northwestern, Northern and Northeastern Boundaries of the Province of Quebec,' thence northerly and easterly along the shores of Hudson bay and Hudson strait; thence southerly, easterly and northerly along the shore of Ungava bay and the shore of the said strait; thence easterly along the shore of the said strait to the boundary of the territory under the jurisdiction of Newfoundland; thence southeasterly along the westerly boundary of the said last mentioned territory to the middle of Bay du Rigolet or Hamilton inlet; thence westerly along the northern boundary of the province of Quebec as established by the said Act to the place of commencement.

Mr. BORDEN. I have an amendment to offer, and I might mention it now. This resolution is founded on the description contained in the resolution of 1908. It has been prepared by the technical officers: the Dominion Geographer and the Dominion Astronomer, and it is, I believe, in proper form with one exception. That is to say: my right hon. friend will find in the 11th line the words 'under the jurisdiction of Newfoundland.' There is a question about 'de facto' and 'de jure' jurisdiction at present. My right hon. friend will remember that for some time past there has been an endeavour to have a decision given by the judicial committee of the Privy Council upon a stated case which has not been heard yet, nor I think agreed to. In the meantime, I think it would be advisable to strike out the words 'under the jurisdiction of Newfoundland' and substitute for them 'over which the Island of Newfoundland has lawful jurisdiction.' I think it would be desirable to distinguish between the 'de facto' jurisdiction and the 'de jure' authority.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. That would improve the Bill but perhaps it would be better to say: 'May have lawful jurisdiction.'

Mr. BORDEN. Perhaps that is a little vague.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. It may be too vague for a statute.

Mr. BORDEN. The word 'lawful' would preserve all our rights.

Mr. LEMIEUX. The question will probably soon be decided by the Privy Council. It is true that some years ago a test case was prepared by the Department of Justice for submission to that court, and I do not know for what reason it was not submitted; but I am informed by the Attorney General of Quebec, Sir Lomer Gouin, that proceedings have been taken against some of the poachers who for some years have had so-called authority from Newfoundland to cut timber in the district which is supposed to pertain to the province of Quebec and in some parts of Ungava. When this resolution is passed and Ungava is ceded to Quebec, I am quite sure that the provincial authorities will see that the jurisdiction of both governments is clearly established by the Privy Council. May I ask the right hon. the Prime Minister if he has communicated with the government of Quebec as regards the exact territory which it is proposed to add to the province of Quebec? I understand that the Prime Minister of Quebec has been quite willing to accept the territory of Ungava, but he claims that not only the mainland but also the islands bordering on Ungava, should be given to Quebec; and I would like to know from the right hon. gentleman if the islands will be included in the territory to be ceded to that province.

Mr. BORDEN. No, they will not. There was a question in regard to the islands in relation to the three provinces to which territory was added—Manitoba, Ontario and Quebec. We determined not to include the islands for the present. One reason was the difficulty of giving a description of the islands adjacent to those territories which would be sufficiently definite. Then, the islands may be necessary for Dominion purposes in connection with navigation and defence.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Will my right hon. friend kindly inform the House what is the population of Ungava—Indians, Esquimaux and white men—if he has the information at hand?

Mr. BORDEN. I have not the information before me at this moment, but I will give it to my hon. friend on the second reading of the Bill.

Resolution reported, read the first and the second time and agreed to.

Mr. BORDEN moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 151) to extend the boundaries of the province of Quebec.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

ONTARIO BOUNDARIES EXTENSION.

The following resolution was considered in committee, reported, read the first and second time and agreed to:

Resolved, that it is expedient to extend the limits of the province of Ontario so that the boundaries thereof shall include, in addition to the present territory of the said province, the territory bounded and described as follows:—Commencing at the most northerly point of the westerly boundary of the province of Ontario as determined by the Canada (Ontario) Boundary Act, 1889, chapter 28 of the statutes of 1889 of the United Kingdom (the said westerly boundary being the easterly boundary of the province of Manitoba); thence continuing due north along the same meridian to the intersection thereof with the centre of the road allowance on the twelfth base line of the system of Dominion land surveys; thence northeasterly in a right line to the most eastern point of Island lake, as shown in approximate latitude 53° 30′ and longitude 93° 40′ on the railway map of the Dominion of Canada, published, on the scale of thirty-five miles to one inch, in the year one thousand nine hundred and eight, by the authority of the Minister of the Interior; thence northeasterly in a right line to the point where the eighty-ninth meridian of west longitude intersects the southern shore of Hudson bay; thence easterly and southerly following the shore of the said bay to the point where the northerly boundary of the province of Ontario, as established under the said Act, intersects the shore of James bay; thence westward along the said boundary, as established by the said Act, to the place of commencement.—Mr. Borden.

Mr. BORDEN moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 152) to extend the boundaries of the province of Ontario.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

FISHERIES ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. HAZEN moved the second reading of Bill (No. 140) to amend the Fisheries Act.

Mr. SINCLAIR. Will the minister be kind enough to explain this Bill?

Mr. HAZEN. The measure was explained upon its being introduced on Thursday. My hon. friend (Mr. Sinclair) was, I think absent on that occasion, but it will only take a few moments to again explain the Bill. Owing to the uncertainty as to the question of fishery rights in tidal waters, following the Privy Council decision of 1898, the Department of Marine and Fisheries discontinued the granting of new leases of areas on which to carry on oyster culture and cultivation, and while some of the provinces at first arranged to take up the matter, as it was felt that leases of a satisfactory nature could not be given by the provinces without the consent of the Dominion, it was dropped and things were drifting on in this way up to two years ago when the Inspector of Fisheries took up the question of a modus vivendi with the maritime provinces, under which this department would issue leases pending the settlement of the outstanding question of fishery rights, and without prejudice to the claims of the provinces in any way. Nova Scotia and New Brunswick agreed to this modus vivendi, although up to the present time the government of the latter province has not signed it, and of late I think there has been a disposition on its part not to do so; but Prince Edward Island, after first expressing anxiety to enter into such an arrangement, finally declined to do so, and the premier of the province, Mr. Matheson, who has been in Ottawa for some weeks past, states that the local government is not prepared to enter into any arrangement which would hand over rights which it considers it possesses; but on the other hand is anxious to itself issue lease on the policy that it is in a position to place the industry on a flourishing basis. The question has been taken up with the Department of Justice, and the deputy minister of that department advises the desirability of amending the Fisheries Act, to enable a suitable agreement to be entered into with the province, and states that such an agreement would not in any way prejudice or affect the questions now pending, looking to a decision regarding fishery rights. The matter is important, because as my hon. friend knows the oyster industry in the lower provinces has been falling off year after year. If the hon. gentleman will look at the report of the oyster fisheries on the Atlantic coast prepared by Mr. Wm. A. Found, the Inspector of Fisheries, and published in 1910, he will find a table at page 23 which shows the following state of affairs so far as the oyster industry is concerned: The oyster fishery some years ago was one of very great importance. We find, for instance, that in the year 1890 54,926 barrels of oysters were produced in the three lower provinces. The year before that, the quantity was 61,549 barrels. From that time down to the present there has been a continuous falling off in the production year by year until in 1910-11, the last year for which I have statistics, there were only 27,005 barrels of oysters produced in those provinces, of which 14,045 barrels were produced in New Brunswick, 11,264 barrels in Prince Edward Island, and only 1,696 barrels in Nova Scotia. This discloses a very alarming state of affairs, and it is perfectly clear that unless something is done the oyster fishery will become an industry entirely of the past. There is every opportunity in the maritime provinces for a very large production of oysters. The natural producing beds are situated about as follows: In New Brunswick 5,000 acres, in Prince Edward Island 4,300 acres, and in Nova Scotia 1,250 acres. The area that might be made to produce oysters has been variously estimated at from 1,000,000 to 3,000,000 acres. Hon. gentlemen know that oyster culture is now carried on on the Atlantic coast of the United States to such a large extent that it yields approximately $15,000,000 per annum, though oysters sell for from one quarter to one-third the price they do at the Canadian beds. Under artificial culture, oyster beds would yield about 250 bushels per acre per annum, and even as high as 500 bushels per acre might be obtained. Unless oyster culture is taken up in an intelligent way the Canadian oyster fishery must soon be practically wiped out. The regulations have become more and more restrictive, until at the present time fishing is not allowed to begin until October 1 so that it usually lasts about four weeks each season, and as the number of oysters is being year by year reduced, the quantity of spat is being proportionately minimized, so that the beds will have less and less chance of being seeded. When oyster culture is taken up the regulations will have to be so arranged as to enable it to be carried on to the best advantage. The department, without the consent of the provinces, was unable to do anything because in view of the condition of the fishery laws at the present time, parties could not accept leases from us unless those leases had been approved of by the provinces concerned. Under these circumstances it has been thought better to pass this law empowering the government of Canada to grant permission to the provinces to make leases of these oyster areas, under rules and regulations and under terms and conditions to be determined upon by the Department of Marine and Fisheries and the different provincial governments. If that is done it is believed that these oyster areas, which are not now yielding, can be leased in blocks of from five to ten acres, as the case may be. The result will be that the person who leases areas will replant the beds, and we hope there may be an increased production in this industry which is such a desirable one to perpetuate and develop. The Bill simply authorizes the Governor in Council, under terms and conditions that may be agreed upon, to empower the provinces to grant leases of these oyster beds.

Mr. SINCLAIR. I am very much obliged to the minister for the very interesting account he has given us of the purposes of the Bill. My own view is that it will be much better to leave the management of the oyster industry in the hands of the Dominion government, and that is the view held by the people of Nova Scotia generally. The other provinces are more interested in this fishery, as they have larger areas capable of cultivating than have the people of Nova Scotia. In Nova Scotia we have no Minister of Fisheries, and no officers to look after these matters; but there is no doubt at all in my mind that so far as the maritime provinces are concerned it would be much better for the industry and for everybody else concerned, if the Dominion government should continue to take charge of the oyster industry. I presume from what the minister has said that it will not be compulsory on the part of any government to accept the management of the oyster industry from the Dominion unless they wish to do so. It will still be open, I presume, for the province of Nova Scotia to leave the conduct of the oyster industry in the hands of the federal government, as has been the case in the past, should the province wish to do so. I trust if that should be done, the minister will take an interest in this important question, and carry out such a policy as will have the effect of conserving the oyster industry.

Mr. HAZEN. I am very glad to hear the hon. gentleman's views because they entirely concur with my own. I think without doubt it is more in the interest of the oyster industry that it should be managed by the Department of Marine and Fisheries at Ottawa. This Bill is simply introduced to meet a difficulty which faces us in the case of Prince Edward Island, and I fear also in the case of New Brunswick. Nova Scotia has, however, consented to our carrying on the management of the industry in that province, and we are prepared to have the oyster areas delimited and lease them to certain people under the regulations to be established. But there is no intention of throwing any burden in connection with this matter on the provincial governments. To my mind the other governments are making a mistake which will involve them in a certain amount of expenditure in the way of stocking and delimiting the beds, and in other respects. However, that is a matter for the provinces themselves to decide. If Nova Scotia is still willing to agree to the modus vivendi, we are prepared to go ahead and do our share.

Mr. CHISHOLM (Antigonish). In the county I have the honour to represent there is some business done in the cultivation of oysters and this industry is of considerable importance to a couple of the districts there. On that account I am emboldened to say, I think it would be a mistake to transfer the cultivation of the oyster to the provincial government. As my hon. friend from Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair) pointed out, they have not the machinery down there for the cultivation of the oyster, and I fear if the whole thing is transferred to the province, the result may be ultimately the entire neglect of this industry. As it is, there has been a serious falling off. I think that the department here should devote a little more attention to the matter of oyster cultivation. The beds in my county, to which I refer, are in Tracadie harbour. I have asked the department to have some cultivation done there; and I take this opportunity of calling the attention of the minister to this place. It was proposed, I think, last year, that Mr. Kemp should go down and do some work there, as he did fifteen years ago, but owing to the fact that he was engaged in Prince Edward Island, it was impossible for him to go. I had good reason to expect, however, that this matter would receive attention at an early date and I hope that the assurances given will be borne in mind by the present minister.

Mr. HUGHES (Kings, P.E.I.). I understood that under this proposed arrangement, the Dominion government would still retain the management and regulation of the fisheries and the local government would have the power to grant leases and receive the rents from those leases.

Mr. HAZEN. As in practically all fisheries, we make the regulations.

Mr. HUGHES (Kings, P.E.I.). And the local government has the rents——

Mr. HAZEN. Well, the effect would be that we would allow the local government subject to conditions which may be agreed upon, to grant the leases and to get the benefit of what revenues there may be. I do not expect that there will be a large revenue. The license fee is merely nominal, a dollar or two an acre. These licenses would be controlled by the commissioner. But I think that there is no question that under the law, the power to regulate in relation to close seasons and so on, is vested in the Dominion government. Even where it has been decided, as in the case of the rivers, where the provinces are the riparian proprietors, that they have the rights to lease those rivers to anglers and to collect the fees, yet the regulations regarding the close season and all that sort of thing are made here at Ottawa.

Mr HUGHES (Kings, P.E.I.). And enforced by the officers of this government?

Mr. HAZEN. Yes.

Mr. SINCLAIR. I assume that the minister intends to make appropriations for the promotion of the oyster business. I understand that in Nova Scotia, assuming that these beds are left under the control of the federal government, something will be done. But if in Prince Edward Island they do not agree to leave the beds under control of the federal government, will the minister spend money to assist the oyster propagation there?

Mr. HAZEN. Under the Bill, we will not spend money anywhere in oyster propagation. The proposition is, that worn-out bottoms, capable of producing oysters, but now sterile, will be leased to private individuals and these private individuals will practically farm below the sea as the farmers do in the land. They will lease these areas, plant them, and reap the profits.

Mr. CHISHOLM (Inverness). Will the local government have the right to determine the length of time?

Mr. HAZEN. Under the Bill everything is subject to terms and conditions that may be agreed upon between the two provinces, and that will be a matter of agreement having regard to conditions that are desirable.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read a second time, and the House went into committee thereon.

Mr. JAMESON. If the provinces avail themselves of the benefit of this measure, will that mean that the Dominion government will abandon the work it has been carrying on recently, in connection with oyster culture? An officer of the hon. gentleman's (Mr. Hazen) department has been doing work in the different parts of the maritime provinces in this connection. For the last few years, I believe he has been operating in Prince Edward Island. Some years ago, this expert of the department, Mr. Kemp, was in the neighbourhood of my own riding, and planted some oysters in the Annapolis river at Goat Island. I have not been able to get a report on that experiment to learn whether it turned out satisfactorily or whether it was a failure. Is it proposed to abandon work of this character? Or is this work to go on and are we to have reports of the progress made?

Mr. HAZEN. We must be able to get reports in the department. If the hon. gentleman will let me know what report he desires, I will expedite the furnishing of it. Mr. Kemp is now in Ottawa, I believe. There must be reports on file, I assume, though, as my attention has not been called to the matter, I cannot say that I have seen those reports.

Mr. JAMESON. No, there is no report.

Mr. HAZEN. Then I should think it would be desirable that my hon. friend should call for a report, and I will be glad to have it furnished. Even though this work is being carried on by arrangement with the provinces, as undoubtedly it will be in Prince Edward Island, and maybe in other provinces, I think that from the national standpoint, and having in view the importance of this matter, it is only right and proper that the department should continue, as far as it can, to assist in the development of the industry by placing the services of its expert in oyster culture at the disposal of any province to assist that province by advice and consultation. If the government here are to carry on the work then, in addition to the leasing of these areas, it might be well for us also to carry on experimental work to furnish object lessons to those leasing areas from the government as to the best methods of oyster culture. I do not see why we should cease our work here even although under this Bill we enable the provinces to extend their work.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

AID TO AGRICULTURE.

Bill (No. 100) for the aid and encouragement of agriculture—Mr. Burrell—read the second time and House went into committee thereon.

On section 2—annual grant to encourage agriculture,

Mr. PUGSLEY. It seems to me that this clause is fairly subject to criticism in that it proposes to leave to the Governor in Council very wide discretion as to the granting of subsidies. A subsidy may be granted to one province which is not in proportion to its population or needs. Subsidies granted to provinces ought to be based upon some principle, as nearly as possible on the principle to be found in the British North America Act. If this Bill passes, it will give the Governor in Council absolute discretion, without consulting parliament, to do what the Governor in Council pleases with the money which may be voted for this purpose. I do not know whether it is intended that when the estimates are brought down a separate amount should be voted for each province or a lump sum for the whole Dominion to be used at the pleasure of the Minister of Agriculture. Perhaps my hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture might enlighten the committee as to what is intended in that respect.

Mr. BURRELL. There is absolutely no desire on the part of the government to divide the money in any way except what is absolutely fair and equitable. I stated in introducing the Bill that the money would be granted according to the population of the various provinces, and I think there would be no objection to bringing down the supplementary estimates divided as they would be according to the populations of the various provinces.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Well, why should that not be provided in the Bill?

Mr. BURRELL. I do not see why.

Mr. PUGSLEY. It is a wrong principle. If the Minister of Public Works were to come down with a Bill providing that moneys appropriated to public works might be divided in the discretion of the Governor in Council we would all be shocked. It is true we have the statement of my hon. friend, and I have no doubt that the intimation he has given will be carried out in good faith, but parliament is passing a law which presumably is to remain permanently upon the statute-book, and I think we ought to recognize the principle upon which subsidies are to be given namely, in proportion to the population of the different provinces.

Mr. HAZEN. I have no doubt that the practical working out of this will result in the amount voted by parliament being apportioned practically in proportion to the population of the different provinces, but I do not think parliament should lay down a hard and fast rule that that should be the case. There may be years when one province will need for agricultural purposes more than another. Regard must be had to the conditions in the different provinces. It would be better to leave it as it is, allowing some small measure of discretion with the Governor in Council that he may have regard to the different conditions. My hon. friend will see that there should be some elasticity and a certain amount of discretion although the probable result will be that the provinces will all get their fair share.

Mr. GRAHAM. Of course that could all be done under a special Act. When the estimates are brought down and passed they become a statute of the Dominion of Canada, and you can give aid to any province for any purposes for anything within the constitution. This is a general principle laid down providing for an amount of money to be expended annually and there should be some basis as to how the money will be divided. To put it on a sordid ground, it is possible that in one province, where a provincial election may be taking place, the government might intimate, as certain gentlemen did in a riding recently, that if the people want a lot of money expended in that province, they had better put in a certain party. In a riding recently they were told that if they wanted a lot of money spent on agriculture it would be well for them to vote for a certain candidate. That is what was said by a very prominent member of this House.

Mr. HAZEN. I have heard that statement frequently in the last fifteen years.

Mr. HENDERSON. Very frequently.

Mr. GRAHAM. The hon. gentleman seems to want to hang on to it. With that experience, there should be some standard established when a general principle is being laid down. Special circumstances can be met, by special legislation, and special estimates, as they arise. But, this is for the distribution of an amount to be voted annually and the government are asking us to place in their hands the sayso of where this money will go without any regard to the population of the different provinces.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). It may not go to a province at all; it may go beyond a province.

Mr. GRAHAM. This Act, unfortunately, says it shall be confined to the provinces. If we are going to hand this over to a department of the government we shall lay down the general principle upon which the division shall be made. I say this all the more strongly coming from the province of Ontario which has the largest population, and I think ought to have some consideration, particularly when the government had such a large support from that province.

Mr. PUGSLEY. The statement of my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen), which is quite at variance with the statement of my hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Burrell), shows the necessity for having some provision in this Bill. The Minister of Agriculture made the statement, as if it were the settled policy of the government, that whatever money as voted should be distributed among the different provinces in proportion to population. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries, having an eye perhaps to the condition of affairs suggested by my hon. friend on my right (Mr. Graham), says: Oh, it will not do to declare that it shall be distributed according to population because we must have some discretion; there must be a certain leeway left to us; we must be allowed to pick out the different provinces, and to say how much money shall be given to each; circumstances may arise which might make it desirable for the Governor in Council to give larger proportion to one province than to another. That shows that the government has not settled upon its policy. The Minister of Agriculture, with the very best intentions might be outvoted by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries when the matter comes before council. It is proposed to increase the subsidies to the different provinces. That is the basis of the provision, and nothing else. Section 2 says:

> The Governor in Council may grant . . . to any province, for the encouragement of agriculture, a subsidy not exceeding such sum as may in such year be voted by parliament for that purpose.

The Fathers of Confederation, having had in mind what would be the necessity of the different provinces, what they would require for education, roads, bridges, and other provincial purposes, felt that, in order to guard against dissatisfaction in the future, in order to guard against difficulties as between the different provinces and in order to prevent the spectacle of the provinces being obliged to come to the federal treasury——

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). If my hon. friend is going to dwell on the Fathers of Confederation, probably we had better take lunch first.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I rather think so too.

At one o'clock House took recess.

House resumed at three o'clock.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Before the recess, when the Minister of Trade and Commerce seemed to think that the principles of the Fathers of Confederation should be subordinated to his desire to get an early luncheon, I was proceeding to speak of the agreement of confederation, with regard to the subsidies, and I showed, I think, that it was considered in the highest degree desirable that the provinces should know exactly what subsidies they were going to receive, and that the allowance to the provinces should be made upon a fixed and definite basis, so that the people of any one province would not feel that they were in any way subject to control by or dependent upon the generosity of the federal government. The idea was to make them in every possible respect independent of the federal authorities. That was the same plan which was adopted as the result of the interprovincial conference in 1906. The governments of the different provinces met together at the request of the federal government and increases were made to all the provinces, but they were made upon a fixed and definite principle. It is now proposed to do by this Bill, what the government asked parliament to do in reference to the Highways Act, that is: to vote subsidies to the different provinces, but to leave it in the discretion of the Governor in Council as to how those moneys would be apportioned. We know very well that one of the most important subjects with which the governments of the provinces have to deal is the subject of agriculture. All the provinces give aid for the encouragement of agriculture, and by this Bill it is proposed to add to the subsidies of the provinces sums to be devoted to this special object. I submit that in the interests of all the provinces, in the interests of the whole people of Canada, this Bill should provide that these additional subsidies should be granted upon a fixed and definite principle. The Minister of Agriculture admitted that was right and he said it was intended to apportion these amounts according to population. But that the government has not any definite policy upon the subject, is evident from the remarks of the Minister of Marine, who apparently took distinct issue with the Minister of Agriculture and said that there might be circumstances which would render it desirable not to grant the aid according to population, but to leave it to the discretion of the Governor in Council. In the absence of any definite statement from the Prime Minister, that shows the government has no definite policy upon this subject. I submit that the principle in this Bill is most objectionable. It was bad enough to do this sort of thing in respect to the highways, and the only excuse the Prime Minister gave for that was that the Bill had been drawn in a hurry and they had not had time to work out the details. Let me ask the Minister of Agriculture if that is the excuse in this case. Has there been no opportunity to work out the details of this measure, so that it is necessary to come to Parliament with this skeleton of a Bill and ask Parliament, with respect to these moneys for the promotion of agriculture, to give to the Governor in Council an absolutely free hand to deal with these grants just as they please? I can hardly imagine a case arising where there would be any difficulty if the Bill provided that these subsidies be given to the different provinces according to the population of each. All the provinces of Canada are agricultural provinces; they are equally interested in the matter of agriculture, they are all spending large sums of money for the encouragement of agriculture. Therefore, I cannot imagine that any possible difficulty will arise if the government should amend this Bill so as to provide that these subsidies should be given just as are subsidies provided by the British North America Act, on the basis of the population of each province. This Bill purposes yielding to the Governor in Council that power over the expenditure of money which parliament has always been jealous of retaining. In the estimates there are almost thousands of items in respect to which parliament is asked to give its approval or disapproval for all kinds of public works which are specified in detail, but in this case, it is proposed simply to pass the Bill in blanket form, giving to the Governor in Council, which means the Minister of Agriculture, the right to be generous to one province and niggardly to another, and to depart from the principles laid down in the British North America Act.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I would certainly not oppose any grant being made to any of the provinces provided it is specifically mentioned how these grants are to be apportioned. As the Bill is drawn and presented to us, I see nothing to indicate how the policy set forth in it will be given effect to. In Quebec we have several agricultural schools, one of which is the great institution known as the Macdonald college at Ste. Anne de Bellevue. That college fortunately does not require much help because through the generosity of its founder, Sir William Macdonald, it is quite up to date and well equipped. In fact, I do do not think there is to be found on this continent or even in Europe any agricultural college which can be compared to the Macdonald college. In Quebec, we have also agricultural schools at Oka, at Ste. Anne's, Kamouraska, and L'Assomption and no doubt these colleges would require from the government very substantial help. Does the government intend, under this legislation, to give aid to such provincial agricultural schools? We also have in practically each of the counties of Quebec an agricultural society which is assisted by the government by sending lecturers and publishing a paper which is freely distributed to the members of the society. Will these societies get assistance? We are told in vague terms that the government intends to help agriculture in the various provinces, but let me ask if that help will be given according to the population of each province? I would be obliged to the Minister of Agriculture if he would give more information to the House on those subjects. I am certainly not opposed to grants for agriculture being made by this government. I have always held that the provinces did not receive at the time of confederation their fair share of the public moneys, and in that sense I am a provincialist. I believe that in the present instance an interprovincial conference should be summoned and probably some means could be devised for an equitable distribution of this money, so that it may not be left at the mercy of one minister. Of course, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Burrell) is a friend of agriculture, and no doubt he does not primarily intend it, but he will probably be encouraged at election times to discriminate as between one province which favours the government and another province which does not. My hon. friend is full of good intentions, I know; but let us make it clear in this legislation that there shall be no discrimination but that all the provinces shall be treated alike, and that the grants shall be really in the interest of the farmers and not in the interest of one political party.

Mr. BURRELL. There seems to be some rather strange misconception in regard to this Bill. I am almost led to think that the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) and the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) were not in the House when I asked leave to introduce the Bill, for I took particular pains to state accurately and clearly what was the purport of the measure and what were the lines on which the government were going to proceed. I know that my hon. friend from St. John has a very fertile and expansive mind, and he has probably put into his remarks some statements in regard to which he was not very serious. He said that it was to be left to the Governor in Council to apportion the money among the different provinces. What the Bill refers to the Governor in Council is not the allotment of the money, but to devise the ways in which the respective amounts shall be expended, so as to ensure their being expended on agriculture and in such a way as not to induce the provinces to knock off their own agricultural grants, but rather to stimulate them along those lines. This is done because we had not time to formulate an exact policy under which we could spend this money ourselves, and in order to implement the promise of the leader of the government to give some aid to agriculture this year. I am perfectly in sympathy with what the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) says in regard to the work done by Macdonald College and other educational institutions, and I believe the money which this parliament may vote for agriculture would be well expended if devoted to the objects aimed at by these institutions. I might point out that in the province of Ontario, of about half a million dollars per year which the provincial government spends on agriculture, nearly 30 per cent is spent on agricultural education; and in Nova Scotia nearly 40 per cent of the money spent by the provincial government on agriculture is spent on agricultural education. The Dominion government would be amply justified in helping the provinces along these lines. But to relieve the mind of my hon. friend from St. John, I may say that when the votes are brought down, they will be divided among the different provinces according to population, so that each province will know exactly what proportion will be allotted to it. Perhaps I may be allowed to quote the closing lines of the remarks I made in introducing the Bill, and which will make this quite clear:

> The principle upon which grants will be apportioned will be that of division based on population, the census of 1911 governing. The government has given a good deal of consideration to this phase of the matter, and has arrived at the conclusion that the population basis is one which is open to the fewest objections. . . I may add that there is no desire in this matter to favour this or that of the various provincial governments. We recognize that in every province a government has been placed there by the people, and I am voicing the sentiments of the Prime Minister and his colleagues in saying that the sole purport of this measure is to do what the title declares it is designed for, viz.: to aid and encourage agriculture.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Would that include aid to annual exhibitions?

Mr. BURRELL. It would be done in any way, upon agreement between the provincial governments and the Minister of Agriculture, so long as it will assist in agricultural development. These details must be left to this government, which is giving a grant which is rather unusual. The hon. member for St. John intimated that there was some difference of opinion in the government on this matter. I do not think so. What the Minister of Marine said was that owing to natural conditions of an extraordinary character, it might be advisable in one year to spend more in one province than in another. We can all understand that; but this year at any rate we do not propose to take that into consideration. There is going to be a straight division according to population.

Mr. PUGSLEY. What about next year?

Mr. BURRELL. In introducing this Bill I pointed out that it was more or less of a temporary measure. The idea of the government was to work out this year a thorough knowledge of agricultural conditions in the whole country. The British North America Act has slightly confused the jurisdiction as between the provinces and the Dominion as to agriculture. We would prefer to do this work ourselves, but we want to work out the scheme this year on lines that will be fair and that will be approved by the provinces.

Mr. LEMIEUX. When an amount will be put in the estimates in accordance with this Bill, will that amount invariably apply to all the provinces, or will the government be in a position one year to exclude three or four provinces, and in another year to exclude others, or will any amount put in the estimates be applied to all the provinces?

Mr. BORDEN. Not one dollar can be spent under this Bill until it has been voted by parliament, and parliament has to be satisfied.

Mr. KNOWLES. Can the expenditure be withheld without the consent of the province? Suppose a certain amount is voted to a province and the province and the Dominion government do not agree, could it be withheld at the dictation of this government?

Mr. BORDEN. If the province could not satisfy the government that the amount would be expended on agriculture, it would not be proper for the government to hand it over.

Mr. KNOWLES. Apart from that there would be no conflict?

Mr. BORDEN. No.

Mr. CARVELL. Would it not be very much better to have the distribution provided for in the Bill? Of course, we will all take the word of the present Minister of Agriculture, that if he is Minister of Agriculture next year, he will divide the money among the provinces according to population; but there might be a condition of things under which the Minister of Marine and Fisheries would feel that it would not be in the interest of the Dominion to expend this money according to population. That is what we on this side of the House fear. Therefore, I think it would be better for the minister to frame an amendment providing that the total amount to be divided under this Act must be divided among the provinces pro rata, allowing this government to exercise some control as to the manner in which it should be expended under proper arrangements with the provincial governments.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I do not at all object to the provisions of section 3, which provides for the making of an agreement between the federal and the provincial governments. I think that is very proper, but it does seem to me that my hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture has not shown any reason for not putting in the Bill a provision that the moneys shall be divided according to the population of the different provinces. My hon. friend (Mr. Burrell) says that this year the government are experimenting in order to ascertain whether it is desirable to expend the moneys themselves instead of through the provincial government, but I would remind the hon. gentleman that if that decision should be come to, they will have to apply to parliament to amend this Bill because the measure provides for subsidies to the provinces. Therefore, before the Dominion government could take charge of the expenditure to be made under this Bill, the Bill would have to be amended.

Mr. BORDEN. Why?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Because section 2 provides:

> The Governor in Council may, in any year, and upon such terms and subject to such conditions as are prescribed by order in council, grant to any province, for the encouragement of agriculture, a subsidy not exceeding such sum as may in such year be voted by parliament for that purpose.

Now, I take it, Mr. Chairman, that means the granting of a money subsidy to the governments of the different provinces. It would not be making a grant to a province if the government themselves expended the money by giving aid to exhibitions or giving aid to agricultural colleges; that would not be in accordance with the terms of this Bill. The Bill provides and provides only, for a subsidy to different provinces. The expression subsidy to a province is well understood. We had it first in the British North America Act, and we have had it in all the Acts in amendment to the British North America Act, which have been passed since that time. I am going to suggest an amendment which I think my hon. friend (Mr. Burrell) would have inserted in the Bill if he had had time to think the matter over before introducing the measure. I will move that the following be added as a subsection to section 2:

> All moneys voted in any year, if expended under this Act shall be apportioned among, and paid to, the governments of the different provinces of the Dominion according to the respective population of the said provinces as established by the last census for the time being.

Now that carries out what my hon. friend says he would do if he had control over the matter as Minister of Agriculture, but he should put it clearly upon the statute-book that that shall be done. It would be a declaration by this parliament that where an arrangement is made for voting moneys in the way of subsidies, these payments shall be founded upon the principle of population so far as the different provinces are concerned, and it prevents an Act going on the statue-book which is indefinate in its character, and which would be a declaration by parliament that it was willing to vote moneys in the way of subsidies, leaving it to the government to do as they pleased with the money as between the different provinces.

Mr. BENNETT (Calgary). It is perfectly apparent that if the scheme outlined by the hon. member for St. John were carried into effect it would be perfectly useless. For instance, take the two provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan: It must be apparent that at times we might have an excellent crop in one province and not in the other. It therefore, becomes necessary to provide seed grain in consequence of hail falling in certain localities. The hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) knows perfectly well that in some sections of the province of Alberta during the present year the crop was entirely destroyed by reason of hail, while in other sections there was no destruction at all. In the province of Saskatchewan no loss was experienced. It therefore, becomes essential that in the distribution of this money there should be no fixed principle, but rather regard should be paid to the demands from the several provinces by reason of their necessities. That should be the governing consideration, I submit to this committee, in determining how the money should be divided. For example I think the province of Saskatchewan this year, having regard to seed grain requires little or no money at all; but I happen to know that in the province of Alberta large sums of money will be required to meet the demands of the settlers not only by reason of hail, but owing to the early frost, a condition which has not arisen in the other provinces. If you divide the money according to population then the necessities of at least one of the provinces may not be properly met. There is this point further. As the interests of the provinces are presented to the Governor in Council, the government of Canada should practically determine how that money should be apportioned and divided.

Mr. GRAHAM. The hon. gentleman who has just spoken evidently did not hear the remarks of the Minister of Agriculture, who stated most positively that although not mentioned in this Bill, the estimate brought in would provide that the money should be divided, under this measure, between the provinces according to population. What the amendment proposes to do is to embody in the present Bill the suggestion and the promise of the Minister of Agriculture. The amendment simply proposes to place in the Statute what the Minister of Agriculture says is the policy of the government. My hon. friend (Mr. Bennett, Calgary) says that he objects to it being divided on any fixed principle. But that is what we on this side are contending for. We think it would be wise to do that. It does not at all affect, and would not and could not affect, the Act referring to the distribution of seed grain, or any other distribution to meet any misfortune that might occur. When special cases arise, this parliament has unlimited power to deal with such cases by special legislation, and it always has done so. Should any requirements appear or be needed in any province, this parliament has always been, I think, fairly generous in meeting the emergency and providing money in the estimates to so satisfy such a demand. But this Act is to provide practically a subsidy to each province, and that subsidy is to be expended along certain lines, and it has no connection whatever with any special conditions that may arise. The Minister of Agriculture has taken the ground, and taken it wisely, that when this money comes to be distributed under this Bill, which is nothing less than a subsidy, it will be divided according to population among the various provinces; and when estimates are brought down for the money to be expended under this Bill, those estimates will be provided among the various provinces according to the population. Now all we are asking is this: That there be embalmed in the statute a clause which shall carry out the promise of the minister to the House this afternoon.

Mr. BORDEN. My hon friends on the other side are threshing out exactly the same question that was debated at very great length in connection with the Highways Act. There is not the slightest objection to setting forth the proposed division of the appropriation in a statute, but we are not going to put the division in this Bill because there is no necessity for it. The division will appear in the Supply Act in both cases, and there is no need whatever for putting it in this Act as well, so far as I can understand. Up to the present time no good reason has been shown to me why we should do that. If we were providing in this Bill a certain sum of money which need not therefore be voted by parliament, everything that has been said on the other side would be absolutely logical and absolutely reasonable, and we would accept it at once. But we have already assured the House, and it remains to be seen whether our assurance will be borne out, that the moneys provided for assistance to highways, and the moneys provided for assistance to agriculture, will be brought into the estimates in the way my hon. friend (Mr. Burrell) has mentioned this afternoon, and will therefore appear in the Statute, and that Statute will be just as binding as if the same provision were made in this Bill. It seems to me therefore that there is no good reason why the division should appear in both places.

Mr. CARVELL. It is all very well when my right hon. friend gives us the assurance that the division will take place in the supplementary estimates this year, but we have no guarantee that it will take place the next year or the year after. If that be the intention what good reason can be urged against putting it in the present Bill, and then we will know what will occur not only next year but some other year when another gentleman perhaps may be leading the government. We do not know what conditions may obtain in the future, and we would like to have this safeguard inserted in the Bill so that we may know what is going to happen. It has been said by the hon. member for Calgary (Mr. Bennett) that in the west this is going to be distributed in providing seed grain. For my part I can well conceive what might happen if my hon. friends were able to go to any particular province in Canada and say: 'We will give you so many bushels of seed grain this year.' My right hon. friend (Mr. Borden) says, 'We do not intend to do that.' But we on this side would like to have the amendment of my hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Pugsley) inserted in the statute so that we may know what will be done in future.

Mr. BORDEN. My hon. friend seems to forget that every year parliament has the matter in its own hands. A vote must be brought down, and parliament will have a perfect right, before the appropriation is made, to point out any injustice to any particular province. And that appropriation must be embodied in the Supply Bill. It seems to me there cannot possibly be any danger such as my hon. friend has alluded to. He speaks of the great advantage—I do not know if he speaks from experience—

Mr. CARVELL. No, I never distributed seed-grain.

Mr. BORDEN. My hon. friend seems to have very impressive ideas with regard to this measure. The proposal in this Bill, as in the Highways Bill, is to utilize such provincial machinery as can effectively be utilized in connection with the subject. I need hardly remind my hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Pugsley), that if this parliament saw fit to make a general appropriation for aid to agriculture, it would not be necessary to have any such Bill as this at all. He knows that under section 95 of the British North America Act, the laws of this Dominion relating to agriculture override any provincial laws that are inconsistent with them. This parliament has the primary right, the dominant right, to legislate in respect of agriculture; so that if we saw fit to depart from the proposal which we are making now—which I think is a very good proposal—of co-operation with the provinces we should not need any legislation at all. But it has seemed to us that co-operation with the provinces and the utilization of provincial machinery is a good principle. At all events, we are disposed to try it, and to try it on terms that will be absolutely fair and just to every province of Canada. It is perfectly obvious that we must have assurance that the money in each province will be expended judiciously, economically, and acceptably, and for the purposes for which parliament has voted it. That is the only qualification we make with regard to the matter. So far as the distribution is concerned it will be on the fairest basis we can propose, the basis suggested by my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), the basis of population, the basis of existing subsidies.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. If everything contemplated in this Bill can be done by an appropriation Bill, what is the object of this measure? The object is that intimated by my right hon. friend (Mr. Borden), to provide a system of co-operation with the provinces. So far, we all agree with him. The object is a good one, and we do not oppose it—quite the contrary. But if the object is to lay a foundation for co-operation between the Dominion and the provinces, it seems to me obvious—and I submit it to my right hon. friend (Mr. Borden)—that we should have a complete law which the provinces will know and understand, and which will not be changed by an appropriation Act to be voted year by year. To this end the method of appropriation among the different provinces should be laid down. I confess that I view with some alarm the statement of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Burrell), when he said that this year it was intended that the money should be apportioned among the different provinces. But he was not looking to the future.

Mr. BURRELL. The right hon. gentleman must have misunderstood me.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I am very glad of that. Will the hon. gentleman (Mr. Burrell) then please tell me what he said? I understood him to take the view expressed by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen) that it might be necessary to give to one locality more than to another. On the Highways Bill we heard the same thing from my hon. friend from South Simcoe (Mr. Lennox)—that he hoped the policy would not be pursued of making an even distribution among the provinces, because one province might require more than another. That is exactly the kind of thing we object to, and I understand that this is the sentiment of the House, and that everybody is satisfied that this money should be distributed on the basis of population, which, I think, is the fairest basis. If that be so, then why not have it stated in the Bill. Then, happen what may afterwards, the distribution of the money voted by parliament for the purpose of aiding agriculture would be given in a proportion that is known and understood. I would not insist so much on this amendment but for the statement made by two prominent members of the majority, the hon. member for South Simcoe (Mr. Lennox) and the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen), that there may be occasion when it would be advisable to give more money to one province than to another. This makes it absolutely indispensable that this should be in the Bill.

Mr. BENNETT (Calgary). May I remind the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) when he speaks of distributing this money according to population, that to distribute it on the basis of a decennial census would not be fair to the west, inasmuch as in the new provinces we have a census every five years.

Mr. PUGSLEY. The amendment does not say 'the last decennial census,' but the 'last census.'

Mr. BENNETT (Calgary). But, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Pugsley) knows that you have to read the law by the special provisions in regard to Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta. The population of one province may increase by 100,000, while another may increase only 10,000. Manitoba, probably, will not increase as rapidly as the other western provinces. The government will have the information before them by reason of the immigration returns. They should be free to distribute the money according to the necessities of the case, the climatic and other conditions that may arise from year to year.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. There may be something in what is stated by my hon. friend (Mr. Bennett, Calgary). Everybody is aware that the population of the western provinces increases more rapidly than that of the eastern provinces. But that does not take from the principle that the money ought to be distributed according to population, and if according to population, it should be according to population as shown by the census.

Mr. HAUGHTON LENNOX (Simcoe). I had not intended to speak on this subject, although it is one in which I am very much interested. But the leader of the opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) happened to mention my attitude in regard to a former Bill, the one relating to the highways. I realize that I am in a hopeless minority, as it might be expressed, at this time. I am entirely in harmony with the government's attitude that there is no reason whatever for incorporating this proposed amendment in the Bill; I am opposed to that amendment at all events. I am exceedingly glad that the government has decided to aid agriculture. As I said the other day in reference to the Highway Bill, it is a step in the right direction.

I think I will stand alone in the position I take in regard to the system of distribution. The government's policy is that, they shall distribute this money absolutely upon the basis of population. The attiude of the opposition leader is also that it should be distributed upon the basis of population. The only difference between them is whether that principle should be incorporated in the Bill now. I do not want it incorporated in the present Bill, because I do not think it would be right to incorporate it, but since the matter has been mentioned, I would rather like to place on record, my view upon this question as to the system of distribution. My view is that neither the money under the Road Act nor those under this Act, should be distributed upon the basis of population, and I hope, as I said the other day, that the government, having taken this step in advance, will yet come to realize that, whatever party may be in power, the true basis of distribution is the needs of the localities, and not population or conformity to provincial boundaries. I believe that the less sectionalism we have, the better. I believe that we should throw aside all parish politics, and parish legislation, that we should leave to the county councils the duty of providing for the needs of counties, and to the provinces, the duty of providing for the special needs of the provinces; that when we come into this House, whether it is in the selection of cabinet ministers, or as far as may be in the selection of senators, and as far as may be in everything, that we should realize that it is not a question of county or locality or province, but it is a question of the whole of Canada, and that we are legislating for the whole of Canada. I can see that cases will arise and must arise, when it would be more in the interest of Canada as a whole, more for the general advantage of Canada, that we should distribute this money upon the basis of the needs of localities altogether aside from the question of provincial boundaries.

It has been suggested that this may be used for political purposes. I am not afraid of that, I would not be deterred from my course even if the right hon. the leader of the opposition were in power (which God prevent for a long series of years, at all events) because I think the true principle is, that this government have been chosen by the people, upon them has been cast the duty of legislating and providing for the needs of Canada; and they have the right to take upon themselves the duty of determining, and it is their duty to determine from time to time what shall be the basis of the distribution of this money. My answer would be, if I had the power to make the answer: Do not trouble yourselves gentlemen, we are in power, and we are asked by the people to administer this fund, we will take the responsibility and to the people we will be responsible. I would not be afraid of criticism in that position. My view is, that certain portions of Canada are especially adapted for agriculture. Certain other portions of Canada are not so manifestly adapted for agriculture and the government of this country takes a large view of the whole situation, not provincially, but they say: Here is a locality that particularly needs the distribution of a certain amount of money; we are charged with the responsibility of distributing the funds of the people of Canada and whether the criticism is favourable or unfavourable, we will decide that this particular locality, whether it be in Quebec or in Manitoba, shall have this assistance out of this public fund. That position would be subject to criticism. Hon. gentlemen opposite, would perhaps think it was not honestly done, because they have not been accustomed to that sort of thing to any great extent; but wrapt in the consciousness of honesty, knowing I was doing what I absolutely believed to be right, I would disregard the criticism of the opposition and I feel confident that the time will come when we will have sufficiently enlarged ideas in Canada, as to the necessity of obliterating provincial lines to distribute public funds as regards railways and this fund, on the basis of the greatest need of the population and having regard to the general advantage of Canada.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. And suppressing the provinces also.

Mr. LENNOX. Not suppressing the provinces to any degree, but endeavouring that every province shall devote its energies to that particular line of industry best adapted to develop the greatest good for the greatest number of the whole Dominion of Canada and where a section of Canada is especially adapted to mining or fishing or agriculture, we shall bend our energies to develop it along the lines of least resistance, and so seek to promote the general welfare of all without regard to provincial boundaries or local boundaries of any kind.

Mr. OLIVER. It is a good while since there has been heard in any deliberative and representative body in the King's dominions the declaration of the principle so clearly put forward by my hon. friend of the right divine of kings to govern wrong. I think my hon. friend is in a smaller minority even than he supposes in holding that view. But there is this to be said: If it is desirable that special attention should be given to special circumstances in special cases and special localities, there is not any necessity for this Act or of the Highway Act to enable that to be done. If the government hold the view of my hon. friend that there is a certain locality in some certain part of this Dominion wherein agriculture requires assistance on the principle that he lays down, on the principle of responsible government it is for the government of the day to put a sum in the estimates and say why that sum is placed there, and take the responsibility for its expenditure; they do not need this Act to enable them to do that. Why do they have this Act at all? It is to declare a principle. Then if it is to declare a principle, we ask that it declare the principle of the equal right of each province of the Dominion to share in the subsidies of the Dominion.

There is nothing abnormal about the intent of the government; in view of the very large revenue of the country to-day, there is nothing wrong or strange about the government saying: We are to-day receiving into the treasury sums larger than we were in receipt of when confederation was formed; these sums are contributed by the people of all the different provinces, and the proportion of these sums contributed by the citizens of the Dominion at large available for Dominion purposes, is larger than and out of proportion to that available for provincial purposes. It is right and reasonable that under those circumstances the government of the Dominion should submit to parliament a measure for handing back to the provinces some share of this large surplus revenue. That is a perfectly legitimate proposition, and it would embody a perfectly definite and accepted principle.

But it seems to me that, if that is a sound principle and if we should legislate on the subject at all we should embody that principle in our legislation. If we do not believe in it, we do not want to put it into legislation, but if we do believe in it, then I submit that it should be embodied in the legislation. I ask, why should we assume that the various provincial governments are not competent to handle the money that comes into their treasury, whether it comes by way of subsidy, by taxation levied by themselves, or contributed by this Dominion Surely the provincial governments are able to handle their own business, just as the Dominion is able to handle its own business. Why should there be any particular, serious provision in a Bill to say that this money should be handled in the different provinces on conditions to be fixed by the Dominion government? Why should not the money be handed over to the provinces to be disbursed on the responsibility of the provinces? Why are not the government and legislature of the province just as responsible to the people of the province as this parliament and this government are to the people of the whole Dominion? It would almost seem as though the idea of this legislation was that the provincial legislatures and governments were in some sense inferior, or less intelligent, or less responsible, than this government is. That is an assumption that is entirely unwarranted. The provincial legislature represent the people of the province just as the members of this parliament represent the people of the Dominion and the government of each of the provinces represent the people of the province just as this government represent the people of the Dominion. Then why should there be any hesitation, considering that it is right to hand back to the provincial governments for expenditure by them, money taken out of the Dominion revenue which is not provided for in the Confederation Act? Why should there be any hesitation about doing it and saying that we are doing it for that reason and that purpose? Why should this government want to exercise some sort of directive control over the proper functions of government in the various provinces? Why should we assume that they do not know how to build their own roads or aid agriculture within their own limits? Such an assumption is entirely uncalled for. So, I say that if we do intend to follow the principle that we are handing back to the various provinces money that in equity, though not in law, is theirs, let us put it in the Act and say that that is the principle in accordance with the amendment of my hon. friend from St. John. As long as the government refuse to do that, as long as the Bill contains the words and phrases appearing in it as it comes to the House, I must say that the government are asking too much in asking the people to consider that the fixed policy of the government is such as the premier has undertaken to state here to-day. The very fact that there are supporters of his own who hold diametrically opposite views to those he has expressed is a reason for urging that the principle, if there is a principle, should be embodied in the Act.

Mr. CHISHOLM (Antigonish). Mr. Chairman, the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Burrell) has admitted again and again in the course of his remarks that it is the intention to distribute this money according to population. What objection can there be to inserting that in the Act? Is it not more satisfactory to all concerned that that should be embodied in the Act itself? The right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Borden) has said that there is no occasion for it. Yet, at the risk of being regarded as provincial by the hon. member for South Simcoe (Mr. Lennox), and at the risk of talking parish politics, I venture to say that there are people who are not quite as confident of justice being done in the distribution of this money by the present government, or perhaps by succeeding governments, as the hon. member for South Simcoe appears to be. I can understand that the maritime provinces, without any possibility of their territory being enlarged and without any possibility of their population growing proportionately with that of the other provinces, will necessarily become relatively an insignificant part of Canada; that is that their influence will be relatively insignificant. Whilst we have the Premier and the Minister of Marine and Fisheries as the commanding influences in the Cabinet, we have every confidence that justice will be done each year, but they are not to be there always and we know not the day nor the hour when perhaps one, or both, of them will disappear from his present position. We feel that it would be only right and fair that the principle should be set forth in the Bill itself, that each and every province, the smaller as well as the larger, those that are not influential as well as those who have influence, should have an assurance of its fair share of this money. The people of the various provinces are entitled to their relative share of this distribution. There is a surplus of nearly $40,000,000, the treasury is full to overflowing, the different provinces have contributed to this money, and it is only right that each and every one of them should receive its share. We had the budget brought down a short time ago. There was no relief to the farmers of the country in the way of giving them a reduction of taxation. It is a very laudable thing that the government should spend a portion of this large sum in the improvement of roads and encouragement of agriculture. What are they going to do with the surplus taxation taken from the pockets of the people? They do not propose to reduce the customs tariff; the interests will not let them. So no thanks to them if they increase the subsidies to the provinces for the promotion of agriculture and the improvement of roads. If the government lessened the burdens of the people by a reduction in the customs tariff it would be very acceptable to the farmers of the country, but, inasmuch as they will not do that, it is only right that the farmers should be guaranteed their proportionate share of this money by having a section in the Act giving to each province its share in proportion to its population and not leaving it dependant on the sweet will of the government. I think the amendment is a reasonable one.

Amendment (Mr. Pugsley) negatived on division.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Shall section 2 be agreed to?

Mr. HUGHES (Kings, P.E.I.). Perhaps this might be a suitable time to get some information from the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Burrell). I wish to ask him whether it is the intention to increase the acreage at the experimental station at Charlottetown, P. E. I. Perhaps I might ask the question by reading a letter.

Mr. BURRELL. I think it will be as well to bring that upon the estimates. My hon. friend will have an opportunity when the estimates are brought up and perhaps he will defer the matter until then.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Could not the hon. gentleman give the practical object of the legislation and tell us how he intends to encourage agriculture? These are broad terms. Could he specify a little more than he did before?

Mr. BORDEN. It has been made very plain so far. If the government had had in mind some of the considerations that seem to have influenced hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House it could have brought in a large appropriation in general terms and spent it anywhere throughout the country that it saw fit. But it did not think that the wisest or best course, so it proposes to use this Bill as a means of arriving at an arrangement with the provincial governments by which there can be co-operation between the provincial and federal governments. The government proposes to distribute the money, which it will ask parliament to vote for this purpose, in accordance with the population of the various provinces. Hon. gentlemen on the other side ask us upon what principle? The principle is a very plain one; each of the provinces of Canada has or is supposed to have an agricultural department under which money is expended in the interest of the people of the province for aid to agriculture and for agricultural education. We are endeavouring, by means of this statute, to provide that the money voted by this parliament and to be distributed under this Bill shall be expended by the provincial government under such regulations and under such conditions as will ensure to the government and parliament of Canada that it is expended for the purpose for which it is intended. We propose to try that principle here and if that does not succeed we may try some other principle another year. We may try the principle which hon. gentlemen on the other side seem to be fighting for—although I must confess that I cannot understand why they are fighting for it—of giving up the principle of co-operation, and of bringing down instead a grant in aid of agriculture expending it ourselves in the various provinces. We have not thought that was the best course, but there is so much objection to our proposal and so much argument in favour of this other course that perhaps we might take that into consideration. I would suppose that the principle which we have adopted and by which we would call the provincial governments into co-operation, would have commended itself to every man in this House without distinction of party. Instead of that, the proposal of the government made in an eminently fair spirit and to be embodied, so far as the division is concerned, in a plain statute, seems to be viewed with suspicion and distrust. I must confess I cannot understand why. The principle is the encouragement of agriculture by the utilization of provincial machinery and by co-operation with the provincial governments. It seems to me that this is a very easily understood principle; it is a principle I believe from which good results may be expected, but I am bound to say that the other suggestion which seems to be urged so strongly by hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House is worthy of being taken into consideration.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I think my right hon. friend is extremely unfair to members on this side of the House. I did not hear a single member on this side speak against this government co-operating with the provincial governments in encouraging agriculture. My hon. friend must have got angry at some of his own followers because they were not disposed to accept the suggestion of the Minister of Agriculture, that these moneys should be divided on the basis of population. My right hon. friend surely did not hear us on this side correctly. All of us who spoke were in favour of co-operation with the provincial governments, but what we said was: that if it is proposed, as the Minister of Agriculture admits it is the correct thing to do—to apportion these moneys among the different provinces on the basis of population, that parliament in this statute should now lay down the principle on which this money is to be divided. That is all we were arguing for. And surely we have the more reason to argue for that when we find the Minister of Marine rising in his place and saying that he was opposed to binding the government to distribute these moneys according to population, because, he said, there might be cases in which in one province or another it would be necessary to appropriate a larger amount than would be justified on the basis of population. In view of that statement it is hard to believe that this policy was settled upon, as my right hon. friend says it was, by the government before the Bill was brought down. If the policy was settled upon, how is it possible that an influential member of the government could say it is true that so far as we reasonably can we will apportion these moneys on the basis of population, but we want elasticity so that from time to time we may depart from that principle in cases where in the judgment of the Governor in Council it would be necessary to do so. There is no ground whatever for the statement of the Prime Minister that we have opposed liberal encouragement to agriculture or that we have opposed the federal government granting aid to the different provinces and acting in co-operation with the governments of these provinces.

SUPPLY.

House in Committee of Supply.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds). I move that item 248, for a grant of $100,000 to the National Battlefields Commission, be struck out, as I intend to have the vote brought down in the supplementary estimates, with appropriate wording to meet the requirements of the statute.

Mr. EMMERSON. I trust that the Finance Minister, in making his amendment, will make it so comprehensive that it will include the battlefields of the Dominion other than those of Quebec. There are the old forts of Beau Sejour and Gaspereaux in New Brunswick, and Fort Lawrence in the county of Cumberland in Nova Scotia, and a number of others, and I hope he will take into consideration the preservation of all these old battlefields and forts, which certainly have been too long neglected.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds). At present I am dealing only with this Battlefields Commission with respect to Quebec. The other matters to which my hon. friend has referred will have our consideration, but it is not possible for us to deal with them this year. I do not say that it will be possible for us to deal with them at any particular time in the future, but the matter to which my hon. friend has called attention, is, I am sure, one in which we are all interested.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I do not suppose it is the intention of the government to change the present personnel of the commission?

Mr. WHITE (Leeds). I have no information to give my hon. friend as to that.

Mr. PUGSLEY.

Mr. EMMERSON. The Finance Minister says that nothing can be done this year, and he cannot give any assurance when anything can be done, as to these old forts and historic battlefields. I want to impress upon him this fact, that unless something is done soon, the day will have gone when anything can be done. Fort Cumberland or Fort Beau Sejour are fast crumblig, and unless something is done speedily, they will simply be a memory. At Fort Lawrence and at Fort Gaspereaux on Baie Verte similar conditions prevail. If anything is to be done to wrest these places from the process of decay, it must be done speedily. I think the attention of this government has been called to this matter. I know that the attention of the former government was called to it, and it was put off, as is too often the case with all governments. If the government would make some announcement with respect to taking early action in this matter, I think the country would hear it with pleasure and gratification.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I may say that the late government had this matter under consideration, and a proposition was made to enlarge the scope of the National Battlefields Commission. There did not seem to be any reason why that should not be done. The gentlemen who are serving the country very acceptably on this commission do not get any compensation for their services, and it seems to me that it will be pre-eminently the work of the commission to take charge of the matters outlined by the hon. member for Westmorland. Several months ago I brought this matter before the House, and the hon. Minister of Militia referred to it as a matter of great importance on which the government would take early action. He expressed unbounded enthusiasm at the idea, and I would have thought that the Minister of Finance would have been prepared to have enlarged the scope of this commission. A few words put in the Bill would be all that would be necessary.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds). I think that the commission should be consulted with regard to such a matter. Individually, I am in entire sympathy with the preservation of our battlefields and all historic points in Canada. I have had in mind the possibility of enlarging the scope of the commission, but as the expenditure for this year is comparatively large, it is probably as much as the government may feel called upon to make this year. The question of enlarging the scope of the commission is a matter which will have to be left for future consideration, as there is not a great deal of time left this session.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). I may say that the proposition meets with my very hearty endorsation, but inasmuch as we have a Battlefields Commission, I presume it would be more appropriate that such an item should be placed at the disposal of that commission. Whatever items may be set apart for dealing with our Canadian battlefields belong, I should imagine, to that commission.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Let us get the item first.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). The item, of course, will have to be considered. The matter has not yet been discussed in council, but as soon as it is in shape my hon. friend will have full information in connection with it. Whatever has been said in regard to the matter has been most sympathetically received by my colleagues, to whom I have spoken.

Mr. EMMERSON. Sympathy is cheap, it is money we want.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Sympathy is a good thing to start with.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). There are certain persons who like to indulge in promises without performing them, I need not say that it is not our intention to proceed along those lines.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I may say to my hon. friend the reason we were greatly discouraged when he was absent from the chamber was that the Minister of Finance, with that care for the treasury which of course, it is proper he should have, rather led us to believe that nothing would be done this year.

Mr. BEATTIE. While this matter is before the House I would like to draw attention to two very celebrated forts at Niagara, Fort George, and Fort Missauga. These forts are opposite the United States frontier where the American forts are kept in good condition. It will be a disgrace to Canada if the forts on the Canadian side are not kept in an equally good state of repair, more especially as it will not require a very large expenditure for that purpose.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). I will take the liberty of bringing the matter to the attention of the Battlefields Commission.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Let me call the attention of the Minister of Militia to the old fortification at Chambly, not very far from my own county of Rouville. This is one of the finest pieces of old military architecture to be found in the country. The fortifications have been well preserved up to a few years ago when the government of Canada spent a few thousand dollars to repair the fortifications, and to restore the names of the great soldiers and captains who fought there under the French Régime, but lately I have noticed that the old fort was crumbling and giving signs of decay. I do not think that all the fortifications, all the old landmarks, should be placed under the control of the Quebec Battlefields Commission, because that body has one object in view. I believe the time has come when we should take into serious consideration the conditions of all the old military landmarks of the country. I would mention also the old fortifications at L'Isle-aux-Noix which were beautifully built by the English officers about a century ago, and are very historic. These fortifications are also crumbling, and I specially draw the attention of the Minister of Militia to the fact. We should not rest satisfied with mere words on this matter, because, as the English proverb has it, 'fine words butter no parsnips.' Let the minister act heroically in this matter and see that a sum is placed in the estimates, and that a systematic policy dealing with the preservation of the historic military landmarks of the country, is adopted, for the perpetuation of the memories of the heroes of the past, and for the education of the young men of this country. Some years ago a monument was erected at Chateaugay to commemorate the valorous deeds of Canadians there, and a similar monument was put up at Niagara, but we should not forget that in other sections of the country there are landmarks which also call for consideration and attention.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria, Ontario). The hon. gentleman would not expect the present government, which has only been in office for a few months, to attempt to perform what he and his colleagues failed to do in 15 years of Liberal administration. He will surely give us breathing space at the beginning of our term of office and allow us time to demonstrate our intentions, if not our promises, in this matter.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds). All that has been said confirms me in the view that this matter should be dealt with in a comprehensive manner, either by the Quebec Battlefields Commission or some other commission. The whole question should be taken up and so dealt with, instead of dealing with it piecemeal and in hugger-mugger fashion. I am quite sure the proposal will have the sympathy of every man on this side of the House if treated comprehensively. Because this is not a party question, it is a question in which we would all heartily support the government in dealing with it in a proper and comprehensive manner. So far as I am concerned, speaking for myself, I am heartily in sympathy with what has been said. It is only as to the method employed that there may perhaps be any divergence of opinion. I am entirely in accord with the idea that legislation should be passed authorizing some commission to take up the whole question, so that it may be dealt with in a thorough and comprehensive way.

Mr. McKENZIE. The discussion that has taken place this afternoon may be regarded as a basis for further inquiry upon this subject, and I do not wish the Minister of Militia and his colleagues to lose sight of the old fortifications at Louisburg. I was waiting for some other hon. gentleman to mention this grand old fortress, but as nothing has been said, I deem it proper now to bring the fortifications of Louisburg to the notice of the government. The old casements and other parts of those fortifications are just as much intact to-day as they were during the French régime at Louisburg, and we should take care that they are preserved as well as can be. An interesting point that I might mention is, that a former captain in the English army Capt. Kennedy, who spent some years of his life at Louisburg and died there, made provision in his will towards the upkeep of the fortification at Louisburg in co-operation with government assistance, so that the conditions as they existed at the time of the siege might be, as far as possible, maintained. I simply mention this matter so that when the government are dealing with this question, Louisburg shall not be forgotten.

Naval Service, including purchase and maintenance of ships, the maintenance and up-keep of dockyards at Esquimalt and and Halifax, and the establishment and maintenance of training school, $1,660,000.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Will the minister please explain this item?

Mr. HAZEN. This item is prepared on the basis of maintaining the present ships and establishments in full working order without undertaking any new work other than is necessary for the efficient maintenance of those ships and establishments. It is estimated this amount will be sufficient for the purpose. The vote is made up as follows:—

Pay, &c., of officers and men for 'Niobe,' 'Rainbow,' and College—	$583,080
Stores, including guns for the above	533,900
Repairs to ships and vessels (mainly 'Niobe')	200.000
Repairs to dockyard machinery at Halifax and Esquimalt	13,000
Miscellaneous, dockyard services at Halifax and Esquimalt	44,444
Miscellaneous, other services	118,600
Repairs and maintenance of buildings	36,300
Provision of additional gear for the College	$ 5,500
Purchase of new machinery for the dockyards at Halifax and Esquimalt	19,200
New buildings and other works	41,276
Construction of lighters, water-tank and other service boats	64,5000
Total	$1,660,000

If hon. gentlemen want any further information regarding these different items I have that information under my hand, and will be very glad to give it to them. I may say pending the declaration of what the policy of this government will be touching the naval service—which as my hon. friends know the Prime Minister announced in the debate on the address would not be determined until after full opportunity was had of considering the whole question and of first consulting with the Admiralty authorities in the matter—it has been thought better that the estimates this year should be based on the idea of maintaining the existing ships and the existing establishments, including the Naval College at Halifax, on a proper basis, without adding new ships or adding to the equipment we have at the present time more than is necessary for the purpose of maintaining it in proper condition. It is on that basis entirely that the estimates are made up this year.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I notice that my hon. friends who represent the interests of the province of Quebec in the government have all vanished. They disappeared at the announcement that we might discuss the Naval service this afternoon. I am sorry for that; I should like to have seen them here. But let me be very frank with my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen) and tell him, notwithstanding the absence of his colleagues from Quebec, that each and every one of the Quebec ministers, in their respective constituencies, and at large public meetings in my province during the last election contest, and before that contest, solemnly promised the people that if a government should be formed under the leadership of the right hon. member from Halifax, (Mr. Borden) then, as soon as parliament should be convened, every sign, every vestige of a Naval service would disappear from the blue-book, that the naval policy of the Laurier government would be wiped out and that we should never hear any thing about it again. Let me tell my hon. friend also, as I have already stated in his presence elsewhere, that he has no idea of the fight, of the struggle, which took place in our province during the last general election on this naval question. We were told by the Minister of Public works (Mr. Monk) by the Postmaster General (Mr. Pelletier) and by the Minister of Inland Revenue (Mr. Nantel) that our policy was suicidal, that we were selling our birthright to Great Britain, and that the time had come for Canada to assert herself and to do away with all this imperialism and this whole naval expenditure. We on our part, resisted those appeals, appeals of the worst kind, that were made in our province against the naval policy; we stood to our guns like men; and we educated public opinion in the province of Quebec to such an extent that on the 21st of September last we returned a majority of members of that province, pledged to a naval policy. Of course, the members returned in favour of the late government were pledged, I am glad to say to the Liberal policy. I say our campaign was a campaign of education and it was carried on against the declaration on the other side that if we were defeated every vestige of the navy would disappear from the blue-books and that there would be no expenditure whatever on such a service.

