> The incomes of those who are working but whose incomes are inadequate by reason of family size (even after the increase in the family allowances proposed above) or by reason of the nature of their employment should be supplemented under a single general income supplementation plan with built-in work incentives.

So exactly how the problem that the hon. member has raised is going to be met is the subject of study and consideration at the present time. Although I do not think we will be in a position to bring forward an answer to this problem in time for consideration with the other family allowance bill, it is the type of problem on which I hope to have some proposals during the course of the next year.

[Translation]

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Chairman, I would like to comment very briefly on this important bill before us. Incidentally, I would like to point out that it is not always the most ponderous bills which are the most important and which bring the greatest quality and satisfaction to the population.

I also congratulate the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) for having found a way to introduce so comprehensive a bill while using so little paper.

That being said, I would also like to add that society has evolved extraordinarily in the last forty-odd years. I recall that, when I was young, people were hoping for legislation which would authorize the payment of family allowances in Canada. I remember also having become a proponent of this. I was not in politics, but I was certainly concerned with social and family matters. And then, some very narrow-minded people accused us of simply propagating marxist ideas because, as they said, to give money for nothing, that was communism. So, they could not realize that we live in society precisely in order to give ourselves more economic advantages, to better succeed in life and that Canada was a country which could give itself such a law.

Today, you do not hear about these charges any more and all seem convinced of the fact that we must absolutely pass ever more measures designed to safeguard the rights of families and individuals.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare, in his speech on second reading last Friday, said that the principle underlying an immediate increase in family allowances was a stronger purchasing power for needy families, families with low and middle income, but I say that if this measure is good—the benefits being $12 a month—to fight inflation and increase the income of low and middle income families, we would all the more obtain better results if it were raised to $20.

● (1650)

Perhaps I will be told that this would be more costly and that taxes would have to be raised. In my opinion, my colleague from Rimouski (Mr. Allard) stated in his remarks rather valid ideas in this connection and about the means which might be used to finance higher family allowances within the framework of the current system. Anyway, I ask the minister—to whom I have already spoken—to introduce an amendment to this effect since a member cannot do so.

As for me, I would have appreciated it if the increase had been retroactive to September 1, 1973 because it was school opening day and because it is the time when expenses are highest to prepare children for school. I calculated that this would cost approximately $4 million. Maybe retroactivity in this field will surprise many people. But if you think it over, the future of the young is being mortgaged for various other reasons and for years to come. If, from time to time, we should adopt a retroactive measure for families I think no one would complain.

I would like to deal with another point. More and more mothers have to work to increase the family income and meet the family necessities. The principle of a direct income to the mother is slowly progressing. Earlier I heard a member mentionning it; the principle is making its way. The family mother is also entitled to security and to income. For example, in Germany, a law has been adopted which guarantees to the mothers, to the housewives a monthly income of $300 to $400. People give statistics saying that the housewife works considerably, that is the same number of hours as plant employees, but I for one would be very hard put to say the exact number of hours that housewives and mothers work each week.

I was brought up in quite a large family and I never counted the time that my mother dedicated to the family. Everyone knows that mothers are very generous with their time to keep house and take care of the children.

If we passed a legislation providing some income for mothers, they could stay at home, take care of the children, have some security, all this while contributing to the family income. This would also give a chance to young people to go to work.

Young girls often ask me to help them find a job as a secretary, etc., in any field where they are ready to work, and they often make the following reflection: Why is it that we, young people, who have followed courses, hoping to get a job, are put aside so that mothers can have these jobs.

I believe that we should make up our mind one day to give some security to mothers, thus allowing young people to find jobs and thus reducing unemployment considerably without having to ask mothers to make sacrifices or ask parents to spend money. I think we should consider this very seriously. I am sure that the minister is already convinced. We will have to find a formula, with the officials of his department so that we can table appropriate legislation during the present session. This will be innovation in Quebec, but it will in any case be innovation and evolution in the right direction.

I want to say in all honesty that during this session I have been, until now, satisfied with the social security legislation which has been passed, especially as concerns income security.

We are therefore on the right track and I hope that this may continue. We must not stop, because if we do, we shall lose time. We must then continue while there is still time.

I would not want to take advantage of the indulgence of the House, but I have here a lot of documentation which shows that many families still do not have the minimum vital income. Here are the figures for the city of Toronto:

A family earns $50 less than the vital minimum.

On the other hand, the Economic Council of Canada published the following in its report:

Four million Canadians live in poverty.

And then an article in the La Presse newspaper states that:

One third of the population of Montreal lives in poverty.

Now, those are figures and quotations that should stir in us a deeper interest in the problem.

We should think of our own underdeveloped. We often hear of those overseas, in Africa, Asia, but we often forget that we can find some, every day, on our own Canadian soil.

Indeed, I agree that we should help underdeveloped countries. I also agree that we should help our own poor even more, to give our country greater social stability, to avoid being faced with deplorable dissention which inevitably harm the national balance and often the harmony and prosperity in our country.

So, while it is still time, we should of one accord endeavour to achieve that objective. That is why I suggest, once again, that the minister consider seriously, while we are at work, the possibility of moving an amendment to make the increase retroactive to the 1st of September and, secondly, of increasing the rate immediately to $20. That would make four months' more allowances to be paid, I know, but if we really want to fight poverty and inflation, if we sincerely want to increase substantially the purchasing power of families, to meet their needs, to my mind we can no longer put it off.

In any event, I shall vote sincerely for Bill C-223; however, if it is amended in the way I have just suggested, if the law allowed me, I would vote three times to approve it.

Clauses 1 to 5 inclusive agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When shall the said bill be read a third time?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): By leave, now.

Mr. Lalonde moved the third reading of the bill.

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) put us into such a nostalgic mood that I, too, should like to personalize for a moment. He is the father of family allowances and the whip of his party is the recipient of them, at least that is how they put it. I want to recall that when we were dealing with the orange paper and we had visions of $20 a month, I told the minister at the time I was going to give urgent family consideration as to whether I should amend my own personal family planning and endeavour to overtake the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang) in relation to this $20. Upon careful consideration, and this was purely an intellectual decision as there were no inhibitions otherwise, I decided not to pursue that course. I might have known that was the right decision, because we do not have the $20 as yet and I would have been misled by the lure, shall we say.

Let me say, as well, that we are happy to have reached this stage. As the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert) has said, the size of the bill is not what counts. Neither does the length of speeches count. Because we have not spoken very much this afternoon or at any great length is not an indication that we are not interested in this bill as much as anyone else. We generally feel, in our party, that once we have spoken on a matter, that is it and we do not have to continue repeating.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Macquarrie: I should like to be helpful to the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Knight), the whip of the NDP, in respect of his reference to the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens). I do not know what his party caucus is like, as I have never attended, but in our caucus we have no gags or guillotines. I might also suggest to him that he might be very well advised to listen to the hon. member for York-Simcoe who has much understanding of the great economic problems facing this country, problems which have not been dealt with adequately by certain parties here.

● (1700)

I am glad that we are passing this bill without amendment because I agree with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre that it is a well drafted bill. One of my professors used to say there is a great difference between good English and legal English, and there is an even greater difference between good English and bureaucratic English. I am glad that from a bureau sometimes a bill in good English can emerge. We are not pursuing the debate on third reading. However, I wish to say with candour and without rancour—I have not brought rancour into my discussions in this House in these many years—that if this bill achieves speedy passage, it is not because of the pilotage of the minister but despite it. He opened discussion on this bill with an extremely partisan prelude. It was unwelcome, it was unprovoked, it was unnecessary, it was unhelpful, it was unworthy, and it was also undocumented. I heard it. That is even worse. I was here.

I want the minister to know that when we give a commitment to support a measure, we do so, and that when we want to oppose it, we will jolly well oppose it. I do not take kindly to a suggestion, when we make a commitment on the part of our party, as the minister implied in his smart aleck manner to the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander), that we then change our mind. We indicated our intention. We said we were supporting the bill. If the government ever again is able to produce something with some grain of good in it, we will take the same attitude. It is my hope—I do not wish him personal ill—that he will not be around all that long and that in the days to come we will have better bills and better ministers.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I simply say that we welcome the opportunity to give this bill third reading. We look forward to the House being given the opportunity to proceed with Bill C-211 in plenty of time so that its provision for a family allowance of $20 a month can be in effect in January.

[Mr. Macquarrie.]

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, my colleagues and I are very pleased to see that we are now at the final stage of the legislation.

I would like merely to comment on some observations that we heard and I think that if there is unanimity among federal members, the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) will be in a better position to influence his provincial counterparts so that the welfare rates now in force in the provinces—and, as far as I am concerned, in the province of Quebec—will not be reduced to destroy the efforts made at the national level to enable families, particularly those with low or middle incomes, to earn more. I hope that the media will play their part before the consultations between the minister and his provincial counterparts; they should know in advance the position adopted in this House and that should make it easier for the minister.

In fact, as pointed out by the hon. member for Bonaventure-Îles de la Madeleine (Mr. Béchard) a moment ago, that happened in the past and resulted in frictions, jealousy and disagreement which were detrimental to our families.

Because it is an important matter and in view of the goodwill of all parties, I hope the families will indeed get the entire allowance and that there will not be any fishing excursions in the meantime so that they could say: Well we will give the increase within a month, after having reduced it. This should not happen, in view of the emergency of the situation, and I do hope that, as soon as the bill will come into force, we will not read in the press that the allowances have decreased in this or that province.

[English]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I shall not embark at this stage on an argument or a sermon.

An hon. Member: Just apologize.

Mr. Lalonde: Any citizens who bother to read Hansard, are capable of making up their own minds. I wish to thank all members for their support of and contribution to this bill. I am sure Canadian citizens will be grateful to parliament for having given them this measure and for whatever help it will bring to so many Canadian families in the difficult times they are going through. Thank you.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Perhaps I should draw to the attention of the House that there are other speakers who would be entitled to take part in the third reading debate if they felt they should. I gather there are none.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

CROP INSURANCE ACT

REIMBURSEMENT TO PROVINCES FOR PARTIAL ADVANCES ON CROP INSURANCE PREMIUMS

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture) moved that Bill C-129, to amend the Crop Insurance Act, as reported (without amendment) from the Standing Committee on Agriculture, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Whelan moved that the bill be read the third time and do pass.

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to have the opportunity to say a few words with respect to Bill C-129, to amend the Crop Insurance Act. On March 29 the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) moved that the bill be read a second time. There was a short debate which did not resume until April 18 when the bill was referred to the Standing Committee on Agriculture. The bill was considered in committee on Tuesday, June 5, and Thursday, June 7, and on the later date the bill was reported without amendment.

The bill was, and is, of considerable importance to all the provinces of Canada in that it provides for the payment of 50 per cent of the premiums paid on behalf of insured persons if no contribution is required from the federal government toward the administration expenses of the provincial plan.

The provinces were very anxious that the bill be passed in order that they be in a position to advertise the plan and to encourage farmers to participate in the program. Despite the fact that the opposition parties indicated that they would not delay third reading, this government did not consider that this bill should have top priority and parliament recessed toward the end of July without the bill having been placed on the order paper for third reading.

As a result, the governments of the three prairie provinces at least underwrote the premiums for the farmers on the assumption that this bill would be passed. I think they deserve credit for their action because the record of the present government is such that to underwrite such a program on the anticipation that the bill would be submitted for third reading and passed is like playing a long-shot at the horse races. The provinces at present are anxiously awaiting the passage of the bill as they are unable to prepare their program for 1974 until they know that the bill has been passed.

On several occasions subsequent to June 8 and prior to the summer recess, questions were put to the Minister of Agriculture to determine when the bill would be submitted to the House for third reading. Despite promises of the minister to bring the bill before the House for third reading, the House recessed without the bill having been considered. I had the privilege of attending in Calgary, as an observer, the western federal-provincial conference. The Minister of Agriculture was also in attendance. I could hardly believe my ears when the minister stated that the bill was delayed and not given third reading because of the obstruction of the House leader of the official opposition.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

An hon. Member: Did you say that, Gene?

Mr. Whelan: I certainly did, and the record shows the facts.

Mr. Neil (Moose Jaw): The record is fairly clear on what transpired and I think it shows that this party and other opposition parties were prepared at all times.

Mr. Whelan: To give unanimous consent? That is not so, and you know it. You had many opportunities to do it.

An hon. Member: You wanted it passed without debate.

Mr. Whelan: I don't give a damn if you don't pass it. The farmers of Canada want it.

An hon. Member: All of a sudden he is the farmers' friend.

Mr. Neil (Moose Jaw): I think the minister has sufficient experience in the House to know that it is the government and not the opposition parties that decide what business comes before the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Neil (Moose Jaw): Furthermore, the opposition has no say in determining the order of business.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Neil (Moose Jaw): I think the record shows that this party at all times was prepared to give quick passage to the legislation on third reading, and that the delay in passing this bill rests squarely on the shoulders of the government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Neil (Moose Jaw): I think it is important that we understand that the Crop Insurance Act is an act designed to offer the farmer protection against crop loss caused by natural hazards. It is a form of income stability in that it attempts to guarantee to the farmer a portion at least of the cost of production. It is a program that gives some protection to the grain producers on the Prairies. But I would like to point out that it is not a program that gives any protection or guarantee to the producer of livestock, and in this regard I would like to recommend to the minister that consideration be given to widening the program to assist those who are attempting to earn their livelihood from livestock production.

I think it is also important to understand that crop insurance legislation is simply legislation to protect the farmer in the event of an emergency situation. It is legislation which allows the provinces to develop their own plan of insurance with respect to hazards that are covered, the extent of the coverage and the determination of the premiums.

I can only speak for the province of Saskatchewan when I say that a reasonably good plan has been developed under the umbrella of the legislation which has resulted in a 100 per cent increase in the contracts issued between 1972 and 1973 and an increase in coverage from $29 million in 1972 to $139.8 million in 1973. However, while we welcome this legislation, I repeat what I said previously, namely, that it is legislation only to cover an emergency and unfortunately it is not indicative of an over-all policy on the part of the present government to develop an agricultural program.

A farmer taking out crop insurance can be compared to a merchant taking out fire insurance on his stock-in-trade. It keeps him from going into bankruptcy in the event of a catastrophe. The taking out of fire insurance does not ensure that his business will prosper. In order for his business to prosper he must have a policy that ensures that he will be able to sell his goods at reasonable prices and derive sufficient profit to make a living.

The case of the farmer is similar. The farmer can take out crop incurance to protect himself in the event of an emergency, but he must be in a position to sell the grain and livestock that he produces in order to realize a reasonable profit. The marketing of grain over the past number of years has been in the hands of the Canadian Wheat Board, and therefore the farmer is dependent upon the government to develop a policy of marketing. It is important that the policy take into consideration, not only the short-term but the long-term variables in the market.

Unfortunately, the present government does not seem to have any agricultural policy which would create stability so far as agriculture is concerned. In fact, I question whether it has a policy at all. First of all, we have a situation where the authority with respect to agriculture is divided between the Minister of Agriculture, the minister in charge of the Wheat Board (Mr. Lang), and the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Jamieson). I suggest that until such time as agriculture is dealt with by one minister, we cannot have a co-ordinated policy. What we have at present reminds me of a three-horse team with each horse pulling in a different direction.

First of all, the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board forced the farmer to embark on what was called the Lift program. He not only encouraged but forced farmers to reduce their wheat production in spite of the fact that indicators in the world situation pointed to the fact that there would be a shortage of food in the immediate future. Having cut back on production through fire sales of wheat, the government completely reversed its policy. As a result, the government and the Canadian Wheat Board asked farmers to produce the maximum amount of grain in 1973. In the meantime, due to fire sales of wheat and long-term contracts, farmers have found themselves in the position of having the grain that they have produced being delivered at a very low price at a time when export prices are very high, and they will not receive the benefit of the high world prices, at least not in the 1972-73 crop year, and it is unlikely that they will do so in the 1973-74 crop year.

The same minister who involved the farmers in LIFT earlier in the spring promised a feed grains policy which would be equitable to all grain producers and livestock producers in Canada. But the policy was not announced until August and has led to considerable confusion in the minds of many of the western farmers and of the livestock producers throughout Canada, primarily because the minister in charge of the Wheat Board and the Minister of Agriculture have not seen fit to explain the policy fully.

Last week the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) announced a domestic wheat policy. But what has happened to it? Was it really a policy? In three days the minister in charge of the Wheat Board increased the subsidy from $1.25 to $1.75. It appears to me that the agricultural policy of the government is a panic policy. It is time the government, in consultation with provincial ministers of agriculture, farm organizations and farmers developed a comprehensive, long-term policy for agriculture, a policy that will give stability to our agricultural economy.

While we welcome this legislation, Mr. Speaker, and intend to give it speedy passage, it should be made clear that we consider it as legislation for emergency situations only. We do not consider it legislation which is part of an agricultural policy, simply because for this government no agricultural policy exists.

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I had thought that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan), who is in his seat in the House, would have had something to say about agriculture on this occasion. We have been trying, without too much success, to get the Minister of Agriculture or the minister in charge of the Wheat Board (Mr. Lang) to make some clearcut statements on their policy. We have been trying to do that ever since the House reconvened to deal with the railway strike. Indeed, we asked them to do so before the House recessed for the summer. But again today the Minister of Agriculture has not seen fit to do so.

Recently, the Minister of Agriculture went to Toronto and talked to the mushroom growers. He tore strips off both parties on this side of the House. He could go to Toronto and recite the failings which he chose to attribute to us, but he cannot come into this House and say what the government is going to do. He could not rise from his seat this afternoon and tell us in detail his policies for agriculture.

This afternoon we are talking about a crop insurance bill. My party is wholeheartedly in support of the changes it proposes. So far as I know, the party to my right is also in favour of the bill, even though the minister says it is not. Crop insurance and improvements to the crop insurance program are all excellent. But what about income? I received a letter from the minister the other day. I had written to him asking him to foretell the future of the sheep industry in Canada, particularly in western Canada. There are people in my constituency who put money into the sheep industry. He said in reply that the support price program the government had for wool has failed. If I remember his words correctly, he said it did not serve its purpose. It is no wonder the program did not serve its purpose; the government did away with it. People who put money into raising sheep in my constituency are so disgusted that they are getting ready to quit. That is the situation in Saskatchewan. I do not know what it is in the rest of the country. The wool growers talked to my party, and we know they are a very discouraged group of people.

The minister's reply also pointed out that prices on the open market, so to speak, had gone up in 1973. That is the excuse he and his colleague in charge of the Wheat Board are relying on for not coming forward with positive agricultural policies. They are maintaining an agricultural support price policy of 80 per cent of the average of prices over the previous ten years. Mr. Speaker, that is not a support price policy; it is a disaster. It is useless.

Mr. Whelan: I never said anything about it.

Mr. Gleave: I know the minister did not say anything about it. If I were sitting over there with a support price policy like that, I would not say anything about it either. In his speech in Toronto he said that the opposition had prevented the government from passing its grain stabilization bill. You bet we did, Mr. Speaker. That was a companion piece to the agricultural prices support policy. It would have left the farmers locked into disaster prices. If the minister does not believe that those were disaster prices, let him take the time to read statements made by Gordon MacEachen, president of the Agricultural Economics Research Council.

Mr. Whelan: He is just reading my old speeches.

Mr. Gleave: Then maybe the minister should read some of his own old speeches.

Mr. Whelan: When I want to feel good, I do.

Mr. Gleave: The wheat producer will still be subsidizing the domestic market. If the minister in charge of the Wheat Board could have got away with it, the producer would be subsidizing the domestic market by 75 cents a bushel more than is stated in the minister's latest announcement. I emphasize the minister's "latest announcement" because he has yet to come into this House with legislation or an order in council. This is no way to deal with an industry as important as agriculture which in my province accounts for 75 per cent of its real earning power. I do not think it is good enough for the Minister of Agriculture to make such statements in Toronto as, "The opposition for years has fought every move we tried to make in parliament to establish Canadian agriculture on a sound and solid footing."

The only thing that pulled agriculture out of the doldrums was a world shortage of food. There was a world food shortage, but neither the minister nor his colleagues brought legislation before the House that the opposition could support. It is time we had something better than this type of statement by the Minister of Agriculture.

The statement goes on to say that the opposition parties in the House are playing games, they are playing politics with farmers and with the agricultural industry. If the Minister of Agriculture thought that, why did he not say so in the House? In any event, why did he not come in with an appropriate piece of legislation and put his case before the House? If he thought that the opposition, and my party in particular, had nothing to contribute to the welfare of agriculture, why did he not say that in the House? He has not done that.

At present, the feed grains program is such that prices are satisfying neither the western grower nor the eastern consumer. That policy still hangs in the air, so to speak. There was to be a statement by August 1, then there was to be a statement by September 1, and after that there was to be one by the middle of September. We did have a reasonable feed grains pricing policy at one time, although I do not know what in the world will be left of it by the time the two ministers responsible are through with it.

If the minister thought that the present policy was such a good idea, why did he not try it on soybeans which have increased in price a good deal more than barley and wheat? Dairy farmers and hog producers in my constituency buy soybean meal, even at present prices, to be used as protein. In Saskatchewan, nobody pays the freight bill from Toronto or Altona in order to make meal available to farmers in Saskatchewan. You just pay that kind of freight, and the government is not saying that it will do something about the price of soybeans and subsidize the guy who is feeding livestock in western Canada. Instead of indulging in rhetoric—

An hon. Member: Mushroom rhetoric.

Mr. Gleave: —yes, mushroom rhetoric, the Minister of Agriculture should get down to cases and bring out a program for Canadian agriculture that will put it on a good footing so that farmers may farm with confidence. If the government does that, there will be adequate food supplies for Canadians who, instead of being forced to pay feast or famine prices in the chain stores will, as a result of sound pricing policy, be able to buy food on the shelves at reasonable prices. I suggest in all seriousness that the government bend its efforts along those lines and look at the complete agricultural picture and not just at the little corners where it thinks something must be done.

As far as the crop insurance bill is concerned, I think the minister said that we support it. One can look at the record and see that when the crop insurance changes came before this House, they received the support of my party.

Mr. Whelan: And I said this last night, too.

Mr. Gleave: Yes. Then what in the world is the purpose of making statements like the one to which I have referred?

Mr. Whelan: On the front of the release does it not say "Notes for an address"?

Mr. Gleave: I don't care if these are notes for a speech. It is the whole damn approach I object to.

Mr. Whelan: I could send the hon. member the tapes, if he wants them, and he could listen to them.

Mr. Gleave: Mr. Speaker, I have quoted extracts from these notes which, according to the front of the release, come "from the office of the Hon. Eugene F. Whelan," and so on. As far as I am concerned, the Minister of Agriculture bears some responsibility. If he wants to get up in this House or anywhere else and say that such and such a thing is the case, that is his right. But I suggest that it is not his right to go around—

Mr. Whelan: Well, I suggest that it is.

Mr. Gleave: Yes, perhaps that is his right.

Mr. Paproski: Why don't you two go behind the curtains and argue this out?

Mr. Gleave: But this is irresponsible.

Mr. Whelan: It is not.

Mr. Gleave: I suggest it is irresponsible—

Mr. Whelan: Why does the hon. member not talk about crop insurance? We are here to debate crop insurance.

Mr. Nowlan: If you can quit quibbling, we will get on with it.

Mr. Whelan: You people had a good chance to do that. It could have been passed by unanimous consent on two or three occasions.

Mr. Nowlan: We said we would get on with it.

Mr. Whelan: I don't care what was said.

Mr. Nowlan: Well, we do. What does the record show?

Mr. Whelan: I don't care what the hon. member is saying, as the record shows that they did not take the chance to pass the bill.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I do not know if the remarks of the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Gleave) are coming through. There seem to be quite a few interventions. The hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar has been recognized by Mr. Speaker and he has the floor.

Mr. Gleave: Mr. Speaker, in conclusion, in case there is any question about our position on this crop insurance legislation, let me say that we favour it. It will be a worth-while measure. It will assist to stabilize the income and production of farmers. That is the purpose of the bill. I welcome the opportunity afforded by this afternoon's debate to correct some of the erroneous impressions that have been left in the countryside, and to set the record straight.

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, I, too, am pleased to participate briefly in the third reading debate on Bill C-129, an act to amend the Crop Insurance Act. I listened with a great deal of interest to the remarks of the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Gleave) and to some of the very misleading interjections of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan). When the minister speaks I hope his remarks will conform with the record, let alone with the rules of this House.

I was interested in the remarks of the speaker who led off this portion of the debate. The hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Neil), outlining in a general way the purposes of Bill C-129, the crop insurance bill, said that it was to protect farmers against certain natural disasters or natural hazards. As I said, I listened to him with interest. I had read the bill previously but I read it again. The one thing I could not find in the bill was any provision which would protect farmers against one of the worst natural disasters from which they could suffer, namely, the Minister of Agriculture.

[Mr. Whelan.]

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nowlan: If the minister would amend the bill and incorporate a provision relating to that natural disaster, I know that we on this side of the House would pass it without further delay because we would be doing the farmers a service.

Mr. Whelan: The record will show what is what.

Mr. Nowlan: The hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar quoted from the minister's notes for an address to the annual meeting of the Canadian Mushroom Growers Association at Toronto. I think the minister has been speaking too long and too often to the mushrooms and toadstools of the land. He thought he could fool the farmers of the land with the type of remarks he made last night, in just the same way as he tried to fool them with the type of remarks he made in Alberta several months ago when he accused the House leader of my party of holding up this minor piece of legislation, as he calls it. Not only has the minister done a disservice to society; he has insulted the intelligence of farmers of this land because he thinks they cannot see through that type of loose rhetoric.

Mr. Whelan: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, the record shows that the House was asked for unanimous consent on two occasions to pass this bill and that on at least two occasions that party refused such consent at the instigation of their House leader.

Mr. Nowlan: Someone from the rump or the prices committee, which is almost the rump, said "Right on". Let's leave the prices committee and Beryl Plumptre for those plums on the opposite side who speak about right on.

I want to get to the record before me and to the two committee reports. We had a total of three hours and ten minutes during two days' debate in this House. That involved a total of 13 speakers of which the Conservative Party produced only four. If that is a filibuster, blackmail or non-co-operation, this minister had better get back to the mushroom patches of this land so the farmers can get on with serious business.

I am glad the minister raised his point of order. It was my next point in the natural, orderly, logical sequence of these few remarks.

Mr. Lefebvre: Keep it non-partisan.

Mr. Nowlan: I always do. I always try to keep it objective and conforming to the record, something which members opposite find hard to follow. Bill C-129 was given first reading on January 22, 1973. As the hon. member for Moose Jaw said, it was given second reading on March 29. The debate on that Thursday started at eight o'clock in the evening. There was a total of eight speakers, ten pages in Hansard. We know how much Hansard is full of loose pages. On that occasion there were three speakers from the Conservative Party, two from the New Democratic Party, one Social Crediter, the minister and one other Liberal. It is rather remarkable that there were eight speakers between eight and ten o'clock that evening.

The next great hold-up, the next great insult to the farmers, was on a Wednesday. When participating in the debate on April 18, the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Murta) said he was disappointed the minister was using this bill as a filler. On April 18, the second and last day this bill appeared in the House of Commons, there was a grand total of five speakers. Those speakers did not begin until after the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) presented his orange paper to deal with the blues of Canadians because they did not have an adequate social program. Members commented on the orange paper. Two committee reports were presented. This was followed by a debate on the Judges Act, debate on the Aeronautics Act, and routine proceedings. There were five speakers, 16½ pages of Hansard, on that occasion. This minister who knows mushrooms, and certainly knows tomatoes—

Mr. Whelan: And I know politics and I know what you are doing right now.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nowlan: As the hon. member for Moose Jaw said, in terms of the order of government business, if this Minister of Agriculture had influence in the cabinet he would get the government business affecting farmers on to the floor of the House of Commons in direct relation to the volume of voice he has used to try to bamboozle the farmers across this land. The House of Commons has been meeting since January 4 of this year and we have had a total of 13 speakers on this bill, four of whom were from the Conservative opposition.

An hon. Member: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nowlan: You were not there. You do not know. You are a nice man, and I would not want to involve you in crop insurance or any other type of insurance because you would be a poor risk. Your insurable interest in terms of the life of this parliament may not be that much.

Where did the great hold-up come? Where was the non-co-operation and filibuster? The bill was referred to the Standing Committee on Agriculture, which met twice. On Tuesday, June 5, the committee met for an hour and 18 minutes. It met at 9.44 and at 11.02 it adjourned to eight o'clock the following Thursday, June 7, when the committee considered the bill for an hour and 50 minutes. There have been 13 speakers in the House, and a total of three hours consideration in two committee meetings. Yet the minister is trying to say that the opposition, Conservative, NDP and one independent, has held up this bill. The only thing that has held up this bill in the House of Commons is that in his present capacity the Minister of Agriculture is a voice in the wilderness.

Mr. Whelan: Tell us how fast you passed the veterans affairs bill.

Mr. Nowlan: Although the minister has made some good speeches, telling audiences what they wanted to hear, he does not have the guts to be frank with them about the crop insurance bill. He picked a poor bill about which to say there has been a filibuster.

Mr. Whelan: I did not say there was a filibuster.

Mr. Nowlan: The hon. member for Laval (Mr. Roy) knows what happened in that committee. I am glad to see the chairman of that committee here. He knows full well what happened in committee. The debate on the merits of this bill in committee was not that long because no one protested them. As the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar said, it does not pronounce any new policy. In committee, the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Towers) introduced an amendment. The chairman ruled it out of order for procedural reasons. It was a money bill and an amendment to an amendment. Then what happened in the great onslaught against the farmers of this land? The committee unanimously passed a resolution put forward by the hon. member for Red Deer. I will not read the entire resolution. It appears in Votes and Proceedings for Friday, June 8, and reads in part:

> Your committee recommends that the government consider the advisability of amending the Crop Insurance Act to include provisions for total insurance on a spot-loss basis against actual loss arising from destruction of or damage to a crop or crops, otherwise insured under this act, from one specific hazard in any area or areas in a province.

If I have misconstrued, misinterpreted or been selective in my summary of a very short record on a very small bit that does very little for the farmers of this land, I want the Minister of Agriculture to stand in his place and correct me. It was the effect of that resolution which was unanimously passed in committee that caused most of the debate in committee.

The minister knows full well that whenever the bill was brought forward it was another filler, just as it is today. It was slipped in today because we passed the family allowances bill and a few others previously. The minister is a great fellow, but because of the party to which he belongs we obviously have differences from time to time. However, as a minister of the Crown it was unbecoming of him to maliciously malign the House leader of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition and say that we held up the insurance bill when he knows full well that whenever the government House leader was asked what we intended to do in this debate he said we wanted to do what I am about to do. The hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar got close to doing it. We always wanted to have some debate to find out what the minister did with the unanimous resolution of the committee, a resolution that would do something for crop insurance. It would extend the terms of this bill so that the farmers of this land would have a lot more protection from natural disasters, rather than this man-made one. That, Mr. Speaker, is the reason our House leader was not prepared to say, whenever the question came up and the government House leader was looking for a filler; Oh, yes; we will let third reading go without putting up a speaker."

I, like other members who have an interest in agriculture, was amazed, even though one of the ministers of agriculture who is absent doesn't know what the agricultural areas of Canada are, that the minister did not speak first. Perhaps I would not have spoken had he told the House what he was prepared to do about the resolution extending the terms of the Crop Insurance Act so that it would become even more meaningful to the farmers of this land. He did not do so and all I can say is that it was a disappointment.

I do not intend to hold up the bill any longer. There isn't any objection to it because it doesn't do very much. Whether it is 50 per cent of the premiums, or 50 per cent of the administration and a shift, or if some sections of the country in the west will perhaps benefit a little more monetarily because of the shift from 50 per cent one way to 50 per cent the other way, in terms of Ontario, about which the minister knows a little, certainly in terms of eastern Canada the benefit in dollars to the farmers is really no more than a pittance. It would have been of benefit if the resolution passed by all members of the committee had been attended to by the minister and if he had risen at the beginning of this debate and told us what he intended to do about that resolution.

If he is prepared to do so now, I will sit down. But I still want to say in summary that the minister, as a parliamentarian, has been exposed to the committee on agriculture when there have been many more contentious items before it. The debates may have at times appeared to be a filibuster, for good or evil, depending upon which side of the table you sat on, but certainly the farmers of this land were always the main concern, even if there was a misinterpretation of how you helped them. But he ought not to malign the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) publicly, regardless of what he said to the mushroom growers. And that was sort of apocryphal in terms of the crop; it is a great crop, we love mushrooms and we love mushroom growers. However, I think it is perhaps allegorical that the minister should say now that his notes were out of order. We all read what the press reports quoted him as saying in Alberta about my hon. friend from Peace River, and he knows that when there are 13 members wishing to speak on a farm bill, with two days of debate, a total of 16½ pages in Hansard—two pieces of a day—and then only two committee sessions, this is not a filibuster. I expected more from the minister, just as the farmers of the land expect more from the minister by way of crop insurance, support prices and a meaningful agricultural policy they can start to build on rather than keep shifting their gears as the policy of the government shifts.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I think I should draw the attention of the House to the fact that the minister requires unanimous consent if he is to speak at this time, having moved third reading of the measure: that would ordinarily be considered as a contribution. Is it agreed that the minister be permitted to speak?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Knight: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I happen to want this bill passed. If the House would agree to sit until about ten minutes after six o'clock I would be prepared to restrict my remarks to about five minutes so that we could get this bill through and benefit farmers throughout Canada. I should like to say a few words on crop insurance, period.

[Mr. Nowlan.]

An hon. Member: Send a letter to the minister.

Mr. Knight: I think I have a serious matter to bring up.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: There seems to be agreement on this point. However, I would remind the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Knight) that he is not prevented from speaking after the minister has spoken. However, I have recognized the minister at this point.

Mr. Paproski: Mr. Speaker, I think we should set a time limit and that it should be ten past six.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I cannot recognize the hon. member, otherwise eminently recognizable, because of his situation in the House.

Mr. Baker: If it is the case that the hon. member is willing to give an undertaking to ensure that the bill will pass, and if a time limit is imposed on the hon. member for Assiniboia as well as on the Minister of Agriculture, perhaps we should agree, if we agree on anything, to extend the sitting to ten after six by the clock opposite, and no longer.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Chair is prepared to sit here until Christmas, as far as that is concerned—

An hon. Member: A good idea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: However, unless the minister indicates that he will finish in time to give the hon. member for Assiniboia his opportunity, I do not see how we can make a decision.

Mr. Whelan: I agree to the suggestion, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Bill Knight (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I should like to speak about crop insurance. The hon. member from Annapolis Valley (Mr. Nowlan) referred to a motion in the committee. I should like to refer to another. In the committee we recommended to the minister a motion related to crop insurance having to do with the old PFAA fund and what could be done with it. My point is this. A general crop insurance program is in existence in Canada today. The government of Saskatchewan has passed a bill to improve that legislation. Further legislation has been presented by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) to bring about a reduction in the premiums, the only legislation which has been forthcoming from the hon. gentleman.

I wish to point out that there are some areas which crop insurance does not cover. I refer to disasters which affect local regions alone. For example, parts of northern Saskatchewan were flooded this year and for the most part the farmers concerned were not covered by crop insurance. The constituency of Assiniboia experienced serious losses due to grasshoppers in certain municipalities. This caused heavy losses for producers.

The committee recommended that what is left in the old PFAA emergency fund be used as a base for establishing a regional disaster fund, flexible in nature, which could be used in cases of severe damage not covered by crop insurance on a regional or national basis. I said this fund could be called the Whelan regional disaster fund, or anything else they wanted. It could be used by the municipalities to cover such cases as the grasshopper infestation that I have mentioned. The experts are now saying what they said last year. Last year, when there was a severe outbreak of grasshoppers in my municipality, they said it would be worse this year. And it was. This year it spread through more municipalities and it was more severe. They are saying that next year it will be worse again, that it will be a real problem across the entire west, given certain weather conditions.

A fund of the kind I have mentioned, used with flexibility, could help look after farmers whose crops have been badly damaged by such outbreaks. I wish to thank members of the Standing Committee on Agriculture for supporting that resolution in principle. Many of them were Liberal members, many of them were not even from the west. I wish to thank them, but I was disappointed about two things: first, that the Conservative party should have opposed the use of the PFAA emergency fund, which I found to be unbelievable, because some of them come from the dried-out areas of western Canada and should know of what use that fund has been; and, second—and I intend to be very blunt because I was most annoyed about it as a whip—when the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) said that the passing of this piece of legislation to reduce premiums to farmers had been held up because of the Conservative party, he was perfectly right because that is exactly what happened.

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, some question has been raised about why I did not rise when third reading of the bill was moved today. I did not think that I needed to rise. I thought the bill was urgent and that it had waited long enough for passage through the House. The provinces have indicated that they passed their legislation in accordance with this legislation, and did so in good faith because I told them that I thought this House was full of reasonable and responsible members, that the legislation would pass and that they could count on it being passed so they could run their budgets accordingly.

Let me just go over the budgets to indicate just how much it means to the provinces. Take, first, Nova Scotia; the amount is not large, $23,000. The amount for the province of Ontario is over $2 million, for Manitoba over $2 million, for Saskatchewan over $4 million, for Alberta over $4 million. So that is what it amounts to. The hon. member for Annapolis Valley (Mr. Nowlan) referred to it as a minor bill. I said, Mr. Speaker, that it was a small bill, and it is. It is small in content and should not take 13 hours of debate. I can think of other legislation that went through this House, for the veterans of this nation, just like that. That is the way this bill should have gone through for the farmers.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Whelan: I sat in this House, as the officials sat in the gallery at different times, waiting for this measure to be passed. We asked time and time again for unanimous consent of the House, and the measure would not have taken five minutes if hon. members had really been serious about what they had said about agriculture. I am not ashamed of one thing that I have said to the mushroom growers of this nation, because they are part of the agricultural scene. What is more, you do not pick them off the ground, you pick them off the trays using ladders, lift trucks, and so on. The hon. member from Annapolis Valley should visit a mushroom plant some day and then he would know what he was talking about.

Mr. Speaker, I had a speech prepared dealing with the recommendations of the committee which I said were good recommendations at the time, and I still think they are. I met with the provincial ministers of agriculture and discussed the very suggestions that had been made by the members of the committee. As I say, I said they were good at the time and I meant it.

In fact, what I should be doing now, instead of wasting my time, is attending a cabinet committee meeting and discussing three agricultural proposals that have been put before the committee. If hon. members want to make politics out of this, then I will make politics also every chance that I get; let me tell hon. members that. I will tell the farmers of this nation that this bill should have been passed straight away, just like that. I am not going to take this sort of guff as Minister of Agriculture. I can put on the table a long list of the things I have done to benefit agriculture, to improve the livelihood of the farmers.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Whelan: This insurance bill is just one little step in the direction I think we should be going to help the farmers of this nation. The meetings that we will have with the ministers of agriculture for the provinces and the farm organizations of Canada, which I and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) have announced, will be discussing many of the things that the serious members of this House want for agriculture.

It really makes me mad sometimes to come to this House and listen to what some politicians and people in the media are saying about food. I appear in defence of agriculture at every opportunity that I get, and I try and get across the facts if I can. I do not use the House as much as I should. But these people say that I have no right to go out and talk to the public. I have every right to do so as Minister of Agriculture responsible for part of the food production of this nation. We have ten provincial ministers of agriculture who are just as responsible.

When there are different programs in different provinces, provinces that are rich and others that are not so rich, for producers who are competing for the same markets, it is a big challenge for a Minister of Agriculture to try to stabilize agriculture in this nation. That is what the meeting to be held on September 27 is to try to do. We have been working on this matter for weeks to formulate something that is realistic and will constitute a program for the consumers and producers of this country so they know what food is going to cost them.

If I had talked last spring, or the minister in charge of the Wheat Board (Mr. Lang) had talked last spring, about what we were going to do for the wheat farmers of the nation, hon. members opposite would have accepted our proposals readily. Ever since I have been a farmer I have never received $3.25 a bushel for wheat, not up until this year.

We have been asked for a stabilization program. I have had letters from the leaders of every responsible farm organization in this nation asking me to help initiate a program to stabilize agriculture, a program that will give them the same kind of security that everybody else has in every other walk of life who is productive in this nation. That is what these programs will do that we hope will result from the federal-provincial meeting we are going to have at the end of September. We will have a new crop insurance program that I hope includes every good suggestion that members of the House have made.

Some members have made very good suggestions about crop insurance. Others who have been very vocal have not made one suggestion. Since I have been Minister of Agriculture I have asked for suggestions from every one of these members. Every one of them had the right to make suggestions. By God, some of those who come from really good farm ridings in Canada have not made one suggestion. It is similar to what some people say about food costs, "We don't care what you do, but do something." Then when you do do something, they do not like it. Perhaps that is their right, but I ask them to be constructive.

Mr. Towers: A point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Whelan: As I have said, the suggestions—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Towers) is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Towers: Mr. Speaker, my point of order is this. When suggestions were made to the minister, he did not accept them; and that is exactly why we did not want to pass the bill without a unanimous decision. We wanted to ask the minister specifically what he was going to do about the suggestions we had made.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: That is more a point for debate than a point of order.

Mr. Whelan: If the bill had come before the House when we asked for unanimous consent, I would have told hon. members exactly what I am telling them now. There will be more proposals presented to the House later in the session in regard to the very matters I am talking about now. However, I must have the concurrence of certain parties in regard to a crop insurance program, principally the provinces. I must also have some input from the farm organizations. I have had some input from them already by way of certain resolutions they have passed.

These are all being considered and formulated and they will be presented along with other programs to make agriculture what all farmers in Canada are dreaming of, not something with which to gouge the public or that goes up and down like a yo-yo. This new program will be something that gives them stability. It was something that we presented to the House in principle over a year ago. I am not saying that it is perfect, but it is what was asked for in Charlottetown and what was asked for in Calgary, and it is what we are going to be presenting to them in September.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: If it is the will of the House, I shall put the question.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) rising on a point of order?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Yes, Mr. Speaker. If we were to reach government business tomorrow, is there anyone present who can tell us what it will be?

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, I understand the order tomorrow will be, first, second reading of the Canada Pension Plan amendments, followed by the amendments to the Parole Act.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. This House now stands adjourned until two o'clock p.m. tomorrow.

At 6.12 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

AGRICULTURE

ANNOUNCEMENT OF AGREEMENT WITH QUEBEC TO REDUCE PRICE OF FLUID MILK TO CONSUMER BY FOUR CENTS

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, hon. members will recall that on September 4 the Prime Minister announced that a consumer subsidy would be paid on fluid milk in those provinces where it was possible to obtain an agreement which would contain and roll back prices to consumers.

I am pleased to be able to announce that negotiations have been completed with the province of Quebec. As a result, the price of fluid milk in the province of Quebec will be reduced by four cents effective Monday, September 17, from the previously announced level which would have been in effect on that date had this agreement not been reached. This means that in the absence of the federal subsidy the base price per quart for fluid milk to the consumer in the province of Quebec would have been 38 cents per quart effective September 17. However, as a result of the agreement the base price will be 34 cents per quart.

It will be appreciated that prices will vary from the base price of 34 cents due to container size, fat content, etc., but irrespective of this the four cents per quart roll-back will apply.

The difference between the five cents per quart federal subsidy and the four cent roll-back in price will be used by the provincial authorities to cover, in part at least, cost increases for the next year.

The agreement further provides that this price will remain in effect for a period of 12 months subject only to the reopening of discussions between ourselves and the Quebec authorities should unforeseen or extraordinary cost changes take place.

Mr. H. W. Danforth (Kent-Essex): Mr. Speaker, although this announcement will be good news for consumers in the province of Quebec, it has some rather interesting implications and establishes some principles. In spite of the government's protestations that it is totally against price controls on wages, food or incomes, the action of the government amounts to selective price control, freezing the price of milk to consumers for a 12-month period. It can be considered in no other light than absolute price control. Listening to the announcement made by the minister today, one can only assume that this is one more panic action on the part of the government in the face of the high price of food.

The weaknesses in the policy announced by the minister are twofold. First, the consumer price is fixed with the result that the price the producer will receive is locked in regardless of input costs. The very fact that this agreement covers a 12-month period shows there is no room left for the farmer or primary producer with regard to costs. What this country needs today are incentives to produce. There can be no incentive in a policy that locks the price of the primary consumer—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Do you want higher prices?

Mr. Danforth: —which locks the price to the consumer at the expense of the producer.

Mr. Sharp: What is a freeze?

Mr. Bell: You don't understand it.

Mr. Danforth: The other primary weakness my colleagues see in the program is that it is not applicable to any province that does not have a board or marketing scheme or milk committee, since it has to be administered at this level. Second, some provinces have already established a milk policy for a 12-month period, and again this program will not be applicable.

So we not only have the fact that price control has been initiated, but today various provinces in the country will be receiving different rates of subsidy and different amounts of money for the production of the same commodity. I think the agricultural community and the farm organizations are right in their absolute rejection of such a policy.

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, we spent some considerable time in deliberations in the committee on trends in food prices which was set up by the House and as a result of those deliberations we then set up the Food Prices Review Board. Any member of the House who sat on that committee, as I did, must surely realize that the consumer must be given some protection in regard to food prices. I have argued within my own party—and I am a farmer—that in regard to basic foods on which families depend, such as milk, bread and the essential proteins, it is part of the responsibility of this parliament to see that children and families are adequately cared for.

The government has moved, however belatedly, to try to stabilize the price of milk so it will not rise above its present level. Anyone familiar with the farming scene knows that in order to do that the government must reach agreements with the provinces that have milk marketing boards, since fluid milk is controlled by those boards. How good these arrangements are is going to depend to a very great degree on the types of agreements the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) makes with the various provinces. We suggest that as a minimum these agreements must include a provision making them valid for at least one year and they must take into account the increasing cost of production that every milk producer in the provinces of Canada is facing.

In this regard the minister says that the difference between the five cents per quart federal subsidy and the four cents per quart roll-back in price will be used by the provincial authorities to cover, in part at least, cost increases for the next year. I think the question arises, who is going to carry the rest of the cost?

In the agreements that the minister negotiates with other provinces it had better be made clear that the federal government will carry those increased costs. It would be absolutely unfair if the Minister of Agriculture, in attempting to ensure to the Canadian consumer a reasonable price for milk, in any way unloaded some of the cost of subsidization on provincial administrations. That is not and should not be their responsibility. In all future negotiations this should be a prime responsibility of the federal government.

I say again that my party believes this kind of approach must be taken in respect of essential foods. We believe the prime responsibility of the Food Prices Review Board must be to make recommendations to the House and the government regarding the means by which we can protect the consumer against unreasonable price increases.

[Translation]

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) for having sent us a copy of his statement in French and in English and I commend him for this. What I recognize as not so valuable is the fact of going through it after the opening of this sitting. This did not leave me enough time to consider its content.

However, Mr. Speaker, I want to say that, at the Department of Agriculture, they are more conscious of the fact that the rights of dairy producers must be recognized, that some production costs are increasing and that if we want enough dairy producers to remain in business in order to supply all people, it is time to ensure that they may get an income enabling them to stay in business.

I welcome the fact that the new policy coincides precisely with the philosophy which we have often propounded in this House, that on the one hand producers should be assured of prices related to the cost of production, plus a profit margin allowing them to live decently, and that on the other hand the paying capacity of consumers has to be taken into account. We were advocating a compensated discount on Canadian products to enable consumers to buy them at a lower price and producers to make a greater profit.

Now on August 22, 1973, the Quebec producers of whole milk presented a petition to the Quebec Agricultural Marketing Board requesting an increase of $1.25 per hundredweight in the price of whole milk. The board gave a decision, an order was published, and producers benefited from an increase of $1.05 per hundredweight, but consumers, due to the present system, had to pay three cents more. As everyone must know that there are 40 quarts of milk in 100 pounds, this would mean an increase of $1.20 per hundredweight for the consumer. The distributor of whole milk therefore automatically gets an increase of 15 cents per hundredweight without any effort on his part. He receives this increase thanks to the work of milk producers.

Last week, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) announced a new policy stipulating payment of a discount of five cents per quart of milk, in order to grant a price reduction to the consumer while recognizing that the producer needs more. If my figures are correct, this means that from now on milk will cost Quebec consumers 34 cents a quart. This means that in addition to the 15 cents that the milk distributors will receive according to the order issued by the Agricultural Marketing Board, they will get another one cent a quart, which surplus should normally go directly to the consumer so that he may benefit from the five-cent increase.

And so, I must say to the Minister of Agriculture that with this new policy we are embarking on a new course. Milk was a start; I trust this will continue with other foods. I merely wish to add this: The situation must be watched closely to see that the consumer is really protected, that he really benefits from the efforts the federal government is now making to reduce food prices. If this is not done, and if no one is specially assigned to this task, we will discover, at some point or other, that there are still "bloodsuckers" who take advantage of those subsidies intended for the consumers and who will rob them of that help.

I congratulate the minister on his statement. He is on the right track, and I hope we will continue in that direction to finally solve the problem of food prices. I hope the Food Prices Review Board will follow the example of that policy and do its duty, so that in the case of all food products we can at long last be assured there will not be thieves who speculate on food prices to the detriment of the consumers and primary producers.

FOOD PRICES

SECOND REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. B. Keith Penner (Thunder Bay): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43 I wish to propose a motion of urgent and pressing necessity arising from the publication this morning by Statistics Canada of the consumer price index for the month of August—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Penner: —which shows an over-all increase of 1.3 per cent for that month, including an increase in the total food index of 3.2 per cent.

Since the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) has not proceeded with a similar motion, notice of which has stood in his name for some time, I ask the unanimous consent of the House to move, seconded by the hon. member for Nipissing (Mr. Blais):

That the second report of the Special Committee on Trends in Food Prices, presented to the House on July 25, 1973, be concurred in.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The motion proposed by the hon. member requires the unanimous consent of the House.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

An hon. Member: Who said "no"?

An hon. Member: It was over there.

Mr. McGrath: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I refused unanimous consent to proceed with this motion because we intend to proceed with it in due course. In the meantime we did not want to proceed with the motion today so that the country would know that this government is bankrupt of ideas to deal with inflation.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege affecting the privileges of all members of the House.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nielsen: They do not care about that judging from the derision over there. It is an abuse of the rules and procedures of the House for an hon. member on the other side of the House to get up and propose a motion which he knows is clearly out of order by reason of the fact that there is another motion in precisely the same terms on the order paper now.

CHILE—OVERTHROW OF GOVERNMENT BY MILITARY—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the tragic and deplorable suspension of the democratic process as a result of military terrorist activities in Chile I move, seconded by the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom):

That the Canadian government refuse recognition of the Chilean military junta and forthwith withdraw any financial or other support which this government presently provides.

Mr. Speaker: This motion also requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity and the motion cannot be put.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

ADVISORY COMMITTEE REPORT—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, in the hope that the law of averages is in my favour I present the following motion under the terms of Standing Order 43. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas):

That the Minister of Manpower and Immigration be asked to table as soon as he receives it the report of the Unemployment Insurance Advisory Committee on its study of the benefit control operations of the Unemployment Insurance Commission from the viewpoint of unemployment insurance recipients.

Mr. Speaker: The motion proposed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre also requires the unanimous consent of the House as it is proposed under Standing Order 43. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent.

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. As the minister responsible I would be perfectly agreeable, but in any case I would assure the hon. member that it is my intention to table this report as soon as I receive it.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That is hardly a point of order. What is required is not the consent of the minister but the unanimous consent of the House.

FAMILY ALLOWANCES ACT

On the order: Introduction of Bills:

July 19, 1973—Mr. Stackhouse—Bill intituled: "An Act to amend the Family Allowances Act".

Mr. Speaker: When the notice of introduction of the bill proposed by the hon. member for Scarborough East first came up last July 23, the Chair expressed some concern about the regularity of the bill. Yesterday it seemed that the hon. member concurred in my suggestion that this bill touched upon the prerogative of the Crown in relation to expenditure from the Consolidated Revenue Fund.

The purpose of the bill, as indicated in the explanatory note, is to provide for the payment of family allowance benefits to a group or class of children not covered at present under the terms of the Family Allowances Act. A bill, or an amendment to a bill, cannot propose the expenditure of funds without a recommendation of the Crown. Since the hon. member's bill is not accompanied by a recommendation of the Crown, it cannot be put to the House at this time.

I refer the hon. member to Citation 249(1) of Beauchesne's Fourth Edition. The principle explained there is further confirmed by Citation 250 as follows:

"If any motion, or bill, or proceeding is offered to be moved, whether in the House or in a committee, which requires, but fails to receive, the recommendation of the Crown, it is the duty of the Chair to announce that no question can be proposed upon the motion, or to direct the withdrawal of the bill."

Judging from the comments made yesterday by the hon. member for Scarborough East, including his reference to discussions which he has had with the Minister of National Health and Welfare, I take it he is in agreement that the bill should be removed from the order paper.

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S.O. 26

[English]

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

INCREASES IN COST OF LIVING AND INTEREST RATES

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I ask leave under Standing Order 26 to move the adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing the uncontrolled inflationary pressures exemplified by the cost of living figures released by Statistics Canada this morning, combined with the increase in interest rates announced yesterday. I make this motion as the most appropriate way in which to get these emergencies before the House.

● (1430)

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Leader of the Opposition has given the Chair the notice required under Standing Order 26. I have also received a notice from the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent), which reads as follows:

Mr. Speaker, I ask leave, seconded by the hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore, to move the adjournment of the House under Standing Order 26 for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter requiring urgent consideration, namely the record level of Canadian interest rates, particularly in mortgages, which will be seriously aggravated by the announcement that, effective today, the Bank of Canada's prime rate will be increased by a further one half of one per cent, and the urgent need for the government to take corrective action.

Obviously there cannot be two motions before the House at the same time. Since the motion sponsored by the hon. Leader of the Opposition is proposed in broader terms and includes specifically the matter suggested for discussion by the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby, and taking into account also the special position in the House of the hon. Leader of the Opposition, I would propose that if one of these two motions is to be put and debated preference should go to the motion proposed by the hon. Leader of the Opposition.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Speaker: Of course, at this point I am only referring to the priority of the motions if one were accepted.

The conditions and circumstances which have to be taken into account by the Chair are set out in section 16 of Standing Order 26. It has often been said that the matter proposed for debate under Standing Order 26 must be in the nature of a genuine emergency or a sudden emergency. This is why, on a number of occasions, the Chair has hesitated to put a motion founded primarily on the regular monthly reports of Statistics Canada. I am sure hon. members are in agreement with this general interpretation of the Standing Order. At the same time, I recognize that there are in this instance special circumstances to justify an emergency debate which would take into account the statistical report on which the hon. Leader of the Opposition has based his motion.

I am therefore disposed to put the motion which stands in the name of the hon. Leader of the Opposition on the understanding that the scope of the debate will encompass the subject matter proposed by the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby who would in this way have a special position in the debate. If the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby sees no procedural objection to this—I would assume there is not very much he can do about the situation—with leave of the House I would suggest that the motion be set down for consideration at eight o'clock this evening, pursuant to section 9 of Standing Order 26.

COST OF LIVING AND INTEREST RATE INCREASES—NEW GOVERNMENT MEASURES TO CONTROL—POSSIBILITY OF NEW BUDGET

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Minister of Finance—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stanfield: Hon. members opposite can make a racket in the House, Mr. Speaker, but it is too bad they cannot do something about inflation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: I would like to ask the Minister of Finance whether, in view of the increase in the monthly cost of living index at the rate of about 15 per cent on an annual basis and ranging right across the spectrum, including the rise in interest rates, he proposes to put any new measures before the House today to bring this situation under some control?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the figures that were published today reflect the situation in the reference week, the first week in August, a situation that became very apparent to the public, to parliament and to the government. As a result of the rise in the cost of living, particularly the rise in food prices, two announcements were made by the government, one on August 13 and one on September 4, involving public expenditures of the nature of $320 million and requiring the legislation enacted this week in the House. Therefore I want to say to the hon. gentleman that the government has already responded to the factual situation reflected in this report by Statistics Canada a month after the fact.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): We have presented measures to the House that get to the essential problem of inflation, which is the world-wide imbalance between the forces of demand and supply.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The minister may wish to keep some of his ammunition for some of the supplementaries.

Mr. Stanfield: The trouble, Mr. Speaker, is that he has no ammunition.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Drury: Come on, Bob: we want more of these questions.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: Listen to them howl, Mr. Speaker. Now that the minister has indicated that he has no new proposals to present to the House today I would like to ask him whether, in view of the increase in the bank rate and the very alarming figures on the cost of living, he is reviewing his announced decision that he has no intention of introducing an early budget? Will he now bring a budget before the House with a full review of the situation, or are we to assume that the current rate of inflation and the current level of bank interest rates were foreseen by the minister at the time of his February budget and everything is going according to what was predicted by him?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman may express himself to be surprised by the figures published today.

An hon. Member: You are not?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): No, the government is not surprised.

Mr. Crouse: Then tell us about next month.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Those facts which are crystallized in statistics today were evident to the Canadian people and the government early in August. We reacted on August 13 and September 4. As a matter of fact, the government had already launched its counter-attack a month or so ago against the inflation represented by the figures released today.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, since everyone agrees that the measures announced by the government constitute nothing more than a popgun approach, I would like to ask the Minister of Finance whether, in view of the outlook for wage negotiations based upon the expectation of continuing rises in prices and reflected now in rising prices and the continuing spiral, he has any measures to announce today other than the increase in the rate of interest designed obviously to produce slack in the economy?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, there is no slack in the economy, an economy that has been growing for the first six months of this year at an annual rate of 9.4 per cent. Further, I want to say to the hon. gentleman that his questions reflecting the publication of statistics today, are about four weeks out of date. The government has already reacted.

FOOD PRICE INCREASES—SUGGESTED IMPOSITION OF EXCESS PROFITS TAX ON CORPORATIONS

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I want to address a supplementary question to the Minister of Finance and another one, if you will give me the chance, to the Prime Minister. In view of the fact there is an immense increase in profits particularly in the area of the food industries, increases of 200 per cent and over 100 per cent in many cases, is he giving consideration to imposing an excess profits tax to make it unpalatable for corporations to gouge Canadian consumers?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I want to say to the hon. member that we are analysing the profit margins of the food industry. I want to say to him also that I recall his own words in the debate in the House last week that an excess profits tax, while it might give some satisfaction in terms of equity and justice, will not solve the problem of inflation. I am looking very seriously at all the options available to the government.

FOOD PRICES REVIEW BOARD—SUGGESTED EXTENSION OF JURISDICTION TO COVER ALL PRICES WITH POWER TO ROLL BACK UNJUSTIFIED INCREASES

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I hope that the serious study by the Minister of Finance—and I accept his word that he is doing it—will induce the Prime Minister to answer my question affirmatively. In view of the fact that the very huge increase in profits in many areas, not only in food but in other areas, indicates clearly a deliberate situation where corporations are taking advantage of the present crisis which they have themselves partly produced at the expense of the consumer, is the Prime Minister now prepared to introduce legislation to give the Prices Review Board jurisdiction over all prices instead of merely food prices and also authority to roll back unjustifiable price increases?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): At this time, Mr. Speaker, I have no announcement to make in this regard.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. member for Portneuf wish to put a supplementary?

Mr. Roland Godin (Portneuf): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Shefford.

INCREASE IN BANK INTEREST RATES—REQUEST FOR GOVERNMENT INTERVENTION

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a further supplementary to the Minister of Finance.

Can he tell us to what level he intends to let the bank interest rate rise before taking steps to be implemented by the Bank of Canada?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I cannot answer the question of the hon. member asked in these terms.

[English]

INFLATION—POSSIBILITY OF IMPLEMENTATION OF GOVERNMENT CONTINGENCY PLAN—STEPS TO STIMULATE PRODUCTION

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the right hon. Prime Minister. As the program which the right hon. gentleman introduced last week contained no provisions for dealing with the basic causes of inflation but simply introduced measures to allow certain Canadians more easily to pay the higher prices brought about by inflation, does the government consider now that inflation has reached a sufficiently high point to justify bringing in the contingency plan which for many, many months the government has announced to the House it has ready for dealing with inflation when it reaches a sufficiently high point?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, because I cannot agree with the premises of the question, the short answer is no. The hon. member should realize that, contrary to what he stated in the premise, we are dealing with the causes of inflation—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: —when we are dealing with the question of supply. The cause of inflation, in the view of the government and in the view of analysts, is shortage of supply. For that reason the measures we have announced in July, August and September are meant to deal with this aspect of the problem.

Mr. Hees: As the Prime Minister has announced that the basic cause of inflation is shortage of supply, would he advise the House now what steps the government has taken to stimulate production in many or in all of the lines where production is short and prices have been rising very rapidly, as all prices in Canada recently have been rising very rapidly indeed?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I wonder if the hon. member would not agree with me that the question he is asking now is very wide in scope and that he is inviting either the Prime Minister or the minister to make a statement which normally ought to be made on motions.

Mr. Hees: Would the Prime Minister take the first opportunity on motions to advise the House what steps the government has taken to stimulate production in the lines where prices have been rising at exorbitant rates in the past few weeks and months?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I think it would be sufficient if I were to send the hon. member a copy of my statements of August and September. He would then see that an important aspect of those announcements is the aspect of supply. I am not surprised that it has escaped the hon. member's attention, Mr. Speaker, when a spokesman for the Conservative party has just rejected a moment ago our approach of subsidizing the milk consumer at the same time as we are permitting the producer through the marketing board in his province to settle the problem of supply to his satisfaction.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hees: I have read all your statements very carefully and there is nothing in them indicating that the government intends to stimulate production in any of the fields seriously affected by inflation.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

INFLATION—INCREASE IN MONEY SUPPLY AS FACTOR

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. Would the minister please explain to the House why the government is continuing to increase the money supply while it increases the rate of interest seeing that no one anywhere, except apparently the government, thinks it is a positive anti-inflation measure?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the interest rates changes, the raising of the prime rate of the banks and the bank rate by the Bank of Canada reflect two phenomena. The first is an extremely strong expansion of credit in the country resulting from expansion in the economy and the second is a widening of the gap between interest rates in Canada and those in the United States and Europe. Because of those two forces, short-term rates in Canada could not be restrained because money was flowing out of the country seeking a better return elsewhere and restricting the capital market in the country, and of course there was pressure on the exchange.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Don Valley on a supplementary followed by the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby.

Mr. Gillies: Is it the position of the Minister of Finance that the 50 per cent increase in the money supply in the last three years has not been a major factor in the inflation that has taken place in this country?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, the monetary supply has been expanding only at a rate to accommodate the expansion in the economy—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): —and certainly the hon. gentleman's question is not consistent with his earlier—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Sit down!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The minister is having some difficulty—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: —in being heard in the House because of the noise coming from different parts of the chamber. I would remind hon. members that there are only 40 minutes for the question period and if 20 are taken up with shouting and applause and cheers and jeers that will considerably reduce—I estimate by approximately 50 per cent—the length of the actual question period. Perhaps the minister might be allowed to reply briefly to the question, after which I shall recognize the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I was saying that certainly the hon. gentleman's question is not consistent with his earlier remarks that there was tight money in the country. I wish he and members of his party, including his leader, could determine whether they want a tight money policy or an expansionary money policy.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Would the hon. member resume his seat. I appreciate that the hon. member is anxious to continue the interesting debate he is having with the minister, but I would remind hon. members that a motion under Standing Order 26 has been accepted by the Chair for the purpose of having a debate this evening. I know that all hon. members are anxious that we proceed with this debate at eight o'clock this evening and would not want all the questions asked and all the answers given during the question period.

INFLATION—SUGGESTED SEPARATION OF MORTGAGE INTEREST RATES FROM OTHER INTEREST RATES

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. While it may make sense to have a tight money policy to deal with inflation in general, it makes no sense to keep mortgage rates as part of that interest rate market situation because they affect housing primarily. May I ask the minister if he and his officials have given any consideration to changing the Bank Act or taking some other course of action which would separate mortgage interest rates from other interest rates in Canada?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I may be able to deal with that more fully this evening. But in answer to the hon. gentleman I want to say specifically that yesterday the rate for certificates of deposit, that is to say, the rate which banks pay for money in order to obtain money to lend in turn, increased by one per cent. Against that, the bank rate increased by three-quarters of one per cent and the bank rate for loans under $200,000, namely, loans for small businesses in particular, increased by only one-quarter of one per cent. The banks have given me an undertaking that the mortgage rate will not be raised and that a reasonable flow of money will continue to obtain in the mortgage market. In other words, the banks have recognized, in reply to a request from the Minister of Finance, recognizing the healthy profits of the banks at the moment—

● (1450)

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby will be recognized for a supplementary. In fairness, following that I think the hon. member for Portneuf should be recognized, and I will recognize later the hon. member for St. John's East and the hon. member for Calgary North.

Mr. Broadbent: I accept that a guaranteed 10 per cent mortgage rate is not much help to Canadian home purchasers. In view of the rest of the minister's answer about guarantees from the chartered banks to provide loans for small businessmen and so on, will he advise whether he has obtained from the chartered banks a statement outlining in percentage terms the allocation of funds they intend to make to small businesses and so on? If so, will he present that to the House?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I just want to say, if I might, by way of preamble—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): —that it is one thing for Your Honour to allow a very wide-ranging question. It is another thing for Your Honour to allow me to reply distinctly and specifically to that question.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): I was saying that in view of the healthy state of bank profits the banks have agreed to narrow their margin on loans from one per cent to three-quarters of one per cent and to narrow their margin on small business loans under $200,000 from one per cent to one-quarter of one per cent.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. In spite of the comment or admonition of the Minister of Finance, I still feel his answer is in the form of a statement that ought to be made on motions. I appreciate fully his point that if a general question is asked it is very difficult to be brief in attempting to reply. Hon. members should bear in mind that when they ask questions that are general in terms it invites the kind of reply the minister has attempted to give. Hon. members might reserve these long questions and debating points until the debate which is to take place this evening. Perhaps at that time the minister might make whatever comments he is trying to make now. The hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby rises on a point of order.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, my point of order concerns the statement made by the minister. The information I asked for did not require a general statement. I asked whether the minister had obtained certain information from the banks and, if so, whether he would table that information in the House. Surely that requires only a simple yes or no answer.

Mr. Speaker: That is hardly a point of order. I think it would be the consensus of hon. members that we try to go on to the next question. I indicated a while ago that the Chair would recognize the hon. member for Portneuf on a question that is not supplementary. He will be recognized, following which I will return to the hon. members I referred to a moment ago.

ALLEGED RESALE OF CANADIAN WHEAT BY RUSSIA TO EUROPEAN COUNTRIES—REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION

Mr. Roland Godin (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board.

Since the USSR is reselling to European countries the wheat purchased in Canada, can the minister inform this House what is the resale price of this wheat?

[English]

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, there have been press reports of sales of wheat by Russia, but I have no knowledge of them. There has been no identification of the source of that wheat. It could very well be American wheat.

[Translation]

Mr. Godin: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question.

Can the minister give us the assurance that he will take the necessary steps to ascertain the extent of this traffic?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, as information becomes available I will be glad to make it available to the hon. member.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

MORTGAGE INTEREST RATES—EFFECT ON RENTS AND COST OF HOUSES—MINISTER'S POSITION ON BANK OF CANADA POLICY

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, having listened to the answers of the Minister of Finance may I ask him whether he is in agreement and accord with the Bank of Canada increasing the bank rate by a whopping half of one per cent to 7½ per cent, the fifth increase in the lending rate since April, putting mortgage rates now between 10 and 12 per cent and making rents impossible to pay for the average man and houses impossible to buy?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is just not correct. In their announcements the banks said they had no present intention of raising the mortgage rate. Therefore the spread between what the banks pay for money and the interest rate they are charging on mortgages has diminished in terms of spread by one per cent. The banks have given me an undertaking there will be no rise in the mortgage rate.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Woolliams: In view of the fact the minister is on record as saying when the monetary policy of the Bank of Canada is in conflict with the monetary policy of the government the government will intervene, does he endorse, as I take it from his answer today, the tight money policy of the Bank of Canada?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I wish the hon. member would get together with his colleague, the hon. member for Don Valley.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): If an expansion of the money supply by 15 per cent and an expansion of bank loans by 24 per cent is tight money, I wish they would reconcile the two definitions.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Don Valley rises on a point of order.

Mr. Gillies: As usual, the Minister of Finance has completely misinterpreted our position.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gillies: The point I made, and this was quite clear in my first question, is that a policy of raising interest rates and increasing the money supply at the same time is highly inflationary and will not work to solve the inflation problems in this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: That is debate rather than a point of order. The hon. member for Calgary North has a supplementary.

Mr. Woolliams: The hon. member for Don Valley answered my question, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

FOOD PRICE INCREASES—SUGGESTED IMPLEMENTATION OF GOVERNMENT CONTINGENCY PLAN

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I suggest to the Minister of Finance that he and the government should get together with the people of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: My question is for the Prime Minister. In view of the fact the 3.2 per cent increase in the cost of food, representing a 16.2 per cent increase over a year, exercises its greatest hardship on low-income Canadians, and in view of the fact high interest rates hurt low-income Canadians most, does the government still have a contingency plan? If so, will the government now proceed with implementation of that plan?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I certainly share the concern of the hon. member for people on low incomes. However, it is still a source of puzzlement to me that the hon. member's party, through its official spokesman, rejected the subsidy on milk for consumers to help people on low incomes.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

● (1500)

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Bell: That is not true.

Mr. McGrath: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister has completely misrepresented the stand taken by this party.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. McGrath: In light of the substantial increase in the cost of living, I can only suggest to the Prime Minister and his colleagues that their conduct is shameful.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am not sure whether hon. members expect the Chair to rule on all these points of order which I suggest are not points of order at all. Hon. members are obviously anxious to have a budget debate or a debate on the general issue during the question period. Our rules are not attuned to this kind of confrontation. I would invite hon. members to try to respect the rules and the generally accepted procedure during the question period. I am sure this would facilitate matters for all members who wish to participate in the question period.

Mr. McGrath: May I ask the Prime Minister, by way of a supplementary, whether, in light of the figures released today by Statistics Canada, he is now prepared to reconsider the decision he made yesterday and appear before the Special Committee on Trends in Food Prices so that its members might have an opportunity to examine the right hon. gentleman on the policy he has put forward to deal with inflation?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: I have already written a letter in reply to the chairman of that committee. I hope it has been received by now and I hope he will find it a satisfactory reply in view of the precedents in Canada.

ENERGY

OIL—REQUEST FOR DETERMINATION OF JUSTIFICATION OF PRICE INCREASE—POSSIBLE GOVERNMENT ACTION TO ROLL BACK

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of the fact that one of the items contributing to the increased cost of living during the month of August was fuel for home heating, and in view of the fact that this probably related to the increase of 40 cents a barrel for oil commencing August 1, I want to ask the minister whether his department has made any study to determine whether that increase, the fourth in the last nine months, was justified? If not, has the government taken any steps to roll back the price to what it was at the end of July?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the increase in August was justified at the time on the ground that we were on a one-price basis with the United States and in light of the increase in price in the United States. On this basis, the restraint announced by the Prime Minister last week will prevent the necessity for a further 40-cent increase which the National Energy Board has now found would have occurred but for the decision of last week.

Mr. Douglas: In view of the minister's statement which implies that the 40-cent increase on August 1 was not required in order to meet increased costs, is this factor being taken into account by the government in the preparation of legislation to establish a two-price system, and can we hope that the domestic price for oil will reflect this fact and not be set at the present figure at which it is frozen?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I would not expect it would be possible to reverse decisions which have been based upon earlier price increases. I would expect, however, that such a system would make it possible to restrain the acceleration of price increases in Canada as related to the price of American crude.

Oral Questions

GRAIN

WHEAT—ALLEGED RESALE BY RUSSIA AT MORE THAN PRICES PAID CANADA AND UNITED STATES

[Later:]

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question arises from an answer given by the Minister of Justice to the hon. member for Portneuf. Generally it is agreed that the U.S.S.R., because it was able to purchase wheat at a price not higher than the cost of production from Canada and the United States, has been disposing of wheat at a price much higher than the price it paid. The minister brushed the question aside and said that no doubt the wheat involved was American wheat. That was the answer as I understood it. I ask him, first, what basis he has for his suggestion that the wheat sold was American wheat rather than Canadian wheat?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): I am sure the right hon. gentleman will see what my answer really was when he is able to read it in Hansard. I indicated at the beginning of my answer that I had no firm indication, only rumours, which the right hon. gentleman ordinarily operates on, that any sales had taken place. I am glad the right hon. gentleman has at last recognized that the United States sold more wheat at lower prices than Canada ever did.

Mr. Diefenbaker: When it comes to recognition of imagination as a basis for answers, I take second place to the hon. gentleman.

Mr. Trudeau: He was talking about questions, not answers.

Mr. Diefenbaker: No, I come in third place, with the Prime Minister as number two.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: This is not a rumour. It is a fact that sales of wheat purchased below the cost of production under long-term agreements have been made by the U.S.S.R. The minister says it is only rumour. I ask him whether he has been in touch with the U.S.S.R. to ascertain what sales, if any, were made of Canadian wheat. Has the hon. gentleman made inquiries through the embassy in Moscow? Has he requested the embassy to communicate with the grain group in the U.S.S.R. in this regard? Brushing aside answers important to the western farmer will not get by me.

Mr. Lang: I am sure the Canadian Wheat Board, alert as ever to any possible problem which might arise for the Canadian farmer, is fully in touch to its own satisfaction with each of its customers. Of course, some of the wheat which has been sold to the U.S.S.R. for a number of years has always been intended for alternative destinations, for example, the extremely valued flour business with Cuba.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is another of those smart-aleck answers.

Some hon. Members: Order!

[Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale).]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will recognize the right hon. member for a further supplementary, but I would draw the attention of the House to the fact that there is not much more than five minutes left before we call orders of the day.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Usually, the minister takes over the Wheat Board when it is to his advantage to do so. I ask him whether he has been in touch with the board to ascertain whether or not it has made any investigation into this allegation, which is more than fiction—it is fact.

Mr. Lang: I am not sure I understand the nature of the right hon. gentleman's concern. I have not discussed this matter with the Wheat Board because, as I have just said, I have no knowledge of anything but rumour and I am completely confident that the Canadian Wheat Board knows enough to bring any such problem to my attention if it considers any action is needed.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Only alibis!

GOVERNMENT POSITION ON IMPOSITION OF PRICE AND WAGE CONTROLS

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister, bearing in mind he did not answer the question directed to him by my hon. friend from St. John's East. In June the Minister of Labour promised his constituents by news letter that if the Food Prices Review Board failed in its efforts to control prices the government had a contingency plan establishing a form of wage and price controls. In light of that promise and in light of unabated rising prices which have reached crisis proportions, will the government now introduce and establish a form of wage and price controls as promised by the Minister of Labour?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Alexander: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I am sure the Prime Minister is most anxious either to contradict the Minister of Labour or to put the House straight. I noticed he was on the point of answering the question. I am sure he would like to put the position before the House.

An hon. Member: He said no.

INCREASED INTEREST RATES—EFFECT ON COST OF TELEPHONE SERVICE AND ELECTRICITY

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Prime Minister. Has the government undertaken studies to determine the effect of higher interest rates on the cost of future telephone service to Canadians and if so, would he be prepared to make the results of those studies available to the House?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I will inquire of the Minister of Communications.

Mr. Hellyer: Could the Prime Minister also tell us whether the government has undertaken any studies as to the effect of higher interest rates on the cost of electricity and power development in Canada and would he also make the results of such studies available to the House at the same time?

CAPE BRETON DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

ALLEGED FAILURE OF CORPORATION TO COMPLY WITH LEGISLATION—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. In view of the fact that after six years the Cape Breton Development Corporation has failed to comply with legislation passed by this House and supported unanimously by two parliamentary committees, would the minister take steps to instruct Tom Kent, president of that corporation, to comply with the legislation immediately as laid down in section 18(a)(2) of the act?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member and others know, I have consistently over the past several months done everything I possibly could to redress what the hon. member regards as certain legitimate grievances, and I think considerable progress has been made. If the hon. member has some alternative means that might be employed to pursue this matter further, as he knows I will be glad to consider them with him or with any other member.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): A supplementary question. I know that the minister has shown great concern and has made the only advance that has been made, but Tom Kent has restricted advancement. The minister has overcome some of it, but does the minister intend to stand pat and allow Tom Kent to deny widows covered under section 18(a)(2) what has been rightly voted to them by the parliament of Canada in 1967? Six years is too long to wait. As I have said in the House, Tom Kent can be charged under the Criminal Code for not complying with the legislation passed by the House. The minister can take action with respect to Kent or action with respect to the legislation; either will satisfy me up to a point.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

EXHIBITIONS

EXPO '74, SPOKANE, WASHINGTON—EXTENT OF FEDERAL PARTICIPATION—CONSULTATION ON POSSIBLE PROVINCIAL PARTICIPATION

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay East): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the government's announcement at the end of July that Canada was withdrawing from any participation in Expo '74 in Spokane, and in view of the welcome news today that the federal government has reversed its position and will now participate in Expo '74, I would ask the minister on what basis and to what extent the federal government's participation in Expo '74 will be made?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, when the government made its original decision not to build a pavilion, one of the reasons was lack of interest on the part of British Columbia and Alberta. The British Columbia government has changed its position and the Canadian government is going to build a park. I am hopeful that the government of British Columbia will build a pavilion within the park, thus I think fulfilling what is desirable from all points of view.

Mr. Harding: Has the federal government retained the site originally set aside for the Canadian exhibit, and has the government held talks with any of the provinces regarding the sharing of this site with them for the purpose of provincial exhibits? If so, with what provinces have discussions been held?

Mr. Sharp: As I said in my original answer, Mr. Speaker, the province of British Columbia reversed its positon on participation as a result of which the government wanted to facilitate some Canadian and British Columbia participation. We have extended a similar invitation to Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba to participate if they would like to come on the same site. I might add that I understand the authorities in Spokane may create a permanent park, which would be a great credit for Canada.

AGRICULTURE

SMALL FARM ASSISTANCE PROGRAM—STATUS OF NEGOTIATIONS WITH QUEBEC—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a question to the Minister of Agriculture.

Owing to the serious conditions in the food production field and the urgency of using all our arable land, could the minister tell us what progress is being made in the negotiations with the Quebec government concerning the small farm development program and will he soon be making a statement in the House in this connection?

[English]

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, we have had an exchange of correspondence on negotiations in the last week. I think the earlier announcement I made in the House proves that Quebec and this government are co-operating very closely.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Annapolis Valley.

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): I have a question for the Prime Minister.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Perhaps the hon. member will allow me to recognize the hon. member for Bellechasse. I was not looking in his direction and I believe he has a supplementary.

The hon. member for Bellechasse has the floor and I will recognize afterwards the hon. member for Annapolis Valley.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I thank the minister for his answer but I would like to ask him a supplementary question. Since there is urgency in that field, I would like him to specify, if possible, what progress has been made in the negotiations and if we can expect a statement in that connection in the days or weeks to come?

[English]

Mr. Whelan: I am hopeful, Mr. Speaker, but I would tell the hon. member that we are discussing with the province of Quebec and the other provinces many other ways of doing the very same thing.

INFLATION—INQUIRY AS TO GOVERNMENT MEASURES TO COMBAT AND PARTICIPATION OF PRIME MINISTER IN SPECIAL DEBATE

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that the problem of inflation affects all departments of all governments, and since the Prime Minister commented on December 23, 1969, in regard to inflation that "We can only get tougher, we can't get weaker", and a year later, on December 24, said "Inflation no longer exists in Canada; we've come around the corner", I would ask the Prime Minister whether he intends to participate in the debate tonight so that we can find out what we have in Canada and what happened when we went around that corner?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, if I had occasion to participate in the debate tonight I would indicate that in economic policy you are never dealing with an immobile economy, that you can at one point in time bring inflation down to zero or near zero as inflation was when I made that statement. The whole purpose of economic policy is to react constantly to changing economic reality and this is exactly what we did, as the Minister of Finance has indicated in his answers. Instead of reacting a month later, as the Leader of the Opposition has done, as soon as the facts about the economy were known we did not wait for the statistics but brought in this series of legislative items.

[Mr. Whelan.]

Mr. Nowlan: I appreciate that the Prime Minister may have some conflicts ahead of him this weekend, but if he is not going to participate in the debate tonight and give some leadership to this land, rather than talking about a month or six months ago, does he intend to make a statement either in the House or on the national media outlining the government measures that have been and will be taken, or does he intend to let the Minister of Finance strangle slowly with the albatross of inflation around his neck?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I did not rule out the possibility of my participating in the debate. However, I feel it is wise to wait and see which of the many spokesmen on finance in the Conservative party will take the floor tonight so I can see whether, indeed, I need answer them.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We have reached the end of the question period and there are a number of members who unfortunately did not have the opportunity to be recognized.

As this is a special day, I think the Chair might take this occasion to mention to hon. members that discussions might be held between the party representatives with a view to not waiting until eight o'clock this evening to have the debate. The Chair has no alternative under Standing Order 26 but to say that the debate is put over to eight o'clock in the evening, but hon. members might well consider the possibility of having the debate start at four or five o'clock this afternoon, which might mean that the debate would finish a little earlier and we might have a brighter participation in the latter part of the debate. Orders of the day.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Bell: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Acting House Leader in these days of national emergency what the business will be for next week? I ask this on behalf of the opposition parties in the House.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, may I say first of all that we would welcome action on your suggestion and an immediate taking up of the discussion of this important matter so that we can further elaborate on the points we were attempting to make during the last hour.

We would propose, either this afternoon in the one event or tomorrow in the other event, to proceed with the second reading stages of items No. 43, the Canada Pension Plan amendments, No. 44, the Parole Act, No. 26, the CNR financing bill, and No. 40, the Co-operative Credit Associations Act. Then, if these have been cleared, or perhaps in any case, on Monday we propose to call Item No. 42 in regard to the Customs Act, Item No. 17 in regard to the proposed Residential Mortgages Act and Item No. 59 in respect of the corporations act. This would be subject, of course, to further discussions with the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gillespie) about taking up the bill in respect of foreign investment review at the report stage.

Mr. McGrath: On the same point of order, Mr. Speaker, I would ask the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang), in his capacity as acting government House leader, whether the government intends to bring forward measures to deal with the real problems facing this country such as rising food costs, rising shelter costs and rising transportation costs?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): On the same point of order, Mr. Speaker, if it is not possible to reach agreement right now to start this evening's debate at four or five o'clock, I wonder if it might be understood that if the House leaders reach such an agreement we can intervene in the debate this afternoon and start this evening's debate that much earlier. As far as we are concerned, we would be prepared to agree right now to start the debate at four or five o'clock.

An hon. Member: How about right now?

Mr. Lang: On that same point of order, Mr. Speaker, there may be some disposition to begin right now.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Lang: I see there is not disposition to begin right now, but we are ready to start at this time.

Mr. Bell: Let us start at four o'clock with time off for supper.

Some hon. Members: Right now.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

An hon. Member: We are ready.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

An hon. Member: Come on, let's start now.

Mr. Speaker: Could we have order, please.

Some hon. Members: Right now.

Mr. Speaker: I respectfully suggest to hon. members that it is very difficult to agree on this kind of an arrangement by way of interruptions from across the floor. I think there should be consultation, as I have suggested to hon. members. Obviously there is not unanimous agreement at the moment as to the time the debate might commence. I suggest there be the usual discussions, and I will call orders of the day.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask whether there has been any agreement to the effect that if the matter that is to be called now receives only an hour or two consideration the debate will be continued on a later date, since the debate is normally terminated at the completion of one day's discussion.

Mr. Speaker: I would again suggest to the hon. member that this might be another subject matter for the type of discussion I proposed a moment ago.

CANADA PENSION PLAN

CONTRIBUTIONS OF MEMBERS OF CERTAIN RELIGIOUS SECTS, INTEREST RATE ON DELAYED PAYMENTS, PAYMENT OF LEGAL EXPENSES

The House resumed from Friday, July 20, consideration of the motion of Mr. Lalonde for the second reading and reference to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs of Bill C-190, to amend the Canada Pension Plan.

Mr. Speaker: My understanding is that we are resuming the debate on the motion now before the House, and that if the minister speaks now he will be closing the debate. I gather there are other hon. members who want to take part in the discussion. That being the case, the Chair will recognize the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner).

Mr. J. H. Horner (Crowfoot): Having regard to Bill C-190, Mr. Speaker, after a cursory look at it one feels there is not really much at stake and that it should receive ready passage. Perhaps a number of members of this House have adopted that view.

The Canada Pension Plan was created in essence for two basic reasons, the first of which was to create a universal plan which would be portable so that upon retirement a person would have something set aside. The bill before us deliberately exempts certain religious groups which had been formed prior to 1966. It is a well-known fact that people have various faiths, and that many cherish in their hearts their own religious beliefs. I would ask the minister why these religious organizations, in order to be exempt, must have been formed prior to 1966? Why is that the condition before they have the privilege of opting out of participation in the Canada Pension Plan? Why should we allow anyone to opt out?

It is also well known that many religious organizations do not retain all their following on a rigid basis, and that from time to time people do break with their church and choose another. What happens to a person who belongs to a religious faith which is exempt from contributions to the Canada Pension Plan, then breaks away from that organization and, at age 50 or 60, finds that no one has made any contribution to the Canada Pension Plan on his behalf? Such an individual would reach retirement age and have nothing. He would be solely dependent upon the old age security system, which is merely a base for retirement today as it is coupled with the Canada Pension Plan. For those reasons, I urge that this bill be not passed without a great deal of study.

Let me deal specifically with the Canada Pension Plan and why I do not think this bill should receive acceptance by this House. In 1966, the Canada Pension Plan was brought into being. The minister who piloted it through the House said it amounted to a tax levied by the government to bring about security for the people when they reached retirement age, and that the tax amounted to about a 23 per cent increase in the existing income tax rate. In other words, there was a choice of levying a premium solely for the purposes of the Canada Pension Plan or of increasing the existing income tax rate by 23 per cent. The latter course would provide an equivalent amount to be set aside in a retirement fund. The minister used another equation at the time. He said it was equal to a general sales tax of about 4 per cent or 5 per cent, and that this would give the government the same amount as a 3.6 per cent tax on salaries over and above $600. Those were the figures the minister used.

The Canada Pension Plan accomplishes one other thing. It sets up an investment fund from which the provinces can borrow money from time to time. Reading from a publication put out by the minister in 1972 to explain the Canada Pension Plan, we find the following statement, among a number of others, which outline the purpose:

> Every contributor to the Plan should have a Social Insurance Number so that his pensionable earnings may be accurately recorded for benefit purposes.

Many people in Canada do not have a social insurance number, whether or not they belong to a religious organization. Certainly, the Hutterites on the Prairies do not want social insurance numbers. They believe all things are common and that no person really acquires any personal assets. For that reason, they do not want to look upon their group as individual with numbers.

Many people other than those of the Hutterite belief do not have social security numbers. Some have been threatened with court action, but at no time has the government proceeded with a prosecution of anyone on the basis of not having a social security number. It has been suggested at times that prosecutions will be commenced, but this has not been the case. I suggest no prosecutions have taken place because of the ticklish question of what to do about those who belong to a religious order. The government knows it would be in very bad straits if it forced members of religious orders to accept social security numbers, therefore it has not proceeded with any court action against those persons unwilling to accept a social security number. A number of people do not have these numbers.

The same publication put out by the minister in 1972 explaining the Canada Pension Plan states:

> Every month, the Department of National Revenue estimates the amount of contributions that have been received and credited to the Plan's operating balance. The Department of National Health and Welfare then indicates to the Department of Finance the amount by which the operating balance is in excess of the amount required to meet all payments in the immediately following period ending three months after the end of that month. The Department of National Revenue will also indicate to the Department of Finance the proportion in which contributions are estimated to have been received from each province during a prescribed period preceding that month.
> Each month, then, the Department of Finance will indicate to each province the amount of excess moneys in the Canada Pension Plan which is available to advance to that province within the first ten days of the following month in exchange for a security of that province having a term to maturity of 20 years.

That implies that the excess in the fund can be lent to the provinces at a rate comparable to the government borrowing rate on 20-year bonds. So, this becomes an investment fund from which the provinces may borrow for the purpose of developing their provinces. I am a firm believer that everybody within Canada should share part of the load involved in building a province so that it may be a better place in which people may live.

It may be of interest to note that on July 11 in answer to a question placed on the order paper by the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale) concerning how much money each province borrowed from the Canada Pension Plan it is shown that the province of Alberta, which many think is a wealthy province, since the inception of the Canada Pension Plan has borrowed from that investment fund $525 million, starting with a low borrowing of $3 million in 1966 to a high last year of $96 million. The provinces of Saskatchewan and Manitoba have both been heavy borrowers from the Canada Pension Plan. Why? Because they receive a good rate of interest. It is Canadian money. It is not necessary for them to go to New York in order to borrow money to build hospitals, roads, and other developments in their provinces. Religious sects such as the Hutterites, for example, use those hospitals and roads. Why should they not contribute to that investment fund? Many people who invest in an insurance scheme do not even break even.

If a person started contributing to the Canada Pension Plan at age 18 and died at age 65, the amount received from the Canada Pension Plan would probably be enough for a very meagre burial; that is all. This is what insurance is all about. We all pool our funds in order to provide some security at a later date. I cannot say that everyone who belongs to the Mennonite or Hutterite sect will, from this date forward, remain members of those sects. They may some day break away and need the security offered by the Canada Pension Plan. Also, I cannot say that at some future date the sects themselves may not change their mind and wish to enjoy the security of the Canada Pension Plan.

Certainly, it has never been the belief of the Hutterites that they should be exempt from the payment of taxes or from the authority of governments. One of the teachers of the Hutterite religion, a Mr. Rideman, in respect of the payment of taxes to government funds said:

> Since governmental authority is ordained by God and hath its office from him, the payment of taxes for this purpose is likewise ordained and commanded, as Paul saith, 'Thus ye must also pay tribute.' For this reason we likewise, willingly pay taxes, tribute or whatever men may term it, and in no way oppose it, for we have learned this from our master, Christ, who not only paid it himself, but also commanded others to do so, saying, 'Render unto Caesar what is Caesar's, and to God what is God's.' Therefore we, as his disciples, desire with all diligence to follow and perform his command, and not to oppose the government in this.

He refers to tribute. They are willing to pay their tribute as requested by governments. They do not like the Canada Pension Plan because of the social security number which is nearly a "must" if one is to have an individual pension plan and not a mass pension plan. The Canada Pension Plan is an individual pension plan because the more one pays into it the more one may receive from it. Many people have said that the Hutterites are a religious group and really are not engaged in business. On that ground, it is suggested that they should be exempt from many things such as income tax, the Canada Pension Plan and so on.

Again, I wish to point out that the contributions to the Canada Pension Plan build an investment fund from which the provinces borrow money for the purpose of building hospitals, schools and roads. These people use these facilities. These people also carry on extensive business. If one group engaged in business is to be exempt from a levy of taxes, then people engaged in similar business in competition with that group should also be exempt. Are the Hutterites, who have gathered in the provinces of Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba, carrying on business? As long ago as 1939 the Supreme Court of Canada ruled they were. I wish to refer briefly to that ruling.

There was a case concerning whether or not the Hutterites were farmers under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act of 1934. The Supreme Court of Canada held that they were farmers within the meaning of the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act of Manitoba, 1934, and the amendment in 1953, and were entitled to the advantages under that act. This was a case in which the Hutterites themselves wished to take advantage of the act and set out to prove they were, in fact, farmers. They did prove this before the Supreme Court of Canada.

It is also interesting to note a recent judgment in a taxation case before the Tax Appeal Board. In this case five Hutterite colonies were involved. The judgment found, as a fact, they were farmers. The judgment goes on to state:

> It must also be noted that if the Articles of Association rather than the teachings and theories of the Hutterian Church are examined, it becomes apparent that two distinct purposes are enumerated in art. 2: religion and industry, the industrial purpose being described in the following way:

This is taken from the charter of the Hutterite Association:

> To engage in and carry on farming, stock-raising, milling and all branches of these industries, and to manufacture and deal in such products and by-products as may be considered by the Directors to be in the best interest of the Colony.

So, the wording of their charter leaves no doubt that they are engaged in an industry. The judgment ended with the following words:

> In view of the foregoing, I have reached the conclusion that the appellants were farmers in the full sense of the word.

What I am saying is that if the minister finds the act to be a difficult piece of legislation to administer and that it would be far easier for him to let them out, I still find that that is no excuse because that would only encourage other groups to rise up and cause trouble. If the government does not have sufficient intestinal fortitude to make the act work, then this bill should not be passed. It should be required that everybody comply with the act and pay into the fund, including those religious groups that were formed before 1966 and desire to opt out. On the one hand, there is the religious aspect of these groups, but on the other there is the farming operation, which is a completely different thing.

Much has been said about being good corporate citizens, about foreign investment in Canada and about these multinational corporations, and whether they are good corporate citizens. We should lay down a guideline so that everyone could see whether or not they are good corporate citizens. I am certain that deep within their hearts these religious groups want to be good Canadian citizens, as Rideman says in his teachings. They want to obey the government for in their eyes the government is God's servant. But in this act we seem to say that we will force the big corporations to be good corporate citizens, and yet we will let many people come into Canada without requiring them to contribute.

Who are these people whom we allow not to be good citizens? There was a study carried out in Alberta in 1959 by what was, in essence a royal commission composed of some respected and honourable men, such as James Bentley, who was at one time president of the National Federation of Agriculture, C. P. Hayes and W. Lodd. I do not know who those two gentlemen are, but I do know Mr. Bentley to be a fair and honest man. On page 27 of the report of that group we find the following statement:

> No loyalty to the country in which they live is acknowledged by the Hutterites, as responsibilities of citizenship are not accepted even by those born in the country.

I cannot underline this statement enough because we all believe that loyalty to the country is the supreme test for everyone. We in this parliament work for those who are most loyal to this country, not necessarily for those who acknowledge no loyalty to the country. Yet, this report states that the Hutterites acknowledge no loyalty to the country. That is what those to whom I referred found to be the case in the province of Alberta. Even those born in the country do not accept the responsibilities of citizenship.

The minister said when this bill was first introduced that this was one of his great problems and headaches, that he did not know what to do about these groups. His headache would be cured, the thorny problem of how to make these people pay into the Canada Pension Plan would be solved, if no exceptions were made. We would in fact be curing the minor headaches of other people, particularly farmers who are in competition with the Hutterites. When the Canada Pension Plan was first introduced in 1966, many farmers said that they did not want any part of it. Mass meetings were held throughout the province of Alberta. I was asked to attend a number of them and, strange as it might seem, I found myself defending the government at the time—it was a Liberal government then also. Many farmers did not want to pay into the Canada Pension Plan. They wanted the choice of opting out because the cash income of farmers is often not very great. They invest their profits in their farmsteads. The old adage that farmers live poor and die rich is nearly as true today as it was then.

Mr. Gilbert: Now they live rich and die rich.

Mr. Horner (Crowfoot): No, many of them die poor because some lawyers and trading companies take their profits. In fact, that it true now more than ever before. In any case, we cannot easily cure the minister's headache in this way. It is not living up to the obligation of governing the people well when you say: I do not know what to do about this problem so let us sweep it out the door and forget about it. Members of parliament cannot say: we accept the minister's headache; it is bothering him so we will help him get rid of it. That would not be living up to the obligation which I assumed when I ran for office. I acknowledged that the problems were difficult, but, I thought I could contribute towards solving them. If I had thought that solving problems meant sweeping them out the door, I should not have come here and the people should not have sent me here because those problems could have been swept out the door without my help. It is parliament and the House of Commons which should settle the problems of these people.

These people are engaged in farming but they are not good Canadian citizens because they acknowledge no loyalty to the country, even those who are born in Canada. This is hard to understand. That is why I took out of the library a copy of this study carried out by a group of respected men. The Hutterites themselves acknowledge that the government is a servant of God and that they will obey the wishes of government. The government has spoken and said that everybody in Canada should contribute to the Canada Pension Plan. The plan is portable. You may never collect from it, but if you need to, it will be there. If we are going to allow one group the choice of opting out, then I say we should give other groups the same right. I say: do not bring in a bill which allows a couple of groups not to take part if they were incorporated before 1966. Many churches have been formed since then.

If we are to allow churches a choice—and this includes strict religious sects—then we should allow them to opt out in the future as well as now, whether they were formed before 1966 or after. It seems to me that if we are to have good roads over which to bring our produce to market and if we are to have a good hospital with many doctors and nurses and all the necessary modern technology at our disposal to protect our families, then we should all without exception contribute to that investment fund. Then, the provinces would not be forced to go to New York forever to borrow. The investment fund idea is sound, but everybody should contribute to it, everybody who is prepared to use it and reap the benefits from it. That is the basis for it.

I have figures here for the province of Alberta. I have not totalled them up precisely, but $525 million has been borrowed by Alberta since 1966, and it is supposed to be a wealthy province. The province of Ontario, last year alone, borrowed $544 million from this fund.

I know that the Amish people of Mennonite people in some parts of Ontario also want to be exempted from contributing to this fund. They are not as businesslike people as the Hutterites. They still do their farming in what might be called an outmoded manner. But they use the roads, their children go to schools, and in cases of severe sickness they use the hospitals.

In 1971-72 Ontario borrowed $498 million, in the year before that $476 million, and in 1969-70 $412 million. We can see that there have been huge borrowings from the fund by the richest province of all. It has borrowed an average of $450 million per year since the inception of the Canada Pension Plan in order to build a better province, to build better roads, better hospitals and better schools. I believe that all citizens, whether or not they acknowledge their citizenship, should be forced to contribute to the building of a province. We ask corporations, whether they be international corporations, American corporations or Japanese corporations, to pay taxes to help build the facilities we desire.

It may be said that there are only a few of these people, that they are nice people, and they do not mean anybody any harm. That is all very true. But I point out that in the province of Alberta the Hutterite sect owns as much land as would encompass all of Prince Edward Island. So, while we might be talking about only a few individuals, collectively they own a large area of Canada. I say that we are exempting too large a proportion of the population from the provisions of the plan. We are exempting the owners of a huge land tract in Alberta, a huge land tract in Saskatchewan, and another huge land tract in Manitoba. I do not know how large a tract is involved in Ontario.

Mr. Reid: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, may I intervene to say that there have been discussions among the parties on how to deal with the debate this evening. My understanding is that we will begin at four o'clock, bypass private members' hour, rise for supper at the normal hour, resume at eight o'clock, and then conclude as specified under the terms of Standing Order 26.

Mr. Bell: We agree.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Is there unanimous agreement to this procedure?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, the time allotted to me will now expire at four o'clock. I have dealt at length with this subject matter because here we are dealing with a principle. Either the plan is compulsory and includes everybody, or it is not. The Conservative party at one time was a great party for principle. It believed in sticking up and standing up for principle.

Mr. Dinsdale: It still is.

Mr. Horner (Crowfoot): Some say it still is. I do not like to think that it does not, but we should treat all people equally. If we want to mention religious people, that is fine, even though I do not like that attitude because it narrows the scope. I notice some members of the NDP nodding their heads. They are unitarians, and maybe there would be some difficulty in interpreting that as religion. However, everybody should have a choice. I say we should not stipulate the year 1966. Some great religious sects may still spring up in Canada that may wish to guard zealously their communal being. Their members may not want to acquire social security numbers. They should be entitled to the same privilege.

Before closing I wish to say that if I am present in the House I will not grant unanimous consent for this bill to be dealt with in slipshod fashion. I want it to go to a committee, so that these groups can appear before it and defend their position that they should be let out of the plan. Can they tell us that what I have said about their possessions is all wrong, that what I have said about their land holdings in Alberta is all wrong?

I don't care if the Minister of National Health and Welfare has a headache. He has plenty of doctors in that department to give him pills for it. I am not shrinking from the job of being a responsible member of parliament, trying to solve the problems fairly as they confront parliament. That is the duty of us all. Just because a problem appears insoluble is no reason to throw it out the door. I know the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) finds inflation insoluble, and would like to get it thrown out the door. But we, as responsible members of parliament, will not let him sweep it out the door. Just because this matter involves two religious sects, and discussion of religion is taboo, we are supposed to let the Minister of National Health and Welfare sweep it out the door. That is wrong in principle, Mr. Speaker. Giving everybody equal treatment is what democracy is all about, not the granting of privileges to some and the withholding of privileges from others.

We all cherish our freedom. We know that in introducing any insurance plan, unemployment insurance, Canada Pension Plan or what-have-you, we foresake a little freedom for the security we get in return. But I know that some people value their freedom more than others. Many people have not taken out social security numbers. A very good friend of mine who contributes to the Canada Pension Plan has not taken out a social security number, and knows he will not be able to get one cent from the Canada Pension Plan when he retires. That is his choice. I notice it is four o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I will now put the motion for the adjournment of the debate.

[Translation]

Mrs. Albanie Morin (Louis-Hébert): Mr. Speaker, I move, seconded by the member for Shefford (Mr. Rondeau), that the debate be now adjourned.

Mr. Speaker: Is the House ready to carry the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S.O. 26

[English]

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

INCREASES IN COST OF LIVING AND INTEREST RATES

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to special order made this day the Hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield), seconded by hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies), moves:

That this House do now adjourn.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the Clerk of the House has just reminded me that under the rules I have 20 minutes. It has often been said that if you cannot say what you want to say in 20 minutes you cannot say it at all, and so I will do my best within that period. I suppose the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) and perhaps even the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) will do me the courtesy of hearing what I have to say in due course.

● (1600)

One of the factors that is causing us such concern today is the further rise in interest rates that has been announced and the indication that this is a return to a traditional approach. This approach, of course, involves higher costs for borrowers, higher costs for those who are doing business and has traditionally led to a slowdown in our economy, particularly in the slow growth areas of the country. What worries us all so much is that we feel we have been all through this before. The increase in the bank rate will work its way through the system, that is the various structures of interest rates, up into the long-term mortgage rates of interest.

The Minister of Finance earlier this afternoon made a great deal of the fact that the banks have given an assurance, for the time being at least, that they will not increase their mortgage interest rates. But ranks provide only part of the mortgage funds in this country, Mr. Speaker. There are other institutions, too, and this increase will work its way into the longer-term rates and will be reflected in the mortgage interest rates charged to many home owners as well as others who wish to borrow money in future. This will lead not only to a vast increase in cost to home owners, but if it continues will eventually reach a point where there will be a slowdown in construction. This has happened frequently before as a result of this kind of policy and will, of course, exacerbate the housing problem. I recognize that the government is quite proud of the housing starts this year, but a continuation of the escalation in the rates of mortgage interest will produce, as it always has in the past, a slowdown in construction. The same applies in the case of business.

Earlier this week we had a warning of the increase in the seasonally adjusted rate of unemployment to 5.5 per cent, the same as it was last March. Earlier today the Minister of Finance said that he had foreseen the figures yesterday and today when the program was developed that was announced by the Prime Minister. I do not know whether he also claims to have foreseen the increased rate of unemployment, seasonally adjusted or not. Surely, these figures are a warning to all of us of what has happened as a result of higher interest rates, what has happened in slow growth areas and what has happened particularly to the fight against regional disparity. The effects of the fight against regional disparity which was launched a few years ago by this government were negated by the slowdown in the economy of the nation. This was deliberately brought about by the minister of finance of that day and the prime minister in order, as the Prime Minister has said, "to lick inflation".

If we hope to make any real dent in the extent of regional disparity we must have an expanding national economy to serve as a basis. If the minister foresaw all this, what new measures have been announced by him, by the Prime Minister or by the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Jamieson) to offset the effect of higher interest rates on areas of slow growth? What new measures has the minister announced to ensure a solid base for the reduction of regional disparity if he foresaw all these increases?

I would not want to question the word of the minister, but I find it difficult to believe that when these policies were developed he actually foresaw the jump in the bank rate that has taken place this day. If he did, he must have seen the disadvantages that would be created for the slow growth areas of the country and homeowners, and should have taken steps to offset them. Higher interest rates have never been effective in containing inflation. This has been recognized by the International Monetary Fund which just last weekend recommended that governments should consider additional incomes policy measures to supplement the measures traditionally used because the traditional measures have not worked.

I agree that if you create enough employment you can very simply eliminate inflation. But, Sir, our labour force is increasing rapidly and we need rapid growth in the economy to create new jobs for people entering the work force. Surely, we are not going to go through the experience of recent years again when a large rate of unemployment was created through 1969, 1970 and 1971 in order to fight inflation. Since then, we have lived with a high rate of unemployment which has never been overcome despite the boast of successive ministers of finance, particularly with regard to the young and particularly in the disadvantaged parts of the country.

The Minister of Finance is not even prepared to bring in a budget in view of the conditions that now exist. Unemployment stands at 5.5 per cent seasonally adjusted, and it is my recollection that at the time of his budget the minister said that he anticipated unemployment, seasonally adjusted, would fall below 5 per cent by the end of the year. Here it is, Mr. Speaker, at the same rate as it was at the end of March with inflation at a rate well in excess of 8 per cent per year and, in terms of the past months, over 15 per cent. And the minister is saying that he has foreseen all of this.

How long ago did the minister foresee it? Was it at the time of his budget in February? Did he foresee then that inflation was going to reach an annual rate of well over 8 per cent in a year? That budget in any event was a failure as regards inflation. Did he present that foreseeing the conditions that now exist, the present rate of unemployment associated with the current rate of inflation? I find that very difficult to believe. That budget was not effective to deal with conditions as they existed in February, and it certainly is not appropriate to cope with the very different circumstances that exist today.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: I give the minister sufficient credit as a humanitarian not to have foreseen those circumstances. I ask the minister why he comes before this House today, after that budget of February, after an increasing rate of inflation month after month after month and increase after increase in the bank rate, saying that he foresaw it all the time.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, a point of order. I think the hon. gentleman wants to quote me correctly. In answer to questions he put to me today, I said that the government foresaw the effect of statistics published today on the cost of living because they showed what had been happening in August. That is all I said.

[Mr. Stanfield.]

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I have no inclination to exaggerate what the hon. member said.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I apologize to the hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) and to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner). I hope we will not get to the position we were in during the question period when we had interruptions and calls. I suggest to hon. members that perhaps whoever has the floor from time to time should be allowed to make his contribution to the debate to be followed by whoever might want to reply.

Mr. Stanfield: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I will give the minister an opportunity to reply to anything I say from time to time. I simply say the minister is now confirming my point. At the time of the budget he did not foresee these conditions. The budget of February and the budget we are now living with are not appropriate to the conditions that exist. It is not for the Minister of Finance to pretend that he has no obligation to come before this House with measures that are appropriate rather than the hodge-podge that he and the Prime Minister produced last week.

There is no greater evidence of the government's lack of concern and lack of understanding of policies than that which is found in the statement which the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) made to a panel of journalists interviewing him on a weekend television program during the election campaign last fall. At that time, the Prime Minister said he did not think it was shocking to see food prices go up. He thought it was good for the farmers. As a matter of fact, as the record shows, the Canadian farmer is just as much a victim of inflation as the retail consumer, the Canadian wage earner, the pensioner or anyone else.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: With regard to the milk arrangement announced by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) today, my party certainly approves of any effort such as this to reduce and hold down the cost of milk. We approve of the use of government funds for this purpose. We made it very clear that we approve of this, but we do not approve of the farmer being stuck with making up the difference, operating under a fixed price and having to absorb the extra costs. We believe it is unfair to apply a price freeze on a particular product without at the same time limiting in any way the farmers' costs. That is what is unfair. The record shows the Canadian farmer as being the prime victim of the policies of this government.

This government talks about the importance of expanding production. Who brought in the Lift Program? Who implemented this disincentive? Who dumped the reserves at firesale prices? Who today cynically bemoans the world situation as a problem of someone else's making? In October 1972, who but the Prime Minister could say that rising food prices were good for the farmer and in September, 1973, announce a policy involving farmers subsidizing other Canadian consumers?

The government is back on the supply kick. The cry is, grow all you can. Has the Canadian farmer been given the advantage of fast write-offs? I direct this question to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner). He provided fast write-offs for manufacturers to encourage production and employment. Has the Canadian agricultural producer been given similar treatment with regard to his equipment? Of course not! Has anything been done by way of an over-all policy to stabilize the farmer's input cost? Has anything been done to ensure that farming will be attractive to our young people? The government's credibility is not high anywhere in this country. It deserves to be low in the agricultural community.

This is the same government using the same discredited methods of high interest rates that were used in 1969 and 1970. When unemployment was running at about 7 per cent, the Prime Minister said he would not hesitate to again use the same methods to deal with any renewed inflation. We see the government today again using the same methods. It is the same Prime Minister who said earlier he would not lose his nerve if unemployment rates went over 6 per cent. This is the same pattern all over again with the same disastrous results becoming evident day by day.

There are two distinct differences in the circumstances this time. In 1969, the government launched its battle against inflation at a time when the rate of unemployment was below 5 per cent. It is making this mistake all over again in 1973 with a floor level of unemployment in excess of 5 per cent. We know the way unemployment climbed the last time. What are Canadians to look for now in this re-enactment when unemployment rates are much higher at the outset?

In 1973, this parliament should do more than talk as it sees history repeating itself. We know the consequences of such a repetition. This parliament can act. As we see this confused government again resorting to outdated, inhumane knee-jerk economic policies, we should act and remove this government from office. This country cannot afford a government flying by the seat of its pants. I say it is time for a good swift kick in its pants.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: The minister said today that he anticipated these figures. The policy announced by himself and the Prime Minister was not greeted with any great applause, even by fans of shrewd political tactics. There are too many serious consequences involved in this kind of makeshift effort. There is a move to more selective controls in a most distorted fashion. There is a shift toward a kind of isolationism when we should be joining with our partners in an approach. Confusion and contradiction is being placed before a country which is looking for confidence and leadership. In June, the Minister of Labour (Mr. Munro) told his constituents, and I quote:

—we found it necessary to establish a prices review board.

He did not say it was a toothless kind of food prices review board. He went on to say:

We are hoping that this will have a strong effect in limiting prices. The government also has a contingency plan if for some reason this board fails in its effort to control prices. The contingency plan would involve the establishment of a form of wage and price control, which you have shown your concern for in the last questionnaire which was returned to me.

I cannot begin to say all I would like to say. However, a year ago when the cost of living was showing a year-to-year increase of 4.7 per cent, I expressed concern about the danger of a full-blown inflation psychology taking hold in Canada. That concern is vindicated again in today's cost of living statistics and the announced increases in interest rates.

I hope no one in this government tries to pretend this is simply a question or rising food costs. The rise in food costs is very serious and most shameful, but the increase in the cost of living index on items other than food is now very rapid. It is at the rate of 6 per cent a year. Further advances in interest rates, housing costs and clothing costs once again show the government's fixation on an ineffective review board dealing solely with food prices to be shameful negligence. It is surely an unprecedented shame to have the cost of living climbing 8.3 per cent over the past year, over 15 per cent this month, while unemployment stands at 5.5 per cent. It is an unprecedented shame for that to have happened.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: The Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance said they foresaw this. Having foreseen it, they produced this tawdry package of measures which are inadequate to provide some stability in this country or deal with the malignant problem facing Canada today, a terrible rate of inflation associated with an unacceptable rate of unemployment.

An hon. Member: What do you have to offer?

Mr. Stanfield: The hon. member knows perfectly well what I have to offer.

● (1620)

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, after listening to the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) one can understand why he was satisfied with a limit of 20 minutes. He reminded me very much of somebody trying to kill a penalty, looking up at the clock hoping he could survive that period of time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. For the second time the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) has made something of the point that I have not asked for extra time. I wish to say simply that I do not presume upon the rules of the House, and I hope the Minister of Finance will not do so either.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Before the minister resumes, I think I should again remind the House that hon. members who have been given the floor should have the opportunity to complete what they have to say without too many points of order and interruptions.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): I recall that the House used to extend its indulgence by allowing speakers who led off debate for all parties to complete their speeches.

However, I can understand the hon. gentleman not wishing to continue that tradition.

What this debate is again about is a difference in analysis as to the cause of the rise in the cost of living in this country. Although, as the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said again today, the government has undertaken contingency plans for price and incomes control we have concluded, and repeatedly said to the House, that in the circumstances which have existed in this country and in the world up to the present, controls would bring about no lasting improvement in our price performance and that they could, indeed, do considerably more harm than good, a danger which has been borne out by the experience of the United States.

An hon. Member: I think not.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): The basic cause of the inflationary pressures which have faced sus up to now has been the world imbalance between demand and supply in relation to a large number of agricultural and industrial commodities. This is a problem which could not possibly be resolved in an effective way by the imposition of price and wage controls. If the cause, as we analyse it, is insufficient supply and overwhelming demand, the imposition of controls imposed against that supply would not increase the supply but discourage it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): The experience of controls both in the United States and the United Kingdom has made it conclusively clear that in a situation where supply fails to meet demand controls are no solution to inflation. I have always recognized that if it became evident that the fundamental nature of the problem had changed, that the main source of inflationary pressure was arising not from a shortage of world commodities or not from an imbalance between world supply and demand but primarily from a domestic spiral of cost and prices, to policy response of the government might well be different. But on the basis of the facts as we see them we do not believe the solution is that suggested by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield).

The major aim of a long series of government policies has been to encourage an increase in supply through the expansion of our productive facilities, an increase in supply so as to get to the root of inflation and ease the pressure of rising prices on the budgets of Canadian families, particularly those on low and fixed incomes and the prevention of any attempt to exploit inflation by profiteering. These policies are not band-aids as suggested by the Conservative leader. They represent carefully selected, carefully coordinated measures, more comprehensive than anything the hon. gentleman has put forward even within the terms of the hon. member for Témiscamingue (Mr. Caouette). The Leader of the Opposition made much of the forecasting. But any reasonable Canadian could have arrived at what was happening to meat prices, what was happening to food prices generally, what was happening to world commodity prices.

Any reasonable Canadian, Mr. Speaker, would have known that the statistics reflecting the situation in the first week of August and published today would show an inordinate increase in the cost of food and in the cost of living. No magic ball was needed to make such a forecast. No superhuman gifts were required to make such a forecast. For the hon. gentleman to express surprise at those statistics today, knowing that parliament and the country were dealing with these issues both this week and last week, knowing the government announced its program on August 13 and again on September 4 in recognition of those very facts, is phoney and just doesn't stand up to examination.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hees: What are we going to see a month from now?

Mr. Cafik: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. With all respect to the hon. members of the House, may I say I listened with attention to the Leader of the Opposition and I should like to hear what the Minister of Finance has to say. I ask members opposite to allow the rest of us to listen.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hees: Tell us what we are going to see next month!

An hon. Member: Why don't you shut up?

Mr. Speaker: On the point of order raised by the hon. member for Ontario, I would refer hon. members to Standing Order 12 to the effect that when a member is speaking no member shall interrupt him, etc. All members should read that standing order sometime. I believe that when a member has the floor he can, perhaps, expect some degree of good-natured interruption, but I really feel we are not achieving very much for the decorum of the House and the orderly conduct of our business if, when a member is speaking, there are shouts, interruptions and catcalls which contribute nothing to the debate and which make it very difficult for the Chair to hear the member who has the floor.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): I want to thank the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Cafik) for his intervention but I assure him that, for the moment, I do not think we are in any trouble here. I would hope that as the clock ticks on Your Honour will take into consideration, with your usual generosity and impartiality, an extension of the time available to me.

In furtherance of these objectives, in order to increase supply, which is the only really effective antidote to the imbalance of world supply and demand affecting Canada and as a means of protecting Canadians, particularly those on fixed and low incomes, against the erosion of the dollar, the government has consistently, in both budgets, and again in the measures announced on August 13 and September 4, followed and implemented the following policies: the budget measures reduced personal taxation by $1,300,000,000, putting that money back into the pockets of taxpayers for a maximum of $500 and a minimum of $100.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): We abolished the sales tax on all children's clothing and on all food and drink except alcohol. We reduced tariffs in a temporary way on $1,400 million worth of goods to increase supply and encourage the competitive factors in the economy. We increased equalization payments by $190 million to allow the so-called have-not provinces to redistribute a greater amount in property taxes for school purposes back to their own citizens.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): We implemented full indexing of old age security payments and guaranteed income supplement to compensate pensioners and those on fixed incomes against the rise in the cost of living. We escalated that index. We liberated the Canada Pension Plan from the 2 per cent limit and we are proposing that this, too, be indexed. A number of provinces are considering increasing social assistance payments which are shared 50-50 with the federal government under the Canada Assistance Plan to offset the impact of inflation. We reduced the tax burden on manufacturers and processors and tried to help them modify prices. We set up the Food Prices Review Board.

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): We imposed temporary export controls on cattle, hogs, beef, pork and a number of feed grains to prevent world-wide export demand causing shortages and sharp rises in prices in Canada. We proposed an increase in family allowances to $20 a month, beginning in 1974, and we have just instituted on a temporary basis for three months, non-taxable interim payments of $12 per child. We instituted a policy of subsidies to militate against the rise in the price of bread and, with the co-operation of the provinces, against the rise in the price of milk. We eliminated capital gains tax from the family farm to ensure that people remain on the farm and that we encourage agriculture.

I could go on with this catalogue, and I understand how unpallatable it is for members of the opposition; but when the reckoning is made the Canadian people will consider each one of these items as a legitimate step in the fight against inflation. I submit to Your Honour that, taken together, all these several measures adopted over the past several months, and I have not been able to list them all, add up to one of the most intensive and far-ranging programs—I was going to say "comprehensive", but the hon. gentleman has diluted the significance of that term beyond recognition—to deal in a workable and realistic way with the kind of inflation we are now experiencing and in moderating its effects upon Canadians.

The hon. gentleman brought into the terms of his motion the rise in the bank rate and the rise in the prime rate by the chartered banks of this country. I believe that most members have a copy of the release of the governor of the bank published last night in which he said that the action was made necessary by the pressure of financial markets, which has led to further increases in short-term interest rates, including those which were announced yesterday by the chartered banks. In his release he says that the upward pressure on short-term interest rates came not only, as I said earlier in the House, from the strong demand for credit in Canada, but also from the much higher levels of short-term interest rates in many other countries. This meant that this differential in rates, particularly in the short term, tended to generate international flows of funds which were adding to the pressure of demand on domestic markets and in the foreign exchange markets. The Governor emphasized, and I repeat, that the policy of the Bank of Canada continues to be directed toward moderating the unusually rapid growth in bank credit and money in Canada while still leaving scope for money growth adequate for continued expansion of employment and output. Those words are his.

The hon. gentleman again says that this is a program of tight money, and his colleague from Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) suggests the same thing. I do not know what the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies) is currently thinking about this subject. When the monetary supply is expanding at an annual rate of 15 per cent, and when chartered bank loans are expanding at an annual rate of 24 per cent, I say that is not restricting the money supply. Indeed, the money supply may well be expanding too rapidly.

I agreed to allow the banks to raise jointly their rates on certificates of deposit. Certificates of deposit are the instruments against which banks borrow money on terms up to one year. I allowed that rate to go from 7½ per cent to 8½ per cent. I did that because short-term rates had outrun them. The shortage of funds that I have described, because of the disparity in short-term interest rates between Canada and the United States, the three point differential with the United States, and the four to five point differential with Europe, had put restraints on our money markets and on our ability to accommodate an expansion of the economy.

In return for that, I asked the banks to take a look at their profit picture and to ask themselves whether these spreads between what they pay for money and what they charge for money which they lend could not be narrowed. The certificate of deposit rate was raised one per cent and the prime rate was raised three-quarters of one per cent, so we narrowed the spread from one per cent to three-quarters per cent.

With regard to loans under $200,000 for small businesses, they raised the prime rate only one-quarter. In other words, the differential was narrowed from one to one-quarter of one per cent. They gave me an undertaking that as far as mortgages were concerned they had no present intention of raising the rates and that they would continue to inject a reasonable amount of funds into the mortgage market. In any event, the banks have narrowed their spread.

May I tell the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent) that, in terms of the amount of money that the banks are now putting into the mortgage market, when my predecessor the present Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) released the 6 per cent limit on bank rates in order to allow the banks into the mortgage market to compete, the banks were not participating in mortgages significantly at all. In fact, their participation was virtually zero. Since 1967 the banks have entered the mortgage market. Last year the annual rate was $3 billion. This year the amount of funds put into the residential mortgage market is $4,100 million, an increase of $1,100 million in a single year.

I now want to deal briefly with the comments of the Leader of the Opposition about unemployment. I have said in the House that I am not satisfied with the seasonally adjusted unemployment rate any more than he is. But to attribute that, as he attempted to do, to weakness in the economy is just not consistent with the facts. I think we are entitled to look at the number of new jobs that the economy has created. I have told the House, and I now repeat, that comparing August 1973 with August 1972 the number of new jobs in this country is 464,000. That is an extraordinarily high increase in the employment rate.

If I can take the first quarter with the second quarter, I have said in the House before that when you take the rate of growth in real terms over the last quarter of 1972 and the first quarter of 1973, discounting inflation of 12 per cent, that rate of growth could not possibly be sustained without damaging the economy. The second quarter taken together with the first quarter—

Mr. Stanfield: Take it by itself.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Very well; taken by itself it is an inevitable result of the shortages of materials, bottlenecks in production, of a necessary levelling off of the economy. Taking the first two quarters of this year, the economy has been growing in real terms, discounting inflation, of 9.4 per cent seasonally adjusted. I stick to the prediction that I made in this House on February 19 when I brought down my budget that the real growth in this country for the year will be 7 per cent. I still hold to that.

The Leader of the Opposition has fun saying that we should blame the weather, blame strikes and so on. I also said in my budget that when you try to attempt to predict what the economy is going to do you are dealing with human affairs, not dry statistics. The problems in this country are not simply statistical; any economist must learn that. The problems of this country are human problems. When you look at what the economy can do, you have to judge on the basis of reasonable management-labour peace; you have to judge on the basis of reasonably good crops; and you have to judge on the basis of reasonable international stability. As the Prime Minister pointed out earlier this afternoon, the economy is not static, it is continually responding to human affairs, both domestically and internationally. Therefore, if any of those bases to which I have referred are interrupted or interfered with, then that affects one's forecast and that forecast has to be adjusted.

In summarizing, Mr. Speaker, may I say that the type of inflation that is facing us the present time is caused by the simultaneously strong demand everywhere in the world for a limited supply of goods. No one country alone can stem that tide. While the Conservative leader may want to pose in cosmetically political terms as a King Canute commanding the world-wide inflationary waters to recede from Canada, when we are one of the great traders of the world involved with world prices, if he thinks that that is going to command the support of the sensible majority of the Canadian people at this time, then I do not believe he is thinking in politically realistic terms.

The government is doing everything reasonably possible to maximize our own supplies, in the process increasing national output and incomes and employment, while at the same time minimizing the erosion of the incomes of those who stand to be most hurt by inflation. It is important that we ensure that our rate of inflation in Canada does not significantly exceed that of our leading industrial competitors. That puts a heavy responsibility on all Canadians. It puts a responsibility on business not to seek to raise prices in order to meet every rise in costs. But their profit picture is improving. It puts a responsibility on labour to ensure that, although they get a just return, they do not try to escalate that return. It puts a responsibility on governments, federal and provincial, not to aggravate inflationary pressures. If this is not done, the result of such a course could only be an accelerating spiral of costs and prices that would intensify inflation, jeopardize Canada's international competitive position and impede the growth in future of production and employment. We have been down that rocky road before and I do not believe many Canadians want to travel it again. I hope and I believe that we Canadians have enough plain, ordinary commonsense to avoid that destructive course, and instead that we are going to work together under realistic policies to meet the world as we find it and achieve the goal of steadily improving a standard of living that all Canadians can share.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, the debate on the cost of living in Canada has unfortunately taken on an aura of windy familiarity; a windy and unsubstantial familiarity, I might say. Nothing new has been added during the debate on this subject which actually began last Monday. On the one hand, the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) has reiterated Conservative policy of systematic controls on everything in the country, systematically disregarding all the available evidence as to the utter disaster resulting from such controls in the United States and in Great Britain, and thus totally ignoring relevant evidence which it seems to me any responsible political party should be considering before offering a convenient political gimmick that may or may not be appealing to some sections of the population of Canada. On the other hand, we have heard the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) in reply deal with nothing new, except to point out in reference to interest rates what his government did a few years ago in allowing the banks to get into the mortgage market. I want to deal with that point at some length in a moment.

We watched the Minister of Finance provide great emotional blather for his Liberal troops by referring to the contradictions offered by the Leader of the Opposition, without announcing anything new in the way of policy. The Minister of Finance has correctly reasserted that his government has taken steps to ease part of the problem of inflation in terms of the incomes of our senior citizens, the incomes of our veterans and the incomes of Canadian families by way of family allowance increases, and so on.

The government has taken some steps, and in any honest appraisal of what this government has done compared with other governments elsewhere, certainly in terms of comparison with the kind of massive controls proposed by the Conservative party, these have to be acknowledged and some credit has to be given.

I remind the Minister of Finance, however, that when he denigrates the Conservatives and then talks about imposing selective controls, in which we believe, it is his government that has refused to put teeth into the Prices Review Board, one creation he cited as one of the government's courses of action. His government refuses to put teeth into that board, giving it the authority to roll back prices where profiteering or price gouging can be shown to exist. Where this government has failed to act it must be held responsible. Of course, the Conservative party, when it had the opportunity to put its vote where its mouth has been recently, refused last week in the Food Prices Committee to support an NDP motion which would have had the effect of putting teeth in the Prices Review Board.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: In the time I am allowed today I want to say something in concrete terms, for a change in this debate, and put forward some specific proposals to deal with a major aspect of the cost of living, namely housing.

In spite of all the talk, understandable and acceptable talk we have heard about food costs, which have been increasing, particularly in the past month, I would remind the Minister of Finance and other members of this House that according to the monthly breakdown of the consumer price index by Statistics Canada, which shows how the average family spends its money, housing is a much more important item. The report indicates that 31 per cent of those points allocated to the cost of living by Statitics Canada are related to housing. Only 25 per cent of the average family's typical budget goes toward food. That was the reason for my motion today under Standing Order 26 on behalf of the NDP. I suggest we should zero in on the important question of housing costs, and that we should deal with interest rates, particularly mortgage interest rates, because these affect every Canadian whether he lives in rural or urban Canada.

It is in this precise area, no matter what else the government has done in other areas, that the present government has demonstrated a clear bankruptcy of policy. In passing, I would suggest that the Conservative party has not offered one shred of evidence that its alternative policy would result in any improvement over the government's policy.

Mr. Nowlan: Why don't you go to the conference this weekend and give them some ideas?

Mr. Broadbent: Listen, my friend; I will try to do precisely that in the next few minutes. The present government in terms of its housing policy, and I should say that the Conservative party when it was in office from 1958 to 1962 followed exactly the same policy, has really determined a national housing policy in Canada by acting wrongly on the basis of two combined principles. First, the government has used housing, and we see this in the interest rate situation that exists today, as an instrument for stabilizing the Canadian economy. Second, the government has relied on incentives as the key to the financing of housing in Canada. The combination of these two approaches is exactly what has put housing in this country out of the reach of the vast majority of our families.

The grotesque, and I use that word with care, injustice of using housing policy as one instrument in monetary and fiscal policy should be clear to all Canadians. When we think of housing in comparison with schools, would any government in Canada think of tightening or loosening the screws on the building of schools as a response to an inflationary or deflationary situation in the economy? I hope no government would do so, and I expect none would as the population of Canada would not accept that kind of policy. People in Canada have come to expect that schooling is a basic right of everyone, and they would throw out of office any government which decided to build or not to build schools on the basis of an inflated or deflated economy.

I suggest that this government and its Conservative predecessor still maintain that approach to housing. If this is the time to deflate the economy, as obviously it is according to the understanding of the Minister of Finance, instead of separating mortgage interest rates, for example, from the rest of the interest rate structure, and I will come to that in a moment and show how it could be done, he leaves mortgage interest rates as part of the general interest situation.

The Minister of Finance rather proudly suggested a few minutes ago that the banks in Canada, those noble institutions, were going to guarantee that mortgage money would continue to be available. What he neglected to mention, of course, is that they will guarantee the availability of that money at 10 per cent, which is just short of the highest mortgage interest level in Canadian history. If the interest rate increases announced yesterday by the banks are allowed to take their course, I predict on the basis of a small "c" conservative estimate that within a month the NHA mortgage rate will hit 11 per cent in Canada which will be the highest level in respect of NHA rates in the history of the country.

This government should not take any pride at all in such a course. The Minister of Finance alluded with some pride to the fact that a few years ago the banks were encouraged to enter into the mortgage market. He was quite right. They were encouraged by this government. That is only one part of the whole series of profit-based methods which this Minister of Finance and his predecessor used to deal with housing. I should like to show how that led to the very high cost of housing we have in Canada today. It is typical of this government and its Conservative predecessor that instead of dealing with housing in the way in which we deal with schools, on the basis of need, they try to generate housing on the basis of profit incentives. This has not worked.

First, in 1967 the Liberals freed the bank rate for mortgages which had been fixed at 6 per cent. They thought this would bring down the price and increase the supply. In 1969, on the recommendation of the then Liberal cabinet minister responsible for housing, the hon. member for Trinity, (Mr. Hellyer)—he is perhaps as comfortable in the Conservative party as in the Liberal cabinet—the NHA lending rate which had been fixed at 6½ per cent was released and permitted to be established by market forces. Again in 1969, and again on the advice of the hon. member for Trinity, the roll-over principle was added to mortgage financing. This enabled a renegotiation of the interest rate on a mortgage every five years. At that time he said that if interest rates went down people would be able to get a lower interest rate on their mortgage after five years. Of course, interest rates have have never gone down but have gone up constantly. Finally, in the spring of this year, Bill C-135 was introduced as a new and exciting measure intended to bring millions of dollars into the mortgage market! Once again, in the words of the present minister in charge of housing, the basic principle involved in the bill was "enhancing the attractiveness of mortgage investment". What that means, of course, is to provide more profits to induce more capital.

What has this series of four steps over the past six or seven years of the Liberal government, incidentally supported by the Conservative party, led to? First of all, the most important and negative effect of these profit-oriented initiatives was to destroy the moderate and low-income housing market in Canada. By generating a significant increase in mortgage funds at unrestricted rates of interest, builders and land speculators in Canada were encouraged to concentrate on high-priced housing where profit margins are greater as everyone knows. This meant that during the Trudeau years, 1968, to 1973, moderately priced housing almost disappeared from the private market. So far in this year, the national average price for housing has gone up by a further 18 per cent. The sole beneficiaries of this kind of policy are the wealthy, either as consumers of expensive housing or as controllers of the building industry.

Like previous tinkering with the mortgage market the minister's new bill, which we have been told will be brought back to the House next week, will be great for investors but will not be helpful to the average Canadian. The minister expressly stated that his proposal entailed no direct market intervention by the government either to stabilize the price of mortgage funds or to ensure an adequate supply. In other words, the government will not ensure that mortgages will be available to those who need them at rates they can afford. Conservatives, I might add, support that bill completely. Under the government's proposal, housing investment would be permitted to seek its maximum profit level without any consideration of social need. From the point of view of investment, housing will remain essentially a commodity like soap, beer or deodorant. If it pays, money will come in and the consumer will be charged what the traffic will bear.

It is no wonder that the financial community in Toronto and elsewhere expresses support for the legislation and urges members to give it speedy passage. It is no wonder also that the Conservative party has added its support. The simple fact is that the market method of dealing with mortgages has not worked. As I said a minute ago, with the interest rate announced yesterday by the Bank of Canada I predict that we will have an NHA mortgage rate of 11 per cent within a month. What this policy has meant is not more housing for the average Canadian but rather the highest profits for the banks and financial institutions in the history of Canada. Bank profits between 1967 and 1971 increased—at an annual average rate of 19 per cent. Between 1971 and 1972 bank profits increased by 20.4 per cent. The Toronto-Dominion Bank, the Bank of Montreal and Royal Bank showed mid-summer increases of 50 per cent, 46 per cent and 37 per cent respectively.

During the period betwen 1966 and 1971, the profits of the banks in Canada increased by 85.3 per cent compared to other sectors of the economy, such as industry, where profits increased by 14.3 per cent, manufacturing where profits increased by 11 per cent and mining where profits increased by 10.2 per cent. Because I wish to make a specific proposal, I shall omit further documentation of the fantastic rip-off that has been accomplished by our financial institutions. I say with all seriousness to the Minister of Finance and to the Conservative Party of Canada that far from leading to the production of more houses which the average person in Canada could buy, the whole reliance on the profit incentive, the whole basic decision to leave mortgages within the market system has simply led to the highest profits in the history of this country for our financial institutions.

I wish to make a specific proposal now. It should be clear, if the government wishes to act in order to provide housing, that it could take the following four steps and in that way do something in the days ahead to provide the necessary housing for those who need it. First, the federal government should establish a central mortgage fund section within a newly constituted ministry of housing and urban affairs. This section would direct banks and other federally-chartered financial institutions to allocate a substantial portion of their annual investment to residential mortgages at a rate not exceeding 6 per cent. Second, the mortgage allocation requirement for each lending institution would be related to the level of its own annual investment, to its liquidity needs, and to the national housing needs for a given period. Third, the regional and income distribution of mortgage funds would be determined by the minister responsible for housing. All Canadians would be eligible for the 6 per cent mortgages but priority in allocation would go to those of average and below average family income. Fourth, if the approved lenders, such as the banks and trust companies, do not allocate their housing mortgage quotas, they will be required to transfer the unfulfilled portion of the 6 per cent interest rate to the central mortgage fund which will lend the funds directly to implement the established housing priorities.

If this four-point program were implemented by this government or by any other government it would save the average family about $1,000 a year in mortage payments alone. This approach must be considered along with other steps which must be taken in respect of housing, but if implemented it would begin to establish housing policy on the basis of social need and social priority on a parallel with medicine, which we have taken out of the market, and on a parallel with schools which we took out of the market sometime ago. I say that this kind of action is long overdue. The present policy of the government, which refuses to extricate mortgage money from other interest rate considerations, will serve only to perpetuate profits by our banks and will not provide homes for people who need them. If the government wants to take a step now to deal with inflation, a step that would be relevant to most Canadians, it should accept a number of the suggestions I have just made and bring in legislation in the next few weeks. We would guarantee speedy passage, and I am sure that Canadians from coast to coast would be pleased.

[Translation]

Mr. Roland Godin (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, we have before us a motion enabling us to discuss the uncontrolled and inflationary thrusts, as shown by the figures on the cost of living.

Mr. Speaker, as most people do we are wondering if the government can do something. It is obvious that the government could act and if no efficient step has been taken up to now it is not, in my opinion, due to a lack of authority or information, but it is rather a form of inaction bordering on complicity and, in the present system, I suppose, similar conditions must be expected.

In short, this government having been elected by financial magnates, it is clear that they must be reimbursed now and they must even make reserves in anticipation of the next election.

It is true that the government has recently adopted legislation to fight inflation. However, we can rightfully be in doubt about the outcome of these measures. The proposed aim may appear honest, but the expected outcome may not only take long to materialize but fail completely because some of these steps seem to me to be based on wrong assumptions. And among those which are offered now, I take the liberty of singling out some reports published by Statistics Canada, including last spring's edition which argued that the cost of living had increased by 41 per cent since 1961.

Together with the majority of the people, I claim that the published figures are completely wrong, ridiculous and unrealistic. We know quite well that in 1973, we cannot buy with $100 what we could obtain for $50 in 1961. On the other hand, a survey made recently by an independent firm, still honest apparently, claims that in 1949, for instance, it cost a family of four $47 a week to live whereas today the same family spends $147.

However, to come back to Statistics Canada, I take my hat off to the officials who amuse themselves juggling around consumer price figures. The reports and figures of those civil servants prove that they are real acrobats. They adjust figures, start their calculations over again on the basis of that ingenious device called the "consumer price index" which dates back to 1939, that is, the year where economists playing heads or tails decided it would serve as basis for graduating the economic thermometer. The scale was based not on the sea level, nor did it start at zero, but on the figure 100. That had been selected as a basis from which they would play at adding or subtracting, according to any decrease or increase in prices.

In 1949, the indicator had already gone up to 169 compared with 1939. The government of the time then wisely took the decision of bringing the indicator back to 100, that is without taking into account increases registered between 1939 and 1949.

In 1961, the thermometer was already up to 129. The government therefore plucked up courage and, facing its responsibilities, took a decision heavy with consequences, that is to base again the scale on the figure 100.

Since then, about fifty investigations have been launched by the government to study all kinds of things, including poverty and all the other problems which could be of interest to the population. Eventually, in July 1973, the index, which had come down to 100 in 1961, had gone up to 151 already, which amounts to 193 as compared with the figure of 100 selected for 1949.

Mr. Speaker, if I allow myself to question those figures, it is because the events are offering me the opportunity. Since then, those belonging to mighty unions, for instance, besides asking for increased salaries, are now adding another parameter, namely the cost of living. A union leader was saying a few days ago that the increase in salaries obtained by united workers with great difficulty for a period of three years had been completely nullified. However, those working for big companies, or who are members of big unions, succeed in negotiating, and will be able for some time still to cope with the rise in the cost of living. However, we should seriously think about the non-organized, about those whose salary has been frozen for years and also about the pensioners whose income has been frozen for years even though they must pay for a loaf of bread the same price as those earning over $200 a week. Thousands of average salary earners are today poverty striken.

In my opinion, one of the reasons for this inflation is because we are still living under a monetary system which was tried 100 years ago and received no improvement while, in the meantime, everything was modernized. Everything is going fast whether it be in the field of trade, industry or any other area. But thanks to all kind of innovations, thanks to science, the average citizens should expect their working hours to be reduced and to enjoy longer vacations. The worker is no longer alone; he is assisted by all kind of machines. From the most modern computer to the heaviest machines, the white collar, the worker and all classes of society should benefit from marvelous inventions.

Unfortunately, the contrary is happening. The man replaced by a machine becomes unemployed. The man who sees all kind of new methods used finds himself without work and, unfortunately, those lucky enough to be on a pay list have to pick up the tab. This money used to pay for social welfare benefits, unemployment insurance benefits, pensions of all kinds, is taken from the wallet of those who are working. Financiers and big companies have been exempted from taxes at the expense of the worker. In 1940, the tax percentage paid by the worker was 40 per cent; it is now over 80 per cent. This is one more reason for inflation.

Finally, we also know that the worker who had to borrow to build his house has to pay for it three times over. He will pay the actual price to the builder of the house and twice as much to the finance company. So, in addition to paying his house three times, the man who has a job must pay for everything given to his neighbours. It is to break that vicious circle that we Creditistes propose that the amounts paid out in the form of pensions of all kinds in Canada be taken out of new credit.

There was talk about freezing prices and salaries. Mr. Speaker, if interest rates on bank loans are not to be frozen, if taxes are not to be frozen, why pick on salaries which represent a very small percentage in comparison with sale prices on finished products. We know that in the United States, for example, in the heavy industries the percentage of salaries represents only about 3½ per cent and in Canada, we also know that in the heavy industries the percentage of salaries included in finished products represents only about 4 per cent, whereas, for example, the cost of salaries in comparison with the cost of producing food for major industries represents only 8.8 per cent of the value of those products sold on the market, the profit on the other hand being 25 per cent, and it is 66 per cent on the cost of raw materials.

Mr. Speaker, in view of those facts, it would actually be criminal and inequitable to consider imposing a ceiling on salaries, since the sore is not there.

Since according to the present pricing system, the public must assume all the production costs for a given period when it should only be paying for the total consumption during this period, the purchasing power/production costs/sales price ratio would be better balanced if current wholesale prices were modified by means of subsidies like those that the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has already started to suggest, so that the relation between modified and current wholesale prices be the same as that between total production and consumption.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, we Creditistes recommend that this adjustment to the economy be made along these lines: First, wholesalers could be asked to register at their bank to obtain the subsidies related to wholesale prices. Second, registered retailers would commit themselves, according to the registration, to maintain all their gross profits at a rate not exceeding the rate agreed to, after consultation, as being the equitable rate of profits within their respective group.

They would also be required, as an evidence that they complied with their commitments, to submit twice a year a duly audited financial statement.

Third, these retailers would in turn be allowed to sell their goods at a discount price, according to the above mentioned formula, at a rate that would be regularly announced by the Bank of Canada.

Let us assume, for instance, that this rate is set at 25 per cent; retailers would get 75 per cent of the price of their goods from the public at large and 25 per cent from their bank, that would be reimbursed in turn under an agreement with the Bank of Canada.

Fourth, together with the passage of the above mentioned measures, all rents, wages and salaries could be reduced by, say, 10 per cent, which would reverse the inflationary trend that results from increasing costs of production. Needless to say that before reaching that point, the corporate income tax and the sales tax would have to be reviewed. And as far as the sales tax is concerned, it would even be desirable to abolish it.

Mr. Speaker, this price adjustment I have underlined cannot be implemented before a change is previously made in the financial system.

We Canadians remember the commitments of the right hon. Mackenzie King in 1935. And if a change was necessary at that time, this measure has obviously become a national emergency; therefore, this is the aim that all Social Credit party members who want to deal efficiently with an expensive social life, have been trying to reach, and we will continue in our effort, Mr. Speaker, because I think that it is important. We will have to reach our goal.

[English]

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, some comments have been made by members opposite concerning the number of members present on this side of the chamber. They know that a most important function is being held at this time in this city, the capital of Canada, and that some of our people have a legitimate excuse for being out of the House. However, I thought that if members of the official opposition had been serious about the motion they moved, their benches would be filled. As you will have noticed, Mr. Speaker, those benches have been rarely full on any of the motions they put forward.

Mr. Hees: It isn't quantity but quality that counts.

Mr. Whelan: The hon. member is talking about quality. That reminds me of a letter that appeared in one of the local newspapers. I am sure the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) would be interested in it. The letter read in part:

> On September 8 I visited Simpsons Sears store on St. Laurent Boulevard. I selected four pairs of men's underwear. Each package showed signs of recent removal of the price stickers. A salesman told me the price was $1.75 each. Then, I noticed another identical package with a price sticker of $1.50. Questioned about this, the salesman said the price had just been increased, and the stickers were being changed for this reason.

I suggest that since the Leader of the Opposition knows so much about this product the letter writer should contact him immediately.

When we introduce programs to aid people, criticism is made loud and clear in the House to the effect that we are freezing people into fixed prices. That was done today. Here, I refer to the program I announced providing 5 cents a quart aid to consumers of milk in those provinces entering into the agreement. Nothing could be further from the truth than that we are freezing them into set prices. It is clearly stated in the agreement that either party can re-enter negotiations if things change drastically one way or another, and I point out that the province of Quebec has agreed to that. We are not freezing prices at any level. We are aiding the consumers and the producers at the same time.

The Leader of the Official Opposition talks about a 90 day freeze, and I have heard the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) make glowing speeches about it. Mr. Speaker, I have here the price index for fish and a comparison with other foods. I wonder if the hon. member for St. John's East would have the guts to go down to his own constituency and tell the people there, "My leader wants to freeze you people at your present level of wages, you who have not reached the same level of wages as people in other parts of the motion. He wants you to remain at two bucks an hour, $2.25, or whatever the wage is, and leave people in other parts of the nation earning $5, $7 or $10, because he thinks you fishermen are getting too much."

Is that what the Leader of the Opposition is talking about when he mentions a freeze? He has never explained it in this House in a way that makes sense to any fisherman or farmer. Actually, it does not make sense to some of his own members because they are not here to support him.

Mr. Stanfield: There are a lot more of them here than Liberals.

Mr. Whelan: Has he anything to offer to guarantee production in this country? Members of the official opposition talk about instability, but when they urge a 90 day freeze they are causing instability because then people do not want to invest in livestock or other production. I blame them as much as anybody else. I blame the whole program that they have been bombarding the country with, and I say that all they have to do is look south and see what happened with a freeze there.

Mr. Woolliams: They are looking north and seeing what is happening here.

Mr. Whelan: And I can tell you they are really interested in what has been happening here. They only wish they could be about 50 per cent as successful as we have been.

There is a strong relationship between high food prices around the world and inflation around the world. No one will deny that relationship. There is a completely false rumour that high food prices are causing inflation. I am no economist, Mr. Speaker, and thank God for that, but even I can see that this is putting the cart before the horse. Inflation has caused higher food prices and it was the last area to move up, in all nations. Indeed, in many cases it was high time that the primary food producer got higher prices. The failing confidence of people in the various monetary systems of the world caused them to buy commodities, including agricultural commodities, that they never bought before rather than hang on to currencies that they considered unreliable.

● (1720)

People in North America have been buying food like never before. I have said it before and I will say it again: inflation is partly the fault of politicians and the people in the media who create a fear of food shortage by using headlines such as "Food Will Be Rationed", Food Will Be Scarce", "Prices Will Skyrocket" and so on. It is well known that the sale of home freezers has never been as high in the history of North America. There is more food stored in basements and utility rooms of homes than ever before. In some cases, people have not one or two but three freezers full of food, and they are still buying on the fresh market.

An hon. Member: How many freezers have you got?

Cost of Living

Mr. Whelan: I have always had a freezer, Mr. Speaker. Recently I sent out a newsletter in my constituency telling people that they should conserve food when it is abundant rather than let it go to waste. It may shock some people but in the part of Canada where I live, tons and tons of food go to waste. I do not see the hon. members from the Hamilton area in the House, but there is a big problem now in Hamilton with the food that people throw away. It is estimated that our affluent society throws away from 10 per cent to 25 per cent of the food it buys. Some nations would be envious of the food discarded by our posh restaurants, even those in this city today.

I have before me a cartoon or a picture which appeared in one of our newspapers today. The wording under the picture indicates that the world knows Canadians can afford steak only once a week, and the picture shows a starving African eating the newspaper. We are amongst the luckiest people in the world, Mr. Speaker, there is no denying that. In an article in one of our daily newspapers recently the reporter compared the food he bought for his family on August 27, 1963 with what he bought on August 27, 1973 and compared his present earning power with that of ten years ago. He proved that he can buy more food now than he could ten years ago. I think there have been some instances where food prices have been too high, but I do ask people to be honest and factual.

Financiers have hedged or sought security in buying commodities and it is at this point that speculators have had a field day. This has caused chaos in the livestock and poultry feed area in our nation. Because of the protein shortage in the world there has been speculation in soybeans. We are expediting all kinds of programs to produce protein but climatic conditions, etc. allow us to do only so much. Soybean speculators all around the world increased the price of soybean protein to livestock and poultry producers from $109 per ton a year ago to over $500 this year. Nothing much could be done about that because it was a world problem but the price has recently dropped from $360 a ton to $202 a ton.

Farmers do not like to be treated like a yoyo, Mr. Speaker. We hear some economists or professors say that we could get rid of half the farmers and put them on welfare. I say let us put half the professors on welfare because I do not think we need them.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Paproski: Your whole staff.

Mr. Whelan: There is a surplus of professors, but they get nice jobs in universities and are not subjected to every whim or fancy of our society. Our farmers do not want to be indentured, they want the stability that the professors have but which the professors would deny the farmers. My economist friends—and it may surprise some people that I have friends who are economists, Mr. Speaker—tell me that agriculture is a pretty important sector of our economy. They recognize that more now than they ever did before, not only because of the actual production, but also because of its job and wealth creation, helping to improve the standard of living of all Canadians.

The Agricultural Economic Research Council calculates that agriculture influences 42 per cent of our economy.

When agricultural output increases by $1,000, total economic output rises by $3,000. When you calculate new income and new output on top of that, the total economic impact is $5,000. The healthier, stronger and more competitive the agricultural economy gets, the better it is for the nation. But it must be realized that when production costs go up by 13 per cent over the previous year, then the farmer is not to blame when the prices of the products he sells increase.

This government has, therefore, taken steps to assist farmers and help consumers at the same time. The opposition asks what we have done. Last night, Mr. Speaker, the crop insurance bill went through this House. That was just a small thing to help stabilize the income of farmers and provide some extra protection, working closely with the provinces. The opposition asks why we do not bring in more legislation. Well, that bill, with the explanatory notes, was only two pages long but look at the time it took to get it through. By means of the bill we pay half the premiums, which amounted to nearly $15 million this year because many farmers did buy the extra crop insurance. Members opposite were not interested in crop insurance last night when the bill was before us; they were only interested in trying to downgrade the Minister of Agriculture. But, Mr. Speaker, a lot of farmers think he is trying to do a good job.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: Just keep blowing your own horn!

Mr. Whelan: Some of them did not even talk about crop insurance but talked about the Minister of Agriculture. If they wanted to show their sincerity, why did they not pass the bill quickly and say "Mr. Minister, bring in all kinds of legislation and we will pass it right away"?

• (1730)

The record shows what this government has done. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) stated how we had reduced income taxes as a way of stopping inflation. We have wiped out the capital gains tax on family farms passed on from one generation to the next. No other nation in the world has done that. There may be some members on the opposite side who honestly and sincerely supported that measure. However, they knew it would have been very bad politics not to have supported it. This Minister of Agriculture can take a little credit for that.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Whelan: For many years before coming here I worked with farmers for no pay whatever. I sacrificed my farm to come here and work for them. Canada is one of the greatest countries in the world. It lets a peasant come here to work for his fellow peasants.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Whelan: If we had full co-operation from the opposition we could do an even better job for the producers of this country than we are doing at the present time. We have increased the old age pension and veterans allowances. We have proposed a complete overhaul of our social security system, including major increases in the family allowance.

We can compare time limits. Members know how quickly they acted on veterans affairs legislation. They realized this group was more powerful and more organized. When it came to the farm bill, they said they did not care, it was not important. The hon. member for Annapolis Valley (Mr. Nowlan) said it was not an important bill. He criticized the minister in charge of the Wheat Board (Mr. Lang) because he did not know Annapolis is a great agriculture area. Last night the hon. member did not even know how to pick mushrooms.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I am certainly not going to repeat the interesting debate of yesterday. I confess I do not know how to pick mushrooms, but I certainly know a ripe tomato that is ready to fall, and I think the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) fits into that category.

Mr. Whelan: All I can say is that I know you can make good cider when there is a windfall of apples. However, the hon. member said he does not know about the production of mushrooms. But what he has said here tonight grows mushrooms. It is called biomass material.

We have enabled this country to set three grain export records in a row and are shooting for another this year. We have been able to introduce quota freedoms of the kind that allow a farmer to grow what he wants, and sell it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Whelan: We reduced freight rates on rapeseed. We bought 2,000 hopper cars. This has helped us set one transportation record after another at Vancouver and Thunder Bay. We have assisted the provinces in crop disaster areas. We raised the compensation for diseased cattle in this country. That was done before any representations were made.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Whelan: We are in the midst of one of the most thorough and open examinations we have ever had in Canada of our entire grain handling and transportation system. I do not think any other nation in the world has done this. We are implementing an interim feed grains policy and have put forward proposals for a permanent one to be effective August 1, 1974. This is a completely revamped national feed grains policy, one that will open new opportunities for farmers in the east and in the west. It will allow meat production to develop in areas of natural advantage which in turn will increase production on a competitive basis.

We have introduced a small farm development program and eight out of the ten provinces now have operational programs under agreement with us. When we first brought out this plan, there was a lot of political noise and flak from the provincial leaders, but they have since seen the wisdom of our policy and have teamed up with the federal government to help us develop profitable family farms from coast to coast. We have called one of the most advanced meetings ever and I will be making a presentation to the provincial ministers of agriculture.

When we introduced stability programs into this House the opposition raised hell. They said they were not any good. However, when I was in Charlottetown the provincial ministers asked for stability. At the economic conference in Calgary they wanted stability. What do the farm leaders say in their letters to the minister in charge of the Wheat Board and to myself? They want stability. The opposition are still critical of that. We have the most revolutionary program for beef grading and beef production that any nation ever had.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the minister, but his time has expired, although I did allow an extra minute because of remarks made by other members.

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, I listened with great interest to the remarks of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner). The Minister of Agriculture catalogued events that have taken place which have nothing to do with the problems we are debating today, problems which I hoped would be debated seriously. I do agree with one thing he said. The high cost of food is not the cause of inflation but is a result of inflationary forces and also of the high cost of production which the farmer has to bear today.

The Minister of Finance made remarks that kept his record clear. He made a speech on inflation without mentioning what the monetary and fiscal policy of this country is; without discussing any of those matters which all agree are the most dramatic and important reasons for the inflation we have in this country today.

The minister said the difference between our two parties is the interpretation of how important the demand factors in the world are versus the cost-push factors in the Canadian economy. I assure him that the difference between the parties is much more different that that suggestion implies. We have a totally different understanding and feeling for the needs of the Canadian economy at this time.

I speak in this debate with a very heavy heart, because it is clear from the speech of the Minister of Finance that absolutely no new ideas for controlling inflation are being considered. There is no recognition or understanding of the changes that have occurred in the national economy, and there is no recognition of the changes that have occurred in the international economy over the past couple of years.

We are going backward to the terrible policies of the past by saying that we can solve the inflation problem in this country only by causing another recession. This seems to be the position of the government. Surely we do not have to go through that again. Surely we can manage our economy better than going from a 7.2 per cent rate of unemployment two or three years ago to our present rate of inflation of 8 per cent plus.

The Minister of Agriculture referred to the experience in the United States with its control problems. They have problems indeed. However, the fact is that the inflation rate in the United States is substantially less than that of Canada at the present time. The rate of increase in inflation in Canada has been greater than the rate of increase in the United States. In 1970, the inflation rate in Canada was in the neighbourhood of 2.2 per cent. Today it is over 8 per cent. Why did we have a 400 per cent increase in the rate of inflation in that period of time? No other country in the world experienced a rate of inflation of that dimension. Why did it happen?

The minister says it is because of worldwide problems. Why are worldwide problems hitting Canada so much more severly than other countries? I can imagine a reporter going around the world and asking ministers of finance in various countries what they are doing about this inflation problem that is worldwide. I get the impression that because it is a "worldwide problem"—I put those last few words in quotation marks—the Minister of Finance washes his hands of it in Canada. But surely Canada has a major responsibility to do something about inflation, just like every other country in the world.

If you went to Australia, the minister of finance there would say, "We have looked at this problem, we have adopted an incomes policy and we have reduced the inflation rate." If you went to Israel—I am picking countries at random—you would find the government had instituted a 90-day freeze. If you went to England you would find they were trying out an incomes policy. In the United States, too, they have adopted an incomes policy. Every country in the world is trying to do something, except Canada. We seem to be content to say that this is a worldwide problem, we have no responsibility for it and there is nothing we can do about it.

There is no question that there has been an increase in world demand. I apologize, Mr. Speaker, for appearing to be professorial and intense about this, but I feel strongly that we are on the road to disaster unless we do something to correct the situation. Of course there is a worldwide demand. But why has the demand been so heavy in Canada? What has happened is that there has been a devaluation of the American dollar of immense proportions. That devaluation has affected prices as far as foreign buyers are concerned and the enormous impact on America is being felt here in Canada. There is no way in which the economy in Canada can be moved forward again unless we are willing to face the fact that we can no longer accept what is going on on a continental basis as automatically good for canada if we with to ensure a high standard living and a reasonable price stability in the Canadian economy. The evidence is absolutely clear on this particular point.

The situation we see today, the measures the Minister of Finance has brought in, seem to me to represent a contradiction in objectives. He says on the one hand that what we are going to do is increase interest rates and on the other increase the money supply. There are real differences of opinion as to what the result of raising interest rates will be. The evidence now seems reasonably clear that in a high inflation situation an increase in interest rates is not anti-inflationary. Rates are looked at as costs and they are passed on. There is certainly no question that this is the situation in the housing market, as was pointed out by the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent). There is also no question that we have always used a housing cycle as a way in which to try to stabilize the economy, an inefficient and inhumane method which will not work any more.

A major reason for the inflation facing this nation at the present time may be found in our monetary policy. The rate of increase in the money supply in this country between 1970 and 1973 has been roughly in the neighbourhood of 50 per cent, whereas the real increase in our gross national product over the same period of time is probably somewhere between 9 and 11 per cent. Now, Mr. Speaker, to increase the supply of anything by that dimension will cause its value to go down. Of course the purchasing power of the Canadian dollar has gone down. It is because we have practised no restraint whatever on the money supply. The Minister of Finance, now, I grant, has recognized this, but he is afraid to lower the boom on it. He says instead, "We'll put interest rates up, but we won't reduce the money supply." The only thing that happens in such a situation is that you get expensive money. What we find, therefore, in the Canadian economy today is not only the beginning of a tight money policy, but an expensive money policy.

What good does it do to try to counteract inflation by throwing interest rates up? It does not do any good at all. It seems to me that for the minister to announce today, through the Bank of Canada, an increase in the prime rate while at the same time there has been an increase in the money supply during the first six months of this year of approximately $6 billion, is a totally self-defeating proposition. It will only lead to more inflation. It is bound to. And there is no question in my mind but that the old cost-push element in inflation is going to come back. There is just no question about that.

Certainly one of the functions of the Department of Finance and of a government is to try to recognize what is going on and what is clearly on the horizon, and to try to do something about it. It seems to me, looking at the situation, particularly with regard to the labour market and the profits being earned by many corporations, it is self-evident that the cost-push inflationary element in the economy has not gone away. It is blindness to the point of tragedy not to support a monetary, fiscal and exchange rate policy with an incomes policy.

We in our party have tried very hard to get the Minister of Finance to tell us what the government's position is with regard to its international exchange rate policy. Three times we have asked him to speak on motions and tell us what position Canada intends to take at the meetings of the International Monetary Fund. We have asked this simply because no country in the world will be so affected as Canada by what happens at those meetings in Nairobi. We are one of the world's great traders and much of our future is riding on these fast approaching meetings.

Why is the Minister of Finance unwilling to make a statement about this most important matter, Mr. Speaker? If we accept blindly a proposition involving some sort of continental North American exchange rate, the consequences could be just disastrous. If, out of the operations in Nairobi, nothing emerges to solve, for example, the energy shortage facing the United States, or the U.S. balance of payments problem, and the United States dollar floats to, say, 40 cents on world markets, just think what this will mean in terms of its effect upon Canada, and what it will do to our domestic economy.

For the Minister of Finance, especially today, to get up in the House at a time like the present, when we are concerned about high inflation, when unemployment is increasing, when the rate of increase in the GNP in the second quarter has fallen short of expectations, and fail to tell us what the government thinks about the changing structure of world trade in relation to Canada, what it thinks about exchange rate policy, what it thinks about interest rate policy, why it is disinclined to use new methods in an effort to get inflation under control, is the height of irresponsibility.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Reid: Those are not the questions your leader asked, and those are not the terms of the resolution.

Some hon. Members: Quiet!

Mr. Gillies: I do not care about the particular nature of the speech made by the Minister of Finance, but I really care about what is happening to this country and I am concerned because there is more uncertainty, more unease about what is happening in the world economy than at any time since the 1930s. I ask members to read the 1927-28 editions of the Manchester Guardian. They would think they were reading today's edition of the Toronto Daily Star. Why? Now, as then, international exchange rates have broken down, there is high inflation, and ministers of finance are saying nothing can be done.

I think that can be done. That is why I am arguing so strenuously. It is a tremendous disservice to Canada for anyone to say there is high inflation in Canada but you cannot do anything about it; monetary and fiscal policies don't work and exchange rates don't matter. This is doing a great disservice to Canada. As I said last Monday when I alluded to this topic, it is exactly the same as people in the thirties saying it was impossible to do anything about the depression. These problems can be solved, but we cannot come to grips with them in the House of Commons until the Minister of Finance is willing to tell us what is the basic philosophy of the government with regard to exchange rate policy, what its basic philosophy is with regard to fiscal policy, what its feelings are about interest rates as cost-push factors, what it intends to do about monetary policy, and why it allows the money supply to increase while it raises interest rates.

In the situation we are in today, which has all the seeds for rising unemployment, it is totally unacceptable, in a debate of this dimension, for the Minister of Finance to make the speech he made today without explaining what is the policy of the government on these important issues. I agree with what was said by the Minister of Agriculture. What a great country this is, with vast assets and resources. But it is being mismanaged so badly. How is it possible to go from a 7.2 per cent unemployment rate to an inflation rate that is hurting so many Canadians in such a short time. No Canadian should have to worry whether he has enough income to get enough to eat or to get proper housing.

The Minister of Finance talks of supply policies. None of the things he mentioned in his speech were supply policies; they were income supplement policies, and I applaud them. But if we in this House think that we are going to come to grips with economic management through that sort of approach, then the Canadian people are going to have a terrible shock.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, would the hon. gentleman entertain a question?

Mr. Gillies: Yes, Mr. Speaker, reluctantly.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): I listened to the hon. gentleman's speeches both today and last Monday and his theme that there has to be a better way. I listened to his general criticisms of fiscal policy, monetary policy and exchange policy. Next time, would he put on the record in a positive fashion what his and his party's policies are with respect to fiscal, monetary and exchange policy?

Mr. Gillies: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member's question is that he is asking for the advice of our party on how to better run the country, then I think we are quite willing to give it to him, and when the opportunity arises I will tell him more about it. But I should like to say that I have never felt that people who really do not believe in innovation and change can run such policies properly. I think a better solution is to go to the people of Canada so that we may form a new government.

Mr. Ed Nelson (Burnaby-Seymour): Mr. Speaker, I listened with great interest to the admission of defeat made by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) when he described the measures that his government is taking to combat inflation in the face of this morning's headlines which indicate that those measures have obviously failed. I can accept to some extent his premise that inflation is due to world trends, shortages and supply problems with the money market, without accepting the inevitability of such forces any more than the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies) in his obviously sincere comments was willing to accept the inevitability of those forces. After all, an economy is a man-made thing, and to accept the premise that we are in the grip of forces beyond our control seems to me to be nonsense. There are from within the borders of this country restraints that can be placed on the flow of money, restraints that can be placed on exports and imports, production can be increased, and the like.

In the minister's machine gun-like delivery the word "profiteering" early in his speech ricocheted off my ears. But the minister completely omitted this factor even as a spent bullet in the summary of his speech. In Canada we have a special problem. Certainly the forces alluded to in previous speeches are a factor, but we also have the factor of profiteering and profit taking and I should like to draw a distinction between those two terms.

Profiteering connotes the cynical profit-taking of businessmen who take advantage of inflation as a cover through which they charge all that the traffic will bear. We saw an example of this recently in Vancouver where prices were changed several times on articles. Were these store owners prosecuted? Were their licences to operate lifted? Were the customers ever repaid? No. Yet they were robbing the people of Canada as surely as the bandit who escapes from a store carrying a loaf of bread. A lady who stole a loaf of bread in Vancouver several years ago was jailed for one year. The judge told her that she need not have stolen a loaf of bread, that she could have got something from the garbage tin. I do not know how one draws a distinction between the two types of banditry.

I am not saying all businessmen are dishonest, heaven forbid. It is the hallmark of a laissez-faire economy that free enterprise connotes freedom to charge what the traffic will bear. The philosophy is summed up by the saying that honesty is the best policy, but business is business.

Where do abuses occur? According to the parade of witnesses who appeared before the trends in food prices committee, abuses occurred everywhere but in the witnesses' own areas of profit-taking. Witness after witness produced carefully documented briefs to show that their industry was not responsible. The poor food prices committee members, limited to about 12 minutes for cross-examination and questioning, could not break down the expert testimony of witnesses backed up by impeccable briefs to show their purity; and that is no reflection upon the members of the committee because certainly they were sincere in their efforts.

The result was—and I was on the fringes of the committee for some time—that we discovered that advertising did not ultimately add to the price of food but actually decreased it. I am not sure how that works; one would think that costs would increase in such a situation, but figures supported the idea and figures do not lie. Or do they? Even more enlightening was the brief of the Packaging Association of Canada. Here again we would all save money by using more packaging. But wait a minute. There was an article last March in the trade journal of the Packaging Association in which members of that association were warned in advance what would happen to them if they indulged in unrestricted profit-taking. I quote from that article:

> We believe, after reviewing the transcripts of the hearings and talking to some committee members, that the food industry in Canada will slowly by degrees be declared in the public interest.

Here is another quote:

> Further, we feel that eventually restraints on ROI—

Return on investment.

> —will be placed, perhaps in the 30 per cent range, as the food industry is eventually declared to be in the public interest.

Further—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. I regret I must interrupt the hon. member. It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair till eight o'clock tonight.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Reid: Mr. Speaker, before six o'clock there were discussions among the House leaders as to what might be an appropriate length of time for speeches, and the suggestion was made that they should be of about 15 minutes duration. If there is unanimous agreement, perhaps that could be made an order of the House, excepting the hon. member who will be continuing the speech he began just before six o'clock.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it agreed that speeches, after the hon. member who is to be recognized now, shall be 15 minutes in length?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is not agreed.

An hon. Member: Who said no?

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I draw to the attention of the House that when the hon. member rose on his point of order there was not a quorum present; therefore he is out of order on his point of order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I think probably we should proceed with the debate. As far as the Chair could see, there was indeed a quorum present, otherwise the Chair itself might have been out of order.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): I can count.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Chair can count, too.

Mr. Ed Nelson: Mr. Speaker, before the dinner break I was in the midst of a quotation to illustrate the variance between the attitude expressed in the Packaging Association's brief to the trends in food prices committee and the attitude expressed in their own trade journal. Let me conclude that point with this brief quotation:

> The packaging industry's previous practice of charging what the traffic would bear or basing your price against competition is no longer valid.

That is a virtual admission it had been the practice to charge what the traffic would bear. I have been trying to distinguish between profit-taking and profiteering. Profiteering is the practice of changing labels to deliberately misrepresent prices in order to gain more profits. Profit-taking is the taking of profits beyond what might be considered reasonable. The hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis), our leader, is recorded in Hansard as having given many examples of profiteering, including the B.C. Packers with an increase of 125 per cent in profits and a sales increase of only 25 per cent, the Silverwood Industry with a second quarter increase of 107 per cent in profits and an increase in sales of only 10 per cent. There is in Hansard about half a page of similar examples.

I do not think we can attribute the causes of inflation merely to factors such as short supply, monetary difficulties and things of that nature. We must also consider profit-taking and profiteering. What is the solution? Let us look at the Conservative party's solution.

An hon. Member: Why don't you offer one of your own.

[Mr. Reid.]

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: They don't have any; they have to look at ours.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: After all, he is part of the government. Aren't you guys proud of him?

Mr. Nelson: Now that we have finished with the Conservative party's solution, let us look at the government's solution. What is the solution of the bigwigs?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): It wasn't worth all the time we gave it.

Mr. Nelson: All right, back to the Conservatives. Who knows what the policy of the sorry Tories is in this House of Commons.

An hon. Member: We do.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: What about the sick socialists?

Mr. Nelson: Let me quote from their leader's policies. Certainly they do not include wage and price controls or a freeze, as the newspapers would have us believe, because we find these words of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) in Hansard for September 10, at page 6378:

> First, let there be no misunderstanding. We have never represented a so-called freeze as the be-all and end-all, no more than a dentist would represent the freezing of a tooth as the treatment. Those who suggest we are presenting a freeze as a policy to combat inflation are misrepresenting our position.

Then if you read on you will find that he said:

> Our position is to put into place an economic stabilization plan incorporating for a temporary period strict mandatory controls of prices and incomes. The time we envisage for such strict temporary controls is in the order of 18 months to two years.

Then if you turn the page you will see that he uses the word "freeze" and says:

> In order to put such a program into effect, a short-term freeze on prices and all forms of income is needed at the outset.

He continues:

> The freeze period should be as short as possible.

So they either advocate a freeze or they do not advocate it. The policy that was enunciated in that statement was referred to in this morning's Globe and Mail, while another policy advocating more teeth in the Food Prices and Review Board appeared on another page. I am bewildered. I think the Tories are bewildered, and I think the House is bewildered.

● (2010)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nelson: I will wait for the applause to die down. Wage and price controls have long since been discredited. In this morning's Globe and Mail there is a long article in which it is reported that two economists of the Royal Bank of Canada have rejected price and wage controls as a solution. They say:

"It has been repeatedly demonstrated that controls are ineffective in an overheated economy and the recent American experience with the price freeze, especially in so far as it applies to food prices, has shown the futility of such attempts".

But the Conservatives are so tied to United States policies than when the Americans run out phases the Tories will run out of policies. They have no real policy. It has been rejected by economists; it has been rejected by all other parties. Yet the Tories insist on adhering to this policy. They must know that it will not work. One of their financial critics wrote a book in which he set forth why it will not work. I cannot understand why they persist in adhering to it. Perhaps it is for no other reason than that it might win them some votes. But they are gradually coming around to recognition of the value of a prices review board.

We look at the government's policy and we see a party which was triumphant in 1968 doing nothing. This government does things only on the basis of crisis. Then it does something only if it is pushed. Everything that is done is done on the basis of "ad hockery." We have as examples LIP, OFY and DREE. These programs were all brought in to solve a situation which arose in a crisis. They did not work. Any policy with any solidity to it was forced upon them by you know who—us. From the start the Prices Review Board was asked for by our party. It was the brainchild of our party; it was our idea. What did we get? We got Mrs. Plumptre. We got evasion and crocodile tears from a government which is frightened of its own shadow and refuses to heed the warning of the people that it received last October 30.

While this government vacillates, the rising cost of living is eating up the meagre pensions and wages of millions of concerned Canadians. I think it is significant that in the speeches of the financial critics of both major parties there is always a token mention of pensioners and people on fixed incomes. The government ought to be aware, if it is not aware, that the privation which has heretofore been confined pretty well to people on low incomes is now creeping upward to the higher wage brackets, and when that happens the people of Canada will come to know which is the only party in this House that has any kind of a policy to alleviate the distress of inflation.

But I am afraid that until the Canadian people are ready to recognize that fact we can only hope, by continued pressure, to get some kind of action from this government. I think this House can be assured that that pressure will be exerted unremittingly by this party.

Mr. Bell: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. There has been further discussion and I think there is a desire now that we reduce the length of speeches to 15 minutes. I also express the hope that at around ten o'clock, due to the great number of members who wish to take part in this national emergency debate, we will be able to reduce the time to about ten minutes.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it agreed that at least until 10 p.m. speeches be limited to 15 minutes?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Cost of Living

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, we meet here in emergency debate, but one would never believe it from the attendance on the treasury benches.

An hon. Member: Why don't you look at your own benches?

Mr. McGrath: We can only conclude that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Gray), the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan), the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) and all the other ministers responsible for various areas of the subject matter under debate must be down at the Chateau Laurier wining and dining with the partisans of the Liberal party from across the country, at a time when Canada has experienced the highest increase in the cost of living in 22 years. Food prices increased during the past year by 16.2 per cent. In this month food prices have increased by 3.2 per cent.

Notwithstanding the announcement made in the House on September 4 by the Prime Minister, and the measures debated and adopted by this House in the last few days, the fact is that the government has not presented to this parliament any program, any policy to deal with the most serious problem facing this country today, runaway inflation.

When this parliament opened on January 4 there was an announcement in the Speech from the Throne that the government would take measures to reduce inflation, to reduce unemployment and to set up a special committee on food prices. Well, we have the special committee on food prices—and we have high unemployment and runaway inflation. The only answer the government has had, apart from the stopgap measures announced by the Prime Minister in the House on September 4, to the whole problem of rising prices and runaway inflation is the establishment of the Special Committee on Trends in Food Prices. What is the record of that committee? Its recommendations have been largely ignored by this government.

Today, the greatest indignity of all in respect of that committee was the refusal of the Prime Minister to accept an invitation, passed by the majority of the committee, to appear before it to explain the statement he made to the House on September 4 and to submit himself to questioning by members of the committee. This is a special committee of the House, not a standing committee. It is a special committee created by the government as the government's answer to inflation.

The Prime Minister, in his letter to the chairman of the committee, referred to the fact that the Prime Minister obviously cannot be concerned with appearing before all the committees of the House of Commons. That is understandable because there are many committees of the House which are involved in various areas ranging all the way from estimates to special references from the House. But this is a special committee with a special mandate. It is the government's answer to rising food prices. It is charged with the responsibility of studying trends in food prices. It has the power to call for persons and papers.

The first report of the committee contained recommendations that special legislation be brought in to establish a food prices review board. The government ignored that recommendation and did not bring in special legislation. Instead, they used an existing statute, the Inquiries Act, which conveniently circumvented parliament; they did not have to come before parliament with a special act. Many of the recommendations in the first report of the committee have been largely ignored by the government. Let me give an example. Recommendation No. 5 in the first report recommended that the federal government, in co-operation with various provincial governments, consider the feasibility of co-sponsored programs to get proper food on the tables of people with low incomes.

Mr. Lalonde: What about the first four recommendations?

Mr. McGrath: A 3.2 per cent increase in the cost of food in one month, or 16.2 per cent in one year, particularly affects families with lower incomes. Most of the other recommendations of the committee—and I can announce them one by one—have been ignored by the government, so much so that the second report of the committee called upon the government to proceed immediately with the implementation of the recommendations in the first report. That has been largely ignored. We can only come to the conclusion that this government is not serious about food prices. It refuses to present to the House and to the country a program that would deal seriously with this very critical problem.

Today we have high unemployment, high inflation and rising food prices, and the best that the government can do is the ad hoc, piecemeal program which it presented to the House on September 4. Nobody quarrels with these measures. As a matter of fact, they received the unanimous support of the House. Certainly it is desirable to do something to hold the price of milk in Canada. We hope and pray that this measure will be effective, although it is questionable whether it will have the desired results. Certainly it is difficult to understand how the government can implement the program in certain areas of the country, including my own province, where there are no milk marketing boards.

So far as the other approach of the government to this problem is concerned, namely, the subsidy for miller's wheat, we know what happened to that. That has gone the same way as the budget brought down in the House by the Minister of Finance on February 19, when he said:

> I want to relieve the Canadian taxpayer of as much of this burden of rising prices as I can. And, in particular, I want to provide relief to that group of our citizens who are least equipped to fight rising prices—our lowest income earners.

I submit that the figures released today by Statistics Canada are alarming to the point where the situation requires extraordinary measures on the part of the government. Food for the home in one month increased by 3.2 per cent, or a yearly increase of 16.2 per cent. Dairy products are up .5 per cent, for a yearly increase of 8.5 per cent. Meat is up 8.2 per cent in one month, or a yearly increase of 27.9 per cent. Prices have reached such critical proportions that many of the people of this country cannot even afford to buy hamburger. Poultry products have increased in one month by 7.6 per cent, or an increase of 39.9 per cent for the year. Eggs have gone up by 13.4 per cent, for a yearly increase of 46.3 per cent.

It is just a short while ago that the government introduced a program in the house, a million dollar program whereby they were going to pay poultry farmers to kill their egg-producing hens so as to reduce the egg-producing capability of this country. What is the result of that program? The result is that we have had in one month a 13.4 per cent increase in the price of eggs.

An hon. Member: What about fish?

Mr. McGrath: I am glad the hon. member mentioned fish, because among the lowest income earners in this country are the fishermen in eastern Canada. They are the ones who are really suffering from these rising prices.

Mr. Lalonde: And you want to freeze them.

Mr. McGrath: The world price of fish has gone up so that today the Americans are paying 70 cents a pound for our fish, but the price to our fishermen has hardly moved—they are getting 9 cents a pound for their fish. These are the fishermen who have to pay inflated prices for eggs. They have to pay inflated prices for beef and inflated prices for poultry products. The low income earners of this country, of whom the fishermen of eastern Canada are the most prominent, are the ones who are suffering most—but this government does nothing about it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: Somebody asked, "What about freezing prices?" This party has never advocated freezing prices for the low income earners in this country.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. McGrath: If the government had accepted the policy advocated by this party in February of this year, we would not have these inflated prices for food. We would not have a 16.2 per cent increase in food in one year. We would not have a 3.2 per cent increase in one month.

I hope that the hon. members who have made the supreme sacrifice of staying away from the Chateau Laurier to sit in the House for this emergency debate will participate on their feet, instead of making stupid interjections from their seats.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. McGrath: The trouble is that this government has failed to bring before the House policies that would adequately deal with runaway prices and with unemployment. That is why Your Honour granted the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) this emergency debate tonight, and that is why parliament has set aside its regular business to debate this most serious crisis facing the country. I submit that while the Special Committee on Trends in Food Prices has done very good work and has heard many witnesses, it cannot be the answer because, as we made plain in the House at the time of the setting up of the committee, we objected to its setting up because the terms of reference were too narrow.

We felt then—and our opinion has been reinforced by subsequent events—that you cannot examine food prices in isolation. I say this with special regard for my friends to my left: you must examine all of the component features of the cost of living and what contributes to food prices. We have high interest rates in Canada, which contribute substantially to the cost of building, and shelters. More particularly we have a high cost of labour, which is a very important component of food prices. We have high incomes and profits. All these things have to be examined in the over-all context of the consumer price index. For a committee of this House to be charged with the responsibility of examining food prices in isolation, I submit is a serious waste of the time of the House, notwithstanding the fact that the food prices committee has worked hard. I say this as a member of that committee.

So far as the Food Prices Review Board is concerned, the order in council setting up the board on May 25 said it was "to inquire into the causes of particular food price increases in any class of food products, and to issue reports thereon, with all dispatch, including recommendations where the board considers it appropriate to do so." Those were its terms of reference laid down by order in council on May 25. What, then, was the Prime Minister trying to prove in his statement of August 13 when he announced various programs that were designed to deal with the consumer price index for the month of July, which showed unprecedentedly high increases? At that time he said:

—the terms of reference of the Food Prices Review Board will be extended to provide for investigation of price increases on individual food items.

That was cruel deception. It was deception of the first order, because those were precisely the terms of reference given to the board on May 25. This was the announcement of the Prime Minister on August 13 to try to deceive the Canadian people into thinking that Mrs. Plumptre and her board, which was inactive up to that time because, on her own charge, she had not received the co-operation of the government and more particularly of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, were being given additional authority. The board already had those terms of reference; they had already been given authority by order in council to look into specific food price increases.

Now we have hon. members saying that the Food Prices Review Board will be the answer, that it will see to it that the policy of applying subsidies to liquid milk will be implemented. I submit that the government already has that authority. The Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs already has that authority under the Packaging and Labelling Act. He has the authority to carry out the same kind of examinations as the Food Prices Review Board is involved in at the present time. But, for reasons known only to the government, the minister refuses to promulgate and implement the regulations under the Packaging and Labelling Act notwithstanding repeated urgings from members of this House that he do so.

Parliament passed the Packaging and Labelling Act more than two years ago. It was supposed to be important consumer legislation at that time, and it is still the major consumer legislation presented by the government. Yet it remains inoperative because of the failure of the government to formulate and promulgate regulations which would be the operative part of the act. Such regulations would enable the government to do precisely what Mrs. Plumptre and her Food Prices Review Board are attempting to do at the present time.

So, Mr. Speaker, we do not need a Food Prices Review Board. What we need is an agency that will examine not only food prices but all the component parts of the consumer price index. And I suggest to you, sir, that what this country needs more than anything else is a new government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: I submit that if the government were to go to the country today it would get the message, loud and clear, that the people of the country no longer want a government that ignores inflation, that ignores rising food prices, that ignores rising unemployment. I submit that the people of the country want rid of this government.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Verdun (Mr. Mackasey).

An hon. Member: This going to be great.

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Verdun): Mr. Speaker, before I even got to my feet I heard the hon. member from Alberta say that this was going to be great. I wonder, would he advocate rolling back fuel oil prices?

Mr. Woolliams: I did not say that. On a point of privilege, Mr. Speaker, it was a friend of mine behind me. I have not said a word all night.

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Speaker, that is such an unusual occurrence that I must apologize to the hon. gentleman. It is the first time in 12 years that he has been silent.

I do not pretend, and I do not think anyone else pretends, to have the answer to the problem of inflation. The hon. gentleman who preceded me mentioned that extraordinary measures are required. That was about his most useful statement. But he did not tell us what they are. Of course, he knows that such measures must not affect the cost of fish because fish is an important product in his riding. And the hon. member from Alberta knows that we should not roll back the price of fuel oil and natural gas because those products are important to his riding.

Mr. Nowlan: Roll back the government.

Mr. Mackasey: The hon. member says, "Roll back the government." I wonder how many people in the hon. gentleman's party would say, "Let us roll back the price of wheat." As a city slicker, frankly I am surprised that the whole attack I have heard today has been on the farmers of the country. I represent a city riding and I cannot get overexcited at the fact that the farmers in the west are for the first time earning a decent income, that farmers elsewhere are getting a decent price for their eggs and poultry, and that fishermen are getting a decent price for their fish.

We are talking about the high cost of food. We have concentrated on the question of the high cost of food ever since the debate began.

Mr. Gillies: No.

Mr. Mackasey: The hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies), who is a very serious member, says no. But the fact of the matter is yes. Is someone from the opposite side of the House now going to get up and advocate tight money? If that is the case, we will be right back to 7.2 per cent unemployment. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) made it clear today—

Mr. Nowlan: To whom?

Mr. Mackasey: To you people who asked the question—that there was not a tight money policy in this country. Somebody may have pointed out the inconsistency between a high interest rate and a non-tight money policy. Although it may be contradictory, at least we know this much, that if we introduced a tight money policy at this stage in our development, at this stage in our recovery, once again we would be fighting the battle on the backs of the working poor of Canada.

● (2040)

I should like to ask those hon. members who were attacking unemployment insurance last October, saying that $66 was too much, if they still feel they were right. If I were a farmer I would say the chickens have come home to roost on that one. I do not hear anybody now saying that we have to roll back the cost of unemployment insurance.

An hon. Member: You sure have to.

Mr. Mackasey: The hon. member is honest, but let him tell the unemployed person who gets $66 a week that he is getting too much. At least he is honest; he is reflecting true Tory policy, and honesty is a good thing.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Peel South (Mr. Blenkarn) on a point of order.

Mr. Blenkarn: Mr. Speaker, I was wondering whether the hon. member for Verdun (Mr. Mackasey) is satisfied with 5.5 per cent inflation. We on this side are not.

An hon. Member: Unemployment.

An hon. Member: You are all mixed up.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I think I should remind hon. members that this is an open-ended debate and points can be made at three o'clock in the morning if somehow the hon. member is not recognized earlier than that. This is really not a point of order and, if I may, I restore the floor to the hon. member for Verdun.

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Speaker, for the record, I think the hon. member was asking whether I was satisfied with 5.5 per cent unemployment, rather than inflation. Of course I am not. That is why I am scared that some would-be economist who thinks he has the answer might come along and say that now we have 5.5 per cent unemployment and high interest rates, all we need is a tight money policy as further restraint on the wages of the working classes, and then we will all be happy and inflation will disappear. That is what is going to happen if we are not careful.

I am not happy with 5.5 per cent unemployment. But at least for once in our lives we put the priority where it should be until we solve inflation, that is, looking after the people who are unfortunate, looking after the people who cannot afford food of any kind, rolling back the price of milk, holding the price of bread and at the same time looking after the western farmer who for the first time in a decade is getting paid a proper return.

The hon. member for Don Valley is a serious economist. He knows that inflation cannot be settled overnight, that part of it is imported. It is a worldwide problem and people will have to wake up and attack it on a worldwide basis. I have to be honest, Mr. Speaker. I would rather have a little inflation than the type of unemployment that permeated this country last year and the year before and the years from 1956 to 1962 when the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) was premier of Nova Scotia. Unemployment predominated in those days. I think hon. members opposite would admit this if they were not too interested in making political points on the backs of the unemployed and the working poor of this country. Mr. Speaker, the answer is not tight money.

An hon. Member: Is it expensive money?

An hon. Member: If you say it often enough you will believe it.

Mr. Mackasey: One thing I do believe, Mr. Speaker, is that the solution does not lie in driving people out of work. That is what tight money would do. The Minister of Finance has resisted the temptation to revert to a tight money policy and obviously is hoping that high interest rates will introduce the right degree of restraint into the economy to give us the best of both worlds.

When we play around, as the hon. gentleman just did, talking about extraordinary measures but "don't worry about fish," then we are being political with the lives of the underemployed and the unemployed and the working poor of this country. They are the innocent victims of fiscal and monetary policies not only in this country but in all industrialized states. One of the other fallacies that I have heard repeated all week is that inflation is caused by underproduction. There is all kinds of unused capacity in this country.

The hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) points in the direction of the Minister of Finance. Mr. Speaker, it was not the Minister of Finance who said that unemployment insurance was too costly and "if I ever form a government I will reverse the trend".

An hon. Member: Who, John or you?

Mr. Mackasey: Don't divert me from my point. By the same token, I am very tired of my friends in the corner who think the word "profit" is a dirty word and that companies have no right to make a profit. They think that because a company makes 34.8 per cent profit over last year, without telling us whether last year was a losing year or a good year, it should be censored. They are being unintentionally dishonest in this respect. I have noticed in the statements of the New Democratic Party that they now link the percentage of profit to the increased percentage of sales. The leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Lewis) is more knowledgeable than I am in these matters and he knows that profits escalate as you progress beyond the break even point. That is logical. By linking the two you are unintentionally inferring that people are being gouged in this country.

The shortage in this country is not in the manufacturing sector. We need to stimulate secondary industry. Our shortage lies in our primary products, which means that this country is rapidly reaching the point when we have to decide where our priorities lie. Are we to sell everything to other countries because the price is better, or do we have to adopt more two-price policies for our primary products? I cannot answer that, but one day we will have to sit down and debate this problem as true Canadians. That is where the shortage lies, and we know it. Can anybody tell me of shortages of secondary goods on Bank Street, if people have the money? Can anybody tell me that our factories are producing to capacity other than pulp and paper, which is very cyclical?

This is a very serious subject, Mr. Speaker. As the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) said, quite validly, the innocent victims are always the same people—the poor, the defenceless, the people who cannot defend themselves. Yet when the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) tries to defend them by social policies, by increasing the family allowance, subsidizing milk, rolling back the price of bread and doing the things he did, he is accused of putting the wrong problem first. Which way would you rather have it until the economists have an answer to it? At least you can make inflation bearable for the people whose incomes are substandard.

Mr. Speaker, I have been around this place for a long time and I can play politics with the best of members. I know this is not a subject to play with because inflation cuts into the income of every Canadian. There is no argument about that. But most Canadians can look after themselves because inflation is a relative thing and everybody knows, deep in their hearts, that the average worker is protected by a good trade union. That includes doctors, who have their own trade union, and lawyers who set their own fees, and all the rest of the trade unions that parade under other names. Once you pay your taxes and buy the luxuries that have become necessities in this country, you still have a greater net income today than ever in the history of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mackasey: What we have to be careful about, particularly in my province, is that we do not widen the gap between the "haves" and the "have-nots". This is a bigger danger to the federal system than all the problems, save language, that we have heard. The poor of Canada are tired of being poor. They have a voice. They are articulate. They are intelligent. They speak out. A man of 52 who is out of work wants someone to look after his income. He needs that. He should not be made to feel like a second class citizen because somewhere along the line the state provides him with an income because no one else will.

● (2050)

At the same time, private industry should not be burdened with the problem of featherbedding. By the same token, it should be made to pay for the social policies that we in this government and this parliament have a responsibility to introduce periodically. I have criticized the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) openly as much as anyone else in the House of Commons, but I at least congratulate him for establishing the priorities he did a few weeks ago to help the victims of inflation first.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mackasey: There is a lot I would have liked to say but I will respect the time limit and not make the role of the Speaker any more difficult. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) speaks for himself, which he properly has done. However, I know the Bank of Canada does not advocate a tight money policy, perhaps one of moderate restraint, but you are not going to restrain people by higher interest rates.

The Bank of Canada sets the prime rate. A small businessman who comes into a bank on a Friday for the payroll will take it at any interest rate because it is the difference between continuing for another week or bankruptcy. A developer does not mind paying a 15 per cent interest rate if he can recoup 30 per cent. I remember fighting price and wage controls a couple of years ago. Why? Because of the inequity with which it was being administered. Wages were to be controlled. Prices were to be controlled. In the meantime, interest was to go sky high, rents were to go as high as anyone wanted and all other sources of income were to be free from any type of restriction.

If you advocate wage and price controls for 90 days or 120 days, as Galbraith suggested, the problem will be what you do when they are removed. You do what they did in the United States. You pay double for the price and wage control. That is not the answer. The answer is selective wage and price controls, if any at all.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I deeply regret interrupting the hon. member, but the time allotted to him under the rule adopted earlier by the House has expired. He can continue with unanimous consent.

Mr. Mackasey: I prefer not to, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I always like to follow the hon. member for Verdun (Mr. Mackasey). Over the years in this institution we have been friends. I recall when our party was in power and we had a minority situation. I had a problem in the family and I called him. He agreed to pair with me on that occasion although we had instructions from our leaders there would be no pairing. For years we have enjoyed each other's company.

Tonight I want to deal particularly with what I consider, outside of the cost of food, one of the most serious crises in our nation, namely, national housing. This problem has been brought about and aggravated, not only by the policies of this government but by high interest rates which have now reached the level of 9 per cent to 11 per cent or 12 per cent on mortgages.

Inflation, as it has been described, is the greatest thief of all. From whom does it steal? It steals from those on fixed incomes, on fixed pensions, the young and the aged. In fact, inflation today is such a national crisis that we now see, as described by the hon. member for Verdun, the average Canadian shackled to poverty because of the policies of this government. Of course, increasing pensions for the aged and increasing the baby bonus helps for a time those who suffer from inflation. However, it is like a person in hospital suffering from an incurable disease—an oxygen tent may keep the patient alive for a time, but eventually he will die. That is exactly like the policies of this government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Woolliams: All this government has done is patchwork which has been of no assistance in controlling inflation. The hon. member for Verdun took great exception to someone using the expression "tight money". Well, if we do not have tight money we certainly have expensive money, because interest rates in Canada are the highest they have been since the last war.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Woolliams: I wonder what kind of policy has led to these high interest rates. I think the questions asked today by the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies) and myself flushed out the government with regard to their policies in so far as interest rates are concerned. I refer to this question asked by my leader on April 9, 1973, recorded at page 3087 of Hansard:

> Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Finance. In view of the very short, terse statement given by the governor of the Bank of Canada in making his announcement of the increase in the bank rate, would the minister make a statement on motions within the next day or so setting forth what the monetary stance is now—

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) replied:

> Mr. Speaker, I will be appearing again before the standing committee—

This is the significant part of his answer:

> I just want to remind the Leader of the Opposition that the primary day to day responsibility for monetary policy rests with the governor of the Bank of Canada, unless there is a conflict between the thrust of monetary policy and that of fiscal policy or governmental policy. That is not so as long as the monetary policy remains expansionary, which it does.

In other words, he said monetary policy lies with the Bank of Canada and unless there is conflict with government policy the government goes along with the increased rate of the Bank of Canada, which today is 7¼ per cent and brings mortgages up to 10, 11 or 12 per cent. The Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) say they endorse the bank's policy of increasing the rate to 7¼ per cent, according to the financial pages of the Globe and Mail, is a result of the bank's policy. There is no conflict; they endorse the bank's policy.

I want to read what the minister said on May 14, 1973, to prove my case that the government cannot slough it off on the Bank of Canada, because this government is aquiescent and approves in every regard the high interest rate of the Bank of Canada which means expensive money for this nation. This, of course, is bringing about a national housing crisis. In reply to a question asked by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) on May 14, 1973, as recorded at page 3713 of Hansard, the Minister of Finance said:

> Mr. Speaker, I will take the general tenor of the hon. gentleman's remarks into consideration. Obviously, the day to day responsibility for the monetary policy of the country rests with the Bank of Canada. It is only when the general thrust of that policy comes into conflict with that of the government that the Minister of Finance has to intervene.

As the government has not intervened, and as there is no conflict between the Bank of Canada and the government's policy, this government is endorsing high interest rates.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Woolliams: It is the beginning of the same policy it adopted between 1968 and 1972 which brought about the unemployment the hon. member for Verdun spoke about. It is the same beginning, the same policies, the same nineteenth century economics of the Liberal party. Let us look at what happened today. In an editorial on the financial page of today's Globe and Mail, headed "Ottawa raises bank rate by half a point to 7¼ per cent", it is stated:

> In a move aimed at controlling inflation, the Bank of Canada has increased its bank rate by half a percentage point to 7¼ per cent, effective today.

The article says the prime rate to large borrowers has been raised to 9 per cent from 8.25 per cent, and mortgages will increase to 10 per cent or 10.5 per cent. That is the government's policy, because they acquiesce and approve the Bank of Canada interest rate. This is the beginning of a tight money policy which will bring about more unemployment this winter, more suffering for those Canadians referred to by previous speakers. I wish to refer briefly again to the report on business which appeared in the Globe and Mail today. It reads:

> Most Canadian chartered banks have announced that prime loan rates will rise three-quarters of percentage point to a record 9 per cent effective September 17. The move raises the prime rate by 50 per cent since April.
> The 9 per cent prime rate surpasses the former record 8.5 per cent which was in force from July, 1969, to July, 1970.

So interest rates tonight in Canada are higher than they have been at any time since the second world war. That is the policy of the government. That is the policy they are using against inflation.

Mr. Paproski: Where is the Minister of Finance? Why isn't he here?

Mr. Stanbury: Where is your leader? It is his motion. He has lost interest.

Mr. Paproski: Where is the Minister of Finance?

An hon. Member: Where is the Prime Minister?

Mr. Stanbury: You are desperate.

Mr. Woolliams: That is the policy of the government, and the minister must be prepared to accept it as his responsibility. What do we need? The government should intervene immediately to deal with this question of interest rates. The Minister of Finance has said that where there is a conflict of policy, the government should intervene. It is high time, now, the government did so, in light of the rate set by the Bank of Canada, if we are to prevent the highest rate of unemployment of any winter since the last war.

Today inflation is posing a severe problem. It was brought about partially, or aggravated at least, by high interest rates. According to a report which has just come out in Ontario, between 300,000 and 400,000 Ontario families need housing help. I would predict tonight, and I am sure my estimate would be confirmed by a computer operating across this nation, that 800,000 Canadian families need help from the government to buy houses or to cope with increased rents.

I want to give just one example of what happens when interest rates increase. A house with two bedrooms, occupying 800 or 900 square feet, whose price would be $35,000, to a person having $10,000 for a down payment would cost $58,000 over a 25-year period with an interest rate of 6 per cent. Incidentally, one cannot buy such a house in Canada today. But increase the rate of interest to 9 per cent, as it is today—

Mr. Lalonde: Louder.

Mr. Woolliams: The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) says, "Louder". He was assistant to the minister of justice in the Diefenbaker government, and acquiesced and sold out that leadership for a pot of gold.

An hon. Member: You mean a mess of potage.

Mr. Woolliams: I hope I can speak loud enough for the Canadian people to hear me. At 9 per cent, the cost increases to $72,100. That house, at 10 per cent, would cost a Canadian family $77,125. Now, let us take the cost spread over a 40-year period. At 6 per cent, that $35,000 house, with $10,000 down, would cost $75,520. At 9 per cent, it would cost $100,080. At 10 per cent, the rate of many conventional mortgages, it would cost $110,080. This is what high interest rates are doing to the average Canadian.

What action should we be taking? The first thing the government should do is to set a ceiling on interest rates. Surely there is a conflict between what the Bank of Canada is doing today and the best interests of the Canadian people. So bearing in mind what the Minister of Finance said, it is time the government intervened to roll back interest rate to enable the average man across this nation to afford to buy a home or pay rent. Second—though we have said this many times before, it bears repeating—we should repeal immediately the building tax, which should never have been imposed.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Woolliams: It was put on by Walter Gordon and is still in existence although statistics show that back in 1959 it cost about $8 a square foot to build a house while today, under the government's inflationary policies, it costs $17.30. That is what inflation is. Repeal of this tax would ease the burden to some extent. We must be prepared to deal directly with the cities, if necessary, and offer money as an inducement to housing development.

Who do high interest rates on home loans affect most? Middle-class people and those who have reached middle-age probably own homes which have been partly paid for, but young people starting out in life and wishing to buy a home cannot afford to do so with interest rates at 9 per cent or 10 per cent. This is why only 6 per cent of those with incomes of average size in the city of Toronto can afford to buy a home.

Mr. Hellyer: Young people haven't got a chance.

Mr. Woolliams: They have no chance at all. Those are three concrete proposals. The Minister of Finance asked today; "What is your policy?" I would say the main policy of the opposition, and there is only one party which is in opposition in this parliament—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Woolliams: The minister should remember the words the late Lester B. Pearson threw across the House when he felt the then government should go down to defeat. He quoted the words of Cromwell: "For God's sake, go." That is my message to the government; it is the only solution for the Canadian people: "For God's sake, go."

Mr. Stanbury: The total of Tory policy.

Mr. Woolliams: The minister of health laughs. Of course he laughs now. He is drawing a fat salary as a cabinet minister as a result of being an executive assistant under one of the ministers in the Diefenbaker government.

An hon. Member: Don't get personal.

Mr. Woolliams: Let me say one last thing and I will sit down. The government has a fine record! It has the highest interest rates of any time, the highest cost of food, the highest cost of housing, the highest unemployment and the highest degree of arrogance of any government who ever sat on the treasury benches.

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, there is one important aspect of the cost of living which has not, in my judgment, received sufficient attention. Much has been said, and justifiably so, about the rising cost of food. But there is another aspect of the increase in the cost of living which is particularly disastrous for sections of the community on small and fixed incomes who live in rented premises. As a matter of fact, the majority of people in urban areas such as the one I represent fall within this category. I refer to the uncontrolled increase in rents.

The hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent) dealt in this debate with the failure of governments of Canada to provide a plan for homeowners other than a few in the top brackets of the income scale. The same failure has put such pressure on the limited stock of rental housing that rents have skyrocketed to an astronomical extent. I know of nothing that causes more heartaches in my riding than evictions and the unbearable burden of soaring rents, even in some cases causing the break-up of homes.

I had a particularly vivid experience of this in my constituency last Friday when I was visited by a constituent who was living with her husband, an old age pensioner, in rented but modest premises. Also living with them was a daughter who was a high school student. They have lived in the same premises for ten years, paying a rental of $130 a month. They provided the furnishings and looked after the repairs. At the end of last month the tenant received a notice that the property had been sold and that she and her husband and daughter must vacate the premises by September 30. A day later she received a lawyer's letter saying that she could disregard this notice of eviction if she and her husband were ready to pay a rental of $300 a month, an increase of $170 a month, or more than double.

As the husband's total income, including old age pension and a pension from his previous employment, amounted to $380 a month, it is quite obvious that they could not afford to pay such a rental. They are desperately trying to get on an already overcrowded list of those seeking to rent premises from the Ontario Housing Corporation.

May I pause to pay tribute to the Ontario Housing Corporation. It may not be perfect, but every week people ask me to assist in getting housing from the Ontario Housing Corporation that is geared to their income. The corporation is financed largely by federal funds. If it had not been for that public housing, many tragedies would have occurred.

No attempt was made by the new owner—indeed, there is no obligation on his part at all—to explain why in one fell swoop he was raising the rent by more than double, and there was no discussion with the tenant as to what he could pay. No figures were offered to justify the increase; there was just the cold, hard legal language of the eviction notice. This sort of situation, though not always so extreme, has been duplicated to my knowledge all over Canada. The amount of increased rent demanded would certainly pay for a very substantial amount of foodstuffs.

What, Mr. Speaker, is the solution? Obviously, one part of the solution is the construction of more public housing and low-rental housing so that supply can balance demand. In the present emergency another method is also required. I submit the time has arrived for rental review and rental controls. The solution is part of what this party has consistently stated, and that is the need for selective controls.

The essentials of life should be controlled, and surely shelter is one of the main essentials of life. It is necessary that we establish, now, some form of rent review or control whereby those who wish to increase rent must justify it by showing that they have increased costs or interest to pay. It is no longer tolerable that rentals can be set unilaterally at the whim of the owner with unlimited power to gouge out what the traffic will bear, which is the situation at the present time.

[Mr. Brewin.]

It was, of course, found possible during the last world war to establish rent controls. The hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas) reminded me the other day that after the war, when he was premier of Saskatchewan, rental controls were continued for five to six years following relaxation of the wartime regulations. And rental control worked well. As I say, rent control has its problems but they are not insuperable.

I am, of course, aware that there may be constitutional difficulties in respect of rent control which would normally be a matter for provincial legislation. But if there is doubt as to the federal power to impose rent controls at the present time—I must say that I think in light of the present emergency such doubts could be dispelled—the provincial governments, at the recent conference of premiers, made it clear that all of them were willing to co-operate with the federal government in dealing with the problem of controlling inflation.

Therefore, I would strongly urge upon the federal government that in their battle against inflation they deal with this question of rentals by calling a federal-provincial conference on an urgent basis in the very near future to work out a plan for rent controls which would be nationwide in scope. If the provinces agreed, well and good; if they did not agree, the federal government must consider whether it must take the lead in this field.

If measures to halt soaring rentals were taken under the leadership of the government, the people of Canada might be persuaded that the government was serious in its battle against inflation. I believe they would secure public support. In my own city of Toronto, the Toronto Labour Council has urged upon metro council that they ask for provincial legislation permitting rent controls. But this is not the problem of Toronto or of Ontario; it is a national problem and should be dealt with on a national scale.

There are two other aspects of the battle against inflation that I want to raise. The first is that it seems to be absolutely essential that if prices are to be controlled, the government must take the power to enforce the findings of the Prices Review Board. At present the Prices Review Board is patterned on the theory embodied in the Combines Investigation Act, which is that in normal times publicity is an effective method of preventing the fixing of prices by monopolies and the gouging of the consumer. But even in normal times the Combines Investigation Act has proved a very inadequate weapon. Lengthy prosecutions have taken place, fines have been levied and then firms combining together to maintain high prices work out a new, legal, law-proof method of price fixing of their own. However, these are not normal times, and if the government does not recognize the emergency in regard to rentals I suspect they will not be the government for very much longer.

If the Prices Review Board is to be more than mere window-dressing, it must have the power at least to make recommendations for freezing and rolling back prices where it finds there is a threat of unjustified price increases or the fact of unjustified price increases. I think the time has been reached when common sense judgments can be applied.

While it may not be easy in theory to define an unjustifiable price increase or to define what is gouging the public, references to undue increases, and so on, have been used for years in our statute books. After a detailed look at the facts it is possible to define whether the public is being gouged, and then there would be an obligation on the person who was raising prices, rents, or whatever it is, to explain and to justify the raise. Then if there was no clear justification for the increase that had been imposed, I suggest it would be possible to make an assessment and to do something about it. For example, in the case I mentioned in my constituency of an increase in rent in one month of from $130 to $300, such increase could not be imagined to be justifiable. If the battle against inflation is to be real and not just window-dressing, then better measures are required. The government must seek from parliament the teeth necessary to enforce stabilization of prices.

One other matter I want to mention is this. I find in the service centre which I operate, and to which many of my constituents come for advice, one of the major complaints of the older people, the senior citizens, about the present increased cost of living relates to the cost of prescription drugs. They point out that they have an increase, and it is welcomed, of $5 and a few cents in their basic pensions, or a little more than that in the case of those who receive the guaranteed income supplement, but they often have to pay $20 for prescription drugs, the price of which is not controlled.

I understand that three provincial governments in Canada are providing prescription drugs free, and I am pleased to say they are British Columbia, Manitoba and Saskatchewan. I recommend to the federal government that it look into this matter, and if it is concerned about the impact of the cost of living on elderly people it will do something about providing prescription drugs free to old age pensioners.

My last point, Mr. Speaker, is this. As an anti-inflation measure the government should again take a leaf out of the New Democratic Party's program. At its convention last July in Vancouver—

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Why don't you come to our convention, Andy, and really learn where it's at?

Mr. Brewin: If you take up this suggestion, I may even come to your convention.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Brewin: At that convention the NDP undertook to provide shelter allowances to make up the difference between a family's rental cost and what it can reasonably afford. Shelter allowances would be paid to people over 60, to the disabled and to families on moderate income with a large number of children. After all, housing is a basic human right, like food, and if the community can accept the principle of subsidizing essential foods it can accept the principle of subsidizing equally important shelter in this relatively affluent age.

I commend to this government the proposition that the time has come for rent controls, the time has come to take the high cost of prescription drugs off the backs of old age pensioners, and the time has come for some sort of shelter allowance. I am glad that the government has moved toward consideration of these victims of inflation, and if it will take seriously the proposals I have made it will be doing even better.

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, the motion under consideration tonight is obviously of the utmost importance since the whole of Canada is facing today the many problems of increases in prices, costs and wages. In fact, we are in such a position that we must find adequate solutions.

Now, if we look into such problems and if we try to find out the real reasons which have brought about the present situation, we shall probably discover many other factors liable to figure out in what way could abuses be redressed and a positive solution be brought up.

Among these real reasons, Mr. Speaker, there is one that could embody all others, that is, we keep on trying to administer while being satisfied with an inadequate system. We would never have to talk about inflation or uncontrolled increase in the cost of living if the present financial system did not create or encourage abuses.

While the motion under consideration states that according to Statistics Canada figures reveal a disastrous situation, and points out interest rate increases, we hit one of the main causes of today's problems. As a matter of fact, the increase in interest rates that we always denounced is one of the main causes of all the others. At a time when production of the consumer goods we need is encouraged, we have to resort to credits, to borrowing. Of course the rates of interest will be reflected in the cost of producing consumer goods and that is, I believe, the source of all the other difficulties that are linked to one another.

Now, if we had an effective means of controlling the increase in the rate of interest, we could solve, at least partially, a good number of those problems.

Here are the other main causes of the present situation: We unfortunately let monopolies do as they please; we accept too easily that some individuals or some companies bring about such an increase in prices. And if I may quote one example from the constituency I have the honour to represent, namely that of Champlain, let me say that there are a good many potato producers who could sell their product at a very reasonable price to the consumer, while getting also a reasonable income out of it.

But what happens in the distribution of those goods and, as in the present instance, in the distribution of those potatoes? Who looks after that distribution? Therefore what happens is simply this: only one dealer will buy in advance the whole potato crop from certain producers and will then impose the selling price he wants and that at the expense of the consumer as well as of the producer. And that is why we pay $5, $6 or even $7 for a 75-pound potato bag, while the producer would have received only 60 cents, 75 cents or a $1 at the most.

One of the main reasons is that we allow some individuals to control, small, average or large monopolies and afterwards to dictate their price to consumers.

If we are looking for real solutions following an analysis of the causes of those inflationary thrust, we obviously must be led to ask: How could we prevent such conditions? Now, we have been suggesting it for years and I take the liberty of repeating it this evening: We should accept some basic and elementary economic principles. For example, we manufacture some products because we need them and they are meant for consumption. Under such an elementary principle, there should always be some balance—

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): The hon. member for Bellechasse on a point of order.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, it is extremely unpleasant—and I should not want to displease any of my colleagues in this House—to see that when the member for Champlain (Mr. Matte) tries to make himself heard in this honourable assembly, some hon. members exchange rather highly pitched conversations. This disturbs the orator considerably and I merely with to suggest that the Chair ask hon. members to listen to the pertinent observations of the representative for Champlain. If they wish to talk, they can withdraw behind the curtains.

My remarks, Mr. Speaker, is not intended to hurt our Anglophone friends, but as we are in a minority in the House, I feel that when a Francophone has the floor, he should be listened to, as well as any other parliamentarian. Then, democracy would be a fact in Parliament, and we could in that way set an example for the whole nation.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order. I do believe the point raised by the hon. member is pertinent and I take this opportunity—

[English]

I take this opportunity to invite hon. members who wish to carry on conversations to either leave the chamber or to speak more quietly, so that hon. members who have the floor will at least gain the impression that they are being listened to. At the same time, this will permit other members to listen to the member who has the floor if they are interested.

[Translation]

I would invite hon. members to follow the debate or at least not to prevent the hon. member who has the floor from proceeding with his remarks.

The hon. member for Champlain.

Mr. Matte: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I thank my colleague from Bellechasse for helping me make myself heard.

I was saying that if we were to proceed from a basic principle such as that of the products we are manufacturing, it would be found that they are being made for consumption. Consequently, the normal tendency would be to work towards balancing production and consumption; this is obvious. If the question were asked to any individual of any age he would also understand that if products are manufactured it is for consumption purposes and if we want them to be consummed one must have the necessary purchasing power.

But today we are faced with such a complex situation that we sometimes take action which interferes with production, which does not afford the consumer the purchasing power which he requires to buy those products. Then, from both sides, we give rise to ridiculous situations because it is unthinkable in a country such as ours which can produce about all kind of products, where we enjoy all we need for food, clothing and lodging, that we can even think of a shortage of products.

I think we all agree on this principle. Surely in such a rich country as ours we have all we need. As happened last year, when we were short of dairy products, of milk powder for instance—which could have been sold easily had it been available—because of a government which did its utmost to prevent milk producers from producing more, we were faced with a ridiculous situation.

We voluntarily impede or paralyse production in a field, and that is followed by a shortage; then, imports are even vindicated in a field where we can produce as much as we want not only for our own purposes, but for other countries as well.

Those ridiculous situations, we have had several of, and still continue to have. It was decided once again to pay not to have people sow feed grains out west when it was known quite well that eastern producers, particularly in Quebec, were in need of it. That is again another intolerable situation; on the one hand, we pay not to sow and, on the other, we sell at excessive prices products we would need for other related productions.

Mr. Speaker, we are always faced with such irrational situations. Why? Because we do not accept the basic, elementary, economic principles as the one I mentioned earlier, that products are made to be consumed. If they are to be consumed, let us give people the necessary purchasing power with which to buy them. If that principle were accepted, would it be possible to talk about inflation? Never since then prices do not matter, and the whole thing becomes a secondary issue. If products cost so much and consumers are given so much with which to buy them, prices do not matter, what is important is to have the power with which to buy them.

In a system where money is used to promote exchange and distribution, when a means becomes an end, the result is situations such as the one we have.

That is why, Mr. Speaker, we will never be able to right the situation and find adequate solutions to those problems of inflationary pressure and price escalation until we think about solving at the root level the economic problems that creep in and perturb the whole financial system, the whole system of production and the whole system of consumption. One day, we shall have to wake up and try and find the only real solutions which are those we are advocating and shall continue to advocate. Then Canadian consumers, treated more equitably, would find it easier to gain their freedom and prosper.

[English]

Mr. Elmer MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, before intervening in this very important debate on the motion before the House I would like to assure my friends in the Créditiste party that we on this side are very interested in what our French-speaking colleagues have to say.

Although we are not as great linguists as is our leader, I want to assure them that we are very interested and attentive, and we wish we were as proficient in their language as they are in ours.

I would like to do tonight what I would hope the government would do in combating the economic ills that beset this country, that is, get straight to the point. I would like to ask the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), if he were here—I suppose he has Hobson's choice tonight, which is either to go down to the Chateau Laurier and tell the people down there what is wrong, or come to the House of Commons and tell hon. members what is wrong, and perhaps he has taken the easier choice—whether he could reconcile his present fiscal and economic policies with a meaningful and serious commitment to fight regional disparities. That is what concerns me tonight.

Does the Prime Minister have any such policy? Does he have any studies which would indicate the extent to which inflation and high interest rates are impeding regional development projects and exacerbating price inequalities across this nation? If he has, I wish he would bring them forward because this is no imaginary problem, as is illustrated in a recent article prominently displayed in one of the major newspapers in Canada; incidentally, one from a province with which the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Jamieson) is familiar, namely, the province of Newfoundland. The Newfoundland minister of development is quoted as saying that some DREE projects are running between 30 per cent and 40 per cent over what was allocated for them. It is apparent that escalating costs may delay DREE projects, as this article points out. These words can be found, for those who are interested, in the Evening Telegram, one of Newfoundland's major newspapers.

Would the Prime Minister, or someone in the government, tell us how much higher the price of food has to go before the Prime Minister will introduce substantial measures to deal with rising food prices, interest rates and economic problems, and what it will take before the right hon. gentleman will appear before the Special Committee on Trends in Food Prices to explain his government's policies? It has been alleged here tonight that there has been no precedent for this. That may be so, but I have the distinct understanding that a previous prime minister, R. B. Bennett, did in fact appear before the finance committee in times past to explain the government's policies to be dealt with by the committee. I would recommend this course of action most heartily to the Prime Minister.

In view of the fact that the price of food items such as bacon varies from $1.99 in St. John's, Newfoundland, to $1.29 in Ottawa, can the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marchand) or any of his colleagues tell us if there are any plans to change the present freight rate structure to alleviate the substantial price disparities which are so painful to the outlying parts of Canada, where people are suffering from slow growth problems and a depressed economy?

Will the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion tell the House what efforts he has been making to counter this government's fiscal policies in order to further his own responsibilities to attack regional disparities? Living costs are higher in slow growth areas—this is the cruel paradox—and wages are lower, as the minister should well know. If this government is really serious about alleviating regional disparities, why will it not at least consider equal pay for those under the jurisdiction of the Treasury Board across this nation?

Why does the government permit the Minister of the Environment (Mr. Davis) to freeze shipbuilding subsidies? He is freezing the wrong thing, Mr. Speaker, and his action has put men out of work without compensatory measures being taken. This is a direct attack, in most cases, on the slow growth regions of Canada. This action has put hundreds of men out of work without other measures being taken to counter it.

Why has the government not adopted the report of the Standing Committee on Regional Development? That committee, although hamstrung to some extent by being convened late, has functioned reasonably well in a fairly bipartisan manner. One of its recommendations was the creation of a joint task force made up of key personnel from the Department of Regional Economic Expansion and the Department of Transport to address itself to problems of common concern to both these departments, and to co-ordinate and integrate the development of a national transportation policy with that of a policy to alleviate regional disparities. This would make life easier and would make the task of this government easier in combatting the real problems at which it should be looking if it is serious about attacking the inequalities that exist in Canada.

We watched with interest what became of the motion which was moved by myself and seconded by none other than the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Prud'homme). There has been no action. I ask again: When will the government take its responsibilities seriously?

It is interesting to note that the government became aware of the western problems when its position in the west was being further eroded. The hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner) pointed out shortly after the beginning of the session, in his usual forthright but always kindly fashion, why the government lost the west. Well, they are hardly number one in the east either. If it were not for the program called LIP and the judicious use of the same, this government would have lost more than the east; they would have lost what some columnists say is the Prime Minister's sole salvation—the artful dodger, the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen), to whom the Prime Minister has given full credit for keeping this vacillating, weary and unimaginative group of cynical opportunists in power. That, Sir, is an awful lot of responsibility for anyone to bear.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Who has the copyright on that?

Mr. MacKay: If the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) wants to know, let me tell him that there is no copyright. What it requires is just good common sense, something he could use.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacKay: As I was saying, it is an awful lot of responsibility for anyone to bear, even for the President of the Privy Council, to keep this government in power. It must be a heavy load on his conscience if it is true, particularly for a minister from Nova Scotia because we in Nova Scotia pride ourselves on our clear consciences; that is why so few Nova Scotians voted for this government.

In any event, the Prime Minister's tribute was very interesting. If he has really kept his leaky ship of state afloat, it certainly relates directly to the priorities of this government and it shows that his priorities are indeed terribly mixed up so far as the welfare of Canada is concerned. Rather than dealing with the really pressing issues that beset this nation and formulating a prices and incomes policy to combat inflation, to deal with fiscal and monetary reform, regional development or federal-provincial relations, this government is obviously only preoccupied with its own survival. So I plead with the Prime Minister and with the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion to formulate some constructive policies, and to act instead of always reacting. Sometimes it is just as difficult to get something constructive past this government as it is to sneak sunrise past a rooster, as they say.

The Minister of Finance said this afternoon that this was a mobile economy—I hope I am quoting him correctly—and the government has to be flexible to deal with it. It is one thing to be flexible; it is another thing to be loose and aimless—and this government has been about as loose and aimless as it is possible for any government to be. The fantastic breakthrough with the United States that the Prime Minister spoke about some months ago has hardly materialized. The war on inflation which he said was won, judging by the latest figures has not even been slowed down. As the hon. member for Annapolis Valley (Mr. Nowlan) said, if we have turned the corner on inflation then it looks as though the government has gone around the bend after turning the corner. The Prime Minister's assessment of our economic problems fully justifies the regard in which he is held by those who understand the realities of economics—a big, fat zero.

What is really the government's policy on regional development is hard to discover. We know the policy is multifaceted; the minister has told us this. We know it is multidimensional; he has said so. We know it is decentralization. But the important thing is: does it work? It appears that that is open to question. Many people say it does not work. The minister of development for the province of Nova Scotia said it does not work, and he resigned from his post. He was development minister for a Liberal administration in a needy province.

An interesting statement was recently made by a prominent adviser to the Liberal Party, Cam. F. Osler, who is the son of E. B. Osler, a former Liberal member of this House, in a position paper entitled "A New National Development Policy for Canada," presented to the Liberal Conference on Western Objectives, commonly referred to now as the Liberals' western wake. This new national development policy for Canada presented by this man, who is an economic consultant with Headland Menzies in Winnipeg, who has a Master of Economics Degree from Simon Fraser University and who has a solid affiliation with the government party, says on page 13:

This paper has emphasized the need for a new national development policy.

What has happened to the current multifaceted, multidimensional, high-powered decentralization policy which was supposed to be the greatest thing since subsidies to solve this country's regional development problems, if already we need a new one before the current one is implemented? According to the press, personnel who are supposed to be decentralized and moved out to the disadvantaged areas are refusing to go. What chaos!

In closing, Mr. Speaker, may I say that the government in all decency should remember that people in the slow growth areas of Canada do not have the savings and the resources, on average, that many Canadians have. Their wages are lower and their savings are less. Their positions are being eroded further and faster by runaway inflation and high unemployment.

In fact, despite the high-flown statements of the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) about his pension improvements, which we of course support, the people of Canada have less purchasing power for their dollar than ten years ago, and we have seen that pension increases have not even kept pace with inflation, which presently is four times what it was during the previous Conservative administration.

The government should raise wages of employees under federal jurisdiction. It should promote the fishing industry, not sabotage it, and eliminate discrimination against fishermen regarding UIC. It should attempt to receive advice and to listen to people in the private sector, to organizations that have constructive suggestions to make, the ADC, the Atlantic Provinces Economic Development Council, the Northern Ontario Development Corporation, and so on.

The government should bring in regional banking policies to take into greater account special needs of slow growth areas for credit. It should act now to provide a domestic funding agency to counter the possible effects, particularly on the Atlantic region, of legislation to deal with foreign investment, namely, Bill C-132.

We in the Atlantic region are conscious that in the national interest it is a good idea to control foreign takeovers and foreign domination of our economy. But we are also mindful that we do not want it done solely at our expense. The minister in charge of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion is very well aware of this potential problem. He recognizes the need for some domestic funding agency, perhaps a Canadian equivalent of the Export Development Corporation, to provide the funds which may be cut off if such measures are adopted, funds which are essential for regional development. As I say, the minister is aware of this problem, and of the apprehension of governments in the Atlantic region.

Most of all, until it has the courage to go to the people with its coalition partners on the extreme left, the government should try to overcome its built-in obsolescence and incompetence. These qualities, together with its association with the NDP, are fast leading it down the road to oblivion. But for the brief period that this administration has left, I suggest it make every effort to cease fouling-up the stewardship that the people of Canada so reluctantly gave it to manage the affairs of the nation.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, every so often each of us in the House of Commons feels a special sense of responsibility to this institution and to the country. I want to make my opening words tonight ones of appreciation to the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies) who in his quiet, sincere way and with that deep knowledge he has of these matters presented a case in the form of a series of questions to the government that I think moved us all. I think the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) and the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) should be congratulated for listening carefully. I know that the remarks of the hon. member for Don Valley did make an impact.

I do not believe there is anyone in this House, or for that matter in any country in the world, who can claim to have a sure-fire answer to what ails western economies. All we do know is that the music is the same as it has been for two decades. I want to put on the record tonight the fact that the subject we are debating, in the serious mood that the House is in, is not new. The administration to which I belonged from 1957 to 1963 was just as deeply concerned about nagging unemployment as the present government should be, and as I am sure it is. We were so disturbed with the type of advice we were getting that we set up a royal commission now known as the Porter Royal Commission on Finance. That commission reported to the Government of Canada in the year 1964.

The message contained in the royal commission report—and in particular I commend chapter 20 to the Minister of Finance—is probably the worst indictment that a public investigating committee has ever laid at the door of public servants in any country. The indictment it laid at the door of the advisers to ministers of finance and government is that they ignored the knowledge that was available to advisers of government in the modern day. Yet since that report came down in 1964 I have been in this House and witnessed several ministers of finance destroyed because they took this same advice from these same advisers. In the speech on the baby budget of September, 1966, I said to the then minister of finance, "You have taken the advice of the same people who got us, and Walter Harris ahead of us." And I saw that minister destroyed. He now sits in the House as the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp).

So in looking at the Minister of Finance tonight I do not do it with any type of personal animosity; I do it in this sense, that I see him sitting in a position where many a good man, many a great Canadian has been destroyed because of the inability of those who advise governments in Canada, and in other countries as well, to change the doctrine they learned many years ago and which is now obsolete.

I do not quarrel with the earnestness and sincerity of these people. I simply say that the evidence has been here for 25 years that this type of stop-go, stop-go monetary and fiscal policy is not only destroying this country's chance to grow and benefit from all we have got here, but is destroying other countries' chances as well. The Minister of Finance rose in this House today and asked these questions of the hon. member for Don Valley: What is the policy of the Progressive Conservative party? What is the alternative?

• (2200)

I am just going to suggest, Mr. Speaker, that since January on several occasions I have heard our leader, the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Stanfield), lay down his principles, his philosophy, in favour of potential budgeting. I would point out to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) that this philosophy of potential budgeting has been ignored, laughed at and scoffed by every adviser to every minister of finance that we have had in this country for the last 20 years. The predecessor to the present minister, Mr. Benson, saw fit to scoff at it on national television, just mouthing the words of his advisers.

In simple English, the theory of potential budgeting is to give every man who wants to work a chance to work and every factory that has the capacity, the chance to produce. Because of the failure of the advisers to the government to look at this theory, Canadians have not had a fair shake in getting the advantage of its potential. I am not here to try to enunciate the details of the various theories available to the government but I want to cover some of the salient points.

First of all, there is a precedent for the use of potential budgeting and that is the budget of the United States in 1964. The story of the successes and failures of the policy is available in written form, but no serious effort has been made in Canada to study this approach or try it because those who run this country do not sit in this House. They sit in the advisory seats in the Department of Finance and the Bank of Canada. Until the minister acts with the power that the people of this country gave him to speak for them and give leadership, we will never have a chance to look at that theory.

The second point I want to make, Mr. Speaker, is that over the last seven or eight years in this and other countries a tremendous pressure has been building up from a type of inflation that was not even heard of in the days of Lord Keynes, he who guides the minds of those who guide the minister. I am referring to what is technically called cost-push, the cost-push of ever-rising government taxes. Just a decade ago the cost of running the federal government borne by the people of Canada was $5 billion per year and now it is $20 billion, increased four times in less than a decade. Interest rates have been discussed enough and are a cost-push. In our day we had a money supply of about $11 billion to $13 billion that our masters allowed us; now we have $48 billion, again over four times as much. I could go through all those cost-push forces leading to big unions, leading big business to join with big industry to get their share. As every member of every party in this House knows, the burden of this has fallen on those who do not belong to big government, big business or big labour.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): I think everyone agrees with the remarks made today by the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent) and the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin). Every member of the House can support those views. Housing has been made the tool of policy in the Department of Finance in the last 20 years, a stop and go policy. All the young couples who wanted a home, all the old people who wanted to maintain the home they had, have had to pay the price of this narrow, obsolete economic doctrine of the 1930's.

I have heard the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams), and I have heard many members of our party in this House and across the country, say that we accept housing as a necessity that ought not to be used by a group of financial advisers as a way of juggling control. I make this suggestion to the Minister of Finance with deep sincerity, and I think every member of his party supports it, that he take a look at this advice proffered not only by our party but other parties as well. It is not partisan advice. The suggestion is made on behalf of the 800,000 people to whom the hon. member for Calgary North referred. Every year, 4 per cent or 5 per cent more people want to have a new home instead of crowding into the ant heaps in the cities. Give Canadians a chance to have a little bit of soil and a house of their own which is the Canadian way.

The third point is that along with this new phenomenon of cost-push, pushing up prices, we had a group of government advisers applying to it an obsolete method of controlling inflation. Cost-push is not controlled by money, by adding more taxes because that is what cost-push is. That is what this government did in 1969. Then they were so horrified by the results that they turned around and poured money into circulation like mad. Today, we have the phenomenon of expensive money, unemployment and high prices, in a package. I do not blame the Minister of Finance; he is just a chip on a river hoping some day to touch shore. All I am asking of the Minister of Finance and his colleagues is to challenge this control of ministers of finance by their advisers. They have a record for 25 years of being consistently wrong. In our day we may not have been very good, but at least we challenged them.

During the past ten years I have put a number of speeches on the record. Time does not allow me to read them, but I will give the minister the dates if he wants to read some of them. They were made on April 1, 1966; September 8, 1966, and October 10, 1967. In the time allotted to me on those occasions, I seriously tried to put forward some short-term and long-term proposals, principles of selectivity, timing, selectivity by region, selectivity by industry, selectivity by purpose. All those things can be covered in what has been said on this subject in the last two or three months in this House. I have not met any group of economists in any university in this or any other country who have been able to challenge the logic and coherence of those proposals, but there is no evidence yet that they have even been looked at by the advisers to the minister. This is what I want to say, this is the type of thing I would like them to look at and these are the types of policies to which our party is pledged.

In the last few months, we have had the old-fashioned phenomenon of old-fashioned shortages arising. We will soon have shortages of fuel, food and steel and, of course, a shortage of fibre is on the horizon. As one hon. member from the Social Credit party asked tonight, why should Canada, why should the United States, why should Australia, why should Western Europe all be short of these things? My God, the productive potential of the United States and Canada for food has been barely scratched. Why is there a shortage in this country? The shortage results from the decisions of the advisers to the government who made the decision in the fall of 1969, and implemented it in the spring of 1970 to deliberately have a shortage of production as a way of getting prices high—the Lift program, the national products marketing bill, the Stabilization Act, the small farms program, the objective of which was to get two of every three farmers off the land and keep prices down long enough to force them off the land. I do not have to go into all that. The governments of the United States and Canada are equally guilty, along with the governments of Australia and Western Europe, of making food short in their own areas. This winter, ten million out of 30 million people who are now suffering from famine are expected to die. We have forgotten the problems of others in looking at our own navels.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, our problem is not insoluble. What is of more concern to me is that we have never been closer than we were in 1924-29 to a breakdown in world monetary affairs. The government knows this, the NDP know it and we certainly know it. The meeting in Nairobi, referred to by the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies), will deal with this problem. In essence, it is that trade between nations is increasing at such a rate that we do not have the monetary media to handle it. Just as in 1924-29 gold and English sterling would not do it, so in 1973 neither American dollars nor the SDR's are sufficient, yet we cannot get out of this government any indication from their philosophy or policy that this is the problem.

If the world machinery of trade breaks down, what country will suffer the worst? We will. This has a tie-up with our domestic policy. That is why the hon. member for Don Valley asked simple, elementary questions. We Conservatives know what we would like to do. Where is the policy, if you have a philosophy that deals with things like the value of our dollar in relation to the American dollar, Swiss francs, German Deutschmarks and the Japanese yen. These are all tied up with this domestic situation. We know what we want to do. We have held meeting after meeting to discuss what we want to do, but we have to get stability before we can do these things.

It is not any accident that the Conservative party, surely the last party that would ever go for controls, should come out and say we see no recourse but for a 90 day freeze, then one and a half or two years for controls to ensure stability so we can move forward with our long and short range policies. Whenever the Conservative party accepts that position, great is the danger to the nation because in the long run, controls are inflationary. You have to get out of them as fast as you can. However, you cannot put in these policies and make these changes unless there is that economic stability. That is what I am asking this House to consider.

We moved this motion because, under the rules, we do not have any opportunity to use in the old fashioned method of considering the estimates to put a minister on a griddle for days until we get some answers. Under the new rules, we cannot question him in committee and we cannot question him in the House and get answers. We are asking the government to accept the fact that there is sincerity in all parties with regard to this problem of inflation that is affecting all our people, to take a look at it in a non-partisan way and believe there is one party in this House that is willing to try new ways to tackle new problems.

We say with complete assurance that there is no hope in the policies followed for the past 25 years. Just as other ministers have been destroyed, so is this minister being destroyed by giving the same answers that have been given in this House for the past 25 years by every Minister of Finance when these crises occur. I warn this House this is not just a Canadian or western world crisis. The whole international picture is at stake. The OECD is pleading with us to get our own houses in order, to go to Nairobi, put forward proposals and get at this problem domestically and internationally.

I assure the minister we do not say for certain we have the final answer, but we are seriously and sincerely disturbed over the answers or lack of answers we are getting from this government. We ask that very serious consideration be given to the fact there are alternatives for Canada other than those suggested by the advisers to the minister.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Bell: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. A suggestion was made some time ago that we might further reduce the time of our speeches to 10 minutes. I realize this would be a hardship for some members, but for the sake of the staff, who will be here many hours in view of the lists that are available, at least from this party, it might be in order if Your Honour would try to seek consent for a 10 minute limit.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I will put the question to the House. Is there agreement there should be a 10 minute limit?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: There is not agreement.

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo-Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, I know if we gave you enough time, it would come out all right. It is understandable, considering the lateness of the hour. I understand the official opposition was entitled to precedence today in order to introduce their motion dealing with prices. However, one wonders why they bothered since they have so little to contribute to the debate.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Saltsman: It may be that the role of the official opposition is not only to numb everyone in this House into acquiescence, but to attempt the same thing with the nation. There does not seem to have been anything in the speeches of members of the official opposition to give any indication they have any idea of how to deal with this serious problem of inflation.

I listened to the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies) for whom I have the highest regard. I say that sincerely. I could not understand whether his logic had left him or mine had left me. I listened to him recite all the countries that had imposed wage and price controls and then suggest that we do the same. When he recited the lists of countries, many of which have higher levels of inflation than Canada, I noted that all were countries where program has admittedly failed. After the recital of disasters with wage and price controls in other countries, one would have thought he would have come to the conclusion we should not repeat the errors of others. Instead, he said that since all of them have tried it, and the record shows all have failed, Canada should not be left behind in this record of failure; we should try it. After all, we are a great nation. If everyone else has failed, we have an obligation to fail with this particular mechanism as well.

I also tried to understand the hon. member's reasoning with regard to the level of the Canadian dollar. Does he want the Canadian dollar to go higher? I am not sure what he wants. That probably merits the suggestion that if the Canadian dollar were higher than the American dollar, there would be some diminution of inflation in Canada.

An hon. Member: He wants it higher and lower.

Mr. Saltsman: Possibly he does. I think it is only fair to point out that the effect of such a move would be to create massive unemployment in Canada. This is particularly sad when one considers that today one of the chief concerns of the official opposition seems to be with the high level of unemployment. A move in the direction suggested by the hon. member for Don Valley would simply increase the level of unemployment.

• (2220)

I did not think the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) was particularly brilliant when he asked the hon. member for Don Valley what the Conservative party would do about inflation if it were in office, but neither was the reply. It is not good enough to say: We are not the government; we do not have to provide the answers; the answer is: You guys get out and let us in, and everything will be taken care of. I have some doubts about that approach. From time to time there is a question in my mind. I take a look at the government benches and I sometimes wonder whether we should be harder on their occupants than we usually are. The only thing that restrains me from taking precipitate action is the unlikely possibility that we might replace what we have over there with what we can see over here.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Saltsman: One must admit it is a Procrustean choice. Whatever the faults of the New Democratic Party might be, and, like some people, I do think there are faults in the NDP from time to time—

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Mr. Saltsman: —I agree it is not very often but one must be fair in these matters—at least when we criticize, and we criticize fairly often and quite strongly, we do at least offer alternative proposals to what the government is doing. The evidence in support of this assertion is that from time to time some of our proposals are accepted by the government, or stolen, depending on which way you look at it.

I want to deal with this question of wage and price control. It did not figure too prominently in the debate today, and it may be the Conservative party is backing away from that proposition. I am not sure of the state of loyalty in that party toward price controls at the moment. I sometimes think that if, in consequence of the wisdom of the Canadian electorate, the NDP were forming a government, wage and price controls might be one of the things it would consider. The question I ask of the official opposition is this: would they be as enthusiastic over wage and price controls if the New Democratic Party were in power as they are now when they see a prospect of forming the government themselves? I do not think they would.

I say this because wage and price control is not a neutral matter which some board or other is going to impose. Wage and price control is a political matter and the decisions which are made—who shall benefit and who shall suffer—depend to a large extent upon the sympathies of the government in power. I am not prepared to trust wage and price control to either the Conservatives or the Liberals. Wage and price control is as much an instrument of rewarding and punishing in a society as is our tax system, and we have all seen what the government and the opposition have done with the tax system. It is important to remind the people of Canada that the opposition is extremely critical of the government except when it comes to such issues as the corporate tax benefits which have been given to industry. Then, the mask comes off and you see the debate as a non-debate. They are in the same game.

The official opposition had the chance of an election. We gave them that chance a little while ago. All they had to do was vote against the government when these corporate tax changes were introduced.

Mr. Kempling: Tell us about the Polymer vote.

Mr. Peters: Why don't you listen to the argument instead of making one?

Mr. Saltsman: You will have a chance to reply. They talk about inflation and what it is doing to the country. But when there was an opportunity to do something about inflation, like refusing to give this money to the corporations by way of tax benefits and increased depreciation allowances, they declined to take it. It was absolutely the wrong policy for anyone worried about inflation to endorse, because it is extremely stimulating. It is the kind of thing which should be done, perhaps, when there is a depression. If you do it in a period of inflation when you are worried about prices, the only conclusion is that you are doing somebody a hell of a big favour and you don't care about the inflationary consequences.

First of all, the purpose was obviously expansionary, if it had any purpose at all. It would pump more money into the economy. It would certainly not lower prices; there is no evidence that the $500 million which the government so generously dispensed to the corporations of Canada has led to any change in prices. Prices have not changed one iota. The Minister of Finance is winding up with egg all over his face. The people to whom he has been generous are shafting him right and left. Even before the promised report comes in, they are saying there has not been enough time to assess the situation, that the questionnaire has been improperly worded, and so on.

[Mr. Saltsman.]

If the minister had wanted to reduce prices he would have reduced tariff concessions because prices in the manufacturing industry depend entirely on import prices plus the level of tariff. As long as tariffs are not changed, a low rate of taxation simply increases the profit levels of corporations. This is equally true of the improved depreciation allowances. They are obviously inflationary and designed to stimulate purchases of machinery in the hope of producing an upsurge in the economy. We know what position the government has taken. That is clear. We have all heard what a terrible bunch they are over there, and we acknowledge this, because, after all, we did fight an election upon these issues. But where was the Conservative party when the government was being so generous to the corporations? Where were the great defenders of the people and those who are so terribly concerned about inflation? Did they speak up on this issue?

An hon. Member: Where were you during the Polymer debate?

Mr. Saltsman: I can understand that the Conservative party would like to form the government. Then, if they introduced a wage and price policy, they could be even more generous to the corporations. One has to remember that as industry functions now there is at least some rationale attached to the marketing system, whether just or unjust. If we were to move into a system of wage and price controls we would have the government playing God with people's incomes, and I am not prepared to see the Conservatives or the Liberals play that kind of heavenly role. I have no faith that they would favour the working man over those who derive money from interest or dividends. I am not persuaded that they would be all that sympathetic to the wage earner. Although it is easy to appraise wages, how do you appraise profits, interest, dividends, rents, and where would you stop?

• (2230)

An hon. Member: Why weren't you the lead speaker?

Mr. Saltsman: We have so many members that it is always a problem for us to decide who is going to get up. I realize the hon. member does not have that kind of difficulty. I realize the hour is late, Mr. Speaker, and that there is some rowdiness, which is understandable, but apart from a few throwaway lines I have not yet got to the meat of what I wanted to say. This is due to the harassment I have had from that side which has diverted me from the more serious aspects of my remarks.

We have talked about the cause of inflation. One speaker said it is cost-push, another has said it is a demand-pull, and a third offered what seemed to me the more common explanation that it is totally due to the iniquity of the Liberal party. That is a reasonable explanation. However, if we look at those items that have escalated most in price, we find almost invariably that they are items that we are exporting around the world. The point is that there is no shortage of anything in Canada. There is some inflation that originates outside this country but there is nothing we can do about that.

Really there are two aspects to inflation. First of all, you can deal with problems in which we have some say. But we cannot control the price of coffee in Brazil or determine what grapefruit is going to cost.

An hon. Member: Or bananas for that matter.

Mr. Saltsman: No, nor bananas. But what we can do is to insulate ourselves from price increases that have nothing to do with any increase in the cost of production in Canada but arise from the cupidity of the owners of resources. What happened in this country is that those resources of which we pride ourselves on having a surplus are increasing in price. Oil is a perfect example. We have been exporting oil. The Americans are willing to pay more for oil, therefore Canadians must pay the same amount. Fortunately, the government has stepped into this situation, though not adequately or fast enough, but they may in fact have stumbled upon a policy without knowing anything about it.

As I say, the price of oil increases outside Canada. Canadians, therefore have to pay more. It is not a question of the cost of producing oil having gone up. To produce a barrel of crude in Canada costs less than $2, including provincial taxes, yet it sells for $4.50. So who gets the balance? That is the result after the government has been exceptionally generous. Both Liberals and Conservatives, the Conservatives more so than the Liberals, have said that it is iniquitous to tax the oil industry, that these companies cannot afford it, that we should not take away their special benefits. So, we had a white paper and the oil companies were left intact to profiteer in this country. But they do not have any commonsense. It is one thing to profiteer abroad; maybe you can get away with that. But if you do it in Canada, that is going too far.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but I must inform him that, despite a certain indulgence by the Chair, the time allotted to him has expired. He may, however, continue with unanimous consent.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Saltsman: In deference to the many members who wish to speak, I shall now take my seat.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I hear a no, so I regret to inform the hon. member he cannot continue.

Mr. John M. Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I do not think I shall ever live to see the day in this House when anything proposed from the government benches is accepted with enthusiasm by members of the opposition. One of the great tragedies of the parliamentary system is that there are probably a great many sincere people on both sides of the fence who, owing to the operations of the parliamentary system, are dedicated to oppose each other. I do not for one moment denigrate the sincerity of hon. members on the other side, but I do feel it is extremely frustrating, in trying to make heads or tails of the debate on this subject, to try to put together the very sensible and interesting speeches by the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies) and the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton), I think it was, and compare them with speeches that have been made by their leader and other hon. members. What those two members did was to try to focus on the underlying nature of the difficulties that we face, while the others who have spoken for the official opposition have seemed to focus almost solely on the froth, on the surface of the debate, and on the political propositions they might be able to find.

One of the things I have been reading the past little while has been the study prepared by the Food Prices Review Board. I realize that to some people that is a dirty word, but this is a study entitled "Wage and Price Controls in Britain". This study is an attempt by the board to find out the real effect of direct controls by governments in other countries which have experimented with them. We all know, because of our close association, the disaster that controls have been in the United States and the way they were operated in order not to put controls on at the farm gate. However, the effect was to put controls on at the farm gate anyway because the farmers were unable to sell their produce at cost or at cost plus a profit to them.

To deal with the situation in Britain, I should like to quote a number of statements from Dr. Smith's study. Before doing so may I point out that one of the difficulties with economics is to find an economist you can trust and follow. There is an old saying: Where there are three economists meeting you have at least six opinions. The problem is that you cannot find any group of economists who agree from day to day, the only exception perhaps being the hon. member for Don Valley.

I want to quote an economist who hopefully will provide us with some long-term advice. In a study of the impact of wage and price controls in Great Britain this is what he had to say:

> The frequency with which the British have resorted to an incomes policy over the past 25 years cannot be explained in terms of economic success of this type of policy. Many statistical studies have been made which have sought to estimate the divergence between actual wage and price movements and those which would have occurred in the absence of the policy. The results—though differing somewhat depending on statistical techniques used—suggest at times a short-run small positive effect, at times a short-run small perverse effect, and at other times no discernible effect; over the longer-run the studies have not found any lasting effect.

The conclusion reached after some 25 years of experiments with wage and price controls in Britain is that they have had no effect at all. And that is the policy that Her Majesty's official opposition wants us to follow in Canada, a policy that will have no effect at all. I am one of those who assumes that the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) is not a stupid man, that there must be some logical argument that he can advance in favour of using a policy that has been demonstrated to be bankrupt in Great Britain and just recently in the United States.

Professor Smith goes on to indicate exactly what the reason is.

An hon. Member: Is that Adam Smith?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: How did you ever hear about that?

Mr. Reid: I think hon. members would be interested to know the logic behind the official opposition's strategy.

An hon. Member: Sure, tell us.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the hon. member might be allowed to make his speech.

Mr. Reid: Mr. Speaker, I am going to quote from the bottom of page 3 of this study. Dr. Smith goes on to say the following:

> An occasional use of incomes policy has been a politically attractive way of demonstrating that the government is trying to do something about inflation as well as about an advancement in standards of living and a fairer distribution of income. A cycle of popular support for incomes policy can be observed with pressures mounting for it, a reaction against it after it has been in force for a while, a lull as memories dim of the last experiment, and then a phase of renewed enthusiasm for a new form of the policy.

The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) sees that we have a problem in Canada and he wants to find a solution to it. What he suggests as a solution is that we do something that is not going to do anything, because it looks politically attractive. That is the economic policy of the Leader of the Opposition and his followers. If that leader could impose that policy upon his followers he would have a point, but today when the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) announced a subsidy on milk and gave the amounts, an official spokesman for that party got up and said, "No good. We don't want it; we are against it".

Shortly after that statement, another member of that party got up and asked; "Why don't you give more?" Who really speaks for that party over there? Is it the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies); is it the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams); is it the Leader of the Opposition; or is it the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert)? Who speaks for the opposition on financial policy?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Will the real financial critic stand up?

Mr. Reid: In most other areas one can say who speaks for the opposition. One knows that the member who speaks on transportation is the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski). We all know this. We know that the member who speaks on regional economic expansion is the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay). But when it comes to financial matters we have a whole host of members who speak for the Conservative Party, all of whom make such a confused mess of it that nobody can understand, not even members on that side, exactly what is their policy.

I do not like to use outside examples to show the effects which a wage and price control program would have in Canada, but we know from experience what has happened in the United States. Dr. Smith has done an excellent job of showing what the results have been in Great Britain. I should now like to draw the attention of hon. members to an article which appeared in today's Globe and Mail, headed "Economists reject commission suggestion, claim wage, price controls serious mistake". This is the result of a study by two senior economists of the Royal Bank of Canada who in turn studied the official report of the prices and incomes commission. I want to emphasize to hon. members, particularly those in the official opposition, that no economist who comes from an organization that has the word "Royal" in its title could possibly be a friend of ours; therefore this is a neutral opinion. They said this:

> "It has been repeatedly demonstrated that controls are ineffective in an over-heated economy and the recent American experience with the price freeze, especially insofar as it applies to food prices, has shown the futility of such attempts.
> "With regard to the job of restraining demand, fiscal monetary policy still remains the best bet, whereas with the problem of supply shortages, a general price freeze is ineffective."

We heard the impassioned appeal by the hon. member for Don Valley in which he said there must be a better way. I really think he must have seen the movie called "The Candidate", because that is the scenario he was following. I suggest the hon. member is importing his political philosophy from the United States.

An hon. Member: Yes, and that candidate won.

Mr. Reid: In economic matters, the real problem lies in deciding which economist you want to believe. It seems to me that the economists the Conservative party have trained and trotted out once in a while, have run the full cycle of economic policy. These policies can be answered by any other economist in Canada.

My suggestion to hon. members is that the solutions advanced by the Conservative party, that is having a freeze or price and wage controls of some kind in co-operation with the provinces is completely unrealistic. I would refer hon. members to the experience of a former Minister of Finance, Mr. Benson, who attempted at one time to impose a voluntary wage restraint of 6 per cent. He went to a conference with the provincial premiers in Manitoba at which they all agreed to do everything they possibly could to restrain wage increases to 6 per cent. The business community was going to put the lid on price increases. What actually happened? When the crunch came the provincial premiers scattered like quail. They were not prepared to face the requirements and put up a tough front. The whole policy disintegrated and dissolved because the provincial premiers were not prepared to play their role. It seems to me that anyone who makes a suggestion that provincial premiers will allow themselves to be sucked in by members of the official opposition, putting their political lives in their hands, is completely out of his mind and is not aware of the situation in Canada.

The western industrialized world went through an unfortunate recession in the period 1969-70.

An hon. Member: Oh, come off it.

Mr. Reid: As the hon. member for Verdun (Mr. Mackasey) has indicated, the people who suffered from that were the working poor and those who did not have enough fiscal strength to protect themselves. The position the government has taken at this time is that most people are in a position to protect themselves from the worst of inflation, and, therefore, it is going to provide a series of measures to protect those who cannot protect themselves.

An hon. Member: You don't believe that.

Mr. Reid: The idea is that because the problems of inflation being faced by Canada today are those caused by shortages of supply, keeping in mind those who would be hurt by a wage and price freeze, the government is trying to provide subsidies for those who require them and assistance for those who are too weak to defend themselves. That is a policy I think is reasonable under the circumstances. It is also a policy that deals with an operation we used to call, when I came to the House of Commons first, the Phillips curve; the trade-off between full employment and inflation. In other words, there are two sides to the same coin.

The economist I quoted before made the point that:

—in Canada to conclude that there is a normal unemployment rate of slightly less than 5 per cent, below which the economy cannot operate for long without setting inflation in motion.

"One can move a little bit below this in the short run, but then wage rates and prices will rise and the attempt to restore price stability will eventually lead to higher-than-normal unemployment.

I think there is some truth in that, and that as we reach a state of full employment there will be additional inflationary pressures. These pressures will be increased by what the hon. member for Central Nova indicated as being a fact; regional disparity in this country. Our economic growth and our requirements for labour are not in the same places at the same time.

It seems to me under these circumstances that the policies which the official opposition has attempted to advocate, from which they are running away or hiding or for which they are losing enthusiasm, are those policies which are designed to cause the problem to get much worse, and cause an awful lot more difficulty.

In my opinion the government is trying to walk an extremely narrow line. The position is delicate, but it seems to me that the position the government is trying to follow to protect those who cannot protect themselves is a lot more preferable than the policy of blind disaster which the Leader of the Opposition and some of those who follow him have adopted. I think this debate has been useful in exposing the lack of initiative and the lack of ideas of the official opposition.

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, as the old saying goes: "Who knows what tomorrow holds?" It is absolutely true. There is however an exception. Canada's Progressive Conservative governments and Liberal governments follow each other and, strangely enough, they are alike.

In 1973, the main subject of discussion is inflation. In 1957 an 1958, the main subject of discussion was inflation. Then those who want to go back a little can easily be convinced that this statement is absolutely true.

I have an article published in 1958 which explained the political program of the Conservative party which wanted to succeed the Liberal party. I shall quote it without partisanship but simply in order that we realize that regardless of the government in office, in the present financial system, we always have the same problems. It is a cycle which repeats itself every 10, 15 or 20 years and we have again the same problems because we have always the same things.

Mr. Speaker, I want to quote an extract from the statements of the time so that we realize that we are still in a similar situation today. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) seems to think: How true what he is going to say seems! It is true. I invent nothing. This is written in a political document published at the time which could still apply in 1973 if elections were announced tomorrow.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Let us forget the party!

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): I shall forget the party, but quote the remarks, the comments and the suggestions made at the time.

Here is what we read in this document:

Inflationary forces are destroying the purchasing power of the dollar, which is prejudicial to the interests of those who receive old age pension, family allowances and veterans' pensions, as well as those who have fixed incomes. Today, the purchasing power is 53½c. compared with what it was in 1939.

In 1973, we are making comparisons with what it was in 1957, then we find ourselves at grips with the same problem.

And I go on quoting:

Inflation is the main national problem that Canada must face today. Everyday Canadians are at grips with this problem as a result of ever increasing prices. All that is done is to curb credit and increase interest rates.

As the Minister of Finance said this afternoon during the oral question period, and I quote:

Such a policy cannot possibly deal with inflation unless the federal government stops wasting money.

At that time, the government was accused of being a waster. Today, nothing is said about it but it happens however that a few departments make unconsidered spendings. No one considers things in depth because this is not the main point of interest today, but if one wanted to make an effort, for instance, and read carefully the report of the Auditor General of Canada, one could find out that in a few departments, credits allotted for such or such purpose in the budget have been missappropriated and that the money was wasted.

And later on, they speak about a fair share for farmers. Now, it is the same today. And I go on quoting:

We will guarantee the farmer a fair share of the national income by maintaining a flexible program of support prices to ensure the parity of farm products, parity founded on an equitable relation between sale prices and cost prices.

Now, wanting to guarantee such parity is absolutely logical, but the necessary means must be taken to achieve it. Let's be frank: are we really?

Yesterday, we passed laws intended to increase certain pensions. Last week, we passed a bill to increase the old age security pension. Yesterday, we also adopted a law to up family allowances. Each time we did so to increase the purchasing power in the lower income brackets, to fight inflation.

Mr. Speaker, if we take the trouble to refer to the Larousse dictionary and analyze the word "inflation", we discover that it is excess money in the hands of consumers, while there is a shortage of products to meet consumer demand. Now that is not the case at the present time. There is production in every shape or form, which really corresponds to the wishes of the people. Perhaps we could do more.

But what I find exasperating in all that, Mr. Speaker—and I should like here to be the spokesman for all those agricultural primary product producers—is that they always let people and consumers believe that it is the producers who are really responsible for the increase in food prices while that is absolutely untrue.

A casual glance at statistics will confirm that about 20 years ago, farm producers earned only 28¢ out of each dollar spent for food by consumers. And in 1973, to look at more recent times, we find that only 10 per cent of each dollar spent for food by consumers goes to farm producers. Which means the Canadian consumer spends less for food than any other consumer in any other country. It also means that if prices increase, it is on account of the voraciousness of some people somewhere and that is what we must find out.

That is why, Mr. Speaker, during the month of August, at a press conference—and I wish to repeat it tonight in this House—I had asked that the Food Prices Review Board do its duty, carry out its work and that if it did not have the power to exercise an effective control and show Canadians the real cause of the price increase in food products, the president should resign. I had also asked that the hon. members be recalled immediately to resume this session in order to deal with such a problem and bring in a solution.

Since then, Mr. Speaker, official statistics were published in newspapers. Following thorough research it was proven that the real culprits for the price increases in food as well as in many other fields are the combines, the large limited companies which are unknown to consumers but which fatten themselves up at the expense of the public by demanding inflated prices, thus making profits possible for themselves.

I have on hand a table published by an economist, Mr. François Dagenais who is working for the Quebec Agricultural Producers' Union; I do not mind giving his name because he is a responsible man who goes to the bottom of things. In that table, Mr. Speaker, we note that in 1972 and 1973, Dominion Stores Limited have increased their sales by 24.1 per cent, their income by 188.2 per cent. Let us ask our agricultural producers, our milk and egg producers, our poultrymen, etc. whether they have succeeded in increasing their income by 188.2 per cent!

Steinberg Foods Ltd. has reported a sale increase of 11.2 per cent and a profit increase of 58.2 per cent. As for the top profits, Harvey's Food Ltd. has reached it. Indeed, that company has increased its sales by 30.6 per cent and its profits by 646.5 per cent.

Table No. 2 shows the increase in sales, profits and taxes in the processing industries and indicates that Dominion Dairies Company Ltd. has upped its sales by 10.6 per cent and its profits by 3.7 per cent only.

Mr. Speaker, it is certainly in the field of dairy products that processors and distributors are least hungry. Figures prove it. And I know a little about this area for having spent a good part of my life in it.

Further, in the table, it is reported that Canadian Canners Ltd. has boosted its volume of processed products by 9.3 per cent and its profits by 56.1 per cent.

Having said this, Mr. Speaker, I should like to get this straight: I stand among those who believe in private enterprise, because I consider that it is in that area that we can more effectively—

Mr. Benjamin: You cannot have it both ways.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I would ask the hon. member to let me finish my remarks and he shall see what I am driving at.

It is because this situation is best suited to allow for maximum output. However, I cannot accept that these corporations, on the pretence that the system works well should take advantage of the population and use the resources at their disposal to unduly increase their prices and their profits.

That is why I am against these trusts carrying on with their business without any control imposed on the prices of food.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but the time allocated to him has now expired.

[English]

Mr. A. D. Alkenbrack (Frontenac-Lennox and Addington): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to make my contribution to the debate this evening because I, as well as many members of this House in all parties, deplore the situation prevalent in our country today in that we are suffering from the worst case of that virulent disease, inflation, in all the history of Canada. This House has seen some strange anomalies, as shown in the speeches just made by the hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. Saltsman) and the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Reid). As a result, it is only fitting to quote a well known columnist who recently wrote the following:

> The more trouble the government gets in, the more they and the NDP castigate the official opposition.

Mr. Benjamin: That's Charles Lynch.

Mr. Alkenbrack: The government makes the excuse that because inflation is worldwide at this time, they can do nothing about it. This is a fallacy. Everyone knows that in an epidemic of a disease, as is the case with the economic epidemic of inflation, one can protect oneself against its onslaught by adopting habits and policies that work against this enemy of society.

This Liberal government and other Liberal governments for the past seven years have been steady partners and contributors to the grave economic condition in which we now find ourselves. The heavy and unreasonable taxation load placed upon the people by the former minister of finance, Mr. Benson, and now the same policy being applied by the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner), has aided and abetted this pernicious case of acute inflation now rampant in our economy. Surely the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and his cabinet have lived long enough to recall the case of Germany after the first world war when inflation ruined that country's economy, and the time in the early twenties when a German housewife had to take a suitcase full of money with her to buy a loaf of bread.

The Canadian people are very apprehensive and they are sensitive to the increasing cost of living. I said that the government has been a partner to this for the past seven years. As a result of the many letters I received from my constituents in 1966, I raised this matter on May 27 of that year. Inflationary tendencies were then taking hold in our economy. I remember that the morning after Mr. Benson had moved that approximately $450 million be voted out of the consolidated revenue fund for the government's use, I rose in my place and made a lone protest regarding the rise in the cost of living. It is recorded at page 5609 of Hansard of May 27, 1966. Although I do not like to quote myself, I beg leave to put on the record a couple of paragraphs from my speech of seven years ago. I said:

> First of all, Mr. Chairman, each of us in this country is a consumer. Present-day government policy and the consequent high cost of consumer goods is storming the last bastion of individual hope and the individual right to live within one's means. It is now practically impossible for the head of a family, father or mother, individual or married couple, to make their modest salaries support their families from one pay day to the next.
> Prices have skyrocketed all along the line in food, rent, clothing, fuel, transportation, medical bills, insurance, taxes and capital cost of housing both new and used. In this rapid and cruel escalation of costs, this government has been a steady partner. Even its policies glaringly point to that fact. It is readily apparent that its policies support the super corporations which profit from and control our buyers' and consumers' economy.

The picture has steadily worsened following what seems now to be that far-off day in May, 1966. What is the case today? Inflation's trot is now a gallop. Two ensuing governments have done nothing, and the latest Statistics Canada figures show what every Canadian already knows, that inflation is getting out of hand. If the government does not do something about it soon, it will get completely out of hand. The cost of living rose by 1.3 per cent in one month, the highest monthly increase since March, 1951. This is damning evidence of the results of the government's do-nothing policy; and I place equal blame on its partner in what I call this clandestine coalition that governs Canada, the New Democratic Party.

Last month food again led the way with an increase of 3.2 per cent, and the increase in bread prices has yet to be felt. Food costs alone have increased 16 per cent over the past year. Housing went up 5 per cent and transportation went up 1.5 per cent. Increases in home heating oil and gasoline played a significant part in the rise in both these items of family expenditure, housing and transportation.

The patchwork of temporary relief measures will have virtually no effect on the increase in the cost of living. The Trudeau government, coalesced with and kept in power by the NDP, is providing no leadership to Canadians in the fight against inflation. The fight that the fathers and mothers of Canadian families are putting up is further impeded by the bank interest rate increase, the fifth increase since April, announced yesterday by the Bank of Canada. And the Trudeau government acquiesces and approves.

I was proud to see my leader bring about and lead this debate today, fighting to provide the kind of leadership that Canada needs by advocating the introduction of a sensible, comprehensive stabilization policy. The question in the minds of the average Canadian family today is: How are we going to bear our load of responsibilities and expense—the federal, provincial and municipal taxes, the cost of food, clothing and housing, and all the necessary expense that goes with making a living to raise and educate a family?

Inflation has also been the ruination of much of our primary industry. Since we are a country of vast natural resources, I say that the government must do something to protect the economy and our primary industries—agriculture, mining, lumbering, the tourist industry and others. The Prime Minister says that he has pegged the price of milk, that is, the retail price of milk through a system of subsidy. But that is only half a measure, because at the same time he should have frozen the price of livestock feed bought by farmers to feed the cows of Canada.

I was proud today to hear my colleague, the hon. member for Kent-Essex (Mr. Danforth), reply to the statement by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) on this matter. The hon. member for Kent-Essex spoke out on behalf of the dairy farmers of Canada. I made a similar protest in this House on June 6 and I quote my protest of that date:

> The price of soybeans and feeds containing this commodity used by farmers for feeding livestock has recently risen faster than the price of gold and beyond any reasonable level. Will the minister please take action to reduce and control the price of this product?

I asked that question of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Gray). He replied:

> Mr. Speaker, parliament has not given me that authority, but I will be happy to discuss the issue with my colleague, the Minister of Agriculture.

I did not get much of an answer to such a pressing and important question. At the present time, members of the government are only interested in sloughing off their responsibilities so they can concentrate on their annual party convention and conference now being held in this capital. They say they are having a policy workshop.

Mr. Speaker, I had an oral question ready for today but because of this more important question of inflation I did not ask it. I will ask it now of the Prime Minister: Will there not be representation at this policy conference from the other wing of their coalition, namely, the New Democratic Party? Since they are dictating the policy of the government here in the House, they might just as well be down at the Liberal convention contributing further to current chaotic conditions under the new Liberalism.

I ask again: Will the Prime Minister not listen? He is always talking about consensus emanating from changing conditions, to which we should respond. I agree with him on the importance of that. Here I wish to quote the Ottawa Citizen of Tuesday, which published the results of a poll taken in a neighbouring constituency to mine. The people of that constituency, like the people of my riding of Frontenac-Lennox and Addington, are people of good judgment; they are cautious and circumspect. Out of 5,425 replies received to the questionnaire, when asked, "Would you accept the imposition of some form of wage and price controls to combat inflation?" they answered as follows: yes, 3,934; no, 496; undecided, 319.

When asked, "Do you favour wage controls?" the replies were: yes, 2,830; no, 1,195; undecided, 473. When asked, "Do you favour a freeze on rent and food prices?" the replies were: yes, 3,697; no, 565; undecided, 240. When asked, "Should pensions be increased to counteract inflation?" the replies were: yes, 4,095; no, 350; undecided, 238.

There were other views sought and given along social lines of crime and capital punishment with which I agree, but I will not raise them here because they are not relevant to this debate. But what better evidence and consensus does the Prime Minister want regarding controls? If he is embarrassed lest he might be accused of theft and plagiarism of Progressive Conservative policies, he need have no qualms since these are the opinions of an honest and impartial cross-section of Canadian public opinion.

We refer to inflation as being the ruination of the economy of many countries. We are currently informed that rampant inflation helped spark the recent sad happenings in the Republic of Chile, and that is true. Today's headlines presage the relentless advance of prices and of all other costs and factors that compose our economy. The Montreal Star has a headline, "Increase in prices highest since 1951;" the Ottawa Journal, "Living costs zoom—worst in 22 years;" the Ottawa Citizen, "Living costs leap—steepest in 22 years;" and Le Droit, "Bond prodigieux des aliments". That is why my leader was the prime mover in this debate today. That is why our party said we would stay here and fight the problems besetting the Canadian people, instead of adjourning which I understand was advocated by those on the government benches and by their partners the NDP.

I have one more point of argument to make and it concerns housing. I think I am fairly well qualified to make this point regarding housing and its high cost. I am a lumberman by trade and was in that business for 25 years before being elected to this House. Members of my family are still carrying on in that business.

The exorbitant cost of building has reached the point where people who need housing are unable to finance construction. This afternoon, in trying to answer one of the questions put to him, the Prime Minister said that the greatest factor in the inflationary crisis was supply, and of course he meant the cost and relative plentitude of supply. Using his own agrument, I therefore call upon him to abolish the 11 per cent sales tax on building materials which is creating a major cost in the price of lumber and building materials supply.

Again, Mr. Speaker, I want to point out I protested this on that same day, May 27, 1966 in this House and have done so since, as have many other members on all sides of the House. I say to the Prime Minister that if he will take off the 11 per cent tax on lumber and building supplies at the manufacturers' level, he will be reducing the price of this material by almost 20 per cent of the retail level. Will the Prime Minister not now respond?

[Mr. Alkenbrack.]

Mr. Speaker, as a result of inflation and the high cost of living, the Canadian people are fast losing whatever confidence they may have had in Liberalism and in this Trudeau government so precariously elected last October. I would think that if this government expected to survive much longer, they would heed the opinions of the people and those of a responsible official opposition and do something, even as a parting gesture, to help the economy and the well-being of the people of Canada.

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I listened to the debate with great interest this afternoon when government spokesmen, particularly the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) attempted to explain the inexplicable actions of this government and to defend the indefensible.

The chickens have come home to roost, Mr. Speaker. We are now witnessing the effects of five years of Trudeau administration, five years of economic bungling and certainly five years of the implementation of ill-conceived agricultural policies which have struck at the heart and soul of our agricultural industry. The implementation of these policies over the past five years has left thousands of farmers in economic ruin. During the last five years the government has stated, even as it does now, that the problems in agriculture are largely of an international nature and they cannot do anything to relieve these conditions. Today we got the same explanation from the Minister of Finance.

The problems of inflation and the economic chaos that exists in this country have been perpetuated by this government and it will not be easy to relieve them. Every day more and more Canadians of every political stripe are becoming convinced that this government cannot and will not reverse the inflationary cycle. Nor will my friends to the left, the New Democratic Party, help the situation by their marriage of convenience. The Liberals are totally preoccupied with their lust for power, and the New Democratic Party is solely preoccupied with its lust for life.

This government must change its attitude or it must be turfed out, Mr. Speaker. These are the options open to this parliament and to the people of Canada. Notwithstanding anything that the New Democratic Party might say, it is as responsible for the chaotic economic conditions that we are now living under as is the Liberal government. Many of their thoughts, ideals and philosophies have been thrust upon this weak-kneed government which has gone along with them simply to cling to power.

An hon. Member: There is not a minister in the House who cares, either.

An hon. Member: There is not one here at all.

Mr. Mazankowski: The result of this alliance, Mr. Speaker, is a government which is on a spending spree unprecedented in our country. This afternoon the Minister of Finance pointed out that the reason for the rising cost of living is a shortage of basic commodities coupled with overwhelming demand. He pointed out, as well, that the main thrust of this government is to increase the supply of those basic commodities.

Perhaps this is a logical statement, but in a country with the agricultural producing potential of Canada surely we could have been insulated from the effects of this so-called international shortage. We have tremendous agricultural productive capacity in this country, but in the past five years there has been a planned and deliberate reduction of agricultural production which is part and parcel of the total philosophy of this government. They embarked upon a deliberate program of destruction of the small family farm; they embarked upon a program which discouraged production, which imposed controls and which left the agricultural economy in a confused and unstable state.

The Minister of Finance said today that this parliament had moved to save the family farm by removing the capital gains tax on interfamily transactions. But who instituted the capital gains tax, Mr. Speaker? Who imposed it upon the farmers of this country in the first place? Which political party in the last election proposed that the capital gains tax on family farm transactions should be abolished? It certainly was not those birds over there. The only reason they removed the capital gains tax on family farm transactions was the political revelation that occurred after the last election. But what have they done to help the small farmer during their tenure of office? We all remember what they did in 1968 when the then minister of agriculture removed the ceiling on the Farm Credit Corporation interest rate which was pegged at 5 per cent. It immediately shot up to 8 per cent and 8¾ per cent.

What have they done to encourage young farmers to engage or remain in agriculture? Their programs have discouraged, rather than encouraged. We hear now that there is to be a conference of the agricultural ministers of all the provinces in order to consider ways and means to encourage production. I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, that had it not been for this Liberal government, with its idiotic agricultural policies, we would not need this conference. Theirs was a policy of destruction; it destroyed the heart and soul of the family farm. They were dedicated to a program of production controls and supply management, and controls upon controls.

We heard the Minister of Agriculture say this afternoon that we are in a period of instability and uncertainty. You bet we are. We have been in that state since the Trudeau administration took office in 1968. From the days when this government instituted its proposals on tax reform there has been instability and uncertainty not only in agriculture but in all industry across the country. There has been instability in agriculture since Lift, Bill C-176 and the stabilization bill were brought forth.

This government is now coming around to realizing the importance of the agricultural industry because food prices have risen very sharply. Where were they when the price of hogs was around $29. What did they do then when farmers went bankrupt because of the low price? They came out a year later with a subsidy on a certain grade of hogs. Where were they when eggs were selling at 12 cents a dozen?

I have before me a grading statement from a farmer who sold 240 dozen eggs to Cal-Ed Poultry Farms Limited. His total receipts were $44.82. He received 12 cents a dozen for grade B eggs. Where were government members when there was talk about increasing and encouraging production? That was the time the government could have moved in with reasonable support programs to keep the farmers in production. Today, production does not exist because, by the deliberate actions and policies of this government, the farmers have been forced off the land.

Where were they when the Canadian Dairy Commission was allowed to discriminate and deliberately take away the quotas from our small dairy farmers? Where are they now? Where were they when we had stockpiles of wheat and it was selling at 90 cents a bushel? What was the government doing then? It was not doing anything. The last report of the Canadian Wheat Board will indicate that farmers realized the lowest price in 12 years for the grain they sold. It was something like $1.59 a bushel. We all know the government is trying to impose a freeze on agricultural products that are being sold. They have manipulated the domestic price of wheat.

An hon. Member: You asked for a freeze.

Mr. Mazankowski: We asked for a complete freeze, right across the board. You are embarking on a program of selective controls aimed at the defenceless farmer. You are imposing a freeze on the domestic price of wheat. You have manipulated the beef and hog industry by your silly export restrictions.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member has about two minutes left. He should use this time to address the Chair.

Mr. Mazankowski: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I wish to refer to a statement made today by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) in which he slammed the professors and economists of this country. Where was the Minister of Agriculture when his government was adopting the policies of the task force report on agriculture which was written by no less than five professors and economists, none of whom was a farmer, and which forms the Liberal bible on agricultural policy? This minister has taken a lot of credit for the increase in price of agricultural products. However, he should not be too glowing about the way his predecessor, who was defeated by the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Hargrave), took the heart and soul out of the farmer in all parts of this country. The minister should be grateful to the Conservative party because if it were not for this party, he would not be occupying that position today.

Inflation is one of the major issues threatening our economic and social fabric. Inflation has eroded our dollar by more than one third since 1961. We must consider the fact that the chairman of the Economic Council of Canada has suggested we will probably be going through a period when inflation will be of the order of 5 to 6 per cent. This means the dollar will be worth something in the area of 75 cents; in 5 years, 56 cents; in 10 years, 42 cents and in 15 years, 31 cents. This is a terrorizing thought. What does this government intend to do about it?

This government has suggested that one of its major priorities is the pursuit of reasonable price stability. We must question the sincerity of that statement because this government and this Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) to date have done nothing to mitigate the inflationary spiral.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to take part in this debate because a number of my good friends and colleagues in all parties have been anxiously waiting for me to speak.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Benjamin: I have sat in this chamber most days since January 4. I have heard the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) and a number of his colleagues recite on numerous occasions the requirement for a 90-day freeze on wages and prices ad nauseam. When I first began to be active in politics, these were the people who said it would be terrible to have a socialist, NDP or CCF government because they would be in favour of state control. The people who led in those kinds of arguments were many of my friends in my province, members and supporters of the Conservative party. I find that particularly ironic in this day and age. They were the ones who held up their hands in horror at the very thought of controls on prices, profits and wages. What is equally ironic, and I admit this quite readily, is that some years ago I also thought that was some kind of solution.

Having read and heard of the bitter experience of parties of all political stripes, from communist to fascist, free enterprise to democratic socialist, every one you can imagine in all parts of this globe, I find it ironic when listening to the Leader of the Opposition and his colleagues who have been talking about controls since January 4. I intend to send to the office of the Leader of the Opposition pages from issues of a very radical publication over a period of some eight weeks this past summer. I am being facetious when I say it is radical. For many years, this magazine has been a supporter of, in the best sense of the word, "free enterprise and the capital system". It is a supporter of conservatives in North America, a supporter of the republican party and President Nixon. Tomorrow or Monday I will send to the Leader of the Opposition all the Xerox copies I have of what this radical publication called Time magazine says about 90-day freezes, price controls and phases one, two, three and four implemented by a republican conservative government headed by Richard Nixon. This magazine is noted for its refusal to recognize any kind of operation other than that endorsed by conservatives, small and large "c", both north and south of the 49th parallel for the past several decades.

I heard the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) say to members opposite, "For God's sake, go." I will buy that, provided you go with them.

● (2340)

An hon. Member: Let's all go.

Mr. Benjamin: I heard the Leader of the Opposition say it was time to remove this government from office.

Some hon. Members: Amen!

[Mr. Mazankowski.]

Mr. Benjamin: I will say not only "amen" but "hallelujah, brother!"

Mr. Baker: I had a tom cat who was as consistent as you.

Mr. Benjamin: I have been working against the Grits for almost as many years as all those fellows opposite me are younger than I am. I can say "hallelujah", except when I look to my right and see the Leader of the Opposition presenting himself to me as an alternative. When he talks about a 90-day freeze and about controls, he also says he intends to perpetuate the present economic system. For an ordinary stubble-jumper like me it is an awful choice to have to make. It is not really a choice. To choose between the Grits over there and these Tories over here is enough to give a coyote the heartburn. I am trying to put this in as polite language as I can.

Mr. Mazankowski: Think of the coyotes.

Mr. Benjamin: I say that because I am in full sympathy with the coyotes when it comes to considering these alternatives.

Mr. Kempling: They voted for you last time.

Mr. Benjamin: I have coyotes in my constituency who are far smarter than Grits or Tories.

An hon. Member: Or you.

Mr. Benjamin: The Leader of the Opposition and his colleagues have talked about controls and a 90-day freeze. If they would like to entice me, and possibly my hon. friends, to support their position they might elucidate precisely what they mean by freezes and controls. Earlier today the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies) made a slip of the tongue and spoke of wage and price controls. I should like to ask him and others in the official opposition: On what wages, and why wages?

Mr. Paproski: That is about the dumbest thing you have said yet.

Mr. Benjamin: Would they also tell me what farmers are to be subject to controls, and why farmers? I will appreciate it if the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner) would explain this to me satisfactorily.

Mr. Horner (Crowfoot): I sure will.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): He was not going to speak.

An hon. Member: He is talking but he is not saying anything.

Mr. Benjamin: We have experienced controls and wage freezes before, during wartime, and under the price and wage board in 1941 or 1942. We can learn from the experience of governments in other countries, too. On every occasion when this kind of economic procedure has been followed, the first people to get kicked in the face were the farmers and wage-earners. If the Leader of the Opposition would provide the House with a specific commitment that his version of controls and freezes means he would start at the top and work down, he would get my support.

Mr. Nowlan: That is worthy of Kreskin. Show some humility.

Mr. Benjamin: I say this with a reasonable degree of safety because I am a most cautious fellow.

An hon. Member: We don't want you at any price.

Mr. Benjamin: But I would find the bed about equally uncomfortable if I had to get into bed with either one of those two parties. If the official opposition would, first of all, drop the word "wage" from the phrase "price and wage policy" and substitute therefore the word "incomes", and, second, if they would undertake that the profits of financial institutions and corporations, and the incomes of professional people, including members of parliament—

Mr. Hurlburt: Lawyers and undertakers.

Mr. Andre: Preachers, too.

Mr. Benjamin: —and if they will specify that the people who are the first victims of inflation—and as far as I am concerned they are persons earning less than $10,000 a year—will not be subject to compulsion, I might be prepared to get rid of "them" in favour of "those".

Mr. Saltsman: This is degenerating into a debate.

Mr. Benjamin: I feel reasonably sure that no Tory will offer any such thing, because the difference between the two parties when it comes down to the crunch is nil.

Mr. Paproski: You simply don't understand us, Ben.

Mr. Benjamin: The hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) talked about lowering interest rates and removing the tax on building materials. I have heard Tories talk ad nauseam for the last five years—in fact, I have heard members of my own party talk ad nauseam about the removal of sales tax from building materials. I have yet to hear a single member of the official opposition say that the sales tax on building materials should be removed only if and when the advantage was passed on to the consumer. That is the essential difference.

I recall the years when the CCF and, later, the NDP were clamouring, together with the Tories, for the removal of the sales tax from drugs. Finally, the Liberal government did remove it. But no reduction in the price of drugs to the consumer followed: the benefit of the removal of that 11 per cent tax went to increase the profits of the drug manufacturing companies. And there was not a word of complaint from the Tories. So, again, if the official opposition would take the stand that the removal of the sales tax from building materials should not serve to profit the manufacturers and builders of houses, I will believe what they say.

The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) spoke today. I hoped he would give us some idea of what the policy being followed by the minister in charge of the Wheat Board really meant. Instead, he gave us a lecture about not wasting food. He was critical of professors, and I agree with that. I hope he agrees that the number one professor in this House is the Minister in charge of the Wheat Board. Then, we might add the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies) and the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent).

● (2350)

An hon. Member: You must be kidding.

Mr. Benjamin: I am only two-thirds kidding. I did not mean that about the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby because he is a half-decent fellow.

The Minister of Agriculture talked about his expert friends who are professors and economists putting half the farmers on welfare. As the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) quite rightly pointed out, it was five experts, economists with the task force on agriculture, none of whom had grown a bushel of wheat in his life, who recommended that at least one-third of the farmers of this country had to go.

I wish the Minister of Agriculture had told us more about his feed grains policy, particularly since he comes from Ontario. I would have appreciated his explanation of how the western feed grain producers would be happy to help out eastern livestock feeders to the tune of a buck a bushel. These are people who talk of national unity yet continue to impose policies that divide the people of this country. The Minister of Agriculture should not have risen this afternoon. If he had to rise, then all he should have said was: "Mr. Kierans, where are you now that we need you?" I hope that as this session progresses all parties in this House will agree that we must strengthen the Prices Review Board to include all commodities, and that we will give the board power to investigate and to roll back unjustified price increases.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member's time has expired.

Mr. J. H. Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, much has been said and many good speeches have been made. There appears to be an agreement on the part of the Liberal party and New Democratic Party to attack us in this debate since they are fearful of the approach of the Conservative party which may have the answer, or part of the answer, to the inflation that has been confronting Canada.

People have been wondering how long this supposed marriage is going to continue. They should read about federalism in Canada as written by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), before he was Prime Minister and when he was a socialist, as he is today. He is quite happy with the marriage and has no trouble with the NDP as bed partners. As someone said in this House earlier, there are no cabinet ministers in the House. Certainly, there are; the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) is here.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Horner (Crowfoot): He is head of treasury board and deputy House leader—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Saltsman: Mr. Speaker, I must rise to protest. If the hon. member for Crowfoot is determined to have his say, then surely the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre at least deserves to be prime minister.

Mr. Horner (Crowfoot): One thing I have not noticed in the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is his desire to be prime minister. Certainly, he desires to be House leader, head of treasury board and to hold a number of other offical positions, which he occupies rather well from his present seat in the House. So the marriage is accepted. The two parties have joined together in this debate to attack the Conservative party position, which as I have said is not an absolute answer. Inflation is very difficut to cure, particularly when a country is gripped by fear as this country is today. We have a psychological belief that inflation is here to stay and will continue.

If you talk to any housebuilder, farmer, person who lends money or worker, they will say they have to have more money because inflation is here to stay and prices will continue to go up and up. I suppose to some extent the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) deliberately printed money and caused a great increase in the money supply because he wanted the country to have a feeling of ebullience so that people would be happy and contented. He wanted good times for the people in preparation for an election so perhaps his party would be returned with a bigger majority than ever.

However, this ebullience has got out of hand and has led to a psychological fear about inflation. The Conservatives have put forward a policy, and it is being attacked because it is right. The hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) has dealt with agriculture and with the philosophy of the Liberals over the past few years, which was completely wrong. He has quoted from the task force report on agriculture and quoted the most important part of the report spelling out the agricultural policy. This report has been commonly referred to as the bible of the Liberal party.

Prior to the last election the former minister of agriculture, when campaigning in Peace River, shuddered and shook and said that the one great mistake he had made as minister of agriculture was that he did not see the folly of the task force report on agriculture and did not condemn it but accepted it. He said that was his biggest mistake, but he was too late. The Minister of Finance has suddenly realized that the Conservative party has some good policies and those he has accepted. But I fear he will recognize the remaining ones too late.

What does the task force report on agriculture say? The recommendations commence at page 431, and on the next page appears the following:

> The main principles of our recommendations, spelled out in detail in later chapters, are as follows:
> 1. The surpluses must be controlled and reduced to manageable proportions by reducing production drastically, if necessary.

We know what the minister in charge of the Wheat Board did. He dumped barley on the market at 48 or 50 cents a bushel and sold it to Japan and to everybody else. He got it out of the country at a low, giveaway price and then tried to boast during the last election campaign that he had moved all that grain and should be re-elected. He then came back to Ottawa and wondered why more prairie members of the Liberal party were not returned. Anyone can give away wheat, but he had become obsessed with this idea in the Liberal bible that we must control and reduce surpluses by reducing production.

The fourth recommendation is this:

> Younger non-viable farmers should be moved out of farming through temporary programs of welfare, education and provision of jobs in other sectors of the economy. Older farmers should be given assistance to ensure that they have at least a "livable" standard of living.

That was the design, and now they wonder why there is a scarcity of food and why we have inflation. As many people have said, inflation comes about from too much money chasing too few goods. One other reason inflation comes about—and the government has done a great job promoting it—is that we get less work done for the same amount of money. In other words, they have destroyed the work ethic in society today. Can you find a better example of the destruction of the work ethic than the sentence I have just read, that:

● (Midnight)

> Younger non-viable farmers should be moved out of farming through temporary programs of welfare, education and provision of jobs in other sectors of the economy.

In other words: We will give them money. We won't encourage them to do anything useful or productive. We will sit them on pedestals somewhere, and somehow or another we will eventually try to work them into society.

I suggest that excessive waste will always contribute to inflation. One has only to look at the expenditures of this government for 1967-68 when budgetary estimates were $9.9 billion. Some five years later this had doubled to $18.3 billion, and the true expenditures for that year amounted to $19.2 billion. Certainly one can see a too rapid growth in federal government expenditure. We have too many bureaucrats and this increases the costs of production. This is the expenditure of only one government, and we have ten others in this country all of which contribute to the overhead which in turn contributes to the increased cost of goods and production. This government wonders why we have inflation today. I suggest the government is the designer of today's inflation.

On July 19 the minister announced government assistance in respect of the price of bread. He admitted that bread would go up in price, but somehow or another he did not think it would go up as much as it did. He should have known that a 15 per cent increase in the price of wheat would cause the price of a loaf of bread to be increased by at least one cent. Since that time wheat has gone up approximately 77 cents a bushel and we have seen a six-cent per loaf increase in the price of bread to the consumer. The Minister of Agriculture can go on television and suggest there are rip-offs and gouges in our society; it is very easy to say that but very hard to substantiate it.

The NDP are always advocating some kind of control on production. That has been their theme for years. They suggest the Conservatives want wage and price controls but never mention profit controls. It is pretty difficult to have profit controls, because in order to have them you must have volume controls. I suppose they would like volume controls as well, because they too would limit production. With the profit and volume controls suggested by the NDP we would wake up one day and find an even more accelerated inflation spiral.

Let me refer to agricultural production, especially to the fifth report of the Economic council of Canada in which it dealt at length with this matter. It pointed out quite clearly that in respect of research and financing, the Canadian farmer was undercapitalized in comparison with the U.S. farmer. The report suggests that the Canadian farmer has never had the necessary scientific tools working for him and that he has not had enough capital to allow him to successfully compete with his counterpart to the south. That report came out in 1969. What has this government done since that time? I suggest it has drastically reduced financing in agriculture.

Since 1969 this government has been obsessed with the idea that the number of farmers must be reduced, preferably those with small operations. Now we hear the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board (Mr. Lang) suggesting that we must have a feed grain storage bank. What did we have when our elevators were full of barley? I suggest we then had a feed grain storage bank. But the minister dumped this grain on the world market at 48 cents to 50 cents a bushel. We took a loss and allowed the grain buyers in Italy to resell our barley, making 50 cents a bushel on it. In any event, this grain was out of our bins and off the minister's mind—out of sight, out of mind.

We have seen in the past year our cost of living climb by about 8.3 per cent and we have seen food prices increase by over 12 per cent. What did the minister do in his budget to counteract this situation? He very generously reduced the tariffs on fruits and vegetables. On August 13 this government put an embargo on the export of cattle, thinking this would somehow appease the consumer and bring about a reduction in the price by keeping more beef at home. I suggest this control was effective to the extent of perhaps 1 per cent on the shipment of beef. It had a drastic effect on the price of beef as compared to the advantages that were gained.

An hon. Member: Are you for a freeze on the price of food?

Mr. Horner (Crowfoot): I am not for a freeze on the price of food, and I do not think the Conservative party is in favour of such a freeze. My feeling in respect of food production is that me must give the farmer more capital and more scientific tools in order that he can produce more efficiently, thereby keeping up to production demands in this country and the demands of other countries to which we sell goods.

An hon. Member: Is that what your leader is suggesting?

Mr. Horner (Crowfoot): I firmly believe that is what my leader is suggesting. In this country we have allowed ourselves to adopt three policies. The first was the Lift program to get rid of production and surpluses. The second was the concept that wherever possible we should have cheap food, and on many occasions it has been said that we should have a cheap food policy. Now, when food prices are up, we find that the consumers are not happy and the government has to bring in some kind of subsidy.

Cost of Living

I suggest that in the past month three ministers of this government have contributed to increased food prices. The Minister of Finance has adopted policies which have resulted in an increase in the price of bread. The adjustment in respect of the cost of milk announced by the Minister of Agriculture has resulted in increased milk prices. Today the minister brought in a measure to subsidize the price of milk to the extent of five cents a quart in one province of Canada. I ask why this should apply to only one province, because the price of milk has gone up in other provinces as well.

The Minister of Finance had done nothing to curtail or manage the supply of money in Canada. He and the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury) have done nothing to control the expenditures of this government. They believe they must divide up the pie and keep doling it out. They believe in increasing the size of government, and somehow or another things will work out. This government thinks that the inflationary spiral we are experiencing is a world condition. If that is so, why is our inflation higher than the inflation of other countries? The United States has a lower rate of inflation this year than ours, and the Japanese, one of our major traders, also has a lower rate of inflation.

Certainly there are and have been shortages of food in some countries, but we in Canada are not in any way in the grip of a food shortage. We may have some difficulties in respect of distribution of food, brought about partially by the rail dispute and partially—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his allotted time has expired. However, he may continue with unanimous consent.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

● (0010)

Mr. J.-J. Blais (Nipissing): Mr. Speaker, I had not planned to participate in this glorious debate.

An hon. Member: Then sit down.

Mr. Blais: As you may recognize, as a new member, I am rather intimidated to join the battle in this honourable chamber, but in view of the drivel to which I have listened from members on the other side I felt that intimidation lift suddenly. I felt that nothing I could do at my worst could fail to make any contribution from the other side seem less.

I should like simply to mention that one point made by the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner) needs immediate rebuttal. He said that the province of Quebec was the only province which has benefited from the federal largesse in the matter of the milk subsidy. He failed to point out that the same largesse is available to all other provinces, and that it is up to the provinces to use their initiative to enter into agreements which will make the subsidies available. Perhaps my friends on the other side, both NDP and Conservative, should advise their friends in the provincial governments of the fact that the money is available. I am not an economist.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Blais: I do not pretend to be an economist. I should like to indicate that most of the people I represent are not economists and therefore need some enlightenment concerning what the position is. I might indicate that that enlightenment is not coming from the opposition benches. One has only to recognize that economics is a great, complex science. Although it includes a very pure science, namely mathematics, it also includes the human element. Judging from the rowdiness and the gargantuan proportions of the "monkey-business" being performed by the members of the opposition benches, it would appear that economics is a very wonderful science indeed, for one can never tell what folly next shall befall humanity. There is some silence at the other end. I suppose they are waiting for another gem. We are dealing with the human element and the human psychology. The Liberal government has recognized that it must tread a very fine course. We must maintain an equilibrium and really walk on a tightrope.

An hon. Member: You sure do.

Mr. Blais: That has been recognized because the maintenance of economic equilibrium is a very difficult feat. I avoided the depression. I was lucky. I was born after the depression. I see some older gentlemen on the other side who have lived through it. Surely, they ought to know that the economy of Canada has been a sequence of booms and busts. They also must recognize that the causes of these booms and busts have not been determined. Surely, we would have avoided them had we known the exact causes. It has been recognized that the particular economic condition we face now is a completely novel situation. The face of the earth on which we live is changing with the increase in the facility of communication and therefore the whole phenomena is a brand new one. Surely, we will not attempt to use time-worn measures by which we might become involved in a situation which could result in considerable difficulty. I would suggest that if we are to adopt or espouse radical measures we might very well aggravate the problem rather than lessen it. Therefore, the government has learned from past experience. It has carefully reviewed the measures taken last year. It has adopted a course which seems to be the reasonable one, notwithstanding the views of gentlemen on the other side.

An hon. Member: And you are no economist.

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, it has been indicated that this course is not popular because, indeed, there is a cry for wage and price controls which has been fanned I might indicate by statements made by my friends opposite. There has been a fanning of this panic which is developing in the country. It would be very possible for the Liberal government to adopt wage and price controls, but this would be fatal. I suggest it would be fatal because this is a very radical measure; there is no doubt about that. It would hurt the economy and hurt directly the principle the Conservative party has always espoused.

An hon. Member: You worry about your own principles.

Mr. Blais: I have sincere principles, which is much more than I can say for members on the opposite side. Mr. Speaker, I receive letters and phone calls from thinking Conservatives and, thank God, there are still some left in this world. They remind me in my riding that they will no longer support the Conservatives because the Tory party has abandoned its principles. The Tory party has entrenched in the constitution of Canada property and civil rights. It has entrenched in the constitution of Canada the doctrine of laissez-faire, Adam Smith, and the whole kit and kaboodle. These are the principles they have always spoken of and, in the same breath, after they have spoken for generations about free enterprise, they turn around and espouse those policies which are the most radical and the most control-oriented of all policies which might be devised. Those are the people—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member obviously is enjoying himself, but I think perhaps from the standpoint of completing the record of the House through Hansard some of the excitement might go down about ten decibels.

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, I was just suggesting to gentlemen on the other side that they may be laughing now, but they might have some second thoughts. A considerable number of comments have been made lately concerning the fact that according to the public polls, the Conservative Party has reached the lowest point it has reached in many years. They may wonder why they are being criticized by the other parties in this House. I would point out to them that the reason they are criticized is that their views are shallow, devoid of worth and I suggest will bring their downfall.

An hon. Member: Go to the country.

Mr. Blais: On that point, let us go to the country. May I say that is what the gentlemen opposite have been advocating. They ask that practical measures be taken by this government and in the same breath say, "Let us have an election and let this country have no government for 60 days".

● (0020)

Mr. Blais: First they say, "Let us have a freeze for 90 days." Then in the same breath they say, "Let us have no government for 60 days". That is Tory logic. I suggest they should think more, and review the position they have taken; then perhaps they will survive the next election.

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Peel South): Mr. Speaker, I was very amused by the speech of the hon. member for Nipissing (Mr. Blais). I remind him that it was this party which suggested the indexing of personal income tax. We were laughed at, but it was accepted. And it was this party which suggested limiting corporate tax reductions for one year. It was laughed at, but the suggestion was accepted. It was this party which for a long time advocated tying pensions to the cost of living, and we have just accepted that. I hope the hon. member does not get himself into a fixed position, because pretty soon we will have an incomes policy in this country and he will have to explain to his constituents, whom he has mentioned, why it could not happen today but it will happen tomorrow for pretty darn sure.

This evening we had a fairly good explanation of the incomes policy from the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin). I want to impress upon him that that policy is designed to make sure that big business, big government and big labour keep their demands within the limits of productivity.

Mr. Gilbert: Is that your policy?

Mr. Blenkarn: Before I go on to discuss an incomes policy, may I point out that this debate has a great deal to do with interest rates, with the cost of money and with monetary policies and I want to make two or three observations with respect to monetary policy which I think need to be made. Over the past three years the money supply in this country has increased at an unbelievable rate. Just last spring the government, rather than refinance its loans in the conventional way had the Bank of Canada print the whole amount. The money supply in one day was increased by $500 million.

The Americans had some financial problems with their trade and their dollar on world markets has slipped this year, on an exchange rate basis, by some 30 per cent; and so has our dollar. That is not so bad so far as the U.S.A. is concerned, because they rely on foreign trade only to the extent of about 4 per cent. But this country is a world supplier of basic commodities. This country supplies to the world 90 per cent of the grain that it grows. This country has the ability to export, and does export, a great number of primary products such as lumber, fish, wheat and oil. These are international products.

It has been said by this government that because international prices are rising, we in Canada must pay more and the government can do nothing about it. But what has really happened? We have $6 wheat, but we have had a 30 per cent devaluation of our currency so our farmers are not getting $6 for their wheat; they are getting $4.20 in relation to German marks and Japanese yen.

That kind of thing is affecting very seriously the cost of living in Canada. The debauching and the pollution of our money supply has been one of the key causes of the inflation cycle in this country, in particular with reference to those products that are determined in price on the international market. It is about time we had a monetary policy explained to this country, one that set out the growth limits of money supply so that to some extent the money supply would bear some relation to the increase in the gross national product and is not increased willy-nilly to meet government expenses.

I want to go on to another matter that I think is perhaps more important, namely, the matter of analysing the kind of inflation with which we seem to be faced today. One of the things that concerns us especially with respect to the price of bread, the price of steel, the price of oil, lumber, etc.—these being commodity prices—is the fact that there is a huge world demand.

The hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner) spoke about the problems of agriculture and said that we have not done anything to encourage production. For a long time our party has had pretty solid policy objectives in connection with the production of basic commodities. For a long time we have had an incentive policy and we have talked about an incentive society. We have said; "Look, you have to give the producers tax breaks and some encouragement to produce". How could you ever start a farm today at an interest rate of 9 per cent, 10 per cent or 11 per cent and hope to produce beef economically? Indeed, if you had the money to buy a place and get organized, you would probably lend it out at a mortgage rate of 10½ per cent, 11 per cent or 12 per cent.

This government gives no encouragement to our producers of basic products. Is it any encouragement to say to oil producers, "I am sorry, your price is frozen but your costs are not frozen"? Is it any encouragement to say to our oil producers, "I am sorry, but you cannot export and we will not help you produce or discover any more oil"? That is the attitude of this government. They are unwilling to supply real incentives to producers. What they are saying is that they will subsidize consumption. This afternoon we heard that the consumption of milk will be subsidized at 5 cents a quart. They hope to keep the price down in this way, but they will not do a darn thing for the feed costs of the farmer, nor a darn thing about increasing the supply of milk in general or making it cheaper to produce. All they can do is give a consumer subsidy.

What I will say now I think should be on the record, and I think it is only fair to say it. This is a debate that you, Mr. Speaker, have allowed tonight on a matter of serious national urgency. For at least an hour and a half to two hours tonight not a single member of the cabinet, the advisers to Her Majesty's representative, has been present in the House. This demonstrates how much the government is concerned about this issue. It does not give a darn about inflation, high interest rates and the ordinary Canadian. Perhaps this government should get out of the House permanently and onto the streets and knock on the doors, when the people of Canada would tell them what they think of them. Members of this government cannot be bothered to participate in the debates of this House; they would rather be somewhere else. Maybe they are lapping up some gin somewhere.

An hon. Member: The fleshpots of Ottawa.

Mr. Blenkarn: I should like to go on to another question which goes beyond the matter of incentives to production, and say a few words on what is called the problem of cost-push inflation. It is at this point that we in this party have suggested that we have a total incomes policy, and people have been misled into saying, "You are going to have a 90-day freeze." If you are to have an incomes policy that will be a start. That incomes policy has to be one that ties the costs of labour, of profits and wages to the productivity of society because, Mr. Speaker, you and I know we cannot spend more than we earn, unless we borrow from a bank and in that case eventually we have to pay the piper.

● (0030)

That is what has been happening in this country. We have been spending more than we create, and we try to validate our expense by printing more money and fooling ourselves. This attitude has to stop right now. We must get an incomes policy which makes sure there is enough credit to carry on the expansion of the country, but not enough credit to pollute and destroy currency values and the savings of Canadians. When we look at the inflation rate and ask investors what kind of return do they need to break even, they may say that, based on a rate of 8.3 per cent, they may have enough a year from now to break even. But to get that they have to invest money at 13 per cent or 14 per cent, pay income tax on their return, and then maybe they will break even. That is the kind of society in which we live.

We must have a government that is prepared to look the problem squarely in the eye, that is prepared to say, "You cannot eat more than you produce. You cannot get paid more than you create." Price rises, income rises and wage rises must be tied to national productivity. That is what an incomes policy is all about.

Finally, I wish to say a few things about the cost of government. Just look at this Blue Book and the pamphlet, "Where Does Your Dollar Go?" There is a lovely little chart in it. But you see that chart going straight up every year since the government took power. The government has doubled national expenditure, from $6 billion to $20 billion in a little over a decade. Has national productivity increased that much? Has the population increased that much? No, Mr. Speaker, but the cost of government has, and we cannot ask business to reduce its profits, we cannot ask the store manager not to raise the price of bacon, while the government of Canada increases its take from national productivity by great amounts every year.

It is about time we had a new government in this country. It has been suggested that we have an election. But, Mr. Speaker, look at the fellows on the backbenches opposite. They are not bad fellows. It is just their leadership that is bad. I say we could do something for Canada. We could build Canada. We could develop an incomes policy. We could encourage production. We could cut the cost of government and make a better Canada. If you fellows want to join us, come on over here and put your leaders out because they really don't care.

[Translation]

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I am aware that some members have more patience than others.

As usual, Mr. Speaker, I wish to contribute to that quite special debate on a motion to discuss uncontrolled inflationary pressures. Certainly, I do not hesitate to take part in this discussion since this is an issue which is of interest to the entire Canadian population.

Still, I regret that in this debate, there are hon. members from all sides of this House who try to prove that the government or some other party could be more competent than the others. I am hoping, as I have always been that Parliament will be most unbiased if we are to adequately serve the community.

We have heard all sorts of comments during this debate. Some members have called for elections and it would perhaps be unfortunate for them if such elections were held. But I think, just the same, that Canadians are very much concerned about price increases, and I believe that it is on that point that we must above all try and discuss in a very objective manner.

The opposition is adamant and I think that they have the right and even the obligation to be. To suggest that this government has well managed the business of this nation during the past six years would be to consider the situation with one's eyes closed. To say that this government has made no efforts whatsoever would be just as unfair. I believe, however, that Parliament as a whole must operate objectively if we are to lead the government into approving certain proposals, because members of the opposition, to whatever party they belong, do come up now and then with some excellent suggestions. It is also obvious that the government has not found the solutions to all our problems.

It is unfair to say that any party or any group of hon. members are less concerned than others with enhancing the well-being of this nation. At least, I do hope that hon. members are all anxious to serve better and find solutions.

We must indeed be realistic enough to admit that these problems do exist and that the kind of inflation which we are experiencing nowadays is very annoying to the Canadian public. Our people are worried, with good reason; tonight, like all other hon. members, I had a number of telephone conversations with people from my riding who were already aware that we were having a debate that would probably extend late in the night. I was asked squarely whether Parliament will announce anything that will be an encouragement to them. Will Parliament finally make up their minds or find a means to stop this price escalation which has become a major problem in Canada?

Such is the role of the true legislator and I appeal to the objectivity of all the hon. members. Of course, Mr. Speaker, I am in the best position to do so because I do not necessarily have to worry about any potential election. But I have a duty to perform during my mandate and it behoves me, in the first instance, to appeal to that objectivity, because people often lose confidence in the attitude of some parties or some hon. members, because the interests or the profitability of a political party have often seemed to override the interests of the community. To my mind, the people are right in being concerned about that. It is one reason why people have less confidence in Parliament. By his attitude, every member can win back the confidence of the people and prove that parliament is seriously working on devising solutions.

Of course, this afternoon, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) announced a measure which seems to be a true control on products. It will be difficult for the producers who will be imposed price controls and who will have no assurance of possible increases in production costs. In my opinion, the government should seriously think it over when it comes to imposing controls on given products.

I take this opportunity because the government seems to think it has found a solution as regards the dairy products, thanks to an agreement with the province of Quebec. I welcome, of course, the fact that the government has reached an agreement with Quebec in this connection; the minister stated that further steps will be taken to enter into further agreements with the other provinces, but I am quite concerned about the producers because as recently as tonight, I again heard a comment by a producer from my constituency who is quite worried about increasing production costs. Therefore, how is it possible to freeze a product without the assurance that the producer will still be able to make a reasonable profit? If production costs keep increasing, there will be no way of adopting the measure announced by the minister.

Therefore, since there is a control on sales prices it is urgent, mainly for the producer—and this will involve all kinds of production—that the government take immediate action to enable the producer to make reasonable profits.

I know that the Progressive Conservative party is often bringing us back to a policy of a price freeze of 90 days. I would have reason to believe, Mr. Speaker, that this 90-day period, ordered in the United States, did not have any extraordinary or very profitable effects.

On the other hand, it is clear that people are waiting for a positive reaction on the part of the government. It is obvious that Parliament will have to find a solution, consideration being taken of the concern and difficulties this is causing. To what extent will the government be able to consider ordering a price freeze without necessarily having to set limits because the U.S. experience has made us understand that some producers were storing goods or delaying the shipment of their herds to slaughter houses and that after 90 days they could make even bigger profits?

I therefore wonder if the government might not consider imposing simply a price freeze without necessarily setting time limits, but deciding that it will end the freeze whenever it may judge it necessary and appropriate.

Now, can we consider a price freeze, especially a long one, without necessarily freezing wages? I should say right now that I will oppose any general wage freeze. In view of the cost of living, can we consider today freezing the minimum wages for instance as easily as we would freeze the wages of the professional classes? Therefore I believe that we should establish some standards to impose a fixed hourly rate. Would it be fair for example to freeze some hourly wages at $7 and at the same time freeze the minimum wages at $1.75 or $1.90 an hour? We must therefore establish standards and decide that a general wage freeze is impossible; personally, I would object to it. But we are perfectly aware that, in the long term, you cannot have one without the other. I believe the government should apply itself more to the analysis and consideration of this possibility.

But one thing is certain, Mr. Speaker, as long as the government refuses to stop price increases, we will see prices rise every day. Recently, the government announced some steps to refrain these increases, but it is clear they are political measures set up from day to day. Far from me to blame the government for announcing these measures last week. Of course, they were necessary, warranted, but there again, nothing assures us that we will not see more price rises and will the government be compelled day after day or week after week to introduce new measures to ward off these new increases?

Therefore, if the government thought that the legislation announced would be adequate for the next 12 months, or the next five or six years, I think it is making a big mistake. That legislation is acceptable considering the needs, but it is inadequate as a guarantee.

That is why I believe the debate we are having tonight should enlighten us and prompt the government to take a very concrete measure. Would it be so embarrassing to accept a valuable proposal from the opposition? The system under which we live disappoints me to a certain extent. It is by tradition, of course, Mr. Speaker, and that is how the people are often disappointed. By tradition, the government should not accept, at least not readily, a proposal from the opposition and by tradition, the opposition must always blame the government, even if the government is right. Therefore, with such a practice or such traditions, we finally lose the confidence of the people and make the people pay for a system that will not change, that members of this House refuse to change.

Therefore, it is imperative that this government receive, accept and consider a proposal that would be fair and that would be a solution to the problems we face at the present time, and it is as important for opposition members to support the government and to force it to act quickly when it is right and when it solves a problem or a difficulty. Therefore, one must of course show some objectivity and lay aside a partisanship which definitely harms the people and for which people must pay. Personally, Mr. Speaker, I don't give a hoot whether a Liberal or a Progressive Conservative government is at the head of this country; what is important is that the people obtain solutions to their problems, and it is up to Parliament, up to each member to see to it.

I am repeating opinions that I have already expressed in this House and that is the way I think I should continue to perform in the sense that I seek above all the better being of each individual in this country. And in order to do that, I must not ask myself if I should favour one party rather than another; I must look for the better legislation and support it; that is the role of every member of Parliament.

And to the extent that we try and pass the legislation most likely to serve the interests of a society, we will succeed in improving the plight of our constituents and allowing them to feel much happier and in greater security.

I would also like as a last point to raise the extremely serious problems relating to housing.

There is talk about suppressing the sales tax of 11 per cent on building materials as a solution to the problem.

Personally, I thought the abolition of that tax could encourage young couples or individuals to become home owners because we know that an individual acquiring ownership becomes more interested, more motivated in his interest in his municipality, his province, and industry.

And I do not think I am wrong in saying that the housing industry affects 33 per cent of the labour force. So, I think that this government has all the reasons in the world to take particular interest in the promotion of the residential housing industry.

We are aware also that the interest rates of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation are now unreasonably high. And I wonder if it is not appropriate to ask the government to consider the possibility of giving a 5 per cent subsidy, for instance, to roll back the interest rates of the CMHC to an acceptable level.

I think that these are measures that we should consider seriously if we really want to correct the problems we are all facing and to alleviate the discouragement of Canadians.

Everyday, some views are conveyed to us that it is now very onerous if not impossible for a young married couple to be able to buy a house. I believe we should give serious consideration to those possibilities.

Of course, I would accept other such valuable alternatives maybe more than those I am now suggesting. For a long time we have asking for the abolition of the 11 per cent tax on building materials—it is not a new idea—as well as lower interest rates to encourage all Canadians and we would demonstrate that we have moved in the right direction in the battle against inflation.

[English]

Mr. William C. Frank (Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I rise as yet another member of this House who is concerned about where this country is heading with the government we find attempting to lead us today. Perhaps the best way to explain what this debate is all about would be to quote from the Financial Times editorial of this week. I quote:

The new bundle of anti-inflation measures which Prime Minister Trudeau presented to Parliament and the country last week has a make-shift, grab-bag feel to it. The commodities Mr. Trudeau chose for specific action—wheat, milk and petroleum products—have little in common except that they may be the targets of consumer complaint. The increase to $12 a month in the monthly family allowance seems to have been selected because it could be done quickly and was likely to be popular.

In no way are these measures in themselves, or in conjunction with the measures announced three weeks before, a coherent program for fighting inflation. They seem to be aimed more at soothing the consumers and placating the New Democratic Party in the hope that inflation will eventually cure itself.

If we are setting out on a course of economic isolation, the strategy should be debated as such and its implications should be carefully considered. It should not be casually adopted in the course of a short-term and piecemeal fight against some of the symptoms of inflation.

It should be clearly realized that the benefits to Canadian consumers in the form of lower prices than world prices are at the expense, not of foreigners, but of other Canadians who are the producers of the commodities in question.

The government does not give the impression that it knows what it is doing. This would be bad enough even if the policies were only short-term expedients. It is much worse if a new long-term strategy is being slapped together without counting the cost or making a sensible estimate of the chances of success.

I do not want to leave the impression my whole speech is made up of quotations, but I feel yet another comment of a famous columnist in the Ottawa Citizen of September 12 sums up a practical solution to this dilemma. I quote:

To my mind, the best speech in the inflation debate was made by the Conservative member for Don Valley, James Gillies, the man who would be finance minister should Stanfield form a cabinet.

Gillies is one of the most competent men to come to parliament in recent times, and there seems no reason to doubt he would be a competent minister of finance.

The writer finishes by saying, and I quote:

Mr. Gillies did not need to point out that the government may recognize the need for such a policy before long—it has had just such a contingency plan ready for almost a year, and if inflation continues to mount it may well be brought into effect.

[Mr. La Salle.]

If it is, it will not matter that the other parties said the Conservatives were crazy—the Liberals will put it forward as though it were the most sensible plan in the world, and doubtless they will have the support of the New Democrats and Social Crediters in the process.

If only the Conservatives were being robbed, it might not be so bad. Trouble is, I get the feeling we're all being robbed.

Nothing could exemplify the trend of this debate tonight better than what I have just cited. What puzzles me is that every time members of the party to my left speak, they go to great lengths in trying to criticize us. If we do not have any plans that are worth anything, why do they spend so much time criticizing us? It is obvious that they and the government know full well who is the threat and who will be forming the next government.

I want to dwell for a few minutes on some points members of the other opposition parties may not know and government members will not want to hear. As members know, the committee on trends in food prices met many days and heard many witnesses. I wish to commend the chairman of that committee, the hon. member for Sarnia-Lambton (Mr. Cullen), on the fair way in which he chaired that committee. After meeting for many weeks and listening to witness after witness, the committee did not seem to be making much progress. Pressure was on the government to do something. The government set up the infamous prices review board chaired by Mrs. Plumptre. History will refer to this committee as the Plumptre committee. Judging from the performance of that board, it will probably go down in history as having been grafted with lemon branches.

Instead of looking at the positive side, the committee on food prices looks at the negative side. A good example of that was the presentation which the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Reid) spent a great deal of time in making. I am sorry he is not in the House. I would like to compliment him on a very good speech. New members have not heard him speak up to this point. His speaking reminds me of the adage that when the cat is away, the mouse will play. The trends in food prices committee cost the taxpayers the minimum. It was composed of members of parliament who found time in their busy schedule to attend the committee meetings. There was virtually no extra cost to the country.

The food prices review board was established at a considerable cost, not to mention the army of price tag analysts going around the country at a cost of $6,000 to $10,000 a day. In her frustration, the chairman of that board said "write your MP". In committee last week, I stated she had said "pester the MP's". I will check the newspaper clipping to clarify that, at least for my part. I will give her the benefit of the doubt since she claims she did not say "pester", but "write" your MP. This is an example of how irresponsible she can be. It remains to be seen whether she consulted the rest of the members of the board. Mrs. Plumptre and the other board members receive almost $1,000 a day to sit, even though up to that point there had only been three meetings. They are the ones who were appointed by the government to try to solve the problem.

My comments were interpreted in a newspaper article which states "MP says he is pestered over food costs". It further states that I do not appreciate being called by my constituents and makes other nonsensical statements.

With all due respect to the press, they misinterpreted what I said. Possibly I misinterpreted what Mrs. Plumptre said.

In our committee meeting, there were a lot of critical comments. Naturally, these came from opposition members. I think they were invited because this board, under the chairmanship of Mrs. Plumptre, has aggravated and antagonized. This board is satisfied that marketing boards are not in the best interest of the country. I admit that marketing boards are not adaptable to every product, but they serve well the needs of the producers they presently serve. The opinion of the Prices Board was probably derived from the fact the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Gray) saw fit to give the Canadian Consumer Association an additional $100,000 to fight the marketing boards. There seems to have been some prejudice again shown here against marketing boards. It was suggested that marketing boards were the culprits in forcing food prices up. I would refer now to the example of eggs. Some two years ago the egg market in Canada was in a poor position and producers right across the country were facing bankruptcy. The marketing boards had been established in the provinces and had the national marketing board not been established we would have seen large companies picking up farm mortgages. The effect this would likely have had upon consumers would have led to even higher prices than they are paying today.

I think the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) must bear some responsibility in this connection, and I would point out that there is still one province which hasn't signed up and agreed to co-operate with the other provinces in Canada. I think the National Egg Marketing Board, if it is to have a fair chance of success, needs the help of the Minister of Agriculture to ensure that the one province to which I made reference co-operates in the program.

The Minister of Agriculture also has a responsibility to see that since feed costs are on their way down in all areas, to make sure that the boards do not exploit the consumers in a way which may have caused concern before. It is his responsibility to monitor the situation in Canada. At the present time feed costs in the production of eggs has dropped in the neighbourhood of between 5 cents and 8 cents a dozen. I think the minister has a responsibility to keep on top of the situation and see that the provincial boards toe the mark and do nothing to lose the credibility which they have built up to the present time.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that farmers have for too long been in the position where they have been the first to go down and the last to come up. They only want a fair market, as they will be the first to admit, and are only too willing to do their part to produce. They need to have confidence in the future and are more than willing to invest their money in advance if they can see fair market opportunities in the future.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I would like to make brief reference to a newspaper report of the results of a questionnaire sent out by the hon. member for Stormont-Dundas (Mr. Lamoureux). This matter was referred to in an earlier speech by one of my hon. friends, but I think it is a point which is worth repetition. The summary of the questionnaire results referred to in the press are as follows:

Do you favour wage controls? yes, 2,830; no, 1,195; undecided, 473.
Would you accept the imposition of some form of wage-price controls to combat inflation? Yes, 3,934; no, 496; undecided 319.

These questions were answered by some 5,425 people. I think that results such as these tell their own story, that the people of Canada in general are not satisfied with what they are getting right now. They don't want the type of hit and miss programs they are receiving.

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, like many hon. members on both sides of the House, I think we are engaging this morning in a debate of some importance, not only to members of this chamber but to the general public. I doubt whether anyone needs to be reminded of the purpose of this debate but it is useful to recall at the outset the initial statement of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) in asking for this debate. He approached the subject by stating a debate was necessary because of the "uncontrolled inflationary pressures exemplified by the report earlier today of Statistics Canada". That is what the debate is all about, the fact that the country is governed by an administration which in effect has taken the view there is nothing it can do to deal with the rapid rise in the cost of living.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) when he spoke earlier today, said the government already knew what was taking place. My answer to him is that if such was the case the government was guilty of one or other of two things: it was either callous for failing to come forward with a substantial program to deal with the rising cost of living or it was stupid in believing that the measures it has taken to date could be of any real help in dealing with the serious inflationary situation which faces the country.

Quite frankly, I have been not only mystified but amazed by the degree of detachment and lack of sensitivity the government has shown in the face of this threat hanging over the Canadian people. Indeed, I was more than mystified and amazed. I was shocked by the statement of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). In attempting to deal with this issue little more than a week ago, he suggested, in effect, that what could be done amounted merely to efforts to alleviate the effects of inflation without dealing with the underlying causes of inflation itself. Any government which reaches the point of believing it has lost control of the economy, as this government now admits, should, if it has any honesty and integrity left at all, consider the only sensible path open to them, and that is, depart the scene so that a government and a party could attempt to do those things which could set the economy back on a safer road. There can be no confidence in a government which says, on one hand, that we ought to limit production while, on the other hand, without embarrassment, the Minister of Finance is telling us, as he did this afternoon, that the overriding cause of inflation is a shortage of supply.

Many of my hon. friends have pointed out that we have experienced the injurious effects of the Lift program. The initial letters stand, I believe, for "Lower Inventories for Tomorrow". I certainly have not heard any member of the government proclaiming the virtues of that particular program in recent days. Perhaps the government now intends to introduce a new form of Lift, whose initials will spell "Lower Incomes for Tomorrow". In any event, the government has admitted it is not able or prepared to deal with the underlying causes of inflation. This was obvious from the lengthy announcement made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) a week ago. He was not even willing to talk about the root causes of inflation. I think his speech will be regarded as one of the more incredible documents in Canadian history. To think that a prime minister of Canada would make a lengthy speech addressed to the issue of inflation which did not contain one word dealing with either monetary or fiscal policy! For students of political science, it will be a classical document in the context of the Prime Minister's detachment from these over-riding considerations.

An hon. Member: Did you read it?

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): I read it not only once but many times, and the more I read it the more amazed I was. I could scarcely believe that a document of that kind could represent the attitude of a responsible government in the face of the economic disruption which inflation is now causing. Any government member who has read it must be more than a little embarrassed. It is quite obviously not an adequate response. It amounts to the application of band-aids when the circumstances call for comprehensive remedies. While it is very easy for members opposite to criticize the kind of program that this party has put forward, we have attempted to treat the problem with the seriousness it deserves. What we are suggesting is that it is high time, in fact past time, the government approached the problem with some kind of seriousness.

● (0110)

I want to mention a couple of matters which may not have been touched on in the course of this lengthy debate. For instance, I want to talk about the extent to which our increasing cost of living is having an effect on young Canadians. I do not think we have had the opportunity—though I hope there are a sufficient number of independent social scientists who are doing this—to examine the kind of blighted and distorted lives being lived today by young people under the age of 25 because they have been both direct and indirect victims of inflation and unemployment.

This debate primarily centres upon the increased cost of living and the increase in the bank rate, but both of these are additional factors in what I think has been a very difficult time for the young people in this country from coast to coast. For the past, I do not know how many number of months but stretching back at least three years, almost half the number of those who have been unemployed month by month—almost one-quarter of a million this past month—have been 24 years of age or under.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and his government have been quite satisfied to deal with this problem purely on the basis of whether or not a certain make-work program, whether Opportunities for Youth or some form of government intervention in the summer, or the Local Initiatives Program in the winter, is sufficient to reduce to some degree the amount of social turmoil existing among young people in Canada.

No amount of window-dressing or breast-beating on the part of government representatives can avoid the fact that there are, and have been for more than 30 months, hundreds and thousands of young people in this country who have been very badly dealt with. One has only to move about the larger urban centres to see in and out of manpower offices and other employment agencies the number of disappointed, depressed and disillusioned young people who have found that, in spite of training and preparation to be productive in society, they have not been given a useful role because this government has not been willing to take seriously its responsibilities of economic management.

We in this chamber are attempting in this debate to tell these young people that there is a better way, that there is an effective alternative to the kind of mismanagement and blundering that they have been witnessing in the past few years. A government that attacks merely the effects of inflation is no longer good enough. What we must have, and I feel must have very shortly, is a government that is prepared to examine the real causes of inflation in this country and, even extending beyond that, in the international community.

I do not think any of us would for one moment say that shortage of supply is not part of the problem of inflation today. It is obvious that in certain goods and commodities there is a shortage of supply, some of these shortages being directly created by earlier government policy. We could also go on to say that a good deal of our problem is compounded by successive devaluations of the U.S. dollar in the international money markets, and the ride-down in which our dollar has participated along with the U.S. currency. We could also say that there is abroad, because of the continuing situation, an inflationary psychology very difficult to deal with, very complex and pervasive.

We could even talk about the alarming rise in consumer demand not only in this country but in a number of increasingly developing countries. Some of this has been triggered by the increasing ability to consume as a result of greater productivity in a number of countries. I can think of two countries that not many years ago were not even mentioned when it came to highly developed economies—Japan and Germany. We could also talk of the way we have inflated demand through the excessive promotion of goods and services by the mass media.

All speakers today could have spent hours and hours listing the causes of inflationary pressure. What we do not need is someone like the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) or the Prime Minister to lecture us on what the causes are. What we need is a government willing to take its responsibilities seriously, to believe that while it may not have the whole answer to the problem it is willing to tackle the problem directly and to do more than simply make additional payments through welfare or old age programs, no matter now beneficial each may be in turn.

The government should have a monetary and fiscal policy and be prepared to deal in some kind of over-all and comprehensive way with an incomes policy. It should be prepared to co-ordinate its own expenditure and revenue programs with those of other levels of government and with major industries, both goods-producing and service industries, within this country.

What we have had, instead, is a government which has operated as some kind of remote island, knowing its programs and policies only unto itself. We have a government that talks of mysterious contingency plans that somehow never seem to exist except in the minds of an occasional minister who dares to talk about them. When conferences are held between federal and provincial governments, the federal government seems either afraid to discuss or is incapable of discussing realistically some of the basic problems of inflation today.

This is not giving leadership. One might even say it is not even the effect of following a good idea. It seems to me we are faced with a government that is committed to only one principle, one purpose, one path, and that is survival. Not survival, I might say, for the benefit of the Canadian people but primarily survival for itself. That surely must be to a great extent an indication of the poverty of political action and philosophy of this government.

It is ironic that we are having this debate on the eve of the national policy conference of the Liberal party. I do not see how there can be any sensible discussion of policy when the government refuses to deal with any policy matters in a way that makes them at least seem to be concerned about, interested in and able to deal with satisfactorily the cost of living today. How can there be consultation with its own members on matters of policy when this government fails to consult with any responsible sector of the economy, whether it be in the area of management, labour or governmental activity? How can they discuss policy when they continue with a group of advisers who have given the government one set of disastrous ideas after another?

How can they talk about policy when they are still committed to pursuing the same policies introduced earlier this year so disastrously in the budget of February, and the government still indicate no willingness or desire to move to a new budgetary recognition of the problems we are now facing? The time has now come for action, and this is the reason for this prolonged debate. If this prolonged debate, no matter how much longer it lasts, produces nothing else than having the government finally take this problem seriously, then we will have achieved a great deal for the Canadian people.

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to speak in this emergency debate on the cost of living, although I do not relish speaking at 1.20 in the morning.

The situation in the country as far as the cost of living is concerned has reached a crisis stage. We now have the highest recorded rise in the consumer price index since the Korean war. Food prices have gone up 14.7 per cent in the last 12 months, the mortgage rate is up to 10 per cent, and the price of the average house has gone up 14 per cent in the last six months. If this upward trend continues in the consumer price index, by the end of the year a Canadian family will have lost about $400 in purchasing power, which will only be partially offset by recent government measures.

Cost of Living

The situation in my constituency of Sault Ste. Marie is not very bright. Last month Sault Ste. Marie was the second most expensive city in Canada in which to buy food. A basket of food that cost $16.14 in St. John's, Newfoundland, cost $15.69 in Sault Ste. Marie and $13.57 in Toronto. Basic foods in northern Ontario traditionally cost more than in the southern part of the province, and as the cost of living increases we in the north suffer more. Milk in my constituency is now selling at 49 cents a quart.

When we look at price patterns over the past few months we see alarming examples of increases in the cost of basic foods, foods that children and adults need for an essential and proper diet. For example, last May a dozen eggs cost 77 cents, by August the price had risen to 83 cents and this month eggs are selling for 97 cents a dozen in my constituency. The price of bread has risen from 35 cents a loaf in May to 38 cents a loaf, although the cost was down a bit in August to 32 cents a loaf. The cost of a pound of hamburger rose from 92 cents to $1.15 and is now down to $1.12. A three-pound rump roast in May cost $4.74, in August $5.34 and in September $5.26. The same applies to bacon, the cost of which has gone up from $1.17 to $1.68. We have indeed reached a crisis situation. Not only has the cost of basic foods gone up but the cost of fuel has gone up five cents a gallon in Sault Ste. Marie in the past two years. Housing costs are also up and it is now predicted that the cost of a house will increase by $2,000 to $3,000 in the next two years in my constituency.

Why are prices increasing? First of all, we know there is a basic increase in world demand, especially for food. This increase in demand has forced up the price in Canada. We are also told by so-called experts that poor weather has affected certain crops, especially the soybean crop in the United States upon which our farmers depend for cattle feed. This in turn has forced up the price of meat.

We also know that the cost of production has risen, as has the cost of labour, processing, handling and advertising. I suspect there is another reason for the dramatic increase in prices, and that is profiteering. When we look at some of the profits of major food processing, manufacturing and retail companies we begin to see some alarming statistics. The Weston food company in a six-month period ending August 3 showed increased profits of 63 per cent, with sales up only 17 per cent. Silverwood Industries in the second quarter had the amazing increase in profits of 107 per cent, while sales were up only 10 per cent over the same period. That great giant, Dominion Stores, had an increase in profits of 93 per cent, with an increase in sales of only 13 per cent.

It is not only the food companies that are taking advantage of the inflationary psychology. Oil companies as well are taking advantage of rising prices of international oil and oil from the mid-East. As a result, Canadians are suffering from an increase in the cost of oil and gasoline. We see companies like Gulf Oil showing an increase in revenue in the second quarter of this year of 16 per cent, with profits up 67 per cent.

The cost of land has increased astronomically, resulting in an increase in the cost of housing. A Toronto developer bought a house for $22,000 and sold it less than two months later for $28,000. Banks now involved in lending mortgage money have shown tremendous increases in profits. The profits of the Toronto-Dominion Bank are up 50 per cent before taxes. The Canadian consumer has the right to know whether these increases in profits are legitimate or whether profiteering is taking place. I personally believe it is the latter. But the consumer has the right to know and the right to be protected.

What is the solution to this problem of the increased cost of living in Canada? The one solution I am convinced will not work is the Conservative party's solution of a wage and price freeze. One example has been recited again and again this evening and I suggest it has to be repeated because it has not sunk into those thick Tory skulls; that is the example of the complete failure of the wage and price freeze policy of the United States. Even President Nixon has admitted that his policies have failed. The consumer knows this because the price of beef in the United States has gone up, and because there have been intensified shortages there has been a stimulated demand by consumers who want to purchase items while prices are frozen.

How could a Canadian price freeze control the price of imported foods? How are we going to control the cost of imported citrus fruits, vegetables, coffee, sugar and oil? We now have to import 50 per cent of our oil because this government has not seen fit to authorize the construction of a pipeline to Montreal. I should like members of the Conservative party to tell me what guarantee we would have that once the temporary price freeze was lifted, prices would not skyrocket as they have in the United States. Moreover, a wage and price freeze is completely unfair. A price freeze encourages many people to increase prices in anticipation of such a freeze and it penalizes those who have their low wages frozen or locked in.

Members of the Conservative party suggest that this is only to be a temporary 90-day freeze to give them time to develop a control program. I ask those hon. members why that policy was not developed during the summer months. While Conservative members were vacationing, the NDP called a special caucus to consider its policy.

• (0130)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. La Salle): Order.

An hon. Member: Order. Sit down when the Speaker rises.

Mr. Symes: I would like to say this: if they have a policy, they should bring it forward for public scrutiny. I wonder why they say they need another 90 days to formulate it. I suspect that the Conservative policy would not work and that they know it would not work. However, the Liberal government is not much better. It has drifted along. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) while on vacation in Kenora said there was a problem in respect of prices, but that it was not of sufficient severity to warrant recalling parliament.

An hon. Member: Don't apologize for him.

Mr. Symes: Unfortunately, we had to come back to settle the rail strike.

An hon. Member: Unfortunately?

[Mr. Symes.]

Mr. Symes: The men went back to work on a very poor basis: they received an unfair settlement. Parliament continued to meet, and therefore we are now discussing the consumer price index. Parliament would not have been sitting were it not for the fact that there was an emergency situation in respect of the rail strike, and the government would not have acted unless pressure had been put on it. When our party met for a special food price caucus we made four recommendations to the government which partially have been implemented. We wanted a prices review board that would not be limited to examining merely food prices but would have the authority to examine all prices. We will continue to urge the government to move in that direction. We want the Food Prices Review Board to have power to roll back prices. I noticed the Conservative party opposed this in the committee on food prices. Members of that party refused to give the board that power. I cannot understand how members of the Conservative Party can profess to be on the side of the consumer and yet could vote against such a progressive piece of legislation.

We wanted pensions increased to at least help those on fixed incomes. We wanted a cost of living escalation that would be reviewed every three months instead of once a year. This was granted. We said also, as an interim measure, that family allowances should be increased to $12 in order to help Canadians. This was granted. We asked the government to give subsidies in respect of basic foods such as bread and milk so that the consumers could at least meet the predicted rise in these areas. We also asked for mortgage interest rates to come down to 6 per cent. It is typical of the government that it has not moved against the great financial institutions of this country although it has the power to do so.

There is also need for an excess profits tax to be levied against companies which, as I described earlier, have been taking advantage of the citizens of Canada. This summer, the New Democratic Party held a national convention in Vancouver and produced an 11-point program to help fight inflation. I have described some of these points. There are other points in respect of this program which, if implemented, would go a long way to reducing the cost of living in this country. We want to see an increase in food production, and this can only take place in our country if we guarantee the farmer a fair price for his efforts. We want to see a two-price system in respect of oil and gasoline so that Canadians will not continue to be ripped off by the oil companies of this country. We want to see a food support program so there will be adequate food on the tables of the poor people of this country.

Our party has a sound and reasonable program to help meet the cost of living in this country. We have urged the Liberal government to move in this direction. We will continue to fight in this House and throughout the country so that the consumers may have fair prices.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. La Salle): Would hon. members kindly resume their seats. I would like first to thank them for cheering me warmly when I was called to the Chair. Now, I recognize the hon. member for Elgin.

[English]

Mr. John Wise (Elgin): Mr. Speaker, as I rise in my place to participate in this emergency debate this morning I wish to commend all the members of this House who have had the interest and enthusiasm and the concern to remain in their places, if not to participate at least to listen. I cannot help being reminded of a situation which I am sure hon. members have experienced from time to time. I refer to the situation where a person has a car, a truck, a tractor or some other commodity which turns out to be a lemon. In such a case he disposes of it at the earliest possible opportunity. Now an increasingly greater number of Canadians are discovering that the government is the lemon I mentioned previously and that it is high time it be discarded.

The consumer price index figures released this morning and the unemployment figures released on Tuesday, combined with the ever-increasing inflation we are experiencing, indicate that not only is the economy of this country being mismanaged but it is being mismanaged by a group of incompetent politicians. The feelings of the people of Canada would indeed be truly felt if a general election were called today, tomorrow or perhaps a week hence. We all know that the "Liberal-Democrat" party is afraid to face the electorate at this time. They know that the smaller portion of the coalition will disappear and that the larger part will be virtually thrown out of office.

No longer can we be content to accept the government's wait-and-see philosophy. No longer can Canadians be expected to be hypnotized with meaningless assurances by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner). We need action rather than part-time remedies or temporary measures. It is not the effect that needs to be cured—which is what the government in its blindness is attempting—but it is the cause. The cost of living figures released by Statistics Canada this morning show what Canadians have known for months: inflation is getting out of hand and we are being thrown back into the dark days of the twenties and the thirties.

God help us, especially since this situation could have been prevented. We have experienced the biggest monthly increase in the cost of living for 22 years, yet the government indicates that because this is a world wide pehnomenon there is not too much they can do. It is as bad as the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) saying; "As the world turns, so does the universe unfold". It all means one thing—that the government is powerless to do anything and is quite prepared to sit and try to weather out the storm, holding hands with its partner in coalition. The patchwork of temporary relief measures introduced by the government will have virtually no effect on the increase in the cost of living.

I have been most disappointed up to this point. There has been no move to introduce legislation to help a group of people within our society who are being affected adversely by the spiralling rate of inflation and cost of living, that is citizens between 60 and 65 years of age. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) said on September 10 that he thought it strange that the Progressive Conservative party should support the government's so-called inflationary measures that were introduced last week and then be opposed to the way in which the government is approaching the whole situation. We will be the last to deny aid to those who need it, and since the government has given no leadership in the fight against inflation, the Canadian people need the help and support of the PC party more than ever.

If the government of this country thinks that a cure for inflation, for rising costs, and for unemployment can be found in temporary, patchwork policy, then we are in for a lot of trouble and hard and difficult times. No doubt it will take a Conservative government to put the country on its feet again. As my colleague, the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) said in the House yesterday, the increases that have been granted to the needy by the House do not even restore the buying power of family allowances to what they were in the years of the last Conservative government.

It worries me, as it worries hundreds of thousands of Canadians, when the government takes the attitude that nothing can be done about the serious economic difficulties facing us today. This assinine attitude adopted by the government toward the economy is being reflected in other areas of responsibility. The reason this country moved so rapidly into the challenges of the 1960's and 1970's was the strong sense of responsibility shown by the Conservatives in the late 1950's and early 1960's. What we need is more of the same type of leadership. What this country does not need is the arrogance and the could-not-care-less attitude of the government today.

Gradually the government has been coming around to our way of thinking. Bit by bit they have been taking parts of our economic platform and incorporating them in their own. We in this party are glad to be of service, not only to the people across this country but also to members of the party on the other side of the House. But what is not wanted is the jeering and abuse that has met our suggestions of price and wage controls. The total ignorance of many hon. members on the other side always comes to light when they start using such irresponsible arguments as comparing Canada with the United States and Great Britain. The hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies) gave an excellent speech on this subject last Monday. It was probably one of the most logical and rational speeches given in the House on the matter before us.

The economic proposals of the Trudeau administration back in 1968 and 1969 have failed. This is obvious from the high rate of inflation that we have today. It was thought then that to fight inflation one should slow down the economy. The result of course was massive unemployment the like of which this country has seldom seen before. Then, as a result of the attempt to fight rising unemployment, inflation bounded back. Rather than wait and try to ride out the storm, there are constructive steps which this government could be taking to deal with inflation. Time and time again these steps have been pointed out, but time and time again the government laughed and said no. Then, last week, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) announced certain selective controls, some of which I am sure will be financed from the pockets of the producers in this country.

It is not about time the government realized that something is wrong with the way in which they have been managing the economy of this country, not only during the present crisis but since 1965 and 1968? Is it not about time the government realized that we can use monetary and fiscal policies, supplemented by an incomes policy, to bring about the type of economic conditions that would be beneficial to all Canadians?

There is no way that the people of Canada would be prepared to sit back and accept the Liberal party's excuse that nothing can be done about inflation. To take this attitude is wrong by any standard. It has been clearly demonstrated that the Liberal party lacks the ability to lead Canadians in the fight against inflation, and that the Liberal party lacks the ability to lead Canadians in the fight against the high cost of living.

Mr. Baker: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I hope you will not take the 15 minutes of applause which greeted the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) from the time allotted to him.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. La Salle): Order. The hon. member for Annapolis Valley (Mr. Nowlan) on a point of order.

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

I forgot to mention in my point of order that I wish to compliment you on the decorum you have maintained since you assumed that high position.

Mr. Poulin: Mr. Speaker, I wish to rise on a point of order.

Mr. Baker: Mr. Speaker, that is probably the best speech that the hon. member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. Poulin) has ever made.

Mr. Knight: Mr. Speaker, on the same point of order, may I point out to the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton that it is probably the only speech which the hon. member has made.

Mr. Baker: I should like, first, to rise to the defence of the hon. member for Ottawa Centre with respect to the comment that it was his only speech. I think he made two others. However, considering the remarks which he made at the opening of the speech—

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. La Salle): The hon. member for Ottawa-Centre on a point of order.

[English]

Mr. Poulin: Mr. Speaker, I rise on the same point of order. Although the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton has learned much, obviously he does not know everything. I have made more than two or three speeches or the number he has mentioned. However, the point of order on which I rose this evening was in reference to the colour of the tie of the hon. member for Annapolis Valley (Mr. Nowlan), which is red. His speech made it obvious that he really supports our policy. The fact is that there is not one member on the other side who during this whole day's debate, has been able to offer—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Baker: Mr. Speaker, I do not want to make any comments on the interjection that has just been made beyond saying that I ask the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin) to be careful from now on into whose bed he crawls. This afternoon we heard a speech by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) following ten days or so upon a speech made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) which was alleged to outline a program to fight inflation. I think it has been generally held by economists, regardless of their political stripe, that the speech of the Prime Minister on September 4 was barely above the quality of the speech given a few moments ago by the hon. member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. Poulin), and was certainly no answer to the critical question of the rising cost of living and the inflation crisis in this country which caused the Speaker of this House—

● (0150)

Mr. Poulin: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) has referred to a speech I made. I did not make any speech. If there is any question of debate, be it here or any other place, there has never been any problem between myself and the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton: I have always won out and will continue to do so.