Now, I am surprised to see such a large amount of money in the estimates for the maintainance of that naval policy. People are being told every day, in our province, not only in the newspapers but at public meetings, that the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Borden) intends to wipe out the navy from his programme. On the other hand we read in another section of the press, and learn of speeches on other platforms, that after consultation with the admiralty, a new policy will be evolved which will mean something while the old policy meant nothing.

Now, I want an authoritative statement from the hon. gentleman (Mr. Hazen) who is at the head of the Naval Department. We on this side of the House are not opposed to a Canadian navy; far from it. And in my own province I would be ready to take up the cudgels again to-morrow and fight the same battle that we fought before the 21st of September last. Public education has been effected in that regard in spite of the Quebec ministers of the government and their followers in the House. I want the hon. gentleman to speak plainly on this question and to say to the country whether we are to have a navy—yes, or no. Whether we are to have a contribution—yes, or no. Then we can debate whether that contribution should be given or not. The naval policy should be above politics. Canada is pledged to do something. But there are certain members who represent especially the interests of the province of Quebec, who are pledged against it; and so are their followers in this House. Now, let us be frank about it. Why shilly-shally? why speak one way for one province, and another way for another province? Our words will reach the heart of the empire, and Great Britain will know whether Canada will do something for the maintenance of Britain's supremacy on the seas or not. My hon. friend (Mr. Hazen) will consult the admiralty. I know his fine Imperial spirit. I may disagree with him on the lines of the policy he may pursue. But is it not time to know distinctly whether Canada will do something or not. I believe that the country has declared in favour of certain aid to be given to Great Britain to maintain her naval supremacy. I say it would be unbecoming on the part of the Canadian people through their representatives to say that a certain policy was pursued by the late government, but we are going to wipe it out from the statute-book and do nothing. That is what is being said in the province of Quebec to-day; that is what is being repeated from platform after platform and in every newspaper of a certain stripe in that province. During the last election and since the last election they have equivocated as to what they will do and they are equivocating amongst the partisans of the Postmaster General (Mr. Pelletier) in Quebec to-day whether they will do something or nothing. The time has come to speak firmly and plainly. If it is the province of Quebec the hon. gentleman (Mr. Hazen) is afraid of, let him not be afraid. In Quebec he will find a majority of His Majesty's loyal subjects ready to stand for a Canadian navy that will do its share for the maintenance of the supremacy of Britain on the seas. Those opposed to that principle are but a minority, and a very insignificant minority at that.

Mr. PELLETIER. Returning to the House after an absence of a few minutes, I am told that my hon. friend from Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) has used the same means as were used on a former occasion to say that I was out of the House when this question was discussed. I am never out of the House when my duty calls me here. And I am not afraid to discuss this question with the hon. gentleman now or at any other time.

Mr. LEMIEUX. What are you going to do?

Mr. PELLETIER. I will tell the hon. gentleman if he will wait a minute. In this House I give my mind and say what I think. But I wish to make clear the point I mentioned first, so that certain newspapers in Montreal to-morrow may have no reason to say that I ran out of the House because I was afraid of what might fall upon me coming from the important member from Rouville. I am going to tell my hon. friend from Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) that he is not stating the facts as they are when he speaks as he has just spoken. I shall ask him to tell me at what public meeting since the elections the stand indicated by him a moment ago was taken.

Mr. LEMIEUX. When my hon. friend was returned by acclamation he made a speech at Lorette in the province of Quebec at which he announced that at last the people would be free from that naval policy that the Borden government has decided not to have any naval question to bother them and that something better than the repeal of the Bill would take place.

Mr. PELLETIER. I said then and I say now that I am opposed to the scheme of the late government, that it is a bad thing. I said then as I say now that when the leader of the present government on the debate on the address took up this question he made declarations which were perfectly satisfactory to us and which were satisfactory in the province of Quebec. Those are the facts which we stated in Quebec.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Not much facts in that.

Mr. PELLETIER. I am not going to be responsible for people in some quarters——

Mr. LEMIEUX. In your own paper?

Mr. PELLETIER. The hon. member for Rouville will not find it in my own paper. I have no paper.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Does my hon. friend state he has no paper?

Mr. PELLETIER. I do.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I must tell my hon. friend that I took the precaution of getting from the court-house in Quebec a declaration of the ownership of 'L'Evenement,' of Quebec, and I find the name of my hon. friend the Postmaster General quite prominent amongst the directors and joint owners of 'L'Evenement.'.

Mr. PELLETIER. My hon. friend is dealing with ancient history. I was at one time one of the directors of the paper, but I inform my hon. friend that I am not now.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Since when?

Mr. PELLETIER. I do not remember the dates but I can get them for my hon. friend. I thought it was more becoming for a member of this government not to have any interest in any of the newspapers of this country which might be called upon to publish advertisements for this government and I gave away, transferred all my interests in that paper and I think it was the right thing to do. But my hon. friend will not find in that paper anything like what he has said this afternoon and I defy him to find anything of the kind.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Get me the paper.

Mr. PELLETIER. I am not going to look for something that is not there. If he wants it he will have to hunt it up himself.

Mr. PELLETIER.

We from the province of Quebec have been misrepresented on this question, not only to-day but from the very day the debate in this House began. We have been told that we went around the province of Quebec and declared that we were against any policy at all.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Hear, hear.

Mr. PELLETIER. That is not the stand we have taken. The right hon. the leader of the opposition said one day in this House that we had taken the stand that the children of Canadians were going to be disembowelled.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Hear, hear.

Mr. PELLETIER. And that was tantamount to cowardice. I may tell my right hon. friend now, that I am against any policy, naval or other, which will put the Canadians of this country who are going to fight for this country in a position to be disembowelled without fighting. I have taken the stand that the policy of the late government was to send Canadians on such ships, that if they should meet the enemy they would not be within range to fight and that these ships would be sunk before having a chance to fight.

Mr. SINCLAIR. Is my hon. friend aware that at the present moment there are four battleships of the same type as was proposed by the late government, being built in Great Britain, and that they will be launched during the present season, and added to the navy of Great Britain?

Mr. PELLETIER. Those are the things which we said to the province of Quebec. I do not regret it, I am of that opinion now, but we in the province of Quebec, have been told by the hon. member during the debate on the address that there was an anti-British party in the province of Quebec.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. PELLETIER. I want to tell him that there is no such thing in the province of Quebec, that the people of our province are British subjects and loyal British subjects—although I am afraid that if this cry goes forth that there is an anti-British party in Quebec, there may be one in some quarters—but the cry to-day is absolutely erroneous, not to say a lie.

We have taken a certain stand on this question. We were absolutely opposed to the naval policy propounded by the late government. What did we find when we came into power with reference to the ten or eleven ships which were to be built on the lines of the policy of my hon. friends opposite? We found that the very men who were in charge of that service, had made reports in which they stated that when the last of these ships would leave the navy yard, they would be obsolete and of no use. Are you surprised that we were opposed to such a policy as that? We were not naval experts but we thought we were telling Quebec what was right in taking that stand, and arriving here, we found that Admiral Kingsmill and Commander Roper were of the same opinion as ourselves. I think that was pretty good justification. Now we are face to face with this question. The government have not had time to go into it, but we have never declared that there would be no policy at all; we adhere, one and all, to the declarations made here by the Prime Minister and those declarations are to the effect that something will be done, that a new policy will be put before this country. With those declarations my right hon. friend has no right to say what he has said. When this policy has been carefully studied, it will be put before parliament, and the country. Those are the declarations made, and it may be that my hon. friends opposite, who had such hopes of seeing this government go to pieces on certain rocks, and who have been disappointed so far, still hope that something might come up to wreck this government. The hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) says that now is the time to speak, that he must know now where this government stands. We are just going to take our time. The government declared that this question should be looked into, and carefully studied, and if the hon. member for Rouville is so impatient about a policy I can only say that the policy which will be put before this country by this government, will be a much better one than the one which he himself, as a member of the late government, put before the country and which was disapproved.

In the last general election, if it had not been for the appeals which were made to the people of my province that the Prime Minister for the time being was a French Canadian and a Catholic, there would not have been a majority in that province of Quebec to approve of the policy which gave us a 'Rainbow' and a 'Niobe.'

Mr. CARVELL. My hon. friend the Postmaster General (Mr. Pelletier) says that the party which he represents in Quebec is not afraid to fight, but that when they fight they want to be in a position to fight and not to fight upon vessels that are so small and so imperfectly equipped that they will not be within the firing line. Does my hon. friend mean to say—and I hope he will give me an answer to this question—that he and his party will take a vote to provide for efficient vessels that will be in the fight, and that his French friends in Quebec will not be massacred, but will stand up and fight like men?

Mr. PELLETIER. I can tell my hon. friend that when French-Canadians were called upon in the past they did their duty nobly to their country. That is what they did when they fought at Chateauguay.

Mr. CARVELL. But my hon. friend is not answering the question. Answer the question.

Mr. PELLETIER. I will answer the question in my own way.

Mr. CARVELL. Ah!

Mr. PELLETIER. The hon. gentleman would like me to tell the committee what is going to be the policy of this government when the government has not had time to consider its policy.

Mr. CARVELL. I cannot make you answer.

Mr. PELLETIER. The hon. gentleman will not make me answer questions which have not been considered by this government. This question has not been considered by the government. My hon. friend may try as much as he likes to make party capital out of it, but this government has taken the stand that there is no policy which it has looked into, but that this matter will be taken up later, at which time a plan governed by the necessities of the question will be considered.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. My hon. friend the Postmaster General has taken refuge on the ground that he was opposed to the Laurier policy. That is the way he put it to-day before the House. He knows as well as I do—and if he denies it I will not bandy words with him—that the position which his party took in the last election, and ever since the Naval Bill was introduced in 1910, was that Canada owed absolutely nothing to England and that there was no need for any policy at all.

Mr. PELLETIER. When I heard words to that effect uttered in the province of Quebec I said that for all the years I had lived I had thought it was wrong to say that we owed nothing to England. My hon. friend will never find anything of that kind on my lips.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I said a moment ago that I would not bandy words with my hon. friend. I never heard him speak, but I read some speeches upon this point, and I maintain that the policy which was followed by his friends in Quebec during the last campaign and previously, ever since the month of June, 1910, when the Naval Bill was introduced, was that Canada owed nothing to England, that they were against any naval policy and that, if they were not to be disembowelled upon the seas of China and Japan, it was not because they were not to be put upon imperial ships, but because they were not to be put upon any ships at all. We heard in this very House the declaration that this policy would mean conscription, and the hon. gentleman knows as well as I do that his friends stated during the campaign that the children of the people would be taken by force and put upon the decks of these ships to fight for England. My hon. friend can take any position he likes upon the present occasion as to what he did or did not say—I would not contradict him even if I knew to the contrary, but I leave it to those who heard him and who heard his friends. I hope that his words of to-day will be reported in the province of Quebec just as he has spoken them, for nothing will be better for the peace of the country than that for once we have it from the mouth of himself and his associates that Canada owes something to England. The hon. gentleman says that he was opposed to the Laurier policy. Everybody heard him say that. He and his friends declared themselves as being opposed to that policy and they said that the first thing which would be done would be to repeal it. One of the first things which was done by one of the followers of the present government was to put a question to the leader of the government whether or not the naval law would be repealed during the present session. That was the course advocated by the party in office, or the wing of the party coming from the province of Quebec; they threatened that as soon as the late government had been defeated that policy would be repealed. Well, it is not yet repealed. It is, in part in force. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries, or the Minister of Naval Service (Mr. Hazen) asks for an appropriation of $1,660,000, for what?—to carry on the naval policy of the Laurier government. That is very far from what was expected by the people of Quebec who voted in favour of the members of the government from that province. They never expected that they would be called upon to vote one dollar for the maintenance and support of the naval policy introduced by the Laurier government. They did not suppose that they would be called upon to vote any such money as that, and if anybody in this House had stated to the electors of the county of Quebec or of Champlain county that they would be called upon to vote over a million dollars to carry out the naval law which was then on the statute-book I am satisfied there would have been a different vote in the province of Quebec. But, it was because these promises were made that hon. gentlemen opposite had the measure of success which they achieved in that province. Now, it is indicated in these estimates that parliament will appropriate $1,660,000. What for? The naval law asks for the creation of a Naval Department. The Naval Department is maintained. The naval law asks for the creation of a naval college. The naval college is maintained. The only thing that is dropped off is the building of warships for which we had invited tenders. In the course of time I do not know what will be done by the government after they have conferred with Great Britain. But, I know what will be the answer of Great Britain. Whatever answer they will have in the future, at the present time they are providing the money for carrying out the naval law. What is it that they provide for? They provide for a naval college with a naval staff; they provide for all the frills and feathers of the naval service, but they do not provide for building ships. We shall have no tin-pot navy! But we shall have a gold lace navy; we shall have an admiral, commodore and captains, but we shall have no sailors. That is what is provided for by these estimates. I find no fault with the estimates and we are ready to vote the money. What will the answer of the British government be when my hon. friend goes over to the other side in order to get that answer? We have it already and we have had it since 1909? At the conference that took place in 1909, which was called by the British government and at which all the dominions were represented, Canada, Australia, New Zealand and South Africa, the first thing the British government asked for was a contribution. We were not in favour of a contribution. Whether or not the present government are in favour of a contribution remains to be seen; we will have to wait for that.

The next thing that was asked for was a fleet unit on the Pacific, and for reasons intimated more than once during last parliament, we did not think it advisable to have a unit on the Pacific only; we thought we must have a service both on the Pacific and the Atlantic—a moderate service to begin because we had to commence in a moderate way—but at all events it was accepted. I shall not anticipate what may be the policy of the present government on the navy but after their return from England we will have an opportunity of judging of it. I have simply to repeat that the naval law is maintained by this government, and that whatever my hon. friend say to the contrary I am glad for my part that he is forced to go back on the language he used last election and to retain the naval policy of the late government.

Mr. PELLETIER. The right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) says he had no occasion to hear what I had to say in the last election, but if that is so it is his own fault. When the leader of the opposition was going around the province of Quebec he singled out the county I represent to speak in at the last minute, when he knew he could not be answered, and so he called a big meeting in my county on the afternoon of the day before the voting. I then sent a telegram to the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) asking him to allow me to appear with my friends at that meeting and I would give him a chance of hearing what I had to say. That request the right hon. gentleman refused. Therefore, if the right hon. gentleman had no opportunity to hear me on that occasion, he had nobody to blame but himself for it. I suppose the right hon. the leader of the opposition remembers that incident; at all events I do. I shall not qualify his action in refusing me a hearing but I may say that it is the first time I ever heard of the leader of a great party going, on the eve of an election, into a county, when he could not be answered, and refusing the candidate on the other side an opportunity to speak. If the right hon. gentleman is much surprised to-day in finding a vote for the navy in the estimates, I may tell him that I am not, and I may tell him further that that vote is absolutely logical and consistent with the policy of the Conservative party. When we came into power we found certain conditions existing; we found that a naval college had been built at Halifax and that two ships had been purchased. Does the right hon. gentleman mean to say that we should have set fire to that college and sunk those two ships? It is true that one of them had met with a bad accident on a certain trip down in Yarmouth, but, nevertheless, we found her there with the other ship, both belonging to Canada. As we had no opportunity to put a naval policy before the country, was it not reasonable and sensible to do as we have done and to say that we would not build these other ten ships which were proposed by the late government, sending back the cheques which had been put in with the tenders and declaring to the country that the ships would not be built? We had under the circumstances to continue what the late government had put into operation. It would have been ridiculous, even for those so called bad Nationalists in Quebec, without one moment of consideration, to close the naval college and give the ships to some other country. That would not be reasonable. I may say that when this government has looked into the question, the policy which shall be brought forward and which shall have the support of all the people of this country, French-Canadian and English-Canadian alike, will be a policy that every one will regard in a broad-minded spirit as this government shall regard it. I am not taking here at the present moment any stand different from that which I have taken in the province of Quebec. I know that some people have said: we owe nothing to the empire. I am not of that opinion. I believe that we owe to the British Empire the protection of the liberties which we enjoy in this country and which are dear to us. We French Canadians think as much of the Union Jack as do the people of any other race or creed in this country, and nobody will ever find a word from me even suggesting anything to the contrary. And, Sir, that is the opinion of the French Canadian people of the province of Quebec to-day, and it has been the opinion of the French Canadians of Quebec for years and years. You will not find to-day in any part of the province of Quebec any support for a proposal for annexation to the country south of us; we are British subjects; we are glad that we are British subjects. And, even although some men may say: we owe nothing to the British Empire; yet if the French Canadians had a chance to-day to go back to the French flag they would stay with the British flag under which they have enjoyed their liberties. That is the sentiment of the province of Quebec, and although that sentiment may be distorted for political and party ends, I say that the province of Quebec is as loyal to the empire as any other province.

Mr. LEMIEUX. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Pelletier) has one language for this House and another language for his electors, and for the people of the district of Quebec when he addresses them on public questions. I state here most positively that during the election campaign the Postmaster General was one of the worst sinners on the question of the navy to be found in the province of Quebec First of all he did not run as a straight Conservative candidate.

Mr. PELLETIER. I did.

Mr. LEMIEUX. You did?

Mr. PELLETIER. Yes, I did.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Well, Mr. Chairman, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Pelletier) has more brass than the 'Niobe' ever used up in her construction.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I withdraw the remark if it is offensive.

Mr. PELLETIER. It is not offensive, coming from you.

Mr. LEMIEUX. My hon. friend (Mr. Pelletier) has the audacity to state that he did not run as a Nationalist during the last campaign. Has he the audacity to say so now in this House?

Mr. PELLETIER. Shall I answer now?

Mr. LEMIEUX. Yes.

Mr. PELLETIER. I will tell the hon. gentleman——

Mr. LEMIEUX. Give the answer, yes or no, because on that point I will read what the hon. gentleman says in his own newspaper.

Mr. PELLETIER. If the hon. member takes his seat I will give the answer.

Mr. LEMIEUX. My hon. friend (Mr. Pelletier) is not going to give a straight answer. I will give the answer, as the hon. gentleman insists he did not run as a Nationalist last election. My hon. friend is one of the proprietors of 'L'Evenement' of Quebec. True, he has told us that he is no longer one of the proprietors of that newspaper, and I accept his word, but he was one of the proprietors during a part of the session, as I have ascertained from the records of the Quebec Court House. But, when he was a co-proprietor of 'L'Evenement,' speaking after the elections in the county of Montmagny, represented by young Armand Lavergne, who was his master during the last election, who was his guide spiritual and temporal during the last election, speaking in the county of Montmagny, in the presence of Mr. Lavergne, to celebrate the victory of my hon. friend from Montmagny (Mr. L'Esperance), here is what my hon. friend (Mr. Pelletier) stated, and I quote from 'L'Evenement' of Tuesday, the 3rd of October, 1911, when he was fresh from his triumph with forty majority in Quebec county.

Mr. PELLETIER. It is better than being beaten in Gaspé.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I did not catch what my hon. friend said.

Mr. PELLETIER. I said that forty majority was better than being beaten in Gaspé.

Mr. LEMIEUX. But I was defeated as a straight Liberal, and my hon. friend (Mr. Pelletier) has been defeated under all colours and all shades for the last twenty years.

But let me quote what the hon. gentleman says; and I am glad you are in the chair, Mr. Chairman, because you were yourself a witness to what took place:

> Mr. Pelletier assured the electors that the French Canadian Conservative members from the province of Quebec would be less the representatives of their counties than the representatives of their race. He proclaimed himself a Nationalist and proud to be a Nationalist. The day will come when there will be no more Nationalist groups, but when the Nationalist spirit shall have invaded the whole country.

Was not my hon. friend a Nationalist on the 21st of September last, and before that? A few weeks before the election, he proclaimed boldly, in the presence of his master, Mr. Lavergne, that he was a Nationalist, and that he hoped to bring the whole Conservative fold under the magic wand of the Nationalist party in the province of Quebec. And now my hon. friend says that no racial appeals were made by the Nationalist party. He will not deny, I am sure, that Mr. Bourassa is the leading spirit of the Nationalist party in the province of Quebec. My hon. friend took his instructions from Mr. Bourassa, and from Mr. Lavergne. He would never have been a candidate in the county of Quebec if he had not sworn allegiance to Nationalist principles. Mr. Bourassa publishes the gospel of the Nationalist party in the province of Quebec, 'Le Devoir.' Now let us see what kind of literature was used by my hon. friend and by every other Nationalist candidate against the naval policy of the Laurier government:

> Mr. Laurier did not stop at the violation of the Canadian constitution; from his own admission, by taking, without authorization, the money of the Canadian people to arm the Canadian troops and to have Canada participate in this infamous war (South African war); his cynicism carried him to the point of proclaiming—in the full light of parliament—that this war was the most just that England had ever carried on. No responsible statesman, not even Mr. Chamberlain, had ever dared to go so far. Yes, the Nestor of the Imperial Conference, the Canadian Washington, found it right and good that 50,000 men should be massacred, millions of farms to be burnt and ravaged, peaceful homes to be pillaged, women to be outraged, and little children to be shut up in pestilential camps, where they died like flies. English and Afrikander soldiers who fell on the veldt for the glory of Chamberlain, women who died from shame or misery for the glorification of Laurier, children whose entrails have dried up in the concentration camps for the honour of the empire.

This was not published at the time the contingents were sent to South Africa. It was published during the last campaign by my hon. friend's party leader, whom he followed very modestly and very humbly. Did it arouse the racial feeling of the French-Canadians? With all the incendiary speeches delivered by the hon. gentleman, with all the incendiary speeches delivered by the Minister of Inland Revenue, and with all the incendiary speeches delivered by the Minister of Public Works, I am proud to say that the province of Quebec gave a majority in favour of the naval policy of the Laurier government; and I say to my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, that if he comes back from London with a similar policy, he will have, and the government of this country will have, the support of the whole province of Quebec notwithstanding the appeals made by the firebrand whom I see in my presence just now.

Mr. PELLETIER. Never mind big words. The hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) has thought fit, since the beginning of this session, to throw mud at a great many people.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Mr. Chairman, I rise—

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I should have risen a little earlier, to call the hon. member to order for using the word 'firebrand.'

Mr. PELLETIER. The hon. member for Rouville is very thin-skinned.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I am in good humour.

Mr. PELLETIER. It does not seem so. The hon. member is in the habit of attacking the honour and the reputation of the most honest men of his province.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Whom?

Mr. PELLETIER. The hon. member used to be very courteous. I do not know whether or not it is the cold shades of opposition that have angered him, but he has acquired the new habit of calling people names and of assailing the reputation of such men as Mr. Ducharme, one of the most respectable men in Montreal.

Mr. LEMIEUX. A notorious boodler.

Mr. PELLETIER. I can only say I am surprised. I wish the hon. member for Rouville would repeat outside of the House what he says in this House against Mr. Ducharme, so that he might be called upon to answer. From his seat in the House, protected by the privilege of a member of the House of Commons, he is able to say a great many things which he would not dare to say outside of the House. I invite him now to repeat these words against Mr. Ducharme outside of the precincts of this House.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Come back to the navy.

Mr. PELLETIER. The hon. member for Rouville went outside of the navy and I have followed him. Now, I have no advice to give to the hon. member, but if the ordinary rules of debate are to be followed in this House, I think he will have to change the course he has adopted lately of calling people names.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Arch-traitor—did I say that?

Mr. PELLETIER. You said Mr. Ducharme was a boodler.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I still say so.

Mr. PELLETIER. Say so outside of the House like a man.

Mr. LEMIEUX. And you appointed him commissioner.

Mr. PELLETIER. If you said so, you could not prove it.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I know him too well.

Mr. PELLETIER. The hon. member has quoted from speeches made by certain gentlemen in the province of Quebec.

Mr. LEMIEUX. The Postmaster General.

Mr. PELLETIER. No, the last quotation which he has made is not from me, and I would not be very much surprised if he had quoted from the 'Toronto Globe.'

Mr. LEMIEUX. No, I quoted a translation from 'Le Devoir.' Do you deny it?

Mr. PELLETIER. Let me proceed.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Lemieux), has no right to interrupt.

Mr. PELLETIER. The Toronto 'Globe' has the habit of publishing reports of public speeches delivered in the province of Quebec which are absolutely erroneous, and of such a character as to deceive the public. I am not responsible for what the Toronto 'Globe' says, and I do not want to be responsible for the statements appearing in that journal. I have stated my position before this House, and I am prepared to compare my stand with the stand which the hon. member for Rouville took in a letter published in 1903, in which he said that he was absolutely opposed to helping England in her wars and sending anybody from Canada to fight her battles. There sitting opposite me is the hon. gentleman who called certain people arch traitors——

Mr. LEMIEUX. I meant your friends.

Mr. PELLETIER—because they would not adopt the hon. gentleman's policy. A potion of the letter to which I refer was read in the House the other day by the Prime Minister, and I am going to have copies of that letter distributed to all our friends in the House, so that when the ocassion presents itself they may show to the people of Canada what kind of a loyal British subject the hon. member for Rouville has become. Unfortunately I do not happen to have that letter under my hand at the present moment, but the hon. member for Rouville admitted that he wrote it.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Yes.

Mr. PELLETIER. Does the hon. gentleman still believe in the sentiments to be found in that letter?

Mr. LEMIEUX. Yes, I can subscribe to each word contained in that letter. I asked the Prime Minister at that time to read the whole letter, but he only read an extract.

Mr. PELLETIER. The Prime Minister read enough to make the House understand that the hon. gentleman was opposed to going to war to protect England's interests.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Have you got a copy of the letter there?

Mr. PELLETIER. I could get it in five minutes, it is in my office.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Get it as soon as possible, and read it.

Mr. PELLETIER. If some hon. gentleman will hold the floor I will go to my office now and get the letter, and have it placed on 'Hansard.'

Mr. PUGSLEY. I want to take advantage of the interval during the Postmaster General's absence, to say a few words upon the excuse which the Minister of Marine and Fisheries gave during the debate on the address, for the government not proceeding to let the contract for the building of the ten war vessels for Canada, after tenders for their construction had been invited by the late government. I see that my hon. friend the Postmaster General has returned, and perhaps he would like an opportunity of concluding his remarks.

Mr. PELLETIER. I would be greatly obliged to my hon. friend if he would accord me that privilege.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Then I will yield the floor to the hon. gentleman, and take the opportunity of speaking later.

Mr. PELLETIER. This letter, of which I have a great many copies, bears the signature 'Rodolphe Lemieux.'

Mr. LEMIEUX. I never change my name to Zandring.

Mr. PELLETIER. When the hon. gentleman is cornered——

Mr. LEMIEUX. Not by any means.

Mr. PELLETIER. When he does not not know what to say, when he is confronted with a letter which contains his condemnation——

Mr. LEMIEUX. Read it please.

Mr. PELLETIER. Then the hon. gentleman uses the words which are insulting, words which I despise. Let me read this letter, and then every hon. gentleman will understand why the hon. member is calling a fellow member names. The letter is addressed to Mr. Henri Bourassa, member for Labelle:

House of Commons,
4th August, 1903.

My dear Colleague,——

Mr. LEMIEUX. Send me over a copy of the letter, if you please.

Mr. PELLETIER. I will give one to the hon. gentleman and another to his leader. The House will see by and by where that leader comes in.

My dear Colleague,—

I would have liked very much to have been present at the meeting on Sunday evening in order to protest with you against the untimely resolution adopted within the last few days by the Congress of Chambers of Commerce. Reasons of a purely personal nature have prevented me from being present.

Permit me, however, to express my surprise that the Chambers of Commerce of Canada, and of the province of Quebec in particular, have thought fit to support the resolution which affirms an absolutely wrong principle, that is the obligation of the colonies to participate in the defence of the empire.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Hear, hear. Go on.

Mr. PELLETIER. I am going on.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. If the hon. member for Rouville continues to interrupt I shall be obliged to declare him out of order.

Mr. PELLETIER. The purport of the letter is so far so good, or so far so bad.

Mr. LEMIEUX. So far so good.

Mr. PELLETIER, (reading):

Useless to tell you that the Canadians should not be bound by such a declaration.

And you will remember that the declaration is——

Mr. LEMIEUX. Read the letter please.

Mr. LENNOX. I rise to suggest that the hon. member for Rouville should remain silent in order that we on this side may hear the hon. gentleman who is addressing the House.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I do not like to call the hon. gentleman to order, but let me say that it is not proper for any one to interrupt an hon. member while he is speaking.

Mr. LENNOX. I suggest that the hon. gentleman who has the floor should be allowed to make such comments as he sees fit, and that the hon. member for Rouville be restrained from indulging in interruptions.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. PELLETIER. We must make some allowance for the fact that the hon. member for Rouville is in a bad predicament at present. On that account we must forgive him something.

Mr. LENNOX. Yes, I suppose he cannot help interrupting.

Mr. PELLETIER. Now we will continue the reading of the letter.

Useless to tell you that Canadians should not be bound by such a declaration. By virtue of what treaty would they like to add to the rights and duties respectively of the empire and of the colonies? What mandate have the delegates of our chambers of commerce received to bind the future of the country in this way? The Canadian parliament alone has the right to assume such a responsibility.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Hear, hear.

Mr. PELLETIER. Do not be too rash, I have not yet finished.

The Canadian parliament only has the right to assume such a responsibility, and I do not hesitate to say that the Drummond resolution does not express the wishes of the calm and reflective opinion of the Canadian people.

If I am wrong in the translation, I speak subject to correction. It is not easy to translate as you read, and I am doing my best.

On the contrary, it is the manly attitude taken last year during the International Conference by the Prime Minister of Canada which answers public sentiment. You will remember with what enthusiasm the speech of the Prime Minister was received on the 12th of May, 1902 in the House of Commons. Certain people having exaggerated notions have been anxious for a long time that our country should plunge into the wars of the empire. Sir Wilfrid Laurier has made a declaration which has been published broadcast which is part of the Drummond resolution and which must, so far as Canada is concerned put an end for ever to militarism. Here are the words used by the Prime Minister:

Now, we come down to the head. This is a quotation from the right hon. leader (Sir Wilfrid Laurier):

It is absolutely useless, at the point where we are now and in this parliament of Canada, to deceive ourselves as to what we may have in view in respect of this matter of the defence of the empire. If the intention is only to discuss what part Canada will take in its own defence and in what measure we must be ready to safeguard the integrity of the country in which we were born, which has received our faith and in which are our homes and all our affections, we certainly shall always be disposed to discuss such a matter as that. But I do not believe that it is at all necessary to ask us to approach a question of this kind——

That is the defence of the empire.

—because during the same session in which we are now the government has given its word to this House that it would be ready at all times to do its duty to that end, and it has received for that the unanimous approval of both parties. But the politics of the present day, both in England and in Canada, and perhaps in this House, comprise a certain school which would like very much to plunge Canada into the vortex of militarism which is now the bane of old Europe. I am not in favour of such policy.

Now, we have from the pen of the hon. member——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Is that the whole of it.

Here, you have, my dear colleagues, the sentiments of all true Canadians and it is to be regretted that the delegates of the Chambers of Commerce have taken their inspiration from some other source. Believe me to be,

Yours very truly,
RODOLPHE LEMIEUX.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear

Mr. PELLETIER. My hon. friends opposite are glad. Of course, whatever their leader says they applaud.

Mr. PROULX. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman a question.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. PROULX. If the hon gentleman will permit me, I would like to ask him——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman has no right to interrupt the speaker except with his permission.

Mr. PELLETIER. Let me finish what I am saying and then the hon. member (Mr. Proulx) can put all the questions he likes. But we have in his letter the affirmation by the hon. member from Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) that he is absolutely opposed to the principle of participating in the defence of the empire. It is there in so many words. He says that he bases his opinion upon that of his leader, and his leader says that whilst he is ready to do everything for the defence of Canada he is against doing anything for the defence of the empire. This letter will go on 'Hansard' and this country will know now that these hon. gentlemen who rise in their seats and tell us that we are arch-traitors because some people have said this or that in some parts of the province of Quebec have gone even further, as the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) himself has done, or as the right hon. leader of the opposition

(Sir. Wilfrid Laurier) went when he made that speech. They have put themselves on record before this country as being opposed to doing anything for the defence of the empire and they have no right to tell this House of Commons what the hon. member for Rouville has been telling the House this afternoon. Now, Sir, I have perhaps taken more time than I ought to have taken, but I thought perhaps this question should be sifted so that we should know where we stand. With these few words, I bow to hon. gentlemen on the other side.

Mr. KNOWLES. Let me ask the hon. gentleman a question. Did not Sir Charles Tupper say that this country did not want to be drawn into the wars of the old country?

Mr. LEMIEUX. I must thank my hon. friend (Mr. Pelletier) from the bottom of my heart for his kindly discovery of that letter of the 4th of August, 1902, and for translating it, and translating it well, so that it will be on 'Hansard' and the people will know where I stand on this question. Let me call attention to the fact that the hon. gentleman is not a pathfinder in this matter. For in the earlier stages of this session a young gentleman, a member of the Nationalist party in this House referred to the fearful letter published broadcast in the province of Quebec last election and asked me if it were true that I expressed in it different sentiments from those that I expressed in the House. Then I explained under what circumstances that letter was published. In the year 1903, my hon. friend will remember there was a congress of the Chambers of Commerce of the Empire, held in Montreal and presided over by Lord Brassey. I attended the meetings because I took an interest in the world's progress. Some important resolutions were placed before them and adopted dealing with trade, naturalization and other questions such as naturally came before such a gathering. There was one resolution placed before them in favour of a direct contribution by Canada to the British exchequer for the maintenance of the British navy. Immediately after the passage of that resolution and before the Congress the Chambers of Commerce dissolved, a public meeting was held in Montreal at the now famous Monument National. It was called by Mr. Bourassa, then member for Labelle, who invited me to be present at the meeting.

He said specifically in his letter of invitation that he wanted to protest against the resolution which had been adopted by the Chambers of Commerce and he included in his letter a copy of that resolution. The resolution had been moved by Mr. Drummond, a friend of mine who is well known to belong to a school of thought as regards our duty as British citizens towards the mother country, which differs materially from another school of thought no less British I could not attend the meeting, but I wrote this letter and I would subscribe to every line, to every word of it this very day if I was called upon to pronounce upon a similar issue. My hon. friend the Postmaster General was not in the House during the discussion on the Navy Bill in 1909 and especially in 1910, when the gist of this very letter was discussed before the House. The right hon. gentleman who leads the opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) was taken to task by the then leader of the opposition (Mr. Borden) because, forsooth, we had included in the Naval Bill a clause by which the help to be given by Canada in time of emergency should be given only when the representatives of the people should have so declared. We were taken to task, we were quite vehemently reproached for the inclusion of that clause in the Naval Bill. A debate took place here and the very sentiments embodied in this letter were expressed not by one member or by ten, but by a majority of the members of the Canadian parliament in the session of 1910. When the question came before the Congress of Chambers of Commerce, the same principle was at stake, the principle of direct contribution as against the principle of voluntary aid to the mother country. You, Sir, are well aware of the fact that not only in Canada among His Majesty's loyal subjects but in the very heart of the realm there are men opossed to militarism, there are men who to-day are members of the British government who are opposed to that vortex of militarism so aptly described by the then Prime Minister, now leader of the opposition. Lord Haldane, the Minister of War, the other day went from England to Berlin in order to confer with the German authorities and the papers say that his visit was in order to put a stop if possible to that policy of intense armaments which seems to be the bane of all European countries. I have never been against helping the mother country and when the day comes to maintain British supremacy over the seas, I say that not a true Canadian will hesitate one second in doing the needful for the mother country; but there are people in this parliament, in this country, in the motherland, amongst the ministers of His Majesty in London, who are opposed to militarism, and I say it was such militarism to which I objected in that letter.

You, Mr. Chairman, know better than anybody else what a fight we had to encounter in the province of Quebec. The Postmaster General, the Minister of Public Works, the Minister of Inland Revenue, the members who formed the Nationalist party in Quebec, abused the right hon. gentleman, decried his followers in the province of Quebec, because, forsooth, they were going to sell our birthright because they were going to spend the people's money to help the mother country and said these gentlemen, this means conscription, this means that your children will be torn from your homes and carried away across the seas, and there be disembowelled. And they added: For what cause? We know that in Drummond and Arthabaska and in every constituency in Quebec the same vicious appeals were made by the Postmaster General and his compeers of Quebec. But I say again, and I am pleased to say it before my friends of the Tory party, let them draft a Bill on a sane imperial basis, let them decide that Canada shall help the mother country even to a larger degree than we ourselves expected to help her, let them bring a Bill acceptable and consistent with Canadian dignity, and they will have the cordial support not only of their friends, but of the Liberal party in general and especially of the French Canadians in the province of Quebec.

The vicious appeals made by the firebrands during the last campaign have helped not a little the British cause in Canada. Our people have opened their eyes. They were taught by a noisy fraction in our province that we owed no duty to the mother country, that Laurier when he was Prime Minister had sacrificed the interests of Canada by sending the contingents to South Africa. They were told all those stories but they have learned through this campaign of education their duties as British citizens, and I repeat they have elected a majority of supporters not only of the right hon. gentlemen who leads the opposition but of the British cause whenever the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, putting aside the vicious arguments used in the last campaign by some of his colleagues' and followers, will frame a Canadinan policy for the supremacy of Great Britain in the world. I hope that this letter will be distributed not only to members of this House but to every elector of my hon. friend in the county of Quebec who have been so much led astray during the last campaign.

Mr. PELLETIER. My hon. friend need not worry; it was distributed in the county of Quebec and that was one of the reasons why I was elected.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. The letter which the late Postmaster General (Mr. Lemieux) has placed on 'Hansard' is dated 1903, and I could quite conceive that any member would be justified in changing his opinion since that date. I understand the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) to say that he has not changed his opinion and stands by every word of it.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I stand by my guns like a fighter.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. The principle of that letter is that there is no duty devolving upon Canada to take part in the defence of the empire.

Mr. PELLETIER. It is in plain language.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. The House can judge of it. The gist of that letter is that there is no duty devolving upon Canada as a portion of the empire to take any part in the defence of the empire.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Nothing of the kind.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. Well then, what is the effect of it?

Mr. LEMIEUX. You will read it in 'Hansard' to-morrow.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. I ask my hon. friend what the pith and gist of it is.

Mr. LEMIEUX. It is opposed to militarism and a direct contribution to the British exchequer. That is the gist of the letter.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. I leave it to the hon. members of this House to judge as to the gist of that letter and as to the purpose of the hon. gentleman in speaking in Quebec or in speaking to Mr. Henri Bourassa in the endeavour to prove to him that he was not in favour of taking any part in the defence of the empire.

Mr. LEMIEUX. You are all wrong.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. I am in the judgment of the House as to that. When my hon. friend voted in favour of the naval policy of the late government was he carrying into execution the principle which he laid down there?

Mr. LEMIEUX. Exactly so.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. Then I would like to ask my hon. friend this: If you are going to leave it to the last minute for this parliament to say, as a portion of the British Empire, whether or not Canada shall take part in Great Britain's wars, after war has been declared, in what single respect do you differ from any foreign nation which, after war has been declared against Great Britain, makes up its mind and says whether it shall be a friend to Great Britain or an enemy? You are in a less loyal, less patriotic position and have less faith in Great Britain than the little kingdom of Japan which sat down ten years ago and said to the representatives of Great Britain: I have sufficient confidence in your integrity, in the justice of your war, I have sufficient confidence in you as a nation, to say that, if within the next ten years you become involved in war, I will come to your assistance and conduct the war in common with you. When the hon. member for Rouville says that this country is bound in no way to take part in the wars of Great Britain, he is less loyal and less patriotic than the ally of Great Britain who sits down and agrees that for a certain time she will participate in the wars of Great Britain. You are a portion of the empire or you are not. If you are a portion of the empire, the minute war is declared you are subject to the international law the same as any other portion of the empire and the same as Great Britain herself. We will suppose that war has been declared and Canada decides that she will not join in Great Britain's war because, in her opinion, the war is not a just one. What position are you put in? Mv hon. friends says that he is a fighter, but he is in the position of the man who decides not to fight but is open to be attached by Britain's enemy under international law. He is not able to take any position in the defence of the empire. So long as you are a portion of the empire there has to be some connection between the motherland and Canada. there has to be some automatic arrangement by which, when war is declared by Great Britain, she is the absolute, superior power that controls the colonies; otherwise you place yourself absolutely in the position of a foreign nation.

Mr. CARVELL. Why do you not get your navy ready then?

At six o'clock, committee took recess.

After Recess

Committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. PUGSLEY. When I gave way to allow the Postmaster General to resume a very interesting discussion into which he had entered, and which was interrupted by his retiring in order to obtain a letter written by the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux), I was proceeding to speak of the fact that the Minister of Marine had given as a reason why the government had decided not to accept the tenders which had been received for the building of ten war vessels, that he had indisputable evidence that it would be a waste of money to construct the vessels as proposed, and my hon. friend gave the impression, whether intentional or not, that these vessels were not of a type which would very long remain under approval of the British admiralty. I would like to read the remarks that my hon. friend (Mr. Hazen) made in giving the reasons for not awarding the contract. Although it may be out of order to do so, yet the matter is of such great importance that probably no objection will be made. In the discussion upon the address in reply to the speech from the Throne, the Minister of Marine is reported in 'Hansard' at pages 179 and 180 as follows:

Now, Sir, my hon, and respected friend the leader of the opposition said that the old government had a well defined policy on that subject. The policy may have been well defined, but I submit to this House that it was not well considered, because the policy which they embarked upon and laid before this House was one which, if it had been carried to a conclusion, would have resulted in the expenditure of an enormous amount of money with little or no advantage to Canada or to the empire. Let me say that, there is evidence that the hon. gentlemen themselves must have come to a conclusion of that kind. We find that in the month of February last, tenders were asked for the construction of four cruisers of the 'Bristol' type and six torpedo destroyers. Those tenders were received on the 1st day of May, 1911, five months before the government went out of office; yet during the whole of that time, apparently, the government did nothing with regard to those tenders. Now, Sir, why was it, if the government were convinced of the wisdom of their naval policy, that they did not, on receipt of those tenders, award the contract for the construction of those cruisers and destroyers? Why did they wait for five months, until they went out of power, without having taken a single step in that direction? There were nine tenders. There was the tender of Cammel, Laird & Company, which was the lowest, for $11,280,000. There was the tender of Swan, Hunter & William Richardson for $12,174,000. There were other tenders, ranging from the lowest already mentioned up to $13,055,804. Those tenders did not include the armour plating, the armament, and certain supplies that go with warships of this sort, and which would have considerably augmented the cost.

Now why did the late government, after embarking on that policy, after receiving those tenders on the 1st day of May, allow them to remain in abeyance without taking a single step towards making a contract for the building of those ships? Was it because the hon. gentlemen discovered afterwards that if they had done so they would have simply been throwing away about $15,000,000 of the people's money? Because the fact is, and I have evidence that cannot be contradicted, and which I am prepared to give this House at any time if my statement is challenged, I have evidence that those vessels, under that contract, and under the conditions, would not have been completed for six years from the time the contract was awarded, and by the end of six years those vessels would have been obsolete, entirely unfit for the purposes for which they were designed. I cannot help concluding, therefore, that the late government, after issuing a call for those tenders, discovered the actual facts which I have just stated. Therefore, they did not award the contract for the construction of those ships, but they allowed the matter to stand. When the present government came into power and when I, as Minister of the Naval Service, began to look into the question and found the facts I have just narrated to this House, I would have been entirely failing in my duty as a Minister of the Crown, if I had advised my colleagues in the Council and the Governor General to sign a contract for the construction of those ships which, by the time they were completed, would have been obsolete and valueless for the purpose for which they were intended.

Now, the Minister of Marine in these remarks throws out an intimation that probably the reason the late government did not award the contract for these vessels was because they discovered there had been a mistake and that the expenditure of the money for the purpose would not have been wise. Let me say to my hon. friend (Mr. Hazen) that he is absolutely and entirely mistaken in that assumption. There were two reasons why the late government did not award the contract. One was, that there was some considerable difficulty in determining as to the firm to whom the contract should be awarded. The lowest tenderers were The Cammell-Laird Company. They are a very reputable ship building firm. They have a very large ship building plant at Birkenhead, near Liverpool, and there is no question whatever but that if the contract had been given to them they would have completed it to the entire satisfaction of the government. But one difficulty —and it is the only difficulty I am aware of with regard to the Cammell-Laird Company—was that they coupled with it, a condition of their making an arrangement with one of the tenderers, Norton Griffiths & Company, for the construction of harbour works, including a drydock, in Courtenay bay, St. John. The late Minister of Marine had considerable doubt as to whether that could be regarded as an unconditional tender, and that was a matter which required the careful consideration he was giving it. But what was of perhaps even more importance than that was that all the tenderers either had shipyards in Great Britain, or were associated with builders having shipyards in Great Britain, it was considered desirable to take a memorandum of the tenders to England and to confer with the British Admiralty with regard to them, as well as with regard to the different firms who had tendered. Just as soon as it was convenient to do so, the Hon. Mr. Brodeur went to England and conferred with the admiralty. My hon. friend knows what happened after his return to this country. He knows that very shortly after his return it was decided to dissolve parliament and in consequence of that the government did not deal with the matter. After the elections, in consequence of the very great importance of the contract, and of the magnitude of the sum which was involved, it was thought only right to leave the question of awarding the contract to our successors. That is the whole story. Whether rightly or wrongly the late government decided that it would be in the interests of the people of Canada that the ships which were to form the nucleus of the Canadian navy should be constructed in Canada. The late government felt it would be desirable to encourage the building of ships in Canada that it would give employment to Canadian labour, and as it was necessary to make a beginning at some time, that it would be better to make a beginning in the way in which we proposed it should be made and to enter upon the construction of these war vessels in our own country. So much for that. Now, in consequence of that statement which was made by the Minister of Marine, there was put to him a question later on in the session by myself, which will be found at page 1239 of 'Hansard', as follows:

Mr. PUGSLEY:

Having reference to the statement of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, quoted in Hansard of the present session, page 179, as follows:—

The fact is, and I have evidence that cannot be contradicted and which I am prepared to give this House at any time if my statement is challenged, I have evidence that those vessels, under that contract, (referring to the tenders for the construction of cruisers and torpedo destroyers), and under the conditions, would not have been completed for six years from the time the contract was awarded, and by the end of the six years those vessels would have been obsolete, entirely unfit for the purposes for which they were designed.

What is the evidence to which the Minister of Marine and Fisheries referred, and will he give the House such evidence in detail?

To that the Minister, Mr. Hazen, answered:—

In the conditions embodied by the late government in their call for tenders for the construction of vessels for the naval service it was stipulated that the time allotted for the construction of the vessels would be six years.

In a memorandum from Admiral Kingsmill, dated October 9, 1911, it is stated that 'owing to the rapidity with which designs change it is anticipated that if it takes six years to complete the programme the ships will be out of date before they are completed.'

Then my hon. friend was requested, I think on a motion made by my hon. friend from Rouville, to lay the memorandum on the table of the House, and that was done. I have before me the memorandum of Admiral Kingsmill, which does not at all bear out the statement of my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. To this Admiral Kingsmill attaches the following memorandum:

With the advent of a minister who is not conversant with naval matters, nor with the requirements of the naval service, it appears desirable to supply information on these points; I therefore forward herewith a few remarks which will tend to enlighten him with regard to immediate requirements with a view to discussion at an early date on the points raised.

This is dated the 9th of October, 1911. Then follows his memorandum, the first clauses of which relate to ship construction. This is what Admiral Kingsmill says:

The programme of new construction adopted by the late government consists of: four cruisers of the improved Bristol type; six improved river-class destroyers. Whilst this progamme does not appear an ambitious one, yet it meets present requirements from the fact that ships of this kind do not require very large complements, and we are in a position to train sufficient men to form part of their crews, and will not require the loan of such large numbers of officers and men from the imperial government as would be necessary if large armoured cruisers were included in the programme. The admiralty find, difficulty in keeping their ships fully manned, and are thus not in a position to spare large numbers for the Dominions navies.

This statement is an absolute and complete justification of the action of the late government in calling for tenders for this description of war vessel. Admiral Kingsmill entirely approves of the programme of building four cruisers of the improved 'Bristol' type, and six improved 'river-class' destroyers. As having a bearing upon this, I would like to read from a report in the 'Montreal Star' of this evening of a speech made by the Rt. Hon. Winston Churchill, First Lord of the Admiralty, in the House of Commons in England, in introducing the naval estimates:

Referring to the building programme, which includes four large armoured ships, eight light armoured cruisers, twenty destroyers and a number of submarines, Mr. Churchill said that $3,500,000 was to be expended on the construction of submarines this year, and as regards the light armoured cruisers the admiralty had decided to return to a smaller type of vessels as being more useful than the recently built vessels of the Chatham class of 5,400 tons. These eight armoured cruisers will be the smallest, cheapest and fastest vessels protected with vertical armour ever projected for the British Navy. They will be strong enough and fast enough to overhaul and cut down any destroyer.

We have here the very strongest approval by Admiral Kingsmill of the programme undertaken by the late government. The remainder of his memorandum relates to the place where it would be best to have these vessels constructed—whether it would be better to build them all in Canada or to have some of them built in Canada and some in the shipyards of the mother country. This is what he says on that point:

Tenders were called for and have been received by the government for the construction of these vessels in Canada; whilst it may be desirable to encourage a firm or firms to establish shipyards in Canada, the interests and efficiency of the naval service would be better served if some portion of the ships, one or two of the cruisers, and two destroyers were constructed in England, orders being placed without delay. We should thus be able to obtain delivery of one destroyer within a year and one cruiser and a second destroyer within eighteen months; by that time a sufficient number of men will have been trained to form a nucleus of the crews, and training will be more efficiently and expeditiously carried out with the advent of modern ships. In the meantime a shipyard can be established in Canada and the remainder of the ships constructed in this yard; the whole of the programme would thus be completed in four years instead of in six as at present arranged. Owing to the rapidity with which designs change it is anticipated that, if it takes six years to complete the programme, the ships will be out of date before they are completed. Even in the short period which has elapsed since the present designs were adopted, the typical destroyers have increased in displacement and the machinery arrangement has been re-designed, which may make it desirable to negotiate with the firm who undertakes the work for an improved destroyer.

The committee will see that Admiral Kingsmill draws a distinction between the advantage of having these ships constructed in four years, and having them constructed in six years, as was proposed in the programme of the late government. But he has overlooked this important fact, that while the contracting firm had six years in which to build all the ships, that did not mean that they would delay for six years the building of any one vessel. They were to begin the work within a time specified, and would be obliged, in order to complete the contract within six years, to build two war vessels in every eighteen months, and hand them over complete to the Canadian government. That is what the specifications called for. Has my hon. friend the tenders and specifications here?

Mr. HAZEN. I have not the specifications.

Mr. PUGSLEY. That is what would be provided for by the Naval Department. Then Admiral Kingsmill suggests that probably the department should have the right to make the changes in accordance with changes which might be suggested by the British admiralty. I venture to say that would be in the contract, as it is in all contracts, that the minister should have the right to make alterations which might be recommended by the engineers of the department, and that the contractor would be obliged to make those alterations, and in case of decreased expenditure, he would make a reduction, while in case of increased expenditure, he would be allowed an increase in cost. The memorandum of Admiral Kingsmill does not at all bear out the statement that was made by my hon. friend. What does my hon. friend propose to do about the building of the Canadian navy? Does the hon. minister contend, does Admiral Kingsmill contend or do the officers of his department contend that these vessels were not of the very best type existing in the British navy at the time those officers gave their approval to the government for their construction? There is no question that was the case. If the vessels of a different type had been designed, the same remark would apply. If a country entered on a naval programme which would run over six years or ten or fifteen or twenty years, it might well be that before the whole programme was completed, the vessels of earlier construction would be out of date.

But that is a difficulty which always presents itself to any nation which undertakes the building of a navy. If my hon. friend is right then the United States could never, with any degree of wisdom, have started to construct a navy. Nor could Japan, nor any country in the world, because when they start they start with a programme which will extend in most cases over a great many years, and of course after the lapse of a number of years the vessels which are constructed in the first place would become obsolete. But surely this remark would not apply to a contract such as the late government proposed to give which would allow the contractors to take six years for the building af all these vessels, yet would have required them to construct at least two of the vessels during every 18 months in order to complete the contract within the prescribed period. Now this is a matter of very great importance to the people of Canada, and it seems to me that the committee has a right to know if, when my hon. friend gave that reason for not awarding these contracts, the government concurred with Admiral Kingsmill that two or three of these ships should be built in England. Surely my hon. friend and his colleagues did not take the important step of delaying the commencement of a Canadian navy without either agreeing or disagreeing with Admiral Kingsmill. If they agreed with Admiral Kingsmill then they should have at once placed an order for the construction, as he says, of one or two of the cruisers and two destroyers in England without delay, and the contract for the remainder of the vessels should have been awarded to a firm for construction in Canada, so that that firm could proceed with the building of its shipyard and get to work on the construction of the additional ships. But the government has done nothing. Notwithstanding there was a unanimous opinion expressed by this House as long ago as 1909, that it was desirable to proceed with the least possible delay to provide a Canadian navy which would be available for the defence of Canada, and which would also be available to assist in the defence of the empire in time of peril, the government simply withdrew from the matter, returned the deposits, and decided not to go on with the contracts, and so far as we have been informed the government have not decided whether they will adopt the view of Admiral Kingsmill: that is to have two or three of these ships built in England and proceed in Canada with the construction of the remaining vessels which would form part of the navy. If the contract had been let to the lowest tenderers Cammell, Liard & Company, early last October when the government came into power and when they had authority to deal with the matter, and if they had also acted upon the tenders which were received for the construction of a dry dock at the harbour of St. John, instead of delaying for many months before taking action, by this time the construction of a dry dock and a ship yard would have been under way, it would not be many months before the keel of the first vessel would have been laid in Canada, and it would not have been many years before all the ten vessels would have been constructed and available for the defence of the country and for the defence of the empire. But nothing is being done, and my hon. friend (Mr. Hazen) proposes to go home to England to consult the admiralty. What does he intend to recommend to the admiralty? He has stopped all action upon these tenders, he has not acted upon the advice of Admiral Kingsmill and given an order for two or three vessels in England, he has taken no steps whatever. Nevertheless he is going home to consult the British authorities. Well, we know what their opinion is. We know perfectly well that what they would prefer would be a money contribution. They would prefer that Canada should contribute a good many million dollars every year, place it at the disposal of the admiralty and let them build, man and control the ships. Does my hon. friend prefer to act upon the advice which the British admiralty may give him, if it is in that direction? The next thing the admiralty would prefer, and it is all on record, is that Canada should build a fleet unit to be placed entirely in Pacific waters. Is this government prepared to act on that suggestion, or has it any opinion upon the subject at all? It seems to me they ought to know whether, in their opinion, the proposition would be acceptable to the people of Canada or not. I think it would not be, but that it would be wholly unacceptable to the people of this country. Then there is the third suggestion, and this is the last which the British government made, their views upon the matter being well known: That we undertake to do the next best thing which could be done for the benefit of Canada and for the benefit of the empire; and my hon. friends may dally months and months and even years, and they may make trips to London in order to consult the British admiralty as often as they like, and they will find I think those are the views which will be presented to them by the British government. It seems to me it is idle for my hon. friend to say that they want to get he opinion of the British admiralty when, as I have said, we have it already clearly expressed in terms with regard to which there can be no doubt whatever. I felt, Mr. Chairman it was my duty to bring this matter before the committee, because whatever others may have thought, I certainly understood my hon. friend to convey the impression that none of these ships were to be completed for six years, and that perhaps by reason of the type of vessels they would become obsolete. But if you read carefully Admiral Kingsmill's memorandum his remarks would apply as much to any class of vessels the construction of which might be undertaken, as it would to these vessels which were proposed as part of the programme of the late government. He admits that they are the best type which can be designed for the purpose for which Canada required them. He admits that it would be better to build vessels of this class at the outset, than to build vessels of different design; and the only respect in which he differs from the late government is that he thinks these vessels ought to be constructed in four years instead of in six years, and that in order to do so it would be better to place an order for one or two cruisers and two destroyers in England, and then proceed with the establishment of a ship-yard in Canada and award the contract for the construction here of the additional vessels.

Mr. HAZEN. The hon. gentleman from the city of St. John has at last thought it necessary, that somebody should give some explanation to this House and the country as to why it was that the government of which he was a member delayed for so long a time without taking any action on the tenders that were submitted in answer to the call for tenders for the building of certain cruisers of the 'Bristol' type, and certain torpedo destroyers, for the purpose of constituting the nucleus of a Canadian navy. I might remind the House of the fact that these tenders were received on the 1st day of May last. The firms who tendered were: Cammell Laird & Company, $11,280,000; Swan, Hunter & Wigham Richardson, $12,174,000; nearly $1,000,000 more; the British Canadian Ship Building & Dock Company, $12,464,000; Vickers Sons and Maxim, $12,712,000; Sir William G. Armstrong, Whitworth & Company, $12,842,000; William Beardmore & Company, $13,055,000; and the Thames Ironworks Shipbuilding & Engineering Company, $8,532,000. The last mentioned tender, which is $3,000,000 less in round figures than the lowest of the other tenders, provided that the ships should be built in England and, therefore, was not open to consideration under the call for tenders which was that the ships were to be built in Canada. The tender of Cammell Laird & Company was nearly $1,000,000 lower than the tender of Swan, Hunter & Wigham Richardson. These tenders were received on the first day of May in the year 1911 and, beyond opening the tenders and tabulating them, there is not a scratch of a pen to show that any action was taken, or any thought given to the tenders until the 5th of October, 1911, two weeks after the general elections, and more than five weeks after these tenders had been received by the Department of Marine and Fisheries in Ottawa.

The first record we have of anything being done with regard to these tenders is in a memorandum that was submitted to council on the 5th of October, 1911, more than five months after they were received by my hon. friend from Rouville (Mr. Lemieux), who at that time was in charge of the Department of the Naval Service.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Not over six months—five months.

Mr. HAZEN. Yes, a little over five months. The memorandum of my hon. friend says.

> Under existing circumstances, and having regard to the magnitude of the transaction, the undersigned is of opinion that the question of awarding the contract may probably be left to the incoming administration and has the honour so to advise council.

So, for a period of five months after tenders were received, nothing was done with regard to the matter, so far as the record shows, by my hon. friend (Mr. Lemieux) or the members of the government to which he belonged. But on the 5th of October, shortly before they handed over the seals of office, my hon. friend reports to council that the matter should be left to the incoming administration. My hon. friend, who to-night is in such a tremendous hurry that something should be done, has, I think the House will admit, entirely failed to give to the House any good reason why five months should have elapsed after tenders were called for before any action was taken. I feel that I was amply justified in saying, when speaking on the address, that the reason that appeared to actuate my hon. friend was that after the tenders were received it was felt that even if the contracts were awarded and carried out, before the contracts could be completed the vessels constructed would be useless, being out of date, and that the $15,000,000 or thereabouts spent in their construction would be spent to no good purpose, and be actually lost money so far as the interest of Canada or of the empire was concerned. I mentioned the sum of $15,000,000, for although the lowest tender amounted to between $11,000,000 and $12,000,000, it did not include the armour-plate or armour and certain other portions necessary to a war vessel which would have to be bought and paid for entirely outside the contract price, and these would have added very materially to the cost of these ships.

The hon. gentleman has said that I was not justified in drawing the conclusion I did from the report made to me as Minister of the Naval Service by Admiral Kingsmill. Let us look at the report of Admiral Kingsmill as read by my hon. friend. The hon. gentleman has said that the first clause affords absolute and complete justification for what the government did, for its whole course in regard to this naval matter. What is the first paragraph? He first refers to the fact of the programme of new construction adopted by the late government which consists of:

4. Cruisers of the improved 'Bristol' type.
6. Improved 'river-class' destroyers.

And says:

Whilst this programme does not appear an ambitious one, yet it meets present requirements from the fact that ships of this type do not require very large complements, and we are in a position to train sufficient men to form part of their crew, and will not require to obtain the loan of such large numbers of officers and men from the imperial government as would be necessary if large armoured cruisers were included in the programme.

In other words, Admiral Kingsmill says that the programme might meet present requirements, and this opinion is based solely on the ground that for these ships we might get the sailors in Canada without having to go to England to get men to man the ships and make them effective. That is the only reason given in the memorandum prepared by Admiral Kingsmill as to this programme being sufficient for the requirements; and on that the hon. gentleman bases the assertion that Admiral Kingsmill's statement shows that the course taken by the government was absolutely and completely justified. And here is what Admiral Kingsmill says with regard to these vessels, after first recommending that they should be allowed to be built in England:

In the meantime a shipyard can be established in Canada and the remainder of the programme would thus be completed in four years——

My hon. friend talks of our ships being completed in eighteen months. But he forgets that there was not then a yard in Canada capable of building ships of this sort and that these yards had to be furnished with material and plant at great cost and workmen had to be brought from different parts of Canada and in some cases from outside, and it would be at least four years after the contract was awarded before anything could be expected to be turned out from this Canadian ship-yard. Admiral Kingsmill goes on:

—the programme would thus be completed in four years instead of in six years as at present arranged. Owing to the rapidity with which designs change it is anticipated that, if it takes six years to complete the programme, the ships will be out of date before they are completed.

So, the contract which my hon. friends opposite advocated and laid before the people of this country provided for contracts being awarded for ships that would be out of date before they were completed. For the ships were not to be completed, if the whole contract was to be carried out, until six years from the time the contract was awarded; and we have the statement by Admiral Kingsmill that as it takes six years to complete the programme, the ships will be out of date before they are completed. What purpose would there be in embarking upon a naval programme to build ships when all these ships would be out of date before the last one was completed in the ship-yards of Canada? Would there be any advantage in spending a large portion of the money of the ratepayers of this country, $15,000,000 on a programme that would be obsolete and on ships that would be out of date before the programme was completed, ships that would be unable to render any service in case the empire or Canada were attacked and could only be used for training ships?

Mr. LEMIEUX. I desire to ask a question. Does the hon. gentleman know how long it would take even the best shipyards in England to build the ships as mentioned in the naval programme of last year?

Mr. HAZEN. Admiral Kingsmill, who was an authority on matters of this sort, who was selected as the Admiral of the Canadian navy by my hon. friends—and a very proper appointment and selection no doubt—calls attention to this in these words:

Tenders were called for and have been received by the government for the construction of these vessels in Canada; whilst it may be desirable to encourage a firm or firms to establish shipyards in Canada, the interests and efficiency of the naval service would be better served if some portion of the ships, one or two of the cruisers, and two destroyers, were constructed in England, orders being placed without delay. We should thus be able to obtain delivery of one destroyer within eighteen months; by that time a sufficient number of men will have been trained to form the nucleus of the crews and training will be more efficiently and expeditiously carried out with the advent of modern ships.

Evidently Admiral Kingsmill believes that if the contract were placed in England one destroyer and one cruiser could be delivered this year and a second destroyer within eighteen months, but that if we followed the programme laid down by hon. gentlemen opposite and if the contract had been awarded to Cammel, Laird & Co., the lowest tenderers, or to any of these other firms, the contract could not have been completed within six years from the time it was awarded and by that time the ships would be completely obsolete and out of date.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Does the hon. gentleman understand Admiral Kingsmill to mean that all the ships will be built in six years? Does he deny that two ships will be completed in eighteen months?

Mr. HAZEN. I do deny that two ships could be completed in eighteen months. It would be absolutely impossible to have a Canadian shipyard established, the plant, materials and men assembled to do the work and to complete any one of the vessels in eighteen months. The language of Admiral Kingsmill's report is plain and clear, that having regard to the whole contract it could only be completed in six years and at the end of six years we would have ships delivered to us obsolete and practically fit for the scrap heap.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Within what time does a first-class warship become obsolete?