Mr. Baker: Mr. Speaker, I see that the voice of sweet reason is now sitting beside the hon. member for Ottawa Centre. As I was saying, this crisis of inflation is so bad that the Speaker of this House deemed it advisable, considering all the circumstances, to permit an emergency debate dealing with the cost of living.

The point some of us tend to forget was mentioned by the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald) in his eloquent remarks a few moments ago when he spoke about the people who are behind the statistics released yesterday morning at eight o'clock. He was referring to the people who are really suffering as a result of the ineffectiveness, the ineptitude and the political expediency of the government. The hon. member for Egmont spoke eloquently of young people who are bearing the burden of this situation because they do not have opportunities for work.

Mr. Poulin: Give us your views, Walter.

Mr. Baker: Judging by the interjections from the other side, members on this side are more conscious of the unprotected people in this country, those who do not have economic bargaining power, the disadvantaged and the infirm. They are the people who are behind these statistics. They are the mothers and the fathers who are trying to raise children at a time when their dollar is diminishing in purchasing value.

Look at the percentage change over the previous 12 months in the price of food—a 15.8 per cent increase. Housing shows a 5.4 per cent increase, clothing a 5.4 per cent increase, transportation 3.3 per cent, health and personal care 5.5 per cent, rent and recreation 4.6 per cent, tobacco and alcohol—in which some members of the House overindulge—2.7 per cent. If there was ever a testament of ineptitude, it is present in these figures.

I say to you this morning, Mr. Speaker, in the late hours of this debate, that this is not just a testament of failure. It is the last will and testament of the government. On September 4 the people of Canada waited, expecting something better than this testament of ineptitude that came from the Prime Minister. They waited for the government to introduce a comprehensive and direct program to fight inflation. But what did they get? They got a palliative.

They asked the government to implement the contingency plan it had talked about so long, a plan for direct economic controls. But what did they get? Nothing. Yesterday we asked whether a new budget would be introduced to meet these economic problems which have been brought on by the ineptitude of the government, by the fear of the government which has had one eye on the NDP and the other eye on God knows where.

Mr. Poulin: What would you do, Walter?

Mr. Baker: We have asked the government to forecast how rising interest rates will be reflected in the mortgage rate. We have asked what the government is going to guarantee that mortgage money will not go higher. And the government talks about some mystical undertaking with the chartered banks. What it forgets to point out is that the chartered banks are not greatly involved in lending in this country, and that the government, because of its ineptitude, has no control over private lenders and other lenders.

There has been no answer on why prices have been forced up by the government. We have had poultry and meat price increases almost beyond measure. What is the cost of buying a home as a result of government ineptitude? What is the level of rents paid by people in the constituency of the hon. member for Ottawa-Carleton?

Mr. Poulin: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I am not from Ottawa-Carleton.

Mr. Baker: They are sober and upright people in Ottawa-Carleton, but a little foolish politically. What about the increased costs of fuel and transportation borne by the people who are behind the statistics? They are the people who matter, but they are the people the government has forgotten.

Earlier in this debate I heard the hon. member for Verdun (Mr. Mackasey) admit he was a city member and knew nothing at all about agriculture, but he spoke about farmers at last getting a decent income. What he forgot, in terms of gross income, was the more expensive input costs of production the likes of which farmers never say before.

Mr. Poulin: And what would you do, Walter?

Mr. Baker: As a result of this, farmers are faced with startling increases in costs. If the hon. member for Ottawa Centre is capable of reading a newspaper, I ask him to look at the weekly newspapers and note the auction sales. Thousands of farms are going out of production because of the restrictive policies of the government.

The fact is that the government failed farmers. It has failed Canadians. It has failed to contain the high input costs of farming. Where the people of this country asked for action, they got indecisiveness. Where they asked for competence, they got incompetence. Where they asked for openness, they got deceit. And where they asked for honesty, they got the hon. member for Ottawa Centre.

Mr. Poulin: What would you do, Walter?

• (0200)

Mr. Baker: If the hon. member for Ottawa Centre is in possession of his senses—which I doubt very much—I would ask him to read the speech made by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) on September 4, 1973. I do not know what his condition is, but it is not normal.

An hon. Member: Oh, yes, it is normal.

Mr. Baker: Then I think perhaps he ought to enter this debate tonight, instead of skulking in the back benches of the chamber where he is wont to be.

Mr. Speaker, there is a challenge to be made by all Canadians. I challenge that hon. member to stand tonight and to make a speech. I challenge him to defend the cost of living. I challenge him to defend the increased cost of rents. I challenge him to defend the rising cost of hydro. I challenge him to defend the cost of fuel. I challenge him to stand on his feet and do the job he was elected to do, rather than sit and shout insults from the back of the chamber. If he can stand, I say he dare not stand. If he defends this government in its ineptitude, then he himself is inept.

Some time ago in this House we debated increases for pensioners of the public service, increases in youth allowances and increases in old age pensions. They were heralded by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) as the great cure-all. We voted for those things as a temporary relief, Mr. Speaker. But let the hon. member for Ottawa Centre, all the other callous members on the treasury benches and the claque behind them, understand that they are not relief and, except in the temporary sense, they are not solutions to the problems which face this country.

The solution to the problem lies in the program announced by the Leader of the Opposition, a program he has put before this country since February, 1973. It is a program which this government for its own reasons, good or bad, has sought to ignore, thus leading us to the present situation of crisis.

I challenge that hon. member to get up and defend the economic tomfoolery that we have seen. I challenge him to dispute the eloquent testimony, the righteous and proper economic thought that was brought forth by the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies). I should like to hear the hon. member speak on the question of economics. All he has done tonight is shout, and I should like to see him get up and defend the speech made today by the Minister of Finance; that is, if he was present to hear it.

Cost of Living

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. La Salle): Order. I am sorry to have to interrupt the hon. member but the time allotted him has expired.

The hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Knight).

[English]

Mr. Poulin: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I would be most happy at any time to debate with the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) as I have in the past. I have asked him time after time, "What would you do," and never at any time has he been able to offer a solution or indicate that he has any idea—

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. La Salle): Order. I would ask the hon. member to resume his seat and, once again, I shall give him the floor in due course if he wishes to take part in the debate. For the time being, I call upon the hon. member for Assiniboia.

[English]

Mr. Bill Knight (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I begin by saying that there are many hazards to many professions: miners fear cave-ins, farmers fear drought—but politicians are the only group of people who can sit up all night debating a set of figures. The figures came out on the basis of a month ago. While we sat in the House tonight, supposedly debating that important issue, in a television program it was announced that in the area of food costs there was a drop in every major city, save one, in Canada in the price of beef and there was also a drop in the cost of other foods. But, Mr. Speaker, no member has taken the opportunity to point that out.

In this debate I listened to the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies) for whom I have a great deal of respect. I hoped to hear him offer some kind of program related to inflation and the cost of living. When it was proposed in February that there should be a 90-day freeze, I listened to a program that I thought might have some merit and I reviewed it, as I am sure all hon. members did. Now I hear it being presented again.

Mr. Speaker, I ask, what would have been the result of a 90-day freeze imposed in February on the people in my riding? The hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner) gets up in this House and talks about grain and cattle and is critical of an export control that affected 2 per cent of the beef production. Such a freeze would have meant that producers in my area would have been frozen at last spring's prices, when they should have been much higher. It would have meant that the producer of Assiniboia would have had his wheat prices frozen far lower than they are today. It would have meant that the price of oats would have been far less than the price today on the market. It would have meant that the working man who negotiated a contract with the co-op this summer would have had his wages frozen at a lower level than he deserved. This is the kind of situation that would have faced the people of Assiniboia.

I ask those Conservatives from western Canada who are enunciating that position what justice there would have been to these farmers who two years ago were receiving prices below the cost of production. What justice would there have been for them, in view of the way the Conservative campaigned last fall, promising to get a good deal for the farmers? Some Conservative candidates spoke of guaranteed prices and some spoke of getting a good return and net income; but now, when the producers of western Canada have finally got something from the market, they speak of across the board freezes for 90 days. What would have happened to the mixed farmers of Assiniboia if the price of beef had been frozen in February? The hon. member for Crowfoot says, "Look at what export control did to the free market? Look at what it did to prices." We know what it did to prices.

What would have happened to the producers in my area who were moving cattle this year, maybe 50 or 75 in a herd, if they had faced a 90-day freeze? There would have been the same kind of absolute disaster as that which hit the American beef market. I plead with the Conservative members, for whom I have respect, to oppose that kind of measure.

An hon. Member: Where are all the Grits?

Mr. Knight: I don't know where the Grits are, and I don't worry about the Grits. Mr. Speaker, this debate was initiated by the Conservative party. Out of roughly 107 Tories, there are nine in the House. Where are they? One is hiding behind the curtain. This emergency debate of theirs has been blown up like a balloon. They huffed and puffed all day, and now they are gone. It is their debate, but only nine of them are left.

An hon. Member: But there is quality.

Mr. Knight: There is some quality. On Monday some people said that parliament ought to come to an end. The hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies) said, let the people decide. There is no question but that in our parliamentary democracy, and thank God we are not like Chile and still have one, the people will eventually make the choice. When that choice is made, we will accept it. However, there is no excuse for a member of parliament saying on a Monday, bring this parliament to an end. We cannot disregard our responsibilities as members of parliament and throw this country into a general election. Absolutely nothing would be done about the cost of living for 60 days prior to the election and three months after that.

Let us say that by some quirk, there was a Tory government. They said they would institute a 90-day freeze. There would be a rise in prices by the large corporations the likes of which we have never seen. I admire a party that talks about moving into the market place. Welcome aboard! However, let us not get into the singsong and say we will determine a course in 90 days. It will not work. If you move into the market place, you move in for good. If you move into the market place with the large corporations, you had better be prepared to do it on a long-term basis.

Should a socialist government have the opportunity to govern, we will move into the market place. The Tories will then stand up in this House and cry foul. They will say we are destroying free enterprise. We would establish national marketing and a two-price system for oil and gas.

The Tories will say those creeping socialists are again moving into the market place. The Tories are playing a dangerous game. If we move into the market place, it will be in a positive direction. We would establish a powerful prices review board.

I wish to deal with the wheat market. I receive $1.76 a bushel for my wheat and my cost of production is $2.58. In spite of this, the Tories want to freeze the price for 90 days, with no recourse to those who are hurt. I want to express some personal opinions on what I think should be considered. Canada has traditionally been one of the main exporting countries of the world. We have a very sparse population. We do not have a volume of internal or domestic consumption related to the total of what we produce as do the United States and other major countries. We have 22 million people scattered from coast to coast.

In terms of what is exported, we should decide what commodities affect the cost of living and can be controlled. I am not talking about 90 days. I am talking about a long-term basis. When a farmer in Assiniboia complains about the price of lumber, I agree it is too high. If we want to start a program in this country, we will need government control over the market place. That is not the Tory policy. That is the policy of the social democratic party. If the Tories want to move in that direction, welcome aboard.

There are certain commodities for which we can have a two-price system. I have listened to hon. members, including some from my party, talk about the inequities of this system enunciated by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang). Following the election, I rose in this House last January to tell this government that the wheat farmer in western Canada was getting an awful rooking because the two-price system was geared in such a way that every producer was losing at least 55 cents a bushel on the basis of the international price. I considered that to be an important issue.

When I returned to my constituency, some producers told me they would accept the idea of a two-price system if it were paid out differently. We are the greatest wheat producing country in the world. Canadians can buy bread at a reduced price. However, when there is a two-price system for his commodity, the farmer would like to see the government have the guts to introduce the same system for the oil and gas industry, not a wishywashy proposal such as that presented by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Macdonald). A powerful national marketing board should be established. The domestic price should be fixed and the corporations should have to live with it. The export price can go where it likes. I remind hon. members that farmers are the greatest users of fuel products in this country.

Nickel is produced in Sudbury. Lumber is produced in British Columbia. Hon. members know the large conglomerates in the lumber industry are selling lumber on the international markets at extremely high prices. They are selling the best quality and the rest of us get what is left. Lumber should come under a national marketing board. The same could be done with regard to fish, but not for 90 days. If we move in the direction of a federal socialist economy with marketing boards and domestic prices set for Canadian consumers, urban and rural, we cannot do this in 90 days. It must be done on a long-term basis.

Cost of Living

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, it is now 2:20 a.m. One has to realistically consider whether debating inflation at this hour is doing any good. The members of the government are not here to either listen or speak. A lone sentry represents the press. The galleries are empty. Canada sleeps. Yet we go on. Why? We go on because we must.

If all the opposition can do is protest the mismanagement of this country and say over and over again what we would do to bring stability back to the economy, then that is what we must do. We must go on exposing the bankruptcy of ideas of this government. We must go on exposing the hypocrisy of the New Democratic Party in keeping the Liberals in office. We must go on providing some hope for the millions of Canadians who are frustrated, bewildered and disillusioned at what they see happening in their lives.

Speaking personally, I do not have any great pretense that my words at this hour will produce instant results. Perhaps my words in the black of night are symbolic. Certainly, they are representative of the feelings of my constituents in Edmonton-Strathcona. Last week I conducted interviews with 159 people on a door-to-door basis, and I found that 64 per cent were convinced the governement was failing to control inflation. The majority of them are simply not satisfied with a government which tolerates 8 per cent inflation and 5.5 per cent unemployment.

But it is more than statistics based on my interviews that I bring to the House at this hour. I wish to record the feelings of people as they expressed them openly to me. If the government will not listen to me, if the government will not pay attention to my statistics, will the government at least have some regard for the basic feelings of people? Here are isolated "quotes" from Canadians I represent. I ask you to remember, Mr. Speaker, as I read them, that these are opinions gathered from a wide cross-section of the Strathcona constituency. These are the statements made:

I am afraid to go to the grocery store.

This, from a widow who is a nurse with two sons, 18 and 16 years old.

I am against a minority government because it does things only reluctantly and needs to be pushed.

Trudeau doesn't care about high food prices.

Trudeau continues to play politics.

I am on welfare and I am very much for Stanfield because I think he will help us more than Trudeau.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Bell: Will you read that one again?

Mr. Roche:

Stanfield is the best of the lot.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Cost of Living

Mr. Roche:

There are still too many people on welfare. We should make it easier for those who need help to get money and harder for those who can work.

The government is hurting the little businessman most and soon there will only be big business in Canada.

The middle class is being squeezed the most.

I have just spent $60 on groceries. I don't know how the government is running the country.

I think David Lewis is the big king.

Pierre Elliott is not the man. We need a change.

There is disillusion in the air. Something must be done.

With the high cost of living all we are doing is fighting for existence. That is a heck of a way to live in a marvellous country in a great province.

I don't know what the new generation will do. It is scary when you think of it.

In a minority government they play both ends against the middle.

We can't afford to go on doing bits and pieces of policies. We've got to plan for the future of Canada.

Those are the voices of Canada today. What is it that these and other Canadians want most? They want a government to take firm and comprehensive action to stabilize the economy. They will accept wage and price controls because they recognize this medicine is necessary to cure the ailing Canadian economy. The government responds to the crisis in which we find ourselves by proposing bits and pieces of solutions. It is now clear that only a change in government will provide a fresh view, the new philosophy which is needed at this moment in our history.

It is this realization that makes so bitter-tasting the desperate antics of the leader of the NDP whose vote of confidence in the government last Monday amounted to one of the greatest rip-offs ever perpetuated on the Canadian people. Never again will I sit silent as the NDP champions the cause of justice, especially for the little man. All the members of the NDP are interested in is protecting their skins and surviving as long as possible because they know they will be wiped out in the next election.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Roche: Imagine the gall of that self-serving politician from York-South who went on the CBC news last week and proclaimed that the Tories were filled with glee at the figures in the latest consumer price index. That is an unmitigated falsehood and if he had any shame at all, the leader of the NDP would never dare show his face in this chamber again. The Canadian people know who their real champion is in their fight for stable prices and sufficient jobs. They know he is that man called Stanfield, a leader of integrity, vision and guts. It is this leader who will save the country from the incompetence of the Liberals and the hypocrisy of the NDP.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Roche: This is the message which should carry across Canada in these early hours to keep alive among Canadians the hope for a better tomorrow.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Mr. Roche.]

Mr. Arnold Peters (Temiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I was interested in the remarks made by the last speaker. He has obviously elevated the NDP into a position I have long looked forward to seeing this party occupy. I noticed in the speeches made today that a great many references have been made to proposals put forward in the last few months by the New Democratic Party, and rightly so. It seems to me that a small group in this House has been pioneering in a number of directions, making recommendations for legislation to solve some of the difficulties facing us. This is probably not the way in which things should be done. I am sure, though, that many of the suggestions which have been made in the course of this debate are worthy of consideration after all the politics have been scraped off them. If we have done nothing else, we have convinced all the thinking members of the House that it is time we adjourned for three or four weeks to provide an opportunity for the civil service to think about some of the proposals which have been made and prepare legislation for the rest of the session.

Mr. Blenkarn: The government has a contingency plan.

Mr. Peters: The government may have such a plan and the opposition parties may have plans, too. But after looking at some of the legislation which has been introduced in the last few days, I think the civil service has no contingency plan. Unless we give them the opportunity of thinking out some of the recommendations that have been made to them, we will get the kind of legislation we have had in the last few weeks. When suggestions are made by the NDP, after a short caucus meeting the government in a backhanded sort of way implements these pieces of legislation. If this debate has done anything it is to show that we should all go home, listen to the views of our constituents and come back here with fresh ideas not from our own mill.

● (0230)

In my opinion, there is not a great desire on the part of the country for an election. Despite what has been said today, the Conservatives have many opinions about what Mr. Stanfield has suggested they do over the next 90 days.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) is a member of long experience in this House and knows he should refer to a member by his constituency or his official capacity in the House, not by his name.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Speaker, I got carried away with the debate that took place a few minutes ago and the reference to underwear. I refer, of course, to the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) who instituted this debate, and to the fact that he has been followed by members of his party. I think it is safe to say that none echoed the sentiments that he expressed, and this indicates to me that hon. members should listen to the views of their constituents.

There are things the government can do and should do. Few people in this country would disagree that we must do something about the housing situation and about the fact that no young couple should pay an interest rate of 10 per cent on a 40-year mortgage. Young people in the city of Ottawa buy houses in the $70,000 range on a 10 per cent mortgage over 40 years. This is a field in which the government can do something to reduce interest rates if it wishes. All would agree this matter must be attended to immediately because we are arriving at a situation where housing for young people with a view to ownership in their lifetime is almost an impossibility.

When we talk about food we are really talking about a limited number of basic foods. Few people in Canada would not agree that the public is being gouged by the food chains and processors in the price of basic food, and that action must be taken to stop this. There has been a great deal of argument about what that action should be. I suggest that nationalizing the food chains in this country may not be a bad idea. It may be much more sensible for the CDC to put its money into Dominion Stores, Safeways, Loblaws and other chains making as much as 200 per cent profit compared with six months ago, than to put its money into Texasgulf, where to my knowledge that kind of profit is not being made.

It must be apparent to most hon. members that the discussion today indicates there is no consensus regarding what must be done. We have had a collection of ideas about the problems facing us today. Most hon. members would agree there should be a budget very shortly and that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) must solve some of these problems. There are few who would not agree with the former minister of northern affairs, the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton), who said that one solution would be to eliminate the advisers who have held their positions for 20 years and have given bad advice during that time. To replace them would take some time.

Therefore, I strongly urge that if this debate has taught us anything, it has taught us that we are contemplating our navels in this place. We are not really speaking for those we represent when we say that now is the time for an election, that now is the time to roll back prices and to do this or that. Now is the time for us to go home, meet our constituents and give the civil service time to put into legislative form some of the proposals made in this debate which warrant consideration. Then in two or three weeks we can—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. Is the hon. member for Peel South (Mr. Blenkarn) rising on a point of order?

Mr. Blenkarn: Would the hon. member permit a question, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Peters: Sure.

Mr. Blenkarn: Is it the opinion of the NDP that we serve no purpose in this House and should adjourn so the NDP can have a holiday, or will the NDP stay and demand that this government produce some legislation?

Mr. Peters: The answer should be very clear. I am prepared to stay here till whatever time the House adjourns. Others in my party feel the same way. Many suggestions have been made in this debate. I think the hon. member would agree that if the Leader of the Opposition were to form the government tomorrow, he would not be so foolish as to suggest that the very next day he would be able to implement legislation. There would be a time lag before legislation was available.

The hon. member heard the acting House leader read off a list of legislative items that have been kicking around for a long time, and if he thinks we should spend the next two or three weeks dealing with them, plus capital punishment, then I am prepared to be here. But I suggest there must be a better way of doing business in this House. We have made a number of suggestions to the country which we put forward as solutions to the problems facing us.

If these suggestions are accepted by the government, the civil service will need some time to draft the appropriate legislation. If the government feels it has legislation in the fields we have been discussing, including the cost of living, interest rates and other areas of increasing costs which are spiralling in Canada today, we are prepared to deal with it. If it is felt that the civil servants are prepared to draft that legislation immediately, by all means I suggest that we get on with that legislation. If that is not the case, I think it would be to the advantage of all hon. members and the government to have legislation in these fields prepared. This will not be possible if we sit here and continue to outline our solutions to these problems. I strongly urge hon. members to forget this business of calling an election. Our real interest lies in solving our problems of today.

This government was elected by the people. They have made a choice. In the 16 years I have been here, they have not made the choice that I would like, but I want to see that those people in my constituency who elected me get the best legislation possible. This has been a long session and we have yet to see adequate legislation in those fields covered by our debate tonight. We have heard suggestions made from all corners of the House. I think hon. members should take a sober second look at what they are asking, and make a clear decision as to whether they want legislation to solve our problems, or whether they want an election. If we want an election, reason will not prevail and conditions will not improve. There are many members of this House who sincerely believe legislation can be drafted which will go a long way toward solving some of our problems. These problems are not insurmountable. Some members believe they may be doing our civil servants a favour by giving them two or three weeks within which they may be able to bring forth the type of legislation needed.

Mr. Frank Hamilton (Swift Current-Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, as I rise to take part in this emergency debate, I see that the time is getting on toward three o'clock in the morning. I am pleased to note there are still some interested and charming spectators in the gallery.

I listened very carefully to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) contribute to this debate, and I have come to the conclusion that the language he has used is incomprehensible to the ordinary citizen. It is time to demystify some of his high-sounding financial phrases, as they mean nothing to the ordinary, honest, dedicated person in this country. The minister's proposals are calculated to sweeten the mood of the people, but it is doubtful if they will do this, let alone do what is really needed.

Cost of Living

The people of western Canada know that in 1963 big sales of wheat were made to Russia and China which was paid for in gold and silver. The Russians paid for that grain in gold at the rate of $35 to $37 an ounce. They are now buying grain with gold at a value of $100 an ounce. This grain can be paid for with three plane loads of gold bullion shipped from Russia to London. The price of our commodity has not gone up that much, but the value of our dollar has gone down. The farmers and ranchers in western Canada know that our dollar has been devalued 40 per cent in relation to the yen and 30 per cent in relation to the Deutschmark. When they realize that we have devalued up to 40 per cent in terms of the currency of our trading partners, is it any wonder that our feed grains and beef prices have gone up?

Currency values play as important a role in respect of farm prices as does supply and demand, but they represent a longer term price stimulus. The minister made much about encouraging an increase in the supply of agricultural products, but it is well known in western Canada that forces have been used to stop farm production. The extent of production is much less than the farmers are capable of producing. Let me refer to the Montreal Gazette of August 11 which states:

> In the mid 60's the federal government pushed dairy farming as the specialization. Within 10 years, all but a couple of dairy farmers in the Hudson area, 30 miles west of Montreal, were closed down by the cost of equipment health inspectors forced them to buy.
> "I gave up" said Davidson.

We have seen the federal government put export controls on our rapeseed crop, a crop which receives absolutely no competition from the United States. We ended up this crop year with a carry-over of some 25 million bushels of rapeseed, yet many feed lots in my area are empty. Cattlemen are confused and disillusioned at a time when they should be going for broke with every possible assistance from the government. It is time the government woke up to the potential of our agricultural industry. This should be one of our nation's major growth industries in this decade, the largest sectors being livestock and grain.

This government receives over $1 per bushel on the effort that goes into the production, harvesting and marketing of wheat. This government is giving $4 million to the province of Saskatchewan under a crop insurance plan, and the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) has criticized us for holding up this measure. He claims it is a big deal, but the federal contribution is less than one per cent of what it receives from the industry.

The agricultural proposals made by this government are about as imaginative, exciting and dramatic as watching the grass grow. As the Canadian farm population declines, the political force in this government against higher farm prices grows. This government wants to reform our basic system and turn the Canadian agricultural industry into a public utility controlled by bureaucrats. We are seeing policies imposed by stealth, when what we need is more discussion on options available to producers. We are not taking advantage of the technology available to the agricultural industry, and there is no incentive to do so. Our policies are short-range with little or no long-term thinking.

The greatest problem, I suspect, in respect of wheat in particular is that it has been responding to short-term pressures. It is not a matter of hindsight that we face but a serious food shortage around the world in 1973. This was predicted in 1967 by concerned and very knowledgeable people. There must be a complete turn-around in our federal agricultural policy.

We need a new program, a rebuilding, and possibly a new homesteading act. I think most of the problems of the big cities could be solved through better use of our rural areas. With regard to inflation and the rising cost of living, we have arrived at a situation where the government is just standing still.

Mr. Ken Hurlburt (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to enter this debate. I think it is only fair to notify my colleagues of the reason I am here, and the only reason: it is because concerned people in my constituency, free enterprising people, have become fed-up with the bureaucracy that has been running our country for the past 10 years. They feel that governments should advise, administer and direct, and not take on the managerial role. I think it would be only fair to advise my colleagues of the practical experience I have had in the livestock and in the auction business. I wish some of my colleagues on the other side of the House would come into our country and familiarize themselves with our type of operation. If they did so, they might have a better understanding of the situation.

An hon. Member: Perhaps we would not be very welcome out there.

Mr. Hurlburt: You would be welcome. I recognize there are two official languages, but in our business we have a language of our own. In our business, if some of the cows in a cow herd are not producing, we get rid of them for whatever can be obtained for them. I think that has been one of the contributing factors in respect of the high cost of living today—we cannot get rid of the non-producers.

With your permission, Mr. Speaker, perhaps I might tell you what would happen in our country. If after a study of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) we found that his father was a very great man and that his mother was a fabulous lady, but that for some reason or other the progeny of these two great people had not produced, we would get rid of them at any cost, that is, the progeny of this great sire and dam who did not produce and attracted other people who did not produce who, in the interim period, attracted the members of the New Democratic Party. We would take any price. The auctioneer would say, "I'm bid $20 for 109 Liberal non-producers. Will anyone bid me $25? I'm bid $25 with 31 NDP thrown in. Do I hear $30? Sold, 140 non-producers for $25."

Mr. Speaker, during my first year in the House of Commons, representing the constituency of Lethbridge, I have found it sad to see our party's attempts to give the Canadian people a better deal frustrated at every move by the NDP leader and his party. It is no wonder that our leader contends today that there are not three opposition parties opposing the government as they are supposed to do but, rather, a government and two opposition parties opposing the Progressive Conservatives.

Why does the NDP insist on supporting the Liberal government and neglecting its role as an opposition party? Quite a few western NDP members do not try to hide the reason. They frankly point out that so far as western Canada is concerned, the opposition comes from the revitalized Conservatives. With only seven out of the 68 western seats being held by the Liberals, the NDP feel threatened by the Conservatives and hope to stall off an election as long as possible.

My good friend Jed Baldwin, the MP for Peace River, has pointed out that Mr. Lewis and his men will huff and puff but will never bring the House down.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. Perhaps it is late, but I think I should remind the hon. member that it is not permitted in this House to identify hon. members by other than their constituency or their function in this House. I think we should follow, although it is a late hour, the rules and procedures that have been followed in past years in this House.

Mr. Hurlburt: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I assure you it will never happen again. The hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) may join the Liberals, but other NDP members, most of them from Alberta, are starting to feel the heat. The Prime Minister announced a so-called three-prong attack on inflation which turned out to be a three-pronged attack on the west. He placed controls on beef exports. He placed a ceiling on wheat prices, and the incentive to explore for oil by our entrepreneurs has come under heavy criticism. The Progressive Conservatives, with whom I am proud to be associated, have a policy which would attack inflation but which would not backfire on western Canada. As NDP members feel the criticism coming on stronger, perhaps they too will start thinking about the people who elected them.

So far as I am concerned, the largest contributing factor so far as inflation is concerned has been the government and its administration. As I look back, I recall that the sheepmen in western Canada were selling lambs for 18 cents a pound. There was no subsidy on wool, but the government at that time would not step in and place a floor on prices. Instead, the government allowed New Zealand and Australian lamb to come in until all the sheepmen had to disperse their herds, with the consequence that the price of imported lamb continued to rise and is still rising.

As I look back at the livestock industry, I recall that the previous minister of agriculture spent time trying to sell the Prime Minister to the west when he should have been trying to sell the west to the Prime Minister. Time was wasted in the fight on Bill C-176. However, the people of western Canada are very thankful for the few strong Conservative members who were here at that time to see that the bill did not go through.

The same applies to the hog business. When the prices of hogs were low, no floor prices were established. The western farmer feels it would have been far more economical for the Canadian government to have supported a few producers, because there are far more consumers than producers in this country.

Another reason for the inflation we have today, in the opinion of people in the west, is that this country is in need of salemen to beat the bushes of the world and sell our produce. In 1970 we had the Lift program and much of our land was taken out of production. Had we had a government which was in tune with the rest of the world—they could see what was happening in Russia, the drought conditions that prevailed; they could watch other nations becoming more affluent and they could see that our agricultural products would be in demand all over the world—and looked into the future with a long-range plan, we would not be in the position in which we find ourselves today.

The first speech which I made in the House concerned trucking. I think our transportation system has contributed to the rise in prices because we have not allowed any competition for the railways. Hon. members know as well as I do that the railway cars travelling to eastern Canada with livestock go back empty, and the grain cars travelling to eastern Canada also go back empty. If trucks were allowed to compete with the railways, you can rest assured that individual operators would be hauling produce both ways, and as a result the price would go down.

Another factor contributing to inflation is the fact that the government does not recognize agriculture as an industry. In my constituency, private enterprisers have established large plants and have financed them. This government has made large loans to American-owned firms under the DREE program, thus creating competition for our companies. The same is true in respect of another manufacturing firm: a $640,000 grant under the DREE program was provided, $440,000 from the IDB, $200,000 from another department—and 30 days after this deal was made, the firm was sold to an American company. I believe that this type of thing has definitely contributed to the inflation we are experiencing today.

So far as oil is concerned, the members of the party to my left have been criticizing large corporations, but I am afraid of what will happen if we do not allow such corporations to continue developing our natural resources, opportunity only knocks once. I also feel that another factor contributing to inflation is the absolute lack of long-term financing for the farmer. If we are to produce food cheaper, we must give him the same type of financing that we give to people in other industries.

When I say that people on the land have experienced two wars, you might say, "So did many of us." But in many cases the women were left at home on the farms. The went through the depression, plus the inflation we have today. At that time there were no work stoppages and no strikes; only a determined effort to win. All they ask for is the right to fail or the right to succeed. I think they deserve this right. If we want our food costs reduced, I beg this House to be ever mindful of the importance of agriculture. As our urban centres grow and we have representation according to population, we will find that the majority of votes will be centered in the urban communities. But I feel we should always remember that agriculture is the "number one" industry in this nation and our farmers deserve every consideration we can give them.

Cost of Living

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): Mr. Speaker, yesterday afternoon I listened with a great deal of interest to the contribution of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) to this debate. While it is difficult at this hour of three o'clock in the morning to make a fresh or wide awake contribution, I appreciate having had the opportunity and the time, since the speech of the minsiter, to sort out and categorize some of the individuals and groups whom the minister yesterday afternoon, as indeed he has on previous occasions, blamed for the uncontrolled inflation in Canada.

I hasten to add that the list is by no means exhaustive and is in no particular order of priority, which is of course entirely in keeping with the policy of this minister and this government of having no priorities whatsoever. This is the list of people whom the minister blames for inflation: first are the people who throw away food; second, restaurants which throw away food; third, newspapers which create an atmosphere of inflation; fourth, rip-offs by unscrupulous packers, millers and bread manufacturers; fifth, people who buy freezers, especially those who have three or four freezers; six, unwarranted gangsters. I am not sure what is the difference between unwarranted gangsters and any other type of gangsters, but I am only using the minister's words. This is the minister's description, and this is how he described this group on the CTV "Question Period" of August 4, and I quote him very carefully:

> The bastards that are raising the price (of beef) 40 cents and 50 cents a pound.

The seventh group is speculators who are having a field day. The eighth group—and again I will quote the minister on the CTV "Question Period"—he described as follows:

> Weston's or those big companies that have got control of manufacturing, processing and bakeries in Canada that can just about damn well do what they want.

The ninth group is unions who shut down the railways. The tenth group is hog producers who accept $64 per hundredweight for their product. The eleventh is the United States of America. The twelfth is Japan. The thirteenth is Argentina. The fourteenth is the economists and professors who should be on welfare. The fifteenth group is the minister's own advisers. On the previously mentioned CTV national program he described his advisers in the following way:

> They don't know a damn thing about consumers and they don't know a damn thing about farmers.

The sixteenth group is the marketing boards which take unwarranted rip-offs, and the final, seventeenth group—I presume the last, but by no means the least in the minister's opinion—is the opposition parties in this House.

● (0310)

The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) speaks often, and we always receive from his department transcripts of or notes for his speeches. He often speaks in a humorous vein, which we all enjoy, but the humour becomes somewhat galling and the laughter hollow. There may be some substance or some reason to blame, to some degree or another, any or all of these 17 groups I have listed and others I have failed to list. But the tragedy is this, Mr. Speaker—and the humour and the laughter stop at this point—that once the minister casts the blame, he stops. There is no follow-up; there is no action; there are no recommendations; there are no priorities; there is no thrust; there is no interest.

[Mr. Hurlburt.]

What, if anything, does the Minister of Agriculture propose to do about his "unwarranted gangsters"? What, if anything, does he propose to do about Weston's or other big companies? What, if anything, does he propose to do about unscrupulous packers, millers and bread manufacturers? What, if anything, does he propose to do about speculators having a field day? What, if anything, does he propose to do about his own advisers who, in his own words, "don't know a damn thing about consumers and don't know a damn thing about farmers"?

There is one particular matter about which it is impossible for me and others to remain silent. This afternoon both the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) and the Minister of Agriculture pointed with great pride to their legislation dealing with capital gains tax and the family farm. This is not only humorless; it is sheer hypocrisy. In his original budget the Minister of Finance sold the Canadian farmer down the river, and the Minister of Agriculture went right down the same river but, sadly enough, didn't know he was on a trip. I challenge either one or both of these ministers to deny that had it not been for speaker after speaker from the opposition parties, the necessary admendments to cure this folly would never have been made.

The Minister of Finance did not know what he was doing. The Minister of Agriculture did not know he was doing it. The entire Liberal caucus, with the possible exception of the hon. member for Bruce (Mr. Whicher), did not care. And exactly the same thing happened with the retroactive capital gains taxation of farm marketing quotas. The Minister of Agriculture, instead of blaming opposition members for delaying, obstructing or filibustering, should thank his lucky stars that we bailed him out of these mistakes. This afternoon he said that the government could do better for the farmers if the opposition parties would help. Heaven would have to help the farmers if it were not for the opposition parties, Mr. Speaker.

Does the Minister of Agriculture think for one minute that we in the opposition are not alarmed by the cabinet's indifference to agricultural problems? Over and over again we hear from the minister that our problem is related to farm productivity, but at the same time he was strangely silent when imports of hatching eggs from the United States increased 30 per cent to 40 per cent this year at prices well below our farmers' costs of production. What has the minister said to or on behalf of hog breeders whose input costs are leading them to slaughter their breeding stock?

In fact I have yet to hear of one statement of the minister's that would give one glimmer of hope to the farmers as the biggest single consumer group in Canada. He has said nothing about energy costs, transportation costs, fuel costs, labour costs, or indeed about the whole range of input costs. It would seem to me, Mr. Speaker, singularly inappropriate in these times for the Minster of Agriculture to cast the blame for inflation wildly in all directions but at the same time to remain mute when positive action and positive proposals are his responsibility as a trustee for Canadian farmers.

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, at this early hour of 3.15 a.m. the time for partisan politics should come to an end. We have gone far enough. We cannot afford the luxury of party lines on an issue adversely affecting every Canadian. At this time I personally do not care who is in power. What I do care about is that the government in power, whichever it may be, take effective action in curbing this unacceptable and drastic inflationary trend.

However, it is clear that the Liberal government, which happens to be the government at this time even though the average Canadian may rightly think there is no government at all in Canada, is not able to make decisions for the long-term good of the country and is ruling from crisis to crisis, ever fearful of recrimination from the NDP. It is in fact, Mr. Speaker, a government afraid to take a stand, afraid to offer constructive suggestions lest they offend members of the NDP. Even according to the words of a former Liberal finance minister, Walter Gordon:

> The role of the Liberal party should be, not just to go along with the New Democratic Party to ensure its temporary support, but to supplant it as a practical progressive alternative to the status quo.

If the country is to survive the present economic crisis which faces it, it must be led by a man who is not afraid to take bold new steps in an all-out war against inflation. It must be led by a man who recognizes that the bankrupt policies of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner), which sunk the country into an economic abyss in 1969-70, are no longer acceptable to the Canadian people.

Just as the government was unable to settle the rail strike which it had been given at least seven months to do, once again it has become more than obvious that it is unable to control the cost of living. It is not difficult to criticize the record of the Liberal administration. Nor is it difficult to observe the problems we are facing today. They are both painfully obvious to every Canadian.

As in 1969, interest rates began to rise, as did unemployment. The latest increase in the prime lending rate, the fifth this year, is a classic example of the first steps toward massive unemployment. With the prime lending rate increased, it is only a matter of time for this to be reflected in higher interest rates on consumer loans, higher rates on mortgages and higher costs in housing. The steps which will follow are ones with which we are well familiar and yet go unheeded by the Minister of Finance who insists on taking this course which can only lead to further economic problems compounding the already critical situation.

In the past we have witnessed an attempt to fight inflation with mass unemployment. The hardships that were encountered by hundreds of thousands of Canadians made this price unacceptable. Yet we stand here watching the same government making the same mistake. Housing is already priced beyond the means of nearly every Canadian. The current increase in interest rates will only make mortgages more expensive and will further tax the ability of Canadians to pay the already staggering usury rates.

Can the government not see that when the demand for housing decreases, thousands and thousands of contractors across the country are affected? Can the government not see that the suppliers of the materials used in housing will be affected right across the country? Can it not see that the effect in this one area alone will result in a widespread reduction in the sales of every commodity in this country? Here I am taking only one small area of the economy, the area of housing.

What about the resulting effect on our automobile makers who will not have the market to sell their new cars? What about the service industries tha will not have the customers to maintain their businesses? There is no area of business nor is there any Canadian who can escape the penalty which will be imposed by this one move alone. Can the government be so blind as not to be able to look ahead at this one problem, or is its memory so short that it has failed to consider what happened in 1969-70? The Liberal government tried to deal with this problem in those years by the traditional, classic methods of high interest rates, tight money and restrictions on expenditures. As we can remember, these policies were to bring on a recession and high levels of unemployment.

Mr. Speaker, the Conservative party has been under continued criticism from both the Liberals and the New Democrats since this government was elected in October of last year. The reason for this is obvious. We have been the only party to offer constructive alternatives to deal with this problem, while the "crisis" Liberals and the "We'll go along with it" New Democrats have hidden their heads in the sand or have offered pious platitudes to the people of this country.

Well, Mr. Speaker, people of this country are fed-up with inaction, they are fed-up with lack of leadership and they are fed-up with two-faced, double-talk from the leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Lewis). The hon. member for York South cries at the injustices, shouts at the shortcomings, threatens to the press, excites the people—and then bows humbly to the whim of the Liberal government.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): If this is a Conservative non-partisan speaker, I wonder what a partisan speaker would say.

Mr. Jelinek: I see the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) is getting a little anxious about some of my remarks, but I shall continue because my time is limited.

Mr. Speaker, let us examine briefly how the Liberal administration has constantly laughed and shrugged off the suggestions by the hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield). In May of 1972, the government refused this party's suggestion to raise the old age security payments to compensate pensioners for the already rising cost of living. Last February, the same government repented and raised the old age security payments by roughly the amount implied in our leader's suggestions. Again last summer, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) ridiculed this party's proposal that income tax be indexed to the cost of living. The minister replied that it would be unique in all the world, it would add immense complexities to the income tax and it would render federal-provincial fiscal arrangements chaotic. Last February the same minister adopted this very proposal with the audacity of making it appear as though it were his own proposal, claiming it to be a bold and sensitive response to a rather fundamental tax problem.

Again, Mr. Speaker, during the last election campaign the same Minister of Finance branded this party's proposals to reduce tax and increase expenditures as a prescription for putting Canada into bankruptcy. Last February, in his budget, the same minister brought forward substantial increases in government expenditures with the promise of tax cuts in the order of 12 to 13 per cent. And again last summer, the government was warned of high unemployment during the winter months and suggested an immediate consultation with the provinces in setting up winter works programs. Lost in the magic fairy tales and the glowing predictions of the Minister of Finance, the Liberal government is waiting until December to initiate this program. Needless to say, because of the last minute desperation, the program did little to alleviate the critical unemployment situation, and vast amounts of moneys were wasted.

In addition, manufacturing firms were promised income tax reductions which took 13 months to legislate into legality. We waited two years for the competition act scheduled to replace the Combines Investigation Act. This is hardly a glowing example of Liberal leadership. Again, Mr. Speaker, the government's Unemployment Insurance Act ran $1.5 billion in debt and was claimed by this government to be the most enlightened unemployment insurance legislation on the face of the earth. Then, following its near defeat at the polls, this enlightened legislation was withdrawn indefinitely and the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Andras) was sacrificed as a scapegoat.

Mr. Speaker, obviously the Liberal government has time after time accepted the policies of the Progressive Conservative party. As I stated at the outset, it is time to put partisan politics aside and for the government now in power to accept the concept of wage and price controls for the benefit of all Canadians and to forget about appeasing the New Democratic Party.

Liberal policies are riddled with inconsistency upon inconsistency. While voicing concern for the small businessman, the government increases the tax on 90 per cent of them by 7 per cent. While the government urges all sectors of the economy to curb inflationary spending, it continues to disregard its own advice by embarking upon a program of government expenditure unparalleled in the history of any country in the world. In the area of government salary administration alone, in the last 10 years the number of people making the equivalent of $20,000 a year has doubled. Quite simply, if the government itself is not able to control spending effectively in its own department, it certainly cannot be expected to control spending in other sectors of the economy.

Mr. Speaker, while the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the Minister of Finance, with the approval of the leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Lewis), scorn controls of the economy, they actually introduced controls on gas, milk and bread. Selective controls simply do not work. What is good for one industry must be good for all industries. It is inconceivable that the administration expects the Canadian people to follow the double-talk and double standards of the Liberal government.

The wage and price control program placed before the Canadian people by this party warrants more than a shrug of the shoulders by the Prime Minister and a declaration by the Minister of Finance that it is a world problem and there is nothing we can do about it. Constant reference is made by critics of the Conservative program by reference to phase 3 of the United States economic program. What is given little consideration is that during phase 1 and phase 2 of that program, inflation in the United States had been reduced to an annual rate of 3.7 per cent, and the accelerating trend in wage increases was not only arrested but was slightly reversed. In addition, unemployment decreased from 6.1 per cent in August of 1971 to 5 per cent in January of 1973. All in all, a most enviable record considering our own cost of living and unemployment record.

Mr. Speaker, it is not sufficient, in the wake of this most serious problem of runaway inflation, for any government to sit back and abdicate authority for action. It is particularly indefensible for the Liberal government to do so when so many Canadians favour controls to stabilize the economy. For too long we have faced incredible rises in the cost of food. We have watched housing climb out of reach for most Canadians. We are facing a dramatic increase in clothing prices. We have seen transportation costs rise, with predictions from the chief executive officer of Air Canada of more to follow.

We have watched virtually every commodity reach record highs, and we have watched it happen in a relatively short period of time. We have seen the government attempt makeshift policies. We have seen a band-aid approach when major surgery is required. For months this party has done everything possible to encourage the government to act effectively in implementing any program that might curb this cancerous infection of our economy. The Food Prices Review Board has been a farce from the outset and has been used by the government as a smokescreen and a cover-up for its own ineffectiveness and its own fear of upsetting its thin balance of power. Even the chairman of the Food Prices Review Board has been critical of the government's action in the handling of spiralling food costs. Mr. Speaker, the latest increase in family allowance has already been more than eaten up by the pressures of inflation, and by the time the projected increase for January of next year becomes a reality, not only will it represent less purchasing power but it will also be subject to taxation.

In a search for money for giveaway programs, in a search for funds for make-work projects and in a search for new sources of revenue, the Minister of Finance has left no stone unturned and has virtually succeeded in reducing Canadian initiative to an all-time low.

Mr. Speaker, the government can no longer afford to ignore the statistics pointing to an even greater increase in the cost of living. It can afford, however, to ignore the whimpering and whining of the New Democrats and to heed the cries of the nation for action now.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. There are a number of hon. members seeking the floor and they will be recognized, of course. Would the hon. member kindly resume his seat? I think I owe it to hon. members to indicate that the Chair has felt it incumbent to bring to the attention of the Sergeant-at-Arms and the Clerk of the House that the staff of the House which has been here since nine o'clock yesterday morning should be given an opportunity to go home because they will be called upon to return here at nine o'clock this morning. The restaurant has been closed as of 3.30 this morning, and the reading room has been closed.

● (0330)

From now, hon. members are on their own. I bring this to the attention of the handful of members still here.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): How about sending the Hansard staff home, too?

Mr. Speaker: Of course, the Chair is here to listen to hon. members who want to continue without the staff of the House of Commons.

Mr. Reg Stackhouse (Scarborough East): Mr. Speaker, despite the critical nature of the topic we are debating, one has to feel that this debate could be described as a form of mental masturbation; that is, satisfying but fruitless. Regardless of what is said in this debate, the result is going to be nil. The government is not going to do anything about inflation beyond the package of palliatives it has offered the country as a means of at least dulling the pain of inflation it is enduring. One of the reasons is not simply the intransigence of the government in its thinking, but also the fact that ironically the government cannot eliminate inflation because it needs inflation. Strangely, the government has a necessity for that which it professes to be counter-attacking. It needs inflation in the economy because it needs inflation in its revenue, and its revenue feeds upon an inflationary economy.

One of the strange facts of the government today is that it has built up such an inflated bureaucracy that it has a vested interest in inflation. When we speak of the cost of living, we are inclined to speak of rises in the prices of food, housing and the like. However, one of the major increases in the cost of living is the cost of government. The cost of the federal government has doubled since the year 1968 when the present administration took office. This growth has to continue. It is not something that has persisted just since 1968 and might very well stop now. It has to continue because of the built-in thrust and force that are part of the bureaucratic structure. This body the government has created is almost like a Frankensteinian monster.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) can say as he did in his budget speech of February 19 this year, that the government is determined to impose restraints on its own spending to avoid aggravating inflation. The fact is that the very nature of the government's program as developed over the years requires it to continue growing because of the built-in increments in salary scales, especially at the top level, that of themselves are forces for government growth and budgetary growth. For example, in the bureaucracy the government has developed in Canada we have the impressive and sad fact that the number of public servants in the scientific, executive and professional categories has increased by 23 per cent in the past three years.

Consequently, we have a sort of top-heavy structure by which thousands of public servants are earning $20,000 a year or more.

In the Treasury Board Department in 1963 there were 150 public servants earning that salary. Today there are 319. In the Department of Finance ten years ago there was one. Now there are 80. In the Department of National Health and Welfare in 1963, 282 public servants were earning that salary. Today there are 508. In the Post Office 10 years ago, there were none. Now there are 146. In the Department of Agriculture there were none. Now there are 360.

In the armed forces, with a total strength of 82,000 at the start of this year, there were 110 generals. Canada had more generals than Kentucky had colonels. Indeed, we are the most "general-ized" armed force in the world. When you look over the rank structure of the armed forced you find that almost no one has the rank of private. It is a real distinction to be a private in the Canadian armed forces. It is for these reasons that Senator Arthur Laing, formerly of this government, said the senior civil service is overpaid and underworked. If people knew of the wild extravagances in the government and in the senior public service, there would be a hanging on Parliament Hill. Of course, capital punishment has been abolished—perhaps for that good reason.

We have a government built-in force for inflation. Just as the proverb states the appetite increases with eating, so the government's dependency upon inflation will increase. The serious side of this is that it prevents the government from doing anything for the people. For example, the government ought to move in the direction of helping people who are finding it difficult to obtain houses, or to carry the houses they have purchased. One reason the government cannot and will not do that is because of its great hunger for more and more revenue to feed this extraordinary bureaucracy which it has built up.

The government ought to eliminate the sales tax on building materials. The 11 per cent sales tax now adds something in the neighbourhood of $2,000 to the cost of an ordinary urban home. The fact is the governnent has a vested interest in this inflation. The more the cost of building materials increases, the more the government's revenue from this tax source increases.

The government ought to help the income tax payer who is striving to have a home of his own by recognizing the interest on his house mortgage as a deductible item from his taxable income. In the past few months interest rates have gone up two points. I called three mortgage companies in Toronto in the last two days and found that one cannot get a mortgage in Toronto under 10½ per cent. In only March of this year 8¾ per cent was considered in the housing industry to be a high rate—but not now.

Therefore, on an ordinary mortgage such as $35,000, increases in the interest rate mean you have to add a carrying cost in the first year of something like $700. That kind of burden has been put upon the shoulders of the ordinary people trying to buy family homes. It has been tolerated by this government. In fact, it has been encouraged by this government through its co-operation with the fiscal policies of the Bank of Canada.

The least the government could do would be to help these people to allow all or part of the interest to be deducted from taxable income. The government will not do that. The government has no intention of helping the taxpayer in that way because it needs this increased revenue: it has its own vested interest in inflation. The government is guilty of that which it is supposed to be opposing. It is one of the inflationary forces in this country. The people of this country must be conscious of the fact that inflation is something imposed upon them, not only by the big corporations or this or that interest but by a government that is supposed to be looking after the interests of the people.

It is for this reason an increasing number of Canadians are conscious that they need a change in government, that nothing else will do if the major difficulties facing them are to be solved. The Gallup poll has shown that a majority of Canadians favour Progressive Conservative policy on economic stabilization. We have heard from such a riding as Stormont-Dundas that over 80 per cent of the people there favour price and wage controls. In a survey I undertook in Scarborough East, I found that 81 per cent favoured the program for which my party stands. The majority of Canadians, according to the Gallup poll, are not satisfied with the way in which the government is handling the economic situation.

It is clear to the people that they need a new government and that they need a party such as the Progressive Conservative party with a positive and constructive program. It has been clear throughout this debate that the real leadership in economic thinking and policy is coming from the party on this side of the House. Already what purports to be the government party is acting and speaking like an opposition party.

Throughout the debate, which has now persisted for more than eight hours, spokesmen for the government, such as they have been, have not advocated their policies or advanced any proposals; they have acted like an opposition party, attacking the policies we have put forward. So it is clear that economic leadership and constructive social thinking is coming from the Conservative party, and it is equally clear that as soon as the people have an opportunity to make a decision at the polls, government will be entrusted to the party to which I belong.

Mr. Harry Olaussen (Coast Chilcotin): Mr. Speaker, I have been sitting here for a couple of hours listening to the speeches made on this subject, and it occurs to me that each and every one of those taking part in the debate has a solution to the dilemma the country is facing. The fact remains that the Canadian people want action. It is action they want. It is action they must get. It is about time we began to implement some of the suggestions which have been made here tonight. We would like to see the government do something about them and see that vigorous measures are taken to cope with the high cost of living.

Back in 1970, the president of the Toronto-Dominion Bank said comprehensive wage and price controls had no proven value in reducing or eliminating inflation and would be impossible to impose effectively. Experience in the United States and Great Britain has shown that wage and price controls are no answer to inflation. In spite of this fact, we find the Conservatives still proposing a bankrupt policy.

For years we in this party have been asking for the establishment of a prices review board which would be empowered to investigate questionable price increases and which would call manufacturers before it to justify price boosts, particularly those applying to household necessities. Prior to the last election such an appeal was rebuffed by both Liberal and Tory parties.

The economics of food are most vague and complicated. They start with the people who supply the farmers, and end with the consumer. A calculation of how the system works is an exercise in hocus-pocus because the essential figures are simply not available. There are reams of statistics on the farmer as a collective entity, and even a few on the give and take of the chain stores, but what the middle stretch is between the farmer and the consumer is curiously absent from official records. The fundamental question which must be asked in relation to the economics of food prices is: Who controls food prices, and how?

This is where the review board could enter the picture, if we had a prices review board which would do the job effectively. What amazes me is that under our free enterprise system we should encounter so much talk about comprehensive controls, especially from those who believe so strongly in the free enterprise system. The New Democratic Party has long contended that the country must have a planned economy as well as greater Canadian control over that economy in order to achieve economic stability. We cannot operate wage and price controls under the system which prevails right now. It would not be feasible.

We find ourselves victims of a world wide economic imbalance and our concern is to find the best way of dealing with it. According to many economists, inflation is a permanent part of our economic future. It is for us to deal with it as best we can, and it is for this reason we want the government to take the kind of action which will benefit all those Canadians who are anxiously waiting for firm and constructive measures to be produced.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order. I regret I must interrupt the hon. member but the time allotted to him has just expired.

Mr. Trevor Morgan (St. Catharines): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with interest all this long evening to what I would call a diatribe. With all respect to what has been said, we are here at a late hour to attempt to deal with inflation within this country. What I have heard so far has not, really, contributed very much to that end, and I include what has been said by two or three members opposite. The paucity of their numbers is an indication of the seriousness with which they regard what is going on in the country. They just don't give a damn, if I may use unparliamentary language. They do not know what we really mean by price and wage controls or the stabilization we wish to bring about so that equilibrium can be re-established. This is what our party is trying to say, but members opposite just ignore it, and do so most successfully, in their own minds, at least.

I am reminded of some words by H. G. Wells which have always impressed me.

Mr. Benjamin: Another socialist.

Mr. Morgan: I do not know whether they will impress hon. members to my left or across the way. I would remind them that the true strength of rulers and empires depends not on their armies but on the belief held by all men that they are equal when it comes to their truthfullness and their position before the law. As soon as the government disregards this standard they are as nothing, as a gang with no response and their days are truly numbered. I suggest this is happening to the government now, and its days are truly numbered.

● (0350)

Where is the equality today? There is no equality between the rich and the poor; they are separated more and more. With high interest rates, the poor get poorer and the rich get richer. There is no truthfulness in what the government says because they are bankrupt of ideas. The hon. member for Verdun (Mr. Mackasey) asked, where are our ideas? Had he deigned to sit here and listen tonight he would have heard many ideas that he could have taken back to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) that he chooses to criticize.

Hon. members talk about legality. They do things that are not in the interests of the public; therefore I say that is illegal and dishonest. The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Reid), had he sat here tonight would have heard new ideas; but he is not here now. He said we had no new ideas to offer. He could not have heard the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton) or, if he did, he did not listen. He could not have listened to the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies) who had some new ideas and approaches.

I will tell hon. members what can be done, and I will name them 1, 2, 3, 4 and 5. First, the Canadian dollar must be put up. If you float it down with the U.S. dollar it causes more inflation; there is no way around that. We cannot compete with West Germany and Japan with our dollar floating downward by 40 per cent as it did in the last year. What does putting our Canadian dollar up do?

Mr. Benjamin: It will make it go down.

Mr. Morgan: Let me tell my economic expert down on the left what will happen. You will then be able to buy more cheaply from other countries in the world. We import most of our manufactured goods and a lot of foods. What we pay for food in this country is where the crunch comes, because most of our food is imported. Put up the price of the Canadian and U.S. dollar and those foodstuffs come down in relative terms.

What is the price we pay on the other side? If my hon. friend down the way wants to ask me something, he can ask me a question in a moment. The price is that it costs us more to export. But what are our exports? We export extractive goods basically, and they come back to us as manufactured goods. That is the simple truth of our economy.

Mr. Benjamin: Who made it that way?

Mr. Morgan: Neither the hon. member nor I was here, so I do not know why he is asking me the question.

Mr. Benjamin: Well, what are you going to do about it?

Mr. Morgan: I will tell the hon. member, if he chooses to listen. The point is that if your extractive goods are exported at a little higher price, so what? The world needs them. We can use the extra dollars we earn by exporting more of our materials at a higher price on other things. Then when we import these materials back, they will cost us less.

If you ask me how we correct the situation, I will tell you. Do not just give a 9 per cent blanket, off the top corporate tax reduction; you do it on a percentage basis. The more goods you export from secondary industry, the more your taxes come down on a percentage basis. The more you export, the less corporate tax will be paid. This will make the extractive industries set up secondary manufacturing industries in this country and we will gain both ways. Goods will be manufactured here, we will not have to export at high prices and we will have given secondary industry an incentive to manufacture in Canada.

Mr. Foster: What is your second point?

Mr. Morgan: It is the third one, if you do not mind my arithmetic. The second shot from the same bow is that you do the same thing for employment. You do not do what the people across the way have done, and that is to hope—and it is wishful thinking which has not been realized—that by recapitalizing you cut down employment and therefore reduce the corporate tax structure. I am suggesting that the proper approach should be that by increasing employment, corporate taxation is reduced and you give them incentive to increase not only their exports but employment opportunities. We will then see the economy of this country expanding and we will not have to worry about foreign takeovers.

Some hon. members are always talking about foreign takeovers. I remind hon. members to my left that when they talk about foreign takeovers they are talking about a Canadian sell-out. This is what we have to stop. A foreigner cannot take over unless a Canadian sells out. Fundamentally, this is what we are talking about. What makes a Canadian sell out to a foreigner? It is because the tax structure of this country is so stupid, awkward and ridiculous.

Mr. Benjamin: They are out to make a fast buck.

Mr. Morgan: The hon. member may think so, but unless we want to nationalize every industry and corporation in this country, this is what we are faced with. I suggest it is impossible to do this. You have to make the economy of the country work in such a way that you encourage Canadians to invest in Canada. Our ratio of savings to credit is 49.2 per cent, the highest of any industrial nation of the western world.

What does this fact say about Canadians? That we are scared? That we will not invest in ourselves? It is time we began to have confidence and courage. But we cannot so long as people across the way will not give encouragement but keep inflation at so high a level that it does not pay anybody to invest in this country. The thing to do is to make our taxation policy such that there is some raison d'être for a Canadian to invest in Canada. We also need a complete review of our taxation policies so there is no division between the upper and lower income groups.

When we consider the fact that we provide welfare for people with incomes of less than $4,000, with the income tax rate being about $350, how silly can we be as legislators? This really does not make sense. We know what it costs to feed a family but our income tax system is not related to that in any way.

For those who are asking for numbers, the fourth thing a government must do in order to survive—and I am sure this one will not—is revise our taxation policy. The housing situation was described adequately by the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) and I need not remind hon. members about it. In the province of Ontario alone we are going to require one million housing units in the next ten years. At this time, one family in six has inadequate housing as a result of this government raising the interest rates to such a level that the average person cannot buy a home. This government must do two things: it must provide funds for land banks so that building lots will be cheaper and it must provide the money required to put in the services to those building lots. I suggest this is the way to solve the housing problem and the way to bring down interest rates.

In closing, let me just say that while I was on a plane coming from Toronto to Ottawa I amused myself by making up a little limerick which suits this occasion quite adequately. The limerick is this:

The Prime Minister must be put aside,
Like the man who fell down a backhouse and died,
And with Lewis as a lover,
They can follow one another,

And they can both be interred side by side.

Mr. Bill Kempling (Halton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, when I put my name up for nomination they did not tell me things would be like this, or that I might be speaking at four o'clock in the morning. Be that as it may, there has been much said today on the subject of inflation; we have heard a great deal from all sides. I must explain that I am in a rather odd position in that the chief heckler of the NDP sits very close to me. I expect he will continue to heckle me, and I accept that.

An hon. Member: We are going to support you.

Mr. Kempling: I see that the hon. member for Sarnia-Lambton (Mr. Cullen) has returned and I appreciate seeing him here. We have heard the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) set forth the position of our party, and others have expanded on our wage and price control policy. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) gave us his usual statistical reply, most of which we have heard previously.

One of the ridiculous aspects of this debate is the position of the NDP. As one of their members said to me, the NDP is in the best position in that it has power without responsibility. What a statement that is, particularly when they stand before the national press and in this parliament and take credit for any popular position the government adopts, saying they are responsible for this, that and the other policy. Then they admit that they have the best of two worlds, they have power without responsibility. That is the most irresponsible statement I have heard from anyone since coming to this House a short while ago.

We have heard the NDP criticize our incomes policy but we have heard very little from that party except the same old socialist gush they have pumped out over the years.

An hon. Member: Swill.

Mr. Kempling: Yes, whatever you want to call it. Members of the NDP scream, yell and jump up and down in their customary orgy of self-righteousness about the economic management of Canada. The fact is that the policies the NDP recommend would bankrupt this country and cripple the industrial potential of Canada—and they know it. We are in the claws of the Liberals, and the NDP support them. That is where we find ourselves now. Any party that accepts the philosophy that it has power without responsibility is not capable of putting forth any economic plan which would allow Canada to reach its potential.

The NDP represents 16 per cent of the voters of this country, and they have no representation from anywhere east of the Ontario border. They have no representative in parliament from Quebec, no one from New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island or Newfoundland, and they have no representative from Alberta. That party represents only four of the ten provinces of Canada. It is a most ridiculous situation in Canada when a handful of members who represent 16 per cent of the people who voted in the last election find themselves in the position of propping up the government which clearly, by example, is incapable of managing the economy of this country. Clearly, the only way to resolve this situation is to dissolve parliament and let the only real judges we have, the people of Canada, decide the issue before us tonight.

The hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Knight) made reference to what he felt would be dire results if an election were called. He felt inflation would get out of hand. We have had all kinds of elections in this country in previous years when prices and conditions were something other than favourable. The election last year was held at a time of very high unemployment. If we followed the hon. member's logic, we would never change the government. I suggest that each government changes as a result of some kind of price situation. So much for the NDP. The members of that party exist in a desert, they are all dried up, they are wandering leaderless. They have so little in the way of policy that they must tag along with the government and take credit for whatever government policy they can hang on to, particularly those they think will attract public attention. They are intellectually dishonest as a political party.

My main concern, Mr. Speaker, is for the small businessmen of this country and the increasing cost of money available to them. It is not enough to say that those borrowing less than $200,000 will get a preferred interest rate at the bank. This is part of the problem which small businessmen face. Another problem faced by these people since 1969, at least for five years, is the stop-and-go policy of the government as far as monetary and fiscal policy is concerned. I can understand the government's lack of concern in respect of this matter. I think there are only two or three businessmen sitting on the government benches who understand the position of the small businessman.

How can the government continue to talk about expanding the economy while frustrating the small businessman year after year? Surely the government must realize that the average small businessman does not want grants, gifts or managerial aid from the government. He wants to be able to go to his bank and borrow money at a reasonable rate. He wants to be able to plan for expansion with money at a cost that is equitable, just and reasonable. The small businessman wants to fulfil his expectations. He wants to develop his business on the basis of his own judgment, not on the basis of stop-and-go policies of this government.

Why is the bank rate at the present level? The government has said it has not adopted a tight money policy, yet we see the rate of inflation increasing at the same time as the money supply is decreasing. The government has indicated that it allowed the bank rate to increase in order to keep some relationship between the Canadian and the United States rate. What the government did not say is that a handful of large multinational corporations elected to utilize fully their lines of credit and transferred the funds to the United States. This government's answer was to raise the bank rate to deter this transfer of funds at a lower rate to the United States. Of course, this had the desired result but it also raised the bank rate for all Canadians.

The hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies) asked the Minister of Finance if he would consider an interest equalization tax rather than raise the bank rate. Of course, the minister answered that no such consideration was part of the government's economic plan. We are now locked into this policy and as the bank rate in the United States goes up, our rate marches up with it.

An hon. Member: What else is new?

Mr. Kempling: Well, I just said that we suggested, through the hon. member for Don Valley, that the government institute an interest equalization tax. The idea, of course, would be that there would be a differential between the rate in the two countries. Why should we have a high rate and they have a high rate? We are not saying that a freeze or wage and price controls is a panacea for inflation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Kempling: There are certain things which always attract attention. If one mentions the word "pensions," hon. gentlemen come alive. If one mentions wage and price controls, they also come alive.

An hon. Member: What about panacea?

Mr. Kempling: I do not even know if I have spelled it correctly in my notes: it looks like "pancreas". We hear from the government and the NDP that wage and price controls did not work, but privately the heads of our chartered banks admit that phase one and phase two of the United States program worked well, and they know that eventually we will come to wage and price controls in Canada.

The stop-and-go policy toward our industrial development is so damaging to our small and secondary industries that they will never expand or reach the potential they are entitled to achieve. I have been in management positions with several small companies and have gone through the disheartening exercise of planning an expansion of a business only to find we could not obtain money at a reasonable rate because of the monetary and fiscal policies of this government.

But aside from the frustration of not being able to fulfil the potential of various endeavours, we have seen prices escalate beyond all reason. We now see the beginning of a picture that we hope is false. We see the beginning of rising unemployment and an accelerated inflationary spiral. This frightens me. I think the present government has had a fair chance to take the situation in hand. Since 1968 it has moved from one crisis to another, and I believe we should now move to bring this matter before the bar of the people of Canada. Let the people of Canada decide. We are sure they will decide wisely. We are sure they will choose a new government formed by the Progressive Conservative party.

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, there are a few thoughts I wish to place on the record in respect of the question of inflation. Before I start on the specifics, however, I think it behooves all members of the House to clearly look at the position of their party as well as their individual position in relation to the economic situation that is coming about. They should do so, not as members of parliament but to some extent as citizens of Canada. This is a matter which, regardless of our political stripe, we must tackle collectively.

As I look at the operation of the government and the opposition parties, I notice that the government has gone through various stages—a stage, first of all, in which the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board (Mr. Lang) announced the program. Since that time I have detected an air of desperation and possibly signs of a government struggling to once again regain initiative. It is a very simple fact that a government struggling to regain the initiative is reacting in a defensive way and is not in an offensive position in bringing in legislation and being in the forefront. In that case it should take a keen look at itself to see whether it is doing the job it should be doing and fulfilling its responsibility. So at this point we must look at the government's policy in respect of inflation and what positive effect that policy will have in the long term.

I should like to deal with some of the specifics of the Prime Minister's statement. One concerns the matter of the subsidy on milling wheat for domestic purposes. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) stated that the floor price would be $3.25. He stated that the price to the Canadian wheat producer for the roughly 10 per cent of our wheat production which goes into domestic milling would be $3.25 plus $1.25, or a total of $4.50. Then, when the minister in charge of the Wheat Board arrived in Winnipeg, he added another 50 cents to bring it to $5. On September 11 the minister made an effort to clarify that statement. I am attempting to show that the government, in attempting to regain the initiative, actually lost it. It made the statement and then added confusion to confusion. The government, as the right hon. gentleman for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) said, tried to explain the unexplainable.

On September 11 the minister circulated a statement to all members of the House outlining the program. In this statement it was mentioned that under the new two-price program, which is to be effective immediately, the government's contribution would be paid directly to the Canadian Wheat Board, the producers, and so on. The next day, September 12, I phoned the Canadian Wheat Board. The reason I did so is that in my constituency there is a relatively small milling concern which is important to the area. I was asked by representatives of that firm what price they would have to pay for Canadian milling wheat. They did not know because they had phoned the Canadian Wheat Board and were told that the board did not know. They were asked to phone again the next day. This is the result of the confusion and the loss of initiative by this government. This government should not attempt, by ad hoc statements, to fill in the gap and shore up the dike. It should come up with a policy that is clear and workable, and defend it. That is the role of the government.

On September 12 I phoned the Canadian Wheat Board and they gave me the international price for No. 1 Canadian red spring wheat and the different protein percentages, as well as the domestic price, which was $1 less. This was a day after the minister had made a statement to explain the unexplainable. But the Canadian Wheat Board still was not selling at that price. In fact, it was not even selling at the increase of 25 cents, much less at the increase of 50 cents.

This is what I mean by confusion. At that time the Canadian Wheat Board said the price was $3.25. There is a minister in the House who is responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board, and yet there is such confusion. What happened beyond that point? I telephoned the Canadian Wheat Board today and asked them today's price for domestic milling wheat and for Canadian No. 1 red spring wheat, generally the most common milling wheat. It was $3.25 to the domestic miller. However, I was left with the impression, and I am sure so was the press and most hon. members, that that was the top price. But no, 14½ per cent wheat was selling today at $3.33 to the Canadian miller. What policy are we following? To what are we reacting?

An hon. Member: What are you complaining about?

[Mr. Epp.]

Mr. Epp: I am complaining not only about the fact that the Canadian wheat farmer has to subsidize the Canadian consumer, but also—here I am coming back to my basic premise—that the government has mismanaged its affairs to such a degree that it has multiplied this confusion. Today, in an editorial in the Winnipeg Free Press, which I understand was started by Sir Clifford Sifton who was minister of the interior some time back at the time when Prime Minister Laurier was in office, this fine Grit paper stated that the government has put its head in the sand hoping that the storm will pass before they know what is happening. That is the reaction today. I submit that the government has lost its will to govern. They enjoy being where they are, but they do not want to take the responsibility of governing, and that means working out policies.

What is needed to fight inflation in so far as the farming economy is concerned is one of my principal concerns tonight. What I would like to point out is this. I believe that a number of members of the House have the impression that farmers are now getting the highest price they have ever received in the history of this country, and that therefore they must be making a lot of money. It is true that prices for farm products are at an all-time high. But today, if you go into ridings in western Canada, you find that due to the spiralling costs of production, and despite the high prices of products, many farmers are no better off than they were when their products were selling at a more reasonable price and their cost of production was at a more reasonable level.

They are now taking a much larger risk and they are worried that the price of their product will drop suddenly while the cost of production will not drop as rapidly. They will then be in trouble. Not only that, but capitalization on farming today is at an all-time high, such as we have never seen before. Many farmers have to capitalize at 10 per cent. We talk about inflation and about the high cost of food, but let us look at it realistically. The reason for the high cost of production is inflation, and there are no benefactors. It is true that many farmers today are in a better cash position than they were a few years back, from 1969 to 1971, but in the long run they are not in a much better financial position despite what people may say. We hear a lot about the rising cost of food, but unfortunately we hear nothing about the other costs that go into the production of food.

Mr. Caccia: That is what the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) has been telling you all the time.

Mr. Nowlan: What he is telling us depends on the phases of the moon.

Mr. Epp: I do not mind hon. members opposite interjecting and saying that the Minister of Agriculture has been saying this, because in my previous remark I said that farmers are receiving the highest prices ever. But you cannot look at prices alone; you have to look at the profit margin. You could be paying $10 for a dozen eggs, but if the cost of production is $9.99 all you are doing is fooling yourself.

It is interesting to note—going back to the statement made by the Prime Minister—that the NDP support this farming policy. In fact, they almost act as if they had come up with a four-point program, as was mentioned by a member of their party today, that the government had adopted two of the points already and that if they keep on pushing the government will adopt more so it is really an NDP program. The minister of agriculture of Manitoba said about this program:

> The federal government did absolutely nothing when farmers went through a depression in 1967 to 1971 but now it is jumping to respond to consumer complaints about high food prices.
> Now that the farmers, for the first time in five years, see a little bit of daylight in catching up in the payment of their bills, hoping to get their feet on the ground again, we seem to be responding to another pressure group that suggests that something should be done about food prices.

I suggest to members of the NDP that they had better get back home to find out what their supporters are saying. They are condemning the agricultural program that was announced by the Prime Minister for not being sufficient. Members of the NDP should check whether or not the rank and file in their party are agreeing with what they are doing.

Obviously, inflation is hitting many groups. We have talked about old age pensioners in relation to the indexing of the old age pension plan. The fact remains that inflation is affecting old age pensioners most because they have a meagre nest-egg—some capital that they were able to scrounge together during the period when they worked. To them that was security. Today that security is gone, or is worth very little as compared with its value at the time that money was earned and put away in savings. This is the cruelty of inflation.

With regard to regional disparity, I believe the Prime Minister's statement and the so-called attack on inflation was largely directed at attempting to obtain raw materials from western Canada at a price which the consumer would feel did not reflect an increase. I do not believe people in any one area of Canada or any one economic sector of Canada should be asked to bear the brunt of inflation.

Just as is the case with the farmer right now, with regard to milling wheat we are talking about 10 per cent—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but the time allotted to him has expired.

Mr. Kenneth J. Higson (Lincoln): Mr. Speaker, the reason for the continuation of the debate at this hour of 4.30 in the morning is that this country is in a critical situation and the government, with its supporters to the left, is in a state of political prostration, unable or unwilling to cope with the economic problems that beset us or even to try to cope with the crisis in which we find ourselves.

Last January and during the few months thereafter the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) was accused of being too thirsty for power and the opposition was considered to be too anxious to take over the reins of government. Mr. Speaker, if ever there was a thirst for power or a desperate hunger for control of government, it is that which we see manifested by the present government and its New Democratic Party supporters.

It was once said that war was too serious a business to be left to the generals. I suggest that the economic destiny of this nation is too serious a business to be left to this Liberal-Socialist coalition of politicians. It is incredible that a minority party, having only one-ninth or one-eighth of the total seats in the House and only 17 per cent or 18 per cent of the popular vote in the election last October, should be in a position to perpetuate the life of an incompetent government by receiving tidbits of legislation in return for its support, thus compromising the principles of two political parties. I am happy that the opposition party of which I am a member is not a party to this type of activity.

This morning the nation is faced with a further increase in the cost of living of 1.3 per cent for the month of August, which is the highest monthly increase since March of 1951. Food is up by 3.2 per cent, for a total cumulative increase of almost 16 per cent during the last 12-month period. And the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has the audacity to tell us that it was, in effect, in anticipation of the increased consumer price index that this announcement was made to this House last September 4. That type of political fancy footwork might be swallowed by the government supporters but it will not be accepted or believed by the people from where I come.

The real motivation and purpose of that announcement was an attempt to make it appear to the Canadian people that the government, really bereft of original thought, was doing something to solve the economic mess that has been allowed to continue too long, and at the same time throw crumbs to the New Democratic Party in order to maintain itself as the government. I am not saying that the steps announced by the Prime Minister were wrong, although some—like the subsidy to wheat, and the oil pipeline to Montreal—in the light of subsequent announcements have proven somewhat confusing, which only manifests once again the ad hoc and butterfly-thinking of the government.

To be sure, legislation to increase pensions and family allowance assistance to those Canadians on fixed or low incomes and thus feel the real brunt of the government's ineptitude are steps in the right direction, as are subsidies to the milk and wheat producers, although subsidies do not control prices but merely spread the burden. And I, for one, would like to see all of Canada's social assistance legislation reviewed, in genuine co-operation with the provinces and the municipalities, so that effective and curative programs could be brought down to assist effectively Canada's economically deprived, instead of perpetuating a system that for too long has been overlooked.

But the announcement of the Prime Minister to which I referred a moment ago really does nothing to solve the real problem. To our already inflation-prone economy has been added a powerful catalyst with the inflationary expectations of our people. Prices have been rising for so long that people expect they will continue to rise, and thus act accordingly. Unions demand raises above increases in productivity in order to compensate their members for expected price increases. They are able to receive these increases, firstly because they hold monopolistic power, and, secondly because management, also suffering under similar inflationary expectations, is not too unwilling to accommodate the unions in their demands. Thus, costs and consequently prices do increase, and these expectations are vindicated in a perpetual motion forever upward.

At some time, Mr. Speaker, someone has to come to grips with this scramble where everyone is trying to stay ahead or just to keep up with the ever-spiralling rate of inflation. Our party has proposed an economic stabilization program as an attempt to contain inflation and at the same time to not jeopardize economic growth. Such a proposal is met with jeers, derision and taunts from the government and its supporters who say it won't work and suggest it has not worked in the United States or Great Britain. On that last point I suggest that hon. members should look again at the experience of our sister nations. Although, certainly, perfection has not been achieved in those two countries, they have been able to control food costs in the last 12-month period better than we have done in Canada, as well as the over-all inflationary rate in the United States. We have not said that this is the cure-all or great panacea for Canada's economic ills. Such a program must be accompanied by sound fiscal policy and would incorporate policies relating to mortgages rates, food prices, old age pensions and labour-management bargaining. And most important of all, we must control government spending.

It is incredible that the government should have increased expenditures from some $10½ billion for the year 1967-68 to an estimated $19½ billion for the current fiscal year, an average increase of 7 per cent during the last seven years. The other day the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) commented that it was interesting to note that small "c" conservative governments had implemented price and wage controls in the United Kingdom and the United States. Naturally, I attach a different connotation to this from that of the hon. member for York South. I, as a Conservative, do not look forward with anticipation to a further intrusion by government into the private sector of the economy. Nor did Mr. Heath. Nor did President Nixon. But, Mr. Speaker, our nation's economy is in a desperate situation and we in this party alone have the courage and the conviction to do something about the situation here in Canada.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Standing Order 2(1) reads:

> The House shall meet on Mondays, Tuesdays, Wednesdays and Thursdays at 2.00 o'clock p.m. and on Fridays at 11 o'clock a.m. unless otherwise provided by standing or special order of this House.

Standing Order 42(1) reads:

> Forty-eight hours' notice shall be given of a motion for leave to present a bill, resolution or address, for the appointment of any committee, or for placing a question on the order paper; but this rule shall not apply to bills after their introduction, or to private bills, or to the times of meeting or adjournment of the House.

● (0440)

Mr. Speaker, in view of the hour, and in particular in view of what these hours mean to the staff—not to the members, because there are not many members here—I wonder if it would not be possible, under the two Standing Orders I have just cited, to ask the House for an order, with unanimous consent, that the sitting of this House for Friday, September 14, commence at two o'clock.

[Mr. Higson.]

I am not trying to cut off tonight's debate. I do not know any way to do that, or I would try. It seems to me, for the reasons I have given, that the House might be doing the decent thing not to sit until two o'clock this afternoon. Though Standing Order 2(1) requires you to take the chair at eleven o'clock on Friday mornings, it seems to me this could be set aside by special order of the House.

I suggest that under Standing Order 42(1) a motion having to do with the time of meeting of the House does not require 48 hours' notice. I would be prepared to write out a motion, but if there is unanimous consent perhaps there could be a House order.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Bell: Mr. Speaker, we saw the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) fingering his Standing Orders, and wondered what he was about. To us this seems a very good idea. It seems to be in order, and we support it wholeheartedly. We feel very guilty as far as the staff is concerned, although we feel we are carrying out our duty as far as the debate is concerned. If there could be some agreement for a two o'clock sitting, it would certainly meet with our approval.

Mr. Speaker: I appreciate the point which has been made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) and the point made by the hon. member who has just spoken, but the difficulty which the Chair faces at the moment is that there is not a quorum in the House. I wonder whether the Chair should feel authorized to accept an order which is offered at 4.45 in the morning without a quorum.

Perhaps earlier this evening some hon. members should have pointed to the fact that there was not a quorum and there should have been an adjournment then. That is my difficulty. Perhaps hon. members might comment on this point, that is, whether it is in order for a House that sits at 4.45 in the morning without a quorum to decide whether we ought to sit at eleven o'clock on Friday morning, according to Standing Orders.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I do not want to be difficult, but it seems to me if there is not a quorum then the House should adjourn. However, I sense that even while you have been making this comment a few members have come in and there may now be 20 of us.

An hon. Member: Twenty-one.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Well, we have grown up. I believe the number now exceeds 20, which is a quorum. Perhaps in those circumstances—

Mr. La Salle: Because you have an independent.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Perhaps in the circumstances Your Honour would accept my proposal.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. At 4.45 in the morning it seems to me, speaking as a humble individual, that a more rational proposition would have been that we adjourn. The hon. member's proposition is that we assume we are continuing with the debate and that we resume our sitting at two o'clock this afternoon. Do I understand this to be the hon. member's proposition?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): It is, Mr. Speaker. It would be my preference that we adjourn, but I know of no way that we can do it unless there is not a quorum. I hope that if we do accept the proposition to start Friday's sitting at two o'clock in the afternoon, even so we will bring this sitting to a close as soon as we can.

Mr. Bell: In expressing agreement with the two o'clock sitting I might say that we have two speeches to hear. As far as we are concerned, this would be the extent of our participation in the remaining part of the debate.

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, to my mind, all parliamentarians, the staff of the House of Commons, as well as the Chair have shown much good will and energy by working till 4.45 a.m.

In any event, I would not like to object to our pursuing our work, but I would like us to respect the schedule established for Friday when we normally sit at 11 o'clock. I would very much like us to respect it so that no one is forced to work at night, under the pretext that we can start later.

For my part, all my life, when I have had to work late at night, it did not keep me from rising early in the morning.

I acquired that habit. I am quite willing to continue to do so, even as a parliamentarian. I am ready to continue our sitting and would very much appreciate it if our schedule for Friday were not altered, when we normally sit at 11 a.m.

Mr. La Salle: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Speaker: I would be happy to hear the hon. member for Joliette (Mr. La Salle) who, in view of the responsibilities he has assumed tonight, has acquired a very special wisdom.

Mr. La Salle: Mr. Speaker, I imagine that, with the co-operation of all hon. members, I should thank the Chair for having invited me to sit as Acting Speaker for an hour.

This was a great honour for me and I think that my constituents will greatly appreciate it.

Now I would like to co-operate will all the party representatives so that the House may sit tomorrow at 11 a.m. or 2 p.m. as the case may be, but I shall certainly be in my usual place to see to the interests of my constituents, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I must consider the views expressed by the hon. members who took part in the discussion concerning the point of order raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). The hon. member for Bellechasse has suggested that the House should sit at 11 a.m. as provided by our Standing Orders—

[English]

I doubt very much that without unanimous consent it would be within the power of the Chair to determine that we would meet at two o'clock in the afternoon rather than eleven in the morning. I would assume that a motion to that effect would have to be made, seconded, the question put and perhaps the bells rung. I am not sure whether we would not wake the rest of the citizenry if we rang the bells at five o'clock in the morning.

In view of the comments submitted by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert) I wonder if we could not agree that we will continue this very interesting debate in the very few minutes that are left of it, as I understand from what was said by the hon. member for Saint John-Lancaster (Mr. Bell), and meet at eleven o'clock in the forenoon. Again, I am in the hands of the House.

Mr. Nowlan: On the same point of order, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert) could fit the act of the possible with that which should be practical. In this sense he could still conform to his natural habit of rising early and carrying on his duties as a member of parliament, attending at his office and doing those duties that a member does, while we give the staff a much needed break. It is a break which they deserve, because while members have been coming and going to this chamber, the staff has been here constantly.

In that way there would be no conflict with anybody's discipline or duties. I, too, rise early and will be doing something early this morning besides participating in this debate. I hope the hon. member will consider that suggestion.

Mr. Speaker: I believe the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, under the terms of Standing Order 42(1), I believe I can move a motion that the sitting of this House on Friday, September 14, 1973, commence at two o'clock p.m. I would be prepared to do so. I gather the hon. member for Saint John-Lancaster (Mr. Bell) will second the motion. However, there is not much point in doing that if it is going to be debated and results in calling in the members for a vote.

I wonder if I can join the hon. member for Annapolis Valley (Mr. Nowlan) and simply appeal to my good friend, the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert) to make it unanimous. The point is well taken that we should be on the job in the morning, but can we not make it unanimous, for the sake of the staff, and agree that we meet tomorrow afternoon at two o'clock, rather than making a motion and going through the formality I have mentioned?

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, as a result of the representations which have just been made by my colleagues of the Progressive Conservative party and the New Democratic Party and considering the work and the burden laid down on the staff of the House as well as on the Chair, I am quite ready to reconsider my position and to accede to the request which has just been made to alter our agenda. As usual, I like to co-operate with all my colleagues. As for the proposal, I find it logical and valid. Owing to the hour—it is five o'clock in the morning—I think that I should accede to that request and readily accept a change in our agenda so that we would sit at 2 p.m. I agree and accept that proposal.

[English]

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): In light of that, Mr. Speaker, perhaps the simplest thing for me to do is present the motion I suggested a moment ago. I therefore move the following, seconded by the hon. member for Saint John-Lancaster (Mr. Bell) and supported by the hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Foster), the hon. member for Joliette (Mr. La Salle) and the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert):

That the sitting of this House on Friday, September 14, 1973, commence at two o'clock p.m.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have some doubt as to whether the Chair is in a position to accept the motion presented by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). There is a motion now before the House that we adjourn. I gather there are a number of hon. members who want to speak to this motion. The hon. member rose, took the floor and intervened on a point of order. It does not give him the right to propose a motion such as this.

Even if it is five o'clock in the morning, the Chair has the responsibility to be very close to Beauchesne, Bourinot, May and other authorities, to be mindful of the Standing Orders and to remind the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre that a motion cannot be proposed such as this one, on a point of order. I gather from what the hon. member for Saint John-Lancaster (Mr. Bell) indicated a moment ago, there are other speakers on the motion. I have to recognize them at the present time.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, is it not possible for the House to do things by unanimous consent? The proposal I make is, not that we adjourn now until two o'clock but that when we adjourn the next session will not start until two. If it is unanimous, is Your Honour not protected?

Mr. Speaker: We would first have to agree that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is allowed, by unanimous consent, to make a motion on a point of order. I will inquire whether there is unanimous consent on this.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: By consent, Mr. Knowles, seconded by Mr. Bell, moves:

That the sitting of this House on Friday, September 14, 1973, commence at two o'clock p.m.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion (Mr. Knowles, Winnipeg North Centre) agreed to.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps on my own point of order I might suggest that whips and representatives in the House might advise hon. members who are not here. A few of their colleagues are not in the House at the present time, and they should be advised they are not expected to be here at eleven in the forenoon. I am suspicious that some of our distinguished colleagues, such as the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) and others, will be here at eleven in the morning. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre will be here unless otherwise advised.

Mr. Sean O'Sullivan (Hamilton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether to take it as a compliment or not, but it strikes me as somewhat ominous that just before I should be given the opportunity to speak there should be the sudden outburst of unanimity among all parties that the House is going to require a rest following the debate this morning.

We are now approaching the hour of 5 a.m. and I rise with a mixture of feelings, as I am sure other hon. members have in this debate. First, I have the very natural feeling of being tired, as this debate has been prolonged long into the night. At the same time, I have a sense of exhilaration in being able to participate in this debate and to listen to the speeches of my colleagues. I have a sense of honour that every member feels in having the opportunity of addressing the House of Commons. Balanced with that feeling I have a sense of disappointment that there may be some futility to the debate in which we are participating.

That sense of honour is supplemented by the fact I have been able to join with my colleagues in the Progressive Conservative party, which provided the impetus for this debate and followed through with the majority of speeches, while on the government side we have seen lackluster representation and minimal participation. Toward this debate there was almost total ignorance and apathy on the part of ministers of the Crown. Those feelings extend further to the entire purpose of this debate and perhaps beyond that to the entire purpose of why we are assembled in this chamber, what it is we are attempting to do and are summoned here to do.

We all know that if we take it on the surface, this House is meeting tonight because Mr. Speaker accepted the emergency debate proposal put forward yesterday afternoon by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) in view of the very serious circumstances facing this nation. We are also aware this House would not be sitting if it were the choice of the government. However, circumstances intervened to force the recall of this House when the Minister of Labour (Mr. Munro) and others in the government failed to settle the railway strike. Once the government was forced to recall parliament, we on this side made it very clear that in discharging our responsibility to the people of Canada we had no intention of leaving here before pressing the government with every means at our disposal to at long last take some action with regard to inflation or, the term which I prefer, to the rising cost of living.

If I might continue to deal further with these feelings, any member of the House who is aware of the commitment he holds, not only to the constituency he represents but to the nation as a whole, is constantly reminded that we in Canada are many times kept together not so much by the positive things we share but by the common difficulties we face and the differences we seek to overcome through mutual co-operation. For any member of parliament who has spent time in his constituency, clearly the greatest danger which unites all Canadians at this time is that presented by the rising cost of living coupled with inaction on the part of the government.

Having returned to my constituency, I know this is the chief concern among the people I have the honour to represent, and I would like to point out that I have the honour to represent a riding called Hamilton-Wentworth which many people assume from its name falls in its entirety within the city limits of the great city of Hamilton. It does not do so. Fifty per cent of the constituency in terms of voters does fall within the city, but it also extends to the suburbs and beyond that to farming areas. So in the constituency of Hamilton-Wentworth there is a tremendous cross-section of urban dwellers and those involved in the great industry of farming.

There is a common concern among all the people, whatever their occupation, whatever their background. Surely it is the cost of living, surely it is a growing sense of desperation that the cost of living continues to rise, perhaps even to the point at which it is getting out of control, while the present government does nothing about it. If responsibility rests with anyone, it must surely come down on the federal government in the first instance, which in addition to supposedly having the trust and the mandate of the Canadian people is also the nation's biggest single spender and one of the chief agents of inflation in the country today. But rather than provide the leadership one expects from a government, we heard today—or, rather, yesterday—in questioning in the House of Commons, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) assure us that the government has reacted to the situation which confronts us and will continue to react. It is not the purpose of government to react. The purpose of government is to lead. The government has failed miserably to discharge its responsibilities in that regard.

As I have said, in the constituency which I represent there is a vast cross-section and all those people are affected severely by the rising cost of living. On Monday last, when this party brought before the House of Commons a motion of non-confidence, the Leader of the Opposition expressed a feeling which I think is shared by many members. I should just like to quote the words of the Leader of the Opposition as they appear in Hansard. They affect those who are severely hit by inflation. He said:

> There are those in Canada who have no powerful trade union or trade associations, who have no levers to pull, who have no means of adjusting their incomes to meet their demands of an increase in prices and rates of interest. They are the great majority of working Canadians and their families.

The leader of my party went on to say:

> This government is not kept here by public confidence. It is not maintained in office by faith and trust in their policies. They are not kept here because events have proven them right in their judgments and in their management of the country's affairs. They are kept here for the political convenience of a group of members in this House. As long as they are here, members of the government will keep improvising policies of political convenience.

The Leader of the Opposition in those words expressed the frustration felt by an ever-growing segment of the Canadian population which must meet the cost of living and which does not have the means of assistance open to other segments of the population. That segment which bears the biggest share of the burden looks to the government and to the House of Commons for help and leadership, and because of the attitude taken by the government it is not only despondent and disillusioned,it is not only facing increasing economic difficulties, it is experiencing a loss of faith in the future of this country, which perhaps is the greatest tragedy of all.

If one considers this country in an over-all context,there really is no excuse for the situation we face today although the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) and the Prime Minister do their best to offer flippant and sometimes insulting excuses. The fact is that this nation, once the most vibrant of lands, offering challenges which no other nation could offer to a people, offering opportunities which no other generation and no other people could ever dream of, has now been crippled because its economy has stagnated under a government which insists on clinging to outdated, outmoded and irresponsible policies. Rather than providing leadership, the Prime Minister says we will react when it becomes necessary.

One of the most cruel ironies about the rise in the cost of living and the inaction on the part of the government is that the segment of the population to which the country owes so much is sometimes the most drastically affected. Of course, I am referring to Canada's senior citizens. In harsher times than I shall ever know and, pray God, that any other generation shall ever know, they served this nation through hard work, putting forward their best to develop a land based on the simple belief that through hard work they could better themselves and make life a bit better for those who would come after. For some of them, twice they were called to put their lives on the line for their country, and twice they responded. And today the senior citizens of Canada are almost neglected by the government except when public outrage forces the government to a trade-off on the basis of the minimum it can get by doing something for the maximum number of voters. Surely it is time for our senior citizens to stop being treated as political pawns and to start enjoying the type of life to which they are entitled, and time for some of us to attempt at least to repay the debt which perhaps none of us can ever really repay to them.

During this debate and during the past days in the House of Commons we have heard many speeches, but perhaps none has been as interesting or at least as challenging in trying to follow the logic of, and if one might be generous, the substance of those speeches delivered by members of the New Democratic Party in trying to justify their position. In particular there were diatribes emanating from the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) who seems to get by with the over-all attitude of stating as eloquently and forthrightly as he is renowned to do, "Mr. Speaker, these are my principles, but if the government doesn't like them I have others".

The fact is that against the wishes of the government and the NDP there will come a time, under our democratic system, when the Canadian people will have an opportunity to express their opinion of what has taken place in terms of the economic mismanagement of this country. I say to my colleagues in the NDP that they had better prepare themselves to be judged as accessories to the crime and accomplices to this incompetent government. For the simple fact is that when you review the economic situation of this country and hold it in sharp contrast with what the economic situation should be, you come to the very distinct and inevitable conclusion that the government opposite has had their chance and they have failed. Their failure in the last election will be reflected in the next; and it will also affect the outcome in so far as the NDP is concerned.

A number of statistics have been quoted in this debate. One of them which has been used most often, particularly by the media, is that this country has had the highest monthly jump in the cost of living since the Korean war of 22 years ago. It means—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order. I must interrupt the hon. member, but the time allotted to him has expired.

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, it was 13 hours ago that this debate on the cost of living and change in the interest rates began. Historically, and perhaps politically, 13 has been known to be an unlucky number. As people in the east are starting to rise and people in the far west are finding a deep sleep, and as we in this chamber in the centre of Canada sit in a sort of semi-stunned state at a quarter after five, I wonder what the soothsayer will say about this debate and what it will do, not for the fortunes of political parties in this House but for the people rising in the east and those in deep sleep in the west.

Although we do not know, what I think we have shown is that those who have participated in this 13-hour period in the 15 minutes allotted to them folowing the lead-off speakers have maintained a good debate. No matter how cynical and critical one can be, and often is, about the parliamentary process and/or members of parliament, no matter the expected interjections and at times frivolous comments which often stimulate debate, the tone, calibre and content of the speeches of all members has been such as to zone-in on this most serious topic that affects Canada. That is a credit to this institution and a reflection of the seriousness members of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition feel about this subject.

Before I go further, as I wind up this debate I want to congratulate those who have participated. Many of us have sat here the full 13 hours. I also want to pay my respects and give thanks to those on the staff of the House who have been inconvenienced, who have obviously been a little upset and are tired, perhaps more tired than many members. I know many of them have been here longer than I and longer than I ever will be here, but going into long hours and calling elections at the wrong time—if there ever is a right time—does create personal inconvenience which, however, must take second place to the concern of members which they reflect here on behalf of Canadians from coast to coast.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) raised a point of order a few minutes ago and mentioned that there was not a quorum. The number of members here consistently during these 13 hours has been as good as that of any Friday afternoon when debate terminates at five o'clock, which again is a reflection of how serious we view this subject. We thank the staff, but we also know the staff appreciates that all of us, either individually or collectively through our parties, try to do what we think is best for the general good, even if this causes personal inconvenience.

My time is limited, and after the harmony that brought us an adjournment till two o'clock on Friday, and having listened to all that has been said, I am not going to make a tub-thumping speech. But I should like to say that when I listened earlier in the day to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) and the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) I started to think that if I were up above and knew as little about the mythology of the land, how would I describe what has gone on in this chamber? I think I would say it must be the three brass monkeys' debate. We used to have a prince. We now seem to have chaos. The brass monkey is the government, and there he sits with his hands over his ears. He hears no evil, sees no evil, and he is so darned afraid to do anything that he does no evil except perpetuate the chaotic economic conditions we are facing today. I say that is not good enough.

Where was the brass monkey tonight, the former prince? Was he getting reannointed in the great chateau down below. Did he have his hands over his ears, not listening to the acclaim that might have been his had he carried out his mandate of May, 1968, which the people finally took away from him in a qualified fashion in 1972? No, Mr. Speaker, that brass monkey, the Prime Minister of this land, has maintained his consistent stance on economic policies. Given the constitution and given the culture he will wax philosophical, but given the cold economic facts he will sit uninvolved, unheard and he will become unconcerned. That is not good government, Mr. Speaker.

I could say more about that, but let us turn to our friends and colleagues to the far, far left. Many years ago when I was knee high to a grasshopper I was first exposed to a great gentleman named M. J. Coldwell. He spoke at my alma mater, Acadia University. At that time George Drew tried to rip the microphone out of his hand and suggested that because he belonged to a socialist party he had to belong to a national party, therefore he belonged to the national democratic socialist party, which happened to be the party in Germany at the time of Hitler. That caused a little scuffle on the platform, but M. J. Coldwell handled the situation well: he was a gentleman and a man of principle.

It is terribly sad that we are experiencing the uneconomic conditions which will cause those problems to which the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton) referred earlier. The hon. member for don Valley (Mr. Gillies), in his enlightened address, suggested honestly that we are getting close to the brink. Where is that principle in that party which used to be the conscience of the land before it sold its conscience for a mess of pottage? It used to be the New Democratic Party but now "NDP" means "no damn principle party".

The leader of that party used to make fun during election campaigns about Tweedledum and Tweedledee, referring to the Conservatives and the Liberals. He would ask: Who is Tweedledum and who is Tweedledee? What do we have today? I suggest we still have Tweedledum, but now we just have "ho-hum" from that man who just huffs and puffs away.

We heard all about the corporate rip-off, and the leader of the NDP (Mr. Lewis) did well in a public way. He did not do too well at the polls, and I was not too displeased about that; but he is starting to raise this matter again. He cannot raise it again with the same credibility as before. With no concerted action from coast to coast, that party does not necessarily represent an attack against corporate rip-off that is being perpetrated as a result of this unholy alliance between two groups, neither of which received a majority, neither of which has a mandate and neither of which has a message for the people from coast to coast or a message for this House during this debate on economic policy.

We have heard many speeches during this debate. The two that stand out most in my mind are those of the hon. member for Don Valley and the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain. I have heard the latter member speaking privately from behind the curtain and over coffee, when he sometimes can wax eloquently, bringing forth ideas like water flowing over a falls. Today, in respect of one of the most complicated subjects, I can say without equivocation that he spoke extremely eloquently. We know that no party has the full answer, but when the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain spoke I know that members on the government benches listened to his views. Five of the ministers who were then present applauded that hon. member.

What can I say about the other speeches in the few minutes I have left at my disposal? The hon. member for Verdun (Mr. Mackasey) and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) suggested that we should not wage this war on the backs of the poor. They said that was what happened in respect of unemployment, and they were not going to do that at this time. What is just as bad as unemployment? Let us consider the erosion of the frozen dollar of the pensioner, the dollar of the working poor, and inflation itself which eats away at these funds. Is that not just as bad a social disease as unemployment? I have in mind that euphemistic phrase, "You cannot wage war on the backs of the poor".

Hon. members on the government side suggest this is an international problem. Why does Sweden have interest rates of 4 per cent and 5 per cent, with deposit interest rates of 3 per cent and 4 per cent? I suggest it is because Sweden has given stable government and leadership in economic, fiscal and monetary matters. We in Canada have more natural resources than Sweden ever thought of having, yet we continually respond as do our friends to the south. We have not developed an independent stance and we have not attempted to develop independent policy.

The Minister of Finance talked about world shortages and the lack of production. He listed a host of palliatives used in an attempt to pump a little money into the economy, but he did not once mention the Lift program or the quota on eggs and milk which curtails production. These things have now come back home to haunt the government. With that host of palliatives and pills, with no prescription to cure the ills, one cannot help but wonder if that is not what the government should be doing to help the needy and aid the dispossessed and those who have been cut off from the mainstream of life.

Is it not the function of government to assist these needy people? Why should this government take false pride in what is a normal government function? This government suggests that its normal function of providing the pill or palliative is designed to arrest the disease. I suggest to you that the money we voted in respect of certain measures in the last week or so will amount to nothing more than wooden nickels or Monopoly money if the cancer of inflation is not arrested and cured within the next six months or a year. Anything we give these needy people will be eaten away in six months or a year, the way things are now going.

I could say much more on this subject, but in conclusion let me refer to the eloquent address of the hon. member for Hamilton-Wentworth (Mr. O'Sullivan). I could not begin to match his remarks. However, it does seem to me that the situation comes down to what he suggested. I wish some of the ministers who sit on the treasury benches were present, but it is kind of late and it is time to go home.

If this government has the will to govern, and that is a trite phrase or cliché, I suggest there is a fundamental difference between clinging to office and exercising power. There is nothing wrong with exercising power. The responsibility of a government is to exercise power on behalf of the people. Unfortunately, at this time in Canada we have a government headed by a Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) who has an instinct for survival in office but who has defaulted in the exercise of power. As the hon. member for Hamilton-Wentworth said, this is a government of react, recant and retreat—which is no substitute for initiative, imagination, energy and the exercise of power.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. Pursuant to section 13 of Standing Order 26, I am satisfied that the debate has now concluded. Perhaps we should say an evening or a morning prayer. I therefore declare the motion carried.

This House stands adjourned until two o'clock p.m. this date, pursuant to special order adopted earlier.

At 5.31 a.m. the House adjourned, until 2 p.m., pursuant to special order made this day.

GRAIN

ANNOUNCEMENT RESPECTING 1973-74 FEED GRAINS PROGRAM

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I would like to give members of parliament up to date information on the implementation of the 1973-74 feed grains program.

The 1973-74 feed grains program includes two main provisions:

1. The pricing of feed grains, moved from the Canadian Wheat Board area to other parts of Canada, based on off-board prices within the Wheat Board area.

2. Buying of feed grains by the Agricultural Products Board to provide a broader base and give more certainty to the off-board market within the Wheat Board area. This will ensure that no producer in the Wheat Board area will have to sell his grain at distress prices even if quotas are not immediately available to him in what he considers sufficient quantity.

The Canadian Livestock Feed Board is working with the Canadian Wheat Board to determine the level of off-board prices in order to arrive at the base price for sales to eastern Canada. The price quoted at Thunder Bay for eastern markets will be this base price plus costs such as handling, transportation and storage that are associated with having grain in market position.

Monitoring of off-board prices on the Prairies will be carried out by Agriculture Canada under the authority of the Agricultural Products Board Act. Survey results will be provided to the Wheat Board and the Livestock Feed Board for their use in determining the off-board price. The monitoring will include sales to feed mills, feed lots, and to larger livestock and poultry producers within the Wheat Board area.

In addition to continuing to offer grain as in the past, the Canadian Wheat Board has reinstituted a policy used occasionally in the past of offering feed grains on a deferred or provisional price basis. This means buyers can buy feed grains for later delivery at the Canadian Wheat Board domestic selling price in effect at the time of such delivery.

The first offering price of the Products Board will be announced within the next few days. Due to the build-up of grain stocks caused by the rail strike, actual purchasing by the Products Board will begin later this month. Thereafter the Canadian Wheat Board will be able to declare prevailing selling prices based on the monitoring of off-board prices.

The Agricultural Products Board purchase program will be operated through the Canadian Wheat Board and country elevators in the Prairies. Producers wishing to sell to the Products Board will deliver their grain in the same manner as if they were selling to the Wheat Board. They will receive a cash ticket as they do with Wheat Board purchases. The payment they receive, however, will be a final payment and will not entitle them to participation in the pool final payments.

Feed freight assistance will continue to apply during the year and the Canadian Livestock Feed Board will closely observe movement and pricing in eastern Canada.

Mr. Frank Hamilton (Swift Current-Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, anyone familiar with the grain industry is well aware that there have been many communications between the Premier of the province of Quebec and the right hon. Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Trudeau). I want to quote from one letter addressed to the Prime Minister of Canada which reads in part as follows:

> The damage to Quebec farmers caused by Canadian Wheat Board policies is now universally recognized. It has actually created the situation you are familiar with both for the Quebec government and for the farm organizations from whom you have often received numerous representations.
> Moreover, you recently acknowledged those representations by officially and publicly pledging to produce a final solution to the feed grain problem before August 1, 1973.

● (1410)

It is now September 14 and from one end of Canada to the other there is confusion not only in the feed grain industry but in the entire Canadian grain industry.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hamilton (Swift Current-Maple Creek): We have this government establishing initial prices on western grain under which there is a return of some $2 a bushel to the producer. The Canadian Wheat Board is selling that same milling wheat for $5.65 a bushel and the same durum wheat for $9 a bushel on the export market. As I said, the farmer gets $2 per bushel.

We have a program in the grain industry being imposed by stealth. What the farmers want are more options, and what we on this side of the House want is more opportunity to debate those options.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hamilton (Swift Current-Maple Creek): What this announcement means is that we will now have a group of civil servants setting prices for western feed grains. I see this as just another step toward turning the Canadian agricultural industry into a public utility.

An hon. Member: Shame!

Mr. Hamilton (Swift Current-Maple Creek): I am still waiting to hear how the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board is going to get around the new feed grain commission established in the province of Manitoba. In addition, it has just been announced that a feed grain commission is to be established in the province of Saskatchewan. The Minister of Agriculture for Saskatchewan gives as his reason that his board is going to regulate the federal government's feed grain program.

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, we have waited some time for the minister responsible for the Wheat Board to make a statement of policy in the House and he has now done so. It has been obvious from his previous statements that this method of pricing is designed to subsidize the producers in the province of Quebec and the Maritimes at the expense of the grain producers of western Canada. It is designed to give an advantage to the livestock and poultry producers in the eastern provinces and to put the western producers of livestock at a disadvantage.

This is such an unfortunate policy it has forced two grain growing provinces, Manitoba and Saskatchewan, to set up grain marketing agencies. This step should not have been necessary since we already have a very effective marketing agency. It destroys the effectiveness of the Canadian Wheat Board as the pricing agent in the domestic market, and puts in its place a very cumbersome pricing method that will not work well, will give trouble continually and give rise to political arguments in this House and elsewhere. It is an unfair policy for the farmers in the province of Ontario. I am surprised that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan), who is a farmer in Ontario, has lent his support to a policy that is so biased, so cumbersome and in a great many respects unworkable. The pricing policy we had maintained an equality between the price of corn produced in Ontario and the price of feed grains produced in western Canada. It maintained a certain equilibrium which this new policy will destroy.

Finally, I am surprised that the minister, who represents a Saskatchewan constituency, has seen fit over the last several weeks to bring in policies that cause the western grain grower to subsidize the bread and flour industries in Canada, and now caps it off by formally bringing in this policy which will cause these farmers to subsidize the livestock producers of eastern Canada.

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I would like first of all to thank the minister for having followed what seems to become more and more the general rule in this House and having given to the spokesman for our party the French version of his statement.

Mr. Speaker, the problem referred to in the minister's statement is not new. In fact, we have been hearing for several years about the difference in prices between the east and the west.

[Mr. Hamilton (Swift Current-Maple Creek).]

Because I am an optimist, I would like to repeat once more that before criticizing the policy announced today—and I would like this criticism to be as frank as possible—I believe that we should wait until we have tried the policy for a while.

For my part, I do not think that this policy is at all unfair to the western grain producers, any more than it is particularly to the advantage of those in the east.

In any event, I have always thought that the central government existed to adopt programs designed to bring justice to all areas of the land. And I am still convinced that all governments have endeavoured, in the past, to find a solution to that problem.

Of course, to my mind, it is too soon to pass a valid judgment on the plan proposed to us today. In any event, I trust the agriculture organization of the province of Quebec, the APU, will analyze this solution in depth, after which I am convinced its president will make an official statement and say with his usual frankness what he thinks of the policy.

Whatever the case may be, as the measure goes into force from September 15, that is tomorrow, I expect that in the very near future both eastern and western producers will be able to understand the full significance of this measure. If its effects are really good, the government will then have been justified in seeking a really fair solution, although it did take a long to time to do so.

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. member for Joliette (Mr. La Salle) wish to comment the minister's statement on motions?

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): No, Mr. Speaker, I should like to move a motion pursuant to Standing Order 43.

Mr. Speaker: I recognize the hon. member for Joliette.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

PROPOSED ADJOURNMENT TO OCTOBER 15—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43, I request the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion concerning a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the reasons which have led to the early convening of this House, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Matte):

That, when the House has passed Bill C-219, An Act to amend the Old Age Security Act, Bill C-220, An Act to amend the statute law providing for the payment of supplementary retirement benefits to certain persons in receipt of pensions payable out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund, and Bill C-223, an Act to amend the Family Allowances Act and the Youth Allowances Act, and the said bills have received Royal Assent, this House adjourn to October 15.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion moved by the hon. member. Pursuant to Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there such unanimous agreement?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not, and therefore the motion cannot be put.

AIRPORTS

TERMINAL TWO, TORONTO INTERNATIONAL—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Peel South): Mr. Speaker, in accordance with the provisions of Standing Order 43 and on a matter of pressing necessity I move, seconded by the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens):

That this House do direct the Minister of Transport to present to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications all plans, specifications and designs now available and to be available for the extension and alteration of terminal two at Toronto International Airport so that these plans, specifications and designs can be reviewed by the committee to ensure that the minister will not once again create facilities designed not for people but, at the best, for freight—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I bring to the attention of the hon. member that that is not a motion but a speech, and I hesitate to submit any speech in the House to the test of unanimity. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I hope this is the proper time to raise it. On today's order paper two motions appear under notices of motions, one by the hon. member for Thunder Bay (Mr. Penner) and the other by the hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore (Mr. Grier). Both are in exactly the same terms as the motion of the hon. member for St. John's East now standing on the order paper under motions.

I have two points to make with respect to the regularity of these notices of motions appearing today. First, they are couched in precisely the same terms as the motion now standing in the name of the hon. member for St. John's East. Second, if these notices are allowed to remain and are then transferred, as they would normally be on Monday and are placed under the heading, "Motions" on the order paper, then Standing Order 19 would be a nullity.

Standing Order 19 sets forth that notices of motions put by hon. members, if they are not taken up when called, may be allowed to stand with the consent of the government. That means they stand in their regular place. If the notices that are now on the order paper in the names of these two hon. members are allowed to remain there and are transferred, as would normally be the case on Monday, then Standing Order 19 would be totally ineffective.

I suggest, Sir, that you take the matter under advisement before they are transferred, which would normally be on Monday. The timing might prove a little difficult in this case but Your Honour might make a decision some time later today on the point I raise that they should not appear on Monday in a place following the motion now standing in the name of the hon. member for St. John's East.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am quite prepared to make a ruling immediately on the point raised by the hon. member for Yukon, with which I do not agree at all, but apparently there are hon. members who wish to contribute to the procedural point and I will hear them before making the ruling.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I only wish to say that the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) had and has no citation to back up his point. If the motion of the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) were in the possession of House, another motion like it could not be moved, but even that would not stop another member from placing the same notice of motion on the order paper. Sometimes there are two or three bills on the order paper dealing with the same matter. The point at issue is whether or not the House has taken possession of a particular motion. Since this has not happened, and since no decision on the matter has been taken, I am sure there is no reason why a dozen members could not put the same motion on the order paper.

Mr. Reid: Mr. Speaker, I would like to draw your attention and that of the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) to the daily routine of business as it appears in today's Order of Business and Notices. You will find under "Motions" that the second and third motions, standing respectively in the names of the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald) and the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard), are identical. Further, Mr. Speaker, I would point out that the first motion, standing in the name of the hon. member for Skeena, is identical with a motion presented by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands which was debated and subsequently transferred to government orders. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, in conjunction with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), that this a typical ruse by the hon. member for Yukon.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, I have a citation—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I will hear the hon. member, but I suggest that there should not be two or three speeches by the same member on a point of order. The hon. member says he has a citation. I will hear him and then make a ruling, depending, of course, on what the citation might contain.

Mr. Nielsen: The citation is found in Beauchesne's Fourth Edition at page 167. It is citation 200, paragraphs 2, 3 and 4, which have a bearing on the matter. In reply to the parliamentary secretary, I wish to say that the point was raised sincerely and not as a ruse. That statement, being a political one, is obviously being made for the benefit of the delegates in the gallery.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Would the hon. member indicate again the citation to which he referred?

Notices of Motions

Mr. Nielsen: Page 167 of the Fourth Edition of Beauchesne, citation 200, paragraphs 2, 3 and 4.

Mr. Speaker: The citation referred to by the hon. member is, of course, well known. It is that only one question can be put to the House at the same time. But of course that does not answer the point made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

It is long established practice, going back at least 100 years, that there can be more than one notice on the same subject appearing on the order paper. As the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and the parliamentary secretary have indicated, at the present time there are a number of such instances on the order paper as of today, excluding the particular instance to which the hon. member for Yukon has referred, where we have motions in exactly the same terms appearing for consideration of the House. As one of the hon. members said, it is, of course, when a decision has been taken by the House, and when particularly a matter has been under discussion by the House, that the point raised by the hon. member may be taken into account.

The hon. member for Yukon referred to Standing Order 19. Standing Order 19, of course, is quite relevant, but that does not help the hon. member's position at all. Standing Order 19 is to the effect that if a motion placed on the order paper by an hon. member is not proceeded with it falls to the bottom of the order paper or disappears from the order paper. I suggest it is only by consent of the House, and as a result of practice that has been developing, that motions that are not proceeded with immediately are allowed to remain on the order paper. If we agreed, as the hon. member suggests, to put Standing Order 19 strictly into effect, then all the notices which appear on the order paper, including one in the name of the hon. member for Yukon, would have disappeared a long time ago. I suggest to the hon. member that his point is not well taken.

Mr. McGrath: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, now that Your Honour has made a ruling may I say to the House that the two hon. gentlemen could have saved themselves a great deal of trouble because I intend to proceed with my motion on Monday.

Mr. Reid: Why not today?

● (1430)

Mr. Grier: Mr. Speaker, may I say that if the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) had been a little more hasty in proceeding with debate on his motion, which has been standing on the order paper since July 25, it would not have been necessary for other members to move the same motion.

ENERGY

OIL EXPORT TAX—CONSULTATION WITH AND REACTION OF PROVINCES—SCOPE OF FREEZE ON PRICE OF CRUDE

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources concerning yesterday's announcement outside the House of an oil export tax. Will the minister tell the House whether he consulted with the oil-producing provinces either prior to or following the announcement, and can he indicate briefly what the reactions of those provinces have been? I am not referring to the reaction of the Alberta delegates at the annual Liberal meeting but specifically to the reaction of the provincial governments of the oil-producing provinces.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, we advised the Alberta minister of the decision of the National Energy Board and also the government's decision with regard to the consequences of the National Energy Board decision. I think it is fair to say that they made no substantive comment about it.

Mr. Stanfield: We will await that comment, Mr. Speaker. I should like to ask the minister whether this policy that the government has adopted—

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Who is your oil man, Bob?

Mr. Stanfield: I am the oil man.

An hon. Member: There is lots of gas over there.

Mr. Speaker: May we have order, please.

Mr. Stanfield: I certainly do not pretend to be the expert on gas that my friend is.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: I should like to ask the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources whether the government's policy with regard to a freeze includes a freeze on the price of crude imported into Canada for Quebec and the Atlantic provinces, for example, as of the same date that Canadian-produced crude was frozen and whether the same general provisions as have been applied to Canadian-produced crude will also apply to imported crude?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I think it will be obvious to the hon. gentleman that there is no way we could put a price restraint on foreign vendors of crude oil to the eastern Canadian market. Therefore they will be in the situation of offering for sale to Canada crude at prices that will be set by international competition. On this basis, as was indicated by the Prime Minister's statement at the time, crude supplies entering the eastern Canadian market from foreign sources would not be subject to the same restriction as those originating in Canada.

Mr. Stanfield: In other words, Mr. Speaker, consumers of petroleum products in the Atlantic provinces, the province of Quebec and any other part of Canada dependent upon imported crude will pay a higher price for petroleum products than those from the Ottawa Valley west in the event of the international price of oil rising as is generally expected?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, the problem that we were dealing with in the freeze was the fact that each month there has been an increase in the price west of the Borden line. In August there had been an increase of 40 cents and there would have been a further increase in the price of crude of 40 cents but for the restraint imposed and the indication that we would establish a control mechanism. If there is an increase in the international price, in due course that would find itself into the refined product. The hon. gentleman will recall that at least at the moment the price offshore is below that in western Canada.

OIL EXPORT TAX—DISPOSITION OF REVENUE—REASONS FOR POSSIBLE INCREASE NEXT JANUARY

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, while congratulating the minister on taking the first steps toward introducing a two-price system, may I ask him for some clarification regarding his announcement yesterday and the decision of the National Energy Board to impose a 40 cents per barrel levy on crude oil exported from Canada. What disposition will be made of this revenue which I believe is estimated at some $15 million a month? Will any part of it be turned over to the oil-producing provinces? Will it go into a special fund? Has the minister any—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the hon. member might allow the minister to reply to the question at this point.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I should indicate that every month the National Energy Board has, of course, been faced with the responsibility of determining what is a just and reasonable price for Canadian crude sold in the American market. Previously it was able to give a certificate that the price was just and reasonable because the single price applicable to both Canadian use and American export products had been increased each month. Of course, with the restraint the price has not been increased in Canada and this is the reason for the board refusing to issue licences. The intention would be that the difference of 40 cents as of October 1 would go into the public treasury. Very obviously, the producing provinces, particularly Alberta, are very much interested in the disposition of that 40 cents. That was one of the questions that was much discussed yesterday when I met the Alberta minister. I expect to be seeing him and his colleagues in the first month of October to get their further comments on the general proposal.

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary regarding the statement attributed to the minister yesterday in which he said that when the present freeze on crude oil prices has expired on January 30, 1974, it is expected that the domestic price will rise to bring it more into line with the international price. I want to ask the minister what this decision is based on. Is it based on a study of the cost of production or is it merely raising the price in order to satisfy the demands of the major oil companies?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, the assumption would be that we would move from the situation of pricing Canadian crude using a Chicago basing point to using a Montreal basing point. That is to say, crude oil for sale in Canada would be priced in reference to overseas crude landed at Montreal. As I indicated to the Leader of the Opposition, of course there is no indication necessarily that the price will go up. I think the specific question from the journalist that I answered was that if the price at Montreal did go up, would this affect the whole market and I said if we used a Montreal basing price at that time of course it would.

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. member for Champlain wish to ask a supplementary question?

Mr. Matte: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the Chair might first recognize the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands on his supplementary and then the hon. member for Champlain.

Mr. Douglas: In view of the Prime Minister's statement that the government is considering a control mechanism which would either be an export tax or a national oil marketing board, may I ask the government if the decision taken yesterday means that the government has decided that the control mechanism will be an export tax, or may we hope that he has not ruled out the possibility of an oil marketing board for Canada?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, the advantage of an export tax is that in purely legislative drafting terms it is rather simpler to achieve at the moment than a marketing board. I would not rule out the possibility of an export tax first to be followed by a marketing board in due course.

INQUIRY RESPECTING QUEBEC'S POSITION ON FREEZING OF OIL PRICE AND PROPOSED PIPELINE EXTENSION TO MONTREAL

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources whether he received from the Quebec government an official notice of approval or disapproval about his recent statement concerning discount prices of oil, and also if he received an official notice of disapproval about the proposed construction of a pipeline to Quebec province.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Yes, Mr. Speaker, we have been meeting the representatives of the province of Quebec today and the talks are continuing this afternoon. At this point, discussions tend to consider the two sides of the projects into greater detail.

OIL EXPORT TAX—DURATION OF POLICY—ALBERTA POSITION ON PROPOSED PIPELINE EXTENSION TO MONTREAL

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources along the same lines. Is this 40 cents surtax per barrel of crude petroleum a temporary policy or a permanent policy?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the intention would be, subject to the approval of parliament, to attempt to separate the Canadian price of crude oil from the fast rising price of crude oil in the United States, and it would continue, we expect, until, if ever, there is parity between the two.

Mr. Woolliams: The minister said that he met the Minister of Energy for Alberta and other officials. Was the Montreal pipeline discussed with those representatives of Alberta, and what was the result of that discussion? Were they in favour of it or in favour of the government vetoing its own decision?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, the Montreal pipeline was among the subjects discussed. The Alberta position was to note very carefully the explanation we gave them. They intend to respond early in October.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. A number of hon. members are seeking to ask supplementaries on this subject. Perhaps we might see a few other members and then return to the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain and the hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge.

TRANSPORT

SUGGESTED PROVISION OF FERRY SERVICE BETWEEN PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND AND NEWFOUNDLAND IN LIGHT OF RECENT STRIKE

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. Can the minister advise whether any plans are being devised, by way of legislation or by way of the creation of an agency, to provide ferry service between Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland in order to prevent a recurrence of the disruption of ferry services between those islands and the mainland as a result of the recent strike?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, this is something we are looking into. While there is a constitutional obligation on Canada to provide service to Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland there is, on the other hand, the fundamental right in law to strike. We have to reconcile all this. This is why I am looking into the problem and I hope we will find a solution.

ESTIMATE OF COST OF SETTLEMENT OF NATIVE CLAIMS

Mr. Joe Clark (Rocky Mountain): Mr. Speaker, may I direct my question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Now that details of missing documents have been made public through CJOH, will the minister say how the government arrived at the figure of $3 billion as the total cost of settlement of native claims, and will the minister say whether a recognition of the concept of aboriginal rights would change the government's estimate?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I cannot make any comment because I do not know whether those documents are valid or not. However, the House and the Indians are well acquainted with the departmental position on Indians. We are ready in the localities where there is no treaty to negotiate settlements with the Indians and we hope to render them justice. As for their costs, we will know what they are when the settlements will have been reached between both parties.

[English]

Mr. Clark (Rocky Mountain): Would the minister advise the House concerning native claims for lands that are now lost? Is the only form of settlement contemplated by the government a cash or compensation settlement, and has the government ruled out the restoration of that land to the native people?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, we have not ruled out that possibility. We have said in many cases that they could involve some lands. In my dealings with the British Columbia government I made representations to the effect that some Indians in B.C. would like to have land rather than cash. It is the same thing in the James Bay area, and I have made that comment to the Quebec government.

ACCEPTANCE BY PROVINCIAL GOVERNMENT OF OBLIGATIONS UNDER QUEBEC BOUNDARIES EXTENSION ACT TO PEOPLE OF JAMES BAY AREA—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Is it the position of the government that the provinces must, and I emphasize the word "must", meet their constitutional commitments respecting native claims and, if so, what specific action has the government taken since April to ensure that Quebec accepts its obligations under the Quebec Boundaries Extension Act for the native people of the James Bay area?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, we have provided the Indians with the necessary funds to enable them to fight their case in court and we have given them all the support they sought from us. Now we have to wait to see what the decision of the court will be. We expect the decision to be made known in a few weeks.

Miss MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Is it the government's position that the settlement of Indian rights is more social and political than legal and, if so, is the government prepared to broaden the restrictive legal approach it has so far taken to native rights in the James Bay area?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, we have tried during the past three years to have the Indians and Quebec authorities meet in order to find a solution. We attended all the negotiation meetings, except that at a certain moment, the Indians have deemed advisable to suspend the discussions and go before the courts. We then helped them to plead their case before the court. I must say that the Indians have done it quite satisfactorily up to now and I have nothing to reproach them; I do not think that we should be paternalistic and act for the Indians in such a debate.

FINANCE

INQUIRY RESPECTING GUARANTEE BY BANKS OF NO INCREASE IN MORTGAGE INSURANCE AND APPRAISAL FEES AND AMORTIZATION PERIOD

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. In addition to the guarantee the minister indicated to the House yesterday he had obtained from the banks that they would not increase their magnanimously low interest rate of 10 per cent on mortgages and that mortgages would continue to be made available, did he obtain from the banks also a guarantee that they would not increase the variety of charges that go with mortgages, for instance, mortgage insurance fees, appraisal fees and the period of amortization of such mortgages?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I will certainly see whether there is any substance to the allegation of the hon. member.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I will recognize the hon. member in a moment. There are five, six or more members seeking supplementaries. If we do this with every question we will not get far during the question period. I will recognize the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby and then the hon. member for Davenport.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, perhaps the minister has been confused by a certain convention going on now. My question was a question and not an allegation. I asked the minister if he would check and obtain from the banks a guarantee that they will not increase the range of service charges that are permitted to them and that go with the mortgage loans they make to people.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I will certainly make that inquiry.

EFFICACY OF UNITED STATES CONTROLS

Mr. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the President of the Treasury Board. In view of the fact that in recent weeks the retail price of bacon has dropped from $1.79 to $1.19 this weekend, owing to the policies of this government—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Caccia: —may I ask the President of the Treasury Board if he will make funds available immediately to members of the Official Opposition so they may visit the United States and see for themselves the disastrous consequences of the control policies that they are recommending to the Canadian people?

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

POSITION OF MINISTER OF FINANCE ON POSSIBLE PRICES AND INCOMES POLICY

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. We are all pleased that he is surviving the battle raging at the Chateau Laurier. Knowing that the minister is an ambitious man, Mr. Speaker, and in view of the growing body of support within the Liberal party for a wages and prices policy—

Mr. Fairweather: Or any policy.

Mr. McGrath: —or any kind of policy to deal with inflation, for that matter, may I ask the ambitious Minister of Finance, and I know he will weigh his answer very carefully—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We are running short of time. Perhaps the hon. member might come to his question.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, I was merely trying to establish reasonable grounds for my question so the minister could give a reasoned reply. Will the minister, in view of the growing body of support within the Liberal party for a prices and incomes policy, now reconsider his attitude in this regard?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I will be quite prepared to arrange for the hon.

gentleman to be invited to the convention, because his arguments would prove my case better than I could.

ENERGY

FREEZE ON OIL PRICE AND PROPOSED PIPELINE EXTENSION TO MONTREAL—PLACE OF DISCUSSION BETWEEN OTTAWA AND QUEBEC

Mr. Roland Godin (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the hon. Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

In reply to a recent question directed to him by the hon. member for Champlain, the minister stated that discussions were to be held today between officials of his department and Quebec government representatives concerning oil and the proposed pipeline. Could the minister advise the House whether these discussions will be held here on Parliament Hill or at the Château Laurier Hotel?

[English]

OIL EXPORT TAX—RIGHT TO IMPOSE WITHOUT PARLIAMENTARY APPROVAL

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, my question is really addressed to you but I will address it to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of the fact the hon. gentleman has made it very clear that this 40 cents a barrel technique or two-price system, an idea taken from Walter Gordon, will be operated through an export tax, has the minister checked with the law officers of the Crown to determine whether the constitutional rights of parliament are being maintained? Does he have the right to impose a tax on people before that tax has been approved by parliament?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): The hon. gentleman will recall the technique commonly employed in connection with taxation measures, and this action is consistent with it.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, that is the reason I brought your name into it. I want to ask the minister a simple question. Has he obtained the advice of the law officers of the Crown and of the Minister of Justice that to tax people by blackmail before parliament has passed an act is part of the regular procedures of parliament?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I must say I have not formulated the question in that way.

[Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton).]

FINANCE

MORTGAGE INTEREST RATES—AGREEMENT BY BANKS NOT TO INCREASE—POSITION OF OTHER LENDERS

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. Since increased mortgage rates are costing the average home owner in Canada $15,000 in extra interest on a 30-year mortgage if paid to maturity, and in view of the minister's statement to the House concerning an agreement with the banks on mortgage rates, to which the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby has already referred, would the minister tell us whether he has concluded any similar agreement with the other institutions in Canada which actually hold 85 per cent of mortgages compared with the 15 per cent held by the banks?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): I do not think the hon. gentleman's statistics as to the granting of mortgages are accurate in current terms. The undertaking I received from the banks and announced to the House yesterday that they had no intention of raising mortgage rates applies to banks over which parliament has direct authority. Many of the other financial institutions may be under other jurisdictions.

Mr. Stevens: In view of the fact the prime rate now being charged by the chartered banks is 9 per cent, the highest level since Confederation, and an unprecedented one and three-quarter points above the bank rate, would the minister tell us whether the agreement with the banks to which he referred yesterday concerning a special low margin for loan interest rates was made before they raised the rate to 9 per cent or whether the banks have already broken the agreement he thought he had?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): The agreement related only to the rates the banks pay on certificates of deposit. In return for giving my consent under the Bank Act to the interest on those certificates of deposit being raised at a uniform rate of one per cent by all the chartered banks, I asked the banks to see whether they could minimize the spread between what they pay for money and what they charge for money. I am glad to say the banks have narrowed that margin from one per cent to three-quarters on the prime rate for loans, from one to one-quarter on prime rates for loans under $200,000, and have eliminated the spread completely as far as mortgages are concerned.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

SITUATION OF CANADIAN CITIZENS IN CHILE

Mr. Jacques Olivier (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Could the minister advise the House of the fate of some 200 Canadian nationals presently in Chile, who are either being held in custody or unable to correspond with Canadians?

[English]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we have had limited communication with our ambassador in Chile but it has been sufficient to establish that as far as he is aware the Canadians in Chile are safe and well.

Mr. Grier: Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of the Environment.

An hon. Member: Where is he?

Mr. Grier: I am sorry. I thought the Minister of the Environment was in his place. Since he is not, I will defer my question.

SUGGESTED PROTEST AGAINST RUNNING DOWN OF CANADIAN FISHING VESSEL BY FRENCH SHIP

Mr. Thomas S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Recently he informed the House that he was having consultations with the French ambassador about a vessel of Canadian registry travelling in international waters adjacent to French territory. I should like to ask the minister today whether he would agree to hold further conversations with the French ambassador about a vessel of French registry travelling at high speed through heavy fog in territory adjacent to our coast, ignoring recognized international navigation rules and running down a Canadian fishing vessel?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): If the hon. gentleman will provide me with the details I will be very happy to follow this through.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

CANCELLATION OF SUBSIDY ON BUILDING OF SMALL SHIPS—EFFECT ON EMPLOYMENT IN COASTAL PROVINCES

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): I have a question for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. A few days ago I asked him some questions in connection with a disastrous decision of the Minister of the Environment which resulted in the loss of the fishing boat subsidy during the fall period, a period of heavy construction. The minister gave us to understand that arrangements were being made to provide additional funds so that no work presently under way would be terminated and no significant number of jobs lost. Can the minister tell us whether those arrangements have been worked out and what machinery will be set up to deal with this important problem?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Officials of DREE and of the Department of the Environment are at present consulting on the details with the provinces. The question that has to be determined from the provinces is just what volume of additional subsidy or work is necessary to keep these yards going for a period of 90 days, approximately 30 of which have gone by. What we are seeking now is a formula through which sufficient additional grants, or whatever the proper description might be, can be provided authorizing those yards to continue where, in fact, there is now some slack. So far as we have been able to determine, the need is not extensive in many areas of Atlantic Canada, but that is a statistic we are trying to get at the present time.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Can the minister tell us specifically which provinces have not yet indicated the extent of the need? I have particularly in mind Prince Edward Island where more than 100 vessels would be affected this fall. Can he tell us whether satisfactory arrangements have been reached with that province?

Mr. Jamieson: Without challenging the hon. member's comment, may I say I doubt very much whether 100 vessels would be affected. We are talking about a 90-day period; there is nothing which says the subsidy will not be continued beyond that date. This is merely covering the period when an assessment is being made of the ships and vessels that ought to be authorized. I cannot conceive of 100 vessels being deprived of the subsidy, but if the hon. member would give me more details I would be glad to look into it. To the best of my knowledge, during the 90-day period there are no significant losses as far as employment is concerned. If, of course, the freeze were to continue, the story might be entirely different. But I do not expect it will.

OIL PRICE FREEZE—POSITION OF CONSUMERS IN QUEBEC AND ATLANTIC PROVINCES

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I might be permitted to return to the first question I put to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. I asked him about the position of consumers of petroleum products in Quebec and the Atlantic provinces. Is it the position of the government that while the five-month freeze does not apply to crude imported into Canada, consumers in Quebec and the Atlantic provinces will not suffer any continuing disparity compared with consumers in other parts of the country because the domestic price of crude will move freely as the international price of crude moves as determined at the landing point in Montreal? Is that a correct statement?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): The proposal now under discussion is to use a Montreal base price related to the landed international price of crude at Montreal.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS

ALLEGED WASTE OF MONEY IN PURCHASE OF ART OBJECTS DISPLAYED OUTSIDE BUILDINGS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Public Works. In view of the growing protests over the waste and extravagance involved in the purchase of the art monstrosities now appearing before public buildings in Ottawa, when will the hon. gentleman be making changes in his fine arts program to ensure that these huge sums of money are spent in encouraging genuine Canadian art?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will allow the minister to reply but it seems to me that a question asked in those terms might well be placed on the order paper.

Hon. Jean-Eudes Dubé (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Public Works does not claim knowledge in the world of art. These specimens are chosen by a select committee composed of some of the best Canadian artists. It has been the policy of this and preceding governments to apply one per cent of the cost of a federal building to art surrounding the building. The question of what is art is a very subjective one and I would not want to impose my tastes nor the tastes of the hon. member on the public.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Dinsdale: Does the minister intend to accept the advice of the hon. member for Cochrane, who has advised the government either to get rid of them or to place a shroud over them, or is he going to wait until the Canadian people place a shroud over the government?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

CAPE BRETON DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

DENIAL BY CORPORATION OF CANADA PENSION PLAN BENEFITS TO MINERS—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO RECTIFY

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. While expressing appreciation of the fact that he has corrected Tom Kent's wrongful approach to Canada Pension Plan benefits, will the minister carry this action one step further and ensure that Cape Breton miners on retirement will have returned to them the Canada Pension Plan benefits wrongfully taken from them by Mr. Kent?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, while I cannot, of course, accept the premise of the question since this matter is a legal one interpreted by the courts, a decision having been made I have indicated to the hon. member and the House, following discussions with the Minister of Justice, that if there is some avenue through which this question can be raised to determine the appropriateness of the hon. member's representations I am quite prepared to consider this. The Minister of Justice has indicated that he, too, will be looking into the matter.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): A point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member rises on a point of order.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, the minister made reference to court action and to what the Minister of Justice may or may not have to say about the matter. In my question I expressed appreciation to the minister for the changes and benefits he has already made available to the miners since that court action. All I now ask is that he continue this same progressive method, disregard Tom Kent's representations, and give back to the miners what has been taken from them. This has nothing to do with the court action.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): He has already improved on the situation.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): A question of privilege, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member sought the floor to ask a question and he received an answer from the minister. He then rose on a point of order, though I do not think he wants me to rule on his point of order. He is now rising on a question of privilege. I will recognize him, but again I seek the co-operation of hon. members as we move closer to the end of the question period.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege because of a remark just made by the hon. member for St. Boniface. I have made a promise to this House that whenever the hon. member for St. Boniface professes to have some knowledge of heavy water I will repeat my invitation to him, or to any other member on that side, to come to my office where I will show him a transcript of the remarks of their House leader. PENSIONS

REQUEST FOR ENLARGEMENT OF TERMS OF REFERENCE OF COMMISSIONER INQUIRING INTO PENSIONS OF RAILWAY EMPLOYEES

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Labour who I believe is behind the curtain. Is the minister in a position to report any progress respecting the commitment he made to the House on August 30 and 31 that he would consider either enlarging the terms of reference given to Professor Deutsch or appointing another commissioner so that the adequacy and fairness of railway pension plans in their totality, especially Canadian National's, might be examined?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I recall the remarks I made in the House on that date, though not precisely. I believe I indicated it would not be in the best interests of the railway workers to have Mr. Deutsch's terms of reference enlarged because it might delay his decision, which he would want to give to the arbitrator who indeed is himself under some haste to make a final determination. I did say that a supplemental study of the benefit structure of the pensions as opposed to the costing was under consideration, and I advise the hon. member it is still under consideration. Discussions will have to be held with the railways concerned, the Minister of Transport and the Union leadership, and we will get these discussions under way as soon as we can.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member rises on a supplementary.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Joseph-Philippe Guay (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): If I understand aright, will the minister give consideration to the possibility of asking Mr. Deutsch to hold hearings in the various provinces of Canada? Is that the understanding I got from that statement?

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. These parliamentary secretaries across the way are paid $4,000 a year—

Some hon. Members: Order!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I seek the co-operation of hon. members. We have just about reached the end of the question period. I will allow the hon. member to speak on his question of privilege; he should be allowed to indicate what his question of privilege is so the Chair may make a ruling.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, my question of privilege is one that has been raised in the past. A parliamentary secretary in this House asking a question is tantamount to one minister asking a question of another minister. These members are paid $4,000 a year extra to answer questions, not to ask them and take up the time of the House with spurious questions to ministers. They can get answers to these questions merely by lifting the telephone or in caucus. It is doubly offensive for the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport to ask a question on the very subject matter that comes under his minister's responsibility.

Mr. Speaker: I hope we do not get involved in a debate on this point which has been raised by hon. members on a number of occasions. I feel it is a serious point of order more than a question of privilege. The parliamentary secretary wishes to rise on this matter and I will recognize him for that purpose, and then attempt to call orders of the day.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I should like to adhere to your request, but I must say that I honestly believe all members of parliament, notwithstanding the fact they are parliamentary secretaries, ministers or otherwise, have the right to represent their constituencies on an equal basis.

An hon. Member: Never mind the commercials.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): I feel we should not be forced to refrain from asking questions other than of our own ministers, giving the people in our own areas the impression that we have an inferiority complex as representatives in this House.

An hon. Member: Don't waste the time of the House, Joe.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I feel I have every right and reason in the world to represent the people of Manitoba residing in my constituency.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

An hon. Member: Take your seat, Joe.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: May we have order, please.

An hon. Member: Joe for leader.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to the House that the point has been made before and that the arguments the hon. parliamentary secretary is advancing now, in support of his contention, which is very defensible, that hon. members have the right to ask questions have been made before, I wonder whether we will gain anything by pursuing the matter further. Orders of the day.

CANADA PENSION PLAN

CONTRIBUTIONS OF MEMBERS OF CERTAIN RELIGIOUS SECTS, INTEREST RATE ON DELAYED PAYMENTS, PAYMENT OF LEGAL EXPENSES

The House resumed, from Thursday, September 13, consideration of the motion of Mr. Lalonde for the second reading and reference to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs of Bill C-190, to amend the Canada Pension Plan.

Mr. William Rompkey (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a few comments on this bill, particularly in respect of its effect on the people of Newfoundland.

This particular piece of legislation, together with other social legislation brought in by this government and previous Liberal administrations, has been a godsend to our people. Certainly, our elderly people can remember the time when they lived on a subsistence income, from hand to mouth, and knew not where the next morsel of bread would be coming from, when survival was the prime consideration. There have been changes in some communities, while in other communities in Newfoundland that change has not been so obvious. This piece of legislation, along with the family allowance benefits, old age pensions and other social assistance legislation brought in by this government and, as I said, previous Liberal administrations, have been of great benefit to the people of Newfoundland. No longer do they have to fear what the future may bring, and no longer is there a question as to where the next meal is coming from because for many people in Newfoundland there is now a guaranteed annual income.

I wholeheartedly support the main thrust of the argument and the policy of the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde), and his hope that we will eventually get to the point where we guarantee an income to all Canadians, not just through the use of social programs to allow them to survive but by creating jobs in order that they may be useful and productive citizens. We should work toward the day when we have a guaranteed annual income for all Canadians, and I think this is a step in the right direction.

I am particularly pleased with the one aspect of this amendment in so far as it applies to the situation at Goose Bay. As members of the House will know, and certainly the government does, the United States force at Goose Bay is phasing out its operations in that community, leaving a partial economic vacuum. It has been the duty and responsibility of this government, together with the government of Newfoundland, to provide for that situation. Part of the problem has or will be solved with the setting up of the Goose Bay project group, the objective of which is to broaden the economic base of Goose Bay by finding other employment for the people of that area. I might say that some 500 or 600 people are affected by this change.

Mr. Barnett: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. There was some noise in the House and I did not hear which order number was called. Having listened to the remarks of the hon. member, I am wondering whether the order I thought had been called was in fact called, that order having reference to Bill C-190.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The order that has been called is in respect of Bill C-190, to amend the Canada Pension Plan and to refer it to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs. Does that answer the hon. member's question?

Mr. Barnett: It answers part of my question, Mr. Speaker, but it does not explain the relationship between the remarks of the hon. member and the bill before us.

Mr. Rompkey: Mr. Speaker, there is one aspect of this bill which has particular reference to the Goose Bay situation, and I was trying to establish the context in which this bill has that effect. This is of particular importance to the people in my area because of the present employment situation there and the changed situation of about 500 or 600 people.

This bill provides that Canada Pension Plan coverage will be provided the civilian employees of the USAF base in Goose Bay who were not covered previously. I want to put on the record the fact that this amendment to the act has great meaning for these people. There was a pension plan for these employees at the excelsior plant, some of whom found it to be favourable, but there was a great deal of dissatisfaction as well.

This amendment to the Canada Pension Plan provides that these employees will at least have the benefit of some pension rights which were denied them previously. I submit that this is a particularly important aspect of this bill, and I am pleased that the minister has seen fit to include it. He made the announcement in Goose Bay when this amendment was first proposed, and I would simply like to say today that I am very pleased indeed to see this bill before the House.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question? I listened with interest to the remarks of the hon. parliamentary secretary, the member for Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador (Mr. Rompkey), for whom I have the greatest respect. I am sure he did not mean to convey the impression in his preliminary remarks that prior to the advent of the social welfare measures which came to Newfoundland as a consequence of confederation, and he specified the family allowance, old age pension and so on, our people were living from hand to mouth. He conveyed the impression that we were in a state of near starvation, and I am sure he did not mean to do that, because in so doing he is not doing justice to that province we both have the privilege to represent in this House. Nor does he do justice to the proud, ancient and honourable tradition of those hard-working, God-fearing and proud people of that province. I am sure he would want to correct the record in that respect.

Mr. Rompkey: Mr. Speaker, I am prepared to stand by the record. Perhaps I should elaborate on my previous remarks by saying that in no way did I mean to downgrade the people of Newfoundland who have worked for their living for many years, and worked very hard. I do suggest that in many cases there was a question of survival. The hon. member knows as well as I the terrible conditions that existed in Newfoundland at one time.

He remembers the six cents a day and the dole, as I do—not personally, but through experience. Our people now are immeasurably better off in that they have a guarantee from this government of an income. I was simply putting on the record that it is certainly a godsend to our province that we will never have to go back to the days our people once faced. There was a period of great fear concerning what the future would bring. I think that fear no longer exists. In no way do I mean to say that our people are not self-sufficient. They always have been and, hopefully, always will be to the degree they can be within the context of their environment. They now have something that will keep them from a state of purely self-subsistence survival.

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I very much regret that when this bill was presented on July 20 I was not in my place in this chamber. At that time I was attending an important regional meeting of the Caribbean Commonwealth Parliamentary Association. It is obvious I was not on holiday, because July 20 is not the best time for one to visit the Caribbean, however beautiful those islands are and however pleasant they are to visit at any time. Therefore I missed the initial presentation of this measure.

I have read with great interest the speeches made on that day. I think the hon. member for Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo (Mr. Beatty)—an excellent member and a long-time resident of that constituency which is a wonderful part of the country but has a terribly long name—spoke with great understanding of the major aspects of this bill. I thought also that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) showed his usual understanding of these matters and his usual concern for helping people who need the kind of assistance which this kind of measure renders. The hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Roche) also spoke wisely and well. So I believe the debate has been well launched.

Although I suppose one can never predict these things, I do not think there should be a long debate. When this matter was mentioned in the committee by the minister, I told him at that time of the view of myself and my colleagues, that we would not be delaying this measure because we know it has merit and justice. So far as I can see, the only member who mentioned what I call the first major aspect, the matter of appeals, was the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. This is a matter about which a number of my colleagues, especially my seatmate the hon. member for Cumberland-Colchester North (Mr. Coates), have been concerned. There was an iniquitous situation in which a citizen wishing to appeal a decision of the tribunal would not have his expenses underwritten by the government.

I am sure every member of this House welcomes what I see in this bill as a correction of an injustice. I commend the minister for bringing about this correction. Justice delayed is better than no justice at all, and we are glad this has been done. I am sure it will help people. It is very much in line with what I thought was the spirit of the legislation when it was put into effect. I have been here long enough to remember the inauguration of the Canada Pension Plan. In fact, we had three launchings and one of them finally made it. It is a complex but very important piece of legislation which means a great deal to many people.

Later in this session I hope we will be able to discuss in a fundamental way some of the matters dealt with by the hon. member who spoke recently and was checked up by my colleague from St. John's East (Mr. McGrath). There are many important issues in respect of the Canada Pension Plan, such as the matter of retirement, the ceiling and age, as well as disabled persons, which must be more carefully studied when we have the broader spectrum of the legislation before us.

On the matter of the exemption of certain groups, which received more attention than some other aspects, I want to say I am very pleased that these fine citizens have at long last—there have been quite a number of appeals—had the rightness of their position accepted. I may say that in my constituency, and in so far as I know in the province in which I am proud to live, Prince Edward Island, there are no people who belong to the Hutterite or Mennonite groups and therefore I have no special appeal in mind. However, I have had the honour to know many of these people while living in other parts of Canada and I regard them as among the finest Canadians.

An hon. Member: Hear, hear!

Mr. Macquarrie: I believe it was the hon. member for Palliser (Mr. Schumacher) who on July 20 referred to the virtues of these people as exemplified in their living from day to day. How wonderful it would be in our society if we could carry on the practice of earlier generations in which the older members of society were looked after by their own families. How wonderful it would be if a grandmother and grandfather could be enshrined in love and affection right in the home. At one time that was the situation in our society. It was a part of our culture. One would never think of turning the aged, loved ones over to an institution.

We realize that now this has changed. It is difficult enough now to obtain a house for the growing family. There is no such thing as a spare bedroom, let alone quarters for the grandmother and the grandfather. But these remarkable people have been able to carry through that familial affection and have been able to make adequate provision for an extended family. They have been able to retain their values, their moral code and at the same time be productive citizens. The people of the groups I have mentioned are among the finest farmers. They work the soil of Canada and make it produce. They bring forth good crops from the providence which has been given to all of us.

The fact that their basic tenets of religion are different from ours I think makes it all the more important that the state recognize their right to differ. The Hutterites and Mennonites are conscientious objectors in terms of war. They adhere very rigidly and strictly to the injunctions against killing. Some of us have an entirely different background. My family got over on this side of the water because we had fought a war which we lost, which Bonnie Prince Charlie, our leader, lost. We were brought over here without any great kindness by the victor of that war, a man very properly called Stinky Willie, the Duke of Cumberland. So our position is different, but surely it is our right and proper duty to respect a different tradition.

I think in countries that are thoughtfully democratic we recognize that even the right to bear arms need not be forced upon people. A well known statesman of Great Britain, Prime Minister Clement Atlee, carried to the very end his view that he would not bear arms. I commend him for his view, although not sharing it. What should be remembered by people in the country is that while the groups mentioned here have a certain view on such things as involvement in insurance, these people, unique I believe among most Canadians, do not draw from the welfare payments made available by the state. It should not be forgotten that while the Hutterites pay income tax, land tax and all sorts of taxes, you will not find them accepting or receiving such things as family allowance cheques or old age security cheques. In my opinion they deserve for that great credit.

I think it is only reasonable that the adjustment which has been made in this bill should be carried through. I share with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre the belief—here I am paraphrasing him perhaps somewhat roughly—in the value of universality. You make a better pension plan if you have a broad basis of participation. But, as he also mentioned, the question of freedom of religion is very high in importance, if not paramount, in the kind of values that are at the heart, core and centre of our parliamentary system, our system of basic freedoms and individual rights.

Beyond that, in a working society in a country such as ours we have to make pragmatic judgments. I suppose you could argue that under the Canada Pension Plan a whole province has been exempted because it was discovered a few years ago that the province of Quebec was working out in fact a better plan than the Government of Canada. I remember those very tense days. I was here at the time and I know what the then prime minister, Mr. Pearson, was going through. It was not an easy situation.

So we developed a parallel system. The Canada Pension Plan was improved because of some of the borrowings from the concepts which the Quebec plan had brought forward. If I remember rightly, it was the premier of the province of my colleague from St. John's East who the first time he saw the Quebec plan at a dominion-provincial conference said that that was the plan for them rather than the federal one. So the idea of making adjustments, as against total universality—I suppose universality is always total—is not one that disturbs me. I look upon this not only as the right and proper thing to do but as a pragmatic settlement of a situation which had been growing difficult.

I know the depth of feelings that these people have; my colleague the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp) and my colleague the hon. member for Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo have told me about it. I know how long these people have pled their case, how carefully and thoughtfully they have put it forward, and I would like them to know that I am delighted that they have been given this measure of adjustment, this reasonable acceptance of their reasonable proposition.

I would like them to know, also, that while some of their basic viewpoints on religious and social grounds are quite different from mine, I believe they deserve tremendous respect from the people of Canada for their fidelity to different mores, a different sense of values and different social customs. I would say that the people mentioned in this bill are fine Canadian citizens who made a great positive contribution to this country and who, if I may mention it, very rarely if ever show up negatively by, for instance creating any trouble in our society. I have never found these people to have been an embarrassment through the violation of laws or the codes of the rest of society. They are, in fact, good citizens. The economic system they have worked out is a commendable one. Some of the family arrangements which they make are in my judgment not only commendable, but I wish that more of us and more of our ancestors had been able to adhere to them in a meaningful and functional way.

So I close by saying that I welcome this piece of legislation. If I had things to criticize, I would have no difficulty in uttering the criticism. But this is a good measure. It is justice somewhat delayed, but justice none the less, and for it I stand and to it I will give my support.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo-Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, may I say first of all how great a pleasure it is to follow the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie) with his beautifully wise, intelligent and civilized approach to a subject. Perhaps I say that only because I happen to concur in the point of view he has expressed, but I think I would say it on other occasions as well.

This is a most important time for me. There have been many people in the House of Commons, from all parties, who have tried to put the cause of the Old Order of Mennonites before the House in order to grant them an exemption, but I was the one who originated the private member's bill which for the last five years has been appearing on the order paper. I have been working with various people in the House in order to see this particular amendment come before the chamber and, I hope passed.

There are two really important aspects to this bill beyond the particular arguments of the Mennonites. The first is that it is an example of a private member's bill that got somewhere not that the language the government is using in its amendment is the language of my bill, but at least the same intent is there. If you look back, you will find that until very recently letters from the Prime Minister and from ministers of the cabinet have been going to the Mennonites explaining to them why we could not possibly make this kind of an amendment. So the other important and very assuring aspect is that governments are in fact prepared to change their minds and take another look at a situation.

I also want to express my deep appreciation to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). I can tell you that while it took a fair amount of persuading of the government and other members of the House, no one was more difficult to persuade than the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. While I am sure he has his reservations about changes in the principle of universality, I am very pleased that he accepts some of the arguments that have been put forward. To me this is very important. I greatly value his judgment, and certainly his support, and I am pleased to see that he will support this amendment.

My first involvement with the Mennonites took place in a little town called New Hamburg. I was talking to a fine looking gentleman who seemed very friendly. There was an election at that time and I was compaigning. He listened to everything I was saying and was being very encouraging. I was quite happy. I said to one of my campaign workers afterwards, "Things look good. I saw Mr. So-and-So, and he looks friendly". He said, "Forget it." "What do you mean?" I asked. He said "Mr. So-and-So is an Old Order Mennonite and he does not vote". Even when they do vote, the tendency has always been to vote for the government in power as a way of not affecting a change and assuming the least responsibility for some of the things that have gone on in this world. I should say that my philosophy in not that of the Old Order of Mennonites.

But I would not like to see a society in which my philosophy, or anybody else's philosophy, was imposed on other people without any real pressing necessity for that. The Mennonites are unusual for a number of reasons. They have a claim against society. They argue that promises were made to them when they came to Canada to exempt them not only from military service but from other programs. Admittedly, at the time those promises were made there were no insurance programs as we know them today. The government was not heavily involved in welfare, but the implied promise was that they could live their lives differently from the people around them.

I am satisfied, from looking over the documents that were signed by the governments of that day, that a promise was made to the Old Order of Mennonites on that basis, and to the extent that it is possible for a changing society to honour that kind of guarantee we should do so. The Mennonites are a pacifist group. They have been objecting to the moneys taken from them for the purposes of the Canada Pension Plan, but they have never resorted to violence. The government has been seizing their milk cheques to collect the Canada Pension Plan contributions simply because the Mennonites refuse to pay those contributions. This procedure was the result of a tacit agreement between the government and the group because, had the Mennonites contributed voluntarily they would have broken a very important oath that each of them takes.

It is important to put on the record the position the Mennonites are in from a religious point of view with respect to the kind of oath that one takes on becoming a Mennonite. Here, it is important to remember that we are not talking about all Mennonites. The vast majority are not in the same position as those in the Old Order of Mennonites. In my area the Old Order represents something less than 800 families, and there are many thousands of Mennonites who do not go along with some of the views of the Old Order. Members of the Old Order hold to the following:

> The church, we believe, is a genuine brotherhood in which individual members obligate themselves to help one another in time of need and to be willing to submit to the discipline and the counsel of the total brotherhood.
> A central teaching and practice of the Mennonite church from the 16th century until today has been that of Christian mutual aid.

Their objection to insurance of any sort, private as well as public, is that it violates their obligation to assist each other. I do not find their view unattractive. If we could extend the view of mutual aid to our entire society we would do well. To some extent we do so through insurance programs, but as I have pointed out they object to such programs. It may be difficult for me to understand their position clearly. My mind is not tuned to this in the same way as their minds are, but I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that members of the Old Order of Mennonites feel strongly about this matter.

I remember discussions in the standing committee, when a number of members made the point that the Old Order of Mennonites are not the only people objecting to the Canada Pension Plan, and that there were all kinds of people who would like to opt out of that plan. But the distinction concerns their reasons. In the latter case, people might get a better deal through a private plan rather than from the public plan. But that is not the objection of the Old Order of Mennonites.

To prove their sincerity they have said, "We are willing to pay the amount of money required from us as contributions, and we are willing to forgo any benefits from the Canada Pension Plan, but we do not wish our money to be paid into an insurance program. We will pay it into a charity, or into foreign aid, or into some other fund from which we do not get any direct benefit." That is an important distinction. When hon. members say that there are other people who would like to opt out of the Canada Pension Plan then I ask, are those people prepared to take the Mennonite test, that is, pay the premiums but not take any benefits, to show that their objection is one of principle and not of pocketbook? People often want to opt out for pecuniary reasons.

If a person wishes to opt out of the Canada Pension Plan, we are in a position to test his sincerity of principle by telling him that if he is willing to forgo the benefits, but still pay the alternative to premiums, as the Mennonites propose, then there is no reason why he cannot opt out. But I do not think many people would take up that offer. I have always been a strong proponent of universality, and like the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre it is difficult for me to conclude that some part of universality has to be breached or set aside. But I suggest that universality can in fact be strengthened by making certain well defined exemptions.

Of course, if there were widespread exemptions universality would be destroyed. The great criticism against universality is not that it will not work, not that it is necessary, but that when you force all people into the same position or pattern, while there is a kind of equity in doing that there is also the possibility of some injustice being created in the process. If an exemption can be made in a specific, proven, well documented instance, then universality is strengthened because the small element of injustice that might be present is removed. I suggest that by granting this exemption from the Canada Pension Plan to the Mennonites the universality of the plan will be strengthened. There is no danger to the plan.

There is a difference in the eyes of the Mennonites between the Canada Pension Plan and other programs. The Mennonites pay their income taxes, and contribute to other programs. The difference is simply that the CPP, more than other programs, can be clearly related in terms of benefits to the individual contributors. In other words, it is more a straight insurance program than other programs. Revenue to pay the old age pension comes from a number of sources. It is difficult to know what percentage comes from each source. The pension is not related to the contributions an individual makes. That is the way we want it, to insure everyone, not on the sole basis of risk but on the basis of social obligation, so that those who are better-off can assist those less well-off. I would be opposed to any exemption from such programs for the Mennonites. Incidentally, because of their work ethic Mennonites are probably somewhat better-off economically than most people around them. They should, therefore, be making a contribution to the rest of society based on their better position.

When it comes to the Canada Pension Plan, however, those ideas do not apply with equal strength because it is more difficult to make a case for universal coverage under the Canada Pension Plan. Under that plan, the more you earn, the more you get and the longer you contribute, the more you get. Therefore, with few exceptions it is very much an income related program. It does not do any harm to the other people in the Canada Pension Plan to grant an exception in an unusual case.

I could say much more about the Mennonites, Mr. Speaker, but I can understand that some people may not be fully convinced—even some of my colleagues. I can understand that because in my party for years and years—sometimes it seems for centuries—we have fought to establish the principle of universality. Any breach of that principle has to be justified very clearly. Perhaps it is not possible to ever completely resolve this question. Perhaps those who may vote for the exemption, but who are strong proponents of universality, may have some doubt in their minds. There is some doubt in my own mind about which way I should go on this issue, and whether I should be taking up the cause of the Mennonites. I resolved that doubt in this way, Mr. Speaker. Since there was a question on both sides, and, universality did not appear to be in danger of being destroyed if the principle could largely be established, then if I was going to err, I would err on the side of greater freedom. On that basis, and I hope on the basis of some of the arguments I have made, I hope that this bill will ultimately receive the unanimous consent of this House.

Mr. Leggatt: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Saltsman: Certainly.

Mr. Leggatt: Are any of the basic old age pension benefits being accepted by that community?

Mr. Saltsman: Mr. Speaker, I am not certain, but I know that many of these people reject the old age pension. I have no way of proving this, but I understand that most of them reject it; some accept it. They make a contribution to it; it is kind of a tax.

While I am very sympathetic to the Mennonite point of view, I do not share it; I do not feel that it is possible for anyone to opt out of society. You cannot opt out of having your air poisoned or being invaded by an army; you cannot opt out of an epidemic or famine. It is my view that we are interdependent, but that is not the view of the Mennonites. I think they have made their case and have tried to do so conscientiously within the framework of their religion. Whatever my view may be of their religious beliefs, they do not do anybody any harm; that is the important thing.

If in fact their views came into collision with the best interests of society, some other attitude would have to be taken. They have a different view of the old age pension although most of them reject it as well as the family allowance.

Mr. Leggatt: Would the hon. member permit one further question?

Mr. Saltsman: Yes.

Mr. Leggatt: In terms of the provisions of the basic old age pension, would the hon. member not agree that this is in fact an insurance provision against the rigours of old age? If some of them accept it, is their position not inconsistent?

Mr. Saltsman: Mr. Speaker, I think there is always some inconsistency in a position but there is a point of consistency. I know it is not always possible to admit hon. members to the caucus of the New Democratic Party, but this may be one of those rare occasions when you can see the kind of thing that goes on here. I am sure it is repeated in the caucuses of other parties.

There are different kinds of insurance programs. Medicare is a different kind of insurance program because its benefits are not really directly related to contributions. In other words, no insurance company would undertake that program on an actuarial basis. Things like medicare, the old age pension and the family allowances, are really social welfare programs underwritten by those people who are better-off for those who are less well-off. There is not just a sharing of the risk at one level, there is a sharing between all income levels. The argument against medicare was not that the rich could not take care of themselves; it was just that under medicare the rich would not only have to take care of themselves but perhaps others who could not.

While there are some similarities between programs such as the old age pension, medicare and the Canada Pension Plan, there are also differences, and it is those differences that I was trying to point out earlier. With the Canada Pension Plan it is easier to relate the actual contributions made by the person to the benefits he receives, very much like private insurance and in contrast to the other programs which are government insurance programs.

Mr. Thomas S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge (Mr. Saltsman) presented the House with a carefully prepared rationale for the bill before us as he sees it. Usually, I find myself persuaded by the hon. member without too much difficulty but as he has indicated, he is not certain that he has persuaded all his colleagues in this party. The hon. member congratulated the government for having changed its mind on this matter. There have been times when I have been willing to agree that the government should be congratulated for changing its mind, but I am not convinced that this is such an occasion.

I am rather fearful that the provision for opting out, of which was discussed in detail by the hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge, embarks us upon a slippery path in respect of legislation which is of general application. One can think of a number of situations when persuasive arguments could be advanced for allowing certain groups within our society to opt out of certain provisions in legislation.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps hon. members would agree that we now call it four o'clock.

● (1600)

Mr. Reid: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, there have been discussions, as a result of which we might rise at this point until the call of the bells for royal assent, if the hon. member who is to introduce a matter for discussion in private members' hour is prepared to agree. If members are agreeable, I ask that it be made an order of the House.

Mr. Bell: Mr. Speaker, we agree. If it is possible, we want to get our Liberal friends over to their convention. They are of absolutely no use around here, but if they are over there we can wish them an interesting and happy time.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, as I said around five o'clock this morning, I do not like to be difficult. The hon. member for Surrey-White Rock (Mr. Mather) whose bill is slated for this afternoon would like to speak on his bill, even if the private members' hour is to be only 45 minutes long. If any Liberals want to stay, they are welcome.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I take it that the House agrees to the calling of the particular order standing in the name of the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' PUBLIC BILLS

[English]

NATIONAL TRANSPORTATION ACT

AMENDMENT TO ESTABLISH UNIVERSAL EMERGENCY TELEPHONE NUMBER

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey-White Rock) moved that Bill C-37, to establish a universal emergency telephone number, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

He said: Mr. Speaker, as the bill indicates, the purpose of the bill is to amend the National Transportation Act by adding immediately after section 22(1)(i) the following:

(j) provide for the establishment by all Canadian telephone companies of a universal emergency reporting telephone number.

While I have little expectation or even hope that the bill will be passed, I believe that the discussion of what is proposed can be useful, as the discussion will arouse in the public mind and in communities which will later be effected, an interest in the subject. In this way we will speed up the establishment of a provision such as this which is an additional step in the field of public safety. This additional step involves the establishment of a single emergency number through which people can summon police, fire or ambulance help in any city of Canada or, indeed, of North America because in the United States a great deal of progress has been made already in establishing that single, universal aid number in the telephone system.

I point out that I cannot do better than quote from an article which appeared in Life magazine some five years ago. Since that article appeared, the single emergency telephone number has been introduced in some 250 area systems, and an additional 60 systems are to operate with the number by the end of 1974. It will be installed in those systems in the United States, Mr. Speaker. The article reads:

It won't be long before 911 takes over as the most memorable trio of digits in American culture.

The telephone industry . . . has announced that it is ready to start converting its phones to a single emergency number that could summon police, fire or ambulance help in any city on the country.

The wonder of it all is that it took the nation with half the phones in the world until 1968 to decide that the traditional means for reporting emergencies are close to anarchy. In Los Angeles County there are 50 different numbers for the police. In the St. Louis area there are 32 police numbers and 57 for fire emergencies. The numbers themselves, each with a different mind-cracking combination of seven digits, are a guarantee that nobody will be able to remember them when they need them most.

To make full use of the 911 system, cities will have to set up central dispatchers for their emergency services—a process that fortunately is already under way in some areas. And for those citizens stranded with an emergency to report and nothing but folding money in their pockets . . .

American telephone companies will come to their rescue. I continue:

As the 911 systems goes into effect, the company proposes changing all its pay phones so that emergency calls—or those to "0" for operator—will not require a dime to go through. In effect, the nations's 1,363,000 public booths will become direct emergency phones.

The speed with which the new system goes into operation now depends on the cities agreeing to install it. They should regard it as a 911 situation.

I think the value of one emergency telephone number is obvious. In any emergency, time is of crucial importance. In trying to get an ambulance, for example, or police, one uses the nearest telephone as the medium of communication. The injured or other person involved in an emergency who is trying to use that telephone most likely does not know immediately the number to call. He or she, even if a telephone book is available, wastes precious moments looking for the number while injury worsens or flames mount.

Moreover, the person trying to call must first find a ten cent coin which he or she may not have. He may come from another city, where a different emergency call system is in force. He may, in many cities, succeed in reaching the operator and say, "This is an emergency," and the operator will attempt to contact the right source of aid. But this takes time, Mr. Speaker, time which in many emergencies is vital to life or property. Hence, I urge the adoption of the one universally established and used emergency telephone number. This would be a success.

In Canada, Mr. Speaker, the Bell Telephone Company has already reserved the universal number 911 in many places where that company operates. Also, there are at this time six centres operating on the universal 911 number. Four of these are in Alberta, one is in St. John's, Newfoundland and one in Fredericton. Bell Telephone also plans to end the practice of requiring a person to use a coin in order to call the operator or to use the 911 number. According to what I was told yesterday, this is in the works for the future. There are, however, other telephone companies. I have a list of some of them. They use a different system for calling emergency help. Some companies draw little pictures in the telephone books they publish; others, in their telephone books, leave blank spaces in which one can fill in emergency telephone numbers.

The purpose of the bill before us is to amend the National Transportation Act and to provide, by law, for the establishment of the one universal emergency reporting telephone number. If this is to be done, it will require the co-operation of all telephone companies and of all the centres in which the universal number is to be established. In turn, this will mean that those centres of population will have to provide the central agency from which all types of aid can be summoned and relayed. Hence, while I am confident that what is aimed at will appeal to hon. members, yet, even as the author of this proposal, I am sure that the most that we can do at this stage, is allow the subject matter of the bill to go to an appropriate committee of the House where it may be discussed and, no doubt, improved and where witnesses can be heard as to the practicality of what is proposed.

There is no doubt in my mind that by degrees a universal emergency telephone number system is coming. Indeed, it is already in effect in hundreds of areas in North America. To ensure its fullest success, it should be universally known and used. It should be as universally communicated as the illustrated highway signs in North America indicating a hill, or a low bridge or a curve. I urge hon. members to allow the subject matter of the bill to proceed to a committee.