Mr. HAZEN. Judging from Admiral Kingsmill's report, in about six years. Owing to the rapid improvements and new inventions a ship ceases to become an effective fighting machine in a very short time. Having regard to that set of facts, I do not believe there is a man in Canada unless, he is speaking from some political standpoint, who would for a moment advocate that it was desirable to enter into this contract and on the other hand I believe that the people of Canada would almost unanimously have condemned any government that would enter into a contract under which they would receive ships obsolete at the time they were built. I think I was placing the most charitable construction possible on the action of hon. gentlemen opposite who for six months and over after the receipt of these tenders did nothing, apparently did not even give serious consideration to the matter and took no action, when I say I believe their action was prompted by the realization that the contract into which they proposed to enter was improvident and not in the interests of the taxpayers; that they would be spending a large sum without getting an adequate return to the people of Canada or rendering service and assistance to Great Britain in case she became involved in a war with a foreign power.

My hon. friend to-night asked what we intended to do when we consult with the admiralty. The Prime Minister in adressing this House during the debate on the address stated plainly that it was our intention not to rush into a scheme as hon. gentlemen opposite did which was not well considered but to carefully consider all the different interests involved and after consultation with the admiralty, to formulate and bring before this House a naval policy that we believe will meet with the approval of the people of Canada irrespective of the province from which they come and also of the empire whose interests we want to protect with those of Canada in the framing of any naval policy or any navy that we may have.

With reference to some remarks made by the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux), I would say that I am not afraid in any respect of the people of the province of Quebec. I have the very greatest respect and admiration for the patriotism and loyalty of the people of the province from which my hon. friend comes, and I believe that the people of Quebec, in common with the people from the rest of Canada, realize that it is a duty that we owe to the empire to take some effective means not only for the protection of our own ports and shipping, but also that we join hand in hand in promoting the interest and defending the cause of the British Empire as well .

This naval question undoubtedly is a question of very great importance in this country. We are gaining in Canada a position of wealth and importance as one of the sisters beyond the seas of the British Empire. I believe that there is not a self-respecting citizen of Canada who does not feel that the position we occupy to-day, allowing the taxpayers of Great Britain without any assistance on our part to continue as in the years when we were in our infancy to maintain the British navy for the support and protection not only of the British Isles but of the British Colonial possessions beyond the seas, is rather humiliating to us as a self-respecting people and that it is our duty plainly, clearly, and manifestly, to contribute our fair share towards national defence.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Hear, hear.

Mr. HAZEN. I believe that throughout Canada that is the strong sentiment of the people, but while that is the general feeling, while we feel that we have outgrown our swaddling clothes, and are standing on strong ground financially and in every other respect, it is humiliating to us as a nation to go on and allow the mother country to continue to pay all the expense of the support of the navy that has done so much for us in the past, and must be maintained if the British Empire of which we are an integral part is to maintain its supremacy in the future. Therefore, I say it is our duty to contribute our share fairly to the support of the British navy; but while I say that I think our contribution must be on grounds that will meet with the approval of our citizens and will be consistent with our position as a selfrespecting part of the British Empire. A navy to be effective must be for the purposes of the empire. If we are to continue as an empire we cannot have one navy for New Zealand, another for Australia, another for South Africa, another in Canada, and another for the British Isles. A navy which exists for the purpose of the general defence of the empire must be a navy concerning which there shall not be a divided control which would destroy its usefulness and efficiency in time of trouble. As General Botha, Prime Minister of South Africa, said soon after the imperial conference: I fail to see how South Africa can fail to be at war if any other part of the British Empire is; it is not consistent with the idea of empire, that ont part can be at war without the other parts assisting and rendering effective aid. That must be the feeling and ambition so far as the navy is concerned, and whatever navy is designed—and for the moment I am not considering whether each portion of the empire should have representation on the board controlling that navy—must be a navy concerning which there will not be a divided control and must be prepared to act and strike as an effective whole when necessary in defence of the flag.

This question has been discussed to-day largely from the standpoint of the effect of the naval policy of the recent government upon the province of Quebec. Let me say to hon. gentlemen opposite that I believe that naval policy as enunciated by hon. gentlemen opposite was not any more popular in the other provinces; I believe that the general feeling in Canada was largely adverse to the scheme which was embarked on hurriedly without carefully considering the consequences. We hope and believe that the government of the day will be able to formulate and lay before parliament at a not far distant date a proposal in regard to the important question now under consideration that will meet with the enthusiastic support not only of the English provinces but of Quebec as well, and that will prove itself in the future a very great force for the preservation of the peace and for the security of the whole British Empire.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Has my hon. friend the tenders and, if so, will he kindly send them over to me?

Mr. HAZEN. The tenders I read were contained in the report made to council by my hon. friend who sits opposite to me, the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux). The tenders were laid before the House. I think the papers can be got.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Perhaps my hon. friend can tell the committee within what time these vessels were to be completed?

Mr. HAZEN. I have not the call for tenders; all I have is a list of the amounts of each tender. I may be able to get the information without any great delay.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I think this is a matter of a great deal of importance, and that my hon. friend ought to allow this item to stand until we have the conditions of the call for tenders, and proceed with some other item.

Mr. HAZEN. We will get it for the hon. gentleman in a moment. The deputy minister of Naval Affairs tells me that the call for tenders required the delivery of one cruiser and two destroyers within three years of the date of the awarding of the contract; after that one cruiser every year and one destroyer every nine months.

Mr. BELAND. Only one cruiser would have been obsolete.

Mr. HAZEN. They would all have been obsolete at the end of six years.

Mr. BORDEN. As a matter of fact, the British admiralty have abandoned this type of vessel alogether during the present year.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I agree with what has been said by my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen) that something ought to be done for the naval defence of Canada and we must all join hands in maintaining the supremacy of Great Britain in case of danger. There has never been any difference of opinion between this side of the House and the other as to that material point in the discussion, namely, the defence of the British flag and the maintenance of British supremacy over the seas. Let that be clearly understood throughout the country. The words we are speaking this evening will, I hope, be repeated by the press throughout Canada. The issue was obscured during the election. My hon. friend must be aware, that in certain provinces the policy of my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) was assailed, because, forsooth, his policy did not go far enough, and in the province of Quebec it was assailed, because, forsooth, it went too far. Now, I admit we suffered heavily from the joint attacks of the extremists on both sides during the election. I have no doubt whatever that on the 21st September last many constituencies were lost to the government of the day because the policy of my right hon. friend had been represented as being a little Canadian policy, whilst in the province of Quebec it was represented as being too much of a British policy. Now, after the defeat, the late government could not consistently give the contract for the carrying out of the naval programme that had been elaborated before the elections. We thought, and properly so, that the question should be left to our successors who had defeated us on that very question because, let there be no mistake about it, while we may talk about reciprocity and other issues that were involved during the last campaign, I can assure the Minister of Marine and Fisheries and the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Borden), that in our province we were simply pilloried on the naval question, because, indeed we had gone too far. I repeat again to my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries that the majority of the people in the province of Quebec, in spite of the appeals there were made, pronounced themselves in favour of the naval defence and of the maintenance of the supremacy of Great Britain upon the seas and in the world at large. The question has been solved There is a majority amongst the people in favour of that policy. Now, it remains for my hon. friend to evolve a new programme. He is going to consult with the admiralty, he says. I am glad of the words he has spoken this evening. He does not speak this evening in the back concession of the county of Quebec; he speaks on the floor of the House of Commons, to the Canadian people, and his words to-morrow will be re-echoed in Great Britain, in the heart of the empire. We are going to have a naval policy. That naval policy, from what I understand from the hon. gentleman, will be a policy which will take one of two forms, either a contribution in money to the British exchequer, or the construction of cruisers, of destroyers, perhaps of Dreadnoughts in Canada or Great Britain. Have I understood the hon. gentleman rightly?

Mr. HAZEN. I did not say what form it would take.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Ah, my genial friend should know that I will vote for this item in a few minutes; I stand for naval defence. I want Canada to do something for the mother country. But will not my hon. friend inform me, will he not state what he is going to do, what he intends to recommend to the British admiralty? He will have a mandate; he will speak on behalf of the government, nay, more, he will speak on behalf of the Canadian people when he reaches London. What will he say to the British admiralty? Will he say that the policy propounded by my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition and his colleagues, the late Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Brodeur) and the late Minister of Militia and Defence (Sir Frederick Borden), was not the policy of the Canadian people, but that the true policy was his policy and the policy of his friends? What is that policy? What is he going to say? —that notwithstanding what may be suggested by the British admiralty, the matter must remain in abeyance until the firebrands, and there are some in this House, not very far from the hon. gentleman, are silenced? What will he say? Will he say to Mr. Winston Churchill; Canada is willing to have shipyards, to vote money, to build cruisers, destroyers, Dreadnoughts, or will he say: Canada is a wealthy nation, we have a surplus of nearly $40,000,000, we are ready to take from the treasury say $10,000,000 annually, as was suggested by the hon. member for South York (Mr. Maclean) and give it to the British exchequer in order to help the mother country in her troubles abroad?

I should like to know what he will say. I can tell my right hon. friend that I as a Liberal and as a Canadian of French descent am quite ready to stand by the British flag and by the duty which Canada owes to the mother country in matters of defence. It is no trouble for me to stand by that flag; I fought in my county, and the farmers of Rouville have accepted nobly the policy of the right hon. gentleman to do something towards our naval defence. I have no difficulty at all with my electors as regards the naval programme. And, Sir, I tell the Prime minister that the province of Quebec is ready to stand by his government if they evolve a sane naval policy. But, I want to know what the government will do. We are in doubt; it is being whispered by the friends of the Postmaster General and by the friends of the Minister of Public Works: no, no, the government will do nothing, the government is only shilly-shallying; the papers may say this or the papers may say that, but nothing will be done, don't be afraid, there will be no navy, there will be no 'Niobe' and no 'Rainbow,' your children will not be disembowelled in the Chinese seas or in Oceania. That is the policy of the Postmaster General in the province of Quebec, but I want to know from the leader of the government what is his policy. We Liberals, English-speaking Liberals, French Canadian Liberals, we stand by the naval defence of this country, we are ready to help the motherland, we will help this government; even when they will be deserted by their Nationalist friends at the first opportunity on that very important question. Sir, this is an important question. The election was fought in my province on that sole issue and on no other. I can assure the Prime Minister that in the province of Quebec we did not hear much of reciprocity. In fact, every Nationalist candidate who now supports the government told his electors: Reciprocity is not important; it is a question of dollars and cents, we don't mind that, the navy is the real issue. In fact, Mr. Lavergne, the leader, the inspirer of the Postmaster General, the Beau Brummell of the Nationalist party, ironically referred to reciprocity as a paltry question of figures, and said: We don't bother about the fiscal issue, but we are concerned about the navy. And in every county of the province Mr. Armand Lavergne aroused enthusiasm; aroused the passions of the people on the iniquitous navy. He told his hearers: Is Canada to be fleeced, Canada is to spend her millions for England? But, Sir, we Liberals in the province of Quebec, we told the people: We are ready to do something for the empire; we stand for a Canadian navy, we want our ships as far as possible built in Canada, we want to fly the Canadian flag on our ships—and what do you think, Sir, but the British Admiralty agreed to that. Just fancy these traitors across the seas: Mr. Churchill, Mr. McKenna, the Asquith government, fancy them agreeing that a Canadian flag should fly on our country's navy. What traitors; what arch-traitors they are Sir! It is remarkable that some people in this country are more British than the British themselves. Amongst Catholics we say that the Ultramontanes are more Catholic than the Pope, and so in Canada we have some people who are more British than His Majesty the King. In England, they agreed to our naval policy, they accepted it. What will the hon. minister say to the admiralty now when he goes over there? Will he advise the British admiralty that it was all wrong? Will he advise them that Mr. McKenna was wrong, that Mr. Churchill was wrong, and even that Lord Charles Beresford was wrong? Why, in his recent book 'The Great Betrayal,' Lord Charles Beresford mourns the fact that the admiralty has not yet seen its way to efficiently protect the trade routes of the empire, and he complains that small cruisers, such as we proposed to build in Canada, have not been built. What is my right hon. friend the hon. minister going to say to the admiralty? I am sure of one thing; I know my right hon. friend; I said a few moments ago that he was a sane imperialist, that he was a good Britisher, that he would put aside the vicious attacks made here against the British flag, and against the policy of naval defence. He will tell the admiralty that something ought to be done by Canada, or by Great Britain and Canada jointly. I know that. But, will he say to the British admiralty: you were wrong when in discussing a policy with the representatives of the Canadian government you agreed to a certain plan. Will he in return suggest something new? Suppose the British admiralty, being consistent with itself, would say, the arrangements made by the Canadian government were all right; we are satisfied if you will carry them out. What then, will the Prime Minister carry out that arrangement; will he come back to Canada and lecture his friend, the Postmaster General, and say: you were all wrong in Quebec county, we are going to adopt the Laurier policy, or will he—he a layman as I am—will he undertake to lecture Mr. Churchill and the British lords of the admiralty and say to them: no, we must not have shipyards in Canada, we must not encourage Canadian enterprise and Canadian skill; we must not revive Canadian shipbuilding; you will build the ships for us, and we will pay the piper; Canada is rich; we have forty millions of a surplus, we will take ten millions from our surplus, and send it to you. I am quite sure my right hon. friend will do one of two things—he will either maintain or perhaps enlarge the Canadian policy evolved by the Liberal government, or he may go a step further, and contribute in cash a few millions. If it is the wish of the Canadian people that we should take our own money and send it to England, Sir, I am a Liberal, I believe in democratic institutions, and I will abide by the decision of the Canadian people, whatever it be. But let me tell my hon. friend this—he was not in the House when the resolution of the 29th March, 1909, came before this parliament; let him open 'Hansard,' let him read the debate which took place on that occasion. Sir, in my recollection, there never was a debate in this House which did more credit to both the Liberal and Conservative parties than did that great debate. I, a young Canadian of French descent, I was enthused by the remarks made on that occasion, not only by my leader, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, but especially by the present Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster, North Toronto).

He is a great orator, a born orator; but on that occasion he was more than equal to himself. The House listened to him; what did he say? Sir, he followed in the footsteps of the right hon. the leader of the opposition; he declared himself for the policy of the Liberal government. He said that he was in favour of a Canadian navy, built in Canada. My right hon. friend the leader of the government, was also in favour of that policy, and he suggested, in the amended resolution which was accepted unanimously—except by the hon. member for Jacques Cartier, now the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Monk)—that there should be a speedy construction of Canadian battleships. My right hon. friend went to England shortly after this. I followed him very closely. He was the guest of the Constitutional Club in London. There was present the leader of the opposition, the Right Hon. Arthur Balfour, who I think presided at that dinner. Mr. Balfour made a speech; Mr. Donald Macmaster, K.C., now M.P., also delivered a speech. My right hon. friend the leader of the government was the guest of honour at that dinner, and he there and then boldly declared himself in favour of the policy propounded by the right hon. the Prime Minister of the late government; he was in favour of a Canadian navy; he wanted to revive old Halifax and its industries. He made a lofty speech; I have it somewhere, but not under my hand just now. I applauded it; I said: How manly is the leader of the opposition; he sticks to his colours; he is consistent. He came back. He had time to pause. Across the ocean, although tossed by the billows of the sea, and dreaming that he would be some day the Premier of Canada—which he has become, thanks to the double-barrelled policy propounded at the last election—still he stuck manfully to his guns. He reached Halifax, the city he represents, and there he delivered another speech, in which he said—and I wish my hon. friend to correct me if I am not telling the truth: Men of Halifax, who elected me in days of opposition, I stand by the Canadian policy; Halifax will have a revival; new industries will spring up; the construction of a Canadian navy will make a new Halifax of the old Halifax. Then, the hon. member for North Toronto during the recess also went around the country delivering many speeches, and at many places again declared himself in favour of a Canadian navy, built in Canada, and manned by Canadians. Thank Heaven, the Conservative party was once true to its colours; it was a Canadian party. On that question of a navy, evolved on the very pretext, the obvious pretext, of helping the mother country it put that question above party lines. It did not want to play the politicai game with that national question. But that mood did not last many months. An election took place in the county of Drummond and Arthabaska. The firebrands, the Minister of Public Works, Mr. Bourassa, Mr. Armand Lavergne, the Postmaster General saw an occasion to create troubles for the Liberal government. They could not well attack the Liberal government on its general policy; but they went before the people of Drummond and Arthabaska on the naval question; and what did they say there? My hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries in those days was quietly presiding over the affairs of New Brunswick at Fredericton, honestly administering the affairs of his province. The right hon. the Prime Minister was away somewhere else, perhaps outside of Canada—If I remember well. At all events, although about half the electors in the county of Drummond and Arthabaska are English-speaking and the other half French, my right hon. friend the leader of the government kept away from the constituency; so did the Minister of Trade and Commerce; although some years ago I remember, when there was a by-election in the country of Sherbrooke, we met there the Prime Minister and the Minister of Trade and Commerce—it was not then too far for them to come and visit us. But on that very serious occasion of a by-election in Drummond and Arthabaska, they kept away from the country. There we saw the Postmaster General, the Minister of Public Works, you, Mr. Chairman, the member for Dorchester (Mr. Sévigny), Mr. Bourassa and the Beau Brummell of the Nationalist party, the young man of the red necktie, Mr. Armand Lavergne. And what appeals did they make?

Mr. PELLETIER. Will my hon. friend allow me?

Mr. LEMIEUX. My hon. friend may answer me by-and-by. They all came to the constituency, and there we know what incendiary appeals they made. We know that an hon. gentleman spoke of certain holes in the British flag. Another gentleman appealed to Divinity itself. The Canadian nationality, meaning the French Canadian, he said, was being crucified on the Golgotha of militarism, and the crucifiers were the Liberal ministers and their right hon. leader. The Judases of the nationalité were the Liberal ministers; the traitors were the Liberal ministers; yes, we in their estimation, were selling our birthright for a mess of pottage. Great Britain was encroaching on the rights of Canada, and we were mean enough, we were unpatriotic enough, we were anglicised enough, to forget our own blood, our traditions, to our aspirations, our ideals, and we were playing into the hands of John Bull.

Sir, we know the result: They went from concession to concession, people with brass buttons knocked at the door of Jean Baptiste the farmer, and said to the mother in that household: 'Mother, how many sons have you?' 'What is the matter with you?' 'Well, have you got any sons?' 'Yes.' 'Then you had better give me their names, because Laurier is going to take them and enlist them in the navy, they will be sent from Quebec to the China seas, or to India, or to Japan, and they will be disembowelled. Laurier wants them to fight for the British flag for an unknown cause. The Postmaster General, was he then Zandrang? I do not know. The Minister of Public Works, the Minister of Inland Revenue, and you, Mr. Chairman, were all there; and the people of Drummond and Arthabaska in a moment of weakness, to quote an historical phrase, were so upset as to believe in what the hon. gentlemen said. Thank heaven the people of Drummond and Arthabaska were found on their way to Damascus at the last election. They paused, they reflected, they read, they listened, and they saw the light and they sent back to his farm that modern Cincinnatus Mr. Gilbert. Now, Sir, to be serious.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I am only repeating the arguments used in Drummond and Arthabaska. My hon. friends on the other side—and I have many there I know—my Tory friends, for whom I have great respect, frankly applaud the appeals made by the Postmaster General when he turns to them and says: 'Yes we are ready to fight for the British flag. We adore the same God, we Catholics and Protestants.' He never misses that peroration; but if they knew him as I know him, if they could have listened to him in the county of Quebec, in the county of Lotbinière and in the county of Drummond and Arthabaska, they would find, not the Britisher who appeals to their noblest passions and looks for their applause in this House, but the very worst firebrand this country has ever known.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Now to be serious again. I say to my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries: He has taken my portfolio—I was Minister of Marine and Fisheries for two months, and I know that there has been no mistake in that department—and he will find the department clean and unsullied, and even the honest Ducharme will find nothing to investigate there. My hon. friend (Mr. Hazen) will go to England. Let me tell him in all seriousness that he carries with him the best wishes of the Canadian people, whether Conservative or Liberal. He will consult the admiralty; behind him will stand the Canadian people. There in conjunction with the British statesmen he will evolve a new policy. Whatever that policy may be, if it is all accepted, it will be the policy of the Canadian people, and I can tell him this further: The Liberal party in this House, composed not only of English speaking Liberals, but French Canadian Liberals, will stand behind the government when that policy is put before the House. We will not make a party question of the defence of the empire.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. LEMIEUX. No, we will not make a party question of the defence of the empire, of the defence of the British flag and the supremacy of the mother country over the sea. This is a national question. That is how we put it before the people of the province of Quebec, in spite of the vicious appeals made by the friend of the Minister of Marine who is sitting to his left, in spite of the passions roused by his colleagues in the cabinet. We stood firmly by the Canadian policy during the last elections, and we intend to stand for it in the future, as in the past. We stand by the mother country when the government's naval policy is brought before parliament.

Mr. BORDEN. My hon. friend this afternoon and this evening has reminded us very much of those beautiful lines of Tennyson:

> Men may come and men may go, but I go on for ever.

If there is anything the hon. gentleman said this afternoon which he did not say this evening, or anything he said this evening which he did not say this afternoon, I, for one am unable to appreciate it. He was evidently so thoroughly satisfied with his performance this afternoon that he found it necessary to repeat it this evening. Well, had we plenty of time, and were we here purely for the purpose of giving my hon. friend that practice which he really does not need, no one would have any objection to it; but I would suggest to my hon. friend that perhaps he might devote himself to some matters that he did not explain very well, and as to which I will ask an explanation from him now. I presume that he spoke for his party. One is a little in doubt as to whether he, or my hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Pugsley) is leading on the naval question, but I would perhaps be safe in concluding that as far as the construction of ships is concerned my hon. friend from St. John is the mouthpiece of the party, and so far as the fighting part of it is concerned my hon. friend from Rouville is their exponent. Now he informs us that he stands absolutely and literally by the letter which he wrote on the 4th of August, 1903. There is no mistake about that, is there?

An hon. MEMBER. Speak now?

Mr. LEMIEUX. Is the Prime Minister appealing to me?

Mr. BORDEN. Yes.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Then I will reply that I am certainly against militarism.

Mr. BORDEN. I am not speaking of militarism—

Mr. LEMIEUX. That is what I mentioned in the letter.

Mr. BORDEN. However, that is one statement. Does my hon. friend not speak for his party in that regard?

Mr. LEMIEUX. I am speaking for myself.

Mr. BORDEN. Then apparently it is not a happy family on the other side of the House.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Everything is serene.

Mr. BORDEN. I ask my hon. friend again whether in making that statement he is, or is not, speaking for his party.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Since my hon. friend the Prime Minister has asked the question I am bound to answer. I say that the letter in question I would write again to-day; I stand by every word and by every line of that letter.

Mr. BORDEN. I would like to inquire whether the hon. gentleman's party stand by every word and by every line. My hon. friend does not seem inclined to give any very direct answer to my question. However, I will leave it in that way. Now let us look for one moment at the letter, and at the resolution which it criticised—because I have taken the pains to look at the resolution—and we will find exactly where my hon. friend and presumably his party stand—unless they repudiate him, because they put him forward to speak—we will find exactly where they stand with regard to this question before we get through.

My dear Colleague,—

I would greatly have desired to have been present at the meeting on Sunday evening in order to protest with you against the untimely resolution adopted these last days by the Congress of the Chambers of Commerce of the empire. For reasons entirely of a personal nature I was unable to be present. Permit me, however, to express my astonishment that the delegates of the Chambers of Commerce of Canada, and of the province of Quebec in particular, had thought it their duty to support a resolution which affirms a principle absolutely false——

Mark the words 'absolutely false'—

—that is to say, the obligation of the colonies to participate in the defence of the empire.

Now, what was the resolution which my hon. friend from Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) thought it necessary to attack, and which he attacked to-day—in the name of his party, I presume?

Mr. LEMIEUX. On my own behalf.

Mr. BORDEN. Was it? Well, let us see. He stated that once before to-day. I will read the resolution he has attacked on his own behalf and in the name of his party as reported in the Montreal 'Gazette' and various other places:

That this Congress affirms the principle that it is the duty of the self-governing colonies to participate in the cost of the defence of the empire——

Mr. LEMIEUX. Hear, hear.

Mr. BORDEN. Why, my hon. friend wrote a letter denouncing it. He did not hear the rest of it.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Go ahead.

Mr. BORDEN. We will read it again, so as to be absolutely sure we get the whole of it:

That this Congress affirms the principle that it is the duty of the self-governing colonies to participate in the cost of the defence of the empire——

Mr. LEMIEUX. The cost.

Mr. BORDEN. My hon. friend should endeavour to calm himself, I will try once more, and I will ask him to use the greatest possible self-control and let me get through with it. I know that it disturbs him, but let him exercise self-control, and we shall be able to get through. This is the letter——

Mr. LEMIEUX. That is the old one.

Mr. BORDEN. He is still disturbed. I would commend to him the advice of a good old friend of mine in Halifax, who occasionally made use of a Latin word in a wrong way when he exhorted a friend, 'Now, don't get too excelsior.' Now, let us begin once more:

This congress affirms the principle that it is the duty of the self-governing colonies to participate in the cost——

Not a word from my hon. friend that time.

—of the defence of the empire; but the colonies claim the privilege of taking their own initiative as to the nature and mode of help which they agree to offer.

Now, that is the resolution which called forth this letter of protest from my hon. friend as I understood——

Mr. LEMIEUX. I am not quite sure of that.

Mr. BORDEN. There was a previous resolution which was drafted in these words:

It is resolved that this congress hereby affirms the principle that it is the duty of the self-governing colonies to participate in the cost of the defence of the empire.

Mr. LEMIEUX. That is the one.

Mr. BORDEN. Now my hon. friend's face lights up when the latter words are omitted.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I thank my hon. friend. I had forgotten it; but that is the very one.

Mr. BORDEN. And not the other? The one I read last was never adopted. The hon. gentleman has stated in this letter, as distinctly as it could be stated, an exactly opposite position from that which his leader took this afternoon. Does not he recognize that. It was put forward as a reproach to my hon. friend the Postmaster General (Mr. Pelletier) and others that they had declared that there was no duty on the part of Canada to participate in the defence of the empire.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Hear, hear.

Mr. BORDEN. What does the hon. gentleman say? I will read it again. Apparently his ability to comprehend either the French or the English language is disturbed for the time being. Let us read it first in French:

Permettez moi cependant d'exprimer mon étonnement de ce que les délégués des Chambres de Commerce du Canada, et de la province de Québec en particulier, aient cru devoir appuyer une résolution qui affirme un principe absolument faux, à savoir: l'obligation pour les colonies de participer à la défense de l'Empire.

Now, let us read it in English in the best translation I can give:

Permit me, however, to express my astonishment that the delegates of the chambers of commerce of Canada, and of the province of Quebec in particular, have thought it their duty to support a resolution which affirms a principle absolutely false, that is to say an obligation on the part of the colonies to participate in the defence of the empire.

My hon. friend says that the obligation or the duty of the colonies to——

Mr. LEMIEUX. Not duty; obligation.

Mr. BORDEN. That is a delightfully fine point.

Mr. LEMIEUX. 'The obligation.'

Mr. BORDEN. The principle that there is an obligation on the part of the colonies to participate in the defence of the empire is a perfectly false one, but the principal that there is a duty on the part of the colonies to participate in the defence of the empire is a perfectly sound one. I am glad to know where we have my hon. friend at last. What a beautifully fine distinction he makes of it.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Will my hon. friend allow me? Does not he see that there is quite a difference?——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. LEMIEUX. The right hon. gentleman (Mr. Borden) is interpreting a letter of mine. I suppose I can help him to interpret it. Does he not see the difference between a moral duty and an obligation?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Yes, I stand by my words. I appeal to my right hon. friend as a lawyer, and a lawyer of distinction, is not there an essential difference between a moral duty—that was the Laurier policy—and an obligation, which was another policy.

Mr. BORDEN. I suppose the word 'moral' might be applied to an obligation as well as to a duty. I never heard that the adjective would be misplaced in one case and properly placed in another. As a matter of fact the letter of my hon. friend does not contain the word 'moral' at all, and does not refer to it. I submit to any hon. member of this House, that when my hon. friend endeavours to squirm out of his letter in that way, he is not doing his intelligence or his standing in this House great credit. It would have been a perfectly proper and reasonable thing to do if he had stood up and said: I did write that letter; but I came to a different conclusion afterwards. But when he ventures to tell this House that any reasonable man could regard for a moment such a distinction as he has attempted to draw, he makes demands upon our intelligence which are either above or below the grasp of any man in this House. My right hon.

friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) made similar reproaches to hon. gentlemen on this side. As I understood him this afternoon he said that the Postmaster General (Mr. Pelletier) or some one else on this side had declared that Canada owed no duty to the mother country—owed nothing to the mother country, I think was the form of it. Surely he is confusing the utterances of hon. gentlemen on this side with those of gentlemen who were his own colleagues for fifteen years. He knows as well as any hon. gentleman in this House that the gentleman who presided as Minister of Trade and Commerce over one of the departments of his government declared in this House and outside of it and repeated it to me across the floor that Canada owed nothing to the mother country except Christian forgiveness for the wrongs she has wrought to this country.

The main point is the one to which my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen) addressed himself, that is the question which arises very naturally upon this estimate, as to the reasons why the present administration did not see fit to carry out the policy of the late government. That has been made patently plain by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen). As a matter of fact, the type of vessel which was adopted by hon. gentlemen opposite has been abandoned this very year by the British Admiralty; if the press reports are correct they have reverted to a cheaper, smaller and swifter type of vessel so it is very fortunate indeed that this contract was not entered into. The hon. member for Rouville says: What are we to do when we go to England, what are we to say to the admiralty? We are to say in the first place that we do not believe that the policy brought down by the last administration would have been of any advantage either to Canada or to the empire. The next thing we will say is that the people to whom that policy was submitted have come absolutely to the same conclusion as that at which we have arrived. And then we will say that we are prepared to discuss with the admiralty the details of a policy which we will submit to parliament and to the people of Canada. In other words, instead of formulating a policy first and thinking about it afterwards, we will think about it first and formulate it afterwards.

I would remind my hon. friend the member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) that this government has been in power hardly as long as the period during which those tenders were before him and his colleagues and yet during the past two, three or four months we have heard the most bitter complaints and the most amazing indignation, because the present government did not formulate a policy during the period we have been in power, a little over five months; yet for a little over five months the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) had these tenders before him and could not make up his mind about them although he did not have, during that time the stress of a parliamentary session to engage his time and attention. He had very much more leisure than the present administration have had to consider any policy of naval defence. I am glad to know that the Department of Marine and Fisheries under the control of my hon. friend the minister who presides over that department will have the advantage of the earnestness and ability and determination to mould such a policy which that hon. gentleman possesses, such a policy as will be in the interest of the people of Canada and of the empire as well. I am glad to know that my hon. friend has determined that such a policy can only be arrived at after care and consideration, which are obviously necessary for the solution of a great problem such as this. It is a problem as I have said on many a previous occasion in this House that concerns in the most vital, in the closest way, the relations between the self-governing dominions and the mother country because no man in this House or in this country need disguise from himself the fact that if the various dominions of the empire do enter into a system of naval defence which shall concern and belong to the whole empire, those dominions, while that system continues, cannot be very well excluded from having a greater voice in the councils of the empire than they have had in past years. I think we all, on both sides of the House, realise that any man who applies his intelligence to the solution of that particular problem will arrive at that conclusion. We might bring down a policy for consideration, a policy of the construction of a certain number of small cruisers.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Hear, hear.

Mr. BORDEN. I am not speaking of myself, I am speaking of parliament, I am not proposing to do anything of that kind. I say that we in parliament, speaking of parliament as a whole, might enter upon a policy of constructing a certain number of cruisers of light type.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Hear, hear. I agree to that, does the Postmaster General agree to that?

Mr. BORDEN. My hon. friend does not understand the context in which I am using that illustration. I say we might do that, but in doing that we would not be framing the basis of a naval policy that would stand in all the years to come. It is for that reason that we thought the late government were wrong in proposing such a policy, and that they did not go to the very heart of the matter; and that before we entered into any arrangement of that kind we must know where we were standing within this empire. So, we propose that the naval policy of the late government should not be continued, and we do propose before any naval policy is entered upon that some of those matters shall be considered, and when that policy is brought down it shall be presented to parliament, and the people of this country shall be given an opportunity to pronounce upon it.

So far as the future policy of this government is concerned, we propose to formulate it after careful consideration and attention to the problems which I have mentioned here to-night. We propose to give to those problems our very best consideration. We propose, so far as the technical question is concerned, to be guided by the empire's experts, because he was not guided because the admiralty must be better informed upon the technical side of this question than any man in this country can possibly be.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Just as we were guided.

Mr. BORDEN. My hon. friend says he was guided. He told us a while ago that he was not guided because the admiralty proposed one thing which they would not do, and then proposed another thing which the late government would not do, and then the admiralty finally consented to something, which they regarded as not wholly satisfactory, because the late government were so anxious to have it.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Which they quite approved.

Mr. BORDEN. Therefore, I do not appreciate the force of my hon. friend's statement that they were guided by the admiralty.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Guided as to the class of vessels by the admiralty.

Mr. BORDEN. I would not view it in that way, but my hon. friend has his opinion and I have mine. In conclusion there was a certain organization left to us by the late administration. My hon. friend has already said that we would not be expected to sink the vessels or to set fire to the building they erected. We have kept them up, we are maintaining the organization so far as it may be necessary and desirable until a definite policy can be arrived at, but when a definite policy is arrived at we shall be very glad indeed to have from the hon. member from Rouville that fervent support which he pledged to us to-night.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Always provided it is on safe lines.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. For my part, and I believe for the whole House also, the discussion we have had is most instructive and will bear excellent fruit. At last we know where we are on this question of the naval policy. We know that it is the policy of this government to have a naval service. We know that it is their intention, somehow or other—I do not know how—they do not themselves know exactly—to take part in the defence of the empire, but whether by a contribution or whether by maintaining a fleet of their own is a matter to be decided, very properly, in the future. The present government took issue with that policy, the policy we laid down, and for which we had the approval of the last parliament. I have no fault to find with those who condemned that policy from the point of view represented by my hon. friend opposite. He was not satisfied with the line which we took, nor were his friends behind satisfied with it. In their view we had kept too much autonomy in our policy. In so far as I remember the discussion during the last parliament, the reproach of my right hon. friend and his friends from all the provinces, except the province of Quebec, was that there was too much autonomy in our policy. But everybody knows in the province of Quebec that for eighteen months and more, from the month of January, 1910, when we introduced the naval policy Bill, up to the 21st September, 1911, the gentlemen who support the present administration, the gentlemen who represent the province of Quebec in this administration, one and all, upon all the hustings in Quebec, upon every stump upon which they could plant their feet, stated that we owed absolutely nothing to England, that we should not have a ship to assist in her defence and that we should never give a penny for that defence. I suppose that I am not to bring proof of what I say, but if that statement is denied upon the present occasion——

Mr. LEMIEUX. They cannot deny it.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. If it is denied, I leave it to those who sit behind them to say whether or not I am right. But, after all, we have gained this out of this present discussion that we know that all this talk was for political effect and that now that the elections are past every gentleman who represents the province of Quebec in this administration will come up and do his duty like a British subject and a Canadian. There is nothing more to be said on this point; it does not require any discussion. The government tell us that they are not satisfied with our programme and that they want to go to England and consult with the admiralty. Well and good; I have no objection to that. We will await their policy. If they can do better than we did, well and good—nobody will begrudge their efforts, but we will judge of their policy when it comes up for discussion. Now, I have only one more remark to make. We have been told that we ought not to have entered into this contract for building ships because the ships would be obsolete before they were completed. How is my hon. friend to proceed? If he is to have ships built in this country he must proceed just as we have proceeded, and when he tells me that ships are obsolete in six years, I take issue with him. There may be, in the space of six years, improvements, or some change in detail, but the types of the ships are not changed once in 25 years. We can follow the course of shipbuilding from the time of the American civil war in 1862, when iron ships came into use and supplanted wooden ships. True there has been improvement. We can follow from type to type, and while it has taken about 25 years to evolve a new type, probably every year there has been some new method, some change of detail in every ship that is built. I dare say there is not a ship built by England, France, Germany or the United States in one year but is somewhat different from the ships built the preceding year, but it does not follow that the type is different. The statement which my hon. friend makes is not serious when he says that the reason these contracts were not gone ahead with was simply that the ships might become obsolete when they were completed. My hon. friend should not have made that statement. He had a better reason, and that better reason was that, having fought upon the policy that we had fought upon and it having gone against us, he was bound to go to England and try to make a new arrangement with the British Admiralty. He will say that from the government standpoint there is nothing else for him to do than this. So, he is going to England. I wish him well, I wish him every possible success, but in the meantime I say that we have established a new basis in the province of Quebec, and that we will never hear any more the treasonable language by which we were defeated.

Mr. PELLETIER. Mr. Chairman, I shall not indulge in the kind of—should I call it argument—which the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux)——

Mr. LEMIEUX. I stated your own words.

Mr. PELLETIER. If the hon. member for Rouville will only hold his tongue for a few minutes—he is so much excited that he cannot refrain from talking all the time. The hon. gentleman would not allow me to say anything while he was speaking.

Mr. LEMIEUX. And you did the same to me.

Mr. PELLETIER. His leader ought to give him some advice. I am not going, Sir, to indulge in that kind of argument. The hon. member for Rouville has thought fit to go as far to-night as to address a member of this House by giving him, not his name, or the name of the county which he represents, but by giving him a name of his own invention.

Mr. LEMIEUX. What name?

Mr. PELLETIER. The hon. member for Rouville will allow me to speak; he has not allowed me to interrupt, and he will please sit down and keep quiet. I shall not follow the hon. member for Rouville on these lines. The hon. member for Rouville is sore, his heart is full of all kinds of regrets, and, of course, we must have some pity on the poor fellow. If we were to follow him this House would be turned into a bear garden. Somebody must have some dignity, and somebody must not forget himself; we will try to show him that good example, and if he is susceptible of learning something, he may learn that.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Thank you.

Mr. PELLETIER. He will not hold his tongue. The hon. member for Rouville has become a great Imperialist, and he is a great Imperialist notwithstanding his own letter in which he says the reverse. I shall not try to explain all that he has put before this House, but I am just going to give you an example of the kind of man the hon. member for Rouville is, and this House will know him, and judge him after that. This man has repeated three times to-night——

Mr. LEMIEUX. I rise to a point of order.

Mr. PELLETIER. I should have said 'gentleman,' I suppose.

Mr. LEMIEUX. No, 'I suppose,' but 'hon. gentleman.' My hon. friend will be polite in spite of himself.

Mr. PELLETIER. I intend to be polite, and I shall never go as far as the hon. member for Rouville went to-night. If the expression 'man' is not parliamentary, I am willing, in order to be parliamentary, to say 'gentleman'——

Mr. LEMIEUX. 'Honourable'; go on.

Mr. PELLETIER—which is made the obligation of every member of this House. This House has heard three times from the lips of the hon. member for Rouville to-night, that I went over into the county of Drummond and Arthabaska, and that I said this, that, and the other thing. I will ask the hon. member for Rouville (Mr Lemieux), if he is enough of a man—

Mr. LEMIEUX. Of an honourable man.

Mr. PELLETIER. No, not this time. I ask him if he is a man to come boldly forward and put his seat at risk and I will put mine in the balance with his, if my statement is not correct that I did not even put my foot in the county of Drummond and Arthabaska during that election.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I wish to say—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Sit down.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I wish to say—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, sit down.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Does he ask for an answer?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The rule of the House is that no member can interrupt another who has the floor unless with the consent of the hon. member addressing the House.

Mr. PELLETIER. The hon. member for Rouville must not be surprised if I do not allow any interruption, in view of the fact that he several times refused to let me answer him when he was speaking. I have tried to show him all possible courtesy since the House opened. I have allowed him to put all kinds of questions, and when he to-night asserts that I took part in the Drummond and Arthabaska election and I wanted to tell him that I was not there at all, he would not allow me to say so and I declare that to be very unfair. I do not want to uselessly prolong this debate, but I cannot resist the temptation of comparing these great imperialists opposite of to-day with their traditions as a party. We have heard to-night the member for Rouville addressing the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, say: bring a bold policy forward and we on this side of the House will support you. He spoke for his side of the House, and it would seem that whilst we were told that there was a lieutenant needed for the leader of the opposition, some of these gentlemen on the front opposition benches think that they are the lieutenants and that they should not be ousted by the arrival of a new figure in the House.

Mr. LEMIEUX. You went to Renfrew and could not prevent him coming here.

Mr. PELLETIER. And to-night we have the member for Rouville promising the support of his party to the government, following the footsteps of the hon. member for South Wellington, who, during the debate on the address told our leader: why don't you get rid of these bad Nationalists and we will support you if you put them to one side. Well, these gentlemen are lonesome in the cold shades of opposition, but let me tell them that this government is quite capable of taking care of its own policy. Let me tell them further that if any good policy is submitted to this country we will always find these gentlemen opposite taking a stand, as they have always done, against the public interest, or else behind the lines of Torres Vedras. Let us compare for a moment the patriotic principles and lofty sentiments of the member for Rouville to-day, when he has become a great imperialist, with the platform of his party years ago. Let us compare his utterances to-day with the programme his party had in the province of Quebec when they came into power in 1896. The member for Rouville, I think—I do not make assertions as he does without being perfectly sure—but I am informed he was one of the founders of a paper called 'Le Soir.'

Mr. LEMIEUX. No.

Mr. PELLETIER. The hon. member (Mr. Lemieux) says 'No,' but he also says I was in Drummond-Arthabaska during the last election, when I was not there. There was in Quebec a paper which my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition—who by his courtesy always gives a good example to the young fellow from Rouville— there was in Quebec a paper which the right hon. leader of the opposition had written articles for and which was his organ.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I rise to a point of order. My hon. friend (Mr. Pelletier) is rather too cheeky.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Will the hon. gentleman state his point of order?

Mr. LEMIEUX. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Pelletier) speaks of the 'young fellow' from Rouville. He may speak that way in the county of Quebec, but not in this House. He must speak of the hon. gentleman from Rouville.

Mr. PELLETIER. The rules of parliament do not oblige me to say more than the hon. member for Rouville.

Mr. LEMIEUX. The hon. gentleman will have to be polite in spite of himself. I do not lose my temper, but I say the hon. gentleman has no right to make that remark. The rules of the House will compel him to refer to another member as the 'hon. gentleman.'

Mr. PELLETIER. The 'hon. member' will do. Well the hon. member says he is not losing his temper, but if we saw him when he really lost his tempper he must lose control of himself altogether. There was a newspaper in Quebec in which the leader of the opposition sometimes wrote very good articles and which was known as his party organ.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I am responsible for the articles I wrote myself.

Mr. PELLETIER. Yes, and there were other articles written in support of the policy of my right hon. friend which he never repudiated.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Life is too short.

Mr. PELLETIER. I will read what one of these articles now, and we will see what these great imperialists said when they wanted to reach power. This is from the Liberal organ in Quebec:

Do you want war; thence million dollars in guns, cannons and bayonets; imminent danger for you farmers.

These are the head lines and here is the article:

One of old Tupper's dreams was imperial federation. Imperial federation means a closer alliance between England and her colonies generally and Canada in particular. One condition of such an alliance would be that in time of war Canada would be called upon to pay its share of the cost in money and in men. And, as England is nearly always at war with somebody we would be continually taxing ourselves to find money, always drawing lots to raise men. In return England would make these fakirs baronets, knights of this, commanders of that. But the people would remain food for cannon. Hardly had Sir Charles Tupper returned from England than he began to pave the way for the realization of his awful plan. England was threatened with a difficulty with the United States over a few acres of mining land which she claimed in Venezuela, thousands of miles away from our country, in Central America. Immediately Sir Charles Tupper, to be officious hastened to order the purchase in England of guns, cannon, &c. to the extent of $1,800,000, in the midst of a session without consulting the House. That was not enough for him. He wanted three millions. Mr. Foster proposed on April 21st, 1896, '(Hansard,' page 6902) a resolution authorizing a loan of $3,000, 000 to pay for the purchases made and to be made. There had then been ordered 40,000 Lee-Enfield rifles and 23,000 carbines of the same make for the cavalry. There have been ordered four batteries of six cannon, 12 pounders with the necessary ammunition. The rifles cost $18 each.

Now I come to the climax, and when I read this, let it not be forgotten that these were the words spoken to the public by the party organ in Quebec:

Why all these armaments, if we are not to have war? And why fight for England? The electors should remember that these big and great chiefs who are always anxious to show themselves greater patriots than others, more loyal than others, and ready to throw themselves into war for the benefit of others, will not be those who will bear the burden. These carbines, these cannon, the electors will have to handle them. You are considered good enough food for powder. The Tuppers, Angers, the Taillons will be in their ministerial offices, whence they will send us forth to death, joy in their hearts and a glass of champagne in their hands. Once more, why all these rifles, these cannon, these bayonets, if these good Tupper & Company do not meditate some bad action? Your children will be sent to Africa, to Asia, whence they will never return. If you vote for Blue candidates, you approve all these warlike preparations. Does the government come to your assistance when you are crushed by taxes of all kinds, when misfortune overtakes you, either through flood or fire? And we spend three millions of dollars for guns. Vote for Laurier and his candidates if you want to see your country enjoy the same tranquillity, and not to expose yourself to start some of these fine mornings, leaving behind your wives and families and all that you hold dear.

And the same men tell us to-day: Bring on a bold imperialist policy, and we will be at your back. Mr. Chairman, I will not say more; the country knows them now.

Mr. LEMIEUX. No, Mr. Chairman, the country does not know them now. The country may know one side, but it does not know the other side. Let us see a little what the country will think of the other side—at least, a portion of the other side; because I know my hon. friends opposite; I know there is no mistake about them; they are staunch Tories, staunch Conservatives. But these words do not apply to my hon. friend, and I wish to reply at once to the question that was put to me a moment ago. It is good for the House, it is good for the country, that this ultra imperialist, this ultra Tory, should be known—not by us; we know him; but by his own friends. My hon. friend said a moment ago that he did not go to Drummond and Arthabaska. He did not, and I will explain to the House why.

Mr. PELLETIER. You said three times that I went.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Listen to the reason why the hon. gentleman did not go to Drummond and Arthabaska. The hon. gentleman, I stated to the House the other day, has changed colours as often as the sky changes. In 1886 he was a Rielist candidate in the county of Temiscouata against the Ross government. In 1887 he was a Liberal candidate in the county of Three Rivers. In 1888 or 1889 he was elected in the county of Dorchester, succeeding his bosom friend, Mr. Larochelle. In 1890 he was again a Liberal candidate. In 1891 that stalwart loyalist, who would not stand for reciprocity in 1911, supported unrestricted reciprocity.

Mr. MORPHY. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order. The hon. gentleman is not discussing any issue bearing on the question before the committee.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I think certainly that the committee is wandering far from the item under discussion.

Mr. LEMIEUX. My hon. friend spoke of articles published in 1896 and before 1896 to explain his stand, and I think I am entitled to answer him to show him before the country and before his own friends. I was just saying that in 1891 the hon. gentleman stood firmly in favour of unrestricted reciprocity as a straight Liberal in the county of Dorchester. A few months afterwards——

Mr. MORPHY. I rise to a point of order. The hon. gentleman is now entering upon an issue——

Mr. LEMIEUX. I am coming to the point.

Mr. MORPHY. I quite understand that I am not entitled to make my point of order without being interrupted. It seems to me that the House is degenerating to a pretty low standard. The hon. gentleman is entering upon a discussion of unrestricted reciprocity. What that has to do with the naval question I cannot see. I ask your ruling.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I must repeat that the hon. member has gone far from the question under discussion. Both sides of the House have done so. I would invite the hon. member to come back to the point under discussion.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I am nearing the point, Mr. Chairman. I was just saying that in 1891 the hon. gentleman stood with this party. In 1896 he stood with the other party, but in 1904 he had a quarrel with the other party, and that is how 'Zandrang' comes in. He wanted to know why I should call him 'Zandrang.' He had a quarrel with his party on that very point; that is why——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. MORPHY. Mr. Chairman, I cannot see that the hon. member is coming to the point.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I am coming to the point.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. LEMIEUX. As a result of that quarrel, the hon. gentleman was kept away from Drummond and Arthabaska by his own friends. That is why he did not go to that county.

But in the last election finally, having passed from the Riel to the Nationalist candidate, then to a Liberal candidate, and then to a Blue, he became again an out and out Nationalist candidate in the county of Quebec, opposing the Canadian navy, opposing any navy, opposing any aid to Great Britain, and opposing his present leader on every hustings in the county of Quebec, standing side by side with Mr. Armand Lavergne, and opposing all naval policy that might be propounded in this parliament by either the Liberal or the Conservative party. He wanted to be elected and he was elected by a majority of 48 after many unsuccessful attempts during those ten years to carry any county in the province of Quebec. Ultimately he was elected on racial and anti-British appeals.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. LEMIEUX. And to-day he stands in this House ready to support anything emanating from the government. The other day on another question the hon. gentleman said to the faithful of the county of Quebec that there were times in the life of a public man when it was more difficult for him to keep his portfolio than to throw it aside. He decided, however, to keep his portfolio on the school question, and make sure, Mr. Chairman, he will again keep his portfolio on the naval question also.

Mr. BENNETT (East Simcoe). It may be an advantage, or a disadvantage, but I happened to sit in this House in 1896, and it would be hard to reconcile the voluble gentleman who has just taken his seat with the same gentleman who sat here silent as the tomb on a certain occasion. What was that occasion? The Postmaster General quoted to-night utterances from newspapers published in the province of Quebec prior to the elections of 1896. There happened to sit in this House at that time a gentleman who stood prominently high in the opinion of both sides in his reputation for fairness, and his splendid character in the province of Quebec. I refer to the Hon. John McIntosh who had the honour of representing the city of Sherbrooke, which city did itself credit in electing him as its member. I remember seeing then a blanched face which held a palsied tongue, and it was the face and the tongue of the hon. member for Rouville on the occasion of a scathing denunciation by Mr. McIntosh. Sir, the occasion of criticism were the speeches uttered by the hon. member for Rouville who paraded from one end of the province of Quebec to the other making denunciation of 'Old Tupper'. The hon. gentleman did not even have that respect which he should have had for the grey hairs of that distinguished statesman as to term him by his title of 'Sir Charles'. That is the taste which the hon. gentleman displays for a man in public life. Did that hon. gentleman dare to deny one word uttered by the hon. John McIntosh on that occasion? No, Sir, not a single word. And his leader and the ministers sitting with him on that side of the House hung down their very heads for shame of him. The statement which Mr. McIntosh made at that time, at the same time enumerating the different places where the hon. gentleman had made the speeches complained of, was that he was a man who instead of being in the Canadian parliament, should have been prosecuted for treason to the British Crown. That is the hon. gentleman who has been prating here to-night, and presenting his views on imperialism as to the views that should be entertained by the hon. gentlemen on both sides of this House.

An hon. MEMBER. Save the mark.

Mr. BENNETT (East Simcoe). The wreck in the shape of His Majesty's loyal opposition which sit on the opposite side are at such variance with each other that they do not know in what direction they are going. I have been in this House, with a slight interruption, for which hon. gentlemen opposite devoutly prayed, for three parliaments, and in that period who ever saw such a spectacle as was presented in this House on the Manitoba school question the other night? Sir, it is a well known rule in the British navy that when a ship sinks owing to the blunder of the commander, that commander like a man goes down with his ship. That has not been done by the leader of the opposition. He is still clinging to the ship, and if any man should be humiliated how must the leader of the opposition have been humiliated the other night. He took a stand on the school question, in connection with the Manitoba boundaries extension Bill, and I give him credit for being conscientious; but if he was conscientious in his attitude with respect to that question, then he stands in the unenviable position that he no longer leads his compatriots from Quebec, but they lead him. Under these circumstances the time has come in the province of Quebec when the right hon. gentleman cannot lead his own following. Sir, the public are getting tired and sick of these hon. gentlemen prating about race and religion.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. BENNETT (East Simcoe). I represent a constituency in the province of Ontario where there are 1,500 French Canadian voters, and in the last election what was the whole issue in that French Canadian settlement? Was it the question of reciprocity or the question of the navy? No, Sir, but the bosom friend of the leader of the opposition, the creature of his hand, the putty which he moulded, Senator Casgrain, travelled all the way from Montreal to the riding of East Simcoe, and for two hours harangued at different points French Canadian audiences. What was the subject? Was it reciprocity, was it the question of the navy, was it the economic question? No, Sir, it was: 'Vote for the old man because he is a French Canadian and a Catholic.' That was the whole cry raised during the last election amongst the French Canadians in my riding. And, Sir, in making that statement I do not go behind Senator Casgrain's back, I am a personal friend of his—at least I hope I am—and I saw him after the opening of the session, and said to him: 'You ought to be ashamed of yourself. The idea of a man of your intelligence going into that riding and endeavouring for two hours to excite the people on questions of race and creed in a county where the people were intelligent enough to deal with questions on their merits, and on their merits alone.' Senator Casgrain admitted the very statement that I attributed to him, that the whole trend of his speech was, 'vote for Laurier because he is a Roman Catholic and a Frenchman.' What happened? An intelligent French Canadian elector said: 'We know Sir Wilfrid is a Frenchman and a Roman Catholic. Tell us about reciprocity.' Senator Casgrain's response to that question was: 'That has nothing to do with it. Vote for Laurier, because he is a Frenchman and a Catholic.' Sir, that policy was not only carried on in East Simcoe, it was carried on in other ridings, and what was the result? Why, Sir, the returns show it. The county of Prescott, in Ontario, went Liberal in answer to the appeal along those lines. Glengarry with its large French vote, went Liberal in response to the same appeal. South Essex, the two Kents, and Russell were all carried in the same manner, I repeat that people are sick and tired of these eternal howls from hon. gentleman opposite, and from their leader, on this question of race and religion. However, it has stood them in good stead. The leader of the opposition has never thought it was not the proper thing to do it himself. I sat in this House during the session of 1896, and what happened when his Chicoutimi speech was attributed to him? The leader of the opposition had there made the statement 'that he thanked God there was not an Orangeman in the Liberal party,' and yet, sitting right behind him at the time, was the Grand Master of Eastern Ontario, the hon. member for Addington.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). The Orange order never so far disgraced itself.

Mr. BENNETT (Simcoe). And then Mr. Bellay, member for Chicoutimi and Saguenay, made the statement repeatedly from his place in the House, and produced a bunch of affidavits in support of it.

The right hon. gentleman who leads the opposition did not dare deny that he had made the statement attributed to him, and 'Hansard' will prove it. It was a pitiful sight, and for this reason, that though the right hon. gentleman did not deny it himself, it fell to the lot of two gentlemen to stand up—two of his own supporters, Mr. Carroll and the present Senator Choquette—and declare that they were present and had not heard it said, and it could not have been said. But, as I have said, the right hon. gentleman himself would not make the denial, and I do not suppose he would deny it to-night even after twenty years. That is the style of election cries that we have been subjected to in the riding of East Simcoe and in all the ridings in Ontario in which there are many French Canadians. And I want to tell hon. gentlemen opposite that had they eliminated that feature from the discussion in these contests the French vote in their ridings would have been much broken up, but instead of that it was a solid mass, and that by reason of the appeals that have been made from time to time. As to the member from Rouville (Mr. Lemieux), I do not suppose that the House is very much concerned with his personal troubles. I have heard the adage that fools rush in where angels fear to tread, and also that people who live in glass houses should not throw stones. If the hon. gentleman had come at me personally as he came at the Postmaster General (Mr. Pelletier), I would refer to a debate which took place in this House in relation to certain actions in the county of Gaspé that did not redound to the credit of the hon. member and to some person very near to him. And on that occasion, what did the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) plead for him? Why, it was enough to melt one to tears to hear the defence put up by the leader of the opposition for the hon. member for Rouville and a certain other person in connection with certain occurrences in one of the ridings in the province of Quebec. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Lemieux) talks about the Postmaster General (Mr. Pelletier) as being a firebrand. Well, there is one thing about a man who carries a firebrand—you can always see him coming. But this dark-lantern brigade gentry who infest the French settlements are not always to be caught. For my part, I prefer the man with the flaming torch to the man who arms himself with a dark lantern.

These hon. gentlemen are in opposition, and I think before many years are passed exposures will be made in this House of the way millions of dollars were frittered away and stolen from the public treasury, and the result will be to keep them where they are for many years to come. They may as well accept the inevitable. They are in opposition, and they are in opposition to stay for many years. But all this talking of the hon. member for Rouville may be summed up in this: He is very busy about nothing and out of wind to no purpose.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I desire to ask the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen) for information as to the ships included in this item. What is the nature of these ships?

Mr. HAZEN. It is not expected to purchase any ships with this vote. The total amount is $1,660,000, and it is divided under the following heads:

To pay the officers and men of the 'Niobe' and 'Rainbow' and of the Naval College, $583,080.

Stores for the two boats, and guns, $533,900.

Repairs to ships and vessels (nearly all for repairs of damages to the 'Niobe'), $200,000.

Repairs to the dockyards machinery at Halifax and Esquimalt, $13,200.

Miscellaneous dockyard services at Halifax and Esquimalt, $44,444.

Miscellaneous other services, $118,600.

Repairs and maintenance of buildings, provision of additional improvements for the college, $5,500.

Purchase of new machinery for dockyards at Halifax and Esquimalt, $19,200.

New buildings and other works, $4,276.

Construction of lighters, water-tank and service boats, $64,500.

That makes the total of the vote. I would be glad to give the right hon. gentleman details of any of these subdivisions if he desires.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. No, I only wished to know if new boats were to be purchased. I understand it is not intended to make such purchases.

Mr. HAZEN. Nothing except lighters, a water-tank and service boats. Nothing in the way of what might be called boats for the navy.

Mr. BELAND. Are men being recruited for the service?

Mr. HAZEN. Yes, from time to time, to keep the number on the 'Niobe' and the 'Rainbow' up to strength.

Mr. BELAND. How many men on each of these ships?

Mr. HAZEN. The authorized numbers are: For the 'Niobe,' 60 officers and 630 men; for the 'Rainbow,' 18 officers and 251 men; Royal Naval College at Halifax, naval officers, 8; civilian officers, 4; cadets, 45; naval men, 40; civilians, 10. This makes a total of 1,068. That is the authorized strength, but I do not think we are up to strength at the present time. For instance, there is accommodation in the naval college for 45 cadets, and I think that at the present time there are only about 30.

Mr. BELAND. Would the hon. minister sum up the services which are being rendered now by these two ships?

Mr. HAZEN. Those upon the ships, of course, are enlisted for the purpose of receiving instruction. The course of instruction is similar to that on board the ships of the British navy; and the intention was, in the scheme proposed, that after taking a certain course of instruction they should be shipped into other vessels actually engaged in outside waters instead of doing the work among the harbours which the 'Niobe' and 'Rainbow' are doing. The training summary included the British navy instruction in gunnery, the management of a ship and other matters to make them efficient seamen for a man of war.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I have seen it stated in the papers that certain of the cadets had been sent to England aboard of some of the ships there. How many young Canadians have been sent to the other side? And will they come back?

Mr. HAZEN. Thirteen have been sent to continue there the work of their course of training that they could not get on board the ship here.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Who commands the 'Rainbow'?

Mr. HAZEN. Commander Holmes.

Mr. LEMIEUX. And on board the 'Niobe' Commander Macdonald?

Mr. HAZEN. Yes.

Mr. LEMIEUX. When I was Postmaster General, I was asked by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries of that time, to ask the postmasters throughout the country to recruit men for the navy. Are the postmasters continuing that work? Are they continuing to recruit?

Mr. HAZEN. That is continued, those instructions to the postmasters have never been cancelled.

Mr. HAZEN.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Are you recruiting men?

Mr. HAZEN. We are getting men from time to time, there is no very active recruiting going on.

Mr. McKENZIE. Would the minister give some further information about the college at Halifax?

Mr. HAZEN. The college is the old hospital building in the navy-yard. The cadets are instructed by a staff of instructors in different branches of education necessary to fit them for the navy. They are also instructed in mechanical work, there is a machine shop and carpenter shop and they receive manual training. In fact they receive the sort of training for the navy that is given at the college at Kingston for life in the army.

Mr. McKENZIE. Do they all receive the same kind of training?

Mr. HAZEN. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. What is the length of the course?

Mr. HAZEN. About two years.

Mr. McKENZIE. Do they spend part of that time on the ships?

Mr. HAZEN. Not until they are through with the college. Then if they want to continue a naval career they go on board a ship and continue their course.

Mr. McKENZIE. What qualifications must a cadet possess?

Mr. HAZEN. He has to pass a preliminary examination such as a boy would get at the common schools of the country, but although the examination is simple some boys fail. The boys are usually about 17 years of age. It is found impossible to get the boys to go to school as young as they do in Great Britain.

Mr. BELAND. The idea of the minister undoubtedly is to have these men who are trained on those ships serve on the new navy he is going to devise when he goes and consults with the admiralty?

Mr. HAZEN. That, of course, was the idea, object and purpose of establishing the college just as with the college at Kingston, but many of those who graduated from the college at Kingston do not go into the army or even take out commissions in the militia; the education they receive fits them for engineering or any other calling because of the very excellent training they get. The same thing is true of the naval college at Halifax. I visited it last autumn and was very much pleased with what I saw. I thought the discipline was excellent and the training good. It would be a benefit to a boy even if he did not enter the navy as a profession. Of course if we are going to have a navy in Canada and to have naval officers we must have means to properly educate them. In England they have the naval colleges and a naval college is an essential and necessary part of the naval system.

Mr. BELAND. The minister of course is aware of the tenor of the resolution adopted here on March 29, 1909. As I understand the minister is going to England within a short time. Some other course will be adopted after negotiation with the admiralty. I would call the minister's attention to a paragraph in the resolution unanimously adopted in this House two years ago:

The House is of opinion that under the present constitutional relations between the mother country and the self-governing Dominions, the payment of regular and periodical contributions to the imperial treasury for naval and military purposes, would not, so far as Canada is concerned, be the most satisfactory solution of the question of defence.

Another course might be adopted, that would be the building of a navy either in close co-operation with the British navy or an entirely Canadian navy. Does the minister wish to adhere completely to the resolution of March 29, 1909, or does he not propose to do that?

Mr. HAZEN. I am not prepared to tell my hon. friend at this moment what the policy of the government will be in that respect.

Mr. BELAND. The minister is not even in a position to say whether he will adhere to the resolution which was adopted unanimously in this House and in the wording of which his own leader, then the leader of the opposition (Mr. Borden), participated.

I am sure of that because I was present in the House when this resolution was adopted with the participation of both parties and with both leaders sharing in the framing of it. It has one paragraph which is important. The minister is not in a position to say whether he will adhere to the resolution which was adopted here unanimously not two years ago—may I ask?

Mr. HAZEN. That is correct.

Mr. BELAND. The minister, a few minutes ago, said, if I understood him correctly, that the scheme propounded by the late government had been hurriedly conceived. This resolution was adopted almost three years ago. It was adopted in March, 1909, and the Bill was presented to this House for the carrying out of the policy regarding naval defence on the 3rd February, 1910. That is almost one year later, and, in the meantime, there was a conference in London between two ministers, at least, of the late government and the Brisish admiralty. I do not wish to delay the House at all, but this is a subject in which I am very much interested. I have been discussing it a good deal with gentlemen who sit behind the minister. One paragraph of this most important resolution reads as follows:—

The House will cordially approve of any necessary expenditure designed to promote the speedy organization of a Canadian Naval Service in co-operation with and in close relation to the Imperial navy, along the lines suggested by the admiralty at the last Imperial Conference, and in full sympathy with the view——

And so on. We have contended that the policy inaugurated by the late administration was exactly on the line of this part of the resolution. We have been contending that in the province of Quebec, and I think we were right. The naval policy which was adopted provided for the building in this country of a certain number of ships, the control of which was to be in the hands of the Canadian government, but it was provided in a certain clause—I do not remember the number of it—that if it was judged necessary, this Canadian navy could share in the defence of the empire and be a part at a given moment of the imperial navy. We have been condemned in the province of Quebec, by the Postmaster General, because this scheme was in too close co-operation with the imperial navy, whilst, if I am well informed, in the province of Ontario we have been condemned because it was not in co-operation sufficiently with the mother country.

Mr. PELLETIER. In defence of the Naval Bill, did not the hon. member for Beauce, in the counties of Montmagny and Beauce where he ran, tell the people that this navy was not so bad as it looked because it was for the protection of the export of cheese and butter?