[Mr. Mather.]

Mr. Paul McRae (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, there is no question there is a serious need for a 911 number or other emergency number with which everyone in this country is familiar, so that in an emergency they could get help quickly. This emergency number system should be set up in such a way that a person who does not happen to have a dime could make his call. The government supports the intent of this measure and I believe it is a good thing we should be talking about it this afternoon and supporting it.

There are, however, some difficulties attached to setting up such a system. One of the results of this debate may be to push the communications industry into moving forward a little faster. The telephone companies have been in consultation with the government about the establishment of the 911 number and the conclusion has been reached that certain far-reaching developments are required in close co-operation with all the municipalities concerned. First, a central organization needs to be established by the municipalities concerned and adequate manning of the emergency facilities arranged. In some cities this is already being done. London and Toronto, I understand, have already done so.

The number 911 has been used and other numbers have been employed in various cities. In cities which have not established reporting centres one can, of course, dial emergency centres such as police and fire brigade separately. Once again, delay arises because the user must pick up a directory and look up a number. We all know that it is sometimes not possible to find a directory at hand. This applies particularly to pay phones. There is no question that a universally recognized number such as 911 would be much more convenient.

As I have indicated, some problems have been brought to my attention. Emergency systems, if they are to work, must be simple in operation and combined in a pre-determined network which assures the calling party of reaching the desired emergency control centre with minimum effort and a high degree of reliability. Unless the system is engineered and adapted to all types of switching centres, confusion will result due to different requirements in the territorial areas. We all recognize that different types of equipment are in use in different areas. This is one of the reasons for delay.

Emergency reporting necessitates reaching an interrogation centre where clearcut and appropriate questions can be asked to ensure rapid and correct dispatch of the appropriate people. In manually operated exchanges, a system for the centralization of emergency calls would be essential; trained personnel would accept the call and forward it for appropriate action. As hon. members know, there are still manually-operated exchanges in some parts of the country. In locations not equipped for direct distance dialling, some homing-in of emergency calls for appropriate forewarning is essential.

The question of responsibility for failure or errors is a serious one. Minimization of this potential would require an emergency network to be set up. Suppose a call is made in an emergency and the operator misinterprets it, fails to get the proper address or call back to the right number. Where does the responsibility lie? This is a matter which might well be considered in connection with the bill before us.

Another matter of concern is whether adequate facilities are available. Supposing there is only one emergency number and a great many people are calling in. Might not a situation arise where calls could not be sorted out quickly and correctly? Then again, an emergency number must harmonize with the normal numbering pattern of exchanges. In some exchanges a five-digit calling system is employed. In others, a seven-digit system. Some of the smaller exchanges use only two or three digits. We should also remember that emergency centres are vulnerable to wide fluctuations in load, so it would seem essential to engineer overflow call answering arrangements.

Then again, personnel at control centres need to be familiar with local conditions. Experience has shown the need for emergency calls to be directed to locations where the recipient has a good knowledge of the local geography and the facilities available, since people calling in emergencies tend to use local or common names for locations, names which could be meaningless to a remote control centre. Obviously, this is one of the problems to be considered, though I believe it can be overcome.

As I say, I welcome the intent of the bill. I have no doubt many lives would have been saved if people had been able to call for assistance quickly enough in an emergency. I urge the government and the industry to pursue this matter as rapidly as possible so that an emergency number system such as 911—and that number is a good one to use—might be available in every community in Canada.

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I listened with great interest to the speech made by the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock (Mr. Mather). I want to say I do not believe consideration of this measure by a committee of the House, and its eventual enactment, should founder on the rocks of technological difficulties. I am satisfied the ingenuity of man is such that those difficulties can be overcome quickly, and for this reason I think we ought to support the bill and that it ought to be sent to committee without further debate. I end my speech here.

Mr. Jack Cullen (Sarnia-Lambton): Mr. Speaker, it was not my intention to take part in this debate but having listened very carefully until 5.30 this morning to very fine speeches, I was moved to feel that perhaps I should now say a few words on this subject.

The hon. member for Surrey-White Rock (Mr. Mather) might be surprised to know that he and I are kindred spirits or have a kindred feeling toward this kind of legislation. In the few years I have been here he has become known as a member who introduces legislation, not so much in the expectation that it will be adopted but as a prod to the appropriate officials, through debate in the House of Commons, to move very quickly.

I agree with the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) that the subject matter of the bill will commend itself to every member of the House, but I am somewhat apprehensive about having a universal number. I say that for this reason: in talking of a universal number we are talking of emergencies as though they were of a particular type or series. In this regard I have in mind a splendid program called Medic Alert. A specific kind of expertise is required to cope with Medic Alert emergencies. I would be somewhat apprehensive that insufficient consideration would be given to the Medic Alert program if we were to implement this kind of legislation without giving it the thought and discussion it deserves.

I have a daughter who is allergic to penicillin and she must wear a Medic Alert badge. There is a number on the badge that must be called so that the expertise required is immediately available. I would be concerned if someone at the other end of the line who was prepared to handle a traffic victim, or a heart attack or an epileptic seizure emergency, did not have specific knowledge of this particular kind of emergency. It seems to me this would work to the detriment of the individual that you were trying to help, rather than work to his or her benefit. So I file that caveat with regard to anyone considering implementing this kind of approach in the interests of doing what I am sure in all our hearts we feel is the right and proper thing to do.

Very close to my community in the city of Sarnia is the city of London, approximately 60 miles away. I am not exactly sure of the date, but an article appeared in Communications Business of June, 1972, indicating that London was the first city in Ontario to use a 911 number for emergencies. The article describes how the system works. Five police constables operate the system which will be installed in the new police administration building in that city.

I would ask myself whether these gentlemen are properly trained in the approach that should be adopted if an individual, who had a shot of penicillin he should not have had, contacted them. What kind of treatment would they receive? I would be a little apprehensive that this might be thought to be the be-all and end-all because it is the easy way. I hope that the people on the other end of the telephone line appreciate the kind of assistance they might be called upon to give.

I have one further comment. It seems to me the bill is redundant in that the principal telephone companies subject to federal jurisdiction, namely Bell Canada and British Columbia Telephone, have already expressed willingness to supply the service and to co-operate with the municipalities in this regard. I suggest, with respect, that this is where the impetus should come from, not in this particular instance from the government or from this parliament. The expertise is with Bell and British Columbia Telephone and with all provincial telephone companies who know how the system works and the kind of problems that arise. I do not think these would be brought before the committee of the House if the subject matter of the bill were referred to committee for study.

A position statement from Bell Canada, as well as a memorandum from TCTC outlining the situation across the country, was attached to the notes that I have received. It seems to me we have to be careful that we do not move too quickly in a technical field like this, with a group of laymen, albeit intelligent laymen, sitting around a table endeavouring to cope with sophisticated pieces of equipment and a very important subject.

Again, I wonder whether we can pass a piece of federal legislation and almost, in effect, wash our hands of it. Federal legislation can only apply to the two corporations that come under federal jurisdiction, Bell Canada and British Columbia Telephone. Since a universal emergency telephone number system is not feasible without the co-operation of the municipalities who must agree to consolidate emergency services, I again make the point that the system cannot be implemented by federal statute alone. This bill does have that failing. As drafted, it purports to apply to all Canadian telephone companies, whereas all the major telephone companies except Bell and B.C. Telephone are presently subject to provincial regulation. The hon. member made the point that he did not expect this particular bill to carry but it was his hope that the subject matter might be referred to committee. I think that covers my objection to that particular point.

If the concept of a universal emergency telephone number is to be legislated with reference to the federally-regulated carriers, it would appear preferable—I speak as a lawyer with some knowledge of legislation, having been a municipal councillor with responsibility of drafting legislation—to put this particular piece of legislation more appropriately into the Railway Act rather than into section 22(1) of the National Transportation Act. Section 22(1) of the National Transportation Act deals with the powers, duties and functions of the Canadian Transport Commission. Establishment of a universal emergency telephone number is not a matter of powers, duties and functions but, rather, involves the implementation of specific action by the commission.

For the reasons I have cited, I think it is premature to pass this particular bill at this time without giving it a lot more thought. However, I am sure that the publicity this debate will generate will indicate to the federal and provincial carriers the need to give serious consideration to bringing about what I feel is an excellent idea to assist the Canadian public.

Mr. Mather: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the hon. member a question? Having in mind the very valid criticisms he has made of some of the details proposed in this bill, would he still have any objection to having the subject matter of the bill, not passed but referred for further study to the appropriate committee of the House?

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, that was the point I tried to make earlier in my address. Perhaps I did not hammer it home hard enough. I did not think that a committee of the House, made up of laymen, was an appropriate tribunal for considerating either the bill or the subject matter of the bill. Particularly in light of the recent report brought down by the other place, it seems to me this might be one area where our science and technology could be put to good use. It may be more appropriate to have that department do a little prodding with Bell Canada and B.C. Telephone, with a view to showing the way to the provincial carriers.

Mr. H. T. Herbert (Vaudreuil): Mr. Speaker, as has already been pointed out, the idea of a universal emergency telephone number appears, at least in theory, to be a worthy one. The problems regarding the proposed Bill C-37, an act to establish a universal emergency telephone number, have already been gone over but they are perhaps worth repeating.

The bill appears to be redundant in that the principal telephone carriers subject to federal jurisdiction, Bell Telephone and British Columbia Telephone, have already expressed a willingness to supply this service and to co-operate with municipalities in this regard. I propose in a moment to go over the situation as it exists at the present time.

Since a universal emergency telephone number is not feasible without the co-operation of municipalities, which must agree to consolidate emergency services, it cannot be implemented by federal statute alone. As drafted, the bill before us purports to apply to all Canadian telephone companies, whereas all major telephone companies except Bell Canada and British Columbia Telephone are presently subject to provincial regulation.

Canada's major telephone companies fully support the establishment of a universal emergency telephone number, 911. The telephone companies have met with authorities in most Canadian cities during the past three years and will continue to assist in ensuring that 911 or a temporary alternate is provided when requested. The introduction of 911 throughout Canada, however, must be the result of orderly evolvement in close co-operation with the municipal agencies concerned.

The evolvement should include two specific phases. The first is the centralized organization required by the municipality to bring the emergency services together under one number; for example, police, fire and ambulance. In the cities where this has been done the telephone companies have provided 911 or a suitable substitute. An example can be seen in Toronto where EM1-1111 is a type of universal number. In Winnipeg and Brandon the number 999 has been in service for some time. Edmonton, Calgary and Red Deer have 911 calling for emergencies. In those cities which have not established a centralized reporting service, effort is made to assign easily remembered numbers to the various services. These numbers are prominently displayed in the various directories. Of course, all companies have always offered operator assistance in an emergency through dialing "O".

The second phase of the evolvement to a universal number across Canada is one of technical and financial feasibility. Although the technical expertise may exist to instal 911 service in all parts of the country, the cost in many areas has been such that the community is not prepared to make a firm commitment. As new equipment is installed and technology advances, there is every indication that the installation of 911 will progressively advance.

The individual status report is worthy of reference. The Newfoundland Telephone Company Limited is presently negotiating with the government of Newfoundland on behalf of the city of St. John's to provide 911 service. At the present time there are no communities in Nova Scotia using a universal emergency number system, but the Maritimes Telegraph and Telephone Company Limited is prepared to provide the number 911, subject to agreement with civic authorities. There are no communities in New Brunswick using a universal emergency number at present. However, the New Brunswick Telephone Company Limited will work with any community to provide 911 or another three-digit number if the cost of conversion to 911 is not excessive.

There are presently no plans to establish 911 calling in the Quebec Telephone territory. The company policy of Bell Canada is to provide the 911 service code on request from governing municipal bodies, subject to the conditions to which I have already referred. Bell has held or is anticipating holding discussions with municipal authorities in many centres in Ontario and Quebec. Northern Telephone Limited has had discussions and has prepared quotations for three of the major cities in the system's territory. In the Manitoba Telephone System the number 999 is provided as an emergency reporting number for the cities of Winnipeg and Brandon which encompass 65 per cent of the main telephones in Manitoba.

Saskatchewan Telecommunications is capable of providing 911 now in Saskatoon and will be capable of providing it in Regina in 1975, but to date no municipal commitment has been made. Saskatchewan Telecommunications will be prepared to review this matter in all centres on request. Alberta Government Telephones presently provides 911 calling in the cities of Calgary and Red Deer, with Lethbridge planned for 1973. The AGT will work with all municipal jurisdictions in Alberta to assist in establishing 911 for all communities.

The Edmonton telephone company presently provides 911 service for the city of Edmonton. The British Columbia Telephone Company is prepared to work with the various municipalities in introducing 911 as a universal emergency number.

If the concept of a universal emergency telephone number is to be legislated with reference to the federally-regulated carriers, it would appear preferable, as has already been mentioned in this debate, to insert it in the Railway Act rather than in the National Transportation Act. The establishment of a universal emergency telephone number is not a matter of powers, duties and functions but, rather, involves the implementation of specific action by the commission.

There is little more that one can add at the moment to what has already been said on the question of jurisdiction. I think the matter has been well reviewed but I will leave it to another member of the House to wind up this debate.

Mr. John M. Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I think the idea of an emergency number 911 is excellent. I believe that after the debate last night the Conservative party is badly in need of an emergency number in order to get out of the situation it has created for itself.

Mr. Dinsdale: Ask the Canadian public about that, John.

Mr. Reid: When dealing with bills presented by private members to illustrate ideas, I always have a great deal of fear in my soul when it comes to debating a motion put forward by the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock (Mr. Mather). His ideas are always intriguing and a little off what we would normally term the beaten path. They are sometimes difficult to talk out as they are usually short and simple, and the ideas presented are usually clear. One has no alternative but to deal with the substance of what he has proposed.

Mr. Stanfield: Is that what you are doing?

Mr. Reid: It is a good thing there are not many members in the House of Commons like the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock. If there were, there would be too many decisions taken by this House of Commons, and that would certainly destroy the reputation we have of being a place not of action but of talk.

Mr. Stanfield: You are setting a pretty good example right now.

Mr. Reid: I want to make it perfectly clear to the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) that it is not the government which is afraid to make decisions, it is the opposition which continually holds back excellent legislation for the purpose of debating it one more time and making one more speech. Perhaps what we really should do in this House of Commons to eliminate this difficulty is take a leaf out of the book of Westminster, the mother of Parliament in London, by attempting to work out an equitable system of allocation of time and decide how much time should be wasted on legislation—

● (1640)

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I think the hon. member has the wrong number.

Mr. Reid: Mr. Speaker, as usual you are quite right. I am appreciative of your comments, particularly as I noted that you were awake at five o'clock this morning to handle affairs in this House while I was not here.

I should like to deal with the points raised by the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock. As I said before the idea is crystal-clear that there ought to be in legislative form some kind of obligation upon telephone companies in Canada to produce a number that would be easily remembered by people who have cause to fall into emergency circumstances. The question, however, is whether or not the proposal the hon. member has put forward is really necessary.

I listened with some interest to the speech given by the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert), who indicated all the areas in Canada in which this idea is being put into effect. I think it is important to point out to the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock that the areas he described in which this process is going into effect are outside federal jurisdiction. In other words, the idea has been accepted, not only by the telephone companies but by all the agencies with whom they must deal, and the process has been set in motion. The question I would put to the hon. member is this: if what he proposes to have done is in fact being done, is it necessary for us to enact legislation? I believe that it is not necessary; that it is a waste of time of the House of Commons to pass redundant legislation or to pass legislation to confirm what is already going on in jurisdictions which have the actual responsibility.

I admit this perhaps might be a small point, but it seems to me it is a very bad habit for a legislative assembly to latch on to a good idea and legislate on it merely because it is a good idea. I would rather have the House of Commons deal with those areas in which there is no agreement, and where there is a need to focus attention on items which are current. If the emergency number is being put into effect, then it seems to me quite clear that it is not necessary for us to deal in a legislative fashion with this principle. So, I am opposed to it on that count.

An article was reprinted in a communications publication of June 1972, which was taken from an article printed in the Bell News which described the situation in respect of the development of the emergency number in the city of London, Ontario. The way in which this has been put together is interesting, because it eliminates some of the great difficulties which plague the telephone companies in attempting to work out a universal system to provide the service which the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock would have us enshrine in legislation.

The basic problem I believe can be summed up in a short statement. If it were the telephone companies which were operating the emergency number it would be the legal responsibility, presumably, of the telephone companies for the relaying of the message to the proper source. Indeed, one of the problems is, what is a definition of an emergency. Some surprising things occurred when the government instituted the Opportunities for Youth Program and the Local Initiatives Program. There were quite a number of distress centres which were funded under these grants in order to meet the wide variety of emergency needs Canadians had. At the beginning, I thought this was a waste of funds. I did not believe at that time that there was a requirement for such funds to be spent in providing that kind of emergency service. However, it takes very little time to examine the record of these distress centres to realize that indeed they are required, and that there is a need which apparently has been demonstrated.

The needs which these centres have been dealing with have been quite different from the type of needs outlined by the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock. The kind of needs which I think have been focused on by these programs have been those which have to do with the needs of people who are lost, alone or isolated. They phone the distress centres in order to find someone to talk to and to find assistance in dealing with social problems. I wish to draw to the attention of the hon. member that we are dealing not with simply an emergency number system but with a whole gamut of emergency matters which have been identified over the past few years.

When I read the bill for the first time, I thought that the term "emergency" applied to an attempt to find police, fire and other services in the traditional sense of an emergency. That really is not the problem. On the contrary, the problem is to deal with other emergencies which people come upon from time to time. I would suggest, for example, that in the position in which the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) found himself when his party ran out of control late in the night, he could have used an emergency number which he could have called in order to shut them up. If this is the purpose of the hon. member's bill, I will accept it because there has been no unity in that party. At least we have not seen it yet, and if we found it I know this government would be in trouble.

[Mr. Reid.]

Mr. Mather: Mr. Speaker, on a point of privilege, may I say that I wish the hon. member, if he insists on getting his wires crossed in respect of my bill, would not plug me into either of the old-line parties.

Mr. Reid: It may well be, Mr. Speaker, that we should have given your number to the Leader of the Opposition so that you might have been able to help with the voice of sweet reason in respect of what went on last night.

Mr. Dinsdale: There is not much reason over there.

Mr. Reid: There certainly is. We decided to accept the verdict of the people of Canada in October. It is the will of the people of Canada that this is the House of Commons and that the House of Commons should govern Canada as best it can.

Before I get a wrong number, perhaps I should return to the subject of the emergency number. This emergency system which has been set up in London, I think, meets the real needs of the community. I think it is important that the distinction between what the hon. member has proposed, what actually are the requirements, and the way in which the community of London has moved, should be indicated. I do not think it is necessary for us in this country to legislate an obligation upon the telephone companies which is not necessary when there are more important and locally effective responses to the problem which I believe has been properly raised in this House of Commons.

In the article to which I referred, the proposal is that the police and fire departments would be linked to the 911 emergency system. It is to be manned by a number of police constables who will then take the calls outside of those two and refer them to the appropriate agencies. For example, the 911 system will be the emergency answering service for all police, fire and ambulance services in London. But in addition to that it says:

> The 911 system will provide substantial benefits for the public. A person who is in need of emergency or protective service will no longer have to remember the number for each agency or which agency deals with his particular problem. By dialling 911 he will reach a central agency, manned by senior police constables and his call will be directed to the proper agency.

That seems to me to be a local response to a local problem. I do not believe that a bill of this type, which tries to deal with local problems on a national basis, is an appropriate vehicle for what the hon. member sincerely wants to do. The article also points out that the initiative for the idea came from a local alderman back in 1967 and that over the years the city of London, through its city council, has been able to develop the kind of program which it required to meet its own perceived needs. It did this with the co-operation of local telephone companies, with the agencies of both the federal and provincial governments and with its own agencies.

It seems to me that while we can encourage the telephone company and the federal government agencies to do this kind of thing, what we really should be doing is going out to encourage the local people, the local communities to set up this kind of system, because the telephone companies are well prepared to co-operate in any way they possibly can. I am in full sympathy with what the hon. member is proposing but I am opposed to the way in which he wishes it to come about, because I do not believe it is our role.

IMMIGRATION

ANNOUNCEMENT OF NATURE OF REVIEW, PUBLICATION OF GREEN PAPER, AND NATIONAL CONFERENCE— TABLING OF STATEMENT

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, during the consideration of the amendments to the Immigration Appeal Board Act I informed the House that the government was continuing its review of the whole field of immigration policy with an eye to Canada's long-term needs. I wish now to inform the House of the steps the government is taking to intensify work on these questions and of the schedule it has set for its completion.

The task, as I think we all recognized during recent debates, is enormous and urgent, and the government intends to proceed without delay. The first step must be to identify all the options, and for this purpose I have appointed a small group of people to deal with this task. We will need a great deal of help. I am writing today to provincial governments and to over 100 organizations enclosing a statement of the problems under study and inviting them to tell us about their particular concerns and to give us their advice. With your leave, Mr. Speaker, I am tabling copies of this statement in both official languages, pursuant to Standing Order 41(2), in each official language.

The target for the completion of this first stage, which will also involve a series of special studies, is next spring. The results will be published in the form of a document, a "green paper", which I am confident will provoke further national discussion. I want to emphasize that we will be seeking the widest possible spectrum of public opinion on the green paper. In addition to seeking the views of the provinces, the territorial governments, members of parliament and briefs from interested groups, I am proposing that a national conference on immigration and population be convened, sponsored by my department.

The green paper will, I hope, provide a good focus for debate. It will do three things particularly. First, it will identify the problems and analyse policy options in terms which will relate immigration to the kind of Canada that we might want. Second, it will review the techniques and procedures by which immigrants are recruited. Third, it will review the whole legal framework within which new policies should operate.

The end result at which we are aiming is a comprehensive policy, to be expressed in new immigration legislation for submission to parliament. Our goal is an up to date instrument to shape Canada's future immigration policy which will crucially affect and determine Canada's economic, social, cultural and demographic growth.

With leave, I should like to table the further statement in both official languages.

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of my party I certainly welcome the minister's statement. I should like to re-emphasize the intent of his last sentence, which we share and accept. He said:

> Our goal is an up to date instrument to shape Canada's future immigration policy which will crucially affect and determine Canada's economic, social, cultural and demographic growth.

I would only add one rider. We on this side of the House, and I am sure all hon. members, suggest that the goal should be an up to date instrument based not on race, creed, colour, sex or national origin but on the ability of the person who comes willingly to Canada in freedom in order that he may ultimately share in the great destiny of this country.

I am pleased to note that the government now realizes that immigration policy cannot be implemented by regulations but should be instituted by legislation. In order to get away from regulations in terms of the Immigration Appeal Board we have found that it was necessary to bring in legislation. Legislation has had to be introduced to deal with certain decisions made by the Immigration Appeal Board that have embarrassed the government.

I should also like to say we should never forget, though some may find fault with this view, that this country was built by thousands of unskilled and uneducated people who came to this country believing in the work ethnic. Many Canadians have forgotten this. Many Canadians have cast aside an appreciation of the work ethic. When we think of the new policy that must be introduced through legislation I hope we will not forget that if this country has reached any greatness it is as a result of the efforts of those who did not have as much education or possess the skills of people today but were sincere in the belief that they were coming to a land of opportunity where they have made their mark. There are many such success stories.

Let me further emphasize the need for consultation with the provinces. I am glad to see there is to be provincial consultation because it seems to me the federal government has abdicated its responsibility in regard to the social services needed by many immigrants. There is a very great need by many immigrants for language training in order to increase their ability to become integrated into our society. There is a need for them to be advised about the many different government services that can be placed at their disposal. There is a need for accommodation and jobs. In this regard there must be more co-operation and consultation with the provinces.

We await the national conference on immigration because we all wish to contribute in respect of input. We await the green paper. I commend the minister and the government for the steps they are taking. They may rest assured that they will have the wholehearted support of members of the Progressive Conservative party.

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, the question of immigration has been of importance to this country ever since white people first began to come to what is now Canada. There are many important aspects of the question. How many people should be encouraged to come to Canada? There have been great differences of opinion in this regard. There is the question of from which countries we should encourage people to come. Opinion has changed in this regard over the years. At one time immigrants were almost exclusively from Great Britain and northern Europe. This situation existed for many years but has now changed drastically. We now have immigrants from Asia, Africa, the West Indies and southern and eastern Europe.

These are all matters of great concern. We welcome the idea of a national conference at which the provinces and the various community groups, ethnic, religious and racial that have a particular interest, will be represented and will be able to make their views known so that hopefully the government may arrive at policies based on a consensus of the people who participate in that conference.

I reiterate what we have said on so many occasions in the past. The rate at which we admit immigrants into this country is in the final analysis decided by the federal government. As a result of the provisions of the BNA Act to a large extent, many immigrants who come to this country who are not fluent in either English or French, the official languages of the country, become to a large extent the responsibility of the provinces and municipalities in respect of the provision of education and the knowledge of Canada they require if they are to become active participants in this country. I say to the minister, as we have said in the past, that we believe the federal government must take a much larger responsibility in fact as well as in law to help the provinces, the municipalities and local communities develop the ability of new Canadians particularly those who are not knowledgeable in either English or French, so they may play a full part as Canadian citizens after they arrive in Canada.

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, we must state positively that this time, we are fully in agreement with the minister's statement.

We notably welcome the fact that, firstly, it deals with the establishment of a long term policy, and this is the reason for our concurrence. We also welcome the fact that, secondly, the government and the minister thought of providing for consultations and negotiations so as to come to an understanding with the provinces.

[Mr. Alexander.]

We dare hope that the widest possible spectrum of public opinion which is being sought, as mentioned also on page 2 of the statement, will help reach the goals which the minister has set and which I think are those of Parliament as a whole.

[English]

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order by way of a caveat. I have not had a chance yet to see the document the minister sought to table under Standing Order 41(2). It may be quite valid and he may be entitled to do so. I simply want to say there is a difference between making a statement on motions under Standing Order 15(3) and tabling a document under Standing Order 41(2). It may well be that a minister may make a statement which may be a condensation of what he tables. That is perfectly all right and takes less of the time of the House. But if what the minister tables is in effect a propaganda document or press release to which he refers in his statement, then we would take very strong exception to it. I have not had a chance to see the document, but I thought I should file that caveat now so this procedure would not be completed without our having had an opportunity to say we object at this time.

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, that is acceptable. I sent copies to the opposition critics earlier today.

Mr. Speaker: As hon. members know, this point of order was raised last week. As raised in the previous instance the point had perhaps more validity, as I understood it, than today. I am in full agreement with hon. members who raise this point that there are two standing orders, one providing for the tabling of documents and the other for the making of statements. There is a third possibility open to ministers, that is, to make a statement outside the House. I have felt and ruled in the past that perhaps it was not consistent with the spirit of the rule to table in the House under Standing Order 41(2) a statement that a minister may want to make outside the House, in other words, to table under the Standing Order a statement to be made outside the House.

The overriding difficulty in so far as the Chair is concerned is that if hon. members object on a regular basis to the tabling of documents under Standing Order 41(2), the Chair would be placed in the position of having to exercise some measure of censorship and having to examine all documents that are going to be tabled and decide whether such documents are of a nature that they can or should be tabled under Standing Order 41(2). I remind hon. members that when this Standing Order was enacted by the House a few years ago it was for the very purpose of making it easier for the House to receive documents or papers from members of the cabinet, and I assume it is for that purpose that these documents are being tabled under the Standing Order. I would hope there would be general agreement among members of the House as to what type of documents are envisioned under the terms of Standing Order 41(2).

Mr. Stanfield: There is just one point, Mr. Speaker. I am sure the minister did not mean to mislead the House in any way but, as I understood him, he said that he had sent copies of the statement he tabled to the opposition parties. What the minister sent was sent to my office, which is the usual practice, but he simply sent the statement he has read to the House. I call that to his attention. He did not send me a copy of what he has tabled, although obviously he is sincerely under the impression that he did so.

Mr. Andras: The Leader of the Opposition is quite right. If he did not get a copy of the statement I tabled, that was an error or misunderstanding on my part. I thought I sent both the statement I read and the statement I tabled.

TRADE

STATEMENT ON GATT MEETING IN TOKYO—TABLING OF DECLARATION OF MINISTERS

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a brief statement on the Tokyo Declaration to which Canada is a signatory. The Tokyo Declaration officially opens the seventh round of multilateral trade negotiations conducted under GATT. These negotiations will be of unprecedented scope covering both tariffs and non-tariff measures which restrict or distort trade in industrial and agricultural products. The negotiations will include the first systematic and comprehensive attempt to reduce or eliminate non-tariff measures and bring such measures under more effective international discipline.

As a result of Canadian efforts the negotiations will also include, for the first time, a systematic examination of the possibilities of reducing or eliminating all barriers to trade in selected commodity sectors. These negotiations hold out the promise of potential benefits larger than those achieved in any previous negotiation. For these reasons the Tokyo Declaration is a very important document, and the fact that representatives of 102 countries assembled to consider and approve it provides ground for believing that this venture will succeed.

Pursuant to Standing Order 41(2) I should like to lay on the table of the House, in both official languages, the Declaration of Ministers approved by 102 countries at the GATT meeting in Tokyo last week.

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, first of all I should like to welcome the minister back from the GATT meeting in Tokyo where he participated at the kick-off of the new round of negotiations. I am sure he is as aware as anyone that the goal posts are still far removed and that a good deal of tough bargaining is going to be necessary if we are to achieve a satisfactory result by 1975.

With the philosophy of further liberalization of world trade this party is profoundly in accord. Certainly no country is more dependent on world trade than Canada. No country exports as large a proportion of its national output as Canada. Therefore no country is as vulnerable to the results of world trade negotiations as Canada.

This is particularly significant at the moment when the world seems to be dividing itself into trading blocs, when Canada, if we are not careful, could be excluded from ready access to the great international markets of the world and when, if we are to be successful and develop fully the talents we have in this country and the high technology industries, we will have to ensure that we have access to the great, powerful, industrialized markets in other countries, including, of course, the European bloc, the United States and Japan.

Probably the Japanese challenge is the greatest of all, Mr. Speaker, and it is reassuring to know that non-tariff barriers are to be attacked as well as the tariffs themselves. It is rather discouraging to look at the results for last year and to realize that less than 3 per cent of Canada's exports to Japan last year were in fully finished products. I hope the minister used the opportunity that was available to him in Tokyo to impress upon the Japanese the necessity not only of balancing our trade fully but also of guaranteeing that within a reasonable period of time, perhaps three or four years, fully half of Canada's exports to that country will be in the form of fully finished products. The minister is going to have to develop considerable backbone if he is going to achieve this and he is going to have to talk tough to the Japanese. I would encourage him in this regard. Certainly this is one of the greatest potential markets in the world for Canadian products, and any failure on his part will not be well received by the Canadian people. If I may make one suggestion, Mr. Speaker, it would be that the minister consider building a permanent facility in Tokyo which could be used by Canadian manufacturers to show the products we have in this country and which would enable Canadians to expand substantially their exports of manufactured products to Japan.

It is equally important that we tackle vigorously the non-tariff barriers to our agricultural products in the European community. Here our interests seem to lie very much along the same lines as those of our American neighbours. The minister and his officials should work very closely with the Americans in putting all possible pressure on the European community to lower the barriers that now exist in order to give reasonable access to Canadian farmers for their products.

One further point which I think deserves emphasis is that in working out the new agreement there would be a determination to pay special attention to the needs and aspirations of the developing countries. They should be given a chance to participate more fully in world trade and earn for themselves the foreign exchange necessary to buy capital equipment and other products they require to develop their own economies.

This is welcome news, Mr. Speaker, but I think the final point that must be made is that no amount of success in these trade negotiations will achieve the results required unless at the same time we can achieve a tremendous improvement in international monetary arrangements. I would hope that the minister would press his colleague, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner), to go to the International Monetary Fund with some fresh thinking. Information already available would indicate that perhaps we might fall into the trap of repeating the mistakes that were made at Breton Woods in 1944. It does not matter what the tariff arrangements are or what the conclusions are in respect of non-tariff barriers if we have an international monetary system that produces crises every year or two.

I would say that of all the problems facing the trading world at the present time one of the most important, and probably the most important, is the resolution of international monetary arrangements and the necessity for the injection of some new thinking in this area.

We wish the minister and his officials well and hope they will be able to solve not only our trading problems but that through pressure on the financial group the orthodoxies of the past will be discarded and we will get an international arrangement which will be efficacious and allow Canadians to develop along the lines we all wish to see.

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, in welcoming the statement the minister tabled today I would like to add that we in this party look forward to the particular trade policies of the government in the areas that are listed as part of the general concern in the statement. We have not had any general indication from the minister or the government of their over-all trade policy. We hope it will be established in these negotiations in the days ahead in a way that will benefit not only Canada but other trading countries.

I should like to make three specific points. First, we should like to see the negotiations that have just begun lead to a general liberalization of agricultural trade. In particular, we would like to see ready access to the markets of western Europe for Canadian farmers. We know very well that for years that part of the world has had a highly protective system for agriculture which has barred the full, liberal entry of Canadian agricultural produce. We hope the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce is pushing for significant changes in that direction and for changes that will include orderly world marketing procedures so that the Canadian farmer will not be left in the kind of vacillating position in which he has found himself in recent years.

The second point I wish to make and I do so briefly, has already been referred to by the spokesman for the Conservative party. It is very important to see that non-tariff trading barriers are discussed as well as tariffs. This is particularly important in terms of Canadian access to the Japanese market which has become one of the most important in the world. If I may take one particular commodity I know something about, it happens to be the case that North Americans produce small automobiles at world competitive prices, including Japanese prices, but they are effectively excluded by non-tariff barriers from the Japanese market. It is this kind of situation that has to be changed if Canadian producers of secondary goods, not only automobiles but the whole range of secondary goods, are to gain access to that very important world market. I hope the minister is pushing the case for the removal of non-tariff barriers very strenuously.

The final point I wish to make on behalf of our party is that we welcome the newly expressed concern about the particular problems of developing nations. For too long the industrial world, including Canada, has developed a series of trade policies which have frequently been in the guise of aid or development for the underdeveloped world but which, in terms of any serious cost-benefit analysis have always turned out to be to the advantage of the developed world. I for one welcome the putting on the agenda of recognition of the special problems of the poorer countries in the world and the indication that the richer nations are going to establish trading principles which, for once, might not work to the disadvantage of the poorer countries.

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, we were glad to hear the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gillespie) speak about the international trade agreement endorsed by 102 countries.

We hope that Canada has acted in such a way as to improve its situation in the fields of import and export and that we will have, among these 102 nations, not a top place, but at least a place equal to the others. What I mean is that we should not be satisfied to deal with other countries by selling or giving away most of our raw materials, by not finishing our products at home, while other countries use our raw materials to finish their products and selling them to us afterwards.

I think that after these discussions, after these agreements, the government should be able to make decisions about processing at home our raw materials as completely as possible and create secondary industries; there is a terrible lack of these in various regions of the country. And by creating needed additional secondary industries, Mr. Speaker, we would not merely be raw materials sellers, but we could deal with any country on an equal basis concerning products made in Canada, and not in Japan or in the United States. This is my wish.

We congratulate the minister for reaching these agreements with the 101 countries gathered in Tokyo, but we would like that, after this very important meeting, Canada carries out decisions in favour of all Canadians.

ENERGY

TABLING OF COMMUNIQUÉ ON QUEBEC-CANADA MEETING

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, under Standing Order 41(2), I wish to table the joint press release on the Quebec-Canada meeting on energy.

[English]

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, if it is a press release, I object. It is not even a good press release.

Mr. Speaker: Hon. members will appreciate once more the procedural difficulty in which we are placing ourselves. The rule is clear. I have referred to the rule on a number of occasions. I am sure that everyone in the House knows what Standing Order 41(2) provides and is aware of the terms of Standing Order 15. I said earlier today, last week and on a number of previous occasions that the purpose of Standing Order 15 is to allow a minister, a member of the government, to make a statement on motions, to which representatives of the parties in opposition can respond. The purpose of Standing Order 41(2) is to table a document or paper relating to the administrative responsibilities of the government or of a particular department. The third alternative is for ministers to make statements outside the House, which our Standing Orders do not preclude and which has been the practice on many occasions in past decades and more.

What is being suggested now is that when a document is sought to be tabled by a minister the Speaker should suspend the work of the House and look at a document which may be five or ten pages long and determine whether it is the kind of document that could be tabled under the terms of Standing Order 41(2). The previous document tabled by the Minister of Manpower and Immigration was even longer than this one. I am sure it is not the wish of the House that we suspend the sitting every two minutes for half an hour so the Speaker can study a document to determine whether it is a document that is acceptable under Standing Order 41(2). I would really think that the responsibility should be that of the minister who tables the document—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: —to determine whether he is complying with the spirit of the rule. This is what all hon. members would expect, and certainly it is what the Chair would expect.

FOOD PRICES

CONCURRENCE IN SECOND REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East) moved:

That the Second Report of the Special Committee on Trends in Food Prices, presented to the House on Wednesday, July 15, 1973, be concurred in.

Mr. Baldwin: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, there have been some discussions, informal and formal, with regard to suspending this motion until the normal question period has been completed. I think that is acceptable to all parties. I have talked to members on the government side and to the other parties. I think the government, as a result of its deliberations over the weekend, might be able to answer a number of questions today, after which we could probably proceed with the debate.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: This order of business will be called immediately on the calling of orders of the day.

AGASSIZ CORRECTIONAL CAMP ESCAPEES

Question No. 2,381—Mr. Schumacher:

1. What were the names of the two prisoners given passes from Agassiz Institution in April of this year to attend a dance and who have not returned?

2. Were these prisoners escorted and, if not, for what reason?

3. In how many cities have fraudulent certified cheques issued by these people turned up?

4. What are the names of the cities in question and what is the amount involved in each case?

5. What is being done to apprehend these people?

6. Were these people in prison on a first offence and, if not, how many offences had each one had previously?

7. What is being done to determine the responsibility for the financial losses incurred by citizens as a result of these fraudulent cheques?

8. What are the qualifications of the person (a) responsible for granting passes to these people (b) recommending passes for these people?

9. What specific action has been taken to prevent further happenings of this nature?

10. What compensation is the government prepared to allow to those who have suffered loss or harm at the hands of those prisoners who are (a) on temporary leave (b) on extended freedom without permission?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): 1. Jeffrey Kinzel and Thomas Schmidt. On March 30, 1973, Kinzel and Schmidt with four other inmates from Agassiz Correctional Camp (minimum security) attended a lecture given by the Ontological Society at the Peter Pan Ballroom, Vancouver. The Ontological Society, a religious philosophy organization, has been working with inmates at Agassiz Camp for some time. During the lecture Kinzel and Schmidt were given permission to go to the washroom. They did not return.

2. Yes.

3 and 4. Unknown. Investigations concerning the commission of such crimes is a provincial responsibility.

5. Upon the inmates' failure to return, the Penitentiary Service escorting officer reported by telephone to his superior who, in turn, alerted the R.C.M. Police detachment. The RCMP immediately placed an all points bulletin with the Vancouver City Police. Further action in respect to the apprehension of these two individuals now rests in the hands of the police.

6. Both inmates were serving their first federal penitentiary term. Inmate Kinzel had three previous convictions. He served two terms in a provincial institution and one six-month suspended sentence on a $100 bond. Inmate Schmidt had four previous convictions for which he served sentences in Provincial institutions.

7. This is a matter falling within the ambit of responsibility of the Attorneys General of the provinces concerned.

8. (a) The Director, Agassiz Correctional Work Camp has served 24 years with the Canadian Penitentiary Service. He entered the Service at Stoney Mountain Institution in 1949 and became a Staff Training Officer in 1957. In 1964, he was appointed Chief Instructor for the Canadian Penitentiary Service Staff College, New Westminster, B.C. During his service career he successfully completed Penitentiary courses on Management, Supervising, Teaching, and Evaluation and Planning. He was appointed Director, Agassiz Camp in March 1968. (b) The Inmate Training Board, made up of the Director, Administration and Supply Officer and two Classification Officers, is responsible for recommending passes for inmates. The Administration and Supply Officer has been with the Penitentiary Service 14 years. He began his career at British Columbia Penitentiary supervising inmates in the Stores Department. In 1962 he was appointed Assistant Stores Keeper, Mountain Prison. He served as Acting Administration and Supplies Officer, Agassiz Camp in 1969, and has on a number of occasions been Acting Director for the Camp. In 1965 he was ordained a Minister of the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of the Latter Day Saints. In addition, he has completed courses in Human Development at Douglas College. One of the Classification Officers has been with the Penitentiary Service since 1963 when he was appointed Protestant Chaplain at Agassiz Correctional Work Camp. In 1967 he was appointed to the position he now holds. He is an Arts graduate of the University of British Columbia, where he majored in Psychology. He received his Bachelor of Physiology in 1964. He completed a Human Relations Course at Douglas College in 1972 as well as in-Service courses on Counselling Techniques, Sociology of Deviant Behaviour, Criminology and Penology and Psychotheraphy. The other classification officer was employed as an Assistant Classification Officer for a period of three months. He holds a Bachelor of Arts Degree from Simon Fraser University and is currently a Classification Officer at Mountain Prison in Agassiz, B.C.

9. The Canadian Penitentiary Service issued a revised Commissioner's Directive on Temporary Absence which directs that group temporary absences to outside functions may only be carried out where satisfactory security arrangements can be made. The Directive also requires institutional authorities to carefully assess the escort needs for such occasions, and to conduct an advance check of the proposed site of the activity, as well as notifying the responsible police force of the intended activity.

10. Save where legal liability exists, there is no authority for payment of compensation other than by obtaining an Order in Council for the making of an ex gratia payment in individual cases of hardship. This matter is under review to determine whether the present situation should be modified, and if so to what extent.

SUBSIDIES AND INTERNATIONAL ASSISTANCE LOANS

Question No. 2,436—Mr. McKinnon:

1. How much money has been given to each of the countries of Senegal, Chad, Mali, Mauritania, Niger and Upper Volta in the fiscal years 1970-71, 1971-72, 1972-73, in the form of (a) Canadian International Development Agency grants (b) International Development Assistance loans?

2. What, if any, special programs has the government initiated or participated in to assist these countries affected by a disastrous drought?

3. What has the cost of these programs been to date?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): 1. During fiscal years 1970-71, 1971-72 and 1972-73 we have paid the following amounts in the form of subsidies and loans to the countries listed below:

Gifts

Country	1970-71	1971-72	1972-73
Chad	248,600	262,100	237,900
Mali	104,800	725,148	203,200
Mauritania	47,000	104,700	83,800
Niger	2,465,400	1,582,632	1,874,100
Senegal	3,182,200	5,381,200	4,507,000
Upper Volta	84,800	499,700	454,500

Loans

Country	1970-71	1971-72	1972-73
Chad	—	—	—
Mali	—	—	—
Mauritania	—	—	—
Niger	—	5,608,300	5,966,900
Senegal	—	—	339,000
Upper Volta	—	—	—

2. Bilateral donors including Canada were asked to provide strong support for the emergency aid effort coordinated by FAO for the African countries of the Sahel region. Canada agreed to allot an additional $3.8 million in food aid over and above the amount of $3 million already allocated for fiscal year 1973-74 for the Francophone countries of the Sahel region. The total amount of $6.8 million in food aid will be distributed as follows: $1 million, Senegal; $1 million, Niger; $1 million, Upper Volta; $1.2 million, Mauritania; $1.4 million, Mali; $1.2 million, Chad. To avoid congestion in the principal ports serving the Sahel region, Canadian food aid will be shipped in accordance with the operations schedule set up by FAO. In addition, Canada has sent three Hercules transport aircraft to transport supplies from the entry ports to the disaster areas in the interior because of difficulties in traditional methods of transport caused by the rainy season. By these means it will be possible to ensure delivery of a greater share of the available aid to the population remote from the large centres.

3. The additional bilateral allocation in food aid made by Canada to the six stricken countries of the Sahel region totals $3.8 million. This amount does not include the sending and use of three Hercules transport aircraft for more than a month.

NUMBER OF POSTAL BOXES IN WINNIPEG

Question No. 2,461—Mr. McKenzie:

1. How many post boxes are there in Winnipeg's 11 postal stations and, of this number, how many are currently rented out to the public?

2. Is there a waiting list of persons wishing to rent post boxes at any of the 11 stations and, if so, how long is the list?

3. What does it cost to rent a box at each of these stations?

4. Is it the intention of the government to make more post boxes available for rent by the public in Winnipeg and throughout the rest of the country?

Hon. André Ouellet (Postmaster General): 1. two thousand two hundred sixty-eight; 2,129 rented.

2. Yes, there is a waiting list of 80 applicants as follows: Main Post Office, 61; Station "B", 9; Station "C", 1; Norwood Grove, 3; St. Boniface, 4; St. Vital, 2. The waiting list includes those to whom vacant boxes have been offered but from whom confirmations have not been received. A few days is allowed following an offer of a box before offering it to the next name on the waiting list.

3. Post Office boxes are available in five sizes with annual rates as follows:

Post Offices Not Having Door-to-Door Delivery by Letter Carrier		Post Offices Having Door-to-Door Delivery by Letter Carrier
A	4.00	A	8.00
B	6.00	B	10.00
C	10.00	C	15.00
D	15.00	D	25.00
E	20.00	E	35.00

4. Every possible effort is made to ensure that lock boxes are made availbale to the public not only in Winnipeg, but for all of Canada. In some cases, an increase of lock boxes would involve major renovations. However, as the demand for boxes are made, every effort is made to accommodate customers.

FEDERAL PENITENTIARIES—OVERTIME PAYMENTS

Question No. 2,477—Mr. Stackhouse:

How much money was expended for overtime payments to the staffs of federal penitentiaries during June 1972 and June 1973?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): June 1972, $288,182; June 1973, $525,762.

NOTES: 1. There are 2,345 Correctional Officers in 46 federal penal institutions.

2. Of the total overtime paid to staffs of federal penitentiaries for June 1973, $503,435 was paid to Correctional officers with the balance, $22,326, going to other institutional personnel.

LETTER SENT BY M. DAN BARTHOLOMEW, C.P.S.

Question No. 2,494—Mr. Reynolds:

Was a letter, regarding inmate No. 1,357 McCauley, dated June 10, 1973, sent by Mr. Dan Bartholomew Cx4 to the British Columbia Penitentiary prison director, answered and, if not, for what reason?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): No. Mr. Bartholomew's letter was referred to the senior institutional officer concerned for his consideration and advice. Action was taken on the matter raised by Mr. Bartholomew the following day. However, due to a conflict in shift schedules between Mr. Bartholomew and his squad leader, Mr. Bartholomew was not immediately informed of the action taken. He was, nevertheless, informed at the earliest possible opportunity.

CANADIAN PENITENTIARY SERVICES—MR. BRIAN MURPHY AND MR. G. W. H. L. SCHLIEPER

Question No. 2,495—Mr. Reynolds:

1. Will the Solicitor General advise whether (a) charges are pending against Mr. Brian Murphy (b) he is allowed to come and go from prison and, if so, for what reason?

2. (a) Are charges pending against Mr. G. W. H. L. Schlieper (b) is he permitted to continue at his job or in some other form of work and, if not, for what reason?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): 1. (a) Yes. (b) Yes. Mr. Murphy is employed as a research officer studying inmate profiles and, therefore, his work, unlike that of correctional officers, does not require him to be in daily contact with inmates in a supervisory, teaching or counselling relationship. His continued employment, pending the disposition of charges now before the Court, did not and does not in any way jeopardize the security of the institution. Since charges were laid, Mr. Murphy has visited the institution once to meet with the Assistant Director, Socialization.

2. (a) Yes. (b) No. Mr. Schlieper is a correctional officer, and is therefore, in daily contact with inmates. It is considered that his entry to the institution could pose a risk which may affect the security of the institution and the safety of both staff and inmates. Accordingly, he has been suspended pending the disposition of charges against him.

3. What is the average annual amount of the parliamentary pension being drawn?

4. What was the average dollar contribution to that pension made by the Members now drawing such pension?

Mr. John M. Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): 1 to 4. The parliamentary pension payable to Members of Parliament is under the administrative jurisdiction of the Speaker of the House of Commons.

ENERGY

OIL EXPORT TAX—GOVERNMENT POSITION IN LIGHT OF OBJECTION—PROVINCIAL SHARE

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Are the minister and the government firmly committed in principle to the export tax on petroleum that has been announced, or is this an interim measure that is subject to review and revision upon consultation with the provinces particularly the producing provinces?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I think I would have to say that the separation of the price for sale in the United States from the price in Canada, so that Canadians will not have to pay whatever accelerating prices American customers will have to pay from time to time, is a matter of principle with the government. As the Prime Minister indicated in his announcement, an export tax is one of the control mechanisms that could be used. Of course, as I indicated to the House on Friday and as I indicated to the Alberta minister, it is certainly within our concept that the proceeds of either a tax or the return of a marketing board would be shared with the provincial governments concerned.

Mr. Stanfield: Recognizing that, according to the minister's announcement, the price of crude in Canada will be based upon the price of crude landed at Montreal, may I ask the minister whether the export tax technique is an essential part of the minister's program, and what proportion of the export tax does the minister propose to offer to the producing provinces?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. gentleman will reread Hansard he will see that I said the proposal of a Montreal basing price was one of the proposals being considered. I already answered the rest of the hon. member's question by pointing out that whether it be an export tax or a marketing board is a matter for discussion. Indeed, the question of the form it would take and the share is one of the aspects upon which we expect the government of Alberta to respond, as Mr. Dickie, the Minister of Mines and Minerals, promised to respond on October 3 when we see them again.

Mr. Stanfield: As the government's policy in this field seems to change so much from day to day, will the minister explain why he and the government found it necessary to behave in such a heavyhanded way in connection with this program rather than following the method of consultation which the minister previously announced the government was committed to follow?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I think it can be said I followed the process of consultation. As the hon. gentleman knows, we published an elaborate analysis of the energy situation, including this particular question, in June. We had consultation with the Alberta representatives in July. At that time Alberta undertook to respond to our analysis and to the conversation on that occasion. Up to this moment no such response has been received from the province. On that basis I am quite prepared to carry on a dialogue and consultation, but it seems to me there is a mutuality required for the effective operation of the process.

OIL EXPORT TAX—NOTICE TO UNITED STATES

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. As the maintaining of good trading relations with the United States is of obvious importance to this country, can the minister advise the House why no prior notice of this added tax on crude oil was given to the United States, particularly in view of the fact this lack of action appears to have caused by far the greatest resentment in the vociferous protest made by the United States government?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I would correct the hon. member by saying there was no lack of notice. I concede it was done at almost the last minute. However, on a matter of this kind I do not believe we should have felt it necessary to seek the permission of the United States government before taking action.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings, the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands and the hon. member for Calgary North on this matter and then try to go on to the next question.

Mr. Hees: No one, of course, has ever suggested that the permission of the United States should be obtained for an action of this kind. However, in view of the fact the United States has stated flatly that no prior notice was given, how does the minister justify his answer?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I will have to re-examine the statement to see if the Americans said they had no notice because I think I can produce some facts to the contrary.

OIL—TWO-PRICE SYSTEM—REQUEST FOR CLARIFICATION OF COMPROMISE—POSSIBLE ELIMINATION OF OTTAWA VALLEY LINE

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources arising out of his statement at the Liberal convention over the weekend.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands might like to ask his question directly. I would hope the question period today would not be a series of questions based on statements made outside the House during the weekend.

Mr. Douglas: Can the minister give some clarification with regard to his statement that there has been a compromise on the two-price oil system? What change has there been, apart from the agreement to give to the oil-producing provinces some share in the 40 cents a barrel export tax, with which I think everyone would agree? Has there been any change in the pricing policy? Will the present freeze, announced on September 4, still stand and will the posted Montreal price come into effect only when a pipeline has been built into the province of Quebec?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, with regard to the latter part of the question, as I indicated to the Leader of the Opposition, the matter is under discussion at the present time.

Mr. Stanfield: It wasn't on Friday.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Read Hansard. With regard to the compromise, it was with the position that had been taken by a certain group at the convention that there should not be a two-price system. We were able to satisfy them that there should be such a system and, indeed, that the province of Alberta would share in the proceeds of such a system. I was glad that the Liberal leader in Alberta was able to give the premier of that province some leadership with regard to good compromising as a Canadian.

● (1450)

Mr. Douglas: In view of the minister's reply to a question put by my colleague from Sault Ste. Marie on September 10 to the effect that one million barrels of western crude had been moved to Montreal refineries, may I ask the minister whether it is now his plan to virtually wipe out the Borden line so that petroleum and petroleum products can move freely across that line until such time as the pipeline is built, making the Borden line no longer necessary?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): It certainly is one of the concepts, Mr. Speaker. Quite clearly the policy reasons for establishing the Borden line between 1959 to 1961 are no longer apposite. Very likely in due course the line may be eliminated. This is one of the questions that is to be dealt with in the context of determining the appropriate Canadian basing point.

OIL EXPORT TAX—CONSULTATION WITH ALBERTA PRIOR TO IMPOSITION

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the minister a supplementary question. In light of the questions put by the Leader of the Opposition on Friday asking whether there was consultation with Premier Lougheed and the Alberta government and the answer that they made no substantive comment about the matter, may I ask the minister whether there was definitely consultation with the Alberta government prior to implementing the 40 cents surtax on a barrel of crude petroleum? If so, when did the consultation take place and where?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, it was the Minister of Mines and Minerals of Alberta and the discussion took place late Thursday morning and early afternoon.

Mr. Horner (Crowfoot): That was not consultation.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): We presented the documents to him then and he accepted them, as I said, without substantive comment.

Mr. Woolliams: A further supplementary question.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Calgary North for a last supplementary at this point. Hon. members will appreciate that we are still on the first question after ten minutes. I will then recognize the hon. member for York South and the hon. member for Témiscamingue.

Mr. Woolliams: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Before I put my question, I have in my hand the speech that the Premier of Alberta made to the Canadian Club of Calgary in which he said that this was a unilateral action on the part of the federal government, that there had been no consultation, and that this was thrust on the Canadian people by the government unilaterally. What does the minister have to say about that?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I suggest that Premier Lougheed talk to his Minister of Mines and Minerals.

Mr. Speaker: I am sure that the hon. member for Calgary North and the minister will appreciate, as will all

hon. members, that we are entering upon a debate rather than asking questions and giving answers.

Mr. Woolliams: I should like to ask one more supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The Chair indicated a moment ago that we should try to complete the first round of questioning. If hon. members want to pursue this matter later for the rest of the question period, that is up to them. The hon. member for York South.

PROPOSED TAKEOVER OF ACKLANDS LIMITED BY UNITED STATES COMPANY—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In his absence last week the Acting Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, the Minister of Manpower and Immigration, was asked some questions regarding the proposed takeover of Acklands, Limited of Winnipeg, Canada's largest automotive supply wholesaler, by a United States firm from Atlanta. One of the answers that the Minister of Manpower and Immigration gave on September 12 was that company representatives were ready to meet with the minister and discuss the takeover. May I ask the minister whether such a meeting has been arranged and when it will take place?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, it is true that such a meeting has been arranged. It will take place tomorrow afternoon and I and my officials expect to meet with the leading representatives of the company.

Mr. Lewis: Would the minister assure the House that in his meeting with the company representatives he will investigate the takeover proposal in accordance with the criteria set in the bill concerning foreign investment and take steps to prevent the takeover unless the benefits and interests of Canadians are protected?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I shall certainly be discussing with the officials the whole question of the significant benefit to Canada of this proposal, but as the hon. member must know, Bill C-132 is not yet the law of Canada, though I hope, as I know other members do, that it will be very shortly.

Mr. Lewis: In view of the fact that there are precedents, for example, Home Oil and Denison Mines, where the federal government did take steps to halt a takeover, may I ask the minister whether he can assure the House that he will request that the takeover be halted until a full inquiry is made as to Canada's benefit and, if necessary, until Bill C-132 becomes the law of Canada?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I think my conversation tomorrow will give me a better opportunity of judging what action, if any, should be taken.

RECOGNITION OF REGIME IN CHILE—GOVERNMENT'S POSITION

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the right hon. Prime Minister but, first of all, I want to congratulate him for having been reconfirmed in the good graces of his partisans over the weekend.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): I thank the Liberals for applauding me with such frenzy.

Mr. Speaker, here is my question. Since the bloody overthrow of the new democrats in Chile, has that country asked the Canadian government to recognize the new regime?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, first of all, let me thank the leader of the creditiste party for his kind words. In reply to his question I must say that the Chilean regime has in fact asked the Canadian government to grant it diplomatic recognition, but we have yet to give an answer because we wish to consider the matter further.

OIL EXPORT TAX—ACCEPTANCE OF PROPOSED COMPROMISE BY GOVERNMENT

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a further supplementary question as a follow-up to what I asked earlier and the answers given by the minister. The minister stated that a compromise was made at the convention in regard to the implementation of the 40 cents surtax. I am not concerned about the convention. What I want to know is whether this compromise is now accepted by the government, what was the compromise, and how much money Alberta will get back from this tax that was imposed without consultation?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I think I would have to refer the hon. gentleman to the resolution passed at the convention. I am not sure whether it would be in order to do so here, but I will be glad to bring it to the hon. member's attention.

Mr. Nielsen: We do not intend to let you do that.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I believe I could table the resolution under the terms of Standing Order 41(2).

● (1500)

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, my question is a very simple one and can be put with great ease. Was the compromise suggested at the convention accepted as government policy? A yes or no will answer that question.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman is not a novice in the political field and he will know that a political convention, of course, does not dictate government policy but rather provides a guideline.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Trinity.

Mr. Hees: That is not what you were telling them on Friday and Saturday. You said, "Whatever you pass we will obey". Pierre, wait until they get you back the next time; then there is going to be trouble.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

An hon. Member: Where's Turner?

Mr. Speaker: May we have order, please.

Some hon. Members: Order!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Unless hon. members want to adjourn this meeting to the Chateau Laurier, perhaps we might try to carry on with the question period.

SUGGESTED BUDGETARY ACTION TO COMPENSATE HOME OWNERS FOR RISING MORTGAGE INTEREST RATES— REASONABLENESS OF BANK RATES

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. As has been urged on the government, is the government now actively considering early budgetary action to compensate home owners for the rising cost of mortgage interest rates and, if so, can we expect an announcement on this matter this week?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, if any announcement is to be made the hon. member will hear about it.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: In due course; don't forget that.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate that and will look forward to this announcement with great anticipation. In the second quarter of this year the eight largest chartered banks increased their combined balance of revenue by a full 21 per cent over the first quarter. Is the government satisfied that the mortgage rates now being charged by the chartered banks are reasonable and necessary and, if so, can the government table any detailed study to support that position?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair has considerable reservation about at least three aspects of the hon. member's question. The first part conveyed information to the House which, as the hon. member knows, should not be attempted by way of a question. The second part of the hon. member's question asked the minister to express an opinion, and in the third part he is asking for information which normally ought to be given on motions. I am not sure whether even the hon. member would be able to rephrase that question.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, will you permit me at least to attempt to rephrase the question by asking the Prime Minister whether, in view of the alarming effects of high interest rates on the cost of housing, the government will propose some effective measure and bring it before the House within the next few days?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member listened attentively to the Minister of Finance when he made this announcement and discussed the question—

Mr. Hellyer: I did and that is the reason I asked the question.

Mr. Trudeau: —he will remember that the banks undertook to hold the mortgage rates steady and not increase them.

Mr. Hellyer: I remember, too, that you are not interested in housing or the problems of the home owner.

INQUIRY AS TO INTRODUCTION OF NEW BUDGET CONTAINING TAX CUTS

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. In view of the tenor and substance of the resolutions passed by the weekend Liberal convention on taxes and high interest rates and related economic subjects, most of which indicated opposing points of view to those held by the Minister of Finance, will the Prime Minister tell the House—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Again I would invite hon. members to ask questions directly. I am not sure what purpose is being served by these lengthy introductions having reference to political activities outside the House.

Mr. Lawrence: Thank you, Sir. Could the Prime Minister indicate whether the government is now considering bringing in a new budget with tax cuts at an early date?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member is really interested in the context of the question he has asked, I would be pleased to send him a little booklet, edited by Senator Stanbury, which indicates that 85 per cent of the resolutions adopted by the 1970 Liberal convention have been implemented.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Rubbish!

Mr. Lawrence: Mr. Speaker, because of the noise I did not hear whether the Prime Minister said yes or no.

Mr. Fairweather: He said there was a little booklet.

EFFECT OF PROPOSED FOREIGN INVESTMENT REVIEW ACT ON ATLANTIC PROVINCES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the right hon. Prime Minister. What assurance has he given to the premiers of the Atlantic region that the risk capital required for the development of these provinces will not be jeopardized by the implementation of Bill C-132, the Foreign Investment Review Act?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the premiers of these provinces have raised the matter with me in discussions, both collectively and singly. As the hon. member knows, when this bill was before the committee certain provinces chose to make their views known. I take it that the hon. member is aware of that.

Mr. MacKay: Mr. Speaker, we in the Atlantic region are well aware of the desirability of this legislation but we do not want it at our expense. I should like to know whether the Prime Minister has arranged any guidelines for domestic funding agencies to meet the needs of this part of the country in the event that this cut-off of capital does occur, as the Atlantic provinces fear?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, this is really a matter which has been dealt with and will be dealt with again in the bill that is before the House. If the hon. member or other members of the opposition have further views to make known on this, they will have a further opportunity to do so in the committee and in the House of Commons. We are certainly open to representations, if only they can agree among themselves what they would like implemented.

AIR TRANSPORT

DATE OF ANNOUNCEMENT OF ALLOCATION OF ROUTE TO MILAN AND NEW ROUTES TO UNITED STATES

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Transport. When will he be able to make an announcement as to which Canadian airline will have the right to fly the route to Milan?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I did not get the last part of the question.

An hon. Member: It was about Milan.

Mr. Bell: Look into it.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member would like a reservation, maybe I can help. This will not be announced before we announce the new policy of the government in the field of international civil aviation.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Speaker, can the minister indicate to the House when he will be making a statement in reference to which new routes allocated to Canada will be given to each of the Canadian airline companies?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, this cannot be done before the cabinet has ratified the agreement.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member will be recognized for a last supplementary on this subject, following which the Chair will recognize the hon. member for Champlain.

Mr. Orlikow: After the cabinet has considered the matter and the minister makes his statement, will he include an explanation as to why Canadian carriers will not be given the right to fly the route from Winnipeg to Chicago until 1978 or 1979?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, the only explanation is that this is a package in respect of which there was give and take, and I do not think one can select one route and ask why we did not get that one. I could ask about 15 questions in respect of other routes, so I cannot give a simple answer.

OLD AGE PENSION—LOWERING OF ELIGIBILITY AGE TO 60—MINISTER'S POSITION

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

Does the minister's recent position—not to mention that of the recent Liberal convention—concerning the old age security pension at 60 years of age confirm the fact that the people from 60 to 65 have no hope of obtaining that pension during this parliament?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I objected to a resolution for the implementation of such a scheme on January 1, 1974 as being unrealistic and I added that I had more confidence in the establishment of a guaranteed annual income for all the needy, including those from 60 to 64 years of age, than in the payment of pensions to everyone, even those who do not need any.

ALLEGED PRINTING OF FOOD RATION STAMPS

Mr. Peter Reilly (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the right hon. Prime Minister. Some week and a half ago, I believe, I asked him why, in view of his statement that there was no food shortage in Canada, the government had found it necessary to have ration stamps printed. His reply, to apply the kindest word to it, was equivocal, but he did say he would investigate. I wonder whether he has investigated and what he has found out?

● (1510)

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Yes, I did investigate it with various ministers who might conceivably be concerned. My investigation confirmed the impression I expressed in the House that the hon. member was flying a canard.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Témiscamingue would perhaps allow me to let the hon. member for Ottawa West put his supplementary question, after which I will get back to the previous question.

[English]

Mr. Reilly: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege simply to say that I was not flying a canard but was operating on information I believe sincerely to be accurate. I will not stand for the imputation of motives by the Prime Minister. It is unparliamentary, unworthy of him, against the rules of the House, and he knows it.

Mr. Trudeau: On the question of privilege—

Mr. Speaker: The Chair, of course, will recognize the Prime Minister if he wishes to rise on a question of privilege, but I doubt very much whether we should pursue the matter.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member will remember that I invited him to supply me with the source of the information and if indeed it is, as he says, honest information, perhaps he might have given it to me in the past two weeks.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

SOCIAL SECURITY

POSSIBLE ESTABLISHMENT OF GUARANTEED ANNUAL INCOME PLAN—DETERMINATION OF METHOD OF PAYMENT

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a supplementary question to the hon. Minister of National Health and Welfare.

Since he just stated that he suggested at the liberal convention during the weekend that a measure be adopted for establishing a guaranteed annual income plan for people in need, and since he stated a moment ago that he is in favour of a system whereby those in need would receive assistance and others would not, can the minister specify who will decide who needs help and who does not?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, first of all, I would like to point out that I did not suggest at the convention what the hon. member for Témiscamingue says I did. As for his second point, I refer him to the working paper tabled in the House last April.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Before this discussion continues, I would like to remind hon. members that it is irregular to ask questions based on statements made outside this House.

MANPOWER

POSSIBLE REDUCTION IN NUMBER OF TRAINEES AT POINT EDWARD INSTITUTE—REQUEST FOR RECONSIDERATION

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In view of the fact that the federal-provincial manpower needs committee for Nova Scotia is today considering a recommendation to reduce the number of basic training for skill development places from 380 to 180 at the Point Edward Institute, and in view of the fact that there are long waiting lists for training at all Canada Manpower Centres in Cape Breton, would the minister intervene personally to see that the operations at this training institute are not diminished in any way whatsoever?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, as I indicated privately to the hon. member, I am sympathetic to his representation. I will take special steps to examine the situation myself, but it has to be done in consultation and co-operation with the provinces, as I believe the hon. member knows.

Mr. Muir: Would the minister concern himself to the extent of suggesting to the committee that he should be fully informed as to the actual happening before the committee makes a decision that it may possibly regret a little later?

Mr. Andras: That representation will be given full consideration.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

Mr. John Reynolds (Burnaby-Richmond-Delta): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment. Has the minister been using the facilities of the Pacific Environment Institute government wharf in West Vancouver to moor his private boat and, if so, is this practice consistent with the policy of the government?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member, I am sure, will appreciate that questions such as this should be placed on the order paper. I doubt very much whether it is in order to ask a question of this kind during the oral question period.

Mr. Davis: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member knows the answer to that question. He knows it is yes. He knows it is a tiny boat. He knows that if any other public purpose can be served it will be removed. He knows that tens of thousands of private boats are moored at public docks and no fee charged whatsoever.

Mr. Reynolds: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. My point of order is that the minister's boat is at a government dock and not a public dock, and while it was tied up at that dock it was replacing a government boat that had to be tied on the outside which caused damage to that boat. I do not think a minister of the Crown should be using government facilities for his own personal benefit.

Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, again on the question of privilege, the hon. member knows that a full inquiry has been carried out and that the other boat which was damaged was, first, not displaced and second damaged as a result of negligence.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We are running short of time. The hon. member for Victoria has the floor.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

PROPOSED OCEANOGRAPHIC INSTITUTE AT ESQUIMALT—REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE PLAN NOT CHANGED

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment. In correspondence last summer the minister stated that a start would be made on an oceanographic institute costing $7 million in Esquimalt-Saanich and that the first sod would be turned in September. To date there is no indication of this. Can the minister assure the House that his plans have not changed in respect of the oceanographic institute?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is correct in assuming that this project will proceed as announced. Plans are well advanced for the start of construction.

Oral Questions

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

DATE OF TABLING OF PROGRAM FOR NORTHERN ONTARIO—HIRING OF PERSONNEL FOR NORTHERN ONTARIO OFFICES

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. In view of the meetings that have taken place between officials of DREE and the Ontario government, can the minister inform the House when the government intends to table its program for industrial development in northern Ontario?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I do not know the precise date but I can say that the negotiations with the government of Ontario are proceeding very well. It is my latest information that it should not be more than a matter of a month or a few weeks.

Mr. Rodriguez: In view of the inability of DREE to decentralize its staff, would the minister inform the House whether he is now prepared to hire personnel to service the northern Ontario offices of DREE?

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, without accepting the first part of the comment, it is of course our intention to have as many people as we can get who are competent, and I am sure there are plenty of them, from northern Ontario for those offices.

SUGGESTED EXTENSION OF PROGRAMS TO YUKON AND NORTHWEST TERRITORIES

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary for the minister who informed me both here and in committee several months ago that a complete study would be made into the feasibility of having DREE applicable to both the northern territories of Canada. Can he say now whether his studies are complete and whether this section of Canada will be included in DREE to make that legislation truly national?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I have had consultations with some of the elected representatives of the Yukon Territory and the Northwest Territories and my colleague, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, and his officials have been meeting with our officials to see how the programs of both departments can be integrated. If it should appear on the surface that there is some merit in extending DREE programs into the north, we will find a mechanism to do so.

SUGGESTED RE-INTRODUCTION OF TARIFF ON BEEF FROM UNITED STATES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Ross Whicher (Bruce): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Finance I have a question for the Prime Minister. Is there any evidence that the United States authorities are willing to relinquish the tariff on Canadian beef going across the border and, if not, is it the intention of the government to re-initiate the tariff on beef coming into Canada so that our Canadian beef producers will have a chance to compete on an equal footing with United States producers?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member will recall that when the Minister of Finance introduced this change he did indicate it would be temporary and kept under constant review. I want to reassure the member that the matter was discussed again as recently as last Thursday in cabinet. When action seems to be imperative, we will take it.

FISHERIES

COMPENSATION TO EAST COAST FISHERMEN FOR STORM DAMAGE—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Walter C. Carter (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Fisheries. It concerns a request from east coast fishermen for compensation in respect of storm damage on June 17. Can the minister tell the House whether he has yet made a submission to his colleagues in the cabinet dealing with this matter and, if so, when can we expect an announcement?

● (1520)

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries): Yes, Mr. Speaker, a submission has been made jointly by myself and the Minister of Finance, and I hope that a decision will be made very shortly.

ENERGY

REASON FOR FAILURE TO DISCUSS EXPORT TAX ON OIL AT WESTERN ECONOMIC CONFERENCE

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question to the one asked by the Leader of the Opposition and I would like to put it to the Prime Minister. In view of the fact the western economic conference took place only a short time ago, and in view of the recent announcement by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources concerning the export tax on oil, can the Prime Minister tell the House the reason this very important matter was not discussed in detail at the time of the western conference?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, for a very simple reason. The federal government and I personally attempted to put energy on the agenda of that conference and the western provinces themselves refused to include energy as an item on the agenda.

[Mr. Whicher.]

BROADCASTING

COVERAGE OF 1976 OLYMPIC GAMES—ALLEGED SAVING BY ACCEPTING CTV OFFER—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is also directed to the right hon. Prime Minister. In view of CTV's continuing offer to provide equipment, facilities and personnel to act as co-host broadcaster with the CBC for the coverage of the 1976 Olympic games at a considerably lower cost than the CBC, is it the government's intention to make use of these repeated offers, thus reducing the over-all cost to the CBC and to the taxpayers by millions of dollars and, if not, why not?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I cannot agree with the premise of the question, but I must confess that a detailed discussion of it is more than I could provide at this time. I would hope the hon. member raised that matter when the bill was before the House. If he did, I am sure he got the answer.

LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAM—ALLEGED DELAY IN SENDING APPLICATIONS TO NEWFOUNDLAND—REQUEST FOR EXTENSION OF DEADLINE

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In view of the fact that again, as in past years, application forms for LIP did not reach Newfoundland until a week after the proposed date, and in view of the fact this will mean further delays in their reaching the northern communities, would the minister advise if he will extend the October 15 date for the approval of applications for another week or two so these people will get the opportunity they deserve?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I will examine the allegations of the hon. member. I was not aware they were that late. I thought they went out early in September.

LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAM—SCARCITY OF APPLICATION FORMS IN ATLANTIC PROVINCES

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister whether he would look very closely into the policy with respect to the releasing of application forms for LIP projects, particularly in the Atlantic provinces where they seem to be in very scarce supply?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Most certainly, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Sarnia-Lambton.

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, the question put by the hon. member for Bruce is one in which I was interested and I have been trying to raise for three days now. I compliment him on catching your eye, Sir.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

LAW OF THE SEA CONFERENCE—POSSIBLE ATTENDANCE OF MEMBERS OF VARIOUS PARTIES AS OBSERVERS

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs with respect to the coming preliminary Conference on the Law of the Sea as well as the conference itself next year. Will representatives from the various parties in the House be permitted to attend each of those conferences?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the House may remember that I outlined in some detail the procedure which the government hoped to follow with respect to the Law of the Sea Conference, namely, that the first stage would be consultations with the provinces, following which I would publish a paper setting out our views which would be subject to discussion in the appropriate committee of the House so that we would at that time be able to get the views of all the parties.

Mr. Howard: I was asking the minister about the presence of members at the preliminary conference and at the conference itself, instead of channelling information through the government, if not as participants at least as observers.

Mr. Sharp: I will take that under consideration, although I should point out to the hon. member that if I began to open up the conference to observers in this way there would be very many people throughout the country who would also like to be present. I understand the spirit in which this is put forward, but I think that our delegation must be of a wieldy size.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

FOOD PRICES

CONCURRENCE IN SECOND REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. McGrath:

That the second report of the Special Committee on Trends in Food Prices, presented to the House on Wednesday, July 25, 1973, be concurred in.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, there have been consultations about one or two additional matters with respect to today's debate, and I think you will find that there is an agreement with respect to the length of the speeches. As I understand it, the rules would provide for 40 minute speeches all day long. I do not think anyone wants that. There is agreement that the first speaker for each party speak for 30 minutes and that all succeeding speakers speak for not more than 20 minutes.

While I am on my feet, may I mention another point, although I confess that I have not discussed it with the other House leaders yet. It has to do with the hour between five and six o'clock. I believe that under Standing Order 16 we would have to use that hour today for private members' business, but I suggest that we might agree now to suspend the private members' hour so that the rest of the time today can be spent on the motion of the hon. member for St. John's East.

Mr. Speaker: The first suggestion made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) was based on what I believe were consultations limiting the speeches made by hon. members of each party initiating the debate to 30 minutes and all speeches thereafter to a maximum of 20 minutes. Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member suggests also that private members' hour be suspended. Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: It is so ordered.

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, first of all, I am very pleased to note that this motion for concurrence in the second report of the Special Committee on Trends in Food Prices has suddenly become so popular. There were two similar motions standing on the order paper, and it is interesting to note that these two motions for concurrence in the second report of the Special Committee on Trends in Food Prices did not surface until after the consumer price index for the month of August was brought down on September 13.

I may say at the outset, that the motion for concurrence in the report of the special committee is usually the responsibility of the chairman of the committee. Why the chairman of the committee or one of the government members of the committee did not see fit to move this motion perhaps will make itself known as this debate progresses. This is most unusual in the case of a special committee of the House because its very nature indicates that the House has set up a special sessional committee to deal with a special and urgent problem.

As a special committee, this committee will end with this session. That is why I believe the subject matter of the second report of the Special Committee on Trends in Food Prices, which was presented to the House on July 25, is a very important one. In saying that, I have no hesitation whatsoever in complimenting the hon. member for Sarnia-Lambton (Mr. Cullen) for the excellent manner in which he has conducted himself as chairman of this important committee.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: I may say that, apart from a few very infrequent lapses into partisan politics, the hon. member has been a good chairman of a very special and important committee. This makes it all the more difficult to understand why he did not move concurrence in this report. It might be well to remember that those charged with the responsibility of being chairmen of committees of this House all too often forget that they are the representatives of Your Honour, and hence have special responsibilities which they should discharge in the same fair, unbiased and objective manner as exemplified by Your Honour in this House. But all too often, Mr. Speaker, that unfortunately is not the case. That is especially so under the new rules of the House.

● (1530)

It might be well for us to remember that the setting up of this special committee was the government's answer to the serious problems of inflation, to the effects of inflation on rising food prices. This committee first saw the light of day in a reference in the Speech from the Throne opening the present session back on January 4 this year. The government then referred to the serious inflation problem and to its determination to protect the purchasing power of the Canadian dollar. I think the precise words were:

—to protect the purchasing power of the Canadian dollar in the hands of the Canadian people.

The Speech from the Throne went on to refer to the fact that:

While food prices in Canada have steadied slightly in the last month or so, the government is concerned about possible future effects of the world-wide trend toward higher food prices and will propose setting up a Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons to make a special study of this problem.

The House rejected the idea of a special joint committee, and I think quite rightly. It would be well for us to remember that since January 4 when these words were put into His Excellency's mouth by the government, Canada has had the worst rate of inflation in 22 years and the highest increase in food prices since the Korean war.

The Speech from the Throne back in January placed a very high priority on what it called the attainment of a reasonable price stability. I might say that these words are as meaningless and as empty as the words of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) in his budget speech on February 19, a budget that was supposed to reduce unemployment, hold the line on rising food costs and, for certain specified items, actually to reduce prices. I can tell you, Sir, that that budget could be best described in the words of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) as a sick joke. Unfortunately, the joke is on the working people of this country.

According to the August report of the Bank of Canada, this country has the highest and sharpest rise in food costs and a higher rate of inflation than any of the six other major industrialized western countries that make up the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development, OECD, It is also well to remember that since the high sounding rhetoric of the Speech from the Throne and the budget of the Minister of Finance last February, we have had high unemployment, high interest rates and high food prices.

[Mr. McGrath.]

There have been five increases in interest rates since that time, and what amounts to an 8.3 per cent rate of inflation as well as a 15.8 per cent yearly increase in the price of food over the period August 1972 to August 1973. The rate of increase for the first eight months of this year has been an over-all one of 6.6 per cent in the consumer price index, and an increases of 12.9 per cent in the cost of food. So, Sir, you can see that the greatest rate of increase has taken place since the Speech from the Throne when all the concern was expressed about rising food prices and protecting the income of Canadians, and since the budget speech of the Minister of Finance which was designed to hold the line on inflation and reduce unemployment. That is why this second report of the Special committee on Trends in Food prices is so important.

It is, therefore, perhaps even more important for us not only to examine the recommendations contained in the second report, which is properly before the House in accordance with the provisions of this motion, but to reflect on the recommendations contained in the first report of the Special Committee. That first report was tabled in the House on April 3, and concurrence was moved on April 17. There is a good reason for going back to the first report and that is that the second recommendation of the second report, one of the most important recommendations, calls upon the government to get on with implementing the recommendations in the first report. I expect that that kind of recommendation in a committee's report must be unprecedented.

The second recommendation in the report now before us reads:

The Committee recommends that the Federal Government consider the advisability of implementing all of the recommendations contained in the first report, especially the recommendation to consider the feasibility of programs to provide food for low income Canadians.

Of the six recommendations contained in the first report, only two have been acted upon by the government. Even at that, those two recommendations have only been partly implemented. The first one deals with setting up the Food Prices Review Board. It is interesting to see just exactly how the government dealt with that recommendation which called for the introduction of special legislation to set up the board. The government did not carry out that part of the committee's recommendation. Instead, it circumvented the committee's report, circumvented this House, and set up the board under the provisions of the Inquiries Act.

The second recommendation that has been partially implemented by the government is the one calling for the media to be provided with more consumer education.

The other four recommendations in the first report that have been ignored called upon the government to implement certain provisions of the proposed Competition Act dealing with consumer protection, new legislation governing the nutritional content of foods sold to the consumer and nutritional labelling, and federal-provincial co-sponsored programs so that nutritious food would be made available directly to children, senior citizens, shut-ins and the destitute. Even back in March when these recommendations were placed before the House, there were indications that meat and poultry prices were going up and that food prices generally would soar.

There was evidence presented to the committee very early in its deliberations to suggest that there was a very serious nutritional problem in Canada, and if there was such a problem then it is all the more serious today. There are many people in this country who cannot afford a nutritious diet. There are many in this country who are under-nourished. This is especially so among children; it is especially so among old people, and it is especially so among the unemployed.

In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, the working poor are the ones who are the worst off because they have to suffer the terrible frustration of not being able to afford an adequate diet with their hard earned money. Of course, the poor of this country, according to the best definition and the best advice that I have, represent 25 per cent of the population—one-quarter of the population, living at or below what has been defined as the poverty line.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, that first report recommended that specific moneys be made available to consumer groups to make representations to government where appropriate. I can see the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Gray) reacting to that one by saying the government has already substantially increased the grant to the Consumers' Association of Canada. I commend him for that action, Mr. Speaker, but that increase was long overdue and it is not what the committee had in mind. The committee was referring to those new groups that have sprung up across the country; groups that represent the working poor, the anti-poverty groups, the citizens' rights groups—those who have banded together so that they may collectively give voice to the terrible frustration their members feel at not being able to provide adequate diets for their families, not being able to properly clothe their families and not being able to make it because of today's seriously inflated prices. These groups were born out of the sheer frustration of trying to survive on inadequate incomes at today's prices.

Mr. Speaker, it is not possible to discuss the report before us without discussing the first report, and the shameful failure of the government to implement all its recommendations. Surely, this must be the first time that a special committee has had to remind the government, by way of a recommendation, to get on with the implementation of its first report; that must be unprecedented. Certainly, it says something about this government's attitude to the special committee on Trends in Food Prices; it shows, Mr. Speaker, that the contempt characterized by the government in their attitude toward the trends in food prices is similar to their attitude to the other committees of this House and that is a shame.

This party dissented from the first report because we felt it did not contain an over-all policy recommendation to deal with the cause of rising food prices and because we felt at the time, and subsequent experience has sustained us in this view, that a Food Prices Review Board would be ineffective and virtually useless as its terms of reference were too confined. We made this clear at the time. That is not to suggest, Mr. Speaker, that we did not support the other recommendations, the effect of which would be, as I have said, to deal with some of the consequences of inflation and high food prices. Indeed, the Progressive Conservative members on that committee played a very active role in drafting that first report.

I believe it is only fair to say that the government owes this committee and this House an explanation. Otherwise by its actions, the government stands in contempt of the very committee which it set up as a special committee to deal with trends in food prices.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: There is certainly no doubt in my mind, Mr. Speaker, that this has been a hard-working committee, a committee on which all of the members took their duties very seriously. I think it can be said of this committee as a whole that, as a result of the hard work and dedication of its members, it has achieved what I consider to be a rare thing for committees these days. It has achieved a degree of collegiality which no longer seems to characterize the committees of this House because of the new rules. These rules make it very difficult for committees to have any degree of collegiality or cordiality or any degree of comradeship or any degree of working-together.

Mr. Nielsen: They have goon squads over there.

Mr. McGrath: As my colleague, the hon. member for the Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) has pointed out, not only is there a lack of collegiality but we have witnessed the moving goon squads. They move from committee to committee to boost the government's side so that the government's position can always be maintained.

An hon. Member: What crap!

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, the special committee, referred to in the Speech from the Throne, was set up on January 23 and has heard 35 witnesses in 28 meetings. Many of these meetings were four-hour sessions, although there were times when the committee sat longer. I am sure that members of the committee, without exception, view with as much concern as I the failure of the government to proceed with the implementation of the recommendations of the first report and the attitude of the government, generally, to this special committee and the two reports.

We view it with great concern Mr. Speaker, because the subject before this special committee of the House is one that requires urgent and immediate attention. It is difficult, if not impossible, for us to understand why the government does not treat the committee with the same sense of urgency and the same sense of immediacy as the committee is viewed by its members.

Members of this House, without exception, are affected by rising food prices but there are those in our society who are more affected. I refer to those people on lower and fixed incomes, the working poor and the unemployed. The over half a million Canadians who are unemployed have to pay the same inflated prices for food, have to make it on unemployment insurance benefits, have to feed their families on their weekly unemployment cheques or, worse, on their weekly welfare cheques. We are talking about 500,000 Canadians, citizens of this country who have families to support.

Then, there are the working poor whose ranks are growing rapidly because of the escalating rate of inflation.

Food Prices

According to the report of the Senate Committee on Poverty—and I might say that this is an excellent report and one which has been largely ignored by this government—in 1971 a family earning $3,000 a year, which of course is well below the poverty line by today's standards, spent 27.9 per cent of their income on food. A family earning up to $9,000 a year spent 18.8 per cent of their income on food and those lucky enough to earn $15,000 a year spent 13.4 per cent of their income on food. If we update these figures from 1971, Mr. Speaker, to take into account the rate of inflation since then, we find that the $3,000 a year income family now spends approximately 31.2 per cent of its budget on food; the family earning up to $9,000 a year spends 21 per cent of its budget on food and the family earning up to $15,000 a year spends approximately 15 per cent of its budget on food. So you can see, Mr. Speaker, that these figures give us some idea of the crisis situation we are in and the toll that inflation takes of the working poor.

The low income groups of this country and the unemployed of this country are the hardest hit. That is why it is difficult, if not impossible, to understand why this government ignores this crisis. Low income earners have come nowhere near keeping up with the 15.8 per cent yearly increase in the cost of food since August, 1972 and they have come nowhere near keeping up with the almost 50 per cent increase in the cost of food since 1961. The minimum wage in this country is still below $2 an hour and, unfortunately for many, the minimum wage is often the maximum. I remain convinced that rising food prices and inflation are the chief causes of labour unrest in this country.

Nutrition is a critical factor in poverty, one which is often forgotten. The children of poor families must eat, too. It is well to refer to a recent study in Montreal which shows that 20 per cent of the population of Montreal lives in poverty. Also, 44 per cent of that city's slum families are undernourished. Yet still the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) and the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Gray) tell us that food is a bargain, even at today's prices.

All the consumer education available in this country, all the consumer protection, consumer laws and shopping skills, are meaningless if you do not have sufficient income to put food on the family's table. That, Sir, is the problem facing many in this country today. According to the latest statistics available, and according to the Economic Council of Canada, one half million families, or 22 per cent of all family units in Canada, live in poverty. They live in poverty according to the definition of the Economic Council of Canada. That is why the committee recommended in its second report that the government pay special attention to implementing the recommendations in the first report and consider immediately a program to provide food directly to low income Canadians.

In its first report, the committee recommended that the government of Canada immediately proceed to promote a federal-provincial sponsored program to get food directly to the children of this country who suffer from malnutrition—that is a strong word. In other words, the committee desired to get food to the working poor of this country, to those who live on fixed incomes and to those who live on welfare. I consider that to be an urgent matter, when one considers the 3.2 per cent increase in food costs in one month. That is why I consider the work of this committee to be of an urgent nature.

It would also be well to refer to two of the other recommendations of the second report. I do not mean to downgrade any of the recommendations of the report, because we helped to draft the report and we support it. We only say that it does not go far enough.

Recommendation No. 8 reads:

> Because an adequate supply of essential food is vital, the Committee recommends that the Federal Government consider the advisability of immediately implementing policies to encourage farmers to increase steadily the production of staple foodstuffs on a basis that will provide a fair income for the farm family and basic food at a reasonable price for the consumer.

My colleagues will have more to say about that during the course of this debate. Recommendation No. 9 reads:

> The Committee recommends that the Federal Government consider the advisability of protecting the Canadian market from the pressures of world food requirements by ensuring that domestic prices reflect domestic demand and supply.

We suggest that consideration should be given first to the domestic consumers of this country but, at the same time, we must ensure that Canadians can take advantage of world market conditions. That has always been our policy and we have never advocated any other.

As the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton) said last Thursday during the emergency debate on the consumer price index, this country has probably the greatest food producing capability of any country in the world, and it follows that we ought to provide incentives to our farmers so that they will produce more food.

Because of the 3.2 per cent increase in the cost of food during August, because of the failure of the government to deal adequately with this serious situation and, as well, because the Food Prices Review Board under its present terms of reference is powerless to act and cannot meet the present situation adequately, as we have said before, now repeat, underline and cannot emphasize too greatly, the hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Atkey) will move an amendment to send this report back to the committee. I hope the government will permit this amendment to come to a vote. I hope the government will be seized with the same sense of urgency with which we are seized and permit this amendment to come to a vote, as this will give the NDP an opportunity to demonstrate and underline their concern, as expressed by their leader in the statement of September 13. It will give that party a chance to demonstrate to Canada that it is not really hanging on to the coat tails of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). Perhaps if they give us that support, if the amendment is allowed to come to a vote, we may be in a position to force this arrogant and heartless government to do something soon about rising food prices in Canada.

Mr. Terry Grier (Toronto-Lakeshore): Mr. Speaker, as I listened to the remarks of the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath), I was struck by his somewhat selective version of what took place in the committee, the report of which is being discussed this afternoon. I was not as struck as he was by the atmosphere of cordiality. I can well remember a number of occasions, particularly in the early stages of that committee, when there were vigorous and sharp disagreements on the part of various members as to what the committee reports ought to contain. It is worth noting that the second report of the food prices committee in some respects does not deal with the central issue of rising food costs, the reason being that there was such widespread disagreement on the part of members that we were unable to arrive at any consensus as to a specific recommendation.

This afternoon I want do deal with one or two aspects of the second report and comment more fully on the exigencies of the Food Prices Review Board and its fate since it was established. I will conclude by talking about one factor in rising food costs in Canada which I feel has not received sufficient attention in the last few months.

I begin by commenting on the report itself. I note that among the recommendations of the second reports is one dealing with advertising. Having heard the testimony of the supermarket representatives in the course of the June and July hearings, I was struck by their efforts to suggest that total advertising costs are a very small percentage of the figure representing their total sales. It is unquestionably true to say that, in a high volume business like the retail food business, the expenditure on advertising will form a relatively small percentage of the amount to be set against total sales. Let us remember, however, that many types of food are not advertised at all or advertised minimally; also, a good proportion of the food sold on supermarket shelves consists of non-advertised private label brands. If we then take the remaining volume of food sold and apply against that total advertising costs, we will see that, in respect of such items as are advertised, the cost of advertising is significantly high, or forms a significant percentage.

It is worth noting that the second report of the committee contains the statement that private label brands which are not nationally advertised can bring about effective savings to the consumer in the order of 20 per cent per item. I am talking about products of comparable quality and value. The supermarkets themselves admit that the savings with respect to private label brands represent about one fifth, if one compares those brands with nationally advertised brands. At a time when rising food costs concern us all, the conclusion of the committee that private label brands form a large proportion of total supermarket sales is a worthwhile one.

I was also struck by the efforts of the supermarkets to present their profit performance as a percentage of sales. By the time the committee finished its hearings, it was generally agreed, even by representatives of the retail food outlets, that this was not in fact a very meaningful or good measure of a profit performance. We were finally able to get profit pictures in terms of equity or assets.

When the representatives of the supermarkets appeared before us, they assured us that the practice of double or triple price labelling, which came to the attention of the public in mid-August, was one which they deprecated and in which they did not engage. We were given very firm assurances that nothing of that kind took place and the situation simply did not arise where a consumer would find one, two or possibly three price labels on a product. However, this August, as a result of some investigative work by some of Canada's newspapers, a story appeared to the effect that many supermarkets had, in fact, many products on their shelves with one, two or three price labels.

When I put that fact against the assurance that was given by the supermarkets with regard to that particular practice last July, I wonder about some of the other assurances the committee was given by the same supermarkets. I may say that having only one price label on a product does not solve the problem for the consumer. The nub of the point is, are the supermarkets raising the prices of products which are already in inventory and which were purchased at a lower cost than newer shipments? If there is only one label, it may just be that the supermarkets are on the ball. The question is, what is the amount on the label and are the supermarkets over-charging the consumers? As I say, these supermarkets gave us assurances. In light of what has happened since then, I am not sure those assurances are necessarily all that comforting.

Dealing with the Prices Review Board, I may say this body might be called the ugly duckling of Canadian politics. I may say in passing that I recollect the ugly duckling eventually grew into a beautiful swan. If I and my party had anything to do with it, we would make sure the Prices Review Board did not remain an ugly duckling, but became a swan. I certainly look forward to support from my friends in the Conservative party in the committee.

The concept of a prices review agency has been proposed by the New Democratic Party for a number of years. Its purpose would be to give the consumer, at a time of rising prices, some assurance he is not being cheated in the market place. As we conceived and proposed it, the scope of the board would range widely over the economy, concentrating on those pivotal industries whose leverage on economic performance is greatest. It would have effective power to implement whatever conclusions it reached. That still remains the position of this party, as reiterated as recently as last July in Vancouver.

I want to take this opportunity to quote briefly from a resolution adopted by our convention at that time:

> A powerful new Prices Review Board must be set up to protect consumers from unwarranted price increases and from gouging by unscrupulous dealers who would charge everything the traffic will bear. The Board must cover not only food, but other essential industries. Parliament must pass legislation to empower the Board not only to undertake searching investigation of price increases but, where necessary on a selective basis, to impose price ceilings or roll-backs.

Mr. Hellyer: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Grier: Not now, Mr. Speaker. I prefer to conclude my speech first.

At the end of the first series of hearings of the food committee, the New Democratic Party proposed that the committee recommend the establishment of a prices review board dealing with food which would have powers of roll-back. At that time, we limited our recommendation to food. We were dealing with the subject of food in a special committee set up by this parliament to take a look at food prices. We did not want to play politics with the issue, but wanted to see if we could win some support for our proposal. My friends in the Conservative party would not have anything to do with it. They wanted, and I do not question their sincerity, a wide ranging program of freezes and controls. They made that point. Otherwise, they would not go along with anything. The Liberals on the committee reluctantly agreed to the principle of having a prices review board, but wanted any powers of sanction, which we had hoped would be given to the board, to remain in the hands of the government.

On that somewhat unsatisfactory basis, the committee came to a majority decision to recommend the establishment of a board to this parliament. I am happy to say when the first report was debated and approved by the House, among the conclusions approved was that of a prices review board. Shortly thereafter, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Gray) announced the establishment of a board under the Inquiries Act. As far as that announcement was concerned, we approved it. We believed that a board established under the Inquiries Act, given full powers of investigation, could get under way more quickly than would have likely been the case had the government brought legislation of a similar nature to this House.

Our quarrel was not that the board be set up under the Inquiries Act, but that the board be given significant powers to impose roll-backs of prices where necessary. Nothing in the debate which took place in this House or in committee up until that time gave us the slightest assurance we could look forward to any support from those in the Conservative benches who were still tied solely and obsessively to their proposal for wage and price controls. With those defects and short-comings, the Prices Review Board went into operation. Since that time, I regret to say, the defects have loomed up and become more noticeable.

I want to comment on three or four of these defects. First, the government did not appear to take the role of the board very seriously. According to a statement which the board chairman made to the public as late as August, the board received very little co-operation. In fact, in some respects it was being obstructed by government departments through failure to provide the necessary staff.

In August, the CPI figures were released. I can just hear someone sitting around the cabinet table asking what the Prices Review Board was doing about this. It was not until that time the government woke up to the fact it had a Prices Review Board. The minister was obviously told in no uncertain terms to make sure the board got functioning as quickly as possible. I believe the minister is guilty of complacency and considerable political shortsightedness.

If the Prices Review Board had begun functioning earlier and more favourably, it would have been better for the Canadian consumer and, I assume, the government. However, the board seems to have taken too leisurely a view of its role. Not until publicly criticized in August did the chairman admit having that difficulty. What prevented her from indicating previously she was encountering this difficulty with the government and asking for the help of this House to get the staff required?

Up until the beginning of September, this board had only three meetings per se, two of which took place after the story which broke in the Toronto press about double price labelling in the supermarkets. I suspect that as a result of this rather cautious and leisurely manner of setting it up, the board received very little support from the government. I suspect, encouraged by the government, it has taken too narrow a view of its terms of reference.

It was not necessary for the Prime Minister to announce on August 13 that the board was to be given extra powers to investigate specific price increases. It is perfectly clear from the original terms of reference, and from Mrs. Plumptre's replies to my questions in committee in late July, that she believed she had those powers at that time. I cannot for the life of me see why it was necessary to go all through this rather pointless exercise of giving the board powers that it already had. But the government has consistently backed off the question of sanctions and powers for the board, and in this respect as yet I have had no indication of any different position being taken by my colleagues in the Conservative party.

It is all very well for them to argue that we cannot take a look at food in isolation, that it is all part of the same economy. But you can say that about every item or every matter that comes before this House. The fact is that a committee was set up to look at trends in food prices and it made a recommendation to establish a board to deal with food prices, yet every effort that we have made to force the government to give the board powers has been frustrated by the official opposition.

As recently as two weeks ago, I moved a motion in committee, and I am going to move an amendment later on this afternoon in very similar vein. I should like to read very briefly the substance on the motion: That the food Prices Review Board be reconstituted with full power to require cancellation or rollback of unjustified price increases wherever it finds them, those powers to include imposition of penalties against companies that gouge the consumer. I was sure that that resolution would commend itself to my Conservative friends, but in the end they voted against it. Perhaps they will indicate later in this debate why they took that position, given their concern that this government do something about food prices in Canada.

May I say in passing that I personally have not been terribly impressed by the performance of the chairman of the Food Prices Review Board. She gives me the impression that she talks too much and does too little. Hardly had she accepted the position before she was saying in public that she did not believe in wage and price controls. Regardless of whether I agreed with her, I thought that statement was unnecessarily provocative to the Conservative party, whose co-operation she surely would have required in her work. Then, last weekend the chairman of the board was quoted as saying that the Food Prices Review Board should not be given any powers, which I consider provocative to the New Democratic Party. I am not interested in what Mrs. Plumptre thinks. She is not being paid to run around giving opinions off-the-cuff on matters of this kind. She and her board are being paid to investigate and to make recommendations. This parliament will decide whether the board has any powers, not Mrs. Plumptre.

I could go on to talk about what I think is a somewhat patronizing attitude displayed in the first report toward shoppers. Shop carefully, she says. Are we to assume that Canadians are not shopping carefully? If they are shopping carefully, the prices of the commodities they are shopping for carefully are going up at the same rate as the commodities that they might be shopping for carelessly. To be told to shop carefully is cold comfort to the Canadian consumers at this time.

The support of this party is for the idea of a Prices Review Board that will do a job, for a board that must be made operational. Our comments and position with regard to the present personnel and the pace at which the board operates, I think I have made clear, are conditional and considerably qualified. At this point I am not interested in getting sidetracked into personalities. I would not be disappointed if Mrs Plumptre were replaced by a more vigorous and authoritative chairman, but this will not solve the real problem. The real problem is: Is this House—and I address myself to Conservatives as well as to the Liberal benches—now prepared to give this mechanism, approved by the House, established by the government, the powers it needs to enforce its investigations?

Why are these powers so important? Why is it that it is necessary for the board to implement its decisions rather than leave them to the government? I am sure I do not have to say to any member of the opposition that the assurances that have been received in the past from government benches do not leave one too comfortable in the belief that when a specific recommendation is made action will be taken. The Prime Minister said on August 13: "We will consider making illegal or unwarranted under law what now can be done but which is considered to be profiteering and which might be difficult to get at under our existing legislation". Translated, I think that means that if a recommendation came forward the government would consider implementing it. That assurance is not sufficient. But if in fact the government is willing to move to consider implementing recommendations of the board, why not do the thing properly and give the board the powers to implement its own recommendations? Give the board teeth. Give it the power to insist on rollbacks where necessary. It seems to me that would be not only the sensible but the swiftest way of dealing with the problem.

The hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies) talked the other day about breaking inflationary expectations. I cannot think of anything that would break those expectations more quickly and more satisfactorily than this board, and I hope they will do so very quickly. Examples of the consumer being unfairly treated in the marketplace should be sufficient to enable it to implement powers given it by this parliament to rollback or cancel increases, and would demonstrate that henceforth this agency of the government was willing, able and ready to protect the Canadian consumer.

I now turn to another factor in rising costs generally which needs to be illuminated rather more than was the case in committee or subsequently. I refer to profits and profit levels. When the supermarket representatives came before us they dealt mostly with their profit performance during the fiscal years 1972 and prior. These fiscal years ended some time in March or April of the year in question.

When we looked at the profit performances once they were translated in terms of equity, we saw that the healthy supermarkets were earning profits on equity ranging between 10 and 12 or 12½ per cent. They contended, I think correctly, that those levels of profit were not out of line with what was earned in other sectors of the Canadian economy.

It is only really since the summer of 1972, and particularly during the year 1973, that there has been a very substantial acceleration in food prices. It therefore seems to me significant to look, so far as we can find figures, at profit performances during this period. For example, Dominion Stores, at its recent annual meeting, announced that its net profit had increased in the first three months of this fiscal year, 1973-74, from the 18 cents a share of the previous year to 34 cents a share, an increase of almost 100 per cent. The chairman of the board said: "Well, the performance the year before was a very bad one and therefore with this increase we are catching up". I say not true. I remind hon. members that in 1973, the year ending March 1973, Dominion Stores earned a profit of 11 per cent on equity—10.9 per cent, to be precise, and in 1972, 11.2 per cent. It was in the fiscal year 1971, two years ago, that the so-called bad year occurred, and that was when the supermarkets were engaging in a price war.

When one looks at the food industry generally and not just supermarkets, one notes, for example, that for the year ending December 30, 1972 the net income of Burns Foods rose to $3.6 million from $2.9 million the previous year, an increase of 25 per cent. For the six months ending July 1, 1973 there was another jump of 24.4 per cent. The figures for the Becker Milk Company indicate a return on equity after taxes for the year 1972 of 20.4 per cent. Canada Packers showed a gratifying jump in net income over the identical period a year earlier of over $4 million, an increase of 40 per cent. The rate of return for the most recent year was 10.95 per cent, and during the 13 weeks ending June 30 this year the net income jumped by another 35 per cent.

Canada Safeway had a net income jump from $15 million in 1971 to $21 million in 1972, with a rate of return, as I said, of 12.6 per cent. I have already talked about Dominion Stores, and Dominion Dairies for the six month period ending June 30, 1973 showed net income up by 59 per cent. General Foods Limited, in the year ending March 31, 1972, showed a net income jump from $9.2 million to $10.3 million, a rate of return on investment on the other hand of 14 per cent. M. Loeb Limited for the 16 weeks ending May 19 of this year showed a jump in profitability of over 122 per cent. Maple Leaf Mills, in spite of a fractional drop in sales last year, showed company profits had climbed by 81 per cent. Quaker Oats showed a 12.6 per cent return on equity last year, and Schneider's Limited for the fiscal year ending October 28, 1972 showed a rate of return on investment of 10 per cent. Silverwood Industries for the 12 months ending March 23, 1973 had a jump in net profits of 775 per cent over the same period a year earlier. They probably have an explanation for that, but it is still a pretty healthy rate of increase. Western Stockyards Limited, and I do not know much about stockyards, showed a rate of return on equity of 22.9 per cent. Steinberg's Limited showed a rate of return on equity of 12.8 per cent for their year, 1972, and net income in the first three months of this year increased by 10 per cent.

An hon. Member: What about Loblaw's?

Mr. Grier: Mr. Speaker, I do not think I have to read all of these figures to indicate that at a time when the consumer has been particularly conscious of quickly rising prices, when various agencies and committees have conducted studies, one rather interesting phenomenon has emerged in the last few months as we begin to get some figures on performance in 1973.

An hon. Member: You forgot about Loblaw's.

Mr. Grier: I still have lots more, but I did not want to run out of time, and I wanted to bring to the attention of some of the less astute members of this House some very simple conclusions.

The simple fact is that the profit picture of companies, not only in the food industry but right across the economy, has been going up at an almost unprecedented rate. These rates are not compared with a bad year, as the so-called bad year in the food industry was two or three years ago. I am talking about improvements over a year which these companies told their own shareholders two or three months ago was a good year, and I might add that the year before was also a good year. We are talking about a phenomenon which shows that at a time when the consumer is digging into his own pocket to pay for food, shelter, fuel, mortgages and so on, the profit performance of companies supplying these services has shown a very healthy rate of increase. I want to suggest that the rate of increase is too healthy, and that it is time we considered the imposition in this country of something that might be called an excess profits tax. I have suggested that the rate of return enjoyed by these companies is too high, given the hardships to which the Canadian consumer is being put.

Let me suggest that if we take the whole profit performance of the Canadian economy in 1973, we would see that as a percentage of the gross national product the total profits of the corporations have gone up anywhere from $1.8 billion to $2.1 billion. When we take a look at the reasons for price increases, whether they be in the food industry or elsewhere, one of the phenomena we can and should look at critically is that in relation to the profit performance of these companies. I would suggest that it would be entirely in keeping with considerations of equity and fair play to the consumer that at a time when we are talking about a freeze here, a control there and a stop-gap measure elsewhere, we should consider imposing an excess profits tax, above which it would not be possible for companies to earn as a result of hardships imposed on the Canadian consumer.

In the time at my disposal I have dealt with an excess profits tax and the Prices Review Board. I come now to an amendment I wish to move, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis):

That the second report of the Special Committee on Trends in Food Prices be not now concurred in, but that it be referred back to the said committee for the purpose of giving reconsideration to the inclusion therein of a recommendation that the Food Prices Review Board be reconstituted with full power to require cancellation or rollback of unjustified price increases wherever it finds them.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the hon. member would now permit a question?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Chair is in some difficulty in this regard as the hon. member's time has expired. It was agreed earlier that we would hold the first round of speakers to 30 minutes, and subsequent speakers to 20 minutes. However, if the House gives its consent, I will permit the hon. member to ask his question.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member advise the House whether he and his party envisage that the Prices Review Board, in addition to having the power to rollback prices if necessary, would have precisely the same power in respect of wages where these are out of line with the averages, and where they exceeded productivity to the point of being inflationary?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): As in Newfoundland, for example?

Mr. Grier: Mr. Speaker, I would envisage these powers to be such that if a price increase was considered necessary or justified on the basis of a wage increase, the board would not consider it unjustified and would agree to it.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Hon. members have heard the motion proposed by the hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore (Mr. Grier), seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis). The Chair has a bit of difficulty in accepting the amendment, but perhaps there will be no objection to it. If there is objection or submissions to be made, the Chair would appreciate hearing them now.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, on examining this amendment I recall that there was another amendment moved at the time the first report was presented to the House some months ago, in April I believe. At that time I think the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Ritchie) proposed an amendment. It was not in the same terms but was generally along the same lines in that it suggested that the committee should consider granting the Review Board certain powers not included in the reference or the report. At that time I spoke on the point of order and Mr. Speaker, who was then in the Chair, after consideration held that the amendment was not in order. I do not have the citation before me, but the ruling stays in my mind very clearly.

I must suggest that there is the same reason for rejecting this amendment now. There are several hon. members who were members of the committee now present. They are conversant not only with the parliamentary law which applied, but also with the facts. One of my colleagues has shown me the citation which appears at page 3392 of Hansard for April 17, 1973. The amendment at that time proposed was:

● (1630)

That the motion for concurrence in the interim report of the parliamentary committee studying price trends in food be amended by

(1) inserting after the word "be" the word "not" and by

(2) deleting the period after "in" and adding thereto "and that the said interim report be referred back to the said committee with the instruction that the committee recommend to the House that

(a) its terms of reference be widened to include a study of all prices and costs, and not just food prices, and

There is, of course, a distinction there, but at the same time there is some resemblance in that there is a widening of the original terms of reference.

(b) the government consider the advisability of instituting an immediate 90-day "freeze" on all incomes, costs and prices, exempting only the price of food "at the farm gate", and

(c) the government consider the advisability of taking measures to stabilize costs in the Canadian economy and to halt the rise in the country's cost of living, after the period of the 90-day "freeze".

I grant that this amendment, proposed by the hon. member for Dauphin, did go a stage further but the principle seems to be much the same that it was, in fact, directing the special committee to include certain recommendations far wider than those contained in the terms of reference and the report the House was considering.

In his ruling at page 3392, Mr. Speaker made that quite plain with his very forceful, eloquent and sound judgment which since I have come to appreciate. I am not so sure I appreciated it at that time, but now I understand it a little better. Mr. Speaker said:

I might say that my main reservation is that this appears to be an entirely new question, and I cannot think that that can be considered as an amendment at all. I will listen to hon. members, but I suggest they would have to do quite a bit of convincing before they would satisfy the Chair—

Your Honour at this time did not go quite that far, but I did detect in your remarks a willingness to at least be convinced.

The only other citation I have is one which goes back some years when the House was considering the changes in the Standing Orders which were brought in by the Special Committee on Procedure. At that time, there was a motion to concur in the report of the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization. This was at the time when the present Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Macdonald) was House Leader and was talking about the virtues of Standing Order 75 (a), (b) and (c), that ill-conceived motion of which he was the parent. At that time, on behalf of my party, I moved an amendment that one clause of the report be deleted. That course not being satisfactory to the government, which was anxious to impose its rather autocratic rules of closure in this House, the then whip of the Liberal party, Mr. Deachman, moved a subamendment to my amendment. The proposal in his amendment was that the motion be changed so that the committee would, in fact, be recommending an entirely new form of Standing Order 75. Mr. Speaker at that time, after very careful consideration, held that the subamendment proposed by the then hon. member for Vancouver Quadra was not in order.

While my amendment proposing the deletion of one part of the report of the committee was in order, the government, through one of its members, was attempting something that was not in order. I think that case is on all fours with what is being tried at the present time. I would ask Your Honour to give some consideration as to whether or not this amendment can be moved without bringing forth a completely new issue.

Mr. Grier: Hypocritical nonsense.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, first of all may I clear up a minor point. If my good friend, the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin), has made as I shall demonstrate one error, I suggest he has made others. The hon. member referred to the amendment on page 3392 of Hansard for April 17, 1973 as having been moved by the hon. member for Dauphin. May I remind him, although as a Conservative he ought to know his colleagues apart, it was moved by the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence). So, that is the one point on which he is wrong.

Mr. Baldwin: We are quite interchangeable.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): My friend says the Tories are quite interchangeable. That is not the way we see them.

Mr. Speaker, when you first suggested that you had some difficulty about this amendment I thought it was only a minor question that was worrying your Honour and I was not sure whether it would be necessary to take the floor on a procedural point. However, in view of what the hon. member for Peace River said, it is obviously necessary to set the matter straight. It is precisely because of the ruling Mr. Speaker made on April 17 that we restricted the amendment we are presenting to the House to something that clearly would be in order. The amendment moved on April 17 by the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham clearly went beyond the original terms of reference given the committee. It sought clearly to go beyond food prices to prices of all kinds, and suggested a number of other things which Mr. Speaker on that date found to be so far removed from the original terms of reference that there was not any possibility of his accepting that amendment. I may say, as you will note in the record, that I fully agreed with the ruling made on that occasion. Accordingly, when in our party we were drafting the amendment which has been presented by the hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore (Mr. Grier) I may say we toyed with an amendment which would go beyond food prices but we were confronted with this ruling and the precedents which say that a committee cannot go beyond the terms of reference given to it.

The terms of reference of the committee as laid down in the original motion this House passed in January dealt only with food prices. I may say there are plenty of citations to the effect that at no point can a committee be asked to do something that would go beyond its terms of reference. These terms of reference could be enlarged, but that could be done only by a substantive motion given with notice and cannot be done by way of amendment to the motion for concurrence in a report. Therefore, the amendment before us in the name of the hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore is limited within the four corners of the question of food prices. It is limited within the rights originally given the committee to make recommendations in respect of food prices and not in respect of anything else.

May I draw Your Honour's attention to some of the citations which bear on this question. One might well look at citation 323, paragraph (2) of Beauchesne's Fourth Edition to establish something that cannot be done which perhaps is not necessary to the argument but which we might as well have clear. That subparagraph reads:

A report from a committee cannot be amended by the House, but it must be referred back to the committee.

We all know this, but it is as well to have on the record that we cannot here on the floor of the House amend the report of the committee, but can refer the report back to the committee. This is precisely what the amendment of the hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore (Mr. Grier) proposes.

Then, you will notice the following words in Citation 322 of Beauchesne's Fourth Edition:

● (1640)

When the motion to concur is proposed the report may be referred back to the committee for further consideration or with instruction to amend it in any respect.

That is precisely what the amendment proposes, namely, that the report be referred back to the committee for the purpose of considering or reconsidering a question which comes within the four corners of the original terms of reference. Citation 322 goes on as follows:

It is not competent for a committee to reconsider and reverse its own decision,—

We accept that the committee made its own report and it cannot change it by its own motion.

—but if the House resolves that such reconsideration is necessary, the correct procedure is for the House to give the committee instructions which will enable it to consider the whole question again.

I do not see how we can argue about it at all. That is precisely what the amendment is asking, that the report be referred back to the committee and that the committee be given the authority to consider again the whole question of the powers that should be recommended for the Food Prices Review Board.

There are one or two other citations that underline the right to refer reports back to the original committee. Citation 325(4) reads:

When a motion is made for concurrence in a Select Committee report, it is competent for the House to adopt it, reject it, refer it back to the committee or decide that consideration of the report will take place "this day six months".

There is a citation that gives four choices. We have chosen one of them, namely, the right to refer the report back to the committee. Likewise, in Citation 326 we read:

The report of a Standing Committee should be considered final only when it is adopted by the House, because, until then, the House can refer it back to the committee with instruction to amend it in any particular.

That is where we are. This report has not yet been adopted by the House, it is not yet in final form because at this moment the House has the right to refer it back to the committee with an instruction to amend it in any particular. We even refrain from the arbitrariness of the language that it be instructed to do so and so, and instead we give it the authority to reconsider the whole question of whether one of its recommendations should not be that the Prices Review Board have the power to consider and order rollbacks.

There are other words of wisdom in Beauchesne to be found in Citation 220 on page 182, but it is a lengthy paragraph and I do not think I will read it now because the gist of it was summed up in my earlier remarks on this point, namely, that when a report is referred back to the committee or when an instruction is being given to the committee in the first instance, in the second instance, or in any other instance, it cannot go beyond the original terms of reference that were given to the committee. Perhaps I should read two or three sentences near the bottom of page 182. The Speaker of the Commons of the United Kingdom said this:

'The principles which guide a limit in the system of instruction on going into Committee may be thus stated: First, an instruction must empower the Committee to do something which the Committee is not otherwise empowered to do. Secondly, the purpose of the instruction must be supplementary and ancillary to the purpose of the Bill, and must fall within the general scope and framework of the Bill.

It is true that this citation relates to a bill, but the same principle applies to a report and I think it has to be accepted that the recommendation back to the committee has to be supplementary and ancillary to the purpose that was given to the committee in the first place. The citation goes on to say:

Thirdly, it is irregular to introduce into a Bill, by an instruction to the Committee, a subject which should properly form the substance of a distinct measure, having regard to usage and the general practice of enacting distinct statutes for distinct branches of law'.

It was on that basis that on April 17 Mr. Speaker ruled out of order the amendment of the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence), principally because it did not stay within the confines of the subject matter of food prices. Indeed, on page 3392 of Hansard he was very strong in the statements he made, in the second column on that page, to the effect that he did not see how it could possibly be considered as an amendment. He was referring to the amendment of the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham. He went on to say:

In the amendment that we have before us is an entirely new question, suggesting that the committee report be not concurred in but that the committee be instructed to consider a number of alternatives which were not referred to in any way in the original terms of reference given to the committee.

As I say, we were fully aware of that ruling and of the general principles that apply to instructions to a committee, and therefore my friend, the hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore, limited his amendment far more than he would like to have done in terms of our interest. He would have liked to have gone into the question of prices across the board, but we accepted the procedural limitation and moved that the committee simply be asked within its terms of reference, that have to do with food prices, to reconsider a matter that was already dealt with in that committee, namely, whether or not the Food Prices

Review Board should have power to order rollbacks. The fact of the matter is that in that committee this matter has been dealt with, which proves that at least the chairman of that committee felt that it was a proper subject of discussion in the committee, namely, rollbacks on food prices. The proposal did not carry because of the votes that took place in that committee, but the right of the House to give a committee the authority to reconsider a proposition is clearly sustained in the various citations that I have read.

Therefore, in summary I contend that the hon. member for Peace River was not as astute as he usually is when he tried to see any comparison between the amendment of the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham and the amendment now before us. The former amendment went beyond the terms of reference of the committee, but the one now before Your Honour is within the terms of reference of the original committee and we think it is proper for the House to ask the committee to reconsider its position on this important matter.

Mr. Reid: Mr. Speaker, in reading the short debate that took place on April 17, 1973, Mr. Speaker made the point that he could not accept the motion moved by the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham because it was a new question and therefore a 48-hour notice had to be provided in the usual way. I will quote briefly from the argument Mr. Speaker made as reported on page 3393 of Hansard of April 17, as follows:

> I think that is one of the arguments which could have been submitted in support of the amendment proposed by the hon. member, but he himself recognizes that what he has put before the House is a new term of reference and, therefore, a new question. Certainly, the House is entitled to consider a new question. However, if it is a substantive motion which is proposed by the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham, then he has to satisfy the other requirement of the Standing Orders, which is that 48 hours' notice of any new question or new motion shall be given unless the motion is proposed under the terms of Standing Order 43 and there is unanimous consent.

The question to be decided is whether the proposition which has been advanced by the hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore is, indeed, a new question or not. The question here is that the Prices Review Board be reconstituted with full power to require the cancellation or rollback of unjustified price increases. It seems to be a question of substance going far beyond what was included in either the first or the second report. Indeed, I believe that an argument could be made that the question of the rollback of prices by the federal authority is far beyond the legislative competence of the House of Commons. Therefore, I would submit to Your Honour that it is indeed a matter of substance. It is a matter of new business, and therefore the motion is not acceptable under those conditions.

The other point I wish to make is that the committee still has its original terms of reference before it. That committee is still sitting. It will have a meeting tomorrow. I understand that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) is to be the witness.

I would like to draw Your Honour's attention to citation 220(1) in Beauchesne's Fourth Edition at page 182. He is speaking of the instruction or the motion which gives a committee power to do whatever is contained in the motion, and he says:

> If the subject-matter of an instruction is within the scope of the question referred to the committee then such instruction is useless and irregular.

If one accepts the principle that the committee is still sitting, still has its original terms of reference before it and, as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) pointed out, had already discussed this matter, then it seems to me that according to this citation the motion to amend the second report is useless and irregular.

Mr. Broadbent: On the same point of order, Mr. Speaker, I would first like to comment on the observations that we just heard against the acceptability of the amendment. The point was made that the subject matter contained in the amendment introduced new material and for that reason should be ruled out on procedural grounds. The crucial point is that the so-called new material included in the amendment is new only in terms of the report of the committee to the House. Surely, this is the crucial procedural question. It is not new in terms of the authority given to that committee by this body. That is the crucial point at stake here.

The hon. member would have been absolutely correct in his argument if the amendment moved by the hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore (Mr. Grier) had gone beyond the terms of reference given to the committee by this House. But precisely because the hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore took great care to stay within the terms of reference given to the committee then it seems to me it is clearly acceptable.

It is inappropriate to argue, as the government spokesman has done, that an amendment has to be ruled out because of the contents of the committee's report. In fact, the committee during its meetings discussed at some considerable length the subject matter that is included in the amendment moved on behalf of the NDP by the hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore. On that crucial ground, I think it is fully within the terms of reference of the committee, and Your Honour should rule in favour of its acceptability.

I should like now to turn to the original objections made to this motion by the Conservative party. The argument that is crucial in that respect against the Conservative spokesman, the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin), is that his reference to the April 17 decision of the Speaker is a totally wrong reference, it in fact being one that supports the acceptability of the amendment rather than the argument against it. At that time the terms of reference were clearly exceeded by the Conservative motion, and therefore Mr. Speaker appropriately ruled it out. On this occasion the terms of reference are clearly sufficient to include the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore, and therefore it should be considered totally acceptable.

However, for the Conservative party to enter into this kind of procedural debate on an issue which it said was so important, shows the almost unqualified degree of hypocrisy which that party has in facing this issue. Conservatives voted against this amendment when it was originally proposed—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member is getting outside the point of order. I thank hon. members for their contributions and would ask the indulgence of the House for some 30 minutes while I prepare my decision on what has become a narrow but difficult point in my mind. I hope that the Creditiste, who is making the first-round contribution to this debate will be prepared to proceed now.

FOOD PRICES

CONCURRENCE IN SECOND REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON TRENDS IN FOOD PRICES

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. McGrath.

That the second report of the Special Committee on Trends in Food Prices, presented to the House on Wednesday, July 25, 1973, be concurred in.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, we are now considering a motion for concurrence in the second report of the Special Committee on Trends in Food Prices, tabled on Wednesday, July 25, 1973.

Last Thursday this question was debated in the House by the Progressive Conservatives until 4 or 5 o'clock a.m. Friday and, at that time, I stated that the time of the House was being abused, that those very same subjects could have been discussed today on the occasion of the motion before us. Some people are always complaining that the Canadian public is paying too many taxes, that food, clothing, machinery, etc. are too expensive but when it comes to wasting the time of the House, for example—which costs thousands of dollars every day because of the mobilization of members, senators and staff—scruples are not too high. In fact they go as far as discussing a question—which we could have debated today—until 4 or 5 in the morning to give the Canadian public the impression that poor Parliament members are working at night.

Mr. Speaker, the Progressive Conservatives are jokers; they are responsible for our coming back day after day in the House to gain some political prestige with the voters by arguing that they are most interested in the welfare of the people. I repeat that they are jokers.

As regards the proposals made by the Conservatives to fight the increasing prices of foodstuff their solution is the same today as a couple of months back: a price freeze. This solution was used in Great Britain to no avail and turned into a complete flop. This solution is still in force in the United States and again it proved to be a complete flop.

Meat producers for instance stopped selling their product on account of the price freeze and because they would not be bothered or forced by any government. Now food production in the United States is decreasing as a direct result of the price freeze. However, the black market is thriving in that country. You cannot buy meat in a butcher's shop at the price fixed by the government, but you can get some behind the counter on the black market, in the backstreet, at an excessice price. The Progressive Conservatives did not realize that.

Mr. Speaker, during the war there was a price freeze under the famous Wartime Price Board. Everything was controlled; rationing tickets were distributed to all Canadian consumers to enable them to buy preserves, sugar, tea, coffee and meat. The Mackenzie King government did not distribute the rationing tickets according to individual needs, but it shaped the people's stomach according to the size of the rationing ticket. We had that during the war.

At the regular price we had a hard time getting what we needed, but on the black market, we could bet anything. Sugar at 8c/ a pound was impossible to find, but if you paid 20c/ a pound, you could get 100 pounds of sugar! We saw this with our own eyes. The same was true for butter: on the ordinary market, you needed coupons, but on the black market you could get as much butter as you wanted at 10c/ or 15c/ more a pound.

The Progressive Conservatives do not remember this, even though these wartime controls had been imposed by the Liberals. Today, we are at peace, but they still talk of controls and of price and wage freezes.

My friends of the New Democratic Party do not want a price and wage freeze. If they could get a price freeze only without a wages freeze, they would be happy. But they are afraid to ask for a price freeze without a wage freeze because wages have a direct effect on the price of goods. Therefore, they go about it in another way. They say: We shall tax profits more. But they do not say that taxes also have an effect on prices. If profits were taxed, the result would be the same.

Mr. Speaker, I heard again a while ago the amendment which reads as follows:

That the second report of the Special Committee on Trends in Food Prices be not now concurred in, but that it be referred back to the said committee for the purpose of giving reconsideration to the inclusion therein of a recommendation that the Food Prices Review Board be reconstituted with full power to require cancellation or roll back of unjustified price increased wherever it finds them.

If this is not price control, I wonder what it is. It amounts to the same thing. However, it enables them to attack those who make profits. Steinberg Ltd. has increased its profits by 12 per cent; Dominion Stores Ltd has increased its own by 100 per cent; Burns Foods Limited by 25 per 100 and Canada Packers Limited by 35 per cent. Those are huge profits!

Mr. Speaker, the rationale of private enterprise is precisely to make profits. As soon as profits are done away with, personal initiative will disappear. That is clear. It boils down to what I have repeated often: The hon. members of the NDP do not tell us how those profits are used.

When we see buildings go up, whether they be Steinberg's, Chrysler's, Ford's or Dominion Stores', permanent jobs are created. Those companies do not pile up their profits in their bedrooms. The leader of the NDP knows that. Why don't they tell us frankly how those profits are used and whether, if those companies were replaced by the federal government, we would have better results.

I have even heard the chum of the NDP leader, René Lévesque, in Quebec, shout this at us in 1962: Let us nationalize power companies and become masters in our own home. This is what the leader of the NDP says: Let us nationalize, where necessary, to become our own masters, or let us confiscate their profits. It is one and the same thing.

Mr. Speaker, in 1962, René Lévesque shouted over the radio and television: Let us nationalize power companies. He meant Shawinigan Water & Power; Northern Quebec Power in my area; Quebec Power, in the Quebec area. And René Lévesque, leader of the Quebec separatists, told the Quebecers—

Mr. Lewis: He was a Liberal at that time.

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): Yes, but before being a Liberal, he was an NDP.

Mr. Lewis: He was a Liberal minister.

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): That is right, a Liberal minister. We see this at all levels. As a matter of fact he was a Socialist NDP and he became a Liberal minister. Today, if we look at the situation in Ottawa, we see that the members of the New Democratic Party are the ones who keep the Liberals in power. What is the difference? The Creditists are watching you dear members of the NDP.

● (1710)

Mr. Speaker, going back to René Lévesque who was saying: The day electricity will be in the hands of the government, all the profits of the big corporations will be available to the population. Your electricity will be less expensive. After 10 years, Mr. Speaker, have a look at the rates for electricity in the province of Quebec. We pay four times more after 10 years than we did under private enterprise 10 years ago.

This is what happens with Crown corporations and government control, this is what we come up with when we do away with the "motor" of private enterprise and of the personal initiative that profit brings about. If the purpose of profit was only to crush or choke people, I would go along. But these profits are used for investment, expansion and consequently for the development of the economy. Nothing is said about this, we hear only about profits so that the population will be impressed. The Socialists then say: down with private enterprise, let the government control everything.

Each time the government took something under control, it was a complete flop. There have been many flops in Saskatchewan during twenty years of CCF administration. Mr. Speaker, Saskatchewan has maintained itself with federal credits here during many years, not with CCF credits in Saskatchewan.

Consumer prices are rapidly increasing. It must be admitted however, the solution is not that which is being advocated by the members of the NDP.

The other day, the government put forth a solution concerning milk products by giving consumers a discount of 5 cents on a quart of milk. For 40 years we have been urging, let us subsidize consumers rather than producers. If the consumer has the required credit to buy, the producer will be financed through consumption. That is normal. But let us not try to finance consumption through production; it would be walking on one's hands rather than one's feet.

Mr. Speaker, the same thing will happen with bread. We are not the only ones to suggest that. Three weeks ago, on August 27, the Chairman of the Food Prices Review Board, Mrs. Plumptre, was reported in Le Devoir of August 27 as saying, and I quote:

Mrs. Plumptre urges consumers to protest to their members of Parliament.

The Chairman of the Food Prices Review Board, Mrs. Beryl Plumptre, has a piece of advice for consumers aggravated by rising prices: Complain to your members of Parliament," she recommended yesterday on the CTV national network.

Interviewed on the program Question Period, Mrs. Plumptre insisted on the fact that the powers of the board are strictly limited to making recommendations to the government.

It is quite clear; the government of Canada cannot be appointed to the board.

"When I accepted the position, she explained, I specified that I would report first to the public, then to the government." Consumers, Mrs. Plumptre continued, should complain to their members of Parliament about rising prices and make it known to them that if they do not do anything about that situation they will not be reelected.

"Members of Parliament are very sensitive to public opinion and it is up to the voters to push them in the back. MPs are in a very bad position".

Newspapers, radio and television, added the Chairman of the Food Prices Review Board, have also an important part to play: it rests with them to make the people aware of this increase in prices and to rally the Canadian people so that they protest to the government about the increase in the price of bread for instance.

And the price of bread has in fact increased.

The price of bread is expected to increase by six cents—

—it happened two weeks ago,—

—next week—

—three weeks ago, she told—

—and by four . . . cents in October.

"If we could get the federal government and the provinces to really examine the situation, we would perhaps have some results", Mrs. Plumptre said,—

In fact, some results were obtained since her statement.

—which claims for the government to adopt a policy concerning the storage of feed for cattle and a policy of "stabilization of reserves".

The first report of the board, Mrs. Plumptre noted, indicates some concern about people who are below poverty level. The government, she regrets—

Below poverty level, this means that when a dozen eggs sell for 99 cents—I bought one last week—those who earn $4,000 a year pay 99 cents just like the hon. member who earns $26,000. It is the same price for everyone. So, those who live below poverty level cannot eat eggs by the dozen too often, of course, because their income does not enable them to do so. I will come to my solution later.

I go on quoting:

—The government, she regrets, could have done something about family allowances—

This will be done by the first of October. Why? Because pressures are made on the government.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) sais during the weekend, at the Liberal convention, that the government takes its responsibilities; yes, but why did it not take them when it had 156 supporters in this House? Why did it not increase family allowances three years ago instead of waiting till 1973? Why did we not increase the old age pensions? Because the government was feeling strong. In fact, with 156 members in Parliament, it was personified arrogance. With fewer members, the minority government has to come and see us from time to time and say: Listen, it might be dangerous; there will be a vote, would it not be possible to save us? I am willing to save the government, inasmuch as it does something to save the population. If it is not willing to do so, I am not willing to save it. That is for sure.

Family allowances—anyhow will be increased on October 1 and so will old age pensions.

I resume quoting:

What about poor people with many children?

I said it recently; the old age security pensions will be increased and a couple will get $341.80 a month; that makes more sense than $180.

However, mothers with five or six children receive social welfare benefits of $150 or $160 a month. But the government does not mention this. It does not talk about the people who really need help. Old people need help, but the blind, the invalid, those who cannot work to earn a living and needy mothers need more than they receive at the present time and the government does not act. But we need have no fear, Mr. Speaker, it will act because it is scared and fear is the beginning of wisdom. When a government is afraid to lose its power, hop! it relaxes a bit and adjusts to the situation.

What happens to the poor? We know what happens. I shall go on with the quotation:

● (1720)

She is not afraid of criticism. "If the government decides to dismiss me, I do not care—

She is not afraid of the government, even though she is chairman of the board!

What is important is that I do my best. If people are not satisfied, that is too bad."

She states the facts as they are.

Then, Mr. Speaker, it is not only a matter of bread and milk. Let us consider the price of eggs which, I said a moment ago, is 99 cents a dozen. This does not make sense; meat—everyone is complaining about it—is prohibitive. It is so prohibitive that almost everywhere horse meat is substituted for beef. Butchers are selling horse meat pretending it is beef so that they can make more profit because beef is beyond reach. I do not say that horse meat is not good, but I would not eat it, even though I am convinced that I have been served such meat without my knowledge. That is the honest treatment of the consumers by the food business.

Mr. Speaker, it is the same thing for milk, bread, canned foods; fruit and vegetables are quite expensive. Recently, on Mr. Jarraud's program on Montreal CKVL station from 7 a.m. to 9.30 a.m. I heard a farmer say over the phone that he has a 12 acre field of carrots and has no one to pick them. That man was losing 12 acres of carrots on his land. In other cases, it is tomatoes or apples.

We all know of the predicament of the apple growers in the Montreal area. They find it hard to recruit apple pickers. So they brought in Jamaicans. And I read in a morning paper that the federal government decided to pay transportation costs with the agreement of apple growers. The federal government is going all out. I do not object to hire Jamaican workers but how much more would it cost to say to welfare or unemployment insurance benefits recipients in Montreal: "Gentlemen, for four or five weeks, go and pick apples, and you will continue receiving your allowances or unemployment benefits". At the present time, they receive and they do not do anything. If we paid them a salary as surplus money, this would encourage them and we would have all kinds of manpower.

But no! If an unemployed decides to go on a farm and pick apples, they stop paying his benefits. He works four or five weeks, and then he stops working; he is again out of work, all the apples have been picked. Then, he goes back to the Unemployment Insurance Commission office, and is told by some official: Sir, you have not worked 8 weeks; therefore, you are not entitled to receive benefits anymore. So, the individual who has stopped drawing unemployment insurance benefits in order to go to work is penalized precisely because he went to work. And the minister says: This is the law. Well, it is a foolish law, Mr. Speaker.

The same applies to welfare recipients. They are caught working and are told: You rascals! You made so bold as to go to work. No more allowances for you! And when the time comes to get further allowances, it takes months before they are eligible again.

The government is powerless in such situations. Some people say: Welfare comes under provincial jurisdiction and the federal government contributes 50 per cent. That's all.

But unemployment insurance, for instance, is a national scheme. If an unemployed who gets $80, $90 or $100 a week to do nothing, to remain idle, was allowed to pick up apples during four weeks, if he was told that he may earn money without running the risk of losing his unemployment insurance benefits, it would be an incentive to work instead of an incentive to laziness, as is now the case.

Unemployed deserve unemployment insurance benefits. Others manage to get benefits by cunning, even though they are not entitled to them. With regard to welfare allowances, the same situation prevails. Some regulations, some legislation should be passed to enable those people to improve their lot. On the contrary, they are punished if they work.

The same thing occurred with food, a few years ago. Western producers were paid not to grow wheat. Eastern dairy producers were punished and fined by the federal government for exceeding their quotas. Too much milk was being produced. The producers were told: You will be punished. And punished indeed they were. In all those areas, the government tried to reduce production and now it says: Prices are high; food cost is extremely high.

Mr. Speaker, as to the 14 per cent of 5 cents the quart of milk subsidy which the government proposed the other day to the benefit of consumers, my colleagues and I have been advocating just that in the House for the past 12 years, making ourselves the laughing stock of everybody: "Subsidies paid to consumers are you crazy? That was allright during the war because there was an emergency but in peacetime this has no common sense.

The government has now decided to subsidize consumers. Within the government there is more and more talk about consumers. Opposition members are still slightly dumb but they will get to it. So, what do we suggest? We suggest similar discounts on all food commodities. An agreement between federal and provincial authorities should be concluded. The machinery required to distribute the 5 cents per quart of milk does exist and millions of quarts of milk are sold. So we say that an agreement should be concluded between the federal authorities and the retailers for the prices to remain at their current level. The government could grant a discount of, say 20 or 25 per cent on the retail prices of all food commodities.

This would reach everyone. The required machinery exists. However, if those grants come from tax money the prices will obviously still tend to increase. So we say that new credits should be issued to pay for new grants since they do not exist at the present time. Therefore, new credits should be issued by the Bank of Canada to change the system so that the governor of the Bank of Canada, Mr. Bouey, stops increasing interest rates and starts serving the people. He is an interest manipulator; that is all he does. He draws up figures and if he is not able to do it, let me know and I will go and do it for him, and not figures based on nothing, but entirely on our resources and production.

Therefore, the subsidies granted for milk and bread should be applied to all food products after an agreement has been made between government and retail outlets. Those who do not want to take part in this program can opt out, but those participating will profit by the 25 per cent discount paid directly by the government. In this way, the consumer would pay 25 per cent less than at present. That would be an efficient way of fighting inflation and excessive food prices. Some can even laugh, but while we are laughing, there are some Canadian citizens who give a sickly smile and who do not find any thing funny.

This could be our solution. If we cut profits, prices will rise immediately and if we remove these profits, will the federal government spend them? And how? At present, private enterprise is expanding and I say that any country in the world is expanding to the extent that personal initiative is encouraged.

I was looking at the results of the recent election held in Sweden. The friends of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) nearly took a dive. And they have been in power for 40 years. That was called socialism par excellence!

[English]

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): They were in power longer than the Creditistes have been.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): It is something like that, but they have not been ousted by the New Democrats, except in British Columbia. Today, they are so sorry about it that they tried the other day to have young Bennett defeated in Kelowna. And the friend of my friend from Winnipeg North Centre really got it when this government was in power.

Such is the solution advocated by the Creditists and I think that electors will come to accept that idea and that we will finally enjoy reasonable prices in the best interests of all Canadian consumers.

[English]

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to comment on the second report of the special committee.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. Possibly the minister will allow Mr. Deputy Speaker to intervene at this time and make the ruling he said he would.

Mr. Baldwin: That might make some difference in his speech.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: First, I want to thank the hon. member for Témiscamingue (Mr. Caouette) for his courtesy in making his intervention. It is very difficult to have so many thoughts coming to the Chair from the floor and to share them in a head which is also filled with a very vicious example of the common Canadian cold. I apologize to the minister that I did not get here before he was recognized for the purpose of making his speech, but in a few minutes he will have that pleasure. I would like to thank hon. members for their contributions with regard to a very interesting point of order.

The issue is as follows. The hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) has moved that the second report of the Special Committee on Trends in Food Prices be concurred in. This committee report is to be found at pages 509 to 514 of Votes and Proceedings for Wednesday, July 25. It contains nine recommendations. None of these deals directly with prices exept the first one which is as follows:

● (1730)

The committee recommends that the Food Prices Review Board immediately begin to study the effects of controls in other countries on the price and availability of food in those countries and furthermore discourages any attempt by the board to set itself up soley as an educational agency.

The hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore (Mr. Grier) has moved an amendment to the motion for concurrence which is in these terms:

That the second report of the Special Committee on Trends in Food Prices be not now concurred in, but that it be referred back to the said committee for the purpose of giving reconsideration to the inclusion therein of a recommendation that the Food Prices Review Board be reconstituted with full power to require cancellation or roll-back of unjustified price increases wherever it finds them.

Procedural argument was then joined and the Chair has had the benefit of the best presentations possible. I have to remind members of the House that the special committee is still in existence and has scheduled further meetings. The relevant part of the original motion which set up the committee is as follows, and I quote from our proceedings on January 23 as reported at page 561 of Hansard:

That a special committee of this House be appointed to enquire into and make recommendations upon the trends in food prices in Canada and factors domestic and foreign which account for these trends—

It was not disputed by anyone taking part in the procedural argument that the purposes set out in the amendment of the hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore were not within the original terms of reference setting up the committee. Is the hon. member, then, asking the House to review its decision to concur in a recommendation to establish the Food Prices Review Board? However, I will not determine the issue on that point.

The two issues that I must decide are as follows. First, is the amendment relevant to the content of the second report of the special committee? There is some doubt in the mind of the Chair that it is. Second, the report is an interim one, and while the committee may not wish to review any or all of the ground it has covered in its two interim reports, it does appear to the Chair that there is no impediment to the committee making a further or final report on any subject so long as that subject is within its terms of reference.

The attention of the Chair was drawn to the decision of Mr. Speaker on April 17. I think the decision as interpreted by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) does not deal with the point I am deciding at this moment. I have decided that the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore is out of order for the reasons I have mentioned.

[Mr. Deputy Speaker.]

May I refer the House, in conclusion, to citation 220(1) of Beauchesne's Fourth Edition, page 182:

If the subject matter of an instruction is within the scope of the question referred to the committee then such instruction is useless and irregular.

Some other citations that appeared to lend authority to the proposition that there could be a recommendation back to the committee were rejected by the Chair because it seemed to the Chair that they were dealing with final reports and the committee would not otherwise be in a position to function again. But there is no question in the mind of the Chair that the committee whose report is being considered is still alive and will be holding further meetings.

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, let me again say that I welcome this opportunity to comment on the second report of the Special Committee on Trends in Food Prices and to speak to this motion seeking the concurrence of the House in the report. I also welcome the rather belated conversion of the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) to the status of being a supporter of the Special Committee on Trends in Food Prices and its work. Certainly his approach today is a far cry from his approach when the committee was being created and during its first hearings. When the first report of that committee was being debated in this House, as the House will recall, at that time he and his Conservative colleagues voted against concurring in the first report, the one which he speaks in support of so earnestly today.

At that time the hon. member for St. John's East, as reported at page 3150 of Hansard, said:

—if that committee is to be effective, it can only do useful work within the framework of a freeze. That is why we do not support the recommendations, or the major recommendation, of the committee. That is why we, if this motion comes to a vote, will vote against it.

One can assess the merit and weight of his words today in light of what he said on April 10 last.

There has been a lot of discussion as a result of the August cost of living statistics which were released last Thursday. They are, of course, of concern to me and to the government and I hope they are of concern to every hon. member. However, I think it is something to be noted again that these statistics were gathered during the first week of August, and therefore this was before the measures announced by the government on August 13 and September 4 had begun to take effect. Since then there have been some hopeful signs that the prices of some of the items leading the surge in the food index in early August have begun to level out. Indeed, there has been an actual decline in the prices of some commodities such as beef and pork.

The statements of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) on August 13 and September 4 demonstrated the government's determination to assist Canadians in meeting the extraordinary pressures placed on the family budget by the worldwide inflation in the price of foodstuffs. In his statements the Prime Minister set out a comprehensive plan of action in three parts: first, measures to conserve and increase the supply of food; second, measures to help protect the consumer against those who may be taking advantage of the present situation; third, measures to mitigate the effect of rising prices on those in our society who are likely to suffer most from excessive food price increases.

The areas covered by the government's plan of action relate to the recommendations in both the first and second reports of the special committee. I think the record will show that the government, in the initiatives that it has taken, has in effect responded positively to the thrust of all the recommendations of the Special Committee on Trends in Food Prices.

An important finding in the second report about which the hon. member for St. John's East spoke so strongly in support is the one which is a reiteration of a conclusion in the first report, namely, that "the primary cause of the dramatic rise in food prices during the past year in Canada appears to be a world shortage of many basic food commodities". In other words, it is not a problem peculiar to Canada; it is a world wide problem.

Mr. Baldwin: Blame the weather.

Mr. Gray: Therefore, the steps the government has been taking to deal with this situation have been formulated to take account of this international perspective.

During the previous debate on the motion to concur in the recommendations in the first report of the committee on April 10, I said that "controls are not a sure-fire solution to this problem; after all, controls introduced at the wrong time and without due regard to the fundamental factors governing food production could well lead to situations of decreasing supply and, in the long term, result in the development of a food price upsurge even more widespread than we have faced over the last year". This statement was, I think, convincingly confirmed by subsequent events in the United States. Since April we have seen in the United States the rise and collapse of a policy of attempting to curb food price increases by using price freezes and controls. It is generally conceded now, even by the United States administration, that this price freeze decision was a mistake and that a better solution to soaring food prices is to encourage food producers to increase the food supply and to do so in as efficient and competitive a manner as possible.

● (1740)

By the tenor of the recommendations of the special committee it would appear that most of its members at least also basically share this fundamental long-term approach to the food price issue. I think it is also instructive that when they examined the experience in the United States, many commentators concluded that such price freezes produced shortages and consequently led to even higher prices. Just yesterday, in the New York Times, Edward Cowan in an article datelined Washington wrote:

> With the transition from the Nixon administration's Freeze 2 to Phase 4 complete, whatever enchantment there was with price controls a year ago seems to have gone the way of most illusions.

It is something based on illusions then that the Conservative Party wants to make the basis for policy in this country. Mr. Cowan went on to write:

> The first reason is that prices are rising, and rapidly, 25 months after the President who resolutely opposed controls switched to them. Mr. Nixon's June 13 freeze has been followed by a new burst of inflation. Even administration economists believe that there has been a causal relationship.

Mr. Bell: What is the date of that, please?

Mr. Gray: Yesterday, Sunday, September 16.

Mr. Bell: You should see today's paper.

Mr. Gray: One of this government's decisions has been to hold in the near future a special federal-provincial conference to bring about the early development of measures to provide for the orderly increase in food supplies in Canada, and it has indicated its willingness to bring this about by measures providing greater assurances than previously to Canadian farmers that the increase in production will receive reasonable returns. In my opinion, this is an area which contains fundamental long-range solutions to the extraordinary increases in food prices that have occured in the Canadian economy this year.

There is a need for additional measures to bring about an orderly increase in food supplies, a market for foodstuffs that will hopefully avoid as far as possible the gyrations in prices, such as those in feed grains this year and this year's surge in beef, poultry and hog prices. The Canadian farmer is seeking greater stability of his income, and the Canadian consumer does not want to face increases in the food budget of the kind that have been the Canadian experience this year. Accomplishing these objectives is the continuing aim of the government.

The government has already acted to counteract price increases in several key commodities. The export controls on cattle and hogs announced in August appear to have had a salutary effect on beef and pork prices. The government has also been moving to forestall anticipated increases in bread and milk prices. The steps I have outlined are an indication of the government's efforts to deal with the kind of concerns reflected in the special committee's recommendations Nos. 8 and 9, namely:

> Because an adequate supply of essential food is vital, the committee recommends that the federal government consider the advisability of immediately implementing policies to encourage farmers to increase steadily the production of staple foodstuffs on a basis that will provide a fair income for the farm family and basic food at a reasonable price for the consumer.

Recommendation 9 reads in part:

> The committee recommends that the federal government consider the advisability of protecting the Canadian market from the pressures of world food requirements—

The second element of the government's plan of action covers measures to help protect the consumer against those who may take advantage of the present situation to make unwarranted price increases. Several of the recommendations of the special committee's second report reflect a similar concern. I refer to those concerning the Food Prices Review Board and the Combines Investigation Act. The second report of the committee recommended:

> The Food Prices Review Board immediately begin to study the effects of controls in other countries on the price and availability of food in those countries and, furthermore, the committee discourages any attempt by the board to set itself up solely as an educational agency.

As the House knows, the special committee recently had the opportunity of meeting again with the board and of discussing with it its current activities. The board confirmed that it had in fact undertaken studies of the effects of controls in other countries and the first study on the experience, I must say apparently an unfortunate experience, of the United Kingdom has now been released.

The board further confirmed that it was not setting itself up solely as an educational agency. The government has acted to help ensure that the board is in a position to identify cases of unwarranted price increases by clarifying its terms of reference and by strengthening its investigative staff to enable it to carry out this kind of assignment. Members will be aware of the nationwide investigative survey now in progress at the retail level of food prices and pricing practices.

It is important to note, of course, that the board is an independent agency, and this was something recommended by the committee; it is an agency with wide investigative powers under the Inquiries Act. Because the board is an agency, independent of government, and it is not subject to the government's day to day direction. It was set up, as I have said, as an independent body and given an initial budget of some $500,000. It has the authority to recruit its own staff as it saw fit. I do regret, however, that its chairman did not come to me to indicate her concerns about staff before the early evening of August 13. I say this because my position throughout has been that the board was, and is, entitled to full co-operation from the government.

There have been suggestions from one opposition party's spokesman about changing the format of the board. Let me say in a preliminary and general way that the proposal to give the board the power to roll back prices raises very serious questions for the consideration of all hon. members. Hon. members of the House should ask themselves if they want to give a totally independent body the power to make decisions that could and would have wide-ranging effects on the economy that would affect supply and wages as well. These would be decisions without appeal and would be made by a body not accountable to the Canadian people through parliament, yet the Canadian people would hold their members of parliament accountable for those decisions. I may also add that if some members are not satisfied with the kind of decisions now being made by the board, they should ask themselves whether they would necessarily be more satisfied with the decisions it would make if it had the authority to order roll-backs or not to order them as it saw fit.

Let me repeat what the Prime Minister stated on August 13:

—in the event that the board reports that significant instances of profiteering have occurred which the parties concerned are unwilling to correct voluntarily the government will seek parliamentary authority to undertake corrective action.

Also, on September 4 the Prime Minister made this statement. I happen to have the French text here:

[Translation]

If the Board points out glaring abuses which those responsible do not eliminate, the government will resort to its powers to take the necessary steps. If it needs other powers, it will not hesitate to call on Parliament.

[English]

The board's first report has demonstrated, in my view, its willingness to actively carry out its mandate, a mandate which is also in the form recommended by the special committee—one of reporting to the public its findings and making recommendations for action both to governments and to the private sector. The government has already responded in a positive way to the board's first major recommendation, that with regard to subsidies to limit the possible increase in the price of bread.

The special committee has also recognized the importance of competition in the food industry and has made several recommendations in this area. The committee was concerned in its report about certain alleged practices in the retail food business and asked the Combines Investigations Branch to make certain investigations. I think the House will be interested to learn that the Combines Branch had already begun a research inquiry into the food manufacturing industry in early July before, in fact, the Special Committee on Trends in Food Prices had prepared its second report. The purpose of this inquiry is to study concentration levels, advertising expenditures and performance of firms in the food manufacturing industry, generally speaking the kind of practices that the committee in its second report asked the Combines Branch to examine. When the inquiry is completed, its findings will be considered by the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission.

Let me also discuss another recommendation of the committee calling for the immediate publication of an assessment of the 1969-71 food price war that the committee thought had been prepared. It would appear that the committee had in mind the following statement on page 27 of the annual report of the Director of Investigation and Research for the year ended March 31, 1971. It followed the presentation of a statistical study of concentration in food retailing which had been carried out by the director. The statement is as follows:

These structural developments are consistent with the 'price war' that occured in 1970 and 1971 even though its full effects remain to be assessed.

I have discussed this statement with the acting director and have been advised that the then director did not intent to convey the meaning taken from his statement by the committee. While developments in the food sector are kept under active review by the director as stated in the annual report, the director did not and does not have a study under way to assess and review the 1969-71 price war. It was simply intended to suggest that the structural changes which had occurred in food retailing had rendered the industry more prone to competition, that the price war which had erupted was consistent with that finding, and that the full effects of the price war "remained to be assessed". That is, that they had not been fully assessed.

Turning to another matter, in its first and second reports the special committee has spoken of the importance of the government's intention to modernize and update competition policy, particularly those areas dealing with direct consumer protection. I have already confirmed that the government will be presenting its new competition policy to the House in stages, as recommended by the committee. I look forward to the bill covering the first stage being presented as soon as possible after certain final drafting revisions now under way are completed.

The committee has also asked that the government consider the advisability of proclaiming immediately the Consumer Packaging and Labelling Act. The committee was of the view that this might have a beneficial effect on food costs. I agree with what I believe to be the intent of this recommendation, that is, to bring these regulations into force as soon as possible. This is also my own objective. I now anticipate that the proposed regulations will be published in the Canada Gazette on September 22.

Mr. Baldwin: What year?

Mr. Gray: This year, of course. I see you are probably thinking of the past. I think, however, that the committee might agree, on reflection, that the act itself could not be proclaimed immediately at that point. These regulations will have to apply to an estimated 80,000 domestic and 40,000 imported pre-packaged products from food to hardware items. The law provides that there must be an opportunity given for public comment on the proposed regulations before they are finally promulgated into law. It would be my intention, therefore, to proclaim the act certainly by the end of the year.

The committee has made other recommendations in its reports about measures to assist the consumer in the marketplace. Since the first report the government has made a sizeable grant to the one national consumer organization to assist it in appearing before regulatory bodies and thereby to carry out a more active consumer advocacy role as recommended by the special committee, and I look forward to further efforts of the type being developed. Studies are being developed on the cost to the consumer and the food industry of putting nutritional information on labels, and also on the best techniques and methods of displaying this information so that it is readily understood by the shopper in the food store. This is being done as part of the work of developing legislation in this area.

The third element in the government's plans of action on food prices are measures to mitigate the effect of rising prices on Canadians generally, and particularly those in our society who are likely to suffer most. The House has been dealing with a series of government proposals to help the Canadian consumer in this area, including immediate increases in the family allowance to $12 monthly and the steps to further increase the old age and guaranteed income supplement by making quarterly adjustments where required by increases in the cost of living.

The special committee has recommended that programs be devised to provide food for low-income Canadians and with the passage of these measures those Canadians who have been hardest hit by the increase in food prices will have some needed compensation for the increase in their food budget. Also, as I said in the House on April 10, 1973, the Department of National Health and Welfare, through the Canada Assistance Plan, shares with the provinces 50 per cent of the cost of a number of assistance programs with special relevance to low-income consumers. My colleague, the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde), has consistently been encouraging the provinces to ensure that the rates under these programs adequately reflect the prices recipients have to pay for food and other essentials. In the last few months several provinces have raised the rates in their benefit structure to reflect rising prices and, of course, the federal share of the cost has risen accordingly.

I understand, further, that the Minister of National Health and Welfare and his department are actively examining what further programs might be called for in cooperation with the provinces and, recognizing the shared responsibility the provinces have in this area, to meet the needs of low-income consumers who may be facing additional nutritional problems because of the upsurge in food prices.

I think that what I have said, Mr. Speaker, confirms the efforts of the government in the areas dealt with by the recommendations of both reports of the special committee. In April, in commenting on the first report, I indicated that the government would strive to make a positive response to the thrust of each and every recommendation. This is also the position of the government with regard to the second report, and therefore it supports the motion to concur in the second report.

To conclude, Mr. Speaker, may I say that I am pleased to have been able to participate actively in the decisions reached by the government to help the Canadian consumer, announced in recent months; measures which include reduction in personal income taxes, sales tax and custom duties, export controls on cattle and hogs, measures to increase family allowances and old age pensions, and to limit price increases in bread and milk. I am continuing these efforts to have the Canadian consumer helped through practical measures that take into account the world wide supply and demand conditions causing the upward pressures on Canadian prices.

This is my concluding sentence, Mr. Speaker. It continues to be the government's position, as the Prime Minister said on August 13, that "if any further action is called for to protect the food supplies of Canadians, or to protect Canadians against further erosion of their purchasing power, it will be taken without delay", and the government has shown its ability and its commitment to take decisive action to deal with these problems in the interest of the Canadian consumer and in fact all Canadians.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until 8 p.m.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Ron Atkey (St. Paul's): Mr. Speaker, I want to make it very clear at the outset that on behalf of our party I propose to move an amendment to this motion of concurrence, and in order that Your Honour may have full opportunity to consider whether there are any procedural admissibility problems with this amendment, I propose to put the amendment now so that we might minimize any delay in Your Honour deciding on its procedural acceptability.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps I should warn the hon. member that if he puts his amendment, that is the end of his speech.

Mr. Atkey: With that injunction, Mr. Speaker, I am willing to withhold the formal moving of this amendment. I did think it might be possible to facilitate your consideration of the admissibility of the amendment, but I will consider your injunction and withhold it.

Having given you and members of the House notice of my intention, I will paraphrase the general thrust of the amendment. It is simply to refer the second report of the Special Committee on Trends in Food Prices back to the committee with an instruction to consider the relevance and the effect of the movement of several main components of the consumer price index for the month of August, 1973, as domestic factors accounting for the trends in food prices in Canada, and related matters. I will formally put the amendment at the completion of my speech.

As a general proposition, I welcome the opportunity of participating in this debate to prod the government into doing something about rising food prices. It seems to me that if the members of the only opposition party in the House had not made it known that they would not support any motion for adjournment, this House might not have been sitting this evening and might not have had an opportunity at least to attempt to come to grips with some of the very real problems facing this country in the food sector.

As has already been mentioned by several hon. members, the committee worked very hard both prior to the presentation of the first interim report made to the House last April 2 and in the period until the second report was presented on July 25.

One consistent theme running throughout the recommendations, both the first report and in the second report, was that the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Gray) should be doing a number of things. There were six recommendations in the first report, of which five were addressed to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. I regret that the minister is not present in the House tonight. In the second report presented to the House on July 25 there were nine recommendations, of which five, Nos. 3 through 7, were again directed to the minister.

Taking the recommendations from the first and second reports, ten of the fifteen substantive recommendations, or two-thirds, involve supposed actions on the part of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. In his absence, and to be fair to the minister, let me point out that he was not been completely unresponsive to the recommendations directed to him. He has provided funds for the Consumers Association of Canada pursuant to the sixth recommendation of the first report, and he has made certain noises about possible legislation requiring nutritional information on food products. To this point, that is just about all. That is about two out of ten. The minister is batting about 200, which will soon qualify him for the minor league, if he does not start producing in the House soon.

Let us look at some of the recommendations of this committee which the minister has not implemented. First I want to refer to recommendation No. 5 of the second report which relates to the proclaiming of the regulations under and legislation contained in the Consumer Packaging and Labelling Act, this Act was passed in the House of Commons on March 17, 1971. It will soon be the third anniversary of the passage of that act in the House, but it is not yet the law of the land. There have been delays. The minister has been taken to task by the Consumers Council, his own creation. They have consistently berated him. He has promised a number of hon. members that the regulations will soon be made public and then brought into force, but he has consistently failed to meet these promises.

I was interested to note that the minister in his speech just before the supper hour made a commitment. He said that the regulations will be made public for the first time on September 22 and he promised, for whatever his promises are worth, that the new act will become law by the end of the year. I am willing to wager that the minister will not make it by the third anniversary of this act, which will be March 17, 1974. That is the nature of his record.

Let us look at the second recommendation that the minister has failed to implement. I refer to recommendation No. 4 in the second report which deals with the supposed assessment and review of the 1969 to 1971 food price war which we thought until this evening was being undertaken by the Combines Investigation Branch. At least, that is what one can gather from reading the report of the Director of Investigation and Research. The minister said tonight that this assessment and review never really existed.

After allowing the committee to go on since last January thinking that the report was under way and that everything was going to be looked after—he let them go on under the impression that a full assessment and review was being carried out by the Combines Investigation Branch—he comes to the House on September 17 and says that the report is not even begun. That is a despicable performance. I would think that the minister himself, who took the trouble to quote from the director's report to verify the fact that there would not be perhaps any inclination to think, or suggestion that an assessment or review had been done, should have read the full report so that he could have understood the conclusions which virtually all the members of the Special Committee on Trends in Food Prices drew from this report. I will quote briefly from a passage of the director's report, including passages that the minister himself neglected to read in his statement this afternoon. The director said:

> The position of the unaffiliated independent has continued to decline, but those of the smaller chains and the affiliated independents have improved markedly. These structural developments are consistent with the "price war" that occurred in 1970 and 1971 even though its full effects remain to be assessed.

That is where the minister's quotation ended. He should have gone on to read this:

It should, however, be noted that the power of the large corporate chains increased substantially in the western provinces between 1958 and 1968. The grocery business in the rapidly developing shopping centres is largely in the hands of a few corporate chains. Also, a few chains have a disturbingly large share of the market in some cities. In addition, there remains a great deal to be learned about food distribution, especially at the wholesaling level. It is the intention of the Director of Investigation and Research to keep the situation under active review.

That is the statement that the committee relied on. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the minister was not keeping on top of the thing. In his absence I might ask, what are they doing over there in the Combines Investigation Branch? Are they really having a look at the food industry at all?

Then there was recommendation No. 3 in the second report. That dealt with certain types of retail agreements involving cash discounts, volume discounts, co-operative advertising, end-aisle displays, introductory free goods and case allowances. The committee asked whether these types of agreements in any way reflected adversely on retail prices, whether they helped limit competition, and whether they disadvantaged small retailers and wholesalers.

Again, for the first time committee members learned in the House today that the minister has launched an investigation, or at least that he had the Combines Investigation Branch commence an investigation in July. That investigation was purportedly launched at the same time that the committee members were considering this recommendation and were trying to come to grips with what they saw as a very real problem. I think the minister was less than honest in not revealing to the committee that this investigation was taking place.

Not only is the minister failing to co-operate with the Food Prices Review Board in their attempt to get investigative staff, but he is failing to co-operate with the special committee. Knowing full well that they were considering a matter in the committee, he chose not to reveal to them the fact that the branch over which he has responsibility was doing the sort of thing the committee members were concerned about. Again, I think that is despicable.

Recommendation No. 2 in the first report of the committee dealt with the consumer protection provisions of the proposed Competition Act. The committee asked the minister to hive off those protection provisions and enact them immediately without waiting for the other provisions dealing with monopoly power, mergers and related items.

The minister, while he has made noises about bringing in provisions relating to misleading advertising or dealing with consumer protection, has yet to give a firm indication of placing on the order paper a bill dealing with consumer protection. Indeed the government House leader was unwilling to give a commitment that we would have the misleading advertising provisions presented prior to any planned recess to come within one, two or three weeks. Again, I say it is very difficult for members of the House and members of the committee to take the minister at his word in view of the many promises that have been broken time and time again.

Those are four areas where the minister has failed to implement the recommendations that have been placed before him in good faith by members of the committee. There are several others. I mention them only in passing. The first is that he should have implemented a program to provide food for low-income Canadians. No such program has been placed before the House. We have no real legislation in force requiring nutritional information on food products. We have no action to ensure that food advertising is primarily price and quality informative, and we have no action to encourage consumers to buy private brands that offer them significant savings.

The Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs has now been in office for some ten months. I suppose that it is fair to give a minister in a new portfolio a chance to get a grip on his department, to get to know the nature and scope of his responsibilities and to have time to formulate an approach to a legislative program that will be responsive to the needs of Canadians. And during that time I suppose it would be unfair of opposition members to criticize him unduly for inaction when the problems may have been those of a previous minister in that portfolio.

But, Mr. Speaker, that period of grace has passed. This minister is now fair game. He has been in office for ten months. He has had two reports from the special committee. He has had the first of the Food Prices Review Board. A total of ten substantive recommendations of a committee of this House were directed to him, and his present batting average is only 200. The Consumers Association of Canada continues to criticize him for his failure to bring in any effective competition legislation. The Consumers Council of Canada continues to berate him for failing to proclaim the Consumer Packaging and Labelling Act.

It is time for this minister to consider doing something else if he is not going to produce in this portfolio. It does not bother me that the minister is lack-lustre, as he has been described, or as the leader of the NDP suggested facetiously on September 4 as "vital, invigorating and dynamic". Those are mere personality traits. Personally, I find the minister a likeable chap.

But his record is abominable. Not only has he failed to achieve any substantive reforms in his portfolio but, equally important, he has failed to project the crusading image that Canadian consumers have a right to expect in their Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

Times are tough. Maybe this minister cannot come up with all the solutions to rising prices. But he can try to give the impression that he is trying and that he cares, that he shares the concern of millions of Canadians about shocking increases in the cost of living, particularly in the price of food. I put that forward in all seriousness in this debate. Previous ministers of consumer affairs have all had that crusading image. I refer to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) who was the first holder of that portfolio, to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Basford) and to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Andras). To a large extent they all carried forward that crusading image. But we do not have it now at a time when there are shocking increases in the price of food, in the consumer price index and in the over-all cost of living. At a time when we have a 3.2 per cent monthly increase in the price of food we have a minister who does not project the sort of crusading image which I and my party believe is necessary to give the consumers of Canada the governmental service and concern to which they are entitled.

I now wish to say a brief word or two about the Food Prices Review Board. The minister, of course, did give them a hard time in obtaining staff. Last Tuesday he attempted to suggest that they were acting independently of him. He neglected to say that ten of his senior departmental officials are in fact supervising the 80 investigators who are going around the country making investigations into the reasons for food price increases.

Of course, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) last September 4, presumably with the minister's knowledge, refused to bring in legislation giving either the board or the government the power to eliminate any abuses respecting unjustified price increases. The minister is not being totally consistent in his approach to the board. On the one hand he tries to stress their independence and power; on the other hand he refuses or is unable to convince the cabinet of the neessity to give them increased powers to do something about the increases in the price of food. I think the sooner we have a clear and articulate statement on the government's position with respect to the Food Prices Review Board, and not any window-dressing in terms of a bogus expansion in the terms of reference, as announced by the Prime Minister on August 13, the better off we will all be.

Now I am going to put the motion that I referred to at the outset of my remarks. I do this in a spirit of co-operation with the members on the other side of the House and with the members to my left. In this motion we are not going to pin the terms of reference or the instruction to the committee down to any specific proposal or amendment that was discussed at an earlier time in Committee. Merely, we are saying that when the committee considered its recommendations in the second report presented to the House in July, a certain set of economic conditions existed.

There was a certain set of premises by which we were all proceeding. Then things changed rapidly in the month of August. It was not just the consumer price index that changed; that is merely the manifestation of the over-all problem which many of us did not realize was so serious. I am willing to bet that members from all parties might not have been willing to stick with the recommendations of the second report had that factual information as manifested in the consumer price index figures of August been available.

In that spirit of co-operation, Mr. Speaker, I propose that this report not be concurred in tonight, that it be sent back to committee and that members from all parties have an opportunity, with this new factual information, to bring forward such recommendations, such reconsiderations, rethought-out policies, rethought-out statements and summaries of facts that occur to them under these new conditions, We should not at this time, in this House, in this period of crisis, be saddled with what are really lukewarm, wishy-washy recommendations which we support for the most part but which really do not come to grips with the over-all problems.

[Mr. Atkey.]

I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Kent-Essex (Mr. Danforth):

That the second report of the Special Committee on Trends in Food Prices be not now concurred in but be refrerred back to the said committee with an instruction to consider the relevance and effect, if any, of the movements of the several main components of the consumer price index for Canada for August, 1973, as domestic factors accounting for the trends in food prices in Canada, and to make any revisions thereby necessitated in the said report for presentation to this House as quickly as possible.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Atkey) was good enough earlier in his address to indicate to the Chair the amendment which he proposed to move, and in this way he gave the Chair an opportunity to consider the procedural acceptability of his motion. I suppose the hon. member did that because he suspected there were procedural difficulties in relation to his amendment. If he did, he was correct.

I certainly do not propose to make a ruling now. I am quite willing to hear the views of hon. members who may wish, for the next hour or so, to instruct the Chair on their belief as to the rules, the precedents and citations which might be applicable to the amendment proposed by the hon. member for St. Paul's. Although I am quite prepared at the present time to make a ruling, I would not want to deprive hon. members of the pleasure of embarking upon a procedural discussion.

Mr. Atkey: Just briefly, Mr. Speaker. No doubt Your Honour is aware of a ruling made by the Deputy Speaker prior to the supper hour. Without attempting to reflect in any way upon that ruling, I think it now constitutes a precedent of the House and I might wish to make submissions on its applicability to this particular motion.

I do not have a written copy of the ruling before me, of course, but as I recall his words the Deputy Speaker seemed to indicate that because this was a motion for concurrence on the second interim report of a special committee, and because the special committee continues to exist and in fact has the option of submitting a third or fourth report, therefore the earlier amendment to consider other new matters was for that reason unacceptable to the Chair.

The procedural argument I would make in this context, Your Honour, is that this motion does not necessarily attempt to introduce a specific new topic which might well be the subject of a third report. It merely attempts to suggest that the factual basis upon which the recommendations of the second report were made have changed so drastically that at the moment, in the best interests of all hon. members of this House, the committee should reconsider its recommendations in light of that new factual evidence which has become available to members of the House and the public subsequent to the formulation and the making of the recommendations in the second report.

Mr. Caccia: May I ask a question, Your Honour?

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. member rising to ask a question on the point of order?

Mr. Caccia: No, Mr. Speaker, a question in relation to the speech that the hon. member completed just before his point of order.

Mr. Speaker: That is perhaps a little embarrassing, but I do not want to obstruct the interesting work of the House. If the hon. member for St. Paul's is interested in allowing a question from his colleague from Toronto, I suppose the rest of us should not object.

Mr. Atkey: Mr. Speaker, I have no objection, although I hope you could get on with your ruling as soon as possible, in the interests of expediting the work of the House.

Mr. Speaker: I am prepared to move with my ruling, but I gather the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has some words of wisdom.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I will keep them down, Mr. Speaker. I can think of three reasons why I should not take the floor.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: Try sitting down.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): That applause suggests there are four reasons, the fourth one being that the House would be just as happy if I took my seat. The first reason is that it is a bit difficult to speak on this point after Your Honour has suggested something about words of wisdom, and the second is that a few moments ago you said you did not want to deny us the pleasure of participating in debate. But the more important reason that would keep me from rising, although it has not succeeded in doing so, is that I find doing so a bit awkward.

This afternoon when we moved an amendment, the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) raised a point of order against it. Now, if I speak procedurally against this one, it may look like tit-for-tat. I can assure Your Honour that is not the case but, rather, I rise because I think the consistency with which this House must act operates against this amendment being allowed. If I can be pardoned for one-half sentence on substance, I do not think this is a good enough reason for not voting on the main motion tonight.

This afternoon, His Honour the Deputy Speaker ruled our amendment out of order relying mainly on a sentence in citation 220(1) which reads in part:

If the subject matter of an instruction is within the scope of the question referred to the committee then such instruction is useless and irregular.

It was argued this afternoon that the Special Committee on Trends in Food Prices is still in session and is going to meet tomorrow as well as on other occasions and needs no instruction from this House to permit it to consider matters that are within its terms of reference. I submit if that applied this afternoon, it applies tonight.

The hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Atkey) said that his amendment, unlike ours, does not raise a specific new topic. If I may paraphrase it, it seems to me that what he is saying is that his amendment just tells the committee to carry on with its work. Surely there is no place, especially in the light of this afternoon's ruling, for an amendment that simply tells the committee to do what it already has the right to do. That committee, when it meets on future occasions, could consider the consumer price index figures and other figures released last Thursday and make a third and a fourth report if it wishes.

I submit that there is not sufficient argument, either in substance or in terms of procedure, to tell the committee to do something it already has the power to do, and that the amendment is not in order.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I do not rise as one thoroughly prepared to argue this question, since the mantle of acting House leader was cast on my shoulders only a few minutes ago. However, although I always have the greatest difficulty in disagreeing with the sage of the House of Commons on questions of procedural minutiae, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), I personally find that the motion put by the hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Atkey) opens up in substance new vistas for debate.

I, personally, would have been delighted to have the opportunity of hearing debate on some of these interesting questions. Unfortunately, I am not here with any elaborate procedural argument. I hope the Chair might find the amendment acceptable so that we might continue with such interesting discussions as have been opened up by the hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Atkey).

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am afraid I must disappoint the amiable Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Macdonald) who appears intent on supporting the procedural acceptability of the amendment moved by the hon. member for St. Paul's. I find it difficult to disagree with the ruling delivered to the House this afternoon by Mr. Deputy Speaker. I do not agree with the hon. member for St. Paul's when he says it was a precedent. I am sure there can be found many precedents in the history of our deliberations to indicate that this kind of decision, having reference to proposed amendments to reports from standing committees, has been made in the House.

The hon. member for St. Paul's first gave to the Chair notice of his proposed amendment. I heard him reading the amendment. It seems to me at first blush, at second blush and perhaps at last blush, that this is an entirely new question. The hon. member must appreciate that there were terms of reference agreed to by this House going back, I believe, to January 23. Hon. members, by amendments or suggested amendments to a committee report or to a motion to do with a committee report, cannot try to rewrite the terms of reference which were agreed to by the House.

I heard earlier during this debate, perhaps at the opening of the debate while the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) had the floor, the suggestion that there should be an appreciation by the House of the work done by committees and an appreciation of the reports being made by committees. I agree very much with the thoughts expressed by the hon. member for St. John's East at the time. If the House agrees, I think we can go along with this idea by accepting the recommendation which has been made to us by a committee, considering it at least and then voting either for or against it.

If that is the will of the House, it is a decision which the House has to make. However, to come before us with an amendment such as the one proposed by the hon. member for St. Paul's, which is an entirely new question, which I respectfully suggest to him has nothing at all to do with the recommendation that has come to us from an excellent committee making an excellent report, that report having been proposed for the consideration of the House and the acceptance of the House by the hon. member for St. John's East, is not in accordance with the customs, traditions and practices of the House.

I suggest to the hon. member that what he is asking us at the present time to do is not to amend the motion before the House but to amend the decision of the House taken by this assembly on January 23. On that basis, I find the amendment cannot be accepted.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, it will be obvious to the House why I rise to speak on this particular occasion. Interest and, of course, long-standing expertise prompt me to rise and talk about farm prices and particularly about the effects that various costs, not least of which is the cost of petroleum, have on costs of food in Canada. By way of introduction to this question I should like to relate my remarks to some of the exact terms of the second report of the special committee which we are considering.

I refer particularly to Votes and Proceedings, page 514, paragraph No. 8, where one finds a discussion of the importance of having an adequate supply of essential food, of the importance, also, of encouraging farmers to increase steadily the production of staple foodstuffs, and of the fact that we should at the same time provide a fair income for the farm family. At the same time, I would refer to paragraph 2 of the same report, which refers back to and incorporates by reference the first report of the committee which may be found at page 232 of Votes and Proceedings. I refer in particular to the second column on that page, that is, to the reference to costs of operation, costs of processing and costs of transportation.

I think there is little disagreement among those who have been following the interests of the farm community, both in this committee and elsewhere, with the idea that one of the most important considerations involving farm costs has been the increased cost of petroleum products, particularly gasoline and diesel oil and also, of course, heating oil. These costs are important from the standpoint of farmers' operating costs.

I am glad the hon. member for Kent-Essex (Mr. Danforth) is here this evening, because he is personally familiar with and has taken an interest in the Ontario greenhouse owners and operators group which has particularly been feeling the impact of the acceleration in petroleum prices which Canada has experienced in the past year. This group will also feel it in the season to come.

These remarks apply to the growers of fresh fruits and vegetables of various kinds, if I may be parochial, in our part of the country in Ontario. They also apply to other parts of the country where some protection is provided for the Canadian consumer in food costs by reason of the fact that the enterprise of the kind of producer I have referred to, who with a not inconsiderable investment in productive facilities provides the Canadian market during the cold weather months with fresh fruits and vegetables, provides important Canadian competition for imported foodstuffs. Without that Canadian competition the consumer would be less assured of paying a fair price at that time of year when he has no alternative source of supply in Canada.

Unfortunately, my colleague the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) is not here this evening. He has, in somewhat forceful terms, put forward in relation to food costs and the costs of the farm community several arguments related to my portfolio and several arguments related to the fact that in the past year, in the area west of the Ottawa Valley line, the basic price of crude petroleum increased by about $1. That was an increase of about 30 per cent from the standpoint of the refiners. Of course, that cost is passed on in due course to all consumers.

The view of the Minister of Agriculture, if I may do the best I can with an argument to which he would render better justice, is that this is unfair to the farmers in the first place, in view of the additional costs and competion to which they are exposed. Of course, this additional cost eventually shows up in the farmer's balance sheet and makes more difficult, as the report says, the provision of a fair income for the farm family.

The Minister of Agriculture at the same time makes a second argument, the justice of which I must acknowledge. He feels that it is unfair, at a time when the big, multinational oil firms are in a position to increase their prices and have in fact increased prices by nearly 30 per cent in less than one calendar year—the beginning of the increase came about November, 1972—to criticize the essential food producer. As these firms are in a position to take a mark-up of not less than 30 per cent, he feels that it is essentially unfair that the producer of food should be subject to so much criticism.

I think it is fair to say, without disclosing the confidence of the cabinet room, that the viewpoint put forward by the Minister of Agriculture and by many who represent the viewpoint of consumers in other farming areas of the country and of consumers in the broader sense was that the increases in the price of gasoline and oil were increases which were, in the first instance, substantial in the hands of the companies that received them; secondly, these increases for the time being were seen to be more than adequate—

Mr. McGrath: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I apologize for interrupting the minister in his speech. I submit to him, through you, Sir, that he must stay within the rules. I submit that his remarks concerning oil and oil prices are not relevant to the debate taking place at the present time.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am not sure whether the point made by the hon. member is well taken. I had assumed the minister who has the floor now would want to relate his remarks to the substance of the motion before us. He was talking about oil. It may have been olive oil he was talking about, which would bring his remarks within the terms of the motion. The minister will want to take that into account.

● (2040)

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, that question has been occupying my mind all day. In response to the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath), if he had talked to those in the farming community of Ontario, as I have, and to his colleague the hon. member for Kent-Essex (Mr. Danforth), he would not say to the farm community, which is responsible for providing food supplies to the Canadian market, that the cost of petroleum products is an irrelevant question. I am not talking about cooking oil. He would not say to the hon. member for Kent-Essex, nor to the Ontario greenhouse growers, that the cost of oil is an irrelevant question.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I am sure the greenhouse growers would say to him, in language which I could not reproduce and which could probably only be matched by the Minister of Agriculture or the hon. member for St. John's East himself, that the question of petroleum costs is one of the most important from the standpoint of producers and one of the most relevant when talking about production.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): In my part of the country and in other parts it is not only a question of heating oil for winter producers of tomatoes and other vegetables; it is also a question of an industry that has become more highly mechanized over the years. Petroleum is a very important expenditure in their total current budget. Therefore, I think it is important that we reflect on the impact of this particular part of the cost package the farmer has to face. The cost package the farmer, like all producers, has to face is in due course passed on to the customers and is ultimately reflected in food prices in Canada.

It was in light of this feeling and the feeling of the Ontario farm communities that we were pleased on that day to be able to gratify the greenhouse growers, mushroom growers and others. While they would be facing difficulties this winter in signing contracts for fuel or heavy oil, due to the increase in oil costs hereto-fore the government had taken the step to put a restraint on oil prices until the end of January so that at the same time it might take action to dissociate the very substantial increase which for domestic reasons in the United States has been forcing up the price of oil in that country. We wanted to dissociate that from prices in Canada.

I might say this proposal has run into some opposition. It has, of course, run into opposition from the producers of oil, and the government of Alberta. The substance of it has not run into opposition. I have yet to hear such an argument articulated. It has certainly not been argued by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) or any of his followers that 30 per cent is not enough for the oil companies.

Indeed, if one looks at the argument of the Leader of the Opposition and his followers, including the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings (Mr. Hees) and the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams)—unfortunately, neither is here this evening—one would find that instead of being prepared to deal with the substance of the question of how much is enough when it comes to oil prices, they have been arguing around the periphery. They have been arguing the minutiae of procedure, not the substance or whether the Canadian consumer is paying too much. They argue about whether enough notice was given to the United States or whether there were consultations with Alberta. In other words, they have evaded the basic question of whether the member for Calgary South (Mr. Bawden) and the Leader of the Opposition think that real oil prices should be restrained in this country, and whether we should shift from a single price system to a two-price system so that the problems of the United States market are not automatically translated into our own.

Mr. Bawden: What happened to the energy report?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): The hon. member for Calgary South asks what happened to the energy report. I think I am right in saying he was not here today when I had an opportunity to deal with this question.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have to take exception to the line of approach adopted by the minister. I have some qualms as to whether what he is saying is within the terms of reference of the committee which considered food prices. As I said a moment ago—I appreciate I may be saying this facetiously—what we are considering at the present time is a report on food prices. I wonder whether the debate on energy, the supply of oil from Alberta and the related problems which were debated heatedly during the question period ought to be included in the debate we are having at the present time. This point was made by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) a moment ago. I feel he had a good point.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I made a very careful study of the parliamentary precedents in this regard. I focused in particular on a very interesting debate in the fall of 1962 when the then hon. member for Stormont-Dundas advanced some very cogent arguments with regard to harbours, with particular relation to Cornwall harbour. I have been trying to emulate—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. My recollection is that the hon. member was ruled out of order and sat down.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I have been reflecting on this question throughout the day. While the fine, red thread of relevance seems very clear to me, I thought it might not be so obvious to other members of the House. On another occasion, and perhaps outside the House, I will have an opportunity to talk about these questions, particularly the consultations which took place with the United States State Department.

I am glad to see the hon. member for Calgary North is here now. I have reason to believe I will have an early opportunity to talk about the discussions with the government of Alberta. Therefore, I will direct myself to the question of farm prices and the cost to farmers. I hope we can have in this House the verbal and articulate support of this measure of the hon. member for Kent-Essex and other rural members from the province of Ontario.

Mr. Stanfield: Tell us what it is.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): The measure is to restrain the prices of gasoline, diesel oil and heating fuel, which the Leader of the Opposition opposes. He would just as soon have higher prices for these to satisfy his Alberta members. However, I hope the Ontario members will support those of us on this side of the House who would like to keep the prices down for the consumer, and particularly the farmer.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I apologize to the hon. member for Vancouver Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis), but the hon. member for Témiscamingue (Mr. Caouette) is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I just want to say that, in my view, the minister does not know carrots from a gallon of gas.

[English]

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Atkey) went through the list of recommendations of the food prices committee on which the government has taken very little action. He did a very thorough job of going over those recommendations. But it was the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath), the member who introduced the resolution, who pointed out, quite correctly, that the two most important recommendations of the food prices committee to date were the ones having to do with the setting up of the Food Prices Review Board and with urging the government to take measures to put food on the tables of people with low incomes.

Both those measures were introduced in the committee by members of this party, and the members of the other parties were very lukewarm about them, particularly the one having to do with putting food on the tables of those of low income. Members of the Conservative party in particular were very much opposed and very vocal in their opposition to setting up the Food Prices Review Board. The reason was that they were obsessed with the single idea that the only way to tackle the question of food along with the rise in the cost of living was to set up a system similar to that in the United States, a stop-and-go policy of freeze, price rise, further freeze, another price rise, and so on. It was a sort of leap the dips approach which would leave the consumer dipping more than he would be leaping.

An hon. Member: Don't forget our friends opposite.

Mrs. MacInnis (Vancouver Kingsway): The Liberals may have been doing something like that too, but the Tories are certainly noteworthy for the fact that since the Food Prices Review Board was set up over their loud protests they are now attacking it for not doing the things that they did not want it to do in the first place or felt it should not do. The Conservatives had this fixed idea, so it is somewhat entertaining to see them now lashing themselves into a fury at the government for failing to use the Food Prices Review Board to bring down food prices.

Opposition to giving the board the powers it must have is equally visible on the part of the government. It was very visible this afternoon in the attitude of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Gray) when he spoke in this debate. I am glad to see him in his seat once more. The minister was very firm in warning that if we were going to give an independent board the power that some of us contend it must have to be effective—that is, power to cancel or roll back price increases that are unjustified—we would be letting ourselves in for serious trouble.

I should like to ask the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, has he forgotten about the powers of the Canadian Transport Commission to deal with such things as wages and whether people get stations in their area, and so on? Has he forgotten that the CRTC has very wide powers involving all kinds of things in the field of communications? Has he forgotten the powers that the National Energy Board has been clothed with? All of these are independent boards.

Mr. Gray: Are not members complaining about them every day?

Mrs. MacInnis (Vancouver Kingsway): Members may be complaining, but the fact is that the government has established the boards and kept them going. Consequently, the minister is in a very peculiar position if he now says that it is impossible to have a similar board to protect consumers in the matter of food and food costs. As a matter of fact, I can only come to the conclusion that he either considers it is not important to protect people in this way or that he simply is not interested in investigating the matter.

As a matter of fact, when the minister spoke this afternoon he slipped as nimbly as did the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) behind the workings of the international marketplace as an excuse for leaving people to sink in the morass of inflation, taking the attitude that nothing much can be done except to wait and see and to let nature take its course. Meanwhile, in order to make sure that nothing is really being done, we have his steady resistance to giving the Food Prices Review Board the powers it must have if it is to do anything.

The minister must know—after all, he has a good head when he is not obsessed with the idea that he must not use it—that going out and snooping around stores to see that prices are as advertised is a useless exercise. Shoppers do that kind of thing themselves and they complain bitterly when they find discrepancies between the advertised price and the actual price of articles on the shelves. I am afraid that the chairman of the Food Prices Review Board would hardly qualify as a candidate for the FBI when she permits the army of snoopers to set out, everybody knowing they are going to snoop long before they get on the trail. That sort of thing will not work.

I picked up a very interesting article this evening in Farm and Country for Tuesday, September 18, by Gordon Hill, president of the Ontario Federation of Agriculture, in which he refers to a number of naïveties on the part of the Food Prices Review Board. He says:

> When one of the chains has been charged in a court because of pricing shenanigans, it is hard to find the board's naïveté palatable.

He was referring to stickers on cans. He went on:

> It is just as naïve to wait for voluntary restraint in other sectors of the market place. When banks are licensed for usury, their profits cannot help but skyrocket. Our economy today is ready-made for opportunists. Food processors have reported profits on investments up 50 per cent to 80 per cent over last year. Commodity futures trading has yielded fantastic profits.

There are people who do know what is happening. We in this party absolutely refuse, and will continue to refuse, to accept the idea that nothing can be done about food prices. We refuse to accept the idea that because of the world market it is absolutely impossible to feed Canadians adequately with good food at a price they can afford. If we were talking about exotic foods that have to be imported, perhaps it would be different; but we are not. We have everything in Canada needed to provide a healthfully nutritious diet. We have the grains needed for bread, pasta, and so on. We have dairy foods such as milk and cheese. We have poultry products, eggs, meat, fish, vegetables and fruits of many kinds. It is absurd and untenable for this government or anybody else to say that we cannot feed our people properly. The people on the street will not accept this. Women in the home will not accept it.

If the government keeps the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs looking like a dignified and indignant pharoah unwilling to take steps to free the people from this tyranny, then he is going to get the plagues and those plagues will come upon all of us—increased misery, insecurity and malnutrition. One of these days he is going to have armies of women besieging his office and other places on the Hill unable to take any more of this business of having the wool pulled over their eyes.

It is absurd to believe we cannot feed our people. There must be something taking place between the producer and the consumer, something that is taking increasingly heavy tolls. If the marketplace cannot provide the kind of diet our people need and can afford, changes in the marketplace must be made.

In the time I have available I intend to deal with one protein food. Nothing is more necessary for a good diet than protein. In underdeveloped countries, dietary malnutrition diseases develop on a huge scale because of the lack of protein. Even in our big cities in Canada there is evidence of malnutrition among newborn children and older children as a result of the lack of protein.

In British Columbia we have always had an abundance of fish and until very recently it was sold at a reasonable price. What has happened in this regard? Le me give you an example of what has happened to the price of sockeye salmon in British Columbia. Up until the beginning of 1972, a 7¾ ounce can of salmon—and I do not know why they do not make it eight ounces—sold for 69 cents. In early 1973, the same sized can sold for 89 cents, and in the summer of this year the cost went up to $1.15. On September 15 this year, the Vancouver Sun ran an article that suggested that callers were complaining that the same 7¾ ounce can of salmon was being sold for $1.31.

Whole pink salmon, which is one of the lower grades, was selling in British Columbia supermarkets this summer for $2.49 a pound. Some people will say that the villains are those who demand increased wages. The fisermen's contract for 1973 in respect of sockeye salmon, which is about the second best grade, calls for 50 cents a pound this year, plus some slight production bonuses, and 52 cents a pound for next year. The contract in respect of cohoe and steelhead calls for 40 cents a pound this year and 42 cents a pound next year, and for pinks it is 20 cents a pound this year and 22 cents a pound next year.

So the pink salmon for which the consumer had to pay $2.49 a pound this summer in Vancouver netted the fisherman 20 cents a pound when he caught it. There is a $2.29 spread between what the fisherman got and what the consumer paid in the store. Who gets that $2.29? Let me point out that, as an additional factor, the labour force in the fishing industry has been reduced by nearly 50 per cent in the last five to ten years because of automation, with the cost in respect of wages consequently going down significantly.

What is the reason for this huge spread? I suggest that it arises because two companies control 85 per cent to 90 per cent of the canned salmon in all of British Columbia and Alaska. Those two companies are B.C. Packers Limited and Canadian Fishing. As far as I can learn anything about Canadian Fishing, eight shares of 15,000 are owned by eight Canadian employees of Canadian Fishing, some 14,900 are owned by Americans, and no one I have been able to contact knows who owns the other three. You might call this a dominant position if you do not like to call it monopoly control, but that is what I call it. I think this more than any other single reason is why we have these prices in respect of salmon today.

Let me refer to some of the reasons we have been given for these prices. On August 4 the Vancouver Province ran an interview with the president of B.C. Packers, Mr. Richard Nelson, to this effect:

> Prices paid here by consumers of B.C. sockeye salmon will rise sharply in the next several weeks due to an unprecedented strong international demand for the product.
> The upward price spiral was blamed Friday by spokesmen for both government and industry on the almost total failure of the Bristol Bay runs to Alaska, largest sockeye fishery in the world.

British Columbia supplies about 20 per cent of that international market, but this year it will supply about 50 per cent because of that Alaska failure. Most of the pressure is coming from Japan and Great Britain. This is the interesting thing about the article:

> Nelson said the retail price here will not be known until sockeye runs have ended. His firm withdrew its price offer to local wholesalers a week ago until the market settled down.

I suggest that means all the fish they can get hold of will be sold to Japan and Britain at the highest prices they can get, and everything that is held back here will be held back until something like a comparable price can be charged Canadian consumers. This means, in turn, that the fish which used to be regarded as a substitute for meat by the poor people of British Columbia has spiralled in cost away out of sight—and fish is about our best protein source in British Columbia, or has been until now. An interesting thing is that around August 16 a small number of 7¾ ounce cans of salmon was released to the wholesalers at a price of $50 for 24 pounds, which comes to $2.08 a pound. It is also stated in this article.

A top official in the federal fisheries service here said the government is powerless to stop the export of fish at the expense of the domestic market.

I should like to ask, if we can have a two-price system for oil, domestic and foreign, why can we not have a two-price system as well for British Columbia salmon? If we can have export controls for beef and pork from the Prairies, why can we not have a two-price system for salmon in British Columbia? These fish are caught in British Columbia waters, and we had a record run this year. What do our federal government officials mean when they say the federal government is powerless to act, when they know this is going on?

An hon. Member: There is something fishy.

Mrs. MacInnis (Vancouver Kingsway): You bet there is something fishy when this federal government allows a statement of that kind to be made. These two companies control between 85 per cent and 90 per cent of canned salmon in British Columbia and Alaska, and therefore are in a position to determine the price. If export prices are higher, they will sell to Japan and Britain. As a result, there will be a shortage in Canada and the prices will be at such a level that only the wealthy can buy salmon in Canada.

There was an interesting clipping in the Globe and Mail of August 10 which stated that for the 24-week period ending June 17 this year—and that was before the big run came in—sales of salmon by B.C. Packers were up by 25 per cent and its profits were up 124 per cent. I say that this is gouging the consumer and this sort of thing should be stopped.

I have only a couple of minutes left so I shall suggest what should be done. First, the sooner we get rid of these snoopers and put the money being used for this purpose by the Prices Review Board to something useful, the better. Secondly, I think we must have a Prices Review Board with some teeth. There is no advantage in the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Gray) and the government thinking they can pull the wool over the eyes of the consumer any longer. People are getting wise and know that a token board is not much good. Thirdly, the Prices Review Board must open the books of these companies and make known to the public what these companies are doing and who controls them. Fourthly, I think the government should put export controls on B.C. salmon in order to keep enough within Canada for our people at a price they can afford to pay.

My fifth point is that we must impose an excess profits tax in respect of these companies which are increasing their profits by 124 per cent while increasing their sales by 25 per cent. Lastly, I think we must get down to a study of who controls the fishing companies. When we do, I think we will find the great Weston empire underlying at least one of the two dominant fishing companies on the west coast.

As my leader said when he spoke last week regarding the realm of corporate profits, "This is an area that only New Democrats are willing to attack, but it is a crucial area". We must get down to the attack in the area of controlling our means of life and the many items which make up the nutritious diet needed by the people of this country. The sooner we get around to it, the sooner will the people of this country have faith in the power of the government to do something about the soaring prices which are inflicted on them today unreasonably and with no justification.

Mr. Bert Hargrave (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to take part in this debate because, first of all, I have been a member of the Special Committee on Trends in Food Prices. Although I have not attended all meetings of the committee, I have been present at most of the hearings. First of all I should like to make a few general comments about the hearings I have been privileged to attend as a member. I must say that during the early meetings the collective feeling of members seemed to be that it would perhaps be only a matter of time before the villain or the rip-off segment of the food industry would be exposed as we proceeded from one witness to another and that, hopefully, the next witness would be the culprit or the fall guy who, because of illegal or excessive procedures and profits, was perhaps responsible for all our record high food costs.

Of course, it was not that easy. The committee brought forth its first report with its principal recommendation being that of a prices review board. Then just prior to the second report of the committee which we are debating tonight the thinking and direction seemed to change significantly, with most of the committee members realizing that there was no single scapegoat to be found and crucified in our deliberations and that, just maybe, North American and world demand—supply patterns had a great deal to do with the Canadian cost of living and especially food cost issues.

A good number of caustic and satirical comments have been made by members of the press, members of parliament and Canadians as a whole about the usefulness of this special committee. I think a good many of these no doubt were justified, especially in the early stages of our hearings. Now, almost in retrospect, as we debate the second report of the committee I suggest that one of the most valuable and perhaps unexpected results of all the committee's deliberations is a much better total understanding of our entire food industry, hopefully, by all Canadians. I hope we appreciate that.

Tonight I wish to address myself particularly to recommendations Nos. 8 and 9 as these two deal very specifically with the long-range agricultural production side of this question. I think it is important that I read these recommendations:

8. Because an adequate supply of essential food is vital, the committee recommends that the federal government consider the advisability of immediately implementing policies to encourage farmers to increase steadily the production of staple foodstuffs on a basis that will provide a fair income for the farm family and basic food at a reasonable price for the consumer.

9. The committee recommends that the federal government consider the advisability of protecting the Canadian market from the pressures of world food requirements by ensuring that domestic prices reflect domestic demand and supply.

These two recommendations to which I wish to address myself cannot help being interconnected and should be considered together in this debate. During all the food cost discussions, both in our committee and all over Canada, I suggest that no single food item received more attention than meat, especially beef. Because of the important position beef holds in any food cost debate, I wish to use this commodity to illustrate the tremendous need for the implementation of these two recommendations.

Up until about a month ago there was ample justification for saying that one of the major reasons for the present pressure for beef in North America is the fact that beef producers have so successfully produced high quality, cheap beef that demand has outstripped supply, and also because this demand pattern is now becoming evident around the world. Let us look a little more closely at this demand-supply pattern between Canada and the United States.

First, whether we like it or not, we must remember that as a nation Canada is a net importer of beef and a net exporter of feeder cattle. In the period January 1 to September 8 of this year Canada exported 111,000 feeder cattle to the United States and 12,600 live fat cattle. In the same period of 1972 we exported only 4,460 feeder cattle and 6,000 head of fat cattle. Our beef and veal exports, that is, the carcass exports to the United States were about 44 million pounds for the same period in both years, so there is no change there.

On the import side, over the same period, we imported 33,700 live cattle in 1973 compared to 32,300 last year, which is an increase of almost 4 per cent. But here is the significant part. Over 50 per cent of these current imports have taken place in the past three weeks. That is, 50 per cent of the cattle coming live to be slaughtered here have come in during the past three weeks. In addition, Canada imported about 105 million pounds of beef from all countries in this same current period compared to 111 million pounds in 1972.

The total trade balance here is definitely not in our favour. Canadian beef cattle producers have recently seen their market prices tumble drastically, with more of the same likely to come. These same cattlemen presently are very concerned about the results of two recent federal government actions which definitely do not provide the long-range incentives called for in recommendations Nos. 8 and 9. The first of these is the manner in which the government imposed the export beef controls. I should like to suggest that most thinking cattlemen did not seriously object to the actual need for these controls, at least for a very short period of time, but they did object very strenuously to the way in which they were imposed on a Monday afternoon back on August 13, just hours before the heaviest run of slaughter cattle in the entire week.

I am sure the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) knows that on Tuesdays there is the biggest run of the week in Canada. As late as Monday a good many had started on the trip to market. Also, it was at a time when our Canadian weekly kill was at a near record level of 65,000 head. Surely these controls could have been announced on a Friday afternoon, to allow a reasonable adjustment period for cattle shippers. In addition, an unreasonable delay in announcing the details of the controls caused untold confusion for both producers and packers. Those details did not catch up to them for several days afterward. I suggest this is not the way to create genuine incentives to produce more foodstuffs.

The second federal action is the very current situation involving our so-called one-way free trade which permits duty-free imports as opposed to export tariffs that are presently charged by the United States. Last week 8,000 head of live fat cattle came into Canada, nearly all through the Sarnia-Port Huron entrance, at a time when rail shipments of beef from western Canada were just starting to arrive after the rail strike. What was the result? A downward plunge of fat cattle markets, with more of the same to come. Some southern Ontario cattlemen are so concerned that they might very easily set up some form of demonstrations in opposition to these U.S. imports. Surely the government should immediately reimpose the import tariffs on beef to help restore some confidence in our Canadian cattle market.

• (2120)

Mr. Hargrave: There is no question that the confidence of Canadian cattlemen in their own market has indeed been shaken over the last four weeks.

To develop these recommendations properly, our consuming public must understand thoroughly just how beef prices are determined. First of all, they are not arrived at by adding up all our costs such as land, taxes, feed, labour, interest, etc., then adding a percentage for profit, then adjusting somewhat for competition and finally coming up with today's beef prices. It is not that easy or simple. Today, $2 steaks or ground beef at $1.25 is the result of events that took place two years and three months ago when the cattle producer made the decision to breed the beef you are eating today. You should add another year to that interval to cover additional planning time which, I can assure you, is definitely necessary. What I am saying is that three to four years ago cattle producers decided, entirely on their own, not to increase their breeding herds sufficiently to produce enough for today's supplies. They did so because there was not enough money in prospect, so they diverted their attention to other agricultural production.

Our national objective in beef cattle must surely be at least to be self-sufficient in Canada today. Why not develop the confidence and incentives to keep those 111,000 head of feeders at home, finish them out here and export the surplus if any? One way of achieving this objective is to develop as quickly as possible a new national feed grain policy. It is important that this new policy clearly recognize the total dimensions of our domestic feed grain industry. This industry represents some 800 million bushels, or 80 per cent of our total feed grain production which, I suggest, is considerably larger than our wheat production.

The new policy must also recognize that our livestock and poultry feeders are the customers for this feed grain and as such they have to be considered in the feed grain price determination.

The proper implementation of these two recommendations could very well determine whether our major Canadian agricultural components continue as a private enterprise or become a public utility. The only fundamental answer to unduly high food costs is increased agricultural production which should continue to be more efficient and more competitive.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hargrave: Finally, we should remember, and remember well, the words of the United States Secretary of Agriculture, Mr. Butz, who said on his recent trip to Canada: "You can't get more by paying less".

Mr. B. Keith Penner (Thunder Bay): Mr. Speaker, I begin by commending the hon. member who has just spoken. I think his contribution to this debate has been an excellent one. Much has been said about the price of meat at all levels up to the retail level, yet there has been so little information and so little understanding of what goes into the price of this important product. I think the hon. member has made a very valuable contribution to the debate this evening.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Penner: The hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) who opened the debate today wondered out loud why it was that two other members of the House saw fit to move, as he had done, concurrence in the second report of the Special Committee on Trends in Food Prices. I certainly cannot speak for the hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore (Mr. Grier), but my motion was placed on the order paper because I felt that the hon. member for St. John's East would never get around to moving his motion. It had been there since July 25.

However, I am rather puzzled by the fact that the hon. member for St. John's East commended this report and praised it, in fact moved its concurrence, and then another member of his party, the hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Atkey) said it was totally inadequate; he did not wish to see it concurred in but, rather, sent back to the committee.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): This is what you call Progressive Conservatism.

Mr. Penner: This contradiction is rather puzzling in the debate today. But I think this debate, which is one in a series we have had on inflation, is important because once again it helps us to understand just how immensely complex is the problem of inflation which we are facing. One of the remarkable aspects of any inflationary economy is that it is a love-hate relationship. Everyone loves the inflation which benefits them, but hates the inflation of someone else for which they have to pay a little more.

The hon. member for St. John's East—who, by the way, is a very able and valuable member of the Special Committee on Trends in Food Prices—in moving this motion today gave us one of his usual, very vigorous speeches. He struck out wildly in a great many directions, but I felt that all his punches really lacked substance. He did not even bother to give us the usual litany from the other side of the House about freezes and price controls which we have come to expect as part of the daily ritual. He really had nothing to offer today, on behalf of his party, on how to cope effectively with the problem of inflation. I thought, also, that his criticisms of the government's actions were really far from convincing. However, he did his best and that is all that can be expected of any of us.

There is no doubt that all members of the House share the serious concern of those whom we represent about the recent dramatic increases in food prices. Nobody on any side of the House can say that they have a monopoly on the concern for this problem. More recent indications of a reversal in the trend in food prices are certainly most welcome. What price reductions have taken place in recent weeks, of course, do not give any of us cause to breathe a little easier, but there is certainly hope.

I have here a report by the Canadian Press which indicates that a cross-Canada survey taken last Thursday by CP and covering 17 common food items shows a decline in most major cities from prices last Thursday compared with the end of August. It was conducted where possible in large supermarkets, and prices on September 13 were compared with those on August 28 for the same 17 items. So I say there is some cause for hope, but not enough at this moment for any of us actually to begin to breathe easily.

In particular—the hon. member for St. John's East brought this out in his speech—we are all disturbed about the impact of rising food prices on families with fixed and limited incomes. They, of course, are the ones for whom we must have the most concern. It was for that reason that the government sought the speedy approval of parliament to increase family allowances and old age pensions. There will be more of those increases in 1974. As well, Mr. Speaker, subsidies have been announced which are designed to hold the line on consumer prices for such staple items as milk and bread.

The Food Prices Review Board established by this parliament is on the alert for any undue profiteering which may be taking place at the retail level, and consumers are asked to co-operate with the board by reporting to it examples of what they consider to be price gouging. Some hon. members have attacked and ridiculed the board, but despite that many members of the special committee were satisfied, following a recent meeting with members of the board, that it is taking its mandate seriously. It is endeavouring to pinpoint problems and to make suitable recommendations to the government based on substantial, valid findings and evidence.

Some members of the special committee have advocated that the Food Prices Review Board should have its powers expanded and enlarged and that it ought to be empowered to roll back prices on its own authority. I continue to oppose that proposal because in my view only the government itself ought to have and to use such powers. It is the government which ought to take full responsibility for the consequences that would result from such action. I am surprised that the NDP would urge such a proposal because we hear so frequently from that party their condemnation of independent boards that have control over prices.

When the Canadian Transport Commission recommended a price increase for Bell Canada it was the NDP that called for the cabinet to take action. The point here is not the Bell Canada increase but, rather, who should take the action. I believe it is the government that ought to take full responsibility under the glare of parliament, under the daily criticism and questioning of parliament. It should have the responsibility for taking such very strong action as rolling back somebody's prices and possibly not rolling back somebody else's. Of course, the Prices Review Board is quite free to recommend to the government that certain prices be decreased. But it is the government of Canada, being aware of its constitutional position, which must make the ultimate decision. To delegate such sweeping powers to a board of inquiry could be very devastating. It could cause some serious dislocations in our economy, particularly in relation to the supply of necessary foodstuffs.

Concern over inflation has led members of the Special Committee on Trends in Food Prices to consider on more than one occasion the advisability of resorting to controls. The committee has not shunned its responsibility for looking at this particular course of action. I think the members have done so in a very serious, responsible way, but the committee in its two reports to date has made no such recommendation to the government, nor has the Food Prices Review Board up to this time. If the board ever does, Mr. Speaker, the committee would certainly want to examine its reasoning with very close scrutiny.

So far, however, most of the sound evidence appears to be in opposition to the imposition of controls. For example, a recent study prepared for the board by Professor David Smith, who looked at the situation in Great Britain, indicates that a temporary resort to controls can make more appropriate monetary demand management even more difficult to attain.

Mr. Atkey: He said that in 1966, too.

Mr. Penner: That is fine. The truth does not alter from year to year. Controls, it is argued by this professor, can cause more severe inflationary problems in the future. Price freezes or other controls at best only suppress prices for a short time. Once a freeze is ended, prices explode. They did in the United States. Indeed, the success claimed for the initial control program in the U.S.A. really was the result of much earlier restrictive monetary policy and the slack in the economy.

Attempts by the U.S. government to control prices have demonstrated quite clearly not only the ineffectiveness of such controls, but, indeed, their perverse effects. Nevertheless, some members recognize that there are certain political attractions in a temporary resort to controls. It is most appealing in certain ways because it gives the appearance of doing something that is bold and effective. I emphasize that it gives the appearance of doing that, but a great many serious-minded observers and commentators, including leading economists, continue to cast doubts on this approach to fighting inflation.

Recently, the president of the French Employers Organization pointed out that since 1945 France has issued 25,931 price control decrees. Despite that huge outflow of bureaucratic decrees, a 10-ounce jar of instant coffee in Paris costs $3.75, and a pound of sirloin $2.95. Price controls represent decisions by a few men given authority to press buttons which they think will give the desired results, that is, reduce inflation and stabilize prices. The trouble is that humans, no matter how clever or well intentioned, never know for certain what will happen when they push the buttons.

Did price controllers elsewhere know that putting controls on prices at one level but not another would make farmers destroy eggs, kill baby chicks and laying hens, and sell off their sows because under the control system it cost more to produce chickens, eggs and hogs than they could get when they sold them? Did price controllers know that many meat packers would have to close down? In effect, the controls reduced supplies of these products. This process tended to force prices up, not down.

In contrast to that, the Government of Canada takes the position, and the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Hargrave) reinforces this view, that the measures we must take are those designed to conserve and increase the supply of food while at the same time protecting farm incomes. Certainly it is a finely balanced course that the government is following, but it is a serious and a responsible approach.

Falling prices or set prices can discourage production. Marina von N. Whitman of the U.S. Council of Economic Advisers has warned as follows, and she ought to know a great deal about this subject:

> Direct controls on food are far from the whole answer, and in the long run they are not the answer at all. Controls which hold prices below the levels which market conditions would otherwise generate for any sustained length of time are bound to create shortages, and thus the necessity for some means of rationing to substitute for the rationing function normally performed by prices in a free-market economy such as ours.

When a price control freezes the price on a product which is in short supply and which is costly to produce, naturally the producers will be reluctant to sell. One writer on economic matters said recently:

> The supply side of the supply-demand equation (based on free prices) has been neglected too long. Incentives to increase productivity should be developed, tariffs should be lowered, taxes, especially sales taxes, should be cut.

● (2140)

On the sidelines, Mr. Speaker, when these controls are having their effects or their supposed effects there are always those who are willing to pay a little more to get what they want. These people will make a direct deal with the producer at a new, higher price despite the fact that they are breaking the law. The more affluent people in a society where there are controls will drain off supplies while the poorer people will go without. The more ridiculous the level of the price from the standpoint of the producer, the less he will produce and the less will appear in the recognized marketplace to be consumed by the poorer people. Controls have never failed to produce black markets which favour the rich and penalize the poor.

An hon. Member: Oh, come.

Mr. Penner: Show me a situation where that has not been the case.

Mr. Woolliams: What about the war?

Mr. Penner: What about it? Look at the history of the Second World War and find out if it did not exist. It is for this reason that the Special Committee on Trends in Food Prices, in recommendation No. 8, said that ways should be found to increase supplies, and in recommendation No. 9 talked about protecting domestic supplies. It was with this in mind that the government on a temporary basis, through order in council, provided for export licensing for cattle, hogs and the products thereof. The order was introduced to prevent a shortage caused by an unusual drain on Canadian supplies—created extensively by the U.S. price control system—that which the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) last weekend called "a stupid law".

Mr. Speaker, I enthusiastically welcome the debate we are having today on the report of the committee because it gives all hon. members an excellent opportunity to state as fully and as clearly as they can what steps they would propose and argue for to reduce food prices, while at the same time not having us live cheaply off the hard labour of our farmers or creating a shortage of supply and black market prices whereby the rich continue to enjoy a bountiful table, regardless of cost, while the poor can barely afford a subsistence diet.

Some hon. members in this and other debates have argued that we cannot consider rising food prices apart from the problem of inflation in general. That is only half true. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang) in a debate a week ago reminded us of a fact that well deserves repeating in this debate. On September 10, as reported at page 6391 of Hansard, he said:

> —that a good portion of the rise in the price of food should not really be treated as an ordinary price rise similar to that which has taken place in every other sector over a period of time, or indeed that is taking place even now. A good portion of the rise in food prices is an overdue adjustment of income to farmers in Canada who produce grain and meat for market.
> It is of particular importance that these adjustments have taken place. Adjustments of a similar magnitude compared with other price rises need not and will not take place in the future, but the adjustment that has taken place to date is overdue. I say that because it is important that other sectors in this country should not believe that they somehow have to try to catch up to the over-all price increases that are taking place in this country, including the increase in the price of food. This would be an attempt simply to take back for the more protected—those on higher incomes—all the gain that has been made by giving farmers a better income return, as well indeed as other gains being made under this Liberal government by the low income earners in this country.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Before I recognize the next speaker I think the House would want to ensure that there is less interruption of members who are making well researched and interesting contributions to the debate, even though I realize that the results from Jarry Park, Montreal, are heartwarming indeed. The hon. member for Kent-Essex (Mr. Danforth).

Mr. H. W. Danforth (Kent-Essex): Mr. Speaker, after many months, in fact years of outcry by the consumers of this country against high living costs we are still faced with a government that seems afraid to tackle the basic causes. This cry that we hear today also comes from the agricultural producers who want this government to give them an opportunity to create more supplies of Canadian goods in order that they can fight on an equal footing to preserve prices to the Canadian consumer.

As far back as last February this party advocated a freeze on food prices, costs, incomes and wages in order that we might have a breathing period in which to take stock of what was going to happen in the country. As long ago as February it became evident that there would be a tremendous increase in prices in the ensuing months and this party advocated that steps be taken to find out if something could be done on behalf of the consumers.

Mr. Speaker, when we talk of consumers, there are no greater consumers in this country than those who produce the food. They, too, are consumers.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Danforth: They are concerned about their input costs as consumers. This is one of the basic problems. If prices had been frozen in February, we would have saved the consumers of this country literally hundreds of millions of dollars and there would not have been this excess profit-taking that our friends in the NDP are talking about—the big rip-offs. But because the freeze did not take place at that time, because we did not have an opportunity to have a breathing period in order that we could sit down with labour and industry, the leaders of agriculture and all the people concerned with the welfare of this country to work out a program, we are in this mess today.

The government of this country delighted and laughed at the fact that we advocated controls. They laugh and express glee when they point to what they call the chaotic situation in the United States. But, Mr. Speaker, today the consumer in the United States has a better shake than the consumer in Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Danforth: In the limited time that is left to me I would like to talk about controls. First I should like to talk about the NDP and their controls. They laughed at our controls, but they are advocating price controls—only they do not call them price controls. They say, "Set up a committee to roll back prices". That is price control. But the problem is that they would roll back prices at the retail level and the primary producer is the man who pays and pays and pays.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Danforth: They talk about rolling back prices, Mr. Speaker. When you roll back prices at the retail level, you let the input cost of the primary producer go to such a degree that he stops producing. This government that laughs at us for advocating price controls is instigating a worse kind of controls—selective controls. These selective controls have the same basic weakness as the NDP controls because they do not control input costs.

When you freeze the price of milk to the consumer for 12 months, as they have done, the primary producer cannot recoup the tremendous input that he is faced with. When you raise the price of wheat to the flour miller so that bread is cheaper, that is not at the cost of the government or the taxpayer; it is at the cost of western producers. When you try to control the price of meat by taking off the 3 per cent tariff on American beef coming into the country, the person who is going to pay, pay, pay is the primary producer, not the consumer.

This government blithely says that it is going to create an atmosphere which will encourage production. It is not enough for the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whellan) to get up and glibly repeat, "I am for the farmer." That is conversation. Let him influence this government to implement policies that will help the primary producer, then I will believe that he is for the farmer.

Only one thing will bring about increased production of food in this country, and that is profit to the primary producer. If you want to impose selective controls on farm produce available to the consumer, as you have done with bread and milk and tried to do with beef, you must control input costs. Under the present government, input costs are rising at the tremendous rate of 13 per cent per year. Yes, 13 per cent, Mr. Speaker. Farmers' incomes, despite what they are receiving today, are not rising to that degree.

What the consumer who is concerned about the high cost of living and the high cost of food today does not know is that the young fellow who is standing at the edge of the counter where one pays for groceries and is putting parcels into bags for customers, who has no responsibility, is working eight hours a day and is probably taking home more pay today than 40 per cent of the primary producers in agriculture despite all their investment and labour. That is the terrible situation we face today. This government says what it wants to do to encourage the production of food in this country. Let it introduce legislation that will give the farmer the opportunity to produce. After all, the farmer must pay the increased interest rates this government has allowed; he must pay the increased building costs this government has allowed. Thus, the farmer must pay increased costs for fertilizer, farm machinery, cattle, seed, chemicals and all manner of items. It is the primary producer who must pay these costs, and under these circumstances he cannot survive. It is time the government found this out.

It is not good enough for this government to say blithely, "We accept the recommendation that says there ought to be a scheme in this country to encourage the production of food." You cannot say that in one breath and then impose controls at the retail level on farm produce. It is ridiculous for the government to criticize us for advocating price controls when it is initiating the same thing on a selective basis and hoping the people of Canada do not realize what it is doing.

I know the NDP are as serious as anyone in this House about trying to control the cost of living. They seem to place all their confidence on the Prices Review Board. I submit it will not solve the problem of high food costs. When we talk about rolling back the prices of food items in this country, do they not realize there are over 14,000 items of food? How can one police any roll-back, let alone enforce it? They base their whole case in the fight against inflation on the high cost of advertising, on the taking of excess profits in the handling of food and in the gouging of the public. Mr. Speaker, these could be contributing factors but they are minor factors in relation to the basic problems that are causing inflated food prices in Canada.

The problem we face in parliament is this: this government is desperately trying patch-up policies and is going from panic to panic as consumers point them out, instead of taking the necessary monetary and fiscal steps and adopting the necessary policies in order to control and fight inflation. When government members stand in their place and say the only reason food prices are so high is that we cannot control them, that is not good enough for me, my colleagues or the people of Canada. Saying that there has been destruction of crops, a storm in some other country, or that some other country is suffering from scarcities of foodstuffs for some reason or another and "We know it is bad here but it is not half as bad as in some other countries" is not good enough.

This debate was brought on in order to give the government an opportunity to send this matter back to the committee. We want to deal with this question on the basis of today's facts. I hope the government will accept the hon. member's motion.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Jim Fleming (York West): Mr. Speaker, if hon. members have any questions after I have finished my remarks, I shall certainly entertain them. I have done a great deal of preparation on this subject and it is most unfortunate that, as we are close to ten o'clock, I will not have the opportunity to mention several things that I wanted to mention. In the time available, with the same courtesy on the part of opposition members that I have tried to extend to them during past months, I will try to make one or two points.

One of the major things we have been attacked on over the months is that the government has failed to get at the sources of inflation.

An hon. Member: It sure has.

Mr. Fleming: I should like again—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Fleming: I am hoping that someone on the other side of the House will tell me, either inside or outside the House, how we can tell the Japanese that pork is poisonous and how we can tell Europeans that beef is unhealthy. How can we tell God to give us better weather? How can we tell the farmer that he does not deserve a better price, or how do we tell the worker that he cannot fight for better wages?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Fleming: This is too bad, Mr. Speaker. I have seen this attitude developing over many months. Sometimes we get heated; sometimes the opposition becomes heated. That is fair enough. Surely, however, we extend courtesy in this House so that when someone is trying to make a point on behalf of his constituents, he is allowed to do it.

May I make a further point. It would not be fair or proper for this government to say, in attacking those sources of higher costs, that we must take away the right of the worker to fight for fair wages. We have heard a great deal about wage and price controls as being the saviour and the solution to the problem that we face in connection with inflation, and especially in connection with rising food costs. Something I have not heard mentioned in the last hour or two is the working paper produced by Professor David Smith of Queen's University. I think the first report of the committee studying trends in food prices recommended that that study be carried out.

The first working paper to come from Great Britain makes something clear. It notes that various control systems established over a number of years in Great Britain, and especially in the past year, have not been successful. Actually, the increase in food prices under controls in Great Britain has been, between April, 1972 and 1973, 15.4 per cent.

An hon. Member: Ten o'clock.

Mr. Fleming: Clearly, controls are nonsense.

Mr. Reilly: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, because this subject is of such pressing importance to so many millions of Canadians and as, because of procedural difficulties today, a great many members, including my colleague across the way and myself, were precluded from taking part in the debate, I would ask the unanimous consent of the House to continue until eleven o'clock.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Paproski: John Reid said no.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Hon. members have heard the suggestion of the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. Reilly). Is there unanimous consent that we continue until eleven o'clock?

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. Hees: Donald Macdonald said no.

Mr. Reilly: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a second point of order. In view of the overwhelming importance of this subject to millions of Canadians, I feel justified in demanding that the government bring this matter in as a government order by the end of this week.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

● (2200)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. The hon. member knows he should not rise on a point of order to make a speech or participate in the debate. If the hon. member has a valid point of order, I invite him to put it to the Chair and the Chair will decide on its value. Otherwise, we will proceed with the normal adjournment debate.

[Mr. Fleming.]

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, may I, in my eternal quest for knowledge, ask the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader about the business for tomorrow, the day after and the day after.

Mr. Reid: Mr. Speaker, I have a large shopping list for the day after and the day after, but tomorrow we will return to the Canada Pension Plan bill we were dealing with last Friday. If that is completed, we will proceed to the residential mortgage legislation. If that is concluded, we will then go on with the CNR financing bill.

Mr. Nielsen: What about the Parole Act?

Mr. Reid: We would also like to bring the Parole Act forward at a later point. Perhaps there could be some discussion among the House leaders as to the appropriate way and time to deal with this matter.

ENERGY—CRUDE PETROLEUM—INQUIRY AS TO MEETING WITH ALBERTA MINISTERS—DISCUSSION OF CONSUMERS' SUBSIDY

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, the seven minutes allotted to me tonight arise from the following question which I directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, and also a question asked by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield), recorded at page 6590 of Hansard. My question was as follows:

> Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources if he is meeting any ministers of the government of Alberta this week and if one of the matters that will be discussed is the question of the province of Alberta subsidizing the consumers in reference to crude petroleum as western wheat farmers have been asked to subsidize consumers in reference to bread in the whole of Canada?

The minister replied:

> Mr. Speaker, I am meeting with the Alberta ministers. The hon. member's formulation will be an interesting one to put to them.

On September 14 the Leader of the Opposition asked a similar question. The minister replied:

> I think it is fair to say that they made no substantive comment about it.

When speaking to the Calgary Canadian Club on September 14, and I mentioned this in the question period today, Premier Lougheed said:

> We are and have been prepared to sit down at a national conference on energy in a spirit of co-operation. However, the federal government unilateral action now appears to preclude such an approach.

When pressed by me today, the minister stated there was consultation. I cannot accept that. With regard to consultation with western Canada, Alberta in particular, I say this new, ad hoc oil and gas policy of the government is the biggest deception ever perpetrated on western Canada. There was no consultation. One recalls the western economic resource conference where the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) put on a show to gain western votes with words, and ever since he has kicked the west in the posterior, all of which was confirmed by the western Liberal delegation at their own convention. As a learned Liberal Senator said at the convention, considering what this government has done to our wheat, our cattle, our natural gas and our crude petroleum, if the government does not revoke and repeal such policies the Liberal party will become a matter of factual history, lacking any national, viable force.

This lack of consultation with the provinces is astounding. It is the most high-handed policy of negative co-operative federalism ever devised. Yesterday they talked about building a pipeline to Montreal. Premier Bourassa stated that it would interfere with their refinery development of crude from international markets. He said no; and as soon as he said no, of course, the Trudeau government said no. This is what the minister of natural resources of Quebec said:

> The pipeline project is absolutely unacceptable to the province of Quebec.

Mr. Lougheed, on the other hand, has complained about the mechanism of the surtax. His words are on record in this House. In his case the government said yes. The Prime Minister said yes. I ask, Mr. Speaker, what kind of economic discrimination is this to western Canada? This is economic alienation.

The utter confusion of the federal Liberal government policy has affected Canadian independent companies more than international companies. For it is they who must scramble for money, for investments in Canada and elsewhere. I was advised by one independent company today that the uncertainty of this policy will dry up funds and in the end all consumers in Canada will suffer. This drying up of funds will curtail development. It does not take a crystal-ball gazer to appreciate that because of the trouble in the Near East which could explode at any time, the price of international crude will continue to rise. The lack of development in Canada may make us dependent on others rather than being sure of ourselves. In the long run this policy will mean loss to the consumers of Canada.

In considering the price of a commodity such as crude petroleum, price has one of two functions. It may restrain consumption or it may generate supply. Those who are developing the tar sands, for example, have this to say:

> Unless oil sands production is exempted from export controls and export taxes, then it is our considered opinion that the federal government's actions would effectively put an end to large-scale development of the oil sands.

I do not have the time to put the figures on the record tonight, but they were put on the record of the committee and show that the tar sands can produce the same amount of crude petroleum as the proven reserves presently known in western Canada. Therefore this is no time for the government to be monkeying around without full consultation. Will the tar sands development be ground to a halt?

Now let me deal with the question of compromise. In my question today I smoked out the minister when I asked him about the compromise spoken of and which was so fully reported at page 9 of this morning's Globe and Mail in Mr. William Johnson's column. The minister said, of course, that the compromise is a compromise resolution of the convention, and that the hon. member—meaning me—should appreciate that it is not binding on the government. Therefore I say the compromise reached at the convention was not a compromise of government policy. So there has been no compromise; that there is, is fiction.

All of these problems have resulted from the Liberal government's ad hoc policy in regard to endeavouring to control galloping inflation. Their policies have added to and aggravated inflation since the Prime Minister said that inflation was licked. The sad thing, as I see it, is that it has taken Alberta a lot of capital, exploration, and above all risk, to find and to develop its resources of crude petroleum and natural gas. Today this government has put the lid on that development. It seems to me that this government believes, if I may coin a phrase, that the nationalism propounded by the Liberal party is according to the price of a barrel of crude petroleum produced in Alberta.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, as I indicated in my response to questions earlier today, I met with Mr. Dickie, Alberta's minister of mines and minerals, on September 13, and on that occasion put to him the situation placed before us by the decision of the National Energy Board the day before, that it could not grant licences for October oil exports because it could not, as required by the act, satisfy itself that the price for Canadian oil being sold to the U.S. was just and reasonable. The board considered that the price differential was generally of the order of 40 cents.

I then explained the choices to Mr. Dickie; that is, let the federal government abandon its policy of attempting to control the inflationary pressures on oil and allow the Canadian price to rise to meet the U.S. price or, alternatively, we would simply not allow the export of oil, which was unthinkable or, alternatively, we had to find a method of maintaining the Canadian price and obtaining prevailing prices for our oil in the U.S. market. The immediate imposition of the export tax or other control mechanism was required. I told Mr. Dickie I regretted that a circumstance had arisen where we had to act immediately.

With regard to the utilization of the funds which would be raised, I suggested to Mr. Dickie that we had only in mind that they would be employed for the purposes of developing secure and stable supplies of energy in Canada. I assured Mr. Dickie that we would consider the Alberta government's entitlement to whatever additional royalties would have been obtained by the sale of oil in the U.S. at the higher U.S. market price, and that we would discuss with Alberta the application of the proceeds to energy developments in the province of Alberta and frontier oil, particularly increased exploration off the Atlantic coast where a discovery is so badly needed by Canada for security of supply in the Atlantic provinces. I proposed to Mr. Dickie that I meet him again and other provincial ministers in Edmonton on October 3 for substantial negotiations which would accommodate Alberta's requirements within the context of the federal policy.

I do not know of any legitimate Alberta public interest which has not been taken into account by the federal government. I acknowledge that Alberta is the owner of the resource. But the owner, by virtue of his ownership, is not entitled to act apart from the responsibilities of being a member of a common neighbourhood, which I might call Canada. The national oil policy of 1961 gave Alberta oil a guaranteed market in Ontario and the western provinces, at a time when international oil was competitive with Alberta oil in price, all the way back to Edmonton. Canadian consumers assisted greatly in the development of the Alberta industry and it was right that they should have done so. Now we have an industry whose costs can compete in world markets. That industry and that province have some responsibilities to the rest of Canada.

The whole point of the federal policy announced by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) on September 4 is not to deprive the government of Alberta of revenues. Indeed, the division of these revenues was left for specific response and discussion on October 3 in Edmonton. The policy does, however, tax certain of the never higher profits of the oil industry for the dual purpose of giving some short-term protection to the Canadian consumer against exaggerated price jumps and providing funds which can be directed toward the development of other Alberta energy sources and those in other parts of Canada as well.

HEALTH—SUGGESTED INSTITUTION OF INSURED MEDICAL AND SURGICAL SUPPLIES FOR OLD AGE PENSIONERS AND OTHERS ON LOW INCOMES

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, I rise on this occasion to speak about the situation regarding insured drugs for those on low incomes. On repeated occasions in this House I have asked the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) to insure the drug costs of all those on low incomes, the old age pensioner, those on small pensions and those living below the poverty line. These people have been hardest hit by the galloping increases in the cost of living. Food costs in the last year are up 20 per cent, and shelter is up 12 per cent. According to welfare statistics there are five million people in Canada living below the poverty line, or some 25 per cent of our people. To those on low incomes, food, shelter and drugs represent a much higher percentage of their dollar than the dollar of those on higher incomes.

I only plead the case of those on low incomes, particularly those who are sick and have chronic illnesses such as heart disease, arthritis, cerebral and vascular diseases or chronic diseases in general. When national medicare was brought in on the blueprint of the Hall Commission report, prescribed drugs were to be brought in also for those on medicare. Let me read what the report said:

> Effective and judicious use of drugs have made it possible not only to improve the health of the nation but also to raise the economic benefits resulting from the provision of health services. The use of many of the newer drugs by physicians facilitates their patients' recovery, and in some instances avoids or minimizes the effect of serious diseases. Improvement in the state of health of the nation meant increases in the productivity of the working force. Persons released from hospital care sooner because of new or improved drug therapy meant saving costly hospital bed days, a welcome economy in the light of rapidly increasing costs of hospital care.

[Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale).]

The report continues:

> Advances in drug therapy in the last two decades have been particularly spectacular.

In view of this, the commission concluded that all prescribed drugs should be included as a benefit of a comprehensive health care program. Over and over again the minister has replied to my pleas, as the one before him did, that the federal government would pay under the Canada Assistance Plan 50 per cent of drug costs. The minister surely had his tongue in his cheeck when he made that statement. He knows that this is permissive legislation. It is not mandatory like food and shelter.

Out of several letters I have received I should like to refer to one. It is a case record concerning a lady suffering severe rheumatoid arthritis and cardiovascular disease requiring five kinds of drugs so that she can keep out of hospital and look after herself in her own apartment. These drugs cost her well over $60 a month. Try to do that on $179 per month and pay for an apartment costing $125 per month. I am afraid most of us do not realize what we are allowing to happen to people who are sick and distressed. Permissive legislation gave her $25 per month maximum. She must pay the other $40, and if she stops taking the drugs she will go to hospital where she will occupy a bed at $60, plus, per day.

I am afraid the minister was more influenced by his counterparts in the provincial governments than by the spectre of those who have to deprive themselves and often eat a little less of poorer quality food, day after day, wondering where next they can cut in order to make ends meet. The minister might better break with his cronies in the provincial government and do what he knows is honest, necessary, long overdue and economically sound.

As a matter of fact, the minister and one of his provincial cronies did get friendly and, according to the story, the minister is going to share the cost or pass it under the table in some form or other to that province for its drugs. The minister talks about consensus of the provinces. There was no consensus in respect of medicare, yet it was passed. Insured drugs would cost one-sixth of the amount of medicare, and to the poor requiring it one-twentyfourth.

The provinces which did not accept medicare were taxed for it, so they soon walked the plank and joined. The minister, instead of doing his duty in respect of drugs, talks about a health care plan where health habits will be assessed. There will also be examinations to spot and prevent diseases. Yet, at the same time people are told that examinations must be cut down, that there are to be no more annual examinations. It is no wonder the people become confused. It is no wonder they are frustrated. I say to the minister, bring in the legislation to ensure drugs for those on low income. Sickness, lay-offs from work and hospitalization costs would involve greater amounts than the cost of drug care.

Costs are mounting daily. They are frightening. The minister should not pass by those people on the other side of the street. They should be given justice. Surely I do not have to remind the minister of the story of the Good Samaritan. Let him make a new resolve, and act.

Mr. Mark MacGuigan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I would like to amplify the statement given by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) in reply to a question the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Rynard) raised the other day, and again tonight, concerning the institution of insured medical and surgical supplies for old age pensioners and others with low income who are in need.

In the first place, the federal government is not constitutionally in a position to institute such insured health benefits. What the federal government has done in this area is to offer to cost-share in one manner or another provincial programs providing such benefits to those in need. Under the Canada Assistance Plan, enacted by parliament in 1966, federal sharing has been and is available to all provinces, but not all have taken full advantage of its provisions. In fact, one large province with which the hon. member should be very familiar leaves the nature and extent of health-related benefits for persons in need largely to the discretion of local, municipal or regional authorities, with the result that there is great variation in the assistance available from one community to another, and this despite the ready availability of federal sharing to the extent of 50 per cent of the cost. Obviously, the provincial government could correct this situation itself.

Any extension of benefits under our two national health insurance programs would have to be on a universal basis since the acts do not provide for federal sharing of less than universal programs. The introduction at this time of a universal program covering pharmaceuticals and surgical supplies would have major budgetary implications and, quite apart from this, would represent a breach of the federal government's firm commitment that it would not initiate a new major joint program without provincial consensus. The background to this commitment is well known to the House.

To summarize, the provinces have not yet taken full advantage of the provisions of the Canada Assistance Plan to provide assistance in the area of pharmaceuticals and surgical supplies to the needy persons mentioned by the hon. member for Simcoe North.

CAPE BRETON DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION—ALLEGED FAILURE OF CORPORATION TO COMPLY WITH LEGISLATION—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, about the only thing I could say that is worth mentioning at this time of night is that at present there are three times as many Tories in the House as there are Grits.

For the past six years I have used every possible vehicle to bring to the attention of the government a situation, namely, that legislation of 1967 has not been adhered to by the responsible Crown corporation officials in charge of the Cape Breton Development Corporation. The last question I put in this respect was on September 10, when I asked if there was any reason the president of the Cape Breton Development Corporation should not be held responsible under the Criminal Code in the same way as any railway worker would be who refused to return to work under the legislation which was recently passed by the House.

The fact remains that legislation passed in respect of pensions for dependants of former employees of the Cape Breton Development Corporation and in the coal industry under section 18 (a)(ii) of the act requires that pension arrangements be made, but there is no doubt that these arrangements have never been made. I might say here that two committees of parliament have given unanimous support to this matter. The most recent committee report recommended unanimously as follows:

> Your committee supports the position of the Cape Breton miners that the Cape Breton Development Corporation has not acted in the best interest of the said miners in deducting from pensions retirement payments sums of money which were legally forthcoming from federal unemployment insurance programs and the Canada Pension Plan. Further, your committee recommends to the House that a firm decision be taken in favour of the legitimate claims of the Cape Breton miners and recommends to the House of Commons that the government consider the advisability of instructing the Cape Breton Development Corporation to satisfy the said claims.

So far as the Cape Breton Development Corporation is concerned, I have here the situation as it applied up to July 1 of this year and still applies in many cases. This is a quotation from their own policy paper, and it reads as follows:

> (a) In the case of a surviving widow of the pensioner, make a single payment to her on the last day of the month in which the pensioner dies and again on the last day of the month following but not thereafter—

This can add up in some cases to a write-off of approximately $50 by way of an answer to the legislation passed in the House under section 18 (a)(ii) which requires coverage. As of July 1 there have been improvements brought about as a result of the sympathetic approach taken by the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Jamieson). I give full credit to the minister in this case. But I say here and now there is no denying that Mr. Tom Kent—and this can be found in the submission put before the government as recently as June—is still ignoring the legislation as passed by the House of Commons in June, 1967, section 18(a)(2), requiring that these payments be made to the widows. This is still not being done. There is no denying it.

I do not know how the parliamentary secretary who will answer on behalf of the minister, or how the minister or the government can answer this question. On the first committee there were 12 members from the government side of the House and that committee gave unanimous support to the contention I put before it, as did the petition accepted by Mr. Speaker and the government. The most recent committee also gave unanimous support to my contention.

The evidence that they have not carried out their full commitments under the legislation is to be found in their own writing. If the hon. member who takes the responsibility for answering tonight reflects on what is happening in the court, I will have no alternative but to take up the matter as a question of privilege tomorrow, because here we are not dealing with the court decision in any way, shape or form but with what Mr. Kent has put in writing and what has been passed as legislation and supported by two committees of this House.

Mr. Mark MacGuigan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the minister, and in the absence of his parliamentary secretary, the hon. member for Saint Denis (Mr. Prud'homme), I would like to reply to the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond (Mr. MacInnis). I know that the problems involving Devco's efforts in Cape Breton are not unfamiliar to members of the Standing Committee on Regional Development. The hon. member has brought them to the attention of that committee with force and commitment. On May 28 of this year, five representatives of the preretirement pensioners group met with the minister for discussions and subsequently with the standing committee.

The Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Jamieson) has been working very hard to deal with what the hon. member regards as certain legitimate grievances of the pensioners. I believe considerable progress has been made. I know the minister is prepared to co-operate with the hon. member to pursue alternate means to bring just benefits to the Cape Breton miners and their families. The minister has also had discussions with the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang) since there is a legal interpretation to this matter to which the hon. member has referred.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly this House stands adjourned until two o'clock tomorrow afternoon.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.30 p.m.

U.S. REJECTION OF OVERLAND ROUTE TO MOVE OIL TO CHERRY POINT—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the terms of Standing Order 43 to propose a motion on a matter of pressing national importance, namely, the report that the United States administration has, in effect, rejected any overland alternative to the use of supertankers at Cherry Point to provide crude oil for the Puget Sound area and the revelation from Washington that the Canadian government has not yet formally proposed any alternative overland scheme. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. McKinnon):

That this House expresses its unalterable opposition to use of the Cherry Point terminal by oil supertankers and requests that the minister of external affairs make a full statement outlining the government's formal position and what measures the government will undertake on this critical matter.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's motion requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent.

BENEFITS AND PRIVILEGES ACCORDED NEW DEMOCRATS AS OPPOSITION PARTY—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the terms of Standing Order 43 to request the permission of the House to move a motion, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKenzie). In view of the New Democratic Party's continued support of inadequate government economic policies resulting in the inability of parliament to deal effectively with the high cost of living, this House requests an examination be made as to whether the New Democratic Party is entitled to continue receiving the extra benefits and privileges customarily accorded to parties in opposition to the government and not customarily accorded to groups or parties in coalition with the government.

Mr. Speaker: The Chair has considerable doubt whether this kind of motion ought to be placed before the House. I think hon. members will agree that the matter should be taken under advisement.

Mr. Peter Reilly (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the terms of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity to all the people of Canada. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Halton (Mr. O'Connor):

That this House resume immediately the debate on food prices which adjourned at 10 p.m. last night.

RAILWAY FREIGHT RATES—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. John Reynolds (Burnaby-Richmond-Delta): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43 I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the Minister of Transport's statement to the House on August 30, 1973, that he would ask the railway companies not to increase their rates for 18 months, and in view of the fact that on September 1 of this year, one day after his statement, the railways put into effect a 6 per cent increase on all agreed charges affecting our largest volume shippers, I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Battleford-Kindersley (Mr. Horner):

● (1410)

MANPOWER

SHORTAGE OF FARM WORKERS AND JOBS FOR STUDENTS—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to seek the unanimous consent of the House to discuss a matter of an undoubtedly urgent and pressing necessity. It refers on one hand to penniless students and, on the other, to the shortage of agricultural manpower.

I move, seconded by the member for Rimouski (Mr. Allard):

That a special committee of the House be asked to study the shortage of agricultural manpower as well as employment available to students and to report to the House, in order that the Department of Manpower and Immigration may have up to the spring of 1974 to draw up a program which would provide at least a partial solution to those problems and which would be implemented as soon as the spring of 1974 so that for once, the government would be introducing a timely and appropriate program.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Under Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there such consent?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent, so the motion cannot be put.

REPRESENTATIONS TO UNITED STATES RESPECTING PROPOSED MOVEMENT OF OIL BY SUPERTANKER TO CHERRY POINT AND ALTERNATIVE CANADIAN SUPPLY

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the right hon. Prime Minister. In view of the fact that since July the government has utterly failed to make any proposal to the United States guaranteeing Canadian oil to Puget Sound refineries in order to end tanker traffic in those waters and in view of the brave words of the Secretary of State for External Affairs in July that we have just begun to fight—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the hon. member should ask the question. I remind hon. members immediately at the beginning of the question period that it is the responsibility of hon. members to ask questions without prefacing them with statements, preambles or allegations.

Mr. Fraser: Can the Prime Minister advise the House why no official communications have been made to the United States setting forth a specific proposal when everyone in the House has known that such communication is imperative in view of the legislation now before the U.S. Congress?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the views of the Canadian government on this subject are well known to the United States.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Explain.

Mr. Sharp: They have been announced in the House of Commons, and I can think of no more authoritative a place in which to state government policy. Moreover, I have had occasion to remind the United States of the Canadian position. As the hon. member knows, the Alaska pipeline will not be completed for some years, so it is not a matter that has to be settled today or tomorrow. I do intend, when I meet the Secretary of State of the United States in New York next week, to remind him of the Canadian position.

Mr. Fraser: In view of U.S. Secretary Morton's letter to the house interior committee setting out the administration's opposition to additional Canadian oil to Puget Sound and because the key clause in the U.S. legislation being studied calls for U.S.-Canadian negotiation on this very point, does the government intend to do nothing until the meeting to which the minister has just referred or the meeting about which the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources told us a few days ago which will take place some weeks from now between the minister and Governor Love?

Mr. Sharp: Provided that the appointment of the Secretary of State is confirmed by the Senate, I expect to see him on Tuesday morning at nine o'clock.

Mr. Fraser: Mr. Speaker, in view of the Prime Minister's statement on Tuesday last that it is government policy to propose Canadian oil to Puget Sound to end tanker traffic there, can the right hon. Prime Minister assure the House that he will forthwith make a statement on motions setting out in detail the Canadian proposal and give the House an assurance that such proposal will be immediately communicated to the United States government, because nobody believes any longer that the government cares what happens on the west coast?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Greenwood.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CHILE—RECOMMENDATION BY CHURCH LEADERS THAT RECOGNITION OF NEW MILITARY REGIME BE WITHHELD—ASYLUM FOR REFUGEES

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the joint statement of the moderator of the United Church, the primate of the Anglican Church, and Bishop Power of the Canadian Catholic Conference dealing with the overthrow of the democratically elected government of Chile, which I presume the minister has received, will the minister tell the House whether he will accept the recommendation of the churchmen that recognition of the new military regime by Canada be withheld until it is clear that the new government is prepared to accept fundamental international principles and the recognition of human rights?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I can reply by reading the words that were addressed to me by the moderator of the United Church, the president of the Canadian Catholic Conference and the primate of the Anglican Church who said, "We warn against precipitous recognition of an unconstitutional regime." That is also the view of the Canadian government, and that is why we have not replied to the request of the Chilean junta that we recognize it now. As the Prime Minister said yesterday, we are watching events very carefully. Our policy is not one of approval if and when we give recognition, but we want to make sure only that there is a government we can deal with confidently and that it is in effective control.

Mr. Brewin: In view of the fact the statement of the churchmen further calls upon the government to give support and assistance to all refugees from Chile, including Chileans who may wish to come to Canada, will the minister state what is government policy in this regard and whether it is willing to grant asylum to the victims of the violent overthrow of the Chilean government?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, the House will be interested to know that there are some Chileans who have sought safe haven in our embassy in Santiago. There are three adults and one child there at the present time, and we are hoping that we will be able to arrange safe conduct for them because they wish to go to Mexico. We have had no requests whatsoever from Chileans to come to Canada, but in view of the Canadian government's record with respect to refugees, whether from Uganda, Czechoslovakia, Hungary or many other places in the world, I am sure we would give very sympathetic consideration to any such request.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Greenwood on a final supplementary, to be followed by the hon. member for Témiscamingue. I believe there are other supplementaries to the first question asked by the hon. member for Vancouver South. We will return to that subject when we have completed the first round.

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the minister whether the government will refer to the appropriate committee of the United Nations the question of large numbers of people being detained by the military regime in Chile pending military trial by court martial, thus depriving them of the fundamental right to trial by the courts? Will this be put forward by the government to the appropriate committee of the United Nations?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, it is my understanding that the Cuban government has already brought this and related questions to the attention of the Security Council and that a debate is beginning today.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

INQUIRY RESPECTING ADJOURNMENT

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Prime Minister.

Can he give any indication as to whether we shall again have to move our families for the continuation of this session in order to enable the Progressive Conservative members to play politics or whether it will be possible for us to get back to our parliamentary vacation?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as everyone knows, that question will be discussed between the leaders of the various parties. I am pleased to find out in advance the position of the Social Credit Party of Canada. Within the next 24 hours, I believe, the acting parliamentary leader of the government, the Minister of Justice, is going to meet the leaders of the other parties.

[English]

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question to the government House leader. Will he advise the Leader of the Social Credit Party that if he thinks they need longer vacations he has the right to put down a motion to that effect?

ENERGY

PRICE AT WHICH CANADA PREPARED TO SUPPLY OIL FOR CHERRY POINT REFINERY AS ALTERNATIVE TO TAPS TANKER ROUTE

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I think I had better address this question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs since the Prime Minister is not accepting questions on the subject. With regard to Canada supplying oil to Pacific northwest refineries in the vicinity of Cherry Point has the Secretary of State for External Affairs in his conversations with the Secretary of State of the United States indicated that such oil will be supplied subject to the export tax?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the difference between American and Canadian prices is represented by the tax, but I am quite sure that the American administration understands, even if the Leader of the Opposition does not, that the price would have been the same whether there was a tax or not.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I take it the answer is yes, although the minister skated all around the subject. I should like to ask the minister what assurances he is prepared to give to the Secretary of State of the United States with regard to the price at which Canada is prepared to supply oil to the Pacific northwest? Is it to be, as the Minister for Energy, Mines and Resources indicated the other day, a domestic price based upon oil landed in Montreal plus the export tax? What firm proposition does the minister intend to make with regard to pricing to the Secretary of State of the United States?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, the price will be in line with prices within the United States. I am sure the Leader of the Opposition would not want us to sell our oil for less than we can get for it in the United States.

REPRESENTATIONS TO UNITED STATES FOR REMOVAL OF CHERRY POINT REFINERY TO SITE FARTHER FROM BRITISH COLUMBIA

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, my question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs is supplementary to those asked earlier about the Cherry Point refinery. Having in mind the fact that the Cherry Point refinery is approximately 18 miles off the lower mainland of British Columbia and also the fact that the potential oil pollution from tankers is almost assured in that area, have representations been made or will they be made to the United States for either the removal of the Cherry Point refinery to a greater distance from Canada's shores, or has the subject been raised with the United States government of preventing this pollution so close to the lower mainland of British Columbia?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Yes, Mr. Speaker, this subject has been raised on many occasions. As I said in answer to questions earlier in the session, the Canadian government was not opposed to the Alaska pipeline as such but was opposed very strongly and remains opposed to the pollution of those beautiful inland waters of British Columbia. Whichever way we can achieve this purpose, we will follow.

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary on the same subject but perhaps a little more detailed than the one just asked. Will the minister now consider the Conservative suggestion and recommend to the United States that the major terminal for the Alaska-U.S. tanker route should be relocated away from Cherry Point to less dangerous waters such as Neah Bay or Grey's Harbour, and will the government move expeditiously on this matter so that this time the request may precede the refusal?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I would deny the premise of the question that this is particularly a Conservative idea. This is an idea that has been floated around for a long time by many people and has been shared by many members of this party. It certainly would be one that we would explore.

TRANSPORT

MEASURES TO CLEAR UP BACKLOG OF FREIGHT CARS AT NORTH SYDNEY DESTINED FOR NEWFOUNDLAND

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, moving to the other end of Canada, my question is addressed to the Minister of Transport. In view of the backlog of some 600 freight cars at North Sydney destined for Newfoundland and as officials of Canadian National Railways have indicated that the situation will persist until after the new year, what action is the minister going to take to direct emergency measures necessary to clean up this backlog and help to relieve the situation?

[Mr. Stanfield.]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the only thing I could do, of course, would be to ask Canadian National to try to clean up this backlog as soon as possible. I can ask CN what measures they are actually taking.

Mr. Marshall: After the minister has asked CN or directed CN to take action, will he make a statement on motions in the House by Friday indicating the action that is going to be taken?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, I will let the hon. member know what Canadian National's answer is.

STEPS TO ENSURE THAT FERRY SERVICE TO NEWFOUNDLAND NOT INTERRUPTED IN FUTURE BY STRIKES

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the minister. In view of the fact this backlog is largely the result of the strike, and in view of the resolution passed at the Liberal convention and the representations by members of the House, may I ask the minister what immediate steps the government is taking to ensure that this vital lifeline to the province of Newfoundland will never again be disrupted by strikes or in any other way?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I think this is a very important question. I believe I answered in the House the other day that, of course, workers have the right to strike in this country and I think that nobody should deprive them of that. Can we, in the circumstances, have a parallel service during an emergency situation? This is something we are going to look into.

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Transport. We are talking about an emergency facing the province of Newfoundland, which happens to be part of Canada. Can the minister indicate whether he is prepared to go beyond asking Canadian National Railways what they are willing to do and direct CN to make available extra service to that province in order to ensure that we do not have to wait until after Christmas to have goods delivered which have been in place in North Sydney for the last couple of months? We are talking about an emergency facing part of Canada and we are certainly not willing to accept the answer the minister has given us.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, that is exactly what I will be asking Canadian National. As soon as I have the report I will give it to the hon. member.

INDUSTRY

TAKEOVER OF BRUCK MILLS BY JAPANESE COMPANIES—PRIOR CONSULTATION WITH MINISTER—DEVELOPMENT GRANTS

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In view of the takeover in July of a Canadian company, Bruck Mills of Quebec, which I believe employs over 2,000 people, by two Japanese companies, and also in view of the fact that Bruck Mills since 1971 has received over $900,000 in DREE grants, can the minister say whether he was consulted about this takeover and, if so, can he guarantee that it is of significant benefit to this country?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I was not consulted about the takeover. As the hon. member knows, there was no requirement in law on the part of the Japanese interests to consult me, but just as soon as we get Bill C-132 through the House there will be.

Mr. Baldwin: When?

Mr. Nystrom: Has the minister considered approaching the two Japanese companies about the $900,000 in DREE grants, and will he also undertake to table in the House a list of all companies that have been taken over by any foreign concern or enterprise during this calendar year?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I believe that information has been made known to the House on an earlier occasion with respect to DREE grants.

IMMIGRATION

POSITION OF PERSONS NOT COVERED BY AMENDMENTS TO APPEAL BOARD ACT

Mr. Peter Stollery (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Can the minister inform the House what he intends to do now with those persons who are not covered by the amendments to the Immigration Appeal Board Act and who come or are due to come before that board?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member will be aware, when Bill C-197 was made law it did not include a special adjustment for those people who had already been ordered deported, but I did undertake at the time in the House to cause the department to review administratively all those cases under appeal to the board which might otherwise have been eligible for consideration under the relaxed criteria involved in Bill C-197. That process is under way now. Some 8,000 or 9,000 cases have been reviewed and many of them have now been referred to the Immigration Appeal Board. We will proceed with these measures with dispatch.

TRANSPORT

RAILWAY FREIGHT RATES—EXTENT OF FREEZE

Mr. John Reynolds (Burnaby-Richmond-Delta): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. As on August 30 the minister stated in the House that the railways had agreed to an 18-month freight rate freeze and as on September 1, one day later, the railways increased their rates by 6 per cent on all agreed charges, can the minister advise the House what happened to the 18-month freight rate freeze?

● (1430)

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Something very simple, Mr. Speaker, that was explained to the House, that when I asked the railways not to increase their rates I mentioned their normal rates, but I said that does not prevent the railways modifying their agreed rates. That means that if they and a company agree I cannot do anything.

AGRICULTURE

SUGGESTED AMENDMENT OF FARM CREDIT LAW TO COUNTERACT INCREASE IN OPERATING COST

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the hon. Minister of Agriculture.

In view of the fact that the prices of farms, livestock and equipment have nearly doubled since 1965, and that federal officials and advisers responsible for granting and administering the loans secured through the Farm Credit Corporation must still apply appraisal criteria set in 1965, thereby preventing the sons of a great many farmers from purchasing their family farms, does the hon. Minister of Agriculture or the government intend to do something about this during the next session?

[English]

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, we are reviewing the present farm credit legislation.

TRANSPORT

PREVENTION OF ABRIDGEMENT OF PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND'S RIGHT TO FERRY LINK WITH MAINLAND—POSSIBILITY OF GOVERNMENT OPERATION OF SERVICE

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Is the minister actively seeking means whereby Prince Edward Island's constitutional right to transportation links with the rest of Canada will not again be abridged? In particular, can he advise if he is looking favourably upon the suggestion that these ferries, which are owned by the government of Canada, be operated directly by that government which has responsibility therein?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I think I have answered this question three times. I believe that Premier Campbell wrote to the Prime Minister on this matter. At the same time, we have to consider the right of the employees.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): It is the law of the land that they have the right to strike. If hon. members want to remove that right, O.K.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. A number of hon. members are seeking supplementaries. I would hope we could try to move to another subject.

MEASURES TO CLEAR UP BACKLOG OF FREIGHT CARS AT NORTH SYDNEY DESTINED TO NEWFOUNDLAND

Mr. Walter C. Carter (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, my question is supplementary to those asked earlier by the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate and the hon. member for St. John's East. In view of the fact that responsibility for providing the link between Newfoundland and the Canadian mainland rests with the Canadian government, as agreed to in the terms of union, will the minister undertake to provide further ships if Canadian National is unable to clear up the backlog of freight cars? Will he agree to have additional ships moved in to help alleviate the situation?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I will ask for a full report on this from Canadian National and my department. I cannot say yes or no. I do not know if there are any ships available at this stage. I cannot—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Fairweather: What about the Bonaventure?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Why don't you learn to swim?

Mr. Speaker: I suggest to hon. members that the noise and fury are not very conducive to a happy and fruitful question period.

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a further question to the Minister of Transport. Instead of the minister asking Canadian National or sending one of his officials to discuss this matter with CN, as though they were running the country, would he be prepared to have a completely independent inquiry set up immediately through his departement to investigate the aspects of the terms of union referred to by the hon. member for St. John's East to see whether in fact the government has a superseding responsibility and also investigate why Newfoundland, which is part of Canada, will have its transportation links cut off for six months just because CN is not willing to put on the equipment to carry out their responsibility?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

[Mr. Macquarrie.]

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, I am aware of this problem. I have already stated in the House we are looking into forming some kind of agency to operate the ferries so that in future it will be possible to avoid this kind of situation, which I deplore as much as any member in the House. During the strike I even applied pressure so that the ferry operations would be maintained.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member rises on a question of privilege. After we have disposed or attempted to dispose of the question of privilege I will recognize the hon. member for Vancouver Kingsway and the hon. member for Bellechasse.

Mr. Lundrigan: I can only attempt to dispose of my question of privilege. The east coast of this country is faced with an emergency that is damaging and ruining the first good economy we have had in years. We stand in our places today to ask questions about a situation announced today which will mean a backlog in freight until after Christmas. This has been admitted by Canadian National. We have been sincere in directing questions to the minister. He says, "why don't you learn to swim?" That is a most derogatory comment. Newfoundland is the newest part of Canada and we suffer the most severe problems of any part of Canada. The least Canada can do, through the Prime Minister and the government, is to try to respond to this emergency with some kind of leadership. The minister should rise in his place and apologize.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. As usual, I will hear the minister on the hon. member's alleged or suggested question of privilege.

Mr. Lundrigan: It is a damn shame.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member has made his speech.

[Translation]

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): On the same point of order, Mr. Speaker, I am sad to see that, apparently, they are trying to pass censure on the government and especially the Minister of Transport for a situation they could not prevent, the union leaders and railway company officials having agreed to maintain the ferries in operation even during the strike. The service was discontinued because the strikers disregarded their union leaders' instructions. Therefore, I am not to blame for that. At that time, we did everything we could and shall strive to prevent any repetition of this; that is, we shall work towards the maintenance of a normal situation.

To conclude, Mr. Speaker, I feel that some people here may die from anything, but certainly not from an overdose of humour!

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Gander-Twillingate and all hon. members will, I am sure, appreciate that is not a question of privilege. When we talk about privilege we are talking about parliamentary privilege. The hon. member feels that his rights—

Mr. Lundrigan: The rights of Newfoundlanders.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have ruled there is no question of privilege. I make this ruling now.

Mr. Lundrigan: This is getting to be a dictatorship.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. May we have order, please. The hon. member for Vancouver Kingsway.

CORPORATE AFFAIRS

INVESTIGATION OF CANADA SAFEWAY OPERATIONS IN OTHER PROVINCES IN LIGHT OF ALBERTA SUPREME COURT RULING

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. In view of the action just taken by the Supreme Court of Alberta in ordering Canada Safeway to reduce its domination of the retail grocery market in Calgary and Edmonton, is the minister's department investigating the operations of Canada Safeway in other provinces where it is established with a view to determining the need to protect the consumer from this domination in other provinces?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of the Combines Investigation Act it is not possible to indicate what investigations are in progress. I am sure the director and the staff are actively carrying out their responsibilities.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Peters: You have never given a decent answer in this House.

Mrs. MacInnis (Vancouver Kingsway): In view of the Alberta court order restricting the amount of money Canada Safeway may spend on advertising, particularly saturation advertising in Alberta, does the minister contemplate similar investigation and restriction of Canada Safeway elsewhere?

● (1440)

Mr. Gray: I do not think there is anything I can properly add to my previous answer.

Is it the policy of the minister and his department to allow service personnel bandsmen to entertain in civvies or uniform at political conventions as was the case during Senator Molgat's election campaign last weekend?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I do not know what the hon. member is referring to. He will have to give me more details before I can answer.

Mr. McKenzie: Will the minister now consider allowing the Queen's Cameron's Reserve Pipe Band of Winnipeg to participate in the Pasadena Rose Bowl Parade on January 1, 1974?

FINANCE

POSSIBILITY OF FURTHER INCREASE IN BANK OF CANADA INTEREST RATE

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Acting Minister of Finance. In view of the United States prime bank rate having risen to an historic 10 per cent and the falling Canadian dollar, indicating that the rise in interest rates in Canada is not sufficient to prevent the flow of money to the United States, has the Bank of Canada indicated to the government that there will be a further rise in interest rates here?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Minister of Finance): Is the hon. gentleman speaking for his party when he advocates a higher interest rate?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. In doing so I make no reflection on the Chair, but when ministers of the Crown break the rules of the House I think it is only right they should be reminded of the fact in the same way as anyone else. The Acting Minister of Finance is forever doing it. He is always abusing the rules.

An hon. Member: Take it easy, Donald.

APPEAL AGAINST DECISION CONDEMNING RED CIRCLING—REQUEST FOR REVIEW OF PRACTICE AND APPROPRIATE LEGISLATION

Mr. Walter D. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the President of the Treasury Board. In view of the importance of preserving the merit principle in the public service, would the minister inform the House whether the government has decided to launch an appeal against the excellent decision of Professor Abbot in which he condemned the practice of red circling in the Morency case?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of Treasury Board): Yes, Mr. Speaker. In the interest of maintaining the pre-eminence of the merit principle in the public service an appeal will be made.

Mr. Baker: In view of the basic unfairness of the practice of red circling, will the minister undertake to review this practice immediately and bring appropriate legislation before the House at the earliest possible date?

Mr. Drury: I will undertake to look into this matter and review it to determine whether there is indeed unfairness. At the same time, I believe we should proceed to appeal the finding of a single adjudicator in this case.

SUPPLY AND SERVICES

ALLEGED OPENING OF TENDERS IN SECRET

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Prime Minister. Bearing in mind the statement made by the right hon. gentleman in the House four months ago that he would look into the government's practice of opening tenders in secret, and having regard to the statement made by the Minister of Supply and Services on May 23 that he had been studying this irregular practice since December, will the right hon. gentleman tell us whether this questionable practice has now been stopped and when he intends to make a statement to the House on the matter?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, as far as I know, none of my officials has been responsible for irregular practices in my department, but if the hon. member will be more specific in his question, I shall answer it. As for the standard practice in the department, as I have said, it is now being reviewed; I intend to announce a new policy in this regard in the very near future.

NATIONAL CAPITAL

STUDY BY DOUGLAS FULLERTON—REFERRAL TO HOUSE COMMITTEE

Mr. Gaston Isabelle (Hull): Mr. Speaker, from time to time, you would think that we were in other legislative assemblies.

I should like to direct a question to the right hon. Prime Minister.

In view of his constant desire to improve the conditions of life for the citizens of the national capital area, on whose behalf I thank him, could the right hon. Prime Minister tell us if he intends to set up shortly a parliamentary committee to again study all questions relating to the National Capital Commission, or will he wait for the Fullerton report on these important matters?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my intention is rather to wait for the Fullerton report, to study it with the cabinet and then, if appropriate, to submit it to a parliamentary committee.

If the hon. member has other representations, I would be happy to hear him because I share his wish to improve conditions in the national capital since I intend, as he does, to go on living here for a long time.

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): I have a question for the Minister of Justice, Mr. Speaker. In view of the resolution recently passed by the Canadian Bar Association recommending that marriage breakdown be the only ground for divorce and that one year of separation be conclusive evidence of such breakdown, and in view of increasing public concern about delay and costs in this field, is the minister considering the introduction of amendments to the divorce law along this line?

GRAIN

WHEAT—POSSIBILITY OF LEGISLATION SETTING FLOOR PRICE RELATED TO FARMERS' COST OF PRODUCTION

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address my question to the minister responsible for the Wheat Board. Since the minister has stated that at least a portion of his domestic wheat policy is to be introduced by way of legislation, may I ask whether he intends to forgo the floor price of $3.25 which has been announced and bring forward legislation making provision for a floor price related to the cost of production to western farmers?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I think the range of $3.25 to $5 does reflect the cost of production. What I did say to the House was that I would be considering this question and discussing with the House leader in due course the question of appropriate legislation, particularly to deal with the treasury payment which is involved as a consumer subsidy to keep the price of bread from going higher.

REQUEST THAT SPANISH-CREWED SHIPS, "RO RO NEWFOUNDLAND" AND "RO RO NEW BRUNSWICK" NOT BE GRANTED VALIDATING LICENCES AND CERTIFICATES

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport related to matters arising between the Seafarers' International Union and the government. Has the minister received a telegram from the SIU requesting that the Spanish-crewed ships, Ro Ro Newfoundland and Ro Ro New Brunswick, not be granted the validating licences and certificates they need and, if so, can the minister indicate to the House the nature of his reply? In other words, has he accepted the request or will he deny it?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, I have been in contact with the premiers of the Atlantic provinces concerning those ships, the Darling report and the Commonwealth agreement. I am going to meet with them next Monday. This is one of the subjects I should like to raise with them before giving a final answer to the SIU.

GRAIN

OPEN QUOTAS AND PLUGGED ELEVATORS—INQUIRY AS TO COMPLAINTS

Mr. Craig Stewart (Marquette): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board and arises from the fact that some farmers cannot deliver grain to plugged elevators. Is the minister receiving any complaints because of the almost wide open quota situation early in the crop year, while elevators are already plugged at some delivery points?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, most farmers faced with congested elevators are quite aware of the fact that this is a result of the railway strike. I do not, therefore, receive complaints from them. They are also aware of the fact that, while quotas are open, the record movement of grain throughout the rest of the year should soon relieve the congestion.

Mr. Stewart (Marquette): Will the minister instruct the Wheat Board to assist farmers who have not been able to make deliveries, thus protecting the equal quota principle of the Wheat Board for all farmers?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, the Wheat Board will, of course, be attempting to place grain cars particularly early and in large quantities in those places where there is congestion. In the meantime, the cash advance program is available to allow farmers to obtain some cash in advance of delivery. As the House knows, we intend to increase the limit available under the cash advance plan.

AIR CANADA

DESTRUCTION OF PLANE BY EXPLOSION AT TORONTO INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT—INQUIRY AS TO REPORT— USE OF JP4 FUEL

Mr. Duncan M. Beattie (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. On June 21 an explosion destroyed an Air Canada plane on the runway at Toronto International Airport. The minister ordered an investigation and promised to table the report in the House. Can he tell me now whether he has that report and, if not, what is the reason for the delay?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the reason is that the report is not completed and is not on my desk.

Mr. Beattie (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. On June 26, when the minister was further questioned about the explosion, he stated that Air Canada opted for JP4 fuel because it was more efficient and more adapted to our climate. He also said he did not know the type of fuel used by Department of Transport planes. Now that he has had time to investigate, and in view of the fact that climatic conditions are the same for both Air Canada and the Department of Transport planes—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member should ask his question. I am sure the hon. member who has the floor knows there are 25 other members seeking an opportunity to ask questions and we have reached the end of the question period. Perhaps the hon. member would ask his supplementary as quickly as possible.

Mr. Beattie (Hamilton Mountain): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Would the minister now inform me why the Department of Transport does not use the same fuel exclusively as Air Canada uses?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, I answered exactly the same question last week. I said at that time that the previous day I boarded a Jetstar of the Department of Transport which was refuelling at the time I was boarding it with GP4.

Mr. Beattie (Hamilton Mountain): On a point of order—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I apologize to hon. members but perhaps we have to hear the hon. member's point of order, after which I will regretfully have to call orders of the day.

Mr. Beattie (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, my point of order relates to the possibility or probability that because of my accent the minister did not understand my question. I asked why Department of Transport planes do not use JP4 fuel exclusively if it is as safe and efficient as he claims it to be for Air Canada?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, I apologize if I did not understand the question correctly. In my answer I referred to "GP4" and I should have said JP4. I must state that all the technical advice we have indicates that it is not dangerous to the point that we should switch from one to the other.

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member is rising on a point of order he will be recognized for that purpose, after which, as I said, we will call orders of the day.

Mr. Ellis: Mr. Speaker, I think my point of order is reasonable. I asked for the referral of some documents and the minister said, "when they are ready". These documents that I want sent to the committee have been on the table since last spring.

CANADA PENSION PLAN

CONTRIBUTIONS OF MEMBERS OF CERTAIN RELIGIOUS SECTS, INTEREST RATE ON DELAYED PAYMENTS, PAYMENT OF LEGAL EXPENSES

The House resumed, from Friday, September 14, consideration of the motion of Mr. Lalonde for the second reading and reference to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs of Bill C-190, to amend the Canada Pension Plan.

Mr. Thomas S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, in the period immediately prior to private members' hour on September 14 when we last had this bill under consideration, I had suggested in respect of one aspect of the bill that this House should proceed with extreme caution when providing for exemptions from the bill's general application.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

[Translation]

Order. Allow me to point out to hon. members that it is rather difficult to hear the hon. member who now has the floor. The interesting conversations now going on could easily be held behind the curtains.

[English]

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Speaker, there are aspects of this bill on which hon. members have touched and with which I find no quarrel, but I do feel that the question of exemptions for a special group or groups is a matter which should receive careful scrutiny by the standing committee before the bill is reported.

As was indicated, the government apparently had a change of mind on this matter, and I suggested that possibly this is one case where the government was making a mistake by changing its mind. Hon. members may recall that immediately prior to the commencement of my speech the hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge (Mr. Saltsman) gave us a very carefully phrased submission expressing his support of this exemption with special reference to the Old Order of Mennonites.

In the course of the hon. member's remarks he indicated that, according to his understanding, at the time this group entered Canada there was some agreement either expressed or implied which provided certain exemptions, and this was one of the conditions on which they immigrated to Canada. I would be willing to agree that there may be circumstances under which a form of special convenant was entered into, and that is a matter of valid consideration in relation to any legislation. Certainly, if there are such covenants or understandings their existence or otherwise should be carefully examined by the committee in all aspects, in order that the real facts can be ascertained. It is only after that kind of careful examination that the House can really have a clear picture of the right course of action to be taken.

My concern, and I think the concern of other hon. members from time to time, is that if we open a door of this kind we lay ourselves open to all sorts of demands for various kinds of exemptions from various groups under certain legislation. Therefore, the matter requires very careful study and examination. I do not know exactly what examination the government may have given the matter before recommending this bill to the House, but only in the standing committee can the considerations of the government be documented.

The hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge indicated that the members of this religious group were willing to accept in some form their responsibility to the community as a whole. In other words, they were not merely seeking to evade the imposition of a tax, either directly or indirectly; they were in fact prepared to have their contributions go to some charity rather than the Canada Pension Plan. My feeling is that contributions to the Canada Pension Plan, either directly or indirectly, are for the common welfare of the Canadian people. Consequently, it might be that we should indicate to the members of this group that contributions to the plan should meet the criteria it is felt is required. If the Canada Pension Plan required the compulsory acceptance of a pension, then I would think their request for exemption from receiving benefits would be a different matter. But as we all know, taking a pension under the Canada Pension Plan or under the Old Age Security Act does require an initiative on the part of the individual citizen. It is only after the taking of that initiative that the benefits of either the Canada pension or old age security apply. This being the case, compulsory participation in the benefits of the plan does not really arise.

These are some of the issues that I feel are involved in this particular aspect of the bill and are the reasons I felt I should intervene briefly in the debate on second reading to express my views. I hope that after due consideration in committee the whole matter will be clarified, and we may be in a position to assess whether or not the government proposal is a wise one.

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, with respect to the amendments to the Canada Pension Plan Act before the House in the form of Bill C-190, there are a few thoughts I should like to place on the record which I feel it is incumbent on members of the House to keep in mind as they view the proposed amendments.

One of the objections that has been aired in this House concerns universality. One of the hallmarks of the Canada Pension Plan was its universality; all Canadians participated, and by exempting specific groups this concept of universality would be broken. I should like to deal with that point a little later, but the Canada Pension Plan clearly makes exceptions to the concept of universality, if there is such a thing as an exception to universality. That point has been brought out constantly by speakers who have said the amendment should not pass.

The second point is in connection with security. I want to relate my comments not to the Old Order Mennonites or the Mennonite people in particular. I am not speaking for myself or representing people of Old Order Mennonite or Amish background. The point that has been made in favour of those people does not apply to my constituents.

The question of security has been mentioned. It has been pointed out that a pension plan builds up security for people in their old age or in case they become disabled. It gives them a fund so they do not become wards of the state. Under the Hutterian principle of common holdings, it is the responsibility of the communal society as a whole to take care of those who cannot help themselves, such as the elderly or those who suffer misfortune and are unable to contribute in a general way to the economic well-being of the colony. So I do not believe that the second point, namely that their security would be hampered or tampered with and that we must provide them with security by legislation, applies to the Hutterian Brethren of which I speak.

The matter that disturbed me the most about the opposition to the amendments to Bill C-190 was the direct statement that the Hutterian people were not loyal to the country or were not loyal citizens. I reject that statement completely.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Epp: Just because groups think differently from the way I think or might have a different system of dividing its members' goods and providing the services they need, does not mean that they are not loyal to this country, that they are not loyal citizens. Under the tenets of faith of the Hutterian Brethren, when they talk of loyalty to a country their first loyalty is to God. Under the precepts governing their religious beliefs, the precepts of God cannot be violated by the laws of the country in which they live. So that is their concept of loyalty so far as citizenship is concerned.

That being the case, what are the facts of the matter? The Canada Pension Plan did not provide for universality; it clearly exempted groups of people who are members of religious orders and who took the vow of perpetual poverty. It also exempted those who were church employed. These were the two basic exemptions and the Canada Pension Plan did not apply to such groups.

Since the inception of the Canada Pension Plan in 1966, certain groups have not had to contribute under the terms of the act. I suggest that the Hutterian Brethren fall within this class of exemption in light of their tenets of faith. First of all, they do take the vow of perpetual poverty. Second, they hold all things in common. Third, they are church employed, the church being the communal administrative body of every Hutterian colony.

I should just like to quote their vow of baptism, and every person who becomes a member of a Hutterian society must accept this vow:

> That no one shall have any private possessions any more: for one gives and surrenders himself to the Lord and his church with all that he has and is able to do, as it was in the original apostolic church, when no one said of his possessions that they were his own, but all things were common to them.

In order to be a Hutterian you must take this vow of baptism; you cannot be born a full-fledged member. Therefore my point is that, the Canada Pension Plan having already made exceptions, the principle of universality is debatable. Then, under the terms of the exemptions made under the Canada Pension Plan I submit that the Hutterian Brethren are just as much entitled to exemption from this plan as the religious groups which are now exempted from it.

I should like also to point out the basic premise on which I will be basing my support of the amendments to the act contained in Bill C-190. I believe that the Canadian Bill of Rights passed in 1960, as well as the Alberta bill of rights, takes precedence in respect of this whole area of freedom of religion. This means that this basic freedom must be honoured and take precedence above the principle of universality which the Canada Pension Plan purports to adopt.

What is the case? Why, for instance, do the Hutterian Brethren object to the Canada Pension Plan and to pension plans in general? They object because a person belonging to that group took the vows of perpetual poverty. He cannot hold any possession, privately or individually. So based on their religious vows, they believe that by building up a pension they are building up personal equity. Whether the pension plan is administered by the government or by an independent insurance company, the person who takes out the pension plan is building up an equity for the time when he is old or disabled. This is entirely contrary to the religious beliefs of the Hutterian Brethren and contrary to their vows of perpetual poverty. So, it is not a matter of escaping taxes or escaping a responsibility but rather a violation of the basic right enshrined in the Canadian Bill of Rights, that is freedom of religion.

I think further that very clearly when the Anabaptist groups came to Canada the letters patent of 1873 were not enshrined in the law, but the government of the day let it be understood that those rights and exemptions for which they asked would be maintained in perpetuity. This has been done, and from that point of view the amendments to the Canada Pension Plan in Bill C-190 are valid and do not violate the principles which underlie the bill.

Further, the present government, I believe, has an obligation which goes back to the former minister of national revenue who stated in a letter to the Hutterian Brethren of Canada that as of January 1, 1972 the Hutterian Brethren of Canada would be exempted from paying the Canada Pension Plan premiums. That is the basis of the amendments now before us. There is still the question, whether or not the amendments to the bill carry, of what position should be taken in respect of the premiums that have not been paid from 1966 to 1972. In some provinces they have been paid under protest by the Hutterian Brethren, but in other provinces, specifically in Manitoba, they have not been. Those premiums, in part, have been paid in that the government withheld moneys which were claimed by the Hutterian Brethren of Manitoba from Department of National Revenue at the end of the tax year.

Since 1972, when they received a letter from the then minister of national revenue, the department has again withheld moneys, either coming through subsidies under the agricultural programs of the Department of Agriculture or from the Department of National Revenue in rebates for income tax payments. Despite the assurances which they received from the minister effective from January 1, 1972 the policy has not yet been altered so far as the actual collection of those premiums is concerned.

I do not believe that you can approach this case from the point of view of universality or from the point of view of security, because both those premises of those who oppose the amendments to the Canada Pension Plan are not valid. In so far as Universality is concerned the Hutterian Brethren have been exempted from the provisions of the Canada Pension Plan, and they do not demand from the state security payments or welfare payments which the rest of society receive from the government at the age of 65 or whatever the case may be.

In defence of the case that all goods are held in common I refer you to a case in Manitoba. Without a doubt most members of the House know that all children born to Hutterians do not remain in the colony, and there is a period of time when a certain number of them will leave the colony. They might come back or they might not. In Manitoba, a case came before the courts in which a certain number of Hutterian Brethren had left the colony in which they lived and then asked a court to rule that they could receive that proportion of the assessed goods of the colony to which their number was equivalent. In the judgment in Manitoba, the court very clearly decided that because of the vows of perpetual poverty and communal holdings, a Hutterian did not own anything; the goods were held in common and could not be divided as members left. So, the members did not have a specific proportion or ratio of the total goods of that community. If the decision had been the other way, it would have destroyed the very tenets on which the religion of these people is based.

Canada is a democracy and it is made up of various people. We come here with various backgrounds. I also subscribe to the idea that every citizen should accept responsibility to the nation. On the other hand, the strength of a democracy lies in the freedoms to which we give lip service. If these freedoms exist and are allowed in practice, then I believe that the amendments in Bill C-190 strengthen the democracy and give credence to the principles on which that democracy is based.

Bill C-190 still does not clear up the question of the backlog nor what will be done about those premiums from 1966 to 1972. I believe that the government, in bringing forth these amendments, is fulfilling an obligation which it has toward these people. I do not believe the bill is in direct conflict with the basic principle of universality, and I am happy to state clearly that I will support these amendments when they come up for a final vote.

Mr. Horner (Crowfoot): Would the hon. member permit a question? I should like to direct the following question to him. Would he be prepared to support an amendment to the bill which would allow any religious organization, whether or not it was founded before 1966, to have the same opportunity to opt out of the Canada Pension Plan payments?

Mr. Epp: I believe that the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner) and I could come to a common understanding.

● (1520)

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): Mr. Speaker, I rise to support this bill and I believe I can be brief. My personal concern with the exemption provisions of the Canada Pension Plan arises out of the fact that I have a number of Old Order Mennonite and Amish in my riding. The position that I take is to try to reflect, as best as I am able, the feeling in the hearts and consciences of these people. I believe, Sir, that this feeling was best expressed in a short sentence in a letter from a member of the Old Order of Mennonites which read as follows:

We believe in trying to live by the honest labour of our own hands and not accept handouts from the public treasury.

I find a great deal to support in that position, and frankly I find very little to criticize or question. I suppose one could argue that this violates the principle of universality in the pension scheme, and indeed it does. I do know the advantages of the universal welfare and insurance schemes, but I am not prepared to accept the principle of universality as the single criterion upon which legislation should be based. From time to time, and probably on too rare occasions, we in this House have the opportunity of expressing that which is in the hearts and consciences of one of our minority groups. We have the privilege in certain cases of overriding part of a universal scheme which is supported only by technicalities and bureaucratic expediency. I suggest to Your Honour that Bill C-190 affords us such an opportunity.

This bill does not open any great floodgates to Canadians wishing to escape the obligations of the Canada Pension Plan. It permits a few very small groups to escape a burden that is placed on their consciences. It will not destroy the Canada Pension Plan. It will not create a bureaucratic nightmare. I must reject immediately the argument that this infringes upon the fair financing of the Canada Pension Plan. If one wishes to reduce this debate to a matter of debits and credits, I think we will find that the Old Order of Mennonites and the Amish are certainly not the winners, and that the public treasury is certainly not the loser.

My position on this matter of finances can be supported at every level of government, not just the federal level. At the municipal level these people pay substantial realty taxes, a large portion of which goes to education and welfare costs, yet their children are educated in their own parochial schools entirely at their own expense, and these people do not accept welfare.

At the provincial and federal levels of government I point out that these people contribute to such plans as workmen's compensation, family assistance plans, old age pensions, and yet they accept no benefits from any such plan. As an aside I would point out that it is a matter of record that these people have repeatedly offered to pay the equivalent of insurance premiums into any worthy charity. Therefore if one wishes to argue on the basis of economics, certainly the public treasury comes out far ahead of the Old Order of Mennonites and the Amish.

In this connection may I emphasize one very important point. Contributions by way of taxation do not place the same burden upon the consciences of these people. They contribute substantially, and indeed willingly, although they accept no benefits. However, a contribution by way of an insurance premium, such as under the Canada Pension Plan, is a philosophical burden. It violates their principle of mutual aid. It means that they are being compelled to support a government welfare program as against a church centred program, which naturally arouses a fear that over a period of time the loyalties of their people could be diverted away from the church toward a dependence on government. I believe it behooves us to respect this principle of mutual aid where, for example, buildings destroyed by fire are replaced by willing neighbours, and where plowing, seeding and harvesting of crops are performed for those who are the victims of illness or accident.

Therefore I support this bill, but in doing so I remind the minister that this legislation was promised two years ago by the then minister of national health and welfare and the then minister of national revenue. The timing of this legislation is a pretty good indication of what we have come to expect from those who choose to govern by press release. I confess that I doubt that we would even have this legislation now had it not been for the minority position of the government resulting from the election last October. Nor do I suggest that the government or the minister should take any pride in the fact that Canada Pension Plan premiums were collected from the Old Order of Mennonites and the Amish by way of garnishee of milk, cream and grain cheques.

As pointed out earlier in this debate by the hon. member for Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo (Mr. Beatty), we in this House often find ourselves in the uncomfortable position of sitting in judgment to some degree on our fellow countrymen. We have judged that those who contribute to government welfare schemes and collect benefits in return are good citizens. Who among us is to say that those for whom I speak today, who contribute equally but take nothing in return, are not good Canadians?

In closing may I quote briefly from an editorial which appeared in the June 14, 1973, edition of Mount Forest Confederate:

So determined was the government to tell Canadians how they should save for their old age that they deducted premiums from Mennonite farmers' cream cheques. Henceforward the Mennonites will be permitted to provide for their sunset years by personal frugality and the raising of devoted families—as they have been doing quite successfully for the past 300 years. In fact it would be just about ideal if the government could find a workable law which would make all the rest of us do the same thing.

Mr. Speaker: If the minister speaks now he will close the debate.

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I wish to take only a few minutes to put on the record certain comments concerning the scope of the bill and of the various clauses contained therein. I have listened with great interest to the points of view expressed by hon. members on both sides of the House. I note that the debate concentrated mainly on the clause that has raised most questions, and on which we heard two speeches this afternoon. But, Mr. Speaker, the bill has other provisions in it, and I thought it might save time in the standing committee if I took a few minutes to say a few words about the bill in general.

With the introduction of the Canada and Quebec Pension Plans in 1965, a program was begun whereby people could and would make financial provision for their retirement, and at, the same time, protect themselves and their dependents or survivors in the event of severe disability or death. Aside from this primary goal, the plans have, during the first years of operation, provided provinces with a significant source of capital at very favourable interest rates.

As hon. members know, this is achieved by loans to the provinces of the amount by which the operating balance in the fund exceeds the amount required to be paid in benefits and for administration. As of March 31, 1973, for example, the total amount of investment in all provincial securities, other than Quebec, was $5,589.6 million, bearing an average interest rate of 6.9 per cent, or roughly $5½ billion in provincial securities.

The benefits provided by the Canada Pension Plan for contributors and their dependents include a retirement pension, a widow's pension, a disability pension, a death benefit, and a benefit for the children of deceased or disabled contributors. Because the plan, as designed, has a ten-year maturation period for retirement pensions, the maximum retirement pension will be payable in 1976 when, under current provisions, it will be approximately $122 a month.

The Quebec Pension Plan was designed with the same benefits payable, the same maturation period and the same qualifying periods. However, the Quebec plan was substantially changed with effect from January 1, 1973, so that the maximum monthly retirement pension in 1976 will be $133.

In 1970 the government felt that action should be taken to amend the Canada Pension Plan to have the benefits more accurately reflect the economy in which the plan was operating. Accordingly, in that year the white paper on income security for Canadians was published with several proposals for improvement in the plan including a suggested increase in the maximum pensionable earnings for contribution and benefit purposes for 1973, 1974 and 1975, the last three years of the maturation period. All the proposals were discussed with the provinces who indicated at that time that firm decisions on specific items should await an appreciation of the whole direction of national social security programs.

● (1530)

[Translation]

The working paper on social security in Canada released in April 1973 was the starting point for the joint federal-provincial revision of the whole social security system. It was followed late in the same month by a meeting of federal and provincial ministers of social welfare. At and following that meeting my counterparts from the provinces studied the proposed changes. It was agreed not only that a general agreement was going to be reached on some of the major issues but also that immediate steps were necessary.

Before year's end I hope to introduce in this House the legislation to enact those major amendments while at the same time ensuring compatibility with the Quebec Pension Plan.

[Mr. Lalonde.]

However, there are a number of technical amendments which should be made in the meantime and can be brought about without the assent of the provinces. It is for that reason that before the July adjournment we introduced Bill C-190 which is being considered today on second reading.

First, the government proposes a technical amendment to exclude from the plan the Hutterites and Mennonites as well as others similar groups because of the fact that their participation in the plan is incompatible with their religious beliefs. This is a measure to which we publicly committed ourselves in December 1971.

Furthermore, certain amendments to the Income Tax Act have made certain changes to the Canada Pension Plan necessary; those changes will ensure that the interest payable or refundable on overpayments or contribution deficits to the plan correspond to similar amounts paid under the new Income Tax Act.

Moreover, the transfer of the U.S. base at Goose Bay, Labrador, called for a third amendment aimed especially at ensuring retroactive protection under the Canada Pension Plan for Canadians who were employed by the government of the United States at that base and who were excluded from the plan under the present agreement.

[English]

In this connection, Mr. Speaker, I should like to commend the hon. member for Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador (Mr. Rompkey) for his conscientious efforts to see such an amendment brought forward for the benefit of the civilian population on the base. His interest and support in our negotiations are warmly appreciated.

[Translation]

Another amendment is related to the appeal procedure and would permit the administration to pay reasonable fees to the lawyer at the second stage of the procedure when the administration brings the case before the Pension Appeals Board—third and last stage of the appeal procedure.

The last technical amendment gives the Auditor General the explicit right to audit the Canada Pension Plan Account. Until now he was doing it under the powers implicitly attributed to him by the Financial Administration Act.

[English]

Taking these points in order, Mr. Speaker, I would like to amplify them briefly for hon. members and explain why these amendments are necessary.

The first proposed amendment concerning the Hutterite and Mennonite communities is intended to honour a commitment made by my predecessor and the then minister of national revenue, as I said, in December, 1971. At that time they indicated that an amendment would be introduced exempting certain religious groups from converage and any contribution to the plan. This commitment was the result of representations made to the government by the Old Order Amish, Mennonite and Hutterian sects.

The government believed then, as it does now, that the Canada Pension Plan, in its present form, places an unintended penalty on these groups for the practice of their own particular religions. This amendment is designed to correct the situation. The communal nature of the Hutterian colonies was recognized in 1969 when it was agreed that members of the colonies were to be considered as partners in the business of farming for the purpose of the Income Tax Act. The colony members live according to the tenets and teachings of their religion in small, self-contained communities in various parts of Canada. According to their beliefs, members of the colony should not acquire interests or rights to property of any kind, and they feel that the Canada Pension Plan gives contributors such rights. Although eschewing Canada Pension Plan benefits, Hutterian colonies make their own provisions for dependent members when they are no longer capable of physically contributing to the welfare of the community as a whole. This provision is such that dependent members are maintained for the rest of their lives in the manner to which they are accustomed, at the expense of the whole community.

The Old Order Amish Mennonite sects hold similar beliefs and although members do not live in colonies, they have consistently stated that their religious convictions are such that they may not, in good conscience, accept benefits under the Canada Pension Plan. The United States government recognized their special status in 1966 and amended their social security legislation to exempt them from coverage.

Despite the fact that the members of these religious groups mentioned are prevented by conscience from accepting any benefits, they are required by law to contribute to the Canada Pension Plan, and the Department of National Revenue is required by law to collect those contributions. Under the legislation now in force, liabilities for 1972 contributions have been generated in the accounts of self-employed members of the sects and many returns have been automatically set aside for collection. In effect, the government had no choice but to apply the law as it stands now.

During the last session, there appeared to be a consensus in the House that this amendment should be given priority in order to allow these religious groups the freedom to practise their religion without any question of law-breaking. I think most hon. members will agree that the amendment is still necessary today, and even more urgent.

I understand the reservations and the serious questions raised by some members who feel that this amendment should not be put forward. The government has had to answer in its own mind questions that have been raised on this subject, dealing on the one hand with questions of freedom of religion and the respect that we have in this country for fundamental freedom and, on the other hand, the necessity of ensuring equal treatment so that all citizens of this country, as much as possible, are put in the same situation under the law. As one hon. member said last Friday, the government has felt that if we were to err we would rather err in the direction of supporting and maintaining basic freedoms rather than supporting the general principle of universality in the application of certain types of laws.

Under the terms proposed, therefore, a member of a religious sect prescribed by the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Stanbury), may elect to be relieved of the obligation of making self-employed contributions to the plan. If the election is filed within six months of the date the new section comes into effect, the election is effective from January 1, 1972. An election filed at any later date takes effect on January 1 of the year in which it is filed—a retroactive date in both cases.

An election can, in the prescribed manner, be revoked with effect from January 1 of the year following the date the Minister of National Revenue receives the revocation. A person may revoke his election whenever he wishes, and for whatever reason, though once he has made a revocation, he can never again elect not to make self-employed contributions. In addition, the new law guarantees a refund of any contributions paid with respect to a period to which an election relates, though not preceding January 1, 1972, because of the effective date of the amendment. Pre-1972 contributions will eventually generate a retirement pension, or disability and/or survivor benefits, if the persons involved wish to accept them.

The second proposed amendment, dealt with in Clauses 2, 3 and 4, is more administrative in nature than the first. Before tax reform, the rate of interest payable in monies owed to the Department of National Revenue, and by the department, were specified in the Income Tax Act. For reasons of flexibility this was changed in the revised act, to the effect that the rate of interest would be decided by governor in council. The provision for interest payable in the Canada Pension Plan, however, was not changed, and thus the purpose of the present amendments is to give the plan the same degree of flexibility that is now part of the Income Tax Act. The rates of interest will, in all cases, be the same as those prescribed by governor in council under the provisions of the Income Tax Act.

Clause 5 of the present bill deals with international agreements. As hon. members will know, the United States Air Force, at its base in Goose Bay, Labrador, employed a number of local Canadian civilians on the base. These people were employees of the United States government and, as such, many of them were covered by either the U.S. Civil Service Retirement System or a private pension plan financed by the government of the United States. In 1967, an agreement was signed between Canada and the U.S.A. whereby the employment in Canada of locally engaged civilians by the government of the United States was included in pensionable employment for the purposes of the Canada Pension Plan. At the request of the United States, however, a clause was added to the agreement stating that the government of the United States was not required to contribute to the plan on behalf of those employees covered under the above U.S. pension plans, but would contribute on behalf of those not included in the U.S. plans.

As hon. members know, the United States Air Force has now relinquished its lease on the base, which reverted to the Ministry of Transport as of July 1 of this year. Negotiations leading to the transfer of control and operations included discussions of the coverage of those employees included in U.S government pension plans, and, as a result, the government of the United States reversed its position and indicated willingness to cover these employees under the Canada Pension Plan from July 1, 1972 onwards.

Unfortunately, Article 9 of the Statutory Instruments Act (1971) states in effect that it is not possible to make a regulation retroactive if the act pursuant to which the regulation is made does not provide for such retroactivity. The Canada Pension Plan does not, and so an amendment is necessary to give effect to the back-dating of coverage.

This problem may well arise again in the future. Any international negotiation is lengthy and detailed, which invariably means that the effective date of the agreement is prior to the actual signing, and consequently the general power provided in the amending clause will also sanction this combination of circumstances in the future.

[Translation]

As regards clause 6 of the bill, this technical amendment relates to the appeal procedure. In certain cases the decision rendered by the review committee—second stage of the procedure—is favourable to the claimant but the administration cannot approve it because this is found contrary to the law and jurisprudence established by previous decisions. Therefore, those cases can be brought before the Pension Appeals Board made up of judges which is the third and last stage of the appeal procedure. As a rule and until now the board has confirmed the decisions rendered by the administration.

However, it is admitted that within this process some respondents may be disadvantaged, mainly because of a lack of resources since at those hearings the Crown is represented by a lawyer from the Department of Justice whereas quite often the claimant cannot afford a lawyer and pay for the fees. It is therefore proposed to make a technical amendment which would permit the administration to pay reasonable fees to the lawyer chosen by the claimant to represent him. In effect, under the current law, the claimant is unfortunately not entitled to such compensation.

[English]

In this respect, I should like to thank hon. members on both sides of the House who, on numerous occasions, have drawn this point to my attention. Their representations mainly concerned the fact that the Canada Pension Plan authorities had appealed decisions, which had been rendered at the second level of appeal, and which were so to speak, in favour of certain citizens. Unfortunately, as I say, the administration had no choice except to appeal some of those decisions, because they did not appear to be consistent either with the act or with the established decisions in this area. It was not always found possible to go along with the decisions made at this second level of appeal as some of those decisions were contrary to the provision of the Canada Pension Plan itself. I think that the present approach at least will permit any citizen of this country to avail himself of the appeal process under the Canada Pension Plan. No longer will he find himself unable to go before the highest appeal tribunal because he himself has not enough resources to pay for the services of counsel.

[Translation]

Finally, clause 7 is related to the Auditor General's authority. During a meeting of the Committee on Public Accounts, the Auditor General's office requested that the Canada Pension Plan include a specific provision calling for an audit of accounts by this office; in this connection, they pointed out the recent amendment to the Unemployment Insurance Act. Therefore, the last clause is the counterpart of the provision already included in the unemployment Insurance Act.

Mr. Speaker, what I have just said shows that the amendments I have outlined—some of which rest on humanitarian grounds, others on administrative grounds—will contribute to provide for a Canada Pension Plan that will work better and that will meet Canadians' needs. Of course, more important amendments are being discussed with provinces and, as I said earlier, we hope to be able to introduce soon a bill in this connection. In the meantime, we must concentrate our attention on the technical amendments that were proposed today. I hope that when these amendments are considered in committee, we will have the opportunity of debating in depth other problems that were raised, particularly about the possible exemption of specific religious groups.

[English]

Once more, in conclusion, I wish to think hon. members for their contributions in this debate and their thoughtful remarks both for and against certain amendments. I am convinced that discussion in committee will clarify certain points. I am sorry that certain members on the opposite side feel that they cannot support this particular amendment. I am happy to see that, at least, the official spokesmen of all parties are supporting this particular amendment and this particular bill. I hope it will receive quick and early approval by this House.

Mr. Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Will the minister permit a question?

Mr. Lalonde: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): First, I apologize to the minister for re-opening this subject after he has concluded his remarks. I have one short question. It arises from the concern expressed to me by a number of members of the Mennonite community about some of the pressure on those who followed the tenets of their religion and did not make contributions to the Canada Pension Plan for the taxation year 1971. They have asked that the government give consideration to the possibility of, not refunding the money of those who paid in for 1971, but simply excusing the money owed by those who did not pay in 1971. I want to ask the minister whether this would be acceptable and whether further legislation will be brought in along this line. In other words, if it is just and humane to recognize the religious freedom of minority groups after January 1, 1972, why is it not just and humane to recognize it before that date?

Mr. Lalonde: I thank the hon. member for his question. He asks why January 1, 1972. It is because we have to set some date at some stage. With regard to the possibility of the amendment which the hon. member has raised, I would like to discuss this with my colleague, the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Stanbury), who is responsible for collecting the contributions. When this matter is discussed in the standing committee, I will be in a position to answer in more detail the point raised by the hon. member.

Mr. Leblanc (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, on clause 7, the minister said that the Auditor General has been designated now in the same way as provided in the Unemployment Insurance Act. Could the minister inform us who was previously responsible for auditing the Canada Pension Plan Account?

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, I understand that until now the Auditor General audited the statements of the Canada Pension Plan, even though there is no specific provision in the law providing such an audit by the Auditor General and he had raised the matter in his report to the Standing Committee of PUblic Accounts. Indeed, after that request by the Auditor General, we included in the bill a provision providing that in any case he would have the responsibility for that audit even though the practice followed until now has been consistent with the content of the bill.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Horner (Crowfoot): On division.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs.

RESIDENTIAL MORTGAGE FINANCING BILL

ESTABLISHMENT OF CORPORATION, RECOGNITION OF SPECIALIZED MORTGAGE INVESTMENT COMPANIES UNDER LOAN COMPANIES ACT AND TAX TREATMENT

The House resumed, from Tuesday, June 12, consideration of the motion of Mr. Basford that Bill C-135, to provide additional financial mechanisms and institutions for the residential mortgage market in Canada, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs.

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Peel South): Mr. Speaker, this bill was last before the House on June 12. Referring to the attitude of the party to my left concerning this important piece of legislation, I was saying how clear it is that that party has no ability to understand the mechanics of mortgage financing. Since this bill was last before us, that party had a convention in Vancouver at which time they suddenly decided that no one should pay more than 6 per cent interest on his mortgage. They were going to reduce the interest rate on everyone's mortgage to 6 per cent. I was very intrigued by that; I thought it was lovely. But, I wondered why they did not decide to reduce it to 4 per cent, 2 per cent or zero. Unfortunately, there are financial facts of life. This bill attempts to deal with some of them.

While I am not particularly pleased with some of the drafting of the bill and some of the details, especially in connection with the corporation which I understand will have in the neighbourhood of 10 directors, I am pleased the minister has finally decided to recognize some financial facts of life and make mortgage money more mobile. By making it more mobile, it will be more available and more competitive, thus reducing the cost of mortgage money.

Since this bill was last before the House, interest rates have risen from 8¾ per cent to 10, 11 and 12 per cent on first mortgage financing. Before coming to this House, I had a great deal to do with the mortgage business. I am shocked when I find that leading trust companies in this nation are refusing to lend money at 10½ per cent, 10¾ per cent and more. Part of the problem is that this government has not seen fit to ensure that interest rates in this country are governed by this country and not by international demand. We in this party have spoken on this subject on a number of occasions. Be that as it may, this bill does not have anything to do with the level of interest rates. The objective of the bill is to ensure that mortgage money is available in the market place.

I am particularly pleased with the suggestion in the bill that approved mortgage investment corporations will be able to pass the income received from their portfolio directly to their shareholders, either as an interest taxable dividend or as a capital gains dividend. This whole concept of "pass through" is essential in the mortgage industry. The present corporate law discriminates and makes difficult the acquisition and collection of funds behind the screen of limited companies because corporations must first pay the corporate tax rate of 50 per cent and, when they make their distribution to their investors, the investors must pay further income tax. The effect of the "pass through" provision in this bill means that an investor will only pay one tax, not two. There will not be a corporate tax plus a further tax on distribution, but one tax payable by the investor on the distribution to him if the distribution is made within 90 days from the year end of the corporation. If, on the other hand, the company elects to make the distribution at a later time, there will be corporate tax, but the dividend will be treated as a capital gains dividend and subject to taxation on the basis of a capital gain rather than on the basis of a regular dividend.

● (1600)

It is imperative in this country that institutions be established to collect small pots of money, and put these small pots of money together in order that the mortgage industry can carry on with projects, making advances and loans. One of the consistent problems has been that an individual going into the business has been subject to rather heavy corporate and personal tax, with the end result that many who would otherwise have gone into the mortgage field have directed their money toward other forms of speculation, and I refer particularly to land speculation. It is imperative that money be collected in order that it can be lent to people who want to build homes. As I said earlier on June 12, as a young man I used to travel to the Capreol-Sudbury area where, as in many other areas in Canada, there was no facility for the ordinary guy to get a loan to build a home, so he had to go to the finance companies.

What this parliament is doing is creating the mechanism whereby savings can be accumulated and not subject to a horrendous tax, but subject only to the regular income tax, as should be the case. This money can be collected by a corporate entity and lent on the market at a realistic rate. It is competition that determines the rate of interest, except under circumstances where this government creates artificial interest rates in order to take care of international problems. Really within Canada it is competition that determines the rate, and one of the advantages of this bill is that it increases competition possibilities in the mortgage field.

This bill also makes it possible, without the horrible burden of corporate tax, for investors to pool their resources, each paying personal income tax on the profits, but without being stuck for both corporate tax and personal tax. It makes it possible for them to pay corporate tax but to avoid being almost raped when they pay a regular dividend, or pay a capital gains type dividend, and thus are induced to go into the field.

I commend the minister for bringing this bill forward. As I said, I am not pleased with some of the drafting, as I am not pleased with the obtuse way in which draftmanship is sometimes carried out in this country. This matter has been referred to earlier in the session by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), and I do not intend at this time to offer less obtuse drafting, but surely somewhere along the line it should be the obligation of those who draft statutes for us and for the public to read, to draft them in such a way that they need not be read 10 or 12 times before determining what they mean.

The principle and the concept of the bill are good and I cannot for the life of me understand why those in the party to my left object to it. Surely, their only objection could be that somebody is going to go into the business of lending people money. If they have any intention of trying to drive down mortgage rates, surely they should stand up and be counted as saying: Yes, let's get on with it and do something for the ordinary people of Canada. Members of that party do not understand what they are doing, so they simply say that because this is a business statute they cannot possibly support it, therefore they speak on and on against it. Would it not be terrible if the management of this country were entrusted to people with such a lack of sense and a lack of financial intuitiveness.

I commend the minister for introducing this bill. I hope it passes in a hurry, moves on to the committee where the drafting can be cleaned up a bit and we can pass it into law.

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, hon. members of the NDP will not support the provisions of Bill C-135. I am sure the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Basford) finds it very awkward to be in the same bed with the hon. member for Peel South (Mr. Blenkarn).

An hon. Member: It is a king size bed.

Mr. Gilbert: After all the progressive ideas the minister has spouted from time to time he now finds himself in the same bed with that hon. member for Peel South, and I am sure he must find it uncomfortable.

The bill does nothing to help the average Canadian purchase a home at a reasonable cost.

Mr. Blenkarn: Except to reduce the interest rate.

Mr. Gilbert: On the contrary, it imposes a financial hardship which is both cruel and unconscienable. The bill sets forth the philosophy of the Liberal and Conservative parties, that they regard housing as a commodity for profit, the amount of which is to be determined by the free play of market forces, with no regard to reducing the cost of mortgage financing for housing. In other words, it puts profit before people.

We in the NDP reiterate our philosophy that all Canadians are entitled to clean, warm shelter at a reasonable cost as a matter of basic human right. The philosophy of the Liberal and Conservative parties is to make this bill attractive in order to enhance mortgage investment. We in the NDP accept our responsibility to provide adequate housing at reasonable cost.

The two main items or factors in respect of the high cost of housing today are the high cost of land and the high cost of mortgage money. I am sure there will be no quarrel, even from the hon. member for Peel South, in respect of that analysis. When we look at the high cost of land we find that the government has introduced Bill C-133 in an attempt to find a solution to this problem. It has set aside $100 million each year for the next five years for the purchase of land to set up a land bank. Just a short while after the passage of that bill, the minister stated that the provinces and municipalities were not taking advantage of the provisions of that bill. This is very disappointing, and I guess it behooves the minister and members of this House to persuade the provinces and municipalities to take advantage of those provisions.

The hon. member for Peel South pointed out that mortgage interest rates have increased in the last while from 8¾ per cent to 10 per cent, 10½ per cent and 11 per cent. One wonders just where it will stop, but I guess there is no limit to the greed and avarice of investors in this country.

Who will gain as a result of the passage of the provisions of Bill C-135? Will it be the average Canadian worker who wants to buy a home?

Some hon. Members: Absolutely.

Mr. Gilbert: Will it be the average Canadian who wants to marry and establish a home who will gain by these provisions? I suggest that is not the case. With the interest rates we will have, we will be making it impossible for the average person to buy a home. The minister set forth the situation in his statement of February 1, 1973 when he said:

> The effectiveness of the new financial mechanisms in generating new sources of residential mortgage funds will obviously depend on the degree to which private investors respond to them. During the development of these provisions, therefore, consultations were held with the financial community to ensure that the mechanisms were fully appropriate and would be effective in meeting their designed purpose. In addition, the research group that worked on the proposals included a number of experts from the financial community.

It is obvious to whom they went for advice. Did they go to the average working person and ask, what is the best way of setting up mortgage financing so houses can be bought at reasonable cost? No. They went to investors and to the financial community and asked what they could do to assist in making mortgage financing more attractive to them. This bill incorporates all of the ideas passed on to them by the financial community.

On Thursday of last week and on Monday of this week we had a debate on inflation and the high cost of living. The three main factors in that area have been the high cost of food, the high cost of clothing and the high cost of housing. Housing has ranked number one. Housing has been the foremost item in the cost of living and inflation. Is it any wonder that one hesitates to review the sad history of the Liberal government with regard to housing? Since 1965 when I came here, the whole philosophy of this government has been to treat housing as an economic valve, turning the tap on and then turning it off in accordance with the economic conditions of the day. As a result, we have had an increase in housing starts, then a shortfall, then an increase, then another shortfall, and the net result has been a shortage of housing at reasonable cost for the average Canadian.

May I remind the House of the lengths to which the Liberal government went in order to lift the rate of interest charged by banks? I remember the arguments of the then minister of finance, who said that if the 6 per cent ceiling were lifted money would flow into the market and there would be competition. As a result the rates would be as low, if not lower. What we have seen is mortgage interest rates rise from 6 per cent to 10 or 11 per cent. I would remind the House also that when the rate was at 6 per cent the banks refused to accept their social responsibility for housing and to put any money into housing. In the result the government was forced to take off the 6 per cent ceiling. The same government has also changed the maturity terms of NHA mortgages. At one time a person had the assurance that his mortgage would run for 20 or 25 years. Then, the financial boys persuaded the government to change the maturity term to five years. In sophisticated financial parlance, this was called the roll-over theory.

They then yielded to pressure to change the formula for setting rates for NHA mortgages through CMHC when related to the yield on bonds. I remember the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Hellyer) telling me in committee that when that formula was lifted he foresaw a flow of money into the market and a downtrend in interest rates. How wrong he was, and how irresponsible was that statement. The Liberal government has placed total reliance on private builders and investors, and has fallen far short of its own responsibility for housing.

Another sad commentary about the Liberal government concerns the tax concessions the government has given to land developers across this country. In my speech on Bill C-133, I indicated how land developing companies, not only in Toronto, Winnipeg and Vancouver but right across the country, had gained control of land in the major cores and were selling it at unconscionable prices. The government assists them in this by giving them special tax concessions related to the application of interest rates related to their land purchases and fast write-offs. Is it any wonder that the people of Canada have lost confidence in this government's attempts to solve the housing crisis? Having seen what has been done, mortgage investors are asking for even more. That is their philosophy. Though we are experiencing the highest cost of housing in Canada, the highest mortgage interest rates and the highest cost of land, they want even more money. Their demand is for more and the government has yielded to them.

We have five major criticisms of this bill. The first is that Bill C-135 provides for the supply and control of mortgage funds for residential housing to be determined by the free play of market forces. The Federal Mortgage Exchange Corporation will not attempt direct mortgage market intervention with the aim of stabilizing either the price or the supply of mortgage funds. Those are the words the minister used in his speech. This means we will have more of the same—higher interest rates and increased housing costs. The minister sits silently by and says the government will not interfere with the free play of market forces.

We in the New Democratic Party say that the federal government must assume responsibility for a strong and adequate supply of mortgage funds. It must determine with the provinces our housing requirements, set annual targets and obtain firm commitments from financial institutions to meet those housing needs. It is only when we take that approach that we will see a downtrend in the cost of housing and mortgage interest rates.

Second, Bill C-135 aims to enhance the attractiveness of mortgage investment on the part of financial institutions and pension funds. The purpose of the bill should be to reduce to the minimum the cost of mortgage financing for housing purposes. The tax advantage given to shareholders participating in mortgage investment corporations, together with the determination to enhance the attractiveness of mortgages, will tend to enrich the shareholders at the expense of home buyers.

I could not help but smile at the tears that were shed by the hon. member for Peel South when he referred to the rape taking place of the investors of this country. Is he not concerned for the people who are buying homes? Is his interest directed to the mortgage investor rather than to those people in Canada who want to buy homes? The theme he sang to the minister of state in charge of housing was that something must be done for the poor mortgage investors because they were being raped. He has his parties mixed. The person who is raping is the mortgage investor; the person who is being raped is the one who is buying the house or hoping to buy it. But I imagine that his statement fits within the philosophy of both the Liberal party and the Conservative party in this respect.

The third reason we criticize this bill is that the setting up of the mortgage investment companies under Bill C-135 will not ensure that adequate mortgage funds will be made available both for new and existing dwellings in rural areas. One does not have to come from the Maritimes to be aware of the shortage of funds for housing that prevails in the Maritimes and Newfoundland. In this bill, the setting up of the companies does nothing to ensure that an adequate supply of the moneys that are collected will be applied to rural housing. The hon. member for Peel South shed tears for people in northern Ontario, and spoke about the problems which they had in obtaining mortgage money for the purchase of a house. I agree with him and I might add that this situation applies not only to people in northern Ontario but also to people in Quebec and the Maritimes. The way to solve that problem is by making sure that the mortgage investment companies provide an adequate amount of money for new and existing dwellings in rural areas. Falling short of that, this bill is totally hopeless.

The fourth reason we oppose the bill is the fact that the mortgage investment companies would not meet the housing needs in areas of regional disparity. Again, it is areas such as Quebec, the Maritimes, Newfoundland and parts of Ontario which need those moneys. There is no assurance that those moneys will flow to these areas. The government must ensure an adequate regional distribution of mortgage funds within the over-all national allotment. If we are to permit the mortgage investment companies to distribute funds on a national basis, they will do it in the areas where the investment is most attractive. They will not touch areas, such as some of the rural areas in Quebec, the Maritimes and Ontario where people will be denied the mortgage moneys which should be allotted to them.

The fifth reason is that the mortgage investment companies will not help the special housing needs of Canada's Indian, Eskimo and Metis people. On the news this morning, I heard that a representative of the Indian people appeared yesterday before the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Basford) and made a special plea with regard to the housing needs of the Indian people across the country. He painted a very sad picture of some of the houses in which these people live. I am sure that the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Chrétien) could reiterate what the hon. member said yesterday concerning the living conditions of Indians across the country. But Bill C-135 does nothing to help these people. The minister might glibly say that help was given them under Bill C-133. The token moneys under the provisions set down in Bill C-133 do not begin to meet the special needs of the Indian, Eskimo and Métis people. To depend on mortgage investment companies to make any allotment of the moneys that they collect to these special groups is really doing them an injustice and a disservice. I hope that the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development will use his good offices to persuade the Minister of State for Urban Affairs to ensure the allotment of moneys by mortgage investment companies to these special groups.

The sixth criticism that we have is that the mortgage investment companies will do little or nothing to assist the middle or low income people who do not qualify under AHOP, which is the Assisted Home Ownership Program, or RRAP, which is the Residential Rehabilitation Assistance Program, to buy or to rehabilitate and repair these homes. We will have a group of people who do not qualify under Bill C-133 and who will not receive any of the benefits under Bill C-135. It seems to me to be a hardship and a cruel hoax to tell people that their mortgage financing will be improved when people in these special groups are not taken care of.

The eighth criticism is that the mortgate investment companies will be authorized to make residential and non-residential estate debt in equity investments. What does that mean? It means that not only must they invest in homes but they can invest in non-residential real estate, in other words in office buildings. One does not have to be an expert in the mortgage investment field to know that they will participate to a large extent in investment in the new office buildings that have been erected and the reason is the attractiveness of the high return on investment in office buildings, far higher than on houses. If there is one reason that this bill should be thrown aside it is this particular provision permitting these companies to invest in non-residential real estate.

I was rather proud and pleased when the hon. member for Peel South said that the NDP had a convention in Vancouver a short while ago and at that convention we set forth our philosophy and our objectives. We said that every Canadian is entitled to clean, warm shelter at a reasonable cost as a basic human right. We say that the financial institutions of this country have a social responsibility when they collect funds from Canadians to see that those Canadians are properly housed. Therefore, we would impose upon the financial institutions across the country an allocation of the moneys that they receive to cover the national housing commitments in this country, and the commitments can best be devised and set forth by the different provinces and municipalities and then conveyed to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs.

We did say that interest rates on mortgages across Canada should be 6 per cent. The hon. member for Peel South said that perhaps we should have said that they should be 4 per cent or 2 per cent. If members of the Conservative party and the Liberal party would agree to changing the interest rates on mortgages in Canada and setting them at 4 per cent or at 2 per cent, they will get the full support of the NDP. When we talk about 6 per cent, even we in the NDP feel uneasy about that interest rate. When I started in the practice of law about 20 years ago I can recall interest rates being at 4 per cent and 5 per cent. There has been a gradual acceleration until now when interest rates are probably the highest that are paid throughout the western world. It is not something of which we Canadians should be proud.

When I heard the hon. member for Peel South saying that mortgage investments must be mobile and more flexible so that they may become more competitive, he reminded me of the arguments I heard in the past, from Liberals and Conservatives, when changes were made. All this does is increase the competition among the financial institutions. It does nothing to reduce the cost of mortgage financing. Surely, that should be the aim and the desire of all Canadians.

We should be demonstrating our concern with respect to housing. There should not be greed and avarice with regard to mortgage investments. I hope that the consciences of all members and all Canadians have been struck by what I have said that housing should be on an equal basis with education and health care. To deprive a Canadian of the basic necessity of housing is to deprive him of a main element in life. I hope that the minister in charge of housing will rethink this bill and introduce legislation which will reflect federal responsibility in the field of housing. I hope he will direct that the moneys of Canadians will be used, at the lowest possible interest rate, to meet our housing needs.

Mr. Basford: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, may I record that I believe there has been some discussion through the usual channels to the effect that if by chance, and only if, I had the opportunity of closing the debate this evening the taking of the vote would be deferred until the first order of business immediately after orders of the day tomorrow. I repeat that I believe that is the understanding through the usual channels, and I emphasize that it is only if I were to obtain the opportunity to close the debate tonight.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it agreed that if there is to be a recorded division that it would take place immediately after orders of the day are called tomorrow?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, when listening to the speeches of the two members who spoke before me, we realize that the government is really in good hands. At one time, the members of the New Democratic Party submit to the minority government orders, at another time it is the Progressive Conservatives when they see that the New Democrats cannot do it. In any event, we can see that the situation has changed and this is probably conforting for the party in power.

When studying the explanatory notes of Bill C-135 we find that the main provision of this bill is intended to raise funds in sufficient quantities to grant mortgage loans to build family dwellings.

It would seem that what has been lacking in recent years is not so much the funds for new housing as the solvency of borrowers. We realize that the cost of both housing and living has been continuously increasing for several years. The price of materials has been rising steadily and we have reached a point where in most cases only a few wage earners can afford to borrow the necessary cash to build or buy a comfortable house, a house that meets the needs of their families. As a matter of fact, being unable to find a decent home we must limit the size of the family in order to house it in the small houses we have to build nowadays.

The main purpose of this bill is to gather the funds existing in private portfolios here and there in order to obtain a sufficient amount so that borrowers can be provided with the money they need.

At the present time, I am under the impression, unless there has recently been a change, that the funds offered by chartered banks, insurance companies or other lenders are not lacking. There seems to be enough, especially since the chartered banks are now interested in mortgage loans. We have come back to this system, especially since the amendment to the Bank Act was passed in 1966. At that time, I remember very well that our leader, the hon. member for Témiscamingue (Mr. Caouette), kept saying that this amendment would allow chartered banks to lend approximately $4 billion more without having a penny more in their reserves; that was a nice gift for the chartered banks.

The report for 1967 revealed that the chartered banks then got interested in mortgage loans, and that in 1967 alone, they lent $1.023 billion for the construction of houses. In short it was part of the new credit which the government at the time, under the new Bank Act, had allowed them to create and which they had made available to borrowers at the prevailing rate.

Since then, it has been realized that when the borrower could prove his solvency, it was not too difficult for him to obtain the necessary mortgage to build a house. However, what is still more important is that Bill C-133, which was implemented a few weeks ago, while enabling low wage earners to obtain loans, does not perhaps allow them to become really the owners of their house, but they are at least in the process of becoming so.

It is often said that one's automobile belongs to the finance company. Now in many cases, we live in a house standing in our name but which also belongs to a lending company. And when one undertakes to reimburse a mortage over a period of 25, 30 or 35 years, it means a whole working life. As it is difficult to get a mortage loan before the age of 25, it will be retirement age when the mortage is reimbursed.

During a whole working life, it is difficult not to have bad luck at one moment or another, owing to either work stoppage or illness. Then it becomes rather difficult and annoying for the head of a family to be forced, during a whole working life, to reimburse the price of three or four houses to own only one. Thus, it would be important to find a means of reducing the interest rate.

I was listening a few moments ago to a discussion between the hon. member for Peel South (Mr. Blenkarn) and the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Gilbert). One of them proposed an interest rate not over 6 per cent, whereas the other mentioned he should have proposed a much lower rate. As far as I am concerned, I can assert that the Social Credit, of which I have been a member for a long time, recommends the establishment of a rather low interest rate in order to enable the borrower to become owner of his house in a reasonable period of time, without having to pay for two or three houses to chartered banks or insurance companies. If we really stop to think out this housing problem, Mr. Speaker, we will find a solution.

There is another issue which surfaces once in a while. I should like to take this opportunity to mention it to Parliament and to the government: it is the 11 per cent federal sales tax on building materials and the 8 per cent provincial tax, in the province of Quebec, which is added on to the federal tax. This means that in Quebec, there is a tax on federal taxes. For instance, in the province of Quebec, the two levels of government collect between 21 and 22 per cent in taxes on all building materials. This is really too much, Mr. Speaker, and it is very costly, in taxes alone, to become a homeowner.

I am going to give an example. In 1965—this is an example that I do not make light of—I bought 1,000 feet of lumber—1,000 feet of board—that were then sold $80 for 1,000 feet. Add to that the 11 per cent federal sales tax and you pay $8.80 more, plus the 8 per cent provincial sale tax, that is $7.10, which comes to a total of $15.90 in taxes for 1,000 feet of lumber in 1965.

Hardly two weeks ago, I bought some lumber from the same supplier. I paid $185 for 1,000 feet; this is a considerable increase. Yet, the federal tax on lumber and the provincial tax have not increased; they remained respectively at 11 and 8 per cent. But in adding, I found that in order to buy 1,000 feet of lumber, it is not $8.80 but $20.35 that I had to pay for the federal tax of 11 per cent. And the provincial tax amounted to $16.40, which means that instead of paying $15.90 for 1,000 feet of lumber bought in 1965, the cost is now $36.75. That is quite an increase in taxes: they have more than doubled in a few years only. The taxes our governments collect on housing are very costly and increase its cost considerably.

Once again I insist, on behalf of my party and Canadian families, in short, on behalf of all Canadian taxpayers, that the government completely abolish that 11 per cent tax which in fact is a hold-up, a highway robbery where Canadian families are concerned.

Borrowers who want to buy a house get a mortgage for 25, 30 or 35 years; they pay interest at 10 or 10½ per cent. In fact, they will be paying interest for 25, 30 or 35 years on the 11 or 8 per cent tax levied by our governments. This, Mr. Speaker, adds considerably to the housing cost increase.

Today, we know that low income families can benefit from certain advantages, under certain conditions; we also know that when we buy of house of let us say 1,200 square feet for $14,000 or $15,000, we do not get the same quality as we would get for a house of the same dimensions but costing $24,000 or $25,000. That stands to reason. However, because of his limited ability to pay, a man in the low income bracket must be satisfied with a cheap and not so comfortable house.

A while ago, I was listening to my New Democratic Party colleague's violent attack against profit-seeking lenders whom this bill aims at exempting from income tax payment.

At a given moment, it crossed my mind that, carrying out his philosophy and that of his party to its bitter end, he would suggest setting up a house building corporation to prevent contractors building dwellings within cities and elsewhere from making profits. I suppose that all contractors in the small northern towns of Amos, La Sarre, Rouyn and Val-d'Or as well as those in Montreal, Toronto and Ottawa want indeed to make profits.

And I was surprised to hear the hon. member for Broadview urging the government to establish a Crown corporation to prevent construction companies from making profits.

So, Mr. Speaker, the idea of channeling private capital already available from various sources will, I think, though I am not sure, lead to competitive mortgages. Maybe we should hope for mortgages at a lower rate of interest than the one we have now.

[Mr. Laprise.]

[English]

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, members of the New Democratic Party will vote against this bill because we consider it to be simply a vehicle which endangers the system of trying to meet the housing needs of the people of Canada without making the fundamental changes necessary if we are to get control of the financial resources required to provide the housing that the people need.

Before going into the reasons for our opposition to this bill and what I think should be in the bill if it is to meet the needs of the people of Canada, I want to say a few words about the speech made a little while ago by the hon. member for Peel South (Mr. Blenkarn). In the last ten days we have had at least three days of discussion initiated by members of the official opposition to deal with the increased cost of living. We have heard repeatedly inside and outside the House simplistic calls by members of the official opposition for wage and price controls which, supposedly, would stop living costs from increasing rapidly. As my colleague, the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Gilbert) said a few moments ago, one of the most significant reasons for the increase in the cost of living has to do with the sharp increase in the cost of housing, either owned or rented by citizens of this country. So, to say the least, I was astounded by the tears shed by the hon. member for Peel South on behalf of the poor people who invest their money in the lending institutions of the country, institutions from which most people who want to buy a house must borrow or obtain a mortgage.

● (1650)

In case the hon. member for Peel South thinks I am exaggerating, let me tell him that the figures I am about to put on the record all come from the financial pages of that radical newspaper which appears in his area, the Globe and Mail. On September 15, a few days ago, the Globe and Mail carried an article summarizing what has happened to the profits of Canadian banks, which are a major source of money in the mortgage field. According to the article, the profits of the Royal Bank of Canada in 1972 rose over profits in 1971 by 13.9 per cent. I shall be referring to the third quarter of each year, Mr. Speaker. In 1973, the bank's profits rose over those of 1972 by 27.8 per cent. The profits of the Canadian Bank of Commerce in 1972 rose by 17.7 per cent over 1971 profits. In 1973, their profits over 1972 increased by 23.1 per cent. The profits of the Bank of Montreal in the third quarter of 1972 increased by 18.3 per cent over that bank's 1971 profits for the same period. In 1973, that bank's profits, over the same period in 1972, increased by 45.4 per cent. The average profit increase for all banks in Canada for the third quarter of 1973, over the third quarter in 1972, was 31.9 per cent.

The banks are not the only institutions from which people who want to buy houses borrow money. If one looks at the Globe and Mail for June 29, one will see an article which summarizes what has happened in the first quarter of 1973 as compared with the corresponding period in 1972. One will see that the profits of trust and loan companies increased by 14.2 per cent in that period. One will also see that the profits of real estate companies increased by a small amount, 125.8 per cent. And these are the people about whom the hon. member for Peel South is worried. I cannot worry about them. I worry about the people who have a need for and want to buy houses.

Mr. Blenkarn: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, although I do not mind being referred to in speeches, I hate to hear my remarks misrepresented. I did not come to the defence of the banks—I never did—in what I had to say this afternoon. The hon. member is clearly misrepresenting my remarks. This affects my privileges as a member of this House, and misrepresents to this House the position of my party. Further, those remarks have nothing to do with this bill. I think the matter must be corrected on the record. My party and I have no intention of protecting any companies, in the way the hon. member suggests. What we are trying to do is to make it easier for people to enter the mortgage business, and to cut interest rates.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That is a point of debate. The hon. member had an opportunity to express his views and another hon. member who has the floor has expressed his views. The hon. member for Peel South may feel that his views have been misrepresented, but he cannot correct them in the way he has tried, by way of a point of order. Standing Order 37 provides that when this matter comes before the House later, the hon. member may take the floor a second time to explain what he said and correct the record; but he cannot do that by way of point of order.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Speaker, I submit that the point raised by the hon. member for Peel South was not a point of order, as Your Honour said, and was a spurious point, to say the least. We are discussing Bill C-135, an act to provide additional financing mechanisms and institutions for the residential mortgage market in Canada. I suggest to the hon. member for Peel South that the lending institutions of this country which provide the bulk of money for residential mortgages are doing very well and do not need the kind of defence which the hon. member for Peel South has advanced on their behalf. It was precisely for that reason that I put on record the kinds of profits which they have been making. They made them legitimately; I do not suggest for a moment that what they did was illegal or improper. It is precisely because we think that the bill we are discussing will enable them to make larger profits that we oppose this bill. That is why I put on record the financial positions of these institutions. Let there be no misunderstanding as to who needs protecting from whom.

The problem of providing adequate housing for Canadians is not new and has been with us for many years. Other members of the New Democratic Party who have spoken in this debate have raised something which warrants repeating. It was when the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Hellyer), who now sits on the front benches of the Conservative Party, was the minister in charge of housing for the Liberal government in 1969 that parliament agreed to his suggestion to lift the 6 per cent limit on residential mortgages. May I call it five o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

Electoral Boundaries Readjustment

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Howie)—Highways—Proposed road from Maine through New Brunswick to Quebec—Investigation of feasibility; the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay)—Regional economic expansion—Nova Scotia—New initiatives in light of resignation of provincial Minister of Development; the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez)—Regional Economic Expansion—Date of tabling of program for Northern Ontario—Hiring of personnel for northern Ontario offices.

It being five o'clock p.m. the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, public bills, private bills and notices of motions.

Mr. Reid: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I think there would be agreement to considering order No. 159, Bill C-222, standing in the name of the hon. member for Peel South (Mr. Blenkarn). This bill seeks to change the name of the hon. member's constituency. I think there is agreement to put it through all stages today. When that is completed we would return to the private members' bill standing in the name of the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' PUBLIC BILLS

ELECTORAL BOUNDARIES READJUSTMENT ACT

CHANGE IN NAME OF CONSTITUENCY FROM PEEL SOUTH TO MISSISSAUGA

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Peel South) moved that Bill C-222, respecting the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

● (1700)

Mr. Bill Knight (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, there have been a number of occasions when members have introduced bills to change the names of their constituencies. For example, the hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge (Mr. Saltsman) had the name of his constituency changed from Waterloo to Waterloo-Cambridge. This will indicate that I do not make these remarks in a partisan way.

Having to move bills in private members' hour is a deplorable way of having to change the names of constituencies. This results in taking time from the private members hour. It appears this time the matter will be handled quickly. The last time we dealt with such a motion, it took much longer.

Members must use private members hour to change the names of their constituencies when we should be dealing with bills such as those of the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall) and the hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Stewart) which are changes in substance related to the needs of this country. Although the hon. member for Peel South (Mr. Blenkarn) has a legitimate reason for changing the name of his constituency, it is ridiculous that members must use the time allotted for private members hour for this purpose.

Mr. Reid: Mr. Speaker, I think there would be agreement to take the bill through all stages, including committee of the whole and third reading.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Does the House give consent to allow the change to be made to the motion so that it may be referred to a committee of the whole?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, considered in committee, reported, read the third time and passed.

FEDERAL TRANSPORT COMMISSION OF INQUIRY ACT

MEASURE TO ESTABLISH COMMISSION

On the order:

January 15, 1973—Second reading and reference to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications of Bill C-33, An Act to provide for the constitution of a Federal Transport Commission of Inquiry (impartial investigation of transport accidents)—Mr. Forrestall.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Some hon. members, including the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall), know the Chair has some reservation about the acceptability of this bill. At first glance, it is the impression of the Chair that this bill seems to infringe upon the financial initiative of the Crown. I do not wish to prevent hon. members making points in defence of the acceptability of this bill. I invite hon. members to assist the Chair in its decision.

Mr. Forrestall: Mr. Speaker, without calling into question the very real problems which cause the Chair to have some reservation about this and other bills that come before this parliament, may I be permitted to make the observation that this bill, like a number of others, has been on the order paper for this and the two previous parliaments.

In most cases where the matter is dealt with, the urgency of proposing bills which attempt to infringe is, from the private member's point of view, clear. Impairment of the initiative of the treasury benches to raise and dispense public funds is not really an issue in this bill. Indeed, the substantive matter of the bill in terms of the ability of the government to raise and expend funds is not involved. In fact, there is no additional expenditure apart from the salaries of the five-man commission.

I find it very difficult to argue the merits of that particular part of the bill. However, I would argue that in recent years conflicts have arisen in the area of general transportation in Canada, particularly aviation, seaborne traffic, transcontinental trains and interprovincial trucking. In recent years, there have been conflicts in a very real sense in interprovincial pipeline transportation. The bill is directed to this concern rather than any initiative of the government with regard to raising money. That is the argument I intend to make in the next few minutes rather than try to argue the merits of a particular clause which, I must confess, I would find difficult to argue with the Chair. If the Chair wishes to entertain other comments on this point, I would be prepared to accede to other hon. members for that purpose.

Following that, I would like to suggest to Your Honour the degree of concern I have with regard to all forms of transportation in Canada. Rather than take liberty with the initiatives of the treasury benches, I would like to bring before this chamber and the country the concern I have in relation to what I consider to be a very urgent matter.

The bill flows from a concern that a conflict of interest could arise when an investigative body is charged in a statutory way with the responsibility for investigating accidents in the transportation field in respect of which it has some regulatory authority. It is this concern I offer as an argument in favour of allowing this brief debate this afternoon. There are other arguments one could use for or against the suggestion that the provisions of this bill might impair the right, prerogative or the ability of the treasury benches to raise money. I can only plead once again that we should be given the opportunity to discuss this matter without getting into the question of the salaries of those on the commission. A failure to accept the very general argument would preclude in a very serious way members of this Chamber from dealing with matters of urgency and great concern.

Your Honour is quite familiar with the citations in Beauchesne's which refer to the right of all of us to be heard. When that right is precluded by any technical argument, I find it difficult to argue in a general way, because that is a fatal argument which does not in my opinion relate to the substantive situation with which we are now faced. The urgency of this matter is very clear in a statistical way. The increase in the number of accidents in this country is creating an international concern which Canada is not presenting to the international transportation community, yet there is a positive indication that accidents in this country could be investigated without any threat of a conflict of interest.

From time to time governments are not prepared to recognize that ministries are fallible, or in fact that they do make errors. They often do not recognize the important results that could flow from motions put before the House by members from both sides. If we fail to recognize that fact in respect of the private members' hour I think we not only do a disservice to this Chamber, we impair in the strictest sense the interpretation of the rules and prerogatives of the Crown in respect of raising and spending money.

A close examination of the bill would indicate a proposed transfer of professional expertise from the ministry of transport to an independent commission which would, in turn, report to another level of government. It could be argued that this commission would in fact not spend an additional five cents. If the bill in its present form is imperfect or is lacking in a technical sense because of the rules of this House, I am sure that we would be only too pleased to accept any appropriate change.

What we are pleading for is an opportunity to speak publicly to Canadians in respect of the transportation industry, while at the same time speaking to members of the treasury benches and our colleagues in the House. I suggest there is a sense of urgency because we have such accidents as the dramatic and tragic one that occurred near Wabush not so many months ago. I suggest this accident was the result of an error situation. The investigation of this accident indicated that there was an internal error. The difficulty involved is that the regulatory body charged with the responsibility for investigating the accident might be said to be encumbered by a real possibility of a conflict of interest. Even if that conflict of interest was imaginative, I suggest our attempt to discuss this matter this afternoon is fully justified. The number of deaths in air accidents in recent years has been on the increase, just as the number of deaths has increased in respect of railway accidents and accidents involving buses and trucks engaged in interprovincial commerce. In 1971, for instance, there were 1,100 accidents involving vehicles engaged in interprovincial transportation.

What we are attempting to do is restore not only national but international confidence in the manner in which we investigate transportation accidents in Canada. We cannot continue much longer to convince ourselves that there is not a distinct possibility of a conflict of interest. If we continue to do so, instead of being in the vanguard of transportation modes in the world we will find ourselves very far behind. The United States and Great Britain have already moved in this direction, while France and Australia are presently deeply involved in the overhaul of their system of transportation accident investigation procedures. They are doing this, as I would, not with the knowledge that a conflict of interest exists, but with the knowledge that there is the possibility of a whitewash being attempted. I am not suggesting this is the case, as we have one of the finest investigative systems in the world.

My bill does not attempt to raise money, it attempts to redirect the structure of the instruments and tools of investigative procedures. These instruments and tools already exist, so I am not proposing the raising of money for that purpose. Indeed, it is quite possible that such a commission as I envisage could well come from the accident investigations branch, the steamship accident investigations branch, or other similar areas. I do not envisage the raising or the spending of money for this purpose, but rather the reallocation of money in a way which would preclude forever in the minds of all those interested in transportation the possibility of a conflict of interest.

I need not remind hon. members of this House of the great difficulties that can arise when a conflict of interest seems to be present in a number of given situations. This is not fair to the men who conduct these investigations, and it is hardly fair to the department. Indeed, for several years I have wondered why the department has not brought forward a bill for consideration by this House which would do what I am suggesting today. Again, all I am suggesting is that we separate these functions and establish under a separate entity the prime jurisdiction with regard to all accidents, simply assigning that responsibility and jurisdiction to various existing bodies.

I am not asking for the expenditure of money. A commission of this nature, whether funded by present means or not, is of no importance to the transportation industry. What they have wanted for a number of years is the removal of any possibility of conflict, no matter how remote. The Air Line Pilots Association, the Canadian Owners and Pilots Association, steamship associations, our trucking associations, people who work in the field of rail transportation, have all expressed concern from time to time in recent years, not that there is a conflict of interest, but that there have been so-called whitewashes, cover-ups, and so on. I am not concerned that that is happening because to the best of my knowledge it does not. But there is continuing concern that a conflict of interest could exist and a whitewash would result.

It is possible that an impartial and honest investigation might be impaired, and if it were the consequence is obvious. Others involved in transportation will not have available to them the serious, thought-out conclusions of an investigative team, and without that the ability to avoid future accidents might be impaired. I do not think it is unfair to suggest it would be impaired in direct proportion to the degree to which information might be withheld.

I have never been entirely satisfied with the procedures and methods used in releasing details of air traffic accidents. I have received countless letters in the last month or so from departmental officials which I am sure, if they came into the hands of the transportation industry in this country, would leave it appalled.

I am not, as I say, asking the House to spend money. I am asking the House to consider in its wisdom referring the subject matter, if not the substance of the bill, to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications. I would withdraw the bill this afternoon if I thought that next week we would be given the opportunity to look into this matter carefully. Had there been no question in Your Honour's mind about the procedural acceptability of the bill, within not only the rules of the House but the prerogatives of the treasury benches, I would have dealt in much greater depth with what is happening in this regard elsewhere in the world. I have spoken of the international experience and would have drawn the attention of the House to the fact that we are almost alone in the western world in our failure to remove the very wide possibility of conflict. I would have indicated my regret about that and substantiated areas in which the transportation industry is calling for this type of investigative body. I would have dramatically pointed out from the information available the admissions of government that near conflicts can in fact result.

I let the matter rest with an appeal to Your Honour not to curtail discussion of this bill for the next few minutes on the ground that it might invade the right of the executive to determine expenditure of money. I ask that you let hon. members who wish to participate in this brief discussion direct their points, not to the very narrow technical arguments that have been raised, but rather to the urgency of Canada removing any possibility of conflict of interest within our total transportation system, not only for our own sake but for the sake of international carriers who move in and out of our air space and our waters on a daily basis.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. The Chair appreciates the interest of the hon. member in the bill now before the House and also the objective that he wishes to achieve by presenting this proposal to the House. I thank him for his comments, particularly those relating to the point of order regarding the acceptability of the bill. The hon. member said in his remarks that the object of the bill is not to spend money. However, the Chair has no authority to remove clause 8 of the bill, which definitely calls for the expenditure of money by parliament. This is clearly indicated in the last two lines of that clause.

Because of the importance of this matter in the hon. member's opinion, he is asking the Chair to put aside the rules, practices and precedents of the House and to base its decision on acceptability on the importance, in the mind of the hon. member, of the proposal contained in Bill C-33. The hon. member also said that the rules are designed to help hon. members, not to limit them. I am sure the hon. member, who has been in the House for many years, will find that the rules are really protective. The rules the hon. member seems to find restrictive today could well become protective, as they have been protective for hon. members in years past.

The hon. member did not seem to contest the hesitation of the Chair in accepting the bill on the ground that it infringes upon the financial initiative of the Crown, so unless hon. members request me to do so I shall not cite the relevant citation in Beauchesne. If hon. members refer to citation 362(2) of Beauchesne, I think they will find clearly set out there that an hon. member cannot introduce a bill which imposes a charge on the treasury without a recommendation. The same is also said in citation 249.

● (1730)

I am sure that if hon. members looked through Beauchesne's and May's they would not find many citations with which to defend the cause of this bill. Because hon. members have been lenient and seemed so interested in the subject matter of the bill before us, the Chair did not try to intervene too early, which I think was more than fair to the hon. member. He did make his point, perhaps under cover of a procedural argument, so I think he has had a chance to fully present his case.

[Mr. Forrestall.]