Mr. BELAND. Certainly, and in saying that I was repeating the very words of the right hon. gentleman who leads the government. He expressed that in the seat which is now occupied by my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition when he said that this naval organization would provide for the protection of commerce. Are cheese and butter not important factors in our commerce, I would ask my hon. friend?

Mr. PELLETIER. Certainly, but what I meant to suggest was that the hon. member for Beauce, as a minister of the Crown, told the audience which he addressed during the election, that there was no danger at all of anybody being hurt by those poor ships, because they were not going to wage war, but were merely for the protection of cheese and butter.

Mr. BELAND. I never stood for an academic resolution to protect the country but I always stood for a navy to protect our coast and trade and how could we protect the country when we went to war unless we fired guns? I see that the Postmaster General is right when he says that he was not in Drummond and Arthabaska; otherwise he would have known what I said there.

Mr. PELLETIER. I am told that it was about the same thing.

Mr. BELAND. Yes. this navy was to be a Canadian navy under the control of the Canadian government for the protection of our ports, coasts, trade and commerce, and sharing with the mother country in the moment of need. Those are the words I used in Drummond Arthabaska.

Mr. LEMIEUX. And the Postmaster General said that it was a crime to do that.

Mr. PELLETIER. The hon. member for Rouville does not know anything about it.

Mr. BELAND. I never heard the Postmaster General on a platform in the last election. I have read some of his speeches in a paper which is supposed to be friendly to him and one paragraph conveyed to me the idea that this navy was condemned very severely and that any participation whatever in defence of the empire would be a national crime. Of course, to-day it is changed as on the school question everything is changed. We have gained to-day the knowledge that everybody in this House is in favour of this country sharing in defence of the empire. Is there anybody in the House against it?

Mr. LEMIEUX. Speak now.

Mr. PELLETIER. I will speak.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Speak now.

Mr. PELLETIER. Would the hon. member for Rouville try and take some advice from his leader and be somewhat more calm? I will speak when my leader speaks on this question and when we have formulated a policy. Let my hon. friend wait a little.

Mr. LEMIEUX. You cannot speak.

Mr. OLIVER. In the meantime the hon. gentleman is within the lines of Torres Vedras.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Do you mean Mr. Lavergne or your present leader?

Mr. PELLETIER. Let the hon. member for Beauce speak.

Mr. BELAND. As far as I was personally concerned I had not taken very strongly to the idea of the organization of the Canadian navy until the 29th March, 1909. But on that occasion we witnessed the great spectacle of both leaders and both parties uniting on the one idea that the time had come when we should organize, in so far as naval defence was concerned, and the word 'speedy' was included in this paragraph at the suggestion of the leader of the opposition of that time. My hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries claims that it was conceived hurriedly, that we were too quick, that we were too fast, too swift, too speedy and yet this word 'speedy' was included at the suggestion of the right hon. gentleman who now leads the government. Since then I have been a fervent adherent of the idea of naval organization in Canada. I realize that it is necessary, that it is a duty, an obligation, and I take this opportunity to say that I believe there is a difference, at least in French, between the word 'duty' and the word 'obligation'. There is a big difference between the word 'duty' and the word 'obligation' and I am sorry that I have to differ from the right hon. gentleman who leads the House in that regard. I have done my best to have the people in Quebec come to the idea that the time has arrived when we should organize a naval defence.

The minister stated to-night that when in six years the ships would be built, they would be obsolete, but if such an opinion were ever given by any gallant admiral it would be a suprise to me because a good many British ships are older than six years and yet they are in effective service in the navy. I tell the minister : I still adhere to the resolution adopted on the 29th of March, 1909, I adhere to every word of it and I trust that when he goes to England—and this country will be well represented by him—he will emphasize the fact that this Parliament was unanimous in passing this resolution, and that direct and periodical contributions to the British admiralty are not allowed by this resolution of the Canadian parliament, but that a speedy organization of a naval service in co-operation with the mother country is ordered by the resolution. The Liberal, party has been doing its best to carry out that resolution as fast as possible, and we have been blamed for it. We now await the policy of the government, and I trust that whatever the minister proposes will be well devised and well planned, as the result of these negotiations with the home authorities and the experts of the British navy. I hope that every man in this House, not only the minister and his leader, not only the gentlemen who sit behind him, not only the Liberal party as a whole, but even those whom you, Mr. Chairman, know so well and who have been denouncing any naval organization in this country, will support the policy the minister submits. Then will be done away with these vicious appeals that have been made in the province of Quebec especially, and even in Ontario and the other provinces on exactly opposite grounds.

Mr. CARROLL. I realize that it is perhaps in the interests of the country that we should get quickly through with the estimates, but I must say a few words upon the resolution now before us. It seems to be well understood that the policy of both political parties in this country is to contribute some aid, in whatever shape it may be, to the defence of the empire. It may be that in the heat of a political combat things have been said which would not be said on the floor of this parliament, but taking the discussion we have had in this House to-day, we may fairly come to the conclusion that the Canadian Parliament endorses some contribution towards imperial naval defence. I think we may also draw the conclusion from the discussion that the present government does not intend to give a money contribution to the British admiralty. I take it that that contribution will be in the shape of ships, because otherwise the government would not be maintaining what naval defence service we have in Canada at the present time. Of course, it must be supposed that if the government had the intention of doing anything else than supplying ships, which may be built either in this country or in England, it would be absurd for the government to be voting money to keep up the two ships we now have. Much has been said about the delay that has taken place in reference to this question of contribution to our naval defence, but it must not be forgotten that much has been done in Canada towards helping out the British Empire in connection with the defence of our country. It takes a long time to work out a plan of this kind; it took a long time to work out a plan for taking over the fortifications at Halifax and Esquimalt, but, in this as in other cases, the longer it takes the better may be the final result. Much has been said about the delay on the part of the late government in providing for our defence, but it seems to me that the present government is not in any great hurry, and the best we have heard from the Minister of Marine is that in the not far distant future there will be something done in the matter. We are led to understand that the Minister of Marine is going to England to discuss the question with the home authorities, and as this is a business government and supposing as a business government it will not contribute money towards naval defence, but that it will build ships, then the question arises as to whether ships should be built in Canada or in the mother country. From the mere standpoint of loyalty alone, and without considering anything else, it would of course be just as loyal for the Canadian government to give the money to the British admiralty to supply itself with these ships, as for the Canadian government to build the ships in our own country. But, there are other things which may be considered. The man who takes the ground that we would not, in the course of a few years, be able to build as good ships in Canada as they can build in the English dockyard is not a true Canadian, because he underrates the skill and the industry and the ability of Canadian workmen. I believe it to be the sentiment in the province from which I come, that if there is going to be a contribution to naval defence, then that money should be spent in Nova Scotia, in New Brunswick, in Prince Edward Island or in British Columbia, as the case may be. If we go into the building of these ships, the British workman can come here and earn Canadian dollars if he will, but the people of Canada who are putting their hands into their pockets should have the right to earn these dollars if dollars are to be earned. I look upon this matter from a business standpoint, and I say that in the course of a few years we will be able to build just as good ships on this side of the water as they can in Great Britain. We may talk as we like about conferring with the admiralty, but as I understand it the admiralty has already concurred in the naval policy of the late government.

But the principal point that I wish to lay stress on is this, that the hon. Minister of Marine, when he goes to England to confer with the admiralty on this question, should not forget that there is a sentiment in this country, especially in the maritime provinces, in which I include British Columbia, that if we are going to contribute ships—and I believe we should contribute nothing but ships—those ships should be built by Canadian workmen, of Canadian material, and with Canadian dollars. That is the stand that I believe every maritime man will take. They may tell us: Yes, the people of Nova Scotia, the people of New Brunswick and the people of British Columbia will have a chance to obtain some graft from such government expenditure. Surely every government that comes into power in this country has enough business capacity to see to it that there is no such thing as that. That is an argument that is put up by the 'Montreal Star'—that our people who ask for money to be spent in this country are people who have some axe to grind. There is no one in this parliament who has not some axe to grind, and the axe that we should grind is to see that our workmen are protected, that if money is to be spent, we should take a strong Canadian, business view, that it should be spent on this side of the water.

Mr. McKENZIE. I am glad to observe that the government is making very rapid progress towards the true Canadian policy in respect to the navy. I can see a very marked advance in the attitude of the minister himself since he addressed this House the first time, in the debate on the Address. At that time he had his position guarded at the right and the left, the front and the back, and his lines marked out with great care. He would not say one word that could be construed by anyone as indicating that he was in favour of a Canadian navy. I must congratulate him and the government that those dark and doubtful days have passed away, and that we have now reached a position where the Minister of Marine and Fisheries can stand up and say that it is only a question of degree, that there is no question of policy or principle, that we are in favour of a navy, that there will be a Canadian navy, and that it will be the best Canadian navy we can produce, that it will be a Canadian navy that will stand shoulder to shoulder and side by side with that of the mother country, that it will be a Canadian navy that will not only protect our commerce and our homes, but will protect the mother country in every line of life where protection is necessary. That is true Canadianism, and true imperialism, if you choose to call it so. I am myself a Canadian; I am of Scotch descent; I belong to people who for the last four or five hundred years have been willing to fight to protect their country when fighting was to be done. It strikes me as very ridiculous that there should be any other idea in this country on the part of any Canadian than that he is true to the flag, first, last and all the time. I cannot conceive of the idea gaining ground anywhere in Canada that we have any other policy, or that any other can be the true policy than that we regard ourselves as Canadians true to Canada, and that in being true to Canada we are true to our King and empire; so that outside powers must know that they must regard Australia, South Africa, New Zealand and Canada as part and parcel of the empire, ready to spring at the throat of any enemy who may dare to think of interfering with or molesting her supremacy all over the world. That is the kind of policy that I support, and that has always been the policy of the Canadian people. I am glad if to-night it is the policy of this government, although a few months ago, when this government was organized, it was well understood that there was a division in its ranks on the question of the navy. My reason for thinking so is well founded. There may be some difficulty in knowing exactly what people have said when talking in the country, as we have only the newspaper reports; but we have the opinion of the Minister of Inland Revenue, as expressed in this House, and I have reason to believe that he expressed the opinion of the Postmaster General and the opinion of the Minister of Public Works when he spoke in this House, coming fresh from his triumph in Drummond and Arthabaska. Speaking in this House on the Naval Bill on the 21st of March, 1910, he said:

> I shall vote against the Bill because it involves the recognition of military imperialism, because it aims at having that principle recorded in our statute-books. I shall vote against the amendment because I do not admit that there is any emergency under the present circumstances. I do not wish to justify the motion of the leader of the opposition. I have just said that I am against it. But I believe, in all sincerity, that it does not involve such serious consequences as the government measure. It involves an expenditure not of $25,000,000, as stated by hon. gentlemen opposite, but of only 18 to 20 millions. The sub-amendment, which calls for a referendum to the people on a question of such importance, is the only proposal which meets with my full and entire approval.

That was the policy of the Minister of Inland Revenue less than a year before he took office in this government; that was the policy of the Minister of Public Works, and it has been stated that the Minister of Public Works was given permission to select his colleagues in this government—and we have every reason to believe that the Postmaster General was in entire accord with the Minister of Inland Revenue and the Minister of Public Works on this question of the navy. Their policy was that there should be no navy at all, that there should not be a dollar spent for men or ships, at least until the matter was submitted to the people. There was no ground for any such submission as far as the present leader of the government is concerned. He laid down his policy clear and strong in the resolution of the 29th of March, 1909.

The right hon. gentleman stood for nearly a year after that resolution had been passed by every part of that resolution, and every principle that it involved. The only way by which he could get away from us was perfectly clear; he got away on the ground that that resolution declared that the navy should be built upon the resolution laid down by the conference of 1907. That matter I wish the Minister of Marine and Fisheries to bear in mind. The right hon. gentleman said further that our programme was not as far reaching, that the ships under our programme were not as powerful as those which were called for by the resolution of 1907. Therefore, because we did not go as far as those imperial resolutions called for he would not follow us, and he was therefore not in favour of the navy. Now, all that the Minister of Marine and the government have to do is to look up the resolution of 29th March, 1909, and the imperial resolutions of 1907, and follow them out. They are consistent with themselves, and possibly also consistent with the policy of the party which has put hon. gentlemen opposite in power. But to say that they must stop until they have had further conference with the imperial authorities is not at all consistent with the grounds which their party took when in opposition. Hon. gentlemen opposite said they would not follow us because we were not complying with the programme laid down by the Imperial Conference of 1907. Well they have now the opportunity of complying with those resolutions in every respect. It was said by the Minister of Marine that we—the late government—were taking too long a time in constructing this navy. Now the present Prime Minister speaking in the House on the 12th January, 1910, knew exactly what time it would take to build a navy. He said:

> An army takes twenty years to create, and a navy half a century.
> The speediest organization would not make our Canadian naval service effective in less than ten years.
> Probably fifteen or twenty years would be required; and the crisis, if a crisis is to be apprehended, will come and probably within three years.

This is the language used by the present Prime Minister in supporting the resolution. He was saying that if a crisis was in sight we would not wait until we built ships, and that it would be better to make a contribution. It would have been well for the Minister of Naval Affairs before making the statement he did, to have studied those utterances of his leader. For any Canadian of spirit, any Canadian with a fair amount of comprehension of his responsibility as a citizen of the British Empire, to live as we do now seemed to him to be impossible, particularly for a follower of the present Prime Minister in view of the language he used in that speech, as to his conception of the man who would be content to accept the protection of the British navy, and do nothing to support it. I will quote further a few words from his speech on that occasion:

> I cannot, however, understand how any man receiving and accepting the protection of the British flag, the advantages of British citizenship, the safeguarding of our coasts, the security of our shores, the benefits and advantages of the diplomatic and consular service throughout the world, the talismanic protection of our flag, can reconcile it with our self respect to have every dollar of the cost paid by the over-burdened taxpayers of the British islands. We have the power to adopt that position if we choose because our liberties which we hold as a right and of grace are in this regard absolute, but, with all respect for the conscientious opinions of others, I cannot conceive it to be a worthy or honourable course. It is not so much a question of our duties or obligations to the mother country as of our own honour and self-respect. I am the descendant of those who have never lived under any other than the British flag since it first streamed to the free winds of heaven. I am as profoundly and unalterably attached to British institutions and connection, and as ready to work, and if necessary to fight for them as any man in Canada. But if my country, one of the richest in the world in proportion to its population, should accept the humiliating, the degrading, the pauperizing position of receiving future protection and safety at the hands and cost of the British taxpayer without contributing one dollar in aid or assistance, I would say that the sooner the empire was rid of her the better for all.

That was the position taken by the present Prime Minister, a position which I accept, and a position which I am willing to support. That being the stand, and necessarily I should say the stand of his followers, I cannot really comprehend how he or his government are consistent in delaying to deal with this question. We have now his idea of the time it would take to build a navy, we have the Prime Minister's idea of what our position really is in that regard, and we have the pattern that he laid down for himself. There seems to be nothing left now except to implement those ideas by immediate and speedy action on the part of the government. Now, I am surprised that the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, and the Prime Minister, would even for one moment tolerate the anti-navy and anti-British ideas that seem to have received some attention from a certain quarter in his government. After the first victory which the Nationalists obtained in Drummond and Arthabaska, in October of 1910, the Halifax 'Herald,' the organ of the Prime Minister in that city spoke of that Nationalist victory in this way:

> It is vicious, incendiary and anti-British.

Yet I am sorry to say the Prime Minister started out with a fair number of the supporters of that policy in the present Cabinet.

I am very glad indeed that some of the members who had started on the way to Damascus with authority to do destruction and injury, like Saul himself, saw a light and are now ready to abandon every idea they had except to stand loyally and consistently by the ideas announced by the Prime Minister. And I for one will not harbour any grudge against them, nor hold an account against them, if they will even at this late day stand loyally behind the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen) in carrying out the policy of the resolution read a moment ago by the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Beland) and adopt the imperial resolution of 1907 which is the standard adopted by themselves, and go forward with the policy and let us no longer remain under the condemnation meted out by the Prime Minister to any class who are not willing to contribute to their own support and defence in this empire of which we are so proud to form a part.

Mr. SINCLAIR. I wish to add just one word of exhortation to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. Two days ago the hon. member for Yamaska (Mr. Mondou) asked a question:

Does the government intend to propose the repeal of the Naval Act?

And the answer was 'Yes'. and then the Minister of Marine and Fisheries went on to explain some kind of policy that is to be adopted by the present government and said that policy would undoubtedly require legislation, which legislation would involve the repeal of the present Naval Act. I took the trouble to look up the Naval Service Act to find what in it could be objectionable to the minister. I find that the first section is the title. Sec. 2 and 3 refer to interpretation. Sec. 4 provides that the King is to be commander-in-chief of the Canadian navy. I suppose that will not be objectionable to my hon. friend?

Mr. BELAND. It is objectionable to the hon. member for Dorchester (Mr. Sevigny).

Mr. SINCLAIR. Sec. 5 provides for a department of the naval service. Sec. 6 provides for a deputy head of the department. Sec. 7 gives the minister charge of naval affairs. Section 8 provides that the minister shall have charge of the navy establishments Sec. 9 authorizes the appointment of a director of naval affairs who is to be of rank not less than a rear admiral. Section 10 provides for a naval board. Section 11 provides for a permanent naval force. Section 12 provides that every officer shall take the oath of allegiance. Then there are provisions for the administration of the naval college, the management of the cadets, etc. I was puzzled to know why the minister should think it necessary to repeal the whole Act. There are no provisions in this Act, to my mind, that require to be repealed. If there are any, would the Minister of Marine and Fisheries point them out—point out if he can a single clause in this Act that he would not require if he decides to have any kind of naval service in this country? But we are told that the Naval Act must be repealed because in some schoolhouse of the province of Quebec a promise was made, I suppose, by these hon. gentlemen that the Naval Act should be repealed. These hon. gentlemen have no better reason to give; but I submit that if we are to have any kind of naval service in this country, we must have the provisions of this Naval Act. This Act further provides for the fisheries protection service. The idea of a marine service is not new in this country; we have had it for many years. We repealed by a section of this Naval Act the Act of 1886 which provided for a service at sea in case of national trouble. We repealed the old Act and put this in its place; and now we are told that this is to be repealed. I would like the Minister of Marine and Fisheries to tell us why he has decided to repeal the Naval Service Act, and to ask if he will point out the clause in it that involves the necessity of repealing the Act, in order to introduce a new policy. It has been said over and over again that the government has the choice of three things. After conference with the British authorities, the former government had three lines of policy proposed. They could give a money contribution, which would be the most acceptable step for the admiralty. Also if they took charge of the protection of the Pacific coast and placed a fleet unit there that would be the next step; and the third was to build protected cruisers and destroyers to protect their trade routes on the Atlantic. The late government selected the third. No doubt if my hon. friend (Mr. Hazen) goes to England, the same propositions will be placed before him. He has another choice. In place of protected cruisers, he can build Dreadnoughts. But he has not ventured to say that that is his policy. The question has been raised by the Minister of Marine that there is something wrong with these protected cruisers, that they are not the type of ships that the Canadian government ought to build. I would like to refer for a moment to the doctrine I find laid down in the Navy League, which I understand is the greatest authority in Britain on this question. The Navy League Annual of 1911-12 issued not many weeks ago referring to these cruisers says:

These are in all respects admirable light crafts and it is difficult to say why a far larger number is not placed upon the stocks.

The same authority estimates that the naval expenditure for 1911-12 in Great Britain will be £44,392,500. This includes 5 capital ships, 4 protected cruisers, of the type we have in Canada—they are actually building these to-day in Great Britain, 4 of them are now on the stocks and they will be launched now this year——

Mr. EDWARDS. What good would they be without the Dreadnoughts?

Mr. SINCLAIR. If they were no good the British admiralty would not build them.

Mr. EDWARDS. They are good with the others, but what would be the use of them without the others?

Mr. SINCLAIR. They are the kind of ships used for the protection of the trade routes. They are swift ships, battleships. They are building also 20 destroyers, 6 submarines, 2 river gun-boats, 1 department ship and 1 hospital ship. We proposed 4 of these cruisers of the 'Bristol' type and 6 torpedo destroyers to begin with, the very kind of ships they are building in England. They are building these constantly. One of them was launched in June last, and they are proposing to launch one on the 18th of June this year.

They are proposing to launch another on the 19th of August, a third on the 31st of August and a fourth in September. During the past two years the British government has built in British yards the following protected cruisers: Five of the Bristol type (that is the type we are proposing to build); four of the Dartmouth type; three of the Dublin class; three improved of the Dublin class, and three for the Australian government, making in all 18, and we are told by the Minister of Marine and by the Prime Minister that these vessels will be useless in time of war. Then 18 of these useless vessels have been built by the British Admiralty within the last two years, or are now building, and they are also being built by every civilized country in the world. There is a dispute among experts as to the best type of ship. There is no doubt that the strongest and most effective ship is the Dreadnought, but these other ships are being built by every civilized and progressive nation in the world. The British government to-day own 92 protected cruisers, Germany 41, Japan 16, United States 14, Austria 9, Russia 8, Italy 7, France 5. The last proposal of the British admiralty was that they would build five in Great Britain each year and if they were the kind of ships my hon. friend says they are, I submit that the British admiralty would not be building them at all. A couple of years ago the government of Australia asked for an expert to be sent out to make some investigations and give them some advice and then the report of Sir Reginald Henderson the expert who went there recommends within the next 22 years the construction of the following vessels: Eight battleships, 10 protected cruisers, 18 destroyers, and 12 submarines. I can understand my hon. friend saying we ought to have some Dreadnoughts. If that is his policy why does he not announce it? If the only difference between the two parties is that we on this side of the House believe in protected cruisers to begin with and those on the other side in Dreadnoughts, it should be easily settled, but the postmaster General and the Nationalist party have not made that demand, and they are not in favour of any kind of ship. These are the questions with which the Minister of Marine will be met when he reaches London, and I submit he will have either to pay a cash contribution or to adopt some policy very close to the policy of the late government.

Fishery protection service, to provide for repairs and maintenance of vessels, $320,000.

Mr. HAZEN. This estimate is $38,000 more than last year. The details of the estimate of expenditure are:

'The Canada,' $45,000; structural alteration $10,000; new armament $5,000; new motor boat, $1,500;

Steamer 'Curlew,' $20,000; steamer 'Constance,' $20,000; steamer 'Petrel,' $20,000, steamer 'Vigilant,' $30,000; steamer 'Restless,' $12,500; steamer 'Falcon,' $12,500. Hire and maintenance of extra vessels for patrolling on the Pacific coast, $120,000.

This makes up the amount of $320,000 that is required for this service.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Has my hon. friend taken into consideration the serious remarks made by the hon. member for Vancouver about poaching by Americans on the Pacific coast?

Mr. HAZEN. Oh, yes.

Mr. LEMIEUX. What precautions are you taking?

Mr. HAZEN. We have here an item of $120,000. We are unable to get new vessels for the service this year to patrol on the Pacific coast. So we propose to lease.

Mr. McKENZIE. The protection of the fisheries along the coast from Canso around to Cape Breton as soon as the drift ice is gone is very important, because we have many American vessels around the coast at that time, and it is highly necessary that the three-mile limit should be enforced. Is there any system by which the ships will be in readiness to go to that part of the province as early as they will be required?

Mr. HAZEN. I entirely concur in what my hon. friend has said. We have three steamers in the service on the coast mentioned, the 'Canada,' the 'Constance,' and the 'Petrel.' They will all be put in commission when the season opens and their services are required.

Mr. SINCLAIR. It is reported on the coast that the laws are not well enforced in regard to steam trawling, that in the Gulf of St. Lawrence the steam trawlers have been working inside the three-mile limit. Some doubt has been expressed as to what is a bay in all parts of our waters. The steam trawler is prohibited from working in bays or harbours or within three miles of the coast line. In the gulf between Cape Breton and Cape Jack some fishermen contend that they should be kept out of that place altogether.

Mr. HAZEN. How wide is the bay at the mouth?

Mr. SINCLAIR. Perhaps ten or twelve miles.

Mr. McKENZIE. Twenty miles.

Mr. SINCLAIR. I am not quite sure about the width of the bay; at all events, I think the minister should have some authority that would define the bays along the coast that are excluded from the operations of the steam trawler, and also the instructions to the protective agents to look out for these steam trawlers and see that they observe the law.

Mr. HAZEN. This question with regard to bays was dealt with at the arbitration which took place at The Hague two years ago when Sir Charles Fitzpatrick was the representative of the Canadian government, and Sir Allen Aylesworth was the agent of His Britannic Majesty. The tribunal at the Hague practically adopted the rule in regard to bays that was adopted in the treaty of 1888, spoken of as the Blaine-Chamberlain treaty, which was negotiated by Sir Charles Tupper, and which was subsequently thrown out by the Senate of the United States. It defines, except in the case of the Bay of Fundy, which is not considered at all, where the three mile limit shall be with regard to bays. In bays that are not more than ten miles in width it shall be a line from headland to headland at the point where the bay ceases to have the conformation of a bay, and at other places it shall be three miles from the shore. But, there are bays in Prince Edward Island, New Brunswick, like Miramichi Bay and the Baie des Chaleurs, in Nova Scotia and Newfoundland, more than ten miles in width, in regard to which it is expressly provided that the line shall be drawn from headland to headland at the point where it ceases to have the conformation of a bay. There is a general clause in other cases to the effect that the line shall be drawn from the first point at which the bay is not more than ten miles in width. A treaty has been agreed to practically in so far as Canada is concerned, and Newfoundland is now about to do the same, but there must be a reference to the United States Senate for confirmation. The deputy minister tells me that the department has been unable to get any evidence whatever that steam trawlers have been fishing within the three mile limit in the waters mentioned by the hon. member for Guysborough. The Naval Department has been unable to find steam trawlers, whether from the United States or France, inside the three mile limit. I will ask the deputy minister to give instructions to the commanders of these vessels to take more particular pains this year, to watch out and see that no trawlers are allowed within the district referred to by my hon. friend.

Mr. SINCLAIR. Might I suggest that the deputy minister will ask the protection vessels to lay out at nights when the trawler is in the vicinity. I am told that it is at night that the damage is done. The trawler works at night, and as a rule the cruiser goes into some snug harbour where they can have a nice easy time, and they do not see anything, of course. If the protection vessel would lay out at night and watch the trawler perhaps it could get at the difficulty.

Fisheries protection service—to provide for two new vessels required for fishery protection sevice on the coast of British Columbia, $275,000.

Mr. LEMIEUX. There was a rumour a few days ago that Commander Wakeham who has charge of the 'Princess' in the Baie des Chaleur and generally on the north shore, was going to be superannuated. I have known Commander Wakeham for several years and, although he has been in the service of the government for nearly forty years, he is still quite alert, vigorous and an excellent officer of the Department of Marine and Fisheries. I do not think that Commander Wakeham is willing to be superannuated. I know there are many requests made for the succession to his position. I hope the minister will take into consideration the very great service he has rendered to the Crown and to the government and retain him as long as he is willing to perform service.

Mr. HAZEN. Commander Wakeham is not in the naval service, but in the service of the Marine and Fisheries Department. No application, in so far as I know, has been made by Commander Wakeham for superannuation and no application has been made to me from any source to superannuate him. I do not know of any reason for superannuating him. He has been a very capable officer and I am sure that I have not the slightest intention of superannuating him at present.

Mr. JAMESON. Before we leave this question with regard to steam trawlers, which has been introduced by the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair), I wish to say a word with respect to it. The hon. member for Guysborough, during last session, introduced a resolution on this question which resulted in a very full and free discussion. I spoke upon that occasion and I condemned very strongly the system of taking fish by means of beam and otter trawlers. I entertain to-day exactly the same opinion in regard to the matter as I did upon that occasion. On that occasion there were statements made by various gentlemen supporting the administration of that day which effectually evidenced the fact that these trawlers were operated within the three-mile limit. I dare say that the hon. member for Guysborough will recollect that such was the case. The subject is one which is of very vital importance to the fishermen not only of Nova Scotia, but to all the maritime provinces, and is one which might very well engage the serious attention of the officers of the Department of Marine and Fisheries. For two or three years in the reports of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries of the late government some reference to these beam and otter trawlers was made and in each case the intimation was thrown out that beam trawling had come to stay, that it was something which might as well be accepted because it was inevitable. For my own part I think that it would be a very serious thing if it were allowed to go on unchecked. If large sums of money were permitted to be invested in these trawlers it might be said later on that there was a vested interest and that it would be improper to interfere with the operation of them. I think that the government should now do all that it possibly can to check the operation of these trawlers. Of course, in the case of trawlers operating in the North Sea, there is a very different condition prevailing from that which prevails in this country. In the maritime provinces the government has expended millions of dollars in constructing breakwaters, wharfs and aids of that character to the fishermen and the fishermen have invested large sums of money in high-class fishing boats and vessels.

If these trawlers are permitted to carry on their operations in our waters, it will mean that the money invested in our ordinary fisheries will be very largely wasted. That is to say, the tendency will be to drive the fishermen who are now prosecuting their calling by the ordinary method, out of that business and compel them to engage in some other, while the steam trawlers will themselves carry on the operation of taking fish. That may be profitable perhaps in countries where there is a very large population and having many industries, such as Great Britain, but in this country I think it would be a most serious thing, and everything that we can do should be done to prevent the operation of these steam trawlers. I took the view at that time, and I think the hon. member (Mr. Sinclair) also entertained a similar view, that if possible these steam trawlers should be debarred the use of our harbours, that they should not be permitted to enter our ports for the purpose of landing their fish or for coaling. In that way they would be excluded from the benefit of the ports in the maritime provinces and the prosecution of this business would be discouraged.

Mr. HAZEN. Would that in any way interfere with the trawlers coming from France and operating from St. Pierre-Miquelon?

Mr. JAMESON. I quite understand that difficulties might arise in that way, but that is a matter that might be dealt with by diplomatic negotiations with the United States and with France. I believe that if the United States and Canada agree that there shall be no beam trawling in the waters of the North Atlantic, there will be none. I furthermore believe that the conditions are such upon this side of the Atlantic that it would be manifestly in the interests of those who have large sums of money invested in the fisheries, and in the interest of the fisheries themselves, that efforts to suppress and discourage steam trawling should be made. Something has been said lately with respect to the steps which the late government took in respect to the suppression of steam trawling. They passed regulations preventing the operations of beam trawlers within the three mile limit. Regulations were passed preventing the operations of these beam trawlers within the territorial waters of Canada, but in so far as the payment of bounties to the steam trawlers was concerned, I know that bounties were paid. For instance, they paid to the trawler 'Wren' the amount of $111.50 in one year, and it was not until a question was asked by myself in this House in 1911, and the matter thus brought to the attention of the administration, that regulations were passed by which beam trawlers were excluded from the benefit of these bounties. To-day we find that although this government and the Minister of Marine have been charged by certain gentlemen, who are not upon this side of the House, with being in favour of the operation of the beam trawler, the fact is that the government has taken a firm stand in regard to the enforcement of the regulations with respect to the three-mile limit, and also with regard to the non-payment of bounties to these steam trawlers. I am assured by the minister that he has gone a step further, and has already opened up correspondence which may lead perhaps to some arrangement being arrived at whereby the United States and Canada will stand together in preventing in future the operations of these trawlers in the North Atlantic waters. I trust it will not be thought that we on this side of the House are in favour of the operation of the steam trawlers, because we are not. For my own part I am as strongly opposed to them to-day as I was a year ago, and I believe that all those who take an interest in the fisheries of our country feel that the best interests of the fisheries, and the best interests of the fishermen themselves, will be conserved and advanced by preventing, so far as possible, the operation of trawlers in the North Atlantic waters.

Mr. SINCLAIR. The question to which my hon. friend (Mr. Jameson) refers is a very interesting one on the coast of Nova Scotia. I have not much to say against what my hon. friend has said; I think he and I agree as to what ought to be done in regard to these steam trawlers. I will not call it a 'beam' trawler, because I understand there is no such ship now in use as a 'beam' trawler. There was a good many years ago a ship of that kind used in the North Seas but a new type of ship has been adopted called the 'otter' trawler, and is now in use. In order to distinguish what I mean I call this kind of trawler a steam trawler to distinguish it from the usual line trawls. My hon. friend (Mr. Jameson) has given a little credit to the late government, although it seems to hurt his feelings to do so. He has admitted that the late government did prohibit this kind of fishing and did so very promptly a few weeks after the arrival of the first steam trawler in Canadian waters. He also admits that when he brought the question of payment of the bounties to the attention of the late government, at once the regulation in regard to the bounty was repealed and a new regulation was adopted by which the steam trawler is in future to get no bounty. I do not admit that he was at all instrumental in bringing about this change. Although it has been drawn out of him to a certain extent he is compelled to admit that the attitude of the late government was decidedly against this mode of fishing, and if the present government is able to do as much as the late government to show its sincerity in this matter I think we will have reason to be pretty well pleased. My hon. friend (Mr. Jameson) has suggested some method by which this could be done, and perhaps it is the best method. If it can be carried out I shall certainly give it my support. I had the pleasure of travelling yesterday to Ottawa with certain gentlemen who have come from Nova Scotia to interview the government in regard to this matter. A number of them are captains of schooners sailing out of the port of Lunenburg and fishing on the banks. They are what we call deep-sea fishermen; splendid fellows; some of them are in the gallery to-night listening to the speeches. They have come here supported with affidavits showing the destruction of their gear on the banks by these ships, and they have sufficient proof in their pockets to show the government that the fishermen cannot carry on their business at all on the Grand Banks if the steam trawler is to be allowed to work in those waters. This means the rapid destruction of the inshore fisheries and of the deep sea fisheries of Canada in which eleven millions or twelve millions of money has been invested. And not only will the money be lost, but the best type of men we have on our coast will disappear; the men who we will have to draw on to man our navy if we are to have a navy in the future. I say that we should stand by these men because it is quite certain that if this kind of fishing is allowed to become a rule on the coast of Canada the ordinary fisherman who now owns his ship and is his own master, will be wiped out and he will have to work for some capitalist who will own the steam or beam trawler.

I trust, therefore, that the Minister of Marine will take this matter to heart, and give it his best consideration. My hon. friend from Digby (Mr. Jameson), said that if we could exclude the steam trawler from the ports of the United States, and also from the ports of Canada, that would perhaps settle the business. I know that it would be difficult to get the assent of European governments to the prohibition of the steam trawler in these waters, from the fact that it is the usual mode of fishing in France, and has come to be the mode of fishing in Great Britain. The trawler has driven the ordinary fishing vessel out of the North Sea, and if that mode of fishing is carried on for many years longer, there will not be any fishing worth anything left there. On the coasts of Canada we have a great fishing industry, and we should do what is neccessary to preserve it. I think my hon. friend will find a good deal of sympathy at Washington with the proposal that something drastic should be done, and if the two governments unite, I think something can be done. I would like, however, to have the policy of the government from the minister himself rather than from the hon. member for Digby. I have no doubt that the hon. member knows what he is talking about, but when this matter was discussed a few days ago, the attitude of the government did not seem to be what the hon. member for Digby says it is. If the minister is opposed to steam trawling in these waters, and is ready to advocate regulations under which fish caught in steam trawlers cannot be allowed to land on the coasts of Canada, and steam trawlers engaged in this industry cannot receive coal from the coal mines of Canada, it will be interesting for the House to know it.

Mr. HAZEN. I am surprised that in some quarters an endeavour has been made to create the impression, in consequence of some remarks that I made in the House a few weeks ago, that I was not in favour of the suppression of the steam trawler. I made a statement to the House, prepared for me by the officers of the department, dealing with this question, and showing the pros and cons of it—a statement very similar to one made a few years ago by my predecessor in office, the Hon. Mr. Brodeur; and an attempt was made for political reasons to create the impression that I was not in favour of suppressing steam trawling if it could be suppressed. Nothing could be farther from the truth. I am convinced, from what I have read on the subject, that steam trawling is a serious menace and danger to our fisheries on the Atlantic coast, and I presume on the Pacific coast as well, and if persisted in must lead to the destruction of the fisheries. The difficulty in the matter, however, is this. Steam trawling is not now permitted inside of our territorial waters; no trawler can operate in Canada within the three-mile limit. The vessels engaged in trawling come chiefly from France, and the United States. In the North Sea steam trawling is carried on very extensively. There are probably over 2,000 steam trawlers carrying on operations there now, and it is impossible for Canada to get the support of the British government in any attempt to prohibit steam trawling, so long as Great Britain is a party to the arrangement under which it is carried on in the North sea by the people of the different countries engaged in fishing in those waters. In fact, the government of Great Britain will not take any steps to prevent steam trawling on the Atlantic coast, and cannot do so consistently so long as she is a party to that arrangement. There does appear, however to be some reason for hope that the government of the United States will be willing to join with the government of Canada in endeavouring to do something to prevent this mode of fishing being carried on, as there is, among the fishermen who go out from the port of Gloucester, at the present moment a very determined agitation in favour of the suppression of fishing in this way. The difficulty that arises, however, is this: The United States and Canada may enter into an agreement providing that neither country should engage in steam trawling. But that will not control France, which sends steam trawlers close to the three-mile limit and makes Pierre and Miquelon their base of operations; and if we adopted regulations providing that steam trawlers should not land their fish or buy coal at a Canadian port, that would not prevent the trawlers from France from carrying on their operations. Perhaps, however, if the United States and Canada came to an agreement on this subject, they might bring moral pressure enough to bear on other countries to induce them not to allow steam trawlers to carry on these operations in future. I have taken up this question with the authorities at Washington, and I am carrying on a correspondence of an informal character through Mr. Bryce, the British Ambassador, which may lead to something later on. I am not in a position to inform the House what that correspondence amounts to; but I can assure the hon. member for Guysborough, the hon. member for Digby and other hon. members who are interested, that, if it is possible to do so, effective steps will be taken to prevent steam trawling being carried on. The question is whether we should prohibit at once steam trawlers, shipping fish or buying supplies from Canadian ports. Suppose we made that regulation, is it going to assist us at the present time? I do not say whether it is or not. If we made that regulation, and steam trawlers continue to come from France, while American trawlers will be able to take their catch to the American market, and probably bring enough coal for the round voyage. The only way to make such a regulation effective would be to prevent steam trawlers from carrying on their operations outside of the three-mile limit; otherwise you might have the spectacle of an American trawler coming to the three-mile limit and carrying on operations while ours would be unable to carry on a similar business. There are, I believe, only two steam trawlers operating from Canada, a large number from the United States, and a larger number from France. That is the situation. No matter how strongly any Canadian government might be in favour of preventing the operations of steam trawlers, there are great difficulties in the way, that will have to be overcome before anything can be accomplished. I am having the matter given consideration in the department, I am carrying on correspondence with Washington through the British Ambassador, and I hope we may be able to accomplish something in the direction desired.

Mr. SINCLAIR. The responsibility of introducing this matter into politics does not lie with this side of the House, but with the other side.

Mr. HAZEN. I do not think either side of the House is above making political capital out of anything of that kind.

Mr. SINCLAIR. The minister said a few minutes ago, that some person had been endeavouring to make political capital out of this question.

Mr. HAZEN. I noticed that in some extracts from the press of the province from which the hon. gentleman comes.

Mr. SINCLAIR. It has been one of the chief planks in the platform of my hon. friend opposite representing the eastern part of Nova Scotia during the last few elections. I was accused of owning a share in a steam trawler. When my opponents discovered that they could not find out any other way of trying to prejudice the fishermen in the county I have the honour to represent against me, they told a false story round the shore that I was a shareholder in the steam trawler that was working in that vicinity. This question has been a political one in that province for the last four or five years, and when the late government had taken the step to abolish steam trawling in Canadian waters, the provincial convention of the Conservative party, at a meeting held in Truro some years ago, passed a resolution condemning that government for not doing more in connection with this question. You will therefore see that no person on this side of the House is responsible for introducing this question into the political arena, but that it is owing to hon. friends from Nova Scotia, who were trying to harass and annoy the late government over this question, that their chickens are now coming home to roost, that they have to deal with this question themselves.

Mr. JAMESON. The hon. gentleman said that I somewhat grudgingly admitted the late government had taken certain steps for the prevention of steam trawling within the three-mile limit. I do not grudgingly admit it, I say it is a matter of record that on the 9th September, 1908, an order in council was passed which reads as follows:—

The use or operation of vessels known as steam trawlers, operating beam, otter, or other trawls for the purpose of catching fish is prohibited within the three mile limit and in the bays and harbours of Canada.

I do not make that at all as a grudging admission. I say that it is a matter of record, and the hon. gentleman, I dare say, was very well informed with regard to it himself. Now, let us see what the late government did under that regulation, and I will quote for that purpose from the debate which took place last session on the resolution of my hon. friend from Guysborough. That question was discussed in this House on the 6th February, 1911, and I will quote from the remarks of one of the hon. gentleman's own friends on the subject, the hon. member for Inverness (Mr. Chisholm) which are to be found on page 3116 of 'Hansard.' This is what the hon. gentleman in question said:

I have just a word or two to say with regard to the operations of steam trawlers within the three-mile limit. I am of the opinion that the steam trawlers do operate within that limit.

This, be it remembered, was over two years after the enactment, by the late government, of the regulation prohibiting the operation of steam trawls within the three-mile limit.

On more occasions than one that famous beam trawler the 'Wren,' and another whose name I do not remember, operated off the coast of Inverness last year.

That would be in the year 1910, a year and upwards after the passage of this regulation.

This steam trawler would come about dark, move along aimlessly, and just as soon as night fell they would drop their nets and steam on. That I have from the fishermen of Inverness, who have watched their movements. From their statements I am satisfied that their steam trawler did operate within the three-mile limit.

So that while I am perfectly satisfied to admit that the late government passed a regulation prohibiting the operation of steam trawlers within the three-mile limit, I put the hon. member for Inverness in the witness-box and proved out of his own mouth, that the late government did not enforce that regulation and did not protect the fishermen.

Mr. SINCLAIR. The late government, it was shown over and over again, had given instructions to the vessels to watch the steam trawlers, and see that the regulation was not violated. They also challenged the parties who were making those statements to produce proof, and if they did so prosecutions would be conducted. Those parties, however, failed to produce the proof called for, and the government is not responsible in that case.

Mr. JAMESON. The hon. member for Guysborough may not be prepared to take the statement of his colleague the member for Inverness in that regard, but it certainly went unchallenged in this House when the question was debated in 1911, and I believe it will be unchallenged by any member who is cognizant of the state of affairs as they were. The hon. member for Guysborough states that we are attempting to make political capital out of this, and insinuates that the government which came into power on the 10th October last are responsible for the present condition of affairs. I do not wish to labour the question, but I think it is very obvious that the late government only trifled with the matter, that they were not serious at all in their attempts to deal with it. They went on and paid a bounty to steam trawlers after the regulations had been passed prohibiting the operation of steam trawlers within the three-mile limit. It was not until some days after I had brought the matter to the attention of the late government by placing a question on the order paper with regard to the payment of these bounties, that on the 22nd of February, 1911, an order in council was passed which prevented steam trawlers from sharing in the bounties paid to fishing vessels. Therefore, I do not think it comes with very good grace from the hon. member for Guysborough to cast insinuations upon either the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, or this administration, with respect to the steam trawlers or intimate that they are favouring them. The hon. gentleman has gone a step further and said that the Conservative party in Nova Scotia pitch-forked this question into the political arena by passing a resolution in respect to the matter, after, as I understood him, the late government had passed a regulation by which they debarred the steam trawlers from participating in the bounties paid to them. That regulation, as I have said was passed on the 22nd of February, 1911, and the resolution to which he refers was passed, if my memory serves me, in June or July, in 1909, almost two years before the late government had taken the stand with regard to these bounties to which I have just alluded, and one year after they had passed the regulation prohibiting the operation of these steam trawlers within the three-mile limit, during which time they had actually permitted such operation by steam trawlers. So that when the matter is looked at from a fair and reasonable point of view, it will be seen that the late government only trifled with the situation and never dealt with it energetically. Either they disregarded the interests of the fishermen, or they stood in with those gentlemen who were operating the steam trawlers. I drew attention on more than one occasion in this House to reports of officers of the Department of Marine and Fisheries, suggesting that the steam trawlers had come to stay, and when the question was being discussed in the House I quoted on the 6th of February, 1911, from the report of Mr. Cowie, an officer of the department, an officer engaged by the late government and who I believe is yet in the government employ. I quoted from the statement made by that officer at page 377 of the report of the Marine and Fisheries Department for 1910, and this is what he says:

> I think it is now beyond a doubt that trawling has come to stay here, and although its development will, of necessity, be slow, nevertheless, looking to the time when Canada will have many more millions of people within her borders than she now has, when railway rates have been reduced, and the distributing facilities will have been increased to keep pace with the expanding trade, I believe there will be seen a fleet of Canadian steam trawlers running in from the Atlantic grounds with daily supplies of wholesome fresh food fish.

That was the statement which appeared in the report of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries for the year 1910. Does not that seem to have favoured the operation of these steam trawlers? And yet when the present Minister of Marine and Fisheries a few days ago read a report prepared by officers of his department—officers not of his own selection, but officers that were in the department when he came into office—that is along somewhat similar lines, the Liberal newspapers in Nova Scotia attribute to him the views that are expressed in the report and my hon. friend from Guysborough is not fair enough to admit that the statement was not one made by the minister, but was a statement made by men whom he found in office when he took charge of the department over which he has now the honour to preside.

Hydrographic surveys, including survey of Hudson bay, $320,000.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Has this anything to do with the work of the 'Arctic?'

Mr. HAZEN. No, that is in the main estimates which were passed the other night. This is divided as follows: Lake Superior, $30,000; Lake Ontario, $30,000; Atlantic coast, $40,000; Pacific coast, $90,000; Hudson bay, $100,000; Harbour surveys, $20,000; general account, including engraving and printing, $10,000—total, $320,000; the same amount as voted for the service last year.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I do not wish to detain the House, but I was not here when the question of the Arctic came up, and perhaps I may be permitted to say here that the government ought to recognize the work done by Captain Bernier in the far north. The Captain ought to receive through the recommendation of his minister the recognition generally given to an old officer of the Crown. Had I been here the other evening I would have spoken more of the merits of Captain Bernier. But I would ask the minister to bear in mind the service that Captain Bernier has rendered to Canada and the empire.

Hydrographic surveys—to provide for a new vessel required for surveying the Atlantic coast, $200,000.

Mr. LEMIEUX. This is a new vote?

Mr. HAZEN. Yes.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Has the contract been given?

Mr. HAZEN. No, tenders have not been asked for yet.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Are tenders to be asked for as soon as possible?

Mr. HAZEN. Yes.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Does the Minister intend to build the vessel in this country?

Mr. HAZEN. I prefer to have it built in this country if possible. I think the old government had a rule in regard to vessels of this sort that if the tender put in from Canada did not exceed that from outside, by more than a certain percentage, the contract was awarded here. I would like to have it built in Canada, but sometimes our shipyards are so busy that it is almost impossible to have vessels built.

Radiotelegraphic service—to provide for the building and maintenance of wireless stations, $271,500.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Is the hon. minister aware of what is taking place in England in connection with the wireless system? I see it stated that the British government have decided upon a policy on this subject, and that they are arranging to girdle the whole globe with the wireless system, connecting the various colonies. Has the hon. gentleman been in communication with the home government on this subject? The naval service being established, would not this be a timely subject for discussion at future naval conferences by my hon. friend with the British admiralty?

Mr. HAZEN. That, I believe, was agreed upon at the Colonial conference. We have practically bridged the Atlantic with the wireless. The idea then is to reach Australia, but I do not think that up to the present time they have been able to get messages across the Pacific ocean. Of course, we have the cable on the Pacific.

Mr. LEMIEUX. If new stations are to be built, I renew my request with regard to Bird Rock.

Mr. LEMIEUX.

Tidal service—to provide for maintenance of tidal stations and surveying steamers,, $45,000.

Mr. GRAHAM. Before we leave the large amount in which the Hudson Bay is involved—I do not wish to detain the House—but I would ask the privilege when the Hudson Bay Railway is under discussion to ask my hon. friend some questions about this survey of the Hudson Bay as it will affect the question of the railway.

Mr. HAZEN. I shall be happy to give my hon. friend (Mr. Graham) information at any time.

Mr. GRAHAM. It is connected with the Hudson Bay route, and the discussion will naturally come up on the railway item.

Some resolutions reported.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 153) for the relief of George McKay Sutherland.—Mr. MacNutt.

Bill (No. 154), to incorporate the Guarantee Life Insurance Company of Canada. —Mr. MacNutt.

Bill (No. 155), to incorporate the British American Trust Company.—Mr. Bradbury.

Mr. HAZEN moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. GRAHAM. What business will be taken up to-morrow.

Mr. HAZEN. I think we will take up whatever Bills are on the Order Paper ready to be taken up and the Supply will be the balance of the Railway estimates and I think the Militia estimates.

Mr. GRAHAM. With the estimates for the Grand Trunk Pacific it has been the custom to give the members notice exactly when they are to be taken up.

Mr. HAZEN. I have no doubt that to-morrow if hon. gentlemen on the other side are not ready to go on with those estimates they will be allowed to stand until they are.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 12.50 a.m. Tuesday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, March 19, 1912.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Eleven o'clock.

CANADA SHIPPING ACT.

Bill (No. 143) to amend the Canada Shipping Act (Mr. Hazen) was read the second time and House went into committee thereon.

Mr. HAZEN. I explained the purpose of this Bill at the time of its introduction. The first of the two clauses which it contains is for the purpose of exempting sailing ships, fitted with ordinary gasolene engines, that are engaged partly in fishing and partly in the transportation of freight, from having to employ certificated masters or mates. Under the existing law these vessels would be exempt if they were employed solely in fishing, but some of them are engaged for a portion of the year, say for nine months, in fishing and the balance of the year is devoted to carrying freight around the neighbourhood in which the owners live. As the law stands at present these vessels have to have certificated masters and certificated mates. They are operated in most cases by the owner, by the fisherman himself. There are not enough certificated masters and mates, even if the owners were in the position to employ men so qualified, to serve upon these boats; and in addition to that the employment of such masters and mates would impose a burden of expense upon the owner that would not be justified, considering the business in which they are engaged. The junior member for Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean), when I introduced this Bill, suggested that there would have to be some change in its provisions to show that these vessels should either be engaged in the coasting trade, or in the deep sea trade. I told my hon. friend I would look into the matter, and I find that the point raised by him was well taken. So I will ask to amend section one by inserting after the word 'ships' in the sixth line, the words, 'engaged in the coastwise trade.' That will meet the objection that was well taken by my hon. friend from Halifax. I therefore move to amend the section in that respect.

Mr. OLIVER. I am not familiar with the provisions of the Bill. But I gather from what my hon. friend has said that boats propelled by gasolene, not engaged in fishing at any time, would require to have certificated officers?

Mr. HAZEN. Yes.

Mr. OLIVER. Is it reasonable that while a boat propelled by gasolene which happens to be engaged in fishing, may be handled by officers not certificated, and boats propelled by the same means engaged in other callings, should not be relieved from that requirement?

Mr. HAZEN. It has been thought not desirable to extend this privilege any further at the present time. There does not seem to be any hardship in having this requirement for boats which are regularly engaged in trade as carriers. There is no complaint at all from the owners of such boats, because those boats, as a rule, are doing a business that enables their owners to employ a certificated master or a certificated mate. This is intended simply as a relief to those persons who are engaged in the fishing industry. It is from the standpoint of the fishermen that the matter has been dealt with, and it has been thought not desirable to extend the privilege any further at present. If it is found that there is any hardship in applying this requirement to vessels of over 100 tons, propelled by gasolene, which are engaged wholly in trade, and I suppose there are very few of them, the matter will be dealt with at another session; but at the present time we are acting upon what was practically the recommendation of the committee of Marine and Fisheries at the last session of the House. I might say to my hon. friend (Mr. Oliver) that probably at the next session a Bill will be introduced dealing with the Merchant Shipping Act and making a very considerable number of changes in that Act. The subject which my hon. friend has presented could then be dealt with, if it was thought desirable.

Mr. OLIVER. Does the exemption not apply to boats over 100 tons?

Mr. HAZEN. The exemption applies to boats under 100 tons.

Mr. OLIVER. Speaking particularly of the Yukon, the navigation of the Yukon river is in the hands of a monopoly. As a matter of fact a certain navigation company has full control of the navigation of that river. There might be some relief to that condition of monopoly in navigation if a small boat, propelled by gasolene, could be operated under the law. As a matter of fact, two years ago a small vessel built for the purpose of competing in traffic on the Yukon river and on its tributaries and upper waters was debarred from operating by the law as it then existed. I do not recall that that boat was propelled by gasolene, but I know that gasolene boats are in operation on the Yukon river, and I think I am safe in saying that the present provision of the law has been used as a means of preventing that kind of competition in carrying, on those streams, that otherwise would have been secured by the public. I would think, therefore, that it would be advisable to permit of competition in carrying if it can be done without danger to the public.

Mr. HAZEN. My attention has not been called to the condition of affairs on the Yukon to which my hon. friend refers. The matter is certainly one for very careful consideration. If there is existing on the Yukon river a monopoly such as my hon. friend has pointed out, and if the excepting boats under 100 tons that are operated by gasolene, from the necessity of having a certificated officer would go towards breaking up that monopoly, the matter would certainly seem to be one calling for favourable consideration. But I would say to my hon. friend that I would not care to amend this Bill, at so late a period in the session, without careful inquiry as to how far-reaching in its effects such a change might be, but the matter will be considered before the amendment of the Merchant Shipping Act next session.

Mr. OLIVER. I would like very much for the minister to take up the point that I have raised when he is considering the Bill, because there is an immense river system in the northern part of Canada where there must necessarily be a very moderate development of transportation facilities, and where it is very easy for an aggregation of capital to hold the navigation, and it is a desirable thing that there should be every facility offered for competition.

Mr. McKENZIE. I would like to ask the minister if he has anything in this Bill to limit or name the time within which these schooners must be engaged in fishing, before they can get the benefits of the exemption. I can point out to the hon. minister where the Bill might be abused, where a schooner engaged in fishing might enjoy privileges which another schooner of the same size would not enjoy, if she were not so engaged. The owner of the former vessel might only devote a week or a fortnight to fishing and yet benefit by the provisions of the Act. I think there should be some provision for a limit of time within which the vessel must be employed in fishing before she could enjoy the benefits.

Mr. HAZEN. There is no provision of that sort in the Bill. Of course the intention of the Bill is that it shall apply to vessels that are bona fide engaged in fishing operations, or whose principal business is fishing. I may say to my hon. friend (Mr. McKenzie) that the law has not been observed in the past. As a matter of fact there have been violations going on all the time, and it is thought not desirable to have a law on the statute books which has been so violated, and which it is impossible to enforce. It is thought better, therefore, to have some such provision as the Bill contains so as to make the practice legal. The amendment was asked for by a very largely signed petition from people living chiefly in the province from which my hon. friend comes. The signatures are of people in different parts of Nova Scotia, such as Westport, Tiverton, Little River, Sandy Cove and so on, small places along the coast of that province. I think good will result from passing the Bill in its present form. If it is found that some amendment is necessary to guard against what my hon. friend suggests, it can be done at another session of the House. It is too late now at this hour of the session to consider any changes.

Mr. OLIVER. What I said had reference to gasolene boats. I think it would be well for the minister, however, to take into consideration some relief with respect to the requirements, even as regards steam propelled boats of small size, for the reason that I have mentioned.

On section 2.

Mr. HAZEN. The second section, I pointed out to the House, was for the purpose of remedying what I think is a small matter, but which seems to be a hardship. At the present time if a master, a mate, or a second mate loses his certificate, and evidence of that is furnished to the Department of Marine and Fisheries, another certificate is granted, but in order to get that other certificate, which practically costs the department or the government nothing, he has to pay one-half of what it costs to obtain his original certificate. For instance, in the case of a master I think the original cost is $15, and for getting another certificate he has to pay $7.50. It has been felt for a long while that this was rather a burdensome fee to exact from men whose incomes are not very large, and therefore it is provided that when a man proves to the satisfaction of the minister that he has without fault on his part, lost or been deprived of any certificate, the minister may, upon such terms and conditions as he deems fit, cause a copy or duplicate of the original certificate to be made out and certified as aforesaid and delivered to such master, or mate, or second mate, as the case may be. The minister can fix what he considers a fair and reasonable fee, and my disposition would be to fix that fee at the nominal sum of one dollar.

Bill reported as amended, read a third time and passed.

CANADIAN NORTHERN ALBERTA RAILWAY.

Bill (No. 144) respecting aid towards the construction of the Canadian Northern Alberta railway—Mr. White (Leeds)—read a second time and House went into committee thereon.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds). When the resolutions upon which this Bill is founded were under consideration by the committee, I made a rather full statement as to the necessity for the legislation, which statement was concurred in by the hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham). I think it unnecessary to add anything to what I stated on that occasion, so far as giving information to the House is concerned. I therefore suggest that we take up the Bill clause by clause.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

YUKON ACT AMENDMENT.

Bill (No. 123) to amend the Yukon Act (Mr. Doherty) was read the second time and House went into committee thereon.

On section 11—Territorial court.

Mr. BORDEN. The reasons for this Bill were explained fully by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) upon the resolution which preceded the introduction. If there is any information I can give I should be pleased to give it.

Mr. LEMIEUX. The right hon. gentleman (Mr. Borden) is right in saying that information as to the Bill was given by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty). The only suggestion I have to offer relates to one of the judges affected by this Bill. I have not the honour of the acquaintance of Mr. Justice Craig, but I know him by reputation as a well qualified judge. But I have the pleasure of knowing Mr. Justice Dugas. I see by the Orders of the Day that resolutions will be introduced to-morrow with a view to increasing the number of judges in the province of Quebec and to provide $5,000 a year for the new Superior Court judgeship. I do not know in what district the new judge will be appointed, but I suppose it will be the new district of Montcalm. But I know that Judge Dugas, after years of successful practice at the bar, was appointed judge of the Police Court in Montreal. He is highly qualified to fill any of the positions now vacant in the judiciary of Quebec. If Judge Dugas is in good health, as I hope he is, I think the government could avail itself of his services instead of appointing a new judge. The amount to be paid Justice Dugas under this Bill, $5,000, would be exactly the salary of the new judgeship in Quebec. Mr. Justice Dugas is not an old man by any means, but is full of life, a man of high qualifications and one who was quite eminent as a practising lawer. My suggestion, of course, is subject to the limitation I have indicated—that Judge Dugas' health is not impaired.

Mr. BORDEN. I do not propose that the Bill shall be read the third time at this sitting, but that, if passed by the committee it shall stand until the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) is able to be present. He will probably be here during the course of the forenoon sitting. I appreciate what my hon. friend (Mr. Lemieux) has said. The attention of the Minister of Justice will be called to it.

On section 2—Court of Appeal.

Mr. BORDEN. I will explain to my right hon. friend just what the position is. This section repeals sections 46, 47 and 48 of the Yukon Act, chapter 63, Revised Statutes of 1896. These sections are as follows:

46. The territorial court shall sit in banc at such times and places as the commissioner appoints, and the sittings thereof may be adjourned from time to time as may be necessary.

Of course, if the number of judges is reduced to one there can be no sitting in banc.

47. At such sittings the court may hear and dispose of motions for new trials, appeals and motions in the nature of appeals, and any other business or matter within the jurisdiction of the court.

As the court can no longer sit in banc, it is obvious that section requires to be repealed.

48. Two judges shall constitute a quorum of the court in banc; Provided that, where there are only two judges sitting upon an appeal the trial judge or the judge from whose decision the appeal is taken, shall not be one of them.

The same consideration which I have just mentioned applies also to this section. Then, as there is to be no court sitting in banc in the Yukon Territory, it is necessary to make provision for an appeal from the judge, and the proposal of the Minister of Justice, as embodied in this Bill, is that the court of appeal of British Columbia should be constituted as the court of appeal from the judge of the Yukon Territory. This section and the various subsections thereof contain the necessary provisions for that purpose.

On section 4,

Mr. BORDEN. Inasmuch as the territorial court will no longer sit in banc, the amendment which is embodied in this section seems to be necessary. That amendment gives an appeal in all cases from the territorial court to the Supreme Court of Canada.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Directly to the Supreme Court, passing by the Court of Appeal of British Columbia.

Mr. BORDEN. My right hon. friend will observe that the judgment of the territorial court sitting in banc was final and conclusive if that court was unanimous; but if the court was not unanimous, then there was to be an appeal direct to the Supreme Court of Canada. As the court may be reduced to one judge under this statute, the appeal is given in all cases.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. In this section you do not go to the Court of Appeal of British Columbia, but directly to the Supreme Court of Canada. There may be some reason for it, which I would like to know. So far you have made the appeal from the territorial court to the Court of Appeal of British Columbia. Now, you pass directly from the territorial court to the Supreme Court of Canada, passing by the Court of Appeal of British Columbia.

Mr. BORDEN. I observe that. I really do not know just what consideration influenced the Minister of Justice in that regard. I will be glad to let that section stand.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I would like to know; there may be some reason for it.

Mr. BORDEN. I think the inquiry of the right hon. gentleman is very pertinent. I have not consulted the Minister of Justive with regard to that, and I cannot state what his view was when he drew up that amendment.

Progress reported.

SALARIES OF JUDGES.

House went into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Judges Act, and to provide as follows:

For an assistant judge of the Exchequer Court of Canada, at a salary of $6,000 per annum.

For two additional judges of the High Court of Justice for Ontario at a salary of $7,000 each per annum.

To increase the salary of the judge for the district of Montmagny to $7,000 per annum.

For an additional puisne judge of the Superior Court of the province of Quebec at a salary of $5,000 per annum.

For an additional puisne judge of the Court of Appeal for Manitoba, at a salary of $7,000 per annum.

For an additional puisne judge of the Court of King's Bench of the province of Manitoba at a salary of $6,000 per annum.

For an additional puisne judge of the supreme Court of Alberta, at a salary of $6,000 per annum.

For an additional district court judge of the province of Saskatchewan at a salary of $2,500 per annum during the first three years of service; and after three years of service at a salary of $3 000 per annum.

For two additional district court judges of the province of Alberta at a salary of $2,500 each per annum during the first three years of service; and after three years of service at a salary of $3,000 each per annum.—Mr. Doherty.

Mr. BORDEN.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Mr. Chairman, this is rather a comprehensive motion. I have no doubt that some of its dispositions are quite necessary. I suppose there can be no objection to the additional judges in the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan where the business has certainly largely increased. I am not so sure about some of the other proposals. I presume that my right hon. friend the Prime Minister (Mr. Borden) is not in a position to-day to give all the information which it would be valuable to have when we come to discuss the Bill, and I would suggest that it would be advisable to ask the Minister of Justice to give statistics about the work in the court of exchequer to justify the appointment of an additional judge. Then, the judge of the district of Montmagny is going to receive an addition to his salary of $2,000. I do not think that the judge of the district of Montmagny is very much overworked, if he is worked at all, and, therefore, it would be well to get some statistics of the work that he has to do to justify this increase. I am not pressing the question to-day, but I would like my right hon. friend to get the statistics for the second reading of the Bill.

Mr. BELAND. I might remark that the judge of the district of Montmagny also attends to the judicial business of the district of Beauce.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Yes, I know.

Mr. BELAND. In the district of Beauce there has been a great increase in the judicial business in the last ten years. I do not say that it would be sufficient to warrant an increase in salary, but I want to make this statement to the House. There is an important increase in the judicial business of the district of Beauce itself, but as to Montmagny I am not in a position to speak

Mr. BORDEN. I have understood from the Minister of Justice that in respect of the proposals embodied in this resolution, provincial legislation has been passed, with the exception of the two provisions which my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) has mentioned. As far as the judge of the exchequer court is concerned, I will ask the Minister of Justice to get the information. As far as the judge of the district of Montmagny is concerned, I had understood from the Minister of Justice, in discussing the matter with him, just what the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Beland) has mentioned, that the judge presides over what is really equivalent to two districts, and does a very large amount of work. However, I shall ask the Minister of Justice with respect to that. And he will be prepared to give the information which my right hon. friend has asked for.