At this time the Chair has no alternative but to refuse the bill in its present form unless there is agreement among hon. members to accept the suggestion of the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East and refer the subject matter of the bill to a committee. Otherwise, I cannot accept further discussion of the bill in its present form.

Mr. Reid: Mr. Speaker, as a result of your decision there is no other private members' business scheduled for today and I believe there would be agreement in the House to call it six o'clock now.

The second thing I would like to do is to draw Your Honour's attention and that of hon. members to item No. 17 on the order paper, which is the bill on residential mortgages now under debate. The motion calls for the bill to be sent to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs. There have been consultations among hon. members and I think there is agreement to changing the motion so that the bill would be sent to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Hon. members have heard the proposal of the parliamentary secretary. Is it agreed that the motion be changed accordingly?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Does the House give unanimous consent to calling it six o'clock at this time?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

At 5.35 p.m. the House took recess.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

RESIDENTIAL MORTGAGE FINANCING BILL

ESTABLISHMENT OF CORPORATION, RECOGNITION OF SPECIALIZED MORTGAGE INVESTMENT COMPANIES UNDER LOAN COMPANIES ACT AND TAX TREATMENT

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Basford that Bill C-135, to provide additional financial mechanisms and institutions for the residential mortgage market in Canada, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, when I began my speech earlier this afternoon I made the point that members of the NDP were opposed to the passage of this bill because it really does nothing to change the fundamental reliance of the government on the private sector of the economy to meet the housing needs of the people of Canada. I pointed out that the private sector has failed to meet the needs of ordinary citizens and that the financial institutions have been as interested in maximizing their profits as any other sector of the private enterprise system.

Interest rates today are at an all-time high of 10 per cent or more. These interest rates began to increase in 1969 when the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Hellyer), who is now a Conservative, was a Liberal and the minister in charge of housing policy. He permitted interest rates on mortgages, which had been fixed at 6½ per cent, to be raised. He argued that if we removed the limit of 6½ per cent interest on mortgages there would be competition, rates would be reduced and as a result much more money would be available for housing. Events have proven that the hon. member for Trinity was wrong in 1969. The fact that he has become a Conservative has really meant nothing, because the members of the Conservative party are supporting the present proposal, one which was wrong in 1969 and is wrong today.

The fact that the government knows there are fundamental defects in our housing programs can be demonstrated when we recall that they appointed a commission to study all aspects of housing policy. The commission was headed by Professor Michael Dennis of Toronto. Having conducted very intensive and detailed studies of various aspects of housing policy and having prepared a report, Professor Dennis and his group found the government promptly decided the report was such a devastating criticism of the present and former governments that it would be better not to publish it. In fact, it was not until the document somehow got into the hands of opposition members and of the media that the government permitted its publication and distribution.

Professor Dennis was appointed by a Liberal government to look at housing policy. I understand he now works full-time for the mayor of Toronto who, I am told, is a Conservative. Not only did Professor Dennis make that report, but he appeared before the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs on April 10, 1973, and presented a statement in which he analysed Bill C-133 which was then being considered by the committee. Some of the comments he made then could be equally applied to the bill we are discussing today. He said:

> I strongly recommend that the National Housing Act be amended to provide that it is the policy of the government of Canada to ensure that decent housing is available to all Canadians at a price which they can afford and to achieve as equitable a distribution of the nation's housing resources as possible.

I submit that with interest rates at 10 per cent to 10½ per cent we are not getting decent housing at a price which many people can afford. I submit that with the price of land having jumped by some 200 per cent since 1960, the price of housing in major cities such as Toronto and Vancouver, to mention just two, have gone completely out of the reach of 85 per cent of the people of Canada. The submission which Professor Dennis made to the House of Commons committee on April, and his criticisms regarding the lack of an over-all housing policy which would meet the needs of the Canadian people, are as valid today as they were then. The government has failed in the provision of mortgages at an interest rate which ordinary citizens can afford. That is the main subject that is before this House. The government has failed in the provision of land at an equitable price; it has failed in almost every aspect of housing policy.

I wish to place on record the estimates of Professor Dennis and his group on the availability of serviced land in four cities. He estimates that six of the largest developers in ten Canadian cities hold half the land available for housing. That is the reason the price of land has increased so greatly. In Calgary, where there are 7,500 serviced lots available, developers own all of them. In Ottawa-Hull, where there are some 8,100 lots available, developers hold 7,000 of them. In Vancouver, where there are 8,000 lots available, developers hold 6,900; and in my city of Winnipeg, where there are 8,000 lots available, developers own 6,150 of them.

I would not mind if developers where doing this with their own money but, Mr. Speaker, they are doing it with money which belongs to all the people of Canada, because this government, and the Conservative government before it, permitted developers to go to banks and lending institutions—to which we are going to give further protection under the provisions of this bill—to borrow money, not just for this year or next year but probably for the next ten to 20 years, and to write off the interest rates on their borrowings as a legitimate business expense on which they have to pay no corporation tax. In other words they have been given a licence to use our money in order to jack up the price to people who need housing.

• (2010)

When we passed another bill a short while ago, the hon. member for Peel South (Mr. Blenkarn) was on his feet defending the financial institutions of this country.

An hon. Member: He always does.

Mr. Orlikow: Yes, he always does. What does this bill do, Mr. Speaker? As I said earlier, the bill is just a vehicle with which to tinker with the system: it is another excuse for not facing up to the real problems of providing the people of Canada with the houses they need. As I indicated earlier, figures which have been published by the Globe and Mail show that the trust and loan companies made 14½ per cent more profit in the first three months of 1973 than they did in the same period last year. This bill tells them that if they are worried that their housing loans are too risky, the government and the people of Canada, through this bill, will provide a sure-fire way by which they can dispose of their bad risks.

The government is not worried about their good risks; they can keep all the excess profits they make. As far as I know, there are no mortgages which are in any way bad risks in the long run; but if they have any which are bad risks in the short run, this bill will give all the protection needed by taking them off their hands. This legislation will increase the liquidity and the fluidity of the risk for the mortgage and trust companies in the housing field and will permit them to make more money than ever.

This proposal demonstrates that, as usual, the government is unwilling or unable to properly control the total cash flow that is needed if the Canadian people are to have their social programs looked after. There are billions of dollars for the developers who, as the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Gilbert) said earlier today, want to build office buildings for Canadian corporations, with fancier offices, wall-to-wall carpeting, air-conditioning and all the rest, and then charge 50 per cent of the cost to the taxpayer through corporation taxes. There are billions of dollars for more filling stations, for more supermarkets. But that is not enough, Mr. Speaker. Not only will this bill give the mortgage companies protection against losses which they might incur in the building of houses which are so badly needed, but it will give them protection against the most speculative investment they might make in office buildings or other buildings. There are probably too many of these as it is.

We were told earlier by the hon. member for Peel South that we really do not understand this bill; in fact, we were told that we do not understand anything about the building of houses. If he had thought about it, I am sure he would have said that we do not understand anything about business. When the hon. member for Broadview said this party proposed that the mortgage rate be set at 6 per cent, the hon. member asked: Why not 4 per cent or 2 per cent? Although he did not say so, he probably thought: Why not no interest at all? Mr. Speaker, when we talk of an interest rate of 6 per cent on homes, we cannot be that wrong; we cannot be that wild-eyed, that impractical.

Let me put on the record excerpts from an editorial which appeared in the Toronto Globe and Mail last Friday, September 14, 1973. This was the main editorial, headed "Bullied by the bank rate". For the information of the hon. member for Peel South—he is not here, but perhaps he will look at Hansard—I shall read several paragraphs of it. Here, to my surprise, and I am sure to the amazement of the hon. member, is what the editorial says:

> There is absolutely no reason why mortgage lending rates should be forced upward. They do not have the same relationship to international markets as do, for instance, bond rates, and they can be maintained at lower levels in Canada without in the least jeopardizing the security of the Canadian dollar.
> Repeatedly in the past we have urged that the federal government impose a ceiling on mortgage rates and, at the same time, require lending institutions to set aside a certain proportion of their funds for mortgages. It can be done; in fact, it is being done successfully in the United States.

Later in the same article we find these words:

> The most brutal aspect of rising mortgage rates is that what appear to be small increases add substantially to the financing of a home. As the Ontario housing task force under Eli Comay showed, an increase from 7 per cent to 10 per cent in mortgage interest adds at least 20 per cent to monthly home ownership costs. Putting it another way, a $35,000 house with a 40-year, $25,000 mortgage, would cost a total of $75,000 at 6 per cent interest but $110,000 at 10 per cent interest—a difference of $35,000.

I commend that part of the editorial to the hon. member for Peel South who was worried about the people who are without housing. The article continues:

> Until mortgage rates and mortgage funds are secured at a level that ordinary people can afford, Canadian families will continue to be abused unnecessarily.

Mr. Speaker, that is precisely what we have been saying for a considerable time. It is precisely what our members have been saying in the discussion on this particular bill. We have said and will continue to say that the interest rate on homes, particularly the interest rate on mortgages for moderately priced homes, should be fixed at 6 per cent. We do not say that the rate should necessarily be subsidized by the government, although I would consider that to be worthwhile. What we have been saying and will continue to say is that there is nothing wrong with the Government of Canada telling the banks, the mortgage and trust companies and other financial institutions that a certain percentage of the money available for investment must be directed to building homes at a legitimate interest rate. We have said such a rate is 6 per cent.

Today somebody asked if this would not mean that the banks and financial institutions would make less money and, in order to make what they consider to be an acceptable rate of return on their investment, they would have to raise their interest rates on other forms of loans. I am not sure that it would, but let us explore the possibility. I suggest it would be good social policy if we were to encourage home ownership by keeping the interest rate on homes at 6 per cent, even if that meant saying to those Canadians who want to buy cars that they may have to pay a little more on the money borrowed to buy the car or they may have to wait another year before buying it. I say that knowing that the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent) represents a constituency in which live a large number of auto workers. I say that governments have the responsibility of choosing, and that is a choice that I personally would like to see made if it is necessary.

We object to the way in which this bill will provide a tax rip-off and will enhance the attractiveness of mortgages as investments for financial institutions. I have already put on record certain facts. Profit figures prove conclusively that this kind of inducement is not necessary in 1973; nor, in all likelihood, will it be necessary in the next five or ten years. We do not need to help financial institutions which are already making substantial profits and do not need this kind of assistance.

We have said if this bill is to be passed, it ought to be amended so it will benefit only those financial institutions which lend money for residential building. We see absolutely no excuse for the government's offering any kind of subsidy, any further guarantee to investment companies and the like which build commercial properties, office buildings, supermarkets or things like that. I come from a have-not province. The capital, which contains several constituencies one of which I represent, contains more than half the population of the province. Mr. Speaker, the housing situation in Winnipeg is bad. I invite the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Basford) or the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Chrétien) to visit Winnipeg.

Mr. Basford: I was born and brought up there.

Mr. Orlikow: I would be more than happy to take them around Winnipeg. In my constituency, and this applies even more to the constituency represented by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), I can show them the sort of housing accommodation which is available to part of the rapidly increasing population of Winnipeg. The housing for the Indian and native peoples of Winnipeg, Regina, Calgary, Kenora or any other of our western cities is a disgrace to this country. I say that it is shameful that this country should permit such housing conditions to exist in 1973.

Bad as the conditions are in Winnipeg, they are infinitely worse outside Winnipeg. In the reserve less than 100 miles from Winnipeg there are houses and living conditions the like of which I would not have believed existed anywhere in Canada today. This bill will do absolutely nothing for those whose need for better houses is greater than anybody else's in this country.

This bill will encourage financial institutions to pump more money into Toronto, Vancouver, Calgary, Winnipeg and Montreal, cities which are growing and which have benefited more than other parts of Canada from the housing boom for the middle and upper income citizens which has gone on ever since the end of World War II. This bill will probably do nothing for Quebec, except that possibly it will help the people of Montreal. It will do nothing for the Maritimes and nothing for Newfoundland. Those areas are at the bottom of the totem pole, where people get little or nothing. That has been their lot for many years.

We have said, and will continue to say, that instead of giving further financial inducements to the companies which have failed miserably until now to meet the needs of Canadians, we ought to establish within the Department of Urban Affairs a central mortgage fund section which would direct federally chartered lending institutions to allocate capital which is provided to them at the prime bank lending rate for housing. These funds ought to be directed according to the housing priorities established by the Department of Urban Affairs.

I, for one, am not prepared to leave it to the financial institutions, land developers, housing builders and others to provide the houses that are necessary. I do not blame them for what they are doing. We live under the kind of system which says that every person who lives by the law is entitled to maximize his profits, so I do not blame them at all. I blame the government of Canada and the parliament of Canada for letting them do this and encouraging them to do it.

By introducing this bill we are telling them, "You have not made enough money. We are giving you a licence to steal more, to rip-off more from the people of Canada." That is what this bill does, and that is why we object to it. We are saying to the minister—and it is hard for me to say anything nice about this minister—that we want the Department of Urban Affairs to decide where the money which is to be spent on housing in the next year, two or three shall be spent; that is, in what parts of the country it shall be spent and in what cities, and how much shall be spent in rural areas. These are not decisions I am prepared to leave to the private sector of our economy. We know what the private sector has done until now. It has ignored the needs and priorities of the people of Canada.

For that reason we suggest this bill is wrong. It is the wrong bill, introduced at the wrong time and will lead to the same kind of wrong solutions which we have experienced until now. For these reasons we urge the minister, even at this late date, to reconsider this matter and take the kinds of steps which we have proposed.

An hon. Member: You want the minister to listen to you.

Mr. Orlikow: Perhaps what I have said is not so important. I merely ask the minister to look again at the proposals which were made by the task force. This government appointed it. I am referring to the proposals which were made about mortgage funding, land acquisition and public housing. Surely the previous minister had some confidence in the ability of the members of the task force or he would not have appointed them.

I suggest, in closing, that the minister withdraw this bill and that he give serious consideration to proposals made regarding all aspects of housing by Professor Dennis and the group which worked with him. Let the minister return to parliament with a housing policy which we need. Let him not say that in the next four or five years "X" hundreds of thousands of houses will be built. Instead, let him say that we shall build all the houses that are needed by the people and in the places where they are needed. Let us do this, instead of building houses for people who can afford to pay for better homes than those they now occupy but which to a large extent they do not need.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, Bill C-135, which would establish more rip-off institutions, perhaps, in the field of housing is a bill which I feel sincerely will not help the people of my constituency which basically is a rural-urban Saskatchewan riding. Most of our families earn low or middle incomes.

The bill before us would establish two institutions, a mortgage investment corporation and a federal mortgage exchange corporation. Perhaps, according to the traditional economic approach, it will make more funds available for mortgages in this country and will make funds more liquid. However, it will do nothing to make funds available to people in this country who really need homes, those who live on low or moderate incomes. Further, the minister, by introducing this bill, is doing absolutely nothing to bring down interest rates or to subsidize interest rates for people in need. I am not sure that more funds are really to be made available for housing even with interest rates as they are now.

About five or six days ago the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) said in this House that he had received assurances from the banks that there are enough funds available for mortgage and housing purposes in Canada at an interest rate of 10 per cent. Today the minister is arguing that by making more funds available, interest rates will come down and therefore there will be more incentive to build houses in this country. That has always been the traditional approach to economics in this country by the Liberal and the Conservative parties. I maintain that type of approach will not work in the world economy we find ourselves in, with spiralling interest rates not only in Canada and the United States but in the entire western world.

We will not solve these problems unless we have foreign exchange controls and the guts and the gumption to actually control interest rates. The banks and financial institutions must be told to allocate so much of their capital each year to invest in housing at a fixed interest rate of 6 per cent. That is what our party is calling for with regard to residential mortgages and home building in Canada. I maintain that is a reasonable policy. I think it can be done, and it is about time we tackled the banks and financial institutions in this country.

Let us see whether the Conservative party has the guts and the gumption to support the proposal of putting some controls on interest rates on residential mortgages. I suspect they are being sincere, but maybe they are just being political. However, they talk about a system of comprehensive controls for 90 days on salaries, wages and prices in this country. If they are really interested in controls, they should support our argument of allocating funds which the banks have at their disposal, saying to them that every year a certain amount must be made available for housing at 6 per cent interest. At an interest rate of 6 per cent, the ordinary citizens of this country can afford to build houses for themselves and their families. I challenge the Conservatives to do that.

Mr. Woolliams: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Nystrom: I would be very pleased to answer a question.

Mr. Woolliams: Would the hon. member tell us what percentage of the money of the banks goes into mortgages for homes, and what percentage of mortgages are loaned by other institutions? He has been dealing with banks. My understanding is about 15 per cent of the money which goes into mortgages in Canada comes from the banks.

An hon. Member: Eight per cent.

Mr. Woolliams: It is about 15 per cent, if you take it across the board. If you deal with certain quasi things like unions, credit unions, and so on—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I think the hon. member has gone a little beyond the question and is making an argument or a speech. The question is clear, and I will again recognize the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom).

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, to my knowledge about 8 per cent of the funds from the banks go into residential housing in this country.

Mr. Woolliams: Including credit unions?

Mr. Nystrom: I understand it is higher when you get into other institutions and life insurance companies. I do not know, off the top of my head, whether that is the precise figure, but I maintain it is far too low. We should be saying to the banks that a much higher amount should be allocated. I cannot say offhand whether that should be 15, 16 or 20 per cent. We must determine how much housing is needed in this country, who needs that housing and each year require these institutions to set aside a certain amount of their investment capital for housing. That could be done. I think it is the only solution if we are to put housing into the hands of the ordinary citizens of this country.

The hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) raised the question of banks. If I understood him correctly, he defended the banks in their investment policies. I wish to refer to an article in the September 15 edition of the Toronto Globe and Mail. It says that for the first seven months of this year the profits of the chartered banks in this country increased by 31.9 per cent. That is an increase in profits over July 31 of last year of almost 32 per cent. I suggest it is indicative of the interest of the banks in terms of profiteering and making investments. They want to make a quick buck, and they know where the profits are very high.

It is natural that financial institutions such as banks will lend money to people building expensive homes in places like Toronto, Ottawa, Vancouver and other large cities because the housing market is more expensive; they can rake-off a larger profit. Our party contends the time has come to say to the financial institutions that this parliament is supreme and will demand that they provide 6 per cent mortgages to build houses in Canada.

The legislation before us does not guarantee that more funds will go into the housing market. With this type of legislation, the banks might allocate less money for the housing market than at present and channel money presently being put into housing into more profitable enterprises. This bill does not guarantee money will go to those parts of Canada where housing is needed. It is more profitable to lend money in the big cities where houses are more expensive. It is natural that funds will gravitate toward those centres.

We need a lot more than the bill before us today. There must be a fundamental change with regard to housing. Housing is a basic need, just as food, education and medicine and should be treated in that fashion. It should be removed from the commodity market. The financial institutions should not be allowed to profiteer when people cannot obtain shelter for themselves and their families. Housing should be treated in the same manner as schools and hospitals. There is little profiteering on these buildings. Housing is a basic necessity of life and should be made available to Canadians at cost. Banks, financial institutions, land developers, land speculators and other people should not be allowed to rake-off profits.

Unless something is done soon, the situation will become worse in the next few months. We have heard that two of the largest banks in the United States have now raised their prime lending rate to 11 per cent. Usually, the prime interest rate in Canada follows that of the United States. In a few weeks, the prime interest rate in Canada will increase. What will happen to the mortgage rate in this country? The Minister of Finance says he has guarantees that the banks will provide sufficient funds at 10 per cent. However, if the prime interest rate goes up, by the end of the year the mortgage rate in this country will be 11 per cent, if not higher, unless something is done in the very near future. That is why we need foreign exchange controls in this country, or perhaps an interest equalization tax to keep our funds in Canada to develop our country for the people who live here.

It is not only important to get assurance from the banks that mortgages will be held down or rolled back to 6 per cent, but that we get assurance from the banks that their services will not snowball or spiral because they are holding down their interest rates. Banks could, for example, increase their appraisal fees.

• (2040)

An hon. Member: What about lawyers?

Mr. Nystrom: Someone from behind the curtain said, "What about lawyers?" Perhaps this is something else at which we should be looking. Why should a lawyer rake-off a high percentage on a first or second mortgage when the amount of work he puts in is minimal; his secretary is probably doing it for him in many instances.

Mr. Alexander: That is a lot of nonsense.

Mr. Nystrom: I am sorry if I am stepping on a few toes.

Mr. Alexander: You are not stepping on mine. Just be honest.

Mr. Nystrom: I might refer, also, to other services for which charges are made—mortgage insurance, for instance. There are ways in which lending institutions can increase the cost of a mortgage without actually increasing the interest rate charged. The House should be looking into these matters rather than establishing additional financial institutions which in my opinion will not help at all to provide housing for ordinary citizens at prices they can afford.

The minister in charge of housing seems confident that the bill will lead to an increase in funds available for housing. Perhaps it will. But nothing is said in this measure about means of reducing interest rates. Ordinary citizens will not be assisted to get funds at a reasonable interest rate. That is why we cannot support the government's proposals. In spite of the fact that the Conservative party is concerned about the effect of these provisions on corporate funds, I urge hon. members to my right to join us in taking this position in an effort to help the ordinary citizens of this country. I should like to see the Conservative party do that—

An hon. Member: Filibuster.

Mr. Nystrom: —rather than talk about a 90-day freeze and indulging in short-term political opportunism, as they do too frequently.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nystrom: I see I am ruffling the sensitivity of some members on this side.

Mr. Alexander: That's your story.

Mr. Nystrom: When it really comes down to it, the Conservative party will not stand up and be counted. It will not support any measure which is contrary to the interests of the financial institutions. A good example is what Mr. Lougheed is doing in Alberta when he supports the giant oil companies in padding their pocketbooks.

Some hon. Members: Filibuster!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I think the hon. member enjoys creating a certain amount of interest in the debate, but he should be dealing with the principles before us as they relate to housing.

An hon. Member: What principles?

Mr. Nystrom: Someone suggests that there are no principles in the bill.

Mr. Alexander: Shame.

Mr. Nystrom: Because of this, my party does not see fit to support the measure before us, and instead we call upon the government to come forward with substantial legislation which will help the ordinary citizens. I challenge the Conservative party to join us in tackling the financial institutions. Let us see some action instead of opportunistic words, action which will bring benefits to the ordinary citizens of Canada. If the Conservatives do that, the NDP will be right in there with them, fighting all the way.

[Translation]

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I will say only a few words to give our point of view on Bill C-135 which we find inadequate. The bill does not meet all the standards and requirements which we now see in housing. Its objectives is to create a federal fund for the transfer of money among those handling loans at high interest. The small owner cannot be expected to pay interests of 9¾ or 10 per cent on a mortgage for a house, which often represents 90 per cent of services and taxes.

I congratulate the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) for having drawn the attention of the House on the fact that the small wage earner cannot pay interests over 6 per cent, because through some legislation he should at least be given the opportunity to pay his house perhaps, one and a half times or one and three quarters, but not three times over.

I am speaking on good grounds because I am a shareholder of a company which built 112 single houses last year and we expect to build 90 or 100 this year because there is a demand. But I do not feel at all—and I say it to the House—that anybody is rendered a service when, to comply with the act, we must sell to a poor workman who earns $6,500 $7,000 or $8,000 a year, a house with a mortgage at 9¾ per cent whether it may be a loan from the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation or from a bank, that is endorsed by the central corporations.

My colleagues say there may be a few banks that grant loans at a rate of 8 per cent. We are aware of the fact, Mr. Speaker, that once the engineer and the urbanist have checked in order to satisfy the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, and after the whole approval process of plans and estimates the interest on the loan amounts to 9¾ per cent, 10 or 10¼ per cent. White collars live out of it! We are not the ones who make them live, but workmen who own a house or who want to have one day.

Let us consider the various elements which must be taken into account in the cost of a house. I will take as an example a five room house that is sold for $20,000 and which is 32 by 48 feet. In order to build this house, 5,600 feet of lumber are required. If someone wants to contradict me, let him stand up. This lumber includes the wages of the lumberjack who earns $200 a week on average. Out of this amount, one must take $45 that are paid in direct and indirect taxes. Therefore, only $150 are left to the lumberjack. The truck driver who transports this lumber with his truck, earns an average of $450 a week. Once deducted $150 in working expenses, he is left with $300, for a write-off of $65 must be deducted for machinery. An average of 30 per cent are deducted in direct and indirect taxes from the income of the man who owns a sawmill. The lumber salesman, that is to say he who deals with the contractor, also gets 30 per cent. The estate agent gets 30 per cent on his income. What is left on the property? Why is this house sold at $20,000? Because money must be paid at all levels: $3,500, $4,000 and up to $5,000 per house in direct and indirect taxes. That is what is pushing up the cost of living indicator now.

Clause 3 of Bill C-135 reads, and I quote:

> The purpose of this Act is to enhance the marketability of mortgages issued on residential properties in Canada and improve the effectiveness of the contribution of the private sector to the financing of housing in Canada.

Last week the Bank of Canada boosted the discount rate by ½ per cent. If I were a clever investor, I would not invest my money in a first mortgage at 10¼ or 10½ per cent on a property with risks, unless fire insurance were underwritten in my favour and paid to date. I would invest my money with the General Trust of Canada at 9 per cent, and then I would relax. What created this situation? It is the increase in the discount rate on money loaned by chartered banks.

If the building trade follows the trends of the last three years, we will see a slow down if not a complete stop, because a labourer will no longer be able to buy a house. The reason is that he has to pay for those who come before him and who are overburdened with taxes. He must also pay for services provided by the municipalities. With water and sewage facilities costing $75 a foot, if the width of the land is 100 feet, services alone will cost $7,500. This means a disbursement of $62 a month for ten years, or $750 a year.

Let us look now at the interest rate of municipalities. The province of Quebec says: Those are unwarrented expenditures. It is a game of cat and mouse. The federal government says: We are more open, we are going to give a new impetus to the economy. The province says: In Bramptonville—Windsor—in the riding of Richmond—or in Asbestos, those are unwarranted expenditures. You provided too many services to new neighbourhoods, we are not going along with that. We will give you $25,000, and then $300,000 to bury the mains in the streets. Then people say: The taxpayer is going to pay. The taxpayer always pays.

Then, nice measures are passed, such as Bill C-135 now before us. We are opposed to it because it does not solve anything at all. We are against that bill because it helps again those who tinker with dollars and charge interests of 9½, 10 or 12 per cent. I challenge anybody in this House to suggest that a worker in a textile plant in Drummondville, Magog, Valleyfield or elsewhere, who earns an average $5,800 a year, can pay an interest of 10¼ per cent to become a homeowner. Yet, that interest rate received the blessing of this House of Commons.

Now, there is another problem that this bill does not deal with; it is the overloan to contractors who build well-dressed slums. Let me explain: By well-dressed slums

I mean 10-, 12-, 15-, or 20-storey buildings, as can be found in Montreal and Toronto.

People ask if there are any lots left in the province of Quebec. Real slums are being built. The house is nice, the brick is nice, it is well built, it is upright, there are no problems, it is well done. However, one thing has been forgotten: Those rat slums—because only rats can live there—have a little balcony or a little porch—to be more specific—of three feet by four. To see the sun, you must go out on the balcony, on the 17th floor. However, you must tell the kids: "Do not make too much noise, because the people on the 7th floor will hear you." It is no use, because those buildings are not soundproof. The people on the 4th floor can hear what their neighbours are saying.

● (2100)

I think that those slums whose building was authorized by CMHC in our larger centres are a national calamity. However, Mr. Speaker, I congratulate CMHC on its lending of money for the building of single-family dwellings and the good sense it shows by requiring the construction of fairly wide streets and proper ventilation for single-family dwellings.

However, I am talking about the slums in Toronto, Winnipeg, Montreal, Quebec City and other larger centres where workers must pay a monthly rent of $235 to crowd into a 3½ bedroom apartment. These are not dwellings but "camps", slums. It is hopeless, there is no ventilation, no garden, nothing at all, except a small three feet by four balcony.

Why are those houses being built? I know why. Anyone who builds a house now goes to CMHC. If he is the least bit intelligent, he must pay his bills to have the cash discount before 30 days; he makes $20,000 on 18 apartments before selling them. There is nothing doing. Therefore, he builds them like mad. It is always written on the door of those buildings: For rent 1½, 2½, 3½ or 4½ room apartments. He does not rent them and does not care, because he made his money. Then, this individual sets up three companies. There are three of them in Montreal; I will not name them because I prefer to respect their anonymity, even though I could name them right away. Houses are built; they cannot rent shacks! Their money is made. Nothing stops them; one goes bankrupt, another takes his place, always with the blessing of CMHC.

Where are the responsible contractors. I wonder. Where is the family home which respects the individual? I wonder. Do you know what they do? My contractor, Jean-Denis Breton, from Magog, used to say: Let them build shacks the others will fill them up through advertising. When the tenants will be living in 1½, 2½, 3½ room apartments, we shall advertise at the door: Family home for $15 or $20 a month cheaper, a real home. We will empty them, there is no problem. But the individual is not too worried; he made a $20,000 or $25,000 profit on the CMHC loan.

At this stage, I would like the minister to listen to me. This is a terrible plague in our cities. It is like a pyramid. Someone is invited to invest and buy 10 acres of land. Who is this individual? Nobody knows. Where is he registered? Nobody knows. That makes my colleagues laugh, but it is true. Where does he come from? Nobody knows, nobody knows him, he is anonymous. He buys about 10 acres of land. They are subdivided into small lots, not 90 by 120 feet, Mr. Speaker, but small lots. To use popular language or to be on the level of my good friend, the Minister of Agriculture (M. Whelan), I would call that small "pig pens". It is as simple as that. There is nothing, there is no room for a garden or to plant a tree. The money comes from the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and that is all that counts. A house is built. Once they have made a good profit, it does not matter whether they rent it or not. Meanwhile, the taxpayers' money invested in housing is being spent in a way that does not meet with our wishes. We have open air, we have room in Canada; our country is one of the largest in the world. There are 20 million people in Canada but there is a craze for building, everybody want to build, one on top of the other, because our financial corporations, including the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, are not careful enough as regards the environment in our cities.

Mr. Speaker, I think Bill C-135 is unrealistic. We do not think about what we are doing with the amounts of money coming from the banks, the taxpayers, who invest with the approval of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, in the building of healthy dwellings so that our families may live decently tomorrow and so that a man and a woman may bring up children, if they want to, in a responsible society.

[English]

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, it has always been my conviction that there are four areas in which government has a social responsibility. These four areas are shelter, food, health and education. It seems to me that every human being has a right to adequate shelter, a full stomach, proper health care and education. Of these four, only in the field of education has government in Canada really exercised its social responsibility.

The bill before us deals with housing. And housing is essential. Indeed, it eats up 25 per cent to 30 per cent of family incomes in urban Canada. It has a weight of one-third in the consumer price index, but in fact as much as half the income of low-income families, who are not in public housing, may go in shelter of some form or other. There seems to be a general rule that the "poor pay more," and this rule seems to hold good for housing as well as other commodities. Compared with the average family, the bottom 20 per cent of the income scale spend twice the proportion of their income on shelter.

The disparities are also rather staggering. Not only is there a disparity between middle-income and low-income families; there seems to be a disparity between regions of Canada and indeed between different regions of Ontario. For example, according to figures released recently by CMHC it costs $5,510 more to build a home in Sudbury than in Hamilton. Construction costs per square foot are higher in Sudbury than in any major urban area of Canada. Costs range from a low of $15.29 per square foot in Toronto to a high of $19.51 in Sudbury. Of the 19 Ontario urban areas surveyed by CMHC, five of the seven most expensive areas in which to build are in northern Ontario. So disparities exist not just between low-income and middle-income families but also between regions of the country. Regional disparities also reflect the higher cost of shelter.

Mr. Alexander: Try the north.

Mr. Rodriguez: I did. The present housing act is designed for the advantage of the lender, not the consumer. For example, if you are lucky enough to obtain an NHA loan, an inspector will call at least three times during construction to examine the work in progress. There is no guarantee to the purchaser in regard to the quality of materials and workmanship. Also, if a consumer obtains an NHA mortgage loan, he pays a premium of 1 per cent of the total loan which goes into a mortgage insurance fund that is held in trust and managed by CMHC. He pays that, and one may assume it is for his benefit.

Mr. Alexander: What is it for?

Mr. Rodriguez: I will tell the hon. member what it is for. The mortgage insurance fund is for the protection of the lender in case of default. The consumer pays the premium even though the lender holds his mortgage. The Financial Post pointed out in October, 1972, that "the mortgage insurance fund is now worth an impressive $300 million, while claims outstanding against it are only $10 million". The consumers have certainly paid handsomely to buttress the operations of mortgage lenders.

The premise on which this government and previous ones have legislated has been: more mortgage funds, more housing starts, more suburbs to move into. This formula worked for some but left a large number of Canadians outside the mainstream. The effects began to appear in the 1960's, and it was interesting to see the fiscal legerdemain which the Liberal government in 1966 employed when the mortgage rate was frozen at 6 per cent. The government wanted to remove the mortgage ceiling and used an argument that went something like this: If you remove the ceiling on interest rates, the resulting higher rates would attract more money into the housing field and the greater competition for the consumer's buck would bring down the interest rate. Well, Mr. Speaker, we know what happened following that. There has been a steady upward spiral of interest rates to the detriment, not of the lender, but of low-income Canadians. Middle-income Canadians are now starting to feel the pinch and they are screaming.

By 1970 it was obvious that that formula was based on a number of wrong assumptions. It assumed that housing was primarily an individual matter and that the average family should "go it alone" in the housing market. It is now clear that this thinking has to give way to the pattern of social responsibility and the creation of good communities rather than the mere multiplication of housing.

The flow of mortgage funds was seen as a means of either slowing down or speeding up the economy. New housing starts became the economic thermometer of the nation. The assumptions and practices of the past favoured the lenders rather than the people, who are the ultimate consumers. This situation will not right itself in a system controlled by what is euphemistically termed "the free market forces", until the government turns to a housing policy from the consumer's viewpoint rather than the lender's. Note that the assumptions of the past were all right so long as they favoured people of upper and middle income. Now that the middle-income group is being squeezed, with respect to housing, we hear loud squawks and outcries. They are feeling pressures which have been on the poor all along.

What is the purpose of Bill C-135? I think we should refresh our memories on that point. The purpose of the bill, as stated on page 2, is as follows:

—to enhance the marketability of mortgages issued on residential properties in Canada and improve the effectiveness of the contribution of the private sector to the financing of housing in Canada.

The minister in his notes on the bill states:

The provisions of the residential mortgage financing act are designed to contribute directly to meeting these objectives by providing new financial mechanisms in the Canadian mortgage market aimed specifically at improving the flow of mortgage funds for the middle and moderate income home buyer.

This will be achieved by enhancing the attractiveness of mortgage investment for financial institutions and pension funds, and by creating new mortgage investment companies through which the smaller investor can place investment funds into mortgages.

This statement means only one thing, namely, higher interest rates. In view of the fact that 250,000 new houses were built in Canada in 1972, and this is considerably in excess of the annual target of 236,000 new houses set by the Economic Council of Canada, it is fairly obvious that the problem is not availability of mortgage funds but, rather, whether the consumer can afford the cost of contracting a mortgage. And is it fair for mortgage institutions to be able to take advantage of the consumer in such an essential area as shelter? The answer to both questions—I hear reverberations from behind the curtain—is an unequivocal no.

Bill C-135 smacks too much of the old Liberal chestnut enunciated by the minister of finance in 1966. The solution, as the government sees it, is to establish two institutions: the federal mortgage exchange corporation and mortgage investment companies. These institutions will provide liquidity in the mortgage market comparable to stocks and bonds.

Again, these changes are set up, not as advantages to the consumer but as advantages to the lender. This bill is indeed a Shangri-la for the lender, and if it had not been conceived by the Liberal government the Conservatives would have dreamed it up. That is why they both support it, because it is advantageous to their affluent backers.

This bill is most significant for what it does not do. For example, it will not intervene in the marketplace to stabilize the cost or supply of mortgage funds. It will not reduce the cost of housing to the consumer. It will not guarantee that residential mortgages will receive the priority they deserve. It will not guarantee adequate mortgage funds for new or existing dwellings in rural areas and in less privileged areas. The new NDP proposals would seriously come to grips with the real housing problem facing Canadians.

My friend, the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) says, "Here it comes".

Mr. Alexander: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I never interjected for one second during the hon. member's speech.

An hon. Member: That is strange. You usually do.

[Mr. Rodriguez.]

Mr. Rodriguez: It certainly is a great relief to know he has not.

These proposals are, first, that the government establish a central mortgage fund section in the Department of Urban Affairs which would direct federally-chartered lending institutions to allocate capital at rates not exceeding the prime bank rate, plus an administration fee, about 2½ per cent below the present NHA rates. We also propose that these funds should be directed according to the housing priorities established by the Department of Urban Affairs. The NDP views the average and below average family income earners as those who should have the top priority in obtaining NHA mortgages. We feel that this kind of planning on the part of the government would ensure a solution to the housing problem initially for middle and low-income Canadians and, finally, for all Canadians who need shelter at a price they can afford.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, to the relief of all may I say that I intend to be very brief.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Howard: First, I will try to set out, for my own sake if for no one else's, what I conceive to be the purpose of the bill. Lumping it together, I think it is to provide $400 million of taxpayers' money, $100 million of it in share capital and a maximum of $300 million as loans that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) may make to the corporation that is to be set up under the bill.

With this money the federal mortgage exchange corporation is authorized to buy and sell mortgages and to lend money on mortgages currently held for a period not exceeding one year. I think of it as being a kind of stock exchange for mortgages, for dealings in houses, an area where the gamblers and speculators can hold full sway and where the homeowners' interests are not considered at all in those high-stake games where they are dealing in hundreds of thousands and hundreds of millions of dollars.

While initially there is to be up to $100 million of share capital money put in by the public, all in all this is not a public corporation but a private corporation something similar to the Canadian Development Corporation, financed with public funds for the benefit of private interests. It is true that in the bill, unless parliament subsequently changes it, the share capital investment of the public through the federal government shall not fall below 50 per cent. But it does not mean that the federal government will have any measurable say in what the corporation does or how it conducts its affairs just because we put up more than 50 per cent of the money.

To realize this we only have to look to Panarctic Oil, which is a consortium of oil companies, private entrepreneurs who could not find oil on their own and needed the taxpayers of Canada to help them do it. So the taxpayers of this nation put up 45 per cent of the money in Panarctic Oil, and for that investment for a long period of time the Canadian government appointed one member to the board of directors of Panarctic Oil. The oil industry, all the oil companies that were involved in Panarctic Oil, were the dominant factor on the board of directors making policy decisions for Panarctic Oil. Subsequently the government saw the error of its ways and increased its membership on the board of directors from one to two, I understand.

I see this bill as nothing more than the use of public funds to establish private corporations for the purposes of profit to those private corporations. We in this House should be asking ourselves whether we are concerned, in terms of housing for people, with people or profits; whether we are concerned with homes, or whether we want to advance the interests of all the loan sharks and interest hounds involved in lending money. That is the question we should ask ourselves. I think the Conservatives asked themselves it and they found the answer; they came down on the side of the loan sharks and the interest hounds.

This is the second real issue of substance by way of legislation—I do not mean any of the airy motions that are put forward from time to time—that has come before this House dealing with the fundamental economic position of the people of this nation. The other was the corporation tax reduction bill. In both cases we find the Conservatives looking across at the Liberals, and the Liberals looking back, both like two long-lost lovers, kissing, cuddling and hugging, embracing each other—

An hon. Member: It isn't incestuous.

Mr. Howard: I always keep my remarks above the level of decency, Mr. Speaker. Unlike members of the Conservative party, I do not talk of incestuous relationships. I just talk about matters of substance.

Now I wish to deal with an aspect of this legislation that others in the NDP have dealt with. I have not heard any Conservative deal with it, and I probably will not. I want to deal with the lack of impact that this bill will have on the housing requirements of people in low-income groups, particularly people who live in the northern reaches of this nation—the native Indian and the Métis. What does this bill mean to them? In fact, what does housing mean to these people?

Mr. Reilly: Are you going to vote against it?

Mr. Howard: Yes, I am going to vote against it. That question from the hon. member, whoever asked it—I have forgotten his riding—indicates the degree of attention he pays to matters in this House, because a number of members of this party have already said we intend to vote against this bill. I say to the Conservative party, "Once again here is your chance. You are the guys who want an election. Here is an issue we will be glad to have one on. Stand up and be counted."

Mr. Paproski: Put it in writing and let us have an amendment now.

Mr. Howard: "Put it in writing," he says. The implication in that question is that the hon. gentleman who asked it can read, which I doubt very much.

Mr. Alexander: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. We all appreciate the entertainment that is being given to us right now, but surely the hon. member knows he should be speaking about Bill C-135. It appears to me he has lost track of everything. He should restrict his remarks to the bill in order that we can ascertain whether it is any good, rather than admonishing the Conservative party. He should really address his remarks to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Basford).

Mr. Howard: Curb your impatience. I will get to the minister in charge of housing. I point out to you, Mr. Speaker, that I was seriously attempting to stress how this bill will have no impact on people in low-income groups. It was at that stage that the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) and others like him kept interrupting me, trying to drag me off that subject. Perhaps they are not interested in it.

Recently the Native Council of Canada, as a result of examination and of their knowledge, determined the necessity of building 30,000 homes for native people in this nation just to deal with the terrible housing situation that those people have to cope with right now, not to talk of new families, of young children growing up and getting married and of their prospects for the future. These 30,000 homes would be just to deal with the disgraceful situation right now. Of what help will this bill be to meeting that need for 30,000 homes for those native people? It will be of no help. The minister in charge of housing can chew on whatever it is he is chewing on. He can chew on whatever he likes, Mr. Speaker, but through you I say to him that this bill will be no help whatever in meeting the need for 30,000 homes experienced by the native people.

We have situations in this land where families of six or eight people, sometimes comprising two or three generations of human beings, are living in a one-room house, a one-room home, a one-room shack, a one-room hovel to put it in its proper terms. Is there any help for those people in this bill? Not a bit. It is of help to the Royal Trust Company, the National Trust Company, the predatory trust company and all the rest of those thieves and gangsters who lend money to people for homes at the most exorbitant interest rate they can charge. It is of help to them, but not to people on low incomes.

One of the things in housing matters that people tend to talk about and that CMHC tends to look at is the question of sewage facilities. Before CMHC will step into the picture and say, "Yes, we will O.K. an application for a loan," it says, "You have got to be hooked up to a sewer." There are dozens and dozens of communities in this nation where the word "sewer" is unheard of. The most advanced kind of plumbing that people know of is called a septic tank, but the standard is the old-fashioned outside toilet. I say through you, Mr. Speaker, to the minister that if he would consider sitting outside he might understand what we are talking about. If he would consider sitting out, baring his buttocks in 30 degrees or 40 degrees-below weather, he would find it is not a very comfortable experience. It does not add to your opportunities for reading, I can tell you; there is no lingering. Mr. Speaker, there is no help in this bill for that type of situation.

Of course, the minister's friends in the mortgage and financing fields, the hon. member for Hamilton West and his cohorts in the mortgage field and the legal beagles he associates with do not have to go through that type of experience. They do not have to use outside toilets night and day, week after week, in all sorts of weather.

● (2130)

Mr. Alexander: Neither do you.

Mr. Howard: No, I do not have to; that is right. I was going to issue an invitation to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Basford), so I might as well do it now and include the hon. member for Hamilton West. I will gladly make the arrangements for both of those hon. gentlemen to come with me to La Loche in northern Saskatchewan, to Pine House or to my own constituency, Telegraph Creek or Cassiar. They should bring their long underwear—I do not care what brand—and the barest necessities and live with a family in those northern regions for a week this winter. Maybe they would come back to this House with a better understanding of what housing is. You bet I say to the hon. member for Hamilton West, "I don't have to"—but I know what it is like and I do not want to do it again.

Mr. Alexander: You are not alone, so don't get carried away.

Mr. Howard: I would say to the hon. member for Hamilton West, who likes to interrupt, that he would do well to go to Nova Scotia where a number of people are living at the bottom of the economic income level as well. He would recognize them and they would recognize him. If he did that and lived with those people for a week in the conditions they have to live under, and on their income, perhaps he would come back to this House with a better appreciation of what housing means.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I have listened to the hon. member and I feel he is overstepping his bounds. I think this should be more or less a question of privilege. If the hon. member had guts enough to come out and say what he intended to say, then perhaps I would not have stood up. But I think the hon. member has attempted to imply that there are a number of blacks in Nova Scotia who happen to be living in such circumstances and there may be need for recognition of their plight. Surely we all know that these circumstances need to be dealt with regardless of a person's race, creed or colour.

Mr. Basford: Hear, hear!

Mr. Alexander: I think all of us in this House are very much aware of the circumstances, whether people are black or white. What I resent is the cheap NDP way that the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard) is known for in terms of trying to embarrass me. I do not appreciate that.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Alexander: I just want to say, Mr. Speaker, that if he wants to bandy words with the hon. member for Hamilton West he should stand up like a man and tell me what he is thinking, instead of trying to be devious in the way he presents the subject. I know what he is talking about, and as far as I am concerned he is irresponsible. Mr. Speaker, that is the only point I wanted to make.

[Mr. Howard.]

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Howard: I well appreciate the sensitivity of the hon. member, Mr. Speaker, because he knows what he is talking about in this regard.

Mr. Alexander: And you don't.

Mr. Howard: I was saying that Nova Scotia was the place where a gentleman by the name of Robert Stanfield at one time was premier.

An hon. Member: Oh, don't give us that.

Mr. Howard: I was not referring particularly to black people. I am going to tell the hon. member this, through you, Mr. Speaker—if I want to talk about black people and their condition of poverty, I will do it directly.

Mr. Alexander: Then do it.

Mr. Howard: I have never shied away from that responsibility, just the same as I do not enjoy talking about the economic plight of native people, but it is necessary to talk about it. If the hon. member for Hamilton West wants to discuss the plight of the black people in light of this bill and the effect it will have on them, he has all my support to improve housing conditions for that group of people or any group of people.

Mr. Alexander: Get back to your original theme; you have lost it.

Mr. Howard: I think it ill behooves the hon. member for Hamilton West to stand up and exhibit that kind of sensitivity and level charges against me.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Howard: I have never invited them. The fact is that he is a Conservative and the Conservatives have a terrible history when it comes to dealing with the plight of people in terrible circumstances.

An hon. Member: That is not true.

Mr. Howard: The hon. member for Hamilton West or anybody else in the Conservative party should not attempt to cover that up.

Mr. Reilly: A point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Marshall: A point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Fraser: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Fraser) rises on a point of order.

Mr. Fraser: Mr. Speaker, I have listened to something in the last few minutes that, as a new member, I never thought I would have to listen to. I want to dissociate myself and other members from British Columbia from the remarks of the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard).

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. member rising on a point of order?

Mr. Marshall: Were you referring to me, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall). I do not recognize the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. Reilly), who should know that he can only address the House from his seat. The hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard).

Mr. Marshall: Mr. Speaker, I want—

Mr. Speaker: Would the hon. member resume his seat. The Chair recognizes the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe who seeks the floor on a point of order.

Mr. Marshall: Mr. Speaker, I think I have indicated in this House on many occasions the deplorable situation with regard to poverty-stricken people looking for housing, and for the hon. member to indicate that nobody but him has any concern for those people is absolutely ridiculous. I feel that the plight of the people of my district, whom I have mentioned on many occasions, and the deplorable condition of their housing is well understood or should be well understood. The hon. member should not take this particular direction without thinking that there are other members in this House who are just as concerned about the housing situation in all of Canada.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am sure all hon. members, including the hon. member for Skeena, appreciate the point being made by the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe. However, it is hardly a point of order. It is perhaps a point of debate. The hon. member has the right to speak in the debate and may want to make that point later. The hon. member for Skeena.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Speaker, I am proud to stand up in this House to speak on poverty and impoverished people. If the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Fraser) wants to dissociate himself from that attitude, that is his business.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Howard: Let me give an example of the concern for humanity that was exhibited a while ago which members of this House should think about when we are dealing with housing. The local of the B.C. Association of Non-Status Indians in Terrace has, as have other people of native background, taken advantage of a winter works program for which I believe there is $3.2 million available for all Canada. The purpose of this program is to assist in making homes a little more comfortable during the winter months for those who live in terrible housing conditions. The Mackenzie local in Terrace recently said, "Yes, we have a lot of members who live in poor housing conditions. Their homes are draughty and the average person would not want to live in them. But our people have to. We go through severe winters in Terrace, but the people north of us are far worse off than we are, and we want 50 per cent of the money allocated to this local for winter works programs to go to the people of northern British Columbia."

That is humanity, brotherhood, generosity and friendliness. If those feelings were exhibited by the people who draft legislation related to housing, and the people who deal with it in this House, we would be much better off and so would the people I have mentioned.

● (2140)

I have a paper in front of me which shows a number of pictures. I cannot put into words what these pictures show. An old Chinese proverb says that one picture is worth a thousand words. These are pictures of log cabins, old log homes, clapboard buildings and thin-roofed shacks. The best home in this set of pictures taken in northern British Columbia is a trailer. These are homes in which two or three generations of one family live, in which children must grow up.

That is why I asked the hon. member for Hamilton West—only because he offered—and particularly the minister in charge of housing, to live in one of these homes for one week and see what happens to people who live under these conditions. Let them see what happens to a child trying to do his homework when he is crowded into one or two rooms in which eight or ten people live. Let them see what happens to the health and dignity of people living under these intolerable conditions, why there is such a high suicide rate, a high alcoholic rate and high rate of drug use.

Anybody would turn to any sort of relief to get out of the desperate conditions under which those people must live. Those conditions are destructive of humanity. And this bill, Mr. Speaker, does not a single thing to help these people and relieve their deplorable conditions.

Not only native and Indian peoples are affected by these conditions. People who are not of Indian status also live under intolerable conditions. That is sufficient for me, regardless of the other aspects of the bill, regardless of the rip-off aspect, to vote against it.

This bill will simply provide a mechanism whereby mortgage and lending companies will get richer and richer at the expense of those who require decent homes. Apart from that, the fact that conditions such as I have described confront Indian people, Métis, native people, Caucasians in poor circumstances, black people and people of any race, colour or creed, and as this bill will not provide one bit of help to people in those economic circumstances, is sufficient reason for me to oppose it every inch of the way.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, of course this bill does not do the things which the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard) has suggested it does not do. Having read the bill—and apparently I am one of those in this House who has read it—I can say that Bill C-135 seeks to establish a mortgage exchange mechanism and a corporation into which lending institutions can put money which will be used for the supply of mortgages. In short, more money is to be made available for mortgages so that the demand may be met. That seems to be the purpose of the bill.

The hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) set out, for my party, our position on this bill. We suggested through the hon. member for York-Simcoe that this bill will not solve all the problems respecting the supply of money. Further, he said that we would be seeking to move certain amendments when the bill is in committee.

I realize that this bill will not do anything about interest rates. I do not think any party in this House, Liberal NDP, Créditiste or Conservative, has a monopoly on humanity or on feelings for people. I thing that anybody who represents constituents in this House as a member of parliament feels for people. People are people. Many of us were returned to this House with fairly large majorities. Clearly, each one of us was sent here by a certain segment of the Canadian people. Therefore, nobody has a monopoly on humanity. Let us hear no more of that sort of talk.

A man came to my office and said, when we were dealing with religion, that if a man has a bible in his hand and parades it in front of you and portrays what it says, you must watch him carefully to make sure he is a Christian. I say to the NDP that a man who pleads that he is always honest is a man to watch, for you must look into his motives. The NDP always plead that they stand for humanity. If they stand for humanity, they do not need to plead that, for humanity will know where they stand. We sat here quietly because we knew that the NDP wanted to filibuster this bill, and they have done a pretty good job. The Globe and Mail carried a pretty good exposé this morning of the real motives of the NDP. I do not always agree with the Globe and Mail, but in this instance I do.

One cannot help but appreciate the NDP. Outside this House they roar like lions; inside they only roar so long as there is no danger of toppling the government. One thing is certain. There is not a Liberal party in this House; there is only a mess made up of the NDP which wants to make sure that the government survives. That is the test. The hon. member for Skeena may try to roar like a lion, but he bleats like a lamb when it comes to supporting the government. That has been his record ever since January 4.

An hon. Member: Who supported the government on this bill?

Mr. Woolliams: I realize their motivation. I know what they are up to. Naturally they call out; they do not like what I say.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Woolliams: Naturally they want to shout and yell. I can hear them even at my end of the House. Their motivation is transparent. The Minister of Transport (Mr. Marchand) was absolutely right. They will vote with the government as long as it is convenient for their political souls.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Woolliams: I want to deal with one problem respecting interest rates. The interest rates of this nation certainly will not come down with the passage of this bill or following implementation of the bill that was supposed to amend the National Housing Act. It was my party, Mr. Speaker, that introduced amendments suggesting that interest rates on direct loans made by CMHC should not exceed by more than one-half a percentage point the cost of money to the government.

An hon. Member: And what happened?

[Mr. Woolliams.]

Mr. Woolliams: I have heard asses bray but I have never seen certain people look more like asses.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) has the floor.

Mr. Woolliams: We can only bring interest rates down, as I said earlier this week in the House, if the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) and the government come to grips with the Bank of Canada. The Bank of Canada sets the interest rates and lending institutions and banks set their prime rates about one percentage point higher. The Minister of Finance has said over and over again, on being questioned in the House, that if ever the monetary policy of the government differs from that of the Bank of Canada, the government will intervene. Only when this government has the guts to intervene with the Bank of Canada, which has increased interest rates five times since April, will the interest rates of this nation be controlled and be reduced.

If I may come back to where I started, this is merely a bill with respect to the exchange of mortgages and it will encourage lending institutions to make money available for mortgages. In other words, it will attempt to increase the supply of money and meet the demand for mortgages. That is all we are debating tonight. All the talk of the NDP is just so much show. I am sure that the members of that party respond to the kind of motivation and the kind of conscience that moved Woodsworth and Calder. However, some of them seem to have lost the very principles that created that party; and as they were created by principle, they will be destroyed without it.

[Translation]

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a few comments on the stormy discussions I have been hearing for a while now. We are considering Bill C-135 which, it seems, is aimed at providing the necessary capital for expansion in the construction field. Like many others, I regret that no provision was made in it regarding, for instance, the possibility of improving the lot of low or medium income people.

Now, I admit also—and I would like to be quite fair to the minister responsible—that capital is really needed. It is clear, in view of the effort being made to bring in better financing conditions in the construction field in general—that this bill is quite acceptable in itself, considering its purpose.

Now I still think, Mr. Speaker, that we should seriously consider the problem mentioned by the New Democratic Party, that is, the interest rates. Of course, we must make sure we obtain sufficient capital if we want to do better, but the important problem—and I believe that all hon. members are aware of it—is that which faces the individual, that is the problem of not being able to finance a house, which is a very natural desire for all of those who want to become homeowners.

I therefore believe that there is every reason for us to discuss the problem which was mentioned tonight. In view of the appeal made to the members of all political parties, I think that this would be a special occasion to force the government to reconsider this bill as concerns assistance to the individual. I have nothing against this bill as such but I regret, as so many other hon. members, that it seems to favour almost exclusively those who already have money.

Now, contrarily to what my friends of the New Democratic Party would like to suggest, namely that we should force the financial institutions to lend part of their assets at rates established by the government, I would not endorse a bill which would force those who have money to lend it at lower rates than the current market. However, I think the responsibility of the government is to give, for example, a discount of 5 per cent on the interest in order to enable the individual to take advantage of a rate which could be of about 6 per cent.

It is clear—and I think that we have the evidence under our eyes—that the financing of a house is now nearly impossible for an individual with average income. Henceforth, I think the problem raised by the hon. members of the New Democratic Party is very serious and they are right when they ask the responsible minister to set up mechanisms, or at least to make a reimbursement on the interest the individuals have to pay now.

It would be a golden opportunity to call a general election. Mr. Speaker, I would be in favour of the New Democratic Party moving a motion and inviting all hon. members to vote on this. I think they would be supported by many members and we would then have accomplished something really valid for society.

We talk about increases in the cost of living, we deplore them, we ask ourselves which political party is right, but when it comes to proposing a concrete motion, we are left hanging in midair because of words which unluckily are not followed by action.

So, if we are really sincere and serious when we talk of helping directly, those who are truly in need, let us have concrete proposals, let us appeal to the hon. members who can say yes when the time comes to give precedence to the interests of the individual over that of the parties; then, we will have achieved something worthwhile for the individual. We will have enabled many a citizen to own a decent home, which is the understandable wish of many Canadians.

I would also add that the government could also help the individual considerably by cancelling the 11 per cent sales tax on building materials. I know several hon. members have already talked about this. The bill does not deal with that, and so I shall not dwell on it. But I do believe that the minister should consider that possibility, because to limit ourselves to ensuring financial institutions their security is simply not good enough. The main problem is that of helping the individual and enabling him to buy a home, thus making a better man of him, who will be more interested in assuming his responsibilities. I do feel that the point the NDP brought up this evening, that is, the need to set the maximum interest rate at 6 per cent, is altogether welcome.

I hope that the hon. members will have the courage to discuss this matter and that they will invite the government or even force it if necessary, to act in that way. I think we should be able to do it in the present context. Thus, the individual could buy a house and Parliament would have accomplished something very valuable for society.

[English]

Mr. Symes: Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to say a few words on this bill, but as it is approaching the hour of adjournment I will call it ten o'clock.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Is it agreed we call it ten o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

HIGHWAYS—PROPOSED ROAD FROM MAINE THROUGH NEW BRUNSWICK TO QUEBEC—INVESTIGATION OF FEASIBILITY

Mr. J. Robert Howie (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, on Wednesday, September 12, I directed the following question to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau):

> Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the right hon. Prime Minister. In view of the strong support recently expressed by the Governor of the State of Maine for a direct corridor road from Maine through New Brunswick to Quebec, will the Prime Minister investigate the feasibility of such a project for the economic betterment of eastern Canada?

The Prime Minister replied:

> Mr. Speaker, naturally I want to be helpful to the Governor of Maine and to the hon. member if he is making a policy proposal. My understanding is that the people of the Maritimes are quite divided on this subject and that, depending on where you live in the Maritimes, you are either for or against that corridor road. However, I am certainly open to further persuasion, and if there is a unanimous resolution of the Conservative party, for instance, supporting this corridor road it would naturally influence me to try to do something pleasing to them.

Once the political venom is stripped away, it is mot apparent that the Prime Minister is not fully informed or yet impressed with the vital importance of the corridor road or the unity of our people in seeking it. Now is the time for every person of every political persuasion who favours this potentially great artery of commerce to unite in support of the project and dispel the myth that it is opposed by a large number of people.

With any great project or undertaking there are always those who are not in agreement and who speak against it. The hon. member for Madawaska-Victoria (Mr. Corbin) is one of these. These people have every right to express their views, but their views should not subordinate a fair and impartial investigation into the merits of the project. It is on the basis of fact, and not opinion, that this project should move forward or be dismissed. I have asked the Prime Minister to seek the truth that it may set him free of some of the suggestions which his answer indicates he has received. Indeed, if the Prime Minister's objective is to "see it as it is," I believe he will become a supporter of this project.

The corridor road is a straight line highway through the state of Maine from the province of New Brunswick and is created by the extension of Vanceboro-Lincoln road at the New Brunswick border to the outskirts of Sherbrooke, Quebec. Over such a road it would be some 400 miles from Fredericton to Montreal, compared with nearly 600 miles at the present time over Canadian highways or some 540 miles driving through the United States. In addition to the shorter mileage involved, the construction of the modern highway envisaged by the corridor road would create a modern, new, high-speed highway free of much of the strip development which impedes progress on large parts of most of our other highways, including the Trans-Canada Highway.

● (2200)

An investigation into the merits of the corridor road will, in my opinion, reveal it to be an important, indeed a vital component of any program for economic improvement of the region. A shorter route to the markets of Quebec and Ontario would give a tremendous impetus to highway transportation of all kinds, including freight haulers, furniture vans, tank trailers, car carriers, carriers of milled lumber and fresh and frozen fish products. It would improve our access to central Canadian markets and the port of Saint John, New Brunswick. It would also bring Canadians closer together in terms of distance.

I would like to quote a few paragraphs from an address by Colonel R. L. Houston, president of the Canada-Japan Trade Council, speaking at Saint John, New Brunswick, on the occasion of Port Day, Tuesday, May 1, 1973. He said:

> Because of my conviction that you face great questions with ramifications that extend far beyond local boundaries, I would like to speak tonight of several tasks which I believe you will have to tackle as a region, if the work you do and the progress you make as a local community is to realize the greatest possible benefits.
> You will have to tackle them collectively because, I suggest, the problems of economic development of Saint John are the problems of economic development of the Atlantic provinces, and these, in my estimation at least, are truly national problems with which all Canadians should be concerned. By acting together, you may be able to make this evident, and command a national effort necessary for their solution. But to do so, you will have to look on this as one region, and speak to the rest of Canada with one voice.
> The old maxim "divide and conquer" may be a little strong in this context, but you should be aware that "divide and relieve the pressure" is still a rule practised by most popularly elected governments. If you succumb to the temptation of short-term advantage, you may find yourself pitted against your natural allies and end up a long-term loser.

I do not want anyone to end up a loser, Mr. Speaker. I want our entire region to move forward. We can make it happen in the Maritimes if we develop the arteries of commerce, the corridor road, our ports, our power potential and a system of modern highways which would bring the good things of our country to every corner of Atlantic Canada and, indeed, to Canada as a whole.

We need investment in the Maritimes to challenge the enterprise of our people, not handouts. I believe investment in these arteries of commerce and the great infrastructures challenging Atlantic Canada will enable our provinces to take their place in the councils of our nation with dignity. I have asked the Prime Minister to investigate the merits of the corridor road, and if my expectations are met he will find it has great merit and should be placed high on the agenda when the next round of negotiations takes place with the United States of America.

It is not inconceivable that the building of the corridor road by the government of the United States could well be the quid pro quo forming part of a general agreement on a multiplicity of matters and could be accomplished without costing us a cent.

Mr. Ian Watson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I wish to respond to the question raised both by the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Howie) and by the hon. member for Madawaska-Victoria (Mr. Corbin) with regard to the feasibility of what one would call a main corridor between Quebec and New Brunswick.

This matter has been discussed in one form or another since the thirties. A referendum on the issue of bonds for the construction of a highway was turned down a few years ago by the voters of Maine. I am delighted to be answering tonight because I have a motion, number 57, on the list of private members' motions proposing a quid pro quo, the federal government spending money on the Alaska highway equivalent to what the Americans would spend building such a corridor across Maine. Thus we could get around the difficulty created by the Maine voters turning down the bond issue.

Officials of the Department of Transport have investigated two alternative routes which would connect the Sherbrooke and Fredericton areas by passing through the state of Maine. Both routes, bypassing the present Trans-Canada Highway, would be shorter and more direct than the Trans-Canada and either of them would undoubtedly prove of benefit to the maritime provinces.

It has been established that substantial benefits would accrue to any Canadian auto travellers or freight carriers who might use this route. I am personally convinced that there is no expenditure this government could make in the Maritimes that would have more long-term and immediate effect on the Maritimes than an arrangement with the United States government for the construction of such a corridor.

The second and more costly alternative would involve the construction of new highway sections in both Quebec and Maine so as to bypass a number of towns and shorten the distance. The total saving in distance could be from 125 miles to almost 200 miles depending on where you were going in New Brunswick. In fact, it would mean travelling to P.E.I. in seven or eight hours hard driving from Montreal and perhaps 12 to 13 hours from Toronto.

It is evident that in any decision eventually made regarding this highway there would have to be full consultation and agreement with all provinces affected by such a corridor, and this obviously would include Quebec and New Brunswick in particular. If the state of Maine through the State Department indicates its interest in the corridor to the government of Canada, the government will certainly give the matter most serious consideration.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION—NOVA SCOTIA—NEW INITIATIVES IN LIGHT OF RESIGNATION OF PROVINCIAL MINISTER OF DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, on September 12 I asked the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Jamieson) a question relating to the performance of DREE and possible new initiatives. Before mentioning some possibilities in this regard, let me deal very briefly with some of the policy statements made in the 1973-74 edition of the maritime provinces Chamber of Commerce report which I should like to put on the record. There are two major items which should be considered by this government and by the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion.

There are persistent reports that meaningful decentralization of DREE is being impeded by the reluctance of personnel of the department to relocate. I have concluded after some investigation that this is just not so. While at first this may seem reassuring, upon reflection I am not so sure it is. It appears there has been no opportunity for any reluctance on the part of employees of DREE to move, because the department has not even progressed to this stage of proceeding. It appears that no employees have been in fact classified or identified, and perhaps no employees have even been approached with the object of decentralization in mind. If this is so, it is perhaps even more disturbing than any allegation of reluctance because it indicates a lack of real progress.

I do not want to be cynical about decentralization as it is a very worth-while objective. I hope when it does come, the decision-making powers and not just bodies will be decentralized. I hope the minister is paying some heed to the recommendations of the Atlantic Development Council in their annual report for the establishment of a vehicle whereby provincial governments, the region as a group and the federal government can meet to discuss, plan and agree upon the needs of the region and the policies and the programs required to meet them.

In addition, Mr. Speaker, the foreign investment review act, Bill C-132, is obviously of great direct concern to DREE and to the slow-growth areas. As I have stated before, the aims and objects of this legislation are certainly in the national interest but the slow-growth areas of this nation may find the effects counterproductive to their own development.

This fear was reflected recently by the delegates to the convention of the Liberal party at the Chateau Laurier. The minister must, and I am confident that he will, take the opportunity to arrange for compensatory measures in order that slow-growth areas do not make more than their fair contribution to the effort to halt foreign domination of our economy. However, the slow-growth areas of this country need certain concessions. They do not need coercion; they need concessions in transport and fiscal policy and perhaps even with regard to tariffs. More than that, they definitely need some alternate source of development capital from some sort of Canadian investment or development corporation. We are looking to the minister of DREE to jealously guard and to zealously advance the interests of the slow-growth areas. His responsibilities will permit him to do no less.

I should also like to suggest to the minister that with regard to the Cape Breton Development Corporation he continue his enlightened and considered policies. The next step that perhaps he will consider is to appoint a person of some judicial or quasi-judicial background to continue the initiatives put in motion by himself and the committee on regional development to study and make recommendations on pensions and ancillary matters regarding Devco employees.

I want now, in the brief time left to me, to put on the record some of the recommendations of the maritime provinces Chamber of Commerce. This organization is a voluntary association of progressive business and professional citizens. It is politically non-partisan, is working for good government at all levels and is certainly concerned with the commercial, industrial and civic welfare of the Maritimes. It deserves to have, in my opinion, some real input into DREE policy. As a matter of fact, there are many other like organizations, a few of which are the Canadian Chamber of Commerce, the Northern Ontario Development Corporation, ADC, and in a real way the Canadian Labour Congress. All of these organizations have a great many sound and good policies that should be considered directly by the minister in his initiatives for DREE.

Many of the recommendations of the maritime provinces Chamber of Commerce are concerned with infrastructure. As the member who preceded me has said, some of the infrastructure concepts are fundamental to the development of the Atlantic region. The development of our marine resources, for example, is mentioned by the Chamber of Commerce. They also deal very directly and in some detail with the possibilities involved in the corridor road to which the hon. member has just referred, and come back again to this overriding concern at the moment regarding Bill C-132 and its possible effects on the region's development.

In closing, I want to quote briefly from the current policy statements of the maritime provinces Chamber of Commerce on this particular topic and to read their recommendation into the record as follows:

> That the maritime provinces make every effort to encourage new capital to the area, regardless of its source, and the Government of Canada be discouraged from implementing any national policy of limiting foreign investment in Canada without—

I emphasize the word "without".

> —taking into account regional considerations.

I hope the minister will take these representations into account when he is considering some of his options regarding regional development.

Mr. Charles Turner (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the minister, and in the absence of his parliamentary secretary, the hon. member for St. Denis (Mr. Prud'homme), I wish to reply to the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay).

The hon. member is aware from the minister's reply in the question period last Wednesday that he has had discussions with the new chairman of the Atlantic Development Council respecting DREE's role and effectiveness in the Atlantic provinces. The minister also mentioned that he would be meeting premiers from the three maritime provinces on the same subject at the council of maritime premiers. This will take place next Monday in Summerside.

With respect to DREE initiatives in Nova Scotia, the hon. member may wish to know that negotiations are proceeding very well. The details of a general development agreement are being worked out between officials of DREE and senior representatives of the Nova Scotia government. There are also a number of joint task forces considering specific areas for new initiatives. This federal-provincial effort is, of course, in addition to the regional development incentive program which is available throughout Nova Scotia as well as the special areas program which applies to the Strait of Canso and Halifax-Dartmouth areas. The minister will be making announcements respecting new initiatives as formal agreements are concluded with the government of Nova Scotia.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION—DATE OF TABLING OF PROGRAM FOR NORTHERN ONTARIO—HIRING OF PERSONNEL FOR NORTHERN ONTARIO OFFICES

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, on June 11, three months ago, I asked the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Jamieson) if he could inform the House what action the government was intending to take with respect to economic development in northern Ontario. The minister at that time advised me that his department was holding meetings with the provincial government and that another meeting was scheduled for the week of June 18. He also said:

> One of the preliminary matters they will be discussing is ways and means by which we can make a bigger impact on regional development in northern Ontario.

Yet yesterday, when I asked the minister whether he could inform us when the government intends to table its program for industrial development in northern Ontario, I was treated to the standard answer. He said:

> I do not know the precise date but . . . the negotiations with the government of Ontario are proceeding very well.

He then predicted that it should not take more than a matter of a month or a few weeks. I must say that until very recently I was finding it somewhat difficult to believe that these much heralded talks were actually taking place. My worry now, however, is whether they are ever going to end. By the way, Mr. Speaker, I am not suggesting that the federal Liberals and the provincial Tories should stop talking altogether. In northern Ontario we have been listening to the Liberals for 50 years, and the Tories for 30, and if they ever stopped talking, the silence would be absolutely deafening. What I am saying is that it is time they started doing something beside holding tea parties in Toronto and Ottawa.

The minister can surely not say that he has not been made aware of the realities of northern Ontario. Our problems are most serious and pressing. The minister has assured me on countless occasions that he knows what our problems are. He has assured me that he shares my sense of urgency. I say that if this is so, it is time he did something about it.

We heard a good deal about the so-called reorganization of DREE. I want to talk about this because I think it points up very accurately the complete lack of sensitivity and even common sense on the part of this government toward those areas which are in need of solutions, not empty gestures. For all the foo-farra about decentralization, which I think is an excellent program when carried out with some intelligence, what happens in Ontario? We get a regional office in Toronto. Yes, we get a sub-office in Thunder Bay. But I want to know, why should an office dealing with regional economic disparities in Northern Ontario be located in Toronto?

If anything has contributed to the underdevelopment of northern Ontario, it has been the centralization of government and everything else in Toronto and the consequent insensitivity to, and ignorance of, the needs of the north. I note that the Maritimes will have six offices for an area smaller than northern Ontario in geographic size and not much bigger in population, while northern Ontario will have only one.

The Maritimes surely need the six offices, but by the same token northern Ontario needs more than a sub-office in Thunder Bay. Indeed, where do the plans for decentralization stand at this time? Just last week the minister was quoted as saying that public servants with roots in Ottawa are throwing a monkeywrench into DREE's decentralization machinery. Yet the Public Service Alliance spokesman for these employees says that not one DREE employee has been asked to move to a regional post. It is the middle of September and apparently nobody has been asked to move yet.

I call on the minister to get serious about decentralization of DREE. If he cannot get civil servants in Ottawa to move to northern Ontario, I point out to him that there are many capable and experienced people in northern Ontario who could be seconded by the government to staff DREE offices there.

● (2220)

I call on the government to become serious about the disadvantaged area of northern Ontario. At present there are nine Liberal seats out of a possible 12 in northern Ontario. I suggest that unless this government becomes far more serious about our area than it has shown itself to be in the past and present, it will not have many of those seats left after the next federal election.

Mr. Charles Turner (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I wish to reply to the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez) on the minister's behalf. There has been considerable progress in the discussions between officials of DREE and the government of Ontario. Hon. members will be aware that in May and June the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Jamieson) met with each of the provincial governments to consider ways in which DREE programs and policies could be more effectively utilized throughout Canada. This action was well received by the provinces, and joint federal-provincial working parties have since been dealing with the details of new general development agreements. The minister has also had discussions with elected officials from northern Canada and with the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Chrétien) on the extension of DREE activities in the north.

The negotiations with the province of Ontario are proceeding very well. However, the approach being considered is much broader than that which the hon. member may have had in mind when he referred, in his question to the minister on Monday, to a program of industrial development. Industrial development is part of it, but also included in the over-all package under consideration with the province of Ontario will be socially-oriented programs, community services, service industries, as well as tourism. This broader approach appears to be most desirable and is in accord with the objectives of the decentralization to which the hon. member has referred. Announcements will be made when the minister has received the necessary authority and formal agreements have been completed with the province.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.24 p.m.

PRIVILEGE

MR. JELINEK—ALLEGED CONFLICT OF INTEREST RESPECTING TELEVISION COVERAGE OF OLYMPIC GAMES—ATTEMPT TO INTIMIDATE

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege dealing with a matter which has now been made public through the media and as a result my integrity in debating and voting on matters concerning the public business that comes before this chamber may be questioned by a portion of the public.

The facts are that during the oral question period on Monday, September 17, I directed a question to the Prime Minister concerning television coverage of the Olympic games. The question and answer are to be found on page 6626 of Hansard. At about 4.30 that afternoon I received a telephone call in my parliamentary office. The caller identified himself as an employee of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. He refused to give his name. He stated he wanted to do me a favour, namely, to warn me to cease asking further questions on the subject I had raised that afternoon in the oral question period. Otherwise, he continued, it would be publicly alleged that I had a contract with CTV and therefore a conflict of interest.

The following day, yesterday, I attempted to be recognized during the oral question period without success. However, upon going into the opposition lobby when the question period ended I received another telephone call. This time, in less courteous terms, I was told that for my own good I had better lay off my inquiries into the television coverage of the Olympic games. Again, the caller did not identify himself by name.

I need not cite to you, Mr. Speaker, the precedents which establish how seriously the House regards any attempt to intimidate a member in the performance of his duties. I also need not point out to all hon. members how difficult it can be for a member to refute allegations made against him of conflict of interest. It is extremely difficult, sometimes impossible, for him to do this by himself. When the accuser is nameless, the member cannot have recourse to the courts to clear his name. I therefore take this opportunity to assure the House that in no way am I involved in a conflict of interest in this matter or in any other. Should any member feel disposed to call me before a standing committee of the House to investigate this matter, I would be more than willing to comply.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for High Park-Humber Valley has given the Chair the notice required under the Standing Order. Since receiving the notice I have had an opportunity to consider all aspects of the matter raised by the hon. member.

The House will appreciate that there is some difficulty in finding a prima facie case of privilege in circumstances where no charge has been made and there has been no suggestion in the House of any irregularity or impropriety. There is really nothing for the House or one of its committees to consider under the heading of privilege. Indeed, we have no motion before us to this effect. At the same time, I have no hesitation in reaffirming the principle that parliamentary privilege includes the right of a member to discharge his responsibilities as a member of the House free from threats or attempts at intimidation.

The hon. member has made his position clear. In view of all circumstances, I would think no further action by the House should be required at this time.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I rise on the question of privilege. I just want to say, in view of the absence of the minister responsible for the CBC, that I can say without any danger that any person alleging to be speaking on behalf of the CBC would obviously be lying. I do not believe there was any indication in the hon. member's statement that he was impugning the CBC for acting in this way. I just want to assure him that it is inconceivable to me, and I am sure to the House, that the CBC would approach a member of parliament in that way.

• (1410)

Mr. Baldwin: If the Prime Minister wants to wait until the minister returns to defend the action of the CBC, then I think we should have a debate on the issue.

Mr. Speaker: I would assume it is not the wish of hon. members that this matter be sent to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections. I am sure hon. members are not serious in making that suggestion. I am sure the hon. member for High Park-Humber Valley does not suggest that his conduct should be sent to the committee for consideration or investigation by it.

My suggestion is that the situation is very clear, very simple and uncomplicated. The hon. member has indicated what the facts of the situation are. We have to accept his statement that these are the facts, and in the circumstances I suggest that nothing at all would be gained by having a debate, either in the House or in a committee, on the matter raised by the hon. member for High Park-Humber Valley.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, on the same point and despite what you have said, I point out to Your Honour that the hon. member who raised the point of privilege informed the House that someone who would not give his name, and who represented himself to be an employee of the CBC, said certain things. I rise because the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin), on the basis of that kind of statement, said that the CBC had to be defended. I think that is shameful.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lewis: There is not a title of evidence that it was an employee of the CBC, and even less evidence that the CBC had anything to do with it. For the hon. member for Peace River to take this opportunity to show his prejudice against this publicly owned company is shameful.

Some hon. Members: Hear hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. By this time perhaps hon. members will agree that there was some wisdom in the suggestion of the Chair that the matter should not be pursued.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) suggested that my conduct was shameful. I had the opportunity to hear what the hon. member who raised the question of privilege had to say. While there may be some doubt about the evidence, in my opinion he made a very strong case and I think I was entitled to say what I did.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baldwin: If these babblers over yonder want to go on record as saying that if the CBC did these things it should be defended, let them do so.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I seek the co-operation of hon. members. It seems to me that we are getting away from the point raised originally by the member for High Park-Humber Valley. There is now a debate over alleged conduct of the CBC. I doubt whether we should get involved in debate on this point.

Mr. Lewis: I am very sorry, Mr. Speaker, but the last words of the hon. member for Peace River are even more shameful. If there were the slighest evidence that the CBC had anything to do with this, of course I would be condemning it as much as anyone else. The hon. member had no right to say what he did.

Mr. Baldwin: I said it, and I am damned glad I did.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps we might move to the next item of business. Possibly it will be less contentious than this one.

TRANSPORT

RIGHTS OF NEWFOUNDLAND UNDER TERMS OF UNION WITH CANADA—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Walter C. Carter (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43 I rise to present a motion of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the serious problems with respect to the transportation of goods, etc., from the Canadian mainland to the province of Newfoundland and the Minister of Transport's obvious attempt to ignore the constitutional rights of Newfoundlanders, as agreed to in the Terms of Union between Newfoundland and Canada in 1949, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate (Mr. Lundrigan):

That this House instruct the Minister of Transport to ensure that the constitutional rights of the province of Newfoundland as agreed to under Term 32 in the Terms of Union shall be upheld.

And I further move:

That this House disassociate itself from the derogatory remark made by the Minister of Transport, as cited on page 6670 of Hansard.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent.

IMPRISONMENT OF RONALD PATRICK LIPPERT IN CUBA—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, I rise to request unanimous consent to move a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43 and I hope, in the interests of a Canadian in distress abroad, that the House will consider unanimous consent.

In view of the statement made yesterday morning in Gander, Newfoundland, by Prime Minister Fidel Castro of Cuba that he is willing to examine the case of Canadian citizen, Ronald Patrick Lippert, imprisoned in Cuba for the past ten years, this House respectfully requests the Prime Minister of Canada to personally take up with Premier Castro the matter of possible release for Mr. Lippert as soon as possible.

Mr. Speaker: Under the provisions of Standing Order 43 this motion also requires unanimous consent.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent.

BENEFITS AND PRIVILEGES ACCORDED NEW DEMOCRATS AS OPPOSITION PARTY—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps I might refer to a small incident which happened yesterday when the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Cossitt) proposed a motion under Standing Order 43 which had reference to the position of the New Democratic Party in the House. I was looking at the hon. member and he was looking in the direction of the Chair as he proposed this motion, and I think we agreed that his motion was perhaps actually made with tongue in cheek. The Chair took it that this was so, and in conversation the hon. member has confirmed to me that he really did not expect that the Chair would put the motion. It was on this basis and in the same vein that I said the matter would be taken under advisement. I regret very much if either the motion of the hon. member or the comment of the Chair was taken too seriously.

INDIAN AFFAIRS AND NORTHERN DEVELOPMENT

CONCURRENCE IN SECOND REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

On the order: Motions:

April 4, 1973—Mr. Howard:

That the second report of the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development, presented to the House on April 4, 1973, be concurred in.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I should like to proceed with this motion today if I may.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member wishes to proceed with the motion. As he knows, a point of order was raised previously. I would be pleased to hear him on the point of order, and this time the matter would be taken under advisement seriously. In view of the importance of the point of order which was raised before and debated in the House I would be prepared to make a ruling, and I am sure this is what the hon. member has in mind.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Speaker, the motion relates to endorsement of the second report of the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development which made some recommendations to the House on the subject matter of aboriginal rights. It asks the House to endorse the concept of aboriginal rights. A preceding motion dealing with the same report and the same subject matter was introduced and moved by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald) some months ago. It was debated for one whole day and, as I understand the procedure and rules, was subsequently transferred to government orders. Therefore it is lost to the House and cannot be revived unless the government should think it worth while to do so.

There is a rule in Beauchesne called the anticipation rule. It is Citation 131, and I should like to read the first paragraph:

In determining whether a discussion is out of order on the ground of anticipation, regard shall be had by Mr. Speaker to the probability of the matter anticipated being brought before the House within a reasonable time.

I think my motion can only be ruled out of order on the ground of anticipation, because the preceding debate was held to be in order. It is the question of the determination by Mr. Speaker of the probability of the subject matter of the motion, namely, aboriginal rights, and the report of the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development being brought before the House within a reasonable period of time that should be settled. It is some five months since the motion of the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands for concurrence in the second report of the committee was brought before the House, debated and then moved from motions to government orders.

• (1420)

The anticipation rule has been in the rules of procedure of the House for many years prior to 1968-69 when the House embarked upon a new structure and concept regarding the operation of the standing committees. The rules at that time were revised to give the standing committees of the House a much larger role than they had had previously. For example, estimates are automatically referred to committees. The practice of referring annual reports of departments or agencies of government is now commonplace. The practice of establishing special committees such as the Food Prices Committee is more commonplace now than prior to 1969. Therefore, I think the anticipation rule must be read in conjunction with what parliament has conceived shall be the function and role of committees.

This House referred a certain subject matter to the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development. That committee saw fit to make a recommendation to the House on April 3 or 4 on the subject matter of aboriginal rights. I believe that not only is the House entitled to expect reports from committees to which it refers subject matters, but if a committee of the House, which is a committee of all the House and not just one part of it, makes recommendations the House of Commons which set up the committee and referred the subject matter to it is entitled also to be able to approve or disapprove of the recommendations. It should be able to respond by vote to the particular recommendations of any committee.

I submit that the government is abusing the principal concept of the rule of anticipation with respect to the House making a decision about a subject matter referred to a committee, about which the committee has made a recommendation. The government has virtually swept aside the question of aboriginal rights and has virtually denied the House the opportunity to pass judgment on the recommendations of that committee. At no time since April, when the subject matter was debated, has the leader of the House once indicated that the motion under government orders standing in the name of the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands for concurrence in the second report of the standing committee would be listed as an item to be brought forward for debate in the House. At no time in the discussions between House leaders has there been any indication that the subject matter to which I have referred is to be entered on the agenda for debate.

There is no expectation whatsoever that the subject matter of aboriginal rights, under the heading of the motion moved by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands, will be brought forward again by the government.

I submit, therefore, that Your Honour must look at this matter in light of the probability of the matter anticipated, the second report of the Indian affairs committee, being brought before the House within a reasonable time. That is not a valid expectation. The government has declared that it has no intention of letting that subject matter come to a vote. The Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Chrétien) has said he is not going to permit parliament to vote upon the report of that committee because he disagrees with it. In a parliamentary democracy such as we operate under, no one man should be able to deny the will of the majority to vote upon a matter. That is what is involved.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Will the hon. member please resume his seat. The Minister rises on a question of privilege. Perhaps the hon. member will allow the Chair to hear the minister, after which I will continue to hear the hon. member.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard) said that I denied or refused something or said that this matter will never be debated. I never said that and I ask the hon. member to withdraw that statement.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I really do not think that the hon. member for Skeena has to withdraw the allegation. This is debate between the hon. member and the minister. We are on a point of order. The minister can take part in the debate on the point of order. We have until five or six o'clock this afternoon, so that we have ample time to hear the hon. member, the minister, and others who may want to take part in this interesting discussion.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Speaker, that was a very wise decision you made. Even though there was not a question of privilege, and the minister knew it, if the minister is now saying that he is prepared to bring that item before the House again for debate and vote, I will gladly sit down and withdraw my motion. Will the minister say that? No, he will not. That indicates that Your Honour must ask yourself about the probability of the matter anticipated, the second report of the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development relating to aboriginal rights, being brought before the House within a reasonable time. I think one must conclude it will not be brought before the House within a reasonable time. As far as the government is concerned, it will not be brought forward at all during this session. Therefore this motion should be held to be in order so that the House can proceed to debate the issue and vote on whether the House endorses the concept of aboriginal rights rather than one man denying the House that opportunity as is the case at the moment.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member will appreciate what was indicated to him earlier in the debate, that perhaps the Chair should take the matter under advisement. The objection of the Chair, of course, is not to the regularity of the motion in the sense that it can be allowed to stay on the order paper. The question is whether it can be debated at this or another time while the other motion is still before the House under government orders. That is the difficulty of the Chair. The hon. member has presented an interesting argument which will be considered in due course.

2. Will the government undertake to provide the following information (a) is Light-Servicos De Electricidade SA, Rio de Janeiro owned in any part by Brascan and, if so, for what percentage (b) was Brascan formerly called Brazilian Traction Light and Power Company and were Messrs. Mitchell Sharp, Robert Winters and Jack Nicholson at one time officers in this company (c) does the government plan to acquire a share in Brascan similar to the negotiations of the British Columbia government to purchase interest in a Brascan coal venture (Sukunica, in the Peace River vicinity)?

Mr. John M. Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, in so far as Export Development Corporation is concerned: 1. AMARANTH RED No. 2

Question No. 2,217—Mr. Reynolds:

1. Is the government considering banning a substance called Amaranth Red No. 2 or simply, Red 2, currently used in a large variety of foods, drinks and cosmetics?

2. What research has the Food and Drug Directorate made into Red 2 and the reported harmful effects it is having on human reproduction?

3. What input has the Canadian Food and Drug Directorate had towards the FDA in the United States on Red 2 and what feedback from the FDA have we received?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): 1. Amaranth (or FD and C Red No. 2, as it is called in the United States) has been the subject of intensive international investigation since 1970, yet results are still inconclusive. As recently as 1972, a sub-committee of the National Academy of Sciences recommended that there was insufficient reason to take measures to reduce the extent of human exposure to this food colour. Based upon all currently available scientific information regarding the levels of use and toxicological data on amaranth, the Department is of the opinion that no restrictive action is warranted at this time.

2. The Health Protection Branch maintains close contact with scientists engaged in this work in the United States and in other parts of the world.

3. Results of international investigation have been inconclusive, although tests presently being conducted by the United States' Food and Drug Administration are expected to provide more conclusive data. Correspondence and direct communication is continuing between Health Protection Branch scientists and their U.S. counterparts to ensure that action appropriate to the findings may be quickly taken.

HEAVY ICEBREAKERS—INTERNATIONAL STANDARDS

Question No. 2,343—Mr. Forrestall:

Do all heavy icebreakers, as listed in answer to Question No. 1,900, conform with internationally accepted standards as laid down by "Janes Fighting Ships" and, if not, whose description of heavy icebreaker do they meet?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): "Janes Fighting Ships" is not a regulatory society and does not prescribe standards for ships. The term "heavy icebreaker" describes an icebreaker with a minimum of 9,000 shaft horsepower capable of operating in the continuous mode through first year sea ice up to three feet thick and is a Canadian Coast Guard designation.

FREIGHT RATE SUBSIDIES TO AID ATLANTIC REGION SHIPPERS

Question No. 2,522—Mr. Marshall:

1. Has the Federal-Provincial Committee on Atlantic Region Transportation finalized recommendations for selective increases in westbound freight rate subsidies to aid Atlantic Region shippers in reaching central Canadian markets?

2. What is the general basis of eligibility under selectivity criteria developed?

3. Have shippers submitted to their respective provincial governments the names of the commodities which they wish to have considered and, if so, what are they?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): 1. The Federal-Provincial Committee on Altantic Region Transportation is in the process of receiving suggestions from companies in the region for commodities to which an additional westbound subsidy might apply. Response to an advertisement seeking this input run by provincial governments in the regional press at the end of July is not yet complete.

2. The general guidelines for eligibility were outlined in the advertisement as follows: (a) Eligibility will be determined on a selective basis for manufactured commodities using as a selection basis the degree of economic activity in the region associated with their manufacturer. (b) Most agricultural and fisheries products will be eligible. (c) Movements of import and export commodities will not be eligible. (d) The additional subsidies shall be paid initially directly to carriers by the Federal Government on the basis of waybills submitted. It is the intention to pay the additional subsidies only to those carriers whose filed rates reflect reductions corresponding to the increased amount of subsidy. (e) Individual shipments having a total freight cost of less than $100 will not be eligible. (f) Industries producing commodities not considered to be eligible, and industries producing new commodities not moving westbound from the select territory at the time of the initial commodity review will be able to apply for a reassessment of their eligibility.

3. Response to question 1 covers this item.

RENTS ON INDIAN RESERVATIONS

Question No. 2,524—Mr. Godin:

1. What organization regulates the level of rents on Indian reservations?

[Mr. Reid.]

2. On Indian reservations, are tenants exempted from paying school and municipal taxes on single-family or apartment dwellings?

3. What is the average rental cost, per square foot, on Indian reservations in (a) Manitoba (b) Ontario (c) Quebec?

Hon. Jean Chretien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): 1. Individual home owners set the rental rate of individually owned houses on reserves. Similarly, Band Councils set the rental rate of Band owned units on reserves. There are instances where government-owned housing units are located on Indian Reserve land and the rental for these are established by Federal Government regulations. There are no other agencies which regulate the levels of rent for houses on Indian Reserves.

2. Indians living on reservations do not pay school and municipal taxes. However, the interests of a non-Indian in leased reserve lands, including buildings thereon, pursuant to provincial legislation is liable for local realty assessment and taxation in all provinces except Alberta and Saskatchewan. In these latter two provinces although the provinces may retain this right, it is not utilized. There are instances where Indian Bands sometimes charge "user fees" to Indian occupants of single family dwellings for the purpose of off-setting costs of repair, maintenance and perhaps reconstruction of utility service lines. However, such user fees are not considered taxes.

3. As the Department of Indian and Northern Affairs does not control rents charged for housing on Indian Reserves, it does not have any information regarding the average rental costs per square foot on Indian Reserves in (a) Manitoba, (b) Ontario or (c) Quebec.

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY SYSTEM IMPROVEMENTS

Question No. 2,547—Mr. McCain:

1. What major developments are planned for improvements and repairs to the St. Lawrence Seaway system over the next ten years?

2. (a) What is the Canadian share of the estimated cost of these future additions and developments (b) at what times is construction estimated to begin?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): The St. Lawrence Seaway Authority advises as follows: 1. (i) The installation of a ship alignment and mooring system at Lock 7 of the Welland Canal. This is an installation of mechanical devices, designed to guide vessels into and out of a lock chamber and to provide an independent means of holding a vessel in a predetermined position during the lockage operation. (ii) A study programme which will indicate the technical feasibility, environmental acceptability and economic justification for extending the navigation season. (iii) The following three developments and improvements related to computerized traffic control in the Seaway: An integrated marine traffic information and control system, which is a computerized system to enhance marine safety, increase the efficiency of moving cargo through the Seaway and so extend the capacity and life of the present facilities. An automated vessel location and identification system. This is a sub-system of the traffic control system described above to automatically identify and track vessels to further enhance safety and scheduling by continuously monitoring vessel positions using the input of transponder signals from the ships into the computers. A Seaway information service. This system is a revenue-producing by-product of the above traffic control system whereby information concerning vessel movements will be available to industry upon subscription.

2. (a) (i) 100 per cent Canadian. (ii) The Canadian study program will be paid for entirely by Canada. In the same manner, U.S. study programs are paid entirely by the U.S. (iii) Integrated Marine Traffic Information and Control System, 86 per cent. Automatic Vessel Location and Identification System—cost sharing agreements not yet completed. Seaway Information System, 100 per cent. (b) (i) 1974. (ii) Study program to begin in 1974. (iii) Integrated Marine Traffic Information and Control System, 1973. Automatic Vessel Location and Identification System, 1974. Seaway Information System, 1973.

Order Paper Questions

ROUYN AIRPORT

Question No. 2,558—Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue):

Has the Department of Transport completed any studies of the airport at Rouyn in view of (a) making repairs (b) lengthening the landing strip in order to facilitate the landing of DC-9 jetliners and, if so (i) on what date is the work scheduled to start (ii) what amount of money will be attributed to these alterations?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): On June 6 a contract for an economic study was arranged with Mr. Jean-Pierre Brassard, Bureau of Management Consulting, Place Canada, Montreal. This Economic study includes not only the Rouyn Airport but also Val-d'Or Airport and the D.N.D. requirements for that location. This Economic study is forecast to be completed by September 20, 1973. The Ministry will not be making any decision on major improvements to the Rouyn Airport until this study is complete.

R-CLASS ICEBREAKERS IN CANADA'S ARCTIC ARCHIPELAGO

Question No. 2,563—Mr. Forrestall:

1. With reference to the answer to Question No. 2,229 (2), what specific usefulness in Canada's Arctic Archipelago will the proposed R-Class icebreakers, with a capability for continuous progress through only 3 foot ice have, in light of the fact that new ice normally attains a thickness of five to six feet in the first year, and grows to eight or nine feet in its second year of accumulation, in terms of length of operation, in areas of operation as defined by the Arctic Shipping Safety Control Zones (a) during the short summer shipping season (b) outside the short summer shipping season?

2. Does the government intend to employ any of the proposed R-Class icebreakers in Canada's Arctic Archipelago and, if so, at what approximate dates will such deployment be made?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): 1. (a) Based on a short summer shipping season of July 23-October 25 for Hudson Strait, Hudson Bay and Lower Arctic and of August 1-October 15 for Lancaster Sound and the eastern High Arctic, the R-Class Icebreakers will be able to operate in these areas without restriction throughout the short summer shipping season in the Arctic. (b) The R-Class Icebreakers will be capable of effective operations, outside the short summer shipping season, in areas and for periods of operation as follows:

Zone	Extended Operations Season
3	July 25-August 1
4	July 20-July 23 and October 25-November 5
6	October 15-November 20
7	July 20-July 23 and October 25-December 15
8	July 20-July 23 and October 25-December 31
9	July 20-July 23 and October 25-January 20
10	July 15-July 23 and October 25-January 25

Zone	Extended Operations Season
11	July 5-July 23 and October 25-December 15
12	June 10-July 23 and October 25-December 31
13	June 10-August 1 and October 15-December 31
14	June 20-July 23 and October 25-January 16
15	June 20-July 23 and October 25-January 31
16	June 5-July 23 and October 25-January 10

2. Yes. The Ministry of Transport intends to employ the R-Class Icebreakers in the Arctic from approximately July 1 to October 31 each year during which period of time commercial shipping, with its limited icebreaking capability, is operating in the Arctic Archipelago.

R-CLASS ICEBREAKERS AS SUBSTITUTE FOR POLAR-CLASS ICEBREAKER

Question No. 2,564—Mr. Forrestall:

With reference to the answer to Question No. 2,229 (2), does the government intend in any way to employ the proposed R-Class icebreakers as a substitute for a large, truly polar-class icebreaker with capability for virtual twelve-month operations in assist to extractive and other operations in Canada's Arctic Archipelago?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): No, but depending on conditions, they may well be used to supplement the operations of any larger class icebreaker.

SPEED OF PROPOSED R-CLASS ICEBREAKERS

Question No. 2,565—Mr. Forrestall:

1. What maximum speed, and what minimum speed will the proposed R-Class icebreakers be able to maintain in the continuous progress made in, for example, search and rescue operations, for each of the Zones as outlined in the Arctic Shipping Safety Control Zones, for each of the months from July to February?

2. What alternative icebreaker facilities will be available from the Canadian Coast Guard to assist in search and rescue operations, and particularly rescue functions, for the months in which the proposed R-Class icebreakers are of absolutely no use in specific Zones as outlined in Part 1?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): 1. Depending upon the existing ice conditions found in the Zones between July and February which vary greatly from open water to multi-year ice of up to 9 foot thickness, the continuous progress mode speed of the R-Class Icebreaker will likewise vary from a maximum of 16 knots to a minimum of zero knots.

2. Bearing in mind that commercial traffic is not presently in the north prior to July 1 or after October 31 each year, and that no marine search and rescue incidents are normally to be expected outside this period, the CCGS Louis S. St. Laurent and the CCGS John A. Macdonald would be made available to assist in any search and rescue operations that may occur beyond the seasonal operating period of the R-Class Icebreakers in the north.

[Mr. Marchand (Langelier).]

DREE—GRANT TO SAUNDERS AIRCRAFT CORPORATION, GIMLI, MANITOBA

Question No. 2,587—Mr. Rowland:

1. Has Saunders Aircraft Corporation of Gimli, Manitoba applied for a grant from the Department of Regional Economic Expansion?

2. Has such a grant, subject to the usual conditions, been approved and, if so, for what amount?

3. Has the amount agreed upon been paid to Saunders Aircraft Corporation and, if not, for what reason?

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): The answer for the Department of Regional Economic Expansion is as follows: 1. Yes.

2. Yes, $996,000—based upon estimated capital costs of $1,550,000 and an estimated 405 jobs to be created.

3. Although the full amount has not been paid, the company has received an initial payment of $257,424 on the basis of the eligible capital costs incurred and an estimated 146 jobs created in respect of Phase I of the project.

PROPOSED SEISMIC TESTS TO BE CARRIED OUT BY E.M.R.

Question No. 2,625—Mr. Orlikow:

1. Did representatives of the community at Coral Harbour in the Northwest Territories meet with officials of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development in June, 1973, to discuss proposed seismic tests to be carried out by the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources?

2. Did spokesmen for the community make clear to the officials present that they opposed any tests which might harm the land and waters before a settlement of their land claims was reached?

3. Was the request transmitted to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and Energy, Mines and Resources?

4. (a) Were the proposed experiments carried out in the vicinity of Coral Harbour and, if so, for what reason (b) were further discussions held with the representatives of the local people to explain the reasons why their requests had been ignored?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): 1. Yes.

2. Yes.

3. Yes.

4. (a) No; (b) not applicable.

IMPORT DUTIES ON MOBILE HOMES

Question No. 2,649—Mr. Reynolds:

1. On what date does the Minister of Finance plan to reinstate the recent 2½ per cent reduction in import duties on mobile homes?

2. Does this policy adversely affect Canadian manufacturers to the benefit of United States manufacturers?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): 1. The legislation which implemented the tariff reduction on mobile homes provides that the reduced tariff rate will remain in effect for one year from February 19, 1973. The legislation also provides authority for the restoration of the pre-Budget rates by Order in Council in instances where, in the view of the Government, the tariff reductions have caused or are causing genuine hardship for Canadian producers and their employees.

2. Members of the industry have alleged that they are facing hardships as a result of the tariff reduction. As indicated on pages 5724 and 5725 of Hansard of July 17, 1973, officials of the Department of Finance wrote to the Canadian Mobile Home and Travel Trailer Association in May asking that a date be set for a meeting to discuss the industry's representations. The Association was also asked to provide further information in support of the representations. To date there has only been an acknowledgment from the Association.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

GRANTS IN AID TO BILINGUALISM

Question No. 772—Mr. Matte:

1. What amounts were granted in aid to bilingualism in 1968, 1969, 1970, 1971 and 1972 in (a) the Province of Quebec (b) the other provinces?

2. How many of the bills introduced during the 4th Session of the 28th Parliament were originally drafted in French?

Return tabled.

Mr. Lawrence: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Not quite two weeks ago today Your Honour ruled me out of order when I attempted to ask an oral question relating to a matter about which we are actually in special session, namely, the estimated cost of the Food Prices Review Board. Your Honour indicated that it should be placed on the order paper. I immediately placed the question on the order paper. The answer must be within the immediate knowledge of the government, and if there is to be an honest attempt on both sides of the House to sharpen up the question period I certainly think some of these urgent questions should be answered more quickly.

• (1430)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Cossitt: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order with regard to questions 2271 to 2280 inclusive requesting the names of lawyers whose services are being used by the government in the various provinces to carry out legal work. This is the sixth time I have raised a similar point of order. On the last occasion, one week ago today, the parliamentary secretary told the House he had not yet obtained definite information from the Department of Justice as to when answers would be forthcoming. I would think that by now some definite information should be available. I might add that I have been seeking this information since last April. Possibly, the Minister of Justice can enlighten the House as to when this information will be supplied. May I say that because the disclosure of certain information would be embarrassing to the government is a darn poor excuse for withholding it from the Canadian public.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, I, too, rise on a point of order with respect to a question I put down two months ago, No. 2414, an important question dealing with the Opportunities for Youth program. I think members of the House are entitled to the information which is being sought.

Mr. Stackhouse: Mr. Speaker, I should like to rise on a point of order to say that certain questions which I placed on the order paper last February and March have remained unanswered. I can well appreciate that the information, which I am sure is known to the government, might be embarrasing to the Prime Minister and to members of the cabinet if it were disclosed, but it would certainly be useful to the public. I would welcome an answer to these questions at a very early date.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I, too, rise on a point of order respecting questions placed on the order paper. I bring this matter to your attention because of the strange things that are happening between the government and the Cape Breton Development Corporation, including the fact that the senior partner of the law firm representing the miners suddenly found himself on the board of directors of the Cape Breton Development Corporation. My point of order refers specifically to question No. 2581. In order to make it clear that something has gone wrong, I should like to draw the attention of hon. members to the terms of that question, which are as follows:

1. How many business enterprises has the Cape Breton Development Corporation invested in since it began operations?

2. (a) How many such businesses are still in operation (b) what is the nature of these operations (c) who are the responsible persons managing them?

3. (a) How many are no longer operating (b) what was the nature of such oeprations (c) for what reason did they cease operations?

4. Did the Corporation recover its investments?

5. In each instance (a) what was the investment (b) how much of the investment was in the form of (i) grants (ii) loans and, of the amount in loans, how much has been recovered to date?

Mr. Speaker, I draw to your attention the fact that the answer provided to this question by the Department of Regional Econnomic Expansion was as follows: "101 business enterprises." That is not an answer in any way, shape or form to question 2581 which has since disappeared from the order paper. I would hate to think that Mr. Tom Kent has enough influence to reach into Ottawa and pluck from the order paper a question with regard to which he is responsible for providing parliament with information.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): How did this question disappear from the order paper? Why is it that the partial answer provided does not in any way conform with an answer given by Tom Kent before the Standing Committee on Regional Development? For six years I have been prodding and trying to get from the government a reasonable settlement, but when questions disappear from the order paper then somebody on the government side has quite a bit of explaining to do, including the placing on the board of directors of the corporation of the senior partner of the law firm employed to fight the case on behalf of the miners. It smells.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): What we need here is not only the FBI and the CIA—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Reid: Mr. Speaker, I just wish to assure hon. members that I will look into the matters they have raised. I also wish to inform the House that a total of 87 per cent of all questions which have appeared on the order paper have been answered as of today.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baldwin: The quality of the answers counts, too. We are objecting to the quality.

Mr. Stackhouse: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): On a question of privilege—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. If the hon. member for Scarborough East will be patient the Chair will recognize him in due course. Hon. members will note that we have been sitting for 30 minutes and have had a number of points of order and questions of privilege. I would hope we would try to straighten out these difficulties and get on with the business of the House. The Chair, of course, will hear the hon. member and others, I gather, who have points of order or questions of privilege.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, my question of privilege arises from the attempt at an answer made by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River who seems to have a greater vocabulary than the word "no". What has 87 per cent of the questions being answered to do with the removal of my question from the order paper? The hon. member seems to take it on himself to apologize for the government. If it comes to a choice, he is the last I would pick from that side of the House to give an answer to anything.

Mr. Nielsen: I should like to speak, if I may, Mr. Speaker, to the serious and important question raised by my hon. friend from Cape Breton-East Richmond. The House of Commons is an institution within which the government is supposed to account to the people of Canada. One of the reasons we place written questions on the order paper is to obtain such an accounting from the government. My hon. friend put down a series of questions numbering a dozen or so directed to the operations of a corporation coming under the jurisdiction of the government, and the government has made no attempt at all to answer those questions.

The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River rose to say that the government had answered 87 per cent of the questions.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nielsen: If the kind of answer my hon. friend received is any indication of the quality of that 87 per cent, then the answers given fall far short of recognizing the principle of accountability to which I have referred.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond).]

Mr. Nielsen: Surely the government can make a more serious effort not only to answer the questions which are put to them in a specific way, as did my hon. friend, but to answer them within a reasonable time and not carry them over for months and months. If this were done, members could get answers to their questions and the government could perhaps convey some semblance of an image in terms of accountability to the House.

Mr. Stackhouse: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate very much the parliamentary secretary informing the House that answers have been given to 87 per cent of the questions asked, but I say to him we should be equally concerned about the 13 per cent that have not been answered, many of which, I suspect, involve information which the government is covering up.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I would hope that when written questions are called we would not become involved in a debate about statistics as to the number of questions answered and remaining unanswered. I feel that legitimate points of order can be raised by some members who believe their questions have remained unanswered for too long, but I think that to go further is to invite fruitless debate at this point. If there is a claim that a large proportion of the questions have been answered and if, in response, there is an equally legitimate claim that a number of questions remain unanswered, I suggest that this is a subject for debate.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to bring out statistics on answers or non-answers to our questions. One thing is certain, they are slow to answer the questions listed on the order paper.

Mr. Speaker, I can very well understand the complaints of the Progressive Conservatives, but I will say that when they were in power, answers were no quicker than they are today.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

[English]

Mr. John M. Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, would you be so kind as to call notice of motion No. 227.

FORMULAS OF HAIR SPRAYS SOLD IN CANADA AVAILABLE TO HEALTH PROTECTION BRANCH

Motion No. 227—Mr. Marshall:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the formulas of hair sprays being sold in Canada and available to the Health Protection Branch of the Department of National Health and Welfare.

Mr. John M. Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, this motion is not acceptable to the government in that the material requested was submitted in confidence, and consent to table this information has not been obtained from the other parties concerned.

Mr. Marshall: Then I ask that it be withdrawn, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Dropped.

Order discharged and motion withdrawn.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the remaining notices of motion stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Translation]

Mr. Laprise: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Abitibi on a question of privilege.

Mr. Laprise: Mr. Speaker, my question of privilege refers to motions for production of papers. On April 18, 1973, the government agreed to produce the papers related to the notice of motion for production of papers No. 203. But, these papers have not yet been produced. I therefore ask the government when it intends to fulfil the agreement of April 18, 1973?

[English]

Mr. Reid: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Abitibi has raised a point which affects him and all other hon. members who have had motions accepted by the government. The problem we are having in preparing these papers is that they must be translated into the two official languages. We have got into bottlenecks in some departments in getting this material out, but I can assure the hon. member that this matter has been a considerable concern of mine as well as of the departments. We hope to have the translations completed as soon as possible once the new system is in line.

ENERGY

PROPOSED CUTBACK IN NATURAL GAS SUPPLY BY WEST COAST TRANSMISSION TO BRITISH COLUMBIA THIS WINTER—FILLING OF BOARD VACANCIES

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources who I know is very fleet of foot. It concerns a report that West Coast Transmission will be cutting back on the supply of gas to British Columbia customers by 10 per cent on peak demand this winter as a result of some difficulty with one of the suppliers to West Coast Transmission. Has the minister been in touch with the National Energy Board and is he satisfied that this cutback is necessary or whether the cutback could not be made in the gas exported by West Coast Transmission in order to give British Columbia customers priority?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I saw the president of that company yesterday afternoon and he informed me of the facts referred to in the news report this morning. I have indeed been in touch with the board along the lines suggested by the Leader of the Opposition and I shall be seeking the board's advice on handling this problem. It is related to a structural fault in one of the supplying fields.

Mr. Stanfield: Despite the very substantial reserves of natural gas in western Canada, is the supply system as authorized and approved by the National Energy Board so precarious that some difficulty developing with one supplier of gas creates this threatened shortage for British Columbia?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I would be glad to canvass that question with the board. I would remind the hon. gentleman that this difficulty relates to the West Coast system as opposed to the Trans-Canada system which is hooked into very much larger reserves, but I think it is a valid question.

Mr. Stanfield: Since the minister has referred the matter to the National Energy Board, has he any explanation why the board now consists of five members when the statute provides that the government shall appoint seven, and why the board has been without a chairman for more than two months in a situation of great difficulty and importance in the energy field?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I hope to make some announcement in this regard in the relatively near future.

ASSURANCE TO BRITISH COLUMBIA OF ADEQUATE SUPPLY OF NATURAL GAS THIS WINTER

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. In view of the request of the British Columbia government for some assurance from the minister that they will have an adequate supply of natural gas this winter and that British Columbia customers will be given priority over exports, has the minister been able to give that assurance to the British Columbia government?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Not yet, Mr. Speaker. As I have indicated to the Leader of the Opposition, upon my return this morning I immediately put the question to the National Energy Board. I received, of course, a telegram to the same effect from the Attorney General of British Columbia. I hope to be able to respond both to the House and to that gentleman at an early date.

Mr. Douglas: In view of the fact that the National Energy Board gave export licences to West Coast Transmission, would the minister undertake to find out why, before giving such export licences, the National Energy Board did not assure itself that West Coast Transmission had adequate reserves to meet a contingency such as that which has arisen?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I will undertake to find that out.

OIL—METHOD OF DEVELOPMENT OF TAR SANDS

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): In view of the fact that the situation which now applies to natural gas may in the not too distant future apply to oil, may I ask the minister whether the government is contemplating making any offers to the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan for some public participation in the development of the tar sands in those two provinces?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman may know that the government of Alberta made a new and interesting proposal last night with regard to state participation in the oil industry. I expect to be meeting with representatives of that province in the near future to discuss the possible further development of the oil sands, and development in Saskatchewan as well.

EXEMPTION OF TAR SANDS OIL FROM SURTAX

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the minister. In light of his answer, has the government now established a policy, in view of the proposed sharing of the development of the Athabasca tar sands by business and the people, that will ensure that crude petroleum produced from this particular development will be exempted from the surtax?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, that is one of the questions that has been discussed but no conclusion has been reached yet. There is some question whether specific exemption would be necessary in light of anticipated price levels.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, may I follow that up. The minister said that there is some question. Would he enlighten the House and people interested throughout the country as to what is the question that concerns him in this regard and why he cannot categorically say now whether the crude petroleum produced by that development will be exempt from the surtax?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I should like to have very full consultations with the government of Alberta before making that statement, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. There appear to be a number of supplementaries on this question. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Champlain and then return to supplementaries by the hon. member for Edmonton Centre and others.

LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAM—EFFECT OF RECOMMENDATIONS OF CONSTITUENCY ADVISORY GROUPS ON SELECTION OF PROJECTS

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

Could he tell the House if the decisions of the constituency advisory committees which will be established under the LIP program will have a determining influence in the choice of projects to be approved?

● (1450)

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, as I explained in letters to all hon. members, they certainly will have an influence on the decision but I retain the responsibility and authority for the final approval or disapproval of projects.

[Translation]

Mr. Matte: Mr. Speaker, on a supplementary.

Could the minister tell us if he will necessarily accept the suggestions made voluntarily by members of the House or by members of these advisory committees?

Mr. Speaker: I am under the impression that the minister has already answered this question.

ENERGY

OIL EXPORT TAX—POSSIBILITY OF SUBSTITUTION OF DIFFERENTIAL APPROACH ADMINISTERED BY INDUSTRY

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources about his conversation with the representatives of the oil industry in Calgary yesterday. In view of the fact there is no quarrel over the 40 cents price differential, did the minister propose to the oil industry that he would consider the traditional differential approach administered by the industry as opposed to this awkward export tax he has proposed?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): No, sir, I did not make that proposal.

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): I have a supplementary for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Is it true that the minister allows the National Energy Board 24 hours to make national energy decisions and that the minister dictates their policies—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

FUEL OIL AND GASOLINE RETAIL PRICES—GOVERNMENT REQUEST FOR FREEZE—ACTION TO ENFORCE

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. With regard to the minister's September 13 request to oil and gas retailers not to increase prices, has the minister set up some monitoring agency to check prices of automobile and heating fuels and have any retailers increased prices since September 4?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I indicated to the House that I did not see, under the present arrangements or those contemplated, any way in which the government could monitor prices at the retail level. Except through the efforts of the major producers through wholly owned chains, at the retail gas level this largely concerns independently owned organizations and there are no general monitoring arrangements to cover individual decisions.

Mr. Symes: In view of the fact that gasoline prices have been raised since September 4 by two companies in the Sudbury region and other gasoline retailers are threatening to follow suit because the majors are not giving them a fair share of recent price increases, what action does the minister propose to ensure that retailers and distributors comply with the minister's request?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): We would propose no legislative action. If the hon. member has a specific case which he thinks may be in violation of the law, I would be delighted to hear from him.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We will attempt to make some headway. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Peace River on a supplementary and then the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham.

OIL SURTAX—INTRODUCTION OF WAYS AND MEANS MOTION

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the minister whether it is his intention to follow proper parliamentary practice and introduce a ways and means motion with regard to the proposed surtax?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I believe that would be the correct practice.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

INFLATION—INQUIRY AS TO NEW COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT RESTRICTIONS—POSSIBILITY OF BANNING SPECULATION IN FOOD FUTURES

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister on the government's anti-inflation program generally. In view of the Prime Minister's own statement in the House two weeks ago yesterday during the special session that part of the government's anti-inflation policy was the new stringent restrictions under the Combines Investigation Act, and in view of the fact his minister said they had passed through cabinet and had been drafted, I think we are entitled to ask the Prime Minister when we will have the details of this part of the government's program?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): As soon as we introduce it for first reading, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Lawrence: Mr. Speaker, the purpose, of course, in my asking that question was to then ask when will first reading take place? I have a further supplementary, Mr. Speaker. In view of the statement elsewhere yesterday that government action is required at both the Canadian and United States federal levels to ban speculation in futures of food commodities, could the Prime Minister say whether the government is considering taking any action along that line?

Mr. Trudeau: I cannot answer that question now, Mr. Speaker.

FOOD PRICES

REQUEST FOR TRANSPORTATION SUBSIDIES ON PRODUCTS MOVING INTO NORTHERN AREAS

Mr. Elias Nesdoly (Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that milk is over $1 a quart, potatoes are 40 cents a pound and eggs are at $1.12 a dozen in certain areas of northern Saskatchewan and since similar situations exist in other areas of Canada's north to a lesser or greater degree, for example, eggs at $1.90—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member should ask a question. He is not supposed to use a preamble to convey information to hon. members. Would he kindly come to the question.

Mr. Nesdoly: Is the government considering transportation subsidies for food products moving into northern areas so that northerners can have the benefit of food prices paid by Canadian people living in the more populous areas of this country?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I take that by way of representation. I hope the representation will be made to the government of Saskatchewan which is more directly concerned with this matter.

Mr. Nesdoly: In view of the fact that the recently announced subsidies are of infinitesimally less benefit to Canada's northerners, and there is much of the north not in Saskatchewan, what measures does the government intend to take to alleviate this situation so that northerners can enjoy the benefits of reasonable food prices which they certainly have not had in the last 20 years or so?

Mr. Trudeau: Surely the question of prices within a province comes under provincial jurisdiction.

Oral Questions

BREAD AND MILK SUBSIDIES—REQUEST FOR EXTENSION TO YUKON AND NORTHWEST TERRITORIES

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. In view of the action announced by the Prime Minister two weeks ago yesterday with regard to subsidies on bread and milk and the announcement by the Minister of Agriculture concerning the cost of milk to residents of the province of Quebec, reducing milk to 34 cents a quart in that province by reason of his announcement, the minister will recall that I drew his attention to the fact that there were no marketing boards in either the Yukon Territory or the Northwest Territories and that he replied that his department had that matter under consideration. Can he now inform the House, in respect of northerners above the 60th parallel, whether he who has direct responsibility in these areas will pass along the same kind of benefits to these residents as have been provided for the residents of the province of Quebec by measures such as those announced by the Minister of Agriculture?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I have already contacted my colleague the Minister of Agriculture in this regard. Of course, this is a very complex matter, as there is no marketing board in the Yukon nor in the Northwest Territories, but the consumers in these regions will derive the same benefits as those who live in the southern provinces, where farm products come from.

TRANSPORT

MEASURES TO CLEAR UP BACKLOG OF FREIGHT CARS AT NORTH SYDNEY DESTINED FOR NEWFOUNDLAND

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. Bearing in mind the circumstances at North Sydney where the shipment of goods and produce to supply Newfoundland will be delayed until after Christmas and also involving orders now being placed for the spring of 1974, now that the minister has had time to study the situation at North Sydney can he indicate what plans he has in mind and what contingency plan he has devised in order to alleviate that situation?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I think this situation is being studied by the department. Are you talking about the backlog there is now at Sydney?

Mr. Lundrigan: Yes.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): May I say that since yesterday I have received a full report from Canadian National. I think it is unjust for the CNR to leave the public under the impression that nothing was done when I know now for sure that, since July, 11 vessels have been chartered by CN to cut down the backlog. There is no backlog of perishable goods and by two weeks we think everything will be in normal shape.

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Speaker, I do not know if it is in order in the House to accuse the CN of lying. I cannot accuse the minister of lying, but somebody obviously is telling a bloody lie. In view of the fact that for over a month prior to the CN strike there was no produce moving into the province of Newfoundland from Montreal by way of the private enterprise system, in view of the fact that since the first day of the rotating strikes the province, to all intents and purposes, was in the grip of a total strike because of the strikes centred in Ontario, Quebec and the Atlantic region, and in view of the admission of Canadian National Railways yesterday that over 600 cars are at present sitting in North Sydney, as well as the indications from the general public—

● (1500)

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the hon. member might ask the question. It seems to me that his preamble is a little extensive.

Mr. Lundrigan: And in view of indications from the general public that there are firms on the northeastern coast of the province that have not received—

Some hon. Members: Order!

Mr. Lundrigan: Listen to what I am saying.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am inviting the hon. member to ask his question.

Mr. Lundrigan: I would have asked my question by now if there had not been so many interruptions. I would have been finished long ago—and in view of the fact there are firms that have not received goods that were ordered two months ago, goods that have been in place in North Sydney for two months, can the minister give an assurance that extra vessels will be placed in position immediately in order to clear up the backlog and, further, that he will study the constitutional responsibilities under Term 32 of the Terms of Union?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. May we have order, please. Perhaps the minister might be allowed to reply to the hon. member's lengthy question.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): I know that you will not allow me to prove it, Mr. Speaker, but when the hon. member says that it is a bunch of lies I want to tell him that I have all the names of the vessels here and I can give them to the House. If the hon. member knows a charter that can be rented in order to speed up the movement of goods, we will be pleased to rent the vessel any time. A real effort has been made.

An hon. Member: What about Jack Davis?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Some of the goods that are delayed are not perishable. There have been delays at Sydney before and that is why we have ordered a new vessel. It will be in service in a few days' time, and we might have another one some time later in the fall.

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. member rising on a point of order?

Mr. Lundrigan: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe rises on a point of order. I will recognize him first and then, in fairness, the hon. member for Rimouski and return to the hon. members who have supplementary questions they are anxious to ask.

Mr. Marshall: Mr. Speaker, just so that a wrong impression is not left by what the minister said, may I point out that an official communiqué has been issued by Frank Petten, public relations officer of CNR. He said in St. John's yesterday or the day before that while things are moving smoothly, there will be a backlog until after the Christmas-New Year period.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): I rise on the same question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. I have inquired from CNR and was told that nobody can say that is so at this moment. There is no such indication.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. May we have order please. The hon. member is rising on a point of order but his point of order is being interrupted by a question of privilege which the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate wishes to raise at present. I would hope that this matter can be resolved quickly because I am anxious to give other hon. members an opportunity to ask their questions.

Mr. Lundrigan: Your Honour, the impression was left by the hon. gentleman who represents the Department of Transport in the House of Commons—

Some hon. Members: He is a minister.

Mr. Lundrigan: —that wrong information was given to the House of Commons. As my colleague from the west coast of the province indicated, yesterday a press release was put out officially by the CNR indicating exactly what the hon. member stated today. I am under the impression that either the Minister of Transport is totally unaware of what is going on in his department or is being fed a bunch of stuff by the CNR that is not in accordance with the facts.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. May we have order please. That, of course, is not a point of order. The hon. member is debating an issue with the minister during the question period. There should be other opportunities to raise points of order or questions of privilege or to make statements which are entirely irregular at this time, are certainly against the traditions of the House of Commons and are unfair to other hon. members who want to ask questions and participate in the question period. The Minister of Transport rises on a question of privilege.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, I wish to rise on a question of privilege. There is only one way in which I can be made aware of what the CN is doing there at present and that is to get in touch with their officials and get a report. This is what I have done and I have communicated that to the House. I have been told by the CN on the same occasion that the effort they are making will mean an additional deficit this year of $8 million over last year, that is $52 million—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Gander-Twillingate sought and got the floor on a question of privilege. The minister was allowed to reply, which he did briefly. I request the co-operation of hon. members and we will get back to supplementary questions in due course. Certainly we are not achieving much in a practical way by these alleged questions of privilege and points of order which, in my opinion, are entirely disorderly.

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I do not think members of this House of Commons should be as concerned with parliamentary niceties as with what goes on in the country. I am not an expert in the rules, as are several hon. members over there, but I do know that we have some freedom of speech. If we do not have the right to stand up in the House and bring these matters before the people of Canada through the medium of the House of Commons, then it is a waste of time for us to be here. That is my right.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lundrigan: It is very difficult during the question period, unless one has a degree in navigation of some sort, to raise a question and put all the points across in the proper manner. We put the question to the minister today and the minister referred to the CNR. We are not talking about the CNR; we are talking about the constitutional responsibility of the government of Canada to the province of Newfoundland under the Terms of Union which were implemented in 1949. We are not asking the minister to obtain reports from the CNR. We are asking him to assume full responsibility as the spokesman on transportation for the government and to make sure that our goods are moved.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I will certainly not rule on this alleged question of privilege. The hon. member claims his right to free speech. I have the impression that if there is one member who has not been denied this right, it is the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: This is a parliamentary institution which operates according to rules that are applicable to all hon. members. I will say nothing further and will recognize now the hon. member for Rimouski. He is a humble member sitting at the other end of the chamber who perhaps has rights, too.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

FINANCE

NEW GOVERNMENT BOND ISSUE—POSSIBILITY OF USING OTHER METHODS OF FINANCING

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Finance I will put my question to the Prime Minister.

The government of Canada launched yesterday a $425 million bond issue hearing interest at 7 ¾ per cent for five years, and that may be exchanged against bonds at 8 per cent for seven years. This was announced in all papers dated September 18.

Here is my question: Does the government consider looking for less expensive methods of raising funds, despite the substantial national production of Canada?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am convinced that the government of Canada would much rather borrow at lower rates if in fact citizens wanted to lend to the government of Canada at lower rates. The hon. member knows that the bank borrows from Canadians on their savings at rates determined by the market, and it is because Canadians themselves do not want to lend at cheaper rates to the government that we have those rates.

PAYMENTS BY CANADIAN PACIFIC SEAMEN INTO UNITED STATES RETIREMENT FUNDS—REQUEST FOR ACTION TO STOP PAYMENTS AND OBTAIN REFUND

Mr. Paddy Neale (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. In view of the fact that over 200 seamen employed by a Canadian shipping company, namely, the CPR, are being forced by American law to pay over 10 per cent of their net income into the American railroad retirement fund and the U.S. social security fund, and in view of the fact that these seamen have practically no chance of drawing either a pension or social security benefits, will the minister take this matter up with the appropriate Canadian government department with a view to meeting with its American counterpart in an attempt to negotiate an agreement that would allow these Canadian seamen exoneration from this onerous foreign tax?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Neale (Vancouver East): In view of the fact that this agreement has been in effect for nearly 40 years, and in view of the fact that the railroad retirement plan now controls millions upon millions of dollars belonging to Canadian workers, would the minister also attempt to negotiate for the return of these moneys to their rightful owners?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Yes, I will inquire into all this. I think the hon. gentleman knows what is implied in it. You have labour agreements which apply at the same time in Canada and the United States.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): O.K. Let us say that I will get the details and reply later.

APPOINTMENT OF PATRICK MAHONEY AS FEDERAL JUDGE—INQUIRY AS TO ENDORSEMENT BY CANADIAN BAR ASSOCIATION

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. Since the political morality of a government is tested by its appointments to the bench, can the Prime Minister tell the House what legal background and experience justify the appointment of Mr. Patrick Mahoney to the Federal Court of Canada?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, without really getting into a specific case I could say that the practice which I followed as minister of justice has been followed ever since by succeeding ministers of justice, and that practice is to consult with the Canadian Bar as to the suitability of candidates.

Mr. Nowlan: I am glad the Prime Minister got to the last part of his answer. Before the appointment was made, were there any consultations with any law society or the Canadian Bar Association about Mr. Mahoney's elevation to the bench, and was the government advised that there would be no endorsement of that elevation?

Mr. Trudeau: I have just outlined the type of consultation that takes place and which I am sure took place in the case of the hon. gentleman who has been named.

NEWFOUNDLAND FERRY SERVICE—CONSTITUTIONAL RESPONSIBILITY OF FEDERAL GOVERNMENT—ACTION TO CLEAR BACKLOG OF FREIGHT

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the government's clearly defined responsibility to the province of Newfoundland to maintain a ferry service between that province and the mainland, and in view of the fact that the government's own ferry operating agency was allowed to disrupt that service, albeit by a strike, may I ask what the Prime Minister is going to do in line with that constitutional responsibility to ensure that the backlog of freight is moved in time to prevent shortages, and what steps will he take to make sure that there is no further disruption in that service?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think that the answer given a moment ago by the Minister of Transport indicates that the government viewed this interruption of service with great concern and impressed upon the company the necessity to bring in supplementary vessels, as it did, to the extent the minister indicated, that the company took all it could.

On the constitutional question, I am sure the hon. member realizes that the freedom of people to work or not to work applies even to Newfoundlanders, and that when the CNR itself reached an agreement with the heads of the union that this work would not be interrupted it was something the government pressed for and obtained. If some people in the Maritimes refused to obey the understanding of their leaders, then surely the fight of the hon. member should be with his fellow Newfoundlanders and Maritimers who refused to deliver this service which the government had arranged.

Mr. McGrath: In view of the fact that the government's constitutional responsibility in this matter clearly supersedes any other consideration—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. McGrath: —and in view of the fact that this service is a vital lifeline between the province of Newfoundland and the mainland of Canada, the disruption of which causes food shortages and all other kinds of inconveniences, is it the intention of the government to take this important service out of the hands of the CN and operate it directly by the government of Canada?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member will remember that the minister himself indicated that this was one of the courses he was considering, but the hon. member will have to realize also that if this is done we will have to have men to work those ferries, and if the people of that area refuse to work them, perhaps against the desires and even the benefits of their fellow islanders and Maritimers—

An hon. Member: Blame the workers.

Mr. Trudeau: No, I am not blaming the workers.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Who stopped the ferries?

Mr. Trudeau: I should like the hon. member who interrupted me to realize that the government made every arrangement for the ferries to continue and that it did not stop the service. It was the workers at that place who stopped the service.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for High Park-Humber Valley.

Mr. Lundrigan: On a question of privilege—

Mr. Speaker: I apologize to the hon. member for High Park-Humber Valley. The hon. member for Gander-Twillingate rises on a question of privilege.

Mr. Lundrigan: I do not enjoy taking extra time of the House.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: May we have order, please. There are just five minutes before the end of the question period.

Mr. Lundrigan: Your Honour, no one enjoys taking extra time of the House but the Prime Minister today, I am sure very inadvertently, misled the House with respect to the workers of the CNR on the east coast. He had a little bit of information fed to him by his office which is partly wrong and partly true. What he said applies to the operation of ferries carrying passengers. At no time did CNR workers or the government make arrangements that produce and freight would be carried during the strike. The Prime Minister today gave the impression that the government had an agreement with CNR workers to carry produce and other freight to the island. He also gave the impression that it was the workers who reneged on this. It was the CNR that inspired the workers to discontinue the ferry passenger service.

Some hon. Members: Sit down!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Will the hon. member resume his seat. The hon. member for High Park-Humber Valley.

Mr. Jelinek: Mr. Speaker, I realize the Prime Minister has had some difficult questions to answer. I have a very easy one for him now if he could only answer it.

Mr. Gleave: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. member rising on a point of order?

Mr. Gleave: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. A great part of this question period has been taken up by a series of points of order and questions of privilege. My point of privilege is that we at this end of the House have not been able to ask the government questions which are important to us, simply because of the behavior of the members to my right.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for High Park-Humber Valley.

BROADCASTING

COVERAGE OF 1976 OLYMPIC GAMES—ALLEGED SAVING BY ACCEPTING CTV OFFER—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, I hope that this time I will be able to finish my question to the Prime Minister and get an answer. Can the Prime Minister advise the House if the government is prepared to reconsider CTV's offer to participate in the telecasting of the 1976 Olympic Games by utilizing their equipment, facilities and personnel as well as assuring the acceptance of their offer to purchase the television rights, thus reducing the over-all cost by millions of dollars?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I answered this question yesterday or the day before.

Mr. Jelinek: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I was afraid the Prime Minister would say that. He did not answered my previous question of last Monday. In fact, he advised me that he was sure I had received answers while the Olympic bill was before the House. For the record, I did not receive any answers. I should like to ask the Prime Minister once again if he can confirm that a contract has been signed by the CBC dealing with the coverage of the Olympic Games, and by what means is the CBC going to receive the $25 million which the government has pledged toward the $50 million budget?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is asking a question which he has asked previously. If the hon. member is not satisfied with the reply—

Some hon. Members: Answer.

Mr. Nielsen: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Yukon on a point of order.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, the question asked by the hon. member for High Park-Humber Valley was entirely different from previous questions and requires an answer.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Leave the Prime Minister alone. He has no answers.

Mr. Speaker: May we have order, please. The hon. member is rising on a point of order and his point may be legitimate. There is no point in getting emotionally involved. There is no reason why the point of order should not be recognized if the question is a different question. If the Prime Minister or a minister of the government wishes to reply, of course, they will be recognized for that purpose, after which I will recognize the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie.

Mr. Nielsen: Let's have the answer.

An hon. Member: Answer.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Nickel Belt.

[Mr. Jelinek.]

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

GOVERNMENT POSITION ON RECOGNITION OF NEW GOVERNMENT OF CHILE

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the minister's reply to the hon. member for Greenwood on the question of recognition of the guerrilla junta in Chile—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Rodriguez: —that precipitous recognition would not be given, can the minister assure this House that precipitous recognition of this regime will be the same as was accorded the Peoples' Republic of China?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I could not make that promise. It was my view that we should have recognized Peking as the legitimate government of China, as the hon. member's party had advocated, some time before we did.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am not sure whether the matter of the supplementary question posed by the hon. member for High Park-Humber Valley has been resolved. Assuming no answer is forthcoming, the Chair will recognize the hon. member for South Western Nova.

TRANSPORT

DIGBY-SAINT JOHN FERRY—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO CONTINUE VIABLE SERVICE

Mr. Charles E. Haliburton (South Western Nova): Mr. Speaker, not having the degree of navigation alluded to by my hon. friend, it is sometimes difficult to get the message across. There have been a number of questions referring to ferries but no reference to one serving Nova Scotia. While swimming may be a reasonable alternative in some other areas—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is not swimming very well at this point. I think he has been affected by a well-known disease.

Mr. Haliburton: My apologies, Mr. Speaker. I have been infected by the people around me. I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Has he yet received any official representation from the government of the province of Nova Scotia regarding the Bay of Fundy service and, if so, what was the tenor of his reply and what action does he propose to take to ensure continuation of a viable ferry service?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, this is the ferry between Digby and Saint John and we are looking into this. I know that the CPR cut the service in half. We are considering now how we can restore the service and if it should be operated by the CPR, by the department or by a new agency.

Mr. Haliburton: Have any discussions been scheduled with the management of CPR in relation to this problem?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, those discussions have already taken place.

NOISE PROBLEM CREATED BY RAILWAY HUMPYARD IN EDMONTON—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO ALLEVIATE

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is supplementary as it has to do with the railroads. In view of the fact that the railroads are now running and that the triple shifting and shunting of boxcars has brought back the problem of squealing and squeaking in the Calder humpyard, which is now harming the health of the worthy citizens of Edmonton Centre, what does the minister intend to do about this harmful noise problem?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: May we have order, please. Perhaps the minister might reply briefly and then we will try to get on.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): We are going to buy some oil, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Paproski: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order—

Mr. Speaker: I was hoping the hon. member would not raise a point of order.

Mr. Paproski: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact I have not received an answer to the two letters I have written to the minister and as I have also pursued this matter in the House on two occasions, would the minister please tell me what I have to do to get a concrete answer from him?

An hon. Member: Buy some grease.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member is making more noise than any train I know of. I honestly thought that the way he put his question was to get a good laugh from the House, and he got it.

Mr. Paproski: A point of privilege, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member rises on a question of privilege. I will recognize him and then call orders of the day. Obviously, we will not get much further this afternoon.

Mr. Paproski: Mr. Speaker, I hate to feel that this minister believes that every time I get up to ask a question on something it is an occasion for him to amuse himself. I am very sincere because this is a very serious problem in my constituency. Through you, Mr. Speaker, I should like to know what the minister intends to do before somebody ends up in the nuthouse in that area. I want to tell him that if somebody does, it may well be he who will end up in the nut house.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) rises on a point of order.

Oral Questions

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I ask for a moment to raise a question of privilege which is in a vein slightly different from those that have been raised in the last little while.

Last evening the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Guay), the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Prud'homme) and I had the privilege of attending an important event in Winnipeg, the focus of which soon became the fact that it was a significant day in the life of one of the esteemed members of this House of Commons. That member responded with his usual vigour and in the style that we in this House always enjoy. I am sure all of us would have enjoyed being there and even though today is the day after the event, I ask the House to give a round of applause for the 78th birthday of the distinguished and right hon. member for Saint Albert.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not have to indicate the approval of this side of the House which has been evidenced by the applause which has just been heard but I would enjoin the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Knowles) not to correct the Hansard when he reads it and sees that he has beatified the right hon. member.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I think the applause all over the House has indicated the way in which the compliments offered by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre have been received by the House. It certainly was a splendid day, and we would all have liked to have been present but I know we will all have an opportunity to pay our respects to the right hon. gentleman during the afternoon.

• (1530)

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to join with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) as well as the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) to extend my best wishes to the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) on the occasion of his birthday.

I had the good fortune of knowing the right hon. member as early as 1946 when he was very active in his party and today at his age, an age that probably very few among us will ever reach, he is alert and vigorous. In fact, he is still an example for all members of this House.

[English]

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I point out that I did not intend to canonize the right hon. gentleman—not yet. It has been predicted that he will live to 120. However, I want to make it clear that when I referred to the right hon. member for Saint Albert, I meant the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker).

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I say a very simple thank you. I am glad the hon. member did not refer to me as a saint, because I doubt whether there would have been that degree of applause that there was. This is deeply appreciated by me. I recall that Sir John A. Macdonald on one occasion, when his birthday was mentioned in the House, and it was his birthday, said that because of his interest in Canada as a whole, Saint Jean Baptiste Day was his day. It is the same with me.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order in connection with the business of the House and I do so, if I may say this by way of explanation to Your Honour and the House, to press home the gravity of the questions that were raised in the House by my colleagues and myself today and yesterday. This matter can be resolved very quickly if the government would agree, as it has failed to do in the past two years, to refer to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications the annual report of CN. The government has not done this. We have not had in this House in the past two years, an opportunity to examine the management and officials of CN. Consequently, we are not in a position to get the kinds of answers we would normally be able to get if those people were before the standing committee.

To underline the gravity of this matter, may I cite briefly Term 32 of the terms of union between Newfoundland and Canada. It reads:

> Canada will maintain in accordance with traffic offering a freight and passenger steamship service between North Sydney and Port aux Basques—

We consider this to be a matter of the most urgent gravity. If the government would agree immediately to refer the current report of CN to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications, and I might say that report was tabled in the House last March, the members on this side of the House could get on with their constitutional responsibilities and examine CN in committee.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, I rise on the same point of order. I think the hon. gentleman read the report. There is no relationship at all between it and the constitutional responsibilities of the government. This responsibility, if it exists, is that of the government and not that of CN.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

RESIDENTIAL MORTGAGE FINANCING BILL

ESTABLISHMENT OF CORPORATION, RECOGNITION OF SPECIALIZED MORTGAGE INVESTMENT COMPANIES UNDER LOAN COMPANIES ACT AND TAX TREATMENT

The House resumed, from Tuesday, September 18, consideration of the motion of Mr. Basford that Bill C-135, to provide additional financial mechanisms and institutions for the residential mortgage market in Canada, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs.

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to say a few words on Bill C-135 respecting residential mortgage financing. The NDP opposes this bill because it perpetuates the basic view, espoused by the Liberal party and the Conservative party, that the private financial market place can best meet the housing needs of Canadians. I reject that assumption for the following reasons. First, one has only to look at the present housing situation in Canada and the crisis which it is in to realize that this assumption is false. Second, on looking at the provisions of Bill C-135, I conclude that it will perpetuate rather than solve the problems to do with mortgage financing in this country.

Let us first look at the housing situation today in Canada. I refer to the Dennis report of 1972, which was an exhaustive study of housing in this country. That report concluded that there were 750,000 housing units in Canada which were not safe, decent or sanitary. In other words, there are about 3 million Canadians living in substandard housing. In addition, there were at least a half million units that were in need of substantial repairs, which meant that another 1 million Canadian were living in substandard housing. About 20 per cent of Canada's population is inadequately housed. That is our present situation because Liberal and Conservative governments have relied primarily on the private mortgage and lending institutions to meet housing needs in Canada.

My second reason for rejecting this bill is this: On examining the present situation in Canada, one can see that the majority of Canadians who want to buy a home cannot afford one. The cost of the house itself is too high, as is the cost of financing that purchase. In Canada the cost of housing has risen by 90 per cent in the past decade. In my constituency, Sault Ste. Marie, it is now predicted that the cost of the average house will rise by between $2,000 and $3,000 in the next two years. The President of the Toronto Real Estate Board has predicted that the average price of a house in Toronto will increase by around $10,000 in the same period. The difference between the two areas is attributable mainly to differences in land cost.

One has only to look at Central Mortgage and Housing figures for Canada to note that the cost of serviced land has risen some 19.2 per cent in the last 2¼ years and 36 per cent since 1967. Clearly, land costs in 1971 represented almost 40 per cent of the cost of all houses in Toronto and about 17 per cent of the cost of all houses in Sault Ste.

Marie. Moreover, throughout the country the shortage of residential land is driving prices up.

Let me give some examples. In Calgary, a house which sold for $23,000 two years ago is now selling for $33,000. It is true that construction costs have gone up; labour costs have gone up, but none of these costs have risen to the degree that land costs have risen. It is the failure of this government to outlaw land speculation and its reluctance to help in municipal land banking that has been the cause of this horrendous increase in land prices. Bill C-133, which was recently debated, moved somewhat in the direction of helping with respect to land banking, but that measure falls far short of requirements. This misguided faith in the ability of a free market economy to fulfil justly and adequately social needs can no longer be tolerated, in my view.

Next, let me deal with the cost of financing a house. On examining the mortgage picture we shall see an equally desperate picture. At one time mortgage interest rates in this country were fixed at 6½ per cent by the government. Then, in 1967, the Liberal government, acting on the advice of the then housing minister who has since joined the Conservative party and now sits as the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Hellyer), removed that ceiling and let market forces determine what the mortgage rate would be.

As a result, residential mortgages are at an all-time high of 10 per cent, and it is predicted they will rise to 11 per cent in the next few months. This is quite understandable. To leave mortgage rates free of any kind of regulation, free to work in the market economy, means that profit motivated companies will develop, build and concentrate on high-cost housing where returns are the greatest. There will be less building of moderate and low income homes. This is what has happened. It has happened as a result of the Liberal and Conservative faith in the private sector to meet the housing needs in this country. We now have a crisis bordering on catastrophe. Public pressure has forced this government to do something about the cost of housing. Bill C-133 has been passed. It will help middle and lower income families to some degree with regard to buying houses. Bill C-135, which is before us, is supposed to help them in financing mortgages. I feel it is a weak bill and does not meet the needs of Canadians.

Why are we opposed to this bill? First, it still allows for the supply and control of mortgage funds to be determined by the free play of market forces. I hope I have already demonstrated that to allow that to happen would only worsen the situation of Canadian home buyers. There has been no attempt by this government to stabilize the price or supply of mortgage funds. There has been no attempt by this government to fix the mortgage rate at 6 per cent so that the majority of Canadians can afford to buy a new home.

Second, this bill gives tax concessions to mortgage companies, banks and their shareholders to attract more funds into the mortgage market. I am afraid this will only perpetuate high interest rates on mortgages and high priced housing because in that way, return or profit for investors is the greatest. How will this bill solve the dilemma of the average income Canadian wanting to buy a house with no guarantee that the mortgage rate will be held at one level? Why do banks need further incentives? Bank profits have increased by 20 per cent each year since 1967. They have had a higher return than any other sector of our economy. Mortgages are 100 per cent guaranteed by the Canadian government. Why do they need concessions? Where is the risk in this kind of financing? The government is perpetuating its corporate rip-off and this time it is affecting home buyers.

The third reason my party is opposed to this bill is that mortgage companies will not only be allowed to finance residential development, but non-residential real estate. I can foresee such companies putting money into office buildings, shopping plazas and so on where profits are much higher than on low and middle income homes. How will that help the average Canadian buy a house? This bill should provide that the priority be for housing, not non-residential development.

Fourth, this bill does not ensure adequate mortgage funds are available for the rural and poorer areas of the country. I know of a man who wanted to build on the outskirts of Sault Ste. Marie. There were no sewage facilities. As a result, he did not qualify for an NHA mortgage. The only way he could arrange financing was to seek a small company that would give him a mortgage at an interest rate of 15 per cent. This is an outrage. This bill is an outrage because of its weakness in this area. The New Democratic Party opposes this bill in principle because it will not solve the problem of financing home building. It will only exacerbate the situation.

For the past few weeks, the members of the Conservative party have been arguing on behalf of the consumer for controls. However, on this bill they are supporting the government. Here is a chance for them to support a control which will benefit the consumer, a control on the mortgage rate, yet they intend to vote with the Liberals. The Canadian public is aware that when it comes to financial matters that affect large companies or financial institutions, the Liberals and the Tories are still the same old gang. They will not jeopardize, restrict or curb any of the financial activities of these companies which are exploiting the consumer.

If the NDP proposal were implemented, it would bring down interest rates. What is our proposal? We would direct the federal government to instruct the banks and other federally chartered financial institutions to allocate a substantial portion of their annual investment in residential mortgages at a rate not exceeding 6 per cent. This would represent an annual saving of approximately $1,000 for the average family on their mortgage payments. I know all the arguments about the banks not being able to allocate more of their funds to the mortgage market. Their mortgage holdings today represent only 8 per cent of their total assets. A 6 per cent mortgage rate would only reduce their profits to a minor degree. The banks can certainly afford to do this because their profits have risen by 85 per cent since 1966. The proposal I have outlined is a realistic approach to mortgage financing.

This bill would perpetuate a financial corporate rip-off of the Canadian home buyer. There is no guarantee that interest rates will go down or even hold the line because of this bill. For that reason, my party is utterly opposed to this bill being passed by the House.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, two of my colleagues took part yesterday in the debate on Bill C-135 during which some objection was raised against the excessive interest rates on mortgages granted for the construction of single family dwellings and the same will soon apply to the construction of public buildings.

Mr. Speaker, there is a cause to effect relationship which has prompted the government to move Bill C-135 dealing with the establishment of a new finance company which would lend on mortgage. At the present time, the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation could be used. We could somewhat extend its powers enabling to grant loans directly without having to resort to a new bureaucracy or a new finance company which would set the rates at its own will.

All this, Mr. Speaker, is due to the credit line allowing the financing of these buildings. A couple of days ago, the Governor of the Bank of Canada, Mr. Bouey, advised us that the bank was increasing its prime rate to 7.25 per cent. Could any one name only one member of Parliament, one province, one municipality or one school board that went to the Bank of Canada to borrow money at an interest rate of 7.25 per cent? This statement made by Mr. Bouey allows all finance companies to increase their interest rates when they don't need to do it at all, because none of them borrows from the Bank of Canada. Even our chartered banks do not do it.

When a banker tells you: the interest rate is higher because the Bank of Canada raised its prime rate by .5 per cent, he is telling a lie. This is not at all why the interest rate is being increased.

Earlier this week, a member of my staff was to borrow a certain amount to buy a single family dwelling. She was informed by the company manager that she will be able to obtain the required $12,500 at an interest rate of 10¼ per cent. She even signed a form. Two days later, she was called by the manager who told her: The loan is accepted but at a 13 per cent interest rate. How can you explain this 2¾ per cent increase within two days?

As for the Bank of Canada which makes no loan to a nobody, it only receives the reserves used by chartered banks to control the credit of the nation. The finance companies get their "supply" from the banks. Decisions are made by the banks.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) is always afraid he might run short of funds to increase family allowances or to pay old age security pensions at 60. If the government of Canada were to float an issue and ask the Bank of Canada for a $1 billion credit, which provision of the law could prevent it from doing so to finance the program of the Minister of National Health and Welfare? Absolutely nothing. The danger is that if the Bank of Canada were to buy the government issue for the nominal amount of $1 billion, under the Bank Act the banks would be entitled to create $16 billion, 16 times more than the government issue which is the reserve for the Canadian banking system. If the minister is not convinced I invite him to my office and I will show him the evidence. This is the problem.

Here we are, complaining, planning to create new finance companies that will get funds from the chartered banks and not the Bank of Canada. The Governor of the Bank of Canada says: We must increase the bank rate. He has applied no controls and still does not control anything. The Bank of Canada has become the handmaiden of the Canadian chartered banks. What the banking system told him, Mr. Bouey has just repeated to us, and the dimwits believe him; but we don't, and haven't for a long time.

Mr. Speaker, that is what is wrong, for the Bank of Canada issues an absolutely useless statement, except that it does allow some to increase their interest rates to 10, 11 and even 12 per cent. Then, in addition to interest, we have to pay the government sales tax on building materials. Then people are told: Build houses, funds will be easier to get. Go ahead, build, because the more you build the more money the government will make through the 11 per cent sales tax on bulidling materials. In addition, the provincial government will get 8 per cent. We have reached the point where taxes are being taxed. In fact, the small homeowner pays 11 per cent on the material required to build his small home. And the provincial government adds another 8 per cent to that. Joe Blow is really a good guy: he puts up with all that without complaining and keeps on paying.

● (1600)

I was reading in a paper yesterday that a Canadian can have a small $25,000 house built at 10—and not 15—per cent interest rate over 40 years. And they claim that this is reasonable. Do you realize that in the next 40 years, this citizen will have paid $75,000 for a $25,000 home? And they say: He will be a homeowner, and we talk of inflation, they want to fight it. After 40 years, he will have paid the price of three houses; he will have only one if he still lives, but he will not.

Most people who borrow nowadays to have a small house built do so for 40 years; if a 40 year old man borrows $20,000 or $22,000 for a period of 40 years, when he is through paying, Mr. Speaker, he will be 80 and retired for 15 years. His old age security pension will not be sufficient to make the payments; which means that by the age of 50 or 55 he may lose his property. This is exactly what is happening and they think that they are helping people to become homeowners! Owners of what? Owners of debts, taxes, interest rates; the house belongs to the finance company, it does not belong to them.

This is the way the system operates which the government, introducing Bill C-135, wants us to accept and which will mean more debts serving Canadians. While our "nincompoops" will be getting deeper into debt, the government will continue to say: We can't.

This afternoon, as the government is about to issue $425 million in bonds yielding 7¾ per cent interest, one of my colleague asked the right hon. Prime Minister about the possibility of finding something else at a lower cost. The government leader replied: This is the prevailing rate, the finance people will not lend us money; we have to pay more because the institutions can obtain better deals elsewhere. So, the government is following the trend instead of going against it; it should manage the Canadian economy by putting to proper use the financial means, at our disposal, namely the Bank of Canada. If Governor Bouey is not aware of it, I tell him so. He is not there to tell us what to do but to act upon what we, as parliamentarians, decide.

Mr. Speaker, everybody is complaining. Earlier my NDP friend from Sault-Ste. Marie (Mr. Symes) was talking about outrageous rates of interest which should be reduced to 6 per cent but when these were at 6 per cent three years ago, the NDP was protesting that they should be lowered at 3 per cent. Today they would be willing to reduce them to 6 per cent.

Mr. Speaker, 6 per cent is not better than 10 per cent. Does anyone know that for a loan at 5 per cent over a 20-year period the interest paid will equal the capital borrowed? For instance, $1,000 at 5 per cent during 20 years will yield $1,000 interest and the capital is still owing. All provinces and municipalities are endorsing such programs, and the government introduces Bill C-135, saying: Here's more.

Mr. Speaker, the day when the system will break, someone will be hurt. People are revolting everywhere in the world, people are marching in the streets. Why? Because of food shortages? No. Because of limited building opportunities? No. But because there is not enough purchasing power to live decently. Then, some people try to have the poor rise against the rich, saying for example: If you live in a shack, it is because somebody else lives in a castle; so, let us rise against the one who owns a castle. There is a revolt, the occupant of the castle is thrown out and, next morning, the aggressor realizes that he still lives in the same shack, that his circumstances are not better.

This does not constitute a solution. The solution would be to ask ourselves if we can build more castles in Canada. Can we improve the situation and provide more help for all Canadians so that they may own their own property, not the Household Finance Co. Ltd., the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, the Canadian Bank of Commerce, the Toronto-Dominion Bank, the Ross Finance Company Ltd., or the Guaranty Trust Company of Canada.

Recently, I saw in the lower St. Lawrence valley people who have lived on the same farm for eight or nine generations. They made improvements to the house, the barn, and the stables, thanks to mortgages. After eight generations of work, these people are mortgaged at 100 percent. While 200 or 300 years ago, the farmer could say: I own my farm, nowadays he says: My farm belongs to the Farm Credit Corporation, it belongs to a finance company. Nowadays, man has to resort to finance the moment he comes into this world.

One can read in Eaton's and Simpson's trade catalogues: Buy through a budget plan, open an account. The baby will soon be born, therefore people get ready, they resort to credit at Eaton's or Simpson's. When the child is six years old and ready to go to school, people order clothing, again through the budget plan.

People get married, they have no money, they borrow from Household Finance. In order to buy a car, they get into debt with the Traders' Finance Co. Ltd., the Niagara Finance Co. Ltd. or the IAC for three years and thus they are being mortgaged throughout their life. Towards the end of their life, funeral directors tell them: die now, pay later.

Mr. Speaker, quite often people tell us about such problems; they say: Listen, we cannot pay. Could you help us? It is on account of all those systems that throw us into debt that we have to lead such a life.

Economists tell us that we live beyond our means. Yes, they are intelligent people. We live beyond our means. What are the financing or productive means in Canada? What are the ways of building houses? Are we short of lumber to build houses? Short of nails? Short of manpower? Short of machines?

Mr. Speaker, we are short of nothing except credit, to build a house. It is strange but once a house is built, there is not a single dollar bill nailed to it, not a single one. Credit is a way of exchange to enable people to buy a house. But we attach more importance to credit than to the house.

Bill C-135 aims at giving additional credit to sink deeper into debt those who need a house. Mr. Speaker, there is no lack of space however. I was looking on the outskirts of Montreal, in Abitibi, in Témiscamingue: there is plenty of space; along La Vérendrye park, there are magnificent lakes, where we could build, establish villages, and so on. There is no lack of space. The province of Quebec has a population of six or seven million people whereas it could contain 60 or 70 million people. So, it is not a matter of space, but it is the system which prevents people from getting adequate accommodation.

Good accommodation is not the exclusive prerogative of those who can pay $200 or $300 a month; the workers of E.B. Eddy, of the CIP, of Noranda Mines, of the Canadian National or of the Canadian Pacific have a right to have their own houses too, and not a house they will be asked to pay four times. This can be done through the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, a government institution which does not need another parallel corporation to accept mortgages or make mortgage loans.

This is why Bill C-135 is creation of new bureaucrats; it imposes a still tighter control on the economic life of people, in the area of housing. Certainly, Mr. Speaker, we cannot accept this. We want that loans from the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation be granted by the Bank of Canada, and that the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation lend to those who have to build the money necessary and at the administrative cost. This would be a reasonable interest rate.

You can say: But we already have private companies and finance companies. I will answer that they can always finance something else. Will we always let the Canadian people be caught in the claws of these vultures, these leeches of the Canadian people, or will we manage to pass laws favouring man? We are always passing laws favouring the financial establishment, as is the case for Bill C-135.

At any rate, Mr. Speaker, these loans to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, without creating new corporations, would allow Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation to enlarge its operation, to reach all levels of the population, without creating, as I said before, a parallel corporation.

If the government really intends and wishes to help middle Canadians to become homeowners, it should act differently than at present. Let it act in a way that will free the middle Canadian from the claws of finance, by allowing him to have access to credit through a federal body which is called Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, which will lend him at an interest rate covering administrative costs. This will allow more Canadians to own their own home.

[English]

Mr. Ed Nelson (Burnaby-Seymour): Mr. Speaker, I should like to join my colleagues in speaking against the bill that is before us today, Bill C-135, that Frankenstein monster dreamed up by this government presumably to make more funds available for mortgages in Canada. It is a bill which may be very comforting to large lending institutions, but it is extremely cold comfort to anyone who is faced with the problem of buying a house. This bill is, of course, supported both by the government and that humane, socialistically inclined group of great Canadians, the official opposition. This is the opposition group that has been shouting "wage and price controls, fight inflation". We already have wage controls, as any worker will tell you.

● (1610)

I started work at the age of 13 and this job is the first one for which I did not have to negotiate a wage or a salary. My wages have been controlled as the wages of most workers are. This is the opposition group that poses as the champion of the people in the battle against rising costs, but it does not want to control interest rates. Wages, yes, but not interest. This is the same opposition group, moreover, that supported tax reductions for corporations and now supports inflated interest rates which would benefit mainly the private sector by providing $400 million of the taxpayers' money, $100 million of it in share capital and a maximum of $300 million as loans to the corporation that will be set up to create a gambling pool for speculators in housing. It will, as I understand it, be a private corporation. It is the people of Canada who will suffer be being forced to pay exorbitant interest rates for whatever sort of shelter they might try to buy.

The people who will be hit hardest, of course, are those who are in the low income bracket. The hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard) covered this aspect of the problem last night when he graphically described the plight of our native population and that of low income groups in some of the have-not provinces. Next week, Mr. Speaker, I will be proposing the toast at the wedding of a young couple in Vancouver. I cannot help but wonder what chance this couple will have of ever owning their own home. Certainly, they cannot buy one at today's inflated prices. Their only alternative is to move into a high-rise apartment and spend the rest of their married life in these modern, ugly filing cabinets that are so rapidly replacing single home dwellings, or they might be lucky and find a dingy basement suite.

Mr. Speaker, 28 years ago I made a down payment of $1,500 on a small home, a payment that was made possible only because I had been left a legacy in that amount. I wanted to pay more, but when I went to the bank at which I had been dealing for ten years—I needed $500 more and for security I had a job appointment slip for my first job of teaching—the bank would not lend me a cent without security amounting to at least $500. Well, if I had had the $500 I would not have had to borrow it. It was tough enough then to borrow money even at 4 per cent, let alone now at 10 per cent. Later, I bought a house with $15,000 down and a mortgage of 5½ per cent. Twenty years later that mortgage is still not paid off even at 5½ per cent. And I am trapped in an area, which has become noisy with heavy traffic and crowded with residential congestion, because in order to move I would have to obtain a mortgage at 10 per cent or cash to escape the usurers.

I mention my own experience to illustrate the extent to which our residential population has become immobile simply because people cannot afford to move out of the houses in which they are living. This heartless and cynical bill treats housing as a commodity to be treated in the market place for profit. It ignores the government's social responsibility to provide every Canadian citizen with a decent roof over his head at a reasonable cost. Like the hon. member for Skeena, I wish that the authors of this bill and its supporters would knock at the doors of the people in this country who are forced to live in substandard housing because of the inflated prices caused by greedy speculators. They would not even have to go as far north as my hon. friend has suggested. They could come to my riding to feast their eyes on the results of their philosophy in some of the poorer sections of the riding. I have lived, worked and travelled in the north country and I can vouch for the validity of the description given by the hon. member for Skeena of housing conditions that are to be found there, but I am also aware of conditions in every large city in this country.

There is no doubt about the position of our constituents, if my own riding of Burnaby-Seymour is any criteria and I think it is since it contains a good cross-section of people both economically and politically. On the basis of 752 responses to the question, "Do you think that the interest rates on mortgage money for housing should be strictly controlled by a government agency?", 571 replied with a resounding "yes" as compared to 182 who said "no". Asked if they thought that mortgage interest rates should be determined by "the free play of market forces"—that favourite phrase of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) and his Tory bedmates—512 respondents said "no" and only 201 said "yes". The public, Mr. Speaker, is not stupid. People recognize simple, social justice. They recognize also a rip-off when there is one and perhaps that is why, in the same questionnaire—summarized only yesterday—they replied to the question, "Which party has done the best job in the House so far?" in this way: NDP 322, Liberal 159, Tory 53.

If they were aware of the profit figures for real estate institutions for the first half of 1973 they would no doubt be even more definite in their replies. Here are some of those profit increases from the corresponding period the previous year: Cadillac Development Corporation 45 per cent, Campeau 65 per cent; Monarch Investment 110 per cent, Marlborough Properties Limited 284 per cent—and this was a bad year for Marlborough Properties—Canadian Interurban Properties 182 per cent. There is obviously a gold mine here for real estate speculators.

Our party feels strongly on this issue and that is why so many NDP speakers have been on their feet in this debate in direct contrast to the reticence of the usually vocal Tory group which now finds itself in a financial Valhalla. We want to see Canadians properly housed. We want to force financial institutions to make a portion of their huge funds available as mortgage money. We want interest rates for mortgages held at 6 per cent, or, with the permission of the hon. member for Témiscamingue (Mr. Caouette) at 3 per cent.

What we really want, Mr. Speaker, is a little compassion from the government and its allies to my right in order to alleviate the deplorable shortage of housing and the equally deplorable types of accommodation in which so many of our citizens are forced to live. Mr. Speaker, I shall oppose passage of this bill.

Mr. Terry Grier (Toronto-Lakeshore): Mr. Speaker, I shall say only a word or two because much of what I might otherwise have said has already been said. I do not wish to take up the time of the House by repeating what has been said already. My principal difficulty in respect of this bill is that for the life of me I cannot see how it will accomplish the objective of producing more residential mortgage funds, presumably at a lower rate of interest. It seems to me the mechanicism to be established inevitably will only produce additional mortgage funds—if indeed they are produced—at an interest rate equivalent to or higher than that which now prevails. Otherwise, why would investment funds enter into the residential mortgage market on a voluntary basis unless there is the incentive of increased interest rates. The logic of the government's position seems to be that if it brings more funds into the residential mortgage market that will force the rate down. However, it seems to me one must look at the proposition the other way around. How will more funds become available for residential mortgages if, in fact, the rates go down? They won't.

I do not, for the life of me, see how this bill will succeed in accomplishing the objective of producing residential mortgages at rates that are acceptable to the great majority of Canadians and to people who live in the constituency of Toronto-Lakeshore. As I understand it, the problem today is not a shortage of residential mortgage funds but a shortage of residential mortgage funds at interest rates which make the eventual payment a conceivable proposition. The problem is not mortgage money but rather what one must pay for that mortgage money, the cost that goes into the purchase of the home which puts it well beyond the range of most ordinary Canadians. You can borrow money any day of the week if you are prepared to pay the interest rates. There is no difficulty in finding mortgages and I do not see why we must go through the process of establishing a mechanism to channel more mortgage money into the market if we are not prepared at the same time to take very concrete steps to ensure that the interest rates at which that mortgage money will be lent are at a reasonable level.

I recognize the fact that the government made some moves earlier this year in an attempt to provide assistance to those who desire to own a home through AHOP, which we supported and which we succeeded in having amended in certain important respects. I can see that that is a step in the direction of making it easier for ordinary working Canadians to own a house. But I wonder how many Canadians today really are aware of the benefits that may be available under that program. I wonder how extensively and assiduously that program is being advertised. Second, how many people will be able to qualify given the relationship between the cost of houses in a city like Toronto and the income of the applicants. I must recognize, as indeed the government must recognize, that the interest rate being envisaged under that program, although lower than the prevailing rates, is still in the range of 8 per cent and above.

In a riding like my own, if I may be parochial for a moment, the matter of mortgages at reasonable interest rates is the very key to the survival and maintenance of the sense of community which has prevailed in that part of Toronto for many years. There is almost no land for new housing in Toronto-Lakeshore. What housing changes hands is older housing, and I welcomed and supported AHOP because I hoped it would make it easier for younger families who have grown up in the community to buy a house in that community, to stay there and to provide the next generation of leadership which every community requires if it is to prosper.

But AHOP is not enough, and the kind of proposal that was put forward last week by the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent) which calls on the government to impose upon the chartered banks—and let us not back away from that term—a regimen which should see them allocating a certain amount of funds each year toward mortgages at an interest rate not to exceed 6 per cent, is essential for the preservation of many of the older communities in our urban areas. I have no doubt that it has equal benefits in other parts of the country, but to my riding its benefit lies in the fact that it would enable us to preserve what is good and to avoid what all too often appears to be the inexorable tendency of these communities to go to high-rise, to concrete filing cabinets, as they were referred to by my colleague, the hon. member for Burnaby-Seymour (Mr. Nelson).

I cannot find any basis in this bill that would warrant my support for it. For these two reasons, first, that it will not succeed in any significant degree in making mortgages with reasonable interest rates available to Canada, and second, that the absence of that kind of provision gives little or no benefit to the kind of constituency I represent and that many other members in this chamber represent, I feel it is largely a hoax. The bill is an elaborate paper mechanism which, I am quite certain, will succeed in providing little or no benefit to ordinary Canadians in the housing market.

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I rise somewhat reluctantly to discuss the subject of this bill, because I do not happen to know too much about housing. However, that does not seem to have prevented many members from speaking so I thought I had better make some kind of contribution.

Mr. Basford: They are all members of your party.

Mr. Leggatt: That includes members of all parties in the House. Somebody has made a reference to abortion. I want to say that that describes perfectly both the policies that have been advocated by the Liberal benches and those that have been advocated by the Conservatives. Their policies have really been an abortion in terms of finding a way of providing money to solve this serious social problem.

I must say that in dealing with this problem in Bill C-133, the government came up with something that I did not think was too bad. They did provide a neighbourhood improvement program, items on co-operative housing, something in terms of land assembly, and something in terms of improvement to existing housing. But when it came to the problem of providing money for new housing, their logic has failed. They have gone again to the free market forces to solve a problem that the free market forces have not solved over the past ten years and will not solve over the next ten years.

You will recall that this government decided to appoint the Dennis task force to report on housing. That task force pointed out that about 50 per cent of Canadians cannot afford decent housing. Those groups on welfare and those earning up to about $6,500 were unable to afford any kind of decent housing. What kind of an answer is this bill to the Dennis report? Admittedly, Bill C-133 went some distance in meeting the recommendations in that report, but in terms of providing money, the key to the housing program, the government has fallen down completely. What has been shown over the past 10 years is that the free market forces cannot solve this problem. However it is appropriate to interfere with the free market when we have a national crisis such as the railway strike, and it is appropriate to force the railway workers back to work at unacceptable terms to them when there is a crisis. I say that what we have is a national crisis in housing and this government has failed to understand that fact. They are much too chickenhearted, and so are my friends to the right, to interfere with their friends, the financial institutions of this country. As I said, the private market forces have failed to solve the problem.

● (1630)

The Dennis Report pointed out that half the people in this country cannot get decent housing. This is the response which the minister made back on June 12, when he introduced this bill. He said:

> The over-all effect of these new institutions should be an increase in the supply of private mortgage funds from the capital market. In addition, some relative decrease in the level of mortgage interest rates is anticipated—

I emphasize the words "relative decrease". What is it going to be? Will it be one per cent or two per cent? One of the major problems has been not that there is not enough money for housing for lower income people, but rather the excessive interest rates charged on that money.

Free market forces are not going to drag down the rates of interest. We need the nerve and the guts to interfere with those forces, and require that interest rates for low income and middle income people be fixed by the banks at 6 per cent. Recently when he appeared on television, the minister criticized this proposal. At a quick glance I thought this criticism had some validity. The minister argued that if you require banks to lend a certain proportion of their money at 6 per cent for housing, there was no knowing what this would do to other interest rates. He said it would drive up interest rates on the purchase of cars and other consumer goods. This only indicated where his social priorities really are. The social priority we need now is in housing. If the effect of the NDP policy would be to drive up interest rates temporarily on the purchase of these other products, so be it. We have a national housing crisis and this bill will not solve it.

I am not surprised that hon. members to my right—some of them around me are really of the far right—support this bill. This attitude is in tune with their free enterprise philosophy. It will not solve the problem, but neither will it upset their friends in the banking institutions. It is really part of the Tory catechism that we should not interfere with the play of free market forces or we will kill the goose that lays the golden eggs. In terms of low income people there are a lot of eggs being laid around this country, but they are not golden. In fact, they are starting to go rotten.