Mr. CARVELL. Before this resolution passes, I would like to call the attention of the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Borden) to the fact that there is no provision here for dealing with the case of the county court judges of the maritime provinces. I would ask him to bring the matter to the attention of the Minister of Justice. Would it not be well to take into consideration the possibility of making some provision to increase the salaries of the county court judges in the maritime provinces? The reason that I mention the maritime provinces especially is, that, as I understand it, there is a great difference between the position occupied by county court judges in the maritime provinces and that occupied by county court judges in Ontario. In Ontario there are two judges in very many counties, and in a few instances only one. One judge who looks after the more important business while the other takes the district court business. In the province of Quebec the district court judge, as I understand it, has about the same jurisdiction and powers as the county court judges in the maritime provinces, and the only difference is that while in the maritime provinces the county court judge receives a salary of $3,000, in Quebec a man doing the same work gets $5,000 a year, and to-day we have a proposition here to give one of them $7,000. I do not say that the judges in the maritime provinces are overworked. I think that perhaps, with the exception of the judges in Halifax and St. John, they could do twice as much work as they are doing to-day. It is not reasonable to expect a man, who occupies a high position at the bar of his native province, to take a county court judgeship at the small salary of $3,000 a year. It seems to me that a man who is sufficiently competent to discharge the duties of a county court judge in the maritime provinces is entitled to a good deal more than that salary. You can hardly find an official in Ottawa, in the ordinary civil service, doing merely clerical duties of any importance who is not receiving $3,000 a year. The county court judge is excluded from taking part in any of the ordinary affairs of life; he is not supposed to augment his income from any commercial or professional pursuit and so he has practically to live on $3,000 a year unless he happens to have a private income. I do not think any of the county court judges would object to have additional duties imposed upon them, and while I do not expect the Prime Minister to give any promise today, I would ask him to bring the matter to the attention of the Minister of Justice in the hope that the county court judges may obtain that increase in salary to which they are entitled.

Mr. McKENZIE. I have much pleasure in supporting the suggestions made by the hon. member (Mr. Carvell). I trust that the Prime Minister, when he is considering the claims of the county court judges of the maritime provinces, will remember that the jurisdiction of the county court is very much wider now than it was in 1876 when these courts were created. In 1876 the county court judges, in Nova Scotia at all events, had no criminal jurisdiction except appeals from magistrates, but at the present day every criminal offence except the nigh crimes such as murder, can, with the consent of the accused, be tried in the county courts, and thousands of such cases are so tried. Then, when the county courts were created, the jurisdiction was only limited to $400 in civil cases, but it has now been extended in Nova Scotia to $800 so that a very large civil business is conducted in these courts. In Nova Scotia, the Lien Act has been extended and the county court judge has exclusive jurisdiction under it, no matter how large the amount that may be involved, which goes further to show that the county court judge is expected to have a good grasp of the law and of business matters. Then again, as an evidence of the extended jurisdiction of the county court, when that court was created we had no Judicature Act and the passage of that Act has involved a very large extension of the jurisdiction on the county court judges. In the city of Sydney a large volume of civil business is conducted before the county court judge as master of the Supreme Court, and so his work is very much greater than it was when the court was constituted. Again, a few years ago, the Railway Act was amended, to extend the jurisdiction of the county courts along the Intercolonial Railway to deal with cases arising between the government and individuals respecting damages caused on the I.C.R. As was pointed out by the hon. member for Carleton, the business as to law and fact dealt with in a county court requires from the judge as good talent as it is to be found in the (legal) profession anywhere. Speaking with more definite knowledge of the county of Cape Breton I can say to the Prime Minister with positive certainty that the judge of the county court is engaged every single day in the year, except Sunday, with criminal cases, civil cases, and Supreme Court cases. Last summer there was some unfortunate litigation arising out of the strike, and in connection with it three or four thousand ejectments had to be tried before him, which kept him continuously at work. Of course, we hope that a circumstance of that kind will not arise again. But, even without that, the population is large and the litigation is increasing every day. We have a competent county court judge there in whom the people have confidence, and they find it convenient to go to his court rather than wait for the sittings of the Supreme Court. The county court judge starts with a salary of $2,500 a year and the maximum is $3,000 so that if it is necessary to give some judges $6,000 and $7,000—and I do not think it is at all too much—the government will understand that $3,000 is infinitely too small for a judge to maintain the dignity of his office. It is highly in the interests of the community that our judges should be well paid and that the county court judges should be as nearly as possible placed in the same independent position as the judges of the Superior Courts. I commend to the Prime Minister what has been so well said by the hon. member for Carleton, N.B.

Mr. KYTE. I desire to supplement the observations made by my hon. friend from North Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie) in support of the increase in the salaries of county court judges. I more particularly have reference to the county court judge in District No. 7, province of Nova Scotia, which includes the city of Sydney and three of the counties of the Island of Cape Breton. The jurisdiction of the county court judge of that district extends over a population of 120,000 and it is by far the largest constituency that any county court judge has in the province of Nova Scotia or in the maritime provinces so far as I am aware. My hon. friend (Mr. McKenzie) has spoken of the enormous amount of business that the county court judge there has to do, and I may point out that that business is increasing all the time. There is no resident judge of the Supreme Court in that part of the province of Nova Scotia, and a large number of matters that are dealt with by Supreme Court judges in other parts of the maritime provinces have to come before him. Some years ago there was a re-adjustment of the salaries of the county court judges of the Dominion, and I think it was intended that special consideration should be given to the salary of the county court judge resident in the city of Sydney. For some reason or other the consideration to which he was entitled was overlooked, and the salary which was intended to be given to him equal to the salary of the county court judge of Halifax, was not apportioned to him. Apart altogether from the question whether or not the Prime Minister is disposed to consider the whole matter of increasing the salaries of the county court judges of the maritime provinces, I think the case of the county court judge of district No. 7 in Nova Scotia is entitled to special consideration and should be specially dealt with.

Mr. KNOWLES. My hon. friends from the maritime provinces, who have spoken of the propriety of increasing the salaries of the district court judges have undoubtedly made out a strong case. Every argument they have submitted applies to the judges of the province from where I come. If it is their duty to speak on behalf of the county court bench in their province, much more is it the duty of the representatives of the province of Saskatchewan to call attention to the remuneration of the district court judges in that province. At present the salaries paid to judges in the west are the same as those paid in Nova Scotia. Even if it is a debatable point whether or not salaries in Nova Scotia should be increased, that fact makes it almost conclusive that they should be raised in Saskatchewan. As every body knows, the cost of living and raising a family, and all the expenses to which a judge is put in order to maintain his position, socially and otherwise, are much greater in the west than in the east. It is an anomaly that judges in the western provinces are not paid higher salaries, and a very generous increase should be given to them, especially in Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia. Another point to be remembered is that the practice of the bar in the western provinces is much more remunerative than it is in Nova Scotia. The members of the legal profession in the province of Saskatchewan, as a rule, earn twice as much as they do in some of the older provinces by the sea. For that reason, as well as because of the greater expense of living, a larger remuneration should be given the judges. In the province of Saskatchewan we have a splendid district court bench. It is occupied by men who have gone on the bench desiring to make good and who have made good, and I think their services should be generously recognized by the government. With regard to the paragraph in this resolution in which provision is made for an additional district court judge of the province of Saskatchewan at the salary named, it goes without saying that he must be a junior judge, because there are eight districts in the province, and all are filled at present. I quite approve of this provision, because some of our judges are at present overworked. In my own district, the judicial district of Moosejaw, Judge Ouseley, a very able and diligent judge, is at present doing three men's work. Is the Prime Minister able to tell me in what district it is proposed to place this additional judge?

Mr. BORDEN. I regret that I cannot give my hon. friend the information. In respect to all the provisions for increasing the number of judges in the different provinces, I understand that this legislation is brought forward in order to supplement and make effective provincial legislation. My hon. friend is entitled to the information, and I will see that it is furnished to him on the second reading of the Bill or when it is in committee. In regard to the general question which has been referred to by hon. gentlemen who have spoken, I am not prepared to make any statement to-day. The subject has not received any consideration, but I appreciate what has been said, and I will see that the attention of the Minister of Justice is directed to it. The situation with regard to the appointment and remuneration of judges is not free from difficulty under our federal system. That difficulty has made itself manifest on many occasions ever since confederation. The provincial legislatures create the judicial positions, and the federal parliament is entrusted with the duty of fixing and providing for the salaries. The result of that is sometimes thought to be that we have too many judges in some of the provinces, and those judges, as a result of that, have not been provided with such salaries as would be necessary for the purpose of securing the best available ability. I am not quite clear how that situation can be improved. So long as this system continues, it is very invidious for the government or the parliament of Canada to sit as a court of appeal from the unanimous vote of a provincial legislature which declares that these judges are necessary. On the other hand, it has, been thought on several occasions during the past 25 or 30 years that the number of judges has been increased without due consideration of some of the matters which have been mentioned here to-day. In the meantime, all I can say is that, with the two exceptions I have mentioned, this Bill is designed to supplement legislation which has been passed by the various provinces concerned. Beyond that, I leave the Minister of Justice to make further explanations on the second reading of the Bill or in committee.

Mr. MURPHY. Can the Prime Minister say whether any request has come from Ontario for the appointment of these two judges?

Mr. BORDEN. Yes, a request has come from the government of Ontario, and I think also from the Chief Justice of Ontario.

Mr. PROULX. I do not believe that these two judges for Ontario are needed. The legislation asking for them was passed two years ago, and the late Minister of Justice never saw any need to make the appointments. When hon. gentlemen opposite were in opposition they criticised the late government very severely for appointing judges on commissions, and yet one of the first things they did after coming into power was to appoint a judge on an important commission, taking him away from his judicial work. If the judges were left to their regular work, I do not think there would be any necessity of appointing two additional high court judges. Since these two new judgeships were created, the jurisdiction of the county court has been largely extended, that was done two years ago, in some cases from $200 to $500, and in other cases from $600 to $800, thus relieving the high court judges of certain work.

The hon. member for Moosejaw (Mr. Knowles) says that in the west they have not enough judges. I think in Ontario we have too many judges, especially on the county court bench, and the province, in my opinion could easily do away with about a dozen of them. I think there should be a conference between the Minister of Justice and the Attorney General of Ontario with the object of amending the law in order to give the county court judges more work. The province should be divided into seven, eight, or ten districts and the county court judges given power to hear appeals in banc from the county and division courts. This would be a great convenience for the lawyers living outside Toronto. At present the lawyers of Toronto do more than half the legal work of the province which is a great inconvenience and loss to their confrères outside who have to go to Toronto, except in the case of Assize and county court work. All the chamber work done before a High Court judge and the appeals we have to send the work to Toronto and divide the fees with the lawyers there, who sometimes take more than half and often more than the outside lawyers will get from their clients. If the county court judges were to hear appeals, it would cause them to brush up their legal knowledge and be a good thing for them, and relieve the High Court judges of a large amount of work. I would also suggest to the Prime Minister that he amend the Judges Act by obliging the county court judges to live in the county town. At present these judges have to live in the district in which they are appointed, but they do not always obey even tnat requirement. We have two judges for the county of Prescott and Russell, a junior and senior judge, but neither lives in the county town. The junior judge obeys the law by living in the district, about ten miles from the county town, but the complaint is made by the legal profession that sometimes two or three weeks elapse without their seeing a judge in the county town. In January last division court was to be held there but no judge came; the senior judge was to hold the sittings there but he did not arrive. There is not enough work in the county of Prescott and Russell for one judge, yet we have two judges, and it is about the worst served district in the province. I would therefore suggest that the law be amended so as to make the judges reside in the county town, more especially when there is only one judge for the district. If there are two judges such a requirement is not necessary; the senior judge could be made to reside there, and the junior judge elsewhere in the county. In my district the majority of the lawyers live in the county town where most of the legal work is done. The High Court judges of Ontario have to live in Toronto or within a radius of five miles of that city. I think the same law should be made to apply to the county court judges, who should either be compelled to live in the county town or within a few miles of it.

Mr. BORDEN. I will draw the attention of the Minister of Justice to what my hon. friend has suggested. So far as the judges in Ontario are concerned, I understand that the legislation was passed unanimously by the legislature of Ontario, and that the government, including the Attorney General, had asked for the appointment of these judges. However, full information will be given on the second reading of the Bill.

Resolutions reported, read the second time and agreed to.

Mr. BORDEN moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 156) to amend the Judges Act.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

SUPPLY—QUEBEC BRIDGE.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds) moved that the House go into Committee of Supply.

Hon. G. P. GRAHAM (South Renfrew). Before you leave the Chair, according to the announcement that I made yesterday I wish to make a brief statement concerning the letting of the contract for the construction of what is known as the Quebec bridge. I take this opportunity of doing so, not on account of any criticism that has been made in this House or on this side of the water, but rather on account of comments that have been made by certain gentlemen in the old land which comments have been reproduced, and in some cases enlarged upon, in sundry newspapers in this country and in the old land as well. The only result that could accrue from these statements would be that they would somewhat impair the pleasant relations that have existed between business men in the old land and those in Canada, and it is in order to prevent any misunderstanding of the methods of the Canadian government or the Canadian people in doing business, that I wish to place a plain statement of the circumstances concerning the letting of that contract on 'Hansard,' which I think all will agree affords a complete reply to the criticism which has been made by certain gentlemen, interested and otherwise. It might be well, Sir, in beginning to call the attention of the House, as I think I have often done before, to the fact that this undertaking is the most gigantic of its kind ever conceived by man. The next in magnitude is what is known as the Forth bridge, but it does not compare with this great project known as the Quebec bridge. Bearing this in mind, hon. gentlemen will understand how very necessary it was that every care should be exercised, and that the government should rely solely on the opinions and judgment of men trained in bridgework, the very ablest experts that could be procured throughout the world. I might say that no step was taken except with the consent of, and on the advice, of the majority of the members of the board appointed for the purpose of reconstructing this bridge. I need not remind the House that the first attempt to construct this great project failed, and a calamity, not equalled I think in our own country, connected with public works, occurred on August 29th, when the bridge, as first undertaken, became a wreck carrying with it to death a large number of workmen. On August 30th there were certain additions made to the government, and on the very next day, on the recommendation of myself as the then Minister of Railways, a board of commissioners was appointed in order to make full investigation as to the causes surrounding the calamity, also to investigate as far as possible the design, the workmanship and the material entering into this great structure. The board was appointed on August 31st, 1907, and was composed of the following: Henry Holgate, C.E., Montreal; J. G. G. Kerry, of Campbellford; and Prof. Galbraith, of the University of Toronto. If I remember well, Mr. Kerry had previously been connected with McGill University. These were very prominent gentlemen. They at once proceeded with their work. It is universally conceded their report is a contribution to scientific knowledge in bridge building of very great value. The report was in such demand that it was necessary to get a larger number printed than was at first arranged for. And if any hon. gentlemen will inquire at the library of any of the chief universities of the world, I think he will find there a copy of the report of these engineers. In the meantime the department appointed Mr. Schneider, of New York, a very prominent engineer, to make investigations into certain details, more particularly with a view to ascertaining if it were possible to accede to the wish and request of the Phœnix

Bridge Company that, as they were not allowed to reconstruct the bridge, at least a portion of the material might be used, and he made a thorough investigation, the result of which will be found in the records of the House. In the statute of 1908, that is 7-8 Edward VII., chapter 59, provision was made for taking over this work from what was known as the Quebec Bridge Company.

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). Would the hon. gentleman (Mr. Graham) say with reference to the inquiry of the Phœnix Bridge Company as to whether a portion of their work might be preserved and used, does he know what the reply of the commission was on that point?

Mr. GRAHAM. When the commissioners appointed for the reconstruction of the bridge came to make their investigation, they unanimously agreed that no part of it could be used, except for loading, as scrap-iron can be used—it could not enter into the structure. Let me read one section of this Act of 1908:

The Minister of Railways and Canals may employ engineers and cause plans and specifications to be prepared for the reconstruction and completion of the said bridge and undertaking, or for the construction of a bridge to serve the same purpose as was intended to be served by the bridge undertaken and partially completed by the said company, on the same site, or on such other site, at or near the city of Quebec, as is recommended by such engineers or a majority of them and approved of by the Governor in Council, and the minister shall apply to such work any moneys appropriated therefor by parliament, including the sum of twenty-five thousand dollars appropriated therefor in the present session of parliament.

Now, acting under that statute, on August 17, 1908, the following were appointed a board to prepare plans and reconstruct the bridge on those plans:—Mr. H. E. Vautelet, member of the Canadian Society of Civil Engineers, Montreal; Ralph Modjeski, Director and member American Society of Civil Engineers, Consulting Engineer, Chicago; Maurice Fitzmaurice, C.M.G., Chief Engineer of the London County Council. It will thus be seen that the selections were made from Canada, England and the United States. I may say in passing that Mr. Fitzmaurice had been associated—as a young man, of course—in the construction of the great Forth bridge. This taken in connection with the fact that he was chief engineer of the London County Council was thought to be one of the highest recommendations that could be given to any engineer. It was conceded by the engineering world that the selection of these three gentlemen was possibly the best that could be made, not only on this continent, but in the world. I wish to put on record the order in council naming these men and prescribing at least partially their duties. I do this because later it was contended that certain acts of theirs which I insisted should be performed, did not fall within the purview of their work as outlined by the order in council appointing them:

On a memorandum dated 12th August 1908, from the Minister of Railways and Canals, representing that it is necessary that measures be taken for the reconstruction by the government of the demolished work known as the Quebec bridge, across the river St. Lawrence, authority for the taking over of which work from the Quebec Railway and Bridge Co., together with their whole undertaking, has been given by an order in council.

The minister further represents that on the consideration of the question, it would appear desirable that such reconstruction be carried out by means of a special Board acting under the Department of Railways and Canals, composed of three qualified persons, in whom should be vested certain duties and powers.

The minister, accordingly, recommends that he be authorized to appoint a Board of Engineers, to be composed as follows:—

Chairman of the Board and Chief Engineer, Henri Etienne Vautelet, member Canadian Society of Civil Engineers, consulting engineer, Montreal: Ralph, Modjeski, director and member of American Society of Civil Engineers, consulting engineer, Chicago; and Maurice Fitzmaurice, C. M.G., Chief Engineer of the London County Council, England, their respective salaries to be as may be hereafter determined. It shall be the duty of the said Board to make careful examination of the existing plans, together with any modifications thereof that may be suggested, in order to ascertain whether the design shown by such plans as so modified should be adopted for the reconstruction of the bridge, so as to utilize, as far as possible, the material already provided.

The Board shall consider carefully the existing specifications, and decide whether, having regard to the conditions, they are such as are suitable to the construction of the projected work.

They shall make full examination of the piers of the bridge now constructed and of such portions of the superstructure as have been built, to ascertain their condition and sufficiency, if utilized either in whole or in part.

In the event of the Board reaching the conclusion that it would be inexpedient to adopt or to modify the existing design, they shall prepare a new design, together with a specification, workings, drawings, estimate of cost and all such things in that connection necessary as preliminary to proceeding with the work and submit the same to the Department of Railways and Canals for its action thereon.

It is intended that the entire responsibility for the design and for the reconstruction of the work shall rest with the Board alone.

The head office of the Board shall be in the city of Quebec.

The chief engineer of the Board shall have power to appoint from time to time such technical, clerical and other assistants as may be required, and at such salaries as may be authorized by the Governor General in Council, on his recommendation, made through the Minister of Railways and Canals.

In the event of serious differences of opinion arising between the members of the Board as to the scheme for reconstruction or any of its details, the Board shall call in eminent bridge engineers, not more than two in number, for the purpose of advising on the points of different, who, with the members of the Board, shall settle the question at issue.

The Board shall furnish monthly to the Minister of Railways and Canals a report showing the progress of the work, and the expenditure thereon; also such other reports as he may, from time to time, require from them in that connection.

Payments for work done and materials delivered and of office-staff pay-lists and accounts, will be made by the Department of Railways and Canals, only on certificates to be issued by the Chief Engineer of the Board, and after audit by the department. The accounts and books of the Board shall be at all times open for inspection by the departmental auditor.

The Committee submit the same for approval.

RODOLPHE BOUDREAU,
Clerk of the Privy Council.

Now, Sir, that board was appointed, and they began their work, began studies in various parts of the world. Mr. Vautelet went to the various points, not only on this continent but in Europe, where he thought the latest scientific information could be obtained. Their instructions were that the first necessity for the reconstruction of this bridge should be its stability; the second was its cost; and the third was the time in which it should be constructed, everybody understanding that in a work of this magnitude no hurry could be expected, and no undue haste was asked. The engineers made their studies in different parts of the world, it took them quite a long time, and at last they came to the point where they began to prepare a design. Now in order that the House may be well acquainted with the information received by the various companies as to the terms on which tenders would be received, I want to read an advertisement that appeared on November 24, 1909. This advertisement invited the various intending tenderers to come to the head office at Montreal and to co-operate with the board, in pursuing their studies and investigations necessary for the preparation of the plans for this great work. Allow me to read this advertisement:

DEPARTMENT OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS, CANADA.
Quebec Bridge.
Tenders for superstructure.
Notice to Bridge Builders.

Contractors for bridge superstructure are invited to visit the office of the Board of Engineers in the Canadian Express Building, Montreal, Canada, after Janaury 3, 1910, where information may be had to enable them to prepare bids for the superstructure of a 1758 feet span bridge, 88 feet in width.

Bids will be received on the specification and for the design shown on the plans as prepared by the Board.

The contractor is invited to submit alternative designs which must conform to the conditions laid down in the general specification.

By Order,

L. K. JONES,
Secretary.

Every contractor had that advertisement, and every intending tenderer visited the office of the Quebec Bridge Board and made his own investigations. Now differences did arise between the engineers, just as differences arise between strong men on many points; and it may not be out of place to say that the stronger the men, sometimes, the more intense the differences. The engineers differed largely, so far as I could ascertain, on the principles of the double intersection and the single intersection for the construction of the bridge. A portion of the board contended that the design should be on the double intersection principle, and another portion contended that it should be on the single intersection principle. An hon. gentleman asks me to explain the differences. I could not explain it technically, but any one who has seen a lattice fence will have some idea of the difference. I will not attempt to explain the differences, they were engineering technicalities. One portion of the board insisted that with the double intersection principle you could not ascertain to such a definite point the amount of stress that would be on each member; while on the single intersection principle you could calculate to a more definite degree what stress would be on each of the members. The engineers continued to differ for some months, until at last the department said, we must come to a point where we can advertise for tenders for the construction of this bridge, and if this board of engineers cannot do it, we will have to get a board of engineers that can do it. Consequently, the board met on May 2, 1910, and they came to this arrangement as a sort of compromise. The Chairman had prepared a plan on the single intersection principle; the other members of the board were contending at that time for the double intersection principle, and they did not agree altogether with the design of the Chairman, but this compromise was arrived at in order that tenders might be invited. It is embodied in this resolution:

Copy of a resolution passed at a meeting of the board held May 2, 1910.

It is resolved that the plans and specifications for a cantilever design now completed be approved and submitted to the minister for tenders, and that in the event of a better plan being submitted by any of the bidders same shall be adopted.

(Sgd.), RALPH MODJESKI.
(Sgd.), H. A. VAUTELET,
Witness: (Sgd.), H. A. Campbell.

Mr. Fitzmaurice was not in this country at the time, but he acquiesced in that arrangement. Mark you, the board itself passed a resolution confirming what had been done before, inviting for tenders on alternate designs, and placing themselves on record that if a better design were submitted by any tenderer than the design submitted by the board that design should be adopted. Consequently, tenders were asked for. There was an advertisement inserted on June 17, 1910, the usual advertisement calling for tenders for the construction of this bridge. Then a little later that time was extended in order that there could be no excuse given by any intending tenderers that they had not full time to complete their plans, after each one of them had been studying practically in the office of the board of the bridge company from the time the proposition was made and the board entered upon their duties. During six months Mr. Fitzmaurice had, on one or two occasions, suggested that he be allowed to resign from the board on account of inability to be present in Canada, and on account of ill-health. For a portion of that time he was off duty on account of ill-health. On my return from the west I wrote Mr. Fitzmaurice a letter pointing out to him that—if I remember correctly the contents of that letter—the situation had reached such a point in the carrying on of this work that it would be necessary that he should be in Canada quite frequently, at the call of the Chairman of the board, to consult on these important matters. Mr. Fitzmaurice wrote me this letter in reply:

The London County Council,
Spring Garden, London,
1st June, 1910.

Quebec Bridge.

Dear Sir,—I am obliged for your letter of the 7th ultimo. I feel quite sure that, owing to the state of my health and the impossibility of my fixing an early date on which I could be in Canada, it is much better that my resignation from the Board of Engineers for Quebec Bridge should be accepted. I quite agree that, at the present time, it is necessary that the services of a member of the Board should be available whenever required.

I think I should also say that the acceptance of my resignation will relieve me of rather an invidious position, owing to my not being able to see eye to eye with the Chairman of the Board as regards the design for the bridge which he has prepared. I feel satisfied that this design is not the best one which could have been got out, is uneconomical, and will give rise to great difficulties during erection. I am also of opinion that the specification on which the bridge manufacturers are to submit designs of their own is not such as will allow them to submit the most suitable design for this bridge.

This resignation, reiterated on the 1st of June, 1910, was accepted by the government in September of the same year. Following that, Mr. Charles E. Macdonald, C.E., L.L. D., now of Gananoque, a former resident of the county of Leeds, and for years a prominent engineer and bridge builder in the United States, was appointed in October; the appointment was dated on September 28.

I may say that in making this selection I consulted more particularly with Mr. Vautelet, chief engineer and Chairman of the board. There had been differences on the board and I was very anxious to get the ablest man I could on the continent and, if possible, one that the chairman would work in harmony with and who would work in harmony with the Chairman. In other words, I wanted to get some person who had not preconceived notions on this question which had been discussed by the members of the board. After consultation with Mr. Vautelet, I went to New York and saw Mr. Macdonald. As a result of the visit I sent for Mr. Vautelet and we talked the matter over with Mr. Macdonald, who accepted the position, much to the gratification of the Chairman and myself, but only accepted it until such time as the contracts should be signed. He did not care to act on the board during all the tedious work of the construction of the bridge. He is a man quite up in years, quite wealthy and does not have to work as he had in years gone by. He was appointed. He took a very active part in the work of the board and gave his best energies, intellect and judgment to the solution of the difficulty in selecting a design and the letting of the contract. After that was done he considered his work accomplished and he was allowed to resign. The tenders were asked for and received and on October 26 a report was signed by the board consisting of Charles Macdonald, Ralph Modjeski and H. E. Vautelet. That report is as follows:

Wednesday, October 26, 1910.

Sir,—Your board met in Montreal on Monday, October 10, 1910, to consider the plans sent by different companies for the Quebec bridge superstructure, and also copies of the tenders which had been made by the secretary of the board.

These copies were compared on the following day with the originals, which were brought to Montreal by an officer of your department.

A detailed statement in tabular form is enclosed.

Since that date the board has been in session practically continuously.

After a careful study of the tenders received on the board's design and on alternative designs submitted, amounting in all to thirty-five different propositions, your board has eliminated, as not acceptable, all but the following:

1st. Design No. V of the board, with short shore arms and floating erection of the suspended span on high staging, tenders on which were submitted by all four firms.

2nd. Design 'A' of the St. Lawrence Bridge Company, being different in outline from the board's design and having the top chords built of nickel steel plates throughout.

3rd. Design 'B' of the St. Lawrence Bridge Company, similar in all respects to design 'A,' except that the top chords of the anchor arm are built of carbon steel.

4th. Design 'C' of the St. Lawrence Bridge Company, similar in all respects to 'B,' with the exception of the top chords, which are designed with eyebars, instead of plates:

Classified for cost only they are as follows:

1. British Empire Bridge Co., board's design 'V'.. .. ..$11,025,566
2. Pennsylvania Steel Co., board's design 'V'.. 11,686,751
3. St. Lawrence Bridge Co., design 'B'.. 11,957,500
4. St. Lawrence Bridge Co., design 'A'.. 12,153,500
5. St. Lawrence Bridge Co., design 'C'.. 12,216,400
6. Maschinenfabrik Augs-Nurn, board's design 'V'.. 13,230,050
7. St. Lawrence Bridge Co., board's design 'V'.. 14,867,170

The cost as per specifications may be increased by 2 per cent and includes an amount of $118,500 to be paid to Messrs. M. P. & J. T. Davis for increased quantities of masonry in the anchor and short piers. The Pennsylvania Steel Company and the British Empire Bridge Company, according to their tenders, use a somewhat larger number of splices in the bottom chord than shown on the board's plan. Your board may later on recommend that their figures be slightly increased, in order to reduce the number of splices.

Your board does not consider that it is within their province to report on the financial status and ability of the different contractors.

They beg, however, to submit the following notes:

British Empire Bridge Company, Limited.—This is a company incorporated in Canada at a capital of $5,000,000. It was formed by the Cleveland Bridge and Engineering Co., Limited, of Darlington, England, and by the Patent Shaft and Axletree Company, of Wednesbury, England.

Our Chairman reported that he had visited the works of these companies. That the Cleveland Bridge and Engineering Company, at the time of his visit, was a modern bridge shop of about 12,000 to 16,000 tons annual capacity.

That the Patent Shaft and Axletree Company was one of the largest firms in England, and that their bridge department was composed of two large main buildings. He could not judge of their equipment, as no bridge work was being done at the time of his visit.

The representative of the British Empire Bridge Company submitted photographs showing some of the bridges built by the parent companies, including a 500 feet arch over the Zambesi River at Victoria Falls, Africa.

He also stated that the Patent Shaft and Axletree Company had a capital of £1,500,000, with a reserve of £400,000 together with other reserves; that their stock was issued at £1 par value and was now selling at £3.

This company has no assets known to us except an accepted cheque for $500,000, which we assume to be in the hands of the Minister, and your board does not know if the parent companies would become parties to the contract.

The British Empire Bridge Company state that they would establish works in this country, where all parts of the bridge, except the raw material, would be manufactured.

Pennsylvania Steel Company.—This firm is considered one of the strongest in the United States and has apparently very large assets.

Your board has no doubt about their ability to build the bridge and fulfill all the conditions of the contract.

It is not quite clear how much, if any, of the shop work would be done in Canada. Transportation of large members from their present shops would be very risky.

Maschinenfabrik Augsburg-Nurnberg A.G.—Your board does not know anything definite about this firm. It proposes to manufacture the bridge partly in Germany and partly in Canada, in connection with the Canada Foundry Company, Limited, of Toronto, in which case the same observation about transportation would apply to a much larger extent. They also state that they may decide later on to build everything in Canada.

St. Lawrence Bridge Company, Limited.—From information given by their representative, this is a company incorporated in Canada with a capital of $500,000, to be increased as need may be.

The Dominion Bridge Company and the Canadian Bridge Company each own one half the number of the shares, but neither parent company will become a party to the contract.

This company has no assets known to us except an accepted cheque for $500,000, which we assume to be in the hands of the Minister. The parent companies are very strong and very well known companies and there is no doubt about the ability of the men at their head to carry the contract to a successful issue.

Specifications.

The Machinenfabrik Augsburg-Nurnberg A.G. does not ask any modifications of the specifications. They only state that no nickel steel material will be longer than 53 feet, which is acceptable to the board.

The Pennsylvania Steel Company and British Empire Bridge Company discussed the specifications with the board. A complete understanding, signed in each case by the representative of the company and the members of the board, has been arrived at.

The St. Lawrence Bridge Company has asked for several modifications to the specifications. In the case of their tender on the board's plans an agreement can probably be arrived at on the basis proposed, except on the question of eyebars. They propose to make further experiments on the manufacture of the eyebars, so as to come to an agreement with the board.

There have also been some modifications and additions to the specifications and contract form, asked for by all the bidders, such as customs duties, &c., for which your board was not qualified to act and for which the contractors have been referred to you.

Your board is of the opinion that it is possible to construct a bridge in accordance with either of the tenders received upon the board's design 'V,' which would make a satisfactory structure.

Your board is also of the opinion that it is possible to construct a bridge in accordance with design 'A,' 'B' and 'C' submitted by the St. Lawrence Bridge Company, which would make a satisfactory structure, providing that plans, details and material were made in accordance with the specifications of the board, including modifications allowed to other bidders.

Respectfully submitted,

Hon. Geo. P. Graham,
Minister of Railways and Canals,
Ottawa, Ont.

That was sent to me, and as hon. gentlemen will see it gave me no definite advice as to what tender should be received by the department. It named several tenders and several designs and said any of these would make a satisfactory bridge. Considering it one of the most important parts of the duty of the board to advise the department definitely as to what design and tender it should accept, I wrote this letter to the chairman in reply to the report of the board which I have just read:

Ottawa, 1st of November, 1910.

H. E. Vautelet, Esq., C.E.,
Chairman, Quebec Bridge Commission,
Montreal.

Dear Mr. Vautelet,—I am in receipt of your letter of the 26th ultimo, containing resolution of the Board, and some very valuable information respecting the tenders, and the companies tendering in connection with the erection of the Quebec Bridge.

Your Board says that the bridge can be constructed according to the tenders on the Board's design No. 1, and also on designs 'A', 'B' and 'C', submitted by the St. Lawrence Bridge Company.

Although the information you submit is very valuable indeed and shows great care in working out, I fear that it does not afford me sufficient data on which to make a recommendation to my colleagues. I would ask the Board, therefore, to go one step further and make a recommendation to me, as to what tender, under all the circumstances, should be accepted.

In view of the close study the Board has given this great project, and also taking into consideration the fact that the members agree on certain designs, I think it is not unreasonable to suppose that they ought to be able to make a unanimous recommendation as to the tender that ought to be accepted by the government.

I note that the stock of the British Empire Bridge Company is held entirely by the Cleveland Bridge and Engineering Co., Ltd., of Darlington, England, and the Patent Shaft and Axletree Company, of Wednesbury, England; and that the stock of the St. Lawrence Bridge Company, Ltd. is held by the Dominion Bridge Company and the Canadian Bridge Company. The capital of the British Empire Bridge Company is $5,000,000, and the capital of the St. Lawrence Bridge Company is $500,000.

As you will readily understand in a gigantic enterprise of this kind, the ability of the contracting party to carry the work to completion is of vital importance.

Should the Board decide to recommend that the work be given to either of these companies I would request that you ask them to furnish the Board with an understanding that each of the parent companies holding the stock of the successful tendering company will become a party to the contract and responsible for its fulfilment.

I agree with you thoroughly that all the details ought to be settled between the successful tenderer and the Board before an announcement is made to whom the contract has been awarded because any tenderer to whom the contract may be given, refusing to sign such contract, forfeits its deposit of $500,000 now in the hands of the minister.

Allow me to thank the Board for the very careful manner in which it has gone about its work, and to express the hope that it may be able to arrive at a unanimous decision on which the minister can act with confidence.

Yours truly,
(Sgd.) GEO. P. GRAHAM.

I received in reply a report, dated Quebec, and signed by Charles Macdonald and Ralph Modjeski, two members of the board, in reply to that letter. It is as follows:

Quebec, November 3rd, 1910.

Dear Sir,—In reply to your request of the 1st November asking for a definite recommendation for the acceptance of tenders respecting the Quebec Bridge, probably it would be well to give a little history of the situation. The public possibly do not realize the immensity of the undertaking and only members of the engineering profession can fully comprehend it. Nothing of equal magnitude has ever been attempted. Every engineer in connection with it has felt an indescribable responsibility. Under the circumstances, it is not to be wondered at, but rather is a proof of the care they have exercised that differences of opinion should have arisen as to the best method of accomplishing this task.

When the members of the Board as originally constituted first considered this great project they knew it was the greatest work ever undertaken and they endeavoured to approach it with open minds. After very careful study they discovered that their views did not coincide on some points. Part of the Board were inclined to favour the double intersection principle, similar to that adopted in the famous Forth Bridge, while the other portion felt equally convinced that double intersection was not practical for such a structure. Studies were made along both lines, but neither party was convinced that their ideas were not the best. There being a divergence of view on the point, it was decided to advertise for tenders on the official plan prepared by the chairman and chief engineer on the single intersection principle with the mutual understanding that while tenders were asked on this design, tenderers were to be allowed to present any other design they chose, which would be fully considered by the Board on an equality with the official design.

This decision was embodied in a unanimous resolution of the board passed on May 2, 1910:

'It is resolved that the plans and specifications for a cantilever design now completed be approved and submitted to the minister for tenders and that in the event of a better plan being submitted by any of the bidders same shall be adopted.'

The advertisement for tenders consequently contained a clause embodying the principle of this resolution.

A full history of the tenders received appears in our former report. It will be seen that ten tenders were received for designs other than the official design, according to the advertisement, and they were considered, as outlined in a former report.

On close investigation of the alternative designs it was found that one, presented by the St. Lawrence Bridge Company, while designed on the single intersection principle, in a very practical way met all the demands that a portion of the Board had in their minds when they favoured the double intersection principle. It certainly is an original and happy combination, which embodies to a large extent the views of the advocates of each of the principles—single and double.

As stated in our former report, a bridge could undoubtedly be constructed on the official design, and once erected would be a substantial structure, but we are of opinion that design 'B', in addition to providing for a satisfactory bridge offers features which simplify the erection and minimize the risk to both life and property entailed in a work of such magnitude. This we consider of paramount importance. In addition to this we favour design 'B' for the following reasons:

1st. The numerous temporary members, sub-trusses and other connections to the permanent members involved in the official design are all dispensed with in design 'B'.

2nd. The erection can proceed in a regular manner, the traveller being carried on the main members only and as it advances each operation is similar to the preceding one, which similarity greatly favours speed and safety in construction.

3rd. There are no members in the trusses that do not carry live load with the exception of two small struts over the centre pier.

4th. There is less distortion and secondary stress as may be seen by comparing the Williot's diagrams, showing in each case the deflections of the trusses for different conditions of loading.

5th. The 'B' design admits of comparatively small stresses in the web members, thus rendering connections with the chords much more simple.

6th. No pin holes are required in the chords as connections are made by means of gussets, thus evading loss of section by large pin holes and permitting the compression members to abut with half holes in gusset plates outside the chords. The absence of pin holes in the centre line of the chord permits the use of a centre diaphragm connecting the several leaves of the bottom chord and presenting a more symmetrical section than in the official plan.

7th. By the substitution of riveted tension chords for eyebars all risk and difficulty of assembling a double line of eyebars with the heavy inclined posts in the official plan is removed and the diagonal tension and compression web members are in practically the same vertical plane as the corresponding leaf of the upper chord, thus insuring a more direct transmission of stress.

8th. All the heavy extras demanded by steel makers occur in the long and heavy web members of the official design. Owing to smaller stresses in the 'B' design these extras may be avoided, thus insuring less risk in the use of material which is beyond commercial limits.

9th. The general appearance of design 'B' will certainly be appreciated from an æsthetic point of view, the large open panels and wide riveted members convey the idea of strength combined with economical distribution of material, which is the true test of scientific construction. A bridge constructed upon this design would compare most favourably with the highest type of long span bridges in existence.

We, therefore, beg to recommend the acceptance of the tender of the St. Lawrence Bridge Company on their design 'B.' We do not wish to be understood as condemning any other design nor is this recommendation in any sense a reflection on any of the companies tendering, but we have arrived at this conclusion after a careful study of all the designs and conditions.

Respectfully submitted,
(Sgd.) CHARLES MACDONALD.
" RALPH MODJESKI.

Hon. Geo. P. Graham,
Minister of Railways and Canals,
Ottawa, Ont.

At one o'clock, the House took recess.

House resumed at three o'clock.

Mr. GRAHAM. As soon as the report signed by Messrs. Macdonald and Modjeski reached me, I forwarded it to the chairman of the board, and he wrote me at some length on December 10, setting out very fully and at considerable length his objections to the report of the majority, and, among other things, in this letter or the one following it, he contended that the tender of the St. Lawrence Bridge company could not be entertained, as it did not comply in some respects with the advertisement, and he could not at all agree that it was a better design than the one he had prepared. Again, on January 20, he wrote me another letter, which may be called a supplementary report, in which he again stated his objections and expressed a view strongly opposed to the report of the majority, and in favour of his own design, and giving many reasons. Among other things, he took the position which I think, it is fair to him to state: that it was no part of the duty of the board to recommend definitely to the minister what tenders the minister should accept; that their duty was performed when they laid their reports before the minister, and it was the duty of the minister to act. These are the letters:

Montreal, December 10, 1910.

Sir,—In reply to your letter of November 29, 1910, enclosing communication of my colleagues addressed to you and dated November 3, 1910, I beg to submit the following remarks:

The board derives its powers from the order in council dated August 17, 1908, in which it is said:

'They shall prepare a new design, together with a specification, working drawings, estimate of cost and all such things in that connection necessary as preliminary to proceeding with the work, and submit the same to the Department of Railways and Canals for its action thereon.'

Owing to different views held by the members of the board, an agreement was arrived at in November and December 1909 that tenders would be received on the board's plans and also on plans made by contractors, according to the specifications of the board.

In accordance with said agreement an advertisement dated Ottawa, November 24, 1909 was put in the papers by the department, stating that

'The contractor is invited to submit alternative designs which must conform to the conditions laid down in the general specification.'

Preliminary specifications were issued, dated January 1, 1910, in which we find.'

'Paragraph 6. Tenders. Tenders will be received on plans prepared by the board, but contractors are invited to submit plans of their own, made according to this and later specifications.'

Complete specifications were also issued dated June 1, 1910, in which we find.'

Paragraph 4. Contractors will be allowed to submit tenders on plans of their own or on modifications of the board's plans, but all tenders shall be subject to these specifications.'

Finally an advertisement dated June 7, 1910 was put in the papers by the department which states that:

(a) 'tenders will not be considered, unless made strictly in accordance with the printed forms.'

The printed forms (contractor's plans) state that the plans must be in accordance with the specifications exhibited and a footnote states that the specifications referred to above are those entitled 'specifications for superstructure' dated Montreal. June 1, 1910.

(b) that the deposit will be forfeited.

'If the party tendering declines entering into contract for the work at the rates stated in the offer submitted and in accordance with the terms stated in the form of contract accompanying the specifications.'

In connection with the above, see form of contract, page 47:

'Which said specifications and supplementary specifications, plans and drawings are hereby declared to be part of this contract.'

On October 26, 1910, a report was sent you signed by all the members of the board, in which you were advised:

(a) that four tenders on plan No. V of the board were acceptable.

(b) that tenders on plans 'A,' 'B' and 'C' of the St. Lawrence Bridge Company would be acceptable 'providing that plans, details and materials were made in accordance with the specifications of the board, including modifications allowed to other bidders.'

The last paragraph means evidently that the plans, details and materials were not, at the date, made in accordance with the specifications of the board and did not come within the requirements of the department as advertised by public notice.

The only tenders, therefore, acceptable to the whole board and conforming to the requirements of the board and department, were the four tenders on plan No. V of the board.

On November 1, you wrote me asking that the board recommend which of the tenders mentioned in the report should be accepted.

At a meeting of the board held November 2. I submitted your letter to my colleagues. At this meeting the St. Lawrence Bridge Company's officials were present and submitted a special specification for compression members, which was entirely different from the specifications of the board and which, if accepted, as will be shown later on, would result in the construction of a bridge much weaker than proposed by the board. Later in the day my colleagues advised me that they had made up their minds to recommend the acceptance of the tender of the St. Lawrence Bridge Company on its own design and that, consequently, they would either send a majority report to the minister, or ask that two engineers be added to the board as provided for by the order in council. I suggested that the first course proposed by them be followed.

This recommendation was forwarded to you b my colleagues in a letter dated November 3, 1910.

On November 12, I answered your letter of November 1, informing you that I had nothing to add to the unanimous report of October 26, 1910. My reason for doing so was that I have never understood, from the time I joined the board, that the clause of the order in council quoted above, allows us to recommend the acceptance of any particular tender. I have always understood that this clause in the order in council leaves the choice of the tender to be accepted, to the department, and that the duties of the board are only those of a technical adviser.

Conditions, other than technical, may affect the choice, such as financial status, honest performance of previous contracts, public interest, &c., which the board is not qualified to judge of, and on which it cannot get information as readily as the department. My understanding of said clause was confirmed by the fact that the tenders for the masonry were not submitted to the board, nor was it asked to recommend to whom the contract should be given.

Referring to the first part of the recommendations of the board in their report of October 26, 1910, I beg to submit the following remarks, in regard to design V of the board:

(a) This plan has been accepted by all my colleagues. (Reports Nos. 11 and 15, and report of October 26, 1910.)

(b) Four of the best bridge companies of England, Canada and the United States and Germany have tendered on the board's design, and, in accordance with paragraph 8 of the preliminary specifications and paragraph 5 of the final specifications, are ready to absolutely guarantee, with a deposit of one and a half million dollars, the satisfactory erection and completion, as well as the materials, construction, design, calculations, plans, specifications and sufficiency of a bridge built in accordance with this design.

(c) Amongst the tenders submitted on the board's design No. V, one tender is $950,000 and another is $270,000 cheaper than design 'B' of the St. Lawrence Bridge Company, and the two tenders are respectively $1,200,000 and $520,000 cheaper than design 'C.'

(d) The English, American and German firms guarantee the completion of the bridge on design No. V of the board, one year earlier than the St. Lawrence Bridge Company on their own designs : A,' 'B' and 'C.'

(e) The plan of erection I proposed for the suspended span has been adopted by all the contractors and will eventually save one year in the completion of the bridge.

(f) The tenders received on the board's design and approved by the board are as follows:—

British Empire Bridge Company..	$11,025,566.20
Pennsylvania Steel Company.. ..	11,686,751.30
Maschinenfabrik Augsburg-Nurnberg..	13,230 050.10
St. Lawrence Bridge Company.. ..	14,867,170 00

The first three tenders are well within the estimated cost sent to the department on June 3, 1910, and which, for reasons given, ranged between $11,230.213 and $13,409,983.

(g) Plans and calculations of the board's design are very complete and fulfil all the requirements of the order in council creating the board. The estimated cost sent you on June 3, 1910, has proved correct.

(h) The design of compression members and connections has been thoroughly tested and the tests have given the most satisfactory results, as shown in the report sent you on August 1, 1910.

(i) Board's plan No. V complies with all the requirements of the board and department. From an engineering standpoint any of the four tenders on this plan could, therefore, be accepted by the department, having been unanimously approved in the board's report of October 26, 1910.

(j) Design No. V of the board is stronger than designs 'A,' 'B' and 'C' of the St. Lawrence Bridge Company, as will be shown later on.

Coming now to the letter of my colleagues dated November 3, 1910, I inclose a copy (Appendix 'A') having the paragraphs numbered for reference.

Paragraph 1. I heartily agree with this part of the letter. The difficulties noted therein, and my desire to put all the facts before you are my only excuse for writing such a long letter.

Paragraph 2. I beg to submit a few remarks on the question of single or double intersection, as follows:—

During the early stages of the work a majority of the board, composed of my two colleagues, favoured double intersection; a minority, composed of the Chairman, favoured single intersection.

I did not rely on my knowledge alone, but consulted on this point many well known engineers.

Amongst others the following, for one reason or another, favoured single against double intersection:

Mr. C. G. Emil Larsson, of the American Bridge Company.

Mr. Fred. W. Cohen, of the Pennsylvania Steel Company.

Mr. Phelps Johnson, of the Dominion Bridge Company.

Mr. John Sterling Deans, of the Phœnix Bridge Company.

The former deputy minister was present at some of the meetings where the question was discussed. Letters written on that subject by some of these engineers were sent you June 17, 1909, and April 25, 1910.

After two members had been added to the board, my two colleagues and Mr. Paul L. Wolfel of the McClintic-Marshall Construction Company, favoured double intersection; Mr. Phelps Johnson and myself favoured single intersection.

After tenders had been called, allowing contractors to present their own designs, three designs for cantilevers were submitted by the contractors; one by the Germans which is single intersection, and two by the St. Lawrence Bridge Company which are also single intersection.

No design for a double intersection bridge was presented by any firm. I felt, therefore, that my convictions on this point have been fully justified.

Paragraph 3. As shown by the advertisements for tenders and by the preliminary and final specifications, to this paragraph should have been added the words:

'Provided that plans, details and materials be made in accordance with the specifications of this board.'

This, of course, would have stopped any further argument, but without them the sentence referred to is incomplete and does not give all the facts.

Paragraphs 4 and 5. The same remarks on pargraphs 2 and 3 apply to paragraphs 4 and 5.

Further, the system of main panelling adopted in designs 'A,' 'B' and 'C' is not original, as it was published for the first time, to my knowledge, in 1901 by a Russian engineer for a 135 feet span. I am not aware that any bridge, large or small, has been built on that system since that date. This must not be understood as condemning the system.

Paragraph 6. Out of three similar designs, 'A,' 'B' and 'C,' submitted by the St. Lawrence Bridge Company, design 'B,' which complies least with the specifications of the board, is recommended by my colleagues. I cannot see any reason for their choice except that it is the cheapest of the three.

My colleagues also state that this design offers features which simplify the erection and minimize the risk to both life and property.

This, of course, is an expression of opinion sustained by neither reasons nor facts. I can only submit the reasons which helped me to form a different opinion and which are as follows:

(a) The letters received from the engineers I had consulted and which are referred to above.

(b) The opinion of Mr. Phelps Johnson, as shown in page two of report No. 11 of the board, and in the minutes of the meeting held September 7, 1909:

'He saw no unusual difficulties in the erection of the design (board's design).'

(c) The schemes of erection proposed by the St. Lawrence Bridge Company are identical, both for the board's design and for their own design. I am, therefore, unable to understand why more men or property would be injured in the one case than in the other.

Blue prints (Appendix 'B') showing the different modes of erection proposed by all contractors and copy of a letter from the St. Lawrence Bridge Company dated October 15, 1910 (appendix 'C') explaining the different schemes of erection, are attached to this letter. (Note passages underlined by myself).

I would say, however, that I differ from the opinion re top travellers, expressed in that letter and believe they are at least not more dangerous than through travellers for the following reasons:

(a) Clauses 17 and 19 of the contract put the complete responsibility for damages to persons or property solely on the contractor. It is, therefore, to be presumed that all contractors have given this question their best consideration, from a business if not from a humanitarian point of view.

With this in view top travellers are adopted by the Germans in their own design, the British Empire Bridge Company and the Pennsylvania Steel Company, although the latter had lately used through travellers for the erection of an 1,182 feet cantilever span in connection with the Blackwell's Island bridge at New York. Their choice of top travellers for the Quebec bridge must, therefore, be the result of their experience in the erection of large cantilever bridges. Their engineer of erection is reputed to be one of the best in America.

(b) The latest large cantilever bridge, erected in America, at Beaver, Pa., was erected with top travellers and the engineer in charge told me their use had been very sucessful.

(c) Top travellers rest on the members of the trusses themselves, instead of on the bridge floor. As they are much smaller than the through travellers, offering less surface to the wind, and have a much wider base, they have consequently greater stability and the risks attending life and property are correspondingly less.

(d) Top travellers, which never are higher than through travellers, follow the top chord and come gradually lower as erection progresses and becomes more dangerous, whereas through travellers remain always at the same height and when they come near the end of the cantilever arm, offer a large surface to the wind and are apparently more dangerous for the men.

I think, however, in view of the guarantees exacted from the contractors by the terms of the contract, that the choice of the scheme of erection and the erection appliances should be left to the contractor, subject to the supervision of the board.

Paragraph 7. Temporary members will, of course, be numerous in any design for such a large structure. Three temporary heavy members in each truss or twelve altogether are required for the board's design.

They are similar to other members used heretofore for the erection of the suspended span of cantilever bridges.

All such temporary members are part of the falsework and their cost is included in the tenders.

Paragraph 8. The schemes of erection proposed by the St. Lawrence Bridge Company are identical, whether for their own design or for the board's design. If through travellers are used they are carried on the main members in either case. As all the panels of the board's design are similar, the operations are also similar. But as stated in paragraph 3, I am in favour of top travellers and cannot see, in a structure of this size, what difference it would make if the operations for each connection are different.

Paragraph 9. I fail to see the importance of this remark.

(a) because there are numerous members in the suspended span of design 'A,' 'B' and 'C' which do not carry live load. Why are they harmless in the suspended span and harmful in the cantilevers?

(b) There is a large number of members in both designs, namely, the materials and sway bracing which do not carry live load, and they have the same effect in preventing the free deformation of the trusses under live load.

(c) all trusses of large bridges such as the Thebes bridge and the projected cantilever bridge over the Hudson river have a large number of members which do not carry live load and I am unaware of any criticism having been levelled at them by any one on that account.

(d) Design 'C' of the St. Lawrence Bridge Company, which is the only one amongst 'A,' 'B,' and 'C' that comes within clause 74 of the specifications, has a large number of such members.

Designs 'M' and 'N' of the same company and guaranteed by them, contain such members, in excess of the number used in the board's design.

The design of the Germans has also a large number of such members.

None of the contractors have ever protested against such members in the board's design, the construction, erection and efficiency of which design all of them are ready to guarantee.

Paragraph 10. The Williot's diagram of design 'B' are for a 502 foot anchor arm built of carbon steel, and no comparison can be made with the Williot's diagrams for the 586-foot anchor arm of the board's design built of nickel steel, and as Williot's diagrams of the cantilever arm of design 'B,' which would have given a true measure for comparison, and should have been furnished as per paragraph 108 of the specifications, have not been submitted by the St. Lawrence Bridge Company, no comparison at all can be made.

The diagrams produced do not, therefore, show that there is less distortion in each case.

This whole matter has really very little importance as deformation is not a measure of strength; for if we compare two members of same length, but of different depths, the same amount of bending deformation which would be harmless in the shallower member may cause the failure of the deeper one.

It is, however, necessary to determine the deformations and the strains they cause. This has been done, with the greatest care, in connection with the board's design, as may be seen by referring to the drawings exhibited, and in all cases the strains resulting from the deformations have been amply provided for.

Paragraph 11. As the web members, as well as the bottom chords of the board's design, are erected in half widths they are just as easy to handle and to connect, if not easier, than the web members of design 'B.'

Paragraph 12. The opinion hereby given is contrary to the universal practice of bridge engineers in America. Very few instances could be shown where this has been done. This kind of connection has been limited in the board's design to as few members as erection would allow, especially for compression members, where its use was deemed inadvisable. An instance of it is shown at the end of the cantilever arm, where special precautions have been taken to avoid the objectionable features of such a connection. I have, however, always intended to change this detail, if possible, in the final drawings. The excellency of the connections used in the board's design has been shown conclusively by tests T4A and T4B, and T6A and T6B, made at Phœnixville. The connections proposed by the St. Lawrence Bridge Company have not been tested.

Paragraph 13. This statement is irrelevant unless it means that the chords proposed by the St. Lawrenec Bridge Company are better than the chords of the board. It is a bold statement in the absence of actual tests of the St. Lawrence Bridge Company's chords and in the face of the extremely satisfactory results obtained in the tests made at Phœnixville on models of the board's chords T1A and T1B, and T2A and T2B, and of a sentence in letter number one accompanying the tenders of the St. Lawrence Bridge Company, where we read:

> 'The results obtained in the tests of nickel steel columns made by the board were, in some cases, unusually and unexpectedly high and it is doubtful that so high values can again be reached unless the board's experiments are exactly duplicated.'

I would also remark that longitudinal splicing, as shown in the St. Lawrence Bridge Company's design, has been tested by the board and has given very inferior results, as shown by tests T7A and T7B.

The results of all the tests referred to were sent to you on August 1, 1910.

Paragraph 14. The first part of the sentence is in direct contradiction with clause 74 of the specifications. It is also in direct contradiction with the often expressed opinion of one of my colleagues that eyebars are the most reliable form of tension members. One might well hesitate, before accepting field riveted connections of tension members over five inches thick, not including splice plates.

A double line of eyebars is very much easier to assemble and less risky than a single line. The St. Lawrence Bridge Company propose themselves to use two lines of eyebars in designs 'M' and 'N.'

Paragraph 15. What does it matter if pins are carefully calculated according to American practice?

Paragraph 16. Any extras demanded by steel makers are included in the prices named in the tenders and there is no risk, since all materials will be inspected and must come up to the specifications. Any material, which it is impossible to get on account of length, may be spliced and I would remark that splicing has been resorted to by the St. Lawrence Bridge Company to a much larger extent than contemplated by the board.

Paragraph 17. This is certainly an unexpected argument, but I have no right to criticise the æsthetic judgment of my colleagues.

Paragraph 18. In view of all the preceding observations contained in this letter I cannot join in the recommendation of my colleagues,

(a) because it is contrary to the recommendation of the whole board,

(b) because the tender referred to on design 'B' is not according to the requirements of the board and the department, since it contains the words:

> 'This tender is based upon the specifications and draft contract as modified by our accompanying letter No. 1, of this date.'

According to the advertisement issued by the department on June 17, 1910, this tender should not be considered.

(c) because in letter No. 1 referred to above, we read, amongst many requests for changes in the specifications:

> 'The results obtained in the tests on nickel steel columns made by the board were, in some cases, unusually and unexpectedly high and it is doubtful that so high values can again be reached unless the board's experiments are exactly duplicated.'

This is certainly a high compliment for the board's design, but I do not see why anything not quite so good should be accepted.

(d) because amongst other clauses, design 'B' does not comply with vital clauses 68, 74 and 278 of the specifications.

The tender on any such design, if built according to the specifications of the board, would be the tender on design 'C' at an extra cost of $250,000 or $1,200,000 above the lowest tender.

(e) even if such tender were based upon the specifications of the board, there are no plans before the board to show how this would be done. Plan 'C' shows only two preliminary strain sheets. Neither the connections of eyebars in the top chords or web members, their layout, nor any other information are given. The bottom chords of plan 'A' which might be used for plans 'C' or 'B' are not acceptable in view of the results of tests T7A and T7B. A note on one of the plans says that if tests are not satisfactory they would be replaced by something else.

The word 'satisfactory' in this case has no meaning since no guarantee of tests was given beyond the vague sentence in letter No. 1, accompanying the tenders:

'The specifications should, of course require only such values as can reasonably be expected from carbon steel in the light of compression tests already made upon it.'

Such results would give a bridge much inferior in strength to the board's design.

The board could not, therefore, give an opinion on plans which do not exist.

Referring to the comparative strength of the board's plan and of 'A,' 'B' and 'C' designs, I enclose calculations showing the superiority of the board's design (appendix 'D').

The calculations for elastic limit are to a certain extent based on assumptions, and, besides, elastic limit and yield point cannot be absolutely compared. I have made the comparison as conservatively as I could, owing to the lack of knowledge on the limit of elasticity of built compression members, in regard to which no investigation has ever been attempted, at least to my knowledge, previous to the experiments made by the board at Phoenixville.

The calculations for ultimate strength are correct and based on the minimum results obtained or specified by the board and on the minimum results guaranteed by the St. Lawrence Bridge Company.

Of course, in a work of this magnitude, where such guarantees are asked from the contractors and where a comparatively new kind of metal is used, I understand that the specifications of the board may have to be altered on such points that could not be ascertained before calling for tenders, such as extreme length of materials procurable, and the physical and chemical tests of materials that mills are ready to manufacture irrespective of cost. I was astonished to find out how little change was really insisted upon by the contractors and steel makers and, of course, such changes, as agreed to by the board, ought to be allowed to all contractors alike. The case is different when the conditions of the contract have not been fulfilled, when vital clauses are concerned and where the changes asked for are absolutely contrary to the requirements of the board and department or diminish the strength of the bridge.

To conclude. As implicitly stated in the report of October 26, 1910, the plans, details and materials of designs 'A,' 'B' and 'C' of the St. Lawrence Bridge Company are not made according to specifications. They provide for a bridge weaker than the board's design, as shown in Appendix 'D.'

Even if they could be made as strong as required by the specifications, there is no plan before the board to show how this result would be attained.

The tenders of the St. Lawrence Bridge Company on their own designs 'A,' 'B' and 'C' do not, therefore, comply with the requirements of the board, as expressed in the specifications, nor of the department, as expressed in the public notices and form of contract issued.

They cannot, therefore, be considered by the board.

The board's design, for the many reasons given on page 4, 5 and 6, complies with all the requirements of the board and the department. It is satisfactory to all engineers and contractors concerned, and I do not know of any technical reason why either of the four tenders on this design should not be accepted.

Yours respectfully,
(Sgd.) H. E. VAUTELET,
Chairman and Chief Engineer.

Hon. Geo. P. Graham,
Minister of Railways and Canals,

Ottawa, Ont.
Montreal, January 20, 1911.

Sir,—I beg to supplement my letter addressed to you on December 10, 1910, by adding to page 6, the following remarks in regard to design V of the board.

(k) A report of Sir Douglas Fox on the board's design was transmitted to me by a representative of the British Empire Bridge Company, and reads as follows:—

'Have made careful examination of board's specifications, general designs and details. Specification is clear and concise and prepared with great care and judgment. It will ensure structure built combining stability and permanence with reasonable economy. Design admirably suited for its purpose. It is perfectly sound alike as to construction and erection and in detail is worked out with skill and judgment. Experiments on large models of compression members have enabled the design of vital parts to be prepared with certainty. Think no hesitation in proceeding with works on lines laid down.'

(l) Letters number two, dated September 30, 1910, attached to the tenders of the St. Lawrence Bridge Company stated:

'Had it not been for the many difficulties that came up on considering the erection of the board's design we would have been content to have tendered on this design only, believing the bridge in other respects to be all that can be desired.'

As mentioned in my letter of December 10 (page 9), the difficulties of erection had become much less serious by October 15, 1910, when the St. Lawrence Bridge Company wrote:

'In a general way we may say that for each design we have worked up in detail a scheme we are satisfied will do the work safely, and on this we have based our estimates.'

And later, speaking of the board's design:

'With the inside traveller the risks above mentioned can, we think, be practically eliminated.'

It follows, therefore, that in the opinion of the St. Lawrence Bridge Company the risks of erection have been practically eliminated and that the design of the board is all that can be desired.

(m) On May 2, 1910, the following resolution was adopted at a meeting of the board held in Montreal:—

'It is resolved that the plans and specifications for a cantilever design now completed be approved and submitted to the minister for tenders, and that in the event of a better plan being submitted by any of the bidders same shall be adopted.'

I will remark first that this resolution allowed other plans to be submitted, but not other specifications.

When tenders were asked on the board's design, that design had no defects, as far as the knowledge of the members of the board went, because if any member had known of any defect it was his duty to have it corrected before advising the minister to ask for tenders on such plans, as in the event of no other plan being submitted, the contract would have been given on the board's design.

The choice, however, remains between a plan that has no defects and is all that can be desired and the designs of the St. Lawrence Bridge Company.

The only real argument brought in favour of the latter is that 'it offers features which simplify the erection and minimize the risks to both life and property.'

This has been answered, pages 8, 9 and 10 of my letter of December 10, 1910.

If this is true it should have resulted in a lower cost of the bridge.

What are the facts?

The weight of both designs is practically the same. The materials used in the St. Lawrence Bridge Company's design cost over one million dollars less than the materials used in the board's design. If the erection is simplified and the risks minimized the cost should be still less. Why, therefore, is the cost of the St. Lawrence Bridge Company's design $932,000 more than the lowest tender and $270,000 more than the next lowest tender on the board's design?

The difference between the tenders of the St. Lawrence Bridge Company on plan V of the board and on their plan 'B' is 19 per cent.

On the same basis it is, therefore, to be inferred that, had the other bridge companies been allowed to alter the specifications to the same extent as was done by the St. Lawrence Bridge Company their bids on the bridge would have been lessened in the same proportion, i.e., to $9,000,000 or to $9,500,000, instead of $12,000,000.

(n) The board's design has been completely worked out and the compression members tested with highly satisfactory results, whereas the sketches submitted by the St. Lawrence Bridge Company are only in the initial stage. Their compression members have not been tested; tests will be required to ascertain their value, and repeated changes in designs and new tests may be required before as good members as the board's may be obtained. (See letter number one of the St. Lawrence Bridge Company, quoted page 14 and 15 of my letter of December 10.)

It will, therefore, take a much longer time to make the shop drawings for the design of the St. Lawrence Bridge Company than for the board's design.

On December 13, 1910, I received a letter from the St. Lawrence Bridge Company inclosing copy of letter addressed to you dated November 28, 1910, in which they agree to make their plans, details and materials conform with the specifications of the board. They do not state, however, what the cost will be. It is, however, another proof that the plans submitted with their tenders were not made according to the requirements of the board and of the department (see 'e,' page 16 of my letter of December 10, 1910). I would add that if the specifications are to be followed, the use of a through traveller will bring in the erection serious difficulties that presented themselves in all plans and which were avoided by the use of a top traveller.

In any case I feel very much gratified that as a consequence of our discussions the St Lawrence Bridge Company has accepted the specifications of the board and that as a result a much stronger bridge has been secured for the country than the one which was originally proposed in their tenders.