I am surprised at the reluctance of Conservatives to support us on this bill because here is another golden opportunity for them to demonstrate their concern about the cost of living and the cost of housing. Here is a party which advocates a 90 day freeze on wages and prices. But how much can we believe in that party when it supports a bill like this? How would Conservatives administer the incomes policy they talk about? How would they fix wages and prices in terms of equity to low income people? That is a political rather than an economic decision, and I believe their political decision would be to penalize low income people and reward the rich. That is why this party does not trust in the policy advocated by hon. members to my right. Their position on this bill is philosophically consistent with their policies for years. That is why I cannot support either the Liberals or the Conservatives on this legislation. I extend a welcome to any free thinking Tories who wish to re-examine their position on the bill. The hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Hellyer) is one who has contributed much to debates on housing.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, it takes a little nerve to tackle the major financial institutions in Canada, but there is a logic to doing it. If we would only treat housing the way we treat railway workers we would solve the housing problem. We would interfere with the free market. We would have the nerve and the guts to require financial institutions to put a certain percentage of their lending capacity into mortgages at reasonable interest rates. In that way, we would solve the problem.

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wish to take a few moments before the minister rises to reply to say that a society motivated only by a desire for profit is basically immoral. I did not originate that phrase. It is a quotation from the CCF Winnipeg Declaration of 1956, and I thought it a most appropriate one to use in debate on a bill such as this.

I have listened to a number of Conservative members repeatedly talking about inflation and the cost of living, repeatedly talking about controls on wages and prices. I have yet to hear, however, any of them say anything about controls on interest rates, profits, real estate speculators and the like. Yet they wonder why we choose not to trust the economy to their hands, when all they talk about is controls on wages and prices. In my opinion any person earning less than $6,000, $7,000 or $8,000 a year in this kind of economy is entitled to all the wage increases he can get, particularly if he is trying to support a wife and children and to pay off a mortgage, and more particularly if he is trying to pay off a mortgage at the kind of interest rates that this or a Conservative government allows.

There are a number of areas in any civilized society where profit making should be ruled out. In fact over the last hundred years there have been a number of areas in our society in which profit making has been ruled out. It has been ruled out with respect to streets and sidewalks, sewer and water systems, public schools and universities. Surely, such a basic human right as having a decent place to live is another area where profit making should be put aside, at least for those on low incomes, for those who live in slums and in substandard housing.

The introduction of the bill is the fourth or fifth time since 1966 that this method has been tried. Its purpose allegedly is to ensure that more money is made available for mortgages for housing. Available to whom? Available to the poor? Available to the people on low wages? Available to people on fixed incomes? No, Mr. Speaker. Each time parliament has dealt with a similar piece of legislation more mortgage money has been made available all right, but available at interest rates that only those with middle and high incomes can afford. It has not made more mortgage money available for those who need housing the most. I hope members of the official opposition will reconsider their position on this legislation. I beg them to reconsider. I beg them to join us in calling on the government to introduce legislation providing interest rates in the nature of 6 per cent for people earning less than $10,000 or $12,000 a year.

Some time ago I spoke to a group of young ladies at a school. I advised them that when they left school they should plan on going through two or three husbands during the rest of their lives, because it was unlikely that the first one would live long enough to pay for the home they would buy. It seems to me insensible and unjust that a home valued at $15,000 or $20,000 should cost a total of $70,000, $80,000 or $90,000 by the time the mortgage has been paid off. I am not opposed to all profits and I am not opposed to a reasonable or fair profit in many areas of our society. But surely, Mr. Speaker, this kind of profit is immoral and surely the motive of profit in the area of decent homes for those who do not have decent homes, is immoral.

If the government wants to ensure that there is a lot more money available in the mortgate market for housing, and particularly to make sure it is available for those who can afford to pay, then this bill must be defeated. The government must bring in legislation to accomplish the purpose that I am sure it wants as sincerely as we do. To suggest that people on incomes of $8,000, $10,000 or $12,000 a year can afford mortgages at a 10 per cent interest rate is an illusion. We all know that families with two, three or four children living on $8,000, $10,000 or $12,000 a year find that a greater and greater share of that income goes for shelter than for food. With each rise in interest rates, a greater portion of the low income goes to paying off a mortgage that will last for 25 or 40 years. Surely even the profit makers, in all conscience, do not want to make profit at that kind of social cost and that kind of indecency to their fellow citizens.

I will be very happy to oppose this legislation and I hope my colleagues in other corners of the House will do the same thing. It will not be a disaster for the minister in charge of housing. He can bring in another bill in two or three weeks or tomorrow or whenever we are here, to do some of the things that we have been advocating for many years to make a greater volume of money available for people on low and fixed incomes.

I have heard the minister refer many times to the number of homes that have been built in the last few years in this country, and there is no doubt that tens of thousands of homes were constructed each year. But they were not for the people who needed them most; they were for the people who could afford them. Imagine what a sufficient supply of mortgage money at rates of 5 per cent or 6 per cent would do for the economy—what it would do for the lumber industry, the furniture industry, the fabricating industry, the appliance industry. Imagine how it would help employment and keep down the cost of living for ordinary families on low incomes. I am sure that is the kind of objective that every member of this House has in his own mind. But to suggest that such an objective can be reached by requiring people on low incomes to pay an interst rate of up to 10 per cent, is not realistic.

When the minister replies I hope that he will have something constructive to put forward on the proposals we have made and that the government can accomplish, as soon as possible, what we have been advocating in the area of housing for people on low incomes.

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to speak in this debate, but I understand that my name has been mentioned two or three times and consequently I have decided to participate briefly.

This bill does not, of course, guarantee that mortgage rates will come down. Even the minister in his wildest dreams would not suggest that would be the result. But he did indicate that if there is a tendency, it would be to exert downward pressure on interest rates to the extent that it channels additional funds into residential mortgages. For that reason, and because this is a useful instrument which will enable mortgages to become more liquid and more attractive to some investors, I think the bill is worthy of the support of the House.

The NDP is quite right when they suggest that the bill is not going to solve the housing problem in Canada. Housing costs are too high, interest rates are too high and something must be done about the situation, but unfortunately the solutions put forward by the NDP are not the right solutions. As a matter of fact, one of the reasons the economy is in such a mess at the present time is that we have followed for too long policies advocated by the NDP and because they refuse to face the basic economic facts of life.

An hon. Member: They do not know them.

Mr. Hellyer: I understand that mention was made of the fact that I was responsible for taking off the fixed interest rates on NHA mortgages. This is absolutely correct, Mr. Speaker, and there were good reasons for it. Unfortunately, these gentlemen in the far corner, because they are totally unacquainted with the building business, would not understand why that was absolutely necessary.

Previously, Mr. Speaker, the NHA interest rate was set by order in council at 2¼ points above the long term Government of Canada bond yield. If that formula were still in effect today, the interest rate on NHA loans would be just about what it is. As a matter of fact, for most of the period since the fixed rate was taken off, mortgage money was available under the National Housing Act at rates lower than would have been the case if the rate had been set by order in council. Anyone who has had the least bit of experience with the building business knows that for the decades rates were set by order in council, the rate was either too high or too low 90 per cent of the time.

Some hon. Members: Too high.

Mr. Hellyer: The academic know-it-alls in that corner of the House, Mr. Speaker, have all the answers.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hellyer: I thought they would applaud that statement, but the second sentence is: like many of their kind they are unfamiliar with the problems.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hellyer: The reason was obvious to anyone who know anything about the business. When the mortgage rate was higher than the market, too much money flowed into housing and when it was lower than the market, no money flowed in. Consequently, there was this boom and bust cycle that everyone has been objecting to, and even the NDP have been saying that housing should not be used as a countervailing economic force in Canada but should be consistently operated in accordance with the needs of the people.

That is precisely the reason the limit was taken off. Having fixed interest rates under the National Housing Act put dozens of the best builders in this country out of business, just because some other academic know-it-alls in Central Mortgage and Housing thought they knew better than the market at all times what the interest rate should be. It did not work. I can cite chapter and verse where subdivisions were begun, model houses were built and sales were made in advance but no money was available to build the houses people required, even though the houses had been sold in advance, because of the rigidity of a system which did not take market forces into account.

My hon. friends have suggested that the present rate of 10 per cent is ridiculously high and I must say that I agree with them completely.

[Mr. Hellyer.]

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

● (1650)

Mr. Hellyer: They also give the impression, and I think this is an impression, that this is the rate in real terms. Mr. Speaker, if we are to learn about our economic situation, we must begin talking in real terms and not in money terms, as has been the case during most of this debate. An interest rate of 10 per cent on mortgages sounds like a great deal. When you consider the inflation rate of 8.3 per cent, which you must deduct from that 10 per cent, and then deduct about three quarters of 1 per cent which is required for administering a mortgage, you will find that the total cost of inflation and of administering the mortgage amounts to about 9 per cent. That leaves an effective, real rate of return of 1 per cent on a 1 per cent mortgage. That is a pretty low rate of interest in real terms.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hellyer: My hon. friends should listen, because there are lots of things about this business that they do not understand. There are lots of things which they do not teach you at school, professor, believe me.

Not only is that one per cent rate of real return minimal, but the whole profit, so to speak, is subject to income tax. If you pay income tax at a rate of 30 per cent or 40 per cent, you will be in the hole from day one. Any person who puts personal investments in NHA mortgages at 10 per cent today will be in a negative position so far as the real rate of return is concerned. In these circumstances, there is not much incentive for ordinary investors to put their money into mortgages.

Would my hon. friends to my left, who try to leave the impression that they believe in fairness and honesty, honestly say to any Canadian today, "It would be a good idea if you put your personal savings into NHA mortgages at 10 per cent. That would be a good investment." Would they say that when there is an 8.3 per cent inflation rate and when the whole profit, so to speak, is subject to income tax at progressive rates? I do not think they would.

The real problem is the economy itself, and here is where hon. members to my left refuse to face facts. You have high interest rates because of inflation. They are a sympton of inflation and, so long as you have inflation at present levels, you will have high interest rates. There is no way under heaven in which you can get away from this fact. When will the NDP wake up to this fact? When will they wake up to the factors that cause inflation?

An hon. Member: What is your solution, 1929 all over again?

Mr. Hellyer: Listen. Then hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies) and others have tried to tell you, but you have a blind side, because so much of your money comes from a source which refuses to let you listen to the solution. You should keep that in mind.

An hon. Member: Bullshit.

Mr. Hellyer: I hope that is on the record.

An hon. Member: I hope it is, too.

Mr. Hellyer: The Canadian Labour Congress said, "Let us have no wage or price controls."

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I think the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Hellyer) should remember that he is really addressing the Chair and the "You" previously referred to would not appear to be the Chair. I realize that he is directing his remarks to the party in the far left corner, but I think he should follow the more traditional method of debate and perhaps we could avoid some of the unfortunate expressions which are getting on the record.

Mr. Woolliams: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I do not think Your Honour ought to call the hon. member who has the floor to order. It is the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard) who ought to be called to order. Is Your Honour afraid?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Chair is not afraid. The Chair heard an unfortunate expression, knew from which direction it came, but did not know from which corner it came.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to argue with you but I had, I thought, paid all the usual respects to the Chair. My remarks to that corner of the House were directed through you, Sir, and if from time to time I seemed to turn my back on the Chair, that was simply inadvertence on my part. I wanted to get as best I could the attention of the NDP who have, I feel, done this country a great disservice in not coming to grips with the basic fundamentals of the problem which apparently concerns them.

That problem is this: So long as wages and prices are rising faster than productivity, you will have inflation. It is difficult to separate at present the proportion of inflation caused by international commodities from that proportion which is caused by the cost-push cycle. If one wanted to make a reasonable guess, one could say that perhaps, of the total inflation in Canada today, about 25 per cent, if you could isolate it, is due to international commodity prices and demand pressures from outside this country. The rest of it, Mr. Speaker, is made in Canada, is made here. Fifty six per cent of our Gross National Product last year was in wages and salaries, including military pay. If that 56 per cent increases at three to four times the average rate of increase of productivity, there is no way that you can avoid inflation. It is just simple arithmetic. If 56 per cent of the GNP goes up at three to four times the average rate of increase of productivity in real terms, you have to print a lot more money to provide any kind of reasonably full employment. If you have to print more and more money in order to provide a reasonably satisfactory level of employment, you will have the kind of inflation which we have today. We must face the facts.

My hon. friends know that these wages and salaries are part of costs. If, for any business in the country, costs go up, the mark-up, which is usually in percentage terms, is applied to the increased costs as well. So, increased costs are reflected in increased prices. Thus one sees the cycle of increased costs leading to increased prices. It is really futile to argue whether increasing prices cause increasing wages or whether increasing wages cause increasing prices, as the two are interrelated. We must accept that fact, or we will continue to experience the kind of inflation that we are seeing today as far ahead into the future as one can visualize.

The other contributing factor to inflation in Canada is the level of government expenditures. My friends of the NDP—and they are not the only ones who are guilty, as I will be the first to admit—have been pushing for more government expenditures. They have been pushing for new programs, for readjustments of all kinds, and in many cases these are justified. Again, let us return to the facts, Mr. Speaker.

If the average increase in productivity per person in Canada in real terms is of the order of 2 or 3 per cent, and if all governments in Canada increase their take of the Gross National Product by 1 per cent per year each year, as they have been doing for the last seven or eight years, there will be less left for the workers in this country, in real terms, to spend for themselves. Consequently, the wage gains which have been negotiated are less in real terms than they otherwise would have been. So, although in some cases unions of Canada have negotiated wage agreements calling for increases of 7 or 8 per cent, by the time you allow for the increase in governmental expenditures and the graduated income tax, and inflation the total gain is zero in real terms.

My friends to my left keep avoiding the critical issue. They say, "Let us have a review board which will look at prices and even roll back prices." But they will not do the same with wages and salaries. If you are to go through that process with prices, you must also go through the same process with salaries, because wages and salaries constitute a bigger proportion of the Gross National Product than any other single factor. They constitute a far, far greater proportion than profits, for example, and the trend is continuing in that direction. From 1949 to the present the proportion of the Gross National Product which is made up of salaries has been increasing and the proportion which is made up of profits has been decreasing.

So I say to my friends, if you are serious about housing, if you mean what you say, if you want interest rates to come down, do something about it; let that something be supporting an incomes policy along the lines put forward by the Progressive Conservative party.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hellyer: There is no other solution. You can make all the great speeches you want and "con" some of the people you talk to, because you are so eloquent, and make them believe things that they do not understand, but you are not being honest with them and you are not being honest with yourselves. If you want to reduce the level of inflation in Canada to anything like an acceptable level, you need to have a policy which stops this upward pressure by powerful unions and oligopolies. There is no way of avoiding it.

● (1700)

Recently in the Edmonton Journal there were two headlines in the same week, one stating that construction workers had turned down a wage increase of something in the order of 94 cents. I cannot remember the exact figure.

The other headline stated the minimum wage would soon be increased to $2.

An hon. Member: Is that too much?

Mr. Hellyer: No. It is not enough to live on, not enough to buy the products made by those earning $8 or $9 an hour. It is out of joint. The pecking order is distorted. it is not fair, reasonable and just. We have to regulate the strong on behalf of the weak. It is ridiculous to have a minimum wage of $2 when the houses those people have to buy are built by people earning $9 or $10 an hour. It is absolutely and utterly ridiculous.

The situation is actually deteriorating. It is getting worse as time goes on. If you go on the basis of percentages, when the fellow earning $8 and $9 an hour gets an 8 or 9 per cent increase, that is a big increase in terms of cents per hour. When the fellow making $2, $2.25 or $2.35 an hour gets that type of increase, he starves. He cannot afford food, clothing or shelter. He cannot afford to live. What do you do? You subsidize food, clothing and housing. You have to twist everything around and hire hundreds of thousands of bureaucrats to pass the money back and forth. These people should be paid a decent wage in the first place. They should have enough to look after food, clothing and shelter.

It is very disappointing to get all of this righteous indignation from the far corner of the House about interest rates on housing. No one is more concerned about it than we in this party. The present situation is absolutely unacceptable. It has deteriorated consistently over a period of about 15 years. Fifteen years ago, a working man in this country could aspire to owning his own house. That is not the case today. It is getting worse all the time. If we want to reverse the trend, we will have to do something about land costs, as recommended long ago by the task force and supported by this party. Something will have to be done about interest rates. To do that, we need an incomes policy to stop this cost-push element of inflation in our country.

Let's be realistic. Let's be honest. Let's not kid ourselves and the people. Let's stop this inflationary cycle. If the New Democratic Party is really serious about trying to do something about the housing problem, the next time there is a motion from this side of the House condemning the government for its lack of action in respect of an incomes policy, let's have some support from that part of the House.

An hon. Member: Vote against this bill.

Mr. Hellyer: This is an innocuous bill. It will not do any harm. It may do some good. I spend a lot of time worrying about this. Why not do something about the fundamental situation? The NDP say this bill will not solve the problem. They are right. This is not the solution. The solution is much more fundamental. The solution is to have some basic relationship between wages and prices and productivity so there are fair shakes for all of the workers of Canada and not just the powerful getting the big stakes while others do not have enough to live on and look after the needs of their families. The Minister of Transport (Mr. Marchand) understands this. It is too bad he cannot persuade his colleagues to do something about it.

If the hon. gentlemen in the far corner of the House really want to do something for Canadian workers and housing, they will reverse their one-sided, myopic policy and come out in favour of an incomes policy which is realistic; one which applies realistic guidelines to the profits of the oligopolies, and the wages of the members of the big powerful unions. We could then start to bring the situation under control. When we do that, interest rates will come down. When interest rates come down, ultimately the average man in this country will again be able to look forward to getting a house for himself and his family. We hope we will have the support of the NDP in this endeavour.

[Translation]

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I do not want to take the floor too long during this debate, but as a result of the intervention of the leader of the Social Credit Party of Canada, the hon. member for Témiscamingue (Mr. Caouette), I must specify a few points. As a matter of fact, the hon. member made a fair and honest description of the situation and the problem of income as regards housing in Canada, and he proposed a real solution, namely the use of credits of the Bank of Canada, which belongs to all Canadians, to help bring about a fair situation in housing, to enable low income people to have access to family and suitable housing.

Faced with such facts, Mr. Speaker, it is not the first time that members of the Social Credit party call for a policy of income based on prices, on the cost of living in general and on the needs of citizens. It is not the first time that we say that the same causes bring about the same effect. As a matter of fact, three years ago, we passed a similar legislation. We will pass again—I hope personally that it will be turned down—a measure designed to increase a little bit the interest rate, create a new ivory tower dreamed up by public servants, which finally will not solve in any way the problem of housing.

Mr. Speaker, ministers and hon. members return the ball to one another and play politics. The Progressive Conservative members say that what the Liberals are doing is no good; the Liberals say that the Progressive Conservatives have not understood anything and New Democrats say that an interest rate of 6 per cent would be more suitable than the present rate of 7¼ per cent, and, as one of the previous speakers said, when we proposed a rate of 6 per cent, these people called for a 3 per cent rate.

In any case, Mr. Speaker, I would like to remind a former Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, the hon. member for Langelier (Mr. Marchand), and the minister responsible for CMHC and mover of this bill (Mr. Basford), of the current situation in my part of the country in Quebec. Today, we heard at length about the problems of Newfoundland. Let us now hear what goes on in Quebec.

In my remarks on the subject, I shall base myself not on the literature influenced by the social credit doctrine but rather on that supplied by the civil servants and the government itself. I shall refer to a publication, a working paper prepared by the Department of Regional Economic Expansion as a contribution to the federal-provincial consultations bearing on a regional development policy for Canada, published in April 1973 and entitled "Quebec—Economic Situation and Development Possibilities".

Mr. Speaker, while the ministers, the governments which are succeeding each other ask Parliament to grant millions of dollars in a given sector, establish new departments to fight unemployment, to develop construction, they keep on putting up hypocritically with an 11 per cent sales tax on building materials, further to the 8 per cent provincial tax. Meanwhile, the situation in the area of housing keeps on worsening in spite of these measures.

Mr. Speaker, it is not I who will say it. Before beginning my quotation, I would like to remind the House that we hear frequently: When housing is doing well, so is the economy. When it is doing bad, so is the economy. It is often said that this is one of the true barometers.

Mr. Speaker, on page 5 of the report that I referred to earlier, one can read and I quote:

In absolute terms, the income per capita and gains per capita (excluding government transfers) are both below the national average,—

● (1710)

And this concerns the province of Quebec.

In Quebec, per capita personal income amounted to $3,027 in 1971 as compared with $2,443 in the Atlantic area, $2,778 in Saskatchewan and $3,967 in Ontario.

That is the income situation. Is the situation improving in spite of allegedly good measures, both in the field of income security and social security as in the field of lodging and other areas, for example, economic expansion?

Page 6 reads as follows and I quote:

So, in Quebec per capita personal income in 1967 was $235 below the national average but, in 1971, $378.

Therefore, the income situation which would permit to buy a house grows worse and worse.

Let us take another item dealt with in the same report and concerning employment in the building industry.

We are told that the building of houses should be encouraged, that a new organization similar to the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation is going to be created and that a new interest rate corresponding to the cost of living will be established. The governments have of course no control over this; they are controlled by those who control the cost of living. Now let us consider what is said about the employment rate which was to increase. On page 35 it is stated, and I quote:

The employment growth decreased during the second half of the last ten years and mainly in the service area. Between 1966 and 1971 the employment rate decreased by 25,000 workers in the building industry.

There was an employment decrease of 25,000 people in Quebec. And the minister will tell us that his policy was effective up to now and therefore that it was a good policy.

Mr. Speaker, I would advise him to read other departments' publications; he could see that the object of his policy up to now was to get votes. The damn well lied—as people usually say—as we know that according to this report, employment in construction decreased by 25,000.

That is what is being said on housing, considering as always the so-called good measures we have tolerated far too long, in housing in Canada. While reading the speeches from the ministers of that time, be they Progressive Conservatives, Liberals or NDP, one was under the impression that that was going to settle the problem, to provide a solution. Now let us see how things really stand. On page 36 of this report, under the title "Housing", one can read and I quote:

Housing: The main housing problems in Quebec are a matter of quality in housing and means of acquiring a house rather than a matter of quantity.

You will understand why in a few minutes. It is very simple: the birth-rate is falling.

I come back to the quotation:

The standards normally used to determine quality in housing show a steady improvement; it remains that Montreal and the province of Quebec—

And at this stage, I invite the minister to listen to me with great attention.

—it remains that Montreal and the province of Quebec as a whole have twice as many overcrowded dwellings than Toronto and the province of Ontario respectively.

—Moreover, in Montreal in 1971, more than 24,000 housing units did not have running water (6,000 in Toronto) and 16,395 units had no bath or shower.

And this situation existed in Montreal, in Canada, in 1971.

Mr. Speaker, how can we improve this situation? If people live in tenements, it is because they cannot afford to buy a house, because their income is too low for them to obtain the money they need from the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation or the other financial institutions. And it is not with a bill such as the one before us, which will contribute to put people further in debt, that we shall solve their problems. I see that 24,000 units in Montreal—right here, in 1971—have no running water and that 16,395 have no both or shower, I believe that it is my duty to ask the minister to think twice before saying that all it takes to solve the problem is another "rigging" of government officials who will investigate and determine what the problems of housing are.

Mr. Speaker, this situation is revolting, and on page 37 of the report, we read that:

Low income families—

Some hon. members suggest that Creditistes have coloured dreams when we say that the monetary and financial system are the root of the problem.

I continue the quotation:

Low income families—

How many are there of these in the province of Quebec? In 1967, there were 248,000 low income families in Quebec.

Low income families (248,000 families in Quebec in 1967) must frequently spend an excessive portion of their incomes on housing at the expense of other essentials, unless they accept to live in overcrowded or substandard lodgings.

—without baths, showers or running water.

This problem is particularly acute in the cases of our senior citizens and Indian population (35,000 people in Quebec); the latter are the worst off in the province, as far as lodging is concerned.

And it is not over yet. I read on:

In Montreal, housing stock increased by 47 per cent between 1961 and 1971—

When we were supposed to have some extraordinary legislation allowing the construction of a greater number of dwellings and meant to improve the availability of housing for those families, the conditions are as follows:

The housing stock in Montreal has increased by 47 per cent between 1961 and against 1971 against 60 per cent in Toronto. While the number of individual dwellings is increasing more slowly than the number of apartments—

—the large apartment buildings where people are shut in—

—in other Canadian areas, the contrary is true in Quebec; however, a reversal of that trend has recently been noted. The number of housing starts in Quebec between 1961 and 1971 has been lower than the national average.

If the present trends are maintained, the increase in number of households in Quebec will remain substantially stable, that is 52,000 a year up to 1986; in Ontario, it will increase from 92,000 a year between 1971 to 1976 to 119,000 a year during the period of 1981 to 1986—

Mr. Speaker, that is the context in which Bill C-135 will be applied.

Those are the facts; I am not making them up. They are from the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. After all the efforts of the former minister of Regional Economic Expansion and those of successive ministers, those are the results.

Mr. Speaker, still too many Canadians do not have access to ownership, particularly those on low or fixed income, older people, unemployment insurance recipients, social welfare recipients and so many others. It was said earlier that over 248,000 families in Quebec did not have access to ownership.

Well, Mr. Speaker, I want to say to the minister that as long as he will sponsor finance-dictated bills encouraging a system of indebtedness for Canadians and increased profits for those profiteering companies he will prejudice the normal evolution of a normal society that is there to allow every citizen to have a decent home.

Mr. Speaker, it is time to understand that the problem is not one of knowing whether the interest rate would be 7¼, 6 or 3 per cent but one of realizing that in order to pay back that interest of 7¼, 6 or 3 per cent, Canadians must have an adequate income, and as long as those who help finance make money to the detriment of small people who do not have the means to increase their income are allowed to continue to do so, we will be faced with an extremely serious housing problem.

While I am at it, I would also like to say to the minister that there would certainly be grounds for an in-depth and serious inquiry into the questionable practices of Central Mortgage and Housing and certain contractors. Mr. Speaker, dog houses are being built with their co-operation; houses crumble down, houses where construction is clearly at fault and inadequate, small houses that cannot be heated in winter, and that are being built here and elsewhere, especially in Quebec; I know at least that in Quebec, this is so. I seems to me that the minister could do more, he who is responsible for that Crown corporation. He could see to it that the standards of that corporation are followed, that the homes where Canadians will live are truly comfortable and of reasonable quality.

[Mr. Fortin.]

Mr. Speaker, if anything must be done, let us do it well and tackle the real problem. First, the sales tax on building materials imposed by the federal government ought to be abolished if we really mean to get better homes built and made available to more people. Secondly, new sources of funds should be created through CMHC by having recourse to the services of the Bank of Canada. If governments can turn to the chartered banks to finance their housing programs, why can they not do it by calling upon the institution that belongs to all Canadians, the Bank of Canada?

● (1720)

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I urge the minister to give special attention to those areas where slums, unsanitary, inadequate and even revolting housing conditions prevail, and as a matter of urgency to set up programs that will enable these people to move either into 15-floor apartment buildings or into single family dwellings.

It seems to me that this government like, the previous ones, have failed utterly with regard to that problem of special importance to our large urban centres. We know that large urban areas will continue to grow and expand to the detriment of rural areas. We must now establish, urbanization programs which will respect human beings, which will allow Canadians to live adequately in respectable and acceptable homes.

At present, Canadians are forced not only to reimburse two or three times the initial value of their home, but governments do not check the quality of these homes and do not see to their improvement.

Finally, if seems to me, and I would like to tell him in a sincere way, that current programs to help owners improve their home are plainly insufficient and do not agree with reality. Many of our fellow citizens would like to improve their property, their original investment, but credit charges are excessive and these people are forced to forsake it and let their home deteriorate. Here again, it seems to me that the minister would be more than welcome it he tackled this particular problem of improving existing buildings and especially the financial problems it involves.

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I would advise the House that if the minister speaks now he will close the debate on second reading.

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I will be very brief so we may vote before six o'clock pursuant to the order of the House. I want to make a few remarks about some of the debate we have had.

First of all, I am extremely indebted to my colleague, the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt). Nine out of the ten speeches in the debate today and yesterday have come from members of the New Democratic Party, and I am indebted to my hon. friend from British Columbia for pointing out that he joined the debate because he did not know much about housing, and judging by the other speeches, nor did any of the other members. As I say, I am indebted to him for that perceptive comment on the speeches of his colleagues.

Yesterday, and to some extent this afternoon, our friends from the New Democratic Party clothed themselves, as they often do, in self-righteousness and pointed out that they were the only members of the House who had any humanitarian instincts, any concern for the housing needs of the people of Canada. For a group that claims to be the only humanitarians in the House, I am surprised, as the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) was, that they repeatedly have to tell us and the people of Canada that they are the only humanitarians. I thought that humanitarianism was something that was obvious, that stood out, and that we need not be told about it once, twice, three times during the course of each speech.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Basford: Obviously, the Canadian people, all of whom are humanitiarian, have not bought their sales talk.

Mr. Nelson: They sure did in the west.

Mr. Basford: Most of the speeches have dealt not with the bill at all but with the housing situation in Canada and measures that were passed by this House a couple of months ago. I had hoped that the research assistants of the New Democratic Party had read Bill C-133 and the information put out just recently by CMHC as to those new amendments dealing with all the new housing programs of the government. But obviously they have not done so. I would encourage them to do so, Mr. Speaker, so that they know what the housing policy of this government is.

In the speeches of these hon. members yesterday and today, there was no mention of the measures passed by this House, and now implemented by CMHC and the government of Canada, dealing with problems relating to non-profit housing corporations and how benefits have been expanded, the new co-operative housing program, the neighbourhood improvement program, and the repair and rehabilitation program that my hon. friend from Quebec spoke about the other day, all of which are aimed at low and moderate income Canadians and which correct some of the housing difficulties that they encounter.

Similarly, there was no mention of the measures this House just passed, and which are now implemented, regarding land assembly and the amount of money set aside for that program, or the programs dealing with public housing, or the amendments to the National Housing Act with regard to Indian housing and the right of Indians to avail themselves totally and completely of programs under the National Housing Act.

Mr. Benjamin: Get to the bill.

Mr. Basford: There was no mention by them of the assisted home ownership program, about which I wish the members of the New Democratic Party would read and persuade people to take advantage of. I would be happy to send them a description of that program.

The hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Neil), I think it was, said words to the effect that we need a housing program to look after people with incomes between $6,000 to $7,000. Details may be obtained from the program itself, but generally it will serve families in the income range of from $6,000 to $11,000 per annum by way of subsidized interest rates, reducing interest rates to as low as 6 per cent for people in the low and moderate income ranges.

The best thing that this group could do for housing, Mr. Speaker, is to persuade at least three of the governments with which I think they have some connection, British Columbia, Saskatchewan and Manitoba, to take full advantage of these newly passed programs. Then, instead of two days of rhetoric we might get some houses built in British Columbia, Saskatchewan and Manitoba. I hope the members of the New Democratic Party will take that message with them to those three provinces, and that my hon. friend from Quebec who has just spoken will also take that message to the government of Quebec and ask them to take full advantage of the programs that this parliament has just enacted.

This bill is another measure, another instrument, in a comprehensive housing program and must be related to the other measures of which I have spoken which were enacted in Bill C-133, the amendments to the National Housing Act. This bill will benefit a very substantial number of people. However, the criticism of last evening apparently was that it is a bill that is directed toward the middle income people who are looking for their own mortgage money. Apparently a bill addressed to the middle income people in the eyes of the NDP is a bad bill. While Bill C-133 was aimed at and provided a program for, low and moderate income people this bill is aimed at those who can make their own way, but apparently it is not for this parliament to address itself to those Canadians who want to and can make their own way. According to the speeches of last night this bill is bad in NDP eyes because it attends to the problems of homeowners in Vancouver, Toronto, Montreal and Winnipeg. I think a bill which looks after the homeowners of Vancouver, Toronto, Montreal, Winnipeg and Ottawa is a pretty good bill. But apparently those are areas of the country which this parliament should not concern itself with because these are cities which, at least according to the NDP, should be ignored.

This bill will help people in those cities and others because essentially it will make it easier and more attractive for people, not just institutions, to invest their savings in residential mortgages. It is designed to bring in new and often small people, small savers, who now do not operate in the mortgage field, by making mortgages easier to deal in and by making them, in relation to other forms of investment, more attractive to institutions like pension funds and credit unions so that they may come into the mortgage business more heavily.

The purpose of this bill is to attract new money into mortgages. There has been a good deal of discussion in the speeches about the banks, life insurance companies and trust companies. This bill is not directed at and will not benefit them. They are in the mortgage business. This bill is not aimed at bringing those people into the residential mortgage business. It was drafted in a technical way to answer specifically the request, for example, from a group in my province which is important, the British Columbia Central Credit Union. This union, and the credit unions across Canada who are increasingly playing an important part in residential mortgages, wanted to avail themselves of the residential mortgage exchange corporation to be set up by this bill. I had thought that the New Democratic Party had some friendship and support for the credit union movement across Canada. All I can say is that in opposing the mortgage exchange corporation they are getting out of touch with what I thought was their own constituency. The making of mortgages and the mortgage document more liquid through the mortgage exchange corporation compared with other forms of investment will lend a greater degree of competitiveness in relation to other investments and will attract more capital which will have a downward effect on interest rates.

As I have pointed out, this is a highly technical bill. Essentially what we are trying to do is create two new institutions, the residential mortgage exchange corporation to create a market of exchange for mortgages and the mortgage insurance corporations to bring new investors into the field, not the banks, the insurance companies or trust companies which already are there but pension funds, retirement plans, credit unions and small investors. I was surprised to hear the objections of the NDP. I say surprised because I know parts of this bill, such as the exchange corporation, are wanted and needed by the credit unions of this country who are engaged in the residential mortgage business. I would have hoped that the NDP would have supported the creation of an institution which would allow the credit unions of this country to play an even more important part than they are already.

I was sorry to hear all the speeches about rip-offs. I would have hoped that rather than the doctrinaire approach, the clichés and rhetoric we have had we might have had an analysis of the bill. It seems to me, however, that clichés and rhetoric seem to be, judging by the speeches we heard last night, a substitute for thinking and analysis in the view of the NDP. I am sorry we have had the rather worn-out advertising slogan they used in the election campaign and since, because I think it has blinded them to what this bill is really all about.

The interest on mortgages accrued by mortgage investment companies is passed on to the shareholders and taxed in their hands. That is hardly a rip-off. If the investor in mortgages is an individual, it is part of his taxable income. In the case of a corporation investing in mortgages, that income from mortgages is taxable as corporate income. All we are doing is avoiding putting a double tax on mortgage interest payments. Surely, if we taxed mortgage interest twice, once in the hands of the mortgage investment corporation and once in the hands of the shareholder, be he individual or corporation—as the NDP is advocating—that would only serve to push rates up and slow down the flow of residential mortgage business. Surely, in the face of the growing savings and pension funds in this country it would be assinine to tax their income from mortgages when we at the very same time are trying to encourage those pension funds to become involved in residential mortgages. As I say, it would be assinine to do that.

If the pension funds, the savings of Canadian workers—which is what pension funds are—are invested in mutual funds, stocks and bonds and are non-taxable, are we to take the NDP view that we should tax the funds of the Canadian workers which are invested in pension funds and retirement plans when they are used to help the housing situation in this country through investment in residential mortgages. The NDP say tax them. That is a silly policy. It is what happens when a party such as the NDP uses clichés and rhetoric rather than thinking and analysis.

Mr. Broadbent: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I am enjoying this very, very humourous address but one of the rules of the House, of course, is that one must stick well within the canons of honesty. I should like the minister to present one illustration in support of the claim he just made, namely that members of the New Democratic Party said that representatives of the trade unions or other groups which have money in mortgages should be taxed for this activity. Was there one speech in the debate which made that claim?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. That is really not a point of order. I daresay the minister may have some difficulty in this respect when the bill is in committee where points like that can be raised. However, if he wishes to reply he may.

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, it comes about by reason of the fact that pension funds, as a rule, are not engaged in residential mortgage business. There are instruments which we hope will attract them into the residential mortgage market. The NDP is saying that those corporations should not be set up and that such a tax arrangement is a rip-off, and they are therefore making it impossible or much more difficult for those pension funds to be in the residential mortgage business.

• (1740)

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lewis: That is pretty tortuous, Ron.

Mr. Basford: In conclusion—so that we can leave before six o'clock—may I point out that I have tried to remind hon. members of what this bill is all about, namely, simply to establish two institutions: one, a mortgage exchange corporation to provide greater liquidity to mortgage documents and in that way attract more people into the residential mortgage business, and two, to allow the formation of mortgage investment companies so that those smaller investors and pension funds which are not now engaged can, through the tax instrument of mortgage investment companies, be attracted, we hope, into lending money on ordinary houses in this country. I have never said that this bill is the whole answer to the housing problem. It is one part of a comprehensive program that has to be considered in particular relationship to Bill C-133, which was just passed, which was supported by the NDP who, in my reading of the debate, were complimentary about that bill which was aimed at the problem of low income Canadians in this country.

This bill, of course, like any other bill, does not remake the world.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Well said.

Mr. Howard: It does not even recognize that the world exists.

Mr. Jamieson: Your members would take eight days to do that.

Mr. Basford: I have not seen a bill yet that remade the world, but perhaps the NDP think that they have. I know that they feel they are closer to God than most.

Mr. Lewis: Which God, Ron?

Mr. Basford: But it seems to me that it should, it does and it will benefit Canadians and improve the capital market and the flow of money into the residential mortgage business in this country. Surely, in view of the present situation in the country, that bill should be supported. We are building houses in record numbers in this country, 260,000 units a year. We will need $4 billion to $5 billion a year in investment to maintain those targets. Surely, this kind of bill which can introduce into the residential mortgage business, I would estimate, some $500 million almost immediately should not be turned down. Surely, we should pass this legislation to attract that money into the residential mortgage business and make that contribution toward solving the problems we have. I hope hon. members will support the bill.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion (Mr. Basford) which was agreed to on the following division:

PRIVILEGE

MR. HALES—ALLEGED INCORRECT INFORMATION SUPPLIED BY MINISTER RESPECTING LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAM

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege, notice of which I have given Your Honour, affecting not only myself but every member of the House. My question of privilege deals with misleading, incorrect and false information supplied by the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Andras) in regard to the Local Initiatives Program.

In a letter dated August 23 the minister wrote to all members of parliament setting out the liaison procedure for the program. The letter states that constituency advisory groups will be established to recommend projects to the minister. On page 2 of his letter there is the following statement:

> Members may nominate as many people as they like in each category in order of priority, from which I—> —shall select the members of the constituency advisory group . . . My decision will be final.

Meaning the minister.

In other words, the minister says that he will make the final selection.

In the yellow document that is handed out by the Manpower offices to those who apply for LIP grants it is stated, on page 1, paragraph (b):

> . . . Members of parliament are invited to set up Constituency Advisory Groups . . . In cases where members of parliament do not wish to set up a Constituency Advisory Group, the Department of Manpower and Immigration will carry out the selection function in consultation with the local member of parliament.

The fact is that the minister has the final selection of the members of these groups. My point of privilege is that this pamphlet, "Information for Applicants", which is issued in the ridings, gives a false impression in that the people in the ridings and the press are led to understand that the local member of parliament chooses the members of the advisory committee as outlined in this circular.

The minister and his department have therefore misled the public by stating the fact that members of parliament have the right to choose and set up the advisory committees whereas in fact they do not have this right. They can only suggest names. The minister selects the members and his decision is final. I suggest, Your Honour, that by this false information supplied to applicants for LIP grants members of parliament are being held responsible not only for the formation of the constituency advisory groups but also, if grants are turned down, it will appear that it is the local member of parliament and his advisory group who have denied certain requests for grants whereas in fact it will be the minister, on the recommendation of the advisory groups which he sets up, who will refuse LIP grants.

I raise this question, Sir, because it affects not only myself but all members on both sides of the House. If you find that I have a prima facie case of breach of privilege I will move, seconded by the hon. member for Fraser Valley East (Mr. Patterson):

> That all correspondence, circulars and pamphlets pertaining to this matter be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections for study and report.

Mr. Speaker: The grievance raised by the hon. member for Wellington is one which was raised before in the House, last week, I believe, by the hon. member for Yukon when he very forcefully objected to or took issue with the statement of the minister. The matter was considered at that time. I suggest to the hon. member that there is not a prima facie case of privilege. He proposes a motion. I suggest to him that this is a substantive motion and not a privileged motion. In the circumstances I respectfully suggest to the hon. member that this is not the kind of matter that the House should consider at this time.

RECOGNITION OF GROUPS OF VISITORS IN GALLERIES—RULING BY MR. SPEAKER

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I beg your indulgence but today is an historic day for this chamber as we have here 42 senior citizens from Edmonton Centre who are visiting parliament. I feel that when people travel 2,400 miles just to see the way parliament operates—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I appreciate the position of the hon. member for Edmonton Centre, who at this time wants to bring to the attention of the House the presence of very distinguished citizens from his constituency. I am sure all members are pleased to see them here, but at the same time I suggest to the hon. member it is extremely bad practice to do what he is attempting to do at this time. Every day there are distinguished visitors in the members' gallery and in my gallery, visitors from my constituency and other members' constituencies, but if we were to embark on a practice of recognizing visits by senior citizens, junior citizens, or any other groups visiting the House of Commons we might spend most of our day bringing to the attention of the House the presence in the galleries of our distinguished constituents. After what I heard yesterday during the question period that might be an improvement—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: —but, all this having been said, I am sure the hon. member for Edmonton Centre, who is a well liked member of the House, will appreciate the position of the Chair.

INDIAN AFFAIRS AND NORTHERN DEVELOPMENT

CONCURRENCE IN SECOND REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

On the order: Motions:

April 4, 1973—Mr. Howard:

That the second report of the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development, presented to the House on April 4, 1973, be concurred in.

Mr. Speaker: Yesterday when the hon. member for Skeena proposed to move that the second report of the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development, presented to the House on April 4, 1973, be concurred in, the Chair suggested that it might be irregular to proceed with the said motion at that time. With the assistance provided by the hon. member himself in his submission to the House, the Chair has given careful consideration to this matter. It would appear to me that not only is the rule of anticipation involved here but there is also the application of certain Standing Orders which I suggest bear on this case.

● (1410)

The hon. member has obviously given serious thought to the procedural difficulty involved. It seems to me that in the submission of his argument he has agreed with the proposition that his motion anticipated the order for the adjourned debate on the motion proposed by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands. Incidentally, the records indicate that the hon. member for Skeena seconded that motion. That in itself introduces a further complication which I will merely mention and on which I will not make a ruling.

As the hon. member pointed out yesterday, the Chair, in interpreting the rule on anticipation, should have regard to the probability of the matter being brought before the House within a reasonable time. I would suggest that the probability of resuming debate on a motion by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands is still an open question. The Chair must assume that that probability is still open.

In my view, consideration of two specific Standing Orders touching upon the procedural question is relevant at this time. Standing Order 45(2) reads as follows:

When a debate on any motion made prior to the reading of the Orders of the Day is adjourned or interrupted, the order for resumption of the same shall be transferred to and considered under government orders.

[Mr. Speaker.]

That Standing Order was permanently enacted in 1968 on the same occasion that the House, in the words of the hon. member for Skeena, "embarked upon a new structure and concept regarding the operation of the standing committees." The Chair cannot assume that the committees and the House as well were not fully aware at the time of the effect of the provisions of that Standing Order.

Finally, the Chair must refer to section 2 of Standing Order 18 which reads as follows:

Government orders shall be called and considered in such sequence as the government determines.

The provisions of that Standing Order, I suggest, are so clear and explicit that they preclude the Chair or any member other than those in the government from designating any government order to be taken up at any sitting.

As stated in citation 13 of Beauchesne's Fourth Edition:

. . . An express order of the House, whether standing or occasional, supersedes every mere usage or precedent. In the absence of any express order "what can or ought to be done by either House of Parliament is best known by the custom and proceedings of parliament in former times."

Without a doubt the anticipation rule must be taken into account as a guide in our proceedings, but in this case its application must be interpreted in the context of the Standing Orders to which I have referred.

The Chair has no difficulty about the hon. member's motion being allowed to remain on the order paper but I suggest, with respect, to the hon. member that it would be difficult to accept from a procedural standpoint that the motion be put and debated at this time.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I might, therefore, with the consent of the House, ask leave to withdraw the motion, saving always the right to reintroduce it at an appropriate time in the future.

Mr. Speaker: Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Order discharged and motion withdrawn.

BEEF—GOVERNMENT POLICIES RESPECTING EXPORTS AND TARIFF—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Danforth.

Mr. H. W. Danforth (Kent-Essex): Kent-Essex, Mr. Speaker.

I respectfully request leave of the House to present a motion under Standing Order 43. The matter is of most urgent and serious concern to all Canadians in general and to the producers of cattle specifically. If the House is sympathetically disposed to grant approval, I propose to move, seconded by the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Hargrave):

That the government policies on the restriction on exports of beef and especially the removal of tariff protection on this commodity entering Canada without a reciprocal agreement with the United States, be referred at the earliest opportunity to the Standing Committee of Agriculture for study and report back to the House.

Mr. Speaker: For the record, perhaps I might indicate that the hon. member has not been named. The House has heard the motion proposed by the hon. member for Kent-Essex. Under the terms of Standing Order 43 it requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity and the motion cannot be put.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

SECOND REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I rise pursuant to Standing Order 43 to seek permission of the House to move a motion of urgent and pressing necessity concerning the need of the House to be able to respond at an early date to the second report of the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development relating to aboriginal rights. I would therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Saint-Maurice (Mr. Chrétien):

That this House set aside Friday, September 21, 1973, for the consideration of Item No. 32 under Government Orders being: Resuming debate on the motion of Miss MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands), seconded by Mr. Howard, That the second report of the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development, presented to the House on April 4, 1973, as amended by unanimous consent, be concurred in. And that, at 15 minutes before the ordinary time of adjournment, unless the debate be previously concluded, Mr. Speaker shall interrupt the proceedings and forthwith put every question necessary to dispose of the said motion.

Mr. Chrétien: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member said that the hon. member for Saint-Maurice was the seconder of the motion, that being myself. He has not talked to me yet.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair was going to inquire whether there is a seconder for the motion. There does not appear to be a seconder.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Speaker, that was an oversight on my part. It is the hon. member for Northwest Territories (Mr. Firth) who is the seconder of the motion.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I am glad the hon. member has recognized that my interest in the north is such that he confused the two ridings.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity.

Mr. Howard: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, in as much as the only person present on the other side of the House who said no was the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, perhaps he would explain why he does not want this matter to come forward for debate.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the Chair might allow the minister to stand up and say that he was not one of the members who said no, but I think that would not be fair to the House and I think it is not fair on the part of the hon. member for Skeena to suggest that one particular hon. member said no. From the procedural standpoint, what is relevant is that there is not unanimous consent. In my hearing there was not unanimous consent and the motion cannot be put.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

COST OF LIVING—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, I rise to seek unanimous consent of the House under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to move the following motion, seconded by the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Darling):

That in view of the fact that the government has not taken adequate measures to deal with the high cost of living and as a result, elderly and lower income Canadians are finding it almost impossible to exist, this House requests that the Prime Minister of Canada postpone his planned trip to the People's Republic of China and also that he not undertake any other junkets that may be contemplated, and in addition—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair has indicated very often that it is elementary, the operation of Standing Order 43 being what it is, that hon. members should refrain from making allegations and often gratuitous statements in motions under Standing Order 43. The procedure has not made it possible so far to have a debate on motions proposed under Standing Order 43. I think this has been understood by hon. members who have generally refrained from making or resisted the temptation to include arguments in their proposed motions. I suggest that a motion couched in the terms proposed by the hon. member is entirely irregular and should not be put to the House.

Mr. Cossitt: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I would therefore, with your permission, move simply as follows, seconded by the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Darling):

That this House requests the Prime Minister to remain in Ottawa and forthwith to direct his government in an immediate and full-scale attack on inflation by means of the essential anti-inflation measures proposed by the Progressive Conservative party.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Shefford.

STE.-SCHOLASTIQUE—REOPENING OF EXPROPRIATION FILES—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the terms of Standing Order 43, to ask the unanimous consent of the House to discuss a most pressing matter.

In view of the huge difference in the way the expropriated were treated at Ste.-Scholastique compared with those at Pickering, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Matte):

That a special committee of the House be formed to reopen and study all the files on all expropriated at Ste.-Scholastique in order that they might be treated exactly as those at Pickering were, taking into account the true respective evaluations.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Under Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: As there is not unanimous consent, the motion cannot be put.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

POSSIBILITY OF LEGISLATION TO DEAL WITH ALLEGED PRICE GOUGING BY SUPERMARKETS—BREAD PRICE MONITORING

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister. In light of his statement to the House in July that in the event of evidence there was any gouging in connection with food pricing the government would take action, by legislation if necessary, and in view of the evidence given by the Minister of Agriculture and charges of gouging by supermarkets, is it the intention of the government to introduce legislation to enable itself to deal with this alleged situation?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the position of the government is still the same. Having regard to the action being attempted by the Food Prices Review Board, the publicizing of whatever findings they have and the summoning of responsible people before them, if in all these circumstances it appears that corrective action is not taken the government will seek parliamentary authority to act.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Stanfield: I take it from the Prime Minister's answer the government does not place much weight on the evidence of the minister. Has the government set up any machinery to monitor bread prices at this time in order to ensure that the increased subsidy and the various arrangements made by the government with regard to domestic wheat will keep bread prices down, as promised by the Prime Minister at the time of his earlier statement?

Mr. Trudeau: Yes, Mr. Speaker. If the hon. gentleman recollects the terms of my statement, it was to the effect we would ask the Food Prices Review Board to follow the various subsidies we are making to ensure that they are passed on to the consumer, and to report to the government if they are not. I believe they are engaged in this task at the present time.

MONITORING OF SALES TAX AND TARIFF CUTS TO ENSURE BENEFITS REACH CONSUMERS—REQUEST FOR REPORT

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): In view of the importance of monitoring and the experience we have had with assurances by the government about minitoring, I wish to ask the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs whether, after six months or more, we can now have the report of his department or group with regard to the monitoring of results of the budget changes and the passing on of those changes to the consumers? Can the minister assure us this report will be tabled in the House today, tomorrow or early next week?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I previously informed the House that I expected the surveys for the purpose of preparing this report to be completed about this time. It is my hope to have the work on the report completed as soon as the survey results are made available to the officials.

ENERGY

TAR SANDS OIL—POSSIBILITY OF EXEMPTION FROM TWO-PRICE SYSTEM AND EXPORT CONTROLS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources arising out of reports of an agreement between the government of Alberta and Syncrude for the production of oil from the Athabasca tar sands. Has Premier Lougheed or Syncrude made a request to him directly, or to the government as far as he knows, that the oil produced by this process be exempted both from the two-price system and from any export controls Canada may have? If so, what has been the reply to such request?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): I would have to confirm this with my office, but to my knowledge I have received no such request either from the company or from Premier Lougheed. I might say that the full details of the Syncrude project are not yet known to us. We learned about them on television and we look forward to obtaining further information as time goes on.

Mr. Lewis: In view of the fact that according to press reports the letter of intent signed by Premier Lougheed and Syncrude makes the arrangement conditional on the obtaining of such exemptions from the federal government, will the minister assure the House that the interests of the Canadian consumer as to supply and price will be protected and that exemption from the two-price system or from export controls will not be granted in the Syncrude situation?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I think I would have to know more about the project. The fact remains that both in terms of income taxation and in terms of protecting the Canadian market the responsibility does lie upon the government to put the interest of Canadians first, as indicated in the National Energy Board Act.

Mr. Lewis: In view of the fact that the minister has told the House there will be legislation introduced to deal with some of the policies announced on September 4 or 13—I forget the precise date—and in view of the fact that the request of the oil corporations and the Conservative premier of Alberta would hypothecate the oil of the Athabasca tar sands to the United States until such time as Canadian prices are equal to or higher than United States prices, may I ask the minister whether he can assure the House that the legislation to be introduced will not exempt any part of the multinational oil industry from the requirements?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I really would not like to anticipate the legislation. Perhaps I could regard the hon. member's question as a representation.

Mr. Lewis: And a strong one.

STE.-SCHOLASTIQUE—POSSIBLE REOPENING OF EXPROPRIATION CASES

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the hon. Minister of Public Works.

Does the hon. minister intend to reopen the files of expropriated people in Ste.-Scholastique so as to deal with them the same way he did with Pickering owners?

Hon. Jean-Eudes Dubé (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to reopen these files because I am satisfied that expropriated people in Ste.-Scholastique have obtained the same justice as will Pickering residents. However, I have agreed to receive in my office next week five spokesmen for the expropriated people. I am sure we can convince these people that they have been fairly treated. However, if there are points in their favour which have been overlooked, I shall be pleased to consider them with justice and an open mind.

STE.-SCHOLASTIQUE—ALLEGED BLACKMAILING BY GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES RESPECTING EXPROPRIATION

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, on a supplementary.

Does the Minister of Public Works intend to take the necessary steps to prevent his officials from blackmailing the expropriated owners of Ste.-Scholastique who are presently under his department's pressure?

Hon. Jean-Eudes Dubé (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I am under the impression that the blackmail is not applied by officials but by certain representatives of the people who are trying to stir up part of the people against the government.

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker . . .

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Is the hon. member for Lotbinière raising a point of order or is he asking a supplementary question?

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I said, a moment ago, that we were trying to complete the first series of questions, which we have now done. We will come back to this question later. I note that the hon. member for Argenteuil-Deux-Montagnes and others wish to ask supplementary questions. We will now come back to the subject involved in the first question.

• (1430)

[English]

The hon. member for St. John's East I believe has a supplementary to the first question.

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs who is momentarily out of the House. If Your Honour will kindly take this into account I shall resume my seat.

TAR SANDS OIL—REQUEST FOR ANALYSIS OF ALL EVIDENCE BEFORE DECIDING WHETHER TWO-PRICE SYSTEM AND EXPORT CONTROLS SHOULD APPLY

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In light of the question by the hon. member for York South and the fact that many thousands of jobs are being developed in Alberta by the Athabasca tar sands project, as the minister knows, and also in light of the fact it has operated in the red to date, will the minister make certain that all the evidence will be analysed before following the suggestion of the hon. member for York South who seems to want to kill development not only in Alberta but elsewhere?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): I shall look forward to receiving full evidence about the Syncrude project either from the premier or the company.

TAR SANDS OIL—POSSIBILITY OF JOINT FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL DEVELOPMENT

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question of the minister. In view of the fact we ought to ensure that we do not make the same mistakes in developing the tar sands as were made in developing the oil fields and turn them over to the multinational corporations, I want to ask the minister whether the government is prepared to make an offer in principle to the oil-producing provinces that have tar sands to develop them on a joint basis so that the federal and provincial governments might develop and control the tar sands oil in conjunction with the public?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, we mentioned at the Western Economic Opportunities Conference our interest in priority in assisting in the development of the oil sands, particularly in research and development. I have not yet made, nor have I been authorized to make, any offer such as suggested by the hon. gentleman.

Mr. Douglas: In view of the fact that these fields must be developed in the next few years if we are to meet the anticipated oil shortage likely to arise by 1983, may I ask the minister if the government is prepared to give serious consideration to a joint public involvement on the part of the federal government with those provincial governments that are willing to co-operate?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I am prepared to give that serious consideration.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

INCREASED FOOD PRICES—EFFECT OF GOVERNMENT'S MONETARY POLICIES

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, my question is supplementary to that of the Leader of the Opposition and is addressed to the Prime Minister. Is the government studying the extent that the rise in food and other prices has been caused by the government's own monetary policies and, if so, what steps are planned to change those policies?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member had occasion to hear the Minister of Finance in the debate the other day and the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, he would perhaps begin to understand that, on the contrary, our fiscal and monetary policies have made the situation better in Canada than in most other industrialized nations.

WELFARE

CONSULTATION WITH PROVINCES ON INCREASING OF PAYMENTS IN LIGHT OF COST OF LIVING

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the fact that the continuous increase in the cost of living affects those on low and fixed incomes, and in view of the fact the Prime Minister indicated that the federal government would pay 50 per cent of any increases by the provinces under the Canada Assistance Plan and social assistance, would the minister indicate if he has been in consultation with all the provinces, whether they have indicated agreement to such a plan, and what action the federal government intends to take in this regard?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I have indeed consulted my colleagues. As a matter of fact, I consult them regularly. Since that time the provinces of Ontario and Quebec have already announced an increase in their welfare payments. I understand that several other provinces are reviewing their present scale of welfare payments, which had already been increased prior to this month, and that there may be further adjustments in the future.

AIRPORTS

STE.-SCHOLASTIQUE—MEASURES TO FACILITATE SETTLEMENT OF EXPROPRIATION CASES

Mr. Francis Fox (Argenteuil-Deux-Montagnes): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question to the Minister of Public Works.

Can he inform the House whether he is prepared to set up a mechanism which could ease a satisfactory settlement of the 350 pending expropriation cases at Mirabel?

Hon. Jean-Eudes Dubé (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, at the request of the hon. member for Argenteuil-Deux-Montagnes as well as those of Terrebonne (Mr. Comtois) and Labelle (Mr. Dupras), we have created a conciliation committee which will do exactly this work. I hope they will settle the odd remaining cases to the satisfaction of all concerned.

STE.-SCHOLASTIQUE—MEASURES TO HASTEN PAYMENT OF COMPENSATION FOR LANDS EXPROPRIATED

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, knowing the efficiency of the Minister of Public Works and his two colleagues whom he has just named and who do not meddle in politics, I should like to ask him a question.

Considering that a great number of expropriated persons have not yet received their compensation cheques and that the rent charged to the persons involved has been increased without any prior consultation, can the minister say what steps he intends to take to cope with departmental dilatoriness?

Hon. Jean-Eudes Dubé (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, we are taking all possible and necessary steps to solve the problem as quickly as possible.

WELFARE

FEDERAL CONTRIBUTIONS UNDER CANADA ASSISTANCE PLAN—PROVINCIAL REPRESENTATIONS FOR ADDITIONAL AID

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. With regard to the need for increasing welfare payments, particularly in the poorer provinces, and recalling the Prime Minister's remarks about the 50 per cent cost-sharing arrangement under the Canada Assistance Plan, I wonder whether the minister has had any indication from the poorer provinces concerning whether additional assistance needs to be provided in order that adequate welfare payments can be made?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, no particular representation has been made in this regard. Discussions have taken place in the general review of social problems, but I have not received any special representations lately.

POST OFFICE

REMOVAL OF ROYAL CIPHER, E-II, FROM MAILBOXES AND VEHICLES

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. I would have directed it to the Postmaster General had he been here. It has to do with the removal of the Royal cipher, E-II from Royal mail pillar boxes and post office vehicles in recent days. Was that done as a result of cabinet action or was it done administratively by the department of the Postmaster General?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I would have to consult the minister on this. I have no recollection that it was done in cabinet. It is possible that it could have happened in some cabinet committee that would have escaped me but I rather think not. The only communication I had with the Postmaster General on this general subject was a few months ago when he told me that he intended to publish special stamps, the largest ever published in Canada, to commemorate the reign of Her Majesty Elizabeth II.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The Machiavellian definition of respect for the monarchy as just revealed by the Prime Minister is difficult of interpretation. I ask him simply, was the Queen's cipher removed from the Royal mail in order to exemplify the newly-found devotion of the government for Her Majesty following her visit?

Mr. Trudeau: On the contrary, had we intended to remove the symbols of the monarchy we would not have proceeded in this way. We would not have invited Her Majesty, and I take it she would not have come, to visit Canada twice at the invitation of the government in the past year, and she would not have been as well received and as happy about her visit as she is.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

• (1440)

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, perhaps the Prime Minister will be able to answer this question. Was it with government approval or was it left to the Postmaster General to do what I have suggested has been done in recent months? Surely the Prime Minister does not suggest that removing any suggestion of the monarchy is a means of showing the government's devotion to that institution?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member will read the blues he will realize that he has repeated his question practically word for word—

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am not getting an answer.

Mr. Trudeau: —and that my first answer gave the whole truth and nothing but the truth on the question he asked.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Horner (Crowfoot): You have never done that in your life.

BILL OF RIGHTS

SUGGESTED ACTION TO EMBODY IN CONSTITUTION

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the right hon. Prime Minister. In light of the fact the majority decision of the Supreme Court of Canada in the Lavell case has cast serious doubts on the efficacy of the Canadian Bill of Rights to protect Canadians against discrimination on the grounds of sex, religion and race, and in light of the Prime Minister's lifelong concern about a constitutional bill of rights, will he now renew the efforts of the government to obtain a consensus so that we may obtain a constitutional bill of rights available to all Canadians?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for the preamble because he correctly states my interest in achieving this end. I can only remind him that the federal government and the provinces went through a great many constitutional conferences between 1968 and 1972—

Mr. Diefenbaker: And between 1961 and 1962 as well.

Mr. Trudeau: —and were unable to reach a consensus on the constitutional bill of rights which he suggests and which, of course, we were promoting during that period. It is still government policy to obtain that, but I cannot say there are immediate plans to convene a constitutional conference for that purpose.

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that fortunately, from my point of view, there have been a number of changes in the heads of governments in the different provinces since then, will the Prime Minister not now fix a definite time to consult with the provinces on this matter, perhaps with a different and happier result?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I certainly welcome the suggestion. I will wait a few more months to ensure there are no further changes in governments and, if possible, I will perhaps in a discreet way initiate the consultation he has suggested.

TRANSPORT

REQUEST THAT MINISTER INTERVENE TO PREVENT RAILWAY FREIGHT RATE INCREASE ON OKANAGAN FRUIT

Mr. G. H. Whittaker (Okanagan Boundary): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. In view of the fact he restated in the House the day before yesterday the 18-month freight rate freeze accepted by the railways, and in light of the fact the railways have announced an 11 cents per hundred weight increase in freight rates on fruit from the Okanagan to Toronto and Montreal effective October 1, will the minister order the railways to withdraw this rate increase?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I cannot say anything more than what I already said to the House yesterday or the day before. What I asked the railways to do was to avoid increasing the normal rates, but as far as agreed rates and certain other rates are concerned it was up to the parties to decide.

Mr. Whittaker: Mr. Speaker, I might say that this is a normal rate, not an agreed rate. Will the minister now tell us what types of freight rates and commodities are affected by the freeze, and what percentage of the total freight traffic this represents?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, when the hon. member puts the question that way I think he is distorting what I said. I said I was asking the railways not to increase the rates. I do not personally have the power to make a decree freezing freight rates. According to the law, and this act was adopted by the House in 1967, the railways are free to increase freight rates and to justify them to the Canadian Transport Commission. All I did was to ask the railways not to increase the normal rates.

GRAIN

PRICE AT WHICH FEED GRAIN WILL BE SOLD TO EASTERN CANADA

Mr. J. H. Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice who is in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board. I understand he made an announcement today concerning the Agricultural Products Board price for feed grain in western Canada. I also understand he is trying to establish a monitored weighted average price for feed grain being sold in western Canada. Can he inform the House and the country at which level feed grain barley will be sold to eastern Canada? Will it be the Agricultural Products Board price or the average weighted price which he is trying to determine?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I would simply like to confirm the policy as announced.

Mr. Diefenbaker: It would be nice to have it announced in the House.

Mr. Lang: The selling price in Canada will be based on the determined off-board price. The purpose of the Agricultural Products Board price is to ensure that no barley or oats is moving at prices below that level.

Mr. Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, I understand the price will be the monitored weighted average price which he is attempting to determine, but who will make up the loss? Let us suppose no barley is bought by the Agricultural Products Board and the Wheat Board has to turn over the grain to it. Who will make up the loss represented by the difference between that price and the international price that farmers may receive when they get their final payments?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, again I welcome the opportunity to clarify for the hon. member the fact that the Agricultural Products Board will not be selling feed grains to anyone in Canada. The Canadian Wheat Board will continue to sell feed grains to the Canadian market on the basis of the price at which non-board grains are trading in the Prairie region. The grain obtained by the Agricultural Products Board, at a price which we are telling the farmers we think is still too low considering the price available from the Canadian Wheat Board, will be stored unless the Canadian Wheat Board needs and wants it for its own purposes.

Mr. Horner (Crowfoot): Who makes up the difference?

Mr. Speaker: The Chair will recognize the hon. member on a final supplementary, and then the hon. member for Charlevoix.

Mr. Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, can the country and the House assume that the loss or shortage will come out of the barley pool in the final accounting of the Wheat Board?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, the question of the price at which barley or oats is in fact traded in Canada depends on the price at which farmers in the Prairie region are willing to sell, and that will be the price to be used as the basis for sales elsewhere.

Mr. Horner (Crowfoot): You did not answer the question. Who makes up the loss? The farmers ought to line you up and shoot you when you go out there.

HEALTH

INQUIRY RESPECTING INTENSIVE USE OF DRUGS IN TREATMENT OF MENTAL PATIENTS

Mr. Gilles Caouette (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Has he received representations on the harmful effects of the intensive use of drugs as a therapy for mental patients?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I regret, but I did not understand the hon. member's question. Would he kindly repeat it?

Mr. Caouette (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, can the minister tell us if he has received representations concerning the harmful effects of the intensive use of drugs as a therapy for mental patients?

Mr. Lalonde: No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Caouette (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, is the minister aware that even though the use of drugs in psychiatric treatments may be effective in the short term, in the long term the use of phenothiazins in the case of 50,000 mental patients has resulted in permanent destruction of the nervous system and of the cells—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I should point out to the hon. member that he is giving a medical opinion and I do not think that he can express an opinion instead of asking a question. Could the hon. member ask his question—

Mr. Caouette (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, I was just coming to my question.

Is the minister prepared to act in this area in order to limit the intensive use of these drugs, as recommended by the committee on institutional psychiatry.

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, I will be happy to examine the medical opinion given by the hon. member.

Mr. Atkey: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege pursuant to the question asked by the hon. member for Charlevoix. I made a submission to the Minister of National Health and Welfare one week ago today on the very subject of that question. I made further submissions orally to him on Monday of this week. The committee which gave rise to those submissions about which the hon. member raised the question is located in my constituency and they raised matters of serious and national importance. I regret to say that the minister today has infringed my privileges by saying that in fact he has had no submissions on the question.

GRAIN

FEED GRAINS—POWERS OF AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS BOARD AND WHEAT BOARD TO PURCHASE

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the minister in charge of the Wheat Board. I assume from his statement that the Agricultural Products Board will be able to purchase all grades of wheat, barley and oats from the farmers. I should like to ask him if that is so and also whether it is his intention to bring in amendments to the Wheat Board Act so that the Wheat Board may also purchase grain from the Agricultural Products Board as well as from farmers?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the prices which have been set at this time for barley and oats are on the base of No. 1 feed barley and No. 1 feed oats, basis Thunder Bay. The Agricultural Products Board prices will range downward for lower quality grain. The Products Board will not pay a higher price for higher quality grain if it is offered to it, the feed price being the basic one which will be available. The question of the steps that may be required in order to facilitate operations between the Agricultural Products Board and the Canadian Wheat Board to the maximum advantage of the Canadian Wheat Board is being determined, but if legislation is necessary it will be introduced at that time.

PRICE TO FARMER FOR BARLEY USED DOMESTICALLY

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I am trying to analyse the formula placed before the House by the Minister of Justice. It seems to make the Einstein theory look like simplicity itself. I have done some figuring here and I want to find out whether it is not correct. As of today, on the basis of the new formula the minister has produced or that has been concocted, is it not a fact that the western farmer would receive 90 cents a bushel for his barley less than he would on this particular day on the international market?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): The fact of the matter is that the price which has been set for the Agricultural Products Board for feed barley, for instance, is 58 cents a bushel higher at the elevator than the Canadian Wheat Board's initial price, but it is set at this level as a midway point between the initial price and the expected final return. No farmer needs to receive the Agricultural Products Board price because, with the expected high quotas that will be available, he can and indeed should hold his grain and sell it to the Canadian Wheat Board.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker,—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will recognize the right hon. gentleman and then the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar, and by that time we will have come pretty close to the end of the question period.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Again I repeat the question. As of today, is it not correct that if a farmer sold his feed barley in western Canada he would get 90 cents per bushel less than he would on the international market? That is a simple question.

Mr. Lang: No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Diefenbaker: How much less?

Mr. Lang: The simple fact is that if he sells to the Canadian Wheat Board he gets the full value of the Canadian Wheat Board initial price and final payment. If, instead, he chooses to accept a total amount without any hope of final payment, he does obtain less, but that is his choice.

Mr. Horner (Crowfoot): This is an insult to the western farmer. Get a judgeship from Trudeau while you can.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Hon. members will appreciate that much of the question period has been spent on this very important matter. I recognize that it is very important, but we must not forget that there are other matters of interest to other members of the House of Commons. The hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar has a supplementary question. We will then try, in the last three or four minutes before the end of the question period, to look at another aspect of Canadian life.

FEED GRAIN—REQUEST THAT AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS BOARD NOT BE ALLOWED TO PURCHASE UNTIL LEGAL STATUS VIS-À-VIS WHEAT BOARD CLARIFIED

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I wish to seek some clarification from the minister in charge of the Wheat Board. According to my understanding, the Canadian Wheat Board is not legally entitled under its present act to buy grain from the Agricultural Products Board. Will the minister delay putting the Agricultural Products Board into operation as a purchaser of western grain until such time as the legal status of the two boards is clarified under the Canadian Wheat Board Act?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): If I were to give the hon. member a legal opinion, it would not be to confirm his premise.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

MONITORING OF SALES TAX AND TARIFF CUTS TO ENSURE BENEFITS REACH CONSUMERS—REQUEST FOR REPORT

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs from whom I have been attempting for many months to get a copy of the report on the monitoring of the February budget changes. Is the minister prepared to honour the statement he made on September 7 that the report would be ready about the middle of September, which has now passed, and can he now give the House a firm date when this report, real or imaginary, will be made available to the House and the public, or are we to regard this whole thing as nothing but a worthless sham?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I said in the House on September 7 that it was expected that the work on the report would be completed about the middle of September, and I stand by the rest of what I said in the answer to that question.

Mr. Stanfield: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The minister said that the report would be ready by the middle of September. I read the answer and I want the minister to stop fooling around with the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gray: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I have here the Hansard extract. I said:

> Work on this has been going on. I expect it to be completed about the middle of September.

This is consistent with the answer I have just given.

[Later:]

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I hesitate to rise on a question of privilege but this is a matter which has been before the House for a number of months. I should like to read the answer given on September 7 by the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. He said:

> Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition is incorrect in suggesting that I have been refusing to prepare a report. Work on this has been going on. I expect it to be completed about the middle of September. It will be delivered to the Minister of Finance, following which I trust its conclusions will be made available appropriately to the House and the public

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): What's your problem, Bob?

Mr. Stanfield: Hon. members opposite may not regard it as of any importance that the minister has been giving the House an assurance on this subject for a matter of seven months and has not lived up to it. I say there can be no doubt, reading that answer, that the report was to be completed by the middle of September, and I want to know when the minister is going to bring this long delayed report to the House. What is he trying to hide?

Mr. Gray: Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition neglected to point out that there was a period between the word "September" and the word "It". He slid over that in his usual manner when raising his point of privilege. I said the report would be presented when it was completed, and I am going to stick to that.

URBAN AFFAIRS

POSSIBILITY OF GREATER ASSISTANCE TO SMALL TOWNS IN FINANCING SEWAGE TREATMENT SYSTEMS

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs responsible for CMHC. In view of the urgency of the clean-up program on the Great Lakes system and the difficulties of small towns in financing sewage treatment systems, can the minister say if more generous financial assistance, with special consideration for small municipalities, will be offered by the federal government in the agreements to be signed with the provinces this year?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I said some time ago that the sewage program of CMHC which expires in 1975 is under review. I hope to make recommendations to my colleagues within a matter of weeks and I hope to announce that, as I have made clear to the provinces, this fall. Of course, I think that one of the features that must be considered in revising the sewage support program is the position of small towns which have not been able to take full advantage of the program until now.

ENERGY

OIL—PRICE OF WESTERN CRUDE IN EASTERN CANADA UNDER GOVERNMENT POLICY

Mr. Peter C. Bawden (Calgary South): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources has ducked out of the chamber. In his absence I will direct my question to the Prime Minister, although since it deals with western Canada and oil he may not understand.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member was given the floor as the question period was about to end for the purpose of asking a question. Perhaps he might attempt to do that, after which I will call orders of the day.

Mr. Bawden: Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. In view of the statement made in Calgary by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources that he was pleased this week that the government of Alberta wanted to base the price of western oil on world prices and not United States prices, will the Prime Minister say whether under the government's new oil policy western Canadian crude prices will continue to rise in eastern Canada by the same amount as crude oil imported from the Middle East and Venezuela?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): That will depend on further announcements the minister will be making in the near future on the basis of which oil will be priced in Canada.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the acting government House leader about the order of business for today and the rest of the legislative items which the government seeks to have enacted or completed in the House before it puts the adjournment motion which appears on the order paper.

Parole Act

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, we propose to proceed this afternoon with the amendments to the Parole Act, which is Bill C-191, followed by item No. 40, the amendments to the Co-operative Credit Associations Act, followed by No. 26, the CNR financing bill. The question of proceeding with additional items of business or completing these tomorrow may depend on the view of the House of the motion now appearing on the notice paper in my name. It is our disposition that the House may well now resume the break which was begun in July, and that the very important items which require attention may be more effectively dealt with by members on and after October 15.

Mr. Baldwin: If I may work my way through that answer I assume that tomorrow the minister will be moving the motion for adjournment standing in his name, provided the three items he mentioned are disposed of today.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, the question of the motion for adjournment is a subject for discussion. I have indicated that it is our inclination to proceed with it, and as these discussions proceed we will determine for certain the course of action with regard to it.

Mr. Trudeau: It depends on you, in other words.

Mr. Howard: Am I correct in assuming that there is no intention on the part of the government at this stage to bring forward the resumed debate on the second report of the Indian Affairs Committee relating to aboriginal rights?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, many hon. members are extremely interested in resuming that debate. I believe the House leader has it very much in mind, and will give consideration to the matter on his return.

PAROLE ACT

APPOINTMENT OF ADDITIONAL AD HOC MEMBERS TO NATIONAL PAROLE BOARD

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General) moved that Bill C-191, to amend the Parole Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

He said: Mr. Speaker, on June 1 last I announced a series of measures designed to prevent abuses in our inmate release programs, that is to say, the parole and temporary absences programs, to provide for a better investigation of inmate grievances through the appointment of a correctional investigator or ombudsman, and to improve the working conditions and morale of employees working in penitentiaries. These steps were meant to remedy some of the immediate problems in our federal correctional system.

One of the measures announced was an amendment to the Parole Act to provide for ten additional ad hoc members of the Parole Board. The bill that we have before us seeks to do just that. Both parole and temporary absences have played an increasingly important role in recent years in our efforts to assist inmates to re-integrate in the community as responsible citizens. As I explained on June 1, inmates can be released from penitentiary under the authority of both the Parole Act and the Penitentiary Act. As one might expect, the criteria for selection by the National Parole Board and the Canadian Penitentiary Service for release on parole or temporary absence have not necessarily been the same.

These differences in criteria arise not only because of the different statutes under which they operate, but also because the considerations that apply in assessing an inmate for temporary absence differ from those applicable to parole. This has led to confusion in the public mind. In addition, as I explained previously, certain legal complexities have brought into question the legality of the back-to-back temporary absences, a practice developed by the penitentiary service in recent years whereby inmates are released on successive leaves of absence over an extended period of time, generally for rehabilitation purposes.

Because of these legal difficulties the Canadian Penitentiary Service has now discontinued the practice of providing back-to-back temporary absences for inmates in federal institutions. I might say that those who were on back-to-back temporary absences on June 1 have now been transferred to day parole. At the time of my announcement on June 1, there were approximately 100 inmates on back-to-back temporary absences, and 43 of those have been granted day parole, 16 have been denied day parole, and 15 have been given full parole. Eleven of these were persons serving a life sentence and the Parole Board does not have jurisdiction over them. Fifteen have still to be dealt with. Experience has shown, however, during those years when the practice of back-to-back temporary absences was developed, that the gradual and regular release of inmates as part of their rehabilitation program constituted an excellent device to assist them in their efforts toward re-integration in the community. While the legality of back-to-back temporary absences could be open to some doubt, it was clear that the practice itself should be continued under some other legislative scheme. This, of course, is possible by a greater use of day parole under the Parole Act, with an expanded Parole Board.

As hon. members are aware, the National Parole Board as now constituted has a membership of nine persons. An excess workload in recent years has slowed down case decisions to the point where the chairman was compelled to suspend panel hearings held by members with inmates in the penal institutions. As a result, applications are, and have been for the last few months, considered by the board through an examination of the inmate's file but without the board or inmate having the benefit of a face to face interview. Such a practice, I am sure hon. members will agree, is inadequate both from the point of view of the proper administration of parole board functions and responsibilities and the inmate's interest in having an opportunity to present his case face to face to members of the board.

The provision of ten additional members to the Parole Board will not only allow the board to resume panel hearings in the institutions, but also to deal satisfactorily with the added volume of decisions on day parole applications that will come before the members. As these ten members will deal primarily with day parole and panel hearings in the institutions, it is our intention to assign them in teams of two to the five regions of Canada; that is two in British Columbia, two in the Prairies, two in Ontario, two in Quebec and two in the Atlantic region.

The nine actual members of the National Parole Board have experience in various fields and disciplines relating to criminal justice such as police, social work, law, corrections, as well as the judiciary. It is my hope that we will attract to the board new members from the various disciplines that contribute to the efficient operation of the criminal justice system so as to reinforce the scope of expertise that the Canadian public has the right to expect from an institution such as the National Parole Board.

I would hope, in this respect, that I could make the necessary arrangements with provincial authorities for the appointment of a limited number of judges to the National Parole Board as ad hoc members for a limited period of time, two or three years, for example, at the end of which they would return to their judicial responsibilities in the province. This kind of arrangement would enable highly qualified and respected members of the judiciary to play an important role in the working of the National Parole Board. This would, at the same time, provide the channel for closer liaison with the judiciary as a whole.

A great deal of effort has been made in this direction in recent years by the board, with some relative success. But more must be done. I believe that the objective of closer liaison between the judiciary and the National Parole Board could be further assisted and supported by the appointment of judges to the board who would be expected to return to their judicial functions after their service as a member of the board for a short period of time. I believe that both the judiciary and the National Parole Board could greatly benefit by that kind of arrangement.

These arrangements will have to be made in concert with the provincial authorities concerned. A number of provinces have already been approached on this and the reaction to this idea has been most encouraging. I am confident that should this legislation be adopted, as I certainly hope it will be, arrangements for the appointment of judges to the Parole Board, on the basis I have just described, could be made fairly quickly.

Hon. members know that a large number of inmates in our federal and provincial institutions are native Canadians especially in western Canada where I might say, Mr. Speaker, 25 per cent of the inmates in federal institutions are native Canadians whereas they only form 6 per cent of the general population. It is my hope that I will be able to attract to the board a native Canadian who would be interested in and suitable for that kind of job. I would also like to appoint representatives from other minority groups who would be more representative of our prison population and consequently, have a better understanding of their problems.

All of the measures that I announced on June 1 have been implemented except the provision of the ten additional ad hoc members to the Parole Board. Treasury Board has already given approval for additional support staff, parole officers and classification officers who would work in conjunction with those ten new members. I trust that hon. members share my concern for the need to immediately enlarge the membership of the National Parole Board as proposed in this legislation. The passage of this bill will not provide a cure to all the problems that we are facing in the field of corrections. It would, however, provide a response to a pressing need. In particular, it would do a lot to help with the over-crowding problem in our penitentiary system. Last year, for example, the population of the penitentiaries increased by more than 14 per cent which is much higher than the increases in previous years. As a result of that over-population situation we have had more tension, more frustration on the part of inmates and employees, more overtime and so on which has led to escapes and other incidents. We would hope that with additional members the Parole Board would be able to provide a better screening and maybe a quicker screening of applications so that more and better people could be put on parole than in the last year.

For the longer term, as I said previously, more profound changes will be necessary. The report of the task force on the releases of inmates, under the chairmanship of Mr. Justice Hugessen of Montreal, which I made public a few months ago, is receiving detailed consideration. As hon. members appreciate, the report raises a number of important issues that could only be dealt with by substantial changes in our current legislation. Also for the long term, we will have to consider the report of the Senate Committee on Parole and Temporary Absence which should be ready soon. It is also my hope that the report of the Justice and Legal Affairs Committee of this House, which is carrying out an enquiry into our penitentiary system including parole and temporary absence, will be of assistance to us in our search for improvements in the corrections field in the longer run.

One of the key questions with respect to parole, is the distribution of responsibilities between the federal and provincial governments. Generally speaking, the National Parole Board has authority over inmates who have been convicted of offences under the federal criminal laws, whether they are in federal or provincial institutions. Some provinces have, in recent years, expressed the wish that these arrangements be reviewed so that the jurisdiction over federal offenders in provincial institutions could be assumed by provincial parole authorities. This is a question that we propose to discuss at the federal-provincial conference on corrections which will take place late this fall, probably in December.

I am hopeful that these federal-provincial discussions on corrections and especially on parole will allow us to reach some conclusion as to whether the current distribution of responsibilities between the federal and provincial authorities is as efficient as it should be. The conclusion of an agreement on this question would enable us to better come to grips with some of the major issues raised by the Hugessen task force and others, in connection with the release of inmates.

In the meantime, I hope that hon. members will agree with me that this legislative measure which is before them today is one that deserves their support. While the quick passage of the bill will, admittedly, not provide us with a cure-all to all our problems in the corrections field, it will at least help us to cope more effectively with some of the problems relating to the release of inmates.

I also want to say that since the bill has been drafted and tabled in this House the Treasury Board has suggested to me that one of the sections could be amended and I intend to put forward an amendment along certain lines. I am referring to subsection (4)(b) of section 4.1 which deals with the non-salary benefits of those people to be appointed to the board. I have been informed, after the bill was drafted, that this section deals with things that are already dealt with in a Treasury Board directive. Consequently, all these matters are taken care of. In other words, the non-salary compensation to people who are order in council appointments, such as these people would be, is covered already by a Treasury Board directive. So, in committee I will move simply for a deletion of subclause (b) on page 2 of the bill. It does not affect the principle of the bill. It relates to the non-salary compensation of the people who are to be appointed on an ad hoc basis to the board.

Having said that, I once again urge the House to support the bill, which is one that will help us to deal more adequately with the problems of parole in Canada.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, will the minister permit a question. I am putting this question now because there is some feeling on the part of members that this bill should go to committee for study and consideration, as this would save time. My question relates to section 684(3) of the Criminal Code. The minister is well aware of it, because it is a section that was previously dealt with in committee. It reads:

(3) Notwithstanding any other law or authority, a person in respect of whom a sentence of death has been commuted to imprisonment for life or a term of imprisonment or a person upon whom a sentence of imprisonment for life has been imposed as a minimum punishment, shall not be released during his life or such term, as the case may be, without the prior approval of the Governor in Council.

That section, I put it to the minister, has not been repealed. Am I correct?

My second question is this. Is it intended to repeal that section when the bill to abolish capital punishment is brought forward. There is some suggestion that this section may be repealed. Is that correct?

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, the section referred to by the hon. member is to be dealt with in the bill on capital punishment, which is before the House. It is my understanding, if I recall correctly—and I am not dealing with that bill today—that that section would still apply. If the bill on capital punishment is passed, we would still require cabinet approval for temporary absences with respect to people serving life sentences.

Mr. Woolliams: Just so that there is no misunderstanding, am I to understand that parliament has not repealed that section yet?

Mr. Allmand: It is my understanding that we did not need to repeal it, as it expired automatically at the end of 1972. It expired with the death of the law relating to the temporary ban on capital punishment, which was in effect for five years. When the effect of that law ended at the end of 1972, so did the effect of that section requiring cabinet approval for the absence from prison of those persons serving life imprisonment. Now, cabinet approval is not necessary for these people seeking parole or temporary absence.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, may I ask another question. Recently, a prisoner was released from a Prince Albert penitentiary. He was given a temporary release. This happened during the summer recess. That person was an inmate of the penitentiary and had been found guilty of murdering a young boy. He went out to dinner either with the warden or somebody else and disappeared into thin air. He is believed to be somewhere in Alberta. Has that person now been rearrested, or is he still at large? The minister knows about whom I am talking.

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, I recall the case referred to by the hon. member. The person in question was released for a temporary absence with escort. He was out with a guard, and escaped from the custody of the guard. To the best of my knowledge he has not yet been recaptured. I might also say that, as that event took place during the summer, cabinet approval was not necessary for the man to go out on temporary absence, because that particular law was no longer in force. However, when the bill before the House passes, cabinet approval will once more be necessary.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I might pose a question to the minister before the official opposition commences its remarks in this debate. The minister mentioned, when talking about temporary absences on a back-to-back basis, that there were some legal difficulties connected with that matter. I wonder if he can tell us what those legal difficulties were?

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, section 26 of the Penitentiary Act, which establishes the temporary absences program, says that temporary absences can be granted for three days for medical purposes, rehabilitation purposes or humanitarian purposes. In certain cases, 15-day passes are granted with the approval of the Commissioner of Penitentiaries. Three-day passes are granted by the directors of the institutions.

This law, after it was passed several years ago, was not used to a great extent at the beginning. Its provisions were used mainly for three-day passes. In recent years, as the increased use of temporary passes came about, these passes were granted on a back-to-back basis. A man would leave the institution for three days and come back; the director would immediately give him a new three day pass; the man would go out and come back again in three days. This became almost the equivalent of parole, and so more and more people began to question the legality of this practice.

[Mr. Allmand.]

We studied this question and found that there were grave legal doubts about the propriety of temporary leave passes being granted in this way. So, we ordered this practice to be stopped. Temporary absence passes are still granted for three days for humanitarian, medical and rehabilitation purposes, but we have stopped the back-to-back passes.

As I said, there were about 100 people on those passes throughout Canada and we kept them on passes until they had a chance to be heard by the Parole Board, because most of them were doing very well on those passes. I have given the statistics. I said that of the 100, 43 were put on day parole. We are trying to use day parole, which is the best way of dealing with these back-to-back situations. For instance, a man who is on day parole may leave the institution in the morning, go to school or to work, and come back to the institution at night. All but 15 of those 100 cases have been dealt with. All new cases are now going for hearing before the Parole Board, if there is to be day parole.

The problem is, and this is one reason we wish to appoint ten additional people, that there will be numerous applications for day parole, as such parole is going to replace back-to-back temporary absence. We are suggesting that ten new members of the board be placed throughout Canada in the five different regions, with two in each region. They will be used to renew panel hearings in the institutions, which were regrettably stopped, and to deal with all applications to do with day parole. They will also make recommendations to the board here, in Ottawa, on major parole decisions.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Speaker, may I ask one further question. In his opening statement the minister spoke about legal difficulties. He said it was not so much that there were legal difficulties but that there were doubts in the minds of some as to the legality of this matter. Is it not a fact that the practice of issuing temporary absences on a back-to-back basis was discontinued, not because of any legal doubts, but because of errors which had been made in the granting of these absences?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will allow the minister to reply to the hon. member's question, but I remind hon. members that we are not in committee at this stage. Perhaps we might continue with the debate and allow the hon. member for Calgary North to make his contribution. As I said, the minister may reply to the question asked by the hon. member for Skeena.

Mr. Allmand: No, Mr. Speaker, that was not the reason they were discontinued. Actually, the success rate for the temporary absences program was over 98 per cent; the rate of failure was extremely low. I said that there was doubt about the legality of this because we had received conflicting legal opinions; at one stage some felt that these absences were legal. However, it is like everything else that goes to court. I decided, after looking at the legal opinions that, for my own part, the practice was illegal, so I decided to terminate them. But this was not because there had been too many failures.

Mr. Reg Stackhouse (Scarborough East): Mr. Speaker, as the minister has indicated, Bill C-191 provides for a larger parole board. There is a need for more board members to fulfil the larger duties which are being assigned to the board. We support the general intent of the bill and are, therefore, prepared to accept it for second reading. However, because of certain questions that we must ask about the bill concerning what good it will accomplish for the parole system of Canada, we want this bill to go through the normal channels of committee discussion and further House debate.

The minister has said that he would like speedy passage of the bill. I remind him that the bill was introduced in the House on June 6. If the government was so anxious for speedy passage in order to implement its provisions, it ought to have brought it before the House for second reading sooner than today. The fact that the government has procrastinated in bringing the bill forward for second reading is no reason to expect the opposition parties to allow this legislation to pass without proper study and scrutiny.

In light of the needs of the parole system in Canada, I suggest the very character of this bill indicates the need for further debate and discussion by the House of Commons. This bill is simply another example of what has been called, with reference to other actions of the government, ad hocery. It is significant that the bill refers to appointing ad hoc members to the board. Ad hoc members will be appointed by an ad hoc government to implement an ad hoc policy.

There is a real need for a much more thorough review of the parole system as it is implemented in Canada today. The minister admitted that. That is the implication in much of what he said in his address this afternoon. He said this bill offers short-term satisfaction to the needs of the parole system and he looks forward to a more long-term re-organization. We would have expected that by now he would have been in a position to present to this House a much more thorough plan for re-organizing the parole system in Canada.

The Hugessen report to which the minister referred was submitted November 30, 1972. The minister has had almost 10 months in which to study it with the aid of his staff. We believe he should now be acting on it to a much greater degree than he seems prepared to do as indicated by the terms of Bill C-191. I regret very much that in his address this afternoon, the minister did not give us any exposition on the Hugessen report. When he tabled it in the House, he gave no exposition of its message. He has not indicated his thinking on the recommendations of this report.

We are now asked to take a serious and considerable step in re-organizing parole in that we would appoint 10 more members without having an adequate debate on the recommendations of the Hugessen report on the release of inmates from Canadian penal institutions. A great deal of that report was devoted to the parole system. This is certainly another example of the government's ad hocery.

In a press announcement by the parole board only this week, the public was informed that we now have in Canada a new kind of parole called temporary parole. This is a means by which the parole board is granting temporary release to inmates who previously might have received temporary absence on a back-to-back basis. It is interesting to note the minister said today that the legality of the system of back-to-back temporary absence, which his government upheld and practiced for several years, is in doubt. I suggest there is reason to believe that temporary paroles, certainly in terminology, have no real status in Canadian law. We recognize that, under the provisions of the legislation the parole board is entitled to provide day paroles, there is no reference to temporary paroles.

When the committee studies the bill, it will be necessary to ask some serious questions of the minister and the parole board authorities to see to what extent temporary parole has not only a pragmatic justification, but legal status as well. I am informed that "temporary parole" is simply a term which the parole board has seized upon as a way of describing, for its own information and organization the kind of leaves which the parole board is now granting to inmates, which I suggest are really not very different from the temporary absences which the penitentiary service was granting just a few months ago.

We have had a change of terminology and a change of jurisdiction, but not a very fundamental change in practice. The old temporary absence on a back-to-basis is gone, but the new temporary parole may not be very different. This is an example of the ad hoc approach which the government is taking on the subject of parole, as it has on so many issues. When confronted by major and complex problems, instead of attempting to solve them with adequate re-organization and imaginitive solutions, the government tries to do a patch up job in some way that will get it through another year in office.

Is this really the method we want to follow in attempting the re-organization of the parole service which the Hugessen report recommends? I had hoped this House could have had before it something which would represent a greater effort at improving the efficiency of the parole board as it is now constituted.

According to the Hugessen report, the present board suffers from excessive centralization. In place of the board, the Hugessen report recommends a two-tier system of organization. In a sense, the present bill, accompanied by the announcement of the minister, makes some gesture towards that in so far as the 10 ad hoc members are to be distributed according to regional locations. However, the proposal of the Hugessen report is much more thorough than what is suggested in Bill C-191. For example, the report calls for the formation of local parole boards to serve each institution or group of institutions. Each local board would have three members, one representing the penal institution, one representing the community and one representing the parole service. In that respect, the local board would be comparable to the British system which provides for local review committees to function in addition to the 33 members of the national parole board in Britain.

On the basis of the Hugessen report, and on the basis of the time the department has had to study this matter, there could have been a greater effort made to see what the experience of the British has been. If that experience were positive, recommendations along that line could have been made to this House of Commons. If it were negative, we could have been given some reason why the Hugessen recommendation was not being adopted.

The report also recommended the appointment of five regional boards of a much greater strength and significance than the one proposed in Bill C-191. Bill C-191 simply proposes that we add 10 ad hoc members to the National Parole Board. These are to be distributed among five regions. However, the Hugessen report states we should have five regional boards, each with eight members. The members would reflect the following backgrounds; one would be an informed and interested citizen, one would be a judge, one would be a senior police officer, one would be a psychiatrist or a psychologist, one would be a criminologist or sociologist, one would be a person with responsibility for programs in correctional institutions and one would be a person with responsibility for the supervision of offenders in a community. What we find, instead, is a diluted, pallid, anaemic, shadowy substitution for this strong and effective recommendation. Had the minister been prepared to show sufficient confidence and imagination I would have expected a recommendation to the House along those lines, or, if not, I would at least have expected an explanation of the decision he appears to have made.

● (1540)

The Hugessen report went on to recommend that provincial boards should continue where desired; second, that a national commissioner for parole be appointed to coordinate local and provincial boards, and, last, that a national parole institute be formed for the purpose of gathering information upon the basis of which the various parole agencies could act. The need for such an institution cannot be overlooked. Before we can hope to deal adequately with the subject of parole, certain fundamental questions need to be answered with respect to the facilities now available to the board.

The report called, as well, for certain other major changes including the abolition of the program providing for temporary absences without escort. The regulations of June 1, positive though many of them were, do not meet the requirements which should have been met in order to ensure the adequate reform of the system. For one thing, the decision to discontinue temporary back-to-back absences does not involve any change in the statute law. A penitentiary can still operate the old system upon which the department has acted in the past and to which the minister could at any time return; the change is dependent simply upon ministerial decision. Penitentiary authorities can still grant three-day leaves of absence should they wish to do so, so it is still possible for another Geoffroy incident to occur. We are continuing what the Hugessen report calls the inefficient duplication of operations of the penitentiary service and the national parole service. Thus, there is a need for a much more fundamental reform of the present parole system and we should take the necessary steps to bring this about in the light of the well thought out and well researched recommendations contained in the Hugessen report.

In spite of certain indications that the thinking of the minister differs from that of his predecessor, we are not satisfied that the parole service, along with branches of the penitentiary service, is adequately responding to the challenge implied in that statement in the report which draws attention to the need for much more effective liaison between the parole board and the various police agencies:

> The protection of society against illegal behaviour by parolees might be improved by strengthening the surveillance and control aspects of the parole process.

There needs to be much closer integration of the parole board program with the whole of the police process throughout the country. I wish to refer to this aspect in some detail because I put it to you, Mr. Speaker, that to a large degree the present system is failing in this respect. In practice, it is failing to provide adequate protection for the public.

It is true that officials often say they are taking all the steps necessary to ensure the protection of society but one must recognize the seriousness of the judgment—and again I quote from the Hugessen report—that "few of their activities are really directed toward this objective." What is the basis of this judgment? I believe it is accepted by responsible people across the country that parole is good in principle. Indeed, I am convinced that every party represented in this House and every section of our society supports the principle of parole and would support a healthy, positive parole program. What concerns us is the way in which the parole system has been so mismanaged that its benefits have been granted to people who could not and would not use them as intended but who, instead, regarded parole as a means of continuing their actions against society.

Just a few years ago, one citizen in British Columbia, Judge A. L. Bewley put together a collection of case histories of 62 persons with extensive criminal records who had been granted parole and who had committed serious offences while on parole. One such person had a record of breaking and entering, robbery with violence, kidnapping and escaping custody. He was sentenced to 7 years imprisonment in 1968 and released on parole in 1970. In 1971 he was re-arrested for robbery. He escaped jail and shot the RCMP constable who was attempting to arrest him.

A second offender was sentenced to four years and six months for attempted murder. He was granted parole in 1970 and was re-arrested for a second attempted murder. There is a third case of a man who had a record of armed robbery and forcible confinement of a person. He was granted parole in 1970, and while he was on parole police reported him on 22 occasions as being seen in the company of known criminals. Those reports were sent to the National Parole Board but the offender's parole was not cancelled.

A fourth case concerns an offender sentenced to life imprisonment as an habitual offender in 1965, although 22 convictions were recorded against him, including armed robbery. His parole was suspended after one month but renewed in 1968. In 1969 he was arrested and convicted of robbery and false pretenses.

In the fifth case I wish to draw to your attention, Mr. Speaker, the offender had been convicted of 105 offences between 1945 and 1962. In the latter year he was sentenced to a ten-year term. Between 1968 and 1971 he was granted parole on three occasions. Three months after being given parole in 1971 he was arrested on 41 charges of false pretenses and forgery committed while he was out on conditional liberty.

These are some of the cases from the west coast to which attention has been drawn. Let us turn, now, to an article which appeared in Weekend Magazine on November 25, 1972. We read that between 1963 and 1971 Dwight Allan Swanson was sentenced to 11 prison terms in respect of charges ranging from car theft and possession of stolen property to robbery and breaking and entering. During this period he was paroled not once but five times and on each occasion he committed one or more offences while on parole. His last conviction, on November 24, 1971, was for indecent assault of a female. I think it is evident that about one third the number of people released on parole commit crimes again. Because of that we must ask very searching questions about the way in which the parole service is being administered in this country. We are not persuaded that parole is being granted always to those who will act with the proper intent. Very often parole is utilized by those who see it as another opportunity to be released from jail and return to crime.

We do not suggest for a moment that the solution to this is simply a reduction in the number of paroles granted. This may be the thinking of the minister and of the parole board, because there seems to be a certain satisfaction taken in the way in which the statistics indicate it is now more difficult to obtain parole than previously. We are not impressed by that kind of statistical justification. We are not saying that fewer people should obtain parole, but we are saying that there must be a much more thorough search of applications for parole and that we should take much more serious steps to help avoid the kind of mistake the parole board has made during the past several years.

We feel we can support Bill C-191 to the extent that it involves the appointment of additional parole board members, even on that ad hoc basis, to serve that end. We welcome the appointment of additional parole officers to make the system more effective, but we are not convinced, until there has been further study, debate and discussion of the various aspects of this complex question, that the parole board itself will carry out its duties in such a way that we will avoid the kind of thing from which Canada has suffered during the last decade. There is simply no justification for the fact that a person, having committed a crime, having been sentenced to prison and having been given parole, is able to go out and commit another crime, then come back and receive a second, a third or even a fourth parole. Very often that person is one who, by his record, has shown that he is dangerous to society.

We, therefore, believe the parole board must reorganize its work and its thinking so that we may be satisfied that parole will be used for the purpose for which it was intended. We must ask questions, for example, about the effectiveness of the board's surveillance and whether the parole officers acting in the name of the board are competent to carry out their duties. I have already referred to the way in which one person on parole could be seen 22 times in the company of known criminals, and that when this was reported to the parole board nothing was done about it. Those reports were sent in, not by the parole officers but by the local police. Too often it is the case that this kind of information is provided, not by those whom one would expect would obtain the information first, but by the police who do not have a primary duty for the supervision of parolees.

One reason for this situation is that the parole supervisors have had too many parolees under their supervision. The police chiefs, in appearing before the Senate committee dealing with parole, said that the bulk of parole violations are only brought to light as the result of police investigations into other incidents. They go on to say that the number of violations which the police report are only a small percentage of the actual number of violations. We, therefore, must ask ourselves some very serious questions about the efficiency of the surveillance program. We must satisfy ourselves as a parliament that the proposals the minister is making in this legislation are adequate, because if the kind of surveillance which is being carried on is not adequate to provide supervision of those who are potentially dangerous, further recommendations must be made.

It is simply inexcusable that we should go on in this ad hoc fashion at a time when we have seen the growth of crimes of violence cause the average citizen to pause and wonder what steps are needed for his own protection. I would point out in this connection that I should like to see much more attention directed toward the value of half-way houses or after-care hostels. It seems to me we ought to be ready to take a much more positive step in this direction than the minister so far has encouraged us to think the government is prepared to take. In dealing adequately with the problem of surveillance of parolees or the transition of an inmate from jail to life we need half-way houses. In this regard we whould study the experience other jurisdictions have had.

For instance, in the 1969 report of the British Parole Board, we see the following statement:

> In a number of cases it has only been possible to recommend parole because an 'After-care Hostel' or 'Half-way House' has been prepared to accept the prisoner at the time of his release.

It seems to me that until we are prepared to couple an adequate supervision program in terms of a sufficient staff with an adequate program of after-care or half-way house facilities, we will not even begin to think seriously about meeting the needs of the parolees and of society. If we really mean what we claim to mean when we speak about parole and the value it has to inmates and to society, surely we must be prepared for whatever is involved in setting up an adequate half-way house system across this country. The few hostels that are now available are largely maintained by voluntary agencies which depend for much of their financing on contributions. These agencies simply cannot adequately meet the challenge of the times. So, I would hope the kind of discussion we have in committee, and the kind of future debate we have in this House, would prompt the government to re-think its present program, its lack of initiative and action in this respect.

There are other changes we need to consider very carefully along with those to which I have referred. One change we need to consider involves the whole question of whether the parole board should have the right to act, as someone suggested, as kind of a substitute judge, because very often it seems the parole board is now, according to the law, in the position of a sentencing judge. In effect, it is in a position to rewrite the sentence the judge has imposed on the convicted criminal on the basis of the trial and on the basis of the evidence he has heard. I think there is something to be said, therefore, for the recommendation by the Canadian Bar Association that the provincial attorneys general should have the right to appeal decisions of the parole board. This would mean that the head of the law enforcement agencies and the law enforcement system in the province would have some say if it were thought that a sentence had not been carried out adequately or that the risk of further parole violation was too great. I would add that the Canadian Bar Association also recognizes the rights of the inmate in recommending that an inmate should equally have the right of appeal.

● (1600)

Just dealing for the moment with the way in which very often the parole board, it seems to me, has offered itself as a substitute for the sentencing judge, and dealing with the proposal of the Canadian Bar Association, I would suggest that if we had that kind of a system or something comparable we might have avoided the tragic mistake made when the five kidnappers of Mary Nelles were released on parole. Shortly after they began their prison sentences for this serious crime, two were released after serving only 20 months of 10-year terms, and three were released after serving 24 and 26 months of 12-year terms for the serious and major crime of kidnapping, a crime that might well have resulted in a much greater tragedy than it did.

This was a scandal and a shock to every citizen who takes law and law enforcement seriously. When representatives of the parole board tried to justify that decision by rationalizing that these criminals really had not intended to commit a crime but to carry out some kind of a practical joke, the real joke seemed to be the law, and every serious law-abiding citizen of this country wondered if the law in Canada, where it has so long been respected, was now a laughing stock.

Another suggestion for dealing with this problem is to give the sentencing judge the authority to impose a minimum term before which parole could not be granted. An editorial in the Criminal Law Quarterly, February 1973, supports this recommendation. It reads:

> The post sentence process appears to take on all the aspects of a device to defeat the original judicial determination.

One solution according to this Law Quarterly is to give the sentencing judge "the power to impose a minimum term before the expiration of which an inmate shall not be released on parole". That is the practice already in two states in Australia, New South Wales and Victoria. The experience there should be adequate for the minister to indicate to us why he has not undertaken some reform along such lines, and why the government is not taking the action it should. If the experience of other jurisdictions indicates the proposal to which I have referred would not be effective, I think the minister should suggest something better, and certainly something better than we have had in Canada for the past several years.

The parole board very often justifies its program on the basis of the saving of taxpayers' money. Apparently the cost of keeping an inmate in a penal institution is so high, and the cost of parole is so low it makes sense to parole very large numbers of inmates. I hope this kind of rationalization can quickly be dispensed with, because surely we are not going to offer this reasoning as some kind of justification for granting paroles to the kinds of prisoners to whom I have referred in citing these case studies. I refer to the kind of parolee who can go out and burgle, swingle, steal, attack and even murder.

What value do we put on that kind of crime when we say we are saving the taxpayers' money by granting parole? What value do we put on the suffering and loss endured by the citizens who are the victims of these men, and what value do we put on the life of a person like the late George Edward Oliver whose throat was slit by a parolee who had a record of crime and past paroles, who was nonetheless given a further parole during which he committed this vile, brutal murder in the city of Vancouver? He was sentenced first in 1969, and paroled the next year. His parole was revoked in 1971 and a second parole was issued the same year. Before the year was out he had committed murder.

We have to see that there is a very great cost to the Canadian people when parole is given to those who cannot use it properly. We have a very grave responsibility as a parliament, along with the grave responsibility borne by the minister, and we are using this debate to draw these responsibilities to the attention of parliament and the public. We hope that further discussion in the committee and further debate in this House will explore this dimension of the problem much more searchingly. We are prepared to pass this bill on second reading, but we are not prepared to be the kind of uncritical audience the minister might have welcomed. We are simply not giving him the speedy and unquestioned passage he has suggested, and we do not do so because too often in the past those who have acted in his name have not acted in the best interest of the people of this country. So we are asking for a much more searching examination of the effectiveness of the National Parole Board and the need for its effective reorganization in the best interests of society.

I should like to say something as well about the need for forming a national parole institute as recommended by the Hugesson Report, to do effective research into how the parole system is working, and to provide informed answers to difficult questions. This bill makes no provision for expanding the research facilities of the National Parole Board. It should be clear to everyone who is engaged in parole work that this is one of the fundamental needs of a reorganized and reformed board. For example, I put a written question to the minister in which I asked how many of those who had applied for parole and received it had received parole before; once, twice, three times or four times. That is the way of finding out the extent to which parole is being made a kind of career by the career criminal. I was told it would take too long to search the records of the parole board to find an answer to that question.

In discussing that kind of thing with those active in the field of parole, I have found that they know the answer but there is just no one on the staff of the National Parole Board doing that kind of elementary, necessary and essential research. If we are ever to have the kind of parole system in which we can have serious confidence we will have to expand the research facilities. If we did that we could certainly draw upon the experience of parole systems in other jurisdictions where, for example, in Great Britain the parole section of the Home Office has its own research unit and publishes the parole section of the annual report of the National Council of Crime and Delinquency. In the United States they have a National Council of Crime and Delinquency with its own research centre providing adequate information for the guidance of parole boards and parole officers in that country. I would suggest further that any attempt to reform the administration of parole in this country which does not provide for extended research facilities and staff would not begin to meet the need.

Finally, I should like to suggest that we should be doing something serious about the need for giving greater recognition to the rights of the inmates themselves. We should recognize that the due process of law should apply to all aspects of confinement in the penal institution, and when an inmate applies for parole he should not only have the right to state his case and the right to a definite decision but he should have the right to an explanation as to why his application for parole has been rejected. Admittedly, there is an argument for the present policy of the board, according to which a reason is not always given. I can recognize that giving a reason or an explanation to some inmates might cause them great distress, and I take that kind of argument very seriously. However, I would point out to the House and to the minister the opinion of a Canadian authority on this subject, Dr. Evelyn Shea of Ottawa, who, in a study called "The Future of Parole" says:

We believe however that the detrimental effects of withholding an explanation will, in the great majority of cases, be worse than the distress caused by knowing the reasons.

I maintain that to give an explanation would surely increase the trust that inmates might have in the penal system and in paroles.

As well, we should give consideration to inmates having a chance to appeal the decision, giving them the same rights that we would give attorneys general or other law agents who would be dissatisfied with the thinking of the board. The Hugessen report says that it has four objectives for the reorganization of the parole system in Canada. These four objectives are: one, the decentralizing of the board; two, integration of the parole system with the criminal justice continuum; three, an interlinked information system; and four, due process of law.

I think it should be clear to us all that the bill before us is inadequate on each of those counts, that it takes but one, small faltering step toward the first objective. But in terms of really reorganizing the board so that it would be adequately decentralized and most efficient in carrying out its mandate, this bill simply does not meet the need. We need further time to ask ourselves if the government should not be recommending to parliament a much more extensive reorganization than it has. Certainly, we have not had any suggestion that the minister intends a further integration of the parole system with what the Hugessen report calls the criminal justice continuum to safeguard society against inadequate surveillance so that there can be an avoidance of the tragic misuse of parole, evidence of which I have submitted. Certainly, we have no promise of a more effective research program and an interlinked information system, and as yet we have no suggestion that the due process of law, on behalf of the society or on behalf of the inmates, would be more greatly honoured.

This is a weak, hesitant step that the government is asking parliament to take, not because the minister has not had adequate information presented to him by most well informed sources, such as the Hugessen task force and the Senate committee as well as the experience of other jurisdictions, and not because the minister has not had adequate time to deal with the information that surely is available to him. Therefore, we say to the House and to you, Mr. Speaker, that while we are prepared to support this bill for second reading we are not prepared to go further than that today. In fact, as I look at this bill and think of the minister's exposition in support of it, I am reminded of what a father of a bride said at a wedding which I recently attended. As he looked at the groom, he said: "well, he is better than nothing". I think that is the best we can say for this bill—it is better than nothing. We know that the National Parole Board needs more members, and we know that it needs the distribution of those members across the country. We know that there was a need to abandon the back-to-back temporary absense system. We welcome all these steps, but there is so much more to be done that we are not prepared simply to give an uncritical acceptance to that which is so obviously inadequate.

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, the bill we have before us is a very short one and really says very little. I am inclined to agree with the hon. member for Scarborough East (Mr. Stackhouse) who said that it travelled a very small distance toward any real change in the method of dealing with this subject. The bill contains a short explanatory note which reads:

The purpose of this bill is to effect the appointment of additional ad hoc members to the National Parole Board.

I can understand why the minister provides a short explanation. It is because whenever the minister has provided a long explanation in the House he has brought upon himself a certain amount of difficulty. But again, he has a difficult portfolio. His position is one with which members from both sides of the House have sympathy because any penal system which is 100 per cent secure and 100 per cent successful does not exist. We in Canada do not have the worst penal system in the world.

However, the purpose of this bill is to put into effect the suggestions the minister made in his statement on June 1, when he outlined certain changes that were being made to our parole and temporary absence system. Certainly, one of these changes that we in this corner of the House welcomed very much was the appointment of Miss Inger Hansen as a kind of ombudsman for the penitentiary service. This change was long overdue and we are very happy with the quality of that appointment. Nevertheless, the statement itself contained a rather inadequate approach to a big problem. I should like to quote the minister:

These are recommendations that are calculated to deal with some federal correctional problems on a short-term basis in the field of penitentiary services, temporary absences and parole. For the long term, more profound changes may be necessary.

We are all waiting very patiently for those more profound changes. We can certainly say "Amen" to the remarks of the minister of June 1. It is not as though there have not been enough reports, enough research and enough information available to the minister to allow him to come up with a coherent, co-ordinated approach. What we have before us is a patchwork approach to the problems of penal reform, one unfortunately which is predicated on whatever the public mood may be at the moment. That is a very difficult part of the minister's job, but I submit the minister should not react to every incident that occurs within the country, because one swallow does not make a summer.

The change that was made on June 1 to increase the mandatory part of a life sentence to 7 years rather than 4, was a response to the public mood. I suggest it was an irrational response in this sense. It is not the length of mandatory sentence that counts, it is the screening process that counts. No one is rehabilitated within prison. It all depends on the way we choose people who are eligible for parole. Whether they spend three, seven or ten years in jail may not be that significant. What is significant is the manner in which we make our choice. We must base that choice on the penology approach and not the political approach. My criticism of the minister has been, and is, that he is using a political approach in attempting to solve this problem.

We need more than a patchwork attempt to put this subject into proper perspective. The purpose of this bill and the statement made on June 1 with respect to rationalizing the temporary absence program with the day parole program sound logical, although I must say I am not that impressed with the Hugessen report to which the hon. member for Scarborough East kept referring. The effect of the recommendations in that report would be to eliminate temporary absence, other than for humanitarian or medical reasons. The rehabilitation ground would be removed from the temporary absence program operated under the Penitentiary Act. I do not think that is a step forward.

I welcome the approach taken by this bill to regionalize and localize these decisions, but I am not so sure that the qualification officer, the people within an institution and the people around the community in which it is situated, are better qualified in terms of the screening process to determine which of the inmates in the institution can benefit from parole, and to know whether the public would be protected on their release.

One of the things that has been lacking in the program to date has been the intimate contact that is necessary in order to make the screening process more effective. The hardest person of all to "con" is the convict inside the prison. Yet how much consultation is taking place with inmates of prisons to determine which of their numbers is safe to release? There is almost none. How much consultation is taking place with the prison staff, with the cooks and the guards who have intimate contact with these men all the time? There is still too much of an elitist approach in terms of dealing with the screening and making the decisions. Based on my experience, you can trust a great many of the persons in institutions to give you a fair and honest assessment of their peer group within those institutions. As I say, Mr. Speaker, we have fallen down in terms of that consultative process.

[Mr. Leggatt.]

We also find that the people who are making decisions on parole are incompetent, or are capable of being "conned" by the inmate who has all the time in the world to prepare himself for an interview, to put on his best front, and as long as that continues to be the case we will have these dramatic errors. I say that these dramatic errors are eroding public confidence in the system that we have at present.

There are three basic myths under which the parole system operates. The first is that people are rehabilitated while they are in prison. All the evidence and statistics show that this is demonstrably false. Rehabilitation takes place outside jail. It takes place within the community, not within jail. Our prisons are for custody, for the protection of the public from people who have a tendency to repeat their crimes. However, that does not mean that the inmates should not be treated decently and humanely. The mark of a civilized society is the way in which it treats the inmates of its prisons. It is still vital and important that the public knows it is protected from escapes from institutions. That is why we in this corner of the chamber supported the establishment of the subcommittee of the Justice Committee to look into this and other aspects of the prison system.

The second myth under which the system operates is that the solution to the crime rate is to change the parole rules and make them tougher. Mr. Speaker, that is not related to the crime rate at all. Each time a spectacular crime occurs the reaction is sudden. We all favour changing the parole rules. But when there is a lack of crime news, we are liable to look in the other direction. You cannot run the system like a lottery that reacts to every public outcry. I am not saying that either six, seven or five years is the correct mandatory term before parole. I am saying that parole decisions have to be based on a very careful screening process. As long as we think that the longer a guy is held in prison the more likely he is to learn his lesson, then really the more likely we are to continue to make mistakes. It does not bring anybody closer to rehabilitation to isolate him from the public.

It is difficult to identify those to whom we can issue parole. As I said before, there is insufficient consultation with two of the most important groups in the prison, namely, the prisoners themselves and the prison guards. As long as we continue the elitist approach, the psychological approach, the psychiatric approach if you like, we will make the kind of errors that we do make. Take the classic case of the Tanya Bush murder which has been referred to in this House many times. If proper consultation had taken place I do not think Gary Head would have been released. If the prisoners and the guards had been canvassed, I do not think that horrible error would have occurred. As long as errors of that magnitude occur there will be no confidence in our rehabilitation system. It cannot be perfect if there is that kind of glaring stupidity which brings the whole system into disrepute.

The third myth is that all prisoners are capable of rehabilitation. That is demonstrably false. There is an element of psychopathic behavior amongst the inmates of our institutions. Those of us who have practised law, and in particular criminal law, know of it. There are people who have no conscience, who have no feeling of remorse for anything they do, and have no capability to restrict their criminal activity. They make up 10 per cent to 20 per cent of our prison population. It is time we did something to examine that element, to learn why these people behave the way they do, and to find out if there is anything we can do about it.

One of the experts in this field is a man from British Columbia, Dr. Hare. He has written an internationally accepted text on the subject, "Psychopathy: Theory and Research." He worked in our institutions in B.C. for some ten years. Here is what he has to say, as reported in the Vancouver Province of February 17 last:

"The fact is, the penitentiary service doesn't really have a rational, integrated treatment program. Many of their rehabilitation programs are poorly organized, makeshift and frequently faddish," he said. "They have the experts but not the expertise to deal with criminals, particularly psychopathic ones."

● (1630)

Hare and his research associates are attempting to develop a model experimental program for the modification of psychopathic behaviour. It would involve a combination of behaviour, drug, and milieu therapy carried out over a period of several years.

He says its unlikely to be carried out. A year ago he contacted the Solicitor General's office about funds and was later visited by a member of his staff. Since then he has heard nothing and assumes they are not interested.

I know the minister's answer is that there are psychiatric opportunities set up but this is a new and interesting departure. This is a specialist in the psychology of psychopaths. This is the kind of new approach that needs to be taken in penology but it is not being taken because we are stuck with traditional attitudes. We can afford to spend money on Montreal bikers apparently making wooden ducks, or homosexual handbooks published in Vancouver, so we can surely afford money for intensive scientific research into the workings of the brains of people who are deeply troubled by psychopathic behaviour.

The other area that is not being followed up is the early identification of this kind of behaviour within the public school system. I am, not saying that they need to be typed or segregated, but most people who are knowledgeable in this field tell us that there are certain personality traits in young children which can identify, once they get into the elementary school system, probable future psychopaths. The problem will not go away if the harsh reality of it is ignored, but we are not doing anything in that area of research and the bill offers no new departures in terms of penology.

As I indicated before, there is no program by any government that is going to work toward public confidence. If there are any more cases Garry Head or those mentioned by the hon. member for Scarborough East, we are going to go back into the dark ages of penal reform. I urge the minister to be cautious of the manner in which these things are issued. The screening process is important. More money must be provided for research before any progress can be made in this field. I can understand the appointment of more members to the Parole Board and I can appreciate the fact that is should be regionalized. It is clear that decisions were being made too far away from the persons concerned. However, this bill is really innocuous and goes no distance toward the co-ordinated thrust that has to be made into this problem.

Mr. Speaker, I am disappointed that there is not more public confidence in rehabilitation, but in a way I can understand and sympathize with the approach of the newspapers. They display an element of sensationalism and seem to be hypnotized by every event but this can be understood in the light of the glaring errors like those in the Head case and the fellow who ran off with his LIP grant. These cases certainly undermine public confidence.

By his remarks, the hon. member for Scarborough East seemed to favour cutting down on parole. That is a simplistic approach, Mr. Speaker, and I do not agree with it. We can still be progressive while being practical and realistic. We know that there is a percentage of those people within our institutions who when released, because of their psychopathic behaviour and psychopathic nature, will again commit crimes so we should realize that an effort should be made to identify those people early in life. We have to spend money on research and perhaps we have to modify their behaviour. It seems to me that until we tackle that problem, we are not getting to the guts of the penal system.

[Translation]

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, Bill C-191 now before the House aims at amending the Parole Act. This bill amounts to a very simple thing, to increase the number of National Parole Board members in order to expedite the work, thus increasing its efficiency, according to the minister.

Mr. Speaker, it is obvious that a clear-headed person cannot object to the principle of parole. The fact that planes crash once in a while is no reason to abolish aviation and it is not because some criminals benefitted from Parole Act lenience by relapsing into Crime that we should abolish the Parole Act.

This being said, as a basic principle, it nevertheless remains that day after day we realize, thanks to the statistics supplied to the Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs and also by the newspapers even on other subjects, that the Parole Act is perhaps not what we need to meet current needs.

● (1640)

Certainly, in order to solve the problem of crime in Canada, which is becoming a major problem, we need more than just a parole act. This must be tied to the social causes which create crime, which make criminals, including the family environment. Indeed, the social environment, often full of injustices, incites people to commit burglary or assault and robbery, and these individuals finally find themselves before a criminal court to be condemned. In many cases, and rightly so, it is society itself which ought to be condemned rather than these individuals.

Let us also talk about organized crime. People choose crime as a profession, earn their living through crime. They have reached such a point of organization, Mr. Speaker, that newspapers are filled with articles telling about shocking things, especially in Quebec; scandal rises right and left which results in people becoming often sceptical about the due process of law and saying that there are two kinds of justice.

Moreover, in many respects justice is not the same for everybody. The bail system, for instance, is such that the rich, those who have money, obtain a kind of justice, while the poor, the man who has no money, the worker, the labourer, the family man whose sole income is the fruit of his toil over 40 or 50 hours of work, obtains a different kind of justice. Mr. Speaker, that such a system in some areas of our country still exist is revolting.

Let us consider also the system, the administration of penal institutions. We have reached the point—and the Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs is in a position to testify of this—where prisons in some areas have been turned into schools of crime. They indiscriminately put in the same bag people who have been sentenced for robbery, rape, murder, attempted murder, etc, and when prisoners are set free, they know a lot more about crime than when they were imprisoned in the first place.

It is unfortunate that millions of dollars are spent for penal institutions which do not always succeed in stopping crime. It is often found that they have become schools for criminals.

Under those circumstances, and to complete this gloomy but realistic picture, there is also the courts and what is called the judiciary administration which is often rotten. In fact, some judges are political creatures and render sentences based on half evidence. I could give many examples. But as I do not intend to have this debate dragging on I will dispense from giving them. But it remains that, hopefully, all my colleagues are aware that today's courts are not a good example for our youth.

With the parole system the members of the Parole Board are often in a position to reverse a court decision. For instance, a convict sentenced to life imprisonment or to 25 to 30 years may apply for parole under the law and the Parole Board is allowed to reverse the judge's decision. This is the reason for most critics against the Parole Act.

Many of our fellow citizens witness murders; then they learn that the accused, after lengthy procedures, has been condemned and they heave a sign of relief telling themselves that justice has been done. But what do they hear a few months later? That the criminal has been set free.

Several examples could be given. I shall mention only one, which concerns my area. A few years ago, a crime was committed at Victoriaville, a burglary. When the burglars came out, the policemen called to the scene tried to protect the owner's property. The bandits, armed with machine guns, had no hesitation in firing point-blank at the police officers. They wanted a shoot-out and, needless to say, their machine guns were not loaded with dummy shells.

When the bandits had planned this crime, they had foreseen that they might be forced to kill, and with those arms, they were ready to do so. In any case, officer Collard was wounded and was unable to walk for eight months.

This bandit was captured, judged after many delays and sentenced to jail. He then applied for parole and, for the purposes of rehabilitation, the board granted his request. It is not because one plane crashes that we should stop all air transportation. In the same way, it is not because of one recidivist that the parole system should be abolished. In itself, the principle is excellent, it is its application which is not so good.

What happened was that the board agreed to grant parole to that gangster who lost no time in going to Sainte-Thérèse-de-Blainville and killing another policeman.

Mr. Speaker, as a police officer had been seriously wounded and another, a father of a family, murdered, the board should have realized that gangster was not likely to rehabilitate.

Even though we believe in the principle of parole for the reason that it may be possible that a human being could be rehabilitated in a normal society and comply with its laws, the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) should reconsider his position on the administration of the law and here is the reason.

All hon. members will recall that, two years ago I believe, Parliament discussed a bill on juvenile delinquents. Bill C-192 raised protests from a lot of the people involved.

It happens that the problem of juvenile delinquents can be summed up in one fact: If he has committed a crime, in 80 per cent of the cases, according to the evidence of the witnesses before the committee, it is because the family environment he spent his youth in did not exist, the parents not being there, or was "rotten". Mr. Speaker, the result is that this young boy or girl enters naturally, against his or her will, the path of crime. Then he is picked up, as people will say, appears before a welfare court and is judged. Then, he is placed in a kind of training institution, with all kinds of young criminals.

These young people have no right to parole, under the laws governing them. However, these are young people who could rehabilitate themselves, much more than hardened criminals who have repeated 8, 10 or 15 times.

This is the exact criticism I want to make about the Parole Act under which, in many cases, hardened criminals are released, while juvenile delinquents remain in jail. If the minister's arguments as regards rehabilitation are valid, if his faith in rehabilitation is reasoned and justified in the case of certain criminals, I do not see why this benefit of parole could not be applied even more to young people.

Mr. Speaker—and I ask the minister to give us these figures—how many probation officers are there for young offenders? How many young offenders, when they are released, benefit from the assistance of a probation officer to re-establish themselves in society? The young person who had no family, no friend, no one to guide him in life, who had no serious mother or father, goes back to free society with the same means when released. The same causes will involve the same effects. Whenever he is hungry, whenever he is tempted by what is displayed in store windows, he will commit another offence and this is how he will relapse into crime. How many probation officers are there? What are their qualifications? What are the qualifications of those who work in the court of Montreal?

In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, in a rehabilitation and crime prevention system, we should above all put all our efforts, all our attention, all our energy in crime prevention and this, from the very first years.

Do we do anything to detect crime at the school level? How many probation officers are acting, are able to act and really follow a young offender? Mr. Speaker, I am inclined to believe that it is practically nothing. He is simply released and, as I said earlier, he relapses into crime; finally, he grows older, and instead of being judged by a welfare court, he goes to criminal court under criminal law. It is at that point, Mr. Speaker, that he becomes a professional in his trade. He is put with other criminals more hardened than him, older than him, in rotten prisons, the best crime schools.

Mr. Speaker, for one—and I think my colleagues share this view—I believe in rehabilitation and, above all, in crime prevention. If one looks at crime statistics in Canada one finds that the crime index is on the rise. When, for example, a youth is found in possession of narcotics he immediately winds up with a criminal record; he is immediately catalogued. What does this same system that condemns that youth, do about the pusher? Is the youth guilty or is it the one who gave him the drug?

Mr. Speaker, this youth caught using drugs—influenced by those older than him—has a criminal record. He is sent to jail or released on bail if his father has the means to pay, and as I said earlier not everybody has the means. Thus he becomes a criminal. This youth will rot in a prison because he does not have the necessary contacts or possibility to get out, because our system of rehabilitation and prevention is clearly inadequate; that is how he becomes a hardened criminal.

Mr. Speaker, I feel that the minister should issue new directives, and maybe even recall the new Parole Act, not the one that simply provides for increased membership on the board but that which sets out the duties of that board so that Parliament can instruct it to review the scope of that act so it will apply first and above all to those who are really rehabilitable, who are better potentials anyway, namely young people rather than confirmed criminals relapsing into crime for the tenth or fifteenth time.

Some hon. members might not believe it, but I urge them to read Hansard for May 5 ou 9, 1969. There is a question dealing with the number of relapses among parolees. Statistics on that are quite unbelievable.

The scandal of our century, in the application of justice, is that crime is systematically created by completely rejecting young people being victimized by a sick society.

● (1650)

Mr. Speaker, when a family is penniless, when the father takes to drink and the mother leaves, the children are left without any family environment and I say to myself if I did not have a good family background, I would probably not be here today as well as many other members.

Mr. Speaker, those young people must not be penalized on account of their age; as we know, they do not come under that legislation. This is why I urge the minister to reconsider his position so that we may hope that the young people may be granted parole much more easily than at the present time and that especially the necessary funds will be earmarked for the services of qualified, serious and honest personnel in the probation and rehabilitation fields.

Mr. Speaker, to get an efficient parole system it is not enough to pass an act, to appoint a number of civil servants and say: Go across the country, search prisons, try to find inmates likely to rehabilitate and free them. I know that the real object of the parole system is to prevent crime and leave the parolee every chance to return to society as a normal citizen. This person was sentenced because he broke the laws of society.

Mr. Speaker, when a prisoner is released he must have every chance to return to society in a normal way. Consequently, for this system to be operative, efficient and really satisfactory, it is essential that the government invests more in the probation system by creating a department or a school or whatever to train more and better qualified probation officers in order to meet the demand.

Mr. Speaker, in closing I hope that the minister will listen to me and that he will answer at the end of this debate.

[English]

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, Bill C-191 has the support of the members of the New Democratic Party. The hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt) set forth in a very clear and convincing way some of the problems that we face today with regard to parole.

All this bill does is appoint additional ad hoc members to the National Parole Board. I think we have reached the end of our research and study with regard to the question of parole. We have to start framing legislation which will deal more adequately with this problem. As the minister said, this is a response to a pressing need. It is only one step on the road to finding the complete solution.

Parole is one of the important matters in the area of the criminal justice system. May I review just a few of the steps we have taken. We made some amendments to the Criminal Code. These had some effect. We have the Hugessen report on the release of inmates. The Senate is now studying parole. An ombudsman has been appointed to study some of the grievances of inmates.

When I listened to the hon. member for Scarborough East (Mr. Stackhouse) speaking on behalf of the Progressive Conservative party, I had the feeling his remarks could be summarized by saying, you put people in prison, throw away the key and leave them there. That may be a rather harsh criticism. However, he gave details of some of the cases that have been failures without giving the details of some of the cases that have been successful. He did not set forth the high recidivist rate we have when we keep inmates too long in our penitentiaries.

The hon. member stressed surveillance. When it comes to parole, it is not only a question of surveillance, but reformation and rehabilitation of a parolee re-integrating himself into the community. He must be helped to adjust with regard to living conditions, employment and his attitude toward himself and other members of society. We have had many reports on the question of parole. We had a chapter of the Ouimet report. As has been pointed out, we have had the Hugessen report with regard to parole. We have also had the official statement of the Canadian Criminology and Corrections Association.

I hope that today we will deal with this bill in committee of the whole and pass it, so that the additional ad hoc members can be appointed to the parole board in order that it can be a more effective instrument in parole. Having said that, I hope the minister will refer to the committee the Hugessen report, the Senate report and also the position of the Canadian Criminology and Corrections Association in order that the committee can study these reports. The minister could then be in a position to come forth with legislation which would deal more effectively with the problem of parole.

It is not only a question of surveillance. It is a question of rehabilitation and reformation. The Canadian Criminalogy and Corrections Association made 27 recommendations setting forth the meaning and purpose of parole. They recommended that in the revisions that are introduced, every effort should be made to construct the system of parole in Canada so that it will be readily understandable by prison inmates, parolees, the police, members of the bench, prison and parole staffs and the public. When you have the divisions of full parole, day parole and temporary absence parole, confusion is created in the minds of the people. It brings about a criticism that at times is unnecessary and unjust.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I wonder whether this is a convenient point for the hon. member to interrupt his contribution.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Matte)—Royal Canadian Mounted Police—Inquiries on information given to provincial governments about ministers; the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Fraser)—Energy—Representations to United States respecting proposed movement of oil by supertanker to Cherry Point and alternative Canadian supply; the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez)—External Affairs—Government position on recognition of new government of Chile.

[Mr. Gilbert.]

It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business. I gather there has been consultation among the parties as to the item of business with which we will proceed. Perhaps this could be put on the record.

Mr. Reid: Mr. Speaker, there have been discussions, but there is absolutely no fixed position on this. There might be agreement not to proceed with private members' hour, but to proceed with the bill we are now discussing. If that is completed before six o'clock, we could reconsider our position and perhaps, rise or have the CNR financing bill. I recognize there has been no agreement. I am simply putting forward this suggestion as one which hon. members may wish to consider.

● (1700)

Mr. Bell: We agree.

Mr. Howard: As the parliamentary secretary has said, no fixed position has been taken. We shall not, in fact, be dealing with private members' bills this afternoon and the next item listed on the order paper is notices of motions for the production of papers. The government has sought for a long time to sweep all these motions under the rug and to withhold the disclosure of documents. Perhaps we should see whether we can persuade members opposite to change this attitude.

An hon. Member: Say yes, or no!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: There is no agreement.

Mr. John M. Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to the President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Welland (Mr. Railton) has asked me to explain to you, and to the House, that he does not intend to proceed with this bill at the present time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Stand.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

[English]

URBAN AFFAIRS—REQUEST FOR COPY OF PROGRAM FORECAST OF DEPARTMENT, INCLUDING BUDGETS A, B, X

Mr. Terry Grier (Toronto-Lakeshore) moved:

That an order of the House do issue for a complete copy (including budgets A, B, X) of the program forecast (program review) by the Ministry of State for Urban Affairs for the latest year for which Parliament approved departmental expenditures.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I propose to begin by noting that I have already stood this motion on one occasion in the immediate past. Very often members are asked by the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of Privy Council (Mr. Reid) whether they are prepared to proceed with their bills and motions. To my mind, it appears a little inconvenient to be repeatedly asked at the very last minute whether we are ready to proceed and I am, therefore, glad of this opportunity to further develop a line of argument which I have sought to put forward on two previous occasions.

I found it instructive when dealing with this matter to review some of the arguments or counter-arguments put forward by spokesmen for the government in earlier debates. On September 6, the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Dupras) enunciated certain views with respect to a motion to produce documents related to the Department of Veterans Affairs. Since the principle we are discussing today is identical with that being discussed at that time I believe it would be worth while to comment on two points he made. I may say they were the only two points he put forward on the matter of principle underlying the notice of motion. I quote from a translation the observations he made as follows:

I fail to see any such benefit for General Motors or Chrysler as well as other industries which compete against one another and which also stand to grain by keeping secret the main elements of their long-term plans.

By analogy I infer the hon. member was arguing that if it was bad business for General Motors and Chrysler to tell the public their long-term plans, it followed it was bad for the Government of Canada to advise members of parliament of the details of some of its long-terms proposals.

I reject utterly that analogy and the logic which appears to underlie it. The parliament of Canada is not a private enterprise corporation, despite the best efforts of some members to turn it into one, and it does not follow that because private business would suffer if it told the world about its plans the government of Canada would suffer if the members of parliament who sustain it were advised of those programs in greater detail. In the first place, the government is not an object unto itself. It exists under sufferance of parliament and it cannot spend a cent unless members of parliament are prepared to vote it supply. I have argued consistently that in order to consider questions of supply intellingently it is necessary for members to be given more information than is available to them at the present time. It is not only fallacious reasoning but an unhealthy attitude to suggest that what is not good for General Motors is not good for the country.

Urban Affairs—Budget Forecast

The second point the hon. member for Labelle made on September 6 when commenting on my remarks was to this effect—that each and every member of parliament had the right, or the opportunity and advantage, as he put it, to participate in the sittings of the various committees at which, for example, the estimates of all the departments were considered. Obviously, we do have this opportunity, this advantage, and even this right. But my question is: how can this opportunity best be exploited? How can a member of parliament, whatever his party, best take advantage of that opportunity to ask questions intelligently and in the public interest concerning programs which the government is contemplating? It is not good enough to say there are committees which members can attend if they wish. I am concerned about this: what material will be made available from the vast archives of government to enable members to do their job effectively, not merely in party political terms, as is often the cases now, but in terms of reaching conclusions as to the inherent wisdom, or otherwise, of programs which the government is seeking to establish? It is my conviction that these program forecasts, of some version of them, would go a long way toward giving members of parliament necessary information which they do not presently possess.

The hon. member for Labelle went on to say that long-term programs of the various departments are not announced, and the fact they were not announced did not jeopardize the interests of Canadians. Canadians, he said, did not miss anything by being unaware of these long-term projects. Mr. Speaker, they may not miss anything if it is assumed that what you don't know won't hurt you. But it is a dangerous philosophy to assume in the process of government that what the people don't know won't hurt them. It might very well hurt them grievously at some time in the future. To say Canadians are not missing anything by being unaware of long-term government plans is nonsense. It is the responsibility of members of parliament to ensure that the government does not take steps which might have deleterious results. Again I say that the information provided in the program forecasts could go a long way to enabling members to discharge this fundamental responsibility more effectively.

I have suggested on earlier occasions that governments of whatever political stripe tend to assume that almost any document prepared by the public service is confidential, unless specifically designed for public consumption, and contains information which ordinary mortals ought not to be allowed to play with. Thus when a notice of motion is presented in this House we are given the reply, as has been the case concerning my notices of motion, that these are internal documents of a confidential nature and therefore cannot be tabled. That is the end of it. Who says they are of a confidential nature? This is said by the government which does not want to release the documents. Therefore, we are engaged in a circular piece of reasoning. The government does not release the documents because it declares them to be confidential and it declares them to be confidential because it does not want them released. I say we have been given no substantive criterion for the basis on which documents prepared in the government service, or task force reports undertaken at the request of the government, should be either released or retained in private.

I am worried about the assumption which I believe was implicit in the remarks of government spokesmen in the past that if you give members of parliament too much information they will cause damage with it or if you give them too much information they will be up to some mischief. The result is that this is a very pessimistic and unnecessary judgment of human nature. I, perhaps, am overly naïve as a new member of this House, but it is just possible that if members of parliament were given more material on which to base their contributions in these committee meetings, they would be more objective and therefore would be less the product of partisan political judgments upon which, in the absence of real material to base a case, a member must fall back. I suggest to the government that it may very well be in its long-run interest to be a little less stingy with papers prepared by the public service.

I suggest it would be very useful if the government were to re-examine its entire policy in this regard and take a look at the basis upon which it is denying the House documents which have gone into the formulation of its policies. It should ask itself seriously whether every piece of paper in the ministry must be stamped "confidential". Other jurisdictions have operated with a very great degree of latitude in respect of the publication of internal documents and have survived. We know for a fact in two jurisdictions I have examined, namely Switzerland and Sweden, a far more, if I may use the term, liberal attitude toward publication of papers has prevailed for some time. It may or may not be coincidental that the government of Sweden which introduced this policy has managed to survive in office for 40 years, although I concede it is in a very close situation at the present time.

It is part of the underlying philosophy of the creation of public policy in Switzerland that the citizens of that republic shall be provided with all the information necessary to come to an educated conclusion about protecting government policy which is not directly amenable to the interest of maximum security. In the case specifically of the Department of Urban Affairs, I may note that the production of some more material would have been particularly useful in permitting members to come to some conclusions concerning the very extensive amendments to the National Housing Act which were passed by this House. Some more useful light might have been shed upon the bill which passed this House a day or two ago. At a time when housing policy is undergoing massive re-evaluation right across the country at all levels of government, I think it would have been in the interest of creative public policy for the ministry of Housing and Urban Affairs to have given this House more background material than it did.

Indeed, I may say this comment might very well apply to the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and to the vast array of bureaucracy which administers federal housing policy. It is extremely difficult to find out precisely upon what criteria its conclusions are based. I think the public, on the whole, is not served by an obsession about privacy in the matter of public papers. I urge that the spokesman for the government reconsider what has been in the past an automatic and instinctive negative response to reasoned requests such as the one I make in my notice of motion for the production of papers.

[Mr. Grier.]

Mr. Ian Watson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore (Mr. Grier) is asking for the production of the 1973-74 program forecast for the Ministry of Urban Affairs so that by scrutinizing the A, B and X budgets of the ministry he will have more information than he feels he now has available to him. I have a great deal of sympathy with the member's desire for more information. Certainly, it is my feeling that over the longer run members of parliament must be furnished with more information on all aspects of government than we now have available to us, regardless of party. I can assure the hon. member, however, that there is no desire to keep him or any other member of the House uninformed about the important activities of the Ministry of State for Urban Affairs. An examination of the A, B and X budgets of the ministry would tell something about the ministry's program.

In the case of the Ministry of State for Urban Affairs the blue book, the main estimates, provides a very clear and concise picture of what the ministry is involved in. And I would remind the House that the minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Basford) was prepared to go before the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs this spring to explain, in detail, the activities of the ministry and the imaginative program it is evolving. Members of the committee, however, chose to study and debate other subjects.

I think we should recall at this juncture that the Ministry of State for Urban Affairs is just over two years old. It was created by proclamation of the House of Commons on July 10, 1971. It is a new ministry, with new activities and new staff, but it is making its mark on the urban situation in Canada. The ministry is, and intends to remain, a small, compact, highly responsive federal agency. And its budget for 1973-74 is not large by the standards of other departments, generally speaking. The estimated expenditures for 1973-74 are $17,020,000. It is very important that all of us have a very clear picture of what a policy ministry is, what it does and what its specific application is in the Ministry of State for Urban Affairs.

Ministries of state were, and are, intended to develop new, comprehensive and innovative federal policies in areas where such policies are of great urgency and importance. And I hardly need remind you how important urban Canada is for our society and our economy. Most of us live in cities. And the fortunes of most of us are decided by how our cities fare. The Ministry of State for Urban Affairs, then, has three major responsibilities. It is to formulate and develop policies by which the federal government can influence the urbanization process, urban growth if you will; it is to achieve the integration of urban policies with the other policies and programs of the federal government, and it is to develop co-operative relationships in urban matters with the provinces and through them with the municipalities, as well as with the public and private organizations.

The rounding out of that mandate has been well launched in the 24 months the ministry has been operating. The ministry is developing urban policy, it is conducting research into urban problems and it is developing co-operative and productive relationships with the provinces and their municipalities.

The ministry has three main functions. They are: Policy development, to initiate proposals for new policies and to evaluate existing policies; research, to provide substantive data and knowledge for policy development; and coordination, to implement urban policies by coordinating with federal departments, between the federal government and the provinces, and through them with their municipalities and with the private sector.

The establishment of the ministry is a response to a number of hard facts about Canadian life. First, the change and the rate of change from an agrarian to an industrial economy affects every person in Canada. The transformation from a rural to an urban society and the flight to the city affects the country from coast to coast and, explicitly or implicitly, involves all levels of government in urban problems.

Governments have tried to meet this challenge. The federal government has taken many useful initiatives, and has tried a number of imaginative programs. But, programs which are developed unilaterally or in isolation are never as effective as projects undertaken with collaboration and consultation. If we are to take hold of urban growth, consultation and coordination are imperative. The fault lies with our past inability to attack urban problems in concert and to see them as part of a nation-wide phenomenon. Urban affairs initiatives are changing this situation.

It is becoming increasingly obvious that all government programs inter-react. There is no such entity as a policy or program which does not influence or affect in some way other policies and programs. Better housing may or may not provide access to better jobs. Transportation networks affect the form of cities and the pattern of urban development. Housing, sewage disposal, water supply and transportation among other factors are almost completely interdependent and inter-related. Although cities and municipal institutions belong in the constitutional framework of the provinces, the federal government has a major impact on urban life through many programs. The federal government is also a major urban landowner and a major national urban employer. It is also a major property manager in our cities. It has obligations and responsibilities to every community in which it has an installation, a building or a facility.

The ministry was created to deal with these facts of life. It was established to bring a coordinated federal perspective to the meeting and guiding of urban change. It was established to seek out information and knowledge on urban issues and to discover how the urban system works and how it can be influenced beneficially. The ministry was established to initiate and to develop mechanisms to enable the three levels of government to work together rather than at odds or in disharmony.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I hesitate to interrupt the parliamentary secretary, as I realize that perhaps some outline of the responsibilities of the department would be helpful in considering the motion presented by the hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore (Mr. Grier). It does seem to me, however, that we are receiving a continuous report on the reasons for which the ministry was set up rather than a specific response to the request in the hon. member's motion. It is difficult motion for the Chair to understand, as I have not the slightest idea what budgets, A, B and X of the program forecast or program review by the minister are all about. Perhaps I could be enlightened on that point by the hon. parliamentary secretary.

Mr. Watson: Mr. Speaker, it is precisely in explaining the purposes of the budgets of the ministry that I am, in fact, detailing how the expenditures of moneys in Budgets A, B and X are to be directed. They are to be directed into these areas, and I feel that from the point of view of hon. members on both sides of the House it would be helpful to put on the record some of the precise objectives of the Ministry of State for Urban Affairs. I feel there is a general lack of knowledge among all members of parliament about these objectives and exactly what function is to be carried out.

Mr. McGrath: There is some lack of knowledge among government members as well.

Mr. Peters: If you would table the document, we could all read it and understand the situation.

Mr. Watson: As I indicated earlier, there is a need for the coordination of function in respect of the expenditures covered in these budgets and the details referred to in the request in this motion.

There are some 110 federal programs which have a direct impact on Canadian citizens and on the lives and well being of the people living in them. Federal transportation and communication systems, for example, have a major influence on the pattern of development in urban communities, and because of that as much as for any other reason the federal government must have the capability to understand and control the urban implications of its programs. Because federal policies interact with those of the provinces and local governments, the federal government must be prepared to work with and coordinate its policies and programs with those of the provinces and their municipalities in completely new and innovative ways.

Federal jurisdictional responsibilities are being taken into the cities to share with the provinces the task of devising and reformulating urban policies for Canada's emerging urban society. It is out of this situation that the commitment has emerged to build consultation between the three levels of government in order to face up to the problems of urbanization and urban growth. There are few urban problems that do not affect all three levels of government, and there are even fewer that do not interact with and react to others.

The mandate of the ministry charges it with building the coordinating and consulting mechanisms to deal with these inter-dependent factors of urban change and growth so that the decision-making processes of all three levels of government work in harmony and not at cross purposes.

Urban Affairs—Budget Forecast

In the first months of its mandate, the urban affairs ministry addressed itself to creating an effective organization, defining goals and strategies, setting priorities and initiating its functions. These tasks have been accomplished but they are subject to continuing review and adaptation to ensure a continuing effective response to urban issues. The question of goals and strategy is of particular importance to a policy ministry because that really is what its mandate is all about.

The question of what urban future or futures is the correct one for Canada has no easy answer. The urban affairs ministry and the minister are addressing themselves to the drafting of options for the urban future from which Canadians can make a choice. Approximately three-quarters of the Canadian population is now urbanized, and in less than 30 years this percentage will be over 90 per cent. Much of that growth will put the vast majority of Canadians within the perimeters of three or four large centres. The questions for us, and there are many, include the following: Should present urbanization trends be allowed to continue? What are the economic, social and political consequences of an almost totally urbanized population? What will happen to national unity and the national purpose? What will happen to the quality of urban life? There are no simple or fast answers to these questions. They involve personal values, priorities and what trade-offs we are willing to make to achieve a satisfactory urban future, but the ministry is tackling these and other policy issues.

The ministry began its existence with a strong sense of urgency in creating the kind of information and institutional response to enable the necessary accommodation to take place. That is the central direction of its policy development, research and coordinating functions. As I said earlier, the objective of this ministry is to lay the options in the budgets, which are in the motion, and which will be and are being directed toward a policy development, before us.

● (1730)

The efforts of the ministry are being directed toward the hiring of personnel for the preparation of long-term policies. The major emphasis in the policy is the development of long-term urban objectives. When elaborated, these will provide the focal points for the planning of urban strategies, policies and programs at the federal level and means of working out productive relationships with the provinces. Just as urban objectives will provide a basis for policy options over the longer term, a framework for urban strategy is being studied within the ministry to provide short-term working guidelines for the federal government over the next ten years.

There are other, more narrowly defined projects under way on policy development. These are projects which deal with specific and continuing sectoral issues. For example, transportation in urban centres is under study preparatory to a national trilevel consultation in Edmonton which will take place next month, and a measure to stimulate railway relocation, which was proposed last fall, will be introduced in the House. This program, as the minister has stated on a number of occasions, will have a major impact on urban centres in terms of what it will potentially be able to do in the way of rejuvenating core areas, opening up green spaces in the centre of cities and making available to cities land for housing, services and recreation facilities.

[Mr. Watson.]

The ministry is working on the policy implications of railway relocation as part of the necessary work-up of ideas prior to introduction of this measure. Practical experience on the issues involved in railway relocation is being gained through the trilevel committee in Winnipeg where railway relocation as envisaged by the federally-financed Winnipeg rail study is a major topic on the agenda of the trilevel action group.

A special task force within the policy branch of the ministry is analysing the short-range factors involved in municipal finance. This is another area that concerns a large number of members of parliament when we see the state of finances of most of our municipalities. Public concern over the availability and use of urban land has led to the initiation of a policy study of possible federal action in regard to federally-owned land, and an announcement on this can be expected in the near future.

The ministry is examining the development of policy proposals to guide the creation of new communities and the managing of the built-in environment in terms of scientific knowledge and technology. Policy development is especially concerned with preparations for the 1973 national trilevel consultation which takes place this fall. The first consultation was starting point. The second will, I am confident, get deeper into the more substantive issues of intergovernmental co-ordination and consultation on urban affairs policies. We are working with this in mind to prepare the federal position. I should note that the urban affairs ministry does not participate in these trilevel consultations by itself: it co-ordinates a federal team effort which includes a number of federal departments, namely, the Department of Transport, DREE, etc.

On the question of urban research, I would like to put on the record a few details. Research is a vital function of the ministry. The research program now under way is guided by certain prerequisites. It must be issue-oriented, it must have sound theoretical and analytical foundations, and it must be applicable to Canadian needs. The research projects have been grouped into a number of broad theme areas related to the scope of individual projects and to the central urban objectives of the ministry. These theme groups include: urban growth and demography, program impact indicators, technology and the environment, the core city, land and housing markets, urban environmental quality, urban government, urban public economy, and urban information and values and systems.

These groups are not meant to be exclusive or to indicate the limits of ministry research activities. Rather, they indicate the current work being undertaken and the more immediate demands for knowledge within the ministry. There are many individual projects within these broad fields. There is, for example, the $232,000 research contract with University of Toronto researchers to analyse the financial plight of Canadian cities. This is one of the ministry's largest external research contracts. We all know that there is more and more pressure on municipalities for more and better services and yet the municipal dollar keeps shrinking. We must find ways to provide more money for municipalities.

The study is examining a number of issues. First, the effects of federal and provincial grants on local expenditures. For instance, do provincial road grants encourage more rapid building of roads, or does the growth rate stay the same? What are the comparative effects of conditional versus unconditional grants? Second, the fiscal squeeze. Is the gap between revenues and expenditures caused by a conscious decision to improve services or by unavoidable increases in existing services?

Then there are a number of other items, such as the exploitation thesis. Do the suburbs take undue advantage of the cities by using their services without paying for them? There are also the new simulation models; the effects of transportation systems on land values and property tax revenues will be analysed and measured by the use of mathematical models. There is also zoning; the effect of zoning on the land market will be studied. For the information of hon. members, I may point out that the ministry is also studying the cost of providing public services in cities of different size, and it is delving into the demand for urban transportation to explore the transport arrangements for different land uses in cities.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but the time allotted to him, plus the allowance by the Chair for the point of order raised by the Chair, has expired.

Mr. Grier: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order to which you yourself referred a few moments ago. I deliberately waited until the parliamentary secretary had finished before doing so. It seems to me that the greater part of his speech—and this was the case with the greater part of the speeches on this subject two weeks ago—did not address itself in any clear way to the substance of the motion which is before the House. I would urge Your Honour to rule that stricter application of the rule of relevancy be applied to these debates, otherwise it will be possible for members of the government to avoid utterly or evade the central question at issue in these motions and spend the better part of this hour reading public relations documents prepared in their departments.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member anticipates what might be said by future participants in the debate. But this question is of some anxiety to the Chair. The hon. member has put forward a motion directed toward a specific objective. I think the argument should be on whether his motion should be accepted or refused, and reasons for either course being adopted should be put forward.

Mr. Watson: Mr. Speaker, I rise on the same point of order. I indicated at the very beginning of my remarks that I had complete sympathy for the hon. member's desire for information. In his motion he seeks information regarding not only this department but other departments. In discussing the motion in the House, I do not think it would be stretching your patience unduly, Mr. Speaker, if one were to go into some of the details of the information sought by the hon. member who proposed the motion. It seems to me that one of the objectives of the motion is to obtain more information, and this is what I have been attempting to provide.

It is all very well to refer to what I have just been saying as a public relations lecture. The fact is that there has not been very much information available to members of parliament regarding this ministry because the estimates were not brought before the committee last spring by a deliberate decision of the committee on health and welfare which wanted to debate something else.

● (1740)

Therefore, this has really been one of the first opportunities to make this information available to hon. members. I would hope that the hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore (Mr. Grier) would be appreciative of our effort to supply more information here. I sympathize with his desire for more information. I am one who also is desirous of there being more information for all of us. In speaking today I attempted to make more information available to the House.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Before the parliamentary secretary, the hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore (Mr. Grier) and the Chair itself, for that matter, get further involved I would recognize the point that this issue is before a committee. I will put it on record now. I quote from Votes and Proceedings for March 29 as follows:

—document entitled "Notices of Motion for the Production of Papers", tabled March 15, 1973, referred to the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments.

I hope members of that committee will consider the difficulties that the hon. member and the parliamentary secretary, along with the Chair, found in just how to proceed properly with the debate. Now perhaps the three of us can rest on our oars and see what the next contributor brings forth.

Mr. Douglas Stewart (Okanagan-Kootenay): Mr. Speaker, I rather regret that you had to put your admonition in exactly those terms so that I might be singled out to be solely relevant, which is always what I intended to be and, hopefully, will be. Unfortunately, I cannot give any other guidance on budgets A, B and X.

I hope that in due course we will have better information as sought by the hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore (Mr. Grier). However, after coalescing a great deal of material and much research, I do wish to indicate some of my impressions to the hon. member who put forward the motion, particularly on the reference to a forecast of the departmental programs, and I also wish to give a brief review of what the Department of Urban Affairs has accomplished. I believe, Mr. Speaker, you will find that what I am about to say is relevant and I trust that if you deem otherwise you will draw it to my attention.

Frankly, I welcome the opportunity to participate in this debate, for one very important reason. That is, to remind hon. members that urban problems and urban issues with which the Ministry of State for Urban Affairs is grappling are not of concern to Canada alone. Indeed, the problems of urban growth evoke universal concern because, whatever form they take, they are present in every county of the world.

At this point I should like to remind the House that Canadians will be hosts in 1976 for one of the most important United Nations conferences ever held. I refer to the United Nations Conference and Exposition on Human Settlements which will be held in Vancouver from May 31 to June 11 of that year. Canada has the key role to play in making this conference and exposition a success. Hon. members will recall that on March 19 of this year the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Basford) informed the House that the conference and exposition would be the largest international conference ever staged in Canada. It is anticipated that some 4,000 participants from approximately 130 countries will be coming to this event.

The Ministry of State for Urban Affairs is responsible for developing and co-ordinating Canadian participation in the conference and exposition. The choice of this particular ministry to spearhead Canadian participation is indeed a wise one, and as my hon. friend from Laprairie (Mr. Watson) has just pointed out, the ministry has established and is strengthening those intergovernmental relationships which will be so necessary for the success of this United Nations event, which in my view ranks higher than the Stockholm Conference on the Human Environment in regard to its long-term significance for human progress. Obviously, the full co-operation of the provinces, of the municipalities and indeed of all Canadians will be needed to bring this particular conference and exposition through to a successful conclusion.

Canada will learn from this conference and exposition. Because urban growth is a universal phenomenon, and because urban growth issues are present in every nation, we can expect an outpouring of ideas, of talent, of communication, all of which will help us and the department, of course, as well as other countries, to meet this situation. Indeed, this event will offer Canada improved means of controlling and guiding its urban growth which threatens as well as promises so much. In turn, many Canadian initiatives and projects will be useful abroad.

I said that the Ministry of State for Urban Affairs was the correct choice to head Canadian participation. Let me briefly outline what it has been doing. Consultations and meetings have been held with the provinces and departmental officials have been in close contact with the staff of the United Nations Environmental Program to work out the myriad details connected with staging such an event. Last May the urban affairs ministry, on behalf of Canada, acted as host for a United Nations seminar which met in Vancouver to begin the arduous task of drafting the agenda for the discussions in 1976 and the criteria for the demonstration projects that will illustrate solutions to problems of human settlements. This seminar drew invited urban experts from over 30 countries. It is significant to note that for the first time East Germany took part in a United Nations consultation on the environment and that the Chinese People's Republic sent official observers.

Moreover, the countries represented were from both developed and developing regions. The experts also met with Mr. Maurice Strong, who is well known to all members of the House and to most Canadians and who is, of course, the executive director of the United Nations Environmental Program. They also met with his staff, with representatives of the Government of Canada, with staff of the United Nations Centre for Housing, Building and Planning, and with representatives of the United Nations economic commissions. This seminar of experts was chaired by Lady Robert Jackson, better known to hon. members as Barbara Ward. Lady Jackson is indefatigable in her efforts to gain world recognition of the crisis posed by urban growth, and her presence and vital leadership injected the experts' seminar with a sense of urgency which this challenge demands. This same sense of urgency underlines the programs of the Ministry of State for Urban Affairs as it attempts to grapple with the many complex issues which constitute the urban growth challenge in this country of ours.

Just recently, in the Montreal Star, a Reuters dispatch reported that city life in Japan would collapse totally if current migration to urban areas continued unabated for another decade. Japan's economic planning agency has urged emergency measures to head off this catastrophe. Among its suggestions is one calling for removal of the capital from Tokyo. The planning agency has predicted that if present trends continue, living conditions in Japan's cities will be miserable by 1985. The housing shortage will be even more acute. Pollution will be much worse. Traffic jams will be monumental. Garbage will start to pile up in the streets. Water will be in short supply. This refers to Japan, not Canada, Mr. Speaker. But the same problems, of lesser degree, also challenge Canadian governments. That is why the Ministry of State for Urban Affairs has shaped its policy and research program to attack these problems and to support the policies and strategies of the provinces in attacking them also.

The urban experts at the United Nations seminar in Vancouver chose six tentative themes for the conference and exposition. But as they themselves recognized, the six overlap because the problems of human settlements are the problems of urbanization, of the continuing process of urban growth. They overlap; they contain elements of each other. They cannot be separated because what we are dealing with throughout the world and what the urban affairs ministry is tackling here in Canada is the question of how people can live better in the built-in environment—better, not just in physical terms, in terms of health, but in terms of cultural and social and other expectations. The dimensions of the problem were fully recognized by the experts, Mr. Speaker, as they are by the urban affairs ministry.

Urban settlements are growing at twice the rate of present world population growth. With that rate of growth, problems inevitably grow at an increasingly faster rate. One can hardly fail to recognize that the one, single challenge that unites all nations is how to improve the human environment. The shift from a rural to an urbanized society is world wide. Overcrowding, pollution, hard-pressed facilities are common to urban communities throughout the world. But the real difference is one of degree not of kind.

In the next 25 years, we have been warned, our urban society will be confronted with pressures of greater degree than ever before in human history. "Vancouver '76" is being held by the United Nations because of those pressures, Mr. Speaker. But the problems and the conference-exposition, provide an opportunity for all nations to join together to overcome the problems of urban growth, to meet them with tested responses, to guide growth by policies and programs that have been proven effective.

Mr. Speaker, I trust that hon. members will agree when I say that Canada has a great opportunity to give world leadership in the fight to guide urban growth beneficially. That leadership has been entrusted to the right minister and to the right federal agency, because the Ministry of State for Urban Affairs is at the centre of our attempts to control urban growth. It is the focal point for federal urban policy. And, through the 1976 conference and exposition, initiatives will be made available to other nations as well.

I thank you, Mr. Speaker, the mover of the motion, the hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore, and other members of the House for the indulgence afforded me. I trust that in every instance, Mr. Speaker, you have found my remarks to be relevant.

Mr. Charles Turner (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, Canadians are a mobile people. We have a lot of ground to cover and we travel about this land of ours at an amazing rate. National transportation policy is not the concern of the Ministry of State for Urban Affairs, but policies affecting transportation matters in urban areas are definitely within the jurisdiction of the ministry. The ministry is acting on them.

As my hon. friend from Laprairie (Mr. Watson) has pointed out, transportation is one of those urban elements which interact with other elements such as housing. The ministry recognizes this interconnection among urban issues and factors, and that recognition underlies its response to urban growth. The realities of urban transportation are all around us. I shall start with a few statistics, not to impress or to avoid getting into the topic but to set out, first of all, the scale of the problem of best formulating federal transportation initiatives for Canada's urban communities.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I have listened very carefully to the last couple of speeches. While they stuck fairly closely to housing and the responsibility of the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Basford), I suggest that the present speaker, when talking about transportation, is not referring to budgets A, B and X. He is giving a mild lecture to the House, and that is not the purpose of asking for the production of papers. There may be a reason why budgets A, B and X cannot be presented to the House, but I suggest no substitute is going to be the policy as outlined by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Turner).

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The Chair continues to be in difficulty. I am still not clear in my mind about this, and if I had been perhaps I would have ruled more forcefully. With regard to the program forecast of the Ministry of State for Urban Affairs, the Chair has no knowledge whether budgets A, B and X concern only the operations of the department itself or whether what is involved is an overview of the various aspects of the urban problem.

The hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) certainly has a point: the issue that was presented to us this afternoon was whether certain information should be put on the desks of hon. members or should be kept in government filing cabinets. This, as he says, has not been made clear.

It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock tonight.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

PAROLE ACT

APPOINTMENT OF ADDITIONAL AD HOC MEMBERS TO NATIONAL PAROLE BOARD

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Allmand that Bill C-197, to amend the Parole Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, Bill C-191, an act to amend the Parole Act, will give the governor in council the right to appoint not more than ten additional ad hoc members to the National Parole Board. The hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt) this afternoon set out the position of the NDP on this bill in a clear, concise and convincing way and I will not add much this evening to what he said.

Parole plays an important role in the criminal justice system. It is therefore necessary, after a person commits a criminal offence and is confined to an institution, for us to have the tools to reform, and rehabilitate him, to turn him into a law-abiding citizen and a socially useful person. We must therefore make sure that our parole system is understood not only by the parolee, by the prison inmate and by the prison official, but by judges and by the public. Our experience of the past year has brought about some public criticism which in many cases has been warranted. Nevertheless, the over-all picture with regard to parole in Canada has been good and the results obtained have been good.

As I said to the minister previously, we have almost completed our studies and researches into problems of parole. We have been given the Ouimet report and the Hugessen report. There has also been the study by the Senate of the parole system. As the minister pointed out, the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs of this House has also been studying certain institutions and the parole of offenders. Also, an ombudsman has been appointed to look into grievances of inmates.

I think the time has come for the study and research to stop and for legislation that will deal with this important problem to be developed. I and the members of the NDP would like to see this bill passed tonight. We want it referred to the Committee of the Whole House so it can be completed and we can appoint the ten additional ad hoc members to the board and begin developing the structure that we hope to develop.

The Canadian Criminology and Corrections Association, in a brief on the parole system, set out the value of parole. I shall read some paragraphs from the brief as follows:

> Parole offers many advantages to both society and the offender:
>
> 1) The offender is released from prison when he is psychologically and socially ready; this increases the chances of his successful adaptation to the free community. If this period is allowed to pass without his release he may deteriorate and his chances of success diminish.
>
> 2) The knowledge that parole may be available gives the inmate a sense of hope, and encourages him to make the adjustments in his attitudes and patterns of behaviour that are necessary if he is to be successful after release. Such a positive stance on his part will help him and also contribute to a better prison program.
> 3) The fact that society has expressed confidence in him and the fact that he has agreed to the conditions of his parole give him maximum encouragement in his efforts to re-establish himself in the free community.
> 4) The offender is enabled to reassume his family and community responsibilities with a minimum of separation. The longer the period of separation, the more difficult the roles of parent and citizen become.
>
> 5) The assistance given by the parole supervisor aids the offender's chances of successful adjustment in the free community.
> 6) Parole offers considerable financial saving over incarceration.

The brief continues:

> There are, of course, risks in releasing offenders on parole. However, there are risks in any program for offenders. The short-term risks of parole are calculated risks over which there is some measure of control. The risks involved in keeping the offender in prison too long, thus robbing him of hope, self-confidence and initiative before turning him free without assistance in making the adjustment, are greater in most cases.

The association is saying, I think, that we must exercise more control over the matter of parole. As well, we must help the parolee to adjust to living in the community, help him with employment and help him to change his attitude not only toward himself but toward other people. I heard the hon. member for Scarborough East (Mr. Stackhouse) speak this afternoon on this bill on behalf of the Conservative Party. I thought he took a negative approach and I came to the conclusion that in many ways he would like to see people incarcerated and the key thrown away. That may have been the sixteenth century approach but it does not fulfil the needs of the twentieth century.

An hon. Member: He is a clergyman, too.

Mr. Gilbert: I certainly hope that the attitude of the Conservative Party changes in this regard. In presenting his argument, the hon. member for Scarborough East referred to a long list of unsuccessful cases and thereby tried to create an emotion of fear rather than one of confidence in people. It is also necessary, I submit, to set out a list of successful cases in the field of parole. After all, we are dealing with human beings and human beings must be treated humanly if we expect them to take their rightful place in society.

[Mr. Gilbert.]

● (2010)

I wish to point out to the minister the necessity of dealing in a proper manner with young offenders. The young offenders bill was presented to this House but it was defeated in committee. Many members, both on this side and on the government side, were happy to see it defeated because it did not embrace the necessary philosophy with regard to the treatment of young offenders.

Mr. Allmand: There will be a new bill soon.

Mr. Gilbert: Since that bill was defeated there has been very little action by the government in drafting a bill which would meet the requirements of the situation.

Mr. Allmand: The new bill is almost ready.

Mr. Gilbert: I am happy to hear the minister say that the new bill is almost ready. Whether we have a new bill or not, I think the minister will agree that we need the necessary psychiatric, psychological and related services for the treatment of young offenders. This is the requirement of a successful piece of legislation concerning young offenders. We must change the attitudes and ways of persons when they are young if we are to avoid problems when they are older.

The record of convictions and incarcerations up until 1970 showed a decreasing trend in the number of persons committed to institutions. Since 1970 there has been an increase in the number of inmates, without the necessary institutions and facilities to handle the increase. The Ouimet report pointed out that Canada makes excessive use of the present system for the treatment of offenders. We now have one of the highest prison populations we have ever experienced. Therefore, it is necessary that we use the instrument of parole with regard to the treatment of these offenders.

The hon. member for New Westminster capably pointed out this afternoon that it is a myth to think we are going to reform and rehabilitate men in prison. The high rate of recidivism points in the opposite direction. This is sad and disappointing. That does not mean our institutions should be places of mere incarceration. We should continue to attempt to provide training and educational facilities in these institutions, but we should place greater emphasis on parole.

European countries have used with great success the parole approach to the treatment of offenders. We have only begun to do this in Canada. We have had the usual setbacks of a new system. I hope we will have a twofold approach, not only to improve the situation with regard to rehabilitation and reformation within the institutions but to improve and strengthen the parole system. There are many comments and criticisms with regard to parole because we have to make humane decisions when dealing with human beings. We shall make mistakes; however, I hope this will never stop the trend toward reformation and rehabilitation. To go back to mere incarceration, putting people in prison and throwing away the key, certainly is not the right approach.