Respectfully submitted,
(Sgd.) H. E. VAUTELET,
Chairman and Chief Engineer.

Hon. Geo. P. Graham,
Minister of Railways and Canals,
Ottawa, Ont.

These reports were in my hands, and the Chairman taking such a decided view one way and the majority of the members of the board having such decided opinions on the other, I believed it was a case in which action should be taken under the clause of the order in council appointing the board which said that where any disagreement arose, not more than two experts should be called in to decide the point in dispute. M. J. Butler, the former deputy-minister of the department, who was thoroughly conversant with the entire transaction from the beginning (and I may say Mr. Vautelet, as Chairman of the board, acquiesced in his appointment), and Mr. H. W. Hodge, an eminent engineer of New York, were named. These gentlemen met in Montreal. There were present Messrs. Modjeski, Macdonald, Butler and Hodge. Mr. Vautelet was ill at the time but the action that was taken can probably best be stated by reading the report of this enlarged board, which is as follows:

Montreal, February 8, 1911.

Sir,—In accordance with your letter of January 20, appointing Messrs. M. J. Butler and Henry W. Hodge to advise with the Board of Engineers, Quebec bridge, on the points of difference that have arisen in that board, we have the honour to report as follows:—

The board, with the exception of Mr. Vautelet, who is detained in his home by illness, met with the advisory engineers on February

6, and have been in session for the past three days, Mr. Macdonald acting as temporary Chairman.

We have examined the various tenders and general designs and the advisory engineers have read the written opinions of the members of the board, and in addition thereto, the opinion of Mr. Vautelet, as expressed in his letter to them dated February 2. They have also considered the verbal arguments of each member of the board, adjourning to Mr. Vautelet's residence for the purpose of conferring with him.

The only point of difference in the board is as to which specific design and tender should be recommended for acceptance; the board being divided between the official design and the design of the St. Lawrence Bridge Company.

None of the tenders on either of these two designs were made requiring modifications of the specifications, so that such alterations must be considered if either of these tenders are to be accepted.

The advisory engineers have not considered it within the province of their appointment to examine closely into the details of the two above mentioned designs, and all of us are of the opinion that consideration of details is a matter that must be carefully studied and worked out in the light of further tests yet to be made by the Board of Engineers.

From our examination of the two above mentioned general designs, we, the undersigned, agree that the design of the St. Lawrence Bridge Company is preferable for the following reasons:—

(a) The type of design offers greater safety to life and property during erection, as well as economy and rapidity in construction.

(b) The design contains the minimum number of secondary members and requires few, if any, temporary members during erection.

(c) The system of triangulation by dividing the web stresses reduces the members to more practical sections and simplifies the details of connections.

(d) The design economizes material, as shown by the calculated weights of the two designs.

(e) The general appearance of the structure is, in our opinion, improved.

We feel that in a work of such magnitude the question of design is of the first importance, and for the reasons given above we recommend the acceptance of design 'B' of the St. Lawrence Bridge Company, subject to certain modifications in general outline and detail, which we deem advisable and which will result in economy, and further improvement in appearance. The modifications of their design we have in mind will reduce the cost of the work by, at least, four dollars per ton and we recommend the acceptance of the tender of the St. Lawrence Bridge Company on their design 'B' at a price not exceeding 8·45 cents per pound (amounting in the calculated weight to $11,246,100) and at a corresponding reduction on their other pound price, if the board should decide to accept any features of their alternate tenders.

The lowest tender of the British Empire Bridge Company, when the additional price they give for complying with the splices required by the official design is added, amounts to $11,320,720.

While not called for by the advertisement, the St. Lawrence Bridge Company submitted among their tenders, one omitting the roadways, which at the reduction in their pound price above recommended, shows a cost of $8,650,000 on the figured weight, and we think this should be called to your attention, as the highways can now be omitted without changing our above recommendations or delaying the progress of this work.

We have the honour to be, sir,
Your obedient servants,
(Sgd.) M. J. BUTLER,
HENRY W. HODGE,
RALPH MODJESKI,
CHARLES MACDONALD,
Chairman pro tem.

Hon. Geo. P. Graham, LL.D., P.C.,
Minister of Railawys and Canals,
Ottawa, Ont.

Mr. Butler only acted in settling the difference that arose between the regular members of the board as between these two designs.

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). I would like to ask my hon. friend two questions there. The British Empire company's tender was for a bridge with roadways?

Mr. GRAHAM. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). And the tender on design B of the St. Lawrence company was for a bridge with roadways?

Mr. GRAHAM. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). Were there separate tenders from these companies for the bridge without the roadway and for the bridge with the roadway, or was just one sum stated for the bridge, the design of which included roadways?

Mr. GRAHAM. The British Empire company tendered on the design with the roadway, and it was the only company that did not put in at least one alternative design. Among the alternative plans submitted by the St. Lawrence Bridge company, was one without the roadway. That was plan X. It was the only company that put in a tender showing that the bridge could be built without the roadways at that saving. Now, this board of engineers unanimously recommended the adoption of this design of the St. Lawrence Bridge company. Following that, I wrote letters to the St. Lawrence company asking them certain things, if they were ready to undertake the contract, and if their parent company would become parties to the contract, as we wanted all the capital that was behind any of the stockholders to be at our disposal, in case the bridge was not a success. In addition to that, I think we asked as a deposit, in the first place, $500,000, and afterwards a further sum, making in all, if I remember the figures correctly, a cash deposit of $1,200,000. It was a very large deposit, and the contractors so expressed themselves; but the undertaking was so gigantic that the department and the government thought it advisable to ask for a very large deposit. As against that the contractors of course, get drawbacks on their contracts as they proceed with the work. Mr. Vautelet resigned his position on February 22. An order in council was passed on February 27, accepting his resignation as from February 22. The contract was signed on April 4, 1911. Mr. Charles N. Monsarratt, M.C., S.C.E., formerly chief bridge engineer of the Canadian Pacific railway, was appointed to succeed Mr. Vautelet, on May 6, 1911. Mr. Macdonald, according to the terms of his appointment, retired as soon as the contract was signed, and was succeeded by Mr C C. Schneider, C.E., of New York, who was appointed on May 15, 1911.

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). Did Mr. Vautelet, who resigned shortly after the final report of the four out of the five engineers was made, make any comments or any report, or express any opinion as to what was advised by the others?

Mr. GRAHAM. I think he did not make any further comment.

Now, the reason I have brought this matter to the attention of the House is that this was the largest undertaking of its kind ever conceived, it was surrounded with a great many difficulties, and the government were of the opinion, which seemed to be acquiesced in by this House on several occasions, that the safe way to carry on this work was to select a board of competent men, the best they could find, and place all the responsibility, because it was entirely of a technical character, in their hands. I may say that not so much as one stenographer was recommended by the government for that board. They selected their own staff from the messengers up, and recommended what their salaries should be, and no increase of salary which the board recommended was ever refused by the government; so there would be no excuse for the board saying that they had ever been interfered with. The board having accepted the responsibility of carrying on this great work, the government relied solely on them. Whether rightly or wrongly, every step taken from start to finish in connection with this work was taken on the responsibility of the board. I think no errors were committed, but if they were, the responsibility would rest on the technical men who accepted the responsibility. I think that they made no mistake, and that none will occur, and that they will carry the work to a success.

Mr. CURRIE. In the consideration of the plans for this bridge, did the question arise whether it should be of the cantalever type or of the suspension type? In New York, where they have great bridges, we find that they are of the suspension type.

Mr. GRAHAM. In New York there is no bridge that approaches this one. But that question was thoroughly threshed out and the board was unanimous for the cantalever principle. The government having decided to place the responsibility on the board, that responsibility was kept on the board all the time, and from beginning to end, in our connection with that great enterprise, no step was taken except on the advice, not only of a majority of the board, when the entire board did not agree, but on the advice of an enlarged board, and the final conclusion was upon the advice of four men to one.

I make this statement for the purpose of placing it on record, not merely for the benefit of the House, the members being fairly conversant with it, but for the benefit of the public, the financial men of England, and the contractors on this continent, and in Europe. The Canadian government, no matter what party is in power, I take it, endeavours to do its business with fairness to everybody, always keeping in mind that they are serving the Canadian people from first to last; and that was done with regard to this great work. In conclusion, I may say that I am not sorry, and have no apologies to offer, for being able, in following the advice of this board, so selected, to give this gigantic work to a Canadian firm, so that as far as possible, the money spent on it will be spent among the workmen of the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to follow the hon. gentleman in any critique of his long statement upon a very complex and technical subject. I am not prepared to do that, either from a late reading of the circumstances outside or from a knowledge of the more technical and abstruse work of the contract itself and all that it involves in the plans and specifications. I think the hon. gentleman has done well in making the statement as full as he has, and entirely free from partisan bias. There are, however, two or three things that occur to my mind as a layman, and I will take the liberty of expressing them. In the first place, it would seem as though the board of engineers, after having approved of a design, and after having settled upon it as the official design, gave an option to the tenderers to tender either upon that or upon a design of their own; and, as it turned out, the St. Lawrence Company did not tender upon the official design.

Mr. GRAHAM. Every tenderer tendered on the chairman's design, the official design, first, and then they could put in an alternative.

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). The St. Lawrence Company tendered on the chairman's design, and then tendered on a design of its own. The British Empire Company did the same.

Mr. GRAHAM. The British Empire Company was the only company that did not take advantage of the opportunity to tender on its own design as well.

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). Then, in the end, design 'B' of the St. Lawrence Company was not the one that was finally accepted. Another design, 'X,' by the same company, was, after the extra engineers had been called in, recommended by them, and the suggestion was made that if the roadway was left out, the cost would be diminished by some $2,000,000; and the opinion of my hon. friend, which he gathered to be the view of the engineers, was that it would be better to have the roadway eliminated and to build the bridge simply for railway transport. What appears to me is this, that when neither the one design nor the other was taken upon what there seemed to have been an agreement, with the exception of the chairman of the board, and a decision was come to to eliminate the roadway, whether it would not have been fair, when the government had made that fundamental change, which would make a very great difference in the attitude of the tenderers, and which was introducing an entirely new element, to have allowed the British Empire Company to have tendered for a structure without the roadway. That was not done. In an immense affair of this kind, in which are interested eminent contractors of very high standing, whose goodwill it would be always well to have, and whose arrangements must be made with great financial security, and consequently with a very wide interest in their contract, when so fundamental a change was made as to eliminate the roadway and consequently one-fifth or one-fourth of the cost, it would have been fair to have allowed the other company to have amended its tender, or to have called for new tenders on the amended basis. But the main thing I want to impress on the House and the country is that, in the statement my hon. friend has made, he has uttered the severest condemnation I have ever heard passed by any hon. gentleman upon the action of his own government. What I mean is this. In his statement my hon. friend elaborated two things. One was the unprecedented nature of the work. No such work had ever been attempted in the world; no such work was at present being carried on anywhere; it was a stupendous work, unique; and he strongly emphasized the care, the attention, the absolute domination of the idea which possessed him that in such a stupendous work no effort in time or cost of scientific ability should be eliminated in getting the very best men to examine the problem and to devise from that examination the very best design and specification that could be had. No amount of money should stand in the way of that; no lapse of time was too long in order that that might be accomplished, to the end that the most stupendous work in the world in that form of construction should be conceived and set into operation by the very best engineering skill that could be had. The extreme levity and light-heartedness with which my hon. friend's government approached this most stupendous task stands out in relief against this elaborate and serious statement of my hon. friend. I do not suppose any great work was ever approached in a spirit of such carelessness, lack of consideration and utter abandonment of responsibility—certainly not in the history of Canada, and I doubt if in any other country, in regard to a work approaching this in magnitude. What was done? This most stupendous work was handed over to a small number of promoters and left in their hands. The legislation that made it possible for these promoters to work was passed through parliament between dark and daylight at the last end of a long and tired session. No supervision worthy of the name was given by that government, though its credit and its money and the reputation of the country was at the beck and call of the promoters.

I just call the attention of the House and the country to the condemnation, the severe condemnation, that my hon. friend has felt called upon to utter against the method, the practice, and, I think, the almost criminal negligence of the government of which he formed a part. The government was not content with putting this into the hands of promoters, heedless of the stupendous character of the construction, careless of everything, it would seem, but the carrying out of some petty design of promoters, but left it in their hands without supervision by the government itself, and when they had played with it and burned their fingers—as they were certain to do and should have been allowed to heal the burns themselves—the government which had been guilty of such levity and such criminal carelessness, made up to those promoters every dollar that they had put into it, and gave them much that they had never put into it, and interest upon all that was paid.

I hope the lesson is one which Canada will profit from in future. The country has paid dearly for its experience. And it is a righteous retribution that a member of the same government which was guilty of such criminal negligence—to say nothing more—in the beginning of this stupendous transaction should be the one to pronounce here in the House his apologia, and at the same time his condemnation of the work of his predecessors.

Motion agreed to, and the House went into Committee of Supply.

SUPPLY

Militia and Defence—allowance active militia, $112,000.

Hon. SAM. HUGHES (Minister of Militia). In introducing the militia estimates, perhaps I may be permitted a word of general explanation. I have largely followed, as necessarily was the case, the estimates as prepared by my predecessor in office. In order to facilitate the discussion and give every member of the House the fullest opportunity of looking into the details of these estimates, I had a statement prepared giving the estimates with explanations, and a copy of this has been sent to every member of the House. On this first item, there is an increase of $2,000. This is due to a new corps having been formed and an increase in the establishment of other corps. Requests have come in from various parts of the country to increase these establishments and this has been done to this extent.

Mr. CARVELL. I do not know whether it is set forth in this memorandum or not, but I believe it is a fact that in this item is included the allowances made to the commandants of different regiments of infantry. Does the minister allow anything to the commanding officer for care of arms and accoutrements in places where there is an armoury with a caretaker in charge? If not, does not the hon. minister think that the commanding officer who becomes responsible for this property should have something in the way of an allowance, even though he does not have to do the actual work of cleaning and caretaking? I have been told by officers of the militia they are responsible for losses when stock is taken every year, even though the losses may be due to the negligence of the caretaker, and, as I understand it, the commanding officer has no way of getting his own out of the caretaker. He must make good to the government but, unfortunately, there is nobody to make good to him. I may be wrong in my understanding of the case, but if I am right, does not the hon. minister think that this state of affairs involves injustice?

Mr. FOSTER (N. Toronto).

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria, Ont.). The hon. gentleman (Mr. Carvell) has stated the case exactly. The allowance for care of arms varies from $40 for a small unit, to $170 for a field battery. Where there is an armoury provided by the government, only half the allowance is made. The commanding officer of a corps provided with a government armoury and caretaker receives no allowance, and most of the artillery corps and many others are now provided with caretakers. I heartily agree that the claim to consideration of the officer responsible who has to pay out of his own pocket for efficiency in these stores though, in many cases, he has no direct control of the caretaker, should be recognized. There has been no change in this item; we are taking it exactly as it has been. But I may say it is our intention, if we can get an officer in command of a district to recommend to us a proper caretaker—and our first requisite is that he shall be a soldier properly qualified—to appoint that man. We will have the officer in command, in more or less direct control of the caretaker. The matter of pay or allowance has not been considered, because we have not had time. I know from personal and other experience that there is a great deal of justice in the statement the hon. gentleman has made.

Mr. CARVELL. I am sorry the hon. minister has not taken time in some instances to make inquiries before he made dismissals of these caretakers. I wish to call attention to a case coming under my own observation. In the armoury in the town in which I live, ever since its construction it has been presided over by a gentleman who was a militiaman, a soldier, as my hon. friend (Mr. Hughes, Victoria, Ont.) says, and who later became an officer in the artillery.

I got from the Militia Department all sorts of criticism, in fact I was looked upon almost as an outlaw in military ethics, in recommending this gentleman as caretaker, I think they call him superintendent, of the 10th Field Battery. But I took the ground that the man who was responsible for the care of arms and accoutrements of the field battery ought to be a man who knew something about a field battery; I do not care whether he is an officer or not, he ought to have some knowledge of field batteries, and, therefore, he was appointed. But unfortunately he was a Liberal, and I think that one of the first official acts of my hon. friend was to remove that gentleman from his position. Now he says, we want a soldier. What have they got? A man who runs a billiard hall, and I do not know what else he does.

I think they sent him down to Kingston on some official business, but he didn't serve out his full time, and came back home in a week or ten days. And that is the man who takes care of the arms in the town of Woodstock. He has control of the arms and accoutrements of the Woodstock camp of the field battery, and of the engineering corps. Well, the engineering corps have only two or three old wagons, a few shovels and spades, and a few Ross rifles—they are all right of course. But let me point out that the government have just supplied the 10th Field Battery with new 18 pounder field guns, costing many thousands of dollars; and here is a man of the class I have described who is put in charge of them, a man who would not even fill out his time at Kingston, and the arms of the 10th Field Battery to-day are in the hands of a man, I won't say he is irresponsible, but I do not think he knows much about the care of arms. I sincerely hope my hon. friend will pause before he dismisses efficient officers and caretakers, and appoints men of this character to their places. I am sorry my hon. friend had not arrived at this laudable decision he now professes before he took the opportunity of dismissing a man from office who does know something about the business, and who has some interest in the affairs of the country.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). The man who was dismissed was a very good man if he had attended to his business, but he made himself very offensive during the elections. However, I may say frankly that in several cases we have refused to accept applicants because they were not competent. I may say also without fear of offending any of my good friends, that I am making it a requirement now that the man who is recommended must always be fit for his business, and if I cannot get a good Tory I will take the best man I can get.

Mr. CARVELL. Will the minister say that this qualification shall be retroactive?

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). I go forwards, but not backwards.

Mr. MACDONALD. I am surprised to hear the minister say that one of the essential qualifications for such appointments is that the man must be a Tory.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). The first essential is qualification; then, of course, we look to his politics.

Mr. MACDONALD. My hon. friend said a moment ago that the principle he was going to adopt was that if he can not find a good Tory, then he will look around and find somebody else. That is an unfortunate announcement for my hon. friend to make at the inception of his career. Everybody agrees that the Minister of Militia, above all others, should aim to keep the militia out of politics. There is not much to be gained in making appointments to the militia from a political standpoint. I do not think any political party would be advanced or injured if a man was appointed as caretaker who was not a supporter of the government.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). How would my hon. friend suggest I should proceed?

Mr. MACDONALD. I know my hon. friend has had very high aspirations in reference to this matter in the past, and I would suggest that he should proceed upon the advice of the commanding officers of the regiments in the different places where arms are to be looked after, and be guided by responsible people in the military service. I am sorry to hear from the minister that he proposes to administer his department in the manner he has indicated.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). Outside of promotions of high officials, I have no hesitation in saying that as between two men, one qualified and the other unqualified, the qualified man being a Liberal and the unqualified one being a Tory, the Liberal will get the job. But other things being equal, both being qualified, the Tory will get the job. There is no use in denying it, that is the rule that both sides have followed, that is the rule my hon. friend would pursue, I am satisfied of that. But I will say this, that so far we have had a little trouble in appointing some of those men and finding they were not exactly qualified. I think in some instances we have even stretched our conscience in appointing Liberals.

Mr. CARVELL. Then we are to understand that there is to be politics in the militia in future?

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). If my hon. friend chooses to call that politics, it is politics.

Mr. MACDONALD. It is unfortunate in a sense. Nobody questions that the patronage system obtains in this country in regard to every branch of the service. But my hon. friend has vociferously proclaimed in the past that there should be no politics. On many occasions hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House have urged that in the Militia Department the patronage system should be disregarded, and that only men who are suitable should be appointed to responsible positions.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). For official positions.

Mr. MACDONALD. I regard the appointment of a man who is the caretaker of an armoury on political grounds as being too pettifogging to bother about. I am surprised to see my hon. friend descending to that.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). I am sorry not to have won the esteem of my hon. friend. But these are not officers, these are men who have care of arms, men who are associated with the young fellows who come into the armoury. Take the case at Woodstock. My hon. friend from Carleton (Mr. Carvell) will not deny that this particular caretaker was one of the best political agents in that community; he was in the drill hall on all occasions, and was thrown into the company of these young men and acted as a political agent among them. I give fair warning that any man who is appointed to such a position hereafter must leave politics aside. But so far as appointing a man to an office goes, other things being equal, I am not going to stand up here and pretend anything to the contrary; all things being equal the man who is appointed to the office will be a Tory. But in promotions in the militiary service there will be no politics.

Mr. NESBITT. If there was trouble in the country and the men were called out to take the field, would the minister look into their politics?

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). I am sorry that my hon. friend is not in the militia; if he were he would know that caretakers are not called out. They stay at home.

Mr. NESBITT. That may be a smart answer in the minister's opinion, but are they not liable to be called out like any other men?

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). Yes, the same as my hon. friend is, but not all of them could go.

Mr. NESBITT. I have no doubt that if I were called upon I would have to go and I would have no doubt that the caretaker would have to go also, with all due deference to my hon. friend. But what I asked him was if the men who are called out will be called out on political lines.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). I never said so. The record of the Tory party in the past has been such as to show they would not be. If the hon. gentleman wishes to go into the matter, I do not think I need go any farther back than the expedition to South Africa, when the issues were not determined on the lines of fitness, but were determined largely on the lines of politics.

Mr. MACDONALD. I hope the minister is very clear about his position. As I understand it, when it comes to caretakers and officials of that kind, he is to apply the political rule while with regard to other branches of the service fitness is the qualification.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). No, fitness is the first qualification for a caretaker.

Mr. MACDONALD. Then why did you dismiss my friend from Carleton, N.B.?

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). Because he was an active partisan.

Mr. MACDONALD. But he was a good man.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). But he goes if he is just an active partisan, just the same if he had been a Tory.

Mr. MACDONALD. You do it to Tories as well as to Grits?

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). Certainly; the man who neglects his business for politics goes.

Mr. MACDONALD. Both?

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). Yes.

Annual drill, $1,730,000.

Mr. NESBITT. May I ask the minister for an explanation of the enormous increase here?

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). If I had taken the estimates of my predecessor in office the amount this year would have been, not $1,730,000, but $2,200,000. I reduced that by the sum of $470,000. However, it is only fair to explain that the infantry corps for this year train for twelve days. The cavalry, artillery, engineers and all other corps train for sixteen days and there is a large increase in the sum required under that heading. The flat rate of fifty cents a day has been increased to seventy-five cents a day and the opportunity is given to the soldier to earn efficiency pay and perform other service thus increasing the sum to $1 per day. These items, figured up, make the total amount.

Mr. NESBITT. One dollar a day will be the maximum?

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). One dollar a day will be the maximum. In that is also included a sum for transporting and maintaining cadet corps in camp. Therefore, although the sum of $1,730,000 is $470,000 less than if the original estimate had been maintained, it will still provide for the training of 40,000 cadets in camp, for four days' additional pay for the cavalry, artillery, and infantry, and, in addition to that, drilling the city corps. That is giving the city corps, who never have an opportunity of manoeuvering, a period of four or five days in camp, and, of course, they will be paid for that also. I am not claiming credit for these changes. They were in the scheme prepared by my predecessor before I took office.

Mr. MACDONALD. Is not my hon. friend, in proposing to train the cadets in camp, taking a new step in that particular?

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). Not necessarily. Provision has always been made in the law for the training of cadets, but it has been for training in a company attached to the active militia, which I do not believe in. The consequence is that the cadets have never been in camp, as a great many parents do not want their children, owing to the fact that the recruiting was not always carried on as it should have been, to attend these camps of instruction with the ordinary active militia. The purpose is, now to have these young lads brought into camp separately and under the conditions which I have already explained.

Mr. MACDONALD. Where?

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). In each county or riding headquarters. If my hon. friends will be good enough to send in a statement in each locality of where we could get good areas for the boys to drill on, I would be much obliged. This year the camps will be held in centres in each county.

Mr. MACDONALD. It is a question whether that policy is a good one or not. These cadet companies are the product of the Strathcona Trust, which contemplated that half of the money which was devoted to each province should be expended for physical training. Thirty-five per cent. of the amount which was devoted to each province, has been utilized for military training and 15 per cent. for rifle shooting. We have the Boy Scouts also, which is an independent organization, and I have heard it discussed with very great seriousness as to the wisdom of the militia department taking hold of this cadet movement to the extent to which they purpose doing by putting these boys into camp. There is the problem that my hon. friend suggests and the point occurs to one, as to whether the parents of the children who are getting this military training to-day under the provisions of the Strathcona Trust from their instructors and teachers at home, would care to allow them, at tender years, to go off and remain in camps under the method proposed here. It seems to me that the true purpose to be served by the expenditure contemplated by the Trust, would be better attained by allowing the young boys to get the military training given by the instructor at home, inculcate them withe a desire for militia work, and militia interests, and then, when they have reached the age when they can join the active militia, they will afford a very fair recruiting ground for the militia. But the fusion of the small boy into the militia directly at that early age, is quite a problem. I am not speaking in a captious way, but in the exercise of such judgment as I can apply to the problem and I must say that I cannot view the proposal favourably. I think the problem of taking the boys away from home—I do not care whether it is to the county town or some place else—and putting them into camp in the summer time, will not work out successfully. I think the results would be very much better if their teachers and instructors developed their interest in militia work by training them in the schools so that they might be brought into the militia in future years. This would result in larger additions to the militia than if, at an early age you proceed to drive and enforce the militia training and render entirely stale the experience which the young man would look forward to, when he got up to the age at which going to camp would be a real experience.

It is of course a question of policy, and for my part I am inclined to think that the expenditure the minister proposes, of $130,000 for that purpose, is not one which in the long run will be in the interests of the militia, or in the general interest of the country. I would like to hear the minister's justification, if he has any, for this change. We have a Boy Scout movement which is not dealt with by the minister and in which you have local interest and enthusiasm displayed by the young men in that branch of junior military work, and you have the cadet movement which is confined to the schools to which the young people go until they get to the age when they have developed some interest along military lines and would go into the militia as a matter of course. I doubt the wisdom of this vote.

Mr. CARVELL. I have given this matter a good deal of consideration, and I have arrived at somewhat the same conclusion as the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) although perhaps my views are a little more pronounced than his. I have read with a great deal of interest the memorandum sent out by the minister, in which he contrasts the 'positive' training with the 'negative' training and in which he shows that the negative or demoralizing training which the people of Canada are receiving is costing $127,000,000. I am not going to analyse that, but I may say that the militia, which my hon. friend (Mr. Macdonald) has so much at heart is not the positive training for good that the minister thinks it is. I hope I will not be taken as saying that I am entirely against a militia force, for I am not. I believe this country has to have a militia force of some kind, but I am afraid that we are being drawn into the vortex of militarism to an extent our fathers never dreamt of. The minister seems to think that all you have to do to fit a boy for going through the pearly gates is to put him in the militia at twelve years of age and keep him there until his habits are formed. Perhaps my experience in the militia is not along the same lines as that of the minister, but if I had a boy and he wanted to join the militia, I would feel much more responsibility in looking after the character and makeup of the officers and non-commissioned officers of the corps he intended joining, than I would if I were sending him to a school. I believe there are some young men who take their first drink of liquor in going to or in attending the military camps.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). Has the hon. member a boy?

Mr. CARVELL. I have not. If I had one I would encourage him to join the militia, but I would be mighty careful as to what corps he joined. I cannot agree with the minister that joining the militia is the remedy for all the ills the human flesh is heir to, and I think he will find that it is not the temperance agent he imagines it is. We come now to the question as to whether this is a good policy. Surely the minister must consider that a boy of twelve years is pretty young to be taken away from his parents and sent into a camp of instruction, surrounded by evil influences as well as good. I will admit that if the minister could get the assistance of all the clergymen and all the W.C.T.U's. and all the other influences for good he speaks of in this memorandum, possibly he might work out the result he hopes for, but even then he would find some difficulty. Therefore, I think the hon. gentleman should hesitate before he launches out into the scheme of which he speaks, to take forty thousand boys between the ages of twelve years and sixteen years away from their homes and put them into those camps of military instruction. Of course, I give my hon. friend credit for seeing that there will be no canteens at these cadet camps. Now, the minister is asking parliament to grant the enormous sum of $8,312,850 for militia expenditure during the coming year, and I know his answer to me will be: Oh, well, that is only $200,000 or $300,000 more than your government intended to expend.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). It is $500,000 less.

Mr. CARVELL. I thought the minister would say: You are another. I want to know if it has ever occurred to the hon. gentleman that out of this expenditure of over eight million dollars he is giving to the man who is going to shoulder the musket when trouble comes, the soldier of all ranks including non-commissioned officers, less than probably $800,000 in the way of pay. He is spending over eight million dollars for military purposes, and out of that he is spending $800,000 as pay to the men whom he wants to train. If you examine these items you will find that the hon. gentleman admits that the former government had proposed to increase the pay of the privates up to $1.50 a day and that he only intends to increase their pay up to $1 and even that is contingent on certain things. I want to point out to him one of the unfair features of this increase. As a matter of fact he only gives the private soldier seventy-five cents a day, but he provides that if it be his second year he is entitled to ten cents extra, and if after that he becomes what is called 'efficient' he gets fifteen cents a day more. The hon. gentleman says that in the infantry and cavalry the principal test for efficiency shall be skill in shooting, and that is all right. If you are going to have an efficiency test nothing could be fairer than the test of shooting because after all the only thing we can ever hope to teach our militia in this country is something along the lines of organization, and to learn how to shoot. But, how will the minister apply that efficiency test to the artillery, and to the engineers? It is very much easier to recruit men for the artillery than for the infantry. He will find less difficulty in getting men for the artillery and cavalry because they have horses, and men like to ride horses better than tramping around on foot, and I don't blame them. Therefore, I think there will be found discrimination in this direction. I know that discrimination has existed for some time, but I point out this difficulty to my hon. friend, and I ask him if he cannot get around it in some way. The minister is increasing this vote by $405,000, $130,000 of which goes to the cadet movement, but there is an increase of nearly $300,000 for the annual training, and the men, the soldier who is the backbone of the whole thing, the men who form ninety per cent of the whole organization of the militia force of Canada are going to get an increase in their pay to the magnificent extent of $30,000, just think of it, for the whole militia force of Canada. My hon. friend is increasing the pay of his general staff, who are very well paid already, by about 40 per cent of that.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). There is an increase of $400,000 in the pay of the men. Last year it amounted to $1,325,000; this year is it $1,730,000.

Mr. CARVELL. That includes fodder, horses and transport. To find out the real increase in the pay of the men, all my hon. friend has to do is to take 60,000 men and multiply that number by 10 or 15 cents a day. The great majority of the men have been getting from 75 cents to $1 a day under the old system. According to his own memorandum my hon. friend is only proposing to increase the pay by $30,000. Out of this $400,000, $130,000 goes to the cadets, $100,000 for four additional days, which means rations, forage, horses and everything else except the pay of the men, who get perhaps a pittance at the end. Then there is the training of all the field artillery, engineers and part of the cavalry at Petawawa; that takes $80,000, and that does not go to the men, but very largely to the railway companies. Then, he is going to take $20,000 for a larger permanent force at the Petawawa camp. I cannot understand this. I think that a force which receives a stated salary all the year round, and a regular allowance for rations, horses, forage, &c., should cost about the same no matter where they are. Then you have the magnificent sum of $30,000 for increasing the pay of the whole militia of Canada. I ask, is this fair? Would it not have been better to have carried out the policy which the late government intended to carry out, and increase the pay up to $1.50 a day, and be done with it? My hon. friend knows that he is not getting any great number of recruits of the right kind. You cannot get the farmers' sons, who are the backbone of any militia force, to leave the farm for 12 or 15 days for such small pay. If we are going to get any benefit from the $8,000,000 which we are spending on the militia, we ought to do something to get the very best men of the country trained, and you cannot get them unless you remunerate them, not so much for their own time, but for the wages they must pay for men to take their places on the farms, or at their places of business. If the minister will, even at this late date, get the consent of His Excellency, I am sure he will get the unanimous consent of parliament to give $1.50 a day to every man who attends camp. I hope he will take this into consideration.

Mr. LEMIEUX. If I remember well, some years ago Lord Strathcona made a certain gift to the Department of Militia, or to Canada, the object of which was the encouragement of drill among the boys at college or in the high schools. The money was to be divided among the several provinces. If I remember rightly, the province of Nova Scotia accepted the conditions of the gift. I would like to know from the hon. minister first, if other provinces have agreed to the conditions, and, secondly, how many boys are reported as taking part in the drills, and if officers are sent to drill them from the department at Ottawa or from the military quarters in the different provinces. I would ask my hon. friend also to take a note of a request which has been made to me by one of my old electors in the county of Gaspé, Mr. Letourneau, of Mont Louis. He is an old soldier who served at the military school in Quebec in the year 1870. If my hon. friend will pardon me, I will read that part of the letter which deals with the grant to be made to the veterans who took part in the Fenian raid.

It is not very relevant to the item under discussion, but my hon. friend (Mr. Hughes, Victoria, Ont.) will read that portion of the letter in 'Hansard,' and he might perhaps tell me later on what he intends to do in a similar case. Now, here is what this gentleman, writing to me on the 19th February, from Mont-Louis, county of Gaspé, Quebec, says:

On the 9th January, 1870 I entered the Military School at Quebec. My instructors were Captain Fitzgerald of the 9th British Regiment, the last regiment which helped to garrison Canada, Colonel Bagot, and Major Gagné. Colonel Bagot, who has since died in India, was the examiner and Major Gagné who has since died at Winnipeg was the French instructor. During that same winter we had the last Fenian troubles. Colonel Bagot expected to leave with his regiment at any moment, and he came to the school and asked for the names of those boys who were willing to accompany him. Out of 50 or 60 boys about one half gave their names, and agreed to join the force. I was one of those, but very few of them are living to-day. However the troubles having been repressed in a very short time it was not necessary for us to leave. Colonel Bagot came back to the military school, and made a long speech to the boys who had given their names, and Major Gagné repeated this speech in French. If my memory serves me right Colonel Duschenay was then employed at the militia office at Quebec.

The time was a little after confederation.

The names of those who offered their services must have been entered somewhere in the archives, and it seems to me that if the government is going to recompense the veterans I should be one of the number.

This gentleman explains further that he left the school in June 1870, and on the first of September following went to Rome to serve as a Papal Zouave. The writer of this letter, Mr. Louis Létourneau, is therefore an old soldier who was ready to serve his country, and he wants to know if, out of the grant that will be made to those who served in the Fenian raid, those who were ready to leave, but were not called upon to do so, will be given a grant. These are the two questions I wanted to put to my hon. friend.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria, Ont.). I think the member for Rouville asked a question regarding the number of cadets.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Yes, in the colleges, by provinces.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria, Ont.). I do not think I have them by provinces. I may say this much, however, to the credit of the province of Quebec: more than half of the organized cadets come from that province. It has been my privilege to inspect a number of these corps, and they are a most creditable organization. In connection with the training of teachers under the Strathcona Trust, I may say that all the provinces now have——

Mr. LEMIEUX. What is the amount of that trust?

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria, Ont.). About $500,000 I think, but that is only a small item in the whole cost. Under the Strathcona Trust all the provinces have accepted and up to date Nova Scotia, being the province which first took it up, has 3,933 teachers regularly trained under that trust, the training being in physical and military drill. New Brunswick has 2,041 regularly trained teachers. Those are the two provinces which took up this training early. Prince Edward Island has 565 British Columbia 378, Quebec 12, outside of their cadets, Ontario 179, Manitoba 415, Saskatchewan 175, and Alberta, 283 teachers already trained under the Strathcona Trust. These teachers carry on their work in the schools at regular periods. Was that all the information the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) wanted?

Mr. LEMIEUX. I would like some statement in regard to the veterans.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria, Ont.). Of course my hon. friend would not ask me to express an opinion off-hand.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Not until the minister has read Mr. Létourneau's letter, which will appear in 'Hansard.'

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). I will take the case up with the officers of the department. The provisions of the law, of course, have to be satisfied, that the veterans were called out on duty at the time, and if my good friend who made application enlisted in May, 1870, as he did according to the dates given, the chances are that his corps were ordered to the front, and he, as long as they were ordered to the front, although not present with the enemy, I think under the law is entitled to get the grant.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Before my hon. friend the minister passes to another subject, we have in Montreal, Quebec and some other cities in that province some independent corps who obtain old arms from the department for their organization. Does the minister exact from these corps that they should join the militia? Would it not be better that they should regularly form part of the militia force than remain independent corps?

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). The independent cadet corps are not liable to be called out for service.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Why should they not be in the militia force instead of being independent corps?

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). I do not know the details in regard to these independent corps, as the question has never arisen before, but I imagine they would not be expected to join the militia, being under age for one very sound reason. It is the first time I knew there were independent corps who were organized and not in the militia. I will give the matter my consideration.

Mr. CARVELL. Before the minister leaves that branch of the subject, will he state what is the character of the training which the teachers have received in New Brunswick? He states in his memorandum that there were in 1911-12 450 teachers already trained in New Brunswick. Would he give some idea as to the character and training they received? There are female teachers as well as male teachers, and the former would not be available to take to the camps of instruction.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). We hope all the male teachers will be. They are all invited to go into camp to get instruction. The matter is fully set out at pages 9 and 10 of the memorandum. The training under the Strathcona Trust is physical drill for the upbuilding of the physical body——

Mr. CARVELL. That is good.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). Secondly, mental development accompanying it, and also a certain amount of the rudimentary military training. If the hon. member has not seen the syllabus, or the books, in connection with this matter, I would be very glad to send copies to him and to other members of the House. They will then see the exact nature of the training that has been carried on for some years under the auspices of the Strathcona Trust. Now, to come to the cadet corps training.

Mr. MACDONALD. Will the minister tell us fully what is his programme in regard to that?

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). Does the hon. member mean in regard to the Strathcona Trust or the cadets?

Mr. MACDONALD. They work together.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). Australia has now under arms 75,000 cadets. The policy as enunciated by Lord Roberts many years ago when he started this movement in England, which antedates the Scout movement, was that the training of the militiamen of the country of the ages of 20 to 30 should be known by the boy of 12 to 13 years of age—that is, he should understand how to aim and carry a rifle on his shoulder, and so forth, and I am satisfied my hon. friend will agree with me in that.

All that the militia of the past knew in the way of forming fours, and so on, may be seen exemplified in any large public school in the Dominion where the children even much younger than twelve years of age, are trained in the regular hall of the school. It was my privilege to visit Chatham, Ontario, not long ago, where I saw upwards of 900 boys and girls from five to fifteen years, assembled in one hall perform these military evolutions just as correctly and far more systematically than I often seen half the same number of militiamen perform them on the parade grounds. In other words, the children of to-day are being correctly trained in all the schools in the simple military movements that are about all we learn in camp. The policy pursued in Great Britain, in Australia and elsewhere where this matter has been carried on for some time, is to train the boys in shooting. That is, the same principle is followed in training in military work as is carried on in teaching reading, writing and arithmetic. The young man who leaves off the learning of these things until he is twenty-one or upwards, can hardly be made proficient in them. There is no reason why a child of ten or twelve, should not readily grasp all the simple movements of military drill. I do not wish to reproach my hon. friend from Carleton for not having a boy; possibly I should sympathize with him, certainly I would not be harsh with him; but his fear is a good deal like that of the dear old maids, who, as we all know, are always the best posted in the management of children. These old maids and old bachelors are the people whom we find best able to advise us when it comes to a question of how the chidren should be brought up.

Mr. CARVELL. I do not come under the hon. gentleman's condemnation; I am not entirely without children.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). Then I am sure the hon. gentleman will agree with me in the policy I lay down. If we wish children to be a success, whether boys or girls, we must trust them. No boy or girl ever attained high citizenship otherwise. If you want a boy to be a man, trust him. My experience in handling boys and men is that I have trusted the fellows and they have never betrayed the trust.

Now, as to liquor in camp, my experience is that the men in camp who are a disgrace to the service—and unfortunately there are many of them—do not learn in camp to drink liquor; they do not take liquor for the first time in camp. They are the men whom some careless officers, neglectful of their business, have picked up in the last day or two before they go to camp or have had them picked up by the bartenders and sent out as part of their command. These are the men who are a disgrace to the clean, decent fellows who go to camp. I do not wish to particularize my own regiment——

Mr. LEMIEUX. If I may be permitted, is it not forbidden to use liquor in camp?

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). The sale of liquor in camp is forbidden.

Mr. BELAND. Not the drinking?

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). No. But liquor is not sold in camp. The abuse of liquor in camp is not very pronounced at any time according to my experience; I have not known many camps in which it has been much abused. But a man in uniform is seen drunk—he probably got his liquor down town—and the cry at once is raised, 'There is the soldier.' 'It is the camp that has done that.' But the same man at home would probably be intoxicated for hours as against minutes of intoxication in camp. Such a man is a disgrace to civilization, but it is not the camp that has made him so. The United States Military Engineering Corps has charge of all public works, appropriations for the rivers and harbours works of the United States. General McClellan, who was a member of that corps, making a speech at one of the annual gatherings, was able to state that, although hundreds of millions of dollars had been expended by the engineering corps, not a man had been unfaithful to his trust. And this good condition, he attributed largely to the military training instilled into these men as boys. The officer at the head of the Engineering Corps to-day is able to state that in the entire record of the Engineering Corps, made up of the best military engineers in the land, there has never been but one man who proved himself unfaithful to his trust, and never a dollar was required from them in the way of guarantee.

Mr. LEMIEUX. What is the regulation in the United States regarding the sale of liquor in camps?

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). I do not know. I have not been in any of the American camps.

Mr. LEMIEUX. The hon. gentleman does not propose any change in the regulations here?

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). No, except so far as the cadet corps is concerned, in that case we provide that no liquor shall be admitted to the camp.

Mr. MACDONALD. The minister has been giving us a very interesting exhortation on military training in general, but, perhaps, it would be more interesting if he took up the different subjects categorically. I ventured at the beginning to ask him what was his justification for the diversion of the Strathcona Trust by providing that this money for cadet companies should be spent in cadet corps camps. I also asked with regard to the increased pay which my non. friend from Carleton (Mr. Carvell), referred to.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). I obtained permission of the hon. member from Carleton (Mr. Carvell), to answer the member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux), first. I have not forgotten the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald).

Mr. CARVELL. The first shall be last.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). Yes, but not least. I was answering the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell). In the city of Toronto where for nearly forty years the boys have been trained from much younger than ten years, not a boy in that city who received the cadet training has ever appeared before the police court. Wherever the military training has been instilled into the boys, the record shows, the boy has some pride, some manhood, that might not be his otherwise. To put it in another way, such a boy may not be all right, but he is a better fellow than he would have been without the training. And men in the service who indulge in liquor, as referred to by the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell), do not learn that in camp. I have no hesitation in making that statement. It has not been my experience to see that sort of thing carried on. If it is carried on, the officers who are in charge or responsible are unfit to wear the uniform of the corps to which they belong. As to the evil influences of camp life, I have never seen them. One would hear more improper language on the street corner of any country village than he hears in camp. There are more improper influences in the low bars of cities and towns than are to be found in all the camps of the Dominion. I have not observed these low influences in connection with the militia camps, and wherever such have existed it is because of men brought out by some careless captain to fill up his ranks at the last moment; and all that will be remedied, if it is possible to remedy it, at an early day.

Now the hon. member for Carleton, N.B. (Mr. Carvell) said something about the shooting. I am sorry I cannot agree with him about the pay. I would like to see them all paid good high wages. But the city corps of this country, and they are nearly as well set up as the country boys, give their time year after year drawing no money for it whatever; in other words, they put the money in the regimental fund and spend it on a field day or two during the year; but not a man of them draws a dollar for his own personal use throughout the year. It is my hope in a few years to see that carried out with the entire militia of the country. Now with regard to the shooting. The infantry and the cavalry are trained to shoot with a rifle. The artillery get their allowance for gun practice and it goes to the battery. But I agree with my hon. friend, I have never liked this provision of the pay. This year we are giving them 75 cents straight pay, instead of the 50 cents which was divided up for a number of things. My desire was to make it a straight pay of 75 cents a day, and let it go at that. That was my own personal desire, but others have thought differently. 75 cents a day with rations is not a bad pay for a young fellow who puts in a week or two.

Mr. NESBITT. On whose recommendation is the efficiency pay paid?

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). That is paid on the test for shooting, it is on the record made at the target.

Mr. CARVELL. I never understood that any efficiency pay reached the members of an artillery corps on account of shooting. If there is, it is something I never heard of before.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). It goes to the battery, and it is divided up among them.

Mr. CARVELL. It must be a late regulation.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). I don't know anything about that, it goes to the battery. I do not know whether it is divided up among the men or used for general purposes, but it is their own money, and they spend it as they choose. Now as to the Petawawa camp. The only large training area in the Dominion of Canada now is the Petawawa camp. Troops from all over the Dominion are brought there at great expense for training. It is our intention to have in every military division a similar training area, perhaps not so large, and we can pay for it. See what can be saved. Take the extra pay now spent in freight, and in bringing these men from their own distant province to Petawawa, and with that money we can fit a training area almost at a man's own door in every province, not only for selected corps, but for the entire troops, who may turn out for two or three days' manœuvers. Now I will come to my hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Macdonald), I have kept him for the last because, being my adviser, counsellor and friend, I will wind up with him. He has referred to the general policy of the cadet system. My idea is that the best way to create a militia is to train the youth of the country. I have absolute faith in a boy of ten, twelve and fifteen years of age, he is as capable of controlling himself, and in 999 cases out of 1,000, does control himself as well as a man. Who has not seen boy scouts, little lads of 6, 8, 9 years of age conducting themselves like men? I saw in the city of Toronto last year young lads coming from the county of Waterloo 50 or 70 miles away, camping along the roadside at night, with no guides, not having their parents with them, and yet they were keeping themselves perfectly straight. They conducted themselves like perfect gentlemen while they were coming to camp, and returning from the camp. Don't be afraid to trust the boys, and you will never have reason to regret it. When young lads of this age have got a practical experience, they will never forget it. Look at the boys' camps conducted all over Canada by the various schools and colleges. There is hardly a school that has not a boys' club, there is hardly a church or Christian association that has not a boys' club. They go at their own expense for three or four days in camp, and the result is a splendid upbuilding of the manhood of these boys. Why should we be afraid to trust the boys going to these camps? There is no danger that they will not be well looked after. I can tell my hon. friend that from every province in this Dominion I have offers from teachers and clergymen, from the Young Men's Christian Associations, from the Salvation Army, asking me if they can be of any service in the camps, and offering to give their time freely in order to help the lads along. More than that, the Women's Christian Associations in many cases are taking the matter up and propose looking after these lads in their own localities. I have no fear whatever for these camps. I am satisfied that a boy who is trained to act on his own responsibility can be trusted.

Mr. CARVELL. The hon. gentleman mentions offers that come from all these sources, are they for the purpose of encouraging the minister in the course he is taking, or is it because they are afraid of the consequences and are trying to minimize them as much as possible?

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). The men of the Young Men's Christian Association who are taking this matter up have only the desire to build up the manhood of the boys. Take Mr. Gartshore, of Toronto, take Colonel Langton, who have waited upon us and said, Your movement is the greatest thing that ever struck this country. One gentleman representing the cadet corps of a city in Quebec came to me and said: Will you give me a marquee to go into camp, I want to be out with my boys, I want to keep the boys from my school under my own eyes. I said, yes, I will give you a marquee. The Y.M.C.A. leaders have told me: We have 20 trained expert physical instructors, which we will add to your military instructors, and it will not cost you a cent. They are interested in the upbuilding of the youth. They do not go through the world fearing to trust the boys and fearing to trust the girls.

Mr. NESBITT. As I understand the minister, it is not his purpose to mix the cadet corps with the ordinary militia. May I ask him then under whose control the cadet corps will be?

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). There will be officers appointed especially to look after them.

Mr. NESBITT. Will they have their own instructors?

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). So far as possible. As I have said, we have already offers from Y.M.C.A.'s of Canada of 20 permanent instructors, and we have offers of assistance from the various schools and colleges of instructors for the cadet corps.

Mr. NESBITT. The instructor who has been with the boys at school knows them better and is more capable, if he is a capable instructor, of taking charge of them than any person else.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). That is right.

Mr. NESBITT. I have been a very warm supporter all my life of this cadet corps movement. But, I would warn the minister against making it a militant movement as some of the parents might object to their children taking part in a militia movement who would not object to them being members of a cadet corps in connection with a school. It gives the boys a fine training and many of them become excellent militia officers in after life. As far as the cadet corps at home is concerned, the instructor there is a most capable man and it is a very great satisfaction not only to the city but to the surrounding country to observe the proficiency which these cadets display in drill. These boys are quite capable of going to camp if they are not mixed up with the regular militia. The Boy Scouts in our section of the country go off to camp with their instructor. He takes charge and generally the Y.M.C.A. sends somebody who assists him. If that policy is followed out I do not see what harm can come to these boys. I would not like to see militarism, or the expense of the militia increased in this country. I can tell the minister that most of the people are opposed to the militia expenditure increasing. I believe in bringing the militia into a condition of systematic service and I would support the minister in any movement he makes towards that end. At the same time I would advise him very strongly to keep a watchful eye on the expenditure. No matter what he may have to do let him keep the expenditure down. I see that the amount proposed to be expended for the training of the cadet corps is $130,000. This is not to provide pay for the individuals, but it is simply to pay their expenses, which is nothing but right. If camps are carefully surrounded with safeguards, if liquor of all kinds is kept out of them and if they are under the care of the instructors of the cadets who know the individuals, it appears to me that much good may come out of them. An important point in the training of a boy is to know something of his disposition and if this movement is watched carefully and not allowed to become too closely associated with militarism it ought to serve a good purpose.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). The line as laid down by my hon. friend from Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) is exactly the line that I purpose pursuing. Where there is a cadet corps, if there is any instructor, it may be one of the boys themselves, or it may be one of their teachers, that officer is going to be brought out if we can get him. Although there has been no attempt to specially organize it yet we have heard of hundreds and thousands of teachers and instructors of the very character that my hon. friend speaks of who would be ready to take part in these camps. I heartily agree with my hon. friend when he says that the only way to manage these boys is to trust them. Take a military camp—if they are positively forbidden in blood and thunder terms to use liquor with all sorts of penalties to be imposed upon them if they violate the law, the chances are that the spirit that is dominant in humanity will find vent and it simply comes down to this that the more you attempt to repress them the more liable they are to break out. I could point to camps where men have been informed that liquor could be obtained in the town adjoining, but their attention was drawn to the fact that it could not be conceived to be possible that any young gentleman wearing the uniform of a British soldier and coming out of a decent home would be found hanging around such a place as a saloon. I could point to a camp where, out of 3,000 or 3,500 men only two were found to be drunk during the twelve days.

Mr. NESBITT. That largely depends on the officers in immediate touch with the men.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). Certainly. My hon. friend spoke also of the boy scouts going to camp. If those camps can be carried out successfully this plan can also be carried out without any trouble. As to cutting down expenses, I might explain that we will drill over 100,000 men and boys. If my hon. friend will notice the militia statement, he will see that the expenses have been pretty well cut down, and I can assure the committee that the country will get a dollar's worth for every dollar that is voted, so long as I have any responsibility in connection with this matter. I might point out to my hon. friend that if we go on with these cadet camps, in three or four years we will have a large number of young men of from 14 to 16 years of age, who will be available for the militia. It should not be forgotten that the battle of Alma was won by boys under 17 years of age, that there were many boys in the squares at Waterloo, that Wolfe was a young man when he captured Quebec, and that Washington was a young man when he led the army across the Alleghennies. So that, it is evident that a man does not have to be very old, in order to make a good soldier. Those who are trained young, will learn quickly, and they will keep hold of what they have learned. These boys, in three or four years, will be able to take their places in the ranks of the militia. With these camp areas, the boys, in place of going out for a Thanksgiving holiday, would be only too glad, having their expenses paid, to go out for four or five days and manoeuvre over an area of ten or twelve square miles. In that way, they would learn more in a day than they would in six or eight weeks of hay-foot, straw-foot drill in the ordinary militia camp. My hon. friend from Oxford, said that he would endorse the proposal that these men should not have any connection with the militia. I propose to introduce a Bill to-morrow to prevent that very thing. At the present time, under the law, these cadets may be brought out, but they must be brought out in connection with the active militia. I do not want that at all. I have very great respect for the active militia, but I want the boys to be brought out under a different method, so that, instead of being brought into camp and placed alongside of these men, some of whom have not the habits which we would like them to have, they shall go into camp apart from the active militia.

Mr. KAY. Would the minister state what part of this additional four days' training will be devoted to target practice, and also whether the men will have to qualify in shooting to earn efficiency pay?

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). I think this efficiency pay is for shooting. As to the additional four days' training, we will follow whatever syllabus is laid down by the officer in command of the camp.

Mr. KAY. The reason I asked the question was, that hitherto the militia man has been taken into camp for twelve days' training. He was required to qualify to get a high average at the butts in shooting before he could get his efficiency pay. He was only allowed one day's shooting at the butts. I maintain that it is very unfair to expect a man to learn to shoot accurately without giving him a chance to practise.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). Quite right.

Mr. KAY. For that reason there has been a good deal of dissatisfaction and a great deal of dishonesty practised at the ranges.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). That is right.

Mr. KAY. I would be very sorry to see the efficiency pay dependent on a man's being able to shoot well.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). I agree with the hon. gentleman (Mr. Kay), and I have objected in toto to the efficiency pay being given in the way it has been given. But, a great change has been made. What we have done to meet the views of my hon. friend (Mr. Kay) is this: Every soldier must take his aiming drill, then he must take his sub-target or practice with a miniature rifle, then he is permitted to fire once or twice or thrice in practice. I established that rule two years ago in my own camp, and I find that it now obtains all over the country. Under the present system, with two or three days' practice, nearly every boy can qualify for his efficiency pay. I think the experience last year was that the efficiency pay was honestly obtained and the shooting was fine. Under the former system the poor lads were brought into camp, a rifle was put in their hands, and, although perhaps they had never pulled a trigger before, they were told they had to make so many bullseyes out of so many shots or they would not get efficiency pay. The lads had no chance of getting efficiency pay under that system. That has been changed in the last two years, and I am satisfied that this year will see greater opportunities for the boys to practice before they are counted out of their efficiency pay.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew). Would the minister please inform me what arms of the militia service will train at Petawawa during the coming year Will there be any infantry corps trained there?

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). The Petawawa camp is largely for the permanent force and artillery and cavalry. I have not looked into the details, which I leave to the officers in charge, but I believe the intention is to bring as many of the artillery and cavalry and permanent corps there as possible.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew). Does the Minister of Militia not think that it would be advisable to have every branch in the service trained there, so that the infantry corps when they are not being drilled themselves could see the different other branches of the service in training?

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). I think that would be advisable.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew). I would submit that for the consideration of the Minister of Militia.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). The view of my hon. friend (Mr. White) may possibly be carried out. It is the intention, in the case of the infantry from this district, to send them to Petawawa, but to bring them from all over the country would involve tremendous expense. There is no doubt great advantage in having all the different arms of the service in training together so that they may get an idea of what the conditions would be in active service.

Mr. CARVELL. Is the time occupied in travelling to and from camp included in the sixteen days' training?

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). The intention is that sixteen days shall be put in in camp.

Mr. CARVELL. The travelling would be extra?

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). Yes.

Mr. CARVELL. I cannot agree that it is good policy to take an artillery corps all the way from the maritime provinces to Petawawa.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). I don't think so either.

Mr. CARVELL. I think that is an error of judgment.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). I agree exactly on that; I don't want them to go.

Mr. CARVELL. Does the hon. gentleman realize what it means to take sixty or sixty-five horses and a hundred men, and all the equipment of a field battery nearly one thousand miles to a camp of instruction? Perhaps the battery with which I was once connected would like the jaunt, but the owners of the best horses would certainly not allow them to be transported to Petawawa unless the minister supplied palace horse cars.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). Nothing is too good for Woodstock.

Mr. CARVELL. I do not think you can get the efficient training unless you have the four main branches of the service: engineers, artillery, cavalry, and infantry in a camp.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). Don't you want the medical corps?

Mr. CARVELL. If all our militia men were the saints the minister thinks they are they would not require a medical man, but I think the services of the medical corps would be necessary in most camps. Why is it that the minister does not give the infantry the extra four days training, the same as the other branches of the service? I believe that the infantry would learn more in the additional four days than they would in the other nine. There must be a reason for that.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). There is no special reason except economy, and the fact that in the days before my hon. friend (Mr. Carvell), graced the militia with his presence in it, they used to go to camp for sixteen days, and it was found to be a failure. When, this year, it was proposed that the infantry should go to camp for sixteen days, the men in many localities raised objections, and as in the past we had got along with twelve days training, I thought I would not force it on the infantry for this year, and besides, to be frank, I wanted to economize, so as to justify as far as possible the cadet corps expenditure.

Mr. CARVELL. The minister has not explained why it is necessary to spend twenty thousand dollars extra to take a portion of the permanent corps to Petawawa.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). It takes $140,000 or more to transport the troops to these camps.

Mr. CARVELL. It surely would not cost $20,000 extra to transport the permanent force.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). The Chief of the General Staff has laid out this plan in conformity with the wishes of my predecessor, and I have not altered it in the slightest. The troops are being brought from all over the country in order that they may get the benefit of being drilled in great masses over a large area. The transport from Halifax will cost $3,000, from Toronto $2,000, from Kingston $1,000, from St. John $1,000, from Winnipeg $5,000, and horses and baggage $4,700 more.

Mr. CARVELL. The minister's memorandum at the bottom of page 5 says:

> Soldiers who have trained the previous year will receive ten cents a day additional, and those who are found 'efficient' in the particular arm of the service to which they belong will receive fifteen cents day efficiency pay.

Will that apply only to men who were in camp the previous year, or will it apply also to men who were in camp two years before and for some reasonable cause were not able to attend last year?

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). The intention is that it will be only for the men who drilled in the immediately preceding year, the object being to encourage them to attend the drill successively from year to year.

Mr. CARVELL. Then I am afraid that the minister will find that many men will be trained under different names from their own.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). That will be watched.

Mr. CARVELL. Is the policy still to be followed of compelling the commanding officers to have their recruiting done five or six days before going to camp, or are they to be allowed to recruit at any time before going into camp? In some portions of the country I know that this has been not only a hardship, but a regular farce, because, especially in rural corps, there are many men who do not know until the last hour whether they can go to camp or not. If you compelled them to enlist at least six days before going to camp, there are thousands of men all over Canada of the very class that we want to train, who will not be able to give a decided answer within that time. The result will be that the commanding officers will sometimes sign for the full complement of men six days before they go to camp, inserting the names of John Jones or John Smith, and at the last moment taking such men as they can get.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). The list can now be filled to the day of going into camp. At one of the camps a couple of years ago one young officer came with about 60 men; another came with only 10 or 12 men. The latter, being asked why he had not more men, blamed the service roll and the small pay. The other man, on being asked how he got so many men, said he always carried his service roll in his pocket, and a couple of nights after he returned from camp he would have a dance, and any one who enrolled in the militia was allowed to go there, and the young ladies were invited to come, and consequently he said every year he had four times the number of men required; he never failed to bring out a full company because he looked after the matter 365 days of the year.

Mr. MACDONALD. The hon. minister did not discuss to any great extent the question I ventured to raise in regard to the cadet corps. He has told us, on page 10 of his memorandum, that his system of military and physical training in the schools was first agreed upon under the provisions of the Strathcona Trust by the Militia Department and the Board of Education of the province of Nova Scotia in 1907. That system formed the nucleus of the system throughout the Dominion. Nova Scotia was the only province that had any teachers who were instructed and gave any instruction in the schools in 1907. Then came New Brunswick in 1910, and the other provinces, I understand, have only come in last year. Even with them all coming in my hon. friend says:

> This year the courses in Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island and Ontario had to be materially reduced on account of lack of funds.

I presume that is because the funds of the Trust, supplemented by the grants of the provinces, are insufficient to enable these schools to be operated. If that is so, has the Board of the Strathcona Trust or has Lord Strathcona himself, any judgment with regard to the matter, or consented to any portion of the funds of the Trust being used to enable the schools to go to camp? If the scheme is a good one, it would appear to me that it would have been better for the minister first to have seen that an ample number of instructors were supplied to all the schools rather than to make what seems to be a doubtful experiment in taking the boys and girls to camp.

Then I would like the minister to tell me where the camps, which he proposes to inaugurate, are to be held. He said in a general way that they would be held in every county. My hon. friend will see that by a vote such as is proposed here, he cannot furnish sufficient facilities to hold the camp in every county in the Dominion in which these cadet corps may be. I would like him to give me full details in regard to all these matters.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). The hon. member will recollect that the estimates were not passed last year until very late, and that is the reason there were no funds available for carrying on the work, as referred to in the paragraph which he has read. The Strathcona Trust itself exercises no control, and does not attempt to exercise any, over the young lads throughout the country.

Mr. MACDONALD. Except to this extent, that the money is granted to that trust on certain conditions.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). It is all done through the provincial institutions——

Mr. MACDONALD. Under a special agreement made with each province which sets out the details.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). It is done by the executive councils for the Strathcona Trust of Canada, through the Militia Council of the Militia Department, in conjunction with the Minister of Education in each province.

Mr. MACDONALD. Does not the department seek the consent of the Minister of Education in each province to the proposition?

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). Why should that consent be asked? We do not ask the consent of the provincial authorities when we are calling out the men for the militia camps. This is a federal government.

Mr. MACDONALD. But my hon. friend misapprehends the situation. There exists in certain provinces of the Dominion —to a greater extent in some, and to a lesser extent in others—a system of instruction along military lines in schools, which is the result of the agreement that has been arrived at between the trustees of a trust inaugurated by Lord Strathcona and the various provincial governments. I have under my hands a form of agreement with one of the provinces which sets out in detail how this instruction is to be carried on. One of the stipulations in regard to the expenditure of money is, that 50 per cent be devoted to looking after the physical training of the boys. A certain proportion only is to be devoted to military training, and another portion to rifle snooting. Now that is the basis upon which this whole system of military instruction in the schools and amongst the cadets of the country has been built up.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). Oh, no, the cadet system existed in the country long before the Strathcona Trust was formed.

Mr. MACDONALD. I know that, but I am speaking of the cadet corps in Nova Scotia as recently formed under the Strathcona Trust. Now, I submit, the minister should not say that this vote to take boys from the public schools and send them to camp, is one in regard to which the opinion of the educational authorities in each province should not be had. I think my hon. friend should have taken the precaution of consulting with the provinces who are expending money in looking after the education of these teachers before he decided on this policy.

Take the agreement between Nova Scotia and the Strathcona Trust. The teachers, who are officials of the Nova Scotia government, come under that agreement. They receive certain special grants from the province as the result of their attending and receiving military instruction, and so on. Now my hon. friend the Minister of Militia steps in and says: We are going to spend $130,000 in taking the boys and girls of the public schools to camp.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). No, we are not taking the girls.

Mr. MACDONALD. You are taking the lady teachers.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). I am not aware of it.

Mr. MACDONALD. You said a little while ago that you were going to take the lady teachers to camp.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). I must have been misunderstood. I never heard of that before.

Mr. MACDONALD. I certainly did understand the minister to say that a short time ago. But if it is not his intention that the lady teachers should go to camp, we will eliminate that feature from the discussion. My hon. friend then is proposing to take the boys from the public schools of the country.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). The boys in the schools or out of the schools—every boy who wishes to come, in proportion to the number from each district, whether he does or does not attend school, whether he belongs to a regular cadet corps or does not.

Mr. MACDONALD. I question very much the wisdom of the minister's policy. He is departing from the well considered lines as laid down in the settlement which was, I think, agreed to by each one of the provinces in the Dominion this last year on the basis of this Strathcona Trust.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). Not at all.

Mr. MACDONALD. My hon. friend proposes to disregard it.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). Not at all.

Mr. MACDONALD. The minister says he is going to take cadets to camp no matter whether it conflicts with the idea of the Strathcona Trust or not.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). Not at all.

Mr. MACDONALD. I submit that the Strathcona Trust proposition is one which was well considered, it has received the approval of each of the provincial governments, and the minister should follow the lines of that trust and carry out that policy. If he does so I am satisfied that the results which he discussed so eloquently which would follow from giving the advantage of a military training to the young of the country would accrue to a very much greater extent than if he follows other lines without regard to that trust.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). We are not departing in the slightest from the Strathcona Trust.

Mr. MACDONALD. You are ignoring it.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). Not in the slightest, any more than we are ignoring any organization in the country over which we have no control. As a matter of fact the hon. member will be called upon I trust in a very short time to discuss the Strathcona Trust Cadet movement. This is a very different movement entirely. That is a matter in connection with the schools to which we are giving assistance in every way. We are giving our encouragement and the very best instructors we can get, just the same as with the military schools of the country. the hon. gentleman would be just as much justified in saying we were running counter to the military schools by having these camps of instruction. The two go hand-in-hand, in their proper spheres, and we are not interfering with them. If this were to be called the Boy Scout movement where would my hon. friend be?

Mr. MACDONALD. Are you taking the Boy Scouts into camp?

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). 'A rose by any other name would smell as sweet.' You can call them junior militia if you like, call them anything, but I prefer to use the term which has been attached to this scout movement from time immemorial, long before the Stratchcona Trust was formed. It is a magnificent institution, which is not surpassed in any country in the world, and we are endorsing it to the fullest extent in our Militia policy.

Mr. MACDONALD. You are not asking the provincial authorities anything about this question.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). We do not consult the provincial authorities about the military camps, why should we do so in this case.

Mr. MACDONALD. But you have the cadet corps by reason of your agreement with the provincial authorities.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). Not at all. These are not cadet corps, that is where the hon. member makes a mistake.

Mr. MACDONALD. Look at the agreement with the provincial government and you will find it.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). The hon. member is opposing this regularly organized cadet corps movement which will take the boys from localities where regularly organized cadet corps were never heard of, and where the Strathcona Trust has not yet reached. I hope the hon. member will see that. I know he wants to be fair and if by my explanations I can make the matter clear to him I will be very glad to do it. There are many sections of the country where young men do not go to school at all. These lads, between the ages prescribed, will be permitted to go to camp in proportion to the number volunteering from the district. I think we will see that point clearly. These are places where neither the cadet corps nor the Strathcona Trust exists, but if a boy happens to have been trained under the Strathcona Trust that will not prevent his coming to camp as a militiaman. We have in the ranks of our militiamen many young men who have been trained as cadets and they are among the best volunteers that we have.

Mr. MACDONALD. In view of the position the Minister is taking I will quote from the agreement made between the Strathcona Trust and the province of Nova Scotia to the following effect:

The Militia Department will draft a syllabus of the work required to be done by a school or college cadet corps in order to entitle a teacher to the annual bonus, and will conduct the necessary examinations. Until cadet corps possess in their officers qualified instructors, this work of instruction will be carried out by instructors detailed by the Militia Department, so far as practicable.

Now I say that in my province the cadet corps owe their existence very largely, if not exclusively, to the work that was done under the Strathcona Trust.

I know that there are cadet corps in other provinces which existed before the Strathcona Trust was organized. And when I say to my hon. friend that he should have consulted the provincial authorities that had to do with these questions before he decided to take the cadet corps, which are chiefly in the public schools, he will say that there are other cadet corps. I know there are. But I say that, as regards those provinces, where the cadet corps have been developed as the result of the Strathcona Trust, under an agreement similar to that I have in my hand, it was a serious thing for the minister to act without consultation with the provincial authorities in regard to this innovation, which he is introducing. If this movement is a good one, he might have made it a concerted movement and one that will not interfere with, but will enhance the value of the Strathcona Trust. His failure to do this may result in some provinces in danger of injury to what has been brought about by the Strathcona Trust.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). The hon. gentleman (Mr. Macdonald), insists on confusing the two things. The Strathcona Trust has nothing to do with that which is now before us. We are paying thousands and tens of thousands for instructors to train these teachers. But that is to assist the provinces. We are not calling upon the provinces to assist us in this. These are two distinct movements. You might properly call these organizations, scouts, or young engineers, or anything else. But the name 'cadet,' has been attached to these organizations of boys, and we have held to the name. But I do not see how the hon. member cannot see that there is no conflict whatever.

Mr. BELAND. I share the views of my hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) in regard to the advisability of providing such an amount of $130,000 for the training of youths in camps during the summer. I understand that boys will be recruited for this training between the ages of twelve and sixteen. I quite understand that the minister is guided by his zeal and boundless enthusiasm in military organization. But I think this scheme is objectionable on many grounds, moral, economic and other. I do not object to providing substantial and sufficient sums for defence, either military or naval; I have given ample proof of that in the past. But I think that now the hon. minister is overdoing the thing. For myself, while taking the classical course in college, I received some military instruction from an instructor who used to come there. But I cannot refrain from saying that we should pause, we should stop and think, before launching upon this new project. This is a new departure, and I am not very sure that it is a wise one. It means this year an expenditure of $130,000. That may be a small amount relatively to the whole, but it will grow larger and larger every year. We are spending now $8,000,000 a year for our militia. The hon. member for South York (Mr. Maclean) the other day said that we might offer $10,000,000 as a contribution to the British navy and also organize a Canadian navy, which would probably involve an expenditure of $5,000,000 more—say $15,000,000 for the navy and $8,000,000 for the militia. And this for a country that claims not to be a militarist country. And the minister states that we are training to-day about 60,000 men. That is quite a number for a country with a population of about 7,000,000. Apply the same proportion to countries with populations of sixty to eighty millions, and it would be a huge amount of training annually. The same principles do not apply to European countries that apply to Canada. We are not a militarist country. I really take very strong objection to training in camp youths of from twelve to fifteen years of age. I would very humbly suggest to the minister that he should allow this thing to stand for a year. Then, if he wishes, let him come back with the item next year and we will discuss it. In the meantime, we can see what the provincial authorities think of it and learn the feelings of the country generally. I think this is a fair proposition to make to the hon. minister. It seems to me that we are marching very fast in the direction of militarism. I urge the minister not to be carried away by his zeal and enthusiasm.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). I am much surprised to hear the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Beland) speak as he has done considering the training he received as a cadet. But I realize that his words of to-day have not the ring of sincerity that usually characterizes his utterances, but he is only endeavouring to assist the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) out of the unfortunate dilemma into which he has got himself by confusing the cadet organization, which is largely a matter of physical drill and is under the control of the provinces, with the cadet organization which is intended, I have no hesitation in saying, to do away largely with the system of training the military as now carried on in this country. Let me point out at the outset that nobody will be allowed to go into camp under this system unless he has the written authority of his parents. Therefore, if my hon. friend has doubts as to the propriety of his children going into one of these camps, those children will be left at home. The system is purely voluntary. There is no ground for the dread with which the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) and the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Beland) regard these boys going into camp, because those camps will be conducted under proper conditions. The manhood of any country is built up by trust and not by restraint, not by keeping men in swaddling clothes or tied to apron strings Search the record of all lands and you always find that the boys who have become the real men of the country are those who have been trusted in their youth. I have yet to see the boy or youth who was fully trusted betray the trust reposed in him Our estimates are growing. But my hon friend from Beauce (Mr. Beland) sat here anticipating a position as minister of the Crown for a good many years, and saw the military estimates growing year by year, yet found no reason to stand up and, with lowering countenance, object to the increase. I have reduced the military estimates this year. And, taking out the items on capital account, the military estimates, considering the number of troops trained and the work done, are almost infinitely lower than they have been in the past five years. Yet now, for the first time, the hon. member grows apprehensive. But I know he is not very serious. I trust to have him take part in the camps this summer. Let him become a scout leader and lead his boys along the road to the camp. Let him look after his boys, and I am satisfied he will be much more favourable to the training of these boys in camp.

Let us instruct boys in a military education, the same as we instruct them in reading, writing and arithmetic. Do it when they are young, you cannot do it when they are old. I challenge all the military men in the country to show me one proficient military man who did not receive a military training in his boyhood. I am satisfied that the hon. gentleman himself, when he goes back home, will undertake to form a cadet corps in his neighbourhood.

Mr. MACDONALD. My hon. friend's versatility is so amusing that, as the proposition was not a serious one, you could hardly understand him discussing it in the way he does. I wish to register my protest against the proposition that we should vote $130,000 for the purpose of establishing cadet camps in this country, in utter disregard of the provisions of the Strathcona fund, and the efforts the trustees of that fund have made and the arrangements they have made with provincial governments. My hon. friend, in his memorandum, under the heading of the cadet corps, has gone into the thing very fully on pages 7 and 11. He shows that the cadet corps are the product of the schools under which the Strathcona Trust are expending the money. I say the minister is displaying a lack of care, and is imperilling the whole system that has been built up by the Strathcona fund.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). The Strathcona trust has nothing whatever to do with the cadet system. The Strathcona trustees work altogether with the schools. The two are entirely distinct.

Mr. KAY. The minister said a few moments ago that the infantry men had objected to the four days additional training.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). Some of them.

Mr. KAY. May I ask if the cavalry men were anixous for the four days additional?

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). Most of the infantry reports say they are in favour of 16 days; so are the officers of the cavalry association. We have not heard from the rank and file yet.

Mr. KAY. It appears to me that this four days additional will mean a large decrease in the number of men who are willing to go out and be trained, it will also mean a great difficulty in getting officers. An officer's holidays, if he is in business, are only about two weeks. At present he is giving all his holidays to the militia service, and I do not think it will be possible for him to give to that service any more than the two weeks he is now given as holidays. As to the rank and file, they are drawn from among the farmers' sons. They are assembled between the 15th and the end of June, when work is comparatively slack. I do not think it will be possible to get them to give up three weeks of their time, because haying usually commences about that time.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). The views of the hon. gentleman are my own views. In the old time I filled in 16 days in camp. But my predecessor and the officers of the force have been petitioning for this, the Cavalry Association and the Artillery Association have asked for it, and it was all cut and dried, I believe, nearly a year ago, that this should be done. I did not wish to step in and, with a wave of the hand, to cancel the arrangement, and run counter to the wishes of the department. Therefore, I let it go so far as the cavalry and artillery are concerned, because they seemed to want it. We will try it for one year. But it is not too late to change it yet.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer). Before this item passes, I would like to put myself on record as being in sympathy with the words of apprehension which have been spoken by the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Beland). I am afraid, however, that anything I may say on this question will fall on unsympathetic ears in the person of my hon. friend the Minister of Militia (Mr. Hughes). Of course, it is natural that I should view things a little differently from him on this question, because, as he has pointed out, in a measure truthfully, an early training has a great deal to do with one's future thinking and attitude upon public questions. I spent a great many years at the university learning to save life, if possible; my hon. friend's profession, when it is practised, has a contrary effect. Now, I am not so sure but that when men are in an emergency they would just about as soon go to a doctor as to my hon. friend. It is one of the peculiarities of human life, one of the mysteries of the world, that when people go out and kill one another, they take means for restoring them in case they have not performed the operation successfully which they undertook when they went out to the field of battle. That is one of the peculiarities of the world, which I think is leading a large portion of the inhabitants of this country to look upon it with a little less enthusiasm than burns in the martial bosom of my hon. friend. I am not sure that the public of Canada do not sympathize more with me upon that question than with my hon. friend. In regard to these cadet corps, I am not sure that my hon. friend is historically correct. He knows much more about military matters than I do, and I think he challenged the House to produce cases of men becoming good soldiers who had not been trained in their youth. If he deigns to look at this point again, I would like him to tell me where Cromwell's army learned their soldiering. They were not trained soldiers, they had to meet trained soldiers, and in the end they succeeded better than the regularly trained men of the day. In Canada we have a number of men in the western provinces who use their guns, not in shooting one another, but who are good marksmen; and I am certain that without any cadet training, or without going into camps, numbers of these men, if occasion arose, would give a splendid account of themselves although they have not undergone this regular drill. There are cases in history of volunteers having proved better than regularly trained men. I think my hon. friend does not carry me on that point.

We have a great deal to do in this great country with a very small population. I view with apprehension the extreme enthusiasm of my hon. friend. His enthusiasm is leading to some good work in this way that he is devoting himself, with that tremendous energy of his, to his department, and he has been very courteous in sending out to us, along the line of the work that he is engaged in, full information in a way which is most commendable. I can only wish that he would devote his enthusiasm to saving men's lives instead of destroying them. Of course, that is the fault of my early training. I do not think that the business of killing has taken hold of the Canadian people as it has of many of the nations of Europe and as it seems to have taken hold of my hon. friend. I am certain that there is a large sympathy with this line of thought. This seems an enormous sum of money—over 8 million dollars. I am going to anticipate a possible answer that has already been made. I must say as something of a party politician that I rose with some reluctance because I anticipated what the minister said in reply to another hon. member that there was not much protest in regard to the mounting militia expenditure during the time of the last government. But, that is not a fair criticism to apply to this cadet movement because this is a new thing. The appeal of my hon. friend from Beauce (Mr. Beland) is well worthy of consideration that we should go very carefully in this matter.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). The hon. gentleman has spent his life in saving people.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer). I said I went to the university to learn how.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). Most of us avoid the doctors; in fact, doctor's mistakes are always buried six feet underground and lawyer's six feet over ground. The hon. member referred to Cromwell's army. Now every man in Cromwell's army was skilled in the use of the quarter-staff. These young men were not only experienced musketeers but they were skilled in the use of the quarter-staff which became the sabre and the spear and that is the reason why the rank and file, achieved their victory over the cavaliers. The hon. gentleman speaks of western men. There is not a man in the west but has been trained to the saddle and trained to shoot, almost from the time of his birth. They are born cadets and that is the kind of knowledge that I am trying to inculcate here.

PRIVATE BILLS.

CONTINENTAL CAN COMPANY.

Further consideration in Committee of the Whole of Bill (No. 119), respecting certain patents of the Continental Can Company.—Mr. Fripp.

Mr. CARVELL. Yesterday, the Prime Minister himself asked that this Bill should stand for some reason, and in his absence now, it would be well to allow it to stand further until the right hon. gentleman can give his views upon it.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer).

Mr. FRIPP. The Prime Minister has no objection to this Bill, so far as I know. It stood because I was not here at the moment.

Mr. CARVELL. The reason given by the Prime Minister was that the Bill was objectionable in some respects, and he thought it should stand. I have no objection in opposing the Bill except that I think its principle is bad if not vicious, and I think the request of the Prime Minister should be complied with and the Bill allowed to stand.

SUPPLY.

House in Committee of Supply.

Militia and Defence—annual drill, $1,730,000.

Mr. G. BOYER (Vaudreuil) (Translation). Mr. Speaker, while addressing us this afternoon, the hon. minister said that his intention was to raise the soldiers' fee to .75 cents a day. I approve this measure for I know what difficulties are met with when taking in recruits as soldiers, every year, when camping time arrives. The insufficient indemnity paid until now has always been a sourse of annoyance which was very often a drawback in choosing desirable recruits from the different bodies. On the other hand, I notice that the hon. minister did not mention if the allocation was also to be increased for the horses. Presently, at the time of camping, the hiring price of a horse is $1 a day. Then the hon. minister knows as well as do the superior officers how hard it is for us to procure cavalry horses. Any way, the department knows all about this matter. The difficulty is still greater in the case of cities. It is acknowledged that the cavalry regiments of the cities can hardly reach the camps with their effective force. It is easier to find horses in the country, if the time for camping is before hay making time. But, if for some reason the drilling time is somewhat delayed, these difficulties become almost insurmountable, unless provided for with an augmentation as it was done at the time of the tercentenary feasts at Quebec when the indemnity was raised from $1 to $2. The existing indemnity rate of $1 is not inducing the farmers to hire their best horses when these are so much exposed to accidents of all kinds owing to bad weather and transportation. Should the pay be more liberal, the value of the horses would be superior and the soldiers' services more effective. Besides that, there are the indemnities in the case of accidents or wounds which do not cover the loss of the animal. There lies the clue to the greater difficulties that we have to meet with in the country when we want to hire good horses, and, that accounts for the fact that we often are supplied with a quality of horses far inferior to the real cavalry horses. Owing to these reasons, I would not be opposed to indemnity rate being raised by the hon. minister to $1.25 or even $1.50 a day. In certain localities of the country, it may be easier to secure cavalry horses for the present indemnity rate; but, in the part where I have the honour to command a cavalry squadron, it is not so. I again say that it would be a good policy on the part of the hon. minister to make the augmentation that I propose and that has anyhow been suggested by many others.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria, Ont.). I fully appreciate all that the hon. gentleman has said in regard to the small sum paid for horses taken by the young men to camp. They have to be exposed to all kinds of weather and to other unfavourable conditions; but year by year there is an improvement in the class of horses, and we hope that next year we shall be able materially to assist our friends all along the line. What my hon. friend says about the value of the horses taken to camp is true, and to meet that the department has raised the indemnity for a horse that is lost or injured from $125 to $175. The department is always ready to deal generously in the case of horses injured or killed in camp. The remarks which the hon. gentleman has made meet my hearty approval, and the matter will receive the consideration of the department.

Mr. BOYER. Mr. Speaker, the military regulations do not permit to enlist recruits under 18 years of age. Nevertheless, we have in the country strong young men under 18 years who are well built and would be splendid cavaliers. Last year, when I had to enlist cavaliers for the squadron which I command, I experienced some difficulty to find young men of 18 years and more because the majority of those whose age is in conformity with the regulations are busy on the farm. It would have been possible to fill in the number needed for the squadron with young men under 18 who are well developed, robust lads; for, after all, our aim is chiefly to get good cavaliers, and the young folks in the country commence very young to go on horseback. It is a sport for youngsters. The enlisting work would be far easier if we had the liberty to select our recruits among the oldest cadets, and even besides them, amongst the young men whose physical qualities, in the matter of development would make them suitable. I consider that the department should give the commanding officers of force more latitude as regards the field of action.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). The hon. member has referred to the fact that it is difficult at certain seasons of the year to recruit from men over the age of eighteen, and he has pointed out that to which I made reference this afternoon, that the young soldier is very often the best soldier. It has been my custom never to ask a young man his age, so long as he was large enough and manly enough to fill the uniform. On one occasion a young man who was a non-commissioned officer in charge of an outpost, was brought before his commanding officer, who asked him, 'how old are you?' 'Do you mean my official age, or my real age?' he asked, and he gave both. His official age was 21, his real age 17. When I commanded a regiment, my custom was to have a large contingent of young men in the service. At Rigaud college, my hon. friend has a very excellent cadet corps, and if he can make satisfactory arrangements to ensure that these young men will be looked after, I have no doubt that he can get a splendid lot of recruits from them.

Mr. BOYER. Does the hon. minister mean to say that we could ignore the regulation which exists to-day concerning the recruiting of young men which I have just spoken of?

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). I am only making suggestions, not laying down the law.

Mr. CARVELL. The minister says the department has always been very generous in paying claims for injuries to horses. My experience has been quite the reverse, and I hope he will take some trouble to look into the manner in which the department has been paying for damages to horses in the past. I think he will find that not only has the patience of the owner been exhausted before he has been paid, but he has spent about half the amount the department has allowed him, before he has got it. I believe there is no matter coming before the Department of Militia and Defence, in which there is as much negligence as there is in paying these claims.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). The matter has been up, and I am informed by the officers of the department, that in the great majority of such cases, under my predecessor, the claims have been settled before the troops left camp. Even where the injury is only apparent, the claim is settled in the most expeditious manner. Since I assumed office I have closed up several cases, and in every instance, the officers of the department were most anxious first to get at the facts and then to do ample justice to the man whose horse was concerned.

Mr. CARVELL. The fault is not in the district officers. It is quite true that when a horse is injured in camp there is always a board of inquiry, which makes a finding, but that finding is not carried out for months, or sometimes years. I do not want to name officials who have been derelict in their duty in this matter, but I can give the minister facts that are within my knowledge, of what has taken place within the last two years, and I can give him the names if necessary.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). A great many men in the volunteer force throughout the country think that they have no means of communicating with the department, or with their member of parliament. When the militia law was being passed, I took the ground that it should be made clear and distinct that every man who became a volunteer loses no right which he possesses as a citizen. While in camp or on duty he is subject to the King's Regulations and to the Army Act; but at other times he is as free as any other citizen. Therefore, there is nothing to prevent him communicating with a member of parliament or unofficially direct with myself, and if any communication of this kind is received by me, the district officer will be called on at once to make an explanation why the matter has not been attended to.

Mr. MACDONALD. Without going through the official channels?

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). There is no need of that. This country would be worse than Russia if a volunteer could not communicate with his member of parliament or with the minister direct.

Mr. MACDONALD. What about discipline?

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). What right has an officer of a company to control the men of his company during the 350 days of the year that they are not under him in camp? That would be the worst sort of tyranny. A private can take any action against his officer, provided he is not on duty or in uniform, and the only recourse the officer would have against him would be in the civil courts of the country.

Mr. MACDONALD. That is a new theory.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). It is not a new theory. It is the militia law of England, which has been in force for many generations. The citizen loses no privilege by becoming a volunteer. While on duty, of course, he does, but during any other hour of the year he is a free man.

The army officers on the British militia list were not free, they were subject to the King's Regulations and the Army Act throughout the year, because the great majority of them had served in the regular army, and were receiving allowances on that account; but the men of the militia force in England were never subject to the King's Regulations, and the Army Act except when on duty.

Mr. ROBB. This afternoon the minister made the statement that from his experience only those who received a military training in their teens made good soldiers. Now, the minister himself is a gallant soldier, he has given evidence of that in Canada and in Great Britain, and he is a fair man, and I ask him if he thinks his statement of this afternoon is not a little unfair to the farmers who in 1866 and 1870, left their ploughs and went out to take up arms to defend their country? Was his statement not a little unfair also to the men who accompanied him to South Africa and won honour and glory for Canada on the veldt.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). I fail to see any unfairness. I want to tell my hon. friend a thing which perhaps he did not know, that the men who turned out in 1866 and 1870, could pick off black squirrels on the top of a maple tree with a rifle when they were ten years of age. That is in harmony with the very statement I was making. These young farmers like the young men from the west, are trained along those lines and I want to train all the boys of the country in the same way so that when they take a rifle in their hands they will be able to pick a squirrel off a tree or a wood-chuck off a stone pile.

Mr. MACDONALD. I want to know whether my hon. friend's doctrine in regard to the rights of members of the force with respect to invoking the aid of the representative of their county in getting compensation when their horses have been killed or injured, is one which is confined merely to cases of that character, because a very dangerous line is drawn there. Does my hon. friend mean to say that if a question of discipline arises in a camp that the militia men affected must not go to the military authorities in the way as laid down in the military regulations, but must go to a member of parliament for his support, and that he can practically tell his superior officer that he does not need to pay any attention to him, but that he will get his member to bring the matter up in parliament? Surely the minister does not go that far?

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). I will say this much: If a soldier in camp loses his horse and the matter is reported upon by the board, the proper course has been followed, he will get justice. The case pointed out by the member for Carleton, which is I trust, a little overdrawn——

Mr. CARVELL. It is not overdrawn. I can tell the minister that I actually paid money out of my own pocket towards the settlement of these claims.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). In case a young man cannot get redress through the regular military channel, and in case red tape procedure would prevent him from taking proper action, I want to proclaim far and wide that when a young man doffs his uniform and returns to civilian life, he is a free man, and has a right to appeal to his member of parliament, or the Minister of Militia, or any other man he chooses, and there is no power under the law to say otherwise to him. Let my good friend, who is a lawyer, read up the law and he will admit that what I say is correct.

Mr. MACDONALD. The minister knows very well that there are a great many laws in the land which are more honoured in the breach than in the observance.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). But the law is clear.

Mr. MACDONALD. The minister knows that, and he knows very well the traditions that exist in the militia in this country. If the course suggested by the Minister of Militia to obtain a remedy is followed it will amount to a very grave breach of discipline. Because all that a man needs to do who has got a political pull is to tell his superior officer he can go hang. He can say that he will get his member to bring the matter up in the House and get after the officer. If the powers of the Militia Council, or whatever body has control of the militia of this country, are not adequate they ought to be made broader. The minister is really going too far.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). I am sorry not to have won my hon. friend's approval because I have been sitting up nights trying to do that. What I say is that if a young man fails to obtain redress, after the matter has been brought up in camp and has gone through the legitimate military channel——

Mr. MACDONALD. He must do that first.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). Certainly I have said so. In case he fails to get justice after having done that, I will give it to him. Justice is what we are most concerned with, that is what these young men want, and I will see that they get it.

Mr. CARVELL. The minister is now laying down a new law.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). No. Not a new law.

Mr. CARVELL. If a young man takes the matter up in a proper manner in camp and a board is convened and finds that the horse for which claim was brought is not injured, and the young man comes here—accompanied by the veterinary who said he was satisfied the horse was injured—will my hon. friend allow him to urge his claim through a political or business channel, or let it go back to the board?

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). I must correct my hon. friend. I am not a lawyer, although I have two distinguished lawyers questioning me at the present time, and I am much surprised to hear one of those lawyers admitting there is a law on the statute-book, while the other says that I am laying down a new law. I am not laying down a new law, the law is there on the statute-book of Canada.

Mr. CARVELL. A new interpretation of the law sometimes has the effect of a new law.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). There is no new interpretation. This has been the practice for many years and I cannot grasp the point of the hon. gentleman's argument about a political channel. I can assure him that if justice has been denied there no red tape will be allowed to stand in the way. If any new evidence can be adduced it will be brought before a new board which will settle the matter whether it goes through an official or non-official channel.

Mr. CARVELL. Then I understand the claimant will not get redress from the minister or through parliament, until the matter has been settled by the board.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). Not much.

Mr. ROBB. The minister is laying down the regulations. Suppose a horse takes the distemper in camp and when it returns home gives the distemper to other horses, have the owners any claim against the department?

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). I will refer the hon. gentleman to the legal lights on his own side.

Mr. KAY. I can support the statements of the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell) as to the delay in paying for horses that are injured. I know of several cases that occured in the last camp that were not settled for three or four months, in fact I had several applications made to me in that connection during the last election.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). Not before the election?

Mr. KAY. Yes.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). Then I can assure my hon. friend that it is a most serious reflection on my predecessor in office, a more serious reflection than I would make concerning him myself. I gave the department every credit for settling these claims expeditiously, and I am sorry to hear they were not.

Mr. HENDERSON. I certainly think there should be no red tape about the settlement of claims of this kind. In my part of the country the farmers freely loan their horses to the Missauga troop, and frequently the horses are returned injured and practically almost useless. I will cite a case which I think occurred about two years ago. A farmer lent his horse and it was returned to him injured. He made application for compensation through what he thought was the regular military channel, and was awarded $21, I believe. He was not satisfied with that and I think returned the cheque to the late Minister of Militia. I took the matter up with the department and it resulted in $130 being allowed for the horse. My recommendation in cases of that kind is to go direct to the department and get redress, because I find that the regular military channel for settling these claims does not seem to comprehend the value of a horse, or what the farmer is really entitled to. Besides I do not like the delays that occur in cases of the kind. My experience has been that the best thing is to go direct to the minister, and I have done so on different occasions.

And I would say for the former Minister of Militia that he was very fair; he did not hesitate to take the matter up himself and adjudicate upon it. Of course, I was particular to furnish him with statutory declarations and other evidence as to the facts. Then the award was made and the money paid. I think that is the proper way to proceed. When a farmer is good enough to loan his horse to a trooper and the horse is returned having caught the distemper and being made useless for the time, or injured, it is the duty of the government to give redress at once, so that next year when the troopers want to borrow horses they can get them. Otherwise the farmers will be very chary of allowing their horses to be used in this way. I trust a system will be adopted by which the farmers will not be put to extra trouble, but will get redress at once.

Mr. MACDONALD. I do not know whether it is under this vote that my hon. friend (Mr. Hughes, Victoria), made a purchase of automobiles. Some curious statements are made in regard to his action in making that purchase. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will be good enough to explain for what purpose he purchased these machines and whether they were bought by tender?

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). Any question the hon. member wishes to ask I shall only be too pleased to answer. I am not responsible for rumours. I have not time to read the papers, so know nothing of what the rumours are—and care less. I purchased twelve automobiles for the department. Our officers on their tours of inspection, travelling by train or stage, have to wait and often lose a great deal of time. They have to engage livery rigs to reach stations where they can take trains. We find that their time is more than five-sixths lost. We figured it up and had the advice of experts upon it. The cost of automobile travelling may be higher, by 50 per cent than the same work done by rail and stage, but we estimate that we shall do more than twice as much work. The world is going on and the department is not going to allow the little sentiment that is attempted to be created among farmers regarding automobiles to stand in the way of the effectiveness of its work. I hope our opponents will go on trying to arouse that sentiment, for the farmers appreciate automobiles, and many of them have them and know how they save time, which means money. So, the anxiety of certain gentlemen for the welfare of the farmers over these automobiles will be misplaced. We are going to do twice the work for half the money. As to the tendering, it is impossible to tender for automobiles.

Mr. MACDONALD. How much did they cost?

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). They cost $850 each, with extra tires and fittings.

Mr. MACDONALD. Does not the statute require you to call for tenders for a purchase so large?

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). Not at all. I consulted fifty different agents describing to each what I wanted. If I had taken the assurance of each of these as to the best machines, I should have had fifty different machines at the cost of, from $1,000, to $8,000. But I could only buy 12. I bought the machine that I knew personally and that was recommended by three separate agents of different companies, after I had explained the purpose for which we wanted them. They are the cheapest in the market and recognized the world over as being the best cheap, handy, strong machine. There are eighty thousand of them made every year. We can take these machines and throw them away at the end of the year and have money in our pockets for our purposes over buying expensive machines. We do not want to have our men travel in too great luxury, but we want to give them facilities for their work.

Mr. MACDONALD. Where are you going to use them?

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). The district officer in every district will have one for his own inspection work. Take the hon. gentleman's own county. Though that county is as well furnished with railways as any in the Dominion, I suppose, still if the officer has to visit Stellarton, Westville, Pictou, Trenton, New Glasgow, and must go by train or livery, he is sure to lose time. And in the ordinary county that is not so well served by railways, the officer will be able to save half his time.

Mr. MACDONALD. Do you employ chauffeurs?

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). At the present time the officer is entitled to a servant, and he will take the place.

Mr. CARVELL. All this sounds very nice coming from the Minister of Militia. He has been telling us many nice things this afternoon, and no one so far seems to have felt like telling him the truth. But the truth is that what the minister has just been saying is absolute nonsense at least so far as it applies to the province of New Brunswick. When the minister tells me that the inspecting officer in New Brunswick is going to save the cost of an automobile even if the cost is only $1,000 in one year or ten years, I tell him that he is talking simple nonsense, I have no milder words to use.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). I did not say that he would save the cost of an automobile in a year. I said we were going to save half the time——

Mr. CARVELL. The hon. gentleman is hedging now. But now, let me show him the position. In the first place, there is not a militia officer in Canada that works—I think I am safe in saying it—more than two hours a day, and I think that in putting it at that I am making a big allowance. They do not have the work to do. Take the militia officers of the Headquarters Staff, why they are walking over one another. They are busy renting more rooms to find places in which to stay.

Mr. EDWARDS. How long has that been going on??

Mr. CARVELL. Too long. For eight or nine years.

Mr. EDWARDS. It is the first time you have mentioned it.

Mr. CARVELL. It may be. It is not the first time I have thought of it.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. CARVELL. My hon. friends mav laugh. But I want to tell them that they will realize the position we have been in, sitting behind this general staff for the last six or eight years. They will be as sick of it as we are. We have had our fill and plenty of this general staff. I want to tell the hon. minister again that there is not a militia officer in Canada who does inspecting work, who works more than two months out of the year at the business. A man can start out on inspection work in New Brunswick—and I know what I am talking about—and taking the regular conveyances, he can inspect every regimental and company armoury in the province and he could not find two months work in it. More than that, he cannot find opportunity to use his automobile for more than two months out of the year. This is simply a means of increasing the perquisites of the general staff and district officers in different parts of the country. I have not criticised the minister severely so far. But when he gets up and tells us that it is necessary in the interest of economy, and in order to facilitate the inspection of the armouries to buy automobiles for these people, I think it time that somebody should tell him the truth. I am not appealing to the farmers in this matter. Many of our farmers have automobiles, and many others would like to have them. The farmers have no prejudice against automobiles.

But they do have a prejudice against men receiving the salaries that these men are receiving, and giving very little service for it, and then to go and buy them automobiles to ride around in.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). I am surprised to hear my hon. friend get up and slate his leader and his colleagues who have been so long in office; while the hon. gentleman, who knew these things were going on all these years, sat dumb as an oyster.

Mr. CARVELL. We never got to the point of buying automobiles.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). When the hon. gentleman talks about there being no work for these officers to do in New Brunswick, he does not know what he is talking about, he is talking nonsense. Let me remind him of the units scattered over his own province, scattered over miles and miles of territory, where the officers have to make long drives, and hang around the stations waiting for the trains, hours at a time, both days and nights. Every cadet corps, every rifle association has to be inspected. The staff officer for that purpose in New Brunswick has to work night and day, and does his duty as well as any other officer in the Dominion of Canada. I want to tell my hon. friend from Carleton, N.B. (Mr. Carvell) that if he has had in the past cause of complaint he is not going to have that cause of complaint very long, because I can assure him that if there are staff officers who have been loafing around doing only two hours work in the day, that will soon be put a stop to. The hon. gentleman has been condoning it, but no hon. gentleman on the government side will tolerate, as he has tolerated, any such conduct on the part of officers who have so little to do, and if there is no work for them to do, they will be disposed of. I think the hon. gentleman, who is himself a soldier, should not be casting reflections upon the force, seeing he has failed in the past in having these wrongs remedied.

Mr. CARVELL. I protested in the past, perhaps not as strongly as I ought to have done, but I protested all these years. Notwithstanding the extracts from the report of General French which the hon. gentleman is going to fall back upon, I may tell him that we have got too much militarism in this country. My hon. friend talks about what they are going to do here, in one of these numerous memoranda that he distributes among the members to prove that he is not increasing the cost of the militia to the country. I find here a most astounding statement that the people of Canada spend to-day on sheer gold lace militarism one-third as much as they are paying in Germany, which is supposed to be the most military-ridden country in the world. Just think of it! I figured out that the people of Canada are paying 34 per cent as much as they are paying in Germany per capita, one-quarter as much as they are paying in Great Britain, one-quarter as much as they are paying in France, and 57 per cent of what they are paying in Italy. It is a remarkable statement, and the people of this country may well pause and consider where we are going. It is bad enough to add half a million dollars, as my hon. friend is doing this year, but when it comes to buying automobiles for these $3,000, $4,000 and $5,000 a year officers to ride around in, I think it is straining the people's patience to the breaking point.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). Would the hon. gentleman have them go by foot? As to the comparison with Germany and other nations, let me point out that Canada to-day has a very large area with a very small population, while Germany has a very small area with a very large population, which of course affects the pro rata of expenditure. But as Canada fills up, the cost per head will naturally decrease.

Mr. CHISHOLM (Antigonish). It is said that the best literary critics are men who never wrote a book, and the best musical critics are men who cannot tell one note from another I do not profess to be a military critic, but I think I do know something of public opinion throughout the country on this subject. There is a general impression prevailing in the rural districts that there is proportionately too much spent on militarism. The Minister of Militia is so filled with the spirit of militarism that he really cannot see beyond his environment. To him militarism is like grace to a Christian, he cannot have too much of it. When one considers that for arts, agriculture and statistics, we are only providing about $2,000,000 in the main estimates, and for militia something over $8,000,000, four times as much, without taking into consideration another million dollars or so for armouries and drill halls, and one thing and another, one is driven to the conviction that it is time to call a halt. Besides, this great sum does not include what is to be spent on the navy. When they compare what is spent on militarism with the amount spent on agriculture, I think the farmers are well justified in entertaining a feeling of great dissatisfaction. I know this thing has been going on for years. I do not say the present administration is alone responsble for it. But it is so that this feeling of dissatisfaction been prevalent for years. I was glad to hear my hon. friend from Carleton (Mr. Carvell) express the sentiments he did. I know these sentiments obtain largely on the other side of the House as well as on this side. In fact. I have heard some of the hon. gentlemen opposite express the opinion that there is too much money spent on militarism. Now, the Minister of Militia says that he must purhcase automobiles for his officers. They may effect a saving, as he has pointed out, it may be that the services of his officers may be utilized to better advantage by providing this luxury. But the country will not look at it in that way. The country will regard these automobiles as a means of procuring joy-rides for these officers, to go around the country with gilt braid on their coats, as the swells of the land. I do not think there is much dissatisfaction against the ordinary soldier, but it is against the expensive staff officers, the pageantry that we see on the outside, that the dissatisfaction exists. Now as to the cadet corps, no doubt it is a good thing to give boys a military training. It is a good thing to subject them to proper discipline, but that is not the whole thing. There seems to be a spirit prevailing in the militia department that if we can organize all the boys into cadet corps we can dispense with clergymen, churches, schools and everything else of that sort. You see abundant evidence of that in this pamphlet. It makes mention of the cost of the negative army as it is called in that pamphlet or advance memoranda; it talks of the amount spent in keeping up reformatories, the administration of justice, and the expenditure on rum and tobacco, as if a military training was going to do away with all these things. I think the idea of cadet corps is a good one, but I do not think it is a good thing to send them off to camp to give them a training, when you might give them the same training at home in schools and colleges.

Give them training, if you will, in the common schools and colleges, give them this training under the influence of their own homes. I do not approve of the policy of making it too easy for the boys to go to camp miles away from their homes. The minister says that they are not obliged to go if they do not want to and that they will not be permitted to go unless the permission of their parents is obtained. That is all very true, but you know very well that boys are curious and full of the spirit of adventure and perhaps the father will be soft and easy and allow the child to go. The minister says that the best way is to put boys upon their honour, and he gave us a lecture upon how to deal with boys. I am not in a position to give a lecture on that subject, but I think there is a good deal of truth in the old homely saying: Spare the rod and spoil the child. That truth has to be acted upon to a certain extent and while the idea of putting a boy upon his honour may be all right to a limited extent it is not as effective as the command of the father or mother.

Mr. EDWARDS. You believe in militarism in the home then?

Mr. CHISHOLM (Antigonish). No, that is not militarism. The home life and discipline have a sweetening effect that militarism does not possess at all. As I said before, I do not not know anything about militarism.

Mr. CURRIE. Anybody could see that.

Mr. CHISHOLM (Antigonish). That is very true, but I rose for the purpose of giving expression to the opinion of the country. Ninety per cent of the people in the rural districts feel that there is too much militarism going on. I am not blaming the present administration for that; the same thing happened to a large extent under the late administration and hon. gentlemen opposite, when they sat on this side of the House, said that if it had not been so late in the session when the estimates were going through they would have brought up and given expression to that very same opinion. But now with a still further increase with such innovations as automobiles for the officers and drill in camp for boys of tender age, it is time to call a halt and do so in no uncertain sound. There seems to be a disposition to say nothing in criticism of the militia as if it were something sacrilegious to say anything that was not most respectful of it. I think the militia ought to be criticised and it is open to criticism just as much as any other branch of the service.

Mr. EDWARDS. I think it would only be fair that members on this side of the House should permit hon. gentlemen opposite to get rid of the views which they have had bottled up for the last ten years and which are beginning to effervesce at such a rate that the cork has flown out of the bottle. They want to express now what has been on their minds for a long time and which they have not had an opportunity to express before. The hon. member for Carleton, N.B. (Mr. Carvell) says that he has thought this thing for six or eight years. Therefore, we ought to be fair and give the hon. gentleman an opportunity to express here to-night what he has had bottled up for the past eight years. We have learned from the hon. member for Carleton to-night that in the past men have had horses injured in camp and that they have received no proper compensation for the loss which they have sustained in that way. We have not heard one word from the hon. gentleman in all these years so far as that is concerned. In all these years there has been in his mind very serious objection to the spending of from $6,000,000 to $8,000,000 a year on the militia, yet not one word of criticism has he seen fit to offer in this House. I found some difficulty in getting certain claims redressed for injuries done to horses in my county until the present government came in and I am pleased to say that I have succeeded in getting claims fixed up which have stood in abeyance for a considerable length of time. I want to repeat to-night what I said when I was on the other side of the House and that is that I do not think that the amount of money spent in this country for militia and defence is out of all proportion to the amount of money that is spent, for instance, upon agriculture. I said that on the other side of the House and I repeat that statement from this side of the House to-night. That is still my opinion. I think there is plenty of room for curtailing expenditure along that line. There has been a greate deal of room for it in years past and I am glad to see that the present hon. Minister of of Militia (Mr. Huhges) is making a cut in the neighbourhood of half a million dollars as compared with the estimates of last year.

Mr. CARVELL. He has made an increase over last year.

Mr. EDWARDS. No, that is the statement that he has made.

Mr. CARVELL. If my hon. friend will look at page 48 of the estimates he will find that the minister demands an increase of $191,000 and there are other items that can be figured up beyond that and we will get the supplementaries for the next session of parliament.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). As prepared by this government my estimates are nearly half a million less than the estimates which I found had been prepared by the former government.

Mr. CARVELL. That may be so.

Mr. EDWARDS. Then, as I understand I think this is a step in the right direction. I do not think that you can find fault with these hon. gentlemen for criticising these estimates, but I think it would come with better grace from them if they had given a little of this criticism in years gone by instead of reserving it all for the present occasion.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE (Kamouraska). (Translation). Mr. Chairman, I cannot let this resolution pass without expressing my deep surprise at the stand taken by the hon. member coming from my province, and who sits o nthe other side of the House. I expected on their part virulent protest against the item asked by the hon. member the Minister of Militia, and I was far from thinking that he would meet his request with an approbatory silence.

I have taken part in the now famous Drummond-Arthabaska in 1910. I have heard during that election many of these hon. members, criticising the expenses incurred by the government, for the annual camps of the Canadian militia.

I have heard them make violent appeals and state that the government were spending hundreds of thousands of dollers sending young men—I apologize to the House for using the expression, but it was the one they used—to get drunk in the camps at Lévis, Three Rivers and St. Johns.

I am exceedingly surprised to see that to-day, when an additional expenditure of $130,000 is proposed, not for the annual drill of the ordinary militia, but towards the training of school boys, ten or twelve years old, who, as stated by the minister, will be turned into as many soldiers. I am, I repeat it, exceedingly surprised that not a word of protest is forthcoming from hon. members on the other side.

Evidently, in regard to this question, as in regard to several others, which have come up since the opening of this session, it is the faction represented in the Cabinet by the hon. Minister of Militia, which has won the day over the other faction represented by the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Monk) and the hon. Postmaster General (Mr. Pelletier). The bellicose views of my hon. friend the Minister of Militia have prevailed over the peaceful teachings of the hon. Minister of Public Works and his supporters.

In the course of the last electoral contest, when the establishment of a Canadian navy was being denounced so passionately in the province of Quebec, I remember hearing the hon. member for I'Islet (Mr. Paquet) state in fervid tones that the government had written a bloody page in the annals of our country. I wonder what the hon. member and his friends think of the page which the hon. Minister of Militia is about to write just now in our annals. As a matter of fact, what the Minister of Militia is anxious to accomplish through this resolution is, as I have stated, to convert into soldiers all the school children in the country. The proof of it, Mr. Chairman, is in the manifest, a copy of which the hon. minister, has caused to be handed to every hon. member and in which his object is clearly set forth:

> If the nation is to learn to shoot this must be taught to the boys. If this movement is handled by a capable and diplomatic staff working hand in hand with the educational authorities it will mean that every boy in the country will learn to shoot and drill, and without arousing the prejudices of the people universal training of the youth of the country will be obtained.

Mr. Chairman, if that radical departure in our military organizations had been proposed by the late government, you know as well as I do, what denunciations would have been heard in our old province of Quebec. The bugbear of militarism would have been exposed, and to my mind with some measure of justification.

As for me, I agree with those hon. gentlemen who have taken a stand against this new system of enrolling all our young men under the flag of militarism.

Our population is not enormous enough, our country's development has not reached such a point as to justify such an extravagant expenditure for military purposes. In brief the requirements of our agriculture are too great to allow our government to divert from its proper use such a considerable amount.

I also object to that part of the estimates providing for the purchase of automobiles for officers in the militia. Such an expenditure will not meet with the approval of the people. My hon. friend is quite enthusiastic when military requirements are being dealt with; but surely he does not wish his officers to wage war in autos. I do not think the Canadian people will approve of such extravagant expenditure. I take strong exception to the new policy expounded by the Minister of Militia and I appeal to my hon. friends on the other side, especially those representing Quebec constituents if they were serious, to join with me and bring their influence to bear on the minister, so that he will cut down his estimates to a reasonable figure.

Mr. E. PAQUET (L'Islet). (Translation) Mr. Speaker, I did not intend to address the House on this question, but I see my hon. friend from Kamouraska has suddenly become greatly concerned with the interest of the farming class. However, the hon. member, in the course of last session did not find a word of criticism to utter in connection with the report of General French. That officer was sent to Canada to completely reorganize our militia. His conclusions are towards increasing the expenditure in this connection. According to General French, there should be, in the first place, a body of 100,000 men and then a reserve of 100,000 more. That report was brought down and laid on the table of the House, and the hon. member had not a word of reproof for the right hon. gentleman who was then leader of the House. During the campaign in Drummond-Arthabaska, I pointed out that while only one million was spent in aid of agriculture, six millions were being expended on the militia. While not approving entirely the increased expenditure on the militia, I must congratulate the government on having given their first thought to the farming community, and framing a policy which will ensure the improvement of our national highways and at the same time, bring about the agricultural progress of Canada.

Mr. VERVILLE. I wish all the members of the House had as much knowledge of militarism as I have, which is none at all. The hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Paquet) takes great pride in the present government for what they have done for the agricultural classes and the improvements of country roads, but so far I have not seen them do anything for the labouring people of Canada.

An hon. MEMBER. What about the automobiles.

Mr. VERVILLE. The government did not give the labouring people any automobiles. I cannot blame the government for buying those automobiles, because, as I understand it, the wars of the future will be so conducted that the rank and file will be placed in front to be killed and the gentlemen with the automobiles can run away. I say, Sir, that any province that will allow a system of education of its children in militarism, by taking a child ten or twelve years old and teaching him how to handle a gun and shoot his fellow-man, ought to be censured by this parliament or any other parliament. I am sure that you will find a vast majority of the fathers and mothers of this country against any such proposal. I claim that the children in the schools are learning too fast how to kill their fellow-men, and that it would be much better for the government of Canada and much better for the country, if, instead of giving a penny a month to the Labour Department, they would spend more money on it and less on guns. It would be much better for the government of this country to educate the children in economics than to teach them how to shoot. Now then, it might be said that I make this statement now and I did not make it when the Liberals were in power, but I want to tell hon. gentlemen that I have always stood with the labouring people of this country in condemnation of this system. In the name of one million heads of families whose children will be wanted for this service, I protest against the promulgation of the doctrine of militarism.

Mr. BURNHAM. It is acknowledged the world over that the expenditure of money in training people to kill each other is prima facie absurd. I should not like for my part the impression to go abroad in the newspapers, especially the Liberal newspapers, that the Conservatives were in favour of spending these sums of money on the military, while our good friends the Liberals were in favour of everything going on as quietly as possible. We admit beyond peradventure that the world as it is is all wrong. We could save vast sums of money if nobody would die, and great remedies could be applied instantly if we had the power of applying them, but we have not. I would ask the hon. gentleman from Maisonneuve (Mr. Verville), who has expressed such admirable sentiments, if he will remember that it has taken us one thousand years to recover from the fact that Rome was not fit to hold off the barbarians. If in A.D. 476 the Western Empire of Rome had been trained in a military way instead of humbugging in other ways as she did she would have preserved the learning of the west, and preserved the power of the west, and we would not have had the Lombards, the Visigoths, the Ostrogoths and the Vandals, and all the rest of them destroying the learning that had been accumulated for a thousand years. We must have some common sense in this matter. Let me remind the hon. gentleman (Mr. Verville) that we are not training our sons or our daughters either to shoot each other; we are training them to hit a mark, and if it should so chance that some one insists upon being shot because they are going to take away that which belongs to us, then we will shoot them, but that is only an incident. There are benefits in a military training which everybody will concede. It makes the young chap erect, well set-up, and it teaches him discipline, which nine times out of ten he does not learn at home. It is a grave mistake for any one to suppose that all the expenditure of money, under the conditions that exist in the world to-day, for the purposes of self-defence, is wasted, because it is not. Ten minutes' study of history will show that if the ancient empire of Rome had been able to defend herself we would have been two thousand years ahead of where we are now, instead of being two thousand years behind. Then, with regard to the automobiles; I am not much of a soldier myself, I would not kill a chicken if I could help it, but I have followed the question sufficiently to know that the automobile is the most economical means of handling a transport service in all the armies of the world. The Americans, the Australians, the Germans, the French, the English, all have automobiles attached to their military forces, and why should we not be up to date? Do we want to lag behind? Certainly not. Everybody admits, and that is the point I want to make, that expenditure in a military way is something that is to be regretted, but it is something that has to be done.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). I am surprised to find that my hon. friend from Kamouraska (Mr. Lapointe) who in his youth was trained as a cadet, and who has all the appearance of a bold soldier laddie, stand up here and show his lack of appreciation of the tact of the gentleman who had the honour of defeating him and his friends in the contest in Drummond-Arthabaska. What are the facts? In 1896 the Liberal-Conservative party had brought in a small appropriation of three million dollars for rifles with which to arm the troops in expectation of a war in which Britain and France would be engaged on one side against other continental powers. These hon. gentlemen opposite then pursued the same policy as they are evidently laying out to pursue to-day. Let me tell these gentlemen that I welcome their appeal to prejudices on every platform and in every riding in the Dominion. In 1896 they went through the province of Quebec telling the people that if these rifles were bought by the Conservatives their sons would be disembowelled.

An hon. MEMBER. Who said that?

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). The Liberals said it in the province of Quebec in 1896.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). Do the hon. gentlemen opposite deny it?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Kamouraska). Yes.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). Then it was that the Liberals appealed to the mothers of the province of Quebec not to let their sons fight for the empire in all parts of the world. That appeal had its effect, but time rolled on and Drummond and Arthabaska fell vacant and the Liberal-Conservative party——

An hon. MEMBER. Kept out of the county.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). I have not the slightest doubt they did it and I say: God bless them for giving back to these gentlemen opposite the same medicine as they themselves administered in 1896. We have evidence that both sides did it in the Drummond-Arthabaska election, and these gentlemen opposite were hoisted on their own petard.

Then came on the last Dominion elections and the people of the province of Quebec and the people of other provinces resisted the appeals to prejudices made by the Liberals, and they placed the Right Hon. R. L. Borden where he now stands at the head of a splendid majority, a united majority, as the gentlemen opposite have found to their cost. I want to tell these gentlemen opposite that they are not talking by the book when they say that the farmers do not want their sons to go to these cadet camps. We have the evidence in our possession that not only the people of the cities, but the country people as well in every part of the Dominion—in the province of Quebec more than anywhere else—are anxious to have their children go to these camps. I am pleased beyond measure to see the line these gentlemen opposite are taking, because from their own view point they are making a fatal mistake. I was more than surprised to find our good friend from Maisonneuve (Mr. Verville), who poses as the champion of labour in this country, taking the stand he did. Let me point out to him that in a country where the labour leaders are honest, where the labour leaders are not afraid to stand up for what they think is right, in Australia, where a labour government is in power, a cadet system has been established and 75 per cent of the cadets are armed and well drilled and trained to shoot. In Australia, every man and boy from the age of ten years up must be by law trained to be a soldier. That is not militarism. Militarism is where a class created in the community holds control of the military power so as to dominate the rest of the people, but when you get a whole people trained for the defence of their country, it is the very antithesis of militarism.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Don't look at me in that way.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). I believe that at heart the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) is right, but unfortunately he has been keeping such bad company that he hardly knows where he is at himself. Discipline does not mean oppression; military training means honour, culture, upbuilding, training the youth to keep his head erect, and training him to keep his head erect is training him to keep his character right. The records of all countries show that where young men are trained in military work they are improved mentally, morally and physically. As an asset to a nation, outside of any question of the defence of the country, it is well to train the youth of the country in military discipline.

When the nation is in danger and its men are untrained, what is the consequence? They take to the woods and leave their wives, their mothers, their sisters, their daughters and their sweethearts to the tender mercies of the invaders. There is a record in every land where the men have been untrained. It is all very well for hon. gentlemen who have nothing to gain but a little cheap popularity, to criticise the defence of the nation. Too long, I fear, have the militia estimates of this country gone through with the suspicion that everything was not right in them. I want our militia estimates to be subject to the fullest criticism, and I have taken pains to have full information regarding them sent to every locality in Canada, so that the people will know where their money has gone and what it has gone for. I want the people to know the exact condition of affairs, and I am confident that they will say: We do not believe in militarism, but we do believe in defending our homes. They will say: Patriotism and loyalty are splendid things, but loyalty untrained is worse than cowardice. It means that you have the spirit to resist aggression, but not the training to do it. Loyalty untrained is useless. A loyal regiment untrained is worse than baggage. A lot of loyal fellows carrying rifles means only so much cost to the nation; they are not fit to fight in any way. It means more than that; the expense is greater, the danger is greater. A few men trained in a nation are worth a whole regiment of untrained loyal men. The days of standing armies have gone, because they would have to be so large that it would be impossible to pay for them, and the people dread them. The old Saxon days have returned, when the whole nation must be armed; and the cheapest way to secure this is by training the youth of the land to handle a rifle just as we teach them to read and write and cipher. I was surprised to see the so-called labour leader in Canada taking the position he did, when the true labour leaders of Australia insist on every man in that country being trained to be a soldier, and on every boy over ten years of age—not optional, as I make it, on the part of their parents whether they shall go to camp or not—but forced to be trained in military work, forced to take a rifle and practice target shooting, forced to give their time and to some extent their means in developing themselves for the defence of their country.

Mr. CARVELL. One would almost think, in listening to the impassioned appeal of the Minister of Militia, that the suggestion made by one of his war lords at the conference which was held here before Christmas, that conscription should be established in this country, had made an impression on the mind of the minister. I hope the day will never come when we shall have conscription in Canada and every man will be forced into the army to be a trained soldier. What do we want an army for? We are not living in France or in Germany, or in Russia, or in Australia.

My hon. friend does not tell us why they are training their people in Australia and New Zealand. He knows why there is excitement in Australia and New Zealand that can never affect Canada.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). Why.

Mr. CARVELL. He knows that it is because of the fear of an oriental invasion. He knows that the people want to keep those countries white men's countries. He knows that is why they are expending so much money on military organization and on navies, and I do not think he could conceive it as possible that those conditions could arise in Canada for generations to come. You would almost think, from what the minister has said, that if you have enough militarism in Canada, you can abolish all the churches in the land and people's souls will be saved by the militia and not by the grace of God. I am not trying to raise race against race or creed against creed. I believe in the militia to a certain extent. I believe we need it to help the police to enforce the civil law and to maintain peace and order; but more than that we do not need, and any money that is spent for more than that is money spent in vain, and would be very much better used for other purposes. My hon. friend talks about defending our homes, our wives, sisters and sweethearts, and all that tommyrot. He knows there is no danger of invasion. He talks about trained men and says that loyal men not trained are worse than baggage in an army. He knows that more than 50 per cent of the men who went from Canada to South Africa were not members of the militia and probably never had been. I know that is true of those who went from the maritime provinces. And when these men were under arms one month, you could not tell the difference between those who were trained and those who were not trained. If you are going to train the militia of Canada to be of any use, all you want to do is to give them the rudiments of shooting. The training of forming fours and so on is useless. Imagine forming fours on the African veldt. I admit that if you teach a young man to be a good shot, and he is ever required to defend his country, or even to go to foreign wars, he has an education which will make him a good soldier. I think the great trouble with my hon. friend and with his general staff is that they spend too much money on fuss and feathers and gold lace and not enough to teach young men how to shoot. I want to point out to the hon. member for Peterborough that these automobiles are not for transport, but for taking the staff on junketing tours. Let the minister give more money to the rifle clubs. I am not blaming my hon. friend for this; those who were running the militia matters in the other government were just as bad; but I find that in the great province of Ontario they give to the rifle associations the magnificent sum of $2,000, while they increase the pay of the general staff by thousands every year, and in the province of New Brunswick they give to the rifle associations the magnificent sum of $1,300.

Besides this they give a little every year to different rifle associations all over the country. Put together all the money that you pay to the militiamen, all the money you pay in rifle practice, all the money you pay that fits a man to be a soldier, and you have not spent a million dollars in the whole of Canada, but you are spending $8,000,000 in fuss and feathers and gold lace. I want the minister to get down to earth and look this matter in the face as a pure matter of business. If the minister has got enough knowledge of military matters, and I think as far as the present party is concerned he is the right man in the right place, he will talk business instead of talking hot air as he has been doing.

Mr. WILCOX. One of the principles of our system of party government that I do admire is that our committees are non-political, that we are there permitted to express views at variance with the views held on our own side of the House, and that in so doing we are not in any way disassociating ourselves from our own party. I desire to make a reference or two with respect to the order which has been given by the Minister of Militia for twelve automobiles. It would have been the greatest possible pleasure for me to have supported this contract, or order, if in my judgment I considered it proper. But from the facts, as they have been submitted to me, I am not exactly satisfied with the negotiations in connection with this order, so far as I understand them. I recognize that my hon. friend the Minister of Militia is a highly qualified man to fill with dignity, the position which he now occupies. He is a warrior, but I have a recollection at this time of other men who preceded him that were warriors. I think of Samson, way back in the old dispensation, who killed 5,000 Philistines with the jawbone of an ass. He was tempted and he fell.

Mr. MACDONALD. Is there any fear of that with the minister?

Mr. WILCOX. I fear that my hon. friend was tempted by an agent in his own constituency and he fell.

Mr. PUGSLEY. It is very serious.

Mr. LEMIEUX. A spade is a spade.

Mr. WILCOX. A spade is a spade and a club is a club. I have made it my practice since I have entered public life, and long before, to always have the courage of my convictions. I do not believe that this thing is proper and I do not intend to support it, although, as I said before, it would give me the greatest possible pleasure to do so because it is placing an $11,000 contract with a manufacturing concern within the limits of my own constituency.

Mr. KNOWLES. It is a contract given to Grits though.

Mr. PUGSLEY. What is the matter?

Mr. WILCOX. Give me time to make my statement. There may be an excuse for my hon. friend (Mr. Hughes, Victoria), in making this mistake. I do not pretend to say that it was deliberate on his part, because I can see the ghost of Sir Frederick Borden in this matter. The principles which have been adopted in this and other departments of the government for the last fifteen years, in my judgment are clearly manifest in this transaction. I received a letter a few days ago from a gentleman in Walkerville and desire to place an extract or two from that letter upon the pages of 'Hansard':

Walkerville, March 6, 1912.

Oliver H. J. Wilcox, Esq., M.P.,
House of Commons, Ottawa, Ont.

My dear Mr. Wilcox,—It has been mentioned to me that you are using your influence towards a reconsideration of the order recently given by the Department of Militia and Defence to the Ford Motor Company, of Walkerville, the idea being to have the order placed with a concern established outside your constituency.

I was at a loss to know, Mr. Chairman, where that information came from for up to that time I had made no reference to it whatever, but I learned from a party of gentlemen, one of them an ex-member of this House from Port Perry, where the agent who read this order hailed from, that when he got that order from the minister he started for Walkerville, or communicated with Walkerville, and told the motor company to keep the member for Essex quiet.

Mr. McKENZIE. He reckoned without his host.

Mr. MACDONALD. How was he going to do it?

Mr. WILCOX. It is pretty hard to do it, because I am not convinced that this is a proper transaction. I desire to place another communication upon 'Hansard.' I want my statement with respect to this matter to be absolutely clear, not so much for the benefit of the members of this House, but for the benefit of my own constituents. In answer to the communication, an extract from which I gave to the House a moment or two ago, I wrote as follows on March 8:

I have received your favour of March the 6th, and I beg to say in reply that I consider the only satisfactory feature in connection with the order given by the Minister of Militia to your agents for twelve automobiles to which you have referred, is the fact that these cars are manufactured in the constituency which I am at present trying honestly to represent. That fact alone may prevent me from opposing the transaction and the item will appear in the supplementary estimates to meet the expenditure.

In approaching the subject I absolutely deny that upon any occasion or at any time I have exerted an influence to have the order cancelled and placed with a firm outside my constituency.

This matter was brought to my attention by a series of questions placed on the order paper by the Hon. Charles Murphy, and in view of the well established custom there was no excuse whatever that I should not have been consulted so that I might have been acquainted with the facts, but I was not.

However, that is not here nor there so far as you are concerned; I will settle this point with the minister.

The next objection is that it has not been established to my satisfaction, and I can tell you to the satisfaction of all the members that have spoken to me upon the subject, the necessity of purchasing automobiles at the country's expense for a few staff officers and generals that are now drawing salaries ranging from $3,000 to $6,000 a year with expenses. While we are absolutely in accord with making all reasonable appropriations for the purposes of militia, and it is the prevailing opinion here that it is the colonels, the majors, the captains and the privates that are entitled to consideration, personally, I consider it neither sound public policy nor good common sense.

The objection is that the law strictly forbids a minister of the Crown to enter into a contract with an individual, firm or corporation for a greater amount than $5,000 without calling for tenders, and in this case the minister did not consult his colleagues nor even the representative of the constituency.

From the Hon. Charles Murphy's question, I learned that the order was given to the Ford Motor Company for twelve touring cars at the cost of $11,419.20. That would be $951.60 each. I have received a telegram from Windsor which gives me the information that the standard price for this class of car fully equipped is $800 f.o.b., Walkerville, so that the minister, without consultation with his colleagues, without consultation of the representative of the constituency, without application for tenders as required by law, has given to some person $1,219.20 in excess of what should be paid.

In the light of these facts I am unable to see upon what ground this deal can be justified or defended when it is brought up in this House by the opposition, and I am inclined to the view that if the facts as they were presented to me are true, and that if this gets into politics there are two parties that will not be benefited by a discussion of it; one is the Minister of Militia and the other is the Ford Motor Company of Walkerville.

Now, in conclusion, I am always open to conviction, and if you or your company can give me a satisfactory explanation of my objections, I will be just as enthusiastically in favour of the proposal as I am now opposed to it. If the minister had not approached me in room 16 in the presence of our members and we had some argument it would not have become the subject of so much discussion here as it is; and I may say that I have so far not taken any position that would jeopardize the interests of your company. I was not complaining because the contract had not been given, but the advisability of purchasing these machines for the purpose the minister has in mind is questionable, and the method which he has adopted in securing them has not been met with favour by many of his supporters, and I absolutely refuse to support that which I believe to be wrong. But, as you have been good enough to communicate with me. I will make no further reference to it with the hope that you may be able to give me a satisfactory explanation.

I remain, dear sir,

Truly yours,
OLIVER WILCOX.

That communication was forwarded by me to a shareholder of the firm. I received a reply. But there is an interesting piece of history here that does not satisfy me. This agent went to Walkerville, or directed a communication to Walkerville, or telegraphed to Walkerville, or in whatever way he let that company know, I was not satisfied with that transaction. He gave that intelligence to Mr. Gordon McGregor, the manager, as I am informed, who happens to be a Liberal. Instead of Mr. McGregor communicating with me, he impressed that knowledge on a shareholder who happened to be on the other side of politics and a friend of mine. This is my information. He wrote to me and answered that communication in which I stated my objections. On March 15, 1912, one of the stockholders of the Ford Automobile Company wrote to me as follows:—

Dear Mr. Wilcox,—I received your kind favour of 8th inst. and contents carefully noted. I thank you very much for so carefully giving me such full detail, and I must confess that your arguments are sound.

But I have here a communication that was directed by the president of this company, in which he attempts to explain some of the objections I had to the order. He said:

Mr. WILCOX

Dear Sir,—Answering the questions which you have put to me, and which I assume are indirectly questions that have come from Mr. Wilcox regarding the order that was given by the Department of Militia and Defence, from information we have received indirectly in regard to this matter, we are led to believe that Mr. Wilcox has failed in placing this order with another concern, with the Reo concern. In this we might be mistaken, and it might be the Hupmobile or the M. and F. or Flanders, as these concerns are located in his constituency.

Let me say I never asked for that order to be given to any firm in my constituency; and in my firm judgment such an order or contract as that should be given upon tender, with opportunity allowed to all the various companies in this country to file their tenders. Now, with regard to the increase of price, Mr. McGregor says:

Regarding the price which has been paid us for these automobiles, $951.60, as you will note, the advertised price of our car is $850 f.o.b., Walkerville. But for this purpose there have been a lot of extras added in order to have the cars complete and in order to avoid the necessity of continually purchasing extras. For instance, the cars are specified with traction treads, which add an extra of $3,020 to our list for the set. There is also one extra traction tread casing, $1.25; 4 Dunlop tubes, $24.20; one top envelope, $5; one jack, $2. In addition to that there is a muffler cut-out, a tire envelope and a set of tire holders. I have not before me the exact prices of these, but you can easily see that the price for a car with all these extras which have been specified would be more than $951.60. . .