We agree that the ad hoc members should be appointed on a regional basis. Setting up regional boards is a good idea. For the past few years, applications have been dealt with by the parole board without the presence of the inmate concerned. The minister assured us this afternoon that, with the additional members, the board will go to the prisons and inmates will be given the right to present their cases for parole. This is a step in the right direction; it will strengthen the structure.

The minister also stated that judges will be appointed to the regional parole boards because of their wide experience in the field. I notice there is quite a difference with regard to the panel system that will be used. The Hugessen report recommends a certain number coming from certain fields; the Canadian Criminology and Corrections Association makes another recommendation.

I hope that in short order the minister will bring in legislation which will improve and strengthen the parole system in Canada. We support this bill. We hope it will be dealt with in committee of the whole this evening, and completed, so that this necessary part of the parole system can be commenced.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): The hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard).

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, my colleagues may not be quite so generous in their applause when they hear what I have to say. We must approach matters of this nature, not with opinions developed from the majority rule concept, as is often the case in caucus meetings of all parties, but from the point of view of what an individual possesses. I do not think there is any great difference of opinion in substance about what we are trying to advocate. There may be differences in terms of the technique of reaching the socially desirable objective, namely, ensuring that society and government agencies do all that is possible with regard to reformation and rehabilitation of those who run afoul of the law and end up in a penitentiary.

There are cases of individuals who are psychotic being sent to prison. I never did understand the term. But as I conceive it, it refers to those completely out of touch with the realities of life and with no concern or responsibility toward anyone except themselves. I agree there are some in that category who should never be let out of an institution, whether it be a penal institution, a mental institution or some other type of confinement, because they are a detriment to society and to themselves.

An hon. Member: Who decides that?

Mr. Howard: If we could find a person with the wisdom and majesty to decide that, we would not need government institutions or institutions of any other kind. That person would be a messiah. However, there is no one person who could do that. Through our political and government systems, society has decided that we require institutions. We have laws. When someone offends against those laws, the courts, or the medical profession if it is a question of certifiable insanity, can commit that person to an institution.

● (2020)

Somebody within the structure has an obligation to make a decision of that kind. Mistakes are bound to be made, just as they are bound to be made by the people to whom parliament has given authority to grant parole. But the objective we have in mind, and which we must have in mind, is that of assisting our fellow man and helping him to the fullest extent we can. Whether we use the term "rehabilitation" or some other term in this context is not particularly material.

I look upon this bill as being a small step. That has been said before. But I think it is a small step in the wrong direction. I think it is leading away from the type of policy which should be available to help people in our institutions to overcome their difficulties. The history of parole and the granting of parole from the time the parole board was set up and the original act was passed in 1958 has been one of groping and fumbling and missing the point.

I well remember the speech made by the minister of justice in 1958 or 1959 when the Parole Act was established. The minister of justice, Mr. Fulton at that time, spoke extensively about the mechanics of the old system of parole and what was conceived to be the new system being introduced. He made a lengthy, detailed and involved speech about the new bill and what it contained. But he missed one point, and when this was brought to his attention later he agreed he had missed it. He ignored the question of rehabilitation entirely. He ignored the question of what happens to an individual after he has been given parole; what happens when he gets out on the street and moves into the mainstream of society. He completely failed to deal with this point. The government of that day had no concept of what would happen to a person after he got out of a penitentiary, whether on parole or at the conclusion of sentence, and this aspect was never kept in mind while the Parole Act was being developed. This gave rise to a difficulty which has faced successive governments and ministers, whether ministers of justice or solicitors general.

I believe it is better for the individual, better for society and better for the taxpayer if, taking into account the factors I mentioned earlier, an individual spends his time of sentence outside a penal institution rather than in it. Though it has been said so many times that it has become a cliché, I think we must continue to recognize a simple fact about penitentiary life, and it is that there is no rehabilitation inside a penitentiary. There are attempts to teach people trades, to teach them work skills. They are taught how to make a chair, how to stamp out licence plates, how to sew mailbags or perform a number of similar tasks. But nowhere is there any attempt made, nor can there be any attempt made inside a penitentiary, to teach a person how to keep a job. You can teach him how to do it, yes, but teaching him how to keep it, or how to lead a so-called straight life is another matter.

In any event, the purpose of a penitentiary is not rehabilitative but custodial. The end result of the criminal law is to keep a person in jail for the length of time for which a court has sent him there, subject, of course, to pardon or parole. That is the purpose—to make sure all the doors are locked and the count is right. Any time there is the least conflict between the desires of a correctional officer, who theoretically works in the area of rehabilitation, and a custodial officer, the custodial officer wins out. So it is better, I believe, for a person sentenced to jail to spend his time outside the institution in the mainstream of society whenever that is possible and as soon as that is possible.

There are instances when the best time to grant parole to a person who has been convicted of a crime and sentenced is on the very day he is sentenced. Again, this involves selection and correct decisions. Strange as it may seem, in certain cases of murder committed under the stress of emotion the best time to grant a parole is at the moment of sentence. I refer to crimes of passion, crimes of emotion, crimes which result from the discovery of family difficulties and a variety of other situations in which the person who commits the crime is not of criminal intellect nor of destructive intellect; he does not consciously or deliberately go out and commit a crime which might result in someone being murdered. It is a matter of a moment, something which could happen to anybody at a given time.

A person of that type should not, in my opinion, be required to spend a lifetime in jail. I do not like talking about statistics in this connection but, as has been stated by the chairman of the parole board, Mr. Street, any examination of a person at that time will show that the risk of his violating parole is nil.

Another point we should keep in mind is that every inmate who enters a penitentiary, even those serving indefinite sentences, so-called habitual criminals, will get out some time. The most obstinate, the most dangerous, the worst psychotic one can think of will get out some day. Our concern must be with the day he gets our and not, I submit, with setting up the mechanics of a structure such as this without being concerned about what happens when he does get out. I think the parole board is ill-suited in most cases to make that determination.

● (2030)

The parole board can make and has made decisions, generally speaking, in the most favourable of cases. The annual reports of the parole board indicate this in reference to the rise and fall of the number of paroles that are granted compared to the number of people who are eligible or apply for parole. Once the backlog of easy cases was dealt with, the parole board found it most difficult to deal with the granting of parole. The parole board also has been, to a measure, something of a jellyfish because when there has been an instance of a mistake on the part of the parole board in granting parole, and it has come to light, the reaction of the board has been to tighten up.

Probably the initial classic case of reference related to a fellow named Dionne who was imprisoned in St. Vincent de Paul penitentiary. He had been convicted of assault on a child from which death resulted. I think the charge was murder at that time.

Mrs. Morin: Rape.

Mr. Howard: He was granted parole. When he got out on parole he did the same thing all over again in two or three instances. He went back to jail. Not too long ago he was relieved of his difficulties; another inmate of the jail ended his life for him. In any event, when Dionne was on parole he committed further offences and there was a public hue and cry about the parole board having made a mistake. It had made a mistake and it admitted it. However, the parole board squeezed up into itself and said, "My heavens, we had better not do that again, not because we might make a similar mistake but because we had better wait for the public clamour to die down". As a consequence, the parole board did not fulfil its obligation and its authority under the Parole Act or the commitment parliament gave it.

What has happened since then? The minister says we need to expand the parole board by ten additional members partly because of the backlog of applications, partly because the parole board had discontinued its panel or subcommittee operation and partly because of the removal of the back-to-back temporary absences issued by wardens to prisoners. The change was necessary, so said the minister a while ago, because of legal difficulties. He said he received conflicting legal advice. If he received it from the Department of Justice, this is understandable. He received it from some government agency, I do not know which, so it is understandable that he received conflicting advice. As a matter of fact, if I ever had to take advice on a legal matter I certainly would not rely on the Department of Justice. However, the minister did receive conflicting legal advice. Perhaps he spoke to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang) on the one hand and the departmental officials on the other.

In any event, the minister said because of legal difficulties they had to discontinue the back-to-back temporary absence system. He said it was a good system and had operated well. I think it was good, because the decision was made at the institutional level by individuals who were closer to the inmates on a day to day basis than any parole board could possibly be. Because it was discontinued, and because the back-to-back temporary absence is to be replaced by day parole, which is an authority given under the Parole Act, it is necessary to expand the Parole board to ten additional, ad hoc members. I submit to the minister that if he did receive conflicting legal opinion concerning whether or not he had the legal right under the Penitentiary Act to issue back-to-back temporary absences, he should have brought in a bill to amend the Penitentiary Act to make clear that that type of authority would be available to the directors.

In his mind, if he thought it was necessary to discontinue the back-to-back temporary absences, and instead say to the parole board that it could do the same sort of things through day parole, I submit he should have brought in an amendment to the Penitentiary Act to say so, and not attempt to deal with that situation by increasing the membership of the parole board and increasing the bureaucracy within the board's structure. Quite frankly, I do not think this is necessary. If the members of the parole board were—I was going to say "conscientious" but I am sure they are—assiduous, dedicated and determined about the question of parole, there would be no need to increase the board to 19 members.

The parole board started in 1958 with five members. Let us take a quick look at the statistical analysis of the operations of the board over the years from 1958 to 1968 or 1969 when it had five members. These figures fluctuate from year to year, and this is understandable because of the different inmate populations. In some cases there was an automatic review of parole cases, in other instances individuals applied, and so on. So without relating the year to year fluctuations to the numbers of people granted or applying for parole and the percentage of success or failure—whichever way one looks at it—there is a fairly consistent pattern.

The number of people who applied for parole over that period of time had a general ratio to the total inmate population in the country. It ranged around 6,000 to 7,000 with an average—by looking quickly at the figures—of probably 7,000 plus applications for parole. Of those who applied over that period, the number granted ranged around 2,000: it fluctuates from year to year. The annual reports of the parole board relate figures in two ways. They relate them in terms of success and sometimes in terms of the failure rate. Later on the board became more euphemistic about it and called it a success rate. It can be stated either way, it does not matter.

In those years, as today, the failure rate was 8 per cent, 9 per cent, 10 per cent or something of that sort. When they changed the reference and called it the success rate, we find there was 88.8 per cent or 90 per cent success, with a 10 per cent failure rate. Generally speaking, that ratio was standard over those years.

In 1969 somebody concluded that five members on the parole board was not sufficient, so the number was increased to nine. Parliament endorsed this change and I was one of those who supported it. One of the arguments given to support the increase to nine was that the chairman of the parole board had the authority to divide the members into panels or committees of not less than two and the panels would have the authority to grant parole on the spot. The theory was that they would meet in the institutions, review the applications, consider the records, listen to the opinions of the warden and the RCM Police, check over the fellow's history of attempts to present himself favourably to the institutional authorities, and then have an interview with the inmate.

Quite frankly, I think these interviews were nothing more than window-dressing. I do not see how two people could sit down for 15 minutes with somebody they had never seen before, but who had been preparing himself for weeks for the occasion, and come up with an assessment as to whether he would be a good prospect, or otherwise, for parole. Such an individual would indicate what he hoped and planned to do, giving an indication that he had a job and perhaps even name the employer. In any event, that was the reasoning behind it.

There was some value in that idea in that decisions could be, and were, made on the spot. There was a bit of an increase in the number of people who applied for parole under that arrangement, and a substantial increase in the number of paroles granted. The success rate remained about the same, 90 per cent, and the failure rate was about the same, being 10 per cent or something of that nature.

I understand that the chairman of the parole board has discontinued this panel system, or perhaps it was the minister who did so. It is my information that it was the chairman. For the sake of those who may eventually read this debate, those words were in response to the nodding and shaking of the head by the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand). The chairman of the parole board discontinued the panel system and said to the two-member committees or panels that were out visiting inmates in institutions that they should come back to Ottawa, consolidate and centralize, and he would then go to the minister and tell him the workload was too heavy. I suppose he expected then to have more members to divide into groups of two under the panel system and would thus be able to increase the staff surrounding the additional members, thereby increasing his kingdom or the size of his bureaucracy. That is what is happening.

As I stand here the percentage of paroles granted to those who have applied will not be any greater than it was in previous years, and the success or failure rate will not be any different. The rehabilitation prospects will remain identical. What has happened to our concern for what happens to the individual once he gets out on the street? I know quite a number of people in my own area who have been or are now out on parole.

Somewhere in one of the annual reports of the parole board there is a graph that indicates the location of various parole officers. There is one in the city of Prince George who has the responsibility of looking after about 250,000 square miles of territory. That is an area within which you could put the four Atlantic provinces two or three times over. That man has no relationship whatever with the people on parole. If a man on parole has a difficulty or some emotional uptightness and does not know what to do about it, who does he turn to? Does he phone 400 or 600 miles to talk to the parole officer in Prince George? He might just as well have a tape-recorder with him that he can turn on when he wants to talk to somebody. The parole officer's voice might come out of it telling him that everything is fine.

A man in that situation does not have any measure of assistance, help or guidance from the parole officer. He is on his own. I am not the least bit disposed to support the idea of increasing the number of members of the parole board just for the convenience or the desire of the chairman to increase this bureaucratic entity. There should be some effort to find probation officers and people in the community who will work on a voluntary basis—and they are there—and sit down with these people on parole and talk over their emotional problems. This would do a great deal toward reducing the 10 per cent failure rate.

There is another disadvantage to the parole officer structure. As I understand it, under the Parole Act a parole officer is a police officer. Many people who are on parole just do not want to sit down and talk with a policeman when they have an emotional problem. They look at their parole officer as someone who might turn them in if he thinks they have done something wrong. These people feel a parole officer is someone who might turn them over to the authorities if he thinks they are associating with the wrong people, that they are drinking too much, or if he thinks an individual is suffering some emotional turmoil and might crack and commit another crime. They think he is someone who might turn them into the authorities if, as is the case in respect of 40 per cent or 50 per cent of the inmate population of penitentiaries in British Columbia, he thinks they might take another fix of heroin to get them over some tough emotional period. That is a criminal offence and such a parolee would be sent back to prison, so there is reluctance on the part of the individual to talk to the parole officer.

Just as Davie Fulton, a former member of the Conservative government, missed the boat entirely when the parole board was set up in 1958, I think this minister is missing the boat entirely when he talks about the establishment of a super-structured parole board which is ill-equipped and ill-suited to make the decisions it must make or, what is even worse, to follow them up after an individual gets out of jail. This should be our prime concern, and that is why I said at the outset there is no difference of opinion among members of this House as to the need to stress rehabilitation. This idea has been expressed to the point that it has become almost a joke, or meaningless.

In any event, our concern must be in respect of rehabilitation. We must be concerned about helping these individuals get over the rough spots. Our concern must be to try to cut down the incidence of criminality. Our concern must be to try to cut down the incidence of violence, to cut down the incidence of robberies and all the other crimes that take place which result in people being sentenced to the penitentiary. But I think, quite seriously, that we are headed in exactly the same direction as when we started out in 1958, not helping one bit except to add to the bureaucratic structure. In this way the objective and the goal of rehabilitating the individual will receive scant consideration.

To take another approach to the matter, in terms of security I believe there should be gradations of institutions so that individuals who are considered to be tough, incorrigible, unable to conform, unreliable, desirous of only engaging in criminal activities, who are housed in a maximum security institution or a super-maximum security institution, would not be offered the opportunity for parole which is available to those who are housed in other institutions. The other penitentiaries in different types of classifications moving downward are called medium security or minimum security institutions. They have living accommodation quarters or home-living style activity. We have community homes. Halfway houses are not part of the penitentiary structure. If you walked by those community homes you would not know they were penitentiaries. People go out of them to work, to go to school or to engage in some type of activity, and they come back to the institution at night. There is a guidance counsellor around.

If an individual wants to spend the rest of his life in jail, he should be faced with this prospect, and if he wants to stay within the institutional structure until he has served his time, he should be kept in the so-called maximum or hard-line institution. His function there should be to work, work, work. There should be no meanness, no cruelty, no starvation, no lash, the paddle or anything degrading to the individual—just good, old-fashioned work. Then, if he wants to embark upon the road that leads toward rehabilitation, toward parole, toward temporary release, all of which lead toward a variety of other things—and it must be his choice—he should work his way, not by escaping out of that maximum institution, into other types of institutions and move toward rehabilitation. However, he must be faced with that prospect.

I do not believe in the idea of giving parole opportunities to everybody theoretically, in every type of institution, nor do I believe in granting temporary releases right across the board. But I do believe in some type of meaningful attraction being offered to the individual, so that if he wants to make a go of it then the facilities of the parole board are there to help him all the way, not only in parole being granted in the first place but in offering him assistance after he gets out—and that is the most important aspect.

Until the minister, the government and society in general are able to accept that concept and work toward it, all this is window-dressing which permits a debate to take place in the House about these matters and allows an expansion of a bureaucratic structure with nothing meaningful coming out of it at the end.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I feel the minister is on the right track in wishing to increase the number of members of the parole board. This brings me to my first point, and I will not speak at great length. I wanted to differentiate between the history of the parole board and the history of the temporary release program.

First, I want to quote from the Penitentiary Act because I believe it was misinterpreted at the time the former solicitor general held this portfolio, now the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer). I do not blame him personally for that, and I never did at that time. Apparently he listened to a group of people who had a different interpretation of the act than was formerly the case. I agree with the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) that the act was incorrectly interpreted and that it was misused. I want to point out that in my opinion the mistakes were not made by the parole board but, rather, as a result of ad hoc decisions under the temporary release program, for which of course the Solicitor General must take full responsibility.

I wish to quote from the Penitentiary Act, which is found in chapter 6 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1970, at page 12, section 26. This is the section under which the Department of the Solicitor General operated the temporary release program. I, as well as many lawyers across the country, including bar associations, believe that the back-to-back temporary release program under the act was misinterpreted and misused by the department. Section 26 reads:

> Where, in the opinion of the commissioner or the officer in charge of a penitentiary, it is necessary or desirable that an inmate should be absent, with or without escort—

I will have something to say about the words "with or without escort".

> —for medical or humanitarian reasons or to assist in the rehabilitation of the inmate, the absence may be authorized from time to time.

The grounds, in that section of the act, are medical or humanitarian reasons. Medical reasons do not need any explanation. If the inmate becomes sick and needs medical attention in a hospital, such as surgery or some other kind of attention, then the commissioner or officer in charge can sign a document for his temporary release and he can be removed to the hospital. I might say in passing that I had cases of applications being made years before the act was misused, misjudged and misinterpreted. The other ground is humanitarian reasons. We know what they are. I can give you one example of a man who was incarcerated for seven years for armed robbery. He was a family man. His seven year-old girl had played with other children with whom she started a bonfire, as a result of which a fire started and in the accident she died. We made application to the attorney general and the inmate was released to attend the girl's funeral. Those are humanitarian grounds and they are justifiable. I hope we will always have such a law.

Then we should consider the rehabilitation of the inmate. I do not think it was ever intended that an inmate should be released under the temporary release program for the purpose of rehabilitation at a time in Canada when we have abolished capital punishment not only de jure but de facto. We had abolished it by law. Of course, that law has now lapsed and the bill to reinstate it is awaiting third reading. We abolished capital punishment except where a person was found guilty of intentionally killing a police officer or a prison guard. But even during the five-year abolition period all those people who had been found guilty of such murders—I could name them—and who went through the due process of law—trial, Court of Appeal and the Supreme Court of Canada—had their death sentences commuted to life imprisonment. Recently we saw the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) on television when he appeared at the Liberal party convention. He was asked about this situation and he said that every case was decided on its own merits. But, Mr. Speaker, I stress that all sentences were commuted to life imprisonment. That is de facto abolition.

I hope the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) does not want to get involved in this. He is a rather talkative man.

Mr. Lalonde: The same thing happened under Diefenbaker.

Mr. Woolliams: Do you want me to name the cases where they did go to the gallows?

Mr. Lalonde: Not under Diefenbaker.

Mr. Woolliams: Yes. Mr. Speaker, I can tell you of one in Calgary. The death took place on Scarborough Avenue, at Scarborough United Church, where a man beat a girl to death with a Coke bottle. The man went to the gallows. But I did not come here to defend Mr. Diefenbaker or discuss his government. Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman who is trying to heckle me was the executive assistant to a former minister of justice and he should have special knowledge of these matters.

Returning to the question of rehabilitation, I say that this section of the act was never intended for people who were sentenced to life imprisonment or had their death sentences commuted to life imprisonment. At the time Right Hon. Lester B. Pearson was prime minister this section was in force. It provides:

> Notwithstanding any other law or authority, a person in respect of whom a sentence of death has been commuted to imprisonment for life or a term of imprisonment or a person upon whom a sentence of imprisonment for life has been imposed as a minimum punishment, shall not be released during his life or such term, as the case may be, without the prior approval of the governor in council.

So when section 26 is used it flaunts section 684(3) of the Criminal Code. I will deal with the Geoffroy case in a few moments. We also had the Head case, and another one that did not have any publicity, the Swearngen case. These men were found guilty of murder and given life imprisonment. In the case of the latter two it was not the parole board that was to blame. These people committed other crimes when they were out on temporary release. This is why I asked a question today about the chap in Prince Albert who some years ago was found guilty of killing a young boy. Recently he was given a temporary release, and now has escaped. I believe he is in a certain area, which I will not name, in western Canada. To date he has not been rearrested.

The point I wish to make is to raise a defence for the parole board. People have failed to differentiate between inmates on temporary release under section 26, whether legally or illegally enjoying that freedom, and people who are out on parole. Basically, the history of the parole board is good.

The first step we should take is to provide enough parole officers and more psychiatrists so that the proper documentation comes before local parole boards in order to minimize the risk of improper decisions being made. Any minister who must take responsibility for these things is sitting on a keg of dynamite when such decisions are made on an ad hoc basis by a local board with an officer in charge. I will give some examples. The parole board did not let Mr. Geoffroy out. He was found guilty of murdering his wife. He was in jail only a few months when he obtained a temporary release. On what grounds did he get that release? He was not sick. Surely it wasn't for humanitarian reasons. I do not know if it was necessary for rehabilitation.

I repeat that he was found guilty of murdering his wife. That might be a crime of passion, such as my hon. friend from Skeena (Mr. Howard) talks about. But there was another lady involved. There often is in such matters. How deeply she was involved is another question. I have some tapes in my office that would be worth listening to; I keep them there. She was involved with this man prior to the death of his wife. He applied for a temporary release, not because he was sick, not on humanitarian grounds, and surely not because of rehabilitation. He said he wanted to marry a particular woman. I quote the following from Hansard of February 21, 1972, the words of the then solicitor general:

> On June 28, 1971, Mr. Geoffroy sought permission to marry Miss Carmen Parent with whom Mr. Geoffroy apparently had had a continuing liaison.

I don't know what kind of continuing liaison, but people can use their imagination.

> The reason he cited to support his request was that marriage would provide a mother who would look after the needs of his three children—

I do not think for one moment that the then minister wrote those words. Somebody in his department wrote them, and he read them. He was led to the slaughter. If this was a genuine case, why was it not examined properly? Then the truth about the custody of this man's children would have been known. If everything had been above board then surely a man, once he married while out on parole, would not have headed off to Spain and deserted the children.

That is the point I am trying to make with respect to decisions made on an ad hoc basis. I am not blaming the commissioner or the officers in charge. How were they to know who should be released? That is why local parole boards must be provided with proper screening and proper documentation. In that way the risk would be minimized. I believe that some day this case will be written-up in True magazine. It might even make Playboy because it's a joke.

My hon. friend from Skeena said we should not talk about these cases. The minister talked about minimal error. I have many cases I could recite. I have a fine clipping service of my own and I can document many errors. The risk is not minimized when an ad hoc basis is used; that is absolutely wrong. Then there is the example of the man named Head. On January 20, 1967, he was charged with attempted rape of a nine year-old girl. On January 31, 1967, he was charged with indecent assault on a nine year-old girl. On May 26, 1967, he was sentenced to life for the rape of a six year-old girl, and to a five-year concurrent sentence for rape of a nine year-old girl. On June 15, 1967, he was found mentally ill while in jail and declared criminally insane. On November 1, 1967, he was declared a dangerous sexual offender—DSO they call it. His other sentence was reduced to 15 years and then he was given an indeterminate sentence.

This is the record of a man who had to be sick. Surely any psychiatrist or psychologist would say that. I have heard that the reports from British Columbia said he was sick. But he was released under the ad hoc, back-to-back program despite the act. He certainly was not released with the type of illness that would warrant his release, although of course he might have been mentally sick. He was not released on humanitarian grounds. This was not the way to release a dangerous sexual offender, Mr. Speaker. He had a long list of sexual offences.

Of course, the government took responsibility. Any one of us, Mr. Speaker—you, myself or my colleagues, but in this case it happens to be the Solicitor General—would have to take the responsibility. I am not talking politics now, but facts of law. He was released. The evidence is that he disliked one of the wardens. He waited on the road until a little girl only six or seven years old came along, Tanya Bush. That was the end of Tanya. He was tried and found guilty of murder. The case went to appeal and I think it was dismissed.

Why do I mention these horrible cases? I do it to show that you cannot operate on an ad hoc basis. These horrible facts are facts; they are the facts that have destroyed the parole system in Canada that was carefully set up. That is what I kept saying to the media about the Geoffroy case and the Head case. I mentioned that this had destroyed the real parole system where a man is studied while he is in custody, where his behaviour in custody, his behaviour out of custody, his background, his psychological tie-ups are all considered and the psychiatrist comes to a decision on documentation and if that goes before learned men and women who decide whether the man is safe to put out on the street either with or without supervision. Surely that is what the Solicitor General now has in mind, although he may not have enough officers.

Let me take another case. The headline of a newspaper article reads, "Murderer free on Xmas pass"—Commits reign of terror". It is datelined St. Catharines, Ontario. The article reads:

Assistant Crown Attorney Frank Keenan verbally lashed the National Parole Board in provincial court at St. Catharines for a "reign of terror" unleashed on the city by the release of Richard Swearngen on a Christmas leave pass.

Swearngen, 25, was sentenced in 1963 for the murder of a London, Ontario, man whose body was found in Rondeau provincial park. The man had been tied up and burned with cigarettes.

This is the background of the crime. The article continues:

Swearngen was granted temporary leave of absence—

Not parole, Mr. Speaker. All these things are talked about as if the parole board, George Street and his men, made the decision. I want tonight to defend the parole board of this nation. They have made mistakes; the mistakes have been made under section 26 of the act.

I do not know what my friend down there is talking about, but it does not matter. I do not want to get into an argument. This problem is too serious to be joking or heckling about. These are serious matters because every one of us has been elected by the citizens of Canada; it does not matter whether we are Liberal, Conservative, NDP or Social Credit. To continue with the article:

—from Collins Bay penitentiary on December 23 but failed to return by December 28. On January 6, he was driving a car on the Queen Elizabeth Way near Niagara Falls when he picked up a hitchhiker, Michael Savoie, 22, of Park Ave., St. Catharines, and held him (Savoie) at gunpoint.

I want to pause there. They say that this fellow got a little upset. Well, he had two guns; he was ready to be upset.

He robbed him of $70 and identification papers. Swearngen also had identification belonging to Laszo Ulman, of Hamilton. With the latter papers, he rented a car and drove it to Bogart Street, St. Catharines, where he was staying with friends.

Two friends of Swearngen told him they had had trouble with three men at the Henley Hotel. Swearngen and one of his friends went there and, when the trio emerged, Swearngen shouted: "I've got something for you."

He had a Christmas present. He opened fire with two automatics. This is a fellow on temporary release, and the parole board was blamed for it. Let us see what happened. The article continues:

William Harper, 20, of Marlborough St., St. Catharines, was shot twice in the face and his jaw was broken, and Douglas Nicholson, 18, of Parkview St., St. Catharines, was shot in the left shoulder. The third man was not hurt.

Police arrested Swearngen at the Bogart Street address—

En route to police headquarters, Swearngen produced the .25 automatic and ordered the cruiser to stop. He told Sgt. David Horne and Sgt. David Swanwick to hand over their guns, and then fled the cruiser.

Swearngen eventually reached Pontiac, Michigan, with the aid of friends. He was arrested—

Swearngen claimed in a statement to police that the three men who came out of the hotel rushed him with knives and he only fired in self-defence.

Here is what the judge said:

"You and I have very different ideas about what constitutes self-defence . . . The fact that you were carrying two guns shows that you were ready to resort to violence."

I will accept that. The article continues:

The accused would have been eligible for parole in another two years, but must now serve at least 12 years—

These are examples of the temporary release program. Naturally, the parole board gets the blame when it is written up. I looked at the Oxford dictionary this afternoon and it defines "parole" as release from an institution, such as a penitentiary. I could go on and on, Mr. Speaker. All these statistics are a lot of tommyrot because you cannot find out anything from them. The people who make the mistake hide it under the table and the parole board takes the blame.

Certainly jails are lonely. Certainly people in them are frustrated. I agree with other speakers who say that Canada has too many people in the penitentiaries. We have a habit of sentencing people for various kinds of crime to long terms of imprisonment. That was one of the complaints set out in a pamphlet put out by the youth of this party. Only a few years ago, people who had a certain amount of marijuana were said to be trafficking and the courts were giving sentences of four and five years. Yet the same process of law in this country was releasing people who were dangerous psychologically, and the psychiatrists knew that they were.

I suppose Byron was right in his sonnet "The Prisoner of Chillon" when he wrote:

And when thy sons to fetters are consigned,
To fetters, and the damp vault's dayless gloom,
Their country conquers with their martyrdom,
And Freedom's fame finds wings on every wind.
Chillon. Thy prison is a holy place
And thy sad floor an altar—
For 'twas trod, until his very steps have left a trace,
Worn as if cold pavement were a sod—by Bonnivard.
May none these marks afface!
For they appeal from tyranny to God.

● (2120)

I know about these things. I spent 27 years practising before the bar. Apart from the time I have spent in this institution, I have spent much time and initiative—all my life—in defending people. I have been in every penitentiary of this nation, either as counsel or visitor.

Mr. Benjamin: How about as an inmate?

Mr. Woolliams: I don't want to get into that. My hon. friend may know something about that; I don't know. I hope he stops joking, because this is no joking matter, believe me. I have spent all my life dealing with matters of this kind and have deep feelings about them. I want to see us on the road to a proper rehabilitation program. Let us set up a proper parole board, staffed with men and women who are trained in the highest skills, so that the right type of person in our society may be rehabilitated.

Surely we all recognize that environmental factors are behind much of the trouble. Judges across this nation to whom I have talked agree. A man who served his country as a member of this House—I refer to Mr. Justice McNiven whom I met in the Court of Appeal in Regina, who, incidentally, was a member of the Liberal party, and one of the finest men western Canada ever produced—used to say that from broken homes there comes trouble. We cannot change these things, but we can help the young men and women who have gone astray. That is why I want to see parole boards set up on a regional basis so that people with the best experience and the best skills are appointed. In that way we shall return people to society as rehabilitated individuals.

Last week, being alone, I read again the life of Clarence Darrow. Anyone who has read his life story will have read about the famous case of Leopold and Loeb. Darrow was the first lawyer in 1929 to bring together seven top-rated psychiatrists and psychologists of the nation to prove that Leopold and Loeb, who came from the oldest of families in the United States, were in a certain mental condition at the time of the offence.

These two young men had set out to commit the perfect crime. They picked up a young boy, the first one to leave a certain school, and took him out to the country and murdered him. It was not the perfect crime because one of the accused dropped his glasses. His name was on them and he was caught. Darrow pleaded them guilty. The accused were sentenced to death. However, Darrow, with his great ability, eloquence and knowledge of humanity and human motivation, brought scientists for the first time before a Chicago courtroom to show that the accused should be sentenced to life imprisonment rather than to death because of their mental and emotional condition at the time of the offence. That was a very important trial.

This illustrates the kind of law I should like to see in my country. I know what I said about capital punishments, but my remarks are confined to a very narrow basis as one will see if one examines my speeches. That illustrates the kind of law I should like to see in this nation. I say that because my whole life has been spent defending people charged with terrible crimes. In that way I may be unique in this chamber.

If I may be personal for a moment, in 1950 I defended a lady charged with murder. She was acquitted. In 1967 the same lady approached me and asked me to defend her son who was charged with murder. So one can see how important environmental factors are. The environmental factors of the home shape our lives and we can all say, when we point to unfortunate people, "There but for the grace of God go I." So I am really glad to see that the government has at long last moved on this matter.

I know the minister pretty well. We served on the same committee years ago when we used to take time off and visit various institutions. We would talk to various inmates. I know that his feelings run deep and I know he wants to do the right thing. I say to him, get rid of this ad hoc basis of appointing board members because it will cause much trouble and bring about frustrations in the community. Let us have regional boards, made up of skilled men. Let there be proper screening. Let us try to rehabilitate those who warrant rehabilitating, and give them an opportunity.

Above all, let us revise our way of appointing judges. Surely, in 1973, we should not appoint men who have done nothing but draw up mortgages, who have been bagmen for some political party, who have drawn up leases or who are defeated candidates who have practised law. The time has come to put men on the bench with brains and an understanding of humanity of the kind I have tried to describe. Only then will we get better judges.

Above all, it is time we examined the rules of appeal in Canada. Once a trial judge has found the facts, you cannot upset them. If then witnesses say it was snowing and one says it was not, and the judge finds that it was not snowing, the facts that the court of appeal will accept are those found by the trial judge. If the trial judge finds a fact, the court of appeal cannot change it because the rule is, as Your Honour being a lawyer knows, that the demeanour of a witness is taken into account by the judge and he analyses the situation. That rule can become pretty dangerous.

Let me tell hon. members a little story on this point. I recall a trial in which I was defending a rather ugly truck driver. The lady on the other side was very well built, and beautiful. As she stood in the witness-box beside the judge and spoke, with her flowing hair and beautiful figure, I knew that no matter what the truck driver, my client, might say, justice was ended then and there so far as my client was concerned.

That sounds humorous, yet in criminal proceedings the atmosphere in the court is very important.

I have never liked the system in the criminal courts of my province. Let me say that I started in Saskatchewan but went on to practice in Alberta. That is the only province in Canada in which the jury in certain cases can be dispensed with and where indictable offences in certain circumstances can be tried by one magistrate. Mr. Speaker, you can be tried for murder by one judge. The whole principle of jurisprudence is that you shall be tried by your peers. These peers are various people who understand human behaviour and who judge a case according to their own experience. That, to my mind, is how a court ought to be made up. Any other system is not fair.

The Supreme Court of Canada says that when you are tried by a judge alone, the judge is deemed to have instructed himself as to the law. In other words, the judge is presumed to have instructed himself correctly. However, when he must deliver the charge to the jury you can smoke-out his knowledge. That is why 13 men whom I had defended for murder were granted a new trial. They were all under 21 years of age. One of the accused did not even get out of the car and did not know where the others were going when the offence occurred. He, too, was found guilty of conspiring to murder.

In that case the judge instructed the jury improperly in my opinion and the court of appeal held that there should be a new trial. Eventually, five of the accused were acquitted. I say to the minister, who I know is interested in this area, let us strengthen the parole board, let us get rid of temporary releases, and let us not stretch the law to cover bad cases.

Mr. Reid: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member's time has expired. However, with unanimous consent the parliamentary secretary may ask a question. Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

● (2130)

Mr. Reid: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member made some statements about the way in which judges are appointed. Does he believe that any person who has been in politics at any level should be barred from sitting as a judge? Is that what I am to understand from the tenor of his remarks?

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, the fact that he was a member of this House should not affect whether he is made a judge or not. The late Mr. Justice McNiven was one of the finest legal minds. I was not here at the time, but I assume he was one of the greatest members of parliament. He was a man with a sense of dignity and justice. That was a wonderful appointment. Don't ask me about the bad ones.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, it is always very interesting to listen to the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams). He has the great facility of being able to combine his parliamentary responsibilities with what I consider to be a courtroom presentation. He is one of the few who can refight a case and do it well. He made an interesting comment about our peers. I wondered about this when he talked about juries. How would this work if a person applying for parole had his peers in the penitentiary as a parole board? As my colleague pointed out, no one would ever get out under those circumstances. It is the reverse of what happens in court with one's peers.

When we look at the parole board we are really looking at society. Society must look at the number of inmates in our penitentiaries and decide whether we are properly meeting the changes in today's world. If they believe we are, they are not considering the fact that our penitentiary population is rapidly increasing. This does not hinge entirely on the parole board or the method of parole: to some extent it hinges on society.

As lawmakers it may be that we are not taking into consideration the crimes of today. Obviously, many people are being imprisoned for offences that in 10 or 12 years will no longer be considered offences. This is true of offences regarding marijuana. Only a very rash judge would send a young person to penitentiary for such an offence. Only four or five years ago, young people were being sentenced to five, six or seven years in penitentiary for smoking marijuana. Today, society does not find that as offensive as many other offences. The courts have now tempered their approach to the marijuana question, and this is all well and good.

I remember visiting a number of penitentiaries a few years ago. I was not a member of a committee being shown through the penitentiary on a conducted tour. On one occasion I visited a person who had written to me. Many letters were written to members of parliament; they visited the penitentiaries and became acquainted with some of the inmates. A member of parliament no longer has the right to visit a federal penitentiary. This right was eliminated by a Conservative minister of justice, Davie Fulton. According to the British constitution, members of parliament have the right to enter penitentiaries any time and talk in private to any incarcerated person. A former solicitor general from the province of Quebec did not agree with the British tradition.

Although it may cause him some trouble, the minister should reinstate the practice of allowing members of parliament to visit penitentiaries. They should be able to do this unannounced, at a reasonable time. If the minister is shy about doing so, it indicates he has no faith in the institutions for which he is responsible. I hope the minister does not believe the institutions would not stand up to that kind of scrutiny.

Each member of parliament has a responsibility. We help make the laws, establish the agencies that enforce the laws and maintain the penitentiaries. We are not vegetables, although some members may be. The people in our society are not vegetables. However, they believe that the inmates are so out of touch with society and its normal operations that they must be incarcerated for the sake of society. As members of parliament, we have an obligation to ensure that our institutions get those incarcerated back into society as quickly as possible. On their release they must be able to function properly and maintain themselves.

We have seen the birth of the National Parole Board as well as amendments to it. Members who were not here the last time more people were appointed to the parole board should look at the four who were appointed at that time. They may be very surprised. A number of members of parliament defeated in an election were appointed to the board. The same may happen this time. That may not be all bad, but surely the parole board should not be a pension plan for former members of parliament.

The parole board must be responsive to changes in society. The board does a number of things that are not related. The 1973 statistics indicate there are 7,800 inmates in our federal penitentiaries. If we look at 50 per cent of those each year, it is not a large number although it is in excess of the applications made for parole. The board also considers paroles for those in provincial jails.

Under an act of parliament which was passed recently, a person with a criminal record may be able to obtain a pardon if it can be established that he has lived an acceptable life in his community. The criminal record can be eliminated. This, too, has to be done by the parole board. The board's duties also include the granting of partial driving privileges to those whose licences have been suspended as a result of motoring offences.

I have always been disturbed by the relationship of the parole board to the press. The hon. member who spoke before me indicated that a number of mistakes had been made by the board. It is easy to highlight such cases because these mistakes become newspaper stories which are carried across the land. It is not surprising that the board has become a politically conscious body engaged in watching the trend of newspaper reports over the years. To realize this one has only to watch the trend of newspaper reports and the fluctuation in the number of paroles granted over the years.

My hon. friend from Skeena (Mr. Howard) pointed out that over the years the percentage of persons committing second and third offences has been steady. This is why I recently asked the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand), bearing in mind the overcrowding in our penitentiaries, to make use of the royal prerogative to grant pardons. Her Majesty has, on occasion, decided when visiting a country to reduce prison sentences by six months. I believe that if we were to let out half the prisoners confined in our penitentiaries today, all the mistakes mentioned by the hon. member for Calgary North would be apparent, but they would not be present to any greater extent than if the parole board has allowed them to be at liberty; the percentage would remain the same.

I have often felt that one of the greatest offences is the lack of legal protection available to the poor. Indeed, there is very little available for the middle-class. However, a person who is very wealthy in this country can commit murder without serving time for doing so. We often see people accused of crimes, young people in particular, being defended by persons who are not qualified to defend them. I have in mind a number of cases in which the greatest offence committed was committed by the legal system of Canada.

The Solicitor General referred to the practice of granting back-to-back day leaves, and the hon. member for Calgary North criticized this practice as being wrong. I disagree. I believe the people who have the best understanding of the mental condition of an inmate are those who are engaged in the institution in other than a custodial capacity, those who have the opportunity to talk with a prisoner periodically. It seems to me that a recommendation by such people is certainly as valuable as that of any other when it comes to ensuring protection.

My hon. friend from Skeena said the 15-minute interview granted by parole boards is not enough to serve as the basis of a judgment that can be relied upon. I have read some of the presentations made before these boards and listened to others. They have been well rehearsed. On various occasions I have talked to the inmates concerned and wondered how they had acquired the knowledge and the ability to make them. As far as I am concerned, these back-to-back leaves fulfil a need. I do not think the penitentiary staffs would have introduced this scheme if the parole board had been doing its job.

I know from personal experience that many young people are in our penitentiaries. It is not so easy to deal with older prisoners, but in the case of young people there comes a time when they make a decision about their future, whether it is on religious grounds, moral grounds or simply the practical ground that they do not wish to spend the rest of their lives in and out of prison. When these young people decide they must do something about their lives, that is the time for parole.

I have not been impressed by the parole board or with its leadership. I think the board has been operating under Parkinson's Law, as have other branches of government. I would prefer the new members of these boards to be professional people rather than full-time civil servants. At least half of them might well be correctional officers with experience of the penitentiary system, people who have been closely connected with inmates of penitentiaries over a long period of time during which they have gained knowledge of all the ways in which people can be "conned", and acquired experience which enables them to sort out the sincere applicants from the confidence men. I am sure they would be useful on the board.

I should also like the minister to give some consideration to separating the board's responsbilities. I do not believe we should mix up the parole structure of our penitentiaries with the act we passed very recently which allows for wiping out the record of persons who have been living in a community and have been of good behaviour for a period in excess of five years. I think this is a field which is quite different to that of parole. I know it is classed as a pardon, but it is a pardon in a different sense.

I am sure one would have to agree that pardons should be taken out of the operation of the board and that they should be granted in a distinctly different way. This is often done by the minister at his own discretion. In that case, the machinery operates at that level rather than at the level of the parole board. In respect of the wiping out of criminal records, it is necessary that investigations be carried on in the community. An application must be made in the first instance, supported by guarantors, character witnesses, and so on. This is often upsetting to the community. I do not think it should be connected with the parole board; it should not be the responsibility of the board.

I believe we should also set up an administrative body to rule on other matters which are referred to the parole board now but are mainly in the provincial field. I refer to problems in respect of privileges taken from people, including the privilege of driving an automobile. I also refer to the many requests which come to the parole board every day asking that people have these privileges restored to them at least on a very limited basis during the course of their employment. I think those two major categories should be separated from the activities of the parole board. I do not agree with the previous speaker who believes the parole board should be totally responsible for all things which under all circumstances take place within the penitentiary service.

I remember an occasion when a senior official, not many years ago, gave consideration to a young person who had committed a brutal crime, one certainly as wanton as that mentioned by the previous speaker. Yet this young person was given the advantage of returning to school. Eventually he was allowed to attend day courses at Queen's University. He had been convicted of murder, sentenced and the sentence was commuted. However, that young person came out in four or five years and I do not imagine parliament will ever hear of him again. My guess is that there is less likelihood of his committing a second murder than there is that any average person walking on Wellington Street tonight would commit a murder.

I think we should remember that although there have been bad cases, there have been many good cases. The minister and his department, in the course of the development of the parole system, have determined that it should be made mandatory that persons convicted and sentenced to jail for murder be given a sentence of ten years. This is not something that was done by parliament; it was done by a regulation under the Penitentiary Act. Then the minister comes back to this house—the same minister—and suggests that we should also add to those ten years the right of a judge to sentence the young person to an additional ten years, making it mandatory that he remain in the penitentiary for a total of 20 years.

I believe in the abolition of the death penalty, but I seriously question whether I believe in the abolition of the death penalty if it means that a person may be placed in jail and given a mandatory sentence, under the regulations in respect of the Penitentiary Service, of 20 years. I think a much more humane sentence would be to eliminate that person, rather than keep him in jail for a mandatory 20 years. Yet that is what this minister, who professes to speak very liberally about the problems of the Penitentiary Service, would do. He has made many stirring speeches on this subject, but the facts do not bear out his words.

I suggest, in relation to the minister's demand for the establishment of an extra ten ad hoc members to join what has become a very permanent group in the parole structure, that he is only agreeing with the chairman of the parole board that it is better to have a structure of 19 senior officials than a structure of nine. If the minister is sincere in his desire to change the parole structure, then in my opinion it is his responsibility, if it is our belief that the members of the parole board should visit the penitentiaries to see and hear the people on a regular basis, to see that this provision is written into the act and that it is not a decision of Mr. Street. He should not be in a position to decide that he wants to have all the people here so that he can look at them.

I suggest to the minister that he should look at the persons who are and have been members of the parole board. I notice that one person who was probably the strongest and most capable member of the board is no longer with the board. It should be the responsibility of the minister to look into some of these matters. I suggest that in making appointments to the board, the minister should remember what I am sure many members of this House understand the parole board was originally set up to do, what it is doing today and what it has done over the last few years.

Mr. Speaker, may I call it ten o'clock?

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE—INQUIRY AS TO INFORMATION GIVEN PROVINCIAL GOVERNMENTS ON CABINET MINISTERS

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, on September 11 last, I put to the right hon. Prime Minister a question of the greatest general importance if not the most extraordinary importance, to my mind, since it dealt with the integrity and honesty of the members of provincial governments throughout Canada. In fact, I asked the right hon. Prime Minister whether he could indicate to the House what policy he follows in advising his colleagues, the provincial premiers, when the government or he, through the Solicitor General or the RCMP, is advised of certain facts relating to the actions of members of a provincial government.

Of course, the intent of this general question was to allow the members of the House and, at the same time, all the people of Canada to be aware of the procedure when special information is available, when such information could reveal the existence of compromising situations for those who are entrusted with the management of a province.

In my opinion, the subject itself proves the importance of this question.

Mr. Speaker, I went on asking a very definite question, at that time, when I asked and I quote:

In October 1970, was the Prime Minister aware——of a certain joint investigation carried out in the province of Quebec by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and the Quebec Provincial Police about certain meetings of the former minister in the Bourassa cabinet, Pierre Laporte, with some people who are now involved in the organized crime world?

Why should we know these particulars? In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, in this particular case, it was extremely important for us to get this information. We remember sadly the events of October 1970 in Quebec. At that time, not only the government, but parliament, agreed, for example, to apply war measures, to pass a special emergency measures act and facts have proved since then that only a handfull of people were involved. A few individuals had succeeded in scaring the government in creating fear and even panic not only in Quebec but throughout Canada.

If at the time when the government had to determine the fate of one person named Pierre Laporte it was aware of certain actions which could be called compromising, we can wonder if the decisions that it made could have been influenced by this situation.

I believe that we should know what the policy of the leader of the Canadian government is in such a situation. Is it his duty, as soon as he knows of compromising facts, to advise those concerned of the situation in order to protect the population of Canada since, whatever province you may be from, it is extremely important to be able to rely on the integrity to those who control the administration of the country?

This is why I asked my question, Mr. Speaker, and in my opinion it has some historical consequences since sooner or later some disclosures will be made to that effect and I am referring more especially to what I read in the press some fifteen days ago in connection with Paul Rose, accused of the murder of Pierre Laporte and from whom the RCMP is supposed to have removed some handwritten documents in which he had described the various stages of the unfortunate events of October 1970. We are wondering what the government had to conceal and that is why I think the Prime Minister—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but the time allotted to him has expired.

[English]

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, in answer to the hon. member I would like to say that the RCMP does indeed co-operate very closely with all other police forces in Canada. The range and scope of this co-operation is very broad indeed, covering as it does all aspects of crime prevention and detection. This free and uninterrupted flow of information between policing agencies is integral to the over-all effectiveness of police operations. However, much of that information must, as I am sure the hon. member will agree, remain confidential.

I think that every member of the House can appreciate the fact that questions raised in this House relating to any police investigation are extremely delicate and often can play no positive role in assisting our police forces to carry out their very important and difficult functions. I would therefore conclude that as a general rule it would be improper for me to divulge the details of any given investigation conducted either by the RCMP alone or in co-operation with other policing agencies in Canada.

ENERGY—REPRESENTATIONS TO UNITED STATES RESPECTING PROPOSED MOVEMENT OF OIL BY SUPERTANKER TO CHERRY POINT AND ALTERNATIVE CANADIAN SUPPLY

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, on September 18, in questions to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) which he refused to answer by leaving them to be answered by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp), I asked the government to make a statement on motions setting out in detail the Canadian proposal with respect to the movement of oil to Cherry Point, keeping tankers out of the area, and to give the House an assurance that such a proposal will be immediately communicated to the United States government. I ended with the words:

—because nobody believes any longer that the government cares what happens on the west coast?

One can ask: Why do people believe that this government no longer cares what happens on the west coast? The answer is to be found in cabinet document No. 1214/71 which shows that as early as 1971 the Canadian government had decided to do nothing. This is abundantly clear when you look at the options in that document. First of all, on page 2 of the document the problem is set out. The first subparagraph reads:

(i) because U.S. interests are using Canada's present neutral position to increase support for TAPS,

(ii) because there is a wide spectrum of opinion in Canada regarding the advantages and disadvantages of an alternative route through Canada, and

(iii) because there is little time left for Canada to influence the choice of route instead of having to respond to a U.S. initiative.

The question is: Did Canada try to influence the choice of route? And the answer is clearly no. The evidence is further found in this document to which I have referred. If one looks at page 4, paragraph 11 of that document, the fact is that on March 24 1971, the hon. J. J. Greene and the hon. Jean Chrétien met with the presidents of oil companies interested in the TAPS line. They made it clear they were not going to apply to Canada to build an oil line across Canada. This was also made clear at the briefing for parliamentarians who went to Washington in July to make one last-ditch stand on the matter.

● (2210)

Further on page 6 it is again made clear why the government did not want to interfere, because in paragraph 17 on that page it is stated:

A pipe line route will traverse lands covered by Indian Treaties 8 and 11. Specific provisions relative to the land entitlement aspects of these treaties have never been fulfilled—

This is a clear admission by the Canadian government that the provisions of these treaties have not been fulfilled. Then we look at the alternatives. Again on page 6 of that document we find:

These alternatives range from the present essentially passive role—of awaiting any application that might be made and doing nothing more than to continue technical discussions with representatives of the U.S. oil companies on the possible construction of a pipeline through Canada—to a very active role of seeking an application and offering special incentives to encourage it.

The Canadian government knew the difficulty we were in, because in paragraph 25 on page 8 we read these words:

Recent reports in the U.S. press attribute statements by U.S. government and oil industry officials to the effect that they had written off a Canadian route as an alternative to a trans-Alaska route because of lack of Canadian interest in a trans-Canadian oil pipeline.

Then we see three options set out. The first is:

Maintain the present position which involves no active encouragement of a pipeline—

Paragraph (a) concludes:

Conversely, this alternative would not escalate the native claims issue.

Then there is paragraph (b) which literally says the same thing, but this is the pretend or pretence paragraph. It says we should pretend we are interested. It says we should pretend to keep our options open by saying we will consider all options. Then there is paragraph (c), where we read:

Take a position of actively promoting the use of a Canadian route... This option could reduce Canada's bargaining position relative to a natural gas pipeline from Alaska, as well as the oil pipeline, and in general bring on the disadvantages of being too aggressive... This option could also be expected to escalate the native claims issue.

[Mr. Fraser.]

It is quite clear that as long ago as 1971 the government had no intention to try to use any influence it had to keep tankers off the west coast. It did not want to deal with native Indian claims and it did not want to reduce its bargaining position with respect to a natural gas pipeline, which is all it was interested in.

In June, the United States gave us one last chance. We gave them our answer one day before the U.S. Senate was to vote on the issue. The history of this matter makes us look incredible to the United States. The present so-called Canadian policy of supplying Canadian oil to Cherry Point to get rid of tankers, as stated by the Prime Minister on September 11, is ludicrous if we are to have the pipeline to Montreal, as just announced by the government, because we will not have any oil to sell to the United States.

This is the policy that the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) is taking to Mr. Kissinger on Tuesday next. The laughter in Washington will be so loud that the Secretary of State for External Affairs will not get a word in edgewise and, tragically for Canada, it will serve him right because he really does not have anything to say. It is all a wretched charade. It is the dismal and inevitable result of deception and incompetence over the last three years.

Mr. Joseph-Philippe Guay (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, contrary to what the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Fraser) has mentioned—because it is quite easy for a member of the opposition to make a lot of statements in a case like this—the Canadian government is concerned about the risk to the environment entailed in the passage of supertankers through the Strait of Juan de Fuca to Puget Sound. This has been made abundantly clear on a number of occasions over the past two years or more in communications to the United States government, both written and verbal, including communications by ministers to their counterparts, and also in a number of public statements.

Canada would have preferred an overland pipeline route through this country. However, in view of current action by the U.S. Congress it is now likely that the trans-Alaska pipeline, with its Maritime link, will be constructed. When the final legal impediments are lifted, probably some time this year, it will of course be some years yet before the oil actually begins to flow.

Canada cannot prevent the construction of the Alaska pipeline since it is entirely within United States territory. We also know that most of the oil produced in Alaska will be shipped to various ports on the U.S. west coast by very large vessels travelling well out to sea. Provided these vessels are constructed and managed in accordance with the highest safety standards—and the United States has a good record in this regard—there is no reason why Canada should be unduly concerned about this high seas traffic.

Our most serious concern is with those tankers which will enter the Strait of Juan de Fuca to supply the refineries in Puget Sound. Canada is unable unilaterally to stop this traffic. We must therefore seek to influence the United States either to supply these refineries by some other means or, if that is impossible, to manage and control the tanker traffic in such a way as to reduce risk to an absolute minimum.

One proposal has been to supply all the needs of these refineries overland from Canada via the transmountain pipeline from Alberta. Indeed, at the present time over 80 per cent of the oil delivered to these refineries comes through this route. The rest already comes by small tanker. This proposal has recently been rejected by Mr. Rogers Morton, in a letter to the United States Congress, in view of what the United States regards as the uncertainties of this source of supply and their apparent desire that Canadian oil available for export should be directed as a first priority to the mid-west.

We can foresee, therefore, that the United States would not find our conditions for the supply of oil to Puget Sound acceptable, since Canada would obviously only authorize export of oil surplus to Canadian needs and would not be able to satisfy all United States requirements in both Puget Sound and the mid-west. We are, therefore, considering all appropriate actions to minimize the risk to the environment in the event that the only option left open is a certain amount of supertanker traffic into Puget Sound.

There are four ways of attacking this problem.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. parliamentary secretary, but the time allotted to him has expired. The hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez).

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS—GOVERNMENT POSITION ON RECOGNITION OF NEW GOVERNMENT OF CHILE

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, yesterday in this House I asked the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) if he would consider withholding recognition of the military guerrilla junta in Chile for as long as Canada withheld recognition of the People's Republic of China. I received a non-answer.

When I became a Canadian citizen in 1967, I remember that I received a copy of the proclamation of the Canadian Bill of Rights, the closing passage of which always struck me as most memorable. I taught it to my students over the 15 years that I taught in elementary schools in Ontario because it embodies everything that Canada stands for. It bears repeating because I think members may not have seen it or have read it. It goes something like this: I am a Canadian, a free Canadian; free to speak without fear; free to worship God in my own way; free to stand for what I think right; free to oppose what I believe wrong; free to choose those who shall govern my country. This heritage of freedom I pledge to uphold for myself and all mankind.

Mr. Speaker, two weeks ago a military guerrilla junta led by General Pinochet decided that for the good of the Chilean people, the government which they had elected democratically had to be removed, the constitution had to be suspended and civil and human rights of all citizens had to be thrown out the window. All the things we pledged to uphold for ourselves and all mankind have been denied in Chile.

The government should not recognize the military thugs who represent everything we oppose as a nation. The only condition for relationships with this junta is the immediate restoration of the constitution and civil and human liberties of the Chilean people. We have heard much of the so-called failure of Salvador Allende in Chile. On the other hand, we know that in 1970 he was elected with 36.5 per cent of the popular vote, and in 1972 he received 43 per cent of the popular vote.

I say that Allende did not fail. Perhaps every Chilean did not have a car in his garage or a colour television. Some of them did not have much to eat or much to spend. But President Salvador Allende gave them something that they will never get from their military dictators—he gave them an opportunity to participate in the decisions that affect their lives, and the hope for a democratic future. There are those in this House who probably would not understand what those things can mean to people. There are perhaps those who do not understand how people can tighten their belts and hang in for the promise of a better future. Salvador Allende demonstrated eloquently, if tragically, a measure of the dedication and perseverance of which I am speaking.

And let us not be naïve. The option of militaristic violence was as available to Allende as it was to those who caused his death. But he chose not to use it, and this is a time when many must regret that he did not. But I do not regret it, Mr. Speaker, for if Allende is dead, he left us his principles, his beliefs and his hopes intact.

I have heard no eulogy in this House for Salvador Allende, Mr. Speaker, and I wish I had. It is difficult to believe that no tribute has been paid this brave man, that the mouths of the government and the official opposition have been so assiduously clamped shut. One wonders at the sincerity of the government and the official opposition, who in our recent rail strike in this country had much to say about the upholding of democracy and the sanctity of the voice of the people and who turned their backs when that voice was so dramatically and violently silenced in Chile. This is hypocrisy of a nature which is demeaning to the name of our country.

President Allende died showing great courage in the face of adversity. He died dedicated to improving the social and economic well-being of his people, and with greater respect for the democratic institutions embodied in his country's constitution than any person about whom I have read in the last 50 years or so. This brave man died under heroic circumstances. The true story may never be known, and it is only natural and just that his eulogy in this House should come from a son of South America.

May the light of freedom which he struck in that sleeping continent to the south give us, Canadians, the courage to say no to General Pinochet and company, and may the Chileans always let his memory be a beacon for them. Viva Allende! Viva Chile!

Mr. Joseph-Philippe Guay (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) have repeatedly expressed our feel-

HOUSE OF COMMONS

MOTION FOR ADJOURNMENT UNTIL OCTOBER 15, 1973

On the order: Motions:

September 19, 1973—The Minister of Justice:

That, when the House adjourns this day, it shall stand adjourned until October 15, 1973, provided that at any time prior to that date, if it appears to the satisfaction of Mr. Speaker, after consultation with the government, that the public interest requires that the House should meet at an earlier time during the adjournment, Mr. Speaker may give notice that he is so satisfied, and thereupon the House shall meet at the time stated in such notice, and shall transact its business as if it had been duly adjourned to that time; and

That, in the event of Mr. Speaker being unable to act owing to illness or other cause, the Deputy Speaker or the Deputy Chairman of Committees shall act in his stead for all purposes of this order.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I would propose today to move the motion standing in my name, but if it is agreeable to hon. members and there is consent I would be glad to have the opportunity to move it after the question period rather than at this moment.

Mr. Baldwin: We would be glad to give effect to this suggestion, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Agreed.

ANNOUNCEMENT OF RESTORATION OF TARIFF ON CATTLE AND BEEF IMPORTED FROM UNITED STATES

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I wish to announce—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Declare your intention.

Mr. Whelan: —that the tariff on cattle and beef removed in the budget last February is being restored effective midnight tonight.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Whelan: You will recall that the amendments to the customs tariff approved by parliament provided for restoration of any of the tariff changes where it was determined that hardship could be demonstrated. There has been considerable distortion in the cattle and beef markets caused by the earlier United States action on prices which led to the holdback of supplies in that country. The significant movement of cattle and beef to Canada in recent weeks has brought beef prices down significantly and cattlemen are uncertain about future production potential.

In the interests of continuing beef production in Canada at a level adequate for our needs and our export opportunities confidence must be restored, and this action is in keeping with that objective. This action will be in the long-term interest of consumers and is consistent with the government's announced objective to increase the supply of food in Canada through increased producer confidence and other appropriate measures.

It should be noted that there are tariffs on cattle and beef entering the United States. Should the United States administration consider removing their tariffs on these items, we would of course review the situation.

Mr. H. W. Danforth (Kent Essex): Mr. Speaker, in replying on short notice to the announcement made by the minister in the House this morning, I must say that members on this side are not surprised at the announcement which comes after weeks of continual pressure by the beef producing industry and members of the opposition parties because of the tremendous hardships that were caused the beef producing industry by the removal of the tariff. The removal of the tariff was a part of the policy of the government in its endeavour to reduce the prices of staple foods to consumers in this country. But, Mr. Speaker, we in this party knew, as did all members of the House and the producers, that the removal of the tariff would not cause prices to drop at the consumer level. Unfortunately, we have been proved to be correct in this assumption.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Danforth: The indiscriminate removal of the tariff by the government, through the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner), brought about the chaotic conditions that exist in the industry today. We welcome the announcement by the minister of the restoration of the tariff on beef imported from the United States.

● (1110)

We are surprised that the government did not press more strongly for reciprocal action by the United States. The minister said this morning that if the American government is disposed to consult with him on an agreement to lower the tariffs of the two countries, the government would be interested. Just a few months ago the government was not at all interested; it was interested only in reducing the tariff on beef coming into this country. The precipitate action taken at that time played havoc among the primary producers. We must have a stable agricultural industry if we expect the primary producers to produce the food that Canadians need so much at this time.

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, my colleague beside me says that I had better remember that I am a consumer. I remember that when I am in a supermarket. The most significant part of the minister's statement this morning is that part saying that it is essential to restore confidence to the beef industry. The government's precipitate and unilateral action in the matter of the tariff destroyed, in the first place, the confidence that existed in the beef industry. That is a reflection on the action of the government. Whether there was an attempt by the government to achieve reciprocal action by the United States and how strong that attempt was we have no way of knowing because we have not had a full report on the matter to the House.

The same remarks hold true with respect to the blocking of exports of beef to the United States for a period. Again, this action caught the ordinary producer at a bad time. It interrupted deliveries and reduced the price to beef producer. Only now are they beginning to assess the situation in which they find themselves.

We also have a new feed grains policy which is certainly going to have an adverse effect on beef and meat production in western Canada. The full effects of that policy were not considered and measured before it was put into effect.

I certainly agree with the previous speaker that our prime objective should be adequate supplies of food for the consumer. We will only achieve that if the producer has confidence in the future of his industry and feels he can safely invest the money necessary to produce the food that Canadians need. If the statement made today indicates that this fact has at last come home to the government, that the Minister of Agriculture, (Mr. Whelan) is aware of it, then I think he should stay in this House and not go to Ontario. If he is still not aware of it, then the sooner he goes to Ontario the better.

[Translation]

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, once again, I have to make some unpleasant remarks. I am sorry to have to do so because I much prefer to pay compliments. I am astounded to find that in spite of all the efforts made in this House to try to implement the principle of bilingualism, it is only by accident that we can obtain bilingual statements. With the little knowledge of English I possess, I have been compelled to try to understand as quickly as possible the contents of the minister's statement. I am asking, once more, that efforts be made to respect the bilingual character of this forum if we want the whole of the country to respect the principle of bilingualism.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to say, about the statement just made by the minister that consumers are very worried about the increase in food prices. Even this morning, before coming to the House, I had a telephone call asking me what steps were being considered by the government to allow consumers to supply themselves at prices corresponding to their income. I had to say that, in the first place, I was opposed to a price freeze because this would not benefit low or middle income families.

I experienced this during the 1939-45 war. I still have my rationing book and I know that, then, those who had money could purchase on the black market anything at any price. They did not deprive themselves, but the small earners were forced to use the infamous rationing coupons. Mr. Speaker, small people were rationed before the war because there was no money, then they were rationed during the war because they had money. They are always rationed.

Here is my suggestion: That means be taken, at any one of the government levels, to transform our fodder plants and our grains that we can produce in very great quantities, in our country, into foods of all kinds: beef meat, pork meat, fowl meat or eggs.

This would allow grain producers to find a profitable domestic market and, at the same time, the greatest possible number of individuals could be employed to process those grains into food for Canadian consumers. We should certainly take temporary measures, but above all I think that we should take long term measures to provide in the years to come a sufficient production to meet the needs of the public and this at decent prices for families with low and average incomes.

[English]

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I apologize to the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert) for not having copies of the statement in both official languages. That was not my intention. I felt that because the topic was so urgent it was necessary to make the announcement in the House while the House was still in session. The French copies were not quite ready when I entered the House. I apologize to the hon. member.

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: I think that the hon. member for Bellechasse is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, in connection with the point of order raised by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan), I would like to say that my remarks were not spiteful. However, since they were necessary and that it is possible in Canada to have qualified translators, I hope that from now on steps will be taken so that copies of important statements will be at least available in both official languages when they are made in the House.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

BANNING OF GAELIC RADIO PROGRAM—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, I rise at this time to seek unanimous consent of the House to move a motion under Standing Order 43. I feel certain all members of the House, regardless of their political affiliation, will wish to support this motion.

An action was taken recently by the CBC that shook the foundations of culture in Nova Scotia to their very roots. That action was the announcement in the form of an edict by Lister Sinclair, a vice-president of the CBC, banning the Gaelic language from a weekly radio entertainment program in Cape Breton.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

• (1120)

Mr. Muir: Surely, Sir, you can appreciate the dangers inherent in such a decision. I would not like to see clan warfare between the MacEachens and the Sinclairs or any other Scots at this stage in international affairs. I urge all members to lend me their support in getting this program reinstated in its original form. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond (Mr. MacInnis), that this matter be referred to the Standing Committee on Broadcasting, Films and Assistance to the Arts.

May I say, before resuming my seat, I regret that the President of Privy Council, a noted scholar in the Gaelic language, culture and folklore, is not present in the chamber because I am sure he would wish to second this motion.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: This motion, put forward under the terms of Standing Order 43, requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: I believe there is unanimous consent. I am not sure whether I can find the motion in the hon. member's statement. It may be in Gaelic somewhere.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: However, hon. members have heard the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

PRICE INCREASE BY FORD OF CANADA—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I hope we shall achieve the same degree of unanimity with regard to this motion which is also put forward under the terms of Standing Order 43. The matter of urgent and pressing importance arises from the revelation today that the average increase of $139 in the price of 1974 cars produced by Ford of Canada exceeds the increase for the same products sold in the United States. This is inflationary. But more to the point, this action further increases the unjustified spread between United States and Canadian car prices and completely violates the commitment made by that company to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I assume the hon. member is coming to the motion.

Mr. Broadbent: Right now, Mr. Speaker. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore (Mr. Grier):

That this House instruct the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce to call to Ottawa forthwith the President of Ford of Canada for the purpose of instructing him to roll back the announced price increases.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity.

ENERGY

ACTION TO ASSURE BRITISH COLUMBIA CONSUMERS OF SUFFICIENT NATURAL GAS THIS WINTER

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources following the exchange a few days ago about the announcement by West Coast Transmission that gas supplies for British Columbia at peak periods would be cut by perhaps 10 per cent this winter, and the assurance by the minister that he would look into this situation. Can the minister tell us whether he has been in touch with the National Energy Board and whether the possibility of this cutback in supplies to the gas consumers of British Columbia this winter has now been eliminated?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Yes, Mr. Speaker. The board had a meeting yesterday to discuss this question. I have been advised that at the moment the board has not received all relevant data pertaining to the matter. The board did, however, indicate a certain degree of optimism that with the assistance of distributors and transmission companies it might prove possible to minimize the disruption which this accident in the field has caused.

Mr. Stanfield: Is there any real difficulty about this? Is there any reason that priority cannot be given to the gas consumers of British Columbia to this extent in preference to the export of gas through the same pipeline system?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I expect to be in a better position to respond to that when the board in turn has all the relevant data. I hope to be able to satisfy my hon. friend and others on that as soon as possible.

APPOINTMENT OF CHAIRMAN OF NATIONAL ENERGY BOARD TO FILL VACANCY

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I direct this question to the Prime Minister. In view of the lack of a chairman of the National Energy Board for some two months under very difficult conditions, may I ask the Prime Minister whether, since we are likely to adjourn, he can give the House the assurance that there will in fact be a chairman of this important board appointed by the government before the Prime Minister leaves the country?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as the minister replied yesterday to a similar question, we have been discussing this subject and hope to make an appointment relatively soon.

CO-OPERATION BETWEEN FEDERAL AND ALBERTA GOVERNMENTS ON POLICY MATTERS

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I have a related question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of the letter to Premier Lougheed of Alberta which was tabled in the House on March 10, 1972, by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources stating in part that "it is of paramount importance that the relationship of the government of Canada to the government of Alberta in energy policy matters be one of co-operation and collaboration", I should like to ask the minister why that assurance was not honoured?

[Mr. Speaker.]

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I would respond to the hon. gentleman that, given the time constraint in which this decision had to be made, it was honoured to the best of our ability. In particular, with regard to the decision of the National Energy Board on September 12 concerning export of oil to the United States, we had really only a period of overnight to make that decision. We discussed it with the Alberta minister, who was present in Ottawa the following day, just as soon as the cabinet decision had been made.

Mr. Towers: Did the minister attempt to meet with the premier of Alberta on his recent visit to Alberta?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I did see a report on the morning that I flew to Calgary to see the industry that the premier expected to see me. That report in the Globe and Mail turned out to be a mistake. The premier was on a political tour of Alberta. I do anticipate seeing a number of ministers probably during the first week of October.

ACTION TO ASSURE BRITISH COLUMBIA CONSUMERS OF SUFFICIENT NATURAL GAS THIS WINTER

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the minister dealing with gas supplies for the people of British Columbia. While it may be necessary for the minister and the National Energy Board to canvass the situation to see whether other sources of supply can be made available to British Columbians, I want to ask the minister whether he can give the assurance he has been asked to give, namely, that if other sources cannot be made available he will undertake to see to it that the supplies necessary to meet the needs of British Columbia customers are given priority over export to the United States.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I think I should like to have all the facts of the situation before arriving at a final determination. As the board has indicated, it is not yet in a position to do so. Perhaps I can repeat the advice I received from the board, that it may prove possible to avoid or reduce to minimal porportions any adverse effects on consumers of gas served through the West Coast system. I hope that is so, but I shall be in a better position in a couple of days to respond more fully.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands on a supplementary, then the hon. member for Abitibi, followed by the hon. member for Calgary North, and then we will try to go to another subject.

Mr. Douglas: While accepting the minister's premise that it is hoped that some other sources can be found to prevent an adverse situation, it seems to me that the minister ought to be able to tell the House that if these other supplies cannot be found he can give the people of British Columbia the assurance that gas will not be exported in large quantities to the United States, some 62 per cent of the production, and leave the local customers in short supply?

● (1130)

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I might remind the hon. gentleman that at least some of the gas going to the United States is going to domestic consumers as opposed to industrial consumers, and I think we would want to think twice about leaving domestic consumers in the cold as opposed to people buying interruptable gas from British Columbia.

SUPPLY OF FUEL OIL IN EASTERN QUEBEC—DISCUSSION BETWEEN FEDERAL AND PROVINCIAL MINISTERS

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

Since the analysis on energy resources tabled by the minister a few weeks ago shows that, as far as eastern Quebec is concerned, stocks of heating fuel will last only 40 days, can the minister say whether, in the discussions he had recently with his Quebec counterpart, he has been assured that sufficient supplies will be obtained for the coming winter season?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, these talks were not on heating fuel, but on the assurance of supply for the Quebec market and for the rest of eastern Canada. The Quebec government and I think that this is a priority in our plans concerning the Canadian oil market.

REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE THAT JURISDICTION OF NATIONAL ENERGY BOARD WILL NOT BE REDUCED—APPOINTMENT OF NEW CHAIRMAN

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the right hon. Prime Minister. In spite of the fact the National Energy Board was implemented by the government of the right hon. member for Prince Albert—I might say it has done an excellent job within its jurisdiction of handling energy whether in reference to exports or domestic supply—will the Prime Minister assure the House and the country that he does not intend to bring in any legislation or use any political interference to cut down the jurisdiction of that board?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, in respect of the first part of the question, I of course share the hon. member's feelings in congratulating the board on having done an excellent job. I am sure it will continue doing that kind of job regardless of what energy policy the government might want to bring before the House.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, in light of the fact the government has procrastinated and taken so long in appointing a new chairman of the board, will the Prime Minister assure the House and the country that the appointment will not be a political one, such as Mr. Pepin, but will be an independent appointment in order that the board can exercise its jurisdiction without government interference?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I have not had occasion to consider the particular candidate to whom the hon. member refers but I will ask for information about this gentleman, and if he is the most competent person proposed I will perhaps consider appointing him.

Mr. Woolliams: And that will be another political appointment.

TAR SANDS OIL—POSSIBILITY OF GOVERNMENT CONTROL OF DEVELOPMENT—REQUEST FOR GENERAL POLICY STATEMENT

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources arising from statements he made on a television program last night. In view of the fact the western oil sands may be the major source of oil for Canada in the 1980s, is the government satisfied to allow 80 per cent control of the Athabasca development to remain in the hands of foreign corporations or is the government proposing to take steps to regain Canadian control either through the Canada Development Corporation or direct government involvement?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I think I should say that while I have yet to receive, either from the government of Alberta or from the Syncrude Corporation, details of the project they are planning to put into effect, I recall from the premier's television statement that he was talking about 50 per cent ownership of the pipeline and some higher percentage ownership of the power facility. I think what I should like to do is to get more details about the project before I comment on it. I would have to say that we welcome this initiative and approach by the government of Alberta to try to represent the wider interests of Canadians in this kind of project. As to whether or not the detailed terms would meet that adequately, I would withhold comment until I have received some precise idea of what they are planning to do from either the government or the company.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that in the last number of weeks or months the government has made statements about various aspects of a national petroleum policy in bits and pieces, and in view of the new development by Syncrude in Alberta, may I ask whether the minister can assure the House that he will in a few weeks when parliament resumes, should it adjourn today, make a statement that will collect these various strands of policy he has thrown out in order that the House and the people may know what the national energy policy of the government is?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I will accept the suggestion and admonition of the hon. gentleman.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member for York South might be allowed to ask another supplementary question, but hon. members will have noted that we are still on the same subject. I would hope an attempt would be made by hon. members in co-operation with one another to ensure that some members in the back rows who have been trying to ask questions for some days will be given an opportunity to do so.

TAR SANDS OIL—APPLICATION OF FOREIGN INVESTMENT REVIEW LEGISLATION TO SYNCRUDE

Mr. David Lewis (York South): I want to ask a supplementary question of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Is he or will he be studying the arrangements by Syncrude for the actual exploitation of the oil sands from the point of view of criteria now contained in the foreign investment review bill which has come out of the committee, and if he finds that the present bill does not cover the situation will he undertake to amend it so that this rather massive sellout of an important Canadian resource to foreign corporations can at least be screened?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Like my colleague, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, Mr. Speaker, I look forward to getting details of the proposal. I certainly will be taking a look at the matter when I have those details.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

GRANT TO NEWSPAPER "LE SOLEIL"—POSSIBLE REIMBURSEMENT IN CASE OF SALE—REQUEST FOR INFORMATION ON AGREEMENT BETWEEN PARTIES

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, I should like to direct my question to the right hon. Prime Minister.

Considering that the Quebec City newspaper Le Soleil has received a very substantial grant from the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, and considering that this newspaper was eventually sold to the Power Corporation cartel, could the Prime Minister tell the House whether the letter promising the grant contains a clause for compulsory reimbursement of the grant in the event the newspaper should be sold?

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I should like to point out to the hon. member that the grant given to the newspaper Le Soleil was not necessarily for the newspaper itself, but for the entire operations, which include other things besides the newspaper itself.

[Mr. Lewis.]

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, considering that I had specifically placed on the order paper a motion to obtain additional information, could the parliamentary secretary give more details about the contents of this agreement between the managers of the newspaper Le Soleil and the printing companies that have related businesses?

Mr. Speaker: I think that such detailed data should normally be given on motions. If the parliamentary secretary can reply briefly to the question, I shall recognize him, after which I shall recognize the right hon. member for Prince Albert.

Mr. Prud'homme: Very briefly, Mr. Speaker, I should like to refer the hon. member to the debates he and two of his colleagues, of whom the hon. member for Compton provoked. The reply we gave at that time is the same as that I could give today.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

POLLUTION OF SOURIS RIVER CAUSED BY DIVERSION PROJECT IN NORTH DAKOTA—REQUEST FOR REPRESENTATIONS BY GOVERNMENT

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. The Canadian Wildlife Federation, through its distinguished president, Mr. Orville Erickson, has communicated with the minister in connection with the Garrison diversion project in North Dakota which creates a serious pollution problem in the Souris River prior to its entry into Manitoba, a fact already admitted by the United States Bureau of Reclamation. Will the minister act immediately under the Boundary Waters Treaty Act and insist that the project be suspended until the pollution and other pertinent problems of a similar nature have been resolved?

● (1140)

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I can assure the right hon. gentleman I will give most serious attention to his representation.

IMMIGRATION

IMMIGRANT ADJUSTMENT PROGRAM—NUMBER REGISTERED—ENCOURAGEMENT OF REGISTRATION

Mr. Lincoln Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister responsible for immigration based on reports that registration under the last chance policy is poor. Can the minister bring us up to date on the actual number of registrations and what specific programs he has to encourage these people to register? It seems to me we cannot afford mass deportations on October 15. What plans has the minister in this regard?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I do not subscribe to the idea that it is going poorly. I think it is going positively. We have 32,251 persons on behalf of whom registrations have been made. The processing of the interviews is proceeding with dispatch. We are taking special measures to provide landing quickly in order to establish clearly that there is no trap and that there are no hidden problems with regard to this program. I think our difficulty perhaps is that we do not have a benchmark against which to judge this in terms of quantity. There have been highly speculative rumours concerning the number of people in Canada to whom it might apply, but there is absolutely no statistical or actual basis to indicate that we have 50,000, 100,000 or what. I would appeal to all hon. members to publicize this program in their constituencies and help me to convince these people to take advantage of it before October 15. I agree with the hon. member that we want to avoid deportation orders, but we do intend to apply the law after October 15.

Mr. Alexander: Can the minister advise how many people have been given landed immigrant status since registration, and can he also advise whether in fact he will be setting up special medical teams in cities other than Toronto in order to process these applications quickly?

Mr. Andras: There have been 9,199 registrants who have been interviewed and 9,121 or 99.2 per cent of these have complied with the regulations and relaxed criteria under the immigrant adjustment program. That represents a very high rate of success. Even those who have not succeeded in being dealt in that way are under review because there is documentation or something else involved. The medical teams are being set up as quickly as possible to finalize medical examination which, as the hon. member knows, is a part of the processing.

IMMIGRANT ADJUSTMENT PROGRAM—POSITION OF INDIANS ALONG NEW BRUNSWICK-MAINE BORDER

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary or related question for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Is the minister aware of the concern and anxiety among native people in Indian communities along the New Brunswick-Maine border that his directive regarding visitors to Canada might be applied to them, with the result of splitting up families recognized by the Indian Act, and will the minister assure the House and these concerned native people that the October 15 deadline does not apply to them?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I am not fully aware of the circumstances to which the hon. member refers. Provided this does not involve a suggestion of recognition of the Jay Treaty, which is a very tricky situation, I most certainly will look into it and do everything possible to ensure that legitimate Canadian citizens in that area have nothing to fear.

INQUIRY AS TO PRESENTATION OF NEW BUDGET

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. In view of the fact the budget of last February has been modified and changed so often by a series of ad hoc measures, may we expect to have a new budget presented to the House very shortly?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will take this by way of a representation which I will convey to the Minister of Finance as soon as he returns.

DIFFICULTIES RESPECTING FISHING RIGHTS OF MICMACS AND MALISEETS IN NEW BRUNSWICK—PROPOSED MEASURES

Mr. Eymard Corbin (Madawaska-Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

In view of the growing feeling of frustration and alienation amongst the Indians on the east coast of Canada, particularly the Micmacs and Maliseets in New Brunswick, concerning their fishing rights, can the minister tell us whether he is willing, jointly with his colleague the Minister of Fisheries, to study the matter anew with a view to finding a solution as soon as possible?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I take due note of the hon. member's representations and will get in touch with my colleague, the Minister of Fisheries, to find a solution. The matter falls far more within his jurisdiction than my own, but I shall be pleased to make representations on behalf of the Micmac and Maliseet Indians.

NUMBER OF UNITED STATES CATTLE IMPORTED INTO CANADA RECENTLY

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Agriculture. Since he was kind enough to tell us last spring of the flood of feeder cattle going into the United States, has he any figures on the flood of finished cattle that came into Canada in the last nine days?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): As of yesterday I think it was around 9,000 head. United States cattle moving into Toronto from the United States this week so far, Monday to Thursday, total about 7,000 head. Another 1,800 head have moved into Winnipeg. This week imports were just over 8,500 head.

FINANCE

BANK LOANS TO ASSIST BUSINESSMEN IN FOREIGN COUNTRIES—GOVERNMENT ACTION IN LIGHT OF HIGH INTEREST RATES

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Finance I should like to put a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the fact Canadian chartered banks are now lending over $1¼ billion in Canadian funds to help businessmen in foreign countries and that this figure has gone up 13 per cent in the past reported week alone, what steps does the government intend to take to reverse this trend which is contributing to our present all-time high bank interest rates?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Those are fascinating statistics. I will make sure they are drawn to the attention of the Department of Finance.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, perhaps I might put another question to the Prime Minister. With mortgage interest rates in Canada now over 10 per cent compared with 8 per cent in the United States, do I take it from the Prime Minister's comment that the government in fact has no agreement with the Canadian banks to stop such a flow of Canadian funds?

Mr. Trudeau: No, Mr. Speaker. If the member takes it that way, he is mistaken.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby. Order, please. I will recognize the hon. member for York-Simcoe, but I wonder whether we should have two or three supplementaries on every question asked. I think hon. members should be prepared as much as possible to ask questions and supplementaries in co-operation with other members. Perhaps they ought not go beyond that. The hon. member wishes to ask a third supplementary question. He will be recognized, after which I will recognize the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby and the hon. member for Joliette.

Mr. Stevens: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. In view of the statement by the Minister of Finance on September 14 that the banks have agreed to disburse mortgage funds at no margin over their cost of funds, would the Prime Minister indicate what volume of mortgage funds the banks have so agreed to put out?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I can only take note of the question. It is statistical in nature. I assure the hon. member we will look for the answer to it.

INDUSTRY

PRICE INCREASE BY FORD ON 1974 CARS—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In view of the fact the minister assured the House in March of this year that there will be a significant reduction in the price differential in the pricing of 1974 model year cars and that he made this assertion following a commitment to him made by the head of the Ford Motor Company as well as others, I ask the minister, in view of the revelation today that the price increase on Ford products in Canada will exceed the increase in the United States, whether he was informed of this by the head of the Ford Motor Company and, if so, what action he took upon receiving that information?

[Mr. Whelan.]

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the Ford Motor Company has been in touch with my department. We have been advised by the company that the prices of cars will increase on average by $139 in Canada made up of $68 for mandatory equipment and $71 for optional equipment being made standard. The amount of the increase for mandatory equipment is slightly less than that in the United States and reflects the difference in the safety legislation of the two countries.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that answer simply obfuscates the question totally, and in view of the fact the minister's admonitions to the companies have produced no results at all, would the minister consider removing the 15 per cent duty that Canadian consumers must now pay if they purchase cars in the United States in order to get some competition in that industry in Canada?

● (1150)

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member has other evidence to the effect that what I have been told by the companies is untrue, I would ask him to bring that evidence forward and give it to me.

PROPOSED CONSTRUCTION OF SUPERTANKER PORT ON ST. LAWRENCE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

Following his Ottawa meeting with his Quebec counterpart last week, can the minister advise the House whether there was any mention of the Quebec construction project of a supertanker port? If so, I should like to know whether the minister or the government favours this project?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Yes, Mr. Speaker, this project was discussed in very broad terms. Following this meeting, the department officials will meet with their Quebec opposite numbers to discuss Quebec plans in connection with this project; then I shall be in a position to state our opinion more clearly concerning this project.

EFFECT OF PROPOSED EXTENSION OF OIL PIPELINE TO MONTREAL ON PRICES OF PETROLEUM PRODUCTS IN QUEBEC

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, believing that the projected west-east pipeline is feasible, I would like to ask the hon. minister whether this would guarantee to Quebecers the availability of products at the same price as those currently obtained from foreign countries.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, a most important question is that of the price of supplies on the Quebec market. In addition to admitting the safety problem, we both agreed that the price of oil was one important aspect of the problem. But we have yet taken no final decision in this connection.

URBAN AFFAIRS

INQUIRY AS TO LEGISLATION TO PROVIDE FUNDS TO ASSIST MUNICIPALITIES IN RAILWAY TRACK REMOVAL OR REROUTING

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. In the Speech from the Throne the government stated it would be introducing legislation to make funds available to municipalities for removing or rerouting railway tracks. Does the government in fact intend to bring in this legislation, and will it have top priority in view of the fact that many municipalities are now preparing their budgets with this work in mind?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the legislation would actually stand in the name of my colleague, the Minister of Transport, because, as the hon. member knows, it deals with the railway grade crossing fund. On his behalf may I say I hope it will be introduced when the House reassembles if the motion to recess is passed today. I would also hope that House leaders of all parties would give it top priority so that it could be dealt with promptly.

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the recent announcement by the Quebec government in connection with the projected family allowances program, which should be in force as of January 1, 1974, does take into account the bill currently before the House and it is mostly thanks to the provisions of this bill that Quebecers will be able to benefit from an excellent family allowances program.

Hon. Daniel J. Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Marshall: Was consideration also given to war veterans allowance recipients who are getting a partial disability pension, and will the recent increase in the disability pension be exempt from war veterans allowance cheques?

Mr. Ian Arrol (York East): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. In view of the fact that paper products for Canada's domestic and export markets were in low supply even before the railway strike and before the strikes in the paper mills themselves, would the minister inform the House what action is planned for what appears to be a serious long-term situation? For how many years can we expect shortages before Canada's abundant forests can be utilized to meet the demand?

Does the order in council which will exempt from the ceiling in the War Veterans Allowance Act the increase in old age security and the guaranteed income supplement which will take place in October apply only to October, or does it apply to all of the quarterly increases that will take place in the future?

ALLEGED EVASION OF RESPONSIBILITY BY RAILWAYS RESPECTING MAINTENANCE OF RIGHTS OF WAY IN RURAL AREAS

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Transport I will direct this question to the Minister of Agriculture. I may say I am sorry that the Minister of Labour is not getting equal time today. In light of the fact there is ample evidence that Canadian railways are deliberately avoiding their responsibility in connection with the maintenance of their rights of way through rural areas, and in light of the fact the Canadian Transport Commission has so far evaded its responsibility to direct the railways to fulfil their obligations in such matters as weed spraying and fence repairing, is the minister willing to intervene or will he undertake to urge his colleague, the Minister of Transport, to intervene, provided, of course, that I and other members of the House supply him with information on specific breaches of this responsibility?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the question covered far more than railway rights of way. If I were to answer it in detail it would take quite a while. I will look into the problems he has brought to my attention and discuss them with the Minister of Transport and the CTC.

STEPS TO PREVENT OUTFLOW OF SHORT-TERM FUNDS

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs who is deputizing for the Minister of Finance. Since last week's increases in the prime rate and in the bank rate were designed to stop the outflow of short-term funds, and since there has been a continued heavy outflow of funds, will the minister advise what other steps the government is contemplating to prevent such an outflow, or can we anticipate a further rise in interest rates in a week or ten days' time?

• (1200)

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, obviously this is one of those questions that should be reserved for the minister who has the day to day responsibility. I will put the question to him, but I am sure my hon. friend would not advocate a further increase in interest rates—or perhaps I misunderstood.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): No, Mr. Speaker. I am just wondering if we are to have a further instalment in a bankrupt government policy.

SOCIAL SECURITY

FAMILY ALLOWANCES—INQUIRY RESPECTING METHOD OF PAYMENT

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

In view of his answer to the hon. member for Portneuf and in view of the fact that the government of the province of Quebec informed the minister of its intention to avail itself of the provisions of Bill C-211 in the announcement made yesterday by the government of that province with respect to family allowances, can the minister say if he is satisfied that the government of the province of Quebec would not use those funds to recuperate moneys from the federal government in order to pay out social benefits that were intended as family allowances in Quebec?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, under Bill C-211 family allowances that will be approved by this House will be paid directly by the federal government to the citizens of the province of Quebec as in other provinces. So with that method it is impossible for a province or a provincial government to allot to any other purpose the funds voted by parliament as family allowances.

Mr. Rondeau: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary.

I thank the minister for his answer but does he mean that those allowances will be paid directly to the recipients rather than the province?

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, I think I was quite clear in my reply, but I will try to further clarify it.

The amounts voted by the parliament of Canada for family allowance purposes will be paid by the federal government directly to the citizens in each of the provinces where those amounts are to be paid, and not to the provincial governments.

PUBLIC SERVICE

ALLEGED REQUIREMENT TO FILL OUT SECURITY FORMS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Peter Reilly (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to fly another of my famous canards right up the government's nose. This time I happen to have, unhappily for them, documentary proof of something. In view of the fact that employees of several government departments, some with many years of service, are now being asked to fill out extensive security forms complete with questions about their sex lives, their travel to so-called communist countries and other questions of a rather exotic nature, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether his government is planning an entirely new security program, whether he feels a necessity for this kind of program and, if so, why?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it would appear to me that there is no new program. Certain types of classifications do call for security clearances and this is probably an instance of the past policy being continued. I will find out if there has been any recent change, but I would expect that this canard, too, has gunshot in its wings.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We are coming to the end of the question period and if we are to allow two or three more quick questions perhaps we should limit supplementaries.

Mr. Reilly: Mr. Speaker, this question does not refer to new employees or new classifications. These are employees who suddenly, after having worked in the service in one case for 26 years, have been asked to fill out forms.

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. member have a supplementary?

Mr. Reilly: I should like to ask the Prime Minister once again to investigate this fact and report.

POST OFFICE

REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE MEMBERS' NEWSLETTERS WILL BE PLACED PROPERLY IN MAILBOXES

Mr. Ed Nelson (Burnaby-Seymour): Mr. Speaker, my question concerns postal delivery but since it concerns also enforcement of the law I will address it to the Minister of Justice. In view of the fact that householder newsletters sent out by hon. members are classified as third class mail along with the junk mail that is flooding so many Canadian homes, and in view of the importance of this communication between a member of parliament and his constituents, can the minister say if any steps are being contemplated to ensure that these newsletters are placed in individual mailboxes as required by law instead of being treated as junk mail?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to draw this representation and complaint to the attention of the Postmaster General who, I am sure, will be extremely interested in seeing that all pieces are treated as they ought to be.

FOOD PRICES

INVESTIGATION OF INDUSTRY BY COMBINES BRANCH—PUBLICATION OF RESULTS—CO-OPERATION WITH PRICES REVIEW BOARD

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs if the results of the investigation by the Combines Investigation Branch into the food industry, as announced by him earlier this week, will be made public and when that investigation will be completed? I should also like to ask the minister if the Combines Investigation Branch is co-operating in this matter with the Food Prices Review Board which is conducting a similar inquiry?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member will look at my remarks in the House on Monday night, he will see that I said this inquiry is being carried out under section 47 of the act and the results will be presented to the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission.

Mr. McGrath: I asked the minister if the results of the inquiry, in view of their national importance, would be made public and, further, if the Combines Investigation Branch in the course of its inquiry is co-operating with the Food Prices Review Board which is conducting a similar inquiry?

Mr. Gray: Mr. Speaker, I could be wrong but I do not think the work of the Food Prices Review Board, to which the hon. member has referred, is similar. I think the latter is looking at certain pricing practices in retail food stores, whereas the inquiry of the Combines Investigation Branch is much wider and with respect to the food manufacturing industry. On the other part of the question, I will have to check the exact provisions of the law with respect to the work of the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission. I stand to be corrected but I believe that once the report is presented to the commission it is open to it to hold public hearings on the report. However, I will check into that and make sure my information is correct.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Provencher.

Mr. Epp: In the absence of the Minister of Transport I should like—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will recognize the hon. member, but I indicated to the House a moment ago that we had gone beyond the time allotted for the question period. I thought the hon. member was rising on a point of order. I would not want to disappoint him so perhaps he might ask the question quickly. The Chair will recognize the hon. member and then call orders of the day.

TRANSPORT

NEED FOR ADDITIONAL GRAIN CARS TO CLEAR BACKLOG—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): I should like to address my question to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport. In view of the present situation with harvesting in western Canada and the need for many western farmers to stockpile grain outside because of the backlog and the lack of grain cars, has the department undertaken any discussions with Canadian National and Canadian Pacific to make sure that this backlog will be taken care of shortly, and what is the supply of grain cars coming from Thunder Bay?

Mr. Joseph-Philippe Guay (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, this has been one of the main concerns of the minister, but I will still bring the question to his attention on Monday.

[Mr. McGrath.]

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day. The hon. member for Skeena on a point of order.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Speaker, the point of order I should like to raise at this time is occasioned by the fact that this may well be the last day before the recess and the resumption in mid-October and, therefore, the last day before the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) leaves on his visit to the Peoples Republic of China.

There is a very urgent and important question that I think should be posed to the Prime Minister prior to his departure that has not been permitted because there has been a succession of supplementary questions, as Your Honour has mentioned.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. If there is consent to allow the hon. member to ask his question it could be done, but that is not a point of order. I have indicated to the House on many occasions that when we have called orders of the day it is irregular to rise and seek to ask supplementaries or further questions by way of a point of order.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Speaker, if there is consent I am sure that there are many—

Mr. Speaker: Apparently there is not. Orders of the day.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNTIL OCTOBER 15, 1973

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice) moved:

That, when the House adjourns this day, it shall stand adjourned until October 15, 1973, provided that at any time prior to that date, if it appears to the satisfaction of Mr. Speaker, after consultation with the government, that the public interest requires that the House should meet at an earlier time during the adjournment, Mr. Speaker may give notice that he is so satisfied, and thereupon the House shall meet at the time stated in such notice, and shall transact its business as if it had been duly adjourned to that time; and

That, in the event of Mr. Speaker being unable to act owing to illness or other cause, the Deputy Speaker or the Deputy Chairman of Committees shall act in his stead for all purposes of this order.

● (1210)

[English]

He said: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this motion is to allow the House to resume the adjournment which was begun on July 27, and which had lasted only for a short period when the House was summoned back to deal with some important measures. The House took up the problem of the rail strike, which was causing much difficulty in the country, and enacted the legislation required to end the strike and to make sure that the problems between the men and their employers could be solved in an orderly way without further disruption and difficulty for the country.

The House also dealt with several important measures aimed specifically at assisting those whose income levels may not have been adequate to enable them to cope with current increases in prices, particularly of food. The House dealt expeditiously with a measure to increase family allowances for each child receiving allowances in Canada to $12 per month, effective October 1 and for the balance of the year. The measure is to be effective until the new and improved family allowances program, which is on the order paper, can be implemented.

The House also dealt with two measures relating to old age pensions and guaranteed income supplements and to the superannuation of public servants. It introduced a different type of escalation relating to the first piece of legislation mentioned, providing for an escalation immediately on quarterly basis, and in the case of the second piece of legislation mentioned introduced a more generous form of escalation into the pension plan.

The House also dealt with a crop insurance measure, which was passed through all stages, and it gave second reading to a measure relating to the Canada Pension Plan and to one relating to residential mortgages. That is a further measure which may be of some assistance in dealing with the costs which must be borne by people who are interested in buying a dwelling house for themselves.

The House, as well, witnessed announcements and decisions by the government in relation to other matters which will deal with rising costs. I think specifically, perhaps as the best example, of the action to introduce a larger consumer subsidy which, together with some other measures, has resulted in the avoidance of a five-cent increase in the price of a loaf of bread, and of the measure with respect to milk which proposes to make available up to five cents per quart of milk consumed in Canada.

The House was also happy to hear the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) saying not long thereafter that an arrangement had been reached with the province of Quebec which assured that the effect of this measure would result in a benefit to consumers, inasmuch as there would be an avoidance of an increase in the price of milk in that province. We all look forward to arriving at similar arrangements with other provinces and other parts of the country. Today, the House also witnessed the tabling of the ways and means motions dealing with the export tax on oil. An announcement with respect to this matter had been made earlier.

In proposing that the House resume the adjournment, let me say this: It is well to note, and this is not well understood, that when the House adjourns and members return to their constituencies, by no means do they all automatically go on vacation. Indeed, the adjournment enables members to perform an extremely important part of their work, as they may spend time with their constituents, visit them and deal with their problems. Many members of this House, particularly the most dedicated, spend a great deal of time when the House is in session either in the chamber itself or in committees. As well, while in their offices, they attempt to deal with the problems of their constituents.

The member of parliament is in many ways an ombudsman. He is a troubleshooter. He is a man who deals with the problems of people who come to him for help. A member often deals with problems which may have nothing to do with his parliamentary role. But because of his role as a member of parliament, as an elected representative, he may undertake to act in such matters. This means that there is a heavy load of work for so many of our members who fall into that category, who are dedicated to their work in parliament, that is serving their constituents as well as they can.

It is important that these and other members be away from time to time from this chamber and back in their constituencies, so that they may deal directly with the people whom they serve. It is important for that aspect of the member's work to be understood, so that the time the members spend away from the House of Commons is not misunderstood and so that their reason for being away from the House is not misinterpreted.

I believe, therefore, that the motion which I have moved ought to commend itself to all members of this House. In this way, we may have an opportunity to visit again with our constituents, to travel across the country, and then return on October 15 to take up the business of this House, having by that time had this additional contact with Canadians and with their views.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I agree with what the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang) said about the dual role of the member of parliament. As well as fulfilling his functions here, the member has responsibilities in his home, in his constituency and in other parts of the country. For that reason I want to compliment the Liberal government for bringing forward this motion, as I suspect very few of them look forward to going home and facing their constituents, in view of the record of inertia and incompetence which this government has gained in the last few weeks.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baldwin: We will not oppose the motion which the Minister of Justice has moved. It is the responsibility of the government to propose the motion and, as I say, we are not going to oppose it. Nevertheless, I want to take a few minutes of the time of the House to make some comments on what has been done.

First, although the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and other members of the government tried to create the impression that the government had decided to recall parliament to deal with the rail strike and the other problems related to inflation and the economy, it ought to be noted that, actually, the government was dragged back to this House, kicking, screaming and struggling. It had to deal with the rail strike, a matter which had been incompetently handled. I will not go into that now.

In any event, it is not the government that calls the House back into session; it is Your Honour. Your Honour does so, after consultation with the government. The government must assign reasons to Your Honour. I have no idea what went on between Your Honour and representatives of the government, but I would venture any amount of money that not one word was said about inflation and ways of dealing with inflation. I suspect that the government said to Your Honour that it was necessary for parliament to reassemble in order to deal with the rail strike. That was quite proper. However, when at a later date the Prime Minister, with that modesty that ill becomes him, tried to suggest that the House of Commons was called back to deal with the crisis of inflation and economic problems of the country, that was just so much hog-wash. That is what I call it. That that is correct is evident if one looks at the special order paper for Thursday, August 30, and at the special order standing in the name of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Munro), being an act to provide for the resumption and continuance of operations of railways.

● (1220)

On August 31, the leader and members of my party, the leader of the New Democratic Party and members of the Creditiste party demanded that the government tell us what they were going to do. We did not find out anything. It was only on September 4 that the Prime Minister, with his famous press release and appearance at a press conference which was delayed hour after hour while he and his advisers shifted positions and changed commas, periods and question marks to determine what should be in the statement, indicated the government had any serious intention of looking at the problems of the long-suffering people of this country caused by the failure of this group of extinct volcanoes. That is not the right word. They never were volcanoes, but they are extinct. As a matter of fact, the government House leader had to obtain consent from the Conservatives, the NDP and Creditistes to introduce the legislation which was finally dealt with by this House.

Today, a very indefatigable member of our party, the member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall), prodded the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald). I admit he has had some assistance from time to time from the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). Because of that prodding, because this session was called and because this House was in being, the minister was finally persuaded to make a statement about veterans' benefits. I would venture to say, and if members opposite are honest they will agree, that if this House had not been called into session, that statement would not have been made.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Béchard: Who called the House into session?

Mr. Lefebvre: That is hypothetical.

Mr. Baldwin: None of the other legislation would have been passed. It was minimal. It is not the kind of legislation that goes to the root of the problem. But we do not minimize this. It has had a useful effect. To some extent, it will alleviate the consequences of the inaction of this government. We approved it and to some extent improved the bills, just as this party improved the labour legislation which was introduced in order to persuade the workers to return to work. If it had not been for the amendment of this party, I am confident that the rail strike might still be in existence today.

[Mr. Baldwin.]

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Wishful thinking.

Mr. Baldwin: Under those conditions, it has in a limited way been a useful session and has been of some benefit to the people.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baldwin: Before my friends opposite applaud, let them hear me repeat that if it had not been for the actions of this party and the opposition generally, we would not have had the other legislation. There is no question about it. The government was prepared to adjourn this parliament on August 31 when the bill to deal with the resumption of the operations of the railroads was passed. The government had no intention of pressing on with other legislative measures. I can tell by the way members opposite are eyeing me that they know I am right, and approve of what I am saying.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lang: Your eyes are dim.

Mr. Baldwin: For example, that honourable tropical typhoon, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Macdonald), who rages and rampages across this country creating havoc and discord, would not have done anything with regard to the energy problems of this country. The minister still has a lot to answer for what he has done. However, what was done was because this House was in session. Members of the opposition, exercising their rights and privileges, challenged this government and something was done.

I have checked through Hansard. On August 30, the first day we met, there was no statement on energy from anyone on the government side. A question was asked by a member of this party, the hon. member for York East (Mr. Arrol) about the supplies of gasoline fuel in eastern Canada. The minister responded in his usual negative fashion. The next day, the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas) presented a motion under Standing Order 43. However, it was not until Tuesday, September 4, after the legislation dealing with the rail strike had been passed, that any statement was made. That, of course, was the statement by the Prime Minister. It was an ad hoc improvisation, hastily conceived, without any consideration as to the consequences. I am not going to debate the substance of that now. I probably would not be permitted to do so. There will probably be an opportunity to do so later. Let there be no misunderstanding. What the government did was hastily done, ill prepared and without any regard to the consequences. There was not that degree of preparation and consideration that was required.

When the Prime Minister made his statement on September 4, he did not even know whether the controlling of exports of oil would be done by means of a tax or a marketing board. It was only today, when the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources tabled the Ways and Means resolution, that we were made fully aware of the situation. This is a most shocking, improper and unconstitutional way of dealing with an important subject of this kind.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baldwin: I do not now challenge the right to tax. There may be constitutional issues, I do not know. I will not raise them at this time. I think I can say that members of this House know that the representatives from Alberta are reasonable and moderate people.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baldwin: Many of the attempts by this government to deal with the effects of inflation have been levelled at western Canada. Alberta has received a shellacking. Albertans, and certainly their representatives here, are confident that if the government of Alberta had been given a reasonable opportunity to sit down and talk with the Prime Minister, the minister or his officials, they could have worked out an arrangement which would have had the desired effect. However, this was not done.

Did the government know about this crisis? If not, they are guilty of gross negligence. If they did not know about it and did not do anything, they are guilty of gross incompetence. If I had an hour and a half, I could quote numerous illustrations to show they are guilty of both of these.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baldwin: All that was required was that degree of consultation and discussion that usually takes place between two civilized groups of people. That was not done. One can well understand the Alberta government and people being angered and annoyed. I am in hopes that some arrangement will be worked out for the benefit of the people of Canada in general, and of the people of Alberta in particular. I must say I am shocked and annoyed by the way in which the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources has conducted himself in his dealings with respect to this important issue at the present stage in our economic affairs. The minister and the government have apparently determined to proceed by way of taxation.

● (1230)

There was a situation in 1948 when the then minister of finance announced a tax by radio. The present minister did so by means of a press release. He indicated in a press release that a tax would likely be imposed on the export of crude petroleum and that details would be announced later. I remind you, Mr. Speaker, that in 1948 an interesting debate took place in this chamber. The right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) took part in it as did the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). Even some supporters of the Liberal party also took part and, to their credit, criticized the Liberal government strongly, taking the position that no taxation could be imposed without the consent of parliament. Nowadays, supporters of the Liberal party do not believe this. They believe taxation is imposed by the grace of the party and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner). That is their attitude.

Mr. Foster: Be serious.

Mr. Baldwin: This tax is to come into effect on October 1. The motion before us says we shall not come back until October 15. Will there be a budget then, will there be a ways and means resolution? It seems most unlikely. What kind of debate will take place on the issue? Will the government impose and collect the tax in the interval? I know that when the Minister of Finance in his budget presentation brings down ways and means resolutions there is a general assumption in the country that they take effect as and from that date. This situation is, of course, without foundation in law. In the United Kingdom a different situation prevails because there is a statute which says that a ways and means resolution has the effect of law until legislation is passed. I say it is a shabby way for the government to conduct itself in connection with this affair. It will have much to answer for when a debate ultimately takes place, and I am not speaking only about the substance of what is proposed.

Finally, I would repeat what I said earlier. We do not intend to oppose this motion. We have pressed the government, both in and out of the House, to introduce measures which in our opinion would go to the root and substance of the economic crisis which affects the people of Canada, a crisis which before many months have passed will result in a great deal of misery and unhappiness. The government has made it clear that its only answer to this situation is contained within the legislative program which the Minister of Justice recited today. We think this program is most inadequate. We believe there are other things which ought to be done. We have outlined our proposals in the form of opposition day motions, in the course of debates and in the course of questions asked during the question period. We have made it plain that we are completely dissatisfied with what the government has proposed.

Nevertheless, it is hon. members over there, sitting on the treasury benches, who form the government. They alone have the right to introduce legislation touching financial measures which could go to the root of the problems facing us. We on this side of the House have done all we can. It is our intention now, if this motion passes, to go to the country—not as we would like to go, in an election—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baldwin: —but to tell our story to the people of Canada in our constituencies in all parts of the country, to talk to Chambers of Commerce, farm unions, to those engaged in industry and advise them that this is an incompetent government, that it is incapable of governing and one which remains in office only because it is buoyed up by hon. members to my left. I do not intend to be critical of the New Democratic Party. Its members have a constitutional right, if they choose, to continue to support the government, and it seems plain that with such support the present administration is likely to stay in office until at least some time in the coming year. This is a matter between the NDP, its conscience and the voters of Canada which the party will have to face.

For our part, we believe we can now serve a more useful purpose by attempting to persuade the people of Canada to add their pressures to ours so that when we do come back on October 15 the government, at long last, may have some measures to introduce which would help the long suffering people of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I do not think anybody in this House needs to be coy or apologetic about admitting that it is sensible and reasonable for members of parliament to take a break at this time and spend the next three weeks in their constituencies consulting with their constituents and learning more about their problems.

I do not think there is any need to beat about the bush; I do not think the people of Canada will misunderstand us. It was reasonable to have a summer vacation during which we were able to visit our constituencies again and live with our constituents. And this vacation having been interrupted for some four weeks, it is perfectly reasonable that it should now be resumed. I have no hesitation in saying that my hon. friends and I consider the motion entirely in place.

I must say I was delighted to hear the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) admit that some useful legislation has been passed in the last two or three weeks. It is not often I hear members of the Conservative party make such an admission. The fact is we have spent these three or four weeks very usefully, and the measures which have been passed are measures of benefit to the people of Canada, especially to those on whom the burden of rising prices is greatest. It was worthwhile forcing the government to make the statement it did on September 4, and then going on to deal with the legislation.

The hon. member for Peace River seemed to take credit for this having been done. I chide him as good naturedly as he has chided others in this House: if my memory serves me correctly, this parliament would have been brought down two or three weeks ago if the hon. member and his colleagues had had their way, without any of the measures to which he referred becoming law.

Mr. Baldwin: We would have brought them down in a better form.

Mr. Lewis: The easiest thing one can do—and I am as guilty of this, I suppose, as anybody else—is to persuade oneself of the truth of a proposition that is invalid to the point at which one begins to believe it. The hon. member for Peace River, along with members of the press gallery, keeps saying that the NDP has kept the government in power.

Mr. Woolliams: Who else has done so?

Mr. Lewis: Hold your horses. We made it clear what our policy in this parliament would be. I think the people of Canada ought to know that there have been important occasions in this parliament when, if the Conservatives had really had the guts to bring down this government, they could have done so. We made it perfectly clear from the beginning of this session that we would not under any circumstances vote for the bill giving the corporations the added tax concessions that were promised in May 1972. For many weeks my very pleasant and charming friend—and I hope he is my friend because I have very great affection for him—the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) spoke in terms that suggested that his party, too, might vote against the measure. If they had voted against the tax measure giving added concessions to the corporations, the government would have fallen months ago; but when it came to the crunch and they had to decide whether or not they wanted to go to the country or stay, the Gallup poll made them hesitate and their corporate friends stopped them.

• (1240)

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lewis: Then, two days ago, on Wednesday, they had another similar opportunity. For weeks and months we had been making clear that we would vote against the bill setting up the new housing mortgage arrangements because, in our view, that bill was aimed at private housing in the market place and was not going to be of any value at all to the ordinary Canadian, that it was only of value to investment companies. Again we made clear throughout that we were going to vote against it. But when the crunch came again the Conservative party was no longer interested in bringing down this government; it was interested in making sure its investor friends would continue to make the profits they have been making.

Let it be clear as we adjourn this part of the session that we have been consistent throughout. We said from the start that we would do our best to make this Parliament work and to produce useful measures for the benefit of Canadians. I am proud of the role that we have played in this regard with other members of this House. Although my experience in this House has not been a very long one, encompassing merely some ten years, it is my view that since last January, having looked back through Hansard to study parliamentary history over the years, we have had one of the most productive sessions Canada has ever had as well as one of the most useful.

I should just like to take a few more minutes to talk of the future for a moment instead of the past. I believe that just as all members of parliament will be using, I hope, the next three weeks to spend some time with their constituents, the government will take a serious look at the programs it has announced and which remain to be completed so that we come back on October 15 with some coherent policies in all those areas.

It is of the utmost importance that the five cents a quart of milk subsidy which the government announced, which we asked for before the announcement was made by the government and which was announced clearly in response to our demand, will get to the producer and the consumer of Canada and not to the processing corporations.

I am delighted with the arrangement that has been made with the province of Quebec under which it looks—we have to wait and see whether in practice it will be the case—as if this five cents will indeed go to the consumers in Quebec. I hope that the same kind of arrangement will be made in every other case where arrangements are possible. If there is an area where the five cents does not get to the consumer, I hope the government will have the courage to withdraw that five cents subsidy. We ought not to add to the profits of the processors; any subsidy paid out of the federal treasury should be used to protect the producers and consumers of this country.

The same is true of the very considerable subsidy to wheat. It is true the subsidy was taken in two stages, $1.25 at first and then it was raised to $1.75. But that is not an inconsiderable subsidy. When we return in October we expect the government to have evidence to show that this subsidy to wheat has indeed gone to reduce or to hold the price of bread, that it has helped the farmers of this country, and that none of it has gone to add to the profits of the large flour mills and bakeries.

In the same way the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) ought to get off his horse about the Food Prices Review Board. He has been saying for months, both in the House and outside, that if some gouging is shown to be taking place, that if some injustice is proven, that if there is some infairness seen, then he will take action to present legislation to parliament to deal with it.

I tell the Prime Minister, even though he is not here, that in all of my days of studying the history of law and the effect of legislation I have not heard anything more fatuous. One of the great values of laws on the statute books is not that they punish but that they are there, that their presence on the statute books hold people back from doing harmful things to others. It is not just the fact that there is a law on the statute books providing that somebody may be punished or taxed; it is the fact that there is on the statute books an expression of the moral thrust of society at a given time which is of great value.

If the Prime Minister is at all serious and sincere about stopping injustices and inequities from which the consumer now suffers at the hands of the monopolistic, or, if you like, the oligopolistic system of distributing food where a few large corporations control the largest part of the market, or at the hands of processors of food who have a concentration of productive power of immense proportions, the Prime Minister ought to bring down legislation to strengthen the Food Prices Review Board on the very day we return here so that every corporation in this country will know that, if they do gouge the consumer, there is a law to deal with them.

I plead with the government to reconsider its position on this point, and to have legislation ready when we come back (a) to strengthen the Food Prices Review Board and to give it power to roll back unjustified price increases; (b) to strengthen the board in order to widen its scope beyond food and into other areas which very greatly affect the living standards of Canadians; and (c) to provide for penalties against people or corporations who gouge the Canadian consumer in a situation of great difficulty.

Without citing any figures—I did that some time ago in this House—if you study the profit picture of Canadian corporations it becomes obvious that, while the ordinary people of Canada are feeling the pinch of the rise in the cost of living, the corporations of Canada are having a profit bonanza at the expense of Canadian consumers.

Mr. Howard: They are doing the pinching.

Mr. Lewis: As my colleague suggests, the corporations are doing the pinching. I plead with the government to consider that suggestion.

Adjournment

I hope the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gillespie) will take another look at the foreign investment bill which has gone through committee and is a vast improvement over the bill we had two years ago, a bill that our party was determined to stall and did stall. And it is a good thing for Canada that we did. I suggest he ought to take a look at the bill again, because from what I read I understand the Syncrude arrangement is a massive sellout of a very important Canadian resource which will probably be a major source of oil for the Canadian people in the 1980's. I hope that the reasonable and moderate members of this House from the province of Alberta, and I accept the word of the hon. member for Peace River in that regard, although I would suggest they are reasonable and moderate in something else, will not mind me suggesting that from what I have read I have come to the conclusion that the Syncrude arrangement will mean that this is a sellout of at least 80 per cent of ownership to four foreign corporations. In fact, there are three foreign corporations, as the fourth member of that consortium is mainly a consortium of the other three. So, there are really three foreign corporations in the picture.

● (1250)

These three corporations will own 80 per cent only if the Alberta government uses its option arrangement to take 20 per cent of the equity. If the government does not take advantage of that arrangement these three large foreign-owned corporations may own even more than 80 per cent of the equity, and again this country, this time through the actions of a provincial government, will be pursuing the route we have pursued for years, selling Canada's rich resources to foreign corporations, giving them and them alone the power to dictate the future economic development of this country.

I ask and I plead; I demand, if you like, that the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce take another look at his bill to see whether it covers the kind of situation that has developed in Alberta and, if it does not, be prepared to amend it in order that it will. We in this party see no reason at all why the federal government should not take an active part in the development of so important a resource, and buy out, not necessarily all of the interest of private corporations, but a large part of this interest in order that the federal contribution and involvement together with the Alberta provincial involvement will mean Canadian control of the oil sands development in Athabasca and the oil sands development which I hope will come in Saskatchewan.

Indeed, in the last few weeks and months, as I suggest in a question I asked the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Macdonald) earlier, this government through the minister, and partly through the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), has announced bits and pieces of a national petroleum policy, and that is all we have really had on a number of very important matters, much of which policy we demanded before it was announced.

I certainly offer every support for the two-price system and for the export tax so long as the government of Canada deals fairly with the governments of Alberta, Saskatchewan and British Columbia, where the petroleum products originate, and so long as these provinces get the major part of that export tax we are entirely in agreement with it. We are also in agreement with building a pipeline to Montreal to serve the Quebec and Atlantic provinces market.

All that has been visible has been bits and pieces of various strands of policy. Neither the Prime Minister nor the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources has as yet come before parliament to give a coherent, comprehensive and related statement as to what is the policy of this government in this all-important area of petroleum development in Canada. I demand on behalf of my colleagues and myself, as suggested in a question earlier today, that the minister prepare such a statement when he is studying the Syncrude situation so that we can learn of the details. I think the Canadian people have a right to know the details about the equity and financing of this Syncrude extraction plant as well as the supporting facilities.

Exactly what is the situation there? I do not know, but I have reason to have some very serious suspicions. I think it is important for members of the press and members of parliament to know this, and I hope I am wrong, but from reading about it I understand there is going to be a total investment of roughly $1 billion; that $750 million or $770 million is to be borrowed at some rate of interest; that there will be about $250 million in actual equity in this development, and that the Alberta government is apparently intending to take $200 million of that equity, which is 20 per cent of the total of $1 billion.

If that is the case, then three large foreign-owned oil corporations are to have 80 per cent of the equity of the entire development with an actual investment of $50 million plus the $50 million or so they have spent prior to this stage. So that for a total of about $100 million they will have 80 per cent equity of $1 billion, and that is a pretty good deal for the foreign oil corporations and a pretty bad deal for the people of Alberta and the people of Canada. This is obviously another rip-off.

We ought to know whether the facts are as I have just suggested or whether they are different. I hope they are different and I will not be insulted at all if I am proven to be wrong. I have a very profound suspicion, derived from experience, that I am not likely to be wrong in this respect at least. We have a right to know whether the tar sands oil will be exempt from export controls and from internal price controls, as these three large foreign-owned corporations and the Conservative government of Alberta are now demanding. They demand that they be exempt from the export controls and the two-price system. We want to know what the government's policy is in that regard. It would be a completely unjustified concession to these large corporations, at the expense of Canadians, if that were done. May I call it one o'clock.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. It being one o'clock I do now leave the chair until two o'clock p.m.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

[Mr. Lewis.]

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, to speak at two o'clock on a Friday afternoon is practically to speak to oneself. At least one is then assured of an attentive audience. One of my colleagues suggested I should simply call for the motion because we may at this time have a majority in the House. When we rose at one o'clock, Sir, I was dealing with the arrangement in Alberta with Syncrude oil. I had covered two points. I wish to mention briefly two or three others.

As I have already suggested we are very concerned about the extent of foreign ownership in that situation and when we come back in three weeks we hope that both the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce will have had occasion to study the arrangement in much greater detail than they or anyone have been able to do until now. Most of the details of the arrangement are still in the hands, pockets or minds of the premier of Alberta and the heads of the private foreign corporations involved. However, we hope that by October 15 the federal government will have had an opportunity to study the details and be able to inform the House and the country to what extent the arrangement places a very important natural resource in Canada, one that will gain in importance as the conventional oil reserves are depleted, in the hands of large foreign-owned and controlled corporations.

It is not often enough repeated in Canada, although perhaps I have repeated it often enough as has my colleague the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas), that these same corporations are world wide. The corporations which control the oil resources in Canada are not merely United States or British corporations. They own and control the oil resources in South America and in the Middle East. They own and control most of the energy resources in all the western world. They are and have been for decades—and I do not apologize for using a rather harsh word—a vicious international oil cartel. One is always caught by them in a pinch which it seems to me the people of Canada do not sufficiently realize.

People talk about the price of a gallon of oil at the wellhead. In most cases they are talking about a price which the company charges itself, because the oil goes from the wellhead to its own refinery. In many cases, so far as gasoline is concerned, the gasoline goes to the company's dealers whom they control as if the dealers were their slaves. It is this kind of world control of the western world's energy resources that these large multinational corporations now have. They are a great danger to the world. More and more countries in the western world, as well as elsewhere, realize that danger and more and more people at the United Nations and elsewhere are demanding some international steps to control the immense power these world wide corporations have.

Throughout history, these multinational corporations have been as responsible as any one cause for overturning governments, for undemocratic coups d'etat of one sort or another all over the world. Their money has gone into upsetting systems of government, particularly democratic systems, wherever the democratic system played havoc with their particular international power and profit interests. As my friend says, this economic control world wide also exercises immense pressure on the international monetary market. Among the worst of the gnomes of Zurich actually are these world wide corporations which use the international money market for the purpose of additional profits by buying and selling futures and speculating, not in terms of buying actual dollars but in the way in which they handle the product they sell across the world. It is this kind of concentrated power with immense social consequences that we are now allowing to control yet another basic resource of the Canadian people.

I believe that anyone who thinks about Canada's independence at all, or anyone who is concerned about the future of this country and its ability to gain sufficient economic, political and social independence to build its own distinct society, must be concerned about the deal that has now been announced by the premier of Alberta. That he made such a deal I am not surprised. I am not surprised that a leader of the Conservative party would think that was the right kind of deal to make, because that is quite natural with the particular social philosophy of that party. However, I think the people of Canada ought to recognize it for what it is. I believe it is the duty of the federal government, which is necessarily, or ought to be, concerned with the entire problem of national energy and a national energy policy, to look into this aspect of foreign ownership to see whether or not the investment bill which has left the committee is sufficiently wide to cover this kind of arrangement.

● (1410)

Above all, Mr. Speaker, and I say this with emphasis even though I may not raise my voice, we do not see any reason at all why the federal government, either through the CDC or directly through public investment at this end, should not in that way make certain that at least the control of the Athabasca tar sands development will be in Canadian hands.

Mr. Paproski: In the hands of Alberta.

Mr. Lewis: We ask the government of Canada to look at that, in partnership with the government of Alberta—let me say to the hon. member for Edmonton Centre (Mr. Paproski)—and in partnership to some extent with the corporations now involved. I am not suggesting that either one of those be excluded, but instead of 80 per cent being in the hands of private, foreign-owned corporations, at least 51 per cent ought to be in the hands of the provincial and federal governments of Canada so that we can control our own future.

We want to know how that involvement will take place. When we return on October 15 we want to know from the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources whether the export tax is the only step he will take with regard to assuring orderly marketing of petroleum products in Canada, or whether he will also go ahead with the national marketing board. I plead with him to do so. I plead with him that that is the one way to assure supplies to the Canadian people, to place the supplying of Canadian needs in priority over exports. We ought not to be worrying every second day about exports to the United States.

We ought to have a distinct policy, which the Americans and everybody else in the world can understand, that we are determined that Canadian needs for oil products and natural gas will be a priority for the oil products and natural gas that the Canadian people now have at their disposal. We suggest that this can only be done through a national marketing board, through a Canadian petroleum corporation, and we want to know what the government's ideas are on these things.

When we get back on October 15 I hope the government will lose no time in referring the election expenses bill to the appropriate parliamentary committee. It has been lying there ever since it was passed on second reading quite a number of weeks ago. In my opinion, and in the opinion of my colleagues, it is a very important piece of legislation, one of the very best pieces of legislation in that area that has been suggested in Canada to date. Many hon. members have expressed their wish that it be passed and, as I say, I hope the government will lose no time in referring it to the committee.

When we compare this election expenses bill with the bill that we were presented with in the last parliament we see that the differences are immense. It was the same President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen), Sir, who presented the bill in the last parliament and presented the bill in this parliament. The bills are so different that I am certain the same man is different. There has been some real change in the minister and in the government. I do not suppose it takes much genius to think that the results of October 30 had something to do with the great change, moral, social, spiritual, and above all political, that has taken place in the ranks of the government.

We were glad to see on the order paper the bill for the new family allowance plan, and I was personally delighted to read in the press of the family allowance program announced by the Premier of the province of Quebec. We think we and the other Canadian parliaments are doing the right thing by the families of Canada, particularly in a rising cost of living situation. I hope we will not lose time in putting that bill into law, so that the families of Canada who have children will be guaranteed the assistance which it will provide for them.

Finally I hope that when we return on October 15 we will not lose much time in receiving the amendments to the Canada Pension Plan from the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) which we have been promised, amendments not only to remove the 2 per cent limit on escalation but also to increase the ceiling on allowable earnings under that plan. Even more important I hope that parliament, the government, the official opposition, we in the New Democratic Party, and the Social Crediters, will have the wisdom and vision to insist on lowering the pensionable age both for the old age security pension and for the Canada Pension Plan. There are many spouses whose husbands have taken pensions but who themselves are not yet of pensionable age, and as a result these people are living in a type of degradation that our country ought not to allow.

In short, Mr. Speaker, there are these areas of action that can be effective. They are not simplistic slogans about dealing with the cost of living such as have been presented to us, and about which the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) and his deskmate, the hon. member for Peace River have boasted. I have said what I think about that plan on numerous occasions. But there are areas of price control that could be effective and that we should undertake. There are areas of assistance to people who are badly hurt by the cost of living in which we can take effective action. We should take those steps. Further, there are areas of control of Canadian resources in which we should act to protect the future independence of this country. I am not sure how my hon. friends to my right, physically and politically, will act when we return on October 15. I do not know whether they will continue to be the paper tiger they have been since last January, threatening to bring the government down, but not taking the opportunity to do so when it is presented to them.

I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, so far as my colleagues and I are concerned, that we declared our policy at the beginning of the session. In fact, we declared it last November before we knew exactly which party might be the government. We meant that policy, and we intend to pursue it. I hope that when we get back on October 15 this parliament will continue to be productive in the interests of the people of Canada, and as long as it is productive in those interests this parliament, so far as we are concerned, is doing a job of work which ought to be supported.

Mr. Reid: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, on Wednesday last the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond (Mr. MacInnis) raised a point of order concerning the adequacy of an answer provided to him by the Department of Regional Economic Expansion. On investigation, I found that that point of order was indeed well founded. I now have a revised answer. I would ask the permission of the House to present it to the House now, and to have it printed in Hansard as a proper response to the hon. member's question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I think the suggestion is probably a reasonable one, because if the parliamentary secretary had to wait until we passed the adjournment motion then the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond (Mr. MacInnis) might not get his answer until October 15. Is it the pleasure of the House to accept the suggestion of the parliamentary secretary?

Mr. Stanfield: Yes, Mr. Speaker, without any commitment that we agree it is a satisfactory answer.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The suggestion of the parliamentary secretary is accepted.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNTIL OCTOBER 15, 1973

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Lang:

That, when the House adjourns this day, it shall stand adjourned until October 15, 1973, provided that at any time prior to that date if it appears to the satisfaction of Mr. Speaker, after consultation with the Government, that the public interest requires that the House should meet at an earlier time during the adjournment, Mr. Speaker may give notice that he is so satisfied, and thereupon the House shall meet at the time stated in such notice, and shall transact its business as if it had been duly adjourned to that time; and

That, in the event of Mr. Speaker being unable to act owing to illness or other cause, the Deputy Speaker or the Deputy Chairman of Committees shall act in his stead for all purposes of this order.

● (1420)

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, French singers sing a song entitled: Everybody wants to go to heavens but nobody wants to die. It could be said that in this House, all members want to go on holidays, but few of them want to say it, few of them dare admit it.

As a matter of fact, for at least two weeks, there has been a backstage game to know whether the government would succeed in passing unanimously and without debate an adjournment motion to send members of Parliament back on holidays or whether a debate would take place. We are now debating that matter and undoubtedly, just as all other hon. members, we also need to be close to our constituents, to meet with them, to know what they think of the measures introduced by the government and to know what they think about our position as regards the government's measures. We always try to keep in touch with our constituents but this is very difficult while the House is sitting. We have only weekends to do it, which means that a member who wants to keep in constant touch with people in his riding must be working seven days a week. That is what we are doing.

During this special session which was called together to deal with the railways strike, the present minority government has taken advantage of it to calm down the people's protest and introduce a few social measures which, undoubtedly, would not have been put forward in other circumstances or would have been introduced much later. And even though we, members of the Social Credit party, have supported the passage of this social legislation, knowing that it could enable Canadian families to face inflation, the ever increasing cost of living, we never believed that these improved social security measures would do anything at all to solve the inflationnary crisis that we endure at present.

Nothing in this social legislation will prevent the cost of living from going up; perhaps the contrary will happen because those higher social assistance payments will have to come from somewhere either through heavier taxes, through borrowing or by cutting the expenses of other departments. Whatever happens, some will suffer from them.

We have also supported the grant program introduced by the government as regards milk, wheat, and bread. We would have preferred—our leader, the member for Témiscamingue (Mr. Caouette) requested it strongly—that this subsidizing be granted throughout the food market as bread and milk are not the only items that were or will be more expensive. People say that the price of milk, following the payment of this grant, has gone down by 4 cents a quart. I do not quite agree with that because care has been taken to readjust the price upward a little before this grant was made. So they raised the price then reduced it by 4 cents and said that the price of milk had been cut. I do not agree with this point of view.

The same thing happened with bread. In my region, the price of a 24-ounce bread suddenly jumped by 11 cents and, after the government grant, it was cut by 6 cents. After that they said: We have cut the price of bread by 6 cents.

Once more, I do not agree with this point of view. But in any case, if a grant was made for two items this subsidizing should have been granted for all food items because in the area of meat, mainly beef, the prices have increased sharply and people thought: If we can no longer eat meat we will have a way out with spaghettis. Now a report from the Plumptre Commission states that the price of durum wheat has increased or will increase by about 300 per cent which means that spaghettis will cost much more. So low income families will be unable to turn to that other source of food.

It has also been reported that the price of navy beans which are used to make pork and beans has increased by 100 per cent. Once again, we will be unable to get away with it.

This therefore means that in almost every case where food is concerned, substantial price increases have led families to experience a depression similar to that of the thirties. At that time, there was not enough money; today money is circulating, but a price explosion has reduced the purchasing power of money and families are in conditions similar to those during the depression.

Those who are lucky enough to hold a steady and remunerative job can still get off scot-free, but those who have a fixed income, who are fighting against illness or disability, those who have no other source of income but the money paid by the government are certainly at a disadvantage.

As for the present Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), you could say that he is now in the second stage of his leadership. During the first stage, he had a strong government with a large majority, but he now leads a minority government. To complete his experience, he only needs to occupy one of the seats on the side of the opposition. Then, the experience would be complete. He would see both sides of the picture.

Still I wonder if there would be that many changes. For some time, and especially since the last elections, the official opposition has blamed the government in all kinds of ways, particularly these last few days, for its nonchalant approach to the problem of inflation.

However, the official opposition has been careful not to suggest effective solutions, which leads us to believe that if the roles were reversed, we would be faced with the same situation.

This debate, which seems to have turned into a throne speech, does not mean that this session is finished, but that it will probably continue as of October 15. There will still be many things to do.

For instance, in the field of farm production, with regard to eastern Canada, there is still much to do to make the feed grain transportation subsidies efficient, which would help to lower the production cost in the east and to make the farm production of the eastern regions more competitive.

There is also a problem that is far from solution, unemployment. The government is still fighting two major problems: inflation and unemployment. If it wants to fight inflation too strongly, it increases the rate of unemployment, and if it wants to fight unemployment, in starts inflation. Finally, it succeeds in stopping neither one nor the other.

According to the morning papers, the government is already trying to find excuses for the high increase in unemployment to be announced soon. It has been said that it is caused by the influx of young people on the labour market. The pretext is given that the young do not register, or do so in lesser numbers, at colleges and universities.

It is a fact that fewer do so, or fewer than were expected, but the reason for this is that they do not have the money required to attend university or college. Having been turned down for scholarships or loans, the young people of Quebec are forced to drop out of school and find work. This is a serious problem. In fact, through its inaction and lack of foresight, the government is delaying these young people's studies.

There is another problem—of which the government, to my mind, is partly responsible—and that is the fact that the efforts of the government to ensure slightly better family income have been hampered by rising interest rates. I do not wish to belabour the point because only recently my leader, the hon. member for Témiscamingue, discussed the issue very advisedly in the House and blamed the Governor of the Bank of Canada for setting the prime rate of that bank according to the wish of the chartered banks rather than the needs of the Canadian people.

Again, that is one of the causes of inflation and the Bank of Canada is not playing the role it should be playing as required by the Parliament of Canada under the Bank of Canada Act.

[Mr. Laprise.]

Mr. Speaker, there is still talk about inflation. We will have to talk about it until measures are brought in to solve that problem. I am not yet convinced that the government is as anxious as it says it is to fight inflation because that very inflation suits the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Stanbury). In fact, every increase in prices results in a tax increase. I showed that recently in the House by producing bills for lumber, furniture, clothing and other manufactured goods. Every increase in costs results in higher taxes, in more revenue for the government without their having to raise the percentage of those taxes. It becomes a hidden tax increase, and that suits the government.

Those are so many points that should be discussed and dealt with, especially after the House resumes on October 15 next.

Solutions will have to be found before the end of the year so that the Canadian people may start 1974 not only with the hope but with the assurance of deriving benefit from the resources available in Canada and from the production that industry, agriculture and the Canadian workers are prepared to put at the disposal of the Canadian consumers.

So, steps will have to be taken in order to allow this production to satisfy the needs. That is what the Social Credit Party of Canada has always called for and we shall keep on doing so both in the House and throughtout Canada, and we shall take advantage of this recess to tell the Canadian people about it.

[English]

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, in my remarks on the debate on whether we should adjourn until October 15, I want to raise two matters. The first matter, and I say this without casting any reflections, could have been dealt with in the question period. I wanted to address a question to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), to which he could respond. I shall now put this forward as a representation. I hope that he and the government will give it consideration and that there will be a reply when the Prime Minister returns from his visit to the mainland of China.

There are in my riding, and in Vancouver, Toronto, Montreal and many cities of Canada, number of Canadians of Chinese origin. My colleagues of the NDP and I have expressed some concern about this. For some time, we have supported the idea that the government should seek to establish on the mainland of China immigration offices, in order that those Chinese in this country who have relatives living on the mainland of China should be able to take full advantage of the services of government. We hope that when the Prime Minister visits China, that he, in conversation with the officials and the government of the People's Republic of China in Peking, will seek to have opened, perhaps in two areas in mainland China, immigration offices, and establish there representatives of the Canadian government immigration service.

The homeland of a large proportion of people of Chinese origin in Canada is the province and city of Canton, in south China close to Hong Kong. In recent years people of Mandarin origin, as we loosely call them, as distinct from Cantonese, have been coming to Canada from north China. People of Chinese origin living in Canada find it almost impossible to sponsor mothers and fathers and close relatives who are living on the mainland of China, because there are no immigration facilities in China. They should be given hope, by way of the establishment of immigration offices in a couple of places on Mainland China, so that those Canadians of Chinese origin or people of Chinese origin who are living in Canada and want their relatives to come over here to live, may have the opportunity of sponsoring those relatives, and of having those matters dealt with in the normal course by an immigration department, according to the immigration policies of Canada.

The other thing I want to mention has to do with the motion before us. Not long ago the Leader of the Opposition said—I gather his comments were as the result of conversation he had had with other members of the Conservative party—that the House might as well adjourn, because there is nothing of any consequence on the order paper.

Mr. Baldwin: No, there was nothing of consequence to the economy.

● (1440)

Mr. Howard: I did not hear that chitchat.

Mr. Baldwin: I will stand up and repeat it if you want.

Mr. Howard: The hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) had an opportunity to make his comments a while ago. With great blessing, he placed his hands on the motion, wrapped himself around it and said, yes, let's go.

Mr. Baldwin: No.

Mr. Howard: Is the hon. member prepared to sit next week?

Mr. Baldwin: If the government will produce some economic legislation and you are prepared to vote for it.

Mr. Howard: The hon. member is quite adept at speaking from a sitting position. I suggest the Conservative party made the declaration we might as well pack up and go home because there is nothing of consequence on the order paper.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order, as I am entitled to do when I am being improperly quoted. I said we were prepared to accept the adjournment motion because the government does not have anything on the order paper which indicates a willingness to deal with the economic problems of this country. With that slight correction, the hon. member is correct.

Mr. Howard: There is an item on the order paper dealing with foreign investment in this country. That deals with economic matters to a far greater extent than most people realize, If the hon. member for Peace River says that is not of consequence in so far as economic matters are concerned, then I was correct in my opening remark.

Mr. Baldwin: If so, it was the first time.

Mr. Howard: That is in keeping with the position the Conservative party has taken on corporate matters. My leader, the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis), mentioned the two occasions when legislation was before this House and the Conservative party endorsed, kissed and hugged it. It was in their interest to do so because it benefited the corporate elite of not only this country but the world.

There is another item on the order paper which is of consequence. I would be quite happy to stay and deal with it. I am sure the Conservative party would also, although they did not say so. They did not feel it was worth while mentioning. I am referring to the subject matter of the motion of the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald) which deals with the aboriginal rights of native people. Since the debate concluded on April 11, members of the Conservative party have not done a solitary thing to have that debate revived. We tried a few days ago, with no success. If it were revived and came to a vote, I am sure the Conservatives would vote for it because they did so in committee.

Action on the part of the government on the question of aboriginal rights has been rather shabby. Under the Standing Orders, the government has kept that motion covered. It has refused to bring it forward, although there have been many opportunities to do so. The government would sooner introduce a motion to adjourn than call that motion for discussion and debate. It would only take a few moments to have a debate and vote on the motion. Parliament could express itself on the question of aboriginal rights. That is a denial of the responsibility of the federal government.

In Vancouver in 1969, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) in a most offensive way called the Indian People "historical might-have-beens". Incidentally, he was speaking to a group of Liberals. He declared the government would have no concern or give any consideration to the concept of aboriginal rights. He rejected them. He clung to that position until October 30 last when there was a transformation in the minds of the Liberals in many areas. As a result of the Liberals being soundly defeated, even though they are still in office, the Prime Minister and others in the cabinet felt it necessary to change their stand on aboriginal rights. They now recognize there is some legal base with regard to the claim of the Indian people. That is not good enough.

The Prime Minister, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Chrétien), the government House leader and all others in the cabinet still refuse to bring that motion forward so that parliament can express itself on the question of aboriginal rights. Their attitude is that one man, the Prime Minister, should decide whether this House should vote on the question of aboriginal rights. He has decided we will not have that right.

The Liberal party has a bleak record with regard to aboriginal rights. This dates back to 1910 or 1911 when Sir Wilfred Laurier was Prime Minister. At that time, the government wanted the Indian people to take their case to the Privy Council in London. At that time, the Privy Council in London was the final court of appeal. The order in council that was passed set up the mechanism for the Indian people to take their case to the highest court.

However, the order in council was worded in such a way that even though the Indians might win their case before the Privy Council, they must agree to lose it. In other words, they had to agree to sign a treaty on the same basis as treaties which were signed in the early days, namely that they would get $5 a month, a sack of flour, 100 feet of twine, a bit of gunpowder and a new suit of clothes every three years. That has been the attitude of the government since that time with regard to aboriginal rights.

Although the government has now been forced to admit these people perhaps do have these rights, it is now denying its constitutional responsibility. The Prime Minister and the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development say they recognize the validity of the force of the proclamation of King George III, which was made long before Canada was founded as a nation. They recognize the proclamation states we should treat with respect the claims and rights of the Indian people of this land.

When Canada was formed as a nation in 1867, a phrase was included in the British North America Act that the parliament of Canada has exclusive jurisdiction over Indians and lands reserved for Indians. In 1867, parliament committed itself to carrying out the proclamation of King George III, which the Prime Minister and the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development now say they recognize as being valid. Although they say we have that constitutional responsibility and recognize the validity of the proclamation of King George III, they are not going to do anything about it. They want to shunt that responsibility to the provincial governments. Even though the provincial governments do not have anything to do with this question, they want them to say where they stand before entering into any discussions or negotiations.

I think it indicates once again the deceitfulness of the Liberal party in dealing with the native Indian people, and particularly with their claims to aboriginal and hereditary rights. It reflects once again the deceit started by Sir Wilfrid Laurier in 1910 and 1911, a deceit which was repeated in 1913, which was repeated in 1915-16 with the Royal Commission, which was repeated in 1926 before the joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons, which was repeated in 1948, which has been repeated every single time the question of aboriginal rights has come up for discussion and consideration. Since we are in the position of being a House of minorities, and since there is now one opportunity available to us to force the government to deal with issues on their merits, as has not been the case in the past when they had a majority on their side, we should not rest until parliament has been allowed an opportunity to declare itself on this issue of aboriginal rights and set the stage once and for all for a decent and responsible settlement of the aboriginal rights claim in this land.

As I said before, I think it is shabby and shameful that one man, whether the Prime Minister or the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, should set himself above parliament, should set himself above a committee of parliament and say: I don't care what the committee recommended in connection with aboriginal rights, I shall not let parliament have any say about it at all. I had hoped that somehow or other the Conservative party might have combined with us—the few of us who are interested in this subject matter—to say to the government: No, we shall not permit you to adjourn until we have dealt with the question of aboriginal rights in a declaratory way, until parliament has had a say about it. I hope—and this is all I can do at the moment—that commencing on October 15, when we come back to resume this parliament, we shall deal with item No. 32 on the order paper, the report of that committee endorsing the concept of aboriginal rights and calling upon the government to enter into meaningful negotiations for a settlement of that matter. I hope the government will have the courage to say: yes, we are going to resume the debate on the motion standing in the name of the member for Kingston and The Islands (Miss MacDonald) and seconded by myself. In this way, parliament would be in a position to declare its view on this issue, and thereafter, whatever government came to office, whether a minority or a majority government, parliament would have spoken, not just one man in government.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Mr. Howard: On division!

Motion agreed to on division.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order to determine from whoever is government House leader, or whoever is acting in his place, the intention of the government with respect to the business of the House until four o'clock, approximately an hour and four minutes from now.

Mr. Reid: Yes, Mr. Speaker. It is our intention to call the amendments to the Parole Act now, and when discussion of that measure has been concluded we would call the Co-operative Credit Associations bill, to which we hope second reading will be given. At that point, consultation could take place and if there were agreement among hon. members not to proceed with private members' hour we would be prepared to adjourn at 4 p.m. or when the Co-operative Credit Associations bill is passed through second reading, if that so happens.

PAROLE ACT

APPOINTMENT OF ADDITIONAL AD HOC MEMBERS TO NATIONAL PAROLE BOARD

The House resumed, from Wednesday, September 20, consideration of the motion of Mr. Allmand that Bill C-191, to amend the Parole Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I hesitated to rise because I thought the House leader for the official opposition party might have been able to arrange for the House to consider a subject in which I am particularly interested. However, I gather negotiations to that end have not been fruitful.

Bill C-191 seeks the addition to the National Parole Board of ten ad hoc members. This raises the whole question of what the National Parole Board has done over the years, what society has demanded of the Board, and whether or not the parole board has been doing what we hoped it would do in relation to the weeding out of the inmates in our penitentiaries. Looking back over the history of our penitentiaries, we find that no matter what the National Parole Board has done in relation to the prisoners the numbers of prisoners returned to custody after forfeiting parole has remained over the years relatively even. For the last ten years the level has remained relatively steady at around 10 per cent.

It is interesting to note that in 1958, in the first year of the board's operation, this rate was considerably lower. I asked some of my colleagues why it was almost half of the current figure. They pointed out that a lot of the people in the penitentiaries at that time were exceptionally good risks and that in the first year of its operation the board was able to draw from a group of prisoners who obviously would not have been there had the board been able to operate earlier. I think it is a fact that today there are too many people in the penitentiaries and too few people being let out on parole. It may be that parole is not a satisfactory arrangement. Obviously, people who are interested in penal reform are looking at systems alternative to the parole system we use in Canada.

It is fortunate that the parole board has the help of some blue chip organizations which operate in this field including the John Howard Society and the Elizabeth Fry Society in conjunction with community services run by provincial governments and others, to see that a prisoner who is released on parole has a chance of being accepted in the community. There are other steps which should be taken. I have been interested for a number of years now in an organization in Hull, Quebec, which refers to itself as Ex-Cons. I have never heard the hon. member for Hull (Mr. Isabelle) say anything about this organization. I have not heard him ask the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) for support for this organization. He may not know about it. If he does, he certainly has not been helpful. But this is an organization which is unique. It is made up solely of ex-convicts from federal penitentiaries, assisted by one or two pulp and paper companies, the provincial authorities and a large number of people who are interested in helping the ex-cons to help themselves.

Although this has been fairly satisfactory, every time I raised the matter with the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand), the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang) or any government department that might have money available to put into the organization, I was told it was too dangerous, that it obviously would not work. In Hull, which is not the biggest city in this country, they have an enrolment of at least 1,000 ex-cons and their record is exceedingly good. They have also assisted other prisoners in finding jobs, rehabilitating them in the community, finding housing, getting various projects organized, and they have helped themselves very well. This organization is not supported by the penitentiaries branch. It is not even supported by local members. But I suggest hon. members take a look at it because it has succeeded in creating for ex-cons an environment in which they can ask the questions they want to ask and get the assistance they need from people completely sympathetic to their position.

The parole board is very much like a pyramid with Mr. Street at its apex. People who have studied the National Parole Board over the past ten years will be well aware of the limitation of the chairman of the board in the field of public relations. If he reads in a newspaper that one of the decisions made by the board turned out to be wrong, he becomes scared: the whole parole board from top to bottom becomes scared—but nothing happens. According to the figures, every time there is an accident and a public outcry ensues because of a decision of Mr. Street, there is a great reduction in paroles granted that year. Yet there will always be accidents because these are people who have proven that on at least one occasion they were not compatible with today's society. This in turn means the Solicitor General will have to have more penitentiaries built, and once these institutions are constructed they are filled.

I remember the discussions that took place, long before St. Vincent de Paul was closed, about new maximum security institutions. In that penitentiary at that time there were very few people who were complete maximum security prisoners, confined in cells or in the hole, segregated from the others because they were dangerous to the population in the penitentiary and certainly to society if they were to escape. There were eight or ten of these people at St. Vincent de Paul, about the same at Kingston, and I suppose a few at other maximum security penitentiaries. A maximum security penitentiary was built in Montreal to replace St. Vincent de Paul. This was a maximum maximum security prison accommodating about 350 persons, but obviously there was no need for the number of maximum maximum security accommodations that were provided.

I should like to move a six months' hoist on the second reading stage of this bill because I am opposed to appointing additional people to the parole board just to fill more jobs. The whole question of parole should be examined to see whether we are accomplishing what we have in mind. I heard one of the hon. members from Calgary last night saying he was very much opposed to back-to-back temporary leaves. I also heard the Solicitor General say the same thing. But did either of these members ask themselves why back-to-back leaves were being granted? A leave of three days has another leave of two days added so these prisoners are allowed to work in the community. This was being handled by the penitentiary service because the parole board was not doing the job it was supposed to be doing. Do the minister and the hon. member from Calgary not know that this practice was established because of the failure of the parole board to meet the needs of the day?

I suggest that the members of this House seriously consider putting on the parole board some of the officials working for the penitentiary service who deal with prisoners. I have in mind officials from the classifications branch who deal with 15 to 20 prisoners, not in the custodial sense but, rather, who deal with their problems not only in relation to their sentence but the environment from which they came and the environment to which they will be discharged. It seems to me that no minister can feel very proud of the operations of the National Parole Board or the penitentiary service until he begins to solve the problems of people that cause them to go to jail in the first place. He must understand the social conditions that created the environment which resulted in their going to prison. I refer in particular to the large influx of prisoners into penitentiaries today because of drug offences. Members of this House have had their heads in the sand on the matter of drugs. Other countries have examined the problem and done something about it. We have examined it very little and have done very little about it, though I am appreciative of the fact that some judges have used their own discretion on the subject of parole.

I shall not move an amendment on second reading, but I do suggest to the minister that unless he is prepared to make some changes to the membership of the parole board, amendments will be moved at committee stage or in the House. If no changes are made to the bill, then certainly I shall not support it.

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Mr. Peters: On division.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

CO-OPERATIVE CREDIT ASSOCIATIONS ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING DEFINITIONS, MEMBERSHIP, INCORPORATION, OBJECTS AND POWERS

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (for the Minister of Finance) moved that Bill C-183, to amend the Co-operative Credit Associations Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

● (1510)

[Translation]

Mr. J.-Roland Comtois (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, this bill provides for some amendments to the Co-operative Credit Associations Act which governs the operations of all federally incorporated cooperative credit associations, as well as central provincial credit unions that come under the act by becoming members of such a corporation.

At the present time, there is only one federal corporation, the Canadian Co-operative Credit Society, set up by a special act passed by Parliament in 1953, members of which are the provincial central corporations of British Columbia, Saskatchewan and Manitoba. The Ontario Co-operative Credit Society was a member until its recent merger with the Ontario Credit Union League Limited, and the new organization thus created has submitted an application. Some applications have been received from Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island, and we have reasons to believe that others are forthcoming.

This bill is essentially a response to the request made by the federal agency and its members to amend the act by updating it and allowing the Cooperative Credit Associations, which are at the present time or may eventually be governed by it, to meet more effectively the changing needs of the cooperative movement, while maintaining adequate financial guarantees.

When the Co-operative Credit Associations Act was initially introduced in the early '50s, it provided not only for formation and operation of Co-operative Credit Associations at the federal level, but granted a federal charter to provincial branches which wanted to be incorporated under this act. This was an excellent association for establishing standards aimed at maintaining provincial branches in a sound financial position. I must say that this is the second time amendments have been proposed to this act since it was adopted. The preceding amendments brought forward in 1969 were also intended to help the association and provincial organizations to pursue their healthy and orderly progress under the conditions prevailing at that time.

The present amendments have four main objects: First, increase the possible membership in the Canadian Co-operative Credit Association as well as in the other associations which could become corporations holding a charter from the federal government. Secondly, increase the investment powers of the co-operative credit associations so that they would be more in accordance with those of other financial institutions. Thirdly, extend other co-operative powers to enable central credit co-operative associations to attend more satisfactorily to the needs of the credit co-operative movement. Finally, to provide for the possibility of granting urgent loans to meet the liquidity needs on the part of the central credit associations and of the provincial organizations created in order to grant a financial aid to the credit corporations.

Several other proposals are included in this bill, proposals which do not belong to the four main groups mentioned above. One of them provides for an amendment in order to legally establish credit cooperatives at the federal level. At the present time, new credit cooperative associations can be incorporated only through a special law of Parliament, although the amendments brought forward in 1969 to the Canada Corporations Act provided for the possibility of bringing some changes in the federal laws governing federal associations by means of patent letters. The proposals to amend the constitution methods are similar to those incorporated during the last few years into the legislation on insurance, trusts and loans. One should also mention here a project to extend the credit cooperative associations' control system, so as to enable the superintendant of insurance to administer the assets of an association under the guidance of the minister, should it be necessary, so as to protect the association. The superintendent would also have the power to administer temporarily the assets of an association if it turned out that some assets were lacking or were not reported properly. These provisions rank with the existing legislation on other financial institutions which depend on the insurance department.

A number of other amendments are also proposed, Mr. Speaker. Some result from the earlier amendments or they are purely formal. To be more specific, some amendments are rather related to the substance. From this point of view, it is advisable to recall the amendment which would bring from 12 to 18 the maximum number of members in the board of directors of an association. However, the directors representing credit unions should form the majority of the board.

The present law does not include any provision allowing a central credit bank of a province to disaffiliate from the Canadian Co-operative Credit Association and to escape the Co-operative Credit Associations Act. Provisions are presented which will from now on allow disaffiliation when the minister is convinced that the interests of the federal association and of its members are protected. One of the other amendments proposed relates to the acceptance of the association's auditors and would allow the members of an association to dismiss an auditor and to appoint another one. In the case of dismissal, the superintendent of insurance should be advised.

Presently the law forbids a provincial central bank under the Co-operative Credit Associations Act to accept deposits from another province or to grant loans outside the province where it has been established. We propose to cancel this prohibition in order to give more flexibility to provincial central banks.

Other proposed amendments would enable the members of the Canadian Co-operative Credit Association to vote by proxy, to use the amortized value in the evaluation of federal and provincial government bonds and to give the board of directors of an association more latitude in determining the net annual profits which should be affected to the reserve for unforeseen events.

Allow me to remind you that the changes proposed in this bill were requested by representatives of the federal association and of the affiliated provincial associations. They were also studied as a whole, in an official way, with the provincial authorities, with which close relations should be maintained so that the provision concerning the lender of last resort that I have just described, is applied satisfactorily. They have expressed their interest and their desire to co-operate.

The government is aware of the expansion and of the growing financial strength of the credit movement and of its past and future contributions to the economic development of our country. An obvious indication of its strength and of its importance is the fact that the total assets of local credit unions amounted to more than $7 billion at the end of 1972.

Mr. Speaker, I am convinced that all hon. members will want to deal quickly with this bill which fulfils the requests made by the co-operatives and credit managers concerned.

[English]

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Comtois) has pretty well read what I have in my notes on what I consider to be the ambit of this bill. I suggest it covers many things and is not a simple or uncomplicated bill. It has many clauses which touch upon a great number of the activities on the financial side of co-operative societies. It does not merely deal with producer co-operatives but, rather, with the Co-operative Credit Associations Act.

I have been struck over a period of years by what seems to be a full-cycle turning of the wheel. The origin of co-operative credit associations, federations and the national association resulted from the need of people with rather limited means who wanted to help one another by lending money for business or residential purposes, and gradually they grew.

● (1520)

Three years ago we established a co-operative mortgage association that differs very little from a standard mortgage operation. We know from that that there are documents which a credit union or any one of its organizations signs with one of its members as a result of a lending transaction. This differs little from the standard type of mortgage with a mortgage company, insurance company or bank. We know that many co-operative credit associations actually carry out banking functions. They are the heart and core of what we call the credit banks, ce sont les Caisses Populaires. They are under another name in other provinces. There is one major difference. No longer are they small organizations. There are rumours to the effect that one co-operative organization actually controls one of the chartered banks in this country. There is a difference as a result of the changes under the Income Tax Act. These co-operatives do not pay any income tax.

There is a reference to the granting of powers of investment to these co-operative credit associations similar to those under the Canadian and Foreign Insurance Companies Act. They are going down the same road. However, again they are not taxed. They do not pay any income tax and yet a mutual insurance company owned by the policy holders, which in effect is a co-operative but comes under the Canadian and Foreign Insurance Companies Act, is taxed. Personally, I should like to see what the lines of demarcation and conditions in respect of these organizations are. Is it right, for instance, to say that a co-operative organization in the field of insurance or investment similar to a mutual insurance company should be taxed because it is a standard insurance company, and that the other ought not to be taxed under the Income Tax Act?

It was the proud boast of those who supported the changes in Bill C-259 that there should be equity among taxpayers. I have just shown where there is great disparity among taxpayers. I should like to see developed, as a result of the amendments under Bill C-259, what has been the expansion of the co-operative giants in certain fields, particularly in western Canada, so that we may know whether that has been for the good of the public.

At the time of the revisions to the Bank Act in 1966 it was my contention, which I have repeated, that our Bank Act, being restricted only to the one type of bank, the chartered banks, does an actual disservice to the country and that the Canadian Bank Act should cover every institution that carries out a banking function. If any organization, whether a co-operative, mutual, public or private merchant bank, carries out the banking function, then the activities of that organization should be subject to some part of the Bank Act, not all of it, the same as the chartered banks. They should be subject to control under the Bank Act. Banking is a federal prerogative, and there it should be.

As in the case of co-operatives, we see how these organizations can move in under the deposit insurance privileges extended to banking institutions primarily. This provides for any member of a co-operative credit association to have recourse to the Deposit Insurance Corporation as a lender of last resort in the event it becomes involved in difficulty. I do not object to that because it means the depositor of a trust company, bank or credit union, where there has been a misfortune, error or, perhaps culpable dishonesty, at least shall be protected. This is the purpose of it.

I have outlined these particular questions which I think we want to examine in committee. I hope we will be able to have the representatives of the National Credit Co-operative Association before us to go into these questions, because before long we will see another revision of the Bank Act. I feel certain in my mind that my thesis of 1966 has been reinforced by the experience of the past few years, and that we will have to have a comprehensive banking act passed by the parliament of Canada in order to place all financial institutions at the same high level of performance which would be for the protection of the Canadian public. So, Mr. Speaker, I think we are satisfied to have this bill go to the committee where it may be given the careful examination that it deserves.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise for only a minute or two for the purpose of saying that the New Democratic Party is prepared to support the second reading of this bill so that it can go to the appropriate committee to be studied. Although it is a bill of some 40 pages, with a great deal of technical and complicated language, it contains, as the parliamentary secretary pointed out, three main features. In the first place, it opens to co-operative credit associations certain doors that at present are closed to them. In the second place, it facilitates the incorporation of co-operative credit associations. It makes it possible for this to be done by letters patent, instead of the necessity of always having to obtain an Act of Parliament. In the third place, it extends the powers of the Superintendent of Insurance with regard to the surveillance of co-operative credit associations so as to protect the interests of members of such associations.

It is obvious from the remarks just made by the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) that when the bill gets to committee there will be a rehash of the old debate about the position of co-operatives, whether we are talking about co-operative credit associations, consumer co-operatives or producer co-operatives in respect of income tax. This raises the whole question of the rationale of co-operatives as opposed to private business. I do not intend this afternoon to enter into that argument. I simply say to the hon. member for Edmonton West that it will be joined when the bill gets to committee.

[Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West).]

● (1530)

We would have been prepared to go a little further with this bill today, but the general understanding is that it would be more satisfactory for it to go to the appropriate committee. Therefore, we are prepared to agree to its second reading at this time.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

TRIBUTES TO HON. MEMBER FOR PEACE RIVER AS HOUSE LEADER OF OFFICIAL OPPOSITION

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I should like to have the indulgence of the House briefly, before suggesting that we indicate there seems to be agreement that there be no private members' hour and that we might see both four o'clock and five o'clock simultaneously, to say a word or two about one of our hon. members here present.

The hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) has served as the House leader for his party for as long, I believe, as I have been here. I have now learned that he has been given strategic and other duties and that his ordinary duties in the House have been entrusted to other hands. We will naturally await the new hands with expectation and interest. However, I do not think the occasion should pass—and I know that if the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) were here he would not want it to pass—without saying how much hon. members on all sides of the House have appreciated the contributions of the hon. member for Peace River in his role as the House leader for his party.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lang: I know that nothing I may say will tame him in his role as member of parliament for Peace River in the future. Indeed, as minister responsible for the Wheat Board I fear he may have some additional time and effort to direct to that interesting area. But certainly we have all observed his great ability not only to co-operate and facilitate the business of the House, when that was the clear objective in mind, but also his ability to engage in our numerous points of order and problems of procedure, particularly when Your Honour had found at first glance that there seemed to be no case at all. Then we have heard an immediate and studied examination of the problem by the hon. member for Peace River. Indeed, but for the fact that someone as experienced and as understanding as Your Honour could see what was quality of argument and what was argument in substance, he would have carried the day every time he spoke.

His interventions were often witty and almost always directly to the point. Quite often they were the cause of the kind of pain which is completely permitted and expected in this place. I simply want to say, on behalf of all of us, how much we have enjoyed his performance in that role. It has added greatly to the quality of the work of parliament. The hon. member has been, in that role, a dedicated member of parliament and I now wish him well in his new role as the hon. member for Peace River.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, as a rule, when statements are made by the various House leaders in this House of Commons I have to await my turn as the House leader of the third party. This is a red-letter day for me because I get in second.

Mr. Marshall: You deserve better.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I thank the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall) for his suggestion, but may I say that it is a distinct pleasure for me to join with the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang) in expressing these words of appreciation of the work that the hon member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) has done as the House leader for the official opposition. It has been my pleasure to know the hon. member for Peace River since, I believe, 1962. We have been associated as members of that local union known as the House leaders' club since 1968, and indeed we have become not just colleagues in that role but warm and close friends.

The Minister of Justice is quite right in his assertion that the hon. member for Peace River has been most useful when it has been necessary to achieve co-operation to speed up the business of the House. I may say he has also always been very effective when the aim was to slow down the business of the House. In any case, not only has he done well as the spokesman for his party in the inter-party negotiations that have had to take place, but he has made a contribution to the effective working of this House of Commons as a parliamentary institution.

It is good to know that we are not indulging in some kind of obituary or final eulogy, as if this were the end of the road. I see by press reports that it is a beginning, the hon. member has been given a post that as a matter of fact may be superior to that of House leader, for he may be the eminence griesé who determines where and how this House goes from here on.

I was sorry when I learned a few weeks ago that the hon. member for Peace River was planning to leave his present post. I suppose I have to say that I have seen a number of Conservative House leaders come and go. Some of them I have been glad to see go, but not this one. So I join with the Minister of Justice in this tribute to the hon. member on the effective piece of work he has done I also extend my congratulations to the hon. member for Saint John-Lancaster (Mr. Bell) who, I understand, is to become the House leader for the Progressive Conservative party. We all know him well, and I think it will not be a difficult job at all for the other three of us to break him in to the role which he takes over.

I am glad that the Minister of Justice raised this point, and we shall look forward to an appropriate response from the distinguished and very honourable member of this House, the member for Peace River.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I am deeply moved by the sentiments that have been expressed. As a matter of fact, if I have time after making these few comments I hope I will be able to get back to the media to revise some of the things I have been saying to them in the last half hour.

Let me say at once that I have thoroughly enjoyed the experience I have had over the past five years. It has been a long time. I will have from now until the middle of October to revert back to trying to become an ordinary human being, after being House leader, and this I say with deference to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) who, of course, has managed to undertake the task in his stride. I call him an extraordinary human being. During the course of our experience as House leaders, associating with several House leaders from the government side—at times the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang) and others—we have tried to establish, through the medium of the House leaders' group, a "usual channels" type of institution to correspond with what we see in the United Kingdom but with a particular Canadian application.

I am one of those who are thorough believers in the virtues of this institution and what it can do. I know that as Your Honour sits up there you must sometimes, especially during the question period, wonder about the quality of those virtues. I am sure the government will agree with me when I say there is a need to have in a House of Commons an opposition to challenge, to scrutinize and to elevate the adversary system in the House of Commons so that the benefits which accrue to the people of Canada through it are not left in doubt. This is the point we have been working toward, and I think we have made some progress.

We have thoroughly enjoyed our relationship with the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen), and I think it was a good thing to have had the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Macdonald) as government House Leader. He certainly constituted a very great challenge to us from time to time to work and achieve our objectives.

To make this a better House of Commons so that we can carry out our duties as the agent for our party is essential, but at the same time we must make sure that the business of the House, which is the business of the country, goes forward. This has been our objective. I am able to say that this has been an enjoyable, profitable and useful experience. I am quite convinced that my successor, who will have the confidence of our party, will continue in the same way as I have in trying to achieve those objectives.

I have enjoyed appearing before Your Honour, although I have not always won my arguments. Your Honour's decisions are not appealable, of course, but I am not suggesting we would win any appeal. I recall that when I was a very young lawyer practicing in Peace River, one of my first cases was defending a man who was charged with bootlegging. I thought I made a very good defence before the magistrate and I was young enough to feel that my argument should be accepted. The magistrate found against me, and I thought he had made a particularly bad decision. When he had left the chair, I jumped up and said, "Your Worship, I intend to appeal this case". The magistrate was half way to the robing-room but he turned around and returned to his chair saying, "Mr. Baldwin, I will hear your appeal right now". That is the position we are in with Your Honour.

I have enjoyed the arguments; and Your Honour has, of course, had the advice of his trusted officers at the table. I think we are making progress in changing the jurisprudence of this House. I have enjoyed every bit of it and I look forward to staying for a considerable period even though, I might say, Mr. Speaker, we may have some very important changes in where we sit in this House.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps, contrary to practice and tradition, the Chair might be allowed to add one brief word to what has already been said. This would give me an opportunity to express my personal admiration for the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) and the way in which he has discharged his responsibilities as House leader for Her Majesty's official opposition.

It is well known, and is part of the tradition of the House of Commons, that when serious problems arise or there is difficulty, the Chair should seek the advice of the senior members of the House. Certainly this has been my policy and a number of senior members of the various parties have been consulted from time to time. I see a number of them in the House at the moment. This includes, I might say, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), and obviously it includes the hon. member for Peace River. At all times the hon. member for Peace River has been helpful, kind and generous in the advice he has given me personally, and I have always appreciated it.

In the discharge of his duties, the hon. member has exemplified what I think is best in our Canadian parliamentary tradition. In his difficult role he has been strong and aggressive, as he is entitled to be and ought to be—but this has always been marked by the virtues which are those of a temperate and intelligent man, one who has been in all circumstances a highly civilized person. I think this is a virtue which is still important in this institution, and in my view the hon. member for Peace River has exemplified these virtues in past years.

This is not an obituary in any way, as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre said. Having occupied the high office he has in recent years, the hon. member for Peace River may soon expect to go higher. The only question is, how high will he be going? I hope that in the next weeks or months that decision will not be up to the Chair, unless it gives me an opportunity to replace the position which he held before.

I am sure we are all of one mind and one heart at the present time and congratulate the hon. member for Peace River. We wish him happiness and success in the continuing discharge of his duties, in the service of his party in the House of Commons, that of his constituents and of the people of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a word on this matter although it is difficult for me to speak about the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) because since I came to this House he has been such a close colleague and associate. I have leaned upon him so many times.

As you say, Sir, this is not an obituary. The hon. member will continue in the House and it will merely be a matter of changing his responsibilities somewhat. It is a very arduous task, a very demanding task to be the House leader of a party in this House. To be House leader of the official opposition is very exacting in terms of trying to anticipate what the government might be doing. I do not say that in any derogatory way that reflects upon this particular government, but in the nature of things the opposition does have to react in the sense that the government is in charge of the program of the House. The hon. member for Peace River has combined a very great knowledge of procedure and the rules with what I believe to be exquisite judgment and a judicious balance of aggressiveness, along with knowing just how far to pursue a point.

I recall that after the past election a member of this House wondered whether the House would come apart as a result of the balance of parties. Thinking back to bygone days when things were pretty rough here, and thinking they might be even rougher, the hon. member raised the point with me. But he was not concerned about its being a lively House; he was concerned about its disintegrating. I want to close by saying, Mr. Speaker, that apart from your own skill and judgment, one of the reasons the House has not come apart has been the parliamentary judgment and attitude of the House leader of this party. Without in any way neglecting his duties to his own party or his position in the opposition, the hon. member has never failed to remember his duty to the House of Commons.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I think there might be agreement to call it five o'clock.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: There is a suggestion that we adjourn. Perhaps before we do, I might remind hon. members that, according to long-established practice and tradition, the Speaker will be in his chambers for a short while for tea and crumpets.