So far as opposition from the Liberal side of the House is concerned, we don't think there will be any opposition and if Mr. Wilcox can indicate that there is any possibility of any coming up we will be very glad to take the matter up with some of the members on the Liberal side of the House.

He says he has forwarded me a copy of the special list; but not one of these items which he has mentioned in this communication is on this special list. Therefore, I take it, these extras which are referred to belong to the standard car which was sold for $850. In my judgment, as I said before, this contract should be let by public tender. It is with the greatest regret that I rise to oppose this order, and if a motion is made in this House against it, I should support the motion.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). I regret exceedingly the line of action my hon. friend has chosen to take. I have to say about the contract, that stands on its own merits. But knowing that the Ford machine was made in the hon. gentleman's riding, I thought I would please him by telling him that we had purchased for the department these 12 machines. What was his first remark? 'Can't you put in a word with that concern to help me?'

I said, 'Certainly I will do so.' Accordingly I promptly notified the agent to that effect, that my hon. friend was in favour of the purchase. The next day he came to me and said, 'Why, the head of that concern is a confounded Grit named McGregor; during the election he placarded his shop all over with appeals to his men to vote against me, and all that sort of thing.' I said 'It makes no difference if the head of the firm is a Grit, the company is largely Conservative, and the men are always intelligent enough to vote Conservative. Then he asked me why I didn't get some other machine, and he mentioned two or three others with agencies in Walkerville that I had never heard of before. He said, 'It would be far better for me if you would cancel the order and put it with some other concern.' I need not go any further.

Mr. MACDONALD. Did the hon. gentleman desire the purchase to be put up to tender?

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). You cannot get tenders for automobiles. He never asked me to invite tenders. I found then that my hon. friend misunderstood the situation entirely, he thought his was the only concern in Canada that was making automobiles, and that I should have got them from his riding. I thought I was doing the hon. gentleman a kindness in giving him the information. I have given him the facts of the case, and from that time to this I have had nothing more to do with it. I will only add that when I found he was dissatisfied I told him one day what I thought about it, and I think he understood my position pretty well. From this very concern, when we tried to get them down we got a notification that if we ordered 100 machines they would not be sold for one cent less than we are giving for these machines. I do not know whether Mr. McGregor is a Grit or not, and I do not care. But I do know that the workingmen in any establishment in Canada would be largely Conservative. There are the facts of the case, and they cannot be contradicted.

Mr. WILCOX. The question is whether the minister has taken the proper course. If he has, and if the price was in excess of the value of these machines, as I believe it was, then it is an improper expenditure; if not, then it is a proper expenditure. I have always had a high regard for the Minister of Militia and Defence. I dislike to offer any criticism of his official conduct, but I want to say to him that he is the only minister of the Crown that does not consult me upon matters pertaining to my constituency. I saw in one of the Canadian newspapers an item last year taken I think from one of the English papers which seemed to set forth one of the weaknesses of my hon. friend. The paper said that during the coronation proceedings in England he was invited to a place upon the platform with King George, and immediately he stepped upon the platform he spread all over it and there was not room on it for the King. Now I want to say to him that he is not going to spread all over North Essex on matters which affect the people of that constituency, which they have to pay for, without letting me know something about it. If he does not consult me I will consult him on the floor of parliament.

Mr. MACDONALD. Would the minister tell me out of what vote he has purchased these automobiles?

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). Out of the stores vote.

Mr. MACDONALD. Was there a balance of last year in existence?

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). They are all paid for, and are to be delivered at various points all over Canada.

Mr. MACDONALD. Who was the person to whom the order was given, spoken of by the hon. member for North Essex (Mr. Wilcox)?

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). I think they are delivered through an agent in Toronto. I have driven a Ford automobile, and know what it is. I am surprised at the line of action my hon. friend has taken. I did not know what he meant when he said it would be much more to his advantage if I bought from another concern.

Mr. MACDONALD. Had the member for North Essex called the attention of the minister to what he has stated to the committee to-night, that these automobiles were purchased at a cost of almost $100 a piece more than the price he indicated they could be purchased for?

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). The hon. gentleman has given all the figures in the list, showing at what price they were purchased.

Mr. MACDONALD. The hon. minister said that he had gone through the price list, and his opinion was that the price was $100 more than what they could have been purchased at.

Mr. WILCOX. Mr. McGregor, the president, sent me the previous list, and upon that list not one of those items appeared as extras which he states in his communication were extras. Therefore, I spoke of these items as belonging to the machine?

Mr. MACDONALD. And about $100 too much was paid for the machine?

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). The standard price was $850; they will cost $951.21.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Were these machines contracted for from the manufacturers or through an agent? The reason I ask is that we all know that the agent's commission on the sale of automobiles is a fairly good one, running all the way from 15 to 25 per cent, and if an ordinary commission was paid in this case the agent would have received a very handsome sum of money—$1,100 or $1,200.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). We wanted to get the machines direct, but we were informed that it would be absolutely impossible. No company would sell except through an agent in the locality where the purchase is made. That is the way the machines were bought. As far as the extras are concerned, I may say that the tires are a special kind of traction tires, I believe, and these and the other attachments are got so that in case these machines were away and anything went wrong they would have the equipment with them. I am very anxious that this whole matter shall be thoroughly investigated. I have just given the facts as they occurred. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Wilcox) made no objection whatever when I first drew his attention to it. I thought I had paid him a compliment in that I had purchased the machines in his riding. His first question was that I should put in a friendly word with the firm for him in order to help him, and then one or two days later he came to me and said: See here, that fellow McGregor is an awful Grit, and you will have to cancel the order and give it to some other person.

Mr. MACDONALD. What was the politics of the agent from whom my hon. friend purchased the automobiles?

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). I think he is a Grit. I never asked a man for a vote in my life, but I think this man is a Liberal.

Mr. MACDONALD. What is his name?

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). His name is Williams.

Mr. KNOWLES. I would like to ask the minister whether he inquired of any other firm if he could get the machines direct and thus avoid the payment of the agent's commission? I know that in my own town eleven men got together and purchased machines. The machines came to them and they got them at net cost or at the same price as they would have cost an agent. If you multiplied the commission eleven or twelve times it would amount to a very considerable sum, and therefore I would ask the minister if he inquired of other firms in order to ascertain if it was possible to save that expense?

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). Yes, and I may say that there were other firms that paid as high as $500 commission on a machine. If you took a hundred machines from this firm it would not make any difference; you would still have to pay the commission.

Mr. KNOWLES. Will the minister bring down the correspondence with other firms?

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). I did not say that we had correspondence; I said that we consulted with other firms.

Mr. KNOWLES. With the firms?

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). We consulted the agents.

Mr. KNOWLES. The minister knows that the agent has not the authority to say whether the firm will grant a better price or not.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). The company will not deal except through an agent.

Mr. KNOWLES. I question that statement. I say that the company will deal with people who will take a certain number of machines.

Mr. CARVELL. I do not think we want to take any part in the little family quarrel on the other side as to whether the minister should or should not have bought Ford cars. But, the minister is in error when he says that the company will not sell at less than catalogue prices if you take a large number. I do not know what the Ford Company will do——

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). It is not only the Ford Company, but others.

Mr. CARVELL—but in the last three weeks I have received a letter from the Cadillac Company agreeing to sell machines to three persons at the special agent's discount, and I presume that what the Cadillac Company will do other companies will do. We have no fault to find with the Ford car, but what we say is that the minister has no right to buy automobiles for the general staff to go junketing around the country with.

Mr. LEMIEUX. The minister, while he was on this side of the House, condemned the payment of commissions to middlemen upon purchases by the government. I would like to know from the minister if he intends, when he makes purchases for the Militia Department, to pay a commission to the middlemen?

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). There has been no commisison paid to the middleman.

Mr. MACDONALD. The hon. member for North Essex says there has been.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I understand the minister admits that the purchase was made through an agent, and this agent, no doubt, has got a pretty handsome commission out of it.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). The hon. gentleman should be a judge of commissions.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I understand there is no question about it. I know something about automobiles, and I know that they allow the agents very handsome commissions. My hon. friend makes the excuse that the company would not sell except through an agent. That may be the case with the Ford Company. The Ford Company is one of the most reputable companies in Canada, and I am not going to say whether the minister got these automobiles as cheaply as he could have got them, but, while I am upon my feet, I have one word to say in praise of the minister. I think he deserves great credit for refusing to be bulldozed by the hon. member for North Essex (Mr. Wilcox). That gentleman spoke as if he ran the constituency. He says, indeed, that the Minister of Militia is the only minister that does not consult him and defer to his wishes in this constituency. We had here not long ago the spectacle of the Minister of Customs being obliged to listen to the remarks of the hon. member for North Essex in the House when he said that he had succeeded in having officials dismissed, and that he was not going to remain still until he had other men dismissed who had taken any part whatever in the election or had expressed political views. That is a wrong position for the hon. member for North Essex to take.

Mr. WILCOX. I did not take any such position. I realize my position in this House, and in my constituency, and as a young member I have tried to conduct myself in the manner in which I believe every hon. member should conduct himself, and for which I think I should be given credit. I have tried to act as a young member of this House in such a way as to commend my course to the favourable judgment of the older men in this House, but in so far as matters with respect to my own constituency are concerned, I have only desired to be consulted in so far as I have a right to be consulted, having regard to the principle of government which we have established in this country. If I am not the representative of the constituency I might as well go home. If I have certain rights and privileges under our constitutional form of government, I feel that I would not be doing my duty to the people of my constituency if I did not exercise what I believe to be my rights in their behalf.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Does not the hon. gentleman remember that not a great while ago he made a threat in this House that he was going to have certain officials dismissed and that he spoke as if he had charge of the Department of Customs? That did not strike me as being exactly the right position for a private member, although an influential member of the House and a supporter of the government, to take. Then the Minister of Militia and Defence has stated, and it has not been denied by the hon. gentleman, that the great objection which he raised to the purchase of these automobiles was that the manager of this company, Mr. McGregor, happened to be a Liberal. I think the hon. gentleman had no right to object simply for the reason that the minister should have exercised his best judgment in making the purchase of these automobiles.

Mr. WILCOX. I cannot allow the statement of the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) to go unchallenged.

I recognize my hon. friend to be a very acute and shrewd politician, and the motive which actuated him to make the statement he has just made is to enable him to play a little game of politics up in North Essex. I cannot allow that statement to go unchallenged. I want to say again that I did not, and I do not now, and I do not intend in the future, to bulldoze anybody in this House. But as a free representative of a free people I intend to exercise in this parliament the right which I have under the constitution. As to the reference about Mr. McGregor being a Liberal, I have evidence from a shareholder in the firm that Mr. McGregor never took any part in politics. It does not make any difference whether he did or not so far as I am concerned. I realize that the system of government we have in this country, is a party system, and that human ingenuity has never devised a better system of government than the party system, and I have absolutely no hard feelings towards a Liberal. If this matter is regular and right, all right. I have stated my position clearly to the House, and to the country, and to my constituents and upon that position I will stand or fall.

Mr. MACDONALD. Will the minister bring down to-morrow all the papers in connection with the purchase.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). We will bring down all the papers.

Mr. McCREA. No doubt the minister is a first-class Minister of Militia, but he is a bad purchasing agent. I know that some time ago the Ford Motor Company would give agent's commission to any man buying four cars or over, and that the commission was twenty per cent. The catalogue price on that machine is $850 and it would appear that the Minister of Militia not only paid the catalogue price but something over one hundred dollars per machine above the catalogue price. That is not very good generalship in a business transaction.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). The hon. gentleman (Mr. McCrea) is stating what is absolutely contrary to the fact. The letter which the hon. gentleman read here shows that the machines were sold for less than the catalogue price.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Not at all.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). Excuse me. The machine was sold less than the catalogue price when you consider the extras.

Mr. McCREA. I had the agency of the Ford Motor car and I know that was their system of doing business two years ago and I don't believe they have changed it since. Any person buying four cars or over got the agent's commission which is twenty per cent, and on the catalogue the price of that car this year is $850.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). That is right.

Mr. McCREA. And you paid something over $951.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). We got extras.

Mr. McCREA. I am not making any accusation, but I repeat that while the hon. gentleman may be a good military man, he is a bad purchasing agent.

Mr. CHISHOLM (Antigonish). I happen to know something about how the Ford company sell these cars. I know of a case where four or five persons wished to get a car at wholesale prices, and they communicated with the Ford Motor company, but they could not get the discount. They got over that by one of their number taking the agency for that town, and he entered into a contract that he would sell at least four motor cars and he got the benefit of the discount and the price to the purchasers was correspondingly less. The fact is, that the Ford company would not sell, except through their agent, and all this talk we have been hearing in years gone by, about middlemen's profits and buying from middlemen, is much on a par with this case; there is really nothing in the matter at all, if the facts are inquired into.

Mr. KNOWLES. I have a question to ask of the Minister of Militia, and of the leader of the government. On the 28th of February, I read in this House, a letter written by the Minister of Militia and sent to the city clerk of Moosejaw. That letter accused the gentlemen who compose the city council of Moosejaw of being blundering folk and other things. I want to ask if there has been any letter addressed to the Prime Minister by the city council or any other body in Moosejaw, complaining of that letter and asking that there be an apology.

Mr. BORDEN. There was a letter written to me, with regard to the incident. I cannot recall the precise terms of it. I answered the letter at the time.

Mr. KNOWLES. Does the right hon. gentleman remember whether an apology was asked for, from the Minister of Militia?

Mr. BORDEN. I have no recollection of that.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). Now that the subject is brought up, I might suggest to my hon. friend that he might suggest to the city council of Moosejaw, that an apology is due to the Minister of Militia. I have had very courteous and gentlemanly correspondence from the Board of Trade of Moosejaw, who are evidently gentlemen.

Mr. KNOWLES. I cannot allow that to go without a word. The city council of Moosejaw is just as reputable a body of men as can be found anywhere, and the Minister of Militia should give some reason for making that statement in regard to the city council of the city in which I reside. He has spoken of them in his letter as being a blundering body and has intimated to them as clearly as he could that he does not want to bother with having further conversation with them, and he states here in the House that one reason he does not want to take the matter up with them is that they are Grits—wherever he got that information I do not know. I say that the city council of Moosejaw deserves more courteous treatment from a minister of the Crown. Let me tell the hon. gentleman that the city of Moosejaw gave his party a very substantial majority at the last election, and let me tell him further that if he and the others who are under the Prime Minister will continue writing letters like that, I question if there will be much more appreciation of the Conservative party in that city. I appeal to my right hon. friend and I protest against a minister of the Crown writing such letters to the city council of Moosejaw and making such remarks about them. My hon. friend and myself have extended courteous and friendly treatment to each other for the years we have been in this Chamber, but I never heard of a minister of the Crown before making such entirely uncalled for remarks about a representative body. I hope the Prime Minister will see that that sort of thing is discontinued.

Military camps, $75,000.

Mr. MACDONALD. How many camps will there be for the cadet corps this summer?

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). The present intention is that in almost all localities there will be camps where the friends can visit the cadets. The officers commanding divisions have been asked to send in reports and probably there will be a camp for every county or riding or for some given area.

This item is increased owing to the fact that there are more cadet corps established under the Strathcona Trust.

Clothing and necessaries—for the entire, militia, including the permanent force, $450,000.

Mr. CARVELL. Does the minister really expect during the coming fiscal year to get along on the amount he asks for in this estimate, or does he anticipate a supplementary estimate to make up the deficiency?

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). I am afraid that something extra will be required, and that there will have to be a supplementary estimate.

Mr. CARVELL. That is what I feared. My hon. friend stated before dinner that he was not increasing the cost of the militia this year. As I stated, he admits that he is increasing it by $191,000, and I believe that it will be found that he is increasing it by half a million dollars. My hon. friend is not without guile in the manner in which he has made up his estimates. I want to call attention to a particularly bright operation of the mind of my hon. friend in making up these estimates. A guilty conscience needs no accuser, and when my hon. friend sent out his famous pamphlet justifying the military expenditure of this country, and showing that it is a positive agency for good against all the agencies for bad, that is a tacit admission that there is something wrong, and he is trying to explain away or to educate the public mind to receive the real facts when they come. We find in all these items connected with the fuss and feathers and show, something which goes to the glorification of my hon. friend. that there are increases while all the co-called decreases are on the hard business end of the transaction . You find a decrease of $25,000 in clothing and necessaries. My hon. friend admits now that will have to be made up in the supplementaries. You find a decrease of $75,000 in customs dues. In all probability they will be the same as last year, if not more. He then provides for a decrease of $55,000 in the engineer services, which I understand means the construction of targets, butts and rifle ranges. I prophesy that just as much money will be spent on that service this year as ever. Then, there is a reduction of $4,150 on the Royal Military College. If you add all these together you have an estimated reduction of $234.500. But there will not be a reduction. Practically all that money will have to be expended. Then you have an admitted over-expenditure as compared with last year of $191,000, and in last year's estimates there was $155,000 for the coronation contingent, which was exceptional. If you add these three sums together, you have an admitted increase of the militia expenditure of this year over that of last year of $580,000. Is this a reduction of the cost of militarism in this country, or was I right when I said that we were drifting more than ever into the vortex of militarism? I want my hon. friend to think of this. I know that he is a militarist, but a few jolts such as he has received to-night will set even him thinking.

Militia and Defence—customs dues, $125,000.

Mr. CARVELL. On what basis does the minister estimate a reduction of $75,000?

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). It is estimated that there will be fewer deliveries of orders from the old country. The expenditure for 1911-12 will be heavy, but that for 1912-13 will not be heavy, and the deliveries on the old contracts are all made.

Mr. MACDONALD. Is my hon. friend importing heavy guns this year?

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). There are some to be delivered this year which were ordered two or three years ago.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I would like to know what items are embraced in the amount of $173,850, of appropriations which are stated to be not required for 1912-13. It is by deducting that amount from the total expenditure that my hon. friend makes the increase only $191,000. If he leaves that out, the total increase will be $364,850.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). The amount of $173,850 is made up of $155,000 for the coronation, and $18,150 not required.

Mr. PUGSLEY. That was expended last year.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). I know, we put that in here.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Yes, but it is put in differently. My hon. friend will see that the effect of putting it in that way is to reduce his increase of expenditure from $364,350 down to $191,000. I cannot for the life of me see why my hon. friend should have put in that $173,000, and then have used those figures in order to show that the actual ordinary expenditure this year is not as the figures show, some $350,000 odd dollars more than was the ordinary expenditure last year.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). I am doing simply what the ex-Minister of Public Works did in his own department again and again. The Auditor General requires it to be so published.

Mr. McKENZIE. I would like to know from the minister, if it would not be giving away any military secrets, whether he is placing any new guns in the batteries in the Citadel at Halifax.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). If the hon. gentleman would be good enough to come to the department I will show him all the details in connection with the matter. I can say, however, that I have not given any order for any guns at Halifax.

Mr. McKENZIE. For the security of this country we ought to have the very best guns placed in those batteries, and if they are not there now they should be put there and no criticism will be offered from this side.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). If the hon. gentleman will be good enough to come down to the department I will be glad to show him what is proposed in regard to Halifax.

Mr. PUGSLEY. The minister says that there appears in the estimates of the Department of Public Works an amount which was utilized the previous year for some special purpose, and for which there was not a similar appropriation in the current year, and it was used in order to show a decrease. That is not the case. If my hon. friend will take the estimates for this year of the Department of Public Works he will find that although the appropriation is not required, or added in the column of the previous year, yet the alleged decrease is not shown in any of the columns. Neither is it shown in the estimates of the Department of Railways and Canals. I do not know if it is shown in the estimates of any other department, but it seems to be specially shown in the Department of Militia and Defence, and my hon. friend will see that it conveys an entirely erroneous impression. It is calculated to give the idea to the House and to the country that there has only been an increase of $191,000 upon the ordinary militia expenditure, whereas the hon. gentleman knows the increase is $364,350.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). Will the hon-gentlemen tell the House that every time the estimates for the Department of Public Works were prepared, they were not prepared in the way I state? If he does he does not know what he is talking about.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I think I stated that the amount did appear, but it is not carried out into a column showing decreases.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). Neither is this.

Mr. PUGSLEY. If my hon. friend will look at the militia items on page 48 he will see that the appropriations not required for 1912-13 are carried out to a special column under the heading of decrease, and that amount is added in, in order to show a decrease. You do not find that in the estimates of the Public Works Department, or in the estimates for the Railways and Canals Department, and I doubt whether you will find it in any other department. It is only the Militia Department that has adopted that plan. Why has there been a different rule followed in regard to the Militia Department from what has been adopted in the case of the other departments referred to?

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). On all matters we find a decrease for 1912-13 in the Public Works estimates.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Yes, but you do not find the amount carried into a column as showing a decrease. If my hon. friend looks at it he will see the difference.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). I do not see any difference whatever.

Mr. PUGSLEY. If he had left that out of the column showing a decrease, the actual increase upon the ordinary expenditure would be $364,350, whereas it is shown in this column as being only $191,000.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). Will my hon. friend explain how we could add up the estimates for 1911-12, and make it $8,121,850, and subtract from $8,312,850, the appropriations required for 1912-13, without getting anything else than $191,000. That was done in the case of the Public Works estimates last year, and the same thing was done in every estimate that was ever brought down. The point the hon. gentleman is making, is not well taken. All he has to do is to subtract the total estimates of one year from the total estimate of the previous year.

Mr. PUGSLEY. If the hon. gentleman will turn to Public Works of Ontario, he will find in the column of 1911-12, the appropriation not required for 1912-13. Those refer to Public Works which have been completed, and therefore they no longer appear will not appear in the estimates of 1912-13. The point I wish to make is this: The actual increase upon the ordinary expenditure is $364,350, and in order to reduce it down to $191,000, the hon. gentleman has added in two or three items in regard to services which are past and gone, which ought not to appear, which could not appear during the present years.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). Does the ex-Minister of Public Works say that an expenditure of $155,000 should be kept out of these estimates? The hon. gentleman will find in his own department for last year, 1911-12, the sums to be voted, and the sums to be voted for 1912-13, and then he will find set apart on the right hand, the increase and decrease in separate columns. Will the hon. gentleman tell me how he could take the total figures for 1911-12 and subtract them from the estimates required for 1912-13, and get any other sum than $191,000. He cannot do it. He knows that the law requires the amount to be there, and the Auditor General requires it there and it is figured up in that way.

Mr. PUGSLEY. If the hon. gentleman will take the appropriations for harbours and rivers, he will find there is no column showing a decrease.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). Dare we leave out that sum of $155,000 in preparing our estimates? I ask the hon. gentleman that question.

Mr. PUGSLEY. What I say is, that the effect of dealing with the details of the Militia department differently from what you deal with the details of the department of Public Works, is to convey to the committee an entirely erroneous impression.

Mr. SHARPE (North Ontario). The hon. gentleman has not answered the minister's question.

Mr. PUGSLEY. But does not my hon. (Mr. Hughes, Victoria) see that in the details of the Militia Department he has a column showing increases and decreases which does not appear in the details of the Department of Public Works. He is entirely in error in the statement he makes, and does not he see that the comparison made misleads one who reads these accounts.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). No, but I am determined that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Pugsley) shall not mislead the House. The details are given here for one year and for another year, and the increases are shown and the decreases are shown. If you subtract one from the other you get the right figures. That is what is required by the law, and any child can make the subtraction.

Mr. PUGSLEY. In the Public Works, there is no column showing decreases——

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). There is a total for each year.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Let me ask the hon. minister this question, apart from what I say in regard to this column showing increases and decreases, is not this true?—that upon the ordinary expenditure for military purposes, as between the coming year and the year that will close on the 31st of this month, there is an actual increase of $634,350?

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). No. If the hon. gentleman will turn to page 4, I will convict him out of his own mouth. Item XVII is 'Public Works—Income, $18,614,-030.71, for 1911-12; and $14,515,380 for 1912-13; authorized by statute, $15,000; total, $14,530,380, a decrease of $4,083,-650.71'. There is the very thing that the hon. gentleman claims is not done. We have done the same thing in Militia and Defence except that instead of having separate columns we put both in one column and indicate increase or decrease with a plus or a minus sign. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Pugsley) should know what the law requires.

Mr. PUGSLEY. My hon. friend persists in misunderstanding me. I say that in all departments, the Auditor General puts in the amount for the previous year and the amount for the coming year in separate columns. But in the case of the Public Works, when you come to the details, the amount of appropriations not required for the present year is not carried into the column and added to the decrease. You will not find that in the detail of the Public Works or the Railways and Canals. Why the Auditor General has allowed it to be put in the Militia Department and possibly some others I do not know.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). But I have just shown the hon. gentleman that I do find it in the Public Works.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Not in the details. At the bottom of each section appears 'appropriations not required for 1912-13.' In Public Works these amounts are not carried out into the column showing decrease, but in the Militia and Defence they are.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). Will the hon. gentleman show how it should be done to comply with the law?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Do it as it is done in the case of the Public Works. If the hon. gentleman will look at page 58, he will see at the end of the Nova Scotia votes, a line 'appropriations not required for 1912-13.'

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). The hon. gentleman is dealing with the details, and we do not want that.

Mr. PUGSLEY. It is the details that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Hughes, Victoria) is at now?

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). No. If the hon. gentleman will turn to the militia votes and wipe out the increases and decreases—take that away entirely——

Mr. PUGSLEY. My hon. friend will not add to the regularity of the debate by interrupting.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). Well, go on.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I am speaking of Public Works for Nova Scotia, and you will find there the line that I have just quoted. That means that these services have been performed, and there is no necessity for further appropriations for them. Now, see what was done in the Militia. There is a column which we do not find in Public Works, and the column shows the decreases as compared with the previous year. And there is added to these decreases the total of these appropriations not required for 1912-13, including such extra services as the expenses of the coronation. It comes to this, and the hon. minister will not deny it, that upon the ordinary expenses of the coming year, as compared with the ordinary expenses of the year about closing, the expenditure is $364,350 greater instead of about $190,000 as one would suppose on looking at this column of decreases.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). Does not the hon. gentleman see that in the coming year there may be items—for instance, we are building a drill-shed here. Suppose this drill-shed cost $10,000 last year; this should be put in and ear-marked, because it will not be used for another year. The fact is the hon. gentleman (Mr. Pugsley), is in a hole and is trying to argue himself out of it. I have shown him that on page 4 he will see the thing exactly, except that we, instead of having it in two columns have it in one with the plus or minus sign. The law requires it, the Auditor General demands it, and we observe the law. If the hon. gentleman did not observe the law when a minister I am not responsible for it; I am sorry to say that that is true of many of the things that were done under the late government.

Mr. PUGSLEY. But the Minister of Finance is doing exactly the same thing with respect to the Public Works for the coming year as was done last year. He has not added the appropriation that was not required in the column of decreases.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). If the hon. gentleman will turn to page 78 he will find the same thing is done as is done in the case of Militia and Defence.

Mr. PUGSLEY. That is the lighthouse and coast service.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). It is absolutely in accordance with the instructions of the Minister of Finance.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Why does not he do it in the case of public works?

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). It is done in the case of public works.

Mr. PUGSLEY. No.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). I refer him again to page 45——

Mr. PUGSLEY. My hon. friend knows——

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). I have the floor, and the hon. gentleman will excuse me; it is my turn. On page 77 and 78 he will find the same thing.

Grants to associations and bands, $58,000.

Mr. KAY. Would the minister tell us if there is any truth in the report published in the 'Free Press' to-night that the government are leaving Rockliffe and buying a lot of land on Lake Deschènes for rifle purposes?

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). The matter is under consideration. We are not in a position to give any details yet.

Mr. KAY. Would the minister state what is the reason for leaving Rockliffe?

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). It was found necessary to acquire certain additional lands at Rockliffe, some 200 acres. We found the price asked was enormous, amounting to about $150,000, and it was also found that the ranges would be comparatively inadequate. A number of officers of the department were looking elsewhere to see if we could get a better area. I would not like to say too much about it at the present time, I have gone as far as I can in the matter.

Mr. KAY. Has any option been taken on the property?

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). Yes.

Mr. MACDONALD. Who is acting for the government?

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). Colonel Biggar has charge of the matter.

Mr. MACDONALD. Who is the real estate agent?

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). Colonel Biggar does all the buying.

Mr. MACDONALD. Have you come to any decision yet as to where you are going?

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). Not finally decided.

Mr. CARVELL. This item refers to grants to associations and bands. I want my hon. friend to consider the advisability of increasing this item. I have always felt that perhaps one of the greatest pleasures of militiamen is the possession of a good band, I believe a good band is a good recruiting agent. One of the great difficulties of militia organizations is to keep up their band. The hon. gentleman knows that the officers all over the country have to contribute of their own substance, they are asking the municipalities to contribute, and have to get up entertainments to keep up a military band. I think I am safe in saying that once in about five years they go to pieces and have to be re-organized. I think the hon. gentleman might well take out of the millions he is spending a greater sum to assist the bands, and it would be more profitably expended than the money he is spending, for instance, on automobiles.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). I have now found the vulnerable point in my hon. friend, he is a lover of music. I have great pleasure in saying to him that his views and mine are in exact harmony, and I will be only too glad to meet his views.

Mr. MACDONALD. What subsidies will my hon. friend give to the pipers?

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). It is always a pleasure for me to hear pipe music, although most people dislike it.

Mr. GRAHAM. The minister says his views are in accord with those of my hon. friend from Carleton, N.B., (Mr. Carvell). As my hon. friend from Carleton, N.B., says, it is a difficult thing, particularly in a small place where they don't get many encouragements, for the militia associations to keep up a band. In the town of Brockville we have what is called the 41st Regimental band, I think one of the best bands in the Dominion of Canada. We all contribute a little to keep up this band. Not only is it a splendid thing for the town, but it is a real assistance in recruiting the regiment. I represented to the former Minister of Militia that as these bands were composed of young men, who gave their time freely and with very little pay they might well be more liberally supported by the government without a big drain on the treasury. The young men in these bands are usually mechanics who work hard in the day time, and spend their evenings in practice. In addition to that, they are not ordinary men, because they must have a good deal of musical ability. I think no better addition to the expenditure could be made than to encourage these bands. I hope the minister, in his supplementary estimates, will put in an amount for the encouragement of regimental bands.

Mr. LALOR. And to encourage country bands generally.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). I heartily agree with what the hon. gentlemen have said about that. Any one who ever commanded a regiment knows that it is quite an expense to officers and men to keep it up.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax). Do the grants go to the leaders of these regimental bands?

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). I do not know the details. The grant is made to the band, sometimes as much as $150. However, I will be delighted to meet the wishes of the hon. gentlemen, and I have requested my department to put an item in the estimates for that purpose for another year. I hope now that the hon. gentleman for Carleton, N.B., (Mr. Carvell) and his friends will allow the rest of these items to go through with a sweep.

Mr. MACDONALD. Don't forget the pipers.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). Certainly not. I count the pipers as musicians.

Mr. MACDONALD. What do you pay the pipe band?

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). The 59th Glengarry had a very nice band a few years ago. They received a band allowance.

Mr. MACDONALD. Both of these Highland regiments have regular bands and then they have the pipes. I do not think there has been a special grant in that case. Where there has been a grant it has simply gone for the band itself and not for the pipe music. I would like the minister to take that into consideration.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). There is one important matter that has not been touched on, and that is that the band men have to pay a high duty on instruments coming into this country. Officers of the Highland and other regiments who cannot get their uniforms made in this country have to pay very high duties. I have been endeavouring to make an arrangement on the old basis so that these things will come in free of duty, but the present Minister of Customs, like his predecessor, is invulnerable, and I have been seriously considering whether I should not put a vote in the estimates to pay the customs duty on that class of articles, in addition to the guns, etc., which we import. In bringing in these instruments the boys have to pay the duty out of their own pockets.

Mr. CARVELL. I think that in the past the band instruments for purely regimental bands have been allowed in free of duty; at least that was the law years ago.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). Yes, but that has all been changed.

Mr. MACDONALD. I would support the minister if he would give us more music and less automobiles.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). No, we will have 24 more automobiles next year.

Mr. KAY. Would the minister state whether there is any provision made for giving the cadets rifle practice in their camps?

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). That is the intention.

Mr. KAY. I wish to make a suggestion with regard to the annual training, and that is that the officers be compelled to take the rifle practice.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). It is now optional with the officers to take rifle practice.

Mr. KAY. I think not.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). I think that an officer can take it if he chooses. Above all things an officer should not only be able to teach his men, but to show his men how to shoot. I will look into the matter and let the hon. gentleman know, and if it is not the case I will promise him that it will be the case.

Mr. KAY. In the last four years in the camp at Farnham the officers have been refused rifle shooting.

Mr. CARVELL. There is another matter that I want to bring to the attention of the minister specifically, and that is the grant to these rifle associations. I have stated here to-night, and I wish to reiterate, that in my opinion the only real benefit we get from this expenditure is in the efficiency achieved by the men in rifle shooting. We only spend $58,000 on bands and associations altogether. In my opinion, the only real training which the militia enjoy is in rifle shooting. That is the important thing, and while we are spending some money in teaching these men how to shoot at camps of instruction, and possibly also spending some money at the different rifle clubs, it strikes me that in order to keep up the interest in rifle shooting you have to have regular associations, and in that way the men become proficient to some extent. The object of every rifle club and of all training in the militia is to qualify a man to be an expert shot. You may say that the man does not go there for the money he gets, but notwithstanding that, we must remember that many of the best shots in the country are not wealthy men, but that as a rule they are poor men and the men who would have the greatest interest in rifle shooting are the men who really feel that the prizes they can win mean something to them. They are an inducement to the rich man as well as to the poor man. When you consider the enormous amount of money we are spending on the militia you will, I am sure, agree that we can afford to increase the grant to encourage rifle shooting. I do not know whether we have increased the amount in the last 25 years or not.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). Very little.

Mr. CARVELL. Very little, if any. A great many years ago when I was younger, I took an interest in rifle shooting and used to attend the meeting of the provincial rifle association. My recollection is that the association received $1,300. However, with the increase of the militia estimates from $3,000,000 to $8,000,000 there has not been a proportionate increase in the branch of education which really should be encouraged, and that is rifle shooting. I think the minister might very well increase the grant even if he has to cut down something else.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). I was the father of a proposal, and now it is coming back to me, and I am asked to carry into practice the theory which I advanced while in opposition long years ago. At the present time the great meeting in Canada for competition in rifle shooting is the Dominion of Canada Rifle Association meeting. It is absolutely impossible for men to come here from a distance and compete. The people of Ottawa, Brockville, Kingston, and others living in places within easy distance of the ranges enjoy a great advantage over those who live at a distance. The chance of winning the King's prize at Bisley is the hope of every rifleman in Canada and, while I appreciate the assistance given by the provincial rifle associations to rifle shots to come here and take part, those who live in the maritime and the western provinces are handicapped as compared with those who live in Ontario and Quebec. The proposition I have made is that we should pay the transportation expenses of one man who has never won a prize in the Dominion Rifle Association matches from each corps. I think that would encourage the boys to practise at home and to compete for the privilege of coming to Ottawa. Let the government pay the transport only, not the entrance fee, of one man from every unit, even from the most remote part of Canada, to Ottawa. If my hon. friends have any suggestions to make in that regard I will be glad to hear them.

Mr. SHARPE (North Ontario). I think that the idea of my hon. friend the Minister of Militia and Defence is a good one, and I also think that the suggestion of the hon. member for Carleton, N.B. (Mr. Carvell) is along the right lines, because the ultimate object of the training which is given in the militia is to produce good shots. I would like to see the minister allow the captains of the companies to nominate one or two shots, and give them their transport to the annual meeting of the provincial associations.

Mr. CARVELL. I am afraid you would have trouble there. Each man must work his own way to the meeting.

Mr. SHARPE (North Ontario). I do not think so. Most of the men who attend the association meeting are pot hunters. You cannot get men to go to the association meeting and compete with good shots. If the minister would allow the officers to nominate two, three, or four men and give them transport to the provincial association meeting it would give a great impetus to the shooting, and the best men then could come down to Ottawa, after having gone to the meeting of the provincial association, at the expense of the department. That would produce a great deal of interest in rifle shooting, it would encourage young shots and not pot hunters, and it would be a move upon right lines.

Mr. CARVELL. At this late hour I do not propose to discuss the question in all its details. The idea of the minister, I think, is a good one. But I am afraid that if he allowed these men to be appointed or selected by the commanding officer there might be a charge of partiality. I would prefer to let each man win his own spurs in his own corps. That is a matter of detail. I have no doubt the minister will be able to work out something.

Mr. MORPHY. At the annual camp in London two years ago, the Militia department placed in the hands of the men the Ross rifle, and told them to shoot with it. At that time the regulation was, that the men would be paid the increase for efficiency in shooting and as the men were absolutely unacquainted with this rifle, the result was miserable shooting, and widespread discontent with the department and criticism of it by the men. That extended through the whole western district of Ontario, because the men thought it was a trick of the government to take from them the pay they would otherwise have earned, in addition to the miserable pittance they receive. I cannot conceive that any government would descend to such a practice, nor do I make such a charge against the late government, but the result of it was, that the men fell away from the regiments, in pique and anger. I would ask the Minister of Militia to bear that incident in mind. I believe that mainly because of it, the 28th regiment did not go into the annual instruction camp last year, and owing to the widespread discontent that prevailed, because of the incident, it has had the effect of practically killing the regiment. It seems to me that the Minister of Militia would be well advised to make a note of that. Then, with regard to regimental bands, I may say that the 28th regiment's band has been dead for years, and the regiment has to depend for its music on the Grand Trunk band, of the City of Stratford. The Wellington regiment the 30th once had a splendid band, but its headquarters are now fifty-five miles away from the regimental headquarters. I mention this, so as to impress upon the minister that if the regiments are going to have bands, they should be regimental bands at headquarters. For my own part, I feel that whether through intent or not, the regimental service of this country has fallen to a very low standard, and I think something should be done. After listening to the remarks made by hon. gentlemen on both sides, I have come to the conclusion that there is no way in this country of developing the militia service other than through the training of the young men of the country in the schools and colleges of the Dominion. You cannot get men in this country to go out for seventy-five cents and a dollar a day and wear out a pair of four dollar boots in the dews of the morning, for fun and pleasure. You have to recognize that times have changed. There has been a good deal said about automobiles to-night. I think the whole department wants to be shaken up, and if the minister will use an automobile for himself instead of giving it to his officials, and go over the ground in one of these machines, he might be doing a great service to the country.

Mr. MACDONALD. What is the attitude of the National Rifle Association with regard to the sights on the Ross rifle?

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). I heard unofficially, that the Dominion Rifle Association had communicated with the National Rifle Association, and that the latter have agreed to violate their own law and accept certain sights (the Birmingham Small Arms company's sights, etc., made in the old land, is attached to the Ross rifle), they break their rule in that the mode of attachment disfigures to a certain extent the woodwork. I am not expressing any opinion on the matter one way or the other. I am waiting further information.

Mr. MACDONALD. I hope the minister will not agree to any such proposition.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). I have nothing to do with that.

Mr. MACDONALD. I hope he will not agree to it in so far as his consent is concerned. There is no reason why the Sutherland Rifle sight should not be used attached to the Ross rifle as it is. The theory upon which the objection is based is that as it is attached the difficulty is it would interfere in actual warfare with the use of the rifle, but that seems ridiculous when they substitute for that method an attachment on the side, which manifestly would be of no value whatever in warfare as it would be broken off and lost immediately. The policy of the department has been to encourage this Canadian industry which manufactures sights in Canada, and I hope the minister will carry out the position he indicated he would take when we discussed this question before.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). The minister is not in the habit of changing very readily.

Mr. NESBITT. Is anything done to encourage rifle clubs in the country?

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). The regulations give the rifle clubs one dollar per member up to forty members besides one hundred rounds of ammunition.

Mr. McKENZIE. In my county we have an excellent regiment but there is no band in connection with it. There are however some very excellent bands in the county and if the minister engages bands to accompany the regiment to camp I can tell him that he can easily find a very excellent band in my county. I hope the minister will make some arrangement with the colonel of the 94th to give the regiment a band when they are going into camp.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). The regulations provide that no man can wear a uniform in camp unless he is sworn in for three years, and that applies to the band. Of course, in case a bandsman should not be able to return the following year, I have never known a commanding officer so short-sighted as to force that man out. In many cases the band is not really part and parcel of the regiment, although it is supposed to be. The proper plan would be for the band in my hon. friend's town to regard itself as part of the regiment, and they would soon discover that the people would recognize them as the 94th band which would be a help to them in getting engagements. The regulation with regard to the band rests with the officers of the regiment.

Headquarters and district staff, $183,000.

Mr. CARVELL. What is the cause of the increase in this vote?

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). There is an increase under General French's report. I am ready to justify that report and to give satisfactory reasons for this whole staff expenditure, which has been gradually growing in the last four or five years. At first I was very much opposed to it, but during the last four or five years I have come round. We have, by arrangement between the colonies and the empire, an Imperial general staff, and Canada has the advantage of having, in every division and district, an Imperial staff officer from the old country, who is loaned to us for two years, in order to train up our men. These officers were not getting the pay which appertained to the same rank and position in the old country; in other words, they were losing money by coming to Canada; and there is an increase of $300 each to ten of these men, to make the pay the same as that of the corresponding rank in the old country. Otherwise we could not expect them to remain.

Mr. CARVELL. I must tell my hon. friend that that information is not satisfactory to me and it will not be satisfactory to the country. The sooner we admit that this general staff has reached unreasonable proportions, the better it will be for all concerned. No man need tell me that it it necessary to have 61 permanent officers, at an average of $3,318 each, to look after merely the routine affairs of the militia in Canada, and that does not include the $21,600 authorized by statute for the military members of the Militia Council. There is something wrong in the general principle. A general staff as proposed by General French may be all right in England, where they keep an army to fight; but we keep one merely for the purpose of assisting the civil authorities to maintain order in case of necessity, and to provide a nucleus that may be necessary in times of trouble. Look at the utter ridiculousness of the whole proposition. Here are officials, who are paid fabulous salaries for the amount of work they are doing, receiving this year an increase amounting to more than one-third of the increase to the 60,000 citizen soldiers of Canada. There is no use of my hon. friend telling me that this is a complicated question. This is not common sense, and I hope my hon. friend will be able to give a better reason next year.

Mr. TOBIN. I am somewhat surprised to see these increases in the expenditures of the Militia Department over what they were last year without hearing from our good friends on the other side, especially from the province of Quebec. During the election in Drummond and Arthabaska, I was in that part of the province, and there the Minister of Public Works, with tears in his eyes, told the farmers what a bad government we had in Ottawa, especially since Sir Wilfrid Laurier went into power in 1896, because he had doubled and trebled the expenditure in the Militia Department. He said the Minister of Agriculture was spending only about 15 cents per head in the interests of the farmers, while the Laurier government was spending on the militia $1.50 a head, and still they were going to build a navy which would cost this country fifty or sixty million dollars. I do not see the Minister of Public Works in his seat to-night; nor do I see my intelligent young friend, the member for Nicolet (Mr. Lamarche). He was one of the men I happened to meet on the public platform in Drummond and Arthabaska. I have a great deal of respect for my hon. friend the Minister of Militia, because I think he is honest and takes a great interest in the militia of this country. But during the last election what did these hon. gentlemen say in the province of Quebec? They said: They were not going to have Sam Hughes and Dr. Sproule. Is Mr. Borden going to surround himself with these Orangemen who appeal to race and religion in the province of Ontario? We would never belong to such a party, a party that voted for the Autonomy Bills which took separate schools from the French minority in the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan. That is the language we heard. I am sorry the Minister of Public Works is not in his seat to-night, because no man in this Dominion has made more appeals to race and religion or has created such feeling among our young French-Canadians, among our young French priests, that they feel that the English-speaking Protestants of Ontario want to do away with our religion. That is the way they talk to the young men in the district of Quebec; I did not know what work the Postmaster General did in the province of Quebec; I did not meet him on the public platform; but I have read his paper, 'L'Evenement.' Hon. gentlemen have read that paper and they know what appeals our opponents have been making in the province of Quebec. Now these hon. gentlemen come here and tell us that we must forget everything, and that we must not speak about race or religion. But, Mr. Chairman, the Liberal members from Quebec never appealed to race or religion.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. TOBIN. Hon. gentlemen on the other side may laugh, but I represent a county, the population of which to the extent of 75 or 80 per cent are French speaking people. Five per cent of the balance are probably English-speaking Catholics, and the remainder are English-speaking Protestants. Well the votes of 75 per cent of the English-speaking Protestants go to the present member for Richmond and Wolfe because he does not make racial or religious appeals.

Mr. BENNETT (Simcoe). Oh, oh.

Mr. TOBIN. The hon. member may laugh, but we know him of old. I will say, as my leader always says to that hon. gentleman, that we do not pay any attention to him. We have got to that stage with the hon. gentleman, and I am sure I shall not pay any attention to him to-night.

Mr. BRADBURY. We have had enough of this kind of stuff in the House, and I appeal to the Chairman for his ruling.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I think the hon member for Richmond and Wolfe is wandering a little from the item under discussion, and I take the liberty of drawing his attention to the fact.

Mr. TOBIN. I bow to your ruling, Mr. Chairman, and will confine myself to the subject under discussion.

Mr. BENNETT (Simcoe). I made your leader sit up last night did I not?

Mr. TOBIN. Let me tell the hon. gentleman that the right hon. leader of the opposition is known too well throughout this country for the people to pay any heed to anything the hon. member for East Simcoe may say concerning him. As far as the province of Quebec is concerned, the leader of the opposition stands with the people to-day as he has never stood before. Now let me tell the Minister of Militia that the farmers of this country will ask how it is the Militia Department can buy automobiles. It is really too bad for us to have got to that stage in this country, when the public moneys could be expended to far better advantage. I would like to see the minister cut the item for automobiles out. I do not blame him for paying 20 per cent or probably $3,000 more than he should have paid. I know him too well to think that he would desire to make a dollar out of any transaction, but let me tell him that the farmers of Canada object to paying for such expenditures as this. Why does not the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Paquet), who has been denouncing the militia in the province of Quebec, get up in this House and oppose these items?

Mr. SHARPE (N. Ontario). Why did you not offer any opposition to them before?

Mr. TOBIN. This is the first time, as far as I know, that the Militia Department has proposed any expenditures for automobiles.

Mr. SHARPE (N. Ontario). Is the automobile item the only one you object to?

Mr. TOBIN. I object to this one and to other items also. You know, Mr. Chairman, what denunciations of militia expenditures were made by hon. gentlemen opposite who came from the province of Quebec, when they sat to the Speaker's left. I am sure also that you, Mr. Chairman, if you were not in the Chair to-night, would be asking the present Minister of Militia not to increase that expenditure.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). I want to thank the hon. gentleman for giving me the explanation of why I am so very popular in the province of Quebec. As long as my opponents roundly condemn me I am happy, and from what the hon. member says I have been denounced from one end of the province of Quebec to the other.

Mr. TOBIN. Yes, by your own friends.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). When my Liberal friends or my Tory friends meet me I am happy to receive them with open arms. I am satisfied that the attempts to arouse prejudice in the province of Quebec against ministers from the province of Ontario are simply taken by the people of that province, no matter how enthusiastically and earnestly those attempts are urged from the platform, with a grain of salt, and very little attention is paid to them.

Mr. TOBIN. I would like the present Minister of Militia, when he said he did not blame the Nationalist ministers on account of making appeals to race and religion in the county of Drummond and Arthabaska, to have been present at one of those meetings and heard the language used regarding himself, as well as regarding the Liberal party. I can assure him that had he been there he would not have felt very well satisfied.

Maintenance of military properties, $89,000.

Mr. H. BOULAY (Rimouski) (Translation): Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe is not entirely in accord with the facts when he states that we raised the race and creed cry during the election in Drummond and Arthabaska. I say that, on the contrary, that policy was followed by himself and his friends. From 1896 to 1911, they constantly appealed to sectional and racial prejudices. We had to fight them for fifteen years on that ground.

Mr. TOBIN. Mr. Chairman, I think that the hon. gentleman is out of order; he is quite astray from the item under discussion.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I must say that the hon. gentleman is answering the remarks made by the previous speaker. Once the door is open it is pretty hard for me to close it. I hope that every member will keep to the item under discussion.

Mr. BOULAY (Translation): I regret that the hon. member for Richmond should have taken such a stand. He stated, among other things, that we had vowed that never Messrs. Hughes and Sproule would be members of the government. I never said anything to that effect in my constituency. I deny outright having ever said anything of the kind. I had no business to say so, for this very good reason that I knew I would not be called upon to lead the government of the country.

These gentlemen have their opinion as I have mine, and these opinions are entitled to respect. As far as the militia expenses are concerned, I agree with the objections raised against those expenses. The policy upon which we have made the last election in 1911 was partly on the reduction of the expenses for the militia. We specially objected to the establishment of the naval service, and we said also that the expenses for the militia were too high. We said that in 1896 the Liberal-Conservative party was expending only $1,500,000 for the militia, whereas in 1911, under a Liberal government, those expenses were of $7,000,000. As far as I am concerned, I am quite willing to take the responsibility of my pre-election statement and to renew them before the House. Those expenses are too high and, were the hon. Minister of Militia ready to reduce them, I would surely give him my hearty support.

I say as I already said in my county, that the militia appropriations are too high as compared with what we give to the agriculture. Neither can I approve the item for automobiles. I fail to see their usefulness in the military service. I am quite willing to condemn now such a policy, the same as I did during the last elections, according to our programme. I do not deny what I said then, and I say that the hon. minister should reduce this expense.

Mr. TOBIN. Will the hon. minister allow me to put a question?

If I understood him right, he thinks that the expenses for the militia are too high.

Mr. BOULAY (Translation). Yes, they are too high; and they were thus been increased under the Liberal government. I am ready to condemn such an expense, even when it is made by the present government.

Mr. TOBIN. The hon. member for Rimouski (Mr. Boulay), has admitted that he was against the increase of the expenditure for militia. He also admits that during the last election in Rimouski he used that against the government. And my hon. friend has only to go back to 'Hansard,' to his speech of last Tuesday night, and that will bear out what I said as to the language he used about the Speaker of this House:

Ordinance, Arms, Lands and Equipment, $1,300,000.

Mr. EMMERSON. I desire information with regard to the proposed armoury for Moncton. A year or so ago an officer of the Department of Public Works and an officer of the Militia Department from Halifax were sent to select a site, which was afterwards expropriated for the purpose of an armoury. I do not know in what position the matter is now. I hope progress is being made, and that the construction of the armoury will be expedited.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). I do not know the details of this case, but there have been a number of cases in which armouries were erected that were found not to be satisfactory. It might be they had no place for the officers to meet, or perhaps no place for the cadet corps or the boy scouts; no place to hold a fat-stock show or an automobile show or other public exhibition for which such buildings may be properly used.

Mr. CARVELL. Surely the hon. gentleman is not going to allow fat-stock shows in the armouries?

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). They did before my time, and I hope they will again.

Mr. CARVELL. I succeeded in having a fat-stock show in the armoury in my town and I was nearly excommunicated from the military church on account of it. I thought it was a very proper proceeding.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). I think so too.

Mr. CARVELL. I said: before you drive your stock there, put sawdust on the floor.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). That is right.

Mr. CARVELL. There was a lot of talk about it. They wanted to insure the place for $50,000 or $60,000 for the week of the show. But that was not done. It seems to me that as these armouries are built with public money they should be used for every thing that will not interfere with the use for which they were first intended.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). Hear, hear.

Mr. CARVELL. That is one point on which the minister and I agree. Another point is the Ross rifle. When this vote is expended how many rifles will there be belonging to the militia of Canada, supposed to be in good condition and brought up to date?

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). I am informed that there will be about 95,000, but I have not the exact figures here.

Mr. EMMERSON. I may say to the minister that the official who came from Halifax, took into consideration the question of sufficient room, and in selecting the site he had all these matters in view. I think the minister will find there is ample room, that the site is one that will do the department great credit. I bring that matter up to remind the minister of the conditions that prevail and ask him to have inquiry made and to see that action is taken to utilize the site.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). I desire to have this question of the use of drill halls understood. I am not a crank on this subject, and I do not want to waste a dollar of public money. I am sincere and enthusiastic in looking upon the training of the militia and of the cadets as one of the best things for the country, and I know that the heart of the country is with me in that. These drill halls are going to cost money. But I have been experimenting with all sorts of plans and discussing the matter with architects and others, and I am satisfied that we are now in the position—it was due to the action of my hon. friend from North Simcoe (Mr. Currie), who drew my attention to a building in his town that was being used for an armoury—to provide these buildings much more cheaply than formerly. These are not extravagant buildings. For a country village with one company, room would be provided; where there are two companies the building will be suitable. When it comes to a city the size of Moncton, I believe that the place should have a suitable armoury. It is due to such a city from the government of this country, and the armoury should be a place that could be used by the scouts, the cadets, and the militia. Also philanthropic organizations and others should be allowed to use it—anything for the development of the people so long as it does not rival other buildings. That is the rule we have established. The public own these buildings, and the public should have an opportunity to use them.

Mr. LALOR. What are we to understand the minister to mean when he says that the public should have the use of these buildings? It seemed to be the policy of the late government, so far as my county was concerned, to allow the use of the drill halls for skating rinks. And if the drill hall was not properly located for a skating rink, it was up to the hotel man or anybody else who happened to require the building for a skating rink, to have it moved so that it would be well located for that business. I visited a pretty good-sized town in my county a few years ago just before the militia was called out to camp. The captain of the local company took me around to the drill hall, owned, as the Minister of Militia says, by the people of Canada, and showed me this drill hall which had been used as a skating rink all winter and which had two feet of slush in it so that the militia could not use it for a drill at all. To say that the public should have the use of these buildings is all right so far as agriculture and other purposes are concerned. But I think it a mistake that the drill halls of the country should be used as the late government allowed them to be used—and I speak by the book—allowing them to be turned into skating rinks.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). That is not a public use.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Could not the hon. gentleman utilize a portion of this vote for the purpose of taking care of some of the old forts in different parts of the country? I have in mind more especially Fort Howe, in the city of St. John, which is now completely neglected. The attention of my hon. friend (Mr. Hughes, Victoria) has been called to it. The former Minister of Militia had an examination and survey made of the grounds with a view to making some improvements. The cost of making improvements would be trifling, but they would be of great advantage to the city. Had the former Minister of Militia remained in office, I think he would have carried out these improvements. If the amount cannot be taken from this appropriation, perhaps the minister would think of providing for it in the supplementaries.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). In conformity with the hon. gentleman's request, I took the matter up with the Council. There is no secret about it. There was a most hearty response from every member in the Cabinet. Whether there will be an item in the supplementary estimates, I am not in a position to say, as the hon. gentleman knows. But I can assure him that his suggestions were most favourably received. Not only St. John, but every other place in the country will be brought to notice. A lot of things have been saddled upon the Minister of Militia that do not properly belong to him. I think that item would more properly come under the Battlefields Commission, and if the matter can be so arranged, they should assume the responsibility of carrying it out.

Mr. LALOR.

Mr. McKENZIE. I wish to call the attention of the minister to the armoury in the town of Baddeck, in the county of Victoria, the headquarters of the 94th regiment of Highlanders. The armoury is a small one, and I have been trying for years to get it enlarged, and also to get a drill shed built, in connection with it. Last year I succeeded in getting the Minister of Militia to send an officer from Halifax down there to make a report upon the condition of the armoury, and what could be done with a view of enlarging it with the addition of a drill hall. I also asked him to make a report upon obtaining a rifle range at that point for the 94th. I wrote to the present minister in the early part of this session inquiring for the report of that officer, but I have not yet received a reply. I want to point out to the minister that the town of Baddeck is rather a fashionable place of resort for Americans in the summer time, it is a beautiful spot on the Bras d'Or lakes, and we would like our military buildings to look up to date. The building at Baddeck is a low set one thrown into a field, with nothing around it to suggest that it is a military building. I hope the officer has made a favourable report in regard to the rifle range, and that the minister will proceed to act upon it.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). I have no recollection of the details of the case. I remember my hon. friend asking me for a report on the matter, and I sent to Halifax for it, but it has not yet come to hand. However, I will make inquiries and find out. Nothing is too good for the old 94th.

Mr. CARROLL. I would like to bring to the attention of the minister the condition of the armoury in the city of Sydney. There is a military property there now, I do not know whether it is at the present time the property of the Dominion government, or of the Imperial government. We have a regiment at Sydney, which is a thriving town of over 20,000 inhabitants. There are many young men who are much interested in military affairs, both cavalry and infantry, and they wanted me to bring to the attention of the minister, the fact that an armoury and drill shed are required in Sydney. There are some buildings to which the military people of Sydney have access, but they are on ground which a few years ago, belonged to the Imperial government. I would like the minister to investigate this matter. I would also ask him to tell me if there has been an application from Sydney for a rifle range, and what success the application has met with.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). Speaking from memory, there is some application about a rifle range in Sydney. The rifle men of Sydney have provided a range of their own; I do not remember whether they want us to take that over or to buy a better range. I shall send down a man to report. I can assure my hon. friend that all applications of that sort have my hearty sympathy. I am prepared at any time to come down to the House and face all adverse criticisms for the erection of these drill halls all over the country. I believe they are very necessary in the interest of the country.

Mr. CARROLL. There will be no adverse criticism of the minister from the people of Sydney.

Mr. CHISHOLM (Inverness). I would ask the minister if anything has been done with regard to erecting an armoury in the town of Inverness? Last year I made an application to the late minister, and he sent an engineer down to report. I have seen the report. It appears that a certain site was recommended by this engineer, but I have received no further information. I would ask the minister if it is his intention to erect this armoury in the town of Inverness. It is as necessary there as in any other part of the country. He will find as good militia material in the county of Inverness as he can find in any other place in Canada.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). Judging by the appearance of the hon. gentleman and his friends from that part of the country, it seems to be inhabited by a splendid race. I do not know the details about Inverness. I think an application has been made for an armoury. It would not take over $15,000 for a company armoury, and it would come out of this vote.

Mr. CHISHOLM (Inverness). I wish to emphasize the fact that an application has been made. The town of Inverness is a growing mining town, with a population of about 4,000.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). There are a great many hon. gentlemen who are anxious to get these drill halls and armouries and to get the militia force in proper shape. There are, however, hon. gentlemen who feel called upon to oppose the militia expenditure, but let me call attention to the fact that if we look over the items we could cut down by millions expenditures which are not anything like as essential as the expenditures for drill halls and for the upkeep of the militia. I will ask these hon. gentlemen to look with a pleasant eye upon these expenditures and I am satisfied that they will see their way clear to give their assistance to the legitimate desire for the erection of drill halls all over the country. It may be said that there is an adverse public opinion in the country, but I would say that that so-called adverse public opinion is something which is not real. I am satisfied that so long as the public are assured that these expenditures are being legitimately carried out they will approve of this determination to have drill halls erected in every part of the country.

Mr. LALOR. I sincerely hope that the Minister of Militia will be sympathetic with the hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House who are now pleading for drill halls and armouries. We have had some little experience in connection with that. I remember that, when I sat on the other side of the House, I pleaded session after session for a public building in my own town and I never got the sympathetic ear of a minister sitting upon this side to any demands that I might make in that respect. I hope that the Minister of Militia and the Minister of Public Works, who now are sitting upon this side of the House, will have more sympathy with those gentlemen who are now sitting on the other side of the House than they have had with us when they were sitting on this side of the House and that the Minister of Militia and other ministers will use their judgment in putting up buildings, not in little places of 800 or 900 inhabitants, as those hon. gentlemen did but will look to those places which have been suffering for a great many years and have been penalized because they sent a Conservative to parliament.

Salaries and wages, $168,000.

Mr. CARVELL. I notice here that, for the rank and file of caretakers, $1.50 a day is allowed, and that the chief caretakers of the large armouries receive as high as $3 per day. Would the minister tell me how he distinguishes between the ordinary armouries and the larger ones?

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). I am informed that the chief caretakers are employed in large places where there are two or three different regiments or batteries, and that is where the extra charges come in.

Schools of instruction, $100,000.

Mr. CARVELL. Even at this late hour I think the minister will pardon me if I make one or two brief remarks in connection with these schools of instruction. I am pleased to see that he is increasing this amount and I hope he will, if necessary, increase it to a much greater extent than he is doing at the present time.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). I am bringing these schools to the doors of the people in place of requiring the people to go to them.

Mr. CARVELL. That is what I am coming at. You never can get the average militia officer to go to the central school at Kingston or any other place. We have been trying that ever since the inauguration of this system of training. Once in a while there is a man who is an enthusiast and has plenty of money who will go, but I am safe in saying that perhaps the greatest detriment to the militia is the rich man's son. The man who is able to get a commission because he has some money or because he is rich is the most useless piece of furniture that you can have in a regiment.

Mr. GRAHAM. That is not personal to any of us. You cannot offend any of us in that way.

Mr. CARVELL. I can tell the minister, and I know that he must have met it in his own experience that there are dozens of young men who have accepted commissions, and who have been compelled to allow these commissions to lapse simply because they could not afford the time to go to the schools of instruction. In my own constituency there are bright young men who would be a credit to any commission, but they are trying to earn their own living and the only policy is to bring the instructor to the officer even if you have only three or four officers to bring him to. In the last three or four months, officers —I do not say the general staff—but men very high up in the headquarters staff, have discouraged the formation of these schools, and have told officers in the maritime provinces that they cannot send men down there to hold these schools, but that they must send their officers to Kingston. I presume that possibly if a man went to Kingston and took the three months course, where he would be in contact with the regulars, he might perhaps get a better training than he could get at home, but if you cannot get your officer to go there is it not better to send the instructor to him? That raises another question, and I hope the hon. minister will not think I am unduly criticising him if I find fault with the class of instruction which is given in the artillery and engineer's courses. To-day the education of the engineer officer is a strictly technical, mathematical proposition. An officer who had received his artillery training fifteen years ago would not know by the language what they were talking about to-day if he went to school and attempted to take a course, or if he went before a battery or a company of engineers and attempted to instruct them, especially in artillery. A man who is not abreast of the higher mathematics, geometry and trigonometry, is not in a position to understand what they are talking about. I will give an illustration. Not long ago I visited a camp of instruction in Canada and I found an artillery officer, a sergeant, who had been sent down to instruct the brigade in field artillery. He was engaged in range taking, he went through a certain formula, and he announced that the range was so much. I happened to be there as an interested onlooker, and I told him he was wrong. He said: I am right, and I said: You are wrong, because you are violating one of the principles of mathematics, which is that the two sides of a triangle together are greater than the third side. I got him to go over his formula again, and he found that he was wrong. This instructor did not know whether he was right or wrong. I realize the difficulty my hon. friend will have in getting men who are mathematical scholars, but if he is going to make the engineers and artillery work what it should be in this country and which can only be made possible by the efficient education which they should receive, and without which they might as well stay at home, because if they came into actual hostilities they would only be massacred, he cannot afford to spare money to give this proper education to the officers.

I hope the minister will see that the education is taken by the officer, and above all that the right kind of education is so taken. An ordinary drill sergeant sent around the country cannot instruct officers on these technical questions. Within the last week I have been trying to get a school in my own town, and I was practically told that I must have a brigade and a certain number of officers and non-commissioned officers, and my reply to the minister was that if you had to get a class of twenty or thirty in some of these localities you would not have a class at all. If you are going to have the militia of any value as a force you have to spend money in the proper way, and I am speaking from experience. If the minister would send his instructors to organize the schools wherever he could get three or four officers together there would be much more value obtained for the money.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). I agree with my hon. friend (Mr. Carvell) on the question of the schools, and the first act I did after becoming Minister of Militia was to try to carry out his idea. We have seventy of the best non-commissioned officers on the force going all over the country this winter. The technical education relates to engineers and to artillery, and is the kind of education the staff officers of the old country are giving to our officers and non-commissioned officers throughout Canada. In Quebec there is Major Robertson who cannot be surpassed in the whole world for the value of the higher class technical education he imparts. Those gentlemen are ready to go into country places and wherever they can get a couple of officers together give them instruction.

Mr. KAY. Where is the Webb infantry equipment made, and who is converting the back-sights on the ten thousand Ross rifles?

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). The contract for the latter was given last year, I think, to the Sutherland Rifle-Sight Company in New Glasgow. The Webb equipment is bought in England through the war office, at war office prices.
